EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EGYPT—CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING SEIZURE OF SUEZ CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he is prepared to make a statement on the situation in relation to the Suez canal. Would he also advise whether, in view of the unprecedented and shocking conduct of the Nasser government, Canada ought not to join with Britain in condemnation of what has taken place there in a perversion of international contracts, and also indicate to Britain and the other nations Canada's agreement with the stand which they are taking to meet this situation?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the violation by the government of Egypt of an international convention governing the use of an international waterway so important as the Suez canal is, of course, to be condemned. Possibly it should be recalled at this time that the convention in question attempted to safeguard the free use of the waterway in war and in peace. In that sense, the convention was already violated by the Egyptian government when Israeli vessels were prevented from using the canal.

We are exchanging views with governments probably more directly concerned with this matter than the Canadian government because of their association with the Suez Canal Company. I think it would be premature for me to make any statement beyond that at this time, except possibly to repeat what I said yesterday in answer to queries from the press as to whether Canada had any interest in this matter. In reply to those queries I said that while Canada had no share in the ownership of the Suez Canal Company, nevertheless as a trading nation, and for other reasons I might add, we have a very real interest in the efficient and non-discriminatory operation of this waterway which is of such great and historic importance, both in peace and in war. I added that we would regret, and be concerned about, any action which interfered with such operation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Might I just add a supplementary question? Does not the minister consider that Canada, as a member of the British commonwealth, should have something to say on a matter that particularly affects the members of the commonwealth, Britain, Australia and New Zealand particularly, to indicate a degree of unity in regard to this matter?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we have already had something to say on the matter, as I have indicated. And I should add that our High Commissioner in London, since the announcement of Egyptian action, had discussions in London with the secretary of state for commonwealth relations, with the foreign secretary and with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom with a view, not only to ascertaining what United Kingdom policy is in this matter—and they are more directly concerned than we are because of their share in the ownership of the Suez Canal Company—but also to doing what we can to concert our attitude and policy with other commonwealth countries on this matter.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary question? A report in the Ottawa Journal last night indicated he had made a statement to that paper that Canada would be making no representations on the Egyptian nationalization of the Suez canal. I would like to know from the minister whether that statement is correct, and if so whether he does not think that, because this question is of such vital importance to the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and probably India and Pakistan as well, and France, and because of the position being taken by the United States beside those countries, Canada, too, should stand beside them and let the whole world know that she does?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think what I said yesterday to the press, certainly what I intended to say, was that we had not made any formal representations at that time to the Egyptian government. What we may or may not do in the future remains to be determined; but I believe also that the only governments that have made such formal representations at this time are the governments of the United Kingdom and of France, which have a very special interest through ownership of the Suez Canal Company and in other ways. I do not think at the moment that any other state, including the United States, has made such formal representations. Certain states, Canada is one of them, are consulting together to see what action, if any, should be taken by them collectively on this matter.

Mr. Green: Why should the Canadian government not make known today that Canada stands beside the United Kingdom and France in this trouble?

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Amongst the views which are being exchanged with the United Kingdom, will the minister, on behalf of the government, stress to the United Kingdom the importance of using the good offices of the United Nations in an attempt to solve this problem?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, our High Commissioner in London has already stressed that aspect of the question in his talks with the United Kingdom government.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—REPORTED EXCESSIVE OILING OF HIGHWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works or to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, whichever one has jurisdiction. It has to do with the No. 1 trans-Canada highway in Banff national park. I have had complaints about the authorities there oiling that portion of the road from Anthracite hill into Banff. They tell me it is just a sea of oil and that the tourists are greatly perturbed, and so is everyone else, because of the effect it has not only on their cars but on their clothing as well. The same thing happened before during the tourist season, and the minister took action in that regard. Surely it should not be allowed to continue at this time. I wish the minister would make some remarks about it.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I shall look into it, Mr. Speaker.

BRIDGES

BURLINGTON, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO CHARGING OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Reinke (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister tell the house whether there have been any further developments regarding a decision of the Ontario government to charge tolls on the Burlington skyway bridge, and its effect on the federal government's participation in the cost of that project?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the provincial government has decided to charge tolls on the structure, but I believe they do propose to construct it by themselves without federal government financial participation. There was a discussion yesterday in Toronto among the mayor of Hamilton, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Frost, Mr. Allan, the minister of highways, and myself. We discussed some of the aspects of this bridge as they apply to present and long-term civic planning. As far as I know, however, it is the intention of the provincial government to build the structure by themselves.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BEER—ACTION TO BE TAKEN CONCERNING ALLEGED COMBINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the government yet received from counsel any recommendation concerning the report of an alleged combine in the manufacture, sale and distribution of beer in Canada?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Not as yet.

HOUSING

PRINCE ALBERT, SASK.—INQUIRY AS TO RELAXATION OF MORTGAGE REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to redirect a question to the Minister of Public Works with reference to a complaint from the mayor of Prince Albert with regard to present mortgage regulations. Has the minister received that complaint and what is the attitude of the government with regard to a relaxation of the present regulations to the end that the detrimental effect upon house building across this country will be resolved to a great extent?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a letter, which I believe was dated July 20, and it has been replied to. No restrictions have been placed upon housing by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The fact is that earlier this year we increased the interest rate in an effort to encourage a greater flow of mortgage money into housing and it is expected the result will be a good housing program in Canada this year.

INQUIRY AS TO REDEVELOPMENT IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister received a copy of an order in council recently passed by the Quebec government and printed in the Gazette this morning and, if so, will that be sufficient to enable the federal government to complete its arrangements and make advances to Montreal for a slum clearance and housing project there?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I did receive a copy of the order in council. The situation is as I stated a few days ago. The premier of Quebec stated that in principle his government had no objection to entering into an agreement with the federal government for a slum clearance project and a subsequent re-housing project. It is now a matter for the civic authorities to come to an agreement with the provincial authorities and I presume steps are being taken to that end. I expect that in due course we shall have a proposal put before us coming through the appropriate channels.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): A supplementary question. Does the minister feel that complete agreement has now been reached and the necessary authorization given by the province in order to permit action by the province and the federal government?

Mr. Winters: No agreement has been reached. All I have so far is an indication of intention to sign an agreement.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

COLONEL BELCHER HOSPITAL, CALGARY—STATEMENT ON BOARD OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bow River asked for an explanation regarding the composition of the board of inquiry promised by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Bow River on Tuesday last. The board set up by the minister is a fact-finding body only which will report the facts to the minister. The minister did use the words "independent board of inquiry" as reported in Hansard for Tuesday, July 24, but he used the word "independent" in the sense that the facts of this incident would be collected by a board to be composed of members who were not directly involved in the incident. The members of the board, all senior officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs, are as follows: Mr. W. G. Roaf, regional administrator for western Canada, Dr. J. K. Mulloy, senior treatment medical officer, Calgary district, Mr. E. M. Scott, district administrator for Edmonton district.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. How can there be an impartial investigation when only those who are connected with D.V.A. are conducting the investigation? Surely they should be outside D.V.A.?

Mr. Bennett: These three officials who are collecting the facts will present them to the minister and I am quite sure that with their experience they will be able to collect all the facts.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They are officials of D.V.A.?

Mr. Bennett: Yes.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They can hardly be impartial.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Welfare branch—

Family allowances and old age security—

278. Administration, $2,693,059.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned last night I had been discussing a set of figures found in the report of the welfare council of Winnipeg. These figures, to be found at page 16 of that report, have to do with the amount of money which it is felt an old age pensioner ought to have in order to be able to live in Winnipeg in anything like comfort. The figures are as follows:

	Per month
Rent	$20
Food	30
Clothing	10
Church	2
Medical insurance or care	3
Memberships and hobbies	5
Transportation	4.50
Laundry	2

I had pointed out that those commodities or services are all produced in Canada and I believe that every item is produced in Manitoba. I had suggested that it is most fantastic that in a country with probably $28 billion of production this year and with vast potentialities for the production of food, clothing, shelter and practically everything else that Canadians ordinarily use, we should not be able to allow our senior citizens a sufficient amount of that production to give them the amount of money value called for in this set of figures.

I had pointed out the fact that although members of this committee had been talking about this matter of old age pensions for some time, mostly they had complained about the conditions which prevail but had not offered any solution whatsoever to the problem. Then I pointed out that the member for Fort William at a certain point, almost in indignation, I thought, rose and asked which one of the taxes, or something to that effect, we would suggest should be increased in order that we should obtain the money that is necessary to provide the senior citizens of Canada with the standard of living that I think everybody in this house realizes and agrees they should be able to have. I suggested that it would not be necessary to increase any taxes in order to provide the services and the goods which the elderly people need.

I mentioned the "made-beaver" which the Hudson's Bay Company used. These "made-beavers" were like coins. The largest one had a value of a mature beaver skin dressed. With these tokens, and the smaller ones made by dividing them into halves and quarters, the people in those days all through the west apparently took care of all their needs for the distribution of goods.

Then I referred to the scrip system which was employed in the stores in the towns near where I grew up as a boy in southern Alberta. I thought it might be interesting to give a little attention to that local scrip as probably embodying a germ out of which a method of distribution of goods to underprivileged could be developed without adding to the regular currency circulation of the country.

There were two stores in the little community of Cardston. At that time Cardston was a village of probably 350 people, with about 150 in the neighbourhood. One of the two stores in Cardston was H. S. Allan and Company, general merchants and store, and the other was the Cardston Co-operative Mercantile Company. Each of these employed a form of scrip.

Mr. Nicholson: What year was that?

Mr. Blackmore: I would imagine around 1896-7, and they continued to employ this scrip with considerable freedom until around 1905. The member for Peace River suggests that it was probably a little later, somewhere around 1910. Then it began to be rumoured that in using the scrip they were violating the currency laws of Canada. Consequently that was probably the main reason why the use of scrip gradually was discontinued, but there were merchants in Raymond, about 40 miles from Cardston, who employed scrip, I think, a little later than that.

What was the principle in scrip as used by, we shall say—

The Chairman: Order. May I with some regret break in at that point and state to the hon. member that we are not now discussing the principle of scrip? We are discussing the principle of devoting some $2,600,000 to family allowances and old age security administration. I should appreciate it very much if the hon. member would devote his remarks to that subject.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that technically you are entirely right but realistically you are entirely wrong. Yesterday we discussed old age pensions, and I think every member in this house would be fully agreed that we should double the old age pension. But everybody was agreed—I think including the minister—that the one thing we just could not get over was how to finance the increase. If, in discussing old age pensions, a member cannot discuss the methods of financing, we might just as well close this house up as far as finding a solution to the problem is concerned, and turn it into an afternoon social society, confessing immediately that we are just helpless and that there is no use. Why should people all over the country send a lot of people like us here to talk about problems which, even before we approach them, are admitted as being utterly unsolvable.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might say this. I think we all appreciate the great care which the hon. gentleman has given to the study of this question of assistance to the aged citizens of our country. Last night I had an opportunity of discussing matters with him after he had intervened and I am more confirmed than ever of that interest. I appreciate his position in trying to find additional ways of obtaining resources to meet these obligations. However, I wonder if he would not agree that the chairman was perhaps on strong ground when he suggested that there was another place to discuss the means by which this very desirable objective could be met. I do not want to be unduly restrictive on the hon. gentleman but I think he will be assured of my belief in his interest in this subject, and I want to affirm that great concern. But there is not at this moment an opportunity of discussing ways and means of how this financing can be adequately arranged.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire whatsoever to be out of harmony but I will make this point. If somebody had suggested that in order to obtain the needed money we increase the sales tax on some commodities, it would have been looked upon as being utterly in order for us to talk about that matter for probably three or four hours.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Blackmore: Oh, yes. No question at all would have been raised. The point raised by the hon. member for Fort William was a matter of financing. I imagine he could have gone on dealing with that matter for 15 minutes without being called to order. While I am perfectly ready to agree with your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and to do just as you say, I contend that on this particular topic the enforcement of that rule means that we turn this parliament into an afternoon debating society absolutely helpless to deal with the problem which we are discussing. I shall therefore be obliged to leave the matter up to you. But I will go on to say that if I could have just another two or three minutes to show how that scrip worked, I do not think it would be infringing greatly. It would not take very long.

Mr. McIvor: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: If I might continue, H. S. Allan and Company would have probably had $500 worth of scrip printed by some company and he would use the units of scrip to buy butter, eggs, poultry, boots, various vegetables, various grains, firewood and all manner of things that were produced by the community, and people could go in there with that scrip and buy out of the store what things they needed, including even home-made socks, bootees, home-made clothes and all things which the community produced; and the community was able to produce a wide variety of commodities in those days because they still were able for instance to make yarn out of the raw wool and to knit that yarn into clothing and so on. So, there was relatively a very extensive field for the use of that scrip. They went on with great success. There were units of that scrip which were in circulation, I will wager, for a year and a half. People did not hesitate for a minute to take that scrip for their eggs or butter or any other commodity they turned in. People did not hesitate a minute to accept scrip in payment for articles, for labour, one to another. It functioned just as well as Canadian dollar bills.

Now, my suggestion is that an organization could be set up in every city and town of any considerable size in this country, having anything like a wide range of productive potential, which would enable old age pensioners to be paid the extra portion of their old age pension in scrip with which they could buy commodities being produced all around the area. In this way I feel positive that, having the co-operation of the dominion and provincial government, as well as the local municipalities, we could find a solution not only to the question of giving our old age pensioners what they ought to have, but also the problem of giving our blind all they need as well as all other underprivileged in the nation a chance to participate more adequately in the productive capacity of the country. There would be a much greater production of butter, fruits, vegetables and of other commodities because of the possibility of selling those commodities for scrip. Now, in substance, that is the gist of my message. Unless there is something that I have not been able to determine I will assure the house that this system can work in every province of this nation with the greatest advantage and with tremendous savings to the taxpayers of the country.

Now, that is in substance the message I wish to convey. I should like now, for just a moment, and I am sure there will be no objection on anybody's part, to list again those needs of ordinary old age pensioners as the Winnipeg council enumerated them. The first is rent, $20 a month. I am quite positive that in no city in Canada can a person obtain a room that is fit even to house swine for less than $5 per week. That is pretty well settled. A person is extremely fortunate if he can get a room for $5, heated and with light and all the other things which are necessary. Then, there is food, $30 per month. Let every hon. member in this house just contemplate what the effect upon him would be if he could spend no more than $1 a day for food. That is a very serious thing to think about, especially if he had to eat in restaurants or other public eating places. What chance would he possibly have of nourishing himself adequately on a dollar a day? Even if he engaged in light housekeeping and cooked his own food, he would have the costs of cooking to take into account, like fuel.

The next item is clothing, $10 a month. Perhaps a person could clothe himself on less than that; I do not contend about that. Then, you come to church, $2. Is there any conceivable reason why a person who has been a faithful churchgoer and who desires to contribute to the upkeep of his church, should not go on contributing 50 cents a week merely because he has exceeded 65 years of age? Is he going to be denied the privilege of doing that all the rest of his days? I do not think anyone will say that $2 a month is excessive. Then, consider the $3 item for medical care, and bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that when a person reaches the age of 65, frequently he needs special medicine in order to keep well. He will be very fortunate indeed if he can buy the things which he needs to keep himself well for $3 per month. For example, there is now a little pill containing vitamins. One of these preparations is called parametes; we can buy 50 of them for $3.50. If we take one of these a day it is guaranteed to give us all the vitamins which the body requires. But there is $3.50, and that is only one of the things a person should have in an age like ours. It was different before we had learned how to make such aids as these tablets, but to have a person suffering from malnutrition today because he does not have the money with which to buy the blessings resulting from the work of modern science hardly conforms with any concept of good government. I think we will all agree that $3 per month is not excessive for that item. Then, $5.00 for memberships and hobbies. Memberships in clubs—is the old age pensioner, when he reaches the age of 65, and from then on until he dies, to be denied the privilege of being in a club and paying his club dues? Is he to be denied the opportunity to buy some wood or perhaps other substances to indulge in a hobby? If we say yes, we are making ourselves very cheap.

Then, there is transportation, $4.50. With the price of transportation at the present time, $4.50 is by no means excessive. Elderly people are at the very age when they could use transportation greatly to their satisfaction, and should use it. We come then to incidentals, only $5. Shall a person who has reached the age of 65 not be able to buy birthday cards for his children, not be able to buy Christmas cards? Those are just a few of the incidentals. Should he not be able to go into an ice cream stand and buy a dish of ice cream? Well, that is what we are condemning them to on $40 a month. Now, $2 per month is allowed for laundry. I think that is not excessive.

I do not think I will repeat the items, but let every hon. member go back over them in his mind and he will find that every single item—unless it should be the parametes or something of that sort—is produced right in this country. It is Canadian made. Why should people not be given access to the goods Canadians can make in abundance in any one of the wonderful provinces of this country? I suggest in all seriousness, Mr. Chairman, to the minister that we approach this matter with a positive attitude. We are doing too much negative thinking in our country altogether. We are rationing poverty when we have no right to think in terms of poverty in this land of abundance. We should be thinking positively. I will say this in reference to what the minister said. He felt that there was another place where I might more fittingly discuss this matter of financing. I am glad the committee and the chairman have permitted me to discuss it a little bit right here. Old age security is a subject we are all deeply interested in, but it is a problem which we do not know how to solve, and which I am sure every member in this house knows must be solved unless we leave our old age pensioners by the tens of thousands all over the country in penury and suffering, in malnutrition with resulting disease and early death. That is exactly what it means.

The Chairman: I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I will come on again later.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Holowach: Mr. Chairman, those who have taken part in this debate with respect to the senior citizens, the blind, and the handicapped people in our country have all repeatedly emphasized the need of increasing the pensions of those people, and I should like to join with them in their plea and ask that the minister reconsider the matter and give such increased pensions at this time.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Lethbridge completed his remarks, and I thought that he put across one point very well, namely, that we humans can certainly behave very strangely. Here we recognize the needs of those people and acknowledge that the time has come for parliament to consider and improve the inadequacies of benefits for those people, and yet we do absolutely nothing about it except perhaps next year when an election has to be fought. May I remind the minister that these pensions are the sole source of income and livelihood for many people in our country. How they manage to live on the pension is beyond me, and yet they must. It is unfortunate that the present administration has not been able to see its way clear to increase the pensions of those people this year, not as charity or a give-away program, but as a fulfilment of the guardianship responsibilities which we have toward those people.

We acknowledge that we have done a great deal for those people, but I think too little acknowledgment is paid to the fact that of all the segments of our society it is those people who are benefiting least from the prosperous times in which we live.

The minister has made repeated references to the impressive figures as being an indication of what we are doing for those people, but I think he has given us very little of the other side of the picture, the increased revenues of this government, the piling up of surpluses and the increased cost of living. Might I just remind the minister that in the year 1952 the Canadian population was some 14,430,000 persons, the gross national product in millions was 23,255. On a per capita basis that wealth was distributed amongst all persons in Canada to the extent of $1,615. In 1955 the Canadian population was some 15,881,000, the gross national product in millions was 26,600, which means that on a per capita basis the distribution of the wealth amounted to $1,673. I feel that the increase in wealth in this country ought to be made available by an increased pension to these people.

I think there is a great deal of significance in the tone of the debate that has been carried on with respect to those people. All members are in agreement, and I think that opinion prevails throughout our country, certainly amongst all who recognize we have a solemn responsibility toward this segment of our society. Therefore, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the minister, having all these compelling facts in front of him, knowing the situation as he does and supported by the unanimous opinion of this house and of the country, should not be timid in insisting that those who are in opposition to an increased pension at this time reverse their opinions and make such pension increases available now.

I had no intention of taking part in this debate. This morning I received a very interesting address made by Robert B. Meyner, governor of New Jersey, which was delivered at the national conference on problems of the ageing in Washington on June 5, 1956. The theme of his address was the re-evaluation by our society of the entire concept of old age. The address is entitled, "The Rights of our Senior Citizens". I think it has a definite message and is timely at this time, and I should like to quote from it as follows:

> I am reminded of a story found in a poem about a Mr. Arrents, who was the father of seven children. Mr. Arrents worked hard all of his life to feed, clothe and educate his children. Once in a while throughout these hard-working years, Mr. Arrents would sit back and muse about that one fine day when he would be able to relax and enjoy life—to retire and, so to speak, live off his children. Time passed. The children grew up and left home. "Ah", Mr. Arrents now said to himself. "The time has come to retire. The children," he said, "are all making a good living. Now let them support me in my autumn days as I cared for them for so many years".
> And so, he called on each of his seven children. But from each one came the same answer: "Honestly, pop, I just can't do it."
> Then, Mr. Arrents turned and went back to the task of finding support for himself. As he did, Mr. Arrents was struck by the ironic thought that it seemed to be much easier for one parent to support seven children, than it was for seven children to support one parent.
> In a symbolic way, each of us today is one of those seven children. For like them, we have been unable, for one reason or another, to care properly for a vast army of older parents and grandparents, many of whom played a great role in caring for us. We have neglected, instead, this vast population of older people, many of whom, because of our neglect, are living lives that are isolated, lonely and useless.

Just one more matter, Mr. Chairman; I would appreciate hearing from the minister what consideration has been given to reducing the residence requirements of those citizens, who are Canadian citizens, who have reached the age of 70 years and yet are unable to qualify for a pension. What consideration has been given to reducing the residence requirements of those people? It seems to me the moment that anyone becomes a Canadian citizen he has certain definite responsibilities. The least we can do is to at least make available to them the privilege of being a Canadian citizen by reducing the residence requirements of the aged persons. Would the minister care to comment on that?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a word on that subject if I might and ask the minister to reconsider the matter of the residence requirement. As the hon. member who just sat down said, these people come to this country and many of them make an excellent contribution to its welfare over a considerable period. Their children take on where they leave off and produce and pull their fair share of the load in making this a better and more prosperous place in which to live. Even if we cannot eliminate the residence requirement perhaps it could be reduced to 15 or 10 years in order to give these people a little additional help and comfort in their later years. Many of them have lived very deeply overseas and suffered hardship and some of them cruelty and their children often bring them here to enjoy the later years of their lives in a country where they can worship and live in freedom. I think it is a matter which is worthy of serious consideration and I urge upon the minister that he give it his kind attention in the months that lie ahead and perhaps at some future time introduce an amendment that would take care of the situation.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I have one question I would like to direct to the minister. This is a matter I mentioned when I spoke yesterday. Is the minister contemplating any action in response to the request for guiding allowances for the blind?

Mr. Martin: Perhaps I could now deal with these things, Mr. Chairman. I want to thank the hon. member for Lethbridge for the care which he has given to this matter as have other hon. members.

As I said yesterday, we are all interested in the matter of old age security and I feel it is a question which rightly has engaged the attention of the committee. I am proud of any particular opportunity I have had as the Minister of National Health and Welfare during the past few years to deal with this matter. This is the field in which I have been privileged in the name of the government to bring forward very substantial reforms in raising the amount and increasing the income ceiling to the point where we have doubled the pension in the period in which I have had the opportunity of serving in this department. I am not taking any credit for this; I am simply mentioning it.

We are at a point now where 43 per cent of our whole departmental budget is for the assistance we give to the aged. No country in the world is using as much of the departmental budget for its aged citizens as is Canada.

Everything that is said about the difficulties of the aged is fully appreciated, I am sure, by every hon. member of this house no matter where he sits. These grants are maintenance grants. They could not possibly provide, as no social security measure does, for the full maintenance of the group concerned; however, I can assure the house that this particular matter is receiving very active attention on my part and on the part of the department.

There are a number of things we have in mind. I do not know whether or not we will be able to bring them forward but I can assure the house there is no problem that concerns me more than this particular one. My only comfort in the matter is that we are now providing on federal account 95 per cent of the total cost of pensions in Canada, something close to $400 million for assistance to 870,000 people today as compared with about 90,000 three years ago. That represents a tremendous achievement. The house may be assured that the matter will continue to receive all the interest I can possibly give it.

With regard to guiding allowances, that is a matter which has to be taken into consideration with the provinces because it is a joint proposition. There is to be a meeting of the interprovincial board in the month of October or thereabouts when that and some other considerations we have in mind will be discussed.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question? What about the blind who are 70 years of age and over? This has nothing to do with the provinces and is purely a federal matter.

Mr. Martin: Yes, I know, but it has to be taken into consideration as it will be.

Mr. Zaplitny: The question has been raised of the review of the residence requirements for these applicants for old age pensions. I have taken the matter up with the minister privately on two or three occasions and I would like him to comment on the representations made by the hon. members for Edmonton East and Davenport.

Mr. Martin: I indicated that yesterday. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra raised that question last night and I indicated to him that that matter was being considered along with several other suggestions that he made. I am aware of that problem and it has to be considered along with our assistance program because the period of residence is the same for old age assistance and for old age security. In the former case, because there is provincial participation, we have to consult the provinces. We try to make these things as uniform as we can. The hon. member may be assured, as may the hon. member who raised it and the hon. member for Davenport, that it is being studied.

Item agreed to.

Civil defence—

281. To provide for the civil defence program, $7,010,018.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, when the estimates of this department were before the estimates committee very careful consideration was given to the items dealing with civil defence and many hours' discussion took place. We appreciated the minister's frank statements during those discussions and particularly the day when we were in camera. It is not my purpose, therefore, to speak at any great length today on this subject of civil defence.

During those discussions in the committee the members of that committee from this party made our position quite clear. We believe that reasonable steps should be taken to keep the nation informed as to the nature and the effect of damage which might be caused from the explosion of thermonuclear bombs should another global war take place and those devastating weapons be used. We do not believe the situation is such that there should be anything done which at the present time would create any hysteria and we think the minister is adopting a cautious attitude in this respect. We consider it advisable that research should continue as to the best method which might be employed in order to limit the casualties and the damage which might be done both in the area of the bomb explosion and also in the larger area which would be affected by the fall-out.

During the discussion in this committee we noted the excellent work which had been done by members of the civil defence organization in almost every province in connection with disaster relief and the emphasis which has been placed by the co-ordinator of the civil defence and the civil defence generally concerning the training for disasters which might occur and which arise from acts of God rather than from war. We believe that work should be continued.

There does appear to be somewhat of an anomaly and perhaps the minister would devote some consideration to this matter with a view to removing it. The anomaly is in connection with the compensation that can be paid to civil defence workers.

It was pointed out during the committee's discussion that civil defence personnel if injured when carrying out training or civil defence exercises would be compensated for their injury or loss of time which might arise from it. On the other hand, however, if civil defence personnel are injured when called out to assist a province or municipal authorities in connection with some disaster which has occurred, they do not receive any compensation because they are dealing with an actual disaster rather than a civil defence exercise or training.

I pointed out at the time that service personnel, personnel from the armed services who might be working alongside the civil defence personnel, would of course receive compensation for any injury they might receive but civil defence personnel do not.

I hope it will be possible to review that situation between now and the time when the estimates are brought down at the next parliament to see if that anomaly might be removed. Otherwise we are satisfied that reasonable steps are being taken to keep the public informed and to consider what action should be taken in the event of the disaster of war being brought to this country and thermonuclear bombs falling on Canadian targets.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief comments on this item and I can assure the minister they will be very brief.

As he knows, I represent a district where civil defence efficiency is possibly as high as in any area of Canada owing to the co-operation of the municipalities, the industries and the employees concerned. They have been organized very effectively to serve also in the case of disaster which is an aspect of civil defence which I feel has to be emphasized in order to retain public interest over a continuing period of time.

I want to ask the minister this question. A representative from my district was down here about two weeks ago to take a course at Arnprior. He understood when he came that he was to take a course in what is called orientation, whatever that is, and also in administration. He spent a week there and took the course in orientation and then he was told that unfortunately the course in administration would be coming on later in the year and so he would have to go home.

I just bring this up because it appears to me that this is a waste of public money. This man tells me it cost about $300 to bring him from a point in Kootenay West to Arnprior to attend the course. He thought it was a very poor arrangement that would require him to go back again because an additional $300 would be required for him to return to take the course in administration. I bring this to the minister's attention because I think it is most unfortunate for those who are giving their time voluntarily to take part in this work to get the impression that money is no object with respect to the federal administration of civil defence.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I want to make just a brief statement, but first I should like to thank the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich for the assistance he has given in this matter, both today and in the committee where we had a most thorough discussion. I also want to thank him very much for the tribute he paid to the civil defence co-ordinator and those under him throughout the country who are faced with a difficult problem and are doing their best in carrying out what is perhaps one of the most difficult assignments of any modern government.

Before dealing directly with one aspect about which I have indicated to the committee I would say something, I should like to say to the hon. member who has just spoken that I shall make careful note of the situation he has described. If the facts are as related by him, and undoubtedly they are—

Mr. Herridge: As given to me.

Mr. Martin:—they will certainly be corrected. I can assure my hon. friend and also the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich that the question of compensation which he raised in the committee has been considered in the interval but no official decision as between treasury and the provinces has been reached.

The hon. member raised the question of evacuation a few months ago. I discussed this matter in the committee and there are certain comments I should like to make. As my hon. friend knows, these matters are discussed with NATO and with the United Kingdom. We now believe that our civil defence should be based on the development and testing of plans for the orderly evacuation of the main urban areas in our country should the possibility of attack on such areas by nuclear weapons appear to be imminent. Our military authorities have now advised us that it must be anticipated in any major war that the North American continent would be attacked with high-yield nuclear weapons with little if any warning.

Accordingly our civil defence policy must be so designed as to ensure the survival and safety of as many of our population as would be possible in the event of nuclear attack on this country.

In arriving at this decision it was necessary to take into account a number of factors such as the nature and yield of enemy weapons which could be delivered, the degree of warning to be expected, the density of population of the country, in particular the probable target areas, and finally transportation and other resources waiting for survivors.

It may be assumed that in any major war we would not likely be the scene of primary vital air battles. No doubt a number of enemy aircraft carrying nuclear weapons for delivery on targets in the United States and Canada would fail to reach their targets or be shot down over our country. We have to take all these things into consideration. Under such circumstances the bombs carried by those enemy aircraft would almost certainly be delivered against our larger cities as targets, what might be termed second choice targets, or jettisoned and detonated almost anywhere in the country.

On the other hand, we have certain advantages as compared with other countries. We have only a limited number of cities and we have wide spaces. The two problems which face us are, first, how to ensure the survival of our population in the large Canadian cities in the face of high-yield nuclear weapon attacks against them and, second, how to provide the whole population with protection against radioactive fall-out resulting from the use of nuclear weapons.

The policy of evacuation undoubtedly is a gigantic one. We are certainly—and when I say "we" I mean all of us—far from reaching the stage of perfection in the execution of its technique. But it has been advocated by the United States government, whose problems of evacuation are more difficult than ours, and by other countries, and there is now a gradual shifting of the emphasis from shelter in the direction of evacuation.

All available experience and tests show that, whilst it is difficult, it is a feasible thing to do, particularly for the smaller centres. It is unlikely that complete evacuation can in all cases be achieved prior to the initial attack, owing to the limited amount of warning available. However, since most of the enemy's targets are most likely to be in the United States, there is reason to hope that there would be at least an opportunity to continue the evacuation of some target areas in Canada for a few hours after the initial attack on North America has begun.

In any future conflict the problem, of course, is one of survival. The first few days of nuclear warfare would be the worst. If we could survive these few days we might possibly survive the conflict itself. So, because of these things, the considerations of NATO and so on, we have decided that plans should be developed for the evacuation of the following areas in our country: Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa-Hull, Windsor, Niagara Falls, Halifax, Vancouver, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Quebec city, Saint John, New Brunswick, and Victoria. It is a gigantic job; it has already been begun. All that I am saying is a reaffirmation of the tests that have been carried out.

My hon. friend in the committee, I thought made a very helpful suggestion, which we have taken into account, when he referred to the question of progressive evacuation. I can tell him after considering what he said that it is likewise our view that a wholesale evacuation of the entire population of a city after the alert is sounded is not necessarily practical or necessary. Instead we have planned for what he has described as a progressive evacuation. In other words, if it should become evident that there was a general deterioration in the international situation that suggested the probability of attack, that would be the time to move out parts of the population not absolutely necessary to the life of the community, people like the mothers, the small children, the sick and elderly people.

I have discussed in the committee, and there is no need to go over, all the various phases which would be attached to the concept of progressive evacuation, phases A, B, C, and D. I would not want the house to be misled into thinking that we are in a position to do all of these things. We have carried out certain tests at Brandon, Calgary, Brockville and St. John's, Newfoundland. We are now giving some consideration with the United States to another evacuation.

This is a very difficult problem, but at the present time in the face of this cataclysmic potential—let us put it that way—there is nothing we can do other than to think in these terms. That is the view of other NATO countries which recently had a meeting; the collective view was that we should go on doing our best in the free world with these plans, perhaps predicating our view that in such preparations we were providing a deterrent of some sort, a discouragement of some sort, an insurance premium in any event, that might mean that some day these things would never be necessary.

The provinces are playing their part in this matter, generally speaking, and so are the communities. In what is admittedly a very difficult assignment, I am sure we shall continue to do the best we can. There can be no activity that would result, if war ever broke out, in our being able to save everyone. All we can do is minimize the blow and be prepared to minimize the horror that would result.

Again I wish to thank my hon. friend and the members of the committee for the valuable discussion and the help every one of them gave in this very difficult matter.

Mr. Thomas: I wish to thank the minister for the statement that he made regarding compensation for those defence workers. I certainly hope that the active consideration that he said was being given comes to a satisfactory conclusion and that those people do obtain compensation for their time and the damage and so on that they may suffer in the line of work, because those people are doing a wonderful service to their community and to Canada in general. They willingly give their time and labour in order to see that the communities in which they live are looked after in the event of not only an atomic attack or an enemy attack but, as has been pointed out, cases of a civilian disaster. The training they have received along those lines is the kind of training necessary for them to carry out their jobs in the best possible way.

Now I wish to make one suggestion to the minister. With regard to evacuation, I notice in the larger cities in the United States the highways are generally marked, "This highway will be closed in the event of air attack or enemy attack" or something like that. I should like to put this to the minister, that the highways around the major cities in Canada could be marked in such a way, not necessarily that they will be closed but so that they will be laid out in a systematic way and so that some highways will lead in and some out. As far as a disaster area is concerned, they should be clearly marked in that way and left marked at all times so that the people in those areas, in the event of a disaster or an air attack, would know exactly which highways they would be able to take out of the area. Then there would not be interference with assistance or reinforcements coming into that area.

I cannot think of any more orderly way to carry out evacuation. In the evacuation of an area, we all know that the biggest trouble comes about as a result of people flocking out of the cities and getting in the way of reinforcements and assistance coming in, and you find nothing but chaos. If the highways were clearly marked so that some of them lead in for the assistance coming in and others lead out for the evacuees going out, it would make for an orderly evacuation of any city in the event of catastrophe.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I am not sure that the suggestion advanced by the previous speaker really has very much validity and I should have preferred it if the minister had been much more outspoken in what he had to say. It is all very well to talk about the cataclysmic potential of a thermonuclear war. It would be a cataclysmic reality. What has to be realized is this. The facts have been given by, I suppose, informed witnesses in the United States appearing there before committees. One of them only recently said that if there was a massive attack on the Soviet union, tens of million of people who were not subject to the thermonuclear blast would nevertheless have no hope of survival because of radioactivity fall-out and that this would extend into other countries and into other continents. We must realize this. If there is a massive thermonuclear attack on North America, we will only be able to decide on that day to which area we are going to evacuate our people. It will depend surely entirely on the wind. If the wind is blowing from the north and the attack is primarily on the United States, I suppose we in Canada might have some safety. But if the wind is blowing from the south, then even although we survive or escape the thermonuclear blast, nevertheless the effects on our people—if this American witness is correct—will be such that the outlook will be more than grim for the great majority of them. I agree that we must try to prepare for eventualities. But I think the people of Canada ought to know clearly and without any question that if this thermonuclear war takes place, the possibility of survival of the great majority of mankind is very limited, and that in the case the best civil defence is to make sure that such a war does not break out.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make on civil defence in connection with the specific problem which exists in Montreal. But before making them I should like to express my regret that the minister, on a problem of such national importance as is civil defence, saw fit to give this house such a dose of warmed-over soothing syrup as he delivered a few minutes ago in what were, I dare say, his preliminary remarks on the matter.

The danger about this approach of the minister and of his presentation at this time, Mr. Chairman, is that it leaves the house and the people of Canada with the impression that the minister is saying something new or something different or indicating that some progress has been made. The major tenor of the minister's remarks was to the effect that the government has decided that in this age of thermonuclear warfare it was necessary to evacuate the cities and that the government and the civil defence organization had prepared evacuation plans for Montreal, Toronto and so on across the country.

It sounds like progress but it is nothing but a rehash of exactly the same thing the minister has been saying for the last 18 months and which the minister has been working on for the past two and a half years. The minister can go back to the discussion on the estimates last year at about this same time when I dealt with this subject and when, by a comparison of speeches delivered at a meeting of the mayors and municipalities of Canada—speeches made by the minister, the head of the civil defence organization and by Val Peters, the head of the United States civil defence organization—I showed conclusively that we were undecided and unprepared in this matter of evacuation while the United States has been working on it for a year.

But let me introduce another proof at this point. Just a few minutes ago we heard the minister giving us the thrilling details—in his estimation, undoubtedly—of an evacuation plan. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Montreal Gazette of March 14, 1955. That would be 16 months ago. The heading is, "One-Way Traffic Out of City Included in Ottawa's Master Plan." I will just read you two or three short quotations to show you how the minister warms up this subject and dishes it out again and again:

> "The only defence against the hydrogen bomb—if the enemy is going to drop a bomb on a city—is distance," Dr. G. F. Davidson, Canada's deputy minister of health and welfare and a civil defence expert, said last week.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

> With this in mind, P. H. Fox, the federal government's chief civil defence transportation and communications officer, has prepared a blueprint for the evacuation of Montreal . . .

I interject at that point that the minister just a few minutes ago was talking about a blueprint for evacuation. We heard about "progressive evacuation" in the committee and again this morning as if progressive evacuation was something new. The minister finds new terms for old things. That is all he is doing. Sixteen months ago it was "pre-thinning" of the population. I quote again from this newspaper story:

> However, Mr. Fox said there would be a certain amount of "pre-thinning" of the population. If the international situation grew worse and war appeared likely, 30 per cent of the population—331,500 people—would be evacuated from the danger area before any radar warning.

In order to show why I questioned the usefulness of the minister's remarks this morning, a final quotation from this article reads as follows:

> The federal plan for the evacuation of Montreal has been shown to officials in this city. No action has been taken.

All of that is 16½ months ago. Mr. Chairman, in fairness to this house and in fairness to the devoted people across Canada who are giving of their time, energy and ability and are sometimes risking their lives in training to prepare themselves for civil defence, what right has the minister to come here and to stand up today and, under the guise of giving us something new, dish out material which was published in every newspaper in Canada 17 months ago? Had I the time and the inclination—and I may say I am not going to do it—I could go back and deal with the minutes of the special committee on estimates which dealt with civil defence. I am almost sure that every statement which is on that record can be traced back to previous announcements by the minister.

Mr. Martin: May I just intervene here, Mr. Chairman, in order to make an explanation to my hon. friend. I am sure he would wish it. I just walked across the floor to speak to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich who I think would agree with what I am going to say. What I have said this morning has been said before. But the significance of what I said this morning was that this is now defined government policy. The hon. gentleman had asked me several months ago, in the special committee on estimates whether that was the case and my reply to him was that it was not, that the department was engaged in these tests. But since then the government of Canada as a whole has confirmed the desirability of maintaining these tests. That is the significance of my statement this morning which arises out of the question which was put to me several months ago by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. I am sure that my hon. friend would want to know that.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am grateful to the minister for his interjection and observations. But if this was not defined government policy 16 months ago, what on earth was the civil defence organization doing in preparing blueprints for the evacuation of these cities right down to the final—or presumably so—details of this evacuation? Again, if it was not government policy at that time, the department was far exceeding its authority in doing work of this kind. I suggest to the house that we could find other statements. However, I will not take the time now to do so. But the minister knows perfectly that when he spoke to the federation of mayors and municipalities—that was in 1954, if my memory serves me right—

Mr. Martin: It was 1954.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): —both he and the head of the civil defence organization, Major General Worthington, indicated at that time that evacuation was the plan of action which was going to be followed by the federal civil defence department.

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If that was so in 1954, it must have been established government policy at that time and that brings us to the point where a moment ago the minister was just giving us another interim dose of warmed over soothing syrup. I had not intended, Mr. Chairman, to deal at all with the subject I have just covered, but I hope my remarks have brought home to the minister that while some of us have sat here for two days and listened to him wriggle and evade and give soft and easy answers to questions in this house, we have not necessarily been taken in by his attitude. We are very much aware that a great many of the questions which have been brought before him have not been satisfactorily answered, although they have been evaded by the most consumate of politicians that I have, in my short experience in this house, seen in action.

Mr. Martin: Would you say in addition to that that he was an agreeable politician?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): By every manner of means, the first quality of a politician is that he be agreeable. In that respect, I do not think there is anyone in this house who could help but like the minister. He stands ace high with me in that regard because, as a matter of fact, he is far more agreeable than I am.

Mr. Knowles: Is that the best you can say for him?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Let me turn to the particular situation which we have in the city of Montreal. There is at the moment in the city of Montreal proper—for purposes of this argument I must separate the city of Montreal proper from the surrounding municipalities—no civil defence organization in operation. The reason for that stems from the flat refusal of the city council of Montreal, led by its mayor and the chairman of its executive committee, to provide funds in their budget in 1955 for the support of this particular activity. Whether that decision was right or wrong is not a point to be debated here. I will say that there is a great body of opinion in Montreal and on the city council which disagrees vehemently with those who are opposed to any support of civil defence by the city. I would tell the house that a petition—perhaps I should more correctly say a motion—is on the order paper of the city council at the present time which I am informed has been seconded by 42 out of the 99 city councillors —many of the remaining 99 have not been approached—asking that the civic authorities reconsider this decision and take a more active part in the affairs of civil defence in Montreal.

Personally, so that there be no doubt about it, I regret exceedingly the way in which the city has evaded or certain of the senior people in the city have evaded their responsibilities in this matter. I hope that they will reconsider their decision. On the other hand, I think we should remember that the minister himself has been led down the garden path rather consistently in this matter. When the estimates were being considered last year and at other times, he has said we were just on the verge of reaching an agreement with the city of Montreal. When the estimates committee met back in April of this year he had just spoken to the mayor of the city of Montreal and he claimed something was definitely going to come out of that. I can remember similar statements in the press around March, 1955. The mayor was in Ottawa or General Worthington had gone to Montreal. We were just on the verge of agreement. We were just on the verge of agreement in April, 1956. I dare say when the minister stands up he will say we are just on the verge of an agreement this morning. We should not put too much hope in these potential agreements, Mr. Chairman, judging from our previous experience and the previous times when our expectations have fallen to the ground.

Some of the citizens of Montreal have realized and accepted their responsibilities in civil defence, their responsibilities to their fellow citizens. They have taken action and formed, in the city of Montreal, a civil defence organization without any help from anybody. I would pay tribute in that respect to the Notre Dame de Grace community council from which, as the minister well knows, this whole approach stems. This civil defence organization is meeting regularly and it is representative of a fairly large group in the city. It is doing its best to make what progress it can.

However, Mr. Chairman, I come now to my direct plea to the minister. No organization of this kind can continue without support from somebody official. It seems to me quite obvious that in the immediate future the city of Montreal is not going to give it the necessary support. I would remind the minister that the financial support cannot be forthcoming until next June because the city budget which was passed last March, 1956, covers the period until next June. This organization cannot then, at the present time, look to the city for immediate assistance. On the other hand, it urgently requires, as I understand it, three things. It requires a place to meet, it requires equipment with which to work, and it requires protection for its members in the course of their work and in the course of their duties.

Now the minister has always claimed that the only way to help local organizations in the field, such as the one I have suggested, is through the municipalities and through the provinces. But the minister will also admit that these restrictions have been arrived at as part of the regulations and not as part of the legislation. To the best of my knowledge—I was only able to make a quick search this morning—there is no legislation on the law books of Canada, which would prohibit the minister moving tomorrow if he wished to do so to assist an individual local organization which is separate from its municipality. That is exactly the case we have here now. We have a civil defence organization which cannot get assistance through the regular channels. It wants to do a job and it needs help from the federal government, help which is being doled out in the hundreds of thousands of dollars right across the rest of this country.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the minister has a very clear-cut decision in front of him. Is he going to allow the over 1 million citizens of the city of Montreal to be put in imminent peril through the non-existence of a civil defence organization there because he refuses to make the necessary regulations to assist the local civil defence organization, or is he going to take the statesmanlike step of assisting this organization in its work? Otherwise, at this moment I see no hope for it to grow, no hope for it to prosper and little expectation for it to continue beyond—

Mr. Martin: May I ask a question?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Yes.

Mr. Martin: I have been very interested in what my hon. friend has said because he knows that I share his concern about Montreal. Has the voluntary group to which he refers established any connection as yet with the municipal government, or does he know?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): They have definitely established no official connection.

Mr. Martin: But there have been talks?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): To the best of my knowledge, there have been talks; in fact specifically there have been talks between this defence organization and certain city councillors, which led to the motion that I told the committee about a little while ago.

But, as I was pointing out, it is now the decision of the minister. It is unfortunate that he has been put into this position because the civic authorities in Montreal have chosen to follow a course of action which many people question, but we must face realities.

In the minister's estimates last night there were such sums as several thousand dollars for each of various organizations. There was $4,500, if I remember correctly,—and it was very much appreciated and very much needed—for the Montreal institute for the blind. There is no impediment, legislative or otherwise, to give similar help to a civil defence organization in Montreal. Later on when the day of danger and reckoning comes, it could be a potent factor in saving hundreds of thousands of lives. If the minister really believes that civil defence is necessary in the major centres of Canada he cannot refuse this request.

Mr. Leboe: I do not intend to take more than a minute of the committee's time, but I should like to say that I do agree with what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin said about evacuation. Anyone travelling west from here, who travels through the city of Spokane, Washington, will realize the advantage of having some scheme by which traffic can be readily moved through a city. In the city of Spokane we find a colour scheme is used for the different highways, and a stranger entering the city, who wants to travel through the city, has only to read the sign at the entrance to the city, on which the colour scheme of the highway is painted over which he wishes to travel, and he can go right through the city by following that colour without any trouble. In addition to that neon signs could be used in the colour scheme, which would be controlled at station points, which would bring arrows or other facilities into operation to guide the traffic.

I should like to say a word on the questions that have been dealt with here today with respect to the possibility of bombing in war. We should not rule out the possibility of guided missiles which are not of thermonuclear construction. While it is being realistic to think in terms of thermonuclear weapons, yet we must not rule out the possibility of other guided missiles which are being used for the purposes of war which would give, in fact, more time for evacuation.

I should like to confirm what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin has said regarding lines of demarcation, or marks to show where the traffic should go in the case of an attack.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, my remarks are going to be very brief because I want to expedite the badly arranged business of this long drawn-out session of parliament.

With regard to civil defence, I might point out that this year we have had a much better opportunity to discuss the problem than in the past. We have spent 10 times the amount of time on civil defence that we were able to do last year because we had the benefit of the estimates committee, with several hours of discussion there with the minister and with his officials. The only thing I want to say on this occasion is that although we accept the policy announced by the minister for evacuation of cities, I consider it to be a single-barrelled policy, and it should be double-barrelled. I drew some attention to this in the course of the study in that estimates committee in April. I think more emphasis should have been placed on the question of survival on a family or household basis by means of shelter. I am of the opinion that in a thermonuclear war against this continent more Canadians will be in danger of radioactive fall-out than from a direct hit on cities, and even if there is evacuation of cities the people who are evacuated must have shelter against radioactive fall-out.

The minister has not emphasized that aspect of it, and at this stage I simply wish to express my opinion that evacuation of cities must go hand-in-hand with shelter against the fall-out. That may be essential even in the cities from which evacuation is planned because the time element may be such that the evacuation cannot take place. As I pointed out in the committee on estimates, in order to dispel the apathy in regard to civil defence, I think we should emphasize the fact that it is possible to survive even in thermonuclear warfare, as has been proven by the various tests that have been carried out. If people are protected against fall-out they have a chance for survival. It is important that that aspect of it be kept firmly in mind, because if the populace in large measure survives, then it might be possible to carry on the struggle more effectively later. But, if we are of opinion that nothing can be done under thermonuclear conditions, then no action will be taken, and I think a great deal of the delay in civil defence operations across the country has been due to the feeling that nothing can be done, and there are so many things that can be done. I think the civil defence organization is to be congratulated on what it has accomplished so far in establishing a good means of communication across the country—that is the prime essential—and in the training of great numbers of individuals in civil defence operations. I think that those people who have voluntarily given their time to take the courses in civil defence are worthy of special recognition; but I just emphasize the fact that the minister should have two schemes in mind, evacuation plus proper shelter on the family basis so that people will survive radioactive fall-out.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank my hon. friend for having intervened in this debate. One could contrast what the hon. member has said with what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, and although undoubtedly he said it with the best of intentions his attitude was that practically nothing could be done. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has expressed my views and the views of the civil defence organization that we must not take a defeatist attitude. We know we cannot provide for 100 per cent survival. We know how disastrous the situation would be if a world war developed in which thermonuclear weapons were used. Nevertheless, we know, too, that we can minimize the blow, as I said in my earlier statement. I think the balanced statement we have just heard is one to which I would want to describe fully. Nothing will be lost if we make an attempt and everything will be lost if nothing is attempted.

I also thank the hon. member who has just spoken for what he said about the civil defence workers who are doing their best with respect to a very difficult problem.

The suggestion was made about signs on the roads and so on. My hon. friend will, of course, understand that we work in full co-operation with the provinces. In the case of the province of Alberta they have a very good civil defence organization and I publicly thank the government there for its interest and endeavour in this particular field and my thanks are also extended to the local volunteer bodies. They take the view, and I must say I share this view, that we must not be too ostentatious until we have reason to be ostentatious.

I know the situation in the country to which my hon. friend referred. I lived in a hotel in New York last fall where there were all sorts of signs but there was not much behind them. The government at Alberta has taken the position, as most of the provincial governments have, that we ought to make sure not only that our plans are developed but that they are capable of execution before we create false impressions. There may be a midway position but I just mention that to indicate the way we feel about it.

With regard to the situation in Montreal, my hon. friend has taken a rather courageous course this morning and I commend him for it. As he knows, I have been greatly concerned about the fact that in the largest city of Canada there was a decision about a year and a half ago to undo the really great work that had been done by the city government and volunteer bodies. This was a regrettable thing. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said, if Coventry won't defend Coventry, Her Majesty's government of the United Kingdom cannot.

All around Montreal there is now a group of communities that are engaged in doing work for civil defence. As the hon. gentleman said, I have talked to the present mayor on three occasions in connection with this matter during the course of the last five months. When I spoke in the committee I did express the hope—indeed I went further than that and said I expected—that results would flow from our discussions. I can only say to my hon. friend that I have not given up in that particular. When I asked him a question a moment ago concerning whether or not the volunteer group he had in mind had any association or connection with the city government officially he indicated that there had been some consultation. I know that a group has discussed the matter recently with the mayor and only ten days ago I myself discussed this matter with the mayor over the telephone. I have not given up.

Assuming that the city would not officially participate, my hon. friend asked what I would be prepared to do. I can only say I am prepared to consider that possibility. At the present time we have just concluded an arrangement with the government of the province of Quebec whereby they have given us permission to deal directly with the municipalities without going through them. I do not know whether it is on its way or whether it has actually been put forward but we have a submission to the treasury to permit us to deal directly with certain municipalities and also to be allowed to provide 25 per cent assistance without going through the government of the province.

My hon. friend's proposal goes one step further in that he suggests we should deal with a volunteer group. We must remember that in cities we have to deal with the fire departments, welfare department, police force and other groups which are a part of the organized community and which play a very essential role in the development of a city's civil defence organization. I may not fully satisfy my hon. friend by my assurance but at this stage I can only assure him that I will carefully examine the extent to which it would be possible to encourage a local body of this kind. It may be possible to establish some titular connection with the municipalities and I assure him I will be glad to pursue that question vigorously.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, one brief question occurred to me while the minister was speaking. I wonder would he care to see personal representatives of the civil defence organization in Montreal and discuss possible arrangements with them.

Mr. Martin: I would be glad to.

Mr. Castleden: In his statement would the minister care to say something about the possibility of greater co-operation with the militia of Canada?

Mr. Martin: As I have said, I have already clearly indicated that in the discussion in the committee. There has been a change of policy there and the measure of co-operation between the defence forces and the civil defence organization is now on a firmer footing than it was before. In my own judgment there is an increasing role for certain groups in the armed forces. It may not be along the lines they are theoretically contemplating in the United Kingdom but along lines that I think would give the armed forces, and particularly the reserve forces, a greater role than they have had heretofore.

Progress has been made and I know, for example, that civil defence courses are now given to members of the armed forces. Some are actually taking courses at our civil defence college in Arnprior.

Mr. Castleden: I would like to have the minister's statement on the following matter. I believe the prairie region is looked upon as a receptionist area. I know my own province has been co-operating with the government in an endeavour to carry on a training program relating to the rural and city municipalities in the receptionist area. I think there has been a little hesitancy on the part of the government to assist the province in preparing the kind of supplies such as blankets, medical supplies and food supplies that would be necessary in the case of an emergency. I think that in fulfilling the role they are trying to fulfil in the receptionist area more assistance would be of great value.

It must be remembered that we are dealing with the possibility of a type of war about which we know very little. Although the program must be a running one which permits of changes in policy, and although I believe we cannot be ostentatious in what we are spending, I think we should be doing what we can.

I would also say this. Where training has been carried out and where supplies have been available they have been of great value in cases of peacetime disaster. I think there is no doubt that support should be given to this kind of program to take care of peacetime disasters, and on that ground I think the expenditure can be supported.

Item agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—

54. To provide for the requirements of the sound broadcasting service (to amount formerly authorized by chap. 32 R.S.), $6,250,000.

Mr. McCann: Continuing the discussion of last evening on the estimates of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the hon. member for Eglinton raised two or three questions which I shall endeavour to deal with before we proceed with the rest of the debate.

He asked about rumours he said he had heard to the effect that the C.B.C. was proposing to sell television news service to those who might be interested in purchasing it. I am informed by the corporation that it is not considering selling television news services.

The hon. member also asked when colour television will be available. I am not in a position to give an answer at the present time on that. I believe that this is one of the questions we shall be able to deal with much better when we have the report of the royal commission.

The hon. member also asked about the commercial operations of the corporation and revenue from advertising. For the revenue figures requested I would draw attention to a breakdown given on page 3 of the section on finance in the annual report of the corporation, which has been tabled. I am informed by the corporation that it is continuing to charge uniform rates.

I wish to put on the record some information with reference to the finances of the company as provided for by vote 54 and supplementary vote 605, the one dealing with sound broadcasting and the other with television. Vote 54 in the main estimates and vote 605 in the supplementaries represent proposals by the government for interim financing of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pending the report of the royal commission on broadcasting. As hon. members are aware, the royal commission, under the chairmanship of Mr. Robert Fowler, is conducting an exhaustive study of the whole matter of television and sound broadcasting and is examining the operations of the corporation. The government expects that after it has the report of the royal commission it will be in a position to make proposals to parliament regarding a firm basis for long-term financing of the national broadcasting system and its development, both in television and in sound broadcasting. I believe too that members of the house will be in a better position to consider these matters after having had the report of the royal commission which we expect will be ready for the next session of parliament.

As hon. members are aware, the operations of the radio part of the national broadcasting system have been financed for several years from a statutory annual grant of $6,250,000 together with the proceeds of the excise tax on radio sets and equipment in accordance with statutory provision. In addition the corporation has the proceeds of its commercial activities. In its statement for the year ended March 31, 1956 the corporation shows a deficit in sound broadcasting of some $287,000 after depreciation.

In the current fiscal year it is estimated that there will be some decrease in the yield of the excise tax on radio sets and a further drop in sound broadcasting commercial revenue. At the same time, to keep services at their current level, there will be some minor increase in expenditures arising from normal salary adjustments, the replacement of commercial programs, strengthening of radio programming and increased fees and salary costs resulting from collective bargaining agreements.

The statutory grant of $6,250,000 annually was provided for a five-year period in 1951 and came to an end with the last fiscal year. Under the circumstances the government is proposing this vote 54 of $6,250,000 simply as a temporary measure to provide the same amount for another year.

The corporation expects that with this continuation of the $6,250,000 grant it will have a deficit in its sound broadcasting operation this year of some $3 million. The deficit will have to come from its own reserves, since the government is not proposing any further grant for sound broadcasting above the level of the statutory amount of the previous five years.

The operations of the national television system for the last three years have been financed from the proceeds of the excise tax on television receiving sets and equipment, together with the income from television commercial operations. I think it became very plain, particularly to members of last year's special committee on broadcasting, that the proceeds of the excise tax plus commercial revenues would by this year not be nearly enough to support the nation-wide system, with service through the number of public and private stations that have been authorized. That of course was one of the reasons for the setting up of the royal commission.

The corporation explained to the committee at the last session that it expected a fairly heavy deficit in television operations for the fiscal year 1955-56. The deficit during the last year, however, was held to approximately $1 million, as the financial statements of the corporation show. Income both from the excise tax and from commercial revenues was considerably higher than had been anticipated while expenditures were held down. The result was a deficit smaller than had been expected. The rate of expenditures of the corporation, however, continued to grow through the year as new stations were added to the system and as program services were developed.

Some further increase will be necessary during this year, according to the corporation, simply to meet commitments of various kinds already made and to permit minimum normal development of the service along the lines anticipated for the last several years. At the same time it is expected that the proceeds of the excise tax in this year will be considerably below last year and that there will not be a major increase in commercial revenues. As a result, the corporation anticipates an operating deficit in television this year of about $17 million on the present basis.

The government has given considerable thought to this matter. With the royal commission studying the whole question and examing operations of the C.B.C. we did not think it wise that the corporation be left in a position in which it would have to reduce sharply its television services. Nor, on the other hand, pending the report of the commission, did we wish to ask parliament to provide funds at this stage for a major expansion of the television service. We are, therefore, proposing this grant of $12 million, leaving it to the corporation to finance from its own reserves the balance of the deficit, an amount anticipated at about $5 million. So that the $12 million grant and the use of $5 million of the reserve would make up the $17 million of the operating deficit.

We consider this to be a sensible interim arrangement under which it will be possible to continue the operation and normal development of the national television system along lines already laid down, but under which no new departures can be undertaken. At the next session, with the report of the royal commission in hand, we hope to be able to make proposals of a more permanent nature based on thorough consideration for the financing and development of our national broadcasting system, both radio and television.

That is the statement with reference to the government's financing for this year. At a later period I shall put on the record details of the financing of the international services.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the statement just made by the minister indicates the serious situation which faces the Canadian people in connection with the financing of the C.B.C., in particular under the television policy now in effect. The deficit this year indicates that there is something wrong in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's control of expenditures.

The trend has been upwards in recent years. I think the Canadian people today are asking that what appears to have the elements of hog-wild spending by the C.B.C. must be curtailed and discontinued. As far as the $12 million item is concerned, to which the minister just made reference, whereby the C.B.C. asks for a grant of that amount on the part of parliament, I suggest that the $12 million should be in the form of a loan advance and not a grant so that parliament will be in a position to determine, when the royal commission makes its report, as to what shall be the future course of the C.B.C.

Mr. Goode: On a point of order, if my hon. friend will allow me. We listened last night for an hour to the hon. gentleman who represents his party in this house speaking on the C.B.C., and the Liberal party kept a quorum in this house to allow the gentleman to speak. There are other parties—and I say this with all respect to my hon. friend from Prince Albert—there are other parties and other members who wish to speak in this debate, and I rather think we should take them in the right order. I understand that the C.C.F. party has a member to speak, the Social Credit party has a member to speak and, as you know, I shall have something to say at some time, but I rather think that my hon. friend should give way with regard to this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I submit that those remarks are as untimely as they are unfair. You gave me the floor.

The Chairman: Order. After all, we are bound in this house by custom, and if a member wishes to speak he rises. The hon. member for Prince Albert was the only member who rose following the speech of the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Apparently my hon. friend was not in the house to notice that nobody rose, and he made a gratuitous statement that is—

Mr. Goode: I have been in the house since 2.30.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor. When my hon. friend takes the floor I shall listen to him, but at the moment I have the floor. I said a moment ago that the people of Canada are beginning to realize that some effective action must be taken with regard to this problem. I have before me an editorial in the Windsor Daily Star of yesterday's date, which sets out clearly and effectively an argument that is generally being more and more accepted by the Canadian people. I shall only quote one or two excerpts from it. It is entitled "C.B.C. Deficit":

> The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's deficit for the last fiscal year was $1,358,000. But to that figure should be added the $22,799,000 the corporation received in ear-marked revenue from the excise tax on radio and television sets and parts, and a $6,200,000 government grant for radio. The state radio-television system, then, was in the red to the tune of more than thirty and one-quarter millions. And C.B.C. expects a bigger deficit this current fiscal year.
> Many thoughtful Canadians must be uneasy over the widening stream of taxpayers' money that has been pouring into C.B.C. since the advent of television in Canada. Much of it goes to subsidize entertainment, some of it good, some bad.

I refer particularly to the situation with respect to television because I believe that the policy that has been followed of local monopoly in television has been detrimental to Canadian television development. I say this because, as we approach the period when colour television is adopted and becomes more generally used, the amount of the present costs for television will be materially increased. Indeed, the general estimate, as I have read, of authorities in the United States has been that the increase is some 15 per cent over and above the costs of ordinary television. That means that more and more because of the present television policy Canadian taxpayers are being made to pay. My submission is: if a policy in keeping with television development in other parts of the world were inaugurated in this country, the taxpayer would in consequence not find himself mulcted to the extent that he is today.

I believe that more and more members of this house are coming to realize the need of a standard committee on broadcasting. I am not criticizing the minister for not having a committee set up this year, although there are some who disagree with my viewpoint in that regard. With the royal commission sitting, I did not seriously contest the stand taken. However, whatever the royal commission's recommendations may be, if there is no stop put to ever-mounting expenditures which appear to be uncontrolled, and if the recent trend continues upward in the same ratio, the cost to the Canadian people will within a period of five or six years be $100 million a year. That is a serious situation and one that merits the consideration of parliament to a degree to which this matter has not been so heretofore.

I find it difficult to understand why the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, having available to it the best outlets in Canada, is continually in the red. In Toronto the C.B.C. operates two radio stations and one television station; in the city of Montreal, two radio stations and two television stations. Private stations make money.

Mr. McCann: Lots of money.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says, "Lots of money." That being so with available outlets such as the C.B.C. has and with its programs and with almost a similar degree of advertising, why does the C.B.C. find itself year by year with increasing deficits?

Secondly, virtually every one of the corporation's other radio stations and all its television stations are in highly valuable commercial locations. What about the C.B.C. station in Vancouver? It should make profit. There is a private station in Bellingham, Washington, XVOS television station, based almost entirely on the Vancouver market, and it makes a very fair and reasonable profit. Take a station such as in my own province of Saskatchewan, station CBK, which can be heard over almost all western Canada, a 50,000-watt station. Why can stations such as these not make a profit? Why is it that year by year C.B.C. comes back to parliament, or receives a grant in lieu of an annual parliamentary vote, as it has for the past five years?

Why is it that the financial situation of the C.B.C. worsens year by year? The C.B.C. has radio stations in Winnipeg, Quebec city, Ottawa, Halifax and Sydney. It has television stations located in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax. It is passing strange that, year by year, deficits increase and parliament is being asked for further votes. I am one of those who believe that the time has come to put a stop to this trend. Because of that fact, in so far as this $12 million item is concerned, I believe it should be in the form of a loan and not in the form of an advance. If we put it in the form of an advance it amounts to encouragement for further over-spending which is not justified having regard to any consideration whatsoever.

I am not going to take up much time this afternoon. I simply point out that, at the rate expenditures are mounting, if the person with the television set is to pay for the services rendered by the C.B.C., the present tax is totally insufficient. In the brief of the C.B.C. there was a suggestion that a basic licence fee of $15 a year payable by television owners would be sufficient.

Mr. Fulton: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It would be nothing of the kind. At the rate expenditure is going on, within two or three years that amount would have to be raised to $40 per set. This is not bringing before the committee something that we on this side have not warned about for several years. It is a situation, however, that has now reached the point where a decision must be reached on this important question. A decision is necessary for the preservation of the rights of the taxpayers of this country and also for the development of television generally everywhere within this country.

I realize that the commission has not yet reported. Because of that fact I do not intend to discuss other matters connected with this field of endeavour except to repeat something that we on this side of the house have asked for throughout the years. In addition to there being greater control over expenditures on the part of the C.B.C. we ask for a greater measure of parliamentary control, a greater assurance of a careful examination of expenditures that are being made. We are gratified to find that there has been widespread support for what we have endeavoured to secure, namely, an independent body to adjudicate between the C.B.C. and the private stations. We have pointed out the utter democratic injustice of there being a regulatory body performing executive, legislative and judicial functions and being a judge in its own cause. Those two matters represent all I intend to say with regard to this matter at this time. To go back to where I started, I again use the same expression. This hog-wild expenditure on the part of the C.B.C., unless controlled, will result in an increase in taxation far beyond what is justified for what Canadians are receiving today.

Mr. Reinke: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal for a few moments with the annual report of the C.B.C. which was tabled on July 22. Then I should like to express a few private views of my own with regard to the C.B.C. and with which I believe a great many Canadians might agree with me.

I think it is perfectly obvious to all hon. members that the C.B.C. today, with television and radio in particular, controls to a great extent many of our activities here in Canada and wields a great deal of influence. In less than four years since television was first inaugurated in Canada, it has reached a proportion where it is covering, as the minister pointed out, nearly 80 per cent of our population. In looking over the report, while I must admit that the C.B.C. have done an excellent job in covering the population of Canada, I in my own mind cannot see where they have accomplished very much that private enterprise itself could not have accomplished; that is particularly in the way of coverage, although I will admit that as a network the C.B.C. probably covers more of Canada in a more unified manner and brings this country more closely together than would be done by private enterprise.

As the previous speaker has pointed out, I believe that the time has come to take a new look at the C.B.C. I am not expecting anything I might say here today to change or affect the picture in so far as the Fowler commission is concerned. However, I would hope that the opinions expressed by hon. members in this house will be taken into consideration by that commission when they make their report.

In reviewing the classification of radio and television network programs, I believe that the C.B.C. has for the most part accomplished a fairly good balance. I was greatly interested to read the numbers of hours that were devoted to the various classifications. For instance, I think that people enjoy possibly the lighter types of music more than they enjoy the heavier types. As a result, three times as many hours were devoted to that type of music, and so on. I was particularly pleased to see that a great deal of Canadian talent was used last year and that Canadian talent was given a chance. In all, it is reported that 1,004 orchestra members were used, all Canadians, and that 22 of the 26 conductors were Canadians. However, the thought that strikes me about this particular part of the report is this. While these engagements were provided for over 1,000 talented musicians, I am wondering how many of them actually presented more than one program. I notice here that over 12 programs in 12 cities across Canada were presented during the summer months. I would think that possibly that figure of 1,004 could be reduced by two-thirds, and most of them from Toronto or Montreal.

I would also hope that the Fowler commission, when it makes its report, will take into consideration what effect private radio and television would have on the use of talent in this country. In the field of drama I might say that the corporation is trying very hard but that, in a great many instances, I believe they are falling short. I have in mind particularly one play on television that I thought should never have been produced. That one is brought to my mind at the present time. I think it was called "The Eye". There was quite a garbled-up television program about somebody's subconscious mind and his conscious mind. It was so bad that I finally turned it off and listened to one of the Buffalo stations. As I say, with the money that we are spending, I cannot understand why programs of this type should be produced at all. I think the Canadian people would be more interested in fiction, if it has to be fiction, that is built around some of our historical events like confederation or perhaps the Northwest Mounted Police. So far as the Northwest Mounted Police are concerned, the only program I saw having to do with them was one which emanated from the United States. I could go on and elaborate on the programming of the C.B.C. but I should like to turn to the financing because, in my opinion, that is the most alarming problem that is confronting us today.

In the year ended March 31, 1956, as has been pointed out by other speakers, the C.B.C. had an income of $38,942,000 and their expenditures were $38,572,000 before depreciation. For programming and engineering, this corporation spent $32,347,000, yet the income from commercial broadcasting was only a little over $9 million. Let us take a look at the picture over the past four years, 1953, 1954, 1955 and 1956. In the year ended March, 1953, the income of the C.B.C. was $15,359,000. Television was just commencing that year and the expenditures were not too heavy in that field. It was in that year, too, that we collected some $5,700,000 from radio licence fees which the Canadian people detested so much. In that year the expenditures on both radio and television only amounted to $14,304,000.

Then, in the year ended March, 1954, the revenues of the C.B.C. jumped to $27,430,000 and the expenditures jumped to $19,986,000. In the year ended March, 1955, the revenues jumped again to $34,700,000, but the expenditure also jumped to $29,100,000, an increase of roughly $9 million. As we all know, last year the increase was $9·5 million. Now, in addition to all these yearly expenditures, the operations of the C.B.C., as reported in 1955, cost an additional $19 million that the government of Canada lent for capital expansion. There was another $8,500,000 last year, bringing the total to $27,500,000. Of this amount, only a paltry $72,000 has been so far paid back to the government. Now we are faced with an expected deficit which this parliament is going to have to vote, and I am quite prepared to go along with it. But I want to bring to the attention of hon. members and impress upon them that this will add another $12 million on top of the already existing debt.

With operating expenditures of this order—I do not know whether the minister mentioned them in his figures earlier, but they must be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $45 million or $50 million—I should like to know where we are going with this monster. I feel that this corporation has extracted $29 million from the taxpayers' pockets through the sales of radio and television sets and parts. There will be a net loss of millions of dollars and that is going to put us in a position where we have to take some drastic action. Where are you going to get over $30 million next year? There are only three ways that I can fathom for the C.B.C. to raise the money. First of all, there is the present system of excise and sales taxes on radio and television sets. Then, there are the taxpayers upon whom you could impose a licence fee but, as I said before, the Canadian people protested it so much when it was $2.50. The third way is for the corporation to carry on an efficient business or get out of the business entirely.

In the report it is stated that the market for television is fast becoming saturated. I believe this to be true to a certain extent, but we may be overly pessimistic about that. There are some people who continually change their sets for newer and better ones. But I believe it is quite correct that the revenues from the excise tax are going to dwindle in the years to come. Is parliament supposed to vote money out of its revenues all the time, at a time when we would like to raise the old age pensions and family allowances, at a time when we are committed to $200 million to start off with for a national health program? At the rate this corporation is going it will not be long before the amount is going to be tremendous. I am not in favour of the old plan of assessing the taxpayers of Canada the $15 that was suggested by the C.B.C. to the Fowler commission. I am not in favour of this parliament subsidizing the C.B.C. to the extent it has in the past. In my opinion the only one alternative is for the C.B.C. to pay its own way or else get out of the business and let private enterprise do it.

I have gone over this report rather carefully and I cannot see too much in it that private enterprise could not have accomplished. For instance, the C.B.C. developed between 40 and 45 hours a week of program service for national distribution through C.B.C. and private stations. Of these 40 or 45 hours that were provided for the private stations, 55 per cent was produced in Canada and the other 45 per cent was piped in from the United States. In so far as the French language programs are concerned, of course, the percentage is higher because obviously the programs for French viewers have to be produced in Canada. I am not disagreeing with the idea of bringing United States programs into this country since they are obviously the programs the viewers wish to see. However, I cannot see where it is necessary to use the C.B.C. to bring these other programs in from the United States when the same thing could be handled by private enterprise.

Last year $10,600,000 was paid out for T.V. and radio talent. As I said before, this is admirable because it gives Canadian talent and Canadian artists a chance. However, this $10,600,000 does not include the cost of announcers, producers, program research editors, scenery, news writers, film editors, camera men or commentators. The report lists the various programs under various headings such as drama, opera, variety and so on. I am wondering whether these are all the programs the people wish to see. I am convinced a great deal of the money we are spending now should be spent in providing more top notch programs.

I find that one and one-half pages of the report are devoted to audience research.

Those one and one-half pages of audience research do not give one ounce of information about the result of that research of audiences. I do not know whether "Tabloid" has a good listening audience; I do not know whether "Scope" or "Folio" has a good listening audience; and I am wondering whether or not the people are listening to those programs that the C.B.C. is putting on, particularly in areas where they are competing with United States programs or overlapping private stations. We cannot force people to listen to programs they do not wish to hear. We cannot tell them that it is a good program to watch and that they should watch it. A little of that thinking is all right but we cannot take it too far.

Today we have this huge corporation with 5,000 employees. Last year the staff of the C.B.C. increased, according to this report, by 1,000 personnel, and this huge corporation is operating a monopoly in our largest cities. I believe that if we gave private enterprise a chance they could pay their own way and give the people a great deal of what they want at the same time. This country was built on private enterpise. Anyone who owns his own home or his own car is a private enterpriser.

Does the C.B.C. operate like private enterprise? I would say not. Let me give another example. I read in the report that 80 producers were sent to televise and comment on the boy scout jamboree held at Niagara Falls last year. Eighty producers, commentators and technicians were assigned to cover the boy scout jamboree held at Niagara Falls! The report also tells us that many months were devoted to the planning of the conference. I am not belittling to any extent the importance of that meeting but to me it sounds rather fantastic that the corporation should send that many people to cover it. The report also shows that we sent technical advisers to private stations to teach them how to operate and how to deal with the technicalities of television. Why can these private stations not send their technicians to the C.B.C.? Why should we, using the taxpayer's money, send our technicians out to the private stations?

Then, we come to the news. I am quite sure the news broadcasts have a large listening audience. I would think it is quite natural that some of the listeners might think that a state-owned news service would be rather partial to the government; but I have found, in my investigations at any rate, that the opposite is true; that the C.B.C., and possibly rightly so, are so anxious that they should not be criticized for favouring the government that they are bending over backwards to favour the criticisms of the opposition. They are not even giving the whole story. On the program, "The Nation's Business", the time is divided up, as hon. members know, as follows: Four spots to the Liberal party; three spots to the Conservative party; two spots to the C.C.F; and one spot to the Social Credit party, a total of 10. Out of the 10 spots the opposition parties have six chances to criticize the government. We sit here in the House of Commons with a large majority. A good many of us would like to be on television to present our own private views. We, with 170 members, have four chances out of 10, as against 100 members of the opposition, and they have six chances out of 10 to present their views to the people of Canada.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I watched with a great deal of interest the proceedings on the pipe line as reported by the C.B.C. I think I should take a few minutes to bring to your attention exactly what took place to give you a good example of the C.B.C. coverage of the news on the Toronto station. I believe the Toronto station covers Ottawa, and part of its news is piped into Montreal. In going through the Toronto news I have found that a good portion of it was duplicated on other T.V. and radio stations across Canada. Here is an example from the C.B.C. news coverage of the pipe-line debate in the House of Commons. While these programs are presented to the people on the basis of news reports that are received from the wire service of the House of Commons, they do not give all the truth and a daily diet of slanted news or half-truths is bound to sink into the minds of the people sooner or later, and they are going to begin to wonder just how this country is being run. For instance, on May 9 this came from the C.B.C. central news room in Toronto at six p.m. You cannot call this an untruth. It says:

> Mr. N. E. Tanner, of Calgary, holds only two of nearly 2 million shares of the company. Well over three-quarters of the shares are held by five companies which are owned mainly in the United States.

I would not say it is exactly untrue, but it does not tell the whole story. It does not say they are Canadian companies mainly owned by interests in the United States. Then in the ten o'clock edition of the news they said practically the same thing except the following:

> . . . three-quarters of nearly two million shares are held by four big companies that are owned mainly in the United States.

So there must have been a correction made at that time. Then, it goes on page after page. On May 14, in the 6.30 news, they said:

> The Conservatives have urged that the line be built under Canadian control. The C.C.F. wants it under public ownership. Mr. Howe said there was no way, short of public ownership, of guaranteeing Canadian control over the pipe line.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce never said that at all.

Mr. Knowles: He did so.

Mr. Reinke: He did not. He never said that at all. Then we come to May 14, eleven p.m., and we find a whole page devoted to radio there, the same day that the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke in the House of Commons and delivered a speech explaining the whole pipe line. At eleven o'clock there is nothing but George Drew. The same thing happened again on May 15 and May 16. Here it is again:

> The Conservatives want the cross-Canada gas pipe line under Canadian control and the C.C.F. want it under public ownership.

Nothing for the Liberals. Here we come to May 17 and we find the following; finally the truth comes out:

> Mr. Howe went on to say that no one should worry too much about Canadian control of the line. He declared that Canada would have control of it.

He is reported to have said that on May 17 when, in fact, he said it on May 14, right here in this House of Commons, as reported at page 3864 of Hansard. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> In other words, an all-Canadian pipe line, whoever may own it, is completely under Canadian control.

Previous to that he had gone on to explain that parliament legislates the laws and regulations. What is referred to in this news broadcast is his statement on that day where he said, at page 3864 of Hansard:

> Whenever I have mentioned this 51 per cent offer, I have taken care to point out that it does not guarantee control by Canadians.

But it is a different thing altogether when the people of Canada have been led to believe that this government was not in favour of a pipe line under Canadian control or under control of Canadian regulations.

Then we go on. It goes on every day the same, reports of silly little things that the opposition have said like:

> Mr. Regier said he wondered how much of the money was contributed to the Liberal campaign fund in 1953.

The headline is:

> Charges that Trans-Canada Pipe Line Limited contributed to Liberal party funds.

You might as well call the Minister of Trade and Commerce a crook. Here is another example of it. On nearly every day that is covered by this report reference is made to the fact that debate was choked off. Here we go again:

Opposition cries "shame". "Choke". "Shame".

Then we have a few more pages on which the word "shame" appears. Here is one:

"Shame", George Drew reports.

Then we have an example of the commentary that was given by some of the members of the press gallery. I do not know whether these are called commentaries or whether they are news reportings by the press gallery. If they are news commentaries possibly I am wrong in criticizing them, but I consider them to be a part of the news because the C.B.C. has no reporter in the press gallery, and it should have.

I am not picking on any one particular person, but the first name I come to is Doug Leiterman of the Southam news service. He said:

Parliament hasn't seen such a day as this in this country. At times, the house was completely out of control and seemed about to fly apart at any moment. The members shouted, they were shouted down; the Speaker ruled, then he reversed himself. Once, the opposition refused to vote at all. Liberal back-benchers sang "Alouette" and drowned out George Drew.

Some hon. Members: It is true.

Some hon. Members: It is not true.

Mr. Reinke: It may be true, but it does not give any explanation about what took place in the chamber, nor does it mention the people who were doing the rioting. Here is another example:

Through it all, the Prime Minister sat, shoulders hunched, and spoke not a word. His motion of closure was pushed through, but the opposition is still fighting its legality.

We come now to June 1:

Mr. Drew's motion calls upon the Commons to resolve that it no longer has any confidence in the Speaker, and makes three accusations against him: first, that he improperly reversed a decision of his own without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion; second, that he has repeatedly refused to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard; and third, that he has subordinated the rights of the house to the will of the government.

The first accusation refers to Mr. Beaudoin's decision, at the opening of today's sitting, when he ruled that a motion by Colin Cameron of the C.C.F. was out of order.

It does not mention why the Speaker ruled that motion out of order.

An hon. Member: Did he mention it?

Mr. Reinke: The whole thing is very cleverly put together.

An hon. Member: Of course he did. It was so terrible it had to be mentioned.

[Mr. Reinke.]

Mr. Reinke: We come now to June 4:

The opposition leader in the House of Commons has come out in favour of full public ownership of an all-Canadian natural gas pipe line.

Well, sure he did, but as a third alternative. Anyone who listened to the news broadcast would immediately get the impression that the Leader of the Opposition was in favour of full public ownership of the pipe line. This is strictly a distortion of the truth.

We come now to some of the other commentaries. Here is one by Arthur Blakely; he is a dandy, all right. It reads:

Choked off debate on the subject—guillotine.

He uses the word "guillotine" all the way through. It is not as though he were referring to some member of the opposition using the word "guillotine". He goes on to explain what closure is and says:

The present rule of closure was introduced by the Borden government in 1913 as a means of ending debate on the now almost forgotten navy bill.

He refers to its use in 1917, 1919 and 1921, and when he comes to 1926 he says:

In 1926 the King government used the guillotine.

And then he says:

. . . the Bennett government resorted to the use of closure in 1932 to secure passage of the then controversial unemployment relief bill. The rule "closure" is obviously one to be reserved for emergency use only.

Mr. Ellis: A rose by any other name.

Mr. Hellyer: Down, Wimpy.

Mr. Reinke: And then of course we get into the interviews with the various leaders of the parties.

Some hon. Members: Clause 1; clause 2; clause 3.

Mr. Reinke: These are really worth reading. Of course the leader of the C.C.F. party is reported as saying:

I believe the people of the country will understand that this is a giving to an American corporation of a very large amount of Canadian money. It is said, of course, that some of it is loaned.

Of course, that is his business if he wants to talk like that.

An hon. Member: Well, thank you.

Mr. Reinke: The leaders of all the opposition parties in the house are mentioned, but there is no mention of the leader of the Social Credit party.

Mr. Ellis: He was just a Liberal echo.

An hon. Member: What do you think you were?

Mr. Reinke: Then we come to Stanley Burke. He uses the word "guillotine" for closure, and he does not even bother to explain closure or use the word; it is just "guillotine" again. Then he expresses his own opinion and says:

> Mr. Howe has said that it is of the utmost urgency to start this year. But what would happen if the line were delayed a couple of years? Would it be worth waiting to get a better deal on this vital national project? Then there is the fact that the export deal stands a good chance of being thrown out in Washington. What would happen if the government has to take over the line, serving the Canadian market only? It would—

Mr. Ellis: What is wrong with members of the press gallery expressing their opinion?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): This is supposed to be news reporting.

Mr. Reinke: Why should they be expressing their opinions on a news broadcast?

Mr. Ellis: This is news commentary.

Mr. Reinke: And then they go on to refer to the hon. member for Eglinton.

Some hon. Members: Sour grapes.

Mr. Knowles: Do you want a government-controlled press?

Mr. Reinke: And so the report goes on. On May 30 we have Blakely again using the word "guillotine". He says:

> And so the pipe line battle is joined again, and the House resumes tomorrow under the shadow of the "guillotine".

On May 31, with Doug Leiterman reporting, it was said:

> There was no doubt at all that the government's motion would win and the "guillotine" fall in the early hours of Friday morning.

Mr. Knowles: Did it not?

Mr. Ellis: That was a statement of fact.

An hon. Member: What about the songs you sang?

Mr. Ellis: They want a government-controlled press.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Reinke: I have a few more comments to make.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Before the hon. member proceeds, since he has consent to go on for a few minutes I wonder if he will permit one question. When he says that the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not make a certain statement which was attributed to him over the C.B.C., is he not aware of the fact that on page 3864 of Hansard for May 14, 1956, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is reported as having said:

> Short of public ownership there is no way of guaranteeing Canadian control of the shares.

Mr. Reinke: That is what he said. I believe I explained that when the hon. member was not here.

Mr. Knowles: I certainly was here.

An hon. Member: You are the one who was absent.

Mr. Ellis: He is absent intellectually, anyway.

Mr. Castleden: What kind of press do you want, a government-controlled press?

Mr. Reinke: At any rate the report here mentions the fact that the Conservatives wanted the pipe line to be under Canadian control. The pipe line itself is under Canadian control, as was explained by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but the minister said he could not guarantee that the company would be under control by Canadians. That is where I say the truth of this thing was distorted. The people were led to believe that the pipe line itself was not under Canadian control.

Mr. Knowles: The fact is that the C.B.C. reported the Minister of Trade and Commerce correctly.

Mr. Reinke: He explained it and it appears on the same page of Hansard. Both statements appear on the same page.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member read a part of that page of Hansard.

Mr. Reinke: Then we come to June 2 again, and the report says:

> We have just seen an almost unprecedented spectacle of some two or three hundred people, who almost mobbed opposition leader Drew and C.C.F. leader Coldwell, as they left the building, and there were a good many boos for the Liberal cabinet ministers when they left.

Mr. Ellis: That was right.

Mr. Reinke: I happened to be out there that night when the Minister of Trade and Commerce emerged from the building. I will admit there were some boos from the crowd, but I would venture to suggest that people were planted there for that purpose. There were also some boos for other hon. members—

Mr. Ellis: Yes, other Liberals and Socreds.

Mr. Reinke: —because there were some supporters of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in that same crowd.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): And they were booing him, too.

Mr. Reinke: I was one of them. That was on June 2, before third reading. I know that is a fact because I was out there and I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce received a great many cheers but it says here there were many boos for Liberal cabinet ministers, and opposition leader Drew and Mr. Coldwell were almost mobbed.

That was on June 2. Again there was mention of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, but where is the hon. member for Peace River? Does he not represent a party in this parliament? They seemed to give three times as much time to the Leader of the Opposition as they did to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but that may be a coincidence.

Then finally on June 6 we get the hon. member for Peace River. At last they realized that there were four parties in the House of Commons. I was there on that particular night, as I had been on June 2. I thought I would go out on the final night to see what was going to be telecast. Of course they had the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on, and then they stated that the crowd was becoming noisy and boisterous by the time the Minister of Trade and Commerce emerged. They said there were no cheers for the minister. Then there was some commentary on what the minister said, and there was reference to the Leader of the Opposition and other hon. members who were coming from the building. It does not say much about the Leader of the Opposition except in the last few words, which were:

> The bill to permit the pipe line was passed five years ago, over five years ago, and now—

Then Larry McDonald said:

> Thank you very much anyway.

Then the announcer said:

> As you can see—it was impossible for the Progressive Conservative leader to finish his statement. Later, C.B.C. television news asked him to outline again the points he wanted to make.

There we had all the other parties out in front. Apparently they had to go to the home of the Leader of the Opposition to finally get a statement from him as to what went on. I do not know who is to blame for this misinformation. I am not blaming it all on the C.B.C., but I think some blame rests on them in this particular case. Probably some blame should rest on the Toronto station. I think a lot of it stems from the fact that they have to take the news as it comes out of the press gallery. As long as the C.B.C. wants to operate a news service and produces news concerning the House of Commons, they should have someone here in the gallery. It would require a relatively small expenditure to have a man in the press gallery. At the meetings of the general assembly of the United Nations the C.B.C. has a staff of reporters, but in the House of Commons, the highest legislative body in Canada, they have no one to report on behalf of the C.B.C. That is something that should be corrected as quickly as possible.

I should like to close by saying that parliament will have a problem to face when the royal commission presents its report. It will be our duty to assess the findings in that report. We will have to decide whether it shall be the duty of the C.B.C. to be responsible for the presentation of culture to the people of Canada. Are we going to be responsible for giving them the news of Canada? Are we going to be responsible for entertaining the Canadian people? Is it going to be our job to sell the merchandise and subsidize the program sponsors? Are we going to support the C.B.C. by importing foreign programs and talent? Are we going to use the C.B.C. to educate the people?

These are problems which we will have to face next year. I want to thank hon. members for permitting me to finish my remarks.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member doubting the impartiality of the Canadian Press and the British United Press when it comes to covering parliament? Does the hon. member want them to be replaced by a government-sponsored news gathering service?

Mr. Reinke: I am suggesting that the news that came out of the press gallery with regard to the pipe-line debate was slanted and biased. I know that a good portion of it was cleverly written, but if you have a steady diet of it day in and day out, a little bit here and a little bit there, just twisted a little bit, the over-all picture becomes biased.

Mr. Knowles: Is it not because the Liberals do not like seeing themselves as others see them?

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that after the remarks just made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat—

Mr. Knowles: A Liberal member at that.

Mr. Bryson: —the members of the press gallery will mend their ways. I hope the people of Canada will not repudiate the C.B.C. because of the very silly arguments which have been put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton South. It seems to me that the C.B.C. is very fair with its news releases in connection with all matters that go on in this house, even in connection with something like the controversial pipe-line debate. I was very much surprised that the hon. member did not take to task the newspapers of this country because they made a great many more derogatory remarks regarding the actions of this government than were contained in anything that came over the C.B.C.

It is expected that the Fowler commission report will be presented and be before this house next year. At that time I fully expect there will be a select committee of this parliament set up to deal with those recommendations. I anticipated the suggestion made last night by the minister that we should not deal with the briefs which were presented to that commission at this time, that we should wait until the report has been submitted before we deal with the submissions of the different people and organizations. For that reason I am not going to make any extended remarks this afternoon in connection with the C.B.C. As a matter of fact I feel that in the briefs I have read and the newspaper reports of those briefs there is nothing we have not heard before over the past few years. So if I happen inadvertently to refer to one or two aspects of the criticisms that have been made by some of these organizations, I feel that I shall not be doing what the minister suggested shoud not be done.

I feel very strongly about what I term the unwarranted criticisms levelled at C.B.C.'s policies and the regulations it uses to carry out those policies. I feel let down that the government, which saw fit to establish the C.B.C. in the first place, a child of the government should allow on certain occasions circumstances to arise which give the opposition to the C.B.C. a great deal of ammunition with which to blast that organization.

I also feel strongly that when accusations are made—in most cases false accusations—the members of the government, who should be supporting their own instrument in many instances fail to repudiate these false accusations that are levelled at the broadcasting corporation by its opponents. Because of that I cannot help disagreeing with even the setting up of the Fowler commission, because I feel that commission was set up in spite of the considered opinion and the recommendations of the government members and the majority of the members who sat on the parliamentary committee last year when they dealt with this whole subject. So I am afraid it was something the government did over the heads of those members of the committee who ruled against the setting up of such a commission.

Because of this, because of the actions I have pointed out, I cannot but feel suspicious, and I am sure a great many other Canadians must be suspicious, that the government itself is not yet convinced that publicly owned utilities are in the interests of the Canadian economy. For that reason we who support publicly owned utilities in this country as being the best possible method of carrying on business in certain fields are somewhat reluctant, as the champions of such a system, to make the kind of constructive criticism we feel should be made and must be made if the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is going to expand and do the kind of job that must be done in that field in this country, the kind of job that no other organization can do as well.

I am not going to deal with any of the programming aspects of the C.B.C. I have here, as all members have, the annual report of the C.B.C. I should like to commend the minister and the officials of the C.B.C. for the very comprehensive document outlining the activities in the field of programming they have undertaken during the past year. I think that is one of the finest documents the C.B.C. has presented since its incorporation.

I cannot help being somewhat concerned when I hear the suggestion made that the C.B.C. is acting, in broadcasting in this country, as a competitor, a judge and a jury over the private companies broadcasting in Canada. These people who are opposing the C.B.C., and who are so very critical not only of the cost but more particularly of the types of programs the C.B.C. is airing, tell all and sundry that we should have the kind of programs the people of Canada want to hear. They say that all we have to do is take away the restrictions the C.B.C. imposes on the private stations operating across this country, but they do not tell us what they want to do. They tell us only they are prepared and ready to put on the market, as it were, or on the air waves, tailor-made programs which are going to be highly acceptable to the viewing and listening public of Canada.

First of all I should like to say that their past and present performance leaves a great deal to be desired. I am sure, too, that the majority of Canadians are highly suspicious of the kind of programs the private people would be prepared to put on in this country if they had the field to themselves, which, incidentally, they do not want to do themselves. They have made that quite clear.

Then they suggest a regulatory body. I too wish they had an independent regulatory body, because I am sure the private operators in this country are virtually getting away with murder in so far as the broadcasting regulations are concerned. I am convinced that they do not want an independent regulatory body. All they want is their foot in the door. I am convinced that if we had an independent regulatory body to administer the broadcasting regulations in this country they would find themselves restricted a great deal more in their operations than they have been under the supervision and regulations of the C.B.C. as they are carried out at the present time.

They talk about competition. They go to the people—and this is something that I think is false—and they ask, "Are you in favour of the C.B.C. being judge, jury and competitor with the private stations?" Naturally people are very much aware of freedom in this country. Their immediate reaction is, "Yes, we would like to see an independent body. We do not like to see the C.B.C., this vast corporation, in direct competition with a small independent broadcasting company." But that is false because that kind of proposition is based on the premise that there are two distinct broadcasting organizations in this country. That is not true. We have in this country the C.B.C., and in conjunction with the C.B.C. we have the private broadcasting stations augmenting the services of the C.B.C. and working in co-operation with the C.B.C. In effect we have one broadcasting organization in this country. To admit that the corporation provides the private operators with a great measure of the service free of charge, and then to turn around and say that the private broadcasters are competing with the C.B.C. is an absolutely false statement.

I do not know of any business in this country that is in a more lucrative position than the private broadcasters. They are doing very well. I happen to know a few in my area, and I happen to know that they are in a very lucrative business. But I think I can understand that they see where the business can become even more lucrative. A few moments ago the hon. member for Prince Albert posed the question, why is the station CBK at Watrous not making a profit?

I would suggest to the hon. member for Prince Albert that if the private broadcasters in this country would accept some of the responsibility for building television and broadcasting facilities and better programs, the C.B.C. possibly could make a profit in a good many of the stations they are operating in this country. But the C.B.C. today are building across this country radio and television broadcasting facilities, and certainly they are not going to be in any position to show a profit for some time. But I maintain that if the private broadcasters in this country would do some of the things they are promising they are going to do if they have the field to themselves, by way of providing different programs and building facilities for broadcasting in this country, possibly the C.B.C. would be relieved of a great deal of the economic strain to which it is subjected today. Hence, as far as I am concerned, many of these things do not seem to hold water.

I will agree that C.B.C. broadcasting in this country is costing the Canadian people a tremendous amount of money. But is there anybody in this country who is so naive as to think that he is going to get a comparable type of broadcasting for any less? Is there anybody in this country who is so naive that he thinks the private interests in this country are going to go out and produce television and sound broadcasting "for free"? No, Mr. Chairman; the people pay for everything in this country. Whether it comes from the C.B.C. or whether it comes because of the fact that you buy a can of baking powder or something else, you pay for everything you get in this country. It is a matter of how you pay for it.

Then I have heard the fantastic argument put forward that the poor suppliers of radio and television sets are paying the major shot for broadcasting in this country. I wonder whether there is anybody in this country who is so naive as to think that a man who sells a television set gives $15 of his own money to support broadcasting in this country. No, Mr. Chairman; the person who buys that set pays for the broadcasting just as he is paying for the broadcasting now through the C.B.C. Anybody who tries to tell you anything different is just pulling your leg.

I should just like to say one further thing, Mr. Chairman. I do not think we can afford to turn over an important public utility to private interests, in particular the C.B.C. If we are going to try to maintain programs which have in them a great content of material that is important to Canadians, we can do so only through the C.B.C. Only those who stop to realize what is involved in television appreciate what is the situation. They know that Hollywood can put a program in the city of Toronto, can run that program for from 12 months to two years, and have a full house every night. But if you put on a television program that may cost as much as $25,000 to produce, and you put it over the air waves once, you have "had it"; it is obsolete. If you put it over the air waves twice you will receive criticism. I am sure the members of the C.B.C. who are present will tell you about the criticism that is levelled at them for giving repeat performances over television networks.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am very suspicious. I am very suspicious of the suggestion that anybody else except the C.B.C. is going to provide the kind of programs Canadians are interested in. If we had a network set up by the private broadcasters, as is suggested, I am sure they would buy the cheapest and the least and charge all the traffic would bear. So in closing I should like to say this. If we want the kind of programs that I am sure the majority of Canadians want we are going to be obliged first of all to maintain the C.B.C. and second, we are going to be obliged to pay for it.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Chairman, having regard to what was said with regard to the Fowler commission by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, may I say to him that I do not think there is any need to be suspicious of the motives behind the setting up of the Fowler commission. On May 14 of this year, because I hold strong views with regard to the C.B.C. and private television in Canada, I appeared before that commission in Vancouver—at my own expense, incidentally—and presented a brief setting forth my own ideas. After that brief had been read, Mr. Fowler and his associates of the commission questioned me for 90 minutes, an hour and a half, on my views and on other people's views with respect to Canadian and United States television.

Although I am certainly not an expert on television, either on its technical points or its public aspect, I came away from the commission with this idea, namely that if the government had ever appointed an effective commission on any matter in the last decade, this was the time they had done it. Certainly I do not know Mr. Fowler outside of my 90 minutes before the commission, but I came away with the opinion that here was one of the finest open-minded Canadians who had ever been given an appointment by any government. Mr. Fowler showed—and I have been on two television committees in this house—an understanding not only of my views but of the difficulties encountered by the C.B.C. He argued with me with regard to some of the views that have just been expressed by my friend the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort.

I can assure the hon. gentleman that I came out of that commission meeting not knowing the final viewpoint of Mr. Fowler on anything he had asked me about. He is a shrewd businessman. He understands the position of the C.B.C. and of the private broadcasters. He questioned me with far more ability than I would ever show in my answers, but he indicated a friendly understanding of the whole situation. What the report of the Fowler commission will be, of course, no one knows. But when that report comes down I am quite sure it will be a fair report, and one that will have taken into consideration completely my views and those of the hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F.

Mr. Bryson: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would allow me to interrupt for a moment?

Mr. Goode: Yes.

Mr. Bryson: I should like to put him straight on this one point. I am certainly not critical of the Fowler commission as such. I am very happy with the attitude, as I read it, of Mr. Fowler toward the whole question of the C.B.C.

Mr. Goode: The hon. gentleman was suspicious of the government's motive. I thought that was what he said.

Mr. Bryson: Yes.

Mr. Goode: I could understand what the hon. gentleman had said about that.

Mr. Knowles: That is a different story.

Mr. Goode: Before I go into my little discussion—and most hon. members know what it is going to be about before I do so, because I have mentioned it previously in this house—I want to say this. I have no inclination, and certainly I am not going to do so, of criticizing the C.B.C. this afternoon. I have criticized it in two different committees. I have taken a view that I think has been opposed to party policy on this side of the house. However, it has been sincere criticism, and that criticism has been fought in committee by Mr. Dunton. I think I have come to the point where, although I see his viewpoint, I will never agree with him as long as conditions remain as they are at the moment in Canadian television.

There is one thing I want to say—because I am going to mention to you, Mr. Chairman, the granting of a licence for a television station in Burnaby—to my friends of the C.C.F. There are at least three members of that party from British Columbia who are within hearing of my voice at the moment. Exercising their judgment they have appointed a gentleman to run against me in Burnaby-Richmond. He was sponsored by the present member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, and I think is being advised by him. I shall have some things to say in regard to another matter on another occasion, but I do say to the hon. gentlemen across from me that I have been accused by the official C.C.F. spokesman in my riding of speaking on behalf of private television interests in this house, and of being paid by private interests to do so. I say now that those remarks were either sponsored or directed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, and I hope the hon. gentlemen who now listen to me do not concur in those thoughts, that were not only vicious but most unfair and untrue.

Some time ago, Mr. Chairman, I presented a petition to this house. I cannot go into the matter of that petition because I would be out of order. However, I think you will allow me to say that 13,333 people in my riding, representing something over 50,000 people, asked me to present it to this house. The reason for that petition was that the 80,000 people in Burnaby believe they are important enough in the national picture to be allowed to have what they want. They want a television station in my riding. You can say it is not important in the over-all national policy of the C.B.C., but 80,000 people, the second largest populated area in British Columbia, are important. It is my duty, as best I can with my limited abilities, to present the plea of the people of my riding to the minister and to the C.B.C. for the public utility they want.

It has been said by the C.C.F., and I think quite rightly, that there is money to be made in private television when it comes to Canada; that is outside of Ontario, may I say. There is a lot of money in a private television station. I have not yet heard a good argument to the effect that merely because someone who is going into business is going to make a lot of money, we should not let him go into that business. We have, as the hon. member for Prince Albert said this afternoon, a United States television station in Bellingham, Washington. I am not sure that he realized all the details concerning this station, but at least he mentioned it. This station in Bellingham is taking over $400,000 in advertising from the province of British Columbia every year. I think perhaps the figure now is 50 per cent more than that, but I want to be sure of what I am saying.

Lately the government of the United States has said that this station can now increase its power six times. The Bellingham station, which started out as a two-bit operation, has made enough money out of Canadian advertising so that within the next few days they will have a station comparable to the power of CBUT, Vancouver. As the C.B.C. knows, this station was constructed by technicians on the ground out of home-made parts, yet they have now made enough money to establish themselves as a $2·5 million corporation. They have made it from British Columbia money, because if you watch television in Burnaby, as I do when I am home, you will see that 90 per cent of the programs coming over that Washington station are sponsored by industry either in the Vancouver riding or in my own riding.

A lot has been said during this session about the United States having control of Canadian business. Here is one business about which we can do something if someone in the C.B.C. will allow us to do it. It can be said, and the C.B.C. have argued this with me in committee, that in the final analysis it is the Minister of Transport who lays down the regulations regarding the acceptance of applications for licenses. This does not fool me, and I am quite sure it does not fool any member of the television committee. The C.B.C. decides the final attitude and advises the Minister of Transport or, in this case, the Minister of National Revenue, what should be done. I know of no gentleman for whom I feel more sympathy than the Minister of National Revenue when he has to present these arguments to the house, because no man with common sense could really believe what he has to say. The C.B.C. is supposed to advise him on C.B.C. matters. I am quite sure the minister would know, as I do, that some of the advice they give him is something children might understand, but certainly not members of parliament.

Here we are faced with a situation in British Columbia, and elsewhere in Canada, where we are allowing Canadian money to go down to the United States to sell Canadian goods to Canadians. My people in Burnaby want a television station. I do not care who gets the television station, but I want the C.B.C. and the government of Canada to say to my people, "Send in your applications for a licence and we will look over the whole works; we will pick out the best one." I want nothing whatever to do with it. There is a million and a half dollars available in Burnaby to put up a private television station. There is no reason to prevent that being done, except the fact that the C.B.C. have advised the government there should be a single coverage policy. What single coverage policy? We have two Seattle stations, one Tacoma station and one Bellingham station being beamed into Vancouver every five minutes of the day. Ninety per cent of our television advertising is now going to the United States, to these stations.

Let us be fair to Canadians. Let us be fair to my constituency. We are not asking the people of the United States to take shares in these stations. We are not saying that the United States is going to control this station.

I am telling the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, and because I know the gentleman for the C.B.C. is here I am telling him too, that they are Canadians with 100 per cent Canadian money, ready to put up a million and a half dollars for a television station. They will be spending money that is provided to them in part by Canadian advertising people who want to sell Canadian goods to Canadians through a Canadian television station. Now, if there is no sense to that argument, if I am not on the right track, let someone tell me. They have not been able to tell me that in two television committees, and I do not think anyone can argue against the proposition now. All we are asking is to take Canadian advertising money out of United States hands and put it into Canadian hands.

I am quite sure that somebody will make the argument here that we must not violate this single coverage policy. I am not too sure that Mr. Fowler is sympathetic to that point of view. He talked to me quite a while about the single coverage, as officials of the C.B.C. know. He could not see the fairness of it, either. He perhaps did not argue the way I would, but there were some doubts in his mind as to whether British Columbia—he confined his remarks to that—was being treated properly, because he had had the opportunity of viewing United States television stations sponsoring Canadian advertising.

I have mentioned this fact many times in the house. I have put up the best arguments I can in the television committee. I have everybody in Burnaby behind me; the Burnaby council; the South Burnaby board of trade. Everybody who carries any weight in Burnaby-Richmond says he wants a private television station. We are coming to the point now where we are suspicious of our own policy, because we have appointed a commission to either justify that policy or make some changes.

Let us make the changes cleanly. I am not asking for private television stations right across Canada. I am not saying that every little two-bit operator with a million dollars should be allowed to put up a television station. I am not saying that Horsefly, British Columbia, should have a television station because there are 35 people there. I propose to the minister and the C.B.C., in all sincerity that they give us a television station within the confines of the B contour.

The C.B.C. told me in the committee that they did not propose to build another C.B.C. television station in Canada. That is what Dr. Dunton told me in reply to questions. If I am wrong I know I will be corrected. The answer was given to me that there will not be another C.B.C. television station in Canada. All right; if that is true they have arrived at the point where they have no further proposals to spend capital money in building stations. Then let someone else give Canadians in British Columbia some Canadian programs.

Lately the argument could be used that we have allotted a licence to Victoria, B.C. That only substantiates my argument. No one is going to say—and the C.B.C. has the final say on these things—that Victoria will not overlap the B contour in Vancouver. No one will argue with me that Hamilton does not overlap the B contour in Toronto, because the officials of the Department of Transport will tell that story. I am only saying that if you can give me a directional signal that will reach the boundary between Vancouver and Burnaby I will be satisfied. You cannot do it, but I am willing to go along with that. I am supporting as best I can the request of 80,000 people of the second largest populated area of British Columbia, who says, "We want to spend our money in television; we want Canadian goods televised and advertised to us by Canadian money through Canadian stations". I am going to fight in this house whether I am in order or out of order until Burnaby gets its own station.

Mr. Barnett: May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman? I should like to ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond whether he considers the sole function of a television station to be that of an advertising medium?

Mr. Goode: No. No one with any sense would say that a television station should be only an advertising medium. I will tell my hon. friend that my riding is, I think, not more than seven or eight air miles from the C.B.C. installation in Vancouver, yet I have many hundreds of people in my riding who cannot receive Canadian television of any kind.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I do not often speak on the C.B.C. estimates because that has not been my particular responsibility in the group which I represent, but the hon. member for Macleod, who usually takes care of this section of our responsibilities, is not here at this time. Illness in his family makes it necessary for him to be away. I did think that today I would take just a few minutes of the time of the committee to comment on some of the things that have been said, and particularly on the policy under which the C.B.C. operates.

I can imagine that as the chairman of the board of governors sits in this committee in front of the minister and listens to all the things that are said he must get a bit red in the ears. I am not going to help that very much today, I am afraid, because I believe he needs to have his ears pinned back just a little bit in this committee. I think we ought to talk very bluntly and straight to him as well as to the minister, and let them know exactly what we think about this whole C.B.C. situation.

I am always interested in listening to anything the C.C.F. defend. When they rush to the defence of anything it is a sure sign that they think its administration, its policy and so on are all in their favour, and today we saw another example of what we witnessed here some few years ago when the leader of the C.C.F. rose in his place and in his very ardent and earnest defence of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation also charged the private stations in Canada with being guilty of treason, and indicated that because they were guilty of treason they should have their heads cut off, and so on.

Well, as I said, I am always suspicious of anything the C.C.F. go for in a big way, and when the spokesman for the C.C.F. said today that he hoped these silly remarks—I am not going to say whether or not I agree with their being silly—made by the hon. member for Hamilton South would not cause the people of Canada to repudiate the C.B.C.; when I listened to that and then what followed, I could not help feeling that the C.B.C., its whole set-up, its regulations, the statute governing it and the policy laid down for it by the government, all favoured the leftists' point of view, favoured the very thing for which the C.C.F. have constantly stood. It is a socialist conception; it is a socialist-administered body, and it most often portrays the socialist, leftist point of view. That is the reason we see them exulting over the C.B.C. and hoping that nothing will turn the Canadian people against it.

They do not want a change. Mr. Chairman, that is one of the very best reasons in the world why the minister had better take a look at this thing and the chairman of the board of governors with a view to seeing that it is changed and brought more in line with the spirit of free enterprise, if that is what you believe in. If you do not, then of course let it go on the way it is going, because you have not a free enterprise set-up at all, and you never will have under regulations such as you have today, and the statute and the policy laid down by the government. I am talking very straightforwardly about it. I am not blaming the minister nor the chairman of the board of governors of the C.B.C. The responsibility has to be taken by the whole government for this thing.

[Mr. Low.]

My hon. friend of the C.C.F. spoke about quite a number of things in connection with the C.B.C. but, in the main, he defended the whole set-up and pleaded for no change. Well, now, I have never had too much time to listen to the C.B.C. network commentators in the past, but I did this past winter. I was forced by an illness to remain in bed for quite a long time, and I had ample opportunity to listen to commentaries, both from foreign commentators and from our own in this country. While I was convalescing I paid particular attention to what was going on, and I can understand, after listening very carefully to these commentaries over several months, why the C.C.F. exults over the C.B.C. and what is going on, and will rush to its defence so constantly.

I listened to such men, for example, as Milton Shulman, Marcus Long, Leonard Beaton, Murray Ballantyne, Alex Josey and others, some from Britain and some from Canada; and in every single case as I listened to those commentaries they slanted news strictly to the left. They played up the weaknesses of British policy when they were speaking, for example, of the situation in Cyprus, in Malta, or in any other place, such as British East Africa. I heard one of them talk about Kenya. They slanted their commentaries strictly to the left and ran down British policy. They could not have done a better job of trying to destroy the commonwealth and its unity if they had been communists themselves.

I could have understood that if within a matter of a few days, a week or two weeks, I had been able to listen to commentaries that presented the other point of view; but, Mr. Chairman, I listened in vain. There was not a single instance of the other point of view being given a chance on the C.B.C. Is there any wonder that British policy has come under very great, destructive criticism; is there any wonder that the commonwealth is being weakened? Is it any wonder that people are coming to think more and more leftist all the time? I charge the C.B.C. with the responsibility of refusing or neglecting, one or the other, to give an opportunity to commentators on the other side of the question to present their views in order to balance this thing up. I have been told on several occasions that the C.B.C. does try to present a balance. Well, if they do I must say that in all the months I was required to lie in bed, when I had nothing to do but listen to the commentaries and news broadcasts over television, I never heard one single effort made to present the other side of the case; that is the pro-British, pro-private enterprise, the pro-policy regarding, let us say, the right of the self determination of people.

Not once in all the time I lay there listening to these commentaries did I hear one rightist objective talk about places like Cyprus. I never once heard the fact mentioned that Greece had never been in possession of that land. I never once heard that a great proportion of the population on Cyprus is Turkish. I never once heard it emphasized to the public that if the island and its people were given over to the complete control of Greece, these many thousands of Turkish residents who have just as much right to be there as the Greek residents would be at the mercy of a group of—what shall I call them? I cannot find words to describe them. They are nothing but anarchists who want to gain control by force. What better are they than communists? Not a bit better.

Under the circumstances it would seem to me it is the responsibility of the C.B.C., which chooses these commentators, to see to it that the other side of the question is given as much prominence as the leftist side is given.

Mr. Philpott: What about Wilson Woodside? Did you not hear him this year?

Mr. Low: I am sorry but I did not.

Mr. Philpott: He has been on several times.

Mr. Low: As I said, during the period of months when I was on my back and listening carefully to these broadcasts I did not hear one single commentator present anything but the leftist side of the case. It may be that Wilson Woodside occasionally gives a newscast that presents a more objective view or that plays up the right side, but if so he is one of the very few. He is like a voice in the wilderness.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: I hear one of my C.C.F. friends saying "Hear, hear". He agrees with what I said. He does this, of course, because it is true.

The hon. member for Hamilton South spoke at some length about slanting newscasts. I am not going to comment whatever on what the hon. member said, except to say that what he said is in large part very true. There was serious slanting done in relation to the news during that period when we were having the pipe-line battle in this house. I would like to mention an incident that occurred about that time over the C.B.C. television network which is not a case of slanting but one of absolute falsification.

I was lying on my back at home one evening listening to a telecast; I believe it was "Press conference". One of my colleagues, the hon. member for Macleod, was being interviewed by a group of people amongst whom was Grant Dexter of the Winnipeg Free Press. At one stage Mr. Dexter referred to something that had happened just a day or two before in the house concerning my friend the hon. member for Bow River.

During the course of one of his addresses the hon. member for Bow River pulled out a dollar bill and said something to this effect: "Now, what is it that gives value to this?" He referred to the fact that the bill was signed by officers of the Bank of Canada and proceeded to read the names on the dollar bill. He mentioned the name of Mr. Coyne who is the governor of the Bank of Canada. Now this bird, Grant Dexter, up in the gallery, took for granted that he had deliberately mispronounced it, and on the "Press Conference" program to which I have referred he charged—

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I do not think it is fair to refer to a member of the press gallery who is not able to defend himself as a bird.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Dexter should be referred to as a man, which he is.

An hon. Member: He was looking at you.

Mr. Sinclair: You should practise what you preach.

Mr. Low: Does my hon. friend who has raised the objection think anybody could ever win a battle against a columnist in his own column? My goodness, don't think we are so naive, my friend, as to believe this is true. Mr. Dexter will have plenty of opportunity to reply to me through the columns of the Winnipeg Free Press and by other means. He will say what he thinks about me; in fact, he has done that already. I would not have a ghost of a chance.

Mr. Chairman, let me now return to what I wanted to say. If this is distasteful to my hon. friend he can always leave. There is a nice room back of this chamber where he can cool his heels.

Mr. Hees: I just do not believe that you should make remarks like that concerning a man who cannot answer back.

Mr. Low: Oh, he can answer back.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Peace River should be permitted to continue what he is saying.

Mr. Low: Well, Mr. Chairman, this bird up in the press gallery—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, just in order to avoid confusion I think it should be mentioned that there are two gentlemen in the press gallery by the name of Bird, so we had better be careful how we refer to them in order to keep things clear.

Mr. Low: Thank you. I shall be more specific. This gentleman, Mr. Grant Dexter, went on the C.B.C. and prostituted his very grave responsibility by twisting and falsifying what the hon. member for Bow River had actually said. He tried to make it appear that the hon. member for Bow River and his colleagues were anti-Semitic by saying that the hon. member mispronounced the name Coyne as Cohen.

Mr. Knowles: Did he not? He certainly did; I was here myself and heard it.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I was the one who said it, and just because you did not understand it does not mean that I said it. I did not say "Cohen".

Mr. Knowles: In this instance I will support that bird Grant Dexter.

Mr. Nicholson: I was here and I heard my hon. friend pronounce the name twice, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Thomas: He pronounced it correctly each time.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think I should point out to hon. members, both those of the same political party as the hon. member for Peace River and those of other political parties, that the hon. member should be permitted to continue his speech without interruption.

Mr. Low: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for mediating in this squabble. As I said, Mr. Chairman, it is a prostitution of the grave responsibility of the press when a man goes on the air and attempts to absolutely falsify a thing which was said in this house, and to twist it to his own liking. In this case I charge that Mr. Dexter, who enjoys tremendous freedom in this country, ought to have measured up to the responsibility devolving upon him, and should not have tried to deliberately falsify something which, if it amounted to anything, was at the most a mere trivial incident that anybody could overlook if he had a clean decent outlook on things. I mention this as an example of the things you frequently hear on the air.

The C.C.F. spokesman said in the course of his address that the private broadcasting stations were doing very well. I do not know why, but he used as an excuse for the fact that the C.B.C. is not able to compete with the private stations and is unable to show a favourable result the reason that they are expanding and building stations and generally increasing their facilities. The C.B.C. have never been able to compete with private broadcasters, even before they started setting up new radio and television stations. They never have shown equal results and they never will. There is just that difference between socialism and interested private ownership and management. I submit that the private broadcasting stations in this country are doing well and under the circumstances I think they are doing very well. They would be doing a whole lot better if they were not subjected to the overriding control and oftentimes the dicta of people who consider themselves to be completely omnipotent in exercising their powers.

Mr. Bryson: My reference to the private stations doing well was strictly in connection with the financial end, not the service.

Mr. Low: I will go further and say that they are doing well in service. I want to tell you that the C.B.C. will not do what private stations are doing. By the way, my hon. friend is one of the beneficiaries of the private stations which make it possible for every hon. member of this house to make regular reports to their people free of charge while they are here in parliament. The C.B.C. says, "We will grant to this party four telecasts; to this one, three; to this one, two; and to this one, one." It is even worse than that when we come to sound broadcasting.

Let me indicate just what the private stations of this country are doing. I know personally that in many cases they are going far beyond the call of any financial return or obligation. I should like to refer just briefly to station CFGP at Grande Prairie in the Peace river country. As I have travelled through Peace river constituency I have listened day after day to that station and have heard them providing a service to the people of that constituency, not only in the form of newscasts and commentaries and that sort of thing but by providing during certain hours lovely music played by artists in their own studios, particulars of people who have recently taken ill, reports from hospitals to the people at home on how their sick ones are getting along, and all that sort of thing.

Many of these private stations are performing almost heroic services for the people they serve. If they make some money out of the advertising which is paid for by private business, then I simply say that is all to the good. It is fortunate that they can get this money out of the advertising so they can carry on and give the service they do. I shall defend these private stations and what they are doing. I want to make it abundantly clear that it has been my experience that many of these stations are going away beyond any call of duty, away beyond what they are required to do by the C.B.C. They are helping people in many ways which are never made known in this house.

I do not know how much time I have left, but you call me to order, Mr. Chairman, when it is up. I want to say a word about government policy, because the C.B.C. operates under government policy. The statute authorizing the establishment of the C.B.C. set up a crown corporation which was given authority to operate radio and television stations across Canada. The corporation is doing that. The same statute gives the C.B.C. authority to draw up rules governing the conditions under which private stations may compete with the C.B.C. The statute also clothes the C.B.C. with authority to regulate those competitors.

The hon. member who spoke for the C.C.F. denied that there was any such thing as a judge-jury complex in this business. If he or any other C.C.F. speaker will explain how you can get away from a judge-jury complex under circumstances like that I shall be prepared to listen. I would like to hear my hon. friend give an explanation, and he will have another chance to speak.

Mr. Bryson: On a question of privilege, I should like to explain my position once again. I maintain that there is only one body broadcasting in this country, that the private stations are operating in conjunction with and as an adjunct to the C.B.C. There are not two separate organizations. My argument is that they are not in a competitive position.

Mr. Low: That is an absolutely fallacious argument. They are in a competitive position; they are constantly in competition. When they go into competition who is it that has the final say, who is it that clamps down on the private stations and says they have a position of priority? It is the C.B.C. The policies governing the C.B.C. are a hodge-podge of socialism and private enterprise, with socialism having the upper hand. That is what I am complaining about.

In my judgment the private stations have done a magnificent job under the circumstances, but I am wondering how much more they could have done if they had not been circumscribed, if they had not been kept down by the weight of C.B.C. regulations. The government policy is a straight out and out denial of free enterprise. In my judgment it encourages the board of governors to look upon themselves as absolute dictators and omniscient manipulators. Not only that, the government's policy in many respects is most contradictory.

Let me tell you why I say that. The government's policy says that the C.B.C. and the government of Canada can go into the broadcasting business, but that no other government or crown corporation in Canada can. What kind of consistency is that?

Mr. McCann: That was decided by the privy council.

Mr. Low: What was decided by the privy council?

Mr. McCann: The matter of whether the government of Canada or the governments of the provinces had jurisdiction with reference to the use of the air.

Mr. Low: I am not talking about that. The minister has missed the whole point, and I shall explain it to him. We do not need to get hot about it. I said that the policy laid down in the statute setting up the C.B.C. is completely inconsistent in that it provides for the government of Canada to go into the broadcasting business, which it did through the C.B.C., but it denies the same privilege to a government in any other part of Canada.

Mr. McCann: That is the exact point that was decided.

Mr. Low: It is quite true that with the C.B.C. statute before them the supreme court would rule in favour of the government of Canada. Of course it would. What I am getting at is that the government provided themselves with a policy by law governing the air waves, and in the operation of that law and policy they will not allow the government of a province to have a radio station. If it is good for the one, why should it not be good for the other? All you need to do is to simply provide for it under the regulations. You have that power, but you will not. You hide behind a supreme court decision and claim that gives you justification for not granting a licence to a provincial radio station.

I had some experience with this. Up to 1939 radio station CKUA was owned by the University of Alberta. That station gave most excellent service in many fields; in the field of school broadcasting, in the field of classical music, in the field of religious broadcasts open to every denomination, Protestant, Catholic, Jewish and Moslem in the province. Eventually it got to the stage where it wanted and needed to expand its power and facilities so as to reach the other parts of the province, because the C.B.C. would not allow private networks under regulation 14. So the university came to the provincial treasurer and asked him for some more money.

When we talked the whole matter over we decided that the only way we could justify expanding the facilities was to place the station not under the university but under the department of telephones of the province, so they would have the advantage of the engineering facilities, technical know-how and so on. We did expand the facilities, and then we applied to the C.B.C. for a commercial licence. That was all we needed, a commercial licence, in order to put that station on an even basis with other stations in the city of Edmonton and northern Alberta.

That application was made in 1941, again in 1943, 1944 and 1945, and it was turned down each time on the ground that there was not room for another station in Edmonton. That was the ground; it was not on any constitutional ground at all. That position was maintained all the way through, in spite of the fact that the department of telephones had gone to the expense of expanding the facilities and building up the power so the advantages of the university broadcasts could be enjoyed all over the province, particularly because of the failure of the C.B.C. and this government to allow private networks so the other radio stations could carry those excellent school programs, 4½ hours per week of "School of the Air" for educational purposes. Yet the C.B.C. turned down the application for a commercial licence because they said there was not room for another station. Since that time two other stations have been opened in the city—

Mr. McCann: How long was it used for political broadcasts?

Mr. Low: It was not used at all for political broadcasts. That is exactly the point of view I expected from the minister, "How long was it used for political broadcasts?" It would have been wonderful had it been open constantly for Liberal broadcasts so the minister and his colleagues could use it, but if there was any possibility of anybody else ever using it, then, "No, sir; the C.B.C. will grant no licence." That is typical of that attitude of the Liberal party.

We meet regularly, in what we call these interparty meetings with the C.B.C., to work out the division of free time on the "Nation's Business" broadcasts. In almost every single one of those, Conservative, C.C.F. and Social Credit have pleaded with the C.B.C. to divide the time equally—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Low: They say "Oh." Let me just point out—

Mr. Philpott: It is slanted on your side now.

Mr. Low: My hon. friend says, "It is slanted on your side now." He takes for granted that all the opposition members do is poke at the government. He takes for granted that whenever we get on the C.B.C. networks all we do is try to tear down the government, everyone on this side. That is not true. There are some in this house who still have some statesmanship in them.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry, but it is my duty to advise the hon. member that his time has expired. Of course with the consent of the house he may continue his remarks.

Mr. Low: I would not want to go on at this time, but I shall have more to say about this interpolation that the hon. member for Vancouver South made.

Mr. Philpott: I guarantee right at the beginning that I shall not take as much time as some of the members on the other side of the house, but first let me make some remarks on what has just been said by my good friend the hon. member for Peace River on the question of commentators, because this is a question on which I am a little sensitive myself—

Mr. Low: I can understand that.

Mr. Philpott: —having been a commentator both for the C.B.C. and for the private stations for a great many years. I would say that as far as I was concerned, of the different jobs I have had in this house, on newspapers or in any other walk of life, I never had to work harder for the money I got—and it was not too much at that—than I did as a commentator on the C.B.C.; because on that job, believe me, you are on a really hot spot indeed. My opinion, for what it is worth, is that whatever else is wrong with the C.B.C.—and I think there is plenty wrong with the C.B.C., about which I intend to mention a point or two in a minute—there is nothing wrong with the C.B.C. on two scores; first, they try to be absolutely fair and are absolutely fair in their political broadcasts.

Mr. Low: I deny that most vehemently.

Mr. Philpott: This country has the fairest system of political broadcasts of any country in the entire world, bar none, with the possible exception that it is definitely slanted in favour of the opposition, especially the minority of my hon. friend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Philpott: My second point is that the C.B.C. tries very hard—and succeeds, I think, very well—over the years in the extremely difficult field of providing a balance of political comment. If any of you think it is an easy job to provide a balance in political comment, or for that matter even to provide fair comment in the newspapers of this country, I suggest that you take on the job yourself for a while. I know, as an old newspaperman of 33 years' experience, that everybody in Canada thinks he can run the newspapers better than the newspaper editors, and I also notice that same characteristic applies a little to radio, because it seems to me that just about everybody in Canada thinks he can run the radio better than the professionals who are in charge of running the radio. I just do not happen to think it is true.

When you get down to picking out political commentators in a country like Canada, with all the diverse interests and diverse political backgrounds that we have, it is not the easiest thing in the world to get a balance of commentators. I myself have had some experience from time to time in trying to get up panels. Not so long ago the program "Town Meeting of the Air" was getting up panels of three or four speakers of different parties so as to make a balance. The difficulty is quite obvious. There is a great and growing scarcity of right-wing Conservative speakers who are both intelligent and vocal and who are willing to go on the air and do the job. So you are always left with a lop-sided panel. You always have plenty of good vocal Liberals, and you might also have some good vocal leftists. We certainly have enthusiastic Social Crediters willing to go on any and every panel.

Mr. Low: They are never asked.

Mr. Philpott: But it is not the easiest thing in the world to get a balance which suits all the people of Canada. I must say I was truly astonished to hear my hon. friend from Peace River suggest as leftists the names that he mentioned.

Mr. Low: I did not say they were leftists.

Mr. Philpott: I understand that two of the names you mentioned were Murray Ballantyne and Marcus Long.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, may I correct my hon. friend? I know he would want to have it correctly. I did not say they were leftists. I said that in the commentaries made by these whom I named and many others, more often than otherwise their comments were slanted heavily to the left. I did not name any one of them as a leftist.

Mr. Philpott: I happen to be a little luckier than my hon. friend. I hear some of the comments by C.B.C. commentators on the other side. I heard a very good commentary by Mr. Wilson Woodside, who not so many months ago ran as the Conservative candidate for Trinity and is a man who could not by any stretch of the imagination be called a leftist. Then I often hear, and with great pleasure, Mr. J. B. McGeachy, until recently of the Globe and Mail. I do not think we can call Mr. McGeachy a leftist.

Mr. Low: There are many of us who could.

Mr. Philpott: If that is the case I think we had better skip that matter, because we cannot find any common ground.

I rise at this time particularly to support my colleague the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond in expressing quite candidly what I think is the opinion of British Columbia. During the Easter recess we had the largest and most enthusiastic Liberal convention that has ever been held in the history of the province, at which people from all over the province of British Columbia devised a new platform for the party. One of the points which was passed by an overwhelming majority was that there should be in Canada a new name for the controlling body of radio and television in this country. I forget exactly what they called it, but the substance of the recommendation was that instead of having a board of governors in charge and control over both the C.B.C. and the private stations, we should have a new independent tribunal over both of them.

At this point may I say that while I am personally in favour of it and shall certainly support it, as I supported it in this house some three years ago, I do not believe there was in that proposal as much substance as there is in the proposal made by my colleague the hon. member of Burnaby-Richmond. In my opinion it will not make very much difference what may be the name of the body that controls radio and television in Canada, because if they took effective control of radio and television in Canada all they would do would be to put in my good friend Mr. Davidson Dunton as chairman of the new body. They could not find a better man in Canada. He is by far the most competent radio and television man there is in Canada. Hence all that it would do would be to give a new title to an old job. But I think it would perhaps take the C.B.C. out of the false position in which it is so often accused of being, namely of being both judge, jury and policeman and all the rest of it. It would take it out of that false position.

But as to the question of competition in Vancouver and in British Columbia generally, I am personally quite convinced that at least 95 per cent—or I suppose I could go even higher than that and say well over 95 per cent—of the people of Vancouver certainly cannot see any sense in our being forced to choose between listening to or viewing a C.B.C. television station and the competing private stations in the United States. We believe in competition. We believe in plenty of competition. The only thing in which I differ with my hon. friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond is this. He wants to put up some kind of iron curtain around the borders of Burnaby. I do not think that would be quite practical.

I think perhaps this is what differentiates me from some of my friends immediately opposite. Sometimes I have noted in them what I would call a hostility to private enterprise as such. Some of my hon. friends even seem hostile to the idea of anybody starting a private television station and making money. For what it is worth I say this. If 50 people construct private stations and make money, that suits me fine. I think we can do with one or two of them in and around Vancouver, and all to the good. My policy is to let anybody do anything in the way of private business as long as he is not doing anything that hurts anybody else.

That brings me to an extremely important point. I will frankly confess that if anybody could show me that it was impossible to licence these competitive outlets and still maintain the C.B.C. in the prosperous and sound condition in which it is from coast to coast, I myself would be against any change. Let me make this absolutely clear, Mr. Chairman. I regard the C.B.C. as perhaps the greatest single agency which has yet been built up in this country for the creation of national unity and harmony in this Dominion of Canada. Whatever else we have or do not have, let us never forget the great debt we owe to the C.B.C. It has done a great service to the people of Canada, and it is doing a great service right now.

It is not perfect. I have never met any perfect people. I have never known of any perfect political parties. I have never seen any perfect newspapers. I do not know of any perfect institution anywhere. The C.B.C. is not perfect. I do not expect it to adopt all my ideas or to agree with my ideas which are fairly lowbrow in some respects. For instance, every night is Wednesday as far as the C.B.C. are concerned. They have too much Tschaikovsky and not enough cowboy music, especially in the morning; and I cannot "go" Tschaikovsky before 10 a.m.

I do not expect everybody to agree with me. By and large I think the C.B.C. is doing a wonderful job. Whatever else we do or do not do, I think every intelligent and patriotic person in Canada should make absolutely certain that we keep the C.B.C. in operation, and that we put up whatever amount of money is necessary for that purpose from time to time. While I for one would not dream of trying to anticipate anything the Fowler commission might recommend, I certainly have no compunction in expressing my own personal hopes. Those hopes include the one that, whatever is recommended, the C.B.C. will be kept in flourishing condition; that it will be given the means to do its own job; that it will have taken away from it some of the tasks which it ought never to have been given in the first place and which put it in a false light with regard to some of its own competitors.

Regardless of how the money is raised to finance the operations of the C.B.C., it seems to me that if the C.B.C. can continue to do as good a job for the people of Canada as it has done in the past, it could come before the parliament of Canada every year with its budget and ask for whatever amount of money it needed to do a good job and be reasonably sure of getting it from this house and from the people of Canada.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, there is one thing of which we can be certain when we discuss the estimates of the C.B.C. There is always a great variety of opinion. Certainly this afternoon, in the speakers who have taken part thus far, we have seen the same situation repeat itself. I think it was in the issue of April 2, 1955, that Maclean's magazine presented an extremely interesting article under the heading, "Everybody Throws Rocks at Davey". In that article they were referring to the chairman of the board. A few rocks have been thrown this afternoon and also a few bouquets. I am not going to decide just how the score stands at the moment.

However, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that by the very nature of things there is bound to be long and bitter discussion on a subject of this kind, where you have a broadcasting agency growing larger and larger and more powerful and more powerful under the control of the state. It has been said by some speakers here this afternoon that we have a public utility in the C.B.C., providing a public service. In some respects that is quite true. In this instance, however, we have a public utility, we have a crown corporation dabbling in the very controversial arena of ideas. There are as many ideas or different opinions as there are people in this world. When the broadcasting media are under the control of the state, as they are at the present time, we are bound to have great difference of opinion and rather acrimonious debate.

Actually it is a good thing that we have this opportunity of discussing the C.B.C. estimates at least once a year. Even from the comments that have been made already it is obvious that there is a need for changes in our broadcasting policy, and that there is need for very careful criticism and analysis. I think that has been recognized in the appointment of the Fowler commission which, very shortly, will be bringing in a comprehensive report on the state of broadcasting in this country. Upon that report members of this house will be able to base a more or less comprehensive judgment as to what shall be done in the future.

I listened to the statement of the Minister of National Revenue yesterday and today in reporting to the house on the operations of the C.B.C. As he gave us his statement the thought occurred to me that the C.B.C. has a lion by the tail in broadcasting matters in Canada, particularly since the advent of television. This applies particularly to the rapidly rising costs of providing an adequate television service. The minister's report suggested that we have increased coverage; we have increased programming, and what is perhaps most important, we have increased costs. Everything in the field of broadcasting in the last four years has been getting bigger and "better"—I will put that last word in inverted commas in relation to the C.B.C. activities. I am quite willing to agree that the level of C.B.C. programming has improved in the T.V. medium, but that is to be expected when we recall the tremendous amounts of money that are being devoted to this new mass medium of communication.

However, Canada is rich in talent. There is no reason at all why Canada should not be in a position to provide programs that are equal to the best that can be provided by broadcasting activities in any other country. It is not because the C.B.C. is largely a state operation that we have excellent programs. Under any conditions of broadcasting we would have this same talent available. It could be argued, of course, that the state monopoly of broadcasting, rigid state control, might serve to inhibit creativity rather than stimulate it. Other major countries which are extensively engaged in telecasting at the present time also present worth-while programs.

I am glad to see that the C.B.C. is going to extend its activities so far as the international exchange of worth-while programs is concerned. I suppose the country which has the greatest output of high calibre programs for various reasons is our neighbour to the south, the United States. They have the resources, the talent and the manpower. They also have the greatest degree of freedom in broadcasting activities. I have before me a report that I took out of a U.S.S.R. picture magazine for May, 1956. It reports extensively on the aims and tasks of broadcasting in the U.S.S.R. There they have a state-controlled broadcasting service, of course, and the paragraph which sums up their objectives says something to this effect: The Soviet people do not regard the radio solely as a means of getting news or entertainment. They regard it as a means of broadening their store of knowledge and of keeping in contact with all the developments in world culture. It is in line with this approach that radio programs and television programs are worked out. They go on to outline the kind of programs they are doing in that country.

It is quite true that there are various ways of handling this important medium of communication in Canada which, in a relatively short time, has made a fair degree of progress. But I still say it is possible to argue that the rigid control in this country has inhibited rather than encouraged creativity. The matter of programming seems to be the main reason for the rapid rise in the cost of Canadian telecasting. I should like to raise a query as to whether, in order to carry out the announced functions of C.B.C., it is advisable for us to concentrate so extensively on the provision of light entertainment. There are several fairly costly programs of this kind that are promoted by the C.B.C. Most of them are imitations of similar United States variety shows, and are justified as talent producers. Unfortunately, as the minister mentioned last night, as soon as the artists achieve any degree of fame on the network in Canada there is a tendency for the talent to be lured across the border, where the opportunities are wider and the financial inducements greater.

The minister explained that phenomenon as an indication that Canada has reached maturity in the talent field. It is a rather left-handed compliment to Canada that our entertainers are invited across to wider fields in the United States talent market. That, of course, is one explanation; but it is a phenomenon that has unfortunately been occurring for years, that Canada's outstanding talent, not only in the entertainment field but also in other professional fields has been going to the United States. It is something that has not been in the best interests of the country.

I think there is another explanation that might be given, and that is that there is under the present semi-monopolistic position of broadcasting under the control of the C.B.C., no other outlet for entertainment talent in Canada. If a professional entertainer does not find favour with the C.B.C. he has no other place to turn in Canada, and therefore must find his way across the border.

This situation arises particularly because of the C.B.C. monopoly of network facilities.

The criticism is made from time to time that the private broadcasters have not encouraged Canadian talent to the same extent as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Well, that is quite understandable when we realize that in order to provide programs of the same high calibre it would be necessary for the private operator, under existing regulations, to carry the full burden of the expense on his own financial resources, whereas the C.B.C. with its broad national network resources can pool the expenses right across the network, as well as being subsidized by the public treasury. If the private stations had the same privilege of pooling expenses there is no doubt they could make a broader and wider contribution to the improvement of programming in both the radio and television fields.

The basic function of the C.B.C., the original purpose in establishing a national service, was to knit Canada together as a closer national unit. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat, the hon. member for Vancouver South, said that the greatest contribution in this regard has been made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I was glad to hear him make that confession, because hitherto I had always heard it was the Liberal party that had made the greatest contribution in that regard. I will say that the C.B.C. has done an outstanding job in establishing a national point of view—

Mr. Philpott: Different fields, entirely.

Mr. Dinsdale: —in helping to knit this diverse geographic expanse together, and that was one of the original basic purposes in establishing a national Canadian broadcasting system. Second, there was the important function of bringing a Canadian content, in the first instance, to our radio programs and now to our television programs. These same functions still remain, and it is in these areas that C.B.C. can serve its most useful purpose. But here again I should like to suggest that as changes have taken place in broadcasting in Canada, the private operators have moved into this area to a much greater extent than was originally expected. For example, we have now some 150 private stations helping to weld Canada together culturally as compared with some 30 C.B.C. radio stations—I am not sure of the exact number—and even in the television field there are more private outlets today than there are C.B.C. outlets.

Notwithstanding the limited resources of the private broadcasters, that have risen from the circumstances I outlined a few moments ago. They have been doing some quite worthwhile programming. Therefore, while the C.B.C. has for its two basic functions the matter of national unity and the provision of Canadian content, I think their job today has been lessened considerably by the increase of influence and responsibility of the private broadcasters since the advent of national broadcasting back in 1932.

Perhaps we would be able to deal with this problem of rapidly accumulating costs that has been mentioned by the minister as the bugbear of telecasting in Canada if we used to a greater extent than we are using at the present time the broadcast facilities that are so readily available through the operations of the private stations. Certainly the C.B.C. expenses could be reduced considerably by this method.

I notice that a few days ago—I think it was mentioned in this house—that an experiment was going to be undertaken to make it possible for private operators to carry on a limited network operation. I think that is a step in the right direction, because there is no reason at all why the private stations should be restricted to the local spheres of operation, as they have in the past, and not given wider access to the national radio or television listening audiences. Certainly, it would provide a more representative program and better cultural coverage of the nation if we could get more programs from the local community level than we do at the present time. Under the present set-up a good many of our programs tend to originate in the larger urban centres, which might not necessarily be truly representative of Canadian grass roots culture.

I agree with the minister that we should leave a comprehensive discussion of broadcasting until such time as we have the Fowler report before us, but I do want to mention this one further matter before I resume my seat, and that is the question of the regulation of broadcasting in Canada. This group has never disagreed with the principle that regulation of broadcasting is needed. Obviously, in a communication media so important and so influential as broadcasting, regulations are needed and are carried out in all countries at the present time. But there does seem to be a growing demand for some independence of regulation in Canada.

I raised this issue at the present time because of something that occurred in the Manitoba legislature last March. In view of the fact that I am a member from Manitoba I think it is important that the Manitoba point of view be placed on the record. Certainly we would avoid a lot of the bitterness, a lot of the misunderstanding that arises from time to time in discussions on the C.B.C. if we could remove the suspicion that there was too close a link-up between regulation and the government, for example.

Earlier in the debate we had a suggestion from the hon. member for Hamilton South that the C.B.C. errs too far in favouring the opposition, and he seemed to be bringing forth the thesis that unless the C.B.C. is speaking on behalf of the government it is not performing its function adequately. That seemed to be the implication of his statement.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Dinsdale: Well, he was criticizing the C.B.C. because it seemed to favour the opposition point of view in a particular debate that took place in this house.

Mr. Philpott: Surely the hon. member realizes that the whole point made by the hon. member for Hamilton South was the allegation, which he backed up by some evidence, that during a certain debate in this house the news reports were slanted in favour of the opposition. He was not pleading for propaganda; he was pleading against slanted news reports.

Mr. Dinsdale: That was just his opinion. Then he went on to say further the only way that could be overcome would be by having C.B.C. reporters in the gallery, which suggested that they might be more amenable to the government point of view. That was the implication behind his presentation, as I took it. Rather than move in this direction I think it is imperative that we set up some sort of independent regulatory body to avoid any suspicion of that sort of close tie-up between the government and its broadcasting agency, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I have in my hand a long statement that was made in the Manitoba legislature last march by a Liberal member who took just the opposite point of view. If time afforded I would read it. This takes an opposite point of view from that of the hon. member for Hamilton South, and claims that the C.B.C. is always pro-government and does not allow a fair airing of the other side of the question. We have two sides of the coin, one presented by a Liberal member in this house and one presented by a Liberal member in the Manitoba legislature. Certainly we should take steps just as quickly as possible to avoid any allegations and misunderstandings of that kind.

A monopoly of any kind comes under suspicion and, of course, a state monopoly comes under even more suspicion because it combines not only economic power but political power as well. The sooner we rid the C.B.C. of any shadow of doubt concerning the combination of political and economic power the sooner we will rid ourselves of at least some of this rock throwing that has been taking place in the past few years.

Professor Marcus Long was mentioned in the discussion today. I think he came to the nub of the matter in a statement made in Vancouver recently, when he said:

> I am opposed to any more government control than is necessary . . . If it is necessary to err between control and freedom it is better to err on the side of freedom. That is, increase the number of private stations rather than increase government monopoly and control.

On the subject of regulation, Mr. Chairman, this is what the Manitoba legislature had to say. A resolution was passed and approved in March, 1956, by a vote of 46 to 5, which is one of the largest majorities which has been given any resolution in the Manitoba legislature within recent days. The resolution was phrased in these terms:

> Whereas, Manitoba citizens have a wide choice of radio stations;
> And whereas, there has been a demand for the establishment of more than one local television station;
> And whereas, due to Manitoba's geographic position, a great number of our citizens have but one choice of a television station;
> And whereas, it is desirable that Manitoba citizens have a wider selection of television stations;
> Therefore be it resolved that this house go on record as favouring competition in the television broadcasting field in the greater Winnipeg area;
> And be it further resolved that the federal government be urged to encourage the establishment of television stations in other parts of the province of Manitoba.

Then an amendment was moved which was passed with an unprecedented majority of 47 to 5. The amendment reads:

> Be it still further resolved that the federal government be urged to set up and establish an independent board of regulation for Canadian broadcasting.

We are dealing with a very controversial and complex field, and nothing I can say at this time will throw any further light on the matter. I think it would be in the interests of the best functioning of the C.B.C. if we move toward a more representative position for private broadcasters in this important field, and further if just as soon as possible we establish an independent regulatory body that would remove any shadow of suspicion of political interference in the important function of broadcasting.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I was extremely surprised, as I am sure all hon. members of the house must have been, to hear the hon. member for Hamilton South this afternoon make a charge—which was very vigorously applauded by the many Liberal members in the house at the time—that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canadian Press and the British United Press, the two news services which supply the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with its news, and the press gallery in general are guilty of slanting the news.

I have been a member of this parliament for six years —

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Hees: —and during that time I have become convinced that the C.B.C., the Canadian Press, the British United Press and the press gallery generally report the news both fairly and objectively. From time to time each hon. member, of course, feels that certain speeches did not receive the reporting which they merited. On the other hand, if each one of us is honest he will admit that at times we are very pleasantly surprised by the reporting we do receive, and often we must admit to ourselves that our speeches appear better when we read them in the paper than they perhaps sounded or than we ourselves thought they were.

Mr. Harris: Speak for yourself, George.

Mr. Hees: Of course I know that the Minister of Finance always thinks his speeches are masterpieces, but I am just an ordinary man and I know I make some which I must admit are only fair.

An hon. Member: So do the rest of us.

Mr. Hees: I think a vast majority of the hon. members in this house will agree that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canadian Press, the British United Press and the press gallery generally call them as they see them, and that they are very fair indeed. In sports, Mr. Chairman, one learns to take the referee's decision without whining.

Mr. McCann: You have not learned that yet.

Mr. Hees: Oh, yes, I have. That is one thing I have learned. I have never complained about a referee's decision in my whole life, and I'll bet you have, if you ever did happen to participate in sports, which I doubt.

Mr. Sinclair: You complained about 24 of the Speaker's rulings in one month.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, before the growling started across the line—and it is nice to hear the hon. members on the other side start squealing, because it shows we are sticking them where it hurts—

An hon. Member: Oh, don't be like your leader.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member for Hamilton South and the many Liberal members in the house at the time who applauded him so vigorously whined this afternoon when they claimed that the reports given by the C.B.C., which were given to the C.B.C. by the Canadian Press and British United Press concerning the pipe-line debate, were not flattering to the Liberal party.

An hon. Member: They were lies.

Mr. Hees: Practically every newspaper of every political stripe in this country from coast to coast vigorously criticized the Liberal party's policy and conduct in that pipe-line debate. To single out the C.B.S.'s reports in this instance is, I believe, whining on a very large scale. From what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Hamilton South I can only conclude that he and the Liberal members who applauded him so enthusiastically would like to see the proceedings of parliament reported—

Mr. Studer: Correctly.

Mr. Hees: —by government-selected C.B.C. parliamentary observers over whom the government could exert complete control. Then the people of Canada would receive only the government's version of what transpired in this house.

Mr. Reinke: They would receive a true report.

Mr. Studer: Verbatim.

Mr. Hees: That, Mr. Chairman, would be an important step forward in the creation of the dictatorship which this government's conduct in the pipe-line debate made very clear this government is determined to achieve. I think it was interesting and rather shocking to hear what we have felt has been going on for some time so clearly expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Hamilton South and so loudly applauded by Liberal members who were obviously behind him 100 per cent in everything he said.

Mr. Holowach: Mr. Chairman, late last evening and this afternoon we have been listening to members of the Conservative, C.C.F. and Liberal parties express their views with respect to the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. With much of what has been said I certainly can agree. We agree that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has a very important role to play in the development of the cultural life of Canada. We recognize that many of the issues which are before the corporation at this time, particularly in connection with finance and its relations with the independent broadcasting business in Canada, are matters which deserve our consideration and ought to be resolved satisfactorily as soon as possible.

There are many matters on which we as reasonable men can differ, and in this case the political angle is involved; but I think we will all agree that radio and television, by reason of their impact on commerce, and their daily place in education and entertainment, exercise a tremendous influence upon the public's interpretation of political and social events. For these reasons the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the radio and television industry have a tremendous influence upon our national life. They constitute the most powerful mass medium of communication of our time. In the world of scientific and sociological changes there are bound to be many sensitive problems which have to be tackled, some of which are very controversial. Judging from the speeches which have been made by various hon. members, we are faced with a wide difference of opinion.

In discussing the estimates of the C.B.C. we have an opportunity to examine the entire management picture, and to stress the need of economy. I think one important matter which deserves consideration at this time is the relationship existing between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the independent broadcasting industry. The annual report of the C.B.C. does not refer at any great length to this, but it is an extremely significant matter. We of the Social Credit group believe that it is an important question which involves us very directly. After all, the reason we are here is to see that there is a proper balance between the various industries of Canada, particularly in this field.

Last year we welcomed the suggestion that a royal commission be set up and we are looking forward to receiving the report of the commission. The order in council setting up the commission stated specifically that it should study the licensing and control of private television and sound broadcasting stations in the public interest. We of the Social Credit group approach this entire problem from the standpoint that there ought to be fair treatment for all and special privilege for none. We approach it from the position that there ought to be full co-operation, that there ought to be freedom, and that in this field as in all others there should be righteous competition which would be good for both parties.

Therefore we are opposed to seeing this field ruled or regulated by the excessive power of a government monopoly, which we maintain in this case is the C.B.C., just as we are opposed to private monopoly and excessive power for private money interests which may be interested in this particular field. In either case it is the public who are the losers. There seems to be a trend toward power grabbing and we submit that as members of parliament this should receive our thoughtful consideration.

The Fowler commission has been sitting, and the minister indicated last evening that many submissions had been made. I do not intend to touch upon these, as I think it would be improper to do so. It was my pleasure last year to be a member of the parliamentary committee which studied the affairs of the C.B.C. That committee had many issues before it, many of which also were brought before the royal commission.

Many people have been expressing the fear of abuse and injustice resulting from excess power in the hands of the C.B.C. They claim that this excessive power to regulate the activities of competitors may lend itself at some future date to abuse. The C.B.C., being directly under government control, the inference has been that either this administration or possibly some future administration may abuse that power and become less dedicated to the principle of impartiality. Clearly we do not want anything like that to happen in Canada. However, I think I am correct when I say that abuse is taking place and has taken place.

Because of the actions of the C.B.C. the people of the province of Alberta have experienced injustice and humiliation and I would say insult. A serious situation has been created. It is encouraging and commendable to know that there are newspapers in this country prepared to report some of these startling facts. I hold in my hand a clipping from the King's County Record of June 28, 1956.

C.B.C. Controls Thought

The Fowler commission on broadcasting can surely have no more doubts about C.B.C.'s control of thought in this country. When one of the commissioners stated that the C.B.C. does not "vet" scripts on private stations, these facts came to light.

A group of Alberta stations was broadcasting a series of programs in which Alberta government leaders reported their activities to the people. C.B.C.'s Mr. George Young, who is in charge of broadcast regulations, immediately sent a curt telegram demanding that copies of the speeches be mailed to him at once so that C.B.C. could study the matter.

If C.B.C. does not "vet" such scripts, why ask for them? What do they do with them? Paper the walls of Jarvis street studios, perhaps?

As a result of harrassing these three stations the broadcast was dropped. Consequently the people of Alberta were denied a service and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as an agency of government, was able, by the threat of enforcement of regulations, to stop the flow of opinions contrary to their party's interests.

This is political interference of the worst kind. It is even worse than line by line censorship. It is thought control by threat.

The royal commission on broadcasting must have access to the files of Mr. Young, who enforces

C.B.C. regulations. A study of those files would give an indication of the extent to which the C.B.C. has entered into the political arena with its regulatory powers. Will such a study be made? It should be, and without loss of time.

I am satisfied that, from the circumstances of this case I have reported to you, which took place in Alberta, it is clear that the C.B.C. and the federal government, which after all has guardianship responsibilities over the C.B.C., have offended and done injury to the purpose of the act itself. In any event, the C.B.C.'s action and the manner in which it handled this case without tact—

Mr. Prudham: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he say when that alleged program was on the air?

Mr. Holowach: This particular incident took place some time ago.

Mr. Prudham: What year?

Mr. Holowach: I believe it took place in 1951 or 1952.

Some hon. Members: Oh; ancient history.

Mr. Holowach: It is not ancient history at all. These are facts that have not been disclosed to the people, and that is my reason for bringing the matter to the attention of the house.

Mr. Philpott: Would the hon. member permit a question? He was a member of the radio committee. Why did he not bring it up before that committee?

Mr. Holowach: When the hon. member spoke a few moments ago I listened very intently to him. If he has any further comments to make, I am sure the house would be delighted to hear him afterward.

Mr. Philpott: It is a plain question. Why did not the hon. member bring up this matter in the radio committee, when he could have had Mr. George Young and all the other gentlemen and the documents?

Mr. Holowach: Let us listen to this report from the Nipawin, Saskatchewan, Journal of June 21, 1956:

> Paging George Young!
> A most unusual thing is happening in Canada . . . And it could be cleared up in ten minutes by a Mr. George Young. Mr. Young is in charge of enforcing the regulations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; he writes the letters and telegrams to the private stations when he thinks they are stepping out of line.
> Yet a royal commission on broadcasting has been saying, again and again, that it wants to know where these regulations have resulted in suppression of news or opinion, where they have been unduly restrictive. The royal commission keeps insisting that it wants "chapter and verse".

[Mr. Holowach.]

> Then, why in the world has George Young not been called before it with his files of letters and telegrams?
> Let the royal commission ask him to appear with his file of correspondence dealing with the program "Your Government Speaks" which a group of stations in Alberta started to broadcast. Let the commission hear his curt telegrams and letters—one of which threatened to bring a station, which carried these broadcasts, before the board of governors!
> If the commissioners honestly desire the evidence, that is the place to get it. Surely, it is not fair to ask the private broadcasters to get up and air these complaints—when Mr. Young could easily crack down on them the very next week. Why not ask Mr. Young to appear? C.B.C. is a crown corporation, supposedly owned by the people, isn't it? Then, why aren't those files, unexpurgated, available for public examination?
> If Mr. George Young, as "a representative of the corporation", is so important that his permission in writing must be obtained before a minister of the government of Alberta can go on the air over three stations and report government activities to his people, then surely Mr. Young is important enough to appear before a royal commission and tell how he decides these matters.

I should certainly like to know who Mr. George Young is. To what elite corps does he belong that has such tremendous power it can prevent private radio stations from allowing ministers of the crown to report public business to the people? If there is any general rule in the regulations which does not differentiate between the rights of a minister of the government of Alberta and the rights of some official on Jarvis street, then we ought to do something about that mighty fast.

I have no intention of being unfair to anyone. In fairness I wish to make it perfectly clear that we in the Social Credit group cannot agree with anyone who makes a wholesale condemnation of the work of the C.B.C. We have always maintained, and we have expressed ourselves on the floor of this house, that the C.B.C. has provided and pioneered a most valuable service for Canada and that in the future it can play a very important role. On the other hand we cannot agree with the current position of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in which it does possess exclusive powers and is in the most lucrative television areas. The reason we feel that way is, as I indicated before that we are definitely against the over-all trend of power grabbing that is going on. It is going on not only in this particular industry; there is a definite trend in the affairs of government and big business.

Today the present government has more power and control over the lives, the privacy and the property of our people than ever before. We see that in the string of corporations that have been set up, corporations that have invaded those fields in which they have no business to operate and provide service that could well be provided by private enterprise, were it only given the opportunity. We see it also in radio and television. As I indicated before, this trend is not confined to government only; it is prevalent in other fields as well. We see it in big business, with large corporations absorbing small ones; we see it in finance; we see it in labour. It is becoming a battle of giants. The small independent operator who is anxious to invest, who is anxious to contribute and compete in these various fields is just lost in the shuffle.

I think it was Theodore Dreiser, the author of "An American Tragedy", who many years ago stated that it is not a very great step from the nation of chain stores, chain railways, chain hotels, chain newspapers, chain industrial and mercantile establishments—and I might add a chain of government-owned television and radio stations—to a chain soviet system.

In view of this situation, the position we in this group take is that whilst the C.B.C. does perform a most useful function, there is definitely the need for modifications and adjustments in the policy with respect to that corporation. We believe that somewhere between the two extreme views that have been expressed in the debate thus far lies the correct answer to a more equitable relationship as between the C.B.C. and the private radio and television operators of this country. I cannot quite understand what fear the corporation has with respect to setting up such an independent regulatory board. In fact, I believe that such a board would take away from the C.B.C. many of its heavy responsibilities.

Now just a word about the programs. I should like to be quite frank in this matter. On the one hand I think some of the programs presented by the C.B.C. are excellent. I certainly have enjoyed them. On the other hand I have seen programs that have made me wonder just why the Canadian talent that I know exists in this country has not been used. We have heard statements made to the effect that there are various slanters of news. We believe the chairman of the board ought to give this matter serious attention in order to make sure that there is no slanting of news.

With respect to the utilization of talent, I should like to say that from a western standpoint we people in the prairie provinces especially are not receiving a proper number of programs originating in our centres. I should like to have the minister later on, perhaps when he is answering some of the comments that have been made, tell us just how many programs originate in the city of Edmonton. I know there is an abundance of talent there that has very little opportunity of expression, and I have received rather serious complaints in that regard.

Speaking quite frankly, I believe that the C.B.C. would also command much more respect and elicit much greater public confidence if it would enable the minority parties—and I refer to the recognized minority parties—to obtain a fuller share of public attention. The controversial matters that come before parliament are such that the people of this country deserve to have put before them the various sides of political opinion. I do not believe the opportunity to do this should be subject to financial limitations which burden most of the smaller parties. In addition, as I indicated previously, there should certainly not be any interference with the rights of ministers of provincial governments to report to their people.

Then there is the matter of finances that has been discussed in some detail. I think we should know just what plans the government has with respect to financing some of the future programs and activities of the C.B.C. We start with the accounts of the government of Canada for the year ended March 31, 1955. The Auditor General at that time reported the following:

> 87. The income of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was, of course, distinguishable from that of the others because $27,720,000 was in the form of statutory grants—$6,250,000 under section 14 (3) of the Canadian Broadcasting Act and about $21,470,000 under section 14 (4) of the act, being an amount equivalent to the proceeds of excise taxes on sales of radio and television sets, tubes, etc. However, the corporation also had revenues of $6,263,000 from commercial broadcasting and miscellaneous revenues of $753,000. The corporation ended the year with an excess of income over expense of $4,268,000, after providing $1,365,000 for depreciation and obsolescence.

A similar situation appears this year. We find that in radio broadcasting, despite the grant of $6,250,000 authorized under section 14 (3) of the act plus the grant of $5,061,964 authorized under section 14 (4), as well as the increased revenues from licence and advertising fees, the C.B.C. reports its operating expenses were greater than in 1954-55 and resulted in a deficit of $286,830. The picture is the same with regard to television. It is my understanding that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would like to start colour television. This requires more and more money. As I stressed before, the people of Canada are entitled to know just where it is going to come from.

In reading the annual report given by the C.B.C. we have the faint suggestion made that an annual licence fee for radio sets be made available to the C.B.C. The question I should like to have answered is whether this additional licence fee for radio sets is to be imposed on the people of Canada. In my view the taxes which the people of this country are carrying at the present time are intolerable. It is quite obvious and clear that there is a need for economizing. In my opinion the C.B.C. deserves a sympathetic approach with respect to the financial difficulties they have at this time; but if they are to get that approach from the public, I think they ought to rid themselves of the idea that they do not have to reform themselves.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Blackmore: No, Mr. Chairman. It is almost six o'clock. May I leave my remarks until Monday?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS ON AND AFTER AUGUST 1

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, before I deal with the business for next week I wonder if I may have permission to revert to motions in order to move:

That on Wednesday, August 1, 1956 and on every Wednesday thereafter until the end of the session, in addition to the sittings now provided for by standing and special orders the house shall also sit from eight to ten o'clock p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions for this purpose?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Harris: On Monday we shall take the resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour with respect to equal pay for female employees; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; second reading of Bill No. 443, to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code; second reading of the two bills in the name of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources; the house in committee on the bill to amend the shipping act and the bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PUBLIC RELATIONS OFFICERS

Question No. 555—Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. Are there any public relations officers in the Department of National Defence?
2. If so, how many in each branch of the service?
3. What duties do they perform?
4. If separation allowance, assigned pay, etc., is discontinued to the wife of a serviceman, do these officers contact the family and give reasons for discontinuance of same?
5. If not, does anyone in the department inform the wife or family that allowance is discontinued, and give reasons for such action?
6. How is the wife or family so informed?

Answer by: Mr. Hellyer, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of National Defence:

1. Yes.

2. Navy, 15; army, 22; air force, 17.

3. The main duties of public relations officers are: (a) to facilitate a flow of unclassified news about the armed forces to the Canadian public; (b) to give advice and information at appropriate levels in their respective services about the various aspects of a suitable over-all public relations program; (c) to advise upon and implement as appropriate—particularly at overseas establishments—a program designed to foster and maintain friendly relationships between service establishments and adjacent civilian communities.

4. No.

5 and 6. A serviceman is considered to be personally responsible for informing his wife or family of his financial arrangements and of normal alterations in this respect.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Family allowances and old age security—

278. Administration, $2,693,059.

Civil defence—

281. To provide for the civil defence program, $7,010,018.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 30, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

APPROVAL OF REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Hon. W. E. Harris (for Mr. Pickersgill) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting a reclassification of the staff of the library of parliament, laid upon the table of the house, July 28, 1956, be now approved.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EGYPT—SUGGESTED FORMAL PROTEST AGAINST SEIZURE OF SUEZ CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the developments over the week end, has the government given consideration to the advisability of presenting a formal protest to Egypt which would indicate the position of this government in relation to the events which have taken place there in a manner that is not merely a question of reporting, but would constitute a direct representation from this government?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter has, of course, been under consideration, but we have not decided yet to submit any formal protest, and I do not know that there have been any formal protests submitted by any of the other commonwealth countries but the United Kingdom itself. We are, of course, through our high commissioner, in very close touch with what is going on at the conference between the great powers primarily and to the greatest extent interested in this, and we shall certainly be kept fully informed from London, Washington and Paris about what is going on.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I ask a supplementary question. The Globe and Mail of this morning reports as follows:

British government sources said that early responses from the commonwealth had been encouraging. South Africa, Australia and New Zealand were said to have pledged their active support for firm British reaction to Nasser.

Will Canada take the same position as those other nations of the commonwealth?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We are not informed that that position has been taken by Australia and New Zealand. We have been in touch with the Prime Minister of Australia and we understand that concern has been expressed there, as was expressed here, over the possible interference with the effective administration without discrimination of the canal but that so far it has not gone beyond that and their communications, as ours, have been confidential communications with the United Kingdom authorities.

MILAN BABIC—TREATMENT BY UNITED STATES CUSTOMS OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the government make a strong protest to the United States government regarding the arrogant behaviour of the United States immigration department toward Mr. Milan Babic, a Canadian citizen carrying a Canadian passport, who was a survivor of the Andrea Doria? Mr. Babic was retained in the custody of the United States immigration department for 24 hours and, in his own words, was treated as a criminal. Because of that retention he was not listed as a survivor. No one knew of his whereabouts, and it was not known that he was a survivor until he turned up in Toronto last Saturday.

It is my information that this kind of treatment by the United States immigration department is becoming more and more common. The government should take steps to see that this kind of treatment is not meted out to Canadian citizens in the future.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have not had any complaints of any kind from Mr. Babic concerning this matter and I think we would be well advised not to make formal representations to the United States government without such a complaint from the man concerned and merely on the basis of press dispatches. However, in view of the nature of the information contained in the press dispatch we have already asked our office in New York to find out, if they can, what are the facts of the case and to get in touch with Mr. Babic and see what he has to say about it to us.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the government finds out that the facts are as I have stated, will it make a very strong protest to the United States government?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if the facts are as stated in the newspaper we will take the required action. I think it would be quite proper to bring the matter to the attention of the United States government.

MIDDLE EAST—SERVICES OF GENERAL BURNS UNDER UNITED NATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in connection with a news report today to the effect that Jordan has objected to the continuance of General Burns. Has the minister anything to say in regard thereto, and could he say whether, in view of General Burns' outstanding services in the Middle East in the Jordan-Israel dispute, a request has been made for the continuance of his occupancy of that position beyond the expiry date, which I believe is early in August?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have seen the news report in question, and all I think I can usefully say—because General Burns is an official of the United Nations—in this matter is that his record speaks for itself and is, I think, sufficient denial of any charge of partiality or lack of objectivity. General Burns' term of service with the United Nations comes to an end, I think, at the end of August or September; in any event, within the near future. Although I should like to check on it I believe that the suggestion has been made by the Secretary General of the United Nations that General Burns might be requested to stay on. However, that is a matter entirely for General Burns to decide.

REQUEST FOR ONE WEEK'S EXTRA PAY FOR TEMPORARY STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I am sorry I have not been able to give him notice but it is because I want to do this before the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

In view of the unduly long duration of the present session and in view of the fact that the permanent stenographers in the House of Commons pool all receive one month's holiday, will the government consider giving one week's extra pay in lieu of the one week's holiday which the temporary stenographers would be entitled to if they were working for civilian organizations?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall that we ever had a request of this kind on former occasions when the session was unduly extended, as my hon. friend says, but of course we shall consider what he has said in his question.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NEWS COVERAGE OF PIPE-LINE DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of certain things that happened on Saturday. I would like to ask him whether in his opinion and that of the government the reports of parliamentary reporters of the Canadian Press and British United Press and also the news summaries that the C.B.C. carried in connection with the pipe-line debate were not fair, objective and accurate?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is a question that should be asked on the orders of the day. That is a matter of personal opinion, and this is a free country where every Canadian is entitled to his own opinion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is no answer.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. If this is a free parliament, have not members the right to ask the Prime Minister for his opinion in regard to such a matter?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): And the Prime Minister has the right to refuse to reply, as I am doing at this moment.

Mr. Sinclair: It is a free country.

PUBLIC WORKS

CAPE TORMENTINE—SANDSTONE FOR CAUSEWAY TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister had time to consider a news dispatch from the Charlottetown Guardian of July 19 which I left with him last week to the effect that hard sandstone fill suitable for the proposed causeway had been found at Cape Tormentine?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, geologists of the Department of Public Works, after checking on the rock formation in the Cape Tormentine area, have laid out a preliminary program of test drilling.

To date the public works crew has completed two test holes and is working on a third. A total of about 340 feet of rock has been drilled. The cores are now in our testing laboratories in Ottawa where they are being studied. Six more test holes are planned. Depending upon the results of this test drilling, it would then be necessary to undertake an extensive drilling program to determine if suitable material is available in sufficient quantities and locations to be quarried on an economic basis.

We are in the early, preliminary stages and much remains to be done before a decision can be reached as to the feasibility or otherwise of building a causeway from the mainland to Prince Edward Island.

FISHERIES

NEW BRUNSWICK—REPORTED DESTRUCTION OF FISH BY AIR SPRAYING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Will he be so kind as to tell the house what is his present attitude in regard to his announced intention to take action against Forest Protection Limited in regard to the destruction of certain small fish? Has that attitude changed in the meantime?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the matter has been before the legal authorities of my department and I believe is now before the Department of Justice to ascertain whether we have a good case, either criminal or civil, against the aviation firm which sprayed our hatchery and killed one-third of our fish.

NATIONAL PARKS

INQUIRY AS TO STUDY BY PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources a question of which I have not given notice but which I am sure he will be able to answer. Can the minister tell the house if it is proposed to set up a parliamentary committee which will be assigned the task of investigating Canada's 17 national parks?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I have not heard of any such suggestion.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): A supplementary question. I would point out to the minister that the Crag and Canyon of Banff, the issue of July 25, carried the following:

> Senator Donald Cameron, director of Banff school of fine arts, has been instrumental in the proposed formulation of a parliamentary committee assigned the task of investigating Canada's 17 national parks.

Mr. Lesage: That is the first news I have had.

MILK

ONTARIO PRODUCERS—REFERENCE TO TREATMENT GIVEN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege arising from a question asked the right hon. Minister of Agriculture last week by the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Huffman) during my absence. It had reference to two news stories which had appeared the previous week, one in the Woodstock Sentinel-Review and the other in the Globe and Mail, containing certain statements attributed to me. The statement which appeared in the Sentinel-Review of July 20 contained a reference to an alleged statement by myself concerning the Minister of Agriculture. This statement was as follows:

> Mr. Nesbitt said a deputation from the Ontario Milk Producers Association had appeared before Mr. Gardiner and was attempting to read their brief when the minister said "he wasn't interested in hearing about the milk industry".

The interview I had with the reporter of the Woodstock Sentinel-Review was an informal one over a cup of coffee. The matter of whether or not a deputation from the milk producers was received—before the standing committee on agriculture—was discussed. The news story which appeared in the Woodstock paper was in my opinion correct with the exception of the paragraph I have just quoted. I immediately got in touch with the editor of the paper and said that the statement was not correct, that I had not said the minister had made any such statement. That complaint was made to the editor immediately upon publication. Unfortunately I was absent from the house for part of last week when the matter was raised.

Since then the reporter who wrote the story kindly sent me a telegram acknowledging that I had been misquoted and that the statement was incorrect. I shall be glad to let the right hon. minister see the telegram. Frankly I do not blame the minister for raising the point because it was a serious charge which simply was not true. As far as the story in the Toronto Globe and Mail is concerned, which I might say is quite incorrect, I do not know where they got their information. They certainly did not get it from me.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I should just like to say that it was not I who raised the point in regard to that. I just brought a letter into the house and read it in reply to the question which was raised by the hon. member, and I went on to say that it did provide an opportunity for these people to indicate that I did not meet delegations in that manner. All I wish to say about this is that on future occasions when I make corrections myself of what reporters say I hope there will not be so much booing from the other side of the house.

Mr. Nesbitt: I rather thought the minister might be somewhat sympathetic, because I dare say in his long and colourful career he has been occasionally misquoted himself.

Mr. Gardiner: Quite right.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY REGARDING BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Albert Lavigne (Stormont): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Owing to the added importance brought to the area by the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, will steps be taken to define more clearly the boundary line between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario in the lake St. Francis area?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): The hon. member spoke to me some time ago about his intention to make an inquiry about the uncompleted boundary line between Ontario and Quebec in the St. Lawrence area. I had the opportunity to see the records of the department and I find that the correspondence goes as far back as February 1938, when a series of questions was placed on the order paper and answered by Hon. T. A. Crerar, then minister in charge of this department. I would refer hon. members to Hansard of May 18, 1938, page 3241.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Since I became associated with this department there has been further correspondence. On December 8, 1953, I received a letter from Hon. Lionel Chevrier, then minister of transport, pointing out the urgency of having this boundary survey completed. Following receipt of his letter, I wrote to the ministers responsible for boundary survey work in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The last paragraph of my letter reads as follows:

> You may wish to renegotiate the matter with the province of Quebec (or the province of Ontario), towards the completion of the survey for the demarcation of the line. I am fully aware that this demarcation is the entire jurisdiction of the provinces, but I simply submit that the final survey would prove beneficial to all concerned.

These letters were acknowledged, but no action was taken.

The matter of interprovincial boundary surveys is the responsibility of the provinces concerned. Our department does co-operate when a request is received from both provinces, usually by appointing the surveyor general as chairman of a three-man commission with a representative from each province; who are charged with the responsibility of completing the survey. The costs of such surveys are shared equally by the two provinces concerned and this government.

I can assure my hon. friend that, as soon as requests are received from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec for the completion of this boundary survey, our department will act immediately.

PRIVILEGE

MR. REINKE—REFERENCE TO RADIO REPORTS OF STATEMENT IN DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Reinke (Hamilton South): On a question of privilege, I was listening to radio station CFRA on Saturday evening at 6.30 p.m.—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Reinke: On a question of privilege—and again at seven o'clock to radio station CKOY. It was attributed to me that I had said in the House of Commons that afternoon that news coming out of the press gallery was slanted and lies. I think that is a very serious allegation for anyone to make. I certainly would not make it without substantial foundation, and I never said that. What I actually said was in answer to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and as found at page 6632 of Hansard I said that news coming out of the press gallery was slanted and biased.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Repetition makes perfect.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROVISION FOR EQUAL PAY TO FEMALE EMPLOYEES FOR EQUAL WORK

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide equal pay for female employees as compared with male employees of the same employer, for identical or substantially identical work in federal works, undertakings or businesses; and to provide further under the enforcement procedure for the appointment of referees who may be paid such allowances and expenses as may be approved by the treasury board.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, this resolution, item No. 11 on today's order paper, has now been on the order paper for quite a long time, and I can assure the committee at once that, with the exception of nine days at the end of June, I have been ready and anxious to bring it forward for consideration. However, it has been unavoidably delayed and as the time of unavoidable delay has stretched out in length the statement I planned to make at the resolution stage has conversely become shorter and shorter. I am sure that the committee will agree with that point of view this morning.

The idea contained in the resolution goes back for some years in Canadian history. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested in his speech in the debate on the speech from the throne, the idea was voiced in this chamber about 20 years ago by the then hon. member for Grey-Bruce, Miss Agnes Macphail. But to come down to more recent years, I am sure that all members of the house and many others outside the house have been impressed by the aggressive campaign that has been waged for this idea by the hon. member for Hamilton West. I pay tribute this morning in unstinted fashion to the value of the hon. lady's work in assisting in the crystallization of public opinion in this regard. Perhaps not so obvious but nevertheless effective has been the persistent influence for action in this field brought to bear by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I could very well go on and speak of encouragement for a step such as this from women's organizations, from the Canadian Labour Congress or those congresses that are now part of the Canadian Labour Congress and from women and, yes, men too in this and the other chamber of parliament, and from outside.

In recent years, especially during and since the last war, an increasing number of women have joined our Canadian labour force. Their record shows clearly that women's work is not inferior to the work of men. It would be presumptuous this morning for me to attempt to argue that point. That fact goes without saying. This unquestioned fact has tended to focus attention on the relationship of the earnings of men as compared with those of women doing the same work. In other years when my friend the hon. member for Hamilton West has brought her bill forward I have pointed out that the Canadian government, for quite a long time, has favoured this principle of equal pay. It had made the principle effective. The salaries paid to the classified civil service of Canada have been determined by the content of the job completely irrespective of sex. Also, with respect to our prevailing rate employees across the country, there has been inaugurated the practice of setting the rate for the particular job or of setting the wage classification whether the work has been done by a man or a woman. However, when that was done, it was quite another matter as to whether or not legislation was desirable dealing with the rate of pay of women in private business or private industry that comes under federal labour laws or under federal jurisdiction. For instance, to go beyond our own boundaries, it was observed that in so highly organized a country as the United Kingdom there is as yet no legislation dealing fully with the question of equal pay even in their public service. As was pointed out last year by my hon. friend, in 1955 the United Kingdom adopted a scheme applicable to the civil service. By it the scale for women in the non-industrial civil service is being steadily increased by seven bites or by seven annual instalments so that by the year 1960 or 1961 women will be on an equal basis with men with respect to rates of pay. The United Kingdom so far at least has maintained that equal pay legislation is not appropriate to their system of private industry. At least they have not yet carried into effect legislation to bear upon that matter.

In the United States, although seventeen states have put into force legislation along this line and although sundry resolutions and private bills have been presented before one or the other of the houses of congress, congress as a whole has not passed legislation covering women in the federal field.

Nevertheless this morning I propose that we initiate federal action in Canada. Last year and previously I promised the house that we would give consideration to the matter and that we would consult with those organizations especially interested in the application of that principle. We have done that.

We have done that quite fully. As a result, we have come to the conclusion that legislative proposals especially adapted to the nature of employment under federal jurisdiction should now be recommended to parliament. I feel sure that it can be administered. In view of the past record or the past experience that I have had of the co-operation of employers in connection with other federal legislation administered by my department, I am confident that those employers will voluntarily bring their practices into compliance with the spirit of this proposed legislation.

This resolution forecasts a measure designed primarily to promote equal pay for women. In the measure that will come before us after the resolution I do not think we should try to be in any sense legalistic perfectionists, but rather that we should try to provide legislation that is simple, that we are quite sure will work and that will promote the object in view. Then, after it is under way, experience only will show us where we should cross the t's and dot the i's.

I want to emphasize the importance of a national standard of equal pay for women on two counts. The first is as evidence of recognition of the important part that women have to play and are playing in our Canadian economy. The second—and this is a very important one—is the encouragement of them to take an even larger share in the responsibility for Canada's rapid growth. At present there are about a million and a quarter women in our labour force in Canada this mid-summer; that is the total in our entire labour force, in all the activities, whether they come under federal or provincial jurisdiction. Of that number, approximately 73,000 are employed in activities that are under the federal jurisdiction. And I am quite sure that our economy, in the buoyant state in which it is at the present time, needs more of these women who feel that they can come into the labour force. We need them to help out in Canada's development, and for those who are in the labour force and who may come into it I am very glad to propose this resolution as a recognition of the value of their contribution to the growth of Canada. I have pleasure in moving this resolution, Mr. Chairman.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to thank the minister for his kind remarks, and in doing so I would like to thank all the members of this house who in past years have supported this type of legislation, both in their remarks in this house and on two occasions by their votes. It was significant that the votes on this type of legislation in past years crossed party lines. The legislation received the support, both in speeches and by votes of all parties in this house. I believe that that support, as witnessed in this chamber, was in some measure responsible for the government's serious consideration of the principle and its introduction of the legislation which we shall have before us shortly.

I should like to say also that the minister is quite correct when he refers to those persons outside of this chamber who have given consistent support to the principle of equal pay legislation over a period of many years, and I am sure it must be extremely gratifying to them. I mention in particular the federation of business and professional women which has been most outspoken and which has worked hard to have this type of legislation introduced in all legislatures in Canada. I mention also the women who belong to political organizations of all parties who have consistently supported this type of legislation and by reason of their support have succeeded in having this principle accepted by their political parties and incorporated into political platforms. When I make that remark, I think of course of my own party. But I also pay tribute to the women of all other political parties who have used their influence in this regard. Of course, I cannot help but pay tribute to the pioneer in representation of women in this parliament, Miss Agnes Macphail, who was always a champion of the things which she considered to be fair and equal for all people.

I think I would have to take a little exception to the minister's remarks with reference to the United Kingdom because, although, as he says, there has been no legislation there, the schemes to introduce the principle of equal pay have extended into many fields. Apart from the non-industrial employees to whom he referred, those generally in the civil service, both at the local government level and at the higher level, have been covered in schemes which have been brought down, the first of which, of course, for civil servants in general took effect in February, 1955, and the second one on the local government level in July of last year. But in addition to that the scheme also is currently in operation covering school teachers in England and Wales, which came into effect in May of last year and a further one covering teachers in Scotland, which came into effect in September. The principle is now being extended to the nurses and to rail transport workers. Therefore it is gradually growing in the United Kingdom, as it is elsewhere.

In Canada, of course, with regard to the provinces, two more provinces passed legislation this year covering equal pay, namely, Manitoba and Nova Scotia. They are the most recent converts to the principle. This now brings to five the number of provinces in Canada which have adopted equal pay legislation.

The minister also remarked on the United States and the fact that 16 states and Alaska now have equal pay legislation. Three of these adopted the legislation in 1955, of course; and, despite the fact that the minister points out the United States has not yet adopted legislation, it is significant that this year, in his state of the union message, President Eisenhower stressed the point that equal pay for equal work, regardless of the sex, is, in his words, "a matter of simple justice".

The numbers of women who have been engaged in paid employment have increased steadily in Canada, as they have in all other countries, and there have been improvements from time to time in the matter of remuneration, in working hours and in general conditions; but, as was pointed out in an article which appeared on this subject in the Christian Science Monitor, those improvements have hardly kept pace with the importance of the woman worker in the labour force.

The minister has said that in Canada we have now one and a quarter million women engaged in paid employment. The latest figures which I was able to procure are for May of this year. They show a force of 1,312,000 or, as the minister has said, slightly over the million and a quarter mark. They represent well over 23 per cent of the entire labour force of 5,664,000.

As time has gone on and as the numbers of women engaged in employment have increased, there has been a change in the wage structure in all countries, and this is reflected in the report which appears in the International Labour Review of March, 1956. After an exhaustive study and the citing of some very interesting figures the whole article concludes with these words:

> Since the narrowing of differentials has taken place during a period of rising real wages during which conditions have improved in the lower-paid occupations and industries more than in others, the basic trend can be considered as one "levelling-up". Thus the net result has been not only improved conditions for wage earners as a whole but also greater equality between occupational and industry groups and between the sexes.

When one speaks of equality in the field of remuneration one necessarily becomes curious as to the number of persons who are in the various pay groups and therefore I referred to the tax statistics for 1955 published under the authority of the Minister of National Revenue. I find that for the taxation year 1953, which is fairly recent, according to the statistics which are available, in the wage group under $2,300 the number of female taxpayers greatly exceeds the number of male taxpayers. This points up the fact that a great many women must be receiving less remuneration for their services than men for the reason that there are, as we have said before, only 23·2 and in 1953 it was less than that. In 1953 about 22 per cent of the entire labour force were women, yet in the earning group of taxpayers earning under $2,300 female taxpayers greatly outnumber male taxpayers.

Of all taxpayers we have a total of 814,340 males and 708,150 females, a difference of about 12½ per cent in the number of taxpayers and a difference of 78 per cent in the number of persons. This serves to point up the fact that whereas women represent only about one-quarter of the labour force, when it comes to paying taxes they greatly increase in importance. I hope the Minister of National Revenue is conscious of this fact.

I should point out, Mr. Chairman, if I did not mention it previously that the figures I have just quoted are for single persons. When we move into the field of persons who are taxed as single but who are supporting one or more dependents we find that in the male classification there are 122,490 and in the female classification there are 30,360, something around 25 per cent as compared with 22 per cent of women engaged in paid employment.

It appears that the alibi, if you like that expression, which has frequently been given for refusal to consider equal pay, that women after all are not the supporters of dependents and consequently need not be considered as requiring the same amount of remuneration as men, rather falls short of the mark. It is interesting to observe as these tables come out year by year that the number of women who are supporting dependents increases as the years go by. I will not weary the house by quoting further statistics because they are readily available in this volume for anyone who wishes to examine them.

This is a principle which has long been given lip service by all political parties and in most countries. It is gratifying that we now have at least a recognition in concrete form of this principle in this house.

The minister has said that in approaching a study of the legislation which will be before us shortly we should not be too legalistic, and I think that is probably true. On the other hand, those of us who are keenly interested in this type of legislation could perhaps be forgiven if we have a desire to look for the loopholes which might exist in this legislation. I do not suppose any one of us who studied the legislation we passed last year revising the Unemployment Insurance Act ever thought the interpretation which was later given to it would result in so many disqualifications. It should be a lesson to all of us not only to watch the actual phraseology of the legislation itself but also to be wary of the regulations which may be put into effect and the interpretation which may be given both to the regulations and to the actual legislation.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would just like to make the comment here that regardless of the perfection or lack of it of the bill which may be brought down, if the minister's department is not prepared to give to that legislation a sympathetic interpretation and to provide regulations which will make the working of that legislation flexible and effective, then the legislation itself will be worth nothing. I am sure the minister agrees with me in this regard and I hope that, after the experience we have had in the other fields, he himself will be particularly cautious and will be on the lookout for anything which may be introduced at the regulation and interpretation stage which would nullify the effect of the legislation.

It is not my intention to continue beyond the few remarks I have made today because I am anxiously awaiting the terms of the bill itself. However, I would like to say that in the minister's remarks he rather implied that this legislation was probably a reward for participation in the labour force for the work which women had done and are continuing to do and that it will perhaps be an inducement to increasing numbers of them to enter gainful employment. I do not think any of them wants rewards. What they want is their just due. I would just like to conclude my remarks by again referring to the comment of President Eisenhower which I quoted at the outset of these few words, that this legislation is simply a matter of justice.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to point out that the expression I used, I think, was that this is evidence of recognition rather than a reward, which is quite different.

Mrs. Fairclough: Right.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter into any discussion as to whether this legislation is a matter of recognition or of reward. Our feelings at this time are somewhat akin to those of the minister in that we have a certain disposition to say, "Me too," to the hon. member for Hamilton West who has quite properly, because she is a woman member of this house, carried the ball for some time in connection with this particular piece of legislation. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton West and the Minister of Labour, this legislation is simply carrying forward what was proposed first of all by the first woman member of this house, the late Miss Agnes Macphail. I think it might be worth while if I put on the record the precise terms of the resolution we have before us because, as far as I can recall, neither of the two speakers who preceded me has done this. The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide equal pay for female employees as compared with male employees of the same employer, for identical or substantially identical work in federal works, undertakings of businesses; and to provide further under the enforcement procedure for the appointment of referees who may be paid such allowances and expenses as may be approved by the treasury board.

As the minister pointed out, this resolution has been on the order paper since the beginning of this session. One cannot help but recall something that occurred in this chamber not very long ago, of course not while the house was in session. I do not know whether the Minister of Labour was among the hon. members who stayed behind the curtains on the occasion when this chamber was filled with representatives of the business and professional women's associations, but I think there were many of us who thought that perhaps the terms of this resolution should be somewhat revised to make sure that discriminations which have existed in the past may not be in effect in reverse in the future. It might well be that some time in the future a minister of labour for Canada might have to make some amendments to the act along those lines. Perhaps I should say that if that crisis should arise we could hope that it would be a woman minister of labour who would be introducing those amendments.

When this legislation is boiled down it is actually a further recognition of the fact that there are certain rights and dignities which should belong to all people regardless of their sex, colour or creed, as part of the recognition that they are human beings equal before God. For that reason I along with the other members of the C.C.F. group in this house hail the introduction of such legislation as something of a milestone in that direction; and certainly we will be prepared to give full and careful consideration to the details of the bill when we have it before us. If we feel there are ways in which it can be improved to further the purposes for which it is designed we may have some suggestions to make at that time.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that we are most wholeheartedly in support of this proposal. However, in saying that, we recognize, as has the minister, that legislation is not a complete answer to any form of discrimination or intolerance, that there are limitations to what can be done by legislation in this particular field. Those of us in this house and Canadians generally should not feel that once this bill becomes law the battle against this particular form of discrimination is at an end.

In saying that, I might draw to the attention of the minister an example which I consider indicates the real value of this type of legislation. The union, in an industrial plant with which I happened to be familiar and which had been certified as the bargaining agent, had been endeavouring to have a certain policy of racial discrimination abolished in the plant. The question had been discussed and negotiations opened in various ways over a period of some years, but they were unsuccessful as far as the union was concerned. Gradually the union had narrowed down the area of bargaining until it was felt that this matter might soon be resolved to their satisfaction. At that time the government passed the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act and while that act had no jurisdiction over this particular plant it proved to be the straw that broke the camel's back. The mere fact that the parliament of Canada had given recognition to that particular principle, and by that legislation had said in effect that this form of discrimination should be abolished, was sufficient to bring home to that employer the fact that this was something which should no longer be tolerated in Canadian life.

I feel that that probably will be the most important result of this legislation. After all in many parts of this far-flung country, and the parts I know best are a long way from here, what this parliament does in matters of this kind is regarded with a great deal of respect. The impact upon the thinking of the people of the passage of a bill of this kind is perhaps greater than we may be prone to think. That perhaps is one reason why we regret that other pieces of legislation which we feel would reduce inequities and intolerances have not received the recognition by the government we would like to have them receive.

I think we have to recognize that, if we pass legislation, that becomes the law which should be enforced. That is why I am glad to see that there is reference in the resolution to an enforcement procedure, and it is to be hoped that that procedure will have some teeth in it. While the legislation will have some impact, nevertheless we all recognize that there is always a minority who seem to have no appreciation of proper human values. That is perhaps the strongest argument for putting into legislative form such principles as are involved in this resolution. To those people who have no regard for the dignity and the rights of people, the threat of a possible prosecution very often is enough to bring them into line. Few people like to have to appear in the courts and to receive the publicity that is attached to a conviction for a discriminatory practice. Therefore the fact that there is going to be this law with teeth in it, even though one may recognize that by clever arguing certain loopholes may be found, the mere fact that it is there and that prosecution is possible will in itself have a salutary effect in the particular field that this legislation is designed to cover.

One of the further effects of this type of legislation is that it is going to be a step forward in the matter of the proper and careful evaluation of what is involved in a certain job category. It is going to mean, I think, a further step in the direction of the setting of wage levels on a proper and—though I hesitate to use the word—scientific basis, because I think we all realize that until fairly recent times the wages paid to either male or female employees have been set on rather haphazard lines. In some cases it was a matter of as much or as little as the traffic would bear, and a great many inequities have resulted because of that.

I think we all are aware that in recent years there has been some movement towards the setting of standards which are just and equitable having in mind all the various factors that are involved in the content of a certain job. I think that this legislation will serve to put the movement forward another step so that jobs will be paid for on the basis of what they are really worth and not in each particular instance because of the fact that perhaps an employer is able to exert more pressure upon a woman than upon a man and all those factors that have come into play in the past.

Without further prolonging my remarks at this time I simply want to say again that I am quite happy that the minister is bringing forward this legislation at this time. I have been a little worried once or twice during the session that we might have seen this session coming to a close without this bill being brought forward, and I am glad to see that we have it on the way.

Mr. Hahn: We in this group also welcome the resultion at this time. I must admit that I felt somewhat as did the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that possibly we would be drawing near to the close of the session and the resolution would die on the order paper. We are pleased to see it here now.

The hon. member for Hamilton West suggested that there were only five provinces which had similar legislation on their statute books. I wonder whether she has given any consideration to the fact that some provinces do not find it necessary to pass legislation for equal pay for equal work, since they have no discrimination in their present legislation that would make it necessary. I am thinking specifically of the province of Alberta, where I am told they have no necessity for this type of legislation, there being no discrimination. The teachers' salaries are on an equal basis and I understand that the other civil servants and other employees of the provincial government are likewise and therefore the legislation is not needed.

In my own province of British Columbia the government saw fit to pass such legislation a year or two ago. I must say at this time that again I would agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and I am pleased to see some teeth put into this legislation, which will make its implementation possible. It is useless having legislation unless one can guarantee that it is going to be implemented, and that might be one of the problems with which we shall have to deal more specifically at a later date.

The principle of equal pay for equal work is, I think, one that should be recognized throughout this nation as possible in every industry. It gives me some concern and wonder as to why we did not include the word "sex" in our revision of the employment act when we were redrafting it last year. I think the suggestion was made that in the fair employment section of the act, if we introduced the word "sex", there should be no discrimination and that that would take care of this situation and give a guarantee against the need for this type of legislation in this country.

The fact that our government has taken the lead in this, as well as the many provincial governments that have done so earlier, is desirable. It may be somewhat of a guide to employers in the future to arrive at a decision as to whether further legislation should not be brought in or that they themselves could organize to see that labour across this country as a whole is treated the same. For instance, I find on examination that there is a great deal of discrepancy in the wages paid in different parts of this country, not as between male and female necessarily but as between males themselves. I have an example in mind in Saint John, New Brunswick, with which I am sure the minister is familiar. The mill workers begin in the lumber business at a beginning wage of 70 or 75 cents per hour, I am told. In my own province, in New Westminster, the beginning wage is $1.60 per hour, and the cost of living is very similar in those cities.

Whilst we have legislation here respecting equal pay for equal work by men and women, I wonder whether some day we shall not find it necessary to introduce legislation of a similar nature covering a greater field than we have now. I could cite another example in the case of check-out girls in supermarkets in the city of Ottawa. I find that in this city the maximum wage paid a girl employed on that work is something like $40 per week. The maximum wage in the city of New Westminster for girls in similar employment is $55 per week. That is their take-home pay, I understand, and since I received that figure there has been an upward trend from that through negotiation in British Columbia. The fact is that in New Westminster the beginning wage paid to ladies employed as check-out girls in supermarkets is $39 per week, which compares with the maximum wage in Ottawa of $40 per week for the same type of work. There may be instances where girls may get more than that but generally speaking that is the wage paid. The universal adoption of this type of legislation could well result in the greatest sociological change of the past half century so far as the Canadian people are concerned if the principle of equal pay for equal work is recognized universally. It would then remain for an employer to decide whether he should employ a man or a woman and he would have to take into consideration not just the fact of having to pay an equal wage but what the results will be on his industry by paying women the same wage.

In many provinces women have special privileges so far as their work is concerned. For instance, there is the fact that these girls who work in stores are not permitted to carry boxes weighing more than a certain amount. The same regulations do not apply to the male. Therefore when an employer decides whether he will employ a male or a female he will, of course, have to give that point some consideration. I am fully aware that that factor does not apply specifically to this legislation because it relates to work over which the federal government has no jurisdiction, but at the same time I cannot help but feel that the adoption of such legislation is bound to have its impact upon the demands of labour throughout the country, and that fact should be recognized.

I can see that the result can well mean that wherever possible women may be forced to go back to doing housework and that if the employment they seek is going to call for exactly the same wage the employer is going to decide that he cannot get the same or identical service from women because of the special privileges granted under provincial rights and that they should not receive the same pay. Therefore he will employ men instead. That might be to the advantage of the nation as a whole. I am satisfied that women can hold their end up pretty well if need be. As one who has employed them for some time in business, my experience is that they are quite capable of doing certain jobs. There are fields where that does not hold true and where women have been employed in the past. I am reminded of a quotation from Milton—I forget from which sonnet it comes—

An hon. Member: Milton Gregg.

Mr. Hahn: No, Milton. "They also serve who only stand and wait." I believe that the payment to such a person should compare with the payment to the person who is fully employed because just standing around doing nothing is sometimes harder than to be doing something. It is important that we should recognize that the adoption of this type of legislation may materially affect the adoption of similar types of working conditions in industry generally. Some have them today. In recent years I find there has been a great change in employment in my own province in the case of the union that makes agreements with management in the lumbering business. A few years ago a great number of women were employed in the plywood factories in my riding. Today we find there are very few because they are incapable of doing the same type of work. Yet they receive the same pay as men because there is no discrimination in the take-home pay.

I think the legislation is possibly to the advantage of both the male and the female. What its final result will be is difficult to decide. I wonder whether the adoption of the legislation will cause concern to labour and industry and may not result finally in a complete return to the apprenticeship system under which industry feels that just because a person is employed at the same job does not necessarily mean that they will be given exactly the same return for their work. There may be a move to adopt the apprenticeship system whereby industry can get certain employees for less money and still attain the main objective of getting the work done.

Possibly the legislation may result in a policy of piece work payment similar to what was so common in the 1920's. It may mean that we will have a guaranteed wage plus the adoption of the principle of people being paid for the exact number of pieces of work they do or it may even bring about—and this might be most desirable—a sharing of profits between industry and employees. Whether this type of legislation will solve the labour problems of today is debatable. Whether it will result in lowering the cost of living is debatable. It well might do so because I can see that when you pay equal wages for the work done and get the same amount of work out of each individual the result may be that a greater amount of work will be accomplished. The result will naturally be greater production at the same cost or a very slight increase in cost because the difference in wages is not too great today. The result might be advantageous in its effect upon the cost of living. On the other hand, if industry generally is made subject to similar legislation the result might be the opposite effect.

There is one thought that does give me some concern. Are women prepared to accept the disadvantages as well as the advantages of this type of legislation? Today they very definitely receive special privileges either written into contracts or observed by management as such. Just because the employee is a lady she may be given certain definite advantages that are not available to the man. However, there is another factor, the fact that competition may mean, as I suggested earlier, the possibility of non-acceptance of the lady in employment and the giving of the particular job to a man. That would mean that the ladies of the country would of necessity be forced into doing more housework. I am not suggesting for a moment that that is of necessity the result. I am just wondering whether that is not a possibility. I think they are prepared to accept their responsibility and to give up any few small advantages they have today for this type of legislation. I am satisfied that it is a step in the right direction. I am prepared to accept it and I am satisfied that each member of our group is.

On the other hand, I wonder whether men are prepared to accept the challenge of women who see here a material advantage, and I would caution all men to look to their laurels. Women are marching forward. They may become the breadwinners for their families and dishpan hands may be our lot.

Mrs. Shipley: Mr. Chairman, I of course am very pleased, as all women in Canada must be, that this principle is to become a matter of legislation. I was interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for New Westminster. He has indeed pointed up a problem which may arise, that under certain circumstances women may be priced out of the labour market when this law becomes effective. However, that is the strongest argument for having the legislation drafted in such a way that it is up to the women themselves to lay the complaint before action is taken. Under such circumstances I have reason to believe that would be the type of legislation we would have because the minister has expressed himself as being against having someone go around, make an inspection and raise the issue when no complaint is laid by the individuals concerned. The women are not too foolish and I am quite sure they would not lay complaints if they felt that the economy of the small industry, or whatever the case might be in the small community, would be jeopardized.

Along that same line I have some figures with regard to complaints laid under the Ontario legislation. That legislation became effective on January 1, 1952. I have the figures here up to March, 1954. There were 122 persons involved in the complaints but only 10 employees. That is in a period of something over two years. However, that does not mean that is all the passing of the legislation accomplished because, of course, once the legislation became law it was possible for groups of women—and I am thinking of school teachers and other large groups such as that—to get equal pay without being obliged to lay the matter before the investigating board. Furthermore, there may be many other instances—and I believe this to be true—where perhaps an obvious injustice exists and where women for some reason are loath to take the matter before the authorities. However, there is nothing that we can do here to take care of that situation. It is up to women to talk to women and to encourage them to get justice.

Now that we have every reason to believe that the legislation will be passed shortly, women's groups and individuals throughout Canada are concerning themselves with what the wording of the act might be. We were criticized mildly either for delaying the passing of the bill presented by the hon. member for Hamilton West or the government not bringing in one earlier. The minister has told you that he wanted the legislation to be effective and that he did not think the wording suggested or the wording in some other act was perhaps the best that could be obtained. The women's organizations and others are concerned over just what that legislation might be.

I should like to read you some comments made by the late Senator Taft when this matter was before a special committee of which he was the head. You all know of the great study he made of labour conditions.

[Mrs. Shipley.]

Bills of this nature were introduced over there in the United States at approximately the same time as the late Miss Agnes Macphail introduced one here and they have been before the United States senate and congress ever since then. In discussing the matter in a committee the senator had this to say:

> No basis is provided for determining what jobs are comparable in character, what jobs require comparable skills, what is a comparable quality of work, or what operation is similar to another. A zealous administrator, given this blank cheque, could find quite different types of work to be comparable in character . . . Many factors go into the determination of the wage rate. The terms "work of a comparable character" and jobs which require "comparable skills" are so general and vague that the administrator of the law under such an ambiguous grant of power could destroy the sound wage structure which an employer had worked for years to perfect. Can any employer determine with certainty that he is in compliance? There are degrees of similarity between various jobs and the task of measuring accurately the "skill", "care", "energy", "working conditions", etc. that goes into a given job and at the same time predict that a Department of Labour investigator would make the same valuation is an impossible one.

Then Senator Donnell is quoted at the same hearing as having said:

> I think there are few representative of labour or management who would claim that it is possible to develop a job-evaluation system which could be depended upon in all cases to produce fair and mutually acceptable determinations of "work of comparable character on jobs the performance of which requires comparable skills".

Then he goes on to speak further on the same subject. These are the very words, or are almost the identical work words which were in the private bill presented by the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Of course I do not know, nor do you, what will be the words in the bill that will be presented by the minister tomorrow, I believe. But I think the hon. member for Hamilton West said in effect that no matter what those words may be, it will be the sympathetic administration of this act which will create the greatest good. I am not too much concerned about the words. I hope they will please most of the women's groups. However, I am reasonably confident that we shall have sympathetic administration.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the house is now dealing with this matter in committee. As has been indicated in the remarks that have already been made, it will be necessary to wait until the legislation is before us until we see the exact wording of the measure that we are all anxious to support. I want to point out, however, that the introduction of this resolution represents a very gratifying and, I should think, very heart-warming reward to the hon. member for Hamilton West for the efforts she has made now for many years to bring this matter to the attention of the house and of the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Hamilton West brought similar legislation forward in 1953, again in 1954 and again in 1955. It was not debated or voted upon in 1953 but there were debates and votes in 1954 and 1955. On each occasion the government saw fit to oppose this legislation. I am not going to elaborate on that point now. We welcome the fact that the government has adopted this principle. Already it is in effect in five of the provinces of Canada and it has been giving satisfaction where it is in operation. One of the things that I should like to mention is the fact that, far from placing the men at a disadvantage in any way, this legislation should actually be welcomed by men. The very fact that women workers are placed upon a basis of equal pay for corresponding work is in itself an advantage to men and an assurance that the wage level will be maintained. This is therefore a matter of just as great interest to the men who are in the ranks of our workers throughout Canada as it is in the case of the women. Nevertheless, there is a special reason why we all welcome this legislation. It is one of those steady and progressive changes in our society to indicate the extent to which we realize that there should be no differentiation between men and women in the return they receive for the work they do.

I believe that this is a very desirable piece of legislation. I shall await the legislation itself. Certainly, we agree it is expedient that legislation of this kind be brought in and once again, in supporting this resolution, let me express my congratulations to the hon. member for Hamilton West on seeing this positive result from the steady and constant efforts she has made to arouse interest in this subject.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, you may probably remember that I supported and voted for the resolution brought forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West in this connection. I must congratulate the Minister of Labour and the government on having brought forward the necessary legislation to comply with the suggestions made in this chamber. It will be a good example to all provinces that have not adopted the same point of view and, of course, to employers in general.

I wish to limit my remarks to a question which I desire to put to the minister. Will this legislation apply to crown corporations, to the Canadian National Railways, the national harbours board, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and similar bodies over which the government has an indirect control? If we need new legislation to change the respective charters of these different bodies, I think this is a good time to suggest it, because, after all, these people are considered as indirect employees of the federal government, and I think this legislation should apply in the same way to the different bodies I have mentioned.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, our expert on this particular question has already registered the opinion of this group. I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, that this question of equal pay for equal work is something that has been at the masthead of the labour movement of North America, and perhaps of sections of the world where there is a labour movement, for a good many years. The slogan "equal pay for equal work" is all-inclusive. What we are doing now, of course, is establishing that principle in so far as federal employees are concerned.

When a bill such as this is passed in the country everybody outside immediately thinks that it is legislation that applies nationally. You get a lot of letters such as you receive on antidiscrimination, but it merely applies to federal employees.

The minister made it clear that he believed this bill affected some 73,000 female employees employed by the federal government. Of course, all legislation is as good as its administration and there are going to be administrative difficulties in this. There are one or two thoughts I should like to leave with the minister. First, I think the need for this legislation was proven by the job evaluation surveys made by most of the labour unions throughout North America during the past 15 years. Practically every industry of any size is now organized and has its research personnel. Part of that research personnel consists of job evaluation officers. During the surveys that have been taken over the past 15 years a need has been shown for this type of legislation. The statistics upon which that need is based have been gathered by most of the labour unions across the country.

I think the war proved that there were many sections of industry where women could be employed, but at the beginning of the war, as those of us who were in the house at that time can remember, in shipyards and in other industries where women were trained to take jobs it was the practice of the employer to try to hire them for 15 per cent, 20 per cent or 50 per cent lower wages. During the process of the war the unions did a pretty good job in levelling out in the aircraft industry, in shipyards and in other industries, this question of equal pay for equal work. There are many sectors in industry where women can replace men and, in some places, such as the aircraft industry, they can do a better job and a faster job.

The point I should like to make to the minister is this: the enforcement of the legislation is very important. Where there are unions or civil service organizations already set up they have determined the schedules, the rates of wages, and how they shall apply.

With respect to the principle of this legislation, I would assume that the court of referees or the referees would come into the picture only after the union or the civil service organization has a chance of examining any protest that may be made by way of a grievance after it has gone through the mechanics of the bargaining contracts or the civil service schedule of rates. Then the board of referees will come in. I would want to be careful about it and to know that we are not setting up a superbody that is going to displace the mechanics of collective bargaining in industry, and there is some under the federal government, or the rates and schedules that have been built up over the years and the practices that have been laid down by the civil service. I suggest that any appeal to the court of referees should be processed through either the collective bargaining organization or the civil service organization rather than through an individual. I do not think we want to start writing collective bargaining agreements on the floor of the house. This is one point the minister will have to keep in mind.

Instead of setting up a court of referees that is going to handle individual grievances arising from individuals we should see to it that that court of referees come into existence only through the due process of the collective bargaining organizations, or the civil service organizations. This is the point I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman, and I trust that when the bill comes in the position and the authority of the court of referees will be clarified, and especially when they come into action.

Mr. Schneider: I should like to say a few words on this resolution having to do with equal pay for women before the bill is introduced. I have not heard anyone speak during this short debate on the very serious question of neglected children of employed mothers. The recent serious increase in juvenile deliquency is no doubt caused by the absence of mothers from the home, leaving children to their own devices after school and during noon hours. The more attractive the pay offered by industry and offices, the greater number of mothers there will be who will desert their children during working hours. I have no objection to single women drawing equal pay with men.

Can the Minister of Labour include in his bill a provision for consideration of the plight of neglected children of mothers employed? Can we not stipulate that the mother of children up to a certain age should give proof that her children are properly cared for? Often the purpose of earning extra money is good, such as helping to pay for the home or necessary equipment such as washing machines, refrigerators and so forth. But quite often the purpose of this extra earning is to pay for cars, television sets and other luxuries. I would ask the minister to provide in the act, if at all possible, for regulations to prevent this too common neglect of children today.

There are few members in this house who realize the difficulties of defining the difference in work which can be done by both men and women, and I feel that such decisions should definitely be left to the judgment of management and of the plant union. Problems differ in various plants. I have great faith in the Minister of Labour and I would ask him to consider this problem of neglected children in Canadian homes.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, like all other hon. members of this house, and I am sure the people of Canada, I am glad to see this resolution make its appearance. It deals with a subject which has been necessary for some time to be brought in as legislation. This is legislation which is desirable and long overdue.

As the Leader of the Opposition said this morning, and as other hon. members have implied, the appearance of this legislation is due very largely to the efforts of the hon. member for Hamilton West, and the many women's organizations across Canada which have been pressing for it for many years past.

As the Leader of the Opposition said, the hon. member for Hamilton West introduced a resolution in 1953 which was not debated, and in 1954 and 1955 when the resolution was debated. Many of us were extremely sorry to see that the government did not adopt that very sensible resolution of the hon. member at that time and bring in this legislation several years ago. It seems regrettable to me that it has been held up so long. This is a matter that has been discussed thoroughly by labour bodies for some time, and it seems to me there has been unnecessary delay in bringing in this very desirable legislation.

As was also indicated by the Leader of the Opposition, this is not only good legislation for women; it is also good legislation for men, because it protects their jobs. As one who has been connected with industry for some time, I know that in many industries, if it is found that a woman can perform a job as well as a man, the man will be displaced and a woman will be taken on in his place because she can be hired at a lower rate of pay. If it becomes necessary by law to pay women the same rate that is paid to men for doing a certain job, then of course the men who might formerly have been displaced will not be displaced in future, and this will be a protection for their jobs.

As has been said this morning, this legislation is in operation in five provinces, and I very much hope that it will soon be in operation in all of our ten provinces. I think this legislation will be an example to the other five provincial governments to bring in similar legislation as soon as possible. I also hope it will serve as an example to industry generally, and that equal pay will be afforded to women in the near future for jobs which they perform alongside of men.

The hon. member for Waterloo North said that the children of working mothers were very often neglected. Social workers report that generally this is not the case, and that the children of working mothers are frequently better looked after than are those of non-working mothers. I am wondering from what the hon. member said this morning if he is making a charge against the working mothers in his own riding of Waterloo North that they do not look after their children as well as mothers who do not work.

Mr. Schneider: They cannot look after them as well while they are working in factories.

Mr. Hees: I was very interested in hearing what the hon. member said. In conclusion I would say that like many other hon. members, I am glad to see this legislation make its appearance. It is legislation that is good for both men and women, and it has been long overdue. I am pleased to see that at long last the government has listened to the urging of the hon. member for Hamilton West and the many women's organizations across Canada which have been pressing for it and that finally the government has decided to bring in this measure.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, like many other hon. members I am interested in this resolution practically, I suppose, because it seems perfectly obvious and reasonable that if a piece of work is done well the employer should not care very much by whom it is done and the remuneration for the doing of such work should be the same whether the person who does it is a man or a woman or even a child, despite the fact that it might take the child longer to do it. Please do not misunderstand me. I am not going to take the retrograde step of going back to child labour which it took so many hundreds of years to eliminate.

Philosophically, I suppose, I am interested in the bill because it is another step in the long struggle for the emancipation of womanhood. That is also too long a story to go into here.

I really rise to my feet for one purpose and that is to bring out an idea which I do not think has been brought out sufficiently strongly this morning although the minister, when he spoke, quite rightly paid tribute to the work of the hon. member for Hamilton West and the work of Miss Agnes Macphail, both of whom were advocates of legislation of this sort in this House of Commons. All honour to them and to others like them. I am quite sure that the efforts of Miss Macphail in particular—and I say this with due deference to the hon. member for Hamilton West, but Miss Macphail got an earlier start—certainly had a great influence upon the thinking of labour unions and farm people and most certainly upon the thinking of the hon. members of the political movement to which I belong.

We have, of course, some cases where discrimination of various kinds raises its ugly head even in this extremely advanced country, or so we call it, of ours. Fortunately it does not exist in the same degree as in some other countries. I remember watching some girls selecting oranges from a movable belt to pack them in boxes. The girls on one side of the wall had skin of one particular colour and those on the other side of the wall had skin of another colour. I asked the foreman what the wages were in each case and I discovered that the ratio was about 4 to 1 in favour of the girls of one particular complexion, of one particular ethnic group, amongst the people we saw working.

When the minister was speaking he used the words "the crystallization of public opinion". I was thinking perhaps more of the initiation of opinion amongst the public in regard to these things. It occurred to me that it is not always and indeed it is not often those people who are burdened with the responsibilities of government who lead in the fight for reforms of various kinds.

I am thinking, for instance, that when we talk about the emancipation of women we should be ashamed of ourselves that women received the vote at such a late date. My thinking takes me away back to the scenes and days of my boyhood when the suffragettes used to throw bricks through the glass windows of shops in London. You could perhaps call them fanatics if you like. They certainly were fanatical along that particular line but I suppose their fanaticism served a useful purpose. I think their attempts to gain independence occurring prior to the first great war certainly impressed the minds of the people during the war when women did come into their own in the matter of taking their place side by side with their men in the war factories of Great Britain.

The point I really want to make is this. I said it is not always those who are burdened with the responsibilities of government who are the cause of reform and I think that is perhaps one of the most valuable functions of an opposition. I am thinking of private members' resolutions such as those we had introduced in this house by the hon. member for Hamilton West. In this party we have an hon. member who has probably introduced more private resolutions than has any other individual, and I am thinking of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. There is satisfaction in seeing certain ideas embodied in legislation. Ideas advanced by the hon. member have proved to be of benefit, as will this resolution, to the people of this country.

Legislation providing for the emancipation of women indicates the great need there is throughout the world for greater steps to be taken to see that women are given the franchise. I shall not attempt to give a list of those countries where the franchise is denied to women, but I do want to emphasize this idea of private members bringing forward resolutions which quite often are the basis for legislation some time in the future. Sometimes I find some fault with the impatience shown by my friends on the government side. They are quite often inclined to be impatient with resolutions moved by members of the opposition. That impatience to me is very childish. They take the attitude that they are the government, that they should run the country, that they should bring in any resolutions which are needed, that they represent the will of the majority. The practice is to toss out or to vote out any resolution moved by the opposition.

I am coming back to the minister's statement about the crystallization or I would say the initiation of public opinion in regard to any particular idea and which eventually finds itself incorporated in the form of a resolution which is of benefit, not only to those who are in opposition but to those who sit on the government side.

[Mr. Knight.]

I know that I have at times wearied the house with a resolution in regard to federal aid for education. I remember one misguided Liberal friend—they are not all misguided—who characterized that resolution as being simply a move for political purposes, a deliberate attempt to deceive the public. That simply indicated the supreme ignorance as to one of the most important functions of the opposition.

That is the point I thought I would make in regard to this resolution. I do believe that members can perform a useful service to the country by bringing up such matters in this house. That is one of the things we were sent here for. We should bring up these matters so that they may become publicized, so that they may be discussed throughout the country, so that they may become popular. Then the government, which is always watching which way the water is flowing or, if I may use another simile, which always has its ears pretty close to the ground, decides that, as a majority of the public wants it, it will bring in a resolution to that effect and the thing becomes law.

I congratulate the government, I congratulate the minister, I congratulate those who initiated this idea. I am pleased it has been brought before us and I shall look forward with interest to seeing the terms of the bill.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Chairman, may I add my word of praise for the work done by the hon. member for Hamilton West for the past many years in her efforts to bring this bill about. I also wish to extend congratulations where they are due. This bill has been a long time coming and it will do a great service and provide justice for the women of Canada. However, I have a problem in my particular riding which has to do with equal pay for men.

A few minutes ago one member of the Social Credit party spoke of men being paid $1.60 per hour in British Columbia. In New Brunswick men are being paid for doing the same type of work 65 cents an hour. The hon. member might also have said that in some areas in my riding men are receiving for doing a day's work less than they would receive in the form of unemployment insurance benefits.

In my riding there is an industry which exists because it is subsidized by cheap labour. The ills which face the economy of the maritime provinces are grave, but surely this government should recognize that the labouring man should not be expected to subsidize industry or the losses brought about by poor government regulations in the province of New Brunswick.

Let me give one example. There is a factory in one little town in my riding where the workmen receive $6.50 for a nine-hour day. But they have to pay $1.50 to $2 per day for board. When it is raining they are unable to work and are not paid, but they still have to pay board. The net result is that these men, many of whom have large families, have to get along on less than they would get if they were receiving unemployment insurance benefits. In British Columbia men doing the same type of work would be paid $12 to $15 a day.

What is happening is that the labouring man in my riding is subsidizing industry which is being prevented from existing because of high transportation costs, because of high power costs, because of a hundred and one reasons which should not—

Mr. Gregg: I hate to interrupt my hon. friend, but I think the committee will agree that what he is talking about now has no relationship, directly or indirectly, to this resolution.

Mr. Van Horne: I shall be pleased to amend my completed remarks to conform to the terms of the resolution. It is a pleasure for me to express the satisfaction which we have in seeing this enactment brought about.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Castleden: It is not my intention to take any more than a minute or two to say a few words in support of this resolution. Equal pay for women for work identically equal to that done by men certainly should have the support of every member of this house. The resolution limits this, however, to federal works. The resolution reads:

> To provide equal pay for female employees as compared with male employees of the same employer, for identical or substantially identical work in federal works, undertakings or businesses;

It seems rather ridiculous that a resolution has to be introduced in 1956 to establish the right of women to receive equal pay for equal work. By what right can employers say, "You get less pay for doing exactly the same work as a man, merely because you are a woman"? It is a relic of the dark ages. It is a shameful thing that this has lasted as long as it has in Canada. We are at last taking a belated and very short step towards establishing some elements of justice in this field. It is an unfortunate thing that the government of this country had not recognized this right earlier. I can remember during the war years asking ministers of labour to establish this right for the women when they were working in the factories and war plants and carrying on their task while men were away fighting and to recognize that the women who did such a splendid job should receive the same pay for the same work. That right was denied.

This bill moves towards the elimination of a piece of discrimination which should never exist. If a women did not do the same amount of work, I would say that perhaps she is not entitled to the same pay, but if she does the same work by what right has the employer to make more money out of her employment than out of the employment of a man? Out of such employment he makes so much profit for his organization and the company that he is directing and operating. I do not know why that should exist in Canada. We are pleased certainly to see at last this little bill coming forward and saying that in federal works at any rate the women who do identically equal work will receive equal pay. We have advocated that for years, and I have never heard one person give a legitimate reason why the women should not receive equal pay. This group has fought to remove this discrimination against women ever since the party was formed in 1934. We are glad to see them moving forward. The day is not far distant when organized labour will unite and demand of the governments in all parts of the country that this be universal and that when a woman does the work of a man she should receive equal pay.

I do not know why the government has sat in power for 20 years and has continued to receive the support of the people when it would allow this kind of thing. It is merely a sign that the people are not aware of the injustice, or those who should be speaking about this matter are not doing so. Perhaps the new organization of Canadian labour will take up this subject. Perhaps the fact that the national unions organized in Canada are united at this time is belatedly causing the government to move. At any rate, let us hasten this legislation through and let us wipe this injustice and discrimination against women off the books in Canada and establish a condition in this country to which we can all look with pride.

Mr. Brown (Brantford): I am very happy to be able to say a few words in support of the bill that is forecast in this resolution. I remember that during the first session of this parliament I supported and voted for the bill introduced by the hon. lady from Hamilton West and I was glad to do so on that occasion. Last year I did not give that support to the bill, for the reason that I understood that the Minister of Labour was bringing down legislation on this very subject. For that reason I am very happy today to be able to support the resolution.

I believe that the legislation that is promised and forecast will be progressive, and I think it is a great step forward in labour legislation. I feel that our government has given leadership at this time in introducing this legislation. I feel that it will be popular; I know that it will be popular in Brantford. I am happy that it has the general support of trade unions across Canada and the labour movement in general.

I have heard some people say that this type of legislation will hurt women to this extent, that many employers, if they are obliged to pay equal salaries to women for equal work, will chose men, and that it will in the end hurt women in seeking employment, but I do not believe that will be true. I have never thought that. I think the Minister of Labour and the government should be congratulated at this time on this splendid move, which I believe will be a landmark in labour legislation.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I should like to make a very few comments in regard to some of the questions raised. First of all I should like to acknowledge the speeches made by the two hon. ladies of this house who have spoken: first the hon. member for Hamilton West for the manner in which she agreed to transfer her support from her Bill No. 6 to my bill; and second the hon. member for Timiskaming for her expression of faith that this oncoming legislation will be well and carefully administered. I sincerely hope that her faith will be justified and I think it will.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni gave a brief personal testimony to the far indirect effect of the former legislation that was brought in against discrimination. I was glad he did so, because it is in that field that I think this legislation that is coming down will have some effect, in a field where it may not have any immediate direct legal application whatsoever.

The hon. member for New Westminster thought that perhaps a result of this action might be a growth in apprenticeship training. If that is so, I shall not be sorry. He also said that it might mean an extension of piece work and it might mean extension of the idea of sharing profits. Those possibilities, I think, remain to be seen.

The Leader of the Opposition gave the bill his blessing, and for that I am very glad. The hon. member for St. Mary asked questions.

[Mr. Brown (Brantford).]

He asked whether the legislation will apply to crown corporations or to corporations such as the railways. The answer is yes. It applies to all those activities that come under the jurisdiction of the federal labour laws. The hon. member for Cape Breton South placed stress upon the importance of seeing to it that the legislation should not clash with existing machinery for the hearing of grievances by trade unions or by the civil service association. I can assure him that point has been carefully watched and if he can make any suggestions in that regard when the bill is brought forward I shall be glad to consider them.

The hon. member for Waterloo North raised a question which I think we should discuss later, the effect of this legislation upon the home, the family, children and so on, and I am sure the lady members of the house are much more qualified to discuss it than I am. However, I must admit that I do not look with any great amount of fear on the results that may come in that regard.

Mrs. Fairclough: He is off his rocker.

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member for Broadview accused me, of course, of being late in action and that sort of thing. The hon. member for Saskatoon raised another important question, namely, how far the government should go in leading and attempting to crystallize public opinion. That too is a broad subject, but so far as this kind of legislation is concerned I am going to say that I think it would be a very wrong thing to bring in a bill such as this and have it pass the house by 51 per cent versus 49 per cent of the members for the reason that the 49 per cent against would unquestionably reflect not only 49 per cent of the population of their constituencies but a very large body of the women voters of Canada. I think it would be next to impossible for the Department of Labour or any other department to administer an act such as this if it were actively opposed by 49 per cent of the women whom it is designed to help.

I am not going to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska because, as I mentioned before lunch, I feel that they were somewhat out of order. But both with relation to the employment of women and men, and in that regard I keep myself in order, I do deplore the way in which from time to time my hon. friend runs down my native province of New Brunswick where he and I would like to be at the present time.

Mr. Van Horne: I am not running down the province. I am running down this foolish government. If the Minister of Labour would represent New Brunswick in this house as he should we would not have the conditions that exist there. The Minister of Labour and the government are responsible for the conditions that exist there, and do not let anyone tell you anything else.

Mr. Gregg: I hope this incident will be closed—

Mr. Hees: You are responsible for all the low wages paid in New Brunswick.

Mr. Gregg: —by referring to these words which he used and which I took down as he said them. He referred to the hardship of workers brought about by poor government regulations in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. Van Horne: That is not what I said.

Mr. Gregg: If that is not what the hon. member said, I will take it back.

Mr. Van Horne: I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Van Horne: The Minister of Labour knows very well what I meant. He also knows that I said that those conditions are brought about in New Brunswick in part at least by the regulations of the federal government, and let no one be mistaken about that. The province of New Brunswick is doing everything it possibly can. It has put into effect minimum wages and it cannot overcome the laziness of the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Van Horne: Is there anything else you want to bring up?

Mr. Gregg: —you understand now why I deplore such statements by the hon. member.

Mr. Hees: Don't you wish you had not brought it up?

Mr. Gregg: I think these are the main points brought up by hon. members. I must say I have welcomed the approval and the enthusiastic way in which the resolution has been received today. I know full well that there will be full opportunity for suggestions and discussion of the details later but I can tell you, sir, that as far as I and my department are concerned we are only anxious to see that the legislation arising out of this resolution shall be simple, as I think it should be, and effective. I think it should help to stabilize employment across Canada and I hope it will commend itself to the women of Canada whom it is designed to benefit.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Gregg thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 445, to promote equal pay for female employees.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SUCCESSION DUTIES ON PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES, TIME COUNTED FOR PENSION, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the payment and recovery of succession duties payable on pensions and allowances; also to extend in certain cases and under certain conditions the time and service that may be counted for pension purposes; and further to provide the funds for the additional liability to the R.C.M.P. pensions account resulting from general pay increases.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: I would request the minister to outline for us the nature and effect of the legislation with particular reference to those conditions of service which are embodied in one clause of the resolution.

Mr. Lennard: Don't make it too long.

Mr. Garson: No, I will not. The purpose of the bill, as is quite evident from its terms, is to authorize means by which the governor in council may carry out commitments which have already been made under, for example, the police agreement with British Columbia, the terms of confederation with Newfoundland and the like, and the excellent explanatory notes in the bill are so clear that I think any further attempt at explanation on my part is quite purposeless and simply using up the time of the committee to no purpose. I think the points that my hon. friend raises can be much more satisfactorily disposed of in considering the sections when the bill is before the house.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister overlooks the fact that he and he alone, so far as the membership of the house is concerned, has seen the bill. Therefore we have not had an opportunity to see the explanatory notes. We are asked here to approve a resolution which I must say at once we are disposed to approve but I think we are entitled to know just what its effects will be because there are some questions that arise. There are some conditions of the pension regulations or arrangements at the present time which we would like to see expanded or amended to take care of conditions which have been brought to our attention. With the proposal to bring up to date the R.C.M.P. pension regulations in accordance with the needs of the time and to rectify certain discrepancies which I believe exist, no one in this party is in disagreement.

But from this, for instance, the question arises as to whether it is not time that arrangements were made so that members of the force might count towards their pensionable service the time which they spent in the armed forces in the last war, in other than the provost corps. That is one problem that I know has been discussed amongst those who are interested in this question. We should like to know just how far this proposed legislation goes towards meeting a situation such as that. Before the resolution carries I hope the minister will make some comment. I may tell him that we are almost certain that we will support it, but we want to be certain just what it is we are doing before we give our approval to it.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection to doing as my hon. friend has suggested. This bill will do four things. In the first place it will provide that the succession duties which are payable in respect of the estate of a deceased pensioner may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund and then deducted by instalments out of the pension or allowance in order to avoid too great a burden upon the pensioner all at once, especially where the pensioner is a widow.

In the second place, there is a provision which is to permit the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who were absorbed into the force from the province of British Columbia to count for pension purposes all of the time that could be counted for pension purposes under their pensions from that province. As my friend the hon. member for Kamloops is aware, when we took over the policing of the province of British Columbia we took over several members—there were about 15 that would be affected by this bill —who were absorbed into the mounted police. The purpose is to make sure that when they get their pensions they will derive benefit in them not only from the service that they have had in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police but also for service they had in the British Columbia police force.

This legislation therefore has nothing to do with the point about which my hon. friend spoke, namely increasing or changing any benefits in respect of the pensions of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police generally. It is just to take care of accrued pensions of the members of the mounted police taken over from the province of British Columbia.

Then we have the same problem with regard to those members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that were taken over from the province of Newfoundland when that province, which was then a colony, became part of confederation.

The fourth purpose of the bill is to provide for additional liability to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pension fund resulting from general pay increases. In other words, if we increase the pay a larger amount must be paid into the fund correspondingly. This bill will provide the mechanics whereby that amount can be paid.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask whether any provision is being made for those ex-members of the force who had already retired and gone on pension long before those increases in pay were granted?

Mr. Garson: I wonder whether my hon. friend would clarify his question? He asks whether they will get an increase in pension because there has been an increase in pay in the civil service? Is that what he means?

Mr. Pearkes: I am not talking about the civil service. I am talking about the mounted police.

Mr. Garson: Yes?

Mr. Pearkes: Their pay has been increased considerably in recent years; but great numbers of the force who contributed greatly to the development of western Canada in the early days are now living on very small pensions. It is that class of people who could be helped tremendously if, on account of the increases in pay which have now been granted to the force, they could receive some small increase in their pensions, or perhaps some small monthly bonus for the number of years which they put in prior to a certain date.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, from my hon. friend's standpoint I am sure that the increases of which he speaks would be highly desirable. However, the question as to whether or not they should be granted now or at any other time is one that is not relevant to the provisions of this bill. As I said in reply to my friend the hon. member for Kamloops, this bill deals only with the question as to what provision is to be made for mounted police force members who came from British Columbia on the one hand and from Newfoundland on the other. It does not go to the question as to whether past pensions or present pensions should, as pensions, be increased.

Mr. Pearkes: As we have not the bill before us, it was impossible for me to know that. I was only expressing the pious hope that something might be done for this very worthy class of people.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 446, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN CONNECTION WITH APPEALS, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 443, to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps this bill is of sufficient importance that I should make some brief comments on the motion for second reading. The bill will try to avoid certain anomalies and to provide certain conveniences for the administration of the court in a general way. The four main purposes of the bill are as follows. First of all, there is a provision to establish the office of deputy registrar of the court, the intention being that either this new officer, namely the deputy registrar, or the registrar of the court himself will personally report the decisions of the supreme court. With the abolition of appeals to the privy council, now that the Supreme Court of Canada has become the court of last resort in this country, it becomes increasingly important, I think, that the highest possible standard of service should be given in respect of the reports of its decisions. We therefore feel that the editing of these reports, and particularly the preparation of the summaries and head notes and —we hope—the argument of counsel, should be undertaken by a senior officer of that court. After this new arrangement goes through we will have a senior officer look after it. Inasmuch as the registrar could not possibly do it and also look after his ordinary work the arrangement, as I have said, will be either that the registrar or the deputy registrar will do the work of the court registrar and the other of the two will do the reporting. In this regard we have been very fortunate in getting the services of Mr. Harvey who up until quite recently has been editor of the Ontario Law Reports and who I think, by general consent, is regarded as the most able law reporter in the Dominion of Canada today.

Second, we propose to increase from $2,000 to $10,000 the minimum amount that must be involved in a case appealable as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada. The present amount—that is the $2,000 limit—was fixed in the province of Quebec some years ago, in 1875, to be precise and for Ontario the amount of $1,000 was fixed in 1896. In 1920 the sum of $2,000 was made uniform in all of the provinces, and this amount has remained unchanged to the present day. That is to say, the amount that may be involved to entitle a litigant to appeal as of right to the court of last resort in Canada has been, and is at the present time, the same as it was in Quebec in 1875, in spite of the fact that the purchasing power of a dollar, whatever dispute there may have been as to the change in it in the last 10 years, is certainly very much less now than it was in 1875.

Now, this increase to $10,000 would reduce somewhat the number of cases that reach the Supreme Court of Canada as of right but, of course, leave to appeal may always be granted by the Supreme Court. Therefore, what we are dealing with here, inasmuch as all of the other cases can be handled on the basis of application for leave to appeal to make sure that there is some principle of law involved, which should have the consideration of the Supreme Court—what we are really dealing with here are these cases in which there is only a question of fact which has already been passed upon by the trial court and by the appeal court of the province. I think in most of those cases it will be open to quite considerable doubt as to whether there is any purpose in having a further appellate court go over what is a pure question of fact and arrive at some different disposition from that which has been affirmed in both the trial court in which were involved the judge and jury, who have had the opportunity of hearing the evidence given by the witnesses and all of the advantage that that brings and in the provincial court of appeal.

The Supreme Court of Canada, of course, can be applied to for leave to appeal in any cases where that seems to be warranted. It is simply a question of their not having the appeal as of right in these cases we are now discussing.

Third, we propose to alter the procedure on appeal; that is the method by which a litigant who is appealing from the provincial court of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada launches an appeal in the Supreme Court. The normal method in the provincial courts is for an appellant to serve a notice of an appeal upon all of the opposite parties to the suit and then file that notice of appeal within the prescribed time in the court of appeal. Under the Supreme Court Act, however, the practice heretofore has been that no notice of appeal is served or filed. Instead the appellant must make an application to the court to have the security for appeal that he must give approved; and when the security is approved the appeal is deemed to be commenced notwithstanding the fact that the other parties to the case have received no other notice of it.

We think it is desirable to bring the appeal procedures in the Supreme Court of Canada into line with that which prevails in the provincial courts of appeal. The bill, therefore, will provide for the launching of the appeal to the supreme court by notice of appeal, by filing it with the registrar within the time prescribed by the act.

Fourthly, we propose to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code with respect to the applications for leave to appeal in both civil and criminal cases. At the present time an application for leave to appeal in civil cases must be made to the court, but applications for leave to appeal in criminal cases are, under the Criminal Code, made to a single judge of the court. It is proposed that in all cases the application for leave to appeal should be made to the court but that the quorum on the hearing of the application would be three judges in both civil and criminal cases with the single exception that in capital cases the quorum would have to be five judges.

I think I should point out in that connection that the joint committee on capital punishment made a recommendation the other day that is somewhat different from this provision here, namely, the recommendation which would provide an appeal as of right to anyone who had been convicted in a capital case, and also other recommendations to the effect that the provinces, because it would be the provinces that have the responsibility for the administration of justice, should in such capital cases see that the accused was provided with competent counsel to defend him if he had no means of providing counsel himself.

I suppose there will be those who will say that we should give immediate effect to the recommendations of the joint committee. I am suggesting to the members, however, the present provision for these reasons. In connection with the report of the joint committee on capital punishment, on corporal punishment and on lotteries, there are a number of provisions which can only be implemented by those governments in Canada which, under the British North America Act, are responsible for the administration of justice, namely the provincial governments. In the Fauteux report, which was tabled the other day, there are, it is true, quite a large number of provisions which can be implemented by the federal government, but there are a larger number which must be implemented either by the federal government and the provincial government acting together or which the provincial governments only can implement. That being so, we have felt that inasmuch as these various reports all deal with aspects of what, after all, is one entire problem, namely the administration of justice in the enforcement of criminal law, the least that we could do would be to confer with the provincial attorneys general who have the primary responsibility for the administration of justice, before we attempted to take any action within our own sphere of jurisdiction here to implement recommendations in which the interest of the provinces is at least as great as that of the federal government, if it is not greater. I say that because while we may enact these provisions, it is the provincial authorities that have to enforce them. As we all know, as I think it was stated in this chamber just this very day, no law is any better than its administration. Thus when we are dealing with a problem of this sort we should certainly confer with those who have the responsibility of that administration before we attempt to make any changes in it. Therefore I am recommending to my fellow members and to this house, sir, that in the present circumstances we adopt for the time being this provision that in capital cases the application for leave to appeal should be made to a quorum of five judges; and that this will stay in effect until such time as we can discuss with the provinces, for example, whether they are prepared to undertake this responsibility, which has been suggested, that they should provide counsel if necessary for the accused. We should also at least pay them the courtesy of getting their reaction to this idea of there being an appeal as of right to the supreme court, in which, if they are to undertake the cost of providing the counsel, they must have a considerable interest.

It is for that reason I recommend, as I have said, that we adopt this provision with regard to the quorum upon the understanding that we shall discuss this other matter with the provincial authorities. If a reasonable majority of them are agreeable to adopting this other provision and if we ourselves are advised, that this is a wise provision, we will bring in later amending legislation to provide for it.

There are one or two other minor matters which I do not think there is any purpose in my mentioning at this time. These four provisions are the main items of the bill and I think we can go into the other details when the bill is in committee.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, there are certain very grave reservations that we have with respect to this bill notwithstanding that in a number of respects it will effect a considerable improvement over the existing arrangements.

The most important ground of criticism as far as we in this party are concerned is that we regret exceedingly that the department has not seen fit to take the important and long overdue step of providing that in capital cases, that is mainly in cases of murder trials, there shall be an appeal to the supreme court as of right. We think that the time for such a provision is long overdue.

After all, as appears from the bill now before us, in civil cases up to the present time involving sums of only $2,000—when I say "only" I am referring there to the sense of comparing a sum of that nature with a man's life—in civil cases involving only $2,000 the appeal is as of right. It is true that the bill before us proposes to raise that limit or that floor, as it were, to $10,000, but I may say at once we are opposed to that. If it passes, then we are still going to have the fact that when a cash sum of $10,000 is in dispute you have an appeal as of right, but when a man's life is hanging in the balance you have to go and apply for leave to appeal. We consider that to be an entirely anomalous situation and one which runs counter to the concepts of justice which should prevail in this country.

The minister has said he is recommending the present proposal, that is that there should be an application for leave to appeal in capital cases to be heard by a quorum of five instead of by a single judge as in the past, but he is doing that instead of going all the way and enacting at once the provision that appeals will be heard as of right mainly on the ground that he feels the provinces should be consulted before the step we recommend is taken.

I might emphasize here that this step, namely making appeals on capital cases as of right, is recommended in the recent report of the special joint committee on capital and corporal punishment, as the minister himself pointed out. The reason the minister said he felt they should consult with the provinces was because the provinces would have to undertake certain expenses in connection with the hearing of appeals if they were allowed as a right and therefore the provinces should be consulted first.

I suggest that that argument is insufficient on two grounds. In the first place it is not as though this were a new suggestion made for the first time and embodied anywhere for the first time in the report of this committee. This is a suggestion which has been before law enforcement officers for consideration for many years. Secondly, the argument that there might be some financial expense incurred by the provinces is one which I venture to say that no province would have the temerity to suggest publicly as a reason for arguing against the adoption of the suggestion.

That sort of argument, to my mind, is even worse than the situation which we find prevailing where, if you have $10,000 in dispute, you can appeal as of right whereas if your life is hanging in the balance you have to apply for leave to appeal.

When a man's life is placed in jeopardy as a result of a charge laid by the crown of whatever province it may be, then it behooves us and it behooves the provinces equally to see that that man has a proper defence and a fair trial; and if, as we recognize in the very fact that we have a supreme court and in the powers of appeal we give it, there are certain issues which are so important that they require to go before the Supreme Court of Canada and we require that court to hear the case as a court of last resort, then to my mind there can be no excuse for saying that this supreme issue, of whether or not a man shall lose his life as a result of our judicial process, shall not come before that court as of right and that we are going to wonder whether we should give the man the statutory right to go to that court because it might involve some expense to the law enforcement agencies of this country. That is an argument I cannot support for a moment. It is not an argument, I believe, that any province would advance publicly. It is just not an argument. It is a line of reasoning that does not stand up in the light of the issues which we are considering in this question.

The minister has said he considers that the matter should be left in abeyance until this report of the committee and all its implications can be discussed with the provinces. That means we are not going to have legislation until next year at the earliest. I point out to you, sir, that men are still being tried for murder in Canada and particularly now when the whole question of the retention or abolition of capital punishment is a question which is so greatly exercising the thoughts of our people it seems to me to be an untenable position for the Minister of Justice to take to say we are going to delay any longer in granting an appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada in a capital case.

If there had been an appeal as of right the situation in the Coffin case would never have arisen. I have already expressed my very critical views in this house of the conduct of the minister and the results that developed there with respect to the manner in which that case was handled. As it was, because there was no appeal as a right, because there had to be an application made for leave to appeal and because of the way that matter was handled, there exist in the minds of millions of Canadians, I should imagine, very grave doubts as to the final outcome and the execution in that case. That whole messy, unfortunate and deplorable situation should not have arisen. I know the minister has been urged before that we adopt legislation granting appeals as of right.

I admit that this will be a substantial improvement if the bill carries, even if the amendment which we propose to move in committee is not accepted; but this legislation will still be a great improvement over the previous provision where such application came before one judge. However, I express the greatest regret that the minister has not seen fit to go the whole way and grant appeals as of right. I cannot refrain from expressing the gravest criticism against the grounds on which he has rested his case for his decision not to go that far.

The other main ground of our criticism of the bill is that it increases from $2,000 to $10,000 as the minimum sum which must be involved in civil litigation before there is an appeal as of right to the supreme court. I do not believe it is sound that appeals or the right of appeal should be governed by the financial amount in dispute. I recognize that in almost every province there is a division between the initial jurisdiction of the county court, on the one hand, and the supreme court or its equivalent depending upon the province, but that is only the initial hearing. Once a decision has been given, whether it be in the county or supreme court, as far as I am aware—I hope those who come from other provinces will correct me if I am wrong—there is the same right of appeal from the county court to the appeal court of the province as there is from the supreme court to the appeal court. That limitation or differentiation as to the original jurisdiction is of no application to the principle we are discussing here as to whether there should be a financial limit applicable in the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The minister says that the limit of $2,000 was made uniform in 1920 and that there has been a change in the purchasing power of the dollar since that time. That argument is not sound in principle. If it were the minister would have to establish that the purchasing value of the dollar has declined five times, that in 1920 the dollar would purchase five times what it will today. That is a sorry admission to come from the government which has been in power I should think on a rough calculation at least two-thirds of that time. I do not think that any such argument can be maintained because it is not a sound principle on which to base the right of appeal.

If the purchasing power of the dollar should go up, will there be another amendment to lower the limit? Are we to vary the ceiling or the floor on the amount in dispute before there can be appeal as of right every time the cost of living index varies? As I say, I am not satisfied that it is sound in principle to have a financial limit in matters of this kind and I am absolutely opposed to raising it from $2,000 to $10,000. Two thousand dollars may be more important to a litigant, particularly one who is not blessed with many resources of his own, than $10,000 may be to another litigant. The principle of law involved in the $2,000 case may be as important if not more important, but because the amount in dispute happens to be $9,999 instead of $10,001, if this bill goes through there would have to be application for leave to appeal in the one case with appeal as of right in the other.

In this connection may I point out that when you interpose this obstacle of having to make application for leave to appeal you impose upon the litigant in a civil action or the accused in a criminal case an extra cost in addition to the cost of having his appeal heard. That is a reason additional to those I have advanced why appeals in criminal capital cases should be as of right.

I should like to revert to this subject of consideration for a moment and say that I feel there is an urgent necessity for further reform in our criminal law with respect to the providing of adequate facilities for the proper skilful and thorough defence of every one accused with a capital crime. I regret to say it must be confessed that there have been cases, certainly in the initial hearing, where an accused has been grossly prejudiced by an inadequate defence because of lack of funds. I know of one such case, and those with whom I have discussed this have told me that they have personal knowledge of similar cases.

I submit that so long as that situation exists we cannot disclaim responsibility in this parliament because criminal law is a matter of federal jurisdiction. Some of the responsibility must be shared by the provinces whose duty it is in the administration of justice to appoint counsel for accused who cannot afford to retain their own. I believe this matter requires the most careful and immediate consideration by the bar associations and law societies of the various provinces.

While we are undertaking a general study of the question of capital punishment, while we are considering this question of the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in capital as well as other criminal cases, this other matter also requires to be considered immediately by the department with a view to bringing down at the next session—I doubt if there is time at this session—some amendment or improvement to our law so that it can never be charged against us in Canada that a person accused of a capital crime has suffered because of inadequate defence.

Mr. Garson: Is my hon. friend aware that the provision of defence counsel for accused would be the responsibility of the provincial authorities?

Mr. Fulton: I mentioned that the responsibility must be shared by the provinces, but I repeat that we have regretfully to face the fact that there have been cases where men have been prejudiced—I am not going to say that this went as far as a final miscarriage to the extent of execution—in the supreme courts of the provinces when it was necessary to have counsel appointed by the crown. Admittedly the crown in the province makes the actual appointment, but I am saying that so long as criminal law is a matter of federal responsibility—I hope it will always be—we cannot just say that this is a matter exclusively for the provinces to find a remedy for. The question of appeals to the supreme court that we are considering right now shows to what extent this is a joint responsibility and not an exclusive responsibility.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's advice is always so wise that I like to make sure that I understand it so that, if possible, I can profit by putting it into effect. Is my hon. friend urging that we should amend the criminal law here by attempting to throw a burden upon the provincial administration of justice, upon the provincial governments, by saying that under a federal law they must provide counsel for an accused? Is that what my hon. friend is suggesting?

Mr. Fulton: I do not think it is a case of misunderstanding on the part of the minister. I am inclined to think it is a case of trying to pin me with something he knows would not be sound and he knows I did not suggest. I pointed out initially that the minister has said that he is going to discuss with the provinces all the problems that arise within the fields of enforcement covered by the special joint committee of this house, and the reports of the Fauteux commission and the various other commissions that have reported or are in the course of reporting.

What I said was that here is a situation which must be within the knowledge of the minister, as much as within my knowledge and the knowledge of several others with whom I have discussed it. So long as that situation exists it is not a matter to which we can close our eyes in this parliament, or to which the minister can close his eyes in his department and in his official capacity. But I suggest that if he is going to have these discussions with the provinces this, in my view, is one of the matters that should be put at the head of the agenda of those discussions, ensuring that there is always available to an accused charged with a capital crime an adequate defence and that he does not suffer and is not prejudiced in any respect by lack of funds with respect to his defence.

Whether the provinces would agree with the guarantee that I am asking be written into the Criminal Code, or whether they would agree to enact uniform provincial laws, is a question that must be determined in the course of such discussions. That is all I have said, and that is where I rest. I hope the minister is not trying to say that, notwithstanding the fact that he knows that these deplorable situations have existed in the past, he is not going to do anything about it. I hope that is not what he is saying.

Mr. Garson: Then I understand my hon. friend is urging me, and very properly so, to do what just a few moments ago I said I was going to do. I am glad to have his support, and I think he is right in what he has said. We are going to confer with them. We are going to seek their advice, seeing that they are the administrators of the criminal law, as to what they think of this. It is not merely a question of the money involved; it is a question of whether the procedure we finally adopt is a practical procedure which has been evolved by people who have had the actual experience of administering justice.

Mr. Fulton: That is quite so. The minister did not say—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I wonder whether I might suggest to both hon. gentlemen that there are clauses in the bill dealing with the question of appeals, and if this discussion is going to be carried on back and forth the time to carry it on in that way would be when we are in committee.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think that probably this matter is one that does require detailed discussion in committee, and I shall defer my further remarks under this heading until that time.

The third criticism we have to make of the bill is that it follows what we regard as an unsound legislative principle in that it incorporates into one amending bill provisions relating to two entirely separate statutes. We have raised objections to this same procedure being followed on other occasions. Whilst I realize there may perhaps be some room for difference of opinion as to whether it is a sound legislative practice, I regret to see it being adopted by the department which should set the pattern for legislative excellence, namely the Department of Justice. This bill is entitled "An act to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code", which makes it obvious that it is amending two separate statutes. This means that from the day this bill is given royal assent and is proclaimed, those seeking amendments are going to have to look in two different places to see what is the effect of one bill. If this practice were enlarged upon and carried forward into the future I think our statutes, between the periodic revisions that occur, between the times when there is a complete revision and revised statutes, would become a hodgepodge in which it would be even more difficult for lawyers, let alone laymen, to find amendments than now.

The minister may say there are only two acts and the amendments deal with the same general subject, appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada. That is so, but if you are applying the principle, then why apply it to three, four, five, or six bills, and so you can go on? Either the principle is sound or unsound. We regard it as unsound, and we intend at the appropriate stage to move accordingly that the bill be divided.

In these remarks I have made I have expressed in perhaps strong terms criticisms of the bill. I do so because I do not think there is any more important field of legislation than this, and we here have real regret that the bill does not grapple with the problem and solve it at once, in fields where we believe solutions are urgently called for. Nevertheless I must in fairness say that we believe that the provision with regard to the appointment of the deputy registrar is sound; that the simplifications of the procedure with regard to appeals to the supreme court is, generally speaking, desirable and sound; and the provision for a quorum of five in capital cases, whilst it does not go as far as it should and is to that extent subject to severe criticism, is nevertheless as far as it goes, a real improvement.

The one thing for which I cannot find any justification and about which I cannot find one kind thing to say is the raising of the floor for appeals in criminal cases as of right from $2,000 to $10,000. Because the bill is not capable of amendment to bring about the things we would want at this stage but only in committee, and because as far as it does go it is an improvement, we intend, notwithstanding the quite severe strictures we have made about it, to support it on second reading and then make real efforts to improve it in committee.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): I shall be very brief. I wish to support what was said by the hon. member for Kamloops as far as this bill is concerned. It is an improvement, with the exception, as the hon. member pointed out, of the increase from $2,000 to $10,000, for leave to appeal cases as of right. Like the hon. member, I can see no justification for that, because after all these appeals are not entirely a matter of monetary consideration; they are a matter of privilege, and I do not think the amount of money involved should have any consideration whatsoever.

As the hon. member pointed out, it is much easier for some people to appeal because of a $10,000 consideration than it is for many others to appeal because of consideration of the $2,000. I think it should be thrown wide open, and the monetary limit should be abolished entirely. If it is not going to be abolished, then it should be left at the $2,000 mark. I think this section of the bill is untimely and unnecessary.

Referring briefly to capital cases, I think the quorum of five is sound, but like the hon. member for Kamloops I dislike intensely the thought that a man appealing a murder conviction is given less consideration than somebody suing for $10,000. A $10,000 tag on a man's head is entirely unjustified. I should like to see appeals made possible as of right in capital cases. I only hope that if the minister is not willing to do so now he will take the report of the committee on capital punishment and talk it over as quickly as possible with the attorneys general and law enforcement officers of the provinces, so the necessary legislation can be brought in to provide these people with an appeal as of right.

I hope he will introduce such a bill as soon as he can at the next session and have it passed, because it is an unfortunate thing that a person condemned to death cannot have an appeal as of right but has to make application for leave to appeal. It is an unfortunate thing and, as I said before, a man's life has a very low price tag on it when compared with the $2,000 or $10,000 limit in civil cases.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. Nowlan:

That it be an instruction to the committee of the whole that they have power to divide Bill 443 into two bills, in order that one may deal separately with amendments to the Criminal Code.

I might just say at this stage that earlier in the session a similar motion was accepted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is the house ready for the question? The hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

Mr. Thomas: I intended when speaking a moment ago to agree—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I think perhaps the fault is mine. I recognized the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, but I am informed by the clerk that a motion of instruction to the committee of the whole is not debatable at this stage. The question is the following: It was moved by Mr. Garson and seconded by Mr. Gregg that Bill No. 443, an act to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code, be now read the second time. It was moved by Mr. Fulton and seconded by Mr. Nowlan that it be an instruction to the committee of the whole that they have power to divide Bill No. 443 into two bills, in order that one may deal separately with amendments to the Criminal Code. Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: At this moment I am reminded that on one occasion I said that an amendment of this kind should not be accepted without notice. See Hansard May 28, 1956, page 4370. There are in our rules no provisions for notices by private members. This is a matter which should be looked into because it would be wise for us to have provision for notice to be given of motions of this kind before they are moved.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fulton) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. Is it agreed that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The house went into committee on the bill, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2.

Mr. Fulton: This is the clause which raises from $2,000 to $10,000 the amount which must be in dispute in a civil action before there will be an appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada. As was stated a moment ago in the house, we think that is a most undesirable principle, for the reason that it would seem to penalize litigants to whom $2,000 may be just as important as, or more important than, $10,000 would be to other litigants. We do not believe this juggling about of the floor of the amount which must be in dispute in this manner is sound in principle. The legal point at issue in the dispute involving $2,000 may well be more difficult than the legal point involved in a dispute about a matter involving $10,000. It seems to us again a matter where the principles of justice are opposed to the suggestion made in the bill, and we are therefore altogether opposed to this section and intend to vote against it.

Mr. McIvor: I have a question for the minister. How much would the appeal cost? What would be the court costs of making this appeal?

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be very difficult to say in general terms what would be the cost of the different cases unless one knew what factors were involved; for example, how much it would cost to provide transcripts of the evidence which they will already have had before for the provincial court of appeal. But the point which the hon. member for Fort William raises is quite important, and presents an angle of this matter that I think perhaps has been overlooked by those who have taken part in the discussion until now.

If some plaintiff in a very clear-cut case where the facts cannot be challenged, is able to secure a judgment in a trial court and then is taken, we will say by an insurance company, to the provincial court of appeal and goes through the expense of that court, and then is subjected to a further appeal to the supreme court he may, if he has not a long enough purse to keep up this process of briefing his own counsel, be put in rather an embarrassing position. That is another side of this same question.

What this present clause provides is that where there is, in cases between $2,000 and $10,000, a successful litigant who has got a judgment of the trial court and has maintained that judgment in the court of appeal, he cannot be taken further into the supreme court in a case which, for the most part, involves only questions of fact. For if some principle of law were involved, as the hon. member for Kamloops mentioned, then it is inconceivable to me, and I am sure to him, too, that the supreme court or indeed the court of appeal of the province itself, upon application for leave to appeal, would not grant leave to appeal if there were some principle of law involved that needed to be settled.

It may be that the step from $2,000 to $10,000 is too great a step to take at one time, but I do think the limitation which was imposed in the first instance in Quebec in 1875 does not make sense in 1956 in the whole of Canada. And it is not only upon the question of the purchasing power of the dollar, though it is true I did mention that as one of the circumstances. It also has to do with the nature of the cause of action. For example, there will be a good many automobile collision cases which arise under present circumstances, having regard to the value of the cars involved and the like, which will easily run up above $2,000; they may run to $3,000, $4,000, $5,000, and $6,000, having regard to all the people who may be injured. Now, if it is a clear question of fact; if that has been threshed out in the trial court and an appeal has been taken to the appeal court of the province, and it has been gone over again there, is any real purpose served by one of the parties, the party against whom the judgment has gone, being able to take this question of fact to the Supreme Court of Canada and have it gone all over again by the judges of that court, who already have a very heavy burden of litigation at the present time?

I do not think the matter of whether it should be $10,000 or some lower amount is one upon which the government would want to take too firm a stand, but I am certain that it is not fair either to the litigants on the one hand or to the supreme court on the other that we should retain in 1956 this money limitation which was first put into effect in this country in 1875.

Mr. Fulton: And which was ratified in 1920.

Mr. Garson: Yes, it was ratified in 1920.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to agree with the protest raised by the hon. member for Kamloops on the ground that, particularly since the supreme court now is the final court of appeal, and since it is an important principle of British justice that finally everyone should be able to take his trouble to the foot of the throne—this court is now is the foot of the throne in Canada—certainly nothing should be put in the way of those seeking justice.

The minister has mentioned the rise in the cost of living as one of the factors and, as I understood it, the main factor involved in making this change. If that is so, it is really a sad commentary on what has been going on with reference to the cost of living; but even at that I doubt very much whether five times the present amount is the appropriate amount. Certainly it does not take five times as much now to lubricate the wheels of justice as it did in 1920.

I think the only ground on which the higher amount could be argued is that the court could be put to an extra amount of work and therefore an extra amount of expense in looking after relatively small cases. But, since the principle is so important, in view of the fact that it is the court of last resort, I would certainly suggest to the minister that he recommend at least a lower amount than $10,000. It seems to me to be a pretty broad jump from $2,000 to $10,000, when it interferes with the right of last resort to the supreme court. Unless the minister is prepared to recommend some lower figure, I hope someone on this side of the house will move a motion in order that the amount be retained at $2,000, or that some much smaller figure than $2,000 be substituted therefor.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 58; nays, 31.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the clause carried.

Clauses 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6—Quorum on application for leave.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister whether it would be agreeable to him to have clause 6 stand until after we have disposed of clause 19, for the reason that we intend to move an amendment to clause 19 which if carried, as I hope it will be, would have considerable effect on clause 6. This I may say is the reason I regret that the minister did not adopt our suggestion and split the bill into two separate bills, because here we are in the position of having to ask now that we defer one clause until a clause near the end has been disposed of.

Mr. Garson: That is quite agreeable, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreeable that clause 6 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 7 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 17—Entry of appeals on list and order of hearing.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister if he will just say a word on this clause? On the face of it, it does appear to be sensible and just that the chief justice or one of the puisne judges at his direction be given some discretion concerning the order in which cases are called. On the other hand practitioners from the western provinces and the maritime provinces particularly attach very considerable importance to knowing when their cases are going to be reached and called on the list. If it it left as it is at present so that the western cases will be called first it is a course that does lend some certainty to the time at which counsel must travel to Ottawa. If they have that certainty they are able to reduce their expenses and thus considerably reduce the cost to their clients.

If I understand the amendment it gives the chief justice discretion to vary the order in which cases shall be called. While it seems on the face of it to be sensible to give him some discretion I am somewhat in doubt, and I would appreciate a word of explanation from the minister.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, my impression is that the case is almost exactly opposite to what the hon. member understands it to be. In other words the reason for this amendment is to enable the chief justice, in cases in which unforeseen circumstances have arisen which make it impossible to try a given case, to rearrange the lists in a manner which will provide an absolute minimum of inconvenience to all the other litigants involved. But for this amendment he would not have the power to rearrange the business of the court, and everyone would be put to an inconvenience.

Mr. Fulton: In other words it is anticipated that rather than altering the list in toto in the order in which the various regions are called, this is merely designed to give power to deal with individual cases within the subdivision of the list. Am I correct in putting it in those terms?

Mr. Garson: Yes. If the list all the way were to be a law of the Medes and Persians and could not be changed at all there would be no kind of flexibility to meet a difficult set of circumstances.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 18 agreed to.

On clause 19—On question of law with leave.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, we now come to the two clauses dealing with the amendments to the Criminal Code involving the question of the right to appeal to the supreme court in criminal cases, and so far as we are concerned here the main subject of consideration is capital cases. As I said earlier, we feel that in cases where the penalty is death the accused should have the absolute right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada for final adjudication, instead, of having to apply for leave to appeal.

I do not think I have very much more to say, except to point out I do not feel the argument that provincial attorneys general would be faced with extra costs is really one that can be seriously advanced or seriously maintained where a man's life is at stake. The only argument I can see for justification for the present proposal is if the minister were to tell me that when the application for leave is heard—if the amendment carries, it being then subject to be heard by five judges —they are in effect disposing of the appeal itself. On the face of it that is an attractive argument. For that reason I think it is so much better to have five judges than to have one, as was the case formerly; but it is not quite that simple.

What is being argued in the application for leave is really and properly of a much more restricted and technical nature than the appeal proper. If leave is applied for, it being the duty of counsel for the crown who would be opposing the application for leave to see that the points argued on that application are not extended beyond the proper legal limits, then I do not think it is a safe argument for us to accept that the court is in effect hearing the appeal itself when it hears the application for leave to appeal. I think this is so important that every safeguard all the way through, including this most important one of an appeal to the court of highest resort, be granted to an accused person on a capital charge, that I propose to move an amendment to this section which I shall read. I move:

That section 19 of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

[Mr. Fulton.]

Subsection 1 of section 597 of the Criminal Code is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(1) A person who is convicted of any indictable offence whose conviction is affirmed by the court of appeal may appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada

(a) in any case where the conviction is for an offence punishable by death;

(b) in all other cases;

(i) on any question of law on which a judge of the court of appeal dissents;

(ii) on any question of law, if leave to appeal is granted by the Supreme Court of Canada within 21 days after the judgment appealed from is pronounced or within such extended time as the Supreme Court of Canada or a judge thereof may, for special reasons, allow."

If, sir, you will compare that proposed amendment with section 597 (1) of the Criminal Code as it now stands you will see that the effect of it is this. Subsection (a) as it presently appears in the code now becomes subsection (b) (1) of this amendment, and the proposed subclause (b) of section 19 of the bill appears as subclause (b) (2) of the amendment. In effect all that is done is to insert a new subclause providing that in capital offences leave shall be as a right.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, before the amendment is put I want to reinforce the arguments of the hon. member for Kamloops and express my support thereof. In passing may I also say that I agree absolutely with what he said on the motion for second reading with respect to the inclusion of two separate bills in this bill. I did not speak on second reading, in an effort to save time, but I think it is perfectly open for me to speak on the section we are now dealing with, on the matter of amending the Criminal Code.

It is a most peculiar situation in which we find ourselves. The first five pages of Bill No. 443 deal with the Supreme Court Act, and then you come at the very bottom of the fifth page to a little section which alters substantially the Criminal Code. I listened attentively for an explanation from the Minister of Justice as to why these two acts should be united in bonds of unholy wedlock, but I did not hear any explanation or even an apology therefor.

The hon. member for Kamloops has said that you would have to look through two acts in order to find the amendment. The minister shakes his head, but I suggest that he has not had much experience practising as a country lawyer in a small town with a library not quite as extensive as might be hoped for. The minister may have that experience after the next election, and if he does I think he will find it is going to be awkward to have to go through all the statutes in order to find out which ones have been amended and which ones have not.

Some years ago a former minister of national defence, an able lawyer in his own right but who had apparently intended to forsake that field and did not worry too much about the problems he was creating for his confreres, used to run five or six different acts together in one bill dealing with national defence. There might have been some justification for that because they all dealt with national defence. It might have been said that he was preparing a handbook on military law for the service personnel who were not too well versed in the law. But here we are dealing with legal matters, with appeals under the Criminal Code, and surely these two things could be dealt with on a different basis.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, has not this question been disposed of by the house?

Mr. Nowlan: I am dealing with this section which is amending the Criminal Code.

The Deputy Chairman: The point of order raised by the minister is one I was thinking about raising myself. The question before the committee is an amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops which enlarges the conditions under which appeals may be taken. I think we are going a little far afield if we start to compare National Defence Act amendments with the bill we are now considering. I would ask the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings to co-operate to the extent of restricting his remarks to whether the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops should be accepted.

Mr. Nowlan: May I just point out that on second reading we were dealing with the principle of the bill. If on second reading I had attempted to refer to this section I would quite properly have been ruled out of order and told that I should deal with it in committee. That is one reason we should never have this situation. If this continues the government would be able to bring in one bill to amend the statute law of Canada. It might possibly contain only one section, stating that particulars could be obtained by applying to the queen's printer. If you sent a postcard, then you could find out whether a particular bill had been amended during a particular session of parliament. I did want to put myself on record with respect to this and I submit it was proper to do so on this section, rather than when dealing with the principle of the bill for which there is no principle.

The Deputy Chairman: I would inform the hon. gentleman that the house has put itself on record on the subject, and as far as I am concerned I am not able to allow further discussion.

Mr. Nowlan: I am going to discuss for a moment the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops.

An hon. Member: It is about time.

Mr. Nowlan: It was not my fault, because I did not draft this bill. I tried to save time by not speaking on second reading, but if hon. members over there want it I can spend an hour discussing this amendment.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Nowlan: When you try to co-operate that is the reaction you get from some hon. members.

An hon. Member: You can't take it.

Mr. Nowlan: I want to reinforce the argument which has been advanced by the hon. member for Kamloops. We have here a proposal that in offences where the punishment may be death, there shall be a right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. I believe that recommendation has been placed before the house in another manner. It is something which has been approved of by lawyers in all parts of Canada, and I think there has been a recommendation by the Canadian Bar Association to this effect.

This amendment should commend itself to the sentiments of hon. members generally. A ceiling of $10,000 is being placed on appeals in civil matters, but even when considered on a mercenary basis the right to appeal is automatic when the amount involved is over $10,000. Are we to say that a life is not worth $10,000? As I say, this amendment should appeal to hon. members generally.

There is something repugnant in the idea that a man or woman sentenced to death is precluded from an appeal as of right. There is a procedure followed in my province which might be adopted by the Supreme Court of Canada, and I think the same is true of most other provinces. There is an appeal as of right on matters of law in both criminal and civil cases. Then when there is a question of both fact and law, or of fact, the appeal is by leave. The practice with our provincial court is for the court to hear the application for leave to appeal, which usully involves a complete review of the facts and the law. If that application is granted almost invariably the appeal is granted at the same time. That is possibly one way in which this matter could be dealt with.

I repeat that this amendment should commend itself to the committee. It covers something which probably will be law in the near future. The mere fact that it might possibly involve provincial governments in some expense is no reason that I can think of why this matter should be deferred in order that the provinces may be consulted. If it is right, it should become law whether the provinces approve or not; if it is not right, the approval of the provinces has nothing to do with it. It is a matter of morality; it is a matter of justice, as well as being a matter of law. I repeat that this is an amendment which should commend itself to the committee.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I submit that the hon. member for Kamloops has rendered a service in the study he has given to this bill and the recommendations he has made to the committee. A matter of this kind has to be handled by one learned in the law. I listened to the hon. member very carefully when he spoke on second reading, and I agree with everything he said. If there is one thing to which the Department of Justice should be paying particular attention it is the question of whether a person involved in a capital case is getting justice.

We have had more than one example where a man is picked up and finds himself faced with a capital charge and the difficulty of getting defence counsel. I think all that should be dispelled. I submit that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops is absolutely in order. When a man's life is at stake an appeal should be automatic.

When you consider the application to appeal and the cost that is involved, the average person who is affected, in the circumstances that the bill describes, is just not able to handle the cost. I think the time has now arrived when the Department of Justice, regardless of how the provinces may look at it, should lay it down as a principle of justice that, as far as we are concerned, it is not going to be a matter of money in order to get into the Supreme Court of Canada, that the right of appeal should be automatic, and a thorough examination should be made by the five judges, as we have it now—and that is an improvement.

I do not think there should be any question. There are enough lawyers in this house, and I believe every one of them, if they were to express a private opinion and there were no political implications, would say without any hesitation that the amendment suggested should be adopted. There should not be any quibbling about it.

Perhaps it is a matter of an oversight on the part of the drafters of the bill, and they did not analyse it in the way in which it has been analysed by the hon. member for Kamloops. I do not want to repeat anything he said, but I agree with every word of his remarks on this particular subject. If you read that little booklet written by a newspaperman on the Coffin case, I think the need for this type of legislation will be apparent. It is time we did something to prevent a repetition of the kind of thing that happened there.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that the remarks I made at a previous stage of this bill on this particular subject matter have not had much effect upon those who have taken part in the present debate, and for that reason I should like to attempt to elucidate a little more effectively than I did before just what our position is in this matter.

There certainly is not any question of an oversight. We in the Department of Justice began the over-all revision of the Canadian Criminal Code, which had not been consolidated for over 60 years, as the first step toward what might be regarded as an examination, if not an overhaul, of the administration of criminal justice in this country. We then followed that up by the appointment of the Fauteux committee and then the two commissions under Chief Justice McRuer and then the joint committee of both houses of parliament. All of these committees and commissions have been dealing with separate branches of the criminal law. We now have the Fauteux report and the three reports of the joint committee of parliament. We hope this fall to have the reports from Chief Justice McRuer. We shall then have a review of all of those portions of the criminal law and of penal reform that have not already been considered in the revision of the Criminal Code which was passed by this parliament.

Having regard to the fact that the enactment of the criminal law is the responsibility of this parliament of Canada, and that the administration of justice and the enforcement of the law is exclusively a provincial right and responsibility—and it is a responsibility to which every one of the provinces attaches a great deal of importance for very obvious reasons—I am sure the provinces would not want the federal government stepping in and interfering with their enforcement of the law and their administration of justice. In those circumstances it is no oversight that we have decided that the whole field that has been examined by the Fauteux commission and by the two royal commissions under Chief Justice McRuer and by the joint committee of this house and of the Senate, should be, as a matter of the most primitive form of courtesy, if for no other reason, discussed with those who are responsible for the enforcement of the criminal law, before we undertake to bring in any legislation in this house which will have to be enforced by them.

If we make any allowance at all for common sense, surely we must realize that the people who are right on the firing line of the enforcement of justice must have gained from that experience over the whole history of our country some insight as to what the law should be, that is the substantive law; and also an excellent idea as to what are workable procedural changes.

Therefore, even if we were not trying to maintain something which is of the very essence of good criminal law in this country, those good relations between the federal parliament which enacts the law on the one hand and the provincial legislature and government which enforces the law on the other, but if we were only to regard the matter of bringing before parliament wise provisions of law, we should certainly want to have a discussion of these reports that we have obtained from the various commissions and the joint committee of the two houses of parliament with the provincial attorneys general and law enforcement officers. To what end? To the end that we shall thereby be able to bring in a much wiser law than would otherwise in my judgment be available. We need not be so taken up with our own conceits that we should think that, having little or no experience with the administration of the criminal law, we can reach judgments that cannot be a little better if we consult with those who have extensive actual experience.

In this particular matter that is under discussion, I do not know how the government could have gone any further toward meeting the viewpoints that have been expressed here this afternoon than by putting into effect at once the provision which the hon. member for Kamloops himself is frank enough to admit is a great improvement; that is, that application for leave to appeal would have to be made to a quorum of five, which is a majority of the whole Supreme Court of Canada. Unless we are going to say that this quorum cannot be depended upon to adopt a fair attitude toward the applications made to it, and therefore we have to give an appeal as of right because the quorum will not deal with such applications satisfactorily—unless we take that view, which I think would be quite unwarranted, then in this interim we have a very good and very workable provision to take care of the very points that have been disturbing the minds of those who have taken part in this immediate debate.

I have said—and if there is any doubt about it I want to make it clear now—that our consultation with the provincial authorities over the whole field covered by the Fauteux report, by the two McRuer commissions and by the three reports of the joint committees of parliament will be to the end of securing a criminal law more workable in all its aspects. If, after having had that discussion, it appears that it is feasible and workable, and that it will work out in practice as we think it might be good in theory to have this appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada, then, as I have indicated in the clearest possible terms, so far as the policy of this government is concerned, there is nothing in our minds at the present time that would stand in the way of bringing in that reform.

But surely, even if we did not think we would have a wiser grasp of this whole problem after talking to the people who have had all the responsibility of enforcing it, even if we only thought that as a matter of courtesy between the two levels of government we would get a better enforcement of our law if we observed some of the civil amenities as between the two levels of government, on that ground alone the course we are presenting would be a wise one. May I remind the hon. members who have spoken that no law is any better than its enforcement. So if we are going to have a better substantive law, which will work better, we have to carry along the judgments of those people who are going to enforce that law. Therefore on all these counts the procedure we recommend to the house is the one which I think should be adopted, and for that reason I must oppose the motion.

Mr. Fulton: I regret that the minister should have attempted, as he has, to camouflage the issue under discussion here. The issue here is not the procedure on appeal. The issue here is the principle of whether there should be an appeal as of right in a capital case. If the minister says it is necessary to discuss it with the provinces before we can do anything, why has he brought in these quite substantial amendments with regard to the procedure on appeal, whether the appeal should be heard by a quorum of three or a quorum of five, the posting of security costs and all these things? These are procedural matters in which the law enforcement officers certainly have an interest. But the minister has brought in these amendments without, so far as I am aware—he certainly has not said so if it was the case—discussion with the provinces with respect to matters in which they could well say that they have a direct interest.

But here in discussing this amendment involving not procedure but the principle of whether there should or should not be an appeal he turns around and says that we have to send out a smoke signal and discuss it with the provinces. Why does he camouflage the issue in that way? The minister said that the essence of criminal law is the preservation of good relations with the provinces.

Mr. Garson: Oh, no.

Mr. Fulton: I really never heard anything quite so absurd.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is not quoting me correctly.

Mr. Fulton: If I am not I should like to be corrected, but that is what I understood the minister to say.

Mr. Garson: I said that the criminal law enactments we put through in this house have to be administered by another level of government; that the criminal law, like all other law, is, so far as the ordinary citizen is concerned, no better than its administration, and that in my judgment for that reason it is a wise and essential move that in these matters affecting another level of government we should consult those who are going to enforce the law, not with the view that they should have any kind of control over our judgment but at least that we should hear from them as well as from commissions, committees and so on before we bring this law into parliament for enactment.

Mr. Fulton: Did not a committee of parliament sit for two years and hear from the provincial representatives? What more does the minister want?

Mr. Garson: I shall answer that question right away.

Mr. Fulton: And it brought in a recommendation after having heard from the provincial representatives who were invited there to make their recommendations.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend asked a question and I shall be glad to answer it. We want to discuss with the provincial administrators of justice recommendations that were the product not only of the evidence given by the provincial people, but of a large mass of other evidence as well.

Mr. Fulton: Certainly; and the committee heard them and brought in a recommendation that in a capital case an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada be granted as of right. That is not a matter of procedure. It is a matter of principle, a matter of whether or not this parliament believes that people accused of murder should have the right to go to the highest court in the land. When it comes to working out how that will be done, making provision as to the time at which transcripts and factums will be transmitted and who is to be responsible for the cost of the appeal if the accused does not prefer to retain his own counsel, that is a matter of procedure and should most certainly be discussed.

But we are only asking here that there be a decision on the principle after the due consideration that has already been given to the matter and after the opportunity that has been given already to the provincial representatives to be heard. I believe the minister has a case with respect to the other matters of enforcement of law, penal reform on which the Fauteux commission has reported and so on. These are cases where practically every decision taken is going to have to be administered by the provinces, the jail provisions and so on.

But that is not so here. This is a decision on principle on which we are asking for action now after, as I said, the provincial representatives have already been heard from. Men are now being charged and tried for murder. I do not say that is so at this very moment, but there are murder cases pending, and men's lives are depending on them. There is a case for justification and a basis for delay in respect of the other matters. They are serious matters, but after all it is not a vital matter to put a man in the wrong sort of jail or administer the wrong sort of penal reform, things which may be changed after the recommendations of the Fauteux commission and others are considered. But you cannot change your mind about taking a man's life by hanging, and the question of whether or not he has the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada may determine whether or not his life is taken by hanging. We have heard from the provincial representatives, and it is a matter of principle upon which parliament is entitled and I think is under a duty to decide at this moment.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend a question before he takes his seat? Is his argument to the effect that the application for leave to appeal cannot safely be entrusted to a quorum of five Supreme Court of Canada justices?

Mr. Fulton: It is not my argument at all. The minister again is seeking to camouflage the question. What I am saying is that you are placing obstacles in the way of a man accused of murder having access to the Supreme Court of Canada if you make him come forward and obtain leave to appeal, because you are imposing upon him an additional burden of expense and difficulty.

Mr. Castleden: Did any of the provincial representatives recommend in their evidence that we should deny the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada to persons charged with capital offences?

Mr. Garson: I would speak subject to correction by the chairman of the committee who sits across the way here, because for one reason or another I was not at all the meetings of the committee. However, my own impression is that no provincial representative suggested that there should be an appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Fulton: Before you put the question, may I say that I am in the same position as the minister. I cannot recall all that was said. However, I should think it will probably be found that the reason they did not say that is that they were not asked, and the reason they were not asked is that the committee did not regard it as a matter where it was vital to obtain a decision or because they regarded it as a matter of principle on which we should make up our minds and upon which the provincial representatives were perfectly free to express an opinion if they wished. The fact that they did not express an opinion is significant, in my mind, to show that they were not asked because the committee regarded it as a matter for decision here.

Mr. Castleden: I suggest to the minister that where hearings have been held in the lower courts at the provincial level, frequently local or provincial feeling is quite strong. It seems to me that the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada should be available to every Canadian in order that he could be removed from any provincial atmosphere that might affect the situation.

Of course, as the minister says, a committee of five judges sits and studies whether or not the right of appeal should be granted. However, in the case of capital offences it seems to me we are moving in the wrong direction if we place any obstacles in the way of Canadian citizens that may deny them the right to appeal to the very highest court in the land. It seems to me that right should be undeniable and should be known to everyone.

I deplore the trend here. It seems to me that the move to increase the floor from $2,000 to $10,000 and the whole trend is to try to lighten the work of the Supreme Court of Canada. I think the judges of the court are well paid. They are paid to do a job, and surely the matter of justice should not be a matter of cost.

Mr. Thomas: I think I made my position on this matter perfectly clear, Mr. Chairman, when I spoke on second reading. I think the minister should not only take into consideration the evidence that was taken in the committee in this regard, but should remember this fact. He was talking about co-operation and the relationship between the federal government and the provincial governments. I want to remind him that this is not a matter of social amenities. It is a matter of whether or not some of these cases which are now pending are going to result in the death of a man or woman while the minister is observing the social amenities as between the Department of Justice of this government and the departments of justice in the provincial governments.

This is a matter of life and death, or at least it could easily be so. Surely to goodness nobody in this country has a better right to appeal as of right than a person who is convicted of murder and who could be hanged. I want the minister to think about this matter. As was pointed out earlier, it is a matter of principle. Regulations and so on surely could be worked out, having regard to the responsibilities of the federal government and the responsibilities of the provincial governments so far as money and costs are concerned. Those matters can be worked out later. But this is a matter of principle about which I feel very strongly. I think that a man should certainly have the right to appeal without any worries in that regard. Let the Minister of Justice and the attorneys general of the provinces work out their various little problems later.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: Yeas, 32; nays, 67.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 19 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Garson: I wonder whether we might revert to clause 16, Mr. Chairman. The Prime Minister has called my attention to the fact that there is a typographical error in the language of that clause. It reads as follows:

Section 71 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

It should read as follows:

Subsection 1 of section 71 of the said act is repealed . . .

The Deputy Chairman: May I suggest to the Minister of Justice that if there is no further debate to be had on clause 19 which is under discussion, we should dispose of it.

Mr. Garson: Very well.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 19 carry?

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent to revert to clause 16?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Garson: Clause 16 should read:

Subsection 1 of section 71 of the said act is repealed . . .

The Deputy Chairman: I would ask the Minister of Justice to be kind enough to write out an amendment that we may attach to the bill.

Mr. Garson: Very well.

The Deputy Chairman: On clause 16, Mr. Harris moves:

That clause 16 of the bill be amended to read that "Subsection 1 of section 71", etc.

I might point out that according to the copy of the bill I have before me, that amendment will not make sense.

Mr. Fulton: Just insert the words "Subsection 1 of" before the word "section".

The Deputy Chairman: Actually what I think the Minister of Finance is moving is that, in the second line of the clause, the words "section 66" be struck out—

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Garson: No, Mr. Chairman. Clause 16 now reads:

16. Section 71 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

The amendment would be to this effect:

That clause 16 be amended to read "Subsection 1 of section 71 of the said act is repealed".

The Deputy Chairman: In the first line?

Mr. Garson: Yes. If you approve the motion could be:

That clause 16 of the bill be amended by adding before the first word "section", the words "Subsection 1 of".

The Deputy Chairman: All right. Has the committee heard and understood the motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the motion agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Garson.]

The Deputy Chairman: Is the clause as amended agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 20 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We now revert to clause 6. Shall clause 6 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, there is a further clause that I should like to add at the end of the bill. It will be clause 21. First of all I had better establish the basis in which I am making that request. At the present time there is an appeal in existence. A question has been raised by us with a representative of the court as to whether the present bill would apply to that case. We are of the view that since this particular provision is procedural in character, on applying the usual principles of interpretation it does in fact apply to existing cases. But out of the abundance of caution and to remove any question on that score I would ask one of my colleagues to move as follows:

21. Section 44A of the Supreme Court Act, as enacted by this act, applies to all applications for leave to appeal heard by the Supreme Court of Canada after the time this act comes into force, whether the application was made before or after that time; and in the case of any application for leave to appeal made before that time under section 597 or 598 of the Criminal Code, those sections of the Criminal Code shall, for the purposes of the said section 44A, be deemed to have authorized an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada with leave of that court.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister any copies?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: In other words, you are not making this retroactive but you are saying that the leave shall be deemed to have been granted. Is that the effect of the amendment?

Mr. Garson: Out of an abundance of caution we are making the present enactment do what we think it does already; that is, apply to all existing cases.

Mr. Fulton: In order that we may be certain we understand this, would this be a fair way of putting it? Let us say an application for leave to appeal was launched yesterday, at which time the application had to come before a single judge. The application will be heard, let us say, tomorrow, this legislation having gone into effect in the meantime. Therefore the application has to be heard by the full court tomorrow, although at the time the application was made the law provided that it be heard by a judge. Therefore this section is saying that in the case of applications which are heard after the coming into effect of this legislation, they shall be deemed to have been made under the circumstances brought about by this legislation. Is that it?

Mr. Garson: Yes. I do not think I have anything to add to what I said before. The intention is that by this new clause 21 of the bill it will be made certain that section 44A of the act, which this bill puts into effect, will apply to a case which is now in being.

Mr. Castleden: Can the minister tell us what is the particular case. Is only one case concerned here?

Mr. Garson: Yes, just one case.

Mr. Castleden: What case it is?

Mr. Garson: It is a case before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Castleden: From what province?

Mr. Garson: I can give my hon. friend that information privately later. I do not have the information with me at the moment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By leave of the house, shall this bill be read a third time now?

Mr. Fulton: No, next sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES POWER COMMISSION ACT

AMENDMENTS CHANGING NAME, AUTHORIZING SUPPLYING OF OTHER UTILITIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lesage for the second reading of Bill No. 250.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would it be possible for the minister to indicate who would make up the personnel of the commission proposed by the bill?

Mr. Lesage: The commission already exists, Mr. Chairman. This bill is only to amend the existing act. The chairman of the commission is the deputy minister of northern affairs and national resources. There are two other members, one from the Department of Finance, Mr. George Lowe, and the third is Mr. Patterson, director of the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The chief engineer is Mr. E. W. Humphrys.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Powers.

Mr. Green: This is the clause which provides for investigation to be made by the commission. Can the minister tell us whether there are any such investigations in mind at the present time?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, there is one going on to supply electricity at White Horse.

Mr. Green: There are none in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, for the establishment of a diesel plant at Fort Simpson, if my memory serves me right.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Release of former owner.

Mr. Dinsdale: In this clause there is some reference to projects being carried on outside the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. It says specifically,

> . . . subject to the approval of the governor in council and in compliance with the laws of the province.

Mr. Lesage: That is clause 5.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is correct, yes. May we have permission to revert?

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Dinsdale: Just how extensively would this measure apply to areas other than the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, particularly the northern parts of our provinces?

Mr. Lesage: As I explained on second reading, the only thing we have in mind is regions adjacent to the Northwest Territories or the Yukon Territory. But what we have in mind especially is a case existing at the present time at Fort Smith, which is immediately on the 60th parallel, as my hon. friend knows. There is a power line going south from Fort Smith into territory of Alberta which is the property of the Department of National Defence, and which the Department of National Defence would like to turn over to the commission.

I can give the hon. member an example of another possibility. As my hon. friend knows, there are rapids between Fort Smith and Fort Fitzgerald on Great Slave river which could eventually be developed for hydroelectric power. They are in the province of Alberta. The possibility would be the development of these rapids, as for instance for Pine Point, if there was going to be concentration of the minerals which lie on the south shore of Great Slave lake.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would it be possible for a province upon application to have consideration under this act?

Mr. Lesage: That is not the intention.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask one question on this clause. We have been discussing paragraph (f) of clause 6 of the act, where it says that the commission may "raise or lower the levels of rivers, lakes, streams and other bodies of water, and make stream or river diversions". My question is this. Is that subject to some sort of expropriation proceedings?

Mr. Lesage: Definitely. It is done under the laws of the provinces, as is mentioned in subsection 1.

Mr. Barnett: Pardon?

Mr. Lesage: That is subject to all provincial laws, as is mentioned in subsection 1 of this clause.

Mr. Barnett: And in the case of the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Lesage: It is subject to the ordinances of the Northwest Territories council.

Mr. Barnett: They would not enter on land without the normal procedure of compensation?

Mr. Lesage: No, sir.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 and 8 agreed to.

On clause 9—Supply of utilites.

Mr. Lesage: The proposed amendment to section 22 of the act would authorize the use of surplus funds for extension, expansion or improvement of the plant in respect of which such surplus funds accrued. In 1955 the Fort Smith plant was extended and improved by the installation of a fourth generating unit and erection of a fuel oil storage tank, the total cost of which was approximately $48,000. Since this plant has an accumulated surplus in excess of contingency reserve requirements, the commission considered it would be prudent to finance this expansion from such surplus funds rather than by increasing the capital loan which would result in increased annual costs. It was to enable this to be done that the above suggested amendment to section 22 was proposed.

Since the amending act was not passed by parliament by the end of the commission's fiscal year, March 31, 1956, the proposed amendment would not apply to the 1955 expansion work unless made retroactive. The Auditor General's representative has agreed that if the proposed amendment to section 22 is made retroactive to March 31, 1956, it will be quite in order to finance the aforementioned expansion from surplus funds on hand, hence the purpose of the addition that I will now propose.

I would ask my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to move:

That clause 9 be amended by adding thereto the following subclause:

"(2) This section shall be deemed to have come into force on the 31st day of March, 1956."

Mr. Prudham: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Agreements.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am not sure whether clause 11 is broad enough to cover the question I am going to direct to the minister, but on March 3, 1956, the Financial Post carried an article which indicated that the U.S.S.R. is contemplating rather substantial power developments in the Arctic region, which include atomic power heating stations and a scheme to change the direction of the Arctic current and so forth, which will have serious implications for weather conditions in the northern part of Canada.

Section 11 mentions that the commission may enter into agreements with any persons. Who is responsible for carrying on international negotiations concerning future power developments in the Arctic area? Would this commission have any responsibility for that, or would it come under some other department of government?

Mr. Lesage: This commission has no such power, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Dinsdale: Has the minister heard about the contemplated projects in the north?

Mr. Lesage: I have heard of them, sir, but I have not had an opportunity to consult the Russians in order to see how serious they are about them.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, if the headwaters of the Yukon river were used for the production of power in accordance with plans which have been put forward in the papers from time to time, would this commission not be involved in some way or other?

Mr. Lesage: One of the sites which is presently being investigated to provide needed power for Whitehorse is a site on the Yukon river about two miles from Whitehorse. The plans that are being evolved at the present time are such that anything that would be put up there to provide power at the present time would have a salvage value and could be used if the Frobisher plan, as we call it, ever becomes a reality.

Mr. Green: Is the commission working in any way with the Frobisher people?

Mr. Lesage: It is the water resources branch of my department which has been working with the Frobisher people, not the commission. The commission is supplying electricity to the north but it is not involved in policy matters. It is the water resources branch of my department which does that work.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING BOUNDARIES OF CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS NATIONAL PARK

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 433, to amend the National Parks Act.

He said:

His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the purport of this bill, has given consent, so far as Her Majesty's property rights are affected, that the house may do therein as they shall think fit.

Mr. Fulton: Well, that is a new one.

Mr. Nowlan: Is the minister going to give a word of explanation?

Mr. Lesage: The Cape Breton Highlands national park was established in 1936. The land, which was provided by the province of Nova Scotia, contains approximately 390 square miles. The purpose of the bill is to delete a small area containing 13·3 square miles from the park. This is known as the Panhandle—I am sure the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) is aware of this—and lies near the southwest corner of the park. This is being done at the request of the provincial government, the official request being in the form of an order in council dated February 2, 1956.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Lands withdrawn from Cape Breton Highlands national park.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister has read the formal statement advising the house that His Excellency the Governor General has consented to this bill being introduced so far as it affects the property rights of Her Majesty. Is it the intention of the crown to divest itself of property rights in the lands and premises as described in this bill? The bill does not go that far; it simply says that these lands shall no longer be part of the park.

Mr. Lesage: The intention is to pass an order in council to revert these 13·3 square miles to the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Nowlan: Has the description been approved by the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Lesage: The description and boundaries have been worked out after consultation between officials of the government of Nova Scotia and my officials.

Mr. Nowlan: Can the minister explain the phrase "constant perpendicular distance of three hundred feet"?

Mr. Lesage: I cannot.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REGISTRATION, CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. 349, to amend the Canada Shipping Act—Mr. Marler—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Consular officer.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this bill was considered at some length in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines; and therefore the opposition do not feel that there is any necessity to take a great deal of time on it today. However, there were one or two amendments made in the committee and it would be helpful if the parliamentary assistant would explain these.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Chairman, before explaining the two amendments which were brought in by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, I wish to acquaint hon. members with the fact that the minutes of the proceedings of the committee were placed in the mail boxes of hon. members this afternoon, but there are some 25 copies on the Clerk's table available to hon. members at the present time. This bill was considered at great length by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and two amendments were made.

The amendments will be found in Votes and Proceedings of Friday, July 20. The first amendment has to do with clause 9 of the bill, which deals with section 119 of the act. As hon. members will recall, this clause deals with certificates of service granted to mariners who have demonstrated their ability to operate their vessels through actual experience but who because of lack of basic education are unable to pass the ordinary examination for a certificate of competency. Under the present section a mariner applying for a certificate of service is required to supply evidence of his service and pass a simple examination consisting of an eye test, knowledge of the fundamentals of the rules of the road and in the case of home trade vessels a knowledge of one-flag international signals.

There has always been an understandable reluctance on the part of many mariners, particularly older men, to appear before examiners, and many of them had not obtained their certificates before the expiration of the time limit. I should say that the section dealing with these certificates of service provides that the mariner shall have served as master of a home trade inland or minor waters vessel for a period of 12 months within a period of 10 years starting with 1948. The bill provided that this limit be extended indefinitely, and some objection was raised in committee to the fact that while a mariner might have acquired experience in waters such as the Newfoundland coastal waters or in the St. Lawrence he would have no experience, say on the west coast.

Therefore an amendment was moved in committee to the effect that the minister would be empowered to limit a certificate of service to waters described in that certificate. This was done by an amendment to subparagraph (c) of clause 9 amending section 119 of the Canada Shipping Act, which adds at the end of the subclause (c) the words "within the limits prescribed by the minister and specified in the certificate".

Following this first amendment to subclause 1, the wording in subclause 2 had to be changed somewhat. I should first explain that the previous subsection 2 said that the holder of a certificate for a vessel under 150 tons could on application be entitled to surrender his formal certificate and have this certificate endorsed so as to be good for ships of up to 350 tons. Since we are now limiting the application of these certificates to certain waters we could not have this provision in the new subclause 2, because it might not be in the interest of some holders of present certificates to obtain new certificates, which would be endorsed for ships of higher tonnage but limited to certain waters. Therefore it is for this reason, as hon. members will notice, that new subclause 2 as amended by the committee does not contain the provision that "the holder is entitled upon surrender thereof to be granted a certificate under subsection 1 for those waters."

That deals with the first amendment. The second amendment is a very simple one and it has to do with clause 25 of the bill. This clause was amended in order to further clarify the wording used in the first part of the clause. The amended clause reads as follows:

(1) The international convention for the prevention of pollution of the sea by oil, 1954, set out in the fourteenth schedule (hereinafter called the convention), is approved.

(2) The governor in council may make regulations—

Then (a), (b) and (c) follow. A period was added after "approved" in the original text, and the clause was divided into two subclauses, one dealing with the approval of the convention and the second giving power to the governor in council to make regulations. As I said, this is only a matter of further clarification of the wording of the clause.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Exemption from registry.

Mr. Green: Clause 2 makes a provision that ships from 10 to 15-ton registry shall no longer be required to effect registration under this act. Hitherto the exemption has been for ships under ten tons. This is only one of several changes made in the Canada Shipping Act by these amendments, which have the effect of lowering standards. I doubt very much the wisdom of doing that in connection with this act.

The Canada Shipping Act has been the basis of our marine law for many years. Before that we depended upon the merchant shipping act of the United Kingdom. The provisions, by and large, have stood the test of time. Yet here we are making a change so that it will be no longer necessary for ships from 10 to 15 tons to be registered. They will be thrown into the category of the smaller ships which are licensed and which number about 120,000—these, of course, are the small motor boats running around the Ottawa river, the Rideau canal and the various lakes in Canada—about 120,000 small boats licensed under the Canada Shipping Act, as distinguished from ships that are registered. From now on ships from 10 to 15 tons may come into that category. It will not be necessary to register them.

The parliamentary assistant told us in the committee that there are about 17,000 ships registered in Canada, as distinct from those that are licensed, and of that number 3,354 are in the category of from 10 to 15 tons, there being 857 on the west coast and 2,497 in the rest of Canada.

I am afraid this change is one that is unwise and really not necessary. We were told in the committee that it was done in order to cut out red tape. I suppose we should all be in favour of doing away with red tape in governmental activities, but this practice of registering ships has been a very important factor in our whole shipping picture. Apparently no shipping organization asked for the change. For example, neither the merchants' exchange in Vancouver nor any of the other organizations there interested in shipping asked for this change. Apparently it was requested by different individuals. I am wondering whether a good many of them are not owners of pleasure boats who did not want to be bothered registering their ships which might be from 10 to 15 tons. However, from now on it is not going to be necessary to register them, and in my opinion that breaks down the formalities of registration which have been in existence for so long.

The parliamentary assistant took the position in the committee that the department is not very particular about this amendment, and that if the committee saw fit to recommend going back to the old law, that is, that only ships under 10 tons should be exempt, there would be no objection from the department. I hope that since the sittings of the committee the department has had time to consider this matter further, and I would ask the parliamentary assistant now whether it would not be possible to leave the provision as it was before; as it is under the law at the present time. The present section 8 reads as follows:

> 8. Ships not exceeding ten tons register tonnage employed solely in navigation on the lakes, rivers or coasts of Canada and pleasure yachts not exceeding ten tons register tonnage wherever employed or operated are exempted from registry under this act.

I suggest that we would be wise to continue that provision rather than make the change contained in clause 2 of the bill.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): As I explained to the committee when the bill was considered there, this amendment is to provide that ships are exempted from the requirement to be registered if their net tonnage does not exceed 15 tons. Here we are dealing with net tonnage. The law as it stands puts that limit at 10 tons and we are now asking that it be raised to 15 tons. I wish to remind hon. members that owners of ships below 15 tons net tonnage will still have the privilege of registration if they wish to do so. Otherwise they must take out a licence, which involves a much simpler method. I also wish to repeat what I said in the committee, to the effect that this has nothing to do whatsoever with building standards and inspection requirements. The ships that are registered or licensed will be subject to the same requirements that apply to all other ships covered by the inspection regulations.

I also wish to add that in adopting the new limit we are following the same practice that has been adopted in the United States and in the United Kingdom. All we are doing is to relieve the owners of these small craft from the trouble of going through the complicated procedure of registration when we think that registration achieves no practical purpose. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra put it, and I think I used the same expression in the committee, all we want to do is to cut red tape and cut down on formalities when we are of the opinion that formalities and red tape achieve no practical purpose.

Moreover, in the committee I also gave figures indicating that even with the present exemption for ships below 10 tons net registered tonnage our list of shipping shows that well over 1,000 ship owners with ships below 10 tons have found it convenient to register them, and they are in fact registered and appear in our shipping list. Raising the exemption from 10 tons to 15 tons does not necessarily mean that all owners of ships between 10 tons and 15 tons will take advantage of the new limitation, but they will be at liberty to register or license their ships as they wish.

A while ago the figure of 3,000 ships was mentioned as being the number of ships which will be affected by the change, but it must be said that this is the number of ships between 10 and 15 tons net tonnage which are actually registered. The amendment of the provisions of the present section raising the limitation to 15 tons does not mean that these ships will automatically cease to be on the registry. They can be withdrawn from the registry only on application of the owner, and unless the owner takes that action the ships will continue to be registered.

As far as the attitude of the department is concerned, I expressed it in the committee when I stated that the department was not unduly insisting for this amendment, but I must say that we have since considered the remarks made in the committee and we have not been convinced that the amendment proposed in the bill should not be carried. We must bear in mind that the registry of these small ships involves a lot of work in the department, and if we can cut down that work when we think it is possible to do so without affecting the requirements of the department as far as inspection is concerned, I think we should do so. For these reasons I believe the proposed clause should remain as it is. As I said a moment ago, all we are seeking to do is cut down on red tape and formalities which achieve no practical purpose.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 25—Regulations.

Mr. Green: Clause 25 is the clause which deals with the international convention for the prevention of the pollution of the sea by oil, and that convention is included as a schedule to the bill. As the parliamentary assistant knows, section 495A does two things. In the first place it gives power to the governor in council to make regulations for carrying out the international convention which aims at preventing pollution of the sea by oil. In the second place it gives power to the governor in council to make regulations to prevent the pollution by oil from ships of any inland, minor or other waters of Canada. There are two distinct powers contained in section 495A.

I take it that it will be some time before the international convention becomes effective, and it is unlikely that there will be many cases under the convention off the coasts of Canada outside territorial waters. The parliamentary assistant has stated that the plan is to seek help from the navy and the air force—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): For enforcement.

Mr. Green: —in order to enforce the regulations, that is, to be able to prove that a ship has polluted waters within 50 miles of the Canadian shores. But the other powers are very important right now. As far as the west coast is concerned, as soon as publicity appeared concerning the prevention of pollution by oil there were favourable comments in all the Vancouver newspapers. There we have had trouble for quite a number of years—I am sure the Minister of Fisheries will agree with me—caused by the pollution of the waters off our shores by oil, sometimes from ships and sometimes from refineries. I guess the worst case of pollution in Vancouver harbour was caused by a refinery.

I urge upon the parliamentary assistant that prompt action be taken to have regulations drawn up and put into effect dealing with the pollution of our own waters. It has become a great nuisance on the west coast, and I think the department should act quickly. I should like to know from the parliamentary assistant what the intentions of the department are in this regard. During the sittings of the committee I gained the impression that it might be some time before regulations were enacted. One cannot complain about that as far as the pollution of waters beyond our territorial waters is concerned. But with regard to pollution within our territorial waters there should be action now. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to let us know what the plans are in connection with that particular part of the problem.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): In answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra may I say this. As he himself must have noticed when the matter was before the standing committee, our officers of the steamboat inspection branch had already been busy working on the preliminary draft of these contemplated regulations. We expect that within three to four months from the time this legislation becomes law, these regulations will be finally drafted. The hon. member will also recall that in committee I stated that we would have to consult with the industry. I believe he will be pleased to hear me say that we have not waited for these regulations to be drafted and come into force before taking some action with respect to pollution. I have here a notice to ship masters which has just been handed to me. It bears the date of July 15, 1956 and reads as follows:

NOTICE

To ship masters

The discharge of oil from ships in the Port Alfred area—

This is in the case of Port Alfred. This is an example.

—is causing a serious pollution problem, resulting in serious damage—

Mr. Green: Where is that from?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That is from the Department of Transport. I was going to read the whole thing. Perhaps I had better start back at the beginning again:

The discharge of oil from ships in the Port Alfred area—

That is one of the national harbours board ports on the Saguenay river.

—is causing a serious pollution problem, resulting in serious damage to property and the ruination of bathing beaches.

You are requested, therefore, to refrain from the discharging of oil-contaminated ballast water or oil waste in any other form in the Saguenay river area.

This notice is dated July 15, 1956, and is signed "Deputy Minister, Department of Transport". It is just an example showing that we have already taken some action. We are doing this in respect of other ports also. This is just one example applying to the port of Port Alfred in the Saguenay river.

Mr. Green: It will be three or four months before the regulations are drawn up?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Yes.

Mr. Green: How long does the parliamentary assistant expect it to be before this international convention comes into force? It must be approved by a certain number of nations. Perhaps we could be told approximately when it is expected the convention will be in effect.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Chairman, I am told that is anybody's guess. I can make a guess. I would say twelve months. As the hon. member knows, it is rather hard to give a precise answer to the question just asked by the hon. member. I would say roughly twelve months.

Mr. Green: About a year?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Yes.

Mr. Green: In other words the international convention will be of no effect and our regulations passed to implement that convention will have no effect beyond territorial waters probably for at least a year?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Yes.

Mr. Green: What about the great lakes? My understanding is that this international convention does not cover the great lakes at all.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): No.

Mr. Green: So there may be oil pollution by ships in the great lakes provided it is not done within Canadian waters. Is that right?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That is right.

Mr. Green: Are any steps being taken by the government to negotiate with the United States a treaty or convention covering oil pollution by ships on the great lakes? That would seem to be necessary before the problem is met in that particular part of Canada.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): As I said in answer to the hon. member's previous question, we expect that regulations governing the waters which are excluded from the provisions of the convention will be ready in some four months' time. As regards the great lakes in particular, in committee I stated that we had had preliminary discussions with the United States authorities, and that we were asking for their co-operation in respect of the great lakes area and in respect of these inland waters bordering United States shores as well as Canadian shores.

Clause 26 agreed to.

On clause 27—Regulations.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few brief remarks to make. The information the parliamentary assistant gave us in committee was exceedingly interesting. I might say that the suggestions made by the parliamentary assistant with respect to making regulations under this section were, I thought, very excellent. In that respect I think the department should be commended.

However, there is one other thing I should like to mention and it is this. In the report of the committee I believe it will be found that the minister told us that eventually there were going to be three ships on the great lakes equipped with helicopters for search and rescue work; one on lake Ontario, one at the eastern end of lake Erie and one on lake Huron. When questioned about this matter the parliamentary assistant told us that the one on lake Huron was under contract now and would probably be ready in a year or two; that the one for lake Erie might not be ready for five years, though possibly it would be ready at some time sooner than that; and that the one for lake Ontario would be ready in the same length of time.

I should like to bring this matter to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. Every year there is a big death toll by drowning on the great lakes. Only two or three days ago eight people were drowned in Georgian bay, and there will be a bigger toll before the the summer is over. We all know that it is too late to do anything this summer, but surely by next summer something could be done.

I know it is not possible to get these ships equipped with helicopters by next summer. I would agree on that point. But could not some interim or substitute method of search and rescue be provided by next summer as a stop-gap to prevent these drownings, or to help in their prevention until these ships are ready? Could not greater use be made of the Royal Canadian Air Force or something of that nature until the Department of Transport ships are ready? These matters are always brought very forcibly to everybody's mind at this time of year, when practically every time you pick up a paper you find that there has been a drowning or a boat accident in the resort areas on the great lakes.

I wish the parliamentary assistant would consider the possibility—if not for this summer at least for next summer—of doing what I have suggested, until such time as these new ships are constructed for the department, namely to have some temporary additional search and rescue work done by the R.C.A.F. in co-operation with the Department of Transport or something like that. May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): We shall be very pleased to look into the situation which has just been brought to my attention.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Blackmore: Six o'clock.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that we are almost on the last clause but two, and unless there are lengthy remarks to be made perhaps we could try to clean it up.

Mr. Herridge: I am going to be only a minute or so. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member call it six o'clock.

Mr. Green: I want to ask a question later.

Mr. Hosking: We waited until eleven o'clock the other night. Five minutes will finish it.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I did not rise on section 1 because there was no necessity to do so, but I do want to say that the committee made a very comprehensive and complete study of this bill with the assistance of the parliamentary assistant and his officials. I think all the members of the committee recognize the competence with which the parliamentary assistant handled his end of the discussion. We are also indebted for the very clear-cut and informative answers we received to questions placed before the officials on various sections of the bill.

On the basis of our study of the bill in committee, and recognizing this as a technical subject in which we have to rely to a great extent on the experience and ability of the officials, this group supports this bill as a move in the right direction and something that will end up to the general advantage of the people of Canada.

We were particularly pleased by the introduction of section 27, which provides for the licensing of the operators of small boats on inland, minor and other waters. A number of the members of this group have noticed the increasing number of small boats on our various waters, and as in the case of the increasing traffic on our highways there is no question but that the time has arrived to have some regulation with respect to the licensing of boats and the licensing of operators.

We realize that legislation of this type is not going to be introduced suddenly and be functioning perfectly within a short time. We were therefore very pleased to learn that it is the intention of the department to implement the legislation gradually as the result of co-operation with launch clubs, yacht clubs and other persons who are interested in navigation and the operation of boats. We were also interested to learn that the department is doing something to educate the public, in the terms of the legislation, as to the necessity of licensing boats, and I presume they will do the same with respect to the licensing of operators. I think the small pamphlet that has been issued by the department is very excellent indeed. I think it is a very sound and democratic procedure to seek the co-operation of the people in the administration of legislation of this type, and I believe the department is to be complimented for adopting that approach to this situation.

During the discussion on this section there were some interesting remarks made concerning the question of life preservers. That subject was in the minds of a great many members of the committee as the result of some extremely unfortunate accidents that occurred in recent weeks. During the discussion some members of the committee cited their various personal experiences concerning life preservers that had been sold to people in various parts of Canada. I for one was very surprised to find that you can buy a life preserver marked "government approved". I personally thought it meant that the preserver was approved by the Department of Transport, but the committee learned it simply meant in some cases that it was approved by the provincial department of health as being new material, as in the case of a bed mattress. But that is not of much concern for your health if you happen to drown when you are wearing the preserver.

In that connection we in this group think the department should do everything possible to inform the public of the situation with respect to life preservers, and ask that they only purchase life preservers which have the approval of the Department of Transport if they wish to be safe when they are on the water.

In that respect we urge a continuing educational program as far as the operators of boats and the public generally are concerned. We think the department should do everything it can to co-operate with the manufacturers. I am sure that when the public and manufacturers and all concerned understand the situation it will not be too long before the public in its own interest and the manufacturers in their interest will co-operate with the Department of Transport for the greater safety of those who travel on our beautiful lakes, rivers and other bodies of water.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I have just one brief question. During the hearings before the committee the parliamentary assistant told us that we were going to start hearing representations from boating clubs, yacht clubs, manufacturers and various individuals with respect to forming a good and practical set of regulations for small pleasure boats on the great lakes and other minor waters of Canada. I believe this question was asked before, but I would like to reassure myself concerning this matter. When does the department plan to commence holding these hearings before the committee?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I am sorry; would you mind repeating your question?

Mr. Nesbitt: I was just asking the parliamentary assistant when the officials of the Department of Transport plan to commence holding hearings of representations from small boat owners, yacht clubs, manufacturers, and so on?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Before answering this question, Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for his kind remarks. I wish to assure him that the officials of the department and myself were most pleased to be of assistance to the committee when it considered this bill.

Turning now to the question I have just been asked regarding the meetings and consultations we are going to have with the boating organizations and with all those interested in boating in Canada before the regulations are drafted, I must tell the hon. member we are going to contact them and seek their suggestions as soon as this bill becomes law.

Mr. Green: Am I to take it there will be no regulations in effect before the remainder of this boating season; is that right?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): As I said in committee, we are planning to send out a questionnaire to all these organizations I have just mentioned and to all those who have shown an interest in these proposed regulations. We are planning to hold meetings and discussions some time in the fall; therefore it is extremely unlikely that these regulations will be in force during the present season.

Mr. Green: Can the parliamentary assistant give us an estimate of how many licenses it will be necessary to issue to operators of these small boats?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): There are some 100,000 boat licenses issued in Canada; so if you take it as an average that there are two operators per boat who are going to seek such a license, you can roughly estimate the number of operators licenses to be issued at something in the neighbourhood of 200,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: One further question, Mr. Chairman. During the sittings of the committee the parliamentary assistant told us, as I understand it, that they were considering licensing boats other than those equipped with 10 horsepower motors. If that is the case, would the remarks of the parliamentary assistant apply if it is decided as a result of these hearings to license boats with motors of less than 10 horsepower?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): As I said in the committee, it is rather difficult for me to give any definite commitments as to what the regulations, which have not yet been drafted, are going to contain; but there is a possibility that we will require that the operators of boats with engines of less than 10 horsepower be licensed. There is a definite possibility of that.

Clause 28 agreed to.

On clause 29—

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is the clause which adds to the Canada Shipping Act as the fourteenth schedule the international convention for the prevention of pollution of the sea by oil, 1954. That conference was held from April 26, 1954, to May 12, 1954, and I notice in article 15 the following provision appears:

> The present convention shall come into force 12 months after the date on which not less than 10 governments have become parties to the convention, including five governments of countries each with not less than 500,000 gross tons of tanker tonnage.

Can the parliamentary assistant tell us how many governments have already become parties to this convention? Can he also tell us which countries have over 500,000 gross tons of tanker tonnage, and how many such countries are parties to the convention?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): So far the United Kingdom is the only country which has ratified the convention. In reply to the second question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the countries with more than 500,000 gross tanker tonnage are the United Kingdom, Norway, the United States, Holland and France.

Mr. Green: Are those the only countries which have over 500,000 tons of tanker capacity?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): There may be a few more, but I am sure those five have that tonnage.

Mr. Green: Am I to understand that although it is two years since the conference, the United Kingdom is the only country which has become a party to the convention?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That is right.

Mr. Green: Is there any prospect of the ten countries, including the five which have this gross tonnage of 500,000 tons in tanker capacity, becoming parties to the convention in the near future?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): We hope so. We are informed that the convention is being considered by the governments of a number of these countries.

Mr. Green: When the required number of countries have become parties to the convention, it will take a further period of 12 months before the convention comes into effect?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That is right.

Mr. Green: I notice that article VI of the convention refers to territorial waters. What does the Department of Transport consider to be the territorial waters of Canada?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Three miles.

Mr. Green: Here is another illustration of the need for Canada to make up her mind about her territorial waters. For several years the Department of Fisheries has been trying to get a definition of Canadian territorial waters which will meet the actual needs of the country today. We seem to go along year after year without making a decision on this point, expecting that some day there will be an international treaty under which all nations will agree to just what constitutes territorial waters.

From what I read about the situation there seems to be very little prospect of any agreement being reached on that point in the near future. In the meantime various countries are making declarations as to what they consider to be their territorial waters. I suggest to the Prime Minister that it is about time Canada made up her mind as to what Canadian territorial waters are to be. Here we are becoming a party to a convention which refers to territorial waters, and surely there should be some clarification of what this government considers to be Canadian territorial waters.

I believe the Prime Minister knows that on the east coast they are asking for a 12-mile limit. They are in trouble with their fisheries because there is no 12-mile limit and our fishermen are being unfairly treated. On the west coast we have the situation created by Hecate strait between the Queen Charlotte islands and the mainland of British Columbia. This should be considered Canadian territorial waters, yet these waters have not been positively declared as such.

Frankly I cannot see why the government delays in taking a stand on this question. I think it is just chasing a will o' the wisp to be waiting year after year for some kind of international agreement. I hope something will be done this year by the government, and that there will not be any further delay in reaching a decision as to just what constitutes Canadian territorial waters.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The matter is now under very active consideration. We do not want to make a declaration at this time which would call for contestation by our friends. We are endeavouring to arrange matters so that we can make our declaration and not have it contested by adjoining countries, and countries with whom we have always had cordial relations.

Mr. Green: When does the Prime Minister expect that this declaration will be made?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There is to be a discussion on this matter at the next general assembly of the United Nations. We hope that before that time we will be able to inform these adjoining and friendly powers of the position we are going to endeavour to promote at this meeting of the United Nations.

Mr. Green: Will that be made public at the time or will it all be confidential?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The communications we are having with these friendly powers at this time are confidential, but the agenda for the next meeting of the United Nations provides for a public discussion at which time we would be taking our position on several of the controversial points.

Mr. Green: Will that constitute a declaration by Canada as to what she considers her territorial waters to be?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I do not know that a declaration by Canada as to what she considers her territorial waters to be would advance us very much unless we got a recognition from others that they would respect those territorial limitations.

Mr. Green: Is it not a fact that quite a few other countries have made unilateral declarations as to what they consider their territorial waters to be, and apparently in most cases those declarations are respected by other nations?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): They are not; they are contested. The matter is being considered now by an international committee which was set up by the United Nations and which will be making its report. I hope and expect there will be discussion on that report, at which time many governments will be making their positions clearly known.

Mr. Hees: I gather from what the Prime Minister said that at the United Nations the Canadian government would try to indicate, would endeavour to propose—

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Would endeavour to promote an international theory as to the extent of territorial waters and the way in which they are to be determined from point to point.

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister is saying that at this international gathering we would endeavour to propose. What in the world is stopping Canada from standing on her two feet and making a proposition? Why do we have to endeavour to propose?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Because of the number of divisions we have in our armed forces. We do not want to start a war. We think the method we are following is the one that is most apt to get recognition without any conflict as to what will be regarded internationally as the territorial waters.

Mr. Hees: There are two different things. One is making a declaration of something you are going to do, and another is making a proposition of what you think is a fair attitude. The Prime Minister said they were going to endeavour to make a proposal.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Not endeavour to make a proposal.

Mr. Hees: You cannot stand up and make a proposal regarding what Canada thinks should or should not be done and ask other people in a straightforward manner whether or not they agree with that, or do we always have to be mealy-mouthed in our attitude to other nations?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We do not have to be mealy-mouthed, but we do not find that it would be of serious advantage to adopt the attitude of the hon. member.

Mr. Green: As I understand it, the Prime Minister is referring to discussions of this question which will probably take place in the general assembly of the United Nations later this year. I presume those discussions would be among all the nations that are members of the United Nations, but does that mean that no decision will be reached by Canada unless all these nations agreed to a definition of territorial waters?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Canada itself cannot enact international law, but Canada will use its best endeavours to get recognized as international law the principles for which we shall be contending.

Mr. Green: I should think it very unlikely that all these nations would reach any agreement, because they are so very far apart. As the Prime Minister knows, there are different limits set by many different nations. It is not a matter of war at all; it is simply a matter of what these nations consider to be their territorial waters. For example, I believe some of the nations in South America claim that their territorial waters run out for 200 miles. Will Canada not be in the position, if the Prime Minister's course is followed, that she simply goes to the meeting of United Nations and puts forward her suggestions; then, if no agreement is reached, shall we not be back exactly where we started?

Does there not come a time when Canada, as I believe Australia and many other nations have done, can and should say that Canada considers her territorial waters to be 12 miles from the shore line estimated in such and such a way? Will it not be necessary for Canada to take that step at some time, in any event, if there is ever to be any definition of Canadian territorial waters?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We shall certainly say what we consider should be regarded and recognized internationally as Canadian territorial waters, but we do not want to start something that we are not in a position to carry through. We shall have to have, not the unanimous consent of all the United Nations, but we shall have to have recognition by, for example, the authorities of the United States, the authorities of France and the authorities of those countries who have historic fishing rights on the great banks. We should have, by general recognition to make it regarded as binding upon all nations, acceptance of the decision that was rendered by the international court of justice with respect to the conflict between northern European countries and the United Kingdom. That has set a principle which we think should be applicable to our own shores. We think the conditions are such that the decision that was there rendered would apply to many parts of the Canadian shores, and we think this effort by the United Nations to clarify the international law in that regard is very much worth while.

Mr. Green: May I take it from the Prime Minister's replies that the Canadian government has already decided what it considers should be Canadian territorial waters?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. Green: —and is merely waiting for an opportunity to place that opinion before the general assembly of the United Nations?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I should not like to say that there has been a firm decision that may not be varied as a consequence of our conferring with the other nations, but we think, for example, that this decision of the international court of justice is applicable to most of our shore line. We think the 12-mile limit should be recognized, but we must admit that even if it is there are historic fishing rights that we shall also have to recognize within those territorial waters.

Mr. Green: Are those not separate things? Are not the historic fishing rights one thing and the question of territorial waters another thing?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It will be helpful, I think, to have those matters discussed at the same time and, in order to get recognition of our claims, to have our claims qualified by the knowledge given to those who might be disposed to contest them that it is not intended thereby to exclude the historic fishing rights that have been established over the centuries.

Mr. Barnett: While we are on this subject, I too should like to address a question to the Prime Minister about it. I have in my hand an extract from the Times of London for June 8 last, as quoted in the July 13 issue of the fisheries council of Canada Bulletin. This extract says in part:

> The international law commission today finally confessed its failure to be able to agree on a firm formula regulating the breadth of the territorial sea.

It goes on to set forth some details and then states:

> The commission recognizes that international practice is not uniform as regards the delimitation of the territorial sea. The commission considers that international law does not permit an extension of the territorial sea beyond 12 miles . . .

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

Then it goes on at the end of this extract to say:

> Members were probably influenced in their final vote by a serious warning sounded by Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice (United Kingdom) against a general licensing of the 12-mile limit.

In view of our close relationship with the United Kingdom within the commonwealth, and in view of the general expression of support for the 12-mile limit by the Prime Minister, I wonder whether he could tell us whether there are any direct discussions going on with the United Kingdom, and could he perhaps give us some information as to why apparently the United Kingdom is so much opposed to this extension, with which I think most of the people in this country agree?

Mr. McIvor: On a point of order, are not these territorial waters more a concern of the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. Green: On the point of order, this very convention we are considering refers to territorial waters, and this whole discussion has been completely in order, if the hon. member had only been listening.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I would not attempt to state what are the reasons of the United Kingdom for desiring to maintain the territorial waters within the three-mile limitation. They are probably the same reasons they had for supporting that stand before the international court of justice.

Mr. Barnett: My question was whether the Canadian government is carrying on any direct discussions with the United Kingdom on this subject with a view to perhaps laying the groundwork for some agreement in the general assembly.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There have been discussions with the authorities of the United Kingdom and there will continue to be further discussions, but the whole matter will probably be threshed out publicly in the discussion of the report of the international commission that has been set up.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the fact that certain South American countries such as Peru and Chile, I believe, have made unilateral declarations extending their territorial waters up to 200 miles, would the Prime Minister tell us whether or not, in view of the talks that have taken place, the government would consider suggesting that Canada's territorial waters extend beyond the 12-mile limit?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, I do not think we would venture to claim that the territorial waters extended beyond the 12-mile limit. We would not think there would be very much chance of having that recognized internationally, in spite of the declarations that have been made by some of the South American countries.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Prime Minister what the stand of the government is with regard to Hecate strait?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I cannot make any formal statement. There are these several questions about which we do not think it would be advisable to take a stand publicly that would be apt to be controversial before there is this opportunity to have a general discussion of the report of this international commission of experts.

Mr. Hees: I take it from what the Prime Minister has said that at this United Nations meeting the Canadian government is going to put forward the suggestion that foreign draggers stay outside of our 12-mile limit.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There will be qualifications to that attitude because of the historic rights that have to be recognized with respect to the waters bordering our shores.

Mr. Hees: Does that mean that anybody now fishing within our 12-mile limit is going to be allowed to continue to do so?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Chairman, it does not mean that and it does not mean the contrary. It does not make any assertion whatsoever in that regard. That matter will be considered when there has been a sufficient recognition of the 12-mile limit for territorial waters.

Mr. Hees: Then could the Prime Minister just say simply what it does mean?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It means that the question is not yet one that is determined satisfactorily under international law.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): When shall this bill be read the third time?

Mr. Green: Next sitting.

Some hon. Members: Now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Next sitting of the house.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 418, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Harris—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Income Tax Act

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, in a sense I am fishing outside the territorial waters of second reading. I began to speak just before the motion for second reading was carried, and by arrangement it was agreed that I and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I believe, could carry on with a few general remarks on the first item.

I had been drawing attention to a number of examples of changes in the Income Tax Act which might very well have been considered by the banking and commerce committee had the bill been referred to that committee, where some of the ideas which originate in the house—and I think some very good ideas originate in the house with respect to income tax—might have been put forward and discussed and perhaps received more serious consideration than they do under the method now employed in making up the budget and the amendments to the Income Tax Act. The amendments in the bill are largely technical, and in so far as they are not they carry out the decisions of the minister as disclosed in the budget address.

I had indicated one weakness of our income tax legislation in comparison with others countries, namely that not enough consideration is given to the parents of children. Not enough deduction of taxable income is allowed for those who are raising children. Certainly we do not do as well in Canada as is the case in other countries. I had cited the example of Great Britain.

I now refer to one oddity of the act. If a man is fortunate enough to have a child toward the end of the year he is immediately entitled to family allowance with respect to that child, and the deduction from his taxable income which he is entitled to receive goes down from the $400 for a child not receiving the family allowance to $150 for a child who is getting the family allowance with the odd result that although only one instalment of family allowance may be paid for that child, that is, the December payment, the father loses $250 by way of deduction from income and gains only one small payment of $5 per month by allowance. That is a rather Irish way of putting it but that is the effect of the regulations as they are because there is a great difference between the amount allowed as a deduction and the tax payment received in the case of a child in receipt of family allowance and one which is not. It makes a difference of perhaps $45 to a parent in that particular circumstance.

Another type of exemption which it seems to me could well be considered by the committee is the encouraging type of exemption which would permit the father of a family or a householder who wants to see his child educated in a good school to deduct the school taxes which he pays to another governmental authority. I have raised this point before and I raise it again. It seems to me it is one that deserves serious consideration, particularly in the light of the responsibilities which municipalities have now and which they will have to load on the home owner. It would not result in the loss to the treasury of a great deal of revenue and it would be easing the lot of the parents of children who, as I say, are not as well dealt with under our income tax law as they are in some other countries.

Another sort of exemption which would be good and which would be an encouragement to the enterprise of our people is an exemption which would allow a family to deduct from taxable income the amount paid for medical and health insurance. Certainly it is a problem which is receiving consideration. The problem of health insurance is one that receives consideration from all levels of government, and it is a big issue. But it seems to me it would be an encouragement to those who are prepaying their medical and hospital costs if they were allowed to deduct those payments from their taxable incomes. It would not be difficult to work out an arrangement by which medical expenses, which are now deductible if they are more than 3 per cent of income, or prepayments on insurance of this kind could be deducted, depending on whichever was the larger.

Another item with which I want to deal I can leave until clause 3 is reached, because it relates to the change in the exemptions allowed to the teaching clergy. However, there is one other item with which I wish to deal and that is the position of the self-employed. I wish to say a few words again about that issue, because it has again escaped the attention of the minister in his revision of the numerous sections which deal with approved pension plans. I see that they are now called registered pension plans. There are quite a number of provisions in the act dealing with them, but there is no relief for the self-employed. There is no correction of the injustice which has been pointed out time and time again in this house, and which has been the subject of representations to this government for at least ten years. I refer to the injustice which exists as between the position of those who are employed and are on payrolls and that of those who are working for themselves, with respect to the pension fund savings which they are permitted to make and to deduct from their taxable incomes.

I want to bring to the attention of the committee the people who are involved in this issue. They are the self-employed, the people who are in the professions and those who are working for themselves, such as the farmers and so on. They are set out in the very excellent table of statistics which the Minister of National Revenue produces each year. I refer to "Taxation Statistics" for 1955. At page 9 each profession and occupation is listed separately, beginning with the medical doctors and surgeons. There were 10,000 of those who paid income tax in Canada in the year ended 1953, which is the last year for which figures are given. They are not all the doctors, because there are upwards of 14,000 in the country, but 10,000 of them are in the income brackets and they paid on an average of $11,000 of income each in the year 1953.

Their case is, I think, quite a special one, and it was presented to the government not so long ago in a brief of the Canadian Medical Association in which the argument I think is stated very clearly and very well. They say that over the past ten years repeated representations have been made by the medical association separately and jointly with other professional associations to the effect that self-employed taxpayers should be entitled to make provision for their own retirement. Such encouragement could best be demonstrated by permitting income tax deferment on personal purchases of annuities and other retirement funds in the same manner that now applies to approved pension plans.

The committee well know that the approved pension plans are available only to people who are employed, who are on payrolls. They can set aside up to $1,500 of their own earnings and their employers can put in an equivalent amount, making a total of $3,000 with respect to current purchase of pension rights for the future. That is all deducted from the income on which the employee and employer pay taxes in the current year. The fact is that an employed man, when he is at the height of his earning ability, is able to put aside money on which he has not been taxed for a pension which will be paid to him when he has retired and when he will be taxed at a much lower rate. The case for the medical profession seems to me to be particularly good.

Mr. Fulton: Not only the medical profession; every other profession.

Mr. Michener: I shall come to the others. Of all the professions, the medical profession must have the longest period of training and they have the shortest period of high earning capacity. On the average I think they get into practice at about 32 years of age. They have perhaps about 25 years in which to establish themselves, earn their living and provide for their old age. It is unfortunate if they are not to be allowed the privileges which under the present legislation are allowed to their fellow practitioners who undertake to work for a clinic or in some place where they receive a salary.

The next group mentioned is that of consulting engineers and architects. Then we come to lawyers and notaries. No one has much sympathy for them; nevertheless they constitute an appreciable number in the community. Then we come to accountants, of whom there are some 2,600; dentists, of whom there are 4,460; osteopaths and chiropractors, of whom there are 1,400; and business proprietors of whom there are 167,250. These are the men who take the risk of entering into business on their own account and of making a failure of it. Next we come to salesmen, of whom there are approximately 39,000; forestry operators, of whom there are approximately 1,700; other professionals, 2,700; entertainers, 1,900; farmers, 69,200. That is not many farmers. Those are the farmers who pay income tax. In Canada there are 545,000 farmers and stock raisers to whom the changes which I suggest would apply if and when they are in the taxable income range. Then we come to unclassified taxpayers and finally to nurses, of whom there are 3,720. If one deducts from the total number of taxpayers in Canada in that year—which was about 3,400,000—those who are employees, namely about 3 million, we have left a difference of about 400,000 persons who are self-employed and are paying income tax. They are the people who deserve the consideration for which I am asking tonight.

I have here the amount of income produced by unincorporated business in 1955. Farm operators, from farm production, produced revenue of $1,421 million; non-farm and unincorporated business—that is the other self-employed—produced $1,753 million. That is a total of over $3 billion out of a national income of over $20 billion. They contributed in all about 15 per cent of our national prosperity. They are the people who are suffering under the disability which I may say is a continuing injustice.

I hope the minister will take this matter under consideration for next year. Unless there is some argument which I have never heard I can see no justification for continuing the practice which has been accepted in this country for some years. The answer given has been that there are administrative difficulties. But let me point out to the committee that this year Great Britain has solved the administrative difficulties. When I spoke on this matter previously the British committee under Mr. J. Millard Tucker, Q.C., had reported and recommended a method of dealing with the administrative problems. There was a second Tucker committee, and I should like to advise the house of what has been done in the present year in Great Britain. They have at last found an answer to this problem. I think I have a quotation here from Right Hon. Harold Macmillan, chancellor of the exchequer of Great Britain. This is from the Financial Post of June 23, 1956. It is in an article written by Mr. Donald Robertson, a very good article, on this problem. He quotes the British chancellor of the exchequer as saying:

> I propose to give effect, though in a simplified and modified way, to the recommendations of the second Millard Tucker committee on relief to the self-employed in respect of provision for retirement. This will grant relief from income tax and surtax within certain limits in respect of premiums paid to provide a deferred annuity on retirement.
> It will apply to professional men in practice, to individuals and partners in businesses which are not companies, to controlling directors of companies and finally to employees who are not entitled to any benefit under schemes set up by their employers.

The article goes on to say:

> Stating that a condition of tax relief would be that benefits secured by premiums be payable as annuities and not as lump sums, Mr. Macmillan said that tax exemptions would be limited to pension contributions not exceeding £500 or 10 per cent of earned income in any one year. Beneficiaries, he thought, would range from city accountant to village grocer.

That was described, Mr. Chairman, as a measure of simple fiscal justice, and that is what we lack in this country, simple fiscal justice on this particular issue. I believe that in the course of the debate the limit of £500 of income which self-employed might save has been raised to £750, but I am not sure whether the matter has been finally disposed of. However, there is a serious attempt to deal with what so far has been an insoluble problem to the Minister of Finance and his predecessor. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, it is high time that the issue be met squarely and fairly, and this measure of injustice and discrimination which has been left in our income tax law and has become of very considerable proportions should be eliminated without further delay.

I should like to deal with another matter, but I shall reserve that until clause 3 of the bill is reached.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure that I shall be making the same speech now that I would have made when we were on second reading, when the hon. member for St. Paul's and I agreed to let that pass. A lot of water has gone under the bridge since then. However, I have one or two matters that I should like to bring to the attention of the committee and of the minister on the consideration of this bill, which involves, as somebody suggested, a variety of amendments to the Income Tax Act.

I think perhaps clause 1 of this particular bill has some rather interesting material in it. I note, for example, this change which extends the phrase that requires the inclusion of the value of board and lodging to any other benefits of any kind whatsoever. Perhaps when we get into the detailed discussion of the bill the minister might be prepared to give us some reason for what appears to be a rather tightly drawn part of the act. Also in clause 1 is mentioned for the first time in the act, so far as I know, the matter of a supplementary benefit plan. I suppose that is one of the most important and in some ways interesting features of the Income Tax Act amendments this year, and certainly it is one that will be of great interest to the trade union movement across the country.

I would like to tell the minister that I have been having some discussions of this clause, pro and con, with one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and I have been rather inclined to defend the clause and say that it appeared to me to be a fairly satisfactory and fair arrangement. However, I should like to warn the minister that when we come to clause 19 of the bill he may have to do some explaining for the benefit of my colleague from Cape Breton South, because in the course of our private conversation he said to me—and I am going to quote him for the minister's benefit now—that he thought this description of the supplementary benefit plan was "wrapped in mystery, and like the language of Biblical parables was subject to as endless a variety of interpretations which later will be clarified by regulations written behind the scenes and which we will never see."

I thought at the outset of my remarks I should serve notice on the Minister of Finance that when we come to clause 19 he will have to give some particular clarification of it before the hon. member for Cape Breton South and myself are in complete agreement as to the meaning of this clause.

There are one or two points in this act that I have an interest in discussing, apart from the particular reference I have made so far to clause 1. One of them is the fact that in the province of British Columbia, and perhaps in other parts of the country as well, we have an increasing number of organizations which are setting out to provide housing for senior citizens. In this regard I should like to supplement the plea that I know has been made by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary in respect of some rethinking of the definition of what constitutes a charitable organization in this connection. Such an organization has been getting under way in the Alberni valley where I make my home, known as the Alberni valley memorial home society, which is set up as a community organization with participation by various local service clubs, trade unions, and other organizations of that kind, which are making contributions to this project. I have had sent to me a copy of a letter signed by the director of the legal branch and addressed to the secretary treasurer of this organization, which says:

> After careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that Alberni valley memorial home society does not qualify as a charitable organization within the meaning of the Income Tax Act and donations to it are not allowable deductions under the provisions of section 27 (1) (a) of the act.

Well, apparently that is the position that has been taken by the legal branch of the Department of National Revenue; therefore it leaves open to members who are interested in this matter only the recourse of suggesting to the Minister of Finance that consideration should be given to an appropriate amendment to section 27 (1) (a).

There is one other matter, Mr. Chairman, that I should like to touch upon briefly. It has been brought to my attention a number of times, and I believe it has been touched upon by some other members of the house. I refer to the problems that arise in respect of the financing of the education of university students by the students and their families. I am not going to deal with this at any great length at this time, but I do feel there would be a great deal of merit in considering a change in the allowable exemptions of these people under the act for students at recognized institutes of higher learning. There should be allowed to them at least in addition to the basic $1,000 exemption the amounts they are required to pay in university fees. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that this would be a very beneficial change for our young people, who would find it easier to finance themselves or for their families to finance them in respect of their university education.

There is one other matter, Mr. Chairman, and this with me is not a new subject; it is a subject I have taken up during the last two sessions, and both times the minister has told me "no". However, I am going to persist in bringing this matter forward as long as I am here and able to do so, until I feel some progress is made concerning what I have described as an injustice applied to those whose incomes are derived from wages and salaries in respect to deductions which are allowable for the expenses incurred in making a living.

I notice that in the Canada Gazette, part 1 of the July 21 issue, there is contained information bulletin No. 10 issued by the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue, from which it would appear, so far as this campaign which I and others, and certainly the trade union movement, have been conducting that perhaps we are going backward instead of forward.

While this information bulletin certainly does not change the existing law, it appears to be an indication that the Department of National Revenue is placing greater emphasis upon collecting every last allowable benefit that working people may have been receiving, and is making sure that employers do not allow employees any possible benefits in the way of free board or accommodation or transportation and so on even though they may have to travel a great distance from their homes in the course of earning their living. In one place it says:

> However, employees who are hired for the purpose of filling a specific job away from home are not regarded as travelling "in the course of their employment". They are not on travel status for their employer but are in the same position under the act as employees who have to leave their homes and go afield to get work.

I do not agree that this is always necessarily the case. I have drawn the attention of the minister before to the type of problem that exists on the British Columbia coast, where there is something more than the matter of employees having to go to jobs away from home. In this case they may have to travel back and forth several times during the year because of summer shut-downs for fire seasons or winter shut-downs because of snow.

Under circumstances like those it seems to me there is a need, in our logging industry and possibly in other industries where this business of travelling expense is something that is necessarily incurred while an employee is making his living, for reconsideration. As I mentioned before, the same situation applies in respect to any allowable deduction for tradesmen in regard to tools or special clothes. If these things are going to be allowed to farmers and fishermen and in the course of business expenses to corporations and individual businesses, there is no reason why under reasonable circumstances there should not be some provision whereby people on wages and salaries should not have the same sort of provision as this which applies in other connections.

While I am not too optimistic that the minister is going to get up and announce that he is prepared to move an amendment to the present bill, I feel there is an injustice under the present act, and it is certainly one which I intend to pursue with the minister as long as I have an opportunity of doing so.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, I shall defer any further remarks particularly with respect to the matter of the supplementary employment benefit plan until we get further into the details of the bill. These two or three points I wanted to raise prior to the committee stage, and I am very glad to have had the opportunity of discussing them tonight.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of questions I would like to direct to the minister on clause 1. In the first place the term "registered pension" appears throughout the bill to have taken the place of the words "approved superannuation". I would like the minister to explain why the change was made and what necessitated it. My second question is this. What type of benefit has the department in mind when it uses the phrase "of any kind whatsoever"?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, concerning the first question the change of the wording to "registered pension" is to overcome the misunderstanding which I think has arisen over the use of the word "approved" in the present act. We do not approve pension plans as such. All that the Department of National Revenue does is to register pension plans whereunder the employer may be entitled to deduct certain payments made into the fund for income tax purposes. On the other hand, the use of the word "approved" would indicate that we had in some manner indicated approval of the plan itself, and we are trying to avoid that in what we are doing here.

With respect to the other question, we have in mind other forms of benefits that might be derived in the normal course of employment other than board and lodging. I think the hon. lady will understand, because she is well acquainted even with the law, that there is a rule that provides that when you use such words as "board and lodging and such other benefits" you are confining yourself nevertheless to board and lodging and some similar benefits, whereas there might be a benefit in connection with the employment quite apart from board and lodging which ought to be taxed, and that is the provision which we are making here.

Mrs. Fairclough: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am concerned as usual with the advantageous position in which certain corporations and their employees are placed in comparison with self-employed persons. I am presuming that the minister it talking about such things as golf club memberships and so on.

Mr. Harris: No, not quite that, although that might be it. An example would be the free use of motor cars and things of that kind which are taxed; some similar benefits of that nature.

Mrs. Fairclough: Let us take the cost of service club fees. If a corporation is large enough it may pay the fees of as many of its employees as can qualify for membership in as many service clubs as happen to be in that particular district. These men who are working for a large corporation are deemed to be carrying out the service of their company, and quite rightly so; because undoubtedly they would not of their own volition belong to these clubs which are strictly on a classification basis. However, a self-employed person who likewise belonged to a service club for precisely the same reason an employee of a large corporation belongs to it is not permitted the deduction of those fees.

In my estimation that is not right. What is approved for one should be approved for the other. You may say, truly enough, that the individual who works for a corporation receives no personal advantage and I agree; and you might also say that the individual who works for himself does receive some personal advantage. The individual who works for himself may have some personal advantage; nevertheless he loses a great deal.

The same is true of the operation of a motor vehicle. A person may use an automobile registered in the name of an unincorporated company 99 per cent for company business, but the law says that if he does not possess another motor car he is deemed to use that car 25 per cent for personal use. Where a corporation makes a motor car available to an employee for his own use that employee has nothing whatsoever added to his salary for the advantage he gains from the use of that car, and the company is permitted to charge as a deduction the cost of operation and depreciation.

Those are the three things which come immediately to mind, but I know there are many others. There are dues for golf clubs, dues for service clubs and the cost of operating motor vehicles. I know from personal experience that the self-employed person is at a considerable disadvantage as compared with the person employed by a corporation.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Harris: Beginning at the last and working backward, where an employee of a corporation is allowed the use of a motor vehicle, that is added to his income for taxation purposes. It may well be true that in some cases the hon. member may know of the zealous Department of National Revenue not being able to find it, but in fact it is being done at the present time.

With respect to fees for service clubs, memberships and matters of that kind, it has always been thought that those would be an expense of the business concerned but they are not added to the income of employees, as the hon. member has indicated, in the case of corporations. I would suggest that the amendment before the committee at the present time may permit that to be done.

Mrs. Fairclough: That does not give any advantage to the self-employed person who has all these expenses added to his personal income.

Mr. Harris: There would be no disadvantage, because if you allow it as an expense to the corporation and charge it as income to the employee, there is no discrimination against the self-employed.

Mrs. Fairclough: How can the minister account for the wholesale resignations from service clubs of persons who were members as representatives of their respective businesses, but who found the fees were added to their incomes for taxation purposes?

Mr. Harris: I think the service clubs will maintain their present membership, because most members really feel it is an advantage both to themselves and to the community to belong to such clubs.

Mr. Campbell: I was hoping the minister would comment on one point brought out by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that is the matter of donations to housing or co-operative bodies which are being set up for the purpose of providing low rental accommodation for older citizens. Such donations are not allowed as deductions for income tax purposes. Would the minister comment as to why this is not being done, and if there is not some way these bodies can get around the present act?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. gentleman, in particular the subject which he has brought to my attention. The real difficulty here is that to all outward purposes these companies which negotiate loans or arrangements with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to build tenements or homes for older people have on the face of it a profit motive. I think everyone realizes that there is no profit, at any rate not in the present, although there may be in the distant future if in due course Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are paid off. We would then have a building on which there was little or no debt, and at that point presumably profit would enter into the picture to the benefit of those persons who constitute the corporation.

On the other hand I am free to confess that if there were not such a possibility of profit we could very well consider that this might be held to be a charitable donation and therefore exempt under the act. All I can say at the moment is that I have been considering the point and will continue to do so. If some of the doubts which I now have can be overcome perhaps I may be able to say something about it.

Mr. Leboe: This clause contains the words "of any kind whatsoever" and it seems to me that we are entering a really dangerous field. Somewhere along the line somebody is going to have to put a price tag on these services. For instance quite often the people living in logging camps are supplied with free wood and free light from the power plant, as well as other services. Somebody is going to have to put a price on those services. It seems to me that the thing is wide open, and it should be spelled out more firmly than it is.

Mr. Monteith: What about firemen and policemen who wear uniforms which are usually purchased as a group? Is it intended to cover that by the phrase "of any kind whatsoever"?

Mr. Harris: No. Firemen and policemen and the like are not charged income tax on the value of their uniforms, and it is not intended to do so.

Mrs. Shipley: I was quite interested in the remarks of the hon. member for St. Paul's with respect to professional men, and making contributions to pension funds deductible. I submit that the self-employed person should have the same benefit as the person employed by others, but there is one particular group which I think deserves special consideration, and I refer to the medical profession. When I speak of the medical profession I am not including dentists. It is well known that some medical men make high incomes, but some do not. Generally those in the lower brackets are the hardest worked. Many of them work 18 hours a day to make the incomes they do.

I realize that in the large cities it is sometimes difficult to get a doctor after hours, as it were, but that is not so in the smaller communities. Doctors there work late at night, and when a doctor is sure the case is an emergency he will go out in the middle of the night. I know from actual experience that many doctors work 18 hours a day and are on call 24 hours a day. It seems to me that if any concession is to be made, this group of professional men should receive special consideration.

Included in professional men we have lawyers. Personally I like lawyers as individuals, but it seems to me they are the one group of professional men that have a terrific advantage. They never have to work after hours, except those who are members of parliament and take their duties so seriously that they are here some Fridays and some Mondays. They may work after hours, but if they do it is by desire, because nobody is going to die through not having a lawyer. The rates of pay received by most professional men are as high, and a great deal higher in many cases. I am particularly thinking of the legal rates of pay. That seems to me almost a cartel or a combine; I do not know the exact word for it. However, the fee for the time involved is very great; often it is a percentage of the business.

Medical men get a certain fee; they are obliged by their oath to work at any time of the day or night, and they do. It seems to me that they, above all other professional groups—and I have no objection to all the other professional groups having this concession—should be entitled to this concession first, and then let it be spread out.

When I started to speak, I said I did not include the dentists in the medical profession. I like dentists as much as lawyers, as individuals; but it is a common practice today following extractions, if there is any bleeding or complication and you do succeed in locating your dentist, for him to say, "Call your doctor." That is a common practice throughout Canada today. I like to see them all happy but let us start with the medical profession first.

Mr. Barnett: While the legal brethren are recovering their breath from the effects of the remarks of the hon. member for Timiskaming, I should like to come back for just a minute to the question reintroduced by the hon. member for The Battlefords.

From what the minister says, I think that he would agree as regards the people who are contributing to the projects that we are discussing for providing housing, their gifts at the local level to get the project started are free-will gifts. Therefore there is a case for them to be regarded as charitable donations. I was wondering if the societies were to include a clause in their charters which would make it very clear that there was to be no profit, a clause that would require that any surplus that might accumulate at a later time would be reinvested in improvements or expansions of that particular project, whether that might simplify the question of having the contributors to those organizations qualify on the charitable donations.

Mr. Harris: May I point out that I thought we had passed through the general discussion, and that we were now confining ourselves to the actual clauses before us. However, just to answer my hon. friend's question, that is one of several ways that has occurred to us to consider the matter; but my hon. friend, I think, can take it from me that we are considering all the alternatives to see whether there is some plan that will meet the case. If I might say so, I would rather not discuss it further, because we should like to get on with the clauses.

Mr. Leboe: I must come back to this question again. I am not quite satisfied yet. I am thinking now of the passes, for instance, that are granted to railway employees and employees of various companies in the transportation business, including T.C.A. and C.P.A. Surely we are leaving this too wide open. I should like the minister to say something on this and clear the matter up for me. I am not referring to members of parliament, because they come under the Railway Act and it is not passes that they or members of the Senate have, but it is other people who have passes. It would seem to me that they would be required possibly to say, "We had so many passes that were worth so much."

Mr. Harris: I hope the hon. member will not put ideas into my head. I have no intention of taxing the value of free passes on the railways available for railway employees. If I did that I would feel that I should have to tax the free passes of members of parliament as well. So in those circumstances I am sure my hon. friend would let it go at that.

Mr. Leboe: I should like to, but it was pointed out several times in the committee that any words that are said on the floor of the house or in committee have no bearing on the interpretation of the act. That being the case, it seems to me that it is too broad when it says "any kind whatsoever". Though the minister might give an undertaking here, I do not think, from my experience and from what I was told very plainly by one of the ministers, that means a thing. It is the interpretation of the act. I do not feel satisfied in that regard. I think the act is fully spelled out there.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Harris: It is not, and that is why we are trying to extend it. There are some quite obvious things, such as the hon. member for Hamilton West has mentioned, which ought to be taxed; but there are those such as my hon. friend has mentioned that will not be. If it should happen that, using this broad clause, we get into a field where hon. members feel we should not be, this would be the place to attend to it; but under the present circumstances I can only suggest to the hon. member that there are benefits on which people ought to pay, and that is the purpose of the particular amendment.

Mr. Barnett: As I understand it the act as it now stands reads "board, lodging and other benefits". I wish the minister could explain a little of what difficulties the department has run into in a reasonable interpretation of what are "other benefits", because this matter in a way is related to some of the other things I have been discussing.

The hon. member for Cariboo, I think quite rightly, has pointed out that in the outlying districts where facilities are provided by companies in the logging and mining business and occupations of that kind, there are certain things on which the hon. member mentioned putting a value. One of the concerns I have is that some of these companies may use this legislation to put on an arbitrary dollar value and start charging their employees or making deductions for things which by custom over a long period of years in the type of industry to which I have been referring have been provided as perhaps an inducement to people to go out to the more isolated and pioneering parts of the country.

"Of any kind whatsoever" is very broad. Whilst the minister says if this creates a difficulty he will be glad to consider it, nevertheless it might be much easier to consider the implications now before it becomes law than to wait till it has to come back here as the result of people crying about various injustices, and perhaps wait for the accumulation of quite a volume of them before anything is done about it. I wish the minister could give us some information as to why this change is deemed to be necessary.

Mr. Harris: I have given one example which I think is a good one, and that is the use of motor cars. There is no real provision in the act whereby we can assess for the use of motor cars except under a clause such as that which we are now placing before the committee. I think my hon. friend would agree with me that where an employee of a company is allowed a free motor car, or there is some arrangement made whereby he gets an advantage which you and I do not because we have to pay for our motor car, he should be taxed for it. A very strict construction of the words as they are now, "board, lodging and other benefits" may not include that because the words "other benefits" may relate directly to board and lodging and would not extend to cover motor cars. The purpose of the amendment is to take care of that type of thing. I do not suppose we will go to the limit at all that my hon. friend has suggested, but there are far more obvious advantages of a greater value that go to people and which ought to be taxed.

Mr. Barnett: On the basis of the experience accumulated by the Department of National Revenue would there not be some advantage in adding a specific category? Would it not be enough for present purposes to add a suitable phrase to cover the question of transportation facilities? If other instances occur of real abuse of this provision then they could be added on the basis of experience, instead of creating a situation where someone in the field may get a wrong idea as to just how that should be interpreted.

Mr. Fleming: In reply to various questions as to what it is the minister has in mind that he is seeking to achieve by the inclusion of the words "of any kind whatsoever" he has several times given one example, namely some benefit in relation to the use of a motor car. If there are other benefits that are within the contemplation of the government in introducing this measure then I think the committee should be told, but if only one has come to light and is in the mind of the minister now then it seems to me he has not made out a case for introducing wide words such as "of any kind whatsoever". If it is simply a matter of reaching motor car benefits, why should that not be spelled out specifically in the clause?

I think the discussion tonight must indicate very clearly that there are many hon. members who approach the amendment with a good deal of apprehension, because no one sitting here tonight can fully conceive what may arise some time and what may be included within these very broad words that we are being asked to include in the section. The words of the present section have been there for some years. The Department of National Revenue has had a good deal of experience with them, and I think we should be told tonight what are the specific benefits that are thought now not to be within the scope of the taxing provision, which ought to be; and we should be told the full list of them. Then we can judge every one of them on its merits.

If we are told of others it may be that hon. members will not think they are the sort of benefits that ought to be included within the scope of taxable income. So far we have heard of only one example, and I say to the minister that if it is the only case that has arisen in the experience of the department the proper way to deal with that case is by a specific amendment, and not by including words of completely unlimited effect. One cannot imagine broader words than those, "of any kind whatsoever", and I think the reluctance indicated in the discussion thus far on the part of hon. members to include words of such broad effect is a very understandable reaction, when we are given only one example of what they might be applied to.

Mr. Monteith: To follow that up, I think it has become the practice of the Department of National Revenue to interpret the act strictly as it is worded. If these words, "of any kind whatsoever", are included, what alternative are they going to have to taxing everything that can possibly be included, even uniforms of firemen, policemen and every other kind of item? More than once, and particularly in the estimates committee this year when considering the estimates of the Department of National Revenue, the department has pointed out how its hands are tied by the wording of the act. They say they have no alternative but to follow the wording of the act. It appears to me that they are not going to be given much alternative.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Chairman, there is one point that crops up at this time. I presume the minister is aware that employees of the C.N.R., for instance, are normally allowed about 10 per cent of their gross earnings for away from home expenses. I have had experience in helping fill out income tax returns for men on the C.N.R., and as long as the returns were sworn to they had no difficulty in having their away from home expenses deducted from their gross earnings, provided their expenses did not exceed 10 per cent. I am wondering how this regulation will affect that practice, which has already been adopted and more or less tacitly acknowledged by the department.

One thing that comes to mind as I look at the act is who gets it in the neck every time there is an amendment to the Income Tax Act. It is the workingman, and this is just another case where the workingman is going to be further punished by another change in the act. The hon. member for Timiskaming spoke of professional people. I happen to be a lawyer myself, but I have no sympathy at all for the way professional men may be treated under the Income Tax Act.

Who is the man who has to suffer by reason of our income tax laws? It is the workingman. When he goes on a vacation he is not in the same position as the professional man. He cannot offer the excuse that he is going to attend a convention and therefore claim his expenses as a deduction. I see that professional people are now allowed two conventions a year instead of one. The workingman is not allowed any conventions or any vacation expenses. Every time we turn around we find amendments being made which further cripple and hurt the workingmen of Canada. I think it is time we had another look at the situation.

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend has not taken time to look at the act or he would not have spoken as he has. There is a special provision in the Income Tax Act for the employees of the C.N.R. and other transportation companies to whom he has referred, and this clause does not refer to them at all.

To answer the hon. member for Eglinton, I do not suppose I could make a case on motor cars without also making a case on a number of other things, but it does seem that in a very short time we have turned from wanting to have this imposed as a tax on people to not wanting it. The hon. member for Hamilton West thought we should use this provision for the purpose of charging income tax on certain benefits that were obtained, and now my hon. friend seems to think we should not.

Mr. Fleming: In fairness I think I should say that the hon. member for Hamilton West was seeking to terminate the discrimination which exists in practice.

Mr. Harris: And the way to do that is to charge income tax on the benefits received by the employee. Now, there have been cases—

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister permit a question at that point?

Mr. Harris: Certainly.

Mr. Fleming: Does the minister not consider that the present section is broad enough to permit the inclusion within taxable income of that kind of benefit without any amendment?

Mr. Harris: No; that is the point of the amendment. It does not. It refers to "board, lodging and other benefits" and that means other similar benefits.

Mr. Van Horne: Does the minister not recognize that this clause will affect the provision regarding transportation company employees?

[Mr. Van Horne.]

Mr. Harris: There is no conflict. May I say that where there is a specific clause dealing with the costs of persons engaged in transportation, the law is in that section and not in a general section such as this. There have been cases where companies have paid the insurance premiums of their executives, have sought to have those as deductions and have objected to them being charged as income to the executives. There have been cases where they have supplied free furniture, free refrigerators, free things of that kind. These all ought to be added as income to the person receiving them.

Mr. Monteith: May I point out that I know many cases where the insurance premium paid on the life of an executive has been charged back to that executive as income.

Mr. Harris: I am glad to know that.

Mr. Monteith: And some of these other things that you mentioned.

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend will join with me in hoping that this will cover the particular case.

Mr. Monteith: It is covered now in this particular instance, or at least the Department of National Revenue has claimed it is covered.

Mr. Harris: That may well be.

Mr. Fleming: Has there been a determination on that point? With all respect, it would seem to me that the present language is broad enough to include a benefit of the kind referred to by the minister, namely, the payment of an insurance premium on the life of an executive by his employing corporation.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, there have been cases in which this wording "board, lodging and other benefits" has been brought into question as to whether it is broad enough to cover what we are talking about. That is why we are amending it.

Mr. Monteith: Has the Department of National Revenue ever had a case before the appeal board in this actual type of situation where the appeal board has ruled in favour of the taxpayer and said that the amount was not chargeable to a taxpayer's income?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman. We have had a case in which contributions were made to a non-approved pension plan and when it got before the income tax appeal board it was suggested that perhaps these words were broad enough to cover it.

Mr. Fleming: Is that not a different matter? That is a contribution to a pension plan.

Mr. Harris: But it was in connection with the employee, not the employer.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I think the situation referred to by the minister does not support what he was saying earlier as to the necessity for an amendment to include such examples as the payment of premiums on a life insurance policy for an executive. Can the minister point to a decision of the exchequer court or of the supreme court where it has been held that the language of the present section is not broad enough to include payment of an insurance premium in a situation of that kind?

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Chairman, I cannot show a case where the income tax appeal board in fact held that these words did not cover the broad benefits concerned. But I can produce a case in which doubt was thrown upon it, and that is the reason for the amendment.

Mrs. Fairclough: Although the hon. member for Eglinton protested, Mr. Chairman, I must myself register a protest against the minister's misinterpretation of my words. I am sure the minister himself knows that I was not attempting in any way to impose additional taxation upon any individual. If the individual is required by his employer to do certain things and to take certain benefits, wherein he has no choice so long as he maintains his employment with that employer, then you have a situation where his hands are more or less tied, and I do not think he should suffer thereby. Not only from what I have said tonight but from what I have said on previous occasions on various aspects of general taxation I am sure the minister knows that what I object to very strenuously is the discrimination against the self-employed and the small businessman who has an unincorporated business.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Fleming: No, Mr. Chairman. I wish to come back to that matter, but first there is one other subject I wish to mention. In this clause and in a number of other clauses of the present act the minister proposes to substitute the words "registered pension" for the present expression "approved superannuation". He has drawn attention to some difficulties in connection with the word "approved" and has said that the Department of National Revenue really does not give approval. He is proposing to substitute the word "registered", and he says that the department at the present time registers these plans. In the light of my own experience I am just wondering whether that is a very apt expression. Are any of these plans open to public view, or does the same secrecy attach to them as attaches to the return of the taxpayer?

Mr. Harris: The same secrecy attaches to them. It is not intended that there should be a central registry of plans. But in seeking to obtain tax deduction the employer must register the plan in order to get the deduction.

Mr. Fleming: Then, Mr. Chairman, I think the word "registered" is a most inept word to use. Surely the word "registration" is one that connotes the filing of certain things in a public office, a place of deposit, where a number is attached to each document, and the time of registration is noted. In the public office, in an ordinary case, these documents are all available to view. But surely all that is done here, if the word "approved" is too strong, is to file. They are simply filed there. But surely registration implies something different from the operation that is carried out at the present time, and "registration" surely is not an expression that ought to be introduced here at all.

Mr. Harris: For a long time we sought to find the appropriate word. It should be borne in mind that the plan is in fact presented for consideration, independent of the tax return that may be made at a given time. That is to say, an employer seeking to set up a pension plan would be obliged to submit the details to the Department of National Revenue for consideration and ultimate approval. If I use the word "approval", I think my hon. friend will know what I mean. I refer only to approval for tax deduction purposes. To the extent that the plan comes forward for consideration before in fact there is a tax deduction, it would seem to me that "register" covers to some extent at least what we are trying to say. It is much better than "approved"; and I think we ought to continue to use the word "registered".

Mr. Fleming: We use the word "file" with respect to returns and that is a satisfactory word. We never talk about registering returns of taxpayers.

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Fleming: What happens with respect to these approved pension plans? In the first place, application is made for approval of the plan. Certain documents are submitted. We will say that a new plan comes into effect, initiated by the employer and employee, and it is filed. Then the department each year may require the filing of all the information that is required. Surely the actual step is closely akin to the filing of a return or other information that the department has the right to exact. This is not a case of registration at all. I think it is a most unhappy expression that is being coined now for this purpose.

Mr. Harris: I think my hon. friend omits one factor with regard to registration, namely the decision of the Department of National Revenue that the plan is one in connection with which tax deduction may be granted. If we use the word "file", as the hon. member indicates, it would only mean that we would have some kind of filing case in which we would put the plan and use it accordingly. The matter goes further than that. It goes to the extent of approval, if you will, for this purpose. There must be some action taken by the Department of National Revenue other than mere filing.

Mr. Fleming: Without trying to pursue the matter beyond proper limits, may I say this. I think what the minister has done now is to make out a case for the retention of the present expression in the act. He has not made out a case for introducing an expression like "registered pension". He has made out a case for retaining the word "approved". Where is the difficulty? Who is being misled by the present expression?

Mr. Harris: I do not know who is being misled, Mr. Chairman, but I know I was misled when I read the act. Anyone who reads it could readily come to the conclusion that the Department of National Revenue had approved that particular pension plan, and that that approval could extend to the terms of it, to whether it is wise or unwise or whether it is desirable or otherwise for the employee. We want to avoid having any such suggestion made.

Mr. Michener: Is that not true? Is that not a fact? The department does not approve plans the terms of which are not satisfactory, does it? I think the minister is being a little bit squeamish about the effect or the use of the word "approved".

Mr. McLeod: Just before we go on, Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of questions I should like to get cleared up in my own mind. Whose responsibility is it going to be to set a value on these benefits? That is the first question. Then in the case of the automobile that was cited as an example by the minister, is it necessary that the automobile be registered in the name of the taxpayer in order for it to be deemed to be taxable as income? if it is kept in the name of the company I do not see how it can be taxable, unless it is transferred as private property.

Mr. Harris: As to the former question, the valuation would, of course, be one which ultimately, if not decided between the taxpayer and the assessor, would have to be determined by the courts, or by the assessment that may be made. But in any cases such as those mentioned by my hon. friend there would have to be some preliminary discussion between the parties concerned. I would really think in the latter case it really does not matter who is the registered owner of the motor vehicle. It depends on the facts of the case as to whether the employee receives the use of a motor car from the employer, which is of a certain value to him.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Revenue has many times claimed that he and his department insist upon following the letter of the act and that they are only a collection agency. Under the department of the Minister of Finance the terms of the act are actually determined, and it is up to the Department of National Revenue to collect in full. The minister has even gone so far as to say that in his estimation some of the provisions of the act may appear unjust, but he cannot do anything about it. He and his department must insist upon collecting every penny that they say the act calls for, if it is left to the Department of National Revenue to make up their minds.

The minister says it is not the intention to collect on the uniforms of firemen and that type of thing. However, I do not think there is going to be any alternative, once this becomes law and gets into the hands of the Department of National Revenue, to doing what the Minister of National Revenue says has to be done. They are going to contend that their hands are tied. The decision as to every last detail of any kind whatsoever, as it says here, is going to be in the hands of the tax department.

The minister has admitted that he has not had any great difficulty. There was some small doubt in a small incident, or something of that nature, but he has admitted that he has not had any case go to the appeal board in any instance. As a consequence it would be much better if the wording of the act were left as it is at the moment and the taxpayer were given the small benefit of whatever doubt there may be.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, in regard to the question of the use of motor cars by employees of certain organizations, how would that affect people who were working for the dominion government and the provincial governments, which provide them with motor cars which they use sometimes for their own private purposes. Will the governments pay these people additional wages to look after the income tax they have to pay on the use of the cars.

Mr. Harris: It will depend, Mr. Chairman, on the arrangement with the employer as to whether or not the employee may use the car for his own personal purposes to any great extent.

Mr. Montgomery: It is well known all over the country that those employees use those cars for their own purposes. Just what percentage of the time they use them is pretty hard to determine, and what the minister is doing in this section is putting into the hands of the assessor, under the Income Tax Act and under the income tax department, the right to decide. He will make an arbitrary decision, such as is being done now all around this country, especially with regard to farmers and others. These people will find that they simply cannot afford to go to court. I think it is quite a vicious section, and it should be reconsidered.

Mr. Fleming: In regard to this matter of the use of motor cars, may I ask the minister what attitude the government proposes to take if this section is enacted in a case where a man is picked up at his residence and is transported to his place of business and vice versa at his employer's expense. Is that benefit to be treated as a part of his taxable income, and will some value be placed upon it by the assessor?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, the question has not arisen in that particular form that I know of. To answer the question asked earlier by an hon. member, I think there is some misunderstanding. I am not aware of any federal employees using motor cars for their own benefit. If they are I think it is contrary to the regulations.

Mr. Fleming: Let me put the case. The minister has not answered my point. I would think the minister would have to answer that. I was referring to the use of a motor car or to motor car privileges that are used as an example to justify the extension of the present legislation. Take the case of a senior officer of the Department of National Defence, for instance, who is picked up at his residence and transported to the offices of the department in a government car. Is that to be regarded as a benefit on which a value is to be placed by the assessor and added to that officer's income, and be subjected to taxation?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the discussion on motor cars was to cover the case where a motor car was placed at the disposal of an employee and used by him to his own advantage. The case my hon. friend has stated is one of a company providing some kind of bus service or transportation service for that employee, which is a wholly different matter.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has not dealt with my example of a senior officer being transported to the offices of the Department of National Defence to carry out his daily duties there. Take again the comparable example of an executive who is picked up by a motor car owned by a corporation and driven by a chauffeur of the corporation, in which he is transported from his place of residence to his place of business and then brought back again at night. Is that to be treated as taxable income? I really cannot see much difference in the two cases. If there is a tax payable in the case of the corporation executive, I fail to distinguish the difference in the case of the senior officer who is transported in a government car from his home to the offices of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Harris: I would be inclined to agree with my hon. friend that there is no distinction; but, as I say, I am not aware of any case where a company sends a car to pick up a person and brings him in and that person is charged income tax on that benefit.

Mr. Fleming: No, not now, but we are talking about a case that is going to exist if this section is enacted, and the minister has put his whole case for this wide extension of the meaning of income in this situation on these motor car privileges. Now, surely, the test is not to be the fact that the man has the motor car in his possession and drives it himself. Surely the test is whether there are motor car advantages or benefits made available to him as an incident or term of his employment.

Mr. Harris: Well, that is the very point, and the mere fact that a company would send a car to pick up an employee would not, I think, come under the case where we are thinking in terms of assessing persons for the use of a motor car as such and not just the use of the car for a trip to work or something of that kind.

Mr. Pearkes: What would be the position of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Harris: The Minister of Finance does not pay income tax on his motor car allowance.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, what the minister has just said is quite the opposite of the practice of the department, because one of the things the department has insisted upon is that an employee is not permitted to have the advantage of transportation from his place of residence to his place of employment. It is directly opposite to what the department has practised.

Mr. Fleming: In all earnestness I am going to suggest to the minister, in the light of the discussion we have had tonight, that he reconsider this clause before the bill comes up again. These are very broad words, "of any kind whatsoever"; indeed, they are as broad, I think the minister will agree, as any draftsman can write. I do not think there is a member in this house tonight who can foresee the full application of these words. I earnestly urge upon the minister that before this bill comes up again he reconsider the breadth of his words and see if there is not something that admits of a much clearer definition and understanding than those words.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps I am at fault in some respects, but I am afraid I cannot go along with the thought that the words are not clear and understandable.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fleming: No; it is ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take the second reading of the Telegraphs Act, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport with respect to the St. Lawrence seaway authority and then the Income Tax Act and the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Fleming: In that order?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 31, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Chief Justice's Chambers,
Supreme Court,
Ottawa, July 31, 1956.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Mr. Justice C. H. Locke, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 31st July, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
W. Kenneth Campbell,
Private Secretary to the Chief Justice of Canada.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GOODE—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF HON. MEMBER FOR EGLINTON

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege: As reported at page 6625 of Hansard I mentioned, during an exchange with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) had spoken for one hour in this house last Friday night. I was in error; he spoke for only 30 minutes.

CRIMINAL LAW

FOURTH AND FIFTH REPORTS OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourth and fifth reports of the special joint committee on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries. The fourth report constitutes the final report on the lotteries question. The fifth and final report of the committee is principally a summary of the committee's activities. No motion will be made for adoption of these reports at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAEL—INQUIRY AS TO POSITION RESPECTING EXPORT OF SABRE JETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs respecting the permits for the export of Sabre jets to Israel. Does not the recent and present truculent attitude being exhibited by Colonel Nasser underline the need of an early decision in this regard, and what is the present position of the consideration being given by the government to this matter?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows the Prime Minister announced in the house some days ago that discussions were taking place among certain governments, in addition to the Canadian government, concerned with this matter. It had been hoped, Mr. Speaker, that those discussions would have been completed by now and that an announcement in regard to Canadian policy on the matter could have been made. However, there has been a delay, so that not only this government but the other governments could consider the effect if any of recent developments in relation to the Suez on this other problem. It is hoped that this delay will be very short and that an announcement can be made in a few days.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Was the original order for Harvard training planes for Egypt ever completed, or are there still three more Harvards to be sent?

Mr. Pearson: My impression is that the order has been completed, but I had better look into the matter to make sure that my impression is correct.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

GREENWOOD, N.S.—REPORTED CONVERSION OF COAL-BURNING EQUIPMENT AT R.C.A.F. STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. I sent him notice, though with the present hours he may not have received it until a few moments ago. Is it correct that the Department of National Defence has called for tenders to convert the coal-burning equipment at the R.C.A.F. station at Greenwood, Nova Scotia, to oil for 100 married persons' quarters?

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not received the notice to which the hon. member referred so perhaps I can take his question as notice.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REPORTED SHORTAGE AT ONTARIO FEED MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant. Has a telegram been received from the president of the Ontario farmers' union claiming that Ontario feed mills are having a great deal of trouble securing western wheat? Would the parliamentary assistant comment on this situation?

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the telegram referred to has been received, but I am not in position to comment upon it. The allegations contained in the telegram are being investigated by the Canadian wheat board, and any comment would have to wait until that investigation is complete.

INQUIRY AS TO QUOTAS IN NEW CROP YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant. My question arises out of the grave injustice caused to producers—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Argue: —at the 50 per cent of the marketing points still on the low delivery quota, and the minister's announcement the other day that shipping orders currently in effect at those points will be continued into the new crop year. My question is this. Will deliveries made at the low delivery points in the new crop year be made against current marketing quotas? In other words, will producers at marketing points have the right within the next few weeks to deliver on old quotas rather than on new?

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce): That question will be taken as notice.

APPLICATION OF RAILWAYS TO CHARGE DEMURRAGE ON BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister inform the house as to the result of the application of the railway companies for the right to charge demurrage on box cars on track at elevator terminals?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): The only source of information I have at the moment is this morning's newspaper. I understand that a hearing took place yesterday and that the board set September 10 for a further hearing in the matter. In the meantime the charges have been suspended.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FISHER RIVER RESERVE HOSPITAL—INQUIRY AS TO QUALITY OF TREATMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) or his parliamentary assistant. When Peter Thom, treaty Indian, was admitted to Fisher River reserve hospital, was a third-year medical student the only person available to treat him?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that I did not hear the question, but I shall take it as notice.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF DEVELOPMENT SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister anything further to report in connection with the proposed international survey of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can report that the terms of reference to the international joint commission governing this matter have been agreed on here and have been submitted to the United States. We expect agreement on these terms within the next day or so. I shall be glad to announce that to the hon. gentleman and to the house as soon as agreement has been achieved. At that time the matter will be referred at once to the international joint commission.

PARLIAMENT HILL

PARKING ARRANGEMENTS IN LIBRARY AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Could the minister advise the house what steps his department has taken to clean up the disorderly area north of the parliament buildings and make it an area of which this parliament can feel proud instead of ashamed?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): May I ask the hon. member if this is the same area about which he inquired before?

Mr. Hees: I inquired about it a week ago and the minister said he was going to give consideration to getting it done right away. I think I have given him sufficient time.

Mr. Winters: I think perhaps I should thank the hon. member for his generous extension of time. The situation is that there is a committee sitting to consider certain aspects of the application of the federal district plan. Among other things they have been discussing parking on parliament hill. I have been reviewing this matter with the federal district commission, and I intend to await the committee's report before determining what final action shall be taken in that area.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask a supplementary question. In the meantime, would he have his department have men go out with scythes and cut down the very thick weeds which are over a foot high?

WATER RESOURCES

WATER LEVELS OF LAKE MICHIGAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the recent announcement that the diversion of the waters of lake Michigan to the Chicago drainage canal will be increased by 1,000 cubic feet per second, could the minister tell the house whether lake Michigan comes under the joint commission and whether Canada has to sanction additional water going through that canal from lake Michigan; also whether that is the minimum amount that Canada has agreed to be permitted to go, over and above what has been going hitherto, through that drainage scheme?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am not certain as to the exact legal status of lake Michigan in regard to boundary water matters, but I should be glad to look into it and make a statement tomorrow or the next day on that and also on the action taken in the United States congress.

TELEGRAPHS ACT

AMENDMENT CONCERNING CONTROL OF SUBMARINE CABLE INSTALLATIONS

The house in committee on Bill No. 212, to amend the Telegraphs Act—Mr. Marler—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—"External submarine cable" and "telecommunication" defined.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was up for second reading I explained the position being taken by the official opposition in the following words, as found at page 5617 of Hansard of July 3:

> We in the official opposition are curious about some aspects of this particular bill and while we are not opposing it at this stage we are reserving our right to do so in the event that the examination by the committee reveals the bill has features which in our opinion would justify opposition to it in the subsequent stages.

In the interim the bill has been considered by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and as a result of the deliberations of that committee we believe that the government should take another look before insisting on the passage of the bill. To us it appears to be designed to stifle competition with the crown company known as Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, and we believe that Canadians are entitled to the benefit of competition between this crown company and the private companies which are operating in the same field.

Furthermore, we are afraid that the enactment of this legislation and the policy behind the legislation will in due course lead to the crown company, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, having a monopoly in the field of external submarine cable service from Canada.

The bill will give the government a licensing power over outlets from these external submarine cables. In addition it will give a licensing control over the routing of cable messages within Canada. The minister really explained that in his speech on second reading. I am referring to page 5616 of Hansard of July 3, where the minister said the following:

> The government believes that by establishing a licensing system it will be in a better position to deal more flexibly with applications for permission to land cables, to control the opening of circuits into Canada, and to regulate increases in the capacity of cables; and the amendment before the house has been drafted with these objects in mind.

That goes further than the law at the present time. The Telegraphs Act, chapter 262 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, does give the government very wide control over the landing of cables in Canada. I do not believe any wider control would be possible, and we were told in the committee that in practice such control has always been recognized by the existing companies. But now the government is seeking to go further and take this licensing control over the circuits that come from the cable head. Also, as the minister said, as reported lower down on page 5616—

Mr. Marler: I think the hon. member is mistaken when he speaks about licensing control over circuits coming from the cable head. I think the hon. gentleman should recall that the bill deals only with the cables themselves, not with the circuits in Canada.

Mr. Green: No. In the paragraph I have just read the minister himself explained the purpose of this bill. He said they were going to establish a licensing system under which:

. . . the government . . . will be in a better position to deal more flexibly with applications for permission to land cables—

They already had power to deal with the landing of cables. He then went on to say this:

—to control the opening of circuits into Canada, and to regulate increases in the capacity of cables; . . .

Further down on the same page we find this:

. . . but I think I should point out that the proposed licensing system would enable us to exercise some measure of control over the routing of traffic originating in Canada.

In the committee it was admitted by the minister that the main purpose of this amendment is to control competition from a reliable and long-established private company known as the Commercial Cable Company of Canada.

Mr. Marler: I think the hon. member is putting a very broad interpretation on what I said.

Mr. Green: I do not think I am putting a broad interpretation on it at all. I could quote half a dozen places in the evidence where the minister made it perfectly clear that the reason this amendment was being brought in was in order to permit him to control the outlets which the Commercial Cable Company of Canada would have.

[Mr. Green.]

That brings me to the plans of this private company. It has been in business in Canada since 1884, a period of 72 years. It is a United States company authorized by special statute of the parliament of Canada in 1884 to carry on this cable business in this country. It is a highly efficient organization. I am told by people who use the cable services of this company that it is the most efficient one in the field operating from the shores of Canada, and that when they wish to get fast service they mark their cables "via Commercial Cable".

This company have not laid a cable for about 33 years. Now they desire to lay what is known as a coaxial cable. I am not very well versed in the technical language of this business, Mr. Chairman; hence I may not get the accurate description in some cases. But evidently this is a modern, up to date type of cable. It is to extend from the United States through Canada, thence I think to Greenland and Iceland and then either to the United Kingdom or some country on the continent of Europe. There are to be what are known as 120 outlets.

Mr. Marler: Duplex circuits; 120 duplex circuits.

Mr. Green: I thank the minister for his correction. Of that number, 24 are to be made available in Canada if this company is allowed to proceed with its plans. The company is trying to modernize its service. For example, one of the officials told us in the committee that the company had a request from a large firm in Vancouver for a direct service which could be given only if this coaxial cable is laid, something which would put Vancouver on a competitive basis with Montreal in so far as cables to the United Kingdom, for example, are concerned.

I personally see no reason why the businessmen of the west coast should be denied that advantage, or should be forced to do business with the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, which is what will result if this bill goes through and the government does not change its policy. It was also said that there were demands for leased wire service from Vancouver which could not be met unless this cable could be laid. The same thing applies to Winnipeg, where the Winnipeg grain exchange is in direct competition with the Chicago grain exchange. The men in business there want to have this fast service. Apparently they have applied for such service, and can only get it through Commercial Cable if that company is allowed to lay this modern cable. Otherwise they too will be in the position of being forced to do business, whether they wish to do so or not, with the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

Now, Commercial Cable told the committee that as far back as 1950 they decided that they had to lay a modern cable. They gave evidence that in 1953 they had discussed this whole question with the officials of the Department of Transport. I have here a copy of their brief, from which I shall quote.

Mr. Marler: Was it not 1954?

Mr. Green: No, they say here that they reported their intentions to the Canadian government officials in 1953.

> There were delays caused by extensive surveys, plans and specifications, arranging for cable ships, arranging the $25 million financing and by change of route requested by government and other matters so that it was not until September of 1954 that all the plans, maps, specifications, financial arrangements, etc., were complete and filed with the Canadian government in a well prepared and complete application covering practically every detail. The Commercial Cable Company was to have 24 outlets in Canada available in this cable as needed over the years to come, to take care of the business from the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company and clients of the Commercial Cable Company.

I should explain that this Commercial Cable does not send messages over land in Canada. They are carried by the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company. This application was considered by the department for some time and in February, 1955, the minister wrote a letter to the solicitor for the company which I propose to read because it sets out the stand taken by the Department of Transport at that time. I think the same stand is being taken by the government today. The letter reads:

> Dear Mr. Maclaren:
> I refer to your letter of January 28, 1955, and previous correspondence in connection with the application of Commercial Cable Company to land on the coast of Canada a new trans-Atlantic coaxial cable.
> The government is prepared, subject to compliance by the company with all statutory requirements, to grant authority for the landing of the proposed cable, subject to certain technical and related stipulations the details of which are now being worked out; and subject to the conditions—

This is the part of the letter that is significant and to which I wish to draw attention.

> —that no circuits shall be terminated in Canada except for:
> (1) Purposes of defence communication from Canada to points outside Canada, so far as other available circuits are insufficient,
> (2) Commercial purposes in respect of circuits leased to Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

In other words, this company could lay their cable in Canada and could have circuits in Canada only if those circuits were either for purposes of defence or were leased to this crown corporation. That tells the whole story right there. Are we in Canada to be put in this position with regard to external submarine cables? Then the letter went on:

> The nature and extent of defence communications permitted under (1) above will be defined specifically following further consideration of defence needs.
> As soon as the details of the above mentioned technical and related stipulations have been worked out, an order in council will be prepared to implement the foregoing.

The company were unwilling to comply with that letter, and frankly I do not blame them a bit. I think there are many hon. members in this house on the government side as well as in opposition parties who would not blame the company for being unwilling to lay a cable subject to those conditions.

They have complied with the law during the whole 72 years they have been doing business in Canada. They went to the government about this new cable landing and about their plans for circuits in Canada. Apparently they have always gone to the department about any rates that were to be charged. Whether or not they were under obligation to do so, the evidence showed that this had been their practice. They have done everything possible to co-operate with the government, but they now run up against this snag in that seven years ago the government set up a crown corporation and has apparently decided now that this government child, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, is to be shielded and protected from competition.

Evidence was given by the officials of the company to the effect that they have no objection whatever to a licensing system provided that the rights given them under their original incorporating bill are not nullified, and that the system is not exercised in favour of the crown corporation. They said furthermore that they have no objection to the control of cable rates. So much for Commercial Cable.

Then I come to the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. It was set up in 1949 as the result of an agreement among different commonwealth companies. Canada took over the assets of two private companies; I think they were Cable and Wireless Limited and Marconi. Part of the agreement among the commonwealth companies was that those countries would resist —and that is the important word—the authorization or opening of new circuits which would be detrimental to Cable and Wireless Limited or its associates in the British empire.

Those words appear in the agreement preceding the setting up of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. They seem to indicate that the policy of the government was to be one of monopoly or in any event of hamstringing the private companies, and that point was raised during the debate in this house in 1949. I will not quote again the extracts from Hansard which I read on July 3. There were also extracts from the proceedings of the committee, the same standing committee which dealt with the bill in that year. The then minister of transport, Hon. Mr. Chevrier, made it clear there was to be no interference with competition and that this crown company was not to have a monopoly.

But now after these intervening years we seem to have arrived at the point where that policy has been thrown overboard, and the government is adopting a policy which at least is severely restricting competition and which may result in monopoly, because if the private companies cannot modernize their systems it is only a matter of time until they will be out of the business as serious competitors.

The C.O.T.C. also felt that its facilities should be modernized, and this crown company made an agreement with the British post office and with another private United States company, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, which as hon. members know is a very powerful United States utility. Another party to the agreement was the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company, which is a subsidiary of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. If hon. members care to check that agreement they will find a reference to it in chapter 77 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1953-54.

That is described as an act respecting the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company. The recital sets out the various changes in the share capital of that company, and then the following recital appears:

. . . whereas the company pursuant to its statutory powers is a party to a contract executed on the 27th day of November, 1953—

This was about the same time that Commercial Cable were talking with officials of the department.

—with Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation—

That is the crown company.

—American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and the Postmaster General of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the construction and maintenance of a trans-Atlantic telephone cable system for service between Canada and the United Kingdom and between the United States and the United Kingdom, the execution of which contract by Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation was approved on November 26, 1953, by order of the governor in council.

I am not quarrelling with the C.O.T.C. for making a contract of that kind. By the way, this new cable system is to be in operation this fall. I have in my hand the annual report of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation for the year ending March 31, 1956, and on page 6 I find the following reference to transatlantic cables:

The installation of the trans-Atlantic telephone cable, in which the corporation is a joint owner with the British post office, American Telephone and Telegraph Company and Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company, should be completed and its services in operation by the end of October next—some few weeks earlier than originally anticipated. We look forward to its inauguration with considerable enthusiasm as we believe it to be the most important overseas telecommunication development since the laying of the original telegraph cable over ninety years ago. Our share in this cable will provide for Canada services and facilities for which there has been a steadily increasing need during recent years. In addition to high quality telephone service, we shall offer picture transmissions—broadcast programs—customer-to-customer teleprinter services—leased telegraph circuits for the use of private customers and we shall also introduce a multiplicity of new telegraph circuits in sufficient numbers to meet adequately the needs of Canadian users for some years to come. We are confident that the services so being provided will take care of foreseeable public demands and that the users will be completely satisfied with the quality and quantity of service available to them.

The question we ask is why should the other company be prevented by means of a government licensing system from inaugurating a service of that kind.

The minister explained in the committee that this new transatlantic cable would provide six new circuits for Canada. He indicated that number would be adequate for Canadian needs. He went on to say that the C.O.T.C. now has 40 per cent of the Canadian cable business and he wants it to get more, and that is one reason that this licensing control over the private companies is being taken. The minister said he objected to any more facilities; that these six circuits are ample, and he objected to any more circuits of that kind. He claimed further that his department should have the power to decide whether there was or was not any duplication of services, and whether this private company should be able to establish service of the kind I have just mentioned.

He said also that the department wanted to control the routing of cables in Canada. I think that would be a pretty tough job, because a company could send its cables via the United States. For example, a firm in Vancouver might be forced to send its cables across the United States. The minister is trying to force business into the hands of

C.O.T.C. The Vancouver Province summed up the situation very neatly on July 21, just a few days ago, in the following editorial:

> Mr. Marler's Blackjack is Showing
> Despite the federal government's efforts to conceal its growing autocracy under a cloak of benign and democratic tolerance, the bulge of the government's blackjack can be glimpsed at unexpected moments.
> We had such a glimpse last week when suave and friendly transport minister Marler was explaining to a parliamentary committee that his legislation to control operation of overseas cable service in Canada is not aimed at pushing out the private companies and creating a monopoly for the government-owned operation.
> Why, said Mr. Marler, if we wanted to do that we could simply expropriate their property and close them out.
> This is quite true. But it might have been better if Mr. Marler's frankness had not been carried quite so far.
> Canadians have had a convincing demonstration this year of how a top-heavy majority in the House of Commons has encouraged the government to do all sorts of things, including forcing a Speaker to stay in office after he had resigned. Such shows of power can be frightening.

Furthermore, the C.O.T.C. has been not only a competitor but a judge in this whole matter. I should like to refer to page 6 of the brief submitted by Commercial Cable. In describing a meeting which took place in the offices of the Department of Transport in September, 1954, they say:

> At the meeting there were some 16 men, four delegates from the Department of Transport, four from the Commercial Cable Company, one, who acted as secretary, from the privy council as the application was necessarily addressed to the governor general in council. Among the others, it is interesting to note that there were three representatives from Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation (C.O.T.C.), including its president, to whom nearly everything said was referred for his comment or approval. There was also a representative, a Lieutenant Colonel Read, from the B.P.O.—Cable and Wireless (of Great Britain). C.O.T.C. and Cable and Wireless are direct competitors of the Commercial Cable Company and they were sitting in judgment upon this application.

Then further down:

> Mr. Bowie, president of C.O.T.C., the crown corporation which is a competitor, undertook to look over the application and give the Department of Transport his opinion.

That sort of interference must be stopped if there is to be competition in this field.

Mr. Marler: Those are wholly unsupported statements, are they not?

Mr. Green: I do not believe these men are lying; there is no evidence to show that the men who drew up this brief are not telling the truth.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but it is my duty to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Marler: Might the hon. member go on?

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: The C.O.T.C. is both competitor and judge. That is the key to the situation. That is a picture which should make hon. members pause and consider before allowing this bill to go on the statute books.

The minister argued in the committee that Commercial Cable was a United States concern and that he was all for Canadian companies. That was a somewhat surprising argument after the pipe-line debate; however, it was made. I merely point out that Commercial Cable is not obtaining any financial support from the government. It intends to build the cable with its own money. That was not the position in the pipe-line situation.

It was said also that this new cable proposed by the private company was to be subsidized in part by the United States defence department, which was to pay annually $1,600,000. I have no way of checking that, but I doubt very much whether American Telephone and Telegraph Company has not received the same or perhaps greater assistance in the way of fees from the United States department of defence. Certainly you have on the one side Commercial Cable and, on the other side, American Telephone and Telegraph Company. If the argument is to be based upon whether the company is a United States company then the department is not in any better position than the private company, because it is involved directly and very heavily with this other large United States corporation.

I suggest that the department take a second look at this whole policy. I see no reason why competitors should be hampered in this way. I think it is to the detriment of the Canadian people. The businessmen of Canada are entitled to the best service they can get. If companies put in too many circuits or more circuits than can be used now, no one is going to be hurt except those companies, and it certainly will not do any harm to Canadian businessmen. This policy adopted by the government seems to me to be far removed from what we have been led to believe was Liberal policy.

I hope the minister will not try to force this amendment through at the present time, but will take another look at it. Certainly the arguments against it are strong. It may be that as the result of a second look some policy can be worked out which will bring about a position where there is fair competition. Surely that is not going to do any harm to this crown company. There is no reason why here in Canada we should be loading the dice for crown corporations. This is similar to the situation that would have been created if the government had taken licensing power over the railroads and then had said to the C.P.R., "You can run a railroad but you cannot have any diesel locomotives." That would be a similar situation, and for the life of me I cannot see any reason for a policy of that kind.

Mr. Nicholson: My colleagues and I who were on the committee went to that committee with an open mind. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni intimated that we would listen very carefully to the arguments put forward by Commercial Cable, Western Union and all the members of the committee. After weighing the evidence very carefully, we decided that on balance we would support the government position rather than the position outlined by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Before the committee during our last sitting, the hon. member for York West said he wished to deal with one point because he knew he would be confronted with it by the time this bill got into the house and that someone would say, "You are going to see that a big United States company is favoured in connection with a Canadian enterprise. I think if this were a Canadian enterprise working as I know it can, there would be no problem such as we are faced with today; there would be no need to come into this room." But the members of this committee are in the position that a powerful United States corporation is challenging the right of the Canadian parliament to make regulations that will affect the operation of this company that was granted a charter some 72 years ago.

Counsel for Commercial Cable seriously claimed that because they were given these privileges as far back as 1884, they would be permitted now in 1956 to do exactly as they choose in this important field. They are questioning the right of the minister to interfere with their plans in any way. Since the people of Canada are interested in C.O.T.C., I do not believe we can be asked to put this very powerful United States corporation in a preferred position.

I think the minister did a very good job in committee. He listened very patiently for long periods when able counsel for Commercial Cable presented a brief and made some arguments which appeared fairly convincing. They took us back to the famous trans-Canada pipe line and reminded us that we were prepared to offer a subsidy to this corporation. As a matter of fact they claimed they were prepared to go into this deal without any subsidy from the Canadian taxpayer.

But the Minister of Transport drew our attention to something which did not appear in the brief. He reminded us that this company has a guarantee from the United States government of $1,600,000 per year for the next ten years, with an option to have that guarantee extended for a longer period. The minister quite correctly said, I think, that when one examines the situation with regard to cables, the word "subsidy" could be loosely applied to the proposed cable to a much greater degree than to any other project that has come before the parliament of Canada this session. The minister did not argue that this $1,600,000 was a subsidy, but counsel for Commercial Cable did not deny the fact that because this could be considered partially as a defence project, Uncle Sam's government was prepared to put into the exchequer of this company $1,600,000 per year for the next ten years.

That becomes a matter of concern to Canadian taxpayers because, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra pointed out, we have a considerable investment in the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, and the last annual report we have had shows a net profit for the period of $217,000. I think we should have a very good look at proposals which will turn that profit into a very large deficit, since the people of Great Britain and the people of Canada are interested in this corporation. It is true that there is a United States privately owned corporation interested, but the facts are that the two crown corporations, the British and the Canadian crown corporations, are interested in this field. To place Commercial Cable in a preferred position so that as a result of receiving $1,600,000 from Uncle Sam's treasury they can put—

An hon. Member: It is not a complete subsidy.

Mr. Nicholson: It is not a complete subsidy, but it is being made available for services—

Mr. Low: Why don't you say so?

Mr. Nicholson: I think the minister said it was not a subsidy but it was being made available because of the defence nature of this project, and it is going to put 120 duplex circuits into circulation. I think these figures were changed a little later; but the minister, as shown at page 171 of the evidence, points out that the proposal was to make 24 circuits available in Canada out of 120. At the present time to service both Canada and the United States there are 18½ duplex circuits available. It does not require much imagination to realize what that will do to the C.O.T.C. if at the present time across the Atlantic—and even if this may be revised upward—we have 18½ circuits and then overnight we were to have an additional 24 available for Canadian purposes. It is going to place our own C.O.T.C. in an impossible position.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member if he is not overlooking completely the fact that in the next two or three months the C.O.T.C. will have six of these brand new, modern circuits?

Mr. Nicholson: I am quite aware of that, but the Canadian taxpayers have already made an investment in this new service which is to be available this fall. C.O.T.C. is to have this very modern service which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I cannot go along with his proposal that because C.O.T.C. is to have this service, we should consider that an 1884 charter should give this private company the right to do as they please in Canada for all time to come.

I found that I had some helpful advice from the late R. B. Bennett when a proposition in this general field was before parliament back in 1932. Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, as he was then, said as recorded at page 3035 of Hansard for May 18, 1932:

> Secondly, no other scheme than that of public ownership can ensure to the people of this country, without regard to class or place, equal enjoyment of the benefits and pleasures of radio broadcasting. Private ownership must necessarily discriminate between densely and sparsely populated areas. This is not a correctable fault in private ownership; it is an inescapable and inherent demerit of that system. It does not seem right that in Canada the towns should be preferred to the countryside or the prosperous communities to those less fortunate.

I think if the late Mr. Bennett were describing the present situation he would consider that it is not fair to a sparsely populated area—

Mr. Green: May I ask the member a question on that point? Was Mr. Bennett not referring to radio services and not cable services?

Mr. Nicholson: Quite so, and I said "If he were." I had better finish my quotation:

> In fact, if no other course were possible, it might be fair to suggest that it should be the other way about. Happily, however, under this system, there is no need for discrimination; all may be served alike. Equality of service is assured by the plan which calls for a chain of high power stations throughout Canada . . .
> I believe that there is no government in Canada that does not regret today that it has parted with some of these natural resources for considerations wholly inadequate and on terms that do not reflect the principle under which the crown holds the natural resources in trust for all the people.

It is quite true that the late Mr. Bennett was discussing radio at that time, but we are discussing Bill No. 212 which does give to the appropriate authority answerable to parliament the right to decide what limitations will be necessary in this important field. The minister made it very clear that if Commercial Cable wanted to build a line for American purposes there would be no objection whatever to them being granted landing licences. There was some discussion with respect to whether appropriate authorities in Greenland and in the United Kingdom had been more unreasonable than we were in Canada, and again it was admitted that although negotiations had been under way for some considerable time the appropriate authority in Great Britain has not been willing to grant the request made by Commercial Cable. After some discussion it was also disclosed that the appropriate authorities in Greenland were certainly not more co-operative than the Canadian Minister of Transport.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think we cannot deny the appropriate minister in Canada who is responsible to parliament, who must come to us year after year to get his estimates approved and to justify every act of his department, the right to decide whether a powerful United States corporation that is getting $1,600,000 a year from its government should be placed in a position where it can force the Canadian people to incur huge deficits in connection with the operation of Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, an organization in which we are interested along with the taxpayers of Great Britain and a United States owned private company. I see no reason why the minister should not be given the powers that he seeks under Bill No. 212.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks I should like to make in connection with the bill before us. First of all I should like to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster, as found on page 5620 of Hansard of July 3, when he stated our position. In that connection he said:

> I feel that possibly its objective is to limit the field of communications to government-owned enterprises. We in this group cannot go along with what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni just suggested with respect to communications when he said that they should be handled by a public utility and therefore should come under public ownership.

Further on in his remarks he had this to say:

> We look forward to the government being in this public utility field only for the purpose of operating a cable where other private enterprises are not prepared to give service at a reasonable rate. The minister is sending the bill to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and I am sure that there he and his officials will be able to explain more fully the purpose behind the bill and possibly allay our fears concerning it. I hope that is so because I cannot see this group being in harmony with the setting up of a monopoly that would not give us the full advantage of the technological advances I spoke of earlier.

That is the position we take with regard to the bill. Before I pass on to the other remarks I wish to make, I should like to refer briefly to the remarks of the speaker who has just taken his seat, the hon. member for Mackenzie. He suggested that his group approached the problem with an open mind. I think that is true of anyone who takes part in the work of a committee on behalf of the people of Canada. I do not think anybody has any monopoly on approaching any problem with an open mind.

The hon. member also placed great stress on the fact that this was a United States company and that $1,600,000 of government business had been allocated to it under contract. The hon. member suggested in his speech, I would say in an evasive way, that this was a subsidy or a grant or something that this company could use to give it an advantage over the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, but I do not think that is so because as far as business all over this country is concerned, and it does not matter what business it is, businessmen seek to get contracts well ahead of production. It does not matter what it is. I think it is only good business. Business people carry on that practice throughout the world in all types of manufacturing and other endeavours.

With respect to the fact that these are United States interests, I should like to point out that if we are going to start that type of thinking we must remember that foreign investment in the Canadian Pacific Railway amounts to 88 per cent, with only 12 per cent of the total investment being from Canada. Then there is the Aluminum Company. According to the last figures I saw that company is owned outside of Canada to the extent of 75 per cent. One could name hundreds and hundreds of large corporations in Canada that are controlled to a great extent financially though not physically by outside monetary sources. I do not think we need to worry too much about that in this regard. It is just one more situation which is normal. I cannot see anything abnormal about it.

I think that anyone who may read the hon. member's speech must come to the conclusion, as we in this group have, that the reason for the bill is to protect a government crown corporation from competition. Anyone reading the hon. member's speech will realize that is the essence of it; that he is afraid competition will enter into the field of telecommunications and, having done so, will bring about a deficit so far as the operations of Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation are concerned.

Mr. Nicholson: If I might say so, I think $1,600,000 per year for ten years would be considered as unfair competition to Canadian public investment.

Mr. Leboe: That all depends on what profit is made in giving that service. They may lose money on the service. No question was asked and no answer was given in the committee or elsewhere as to what the possibilities are in connection with that service. This company has contracted to give that service and it may cost them more. We do not know. That is hypothetical as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Nicholson: If C.O.T.C. had that sort of guarantee they would be in a very favourable position.

Mr. Leboe: I do not think there is any reason why they cannot have a guarantee under competition. I do not think that has any effect on this thing at all. I do not want to get into any controversy as far as any cable corporations are concerned. This matter must be dealt with on the basis of principle, and in that connection I should like to refer to certain statements made by the minister as found at page 5614 of Hansard of July 3. At that time the minister said:

The fact that there has been no change in the formalities to be followed is, I believe, explained by the way in which improvements in the general field of communications have developed.

As I progress with the few remarks I wish to make I wish to point out that this seems to be the whole case the minister is putting forward, namely that there is a great deal of development in telecommunications from Canada and perhaps the United States across salt water. But as I pointed out in committee, we have thousands of openings that cross into foreign lands on dry land, and it is extremely difficult for me to see the difference between telecommunications that travel over salt water and those that travel over land, as long as they are going to a foreign country. I do not think there is any real meat in the statement of the minister in that regard.

I should like to read again what he said in his statement. It will be found at page 5615 of Hansard of July 3. As reported there he said:

I regret that it has seemed necessary to deal with these somewhat technical matters which, at first sight, seem perhaps not to be entirely relevant to the bill in order to stress one point in particular, and that is through improvements, installed in the cable itself or elsewhere, the capacity of most if not all of the trans-Atlantic cables has been increased over that which they originally had when the formalities prescribed by the Telegraphs Act were accomplished and when the requested approval of the governor in council was given.

Here again we see that the minister has gone out of his way to stress the volume of traffic that is now provided for through technological advances in the cables that exist today. Further on in his speech as reported on the same page we find this:

However, I must admit some concern that as the act now stands, once the requested permission to land the cable has been granted its capacity may be changed, perhaps quite substantially, without either the knowledge or consent of the government.

Here again we find that the same thought is in his mind, namely that here is a great increase in the telecommunication facilities. I fail to see where an increase in facilities is going to hurt anyone. After all, that is what is wanted by an individual such as myself who comes from the northern areas, where we have been stifled in our growth by lack of communications all through the years. My feelings can be imagined when I see a situation where, in principle, we are now trying to block additional facilities in order to protect a crown corporation.

I should like to make this statement. As far as I am concerned I do not believe that any crown corporation should be protected from competition by legislation of any parliament or any legislature. I believe they should be out in the field of open competition.

Mr. Ellis: Does that apply to post offices?

An hon. Member: Don't be silly.

Mr. Leboe: I guess you have your freedom; that is, you can put a five-cent stamp on a letter at any time and you can send it anywhere you want.

Here again, as reported at page 5616 of Hansard, the minister said:

In fact, however, the matter cannot be resolved in such a simple way; first, because the problem does not always arise in a way that admits of a yes or no solution; and, second, because under the present act there is no continuing control or regulation of the actions of a company with regard to the cable itself.

When the minister speaks, I should like him to enlarge upon that statement and tell us what he means when he says he wants control of the cable itself, and what he is referring to in that statement. It seems to me that once the cable is laid its only purpose is for telecommunications, and that the feeder lines that go into it have an influence on its work as have the feeder lines that lead out of it at the other end. On the same page 5156 of Hansard the minister is reported as follows:

I feel sure the various companies operating cable facilities share this view and that so far as this is not now being done they will co-operate in helping us to achieve this objective; but I think I should point out that the proposed licensing system would enable us to exercise some measure of control over the routing of traffic originating in Canada.

In that connection, when the minister speaks I should like him to enlarge upon that statement as to how the cable companies today are not co-operating in the regulation of traffic within the boundaries of Canada. I understand that all the feeder lines in Canada are those of Canadian Pacific Telegraphs and the Canadian National Telegraphs. If there is some rerouting that is taking place through the United States, it must be done by them. I think I have the minister's answer. It is to be found at page 193 of the minutes and proceedings of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, No. 4. I spoke at this point as follows:

Mr. Leboe: There is a question in my mind that with the teletype service which we have, between Canada and the United States, as I understand it, it is an unregulated teletype service between Canada and the United States at this moment.

Hon. Mr. Marler: That is not affected by this bill.

Mr. Leboe: Supposing the cable is landed into the shores of the U.S., there is nothing to prevent the teletype relaying that message from a United States centre and travelling on the United States lines?

Hon. Mr. Marler: No, I think there is not, as a matter of a fact. Of course, if the situation became confused it would be possible to enact the legislation to cover it.

Mr. Leboe: In other words, to prevent the teletype transmissions?

Hon. Mr. Marler: Yes, if that was thought desirable. I am not suggesting that I do think it is desirable. When we are talking about a hypothetical situation, I do not like to predict hypothetical actions.

I want to point out, Mr. Chairman, that what the minister had in mind is expressed in the speech from which I quoted a few moments ago, namely effective control. While he suggested that this was a hypothetical situation and something that would possibly not be anticipated, nevertheless I say that according to the evidence it is my belief that the minister anticipated such a thing and that he does anticipate a measure of control that is going to direct telecommunications traffic within Canada by law. Maybe the minister says that is not so. But as the minister pointed out, things that are said in committee—promises made or anything else—have no effect in point of law or in the interpretation of the act and its regulations.

In closing I should just like to refer back to the $1,600,000 of guaranteed business that was made so much of in this debate by the hon. member for Mackenzie. I should like to emphasize the point that business today operates continually on the basis of production contracts. The Minister of Defence Production, in bringing down his estimates the other day, pointed out all the things that were being done to bring about a situation where the confidence of the producer was brought in hand by assistance by his department.

Mr. Hosking: I should like to speak on this bill for just a moment or two, Mr. Chairman. First I should like to ask the committee what are the reasons for this bill. There must be some reason which the government have in mind in introducing an amendment to change the legislation so they would have some means of knowing what was taking place with regard to communication cables laid to another continent.

In 1884 we find that the Commercial Cable Company applied to this parliament for a permit to lay a cable from here to England. That permit was granted. At that time they felt it wise to have certain powers, and one of them was the control of the price of the services rendered by these cables. The price was set at 25 cents per word. Let us look at the price paid for service over this cable today. The price is 15 cents per word. We have been paying some 5 or 6 cents less per word than the cost of sending a word from the United States on the same cable. I should like to suggest to the committee that one of the main reasons for Canadians getting that advantage of 5 or 6 cents per word is that we formed the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation back in 1949 and because of the control the Canadian government had over sending messages, by means of competition, thus keeping the price to Canadian users at 5 or 6 cents per word less than people in the United States pay.

In my opinion this is a good thing. However, so far as the powers of the government to control are concerned in relation to the agreement made in 1884, they are of very little value. The price which was set at that time, 25 cents per word, is now unrealistic. How did that come about? Well, I think it would be wise to look through the brief and the minutes of the committee to find some of the reasons. In 1884 this company asked for permission to lay cables, and in that year laid two cables. In 1894 they laid another one; another in 1904; a fifth in 1905 and a sixth in 1923. Then we were told in the committee that one of these cables went out of commission, so at the present time they have only five cables.

We are informed that these five cables have some 9½ duplex channels. I think at this time it would be well for me to say what a duplex channel is. It is a circuit which provides for the transmission of two messages simultaneously, one in each direction. Now, how do they get 9½ duplex circuits available in five cables? In the past 10 or 11 years there has been a great deal of experimental work done with communications. It has been found that by putting undersea repeaters on these cables they could double the capacity of the cables; by putting on tandem repeaters they could square the capacity. There is no doubt that with further experimentation the time will come when they can cube the number of messages on a single cable.

Has our government any knowledge of the increased capacity that has taken place in these cables that this company was given permission to lay years ago? That they have no knowledge of what these increases are, and they have no way of finding out other than through the willingness of the company to give them that information. I would point out the embarrassing position in which our minister found himself, as shown by the committee evidence at page 206 when, after having made a statement to the committee from his official record of the number of circuits, the companies communicated with him during the night and informed him that they had many more circuits than he had put on the record. He had to come back to the committee and say:

> I would like to express my regrets to the committee for having misled them about the number of duplex channels. Mr. Henderson is quite right when he says the number is not 18½—

He was referring to these 18½ channels as the total number of channels, according to the record, from Canada to the continent.

Mr. Nicholson: That is both the United States and Canada.

Mr. Hosking: It is the total number of channels landed in Canada connecting this continent with Great Britain.

> —but I would like to perhaps endeavour to excuse myself by saying, that at the time that figure got into the file that was our information. But information more recently was supplied from Western Union substantiating what Mr. Henderson has said in respect to the total number being 68 simplex circuits or 34 channels.

Here we find our minister with the only source of information at his command being well out of date because of these additions to these cables which have doubled or trebled the number of channels. I think that is a very bad position for the Canadian government to be in. I feel that if we give permission to these cable companies to land cables in our country we ought to have the right, by right and not by favour, to know just how many channels they contain. It seems to me like a reasonable position.

What caused this bill to be brought here? I think it was the application of Commercial Cable for 24 outlets in a new coaxial cable which they proposed to lay from Canada to Greenland, to Iceland and to Great Britain. This cable, being a coaxial cable, will have 120 circuits. It was rather interesting to hear from Mr. Henderson, the company's witness, some information concerning this cable. I would refer this committee to what he said at page 204 of the evidence.

Mr. Green: On which day?

Mr. Hosking: Minutes and proceedings of evidence No. 4. He had this to say:

There has been a lot said with respect to the lease which we have from the government—

He is again referring to the United States government.

—if this cable is landed which provides for an annual rental of $1,600,000 per annum. I might add that that lease is not going to go on forever. All government—

He is again referring to the United States government.

—leases can be terminated. The annual operating expenses of this cable will be in the neighbourhood of $2·5 million which is far in excess of the $1,600,000 from the government.

He is again referring to the United States government. So we see the United States government is going to enter into a contract for 10 years at $1,600,000 per year to partly cover the operating costs of $2,500,000.

Let us look at the use of his cable. I think that is shown on page 209 of the same minutes of evidence. I come back to this question of cable again, and I should like to remind the committee that there are 120 circuits, and that they have requested that 24 be given to Canada. I think I should say at this time that it is the opinion of the minister that if we give this cable company the right to make one outlet from this cable available in Canada, the company then has the right to as many outlets as they wish. Under the existing law they could put the whole 120 in Canada if they wished to do that. The thing we see as unfair competition is that the United States government is paying $1,500,000 a year towards the operating costs of the cable—

Mr. Nicholson: $1,600,000.

Mr. Hosking:—$1,600,000, toward its operating cost. Let us see how they have dispersed the circuits of this cable. As I read a moment ago, Mr. Henderson's answer was:

I say we have a need for 86 channels.

Mr. Hosking: And if there are 24 of these channels available for Canada you would have only 10 spare channels to take care of any growth which might take place in the United States.

He had told us previously that the United States government was going to take so many of them and they had a certain number of channels already sold, and that would have left 10 channels available for growth. Mr. Henderson replied:

That is right.

Mr. Hosking: And you are saying to us that in the light of that situation it would be uneconomic to start to build this cable if you do not have any more outlets in Canada?

Mr. Henderson: We would not want to operate the cable unless we had more outlets in Canada.

Mr. Herridge: Is your loan predicated on your obtaining the Canadian business?

Mr. Henderson: No.

This tells me that the cable company can build this cable without any outlets in Canada at all; it does not require them. The loaning people are willing to loan the money to them to build this cable without having any outlets in Canada. The United States government is willing to finance this cable to the extent of $1,600,000 per year for ten years against an operating cost of $2,500,000, so the cable can be built whether or not we give them permission to have any outlets in Canada. We are not restricting in any way the operations of this company. This bill merely asks that we be permitted to say how many outlets come into Canada, and I can see no objection to it.

I would like in closing to make one more point. It was very interesting to hear Mr. Henderson tell us just what this company was willing to give to the country of Denmark for rights to land on Greenland. They were willing to give to the Danish government complete ownership of all the cable in Greenland's territorial waters and of all establishments on Greenland's soil. Surely we should be entitled to the same kind of rights in Canada. In fact, the bill being presented here does not ask for anything like the agreement this company was willing to give voluntarily to Greenland.

I point out to the committee that the government should have the right to know how many circuits there are between Canada and the continent of Europe. It should have the right to know of any change in the number of circuits that may develop due to engineering research. The government should also have the right to say how many outlets come into Canada from any of these cables.

I can see nothing wrong with this bill, and I would ask the committee to seriously consider if we should restrict our government in view of the fact that this company is willing to say to the government of Denmark, "We will give you all the cable in your territorial waters and complete ownership of everything we have in Greenland."

All we are asking for is the right to know about circuits and to license the outlets that come into Canada.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, the whole problem presented by this bill is very complicated, as I think the minister and all hon. members who sat on this committee would agree. We heard a great deal of evidence in the committee dealing with a highly technical subject which naturally for the layman was difficult to follow; but having had the opportunity to read over the evidence which was given before the committee and having had some time in which to consider it, I find there are certain points that make themselves evident.

There is a fear in the minds of at least some hon. members of the opposition parties that despite what the minister said concerning monopoly, such a situation will develop. I believe the minister referred to this four times. At page 202 of No. 4 of the minutes and proceedings of the committee the minister used words to the effect that the government had no intention whatever of setting up any kind of monopoly, either directly or indirectly. While the minister may have said that, and no one would question his integrity, there no doubt will be other ministers of transport after the present one, and they may have a different view; and the cabinet may, of course, change its opinion in this respect from time to time.

It is the fear of certain hon. members of the opposition that the powers under this act would enable the government, if it desired to do so, to set up a monopoly for the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, which many of us would not like to see happen. We have seen government monopolies in the C.B.C., Trans-Canada Air Lines and in other fields. Although I know some hon. members feel these are perfectly all right there are a great many people, and I would be almost inclined to say a majority of the people in this country, who do not favour government monopolies of this type. It is exactly because of this fear that another government monopoly may be set up or may be experiencing birth at the present time that we raise objection to this particular piece of legislation.

The situation at the present time seems to be somewhat as follows. The present cable companies such as the Commercial Cable corporation and Western Union may replace existing outlets—

Mr. Marler: Existing cables.

Mr. Nesbitt: —may replace existing cables. Thank you, Mr. Minister. I understand they may not put down any new ones. The minister has just said that they may replace existing cables, and I know that in the committee we had a great deal of discussion about just what the word "outlet" means. As I understand the position at the present time it is that these companies may replace existing cables but they may not replace these cables with a new kind of cable. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra pointed out in his remarks, I think it is very much the same as allowing the railways to replace wood-burning locomotives with diesels, because the new coaxial cables will apparently carry a great many more messages than the old type of cable that was laid down 50 or 75 years ago, when these cables were originally put down.

While the minister has just said that the government has no desire to regulate the additional number of outlets, I would like the minister to think over that statement because I am not certain that is exactly what he meant.

One objection to the minister's remarks that he heard throughout the committee proceedings was that the minister had indicated he was worried over the fact that the Commercial Cable corporation would have 24 additional outlets if these coaxial cables were laid down, and the minister felt this might endanger competition with the C.O.T.C. and even with Western Union.

Those hon. members of this house who were on the committee will recall that the witness for the Commercial Cable corporation pointed out that the reason they were making these additional outlets available for Canadian business was because they felt from their experience and as a result of investigations that the cable business in Canada would warrant these additional outlets within the next few years because Canada is a large and expanding country. We have certainly heard from hon. members in this house and particularly those on the government side about what a large and expanding economy we have, that things are fine and business is good. One witness for Commercial Cable pointed out that Canada had become a great commercial nation, and that to meet the needs of this modern and speedy world it was necessary to get in bids in order to purchase goods abroad in a hurry, and that service was demanded to meet these needs. Reference was made to many new types of service, the names of which I cannot recall, but I do remember reference to teletype and that sort of thing. For this reason it was felt that additional outlets would be necessary in the immediate future to carry on Canadian business.

The minister seemed to be concerned during the debate as to the effect of these outlets, and contended that they were not necessary at the present time. He seemed to be worried about the effect these additional outlets would have on the cable business. I was curious about that and asked him to explain, and I should like to quote from page 189 of the proceedings of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I asked the minister if the government had the power to control the rates on telecommunications, and the minister replied, as reported on page 189 of the proceedings, as follows:

> There are some provisions in the Telegraphs Act, but I am told there was a question as to whether they are effective inasmuch as they do not seem in their terms to extend beyond the territorial limits of Canada. There is also a provision in the Railway Act which would give jurisdiction to the board of transport commissioners over cable rates. My understanding is that that section of the act has not been proclaimed.

The minister has expressed doubt as to whether the government has authority to regulate rates for telecommunications at the present time, but I would think from the minister's statement that there would be no doubt that the government has authority. Last evening we heard something about jurisdiction over territorial waters. A cable must touch the mainland of Canada and to do so must come through Canadian territorial waters. In order to touch down at a mythical point, as we used to say in geometry, it would have to pass through at least three miles of Canadian territorial waters. Therefore the government would certainly have the power to legislate as to rates to be charged.

Then the minister said that the provision in the Railway Act which gave the board of transport commissioners power to regulate rates had not been proclaimed. I asked the minister whether it was intended to proclaim that section of the act, and he replied that they were quite satisfied that competition was keeping rates down at the present time.

Speaking of competition, the minister seemed to be concerned over the fact that Commercial Cable would receive an annual rental fee of $1,600,000 from the United States government, apparently for the carrying of defence messages or something of that nature. The minister felt that this would act as an indirect form of subsidy to that cable company which would put Commercial Cable in a better position than either C.O.T.C. or possibly Western Union. That seemed a little incomprehensible to me so I asked the minister certain questions about it, and I quote again from page 189 of the proceedings:

> Mr. Nesbitt: I would say in that connection, since you are in doubt as to whether any existing regulation would regulate rates by either the board of transport commissioners or anybody else, that there is a possibility; and one of the things which worries the government would be that because of the form of the subsidy to the Commercial Cable Company, that they might be able to engage in a rate war or something like that.
> Hon. Mr. Marler: Perhaps I should put it to you this way—that while the rates may be uniform the amount which might be spent to attract business might be greater in one case than another.
> Mr. Nesbitt: I see, you mean for advertising?
> Hon. Mr. Marler: Yes, or the amount paid under the traffic agreements might be greater in one case than in another. I am not suggesting that the company would do these things, but there is the possibility which I think should be considered at the same time that one talks about rates.

I think that shows quite clearly that this indirect form of subsidy to the Commercial Cable Company would not put them in a better position to operate in Canada, in other words to give unfair competition to C.O.T.C. or to Western Union or whoever may be their successors. I am afraid I cannot quite follow that line of reasoning, because cable messages are handled in this country by either Canadian National or Canadian Pacific telegraphs. If a message is sent by Canadian National I understand it is transmitted by Western Union; if it is picked up by Canadian Pacific it is sent either by Commercial Cable or Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. When the average person goes to send an overseas cable he goes to the telegraph office with which he is accustomed to deal. If he usually deals with the C.N. he goes to the C.N.; if he usually deals with the C.P., he goes there. The average person in this country does not know how his message is transmitted overseas. I doubt very much if hon. members of this committee, with the exception of those who happened to be on the standing committee, know that Commercial Cable Company carry Canadian Pacific messages and Western Union carry Canadian National messages.

To say that advertising done by Commercial Cable Company in Canada is going to encourage people to go to the C.P. office and say, "I want my message sent by Commercial Cable," or to go to the C.N. office and say, "I do not want to deal with the Canadian National because I want my messages to go by Commercial Cable," is rather hard to believe when the rates are the same. It does not make any sense. Sending a cable is somewhat like making a telephone call; provided the rates are the same you send it from the most convenient place.

If there is any fear in the mind of the minister that rates would not be kept the same by competition because of this indirect subsidy, control over rates could be exercised by the means mentioned by the minister. If it were thought that the amounts paid under traffic agreements were greater in one case than in the other; if either of these companies started to do that; if Commercial Cable started to do that, I submit that the board of transport commissioners could easily be given the power to control cable rates. Freight rates are controlled and nobody objects or considers it improper. If similar action appeared to be necessary in connection with telecommunications rates, similar action could be taken. We have never had evidence in the past that such action was necessary.

Changing the subject slightly, I should like to suggest that the purpose of these regulations is simply to protect the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation. One does not like to make statements when they are based on meagre evidence, but I have made inquiries at various telegraph offices and the information I have received is that at the present time—I am not saying that the service may not be improved in the future—the service provided by C.O.T.C. is not quite as good as that provided by Commercial Cable.

I asked what they meant by that. They said, "The message is sent and we have to follow it up" or "It has gone to the wrong address." "If we are dealing with Commercial Cable corporation we have no difficulty in following up the matter, but if we are dealing with C.O.T.C. it is difficult to trace the messages, and the service generally does not seem as good." This is a matter that can easily be corrected. It may be only a temporary thing. It may only have been the experience of the particular people I have asked about this, but it is indicative and it is something that is worth considering.

Because of the fact that the government apparently does not intend to allow these other companies to have additional outlets, I feel that this cannot but protect the C.O.T.C. Even if it is not a government monopoly at the moment, I cannot see how anything but this can result. If a company which has cables that have been laid 50 or 60 years ago, as the case may be, is going to replace these cables and it can only replace them with the same kind of cable, it is not very economical to do so. I think the old example of the replacement of the wood-burning engine with the diesel applies. I do not think it is reasonable for the government to expect that any commercial cable company would replace an old, antiquated type of cable with the same type. No doubt the cable company would simply say, "If we are to replace our 1883 cable with the same type of cable, when science has advanced so much since 1883, we are simply not going to do it." If these companies cannot put down modern cables when the time comes to replace them, I doubt very much if they would do anything else. Eventually a government monopoly would be set up.

There are one or two other matters which I would like to touch upon briefly. As indicted at page 202 of the report of the committee's proceedings the minister stated very clearly and without reservations that the government had no intention of setting up a monopoly. I was glad to hear that. However, as recorded at page 143 of the same report, I asked Mr. Corlett, who was the counsel for the Commercial Cable Company, the following question:

> Mr. Nesbitt: You fear possibly that the regulations set out in section 42 might even go to the extent that they would favour one company as against another because the conditions under which different companies operate are naturally different?
> Mr. Corlett: In answer to that question that could be the result because the language of the classes prescribing the duration, terms and conditions of licences and the fees for the issue thereof could be construed by the department in that way.
> Mr. Nesbitt: They might very well be so drawn up as to favour the C.O.T.C. as against any other company, and in fact become a discriminatory type of regulations?
> Mr. Corlett: I would say, theoretically, that is quite possible.

The minister made a reply to that, as recorded on page 180 of the proceedings. It reads as follows:

> Now, somebody seemed to think this morning that it would be possible that we might introduce discriminatory regulations. All I can say is: I do not think that in the whole of the history of Canada there has ever been a government which has so abused the power to make regulations as in fact to discriminate against one corporation in favour of some other corporation. I think it is perfectly clear that, if any such action were taken by any government, it would not long command the respect and support of the majority of the members of the House of Commons. I say that, regardless of which party may be in power. I fully realize that in theory one may adopt what would appear to be discriminatory provisions in the regulations but I cannot believe that the present government, or any future government, is going to adopt that action under this legislation.

That sounds very well, but when one considers that statement by the minister, while it is not exactly the same situation, one cannot help thinking of the C.B.C. and possibly certain other crown companies. Possibly Trans-Canada Air Lines has a somewhat preferred position over certain other air lines. Those are not exactly analogous, but they are close enough to bring the thought to one's mind. It may not be the intention, and since the minister has said so I am quite willing to accept his word that it is not the intention to do so at the present time. One cannot help feeling that in the future, once the pattern is set for legislation of this kind, the opportunity is there for somebody else to do it in the future, and the present government certainly has the idea in mind of indulging in, we should say, the luxury of crown corporations. We have seen plenty of evidence of that, and I think that is one reason a number of the members of this house, including myself, are worried and suspicious about this legislation.

Finally, the hon. member for Wellington South in his remarks, which were in many ways enlightening and interesting, said he thought the reason for this legislation was that the government had the right to know how many cable outlets there were in and out of Canada. No one would quarrel with the hon. member in that statement. Of course the government has the right to know that, and I do not think anybody would disagree with him about that, but is that the whole intention of this?

Mr. Hosking: May I ask the hon. member a question? Have they that information now?

Mr. Nesbitt: They have—

Mr. Hosking: Perhaps they could give it to us, but we do not have it.

Mr. Nesbitt: Nobody would have any objection to the government having the right to know how many cables come in and go out of Canada. It is something the government should know, and some future regulations might be necessary, but it is the question of the restrictions and laying down the terms and conditions that are the cause for worry. As shown on page 142 of these proceedings, I asked the minister in the committee whether the department would have the authority to refuse a licence if the terms and conditions as laid down in the regulations were fulfilled. I quote from page 142 as follows:

> Mr. Nesbitt: What we would like to know is this: do the Department of Justice officials feel under these provisions here that there is the absolute right of refusal notwithstanding compliance with the mechanical form of the application?
> Hon. Mr. Marler: An application of what kind?
> Mr. Nesbitt: For this type of licence?
> Hon. Mr. Marler: We shall try to answer that question.

I do not think we have had an answer to that as yet. Perhaps when the minister makes his statement he might be able to inform us what opinions the Department of Justice officials have eventually arrived at.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, to finish the remarks I was making before we adjourned for the noon recess, I should like to close with a thought I have already mentioned several times, namely that the minister seemed greatly concerned and, in fact, his chief reason for refusing permission to the Commercial Cable corporation to land its proposed coaxial cable was the fact that the company was to receive an annual guaranteed rental of $1,600,000 a year for 10 years from the United States government. As I have already mentioned, the reason was given that this was in effect a form of subsidy which would give the Commercial Cable corporation a possible advantage over Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation and even Western Union. I think I have touched on the various reasons why I do not agree with the minister that this is correct, but there is one more point I should like to make in this respect before I take my seat.

It was suggested in the committee that the minister would certainly be able to call into being the section of the Railway Act which would enable the government to control rates for overseas cables. I have not the quotation in front of me and if I am wrong I am quite sure the minister will correct me, but at that time the minister implied that he thought competition was a better way than regulation to deal with the rates.

I mentioned earlier in my remarks that I do not think that necessarily follows, because Canadian railway rates are regulated and no one has any complaint about that. But even in the event that the board of transport commissioners do not want to take the power to regulate overseas telecommunication rates I think that the Commercial Cable corporation is in no better position than C.O.T.C., let us say, because of the $1,600,000 a year for 10 years by way of guaranteed rent that they are to get from the United States government.

The answer is this. Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation undoubtedly and unquestionably has government loans or funds at its disposal if necessary. Last year C.O.T.C. received a loan of $6 million. As the minister pointed out at page 198 of the report of the proceedings of the committee, C.O.T.C. paid interest on the loan. That is quite true. We would expect they would. But if C.O.T.C. were faced in the future with a rate war or needed money for capital expansion or anything else, I have very little doubt that they would get any loan they required to carry on business and meet any competition.

As I pointed out to the minister in the committee, knowing that it is very doubtful if any private company in its right mind would attempt to start a rate war with the financial power of the Canadian government behind C.O.T.C. It was mentioned in the committee that we would not want to subsidize C.O.T.C. in order that it could give cheaper rates. I do not think that will ever be necessary. No private company, no matter how big it may be, is as big as the government. Commercial Cable or Western Union or Western Union's successor would never attempt any kind of rate war with C.O.T.C., because the boards of directors of those companies know perfectly well what would happen and would never set out on such a course. I think it is ridiculous to suggest that they would. I bring that last thought to mind in answer to the minister's objection to granting a landing licence for the proposed new cable of Commercial Cable corporation.

To sum up, in the first place the fact is that C.O.T.C. could, if necessary, get whatever loans it required. Second, the board of transport commissioners could regulate the rates if there were any question of a rate war. Third, even with the advantage that the minister suggests Commercial Cable would have because of this form of subsidy from the United States government, I do not see how that could be used to channel all the business into the new line of communication that Commercial Cable proposes, because in sending cablegrams advertising would have very little effect for the reasons I pointed out earlier. For the reasons I and my colleagues have set out we cannot agree to this legislation.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief. I was a member of the standing committee and I think it is one of the best committees of the house. I admired the way in which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard—

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. McIvor: Well, some place in Vancouver—presented his case. He did it intelligently, but he did not take as much time as he has taken today. If we want legislation of this kind to go before the committee, then surely the committee has some weight. We passed the bill when it was before the committee. Of course I admit there were enough intelligent members of the house on the committee to pass the bill. I do not think we should take any more time with the bill, because I am one of those who were members of the committee and I have not changed my mind and I doubt if anybody else on the committee has.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, I too was a member of that committee, but my mind is in the same state as that of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I should like to say a few words on this simple little bill amending the Telegraphs Act which apparently involves a controversial subject. I should like to read the new section 41 set out in clause 1 of the bill. It is in these words:

> 41. No person shall in Canada
> (a) operate an external submarine cable; or > (b) construct, alter, maintain or operate any works or facilities for the purpose of operating an external submarine cable > except under and in accordance with a licence issued under this part.

No doubt there are not too many in the house who have too much intimate knowledge about the matter of submarine cables. However, many of us have read accounts of the hazards encountered by those early adventurers who laid the first submarine cables across the vast expanses of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. The first of these cables was laid between England and France in 1850, and after several attempts were made the first submarine cable was laid across the Atlantic in 1856. By 1928 there were 21 submarine cables spanning the Atlantic ocean.

We might think that with the advent of radio and radio communication around the world, submarine cables would have become obsolete. However, with the increase in international trade and the development of diplomatic services throughout the world there is an indication of a necessity for more submarine cables.

There have been a great many changes made in the types of cable used since the first cable was laid and also in the techniques that can be used to increase the efficiency and capacity of the cables already laid. The latest type seems to be the coaxial cable, which will take not only cable messages but telephone voice conversations, television pictures and so forth. However, although there are 21 or more of the older types of cables across the Atlantic, there are only a limited number of companies that will be affected by the new amending bill, No. 212.

All these companies have been operating for many years under special charters given to them by this parliament under the provisions of the Telegraphs Act, which was brought into force in 1875. Therefore in the first place it is rather hard to understand why the bill is necessary, when the companies have had to comply with all the terms of their own charters as well as with the terms of the Telegraphs Act, one provision of which reads as follows:

> 22. The company shall not exercise any of the powers by this part conferred until
> (a) the company has submitted to the governor in council, a plan and survey of the proposed site and location of such telegraph and its approaches at the shore, and of its stations, offices and accommodations on land and of all the intended works thereto appertaining, . . .

Let us look into the history of one of these companies that will be affected by this bill. Probably the one with the most business is the one owned by the government themselves, namely C.O.T.C. This was a government company that was formed as a crown corporation by act of this government in 1949, which brought about the amalgamation of two companies, one called the Marconi Company and the other Cable and Wireless Limited. I should like to say that the move that was made at that time to nationalize commonwealth telecommunication services resulted in control of the cable system to the extent of some 80 per cent by the British government—this was brought out in the evidence in 1949—a fact which would certainly strengthen the position of the crown corporation; and it is understood that at the present time they control 40 per cent of the Canadian business.

In 1953 this crown corporation began plans which will be finished in 1956 for the laying of one of the most modern and most efficient types of coaxial cables across the Atlantic. No doubt this will increase and speed up the service they are able to give, and will give them a decided advantage over other companies in the business.

Enough for the government crown corporation. Let us look for a moment at one of the private companies affected, namely Commercial Cable company. This is a company which has been in business for many years in Canada, since they were given a charter in 1884 by the government. No doubt they did much of the spade work in making available to all the people and corporations in Canada the advantage of overseas telecommunciation services. Their cables were laid, one in 1884, one in 1894, one in 1900, one in 1905 and the latest in 1943. I might say that this company is manned and managed in Canada entirely by Canadians.

Back about 1950 the Commercial Cable company, having great faith in the possibilities of Canada as the fastest growing nation in the world, realized it needed new cables of the improved coaxial type in order to take care of the increased demands upon its services. In 1953 they reported their intentions to the Canadian government. But according to section 22 of the Telegraphs Act which I just read they had to submit all their plans and specifications to the governor in council for his approval.

This they did in September, 1954, after extensive delays caused by extensive surveys, change of the route requested by the government, financing and other matters, in a well prepared and complete application covering practically every detail. They were to have 24 outlets in Canada available as needed over the years to come. All such new business as was obtained would be at rates controlled by the transport department of the government of Canada. A meeting was arranged at which the cable company would present their case. They were told by the chairman, even before the application was considered, that they could not do what they wanted to do. At this meeting the advice of the president of C.O.T.C., the crown corporation which is in competition, was asked. Nothing further was decided at this meeting.

After six months of argument, permission was given to land on the coast of Canada and to pass through, but the Commercial Cable company was denied outlets in Canada except those requested by the crown corporation or those that were necessary for defence. This was a company that was willing to risk its own capital and which would leave hundreds of thousands of dollars in Canada annually. Some reference was made in the committee to the point that this was a wholly controlled United States company. I wonder why the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not rise in their defence. This is a United States company willing to provide service in Canada for Canadians at no cost to Canadian taxpayers, with no request for any loans or assistance from the Canadian government. Yet its application is being denied because the minister believes it will create unnecessary duplication of telegraph facilities. In this connection I should like to quote from a recent letter in the Globe and Mail which reads as follows:

This is the situation:

A new cable is being laid now—it will be ready in a matter of months—by the British government and American Telegraph and Telephone, primarily for telephone use, but with some telegraph circuits. Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation will get the use of six of those circuits. Transport Minister Marler said there is no demand in sight for any more.

Commercial Cable company says there is. It says it has five customers anxious to get leased circuits—private lines, in effect—and business on hand for seven to ten more. It doesn't think any of the 24 would go begging for traffic. Mr. Marler says that any more than the six the crown company is to get would mean unnecessary duplication of facilities.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I very much object to the reading into the record of this letter attributing to me statements that were made neither in the House of Commons nor in the committee. It seems to me that it is a most unsuitable way of putting on Hansard opinions attributed to me but which I have never expressed.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): As reported in the evidence, the minister said he believed it would create unnecessary duplication of telegraph facilities. The letter goes on to say this:

> The phrase has a familiar ring. A couple of years ago when Canadian Pacific Air Lines wanted to enter the trans-continental air freight business —it did not think Trans-Canada Air Lines was fully exploiting the field—the government decided that to grant the application would be to create unnecessary duplication of facilities.

I do not think this is the case. It almost looks as though the government owned crown corporation cannot stand competition. Competition is the life of trade, and hence should be sponsored on every hand. Back in 1949 the then minister of transport insisted that this would not create a monopoly. I sometimes wonder when I hear the Minister of Justice so many times speaking about monopolies. Here is an article in the Globe and Mail entitled "Monopolistic Act". It reads in part as follows:

> Anchor man of this team is the Hon. Stuart Garson, who joined the Ottawa circuit after a long run in Manitoba. Whenever the act seems to be flagging, Mr. Garson can be counted on to rush in from the wings, holding up some business group as a horrid example of the evils of monopoly.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, this is all very interesting but it has nothing whatever to do with the bill about which we are talking. I suggest that the hon. gentleman should address his remarks to the bill and not talk about other matters that are extraneous to it.

The Chairman: I agree that the extract which the hon. member is now reading has no apparent relevancy to this bill. I must ask him to confine his remarks to clause 1 of Bill No. 212.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, I was just trying to indicate that this bill is an indication that the government is creating a monopoly in this field, when C.O.T.C. is given special privileges and these same privileges are denied to other private companies to such an extent that C.O.T.C., by the addition of their new, more efficient coaxial cable can squeeze out by reduced costs and hence reduced rates, fair and just competition.

In the evidence given in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines we have from Mr. Alistair Macdonald, counsel and solicitor for Western Union Telegraph Company, a statement which shows just how they feel about this matter.

> At the outset, may I state that Western Union feels that the language of the pending bill appears to be plenary and enabling in nature and is so broad that if enacted could establish the means through its licensing power to obstruct, and even destroy, the present lawful international telegraph operations of Western Union; and, in fact, such power could be used to effect a confiscation of Western Union's existing contract rights and legislative grants, thus, additionally, rendering valueless all plant, equipment and other assets validly established in Canada under applicable law stretching back over decades.

I think that sums it up, Mr. Chairman. I feel that this enabling bill is unfair to private corporations that have been in the business for many years. So I go along with my colleagues who have already spoken on this measure, in registering my objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. Hees: The aim of this measure is obviously the protection of another crown corporation against competition.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. Hees: I wrote it myself, just a few minutes ago. The policy the government is putting forward in this regard is simply consistent with the policy it has always adopted toward these crown corporations. For instance, T.C.A. has always refused to allow competition in both freight and passenger services. The C.B.C. television has refused to allow competition in television services in the large cities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, competition produces greater efficiency, resulting in lower prices to the consuming public and in better service. Monopoly produces just the reverse. It produces higher prices and inferior service to the public. What this parliament should be endeavouring to do is get the best possible deal for the consuming public of Canada, and that can only be done by enabling private corporations to compete with crown companies if those private corporations wish to enter the field and take a chance of making a success in that particular line of business. If the private company cannot make a go of it and fails, the only loser is the company itself. The taxpayers of Canada are not affected in any way at all. If, on the other hand, the crown corporation cannot get sufficient business to keep it going by offering lower prices and better service, then I think it is obvious the crown corporation should leave the field to those companies that can.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I strongly object, as do my colleagues who have spoken on this matter, to one more move toward establishing another government monopoly.

Mr. Small: I shall not take very much of the time of the committee. I was glad to be a member of the committee and to have been included in that select coterie by the hon. member for Fort William as one of the intelligent members of the committee. I am not a technical man or an engineer, but it appears to me that a company that has been in operation for some 72 years, which received its charter from this parliament and has given reasonably good service, should be allowed to continue. There has been no complaint about the company up to the present time. In fact they have done more than they were asked to do under their charter. The rate was set at 25 cents per word but, as the hon. member for Wellington South has said, they reduced it to 15 cents. In view of all these facts we should like to know the reason for the proposed change.

The purpose of the amendment is set forth as follows:

> The purpose of the proposed new part is to provide for the control of submarine cables terminating in or passing through Canadian territory.

Under the terms of the charter the company obtained they were allowed to land cables and operate telegraphs and telephones, but they decided that the part of the business they wanted to operate was the cables. Up to the present time they have complied with all the regulations set out under the various acts passed by this parliament. There was one act which applied to cables, and there were regulations in connection with telegraph lines. The company kept its plant and system up to date and, as was stated, laid six new cables. Then they reached the point where they wanted to apply the advances that had been made in that particular phase of the business, so they took the usual procedure of applying to this government for the right to replace the worn out part with moder equipment. The government said no, that could not be done.

If the government wants to go into public ownership—I have no objection and I think it is a good thing for the government to go into public ownership in some things—they should do so only if there is some reason for it, such as exorbitant prices being charged or lack of service. It is for those reasons that governments go into public ownership. However, those reasons are not present in this case. For example, the city of Toronto took over the Toronto street railway because they were not giving service, would not expand and the people of Toronto were dissatisfied. At the time the franchise was to be renewed the city refused to renew it, so the case was taken to court and settled agreeably to both parties concerned.

The same conditions were present in the case of Ontario hydro. The residents of Ontario were being charged exorbitant rates for electricity and they were not getting the service. The power barons of those days were mulcting the people of Ontario in that area around Niagara so it was decided, under Adam Beck, to go into the field of public ownership. I could cite other examples showing the reasons for going into public ownership, but in this particular case there is no reason.

As I have explained, the company has not charged high rates and has given good service. It has given as good service as any other company operating in the field. Perhaps if I read from the brief of the Canadian cable company you would see why this amendment has been introduced. The company went through the usual form in making a request to replace the cable, as they had every right to do under their charter. As I have said, the government said no, they could not put in anything new; it must be the same as was there already.

Mr. Marler: I do not want to have such a statement attributed to me by the hon. member, and I am sure he will not find anything in the committee evidence to support it. I do not think he really wishes to say that, either.

Mr. Small: The impression I received when the minister was explaining it before the committee was that if they wished to replace one of the existing cables they could do so; but they could not put in the coaxial cable which they were requesting at that time. I think the members of the committee will bear me out on that.

Mr. Hosking: Do you not mean that they could go ahead and build the coaxial cable from New York to St. John's, Newfoundland, I think it was, and from there to Greenland, Iceland and England, but we would not give them permission to have one outlet because if they had one they could have 120?

Mr. Small: As far as the government were concerned the situation was that they would allow them to put the cable down but they were not to have an outlet; and obviously if you are not going to have an outlet there is no use to have a cable.

Mr. Hosking: It was to run from New York, remember.

Mr. Small: I understood too that if they were going to replace the cable they would have to replace it as it was before.

Mr. Hosking: No, no.

Mr. Small: Well, that may not be your impression, but it was the impression I got.

An hon. Member: Why do you not go over with the minister?

Mr. Small: However, we will leave that for the time being. The fact is that they want an outlet in Canada and they want to put down the coaxial cable. That is the point at which they were stopped, because it is going to interfere with a company that has been in operation since 1949.

The point I want to bring out will be best illustrated if I read from the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for Wednesday, July 11, 1956. I propose to read from the brief presented by the Commercial Cable Company as reported at page 73 of the proceedings:

> Now it is a fact that the Telegraphs Act, section 22, does speak in terms of applying to the governor in council and actually I believe that is the practice that this company has followed in connection with all the cables which have been laid to date—all six of them. It is a matter of interest that in 1923 when an application was made to the then secretary of state, the late Senator Copp recited the statutory authority we had under the 1884 statute and the regulatory provisions that existed under what is now section 22 of the Telegraphs Act, and the company was officially advised by the secretary of state that in view of these provisions it was not necessary to apply to the governor in council at all, as long as a landing licence was obtained from the then minister of marine and fisheries, but the practice and policy of the company has always been to co-operate with the proper authorities of the federal government whenever possible and it is a fact that an application was made in every instance although, as I say, there is some legal doubt as to whether the company is obliged to do so or not.

I do not want to go into that particular phase of it, because the lawyers can argue concerning that matter; but the company does have a point there. What I want to arrive at is that there were certain transactions which took place in the years preceding this, and they date back to 1937. I shall read some more of the evidence that was submitted in the brief:

> As far as any licensing provision is concerned I would say that the company has no objection to being subjected to a licensing system as such, provided that in exercising such a licensing system the statutory rights of the company as expressed in the statute of 1884 are not nullified. And, secondly, that any system of licensing that does exist will not be exercised in favour of Commercial Cable Corporation's big competitor, about which I will have something to say in a minute, namely, the C.O.T.C.—the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation, which is a crown company and the hon. members will remember that it was created by a statute of this parliament at the second session in 1949.

This is the part which I think is the nub of the question as to why the amendment was brought in. The brief continues:

> Now, to complicate things—I am giving this to you as background in order that you can perhaps better understand the plea which we are putting forward today—the background of cable communications is confused, I might say, by a series of commonwealth communication agreements. The various self-governing countries of the commonwealth have entered into a series of agreements dating back over a number of years. There was one in 1928, the imperial wireless and cables conference, and if you look at the statutes of 1929 you will see that the parliament of Canada implemented part of the report of that imperial conference with reference to the Pacific cable.
> Coming down to 1937, there was another commonwealth empire—I think it was called—rate conference in 1937. As a result of that conference, a number of things were agreed upon by the participants including Canada. Canada had a delegate at that conference. Now, it is not possible at this date to obtain a copy of the report, if there was ever a copy made for public distribution; but reference is made to this by Mr. Connelly of the Department of Transport when he was testifying before this committee when the C.O.T.C. bill was before this committee on November 8, 1949. He gave a review of what happened.
> Dealing with this 1937 conference, he stated on page 13 of the proceedings of evidence of that day, that it was agreed by the commonwealth government that: They would "continue the policy of resisting the authorization or opening of new circuits which would be detrimental to Cable and Wireless Limited or its associates in the British empire.

Mr. Hosking: Does it say anything there about coaxial cables?

Mr. Small: The building of coaxial cables and reference to other equipment does not get away from the point I am trying to bring out. In my opinion the amendment to the bill has been brought down for the sole purpose of implementing something that has already been agreed upon but which has never been presented to this house for approval or disapproval and for a proper understanding. I am referring to the agreements with other participating countries in the commonwealth. I think it would suffice if I were to read one more paragraph from the evidence. The following appears on page 76:

> Our whole case is presented, and who is there, sitting in judgment, but none other than our competitor C.O.T.C. and their English counterpart the British post office. We submit that that is not a good thing or fair from the standpoint of a private company. The upshot of that application was that on February 9, 1955, a decision was made and we were advised by the minister that in so far as through coaxial cable—that is a cable coming from Europe to the United States—was concerned it was in order to be landed at Newfoundland or Nova Sctoia but that no local outlets would be allowed to Commercial Cable Corporation in Canada, notwithstanding the fact that since 1886, Commercial Cable Corporation never operated land lines but entered into an interchange agreement with the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company and have been working with them by agreement ever since.

This reputable company has been in operation for 72 years. If the government is not receiving from Commercial Cable Corporation a sufficient return under the agreement and if it needs more, it should charge more or work out some basis of operation to incorporate them into their plan instead of going about it in this way.

The minister said something to the effect that if they so desired they could expropriate this company but they chose not to do so. The method they are presently adopting may be all right according to their way of thinking, but they are not even attempting to expropriate the company; rather they are trying to exterminate the company completely. If the company is not given an opportunity to expand and apply present day technical advances to its business what is the company going to do? If that is the minister's intention it should be revealed to the house. But if he wants to tie the C.O.T.C. in with the British commonwealth agreements, then he should bring in a proposal which we could understand and pass upon; but if it is the intention to double-shuffle this company out of the vested interests it has had for 70 years, to my way of thinking that is not a fair deal.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in this debate until I listened to the hon. member for Broadview. I shall not comment upon the last speech, but I would like to say that as far as I am concerned—and I think I speak for other members in this group—as long as our friends in the Tory party engage in constructive criticism of government policy we are all for it, but when they start putting out a line of balderdash as the hon. member for Broadview did a few minutes ago I do not see why we should have to sit here and listen to it.

I have one or two questions I should like to put to the hon. member and some of his colleagues. First, I should like to ask them who does the 60 per cent of the overseas cable business that C.O.T.C. is not handling today? Second, I should like to ask if the government were creating a monopoly, publicly or privately owned, why they should be worrying about a bill to provide for the licensing of companies? It seems to me that the very terms of this bill are the best possible refutation for some of the arguments being put forward. There would not be any need to license companies if there were going to be a government monopoly in operation. That would be under the direct control of the government and therefore under the control of this parliament.

If we were having a debate on the merits or demerits of having our cable communications handled by a publicly owned monopoly, that would be legitimate; but I listened for four days to the discussion in the standing committee during which time we heard many objections and listened to a lot of extraneous matter. But everyone was given a hearing, and I see no point in coming back to this committee and reading into the record long excerpts from the minutes of the standing committee, attempting to create the impression that what was done in the committee was something different from what actually happened. We had all that out in the committee pro and con, and it is there on the record for hon. members to examine.

The particular licensing bill now before us has nothing to do with the creating of a monopoly in the C.O.T.C., nor has it anything to do with the application being made by a cable company for permission to instal another cable. As was clearly brought out, that is a matter which comes before the Minister of Transport under an existing section of the act. I am not going to say any more, but I do think we should try to consider this matter in some sort of proper perspective.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to say that I think there is a great deal of confusion in the minds of members of the Progressive Conservative party as to the purposes of this bill. As I listened to the comments made this morning and this afternoon one could almost imagine that the bill had as its object the dealing with the application of Commercial Cable company for the right to lay another coaxial cable in the North Atlantic.

Mr. Small: You mean another one?

Mr. Marler: I mean just what I said.

Mr. Small: You said another.

Mr. Marler: Perhaps if the hon. member will bear with me he will realize that I used the word advisedly and I think correctly. I shall come back to the Commercial Cable application which, strictly speaking, I do not think is relevant to this bill but which I would as soon discuss as not, because I know if I do not discuss it then it will be suggested that I was afraid to meet that particular issue.

I should like to refer briefly to the existing facilities in the North Atlantic and those which are in process of being created. There are three cable companies operating transatlantic cables, Western Union, Commercial Cable company and the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. Western Union operates eight cables having a capacity of 45 simplex circuits which are equal to 22½ duplex circuits.

I want to emphasize the meaning of a duplex circuit, because that is the unit which has been used in describing the operations of Commercial Cable and it is one which I think is quite convenient in considering the capacity of the existing cables. So we have Western Union with eight cables having at the present time 22½ duplex circuits. Hon. members of the committee will remember that a duplex circuit is one over which transmission may take place simultaneously in either direction.

In addition to Western Union's facilities, Commercial Cable has actually six cables, but we were told that one is no longer in operating condition and is not included in the figures which were given before the committee or in those I am about to give as indicating the capacity. Those five cables which they now have contain 19 simplex circuits or 9½ duplex circuits. Then in addition, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, to which I shall refer as C.O.T.C., is the lessee but not the owner of two other cables which have a combined capacity of 2 duplex circuits.

In a word, Western Union have 22½; Commercial Cable have 9½ and C.O.T.C. have 2 duplex circuits. That represents the present cable capacity passing from the United States through Canada to the United Kingdom. I should like to emphasize the very small part which C.O.T.C. have of the whole, 2 duplex circuits out of a total of 34. I think it takes a good deal of imagination to suggest that 2 out of 34 would produce the kind of condition which could be described as a monopoly. I am going to come back to the question of monopoly a little later, but I merely want to stress the number of circuits which are available to C.O.T.C. in relation to the total.

That is the situation which exists at the present time. As hon. members know, there is in process of being laid a transatlantic telephone cable which is the joint venture of the Canadian government through C.O.T.C., the United Kingdom through the postmaster general, and American Telephone and Telegrah and its Canadian subsidiary, Eastern Telephone and Telegraph. So far as I am aware this is the first coaxial cable which has been laid or which has been in contemplation of being laid across the Atlantic ocean. I do not know of any other case where a coaxial cable has been used as a submarine cable.

At this point I want to stress the significant difference between an ordinary cable, whether loaded or non-loaded, and a coaxial cable. I think hon. members will appreciate this distinction, not because I shall attempt to describe the physical qualities of the coaxial cable as opposed to a loaded or non-loaded cable but merely in terms of capacity.

The cable of maximum capacity at the present time is one which is operated by Western Union. It has a capacity of eight simplex circuits, that is, four duplex circuits. None of the other cables has a capacity of more than three duplex circuits; some of them only one and some just a little more. The coaxial cable, the cable which is a joint project of Canada, the United Kingdom and American Telephone and Telegraph, will contain 36 voice channels, and its capacity, expressed in duplex circuits is somewhere around 800. So the new coaxial cable is capable of carrying, in round figures, something like 100 times as much in the way of messages as any cable that is functioning at the present time; and when I say "any cable" I am talking, of course, of submarine cable and not about coaxial cables when used for operations on land.

The point I have tried to emphasize particularly is that the introduction of the coaxial cable has completely revolutionized telecommunications, and particularly telecommunications by submarine cable. Before the coaxial cable was available and could be used for these purposes, that is, as a submarine cable, there was an economic limitation imposed by the cable itself on the number of new circuits that could at any time be introduced and made available by any cable company. In 1928, when the latest cable was laid, it provided only six simplex circuits, or three duplex. I particularly want to stress the fact that the coaxial cable has revolutionized the transmission of cables and of telecommunications in all their forms, for the simple reason that the increase in capacity is so remarkable in contrast to what existed prior to the development of the coaxial cable.

Coming back to the T.A.T., the telephone cable, it has 36 voice circuits. Of these the Canadian share is 6½ circuits, leaving a remainder of 29½ circuits, which will be devoted to traffic originating in the United States. These 29 voice circuits are to be used for telephone business, and not for the purposes of transmission of telegrams or cables. Of the 6½ circuits that are attributed to Canada and which are to be operated by the C.O.T.C., six are to be used for voice circuits and the other half voice circuit, which is considered to be equivalent to 11 or perhaps 12 telegraph duplex circuits in the circumstances will be available for Canadian business in all forms of cable transmission, whether it is a simple message, a leased wire, telex, teletype and so on. All those services will be available through the 11 or 12 circuits that C.O.T.C. will have in this half voice circuit to which I referred a moment ago.

I should like to take this occasion to correct the figure that I think I mentioned in the committee that there would be six telegraph circuits, as I have since been informed that I should have said 11 or 12. Of course there may be more, with the development of other techniques, but I have been thinking in terms of 11 or 12 circuits for telegraph purposes.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether those circuits correspond with the 24 circuits proposed by Commercial Cable?

Mr. Marler: Perhaps the hon. member will permit me to answer that question in just a minute. I was in fact just coming to that point. This trans-Atlantic telegraph cable to which I have just referred will, as has been stated earlier, be finished early in October, and I think it will be going into service at approximately that time. It was in the light of those facts that the application of the Commercial Cable company had to be considered.

I wish to emphasize particularly that the proposals of the Commercial Cable company contemplated the laying of a cable which would have a capacity of 120 duplex circuits. So far as we understood the matter, whilst it was possible that two voice circuits would be used, which would take up approximately 24 of the duplex circuits, for telephone purposes, we have been inclined to consider it as a cable project rather than as a telephone project. Of the 120, 24 of these duplex circuits were to be terminated in Canada.

I should like hon. members to appreciate exactly the significance of that figure of 24. The capacity to which I have been referring and which is being used. The 34 existing duplex circuits carry all the present cable business between the United States and Canada at the western end and the continent of Europe at the eastern end. I should like hon. members to note that here we have 34 circuits to carry all that business, and now the Commercial Cable company asks that we should permit it to terminate in Canada 24 more duplex channels, which in itself is almost as much—not quite as much—as the whole of the present installed cable capacity in the north Atlantic.

The information I have is that the Canadian business of Commercial Cable can be carried fairly efficiently on one duplex circuit. That may be too conservative an estimate, and it may be that two duplex circuits are required. It may be the fact that it can route messages down to New York and put them on the cable at the New York end. This perhaps means that one duplex circuit, strictly speaking, takes care of what might be called the strictly Canadian traffic that moves on to the cable, but whether it is one or two is, I think, not material. I wish to point out that the application of Commercial Cable is to open 24 circuits in Canada, in addition to the 11 duplex circuits that C.O.T.C. will be putting into operation in October of this year.

Before I finish with the Commercial Cable application, I should just like to mention one or two factors that were, let us say, glossed over this morning by the members of the Progressive Conservative party. The fact remains that this 120 duplex channel cable, which Commercial Cable proposed to lay if its application were granted, was to be in receipt of $1,600,000 per annum for circuits to be rented to the United States government. The project was strongly urged upon us as being necessary for the defence both of the United States and Canada and of the United Kingdom. Had it not been for that fact, I think it would not have gone as far as it actually did go. But, as was pointed out this morning, this cable was to start from the United States, touch in Canada, first in Nova Scotia and then go across to Newfoundland, then go to Greenland, then to Iceland and then to the United Kingdom. Consequently, there were a number of governments whose approval and consent had to be obtained.

I am not in a position to divulge all of the information we received in that connection, but I should like to emphasize first of all that all of the governments were impressed with the desirability of the cable for defence purposes and for that reason gave, somewhat unwillingly, I think, a limited form of approval to the project. So far as Canada is concerned, the reply which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra read into the record this morning shows that the government, feeling that there was a defence need, agreed to the cable being laid by Commercial Cable Company and to defence circuits being terminated in Canada if our existing facilities were not sufficient for defence needs.

We did say, and I shall not attempt to gloss over the matter, that if any commercial circuits were to be opened they would have to be leased to C.O.T.C. I make no apology for that, Mr. Chairman. I think that was an arrangement which accorded to the project the importance it had as a project for defence. But the truth of the matter is that the company was not satisfied to go ahead with the project unless it had these 24 circuits that would terminate in Canada. In other words, it was not sufficient for this company to have all of the business that the government of the United States was prepared to pay for, all of the United States commercial business that was there and all of the business that there was in prospect, as described in very glowing terms by Mr. Henderson, vice-president of the Commercial Cable Company, but they must also have 24 more duplex circuits terminating in Canada.

As Minister of Transport, Mr. Chairman, I have the responsibility of recommending to my colleagues in the cabinet the action that ought to be taken in that particular field of activity, and I may assure members of the house that I could not see my way clear to recommending the unqualified acceptance of the application of Commercial Cable to open 24 duplex circuits in Canada when the company was in receipt of a rental of $1,600,000 which represented somewhere around 65 per cent of the total operating cost, including interest. The hon. member for Oxford and others who spoke this morning suggested that there was no particular danger that might result from the fact that the Commercial Cable Company might receive $1,600,000 from the United States government. What disturbed me was that that was perhaps just the beginning of what the company might be receiving and that in the event that other circuits would be leased the amount that would be paid by the United States government would represent an unduly high proportion of the operating cost, including interest, and in effect that would mean that the facilities that the Commercial Cable Company would be providing in Canada through the 24 circuits to be terminated there would be cable service provided as a by-product of a large project financed by United States government funds.

I did not feel that I could recommend the granting of a landing permit to Commercial Cable for that particular project. As I said in the committee, I feel that we should have the opportunity to see what need there is for additional circuits when those to be opened by C.O.T.C. are made available some time in October of this year.

I should like to deal very briefly, because I do not think it is necessary to say very much about it, with the question of trying to make a monopoly of C.O.T.C. I ask hon. members to consider this simple fact. It is not necessary for the government to introduce Bill No. 212 in order to refuse applications for the landing of further cables. It is sufficient to read the express terms of section 22 of the Telegraphs Act which I should like to put on the record. Section 22 reads:

> The company—

At this point I am referring to marine electric telegraph companies, the name by which these cable companies are known in the statute.

> —shall not exercise any of the powers by this part conferred until
> (a) the company has submitted to the governor in council, a plan and survey of the proposed site and location of such telegraph and its approaches at the shore, and of its stations, offices and accommodations on land and of all the intended works thereto appertaining,
> (b) such plan, site and location have been approved by the governor in council, and
> (c) such conditions as he thinks fit for the public good to impose touching the said telegraph and works, have been complied with.

When we received the application of the Commercial Cable Company the deputy minister of justice was asked his opinion as to whether or not the granting of a landing permit, which is the name commonly applied to the form of permit that is given under section 22, was mandatory or not. The deputy minister replied that the question of whether the approval required by this statute is to be given by the governor in council or withheld is one to be determined by the governor in council as a matter of policy. He said that he did not find in the act any provision, express or implied, that fetters the discretion of the governor in council and that he could in his view refuse to approve the plan, site or location of the proposed cable on any ground that he considered to be in the public interest.

In other words, if, as was suggested by some of the members of the Progressive Conservative party this morning, the government desired to prevent any expansion by either Western Union or the Commercial Cable Company it would not be necessary for us to introduce Bill No. 212. All that would be necessary for us to do would be to resist, if I may use the word that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra quoted from one of the agreements, and to refuse to grant under any conditions any applications that might be made for landing permits.

Mr. Green: That is what you are doing now.

Mr. Marler: I know that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra cannot wait to get it out—and provided that the decision is taken for the public good. Is that what the hon. gentleman wanted to say? I am quite sure that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, who has practised law a long time, will not deny the fact that it would be very easy to find reasons for the public good that might be invoked as a ground for the refusal of almost any application that might be made for a new cable.

Mr. Green: You have done pretty well at digging up grounds for refusal yourself.

Mr. Marler: Well, I think the difference between us is that my hon. friend has no responsibility for his recommendations whereas I have.

Mr. Green: You are not showing any though.

Mr. Marler: If I am not showing any sense of responsibility it is perhaps because I am coming under the influence of my hon. friend. But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is perfectly obvious that the Telegraphs Act as it now is enables the governor in council to say no and also enables him to say yes. I think, however, that one of the crucial questions—and this in my view is the principal purpose for introducing this bill that is now before the committee—is to be found in the reading of section 22 of the Telegraphs Act which I have just quoted and which enables the governor in council to impose such conditions as he thinks fit for the public good touching the said telegraph and works. That section I think clearly implies that those are conditions that should be accomplished before the laying of the cable is completed. In other words, Mr. Chairman, they are not of the kind that I might describe as being of a continuing character, the sort of thing that happens from day to day after the cable is laid.

Let me give to the committee an example of the sort of thing I have in mind. As the situation is at present, all of the cables that have been laid—perhaps I should not say all of them but should say many of them—or many of the cables that have already been laid had a much lesser capacity for the transmission of messages than they now have. As was said by the hon. member for Wellington South, I think it was this morning, it is quite possible by the incorporation of electronic repeaters into a cable to increase materially the message carrying capacity of the cable. It could be doubled, trebled or quadrupled.

But today we do not think very much in terms of doubling the duplex circuits because the factor involved is so small. The important situation, Mr. Chairman, is this. Today we may lay a coaxial cable having a capacity, say, of 120 duplex circuits. But what is there to tell us that tomorrow or next year there may not be some developments in the equipment or in something that can be incorporated into the cable itself which will materially increase the message-carrying capacity of that cable and create an entirely new situation, particularly in these days where governments, because of their interest in defence or world affairs, can upset the normal economics of the situation by renting—usually at fairly generous rentals—circuits.

At all events, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned it seems to me that it is desirable that we should have the right, by this licensing system which is contemplated, to control the development of additional outlets. Perhaps I should not call them outlets. Perhaps I should call them additional circuits. If, for example, we start off with 24 today, as the company requested, perhaps by tomorrow that might be 120. I think that the government, speaking for the people of Canada, should have the right to decide whether this multiplication of facilities is to take place with or without its approval.

The bill which is before the committee will enable the government to control the development of new circuits and the increase of existing circuits so that when approval is given for the laying of a cable it will be possible to prevent the capacity of the cable from being unduly increased, at least without the government being consulted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question there?

Mr. Marler: Of course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have been following him very carefully. As the law now stands, under section 22 is the authority not there for the control of the multiplication of facilities?

Mr. Marler: Personally, I do not think so, Mr. Chairman, If one studies section 22 in the context of the statute as a whole, I think one is almost certainly drawn to the conclusion that these conditions are of a kind that are accomplished, let us say, once and for all before the cable comes into operation. Why do I say that? Mr. Chairman, the very language of section 22 suggests it. It reads:

> The company shall not exercise any of the powers by this part conferred until . . .

It says that the company shall not exercise —that is the very start of operations, namely exercising their powers until the conditions have been complied with. To my simple mind that suggests that when the conditions have been complied with, then everything is all right; then you go on and you start exercising your powers at that stage. In other words, the conditions must be accomplished first and then you start to exercise your powers afterwards.

What I am saying here is this. Under this system of licensing it will be possible to grant the landing permit and then to provide—as I think it is an essential part of the licence—that the licensee will be permitted to operate, let us say, 100 duplex circuits or 24 or whatever the number is; but they may not afterwards, by the installation of some form of equipment, turn 100 into 200 or into 400.

I have not asked the Department of Justice to confirm this opinion but, personally, I think it is fairly clear that that is the sort of condition that it is very difficult to provide for in section 22. One thing I think is perfectly clear, namely that it would not be possible to revoke the landing permit because, in spite of the prohibition, the company had increased the capacity of its cable. That is provided for in the bill and, as I say, that is one of the main purposes of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister one question there. He said that he did not know whether the matter had been submitted to the law officers of the crown. I understand that is what he said a moment ago.

Mr. Marler: Just on that particular question—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the minister not make some submission to the law officers of the crown in order to ascertain whether or not section 22, as it now exists, did not require that any conditions that are imposed should be those in the public interest or with the public interest in mind? The change that you now bring about by this amendment does away with the necessity of any regard being had for the public interest. If this bill is passed in its present form, the only regard that needs to be had is at the caprice, if you will, of the order in council, regardless of the public interest. I am asking for information.

Mr. Marler: I will try to answer the hon. gentleman. The question that I referred to earlier was as to whether or not it was mandatory for the governor in council to grant a landing permit under section 22. The opinion, of which I read an excerpt, was from the deputy minister on that particular question as to whether or not the issue of the permit was mandatory. That is the first one. The second point is that we are not changing that situation at all. We are merely providing that there may be conditions of a continuing character as part of the condition of a licence which the company would require to have. I hope I have answered the hon. gentleman's question. I am not trying to sidestep it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There may be conditions beyond the public interest that require you to make an order in council? Is that what the minister means?

Mr. Marler: No. I am not suggesting that for an instant, Mr. Chairman. I may say quite frankly that I cannot conceive of a licensing system of which the conditions were not intended to be in the public interest. I am not trying to conceal anything from the committee on that score. I think that the legislation is perfectly clear. I think we have quite wide authority to make regulations under the proposed bill in connection with a licensing system. When we get to the clause by clause study of the bill I am sure the hon. gentleman will see that. But I take it that these regulations must not, in all decency, be framed except having the public good in mind. I cannot help thinking that, after all, the government must be responsible to parliament for the regulations that it enacts pursuant to this bill.

I should just like to say one further word, Mr. Chairman. I may not have answered all the questions that were raised. If not, I should be glad to endeavour to do so. But as I said at the second reading stage of the bill, it seems to me that it enables the government to have more flexibility in the administration of section 22 of the Telegraphs Act. As I see it now, we are faced with the necessity of choosing between a pure and simple yes or no answer to an application that may be made. I think it is very difficult for us to attach qualifications to the response that we give to an application for a landing permit. I think that the licensing system adds more flexibility and will enable the government to attach to the granting of a landing permit conditions that are of a continuing character and that extend beyond the pure operation of laying the cable and bringing it into operation.

There are just one or two things upon which I should like to touch. I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, or perhaps some other hon. member who seemed to attach great importance to the fact that, when this application was considered first of all by my department officials, Mr. Bowie, the president of C.O.T.C., and I think two or three other officials of C.O.T.C. were present at the meeting. They seemed to see something almost sinister in that. I should like to assure them there was nothing sinister about it. The rather curious point in connection with this application of Commercial Cable was that we had believed, up to that time, that the route across Newfoundland to be followed by the T.A.T. cable was known only to a very restricted group. I am not suggesting it was secret or that it had to be a secret, but we did not believe that anybody else knew about it apart from those concerned with the laying of the T.A.T. cable.

Mr. Green: Which cable was that, to which the minister referred?

Mr. Marler: I am talking about the trans-Atlantic telephone cable. When this application of Commercial Cable was received, it was a real surprise that they were proposing to follow the same route. Consequently, it was a matter of great importance to C.O.T.C. to see that the cable that was described in the application of Commercial Cable was not laid in such a way as to interfere with the T.A.T. cable. Their participation in the meeting was not only because of that fact but also because of the fact that they are the most experienced people connected with my department in the field of cable operation.

Now, I should like to say one word about rates. No effort has been made up to the present by the government to control cable rates. As I said in the committee, the rather happy situation that exists now is because there is competition between these three companies. There has been no great difficulty about having to control rates or keeping them down. I should like to repeat, as I said in the committee, that C.O.T.C. has been a factor which has enabled us to keep the rates for cables down. There have been suggestions made at earlier dates by the two United States companies that cable rates should be increased, but C.O.T.C. has refused to accept the suggestions for increases in rates. As hon. members know, C.O.T.C. has managed, I think through the good management of Mr. Bowie and the directors and officers of the company, to operate for six consecutive years with a surplus after paying taxes and interest on the government's investment in the company. In fact, the rates which apply to cables are actually four cents per word lower on cables transmitted from Montreal than on cables transmitted from New York. I have no doubt whatever that if circumstances were such that, because of the fact that new circuits were being opened and were being, let us say, provided with ample funds by the government of the United States, they would be creating the kind of competition that would be exceedingly difficult to meet and C.O.T.C. would have a very difficult time.

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Marler: Perhaps the hon. member would wait just a minute.

It has been suggested we are trying to protect C.O.T.C. If there had been another Canadian cable company, I would have been very happy about it. But if there is any protection that is being given as a result of our refusal of the Commercial Cable application or in the policies that we have discussed here I think, if anything, it has been to see that Canadian telecommunications operations are not snowed under in a field which is highly competitive and in which the competitive forces are very powerful, very large corporations with very substantial sums of capital at their disposition.

I think, Mr. Chairman, I have dealt with all the questions. There is just one it is suggested that I perhaps should touch upon and that is whether or not the issuing of licence under the bill now before the committee would be mandatory. I do not think it would be mandatory. I may say I have discussed the question with Mr. Driedger of the Department of Justice. It is naturally difficult for him to give an opinion which arises with respect to regulations which have not yet been drafted, but I have tried to assure the members of the committee that there was no intention on the part of the government to interfere with the operation of existing cable companies. I think it is very unlikely that the regulations will be drafted in such a way or that any government would administer a licensing system, so that it could arbitrarily refuse an application from any of the cable companies. I have tried to answer most of the questions, but if some of the hon. members would still like to have an answer I shall do my best to give it.

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister has answered a number of questions that have been put to him, and I realize there were a great many. Naturally he could not answer them all at one time. There is one question that is still not clear to me with regard to rates. The minister has pointed out he is not very much alarmed by the $1,600,000 a year rental, which is in effect a type of subsidy, the United States government will give to Commercial Cables. But his alarm in the future might be raised—

Mr. Marler: I am alarmed even by the $1,600,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: If the minister is alarmed by that, he would be more alarmed if it were increased.

Mr. Marler: My alarm would increase as the amount increased.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of this very handsome assured income for at least 10 years, in the event that Commercial Cable Company started some kind of rate war which would involve C.O.T.C. and Western Union, what would then prevent the minister from invoking a section of the Railway Act in bringing the regulations of these telecommunication rates under the minister in the same way as railway rates are? Apparently in the past these rates have always been settled amicably by discussion, but if a rate war did start, what would then prevent that action?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I thought that in the committee I had almost reached the point of convincing the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Nesbitt: You had for a while.

Mr. Marler: I think he had slipped away from me in the committee, Mr. Chairman, but for a while I thought I had almost convinced the hon. member it is not just a question of the rates but that there was also the collateral question of what might be paid out to get the business, what might be paid out to advertise a particular company's advantages.

The hon. member spoke this morning about sending cables. Most of us know perfectly well that if you go to send a cable most people do not know what company it is going by. You go into the Canadian Pacific Telegraph or Canadian National Telegraph office and ask them to send your cable for you but if one of the companies receives a higher percentage of the cost of the message if they send it via Commercial or via Western Union than they do via C.O.T.C. then I think human nature being what it is the telegraph company will send it by the route which attracts the most dollars to its own treasury.

I do not think that condition existed formerly because everybody was on his own when the number of circuits in a cable was small. I think I mentioned before that the maximum was 8 simplex circuits. We are now talking about a large number of circuits of which a small proportion are going to be rented to the United States government for a rental which represents something like 65 per cent of the operating expenses of the cable.

The hon. gentleman may not be concerned by that but I think all I can say to him is that not having the responsibility for what happens to C.O.T.C. he may be indifferent as to whether it is $1·6 million or $2·6 million or $3·6 million; but having that responsibility I cannot be indifferent. As I said a moment ago my concern increases as the amount increases over $1·6 million.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I certainly appreciate, as I think all members do, the minister's high sense of responsibility and I warmly commend him for it. I am trying to establish in my own mind and for at least some hon. members of the house what the reason is.

I am now beginning to get back a little more into line with the minister's thinking again in view of his explanation in this regard but there are two things about which I am still a little unclear in relation to the subsidies. The minister said that because of this indirect form of subsidy and because of other things such as advertising and through other means business might be channelled into the Commercial Cable Corporation.

Mr. Marler: Or Western Union.

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes. But at the same time is it not a fact that there are only the two companies in Canada which pick up telegraphs, the Canadian National Telegraph Company and the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company? It is my understanding, and I am open to correction on this, that Western Union carries all the messages picked up by the Canadian National Telegraphs whereas the Commercial Cable Corporation and the C.O.T.C. divide the messages that are picked up by Canadian Pacific Telegraphs.

Mr. Marler: That is assuming there is no designation by the sender of the message.

Mr. Nesbitt: I think some of us are a little unclear on this matter. If you send a telegram in a Canadian National Telegraph office and specifically designate that it should go via Commercial Cable Corporation is it possible it would be sent in that way? I realize it is highly unlikely that a sender would designate.

Mr. Marler: I not only think it is possible, I believe that is actually what is taking place.

Mr. Nesbitt: I see. I have one further comment. The minister is alarmed not so much by the fact of the control of rates but by what might be done through this more direct method of channelling business between the companies. I believe the point I tried to make this morning was that if this took place none of these companies, no matter how large they might be, would be foolish enough to try and engage in some kind of rate war with a crown corporation because of the loans that would be possible. I do not think any sensible private company would attempt to engage in a rate war either directly or indirectly with a crown company knowing that the resources of the Canadian government were behind the crown corporation.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, dealing first with this question of rates, the impression I gained in the standing committee was that these companies including the crown company have a pretty neat little arrangement which, if it were within Canada, would probably be considered as a combine in so far as rates are concerned. I would be very much surprised if that picture does not continue into the foreseeable future. They will get together and agree upon the rates that are to be charged and then they will all charge the same rates, which is what they are doing today.

Even if the Commercial Cable company should attempt to reduce the rates, surely the Canadian businessman who uses cable services should receive the first consideration. There has not been a word said here about the benefit to him as a result of getting a cheaper rate. The minister seems to be concerned about only one factor and that is that the crown company shall be protected.

The minister stressed that his objective was to protect this crown company and actually he is not only protecting the crown company but he is protecting its partner, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and its subsidiary the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company by his actions.

Mr. Marler: I do not think the hon. gentleman should make that suggestion because the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company and the American Telephone and Telegraph Company are not in the cable business.

Mr. Green: They are not in what?

Mr. Marler: They are not in the cable business; they are in the telephone business. The transatlantic telephone cable is primarily a telephone operation. It is only a telegraph operation so far as half a voice circuit is concerned which I believe may be used by the United States government or others. The point I want to emphasize is that the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and the same applies to Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company, are not in the cable business and are not competitors of any of the cable companies.

Mr. Green: The crown corporation is in partnership with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and its subsidiary the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company and with the British post office. They are all in the bag together. The minister's policy obviously is to protect that group. He is stretching our credulity rather far when he asks us to believe he is only trying to protect the crown company.

The minister gave the impression today that what is proposed is a licensing system. One would think to hear him speak that it was to be an impartial licensing system under which the department would weigh the scales and see that the crown company was treated in exactly the same way as the Commercial Cable Company and Western Union and that this nice new licensing system would be just a general control system which would apply in the same way to everyone in the business; but unfortunately the facts are just the opposite.

The minister himself in his statement today has made it perfectly clear that the government plan is a plan to prevent up-to-date competition from the Commercial Cable Company and Western Union. Of course, Western Union does not enter into the picture so much because it is not trying to lay a coaxial cable and I believe an order has been made in the United States courts to the effect that they must divest themselves of this cable business. They are not interested in keeping up to date in the same way as is the case with the Commercial Cable Company, the other private company. What is the minister doing under this policy? Here you have his own child, the C.O.T.C., as a result of the first coaxial cable getting the equal of eleven duplex circuits. I may be wrong in those figures.

Mr. Marler: That is correct.

Mr. Green: That is what I understood the minister to say. The C.O.T.C. is to have that type of equipment in October of this year. Commercial Cable are still asking for permission to lay a cable of that type. It will take them probably several years to lay such a cable. The minister does not say, "It would be fair for C.O.T.C. to have eleven circuits and Commercial Cable to have eleven circuits," he says, "Oh, no, Commercial Cable will not have one circuit in Canada; we will not allow them to have one circuit in Canada; if they lay this coaxial cable they must continue to do business with their old cable in so far as Canada is concerned." The minister made that very clear on more than one occasion in the committee and I would refer hon. members to page 185 of the proceedings. Incidentally this is a confirmation of the stand taken by the minister in the letter which he wrote in February of 1955. I quote from page 185 of the proceedings:

> Mr. Green: You say that so far as the Canadian government is concerned they cannot have a coaxial cable or system, whatever it is called or described. Is that possibly the view your department is taking?
> Hon. Mr. Marler: The approach which the department is taking is that the Commercial Cable Company asked for a permit to land a coaxial cable of 120 duplex circuits, and we said you may use them for defence purposes and make a connection in Canada for defence purposes, where existing facilities are not adequate, but if you open any circuits for commercial purposes you must do so by leasing them to C.O.T.C.

The minister has not varied that stand one iota; he skated all around it by talking about a licensing system but he is still standing on the policy that if these people lay a coaxial cable and place any circuits in Canada those circuits must be used for defence purposes or be leased to the C.O.T.C., which is their competitor. How that can be considered as fair is completely beyond me. One would have thought that the Department of Transport would be impartial in this matter and would have allowed each group to have an equal number of circuits, or at least to have some of the circuits. But that is not to be the case. Commercial Cable, and no doubt Western Union would be treated the same way, are faced with this government policy. They have been told that they cannot have any of these up-to-date circuits, that they must carry on with the old type equipment. I do not see how the minister can justify a policy of that kind. In effect it means a monopoly for the crown corporation because if these other companies cannot modernize why should they try to hang on in Canada. It certainly means that the Canadian businessman will lose the benefit of that competition.

Even if rates are the same they might be able to get better service from one company than from another. For example, I am told that in the case of a cable message from Vancouver to Japan, if it were sent by Commercial Cable it would go to Seattle and thence to Japan, whereas if it were sent by C.O.T.C. it would go across Canada to Montreal, thence to London, and thence right around the world to Japan. It takes some time longer to reach Japan going that way than it would if sent over the other system. In so far as cable service from the west coast to Australia and New Zealand is concerned, C.O.T.C. give the better service, and more credit to them for that.

Surely the businessman in Vancouver is entitled to choose the way in which his cables are to be sent. If this government policy is carried out the only service available will be by a crown company. I suggest that that is entirely unfair. Will the minister indicate who is going to be hurt by there being too many of these circuits in Canada? He seems to be greatly worried about there being more circuits than are necessary. He seems to think that somebody is going to be badly hurt if that is the case. It seems to me that the people who would not be hurt are those who send the cables. Certainly it would not do any harm to them. Just who is it that is going to be hurt if these eleven circuits belong to C.O.T.C. and 24 circuits belong to Commercial Cable or eleven circuits belong to Commercial Cable? Who is going to be hurt if there are more circuits than are required? Will it not be the companies that would suffer rather than the Canadian people? Those who are doing business would benefit.

This policy seems to be contrary to the whole trend of development in Canada. This country is opening up from coast to coast and surely the demand for this service is increasing. We were told in the committee that it was increasing very rapidly. Why should these restrictions be placed upon this development? Mr. Henderson of the Commercial Cable Company gave evidence about the business they had in prospect for the new circuits. This will be found at page 205 of the proceedings, and I quote:

> Now, with respect to Canada, we did not feel that it was necessary to make a survey here. The minister has stated that he is going to have six telegraph channels when this transatlantic cable is in operation and he has half a voice channel at his disposal. We have a demand now, in the Commercial Cable Company for five leased channels across the Atlantic, and that is even without going out trying to sell channels. We believe the people of Canada should have the opportunity to lease channels direct through to a customer in London, Paris, or wherever it may be. If you are able to dial on your telephone to London, you should be able to dial on your telegraph to London. We believe at some future time that the teleprinter will be out of date.
> The minister stated that if we had made an application for a cable of two circuits, that his answer may have been different. If I had made that application I think that my board of directors would have fired me.

Will the minister please explain just who it is in Canada who is going to be hurt if there are more circuits than seem to be required at the present time?

Mr. Nicholson: Before the minister replies I should like to say a word. I should like to say that two months ago the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and I were on the same side in connection with a very important matter when we were trying to save Canada from the evils of turning over to powerful American-controlled corporations certain important national resources. It is somewhat embarrassing for me today to find a colleague of a few months ago on the wrong side of an important matter affecting the future of Canada.

We had a very long discussion in the committee, and there were at least three divisions. The hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, who are not here this afternoon, tested the opinion of the committee, and on the first vote there were four yeas and 19 nays, as shown on page 223 of the record. In the next vote, as shown on page 227, there were three in favour and 17 opposed. The final vote was an interesting one. The following amendment was moved:

> This part does not apply in respect of a company which is already operating external submarine cables under the authority of an act of the parliament of Canada.

Had that amendment carried, it would have committed this parliament to the proposition that we are not permitted to have anything to say about the operations of Commercial Cable, as a result of certain privileges they were given 72 years ago. This motion was presented to the committee, and it is recorded:

> Motion defeated. The Clerk counting.

I do not recall whether he saw any who voted for it, but there is no record as to whether or not anybody voted for this. I think that we cannot accept that proposition. The minister went over the matter very fully in the committee and again this afternoon, and I am not going to repeat it, but I think that it cannot be established that he is guilty of trying to establish a monopoly. He pointed out correctly that, because C.O.T.C. is in this field, everyone who uses cable services in Canada is able to send a cable from Canada to the United Kingdom for four cents a word less than people in New York.

The last time I was in Europe, I sent a cable home from the publicly owned post office in London and I was surprised to find that when I reached New York I had to pay more for a telegram over privately owned telegraph companies from New York to my home in Saskatchewan than I paid over the publicly owned cable and telegraph system from Canada. In other words, I spent less for that cable from London to Sturgis, Saskatchewan, than for a telegram from New York to Sturgis, Saskatchewan. So I think it cannot be argued that we have not competition in that field. We are still going to have at least Western Union, the Commercial Cable Company and C.O.T.C. I think the minister has made a convincing case that he does require the legislation that is proposed in Bill 212.

Mr. Nowlan: I cannot agree with my hon. friend when he says he thinks the minister has made a convincing case. The minister always speaks with a degree of conviction and with something which appears like logic, in such a way that it does carry, not conviction but perhaps an appearance of it, to one who has not studied his statements too carefully. I must admit that I have not studied them too carefully on this occasion. I was not in the committee when the hearing was conducted on this bill, as I perhaps should have been because I was a member of the committee. However, I was not here at the time and therefore did not hear the evidence, although I have read it since. Incidentally, my hon. friend referred to the votes in the committee. I think that means very little as to the number of members that may be present, because when that committee was sitting, Mr. Chairman, as you know, there were four or five of the committees sitting at the same time.

An hon. Member: Your party was represented.

Mr. Nowlan: It may have been that certain people who were not present were in other committees who otherwise would have been there and voted for or against the amendments that were proposed. I go back again to the case the member for Vancouver-Quadra has made, which I think is a convincing case. If the minister has made one to the satisfaction of the hon. member who has just spoken, I think that the member for Vancouver-Quadra has made a more convincing one. The hon. member who preceded me has admitted that the minister made a convincing case for a monopoly. I think that was the tribute he paid to his logic, and if the minister is prepared to accept that accolade, then I shall not argue too strenuously that my hon. friend is convinced at any rate of that.

I think it is section 22 of the Telegraphs Act which at present creates powers under which the minister will have to act until this bill is passed. It refers to the public good, and any action taken under that section would have that connotation. There are no such words in the present bill, and obviously a minister can pass such regulations as are approved by his colleagues. The effect of those regulations, I think the minister will admit, would be to create a monopoly. He said a while ago, in reply to the member for Prince Albert, I think, that of course the government would be motivated by what was in the public good, but of course—

Mr. Marler: I think that would apply to governments of all parties, even the one my hon. friend represents.

Mr. Nowlan: That goes without saying, but that would be something we have not had an opportunity to demonstrate at the moment.

An hon. Member: Because of the ideas you are propounding now.

Mr. Nowlan: The expression "public good" as contained in the legislation has a specific meaning, as the minister knows, as interpreted by the courts through many years of experience. I am afraid that the expression "public good" as in the minister's mind is a much looser expression, and he qualified it afterwards by saying that he felt that his responsibility was to the C.O.T.C. Apparently his impression of public good is something which will protect the C.O.T.C., because he said that is his responsibility.

I think the member for Vancouver-Quadra emphasized another matter. I am sure the minister would not deny, although it perhaps has escaped his attention for the moment, that he also has a responsibility to the public as a whole, and what might possibly infringe upon the C.O.T.C. might conceivably be in the public interest. I personally cannot accept the proposition that by creating a government monopoly you are thereby promoting the public interest. After all, it was only two or three years ago that the C.P.A. made application for certain rights for carrying freight. They were denied them because apparently it was not considered in the public interest and the T.C.A. had to be protected. I am sure if that matter had been discussed years before, when T.C.A. was first incorporated or first developed and the present minister had been the minister in charge, I can see him, in a smooth, convincing manner assure one that under no circumstances was there any thought of creating a monopoly and that it would be in the public good and only in the public good.

The suggestion was made in the committee that if the regulations had to be passed the matter should be referred to the board of transport commissioners and the power vested there rather than in the minister's own department. The minister's reply to that was that he had qualified men in the department who knew of the administration of cables, that the board of transport commissioners was not qualified to handle that, and therefore it would not be in the public interest to have this matter referred to the board and dealt with by the board of transport commissioners.

If some such reservations are necessary, it is highly desirable that they be administered by an apparently independent and responsible body rather than by the minister's department itself. I think that the hon. member for Mackenzie who preceded me expressed it very succinctly when he said that the minister had made a forceful case for a monopoly. Personally I am not prepared to accept that as a desirable thing and in the public interest. There are many arguments which one could use. I could advance a local one. I noticed in the evidence that Commercial Cable suggested that if the license were granted and they laid the new cable they might operate a cable ship out of Halifax which would result in the spending of large sums of money on the east coast, up to $800,000 a year and another $250,000 a year in Newfoundland.

That is a very commendable reason and one good reason why I would be in favour of the minister reconsidering the matter and would be in favour of Commercial Cable Company being given the privileges it seeks. They are really not privileges for after all this company has been in existence since 1884. They have been carrying on since then and have given good service. They have somewhat of a vested interest in this business. Perhaps that is a disreputable term today but I do not think it is. I think there is a responsibility on the government to protect that interest to a certain extent and at least not bring in an act that may result in forfeiture, with apologies made in the committee for having used the word "forfeiture".

No one suggests for a moment that this minister would ever engage in anything which would savour of or result in forfeiture but the passing of this legislation accomplishes the same thing. Why would anyone engage in further financing? How can you finance undertakings, how can you assure your bankers of a future in this business when you have hanging over you the fact that this legislation is there, legislation of such a nature, whether it is intended so or not, which will result in forfeiture if it is exercised?

I think that this is one of the more important pieces of legislation. True, it deals with a private company in one sense of the word. Actually it deals with it very effectively. This is a type of legislation which should have been brought into the house earlier, should have received even more careful consideration in this committee and for which more time should have been available for discussion. I am quite sure when the public realize all the implications of the legislation and what is involved in it there will be a reaction such as will surprise the minister and will result, if he insists on the legislation being passed, in his exercising the authority which will then be vested in him under it much more carefully perhaps than some other ministers with less sense of responsibility would.

The present minister certainly will not be there all the time. We do not know who will be exercising the responsibilities under this legislation. I think it is not in the public interest. I think it is unfair to those who have been engaged in this business in the past. Perhaps the minister will say: Well, let us get off the first section and give me a chance to bring forward some amendments. I hope that at least he is prepared to entertain reconsideration of some sections so as to provide for the protection of the public interest rather than leaving everything to himself and his department.

Mr. Leboe: Since I entered the debate earlier I should like to make one observation now. It was stated here this afternoon that C.O.T.C. had been responsible for keeping the rates down. There seems to be a strange paradox in arguments. On the one hand we have the statement that C.O.T.C. is responsible for keeping the rates down and on the other hand we hear the plea that any more outlets in Canada will certainly lead to the bankruptcy of C.O.T.C. I do not see the relationship. Either one or the other must be right, and which one is it?

Mr. Green: Will the minister please answer my question as to who is going to be hurt if there are too many circuits in Canada?

Mr. Marler: All I can say, Mr. Chairman, as I indicated in the committee, is that I think the situation today is that with the coaxial cable it is no longer the simple matter that it used to be. I do not think that anyone with the responsibility for taking the action that the governor in council must take under section 22 when an application for the laying of a new cable is received could think otherwise than that the laying of cables in the future will probably be a matter for intergovernmental discussion.

Mr. Green: For which?

Mr. Marler: Intergovernmental discussion. The hon. member has rather suggested that our action in connection with Commercial Cable seems to be wholly unjustified, but the fact does remain that the United Kingdom has not given its approval to the Commercial Cable Company and the somewhat optimistic evidence on the subject given by the vice-president of Commercial Cable Company is, I think, not justified by the facts. I do not think he has any reason to be as optimistic as he seems in saying "we have not had a final turn-down from the United Kingdom government." That may be so. It may not have been final. It may not have been said in very positive terms, but I should be much surprised if the United Kingdom grants permission for the landing of this cable in that country.

The point I should like to emphasize, particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, is that this company already has nine and a half duplex circuits which serve Canada. There is nothing whatever to stop the Commercial Cable Company from laying a 120 duplex circuit cable when they wish to, but the difficulty seems to be that they do not want to lay it unless they can have one-fifth of the circuits terminating in Canada. I cannot see why, having regard to the existing facilities that Commercial Cable Company has, it cannot go ahead and lay the cable as it wishes without having to insist upon reliance upon Canadian business to justify that project.

The hon. gentleman asked who will be heard on applications. I take it that will depend on who makes the application, when it is made and what the circumstances are at that time. I think I should say to him that I think the Department of Transport will do its best to assess the situation at the time the application is made. We have been, I think, very much handicapped by the fact that we have had so little knowledge of the activities of the cable companies that have been going on up to the present. As the hon. gentleman knows, I told the committee at the outset of my remarks that we had thought that there was a capacity of 18½ duplex circuits in the Atlantic at the present time. Yet we found that the number was 34. That was not because we were unable to check the original applications. It was because there had been changes which took place without any knowledge of the government or without its approval. All I can say is that in the future applications will be looked at on their merits and having regard to what the attitude of other governments will be and what the need is for additional service.

Mr. Green: The minister has not answered my question. I asked him who would be hurt if there were more circuits available to Canadians than are actually needed. Does he claim that the business community of Canada will be hurt? Who will be hurt unless it is C.O.T.C. itself? The minister has not answered that question. He dodged all around it. I think we are entitled to know who is going to be hurt because the minister has taken the position that only C.O.T.C., this crown company pet of his, can have access to a coaxial cable. He will not allow Commercial Cable to have any duplex circuits on their coaxial cable. He says that they can lay it and use it for defence purposes in Canada but apart from that they have got to lease it to C.O.T.C.

I should like to know who is going to be hurt if there are more circuits than the minister believes are needed. He has taken the stand that it is his responsibility to decide whether there are more circuits in Canada than are necessary and he wants this legislation so that if he does decide that there will be more than are necessary he can prevent them being opened up. It is going quite a long way, quite regardless of any other powers the minister has taken, that he should be the arbiter of what constitutes too many of these circuits in Canada. Is anybody else going to be hurt, except perhaps this crown company, if more circuits are available in Canada than are actually required?

Mr. Marler: I am afraid that the difficulty in answering my hon. friend's question is that we do not seem to be able to come down to talk about the same terms. We are not attempting to cut out existing circuits. There are not too many circuits at the present time having regard to the volume of United States business that now moves over the cables. As to the question of whether 11 more telegraph circuits will be too many or not, how can one tell until the circuits are open and we have the experience to be able to tell whether they are too many or not? All I can say is that the review on the part of the government will come when an application is made for additional circuits in a new cable. That is where the question is going to arise. All I can say to my hon. friend is that I cannot tell who will have to be consulted at that time until I know what is the situation that prevails at the time the application is made.

Mr. Green: Will it hurt anybody in Canada if there are more circuits than can be used? Who is going to be hurt if that is the position?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Green: May I explain it in this way. Here is a private company which is prepared to spend $25 million or $35 million—I think that is the latest estimate—to put in a coaxial cable, and is proposing to have 24 of those outlets in Canada. Who is going to be hurt if those 24 outlets turn out to be 10 or 15 too many?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I do not see how it can be said they are going to prove that there are going to be 10 or 15 too many. That an application may be made by, let us say, Commercial Cables Company and that they wish to open 24 new duplex circuits in Canada, I thing we would be inclined to take a look and see what was the then existing capacity. When somebody comes along and tells us that what he wishes to do is to instal 24 duplex circuits, financed largely with moneys coming from a contract with the United States government—

Mr. Green: They are financed by loans. They have to borrow money. They gave evidence to that effect in committee.

Mr. Marler: Let the hon. member place his own interpretation on the facts and let me place my interpretation on them. But I say that when a company comes along and asks for permission to open in Canada 24 duplex circuits, supported by a lease agreement providing for approximately 65 per cent of the operating expenses, including interest, and when those 24 duplex circuits represent approximately 12 to 20 times the amount of capacity that company is now using in Canada, I would naturally question the desirability of adding so many circuits to the existing facilities. I think the hon. gentleman would have exactly the same feelings if he had the responsibility for his actions.

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. Green: Then are we to believe that the minister is trying to prevent Commercial Cable Company from wasting their money? Is he trying to help them save some money by not letting them have any of these outlets in Canada? If the minister thinks they are very foolish to put in the new cable and to open 24 circuits in Canada, why should he worry about that matter? Why not let them go ahead and do it? If they have not sufficient business to use those circuits, surely nobody is going to be hurt; but the Canadian business man is going to have just that much more chance to get a direct service, for example, from Vancouver to London or from Winnipeg to London. As the situation is now, the minister has said that, by his policy, no one but this crown corporation can have access to one of these coaxial cables in Canada. The crown corporation has not a cable. It is only leasing what cables it is using at the present time. Surely nobody is going to be hurt if the Commercial Cable Company go ahead and put in these outlets. Is the minister willing to give them permission to open any number of these outlets, even less than 24, if a coaxial cable is laid?

Mr. Marler: When it becomes likely that the United Kingdom will grant a landing permit for the Commercial Cable Company in the United Kingdom, I would be perfectly prepared to review, in the light of circumstances that exist at that time, just exactly what policy I should follow in recommending that the company be allowed to terminate additional circuits in Canada.

Mr. Green: In the committee evidence was given that the company was negotiating with continental nations to land the cable there. If it can be landed elsewhere than in the United Kingdom, does that make any difference in the attitude of the minister?

Mr. Marler: No.

Mr. Green: The minister would still be willing to consider allowing them certain circuits in Canada?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I think that we are now in a field which is purely hypothetical. All I can say is that it depends entirely on where the cable is going to go.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: A few moments ago there was an argument used by the minister as to why he felt that he would be justified in refusing a licence—if I followed him correctly—and in which he said—

Mr. Marler: No; not a licence; a landing permit.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry; I should have said a landing permit. He said that when he saw a company proposing to instal 24 duplex circuits, which would give 12 to 20 times the amount of capacity they are now using, he would feel inclined to question the necessity for or the appropriateness of that application. May I enter into an argument with him on this basis. When he rests his case on that position, is he not arguing on the basis of the old-style circuit and basing a judgment with respect to the use that will be made, can be made and will be desired to be made of the new facilities on the experience with old and obsolescent if not obsolete facilities? My information is that if the new facilities became available, the demand for them would be there and would greatly outstrip the demand for or the use that is now being made of the old facilities.

Mr. Marler: I thought that this morning or perhaps early this afternoon I had tried to make it clear that when we were talking about the duplex circuit it did not make any difference whether you had one duplex circuit out of 120 in a coaxial cable or one duplex circuit out of an existing cable that has a capacity of 4 duplex circuits, we still come down to the same units. The only question is what they are going to be used for. I am not a technical person. I am afraid that is all too obvious. All I can say is that I think you can put the telex circuit just as well in one of the existing cables as in a coaxial cable. I know that you cannot put a voice circuit in a cable that has a capacity of only 8 simplex units.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: A statement has been made that 15 out of the 24 proposed circuits have already been spoken for. Of course that is an indication that 15 out of the 24 would be used if a permit were given and the cable installed.

Mr. Marler: That was not made clear until we met in the committee the week before last.

Mr. Fulton: It is a fact, is it not?

Mr. Marler: No. I am not saying it is a fact. I admit that it was said in committee.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister know what the situation is? What is the minister's information as to the indicated demand for these circuits.

Mr. Marler: All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that when the company made its application in September, 1954, in their application they said that they had not made any survey of the Canadian market or of Canadian requirements. In other words, I think the clear implication of that is that at that time it was not a factor as to whether or not the project should go ahead. What has happened is, as time has gone by the company has become more and more insistent that the Canadian traffic they wished to carry over this proposed cable has become increasingly important. If the hon. gentleman had participated in the discussions he would have found that the emphasis had changed from one of meeting a defence need to the point that we must have a better commercial service for Canadians. I leave it to the hon. gentleman to form his own conclusion as to why that change was made.

Mr. Fulton: This is a commercial company and I am asking what is the most recent up to date information as to the extent to which the potential cables have been spoken for?

Mr. Marler: I have no information on that subject.

Mr. Fulton: So, we have no reason to disbelieve then that the 15 out of 24 were not already spoken for?

Mr. Marler: My information, Mr. Chairman, is that my officials consider that is a very optimistic assessment of the possibilities.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Lesage: Carry on the filibuster. Now, we can see the pattern.

Mr. Green: As long as I feel this question should be discussed. Is the minister not able to say whether the claim made by Mr. Henderson, which I read a few minutes ago from page 205 of the committee record, is accurate or inaccurate? Here is a man who is the executive vice-president of a very old and efficient company. He came before that committee and made this statement of the business they expected to do in Canada. Is there any real reason to question the accuracy of that statement?

Mr. Marler: I think the hon. gentleman should be able to answer that question himself.

Mr. Green: The answer is obvious, that there is no good reason to question it. How is this company to furnish these services if this veto which has been placed upon their expansion by the Department of Transport is to be continued. Is there any possible way that the company can provide that service for which they have a demand?

Mr. Marler: I think there is a very simple way. The company can lay a coaxial cable to serve its United States traffic, without landing that cable in Canada. It has got already 9½ duplex circuits, which is probably four times the amount that is required for its Canadian business. I think they could do that quite well.

Mr. Green: We had evidence, if I remember correctly, that they did not have the facilities now to do this business, and they would require this new cable in order to do it.

Mr. Marler: That is not supported by the evidence before the committee. My hon. friend knows, and I think it was said a dozen times in the committee, that these facilities are there that can be used by Commercial Cable. They can be used for any purpose for which duplex circuits can be used. Now please, Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. gentleman will not try to go on attempting to persuade this committee that it is vital that these circuits should be opened in Canada now. There are 9½ duplex circuits now. The Commercial Cable Company is quite capable of laying a coaxial cable to service its United States business, without any difficulty whatever.

Mr. Green: But they cannot do business in Canada.

Mr. Marler: They cannot do any more business than they can carry on 9½ duplex circuits, which is about four times more than they require.

Mr. Green: All of this is done to protect a crown company, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. Will the minister tell us how much money it is going to cost this crown corporation for their share of this partnership cable which is being opened in October?

Mr. Marler: When the C.O.T.C. estimates are before the committee or when my estimates are before the committee I would be glad to do that, but that is not relevant to this bill.

Mr. Green: The minister has explained, as the basis for the need of this bill, that the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation is going to be able to provide sufficient service to last Canada for an indefinite period.

Mr. Marler: No, no.

Mr. Green: That is the basis on which he is refusing to let these people open the new cable. How much is it going to cost the Canadian people to have this partnership service which has been undertaken?

Mr. Lesage: What are you trying to do, protect the Americans against the Canadians?

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. Marler: As I said, that is not material to the bill and I do not propose to deal with that aspect of the question now.

Mr. Green: I submit it is material to the bill because it is involved directly with this whole issue. How much money is it going to cost? The annual report of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation shows that there have already been advances from the government about $8,050,000; their capital budget for the financial year ending March 31, 1957, at page 5, shows terminal equipment for trans-Atlantic telephone cable and then says that this equipment is not included in the total estimated expenditure of $4·5 million in the T.A.T. cable project and that the $4·5 million represents the corporation's expected payment as a party to the trans-Atlantic cable construction and maintenance contracts. Then, we have in the estimates this year an item for $4,506,725, as a loan to this C.O.T.C. and in the supplementary estimates there is a further loan of $1,908,256. Now, surely the minister can tell us how much money this corporation is going to have invested in this trans-Atlantic cable plan.

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of public and private bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The items under public bills having been exhausted, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

TELEGRAPHS ACT

AMENDMENT CONCERNING CONTROL OF SUBMARINE CABLE INSTALLATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 212, to amend the Telegraphs Act—Mr. Marler—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—"External submarine cable" and "telecommunication" defined.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, now that the private members' hour is over, perhaps the minister could give us those figures.

Mr. Marler: I do not have the figures with me. I think it is about $4½ million but I am relying entirely on my memory. As I say, I do not think the investment of the C.O.T.C. in the new trans-Atlantic telephone cable is really pertinent to the purpose of the amendment to the bill we are discussing at the moment which is as to whether or not we should have a licensing system for the operation of submarine cable communications. I think it would be just as appropriate if the hon. member were to ask me what was the total investment of Western Union and the answer is I do not know.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall this bill be now read the third time?

Mr. Green: No, at the next sitting.

Mr. Marler: Why at the next sitting? Second reading was two weeks ago.

Mr. Green: I submit it is not in order to do that.

Mr. Lesage: Of course it is in order; second reading was before yesterday.

Mr. Marler: It was two weeks ago.

Mr. Green: The committee stage is a part of the second reading. There can be only one stage carried on at the one time. Surely there is no intention to try to force this through in that way. The minister has his bill through the committee.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, this bill has been on the order paper since May 12. A debate occurred on second reading some weeks ago. The bill then went to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines where the committee spent parts of three days, Wednesday afternoon, Thursday morning, afternoon and evening and Friday morning and afternoon going through the bill from start to finish with the benefit of evidence from the two cable companies, Western Union and Commercial Cable. A whole week has gone by since the report of the committee. We have spent virtually the whole day going through the bill in committee. There have been no amendments made in committee and I believe that under the rules when no amendments have been made in committee a motion for third reading is perfectly in order. The alternative would be that it would be put off until next Monday.

Surely the hon. gentleman has nothing further to add on the motion for third reading that he has not already said today. It seems to me it is perfectly reasonable that I should ask for third reading

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am, of course, governed by the provisions of standing order 75 and standing order 78, sub-paragraph 2.

Standing order 75 reads:

> Every bill shall receive three several readings, on different days, previously to being passed.

The latter part of sub-paragraph 2 of standing order 78 reads:

> When a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

The minister having moved third reading I have no recourse other than to put the motion, of course.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is very unusual for the government to follow a course of this kind; however, if it sees fit to do that I suppose we just have to make the best of things.

The official opposition are very much concerned about this bill because we believe a step is being taken which is very unsound. We believe the bill should have been stood over and further consideration given to it so that some plan could be worked out under which there would be full, free and unrestricted competition between the crown company, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, and the private cable companies.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Americans.

Mr. Green: In Canada we have worked out a system of that kind in connection with our railways which I think has been very satisfactory. In this case, for some reason or other, the government is taking the position that a private company must be curbed; it must not be allowed to have a coaxial cable with outlets in Canada unless those outlets are used for defence purposes or leased to the crown company.

As a party we, of course, believe in competition. It seems to me it is so advantageous to have both of these companies with this modern service. This would be advantageous to the people of Canada and certainly would be of great benefit to my own city of Vancouver and the other western cities. It would enable them to operate on the same basis as Montreal in so far as cable service to Europe is concerned.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): They are now.

Mr. Green: In order to take advantage of the most modern service they are now going to be forced willy-nilly either to deal with the crown company or to send their messages through the United States.

I can see no reason why the minister should have taken the stand he has and I am quite confident there are many supporters of the Liberal party in the house today who are dubious—

Mr. Hosking: There is not one.

Mr. Green:—about a step of this kind being taken. I know that the hon. member for Wellington South is not dubious. He is never dubious about anything the government tells him. In fact, it seems to me he sometimes goes overboard far in advance of the government and dives into deep water with his mouth wide open—

Mr. Hosking: I hope I never make any more mistakes than the government.

Mr. Green:—without the slightest hesitation. In any event I am quite sure there will be supporters of the government across the country who will not be in sympathy with this move. It is not a very far step from a move of this type to a restriction of the freedom of the press. These cable services are primarily of use to the press of Canada and to the business community yet the government is stepping in and saying, "You have to do business through our nice little crown company; you cannot give your business to companies having the most modern equipment and providing the best service possible because that competition might be too much for our crown company." When you have a government with a mental attitude of that kind it will do the same thing in other fields. It is just one more step on the road downhill to dictatorship in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is nice to see the Tories so concerned over a United States company.

Mr. Green: We hear a chirp from the official squirmer of the house. We have this step and no doubt there will be other steps following until eventually the Canadian people will realize what is going on in this house and throw out this government. It is strange to have the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) raising the question of United States companies because—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: Let us have all the heckling we can on that. This is a very good place to have it. What is actually being done is that this crown company is in partnership with a large United States company, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. That is the only way in which this crown company will be able to get service through the coaxial cable system. They have this agreement with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. So far as United States companies are concerned we are both in the same position.

Mr. Hosking: Except that we are tied in with the British government.

Mr. Green: Tied in with the British post office, but that was when they had socialism in the United Kingdom and that is why members of the C.C.F. are supporting this bill. They are speaking in accordance with their beliefs and they are a whole lot more genuine about the thing than are the members of the Liberal party. They have given the minister far more support than he has received from anyone on his own side.

There is no need to go into the question at any further length. We have made our position clear. We think the government is making a great mistake. Even though this bill passes I suggest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) that he take another look at his policy and it may not be too late for him to make a change to permit other outlets from the coaxial cable and allow private companies to have this same type of service. If it is considered that 24 outlets are too many perhaps he would give permission for a smaller number. I do suggest that in the interests of the country he should take another look at this whole question and make some changes in the policy he has been following to date.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect that there would be any discussion on third reading. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) when he says that the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking) is perhaps never dubious as to the policy of the present government. However, I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will agree that that cannot be said about me. The thing which has surprised me about this whole matter is that apparently the Conservative party has been as gullible as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra accuses the hon. member for Wellington South of being. By that I mean to say that they seem to have swallowed holus bolus the attempt which was made by the Commercial Cable Company—I do not blame them for doing it—to use this bill as a vehicle for introducing the subject matter of a certain application they had made to the minister under the Telegraphs Act.

If there has been any debate on the merits of socialism, or public ownership versus private ownership, it has been introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and his colleagues. Certainly as far as I am concerned this is not a socialist bill and certainly I am not supporting it on the ground of being a socialist.

As far as I can see, this bill is simply a licensing bill to give the government certain powers to regulate public utilities having to do with telecommunications. We do that same sort of thing in other fields and nobody has suggested that that involves socialism. I think it is confusing the issue to attempt to create the impression that the government of Canada has suddenly swallowed holus bolus the philosophy which some of us in this corner of the house espouse simply because they have introduced this bill.

I do not think I need to say any more. I made some few remarks on second reading when the principle was under discussion and I think it was made clear at that time that we are sympathetic to the purposes of the bill. I think we have made it quite clear that as a result of the detailed and thorough discussions which took place in the committee we are now satisfied that this bill, properly administered, will be in the interests of the Canadian people.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said, particularly by members of the Progressive Conservative party. I have been interested in knowing their position and to say the least I think it has been somewhat confused and confusing. The principal ground of complaint is that because we are providing for the establishing of a licensing system for external submarine communications we are thereby attempting to turn the C.O.T.C. into a monopoly. Nothing has been said by them here today that has suggested they are in favour of a licensing system of any kind. I do not want to speak at great length, but I think the house should understand just what is the position of the Progressive Conservative party in connection with this matter.

I do not think that any member of the Progressive Conservative party, either in the standing committee or in the committee of the whole house, has failed to raise the question of the monopoly of the C.O.T.C. I want to point out briefly just what is the situation. There are 34 duplex circuits now available in trans-Atlantic cables and those 2 are operated by C.O.T.C. To speak of a monopoly when there are 2 circuits out of 34 certainly goes far beyond my understanding. What is the monopoly position of C.O.T.C. so far as Canadian business is concerned? It has 40 per cent of the business while the two United States companies have the remaining 60 per cent. Does that sound like a monopoly, when you have even less than half of the traffic? It certainly does not. My suggestion is that, whenever the name C.O.T.C. is mentioned, there is immediately from the Conservatives a response "monopoly"; but I say that the facts do not justify any such contention as that.

What have we heard today about establishing a licensing system? Nothing whatever. Yet when we were in the committee the hon. member for York West, who seemed not to be disposed to disagree with the idea of a licensing system, moved that the bill be amended and that, in place of having the regulations made by the governor in council, they should be made by the board of transport commissioners. So at that particular moment the Progressive Conservative party was in favour of some form of licensing, and the same clauses and conditions were set forth and the same language was used, in effect, for the amendment as will be found in subparagraphs (a) to (e) of clause 42 of the bill. At that particular moment the Progressive Conservatives were in favour of licensing. Today there has not been one word about licensing.

All that has been said has been with the object of making sure that under no circumstances whatever should anything be done that might possibly curtail the activities of Western Union and of Commercial Cable, so far as Canadian business is concerned. Nobody has suggested for a minute that the bill was to be used to interfere with Commercial Cable dealing with the business that properly belongs to it, with the United States business originating in the United States and put on the cables in New York. Nobody has ever suggested that that was going to be interfered with, but throughout the long discussion in committee what have we heard? Nothing but "For goodness' sake, do not do anything which would affect these two United States companies."

Mr. Speaker, that is not all. After having suggested a form of licensing, but under the board of transport commissioners, the Conservative party, the hon. member for York West speaking for it, then moved that a clause 3 be added to the bill. That was, of course, in the standing committee. He moved an amendment to the effect that this part of the act shall not apply in respect to a company which is already operating external submarine cables under the authority of an act of the parliament of Canada; in other words, that nothing whatever must be done to regulate the activities of the two United States companies.

I think that the great difference of opinion arising between the Progressive Conservative party and the government is that the Progressive Conservative party can think only in terms of monopoly. We have seen that there is no monopoly, and I do not think that there is any likelihood of there being one. We find that one day they are in favour of licensing; but that the next day they are not in favour of licensing. Then they conclude by saying that they do not want this to apply to the two United States companies. I leave to hon. members the task of forming their own conclusions as to the attitude of the opposition.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING AUTHORITY TO CONSTRUCT AND OPERATE BRIDGE

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act by repealing subsection (1) of section 14A thereof as enacted at the present session of parliament and substituting the following subsection therefor:

"14A. (1) The authority may, alone or jointly or in conjunction with the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation of the United States, construct, maintain and operate, either

(a) a bridge over Pollys Gut in the St. Lawrence river for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, railway trains and for other like purposes, with all necessary approaches and facilities, from Cornwall island in the county of Stormont in the province of Ontario to Massena point in the state of New York, or

(b) a bridge over the south channel in the St. Lawrence river for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles and for other like purposes, with all necessary approaches and facilities, from Cornwall island in the county of Stormont in the province of Ontario to the United States mainland in the state of New York."

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Nesbitt: Will the minister be good enough to give us a statement as to the purpose of this resolution?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, hon. members of the committee will probably recall that earlier this session we adopted chapter 11 of the statutes of the present session for the purpose, among other things, of authorizing the St. Lawrence seaway authority, either alone or jointly or in conjunction with the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation of the United States, to construct, maintain and operate a bridge over Pollys Gut. Since then there have been discussions and negotiations between the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation and the New York Central Railway which have made it possible to consider what in the mind of Canadians is, I think, a much more satisfactory alternative to the bridge over Pollys Gut. I think that perhaps I might stick more closely to a memorandum I have here on the subject and perhaps, if necessary, supplement it with a few additions.

I should like to say that after considerable negotiation, and at the request of the Canadian government, the United States Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation agreed to reroute the highway and New York Central Railway in the United States by means of twin bridge facilities at the Grass river lock and bridges over the Grass and Raquette rivers in order to provide uninterrupted facilities.

It was desirable to retain as short and direct a route as possible for highway traffic coming to the Cornwall area from the east by the south shore of the St. Lawrence and particularly to provide as short a route as possible for the St. Regis Indians living in a small section of Canadian territory on the south shore of the St. Lawrence that is entirely surrounded by United States territory. These Indians come to Cornwall for supplies, schools, hospitals, employment, et cetera.

During the current session, parliament passed an amendment to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act to authorize the St. Lawrence seaway authority to join with the U.S. Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation in the construction of a low level highway and railway bridge over Pollys Gut, over the western end of Cornwall island and the United States mainland.

Just at this point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to interject that it was possible to build a low level bridge over Pollys Gut because no navigation was to take place in that part of the river. Hon. members who are familiar with the geography will realize that this plays an important part in the power development but no part whatever in the development of navigation facilities.

The proposed bridge was to replace the existing span of the Roosevelt bridge over the south channel of the St. Lawrence river which has to be removed so as to allow shipping to have access to the new 27-foot Long Sault canal. At that time it was understood that the New York Central Railway would not abandon its line between Ottawa and Helena, New York. As the only possible location for a combined low level highway and railway bridge was over Pollys Gut, the amendment to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act was drafted in restrictive terms accordingly.

Within the last few weeks the New York Central Railway has let it be known that a large industrial corporation is interested in acquiring as a plant site some 2,000 acres of land in the vicinity of the proposed relocated highway and rail line on the United States south shore of the St. Lawrence river to the east of the Grass river lock. The industrial corporation in question objects—and I think quite understandably—to having the railway and highway pass through the plant area. The New York Central Railway, accordingly, proposes to abandon its line between Cornwall and Helena, New York, and to service the industry by a spur line from one of its other railway lines in that area.

The U.S. Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation suggested that the highway be relocated in a westerly and a southerly direction; that is to say, west of the plant area to which I have just referred. This, however, would aggravate the problem of the St. Regis Indians who would have to travel an additional six miles to Cornwall. Furthermore, it would be much more inconvenient for all traffic travelling south and east of the international boundary.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to emphasize that the proposed diversion which would have brought the highway across twin bridges at the Grass river lock on to United States territory and then crossing Pollys Gut to meet the western end of Cornwall island would have materially added to the length of the trip that Indians living in the St. Regis reservation would have to take in order to get to Cornwall, and that the proposal to which I have just referred would have added an additional six miles to a trip that was already quite long.

At this stage the St. Lawrence seaway authority, having regard to the proposals to abandon the railway line, suggested that it would be more practical and economical to build over the south channel a high level highway suspension bridge a short distance west of the site of the present bridge. This is by far the most sensible and uncomplicated approach. It is cheaper, in that the total cost to both entities would be in the neighbourhood of $8 million against more than $9 million for the original plan. It is more direct by far and generally follows the present north-south international highway route at Cornwall. It is best for the Indians and for the traffic coming to Cornwall from the east by the south shore of the St. Lawrence.

Obviously participation by the St. Lawrence seaway authority in the construction of this bridge—which of course is an international bridge—would have to be authorized by parliament, and preferably at this current session, as work should be commenced during the present construction season. The proposal which is embodied in the resolution is to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act to provide that the authority would share in the cost of construction and in the building of either the low level highway and railway Pollys Gut bridge, or the south channel high level highway bridge, in the event that some unforeseen development makes it necessary to return to the idea of the bridge over Pollys Gut.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that anybody who is familiar with the geography of this particular part of the river and the surrounding country would have any doubt whatever that the high level bridge for highway traffic over the south channel south of Cornwall island has many obvious advantages, apart from the fact that it means a lesser cost to provide these facilities than that of those which were contemplated at Pollys Gut. I have no hesitation in urging the committee to adopt the resolution to the end that, as soon as possible, we can introduce the requisite legislation based on the resolution. In that connection I should like to tell hon. members that the bill itself will contain nothing more than the strict terms of the resolution which is now before the committee.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the minister's statement, Mr. Chairman, there are just a few brief questions I should like to ask him. The first one is this. It is indicated in the memorandum to which the minister was referring a few minutes ago that in future there will be a high level bridge—I presume it will be a highway bridge only—over the north channel. Is that contemplated in this resolution?

Mr. Marler: I do not think I mentioned that, Mr. Chairman. I notice that the newspapers have mentioned the possibility of a bridge over the north channel. I did not remember that I had mentioned it. I will say this, however. I think it is a perfectly logical development, although when it will be undertaken is an entirely different matter. I think it is a logical development for one to expect to take place in due time.

Mr. Nesbitt: The only reason I asked the question is this. It is my understanding that in the north channel there is not likely to be any shipping of any kind. I was wondering just what was the purpose of building a high level bridge over there.

Mr. Marler: I should not like to dismiss, quite as simply as that, the possibility that there would be no navigation in the north channel. If my hon. friend will look at the plan of the seaway he will see that the channel for navigation is to be dredged in the south channel, that is in the waters to the south of Cornwall island, and will lead directly to the Grass river lock which is being built by the United States seaway corporation. It may well happen at some later date that Canada will decide to construct locks on its own side of the international boundary line and in that event the channel to the north of Cornwall island, the so-called north channel, would have to be used in order to provide access to the lock which I think would be located just about—I do not know if my hon. friend is familiar with the work, but at the point where there is to be what is called a structure in the dam. So ultimately if there were duplicate facilities provided for shipping it would necessitate a high level bridge over the north channel, if one is to be built.

Mr. Nesbitt: I take it from the minister's comments that there is no additional high level bridge contemplated over the north channel in the immediate future. I believe the present bridge, which is called the Roosevelt bridge, over the north channel will be used in the meanwhile.

Mr. Marler: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Nesbitt: There are only one or two other questions I should like to ask. In the last few days there has been considerable criticism in the press from Mr. Robert Moses, chairman of the New York power authority, claiming that if this bridge is constructed it will result in a delay of one year in the construction of the seaway. I have a number of press clippings in front of me to that effect, but I have not been able to find in any of them any reasons given by Mr. Moses for this suggested delay of a year. Nevertheless, I ask the question because a person with Mr. Moses' knowledge of the subject must know what he is talking about, and he is chairman of an important New York state authority. I was wondering if the minister would care to comment on that?

Mr. Marler: I should like to dispose of two points. With regard to the north channel bridge, I think the hon. gentleman will find, if he rereads the amendments which were adopted earlier this year, that they contain the necessary authority for the St. Lawrence seaway authority to build the north channel bridge if it were considered desirable that it should do so.

The second point is that I know Mr. Moses has said the building of the bridge in this new location, that is over the south channel as opposed to Pollys Gut, would have the effect of delaying the opening of the seaway. All I can tell the committee is that the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, who is president of the St. Lawrence authority, has assured me that the question has been given most careful consideration by their technical advisers and they do not subscribe to the view which Mr. Moses has expressed that a high level highway bridge over the south channel will delay the opening of the seaway. I believe that opinion is likewise shared by the officials of the United States Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation.

Mr. Nesbitt: Apparently the officials of Ontario hydro have not expressed views similar to those of Mr. Moses, nor have the other two authorities concerned with the building of the seaway, but in view of the fact Mr. Moses holds a very important position can the minister give us any idea as to the type of objection Mr. Moses made and why this delay would occur? Were any suggestions ever forwarded to Mr. Chevrier?

Mr. Marler: I do not believe Mr. Chevrier has received any communications from Mr. Moses. I would merely suggest to the hon. member for Oxford that if he were interested in the development of the park and parkways in the state of New York, he would be delighted if this bridge were going to be built over Pollys Gut thereby bringing into the United States parkways system, and to the development that will probably take place in and around the United States portion of the seaway, all of the traffic that would be crossing from Cornwall. I think if I were in the position of Mr. Moses I would probably be most anxious to have the bridge built over Pollys Gut. But as I have no responsibility for parks or parkways in New York, I should like to see it where it would do the most good for the Indians on the St. Regis reserve.

Mr. Nesbitt: After having heard the comments of the minister and having taken a good look at a map of the area, I think I see what he means.

There is one other question I should like to ask. In the memorandum to which the minister referred, it was stated that this proposed new high level bridge over the south channel would cost $8 million whereas the other one over Pollys Gut would cost $9 million. In other words, the second one would cost about a million dollars less even though one would normally think a high level bridge would cost more. However, this proposed high level bridge only involves highway traffic, whereas the first bridge involves railway traffic as well as highway traffic.

Mr. Marler: Yes, that is quite right.

Mr. Nesbitt: Are there any additional amounts for which the authority would be responsible besides the $8 million to be expended on the bridge?

Mr. Marler: The $8 million and the $9 million to which I referred were the over-all costs. I believe our own technical people consider the $8 million figure, if anything, a trifle high. There are greater savings, however, than the $8 million or $9 million figures would seem to indicate. If the hon. gentleman is speaking particularly about the original plan, I think the amount of highway relocation that is involved in bringing the traffic from the bridge over the north channel to the new bridge over the south channel is less and, inasmuch as there is no railway relocation, there are some substantial advantages.

Mr. Nesbitt: The only comment I had on that, Mr. Chairman, was apart from the $8 milion as set forth by the minister, there will be no additional amount to Canada.

Mr. Marler: I do not know whether an exact distribution has been worked out between the two parties of this sum of $8 million to which I referred, but that is not to be paid solely by the St. Lawrence seaway authority. The costs are to be divided between the two authorities. I know of no other costs in connection with this particular aspect of the seaway construction program than are covered by the $8 million.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have one more question. Since the New York Central railway line between Ottawa and Cornwall is apparently to be abandoned—I understand this railway in the past has normally carried wood products from Ottawa and coal—what will the effect be on the upper end of the Ottawa valley of an arrangement of this sort?

Mr. Marler: The first point I should like to emphasize is that the abandonment of that section of line can only be undertaken after an application has been made to the board of transport commissioners and approved by the board. The second point I should like to make is that there has been no passenger service provided over that portion of the line for a very long time. There is, I understand, a very small volume of freight carried over it. My understanding of the matter is that it has been an uneconomic line so far as the New York Central is concerned.

Mr. Nesbitt: In other words, there will be a substitute service.

Mr. Marler: I take it certainly that the Canadian railways would be glad to have any alternative business that may be around. After all, it is principally a matter of moving traffic from Cornwall to Ottawa.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Marler thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 447, to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, if we could have a look at the bill during the dinner recess it probably could be dealt with at eight o'clock.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I much appreciate the offer of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and I will see if it is not possible to send him a copy of the bill. As I said, the bill is in the same terms as the resolution itself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second reading will take place later this day.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be read the second time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Authority may construct bridge over Pollys Gut or over the south channel.

Mr. Nesbitt: Assuming that this legislation passes, as would appear will happen, can the minister tell us when a decision will be arrived at to commence either one of the two bridges proposed?

Mr. Marler: Last Thursday there was a meeting between the Hon. Mr. Chevrier and the other members of the St. Lawrence seaway authority and Mr. Lewis Castle, president of the United States Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, at which it was agreed that they should proceed with the building of the high level highway bridge over the south channel if parliament took the necessary action to approve this change in the powers of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I know of no reason to believe that there has been any change in the thinking either of the St. Lawrence seaway authority or of the United States Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation.

Mr. Nesbitt: Will any legislation be required to be passed by the United States government?

Mr. Marler: My understanding is that no legislation is required.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Monday, July 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 418, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Harris—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, last night when we were discussing this clause the minister answered a question with regard to uniforms and stated that uniforms for firemen and policemen were not considered by the tax department. I wonder if he would tell us what other classifications of employees are allowed uniforms other than the armed forces?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I am not aware of any persons other than those in the armed forces who are given clothing as part of their payment and who are charged for it.

Mrs. Fairclough: There are other persons who obviously must wear uniforms in the performance of their duties, such as waiters, waitresses and musicians. Why are those people not given consideration with regard to uniforms when firemen, policemen and members of the armed forces are?

Mr. Harris: I suppose this is one of those questions the hon. member has in mind with respect to so-called self-employed persons as compared with those who are employed by others?

Mrs. Fairclough: Not necessarily.

Mr. Harris: Where an employer provides clothing and it is on a minor scale such as we have discussed it would not be a matter of concern in taxation. On the other hand, if an employer who was the owner of a restaurant required that the waiters wear a certain kind of clothing while working in his restaurant but did not provide it, I presume that that person would be a free agent to take the employment or not as he chose. He would know that the cost of providing that particular clothing would be part of his cost in taking the job in question.

Mrs. Fairclough: Of course anyone in this country is pretty well a free agent with regard to the type of employment he takes. The minister will recall that in recent years quite a few cases have gone to appeal, mostly concerning self-employed persons. Many of these cases had to do with musicians. One man may form a band and employ a dozen men to work for him and the clothing they are required to wear on the job is of no use anywhere else. Yet they are told that those are working clothes. But the clothes worn by the policeman or fireman or the member of the armed forces are also working clothes. Why should there be any distinction between one class of employee and another?

Mr. Harris: When I became a minister of the crown I found that on occasion I had to wear a silk hat. I had to buy it and I did not claim a tax deduction.

Mrs. Fairclough: Would the minister consider that as part of his working clothes?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, just at the close of the discussion last evening I asked the minister if he would reconsider this clause, particularly the words "of any kind whatsoever". The explanation given by the minister for seeking such an amendment certainly does not justify words as wide in their application as these. Surely the matter warrants some reconsideration.

Mr. Harris: I have given some consideration to it. It is not intended of course to use these words to extend the present tax which is imposed under certain conditions. Two cases were heard by the income tax appeal board and in one instance it was held that these words did not restrict the benefit that might be taxed to board and lodging and in the other case it was decided that they did. Rather than wait until we find we have lost the assessments in connection with a particular class or group of taxpayers it was decided to provide in the law that the present assessments which were of the kind I mentioned last night, that is gifts of furniture and matters of that kind, would continue to be assessed with the sanction of the law.

I am free to admit that if one could draft a clause which would set out all the known kinds of benefits that are given by employers it would be more desirable, but these fluctuate from time to time and are very numerous. I suggest to the committee that we do this on the basis that I have suggested, namely that we do not intend to extend the present practice of assessing every kind of benefit I described last night, and then if at a later time it is brought to my attention that there has been an increase in the class of gifts or benefits provided for I will agree that that was not intended and we would then have an amendment to provide for it specifically. If we tried to define the several kinds of gifts we would only end up as we are now with having to have some general clause which in itself would be just as broad and as indefinite as the present words in this.

Mr. Monteith: I am very pleased that the Minister of National Revenue is here tonight to hear the Minister of Finance's words because after all he has gone on record as saying that he follows the letter of the act. This states "of any kind whatsoever". I am afraid that it will instil in the minds of the tax collection department the idea of doing exactly that. No matter what the intention of the Minister of Finance may be tonight, it is set out very clearly that this is going to authorize the Minister of National Revenue to collect any kind of such benefit, no matter what it may be.

Mr. Fleming: I have just this concluding word to say. We are quite prepared to examine any situation to arrive at a decision as members as to whether it is fair that such benefits should be included within the scope of taxable income or not. The minister has said it is not intended to go beyond the present administration in seeking to define the inclusive nature of certain benefits. If that were all the government wished to do then I do not think there is any case for introducing these words, but, as I say, where there are individual situations we are quite prepared to examine them on their merits.

However, what is proposed in this amendment is that everything imaginable that can be classified as a benefit passing to an employee as a term or incident of his employment shall be construed to be income and therefore taxable. It seems to me the wrong place to put the generalities. Parliament should know with some regard for detail and specific application what kind of taxes it is applying, and not enact this broad omnibus provision when all we have put before us to justify it is in essence one particular situation. If there is nothing more than that by way of protection for the individual in this country then we cannot support the addition of those words of wide and sweeping scope to the present definition.

Mr. Monteith: May I ask a further question of the minister? Is he in a position to define just what value might be put on board and lodging in any certain circumstances, or is that left entirely up to the Minister of National Revenue and his department to make up their minds on, as occasion arises?

Mr. Harris: I do not put the valuation on it. The Minister of National Revenue does.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Just within the past year, the teachers in private schools have had their board and lodging graded a little differently. Why was that done? I understand that is a new ruling on the teachers in private schools.

Mr. Harris: None of the officials are familiar with the case. If my hon friend will let me have details, I shall be glad to look into it.

Mrs. Fairclough: As I have said before, I am perturbed about the inequality of these provisions. I cannot see why one group of citizens is taxed in a different manner from another. That goes all the way down the line. It is not only a matter of the articles covered in clause 1, although that is rather wide.

It is all very well for the minister to say, "It is not our intention to go beyond the practices that have been established already by the department", but some of the district offices have varying practices. As a matter of fact, when we were considering in the estimates committee the estimates of national revenue, we had the minister and the deputy minister denying that certain practices took place, practices that we knew were in effect. Obviously the higher officers of the departments themselves do not know what takes place in the district offices and, unless specific cases are called to their attention, would never know.

The assessors go by the book. They must go by the book. You cannot give too wide a latitude at that level. Ministerial discretion is another thing, but if you are going to put these words into this act, then perhaps every assessor in the country will interpret them to mean that every child who walks into his father's store and takes a box of candy for his own use is going to have that added to his father's income. The minister will say that is ridiculous. I shall too, but I have seen instances where just such trivial things were charged to a person as added income. They add up over a period of time. I have heard assessors say, "You must take certain things," or "It stands to reason you would take certain things." They may say, "You must supply yourself with tobacco from the store"; but perhaps the man is a non-smoker. The imagination of these people sometimes makes one gasp. Yet trying to refute the statements of these assessors is a difficult matter. I have every sympathy with them because I know there are a great many people who make a habit of evading whatever they can. It would be natural if these assessors should be suspicious on occasion, but I do not know why they should be suspicious of everyone in general until they have had some cause to be. This is a situation which obtains in every tax division office of which I know. If you are going to put these words into this act you are going to open the floodgate for all sorts of assessments against taxpayers who are not in a position to defend themselves.

Mr. McCann: I cannot agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West when she states that the officers in the head office do not know what is going on in the district offices.

Mrs. Fairclough: All you have to do is to read the proceedings of the estimates committee.

Mr. McCann: No. The directives are sent out from the head office to all of the district offices, and there is a uniform interpretation which exists from coast to coast.

With reference to the amount which is regarded as income for board and lodging, that is fixed largely by the current rates in the community. For instance, there are some mining communities where they pay a wage, and a man has to make his own arrangements for board and lodging. In a mining camp I was in only a few weeks ago in the Blind River district, the rate is $2 per day because that is the current rate in that community for board and lodging. So I think it is hardly fair to state that we do not know what is going on in district offices, because we do. We would not have much of a head office if we did not know. As I have said, directives go out which interpret the law according to the law, and those directives are the same in every district office.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether this is quite in order or not, but I know you will certainly correct me quickly enough. I wonder whether I might put a question through you and through the Minister of Finance to the Minister of National Revenue. I should like to have the Minister of National Revenue go on record as agreeing with the Minister of Finance to the effect that they would not fulfil this wording suggested, that is, "the value of board, lodging and other benefits of any kind whatsoever".

The Minister of Finance has said that it is not the intention to collect on every item there is and actually to enlarge on the present situation at all, but I should like to hear the Minister of National Revenue agree that that will not be the intention of the Department of National Revenue despite the fact that he has gone on record as admitting that they followed the letter of the law in all their collections.

Mr. McCann: That is quite true. We do follow the letter of the law. That is the reason that the law is made. We have something that is a yardstick by which we can measure cases generally or any particular case, and if a person receives a benefit that has a monetary value it is taken into account and is regarded as income which is taxable.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, that fixes it.

Mr. Monteith: May I put another question in this roundabout way and ask the Minister of National Revenue if it is his intention not to make any change in the present procedure?

Mr. McCann: I think I can safely say that there is no particular change contemplated.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, that is a mouthful, because we had a good deal of discussion about this last night, and the whole case made out by the Minister of Finance is that there is a need for enlargement of the definition of "benefit" in this section. If there is no need for enlargement then there is no occasion for bringing this clause before the house for enactment. Presumably some change is sought and the change must be sought for a purpose.

I must say to the Minister of National Revenue that I think he is perfectly right in saying that it is the duty of his department to enforce the law according to its terms. I do not see how he could do anything else or how it would be proper for the department to take any other position.

But when the Minister of Finance throws out the bait tonight that even if the amendment is passed and the scope of the definition of "benefit" is enlarged it is not the intention of the government to expand the present operation in this respect, then I think he is taking in a lot of territory tonight. I do not see how he can give an undertaking that will have any binding effect in any situation that may arise. He did offer the house a statement that if situations arose that may not have been within present contemplation he would give consideration to them, but I am suggesting that is the wrong way to go about this and it is putting the cart before the horse.

Surely the proper way to proceed is not by a blanket definition to include within the scope of taxable income everything that can by any stretch of the imagination be construed as a benefit under the words "of any kind whatsoever". Surely the proper procedure is for the government, in asking parliament to impose taxation, to bring forward and make out a case for it. The case that has been made out by the minister is in a particular circumstance only, not a case for a wide inclusive extension of the definition. May I say to the Minister of National Revenue that if this section were put into effect I think he would have no alternative but to enforce its full effect. It would be his duty, charged with the administration of the act, to find any benefit of any kind whatsoever that an employee receives as a term or incident of his employment, and, regardless of what the Minister of Finance has said, it would be the duty of the Minister of National Revenue to go ahead and assess. That is why I think we are being asked by the government tonight to take an altogether wrong procedure in enacting a definition of such a widely inclusive effect when no case has been made out for it and, Mr. Chairman, we in this part of the house cannot support it.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister made quite a case for these words, saying that it was not the intention to enlarge their application, as has been suggested, and the Minister of National Revenue stands up and says just the opposite—

Mr. McCann: How?

Mrs. Fairclough: —that the department must go by the book, that they are going to enforce this according to the words which are in the act, which is the very thing we told the Minister of Finance would happen. But quite apart from whether or not the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue can come to an agreement at this time, which they probably could do, these words are going to be in the act for all time or until such time as the act is amended and they are taken out. In that connection I draw to the minister's attention that the senior officials in his own department have a rather deplorable record for accepting jobs elsewhere and it could very well be that in a few years the people who have listened to him will no longer be in positions where they will be administering the act. The same holds true of the Department of National Revenue.

In any event, whatever the causes may be, it is quite within the bounds of reason that within a very few years we will have new people in these departments administering the act who will have no recollection of any agreements or undertakings made with the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue with regard to the interpretation of these words. I think the words are dangerous. It is dangerous to put such broad terminology in the act, and personally I cannot support it at all.

Mr. Hahn: There is another factor that I think is fairly important and that is the interpretation that might be put on this clause by an individual filling in his own income tax return who feels that it is his responsibility to make a note of any and all funds that he receives by way of benefits of any kind whatsoever. Let us say that he includes them in his return and pays his income tax. He has only a matter of one year in which to ask for a rebate when he finds that his neighbours did not include such items and did not have to. I am wondering whether the finance department will take it upon itself to notify these people immediately that their contribution in that regard was not necessary and therefore they are entitled to a rebate.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, if we get to that point I am going to move that the one year become two years.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I am still opposed to this clause being as wide open as it is, and I think it is only in the interests of the administration that the gap be closed a little bit. I can recall a situation where used equipment was classed as secondhand equipment but when the time came that it was convenient to enlarge the interpretation of the act it actually happened that new equipment was classified as secondhand equipment because it had gone into the possession of a second party. The Minister of National Revenue has said that he is going to implement the act as it stands. He has no alternative but to do so, and I think that the Minister of Finance is letting himself in for a lot of grief here. I think we in the opposition are really trying to help him a whole lot. I have in my pocket a letter that reached me today and it has to do with a case where an arbitrary assessment has been made already. In these cases the onus is on the individual to prove that the money is not owing. If a man is faced with such an assessment and has no money, what happens? He is placed in an impossible position.

All the assessor has to do is to say, "I am assessing you so and so", and that is it. There is an appeal, of course, and if the person has enough money to go ahead and appeal the case he may get some redress, but the onus is on the individual. If the onus were on the taxation department to prove the assessment first it would be a different situation, but that is not the case.

I think it is going too far to leave this clause as it is. If there are two or three cases, as the minister said, that need to be covered, surely they can be spelled out.

Mr. Monteith: I am going to suggest that the Minister of National Revenue change places with the Minister of Trade and Commerce temporarily and that the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance get their heads together and see if they can come to some agreement. The Minister of National Revenue says that he has to follow the letter of the act. If this amendment goes through the letter of the act will read, "the value of board, lodging and other benefits of any kind whatsoever." The Minister of Finance says that that does not mean certain things, that there will be no change from the situation that exists at the present moment. I certainly think some definite understanding should be given to the house so that the people of Canada will know where they stand.

Mr. Hees: I think the hon. member has made a very constructive suggestion. Unless the Minister of National Revenue gets over where he can listen to the Minister of Finance tell him how he is to administer the act which the Minister of Finance is passing for him, how in the world are we ever going to get any sense out of this thing?

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Nesbitt: No. Mr. Chairman, I was a member of this house who sat on the special committee on the estimates which inquired into the activities of the Department of National Revenue. Like the hon. member for Hamilton West, the hon. member for Perth and other hon. members, I cannot help but feel that these words "of any kind whatsoever" will give a great deal of scope to some of the junior individuals in the various tax offices of the Department of National Revenue. As the minister told us in committee with respect to the senior officials, they knew what was going on in every branch of the department. They may send out regulations. That is quite true. But these regulations are interpreted differently in different offices. As I recall the hearings of that committee, evidence was presented—I know it was presented by myself, and as I recall it it was presented by several other members—to the effect that some of the junior officials in the branch offices of the Department of National Revenue, albeit succession duty offices or income tax offices, certainly seemed to have the attitude—or at least we were certainly led to believe that they had—of "get all you can". If words like these are put in the act I cannot see how some of these overzealous types in that department will not just try to do that and get all that they can. I think we must be very careful before these words are passed by this committee.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Chairman. I should like to protest with the others who have protested against these words. I have been examining what was said last night by the minister in connection with the matter. I am surprised that in the interval he did not think up and make some modification. Last night the committee suggested that he think the matter over and modify the present wording. He has not done that. Now he is just sitting there in that determined fashion, resolved that no change shall be made. I suggest that is not good enough. Study of a bill in committee serves an extremely useful purpose. Already today and yesterday we have had bills studied in committee, with changes made and alterations accepted. It is in committee that there are pointed out inaccuracies in drafting, in wording or something like that. It is quite customary for ministers to recognize the fact that they themselves have not seen every aspect of a situation and that perhaps other minds applied to the same problem had something to contribute. I think something has been contributed to the discussion last night and tonight with regard to this wording. But what is contributed by the minister? As reported at page 6707 of Hansard, when he was dealing with this matter in the first instance, in reply to a question he said this:

> With respect to the other question, we have in mind other forms of benefits that might be derived in the normal course of employment other than board and lodging.

I draw attention to that expression "might be derived". I do not know just who is going to make that decision. Then, as reported at the bottom of that page, the minister goes on to say this:

> . . . whereas there might be a benefit in connection with the employment quite apart from board and lodging which ought to be taxed, . . .

If it ought to be taxed, this is the institution that should say it ought to be taxed, which should do it in clear words and not leave the matter open as it is here. If the minister wants to leave the matter wide open, why did he ever bother to put in "board and lodging"? Why not just say "any benefits of any kind whatsoever received or enjoyed in respect of the course of employment"? If you are going to spell out things that should be taxed, include them all and name them. But this wide open phrase merits all the criticism that has been offered to it tonight. It is not beyond the capacity of the minister to let this clause stand and go on with other clauses. In the interval he might try to come up with some specific wording. I do not think it can be argued that those who have spoken before me have not shown quite clearly that there is a danger of abuse in wording of this nature. Who is going to make the decision? Will it be the Minister of National Revenue or will it be some junior officer going about the country? Who is going to say that something is going to constitute a benefit and that it has been derived in the normal course of employment, and that it ought to be taxed? If it ought to be taxed, parliament should say what should be taxed. Surely it is clear that over the years taxation measures must be amended from time to time. Evasions of taxation laws have occurred in the past. Loopholes must be plugged. This process goes on continuously. It may well be that next year it will be necessary to bring in some amendment. But let us not bring in a carelessly worded phrase such as this one which puts the discretion, so far as we know, in the hands of very junior officials to determine what tax a person is going to pay. The voice of the taxpayer must be heard in the land, and this is the place for it to be heard. We suggest to the minister to let this clause stand for further consideration.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I have been trying to look at this section objectively and perhaps the question I intended to ask would be better addressed to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister or have his officials experienced any particular difficulty in administering the act as it stands without these words being added "of any kind whatsoever", or in other words with the wording "the value of board, lodging and other benefits"? I think that the committee might be assisted if the minister could give us some concrete examples of the kind of difficulties he may have had, if any. Of course, if there have not been any difficulties, I see no reason at all for having these words added.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, might I answer that question? If my hon. friend will read the record of last night's proceedings, he will see that I referred to the case of refrigerators. That is the kind of thing that has been given by employers to an employee, which we have been taxing and which we should continue to tax.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I see no difficulty at all there. The act reads "the value of board, lodging and other benefits". Certainly if it is considered that the gift of refrigerators was a benefit or an additional benefit, where does the difficulty arise?

Mr. Harris: As I have already said three times, the difficulty arises in that the income tax appeal board has thrown doubt on the use of the words "or other benefits". They have suggested that these words relate only to board and lodging or something like board and lodging and not to refrigerators or something completely different from board and lodging.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of what the minister has just said, would he say that the suggested wording of the act would go so far as to say that employees in factories and so on would be charged income tax on their Christmas turkeys or something like that?

Mr. Harris: Of course not.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Zaplitny: I want to ask one other question. Further down in the same clause we read these words "received or enjoyed by him in the year in respect of", and so on. What is the distinction between the words "received" and "enjoyed"?

Mr. Harris: I have only a layman's knowledge of this matter. These words have been part of the act for some time. I think "received" and "enjoyed" are synonymous terms that have been part of the taxing statute since I have known of it. But I will look up the definition in order to see whether there is anything unusual in it.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Those in favour of clause 1 will kindly rise.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 59; nays, 26.

Mr. Monteith: Just in passing, I wonder if the Minister of National Revenue would now send a directive to all his district offices instructing them not to change their present method of assessment in any manner whatever?

Mr. McCann: We will wait until the act is passed.

On clause 2—Supplementary unemployment benefit plan.

Mrs. Fairclough: I wonder if the minister would give us an example of what is meant in clause 2, paragraph (1), with specific reference to the term "with whom the taxpayer does not deal at arm's length". In what way would an employee's profit sharing plan benefit the employee through—I suppose it is a subsidiary corporation that the minister means?

Mr. Harris: Yes, there are other references later in the bill to a situation in which one corporation might make a contribution to a subsidiary corporation and that is described in the words, not being at arm's length.

Mrs. Fairclough: For the purpose of profit sharing?

Mr. Harris: For the purpose of the pension only.

Mrs. Fairclough: But this says profit sharing.

Mr. Harris: And profit sharing, yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the minister have a specific instance in mind? Could he describe one?

Mr. Harris: If a parent company established or had a profit sharing plan and desired that a subsidiary would also have such a plan, it might find it convenient to make a contribution to the fund in the first place, and the purpose of course of this clause is to tax the amount received should that fund pay money back to the taxpayer which, when it had been paid in, was tax exempt.

Mrs. Fairclough: Well, the taxpayer would not pay anything into a profit sharing plan.

Mr. Harris: That is the point; if you had an employee's profit sharing trust, and out of that trust moneys were paid back to the taxpayer—we do not anticipate it, but if it were it should be taxable then because it was non-taxable when it went into the trust fund.

Mrs. Fairclough: Taxable in whose hands?

Mr. Harris: In the hands of the corporation.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Employer's contribution to pension fund.

Mr. Fleming: May I make a request on a matter of procedure? Clause 3 has 10 subclauses to it and I wonder if, for convenience, seeing they relate to such a wide variety of matters and many of them quite dissimilar, you would call the subclauses in order? I think that will make for a more orderly procedure.

Mr. Harris: I agree because I have a number of amendments to move to the various subclauses.

The Chairman: That will be for the purpose of discussion only, and then the whole clause will be carried at once?

Mr. Fleming: There will be amendments to some of the clauses and I do not know whether it would be more convenient to vote, if necessary, on the subclauses. I think it would make for more orderly procedure.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 3—Subclause (1).

Mr. Fleming: While this does not directly involve the matter of deductions and contributions to pensions by self-employed persons in well recognized groups, I think it would be desirable if, after the discussion there has been on that particular subject, the minister had something to say about it. It was mentioned on second reading and in the general discussion on clause 1. This particular clause does relate to the same section of the act, section 11, in relation to deductions and pension contributions. I wonder if the minister would not say something on this subject because it is a matter, as he well knows, of widespread interest. There have been many representations made to him by well recognized professional groups and others, whose pleas have been before the department for some years, and I would respectfully suggest there should be some statement from the government at this time.

Mr. McMillan: I want to deal with this for a minute. Earlier this session I had a notice of motion on the order paper, but it could not be reached. It had to do with the vesting of pension rights in the different pension plans presently in vogue in Canada. I am concerned about Canadians who, by their work, have built up an equity for later payment to themselves and who cannot or are unable to meet the number of years of service required or are unable to work to a certain chronological retiring age, or both. The two pension plans are contributory or non-contributory on the part of the employee.

In the latter case, the employers pay the contribution for their employees. These arrangements, of course, are generally the result of a contract or agreement between management and labour. The requirements to meet a pensionable retiring age are necessarily based on a certain number of years of service. I am not concerned with those who are able to meet those requirements but with those who through their service have built up an equity in the non-contributing pension fund or the non-contributing part of a pension fund, who, for one reason or another, have failed by not more than a year or so to meet these requirements. I realize that the employee in a contributing plan can recover his own contribution, but I am not aware that any employee ever recovers any money paid into the pension fund on his behalf by employers. The amounts of money involved are large and vary, of course, with the different pension plans.

Now, as an example, an employee in a non-contributing plan who just falls short of being eligible for a pension of $100 a month at 65 years of age misses a capitalized pension of something over $13,000. This capitalized amount, of course, varies with the type of plan, the age at retirement, and in a contributing plan of course would be less. I realize that pension plans were started by companies to provide an incentive for their employees to remain in their employment for a number of years and to reward their employees for a lifetime of service. I have nothing but praise for the companies who so reward their employees. You might ask why the government of Canada should be interested in these pension plans.

First of all, the contributions made toward these plans are free of income tax. Our federal treasury forgoes large sums of money by way of income tax collections in respect to the non-contributory plans and the non-contributory parts of plans. In recent years the income tax on the net earnings of large corporations has been in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent. The people of Canada are therefore subsidizing the various pension plans to the extent that income tax is now collected in respect of the contributions toward these plans. The government of Canada should therefore see that pension plans are put to the best possible use for all Canadians generally.

There are various reasons why a workman might not be able to complete his service up to retiring age and thus qualify for a pension. I can think of different medical reasons. One very common reason is coronary insufficiency. A man might be able to do a very light job but if it requires sudden expenditure of energy he will develop cardiac pain and be forced to quit work. Also in industry we get workers with allergies of the skin and of the respiratory system. I have seen workers in a plant where they have changed their process and used different chemicals and gasses develop respiratory allergies or irritations. These men are not actually sick but they are too miserable to continue at their work and they have to quit.

A man might lose his job because of an altercation with his boss. I have also seen a case in a rather small plant where they had a pension plan and when they sold out to new owners the new owners brought in their own workmen and many of the old workers were discharged and therefore lost out on the pension plan. There are many other examples I can think of where employment is terminated particularly for medical reasons.

Often these terminations of employment come after the age of 45 at which time the worker is too old to find other insurable employment. He cannot go to another factory because in most cases their pension plans are such that it would not be economical to hire him. These workers when they are laid off obtain seasonal employment. They work at a multiplicity of jobs in the summer time and they frequently do not earn enough to keep themselves and their families during the winter. If sickness comes to them or to their families they fall back on the provinces and the muncipalities to pay the cost of their sickness. I have seen various workers who have fallen on the local authorities for relief.

Under the regulations of the Income Tax Act a worker would have a vested right in a pension after 20 years of service. This worker, however, has been helping to build up the equity in that pension plan from the early years of his service in the company.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if some means could not be found whereby a worker would have some fractional interest in the equity of a pension plan in the later years before it matures at 20 years. For instance, he would have some financial interest after 15 years or something of that nature. I would like to see this apply as a matter of right particularly in those cases where the workman's case is just and the termination of service is quite beyond his control.

Practically all our Canadian companies and particularly our large ones with which I am familiar are very generous with their workmen in this respect. However, some of our smaller companies that have pension plans cannot be so generous because they do not have a multiplicity of light jobs which they can give to men with certain disabilities particularly if they have to stay on light jobs permanently.

Although I do not think it comes under this section, while I am on the subject of pensions I might say in a sentence or two that there are many Canadians who cannot avail themselves of a pension plan in which contributions would be exempt from income tax. Many of these people have very modest incomes, as was pointed out last night by the hon. member for St. Paul's. I think the hon. member included doctors. I believe these individuals should have the same right as their fellow-Canadians in this respect.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was most interested in the remarks made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat and I was extremely pleased to note that he has given some consideration to a problem that is concerning thousands of industrial workers in Canada.

I rise at this time because this is a problem that concerns thousands in my constituency and I know that other hon. members in this house are also concerned with this question. I am aware that the hon. member for Kootenay East is concerned, as I am, about the matter and I have worked with him on this question during the last session and this one.

For many years industrial workers have been interested in some form of industrial retirement pension to give them some measure of security in their old age, and in response to that even prior to the war many of the larger companies established pension plans, particularly companies like the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, the International Nickel Company, the railway companies and other large companies. Since the second world war, however, interest in these plans has developed, so far as I can see, by leaps and bounds and particularly since what I consider the very favourable exemptions on account of investment in pension plans.

I think it is because of that investment, as the hon. member who spoke prior to me referred to, that the governments have a considerable interest in the terms, provisions and operation of these pension funds. This interest was indicated, I think, when the Department of National Revenue issued a blue book dealing with taxation and pension plans over the signature of the Minister of National Revenue, who I am pleased to see is here this evening. However, from what I understand, this booklet was never widely circulated. In fact, few unions had knowledge of it although the union which is the largest one in my constituency, the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers in both Kootenay West and Kootenay East, was well acquainted with it. The union to which I have referred used the provisions of part 10 (b) of these regulations published over the minister's signature in submitting the union's case before a conciliation board in Vancouver in 1953. I just want to briefly refer to this booklet because I do not intend to take the time of the house at any great length.

In the foreword to the booklet of principles and rules issued by the taxation division, the Minister of National Revenue states:

> The approval of employees' superannuation or pension funds or plans will be governed by the principles and rules published herewith. These will extend and apply to the continuing approval of plans now operating as well as those which may be established in the future.

The next clause in the minister's regulations, which concerns a number of industrial workers, is clause 10(B), which reads:

> The right provided by employer contributions must vest in the employee with a determinable period, and particularly on the attainment by the employee of an age which would prejudice him in the event of severance from the employment. Therefore, vesting should be absolute upon attaining age fifty subject to a minimum period not exceeding twenty years of service or participation.

Those regulations indicate that the department considers it has a responsibility to approve pension plans as against the explanation given by the minister last evening. I think it is quite right to say that this thing certainly gave a strong impression of having the force of law, especially to a layman like me and a good many other people. Mr. Lowery, chairman of the conciliation board which dealt with the union's problems in 1953, a retired civil servant who had been a collector of customs on the Pacific coast and who was also a qualified lawyer, held that the booklet was binding on the government as a statement of policy. As a result this conciliation board ruled that the pensions were negotiable and that pension vesting was a binding commitment as established under part 10(B) of the rules and regulations as put out by the Minister of National Revenue.

I might say that the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers was the first and only union to appeal to the government to enforce its own declared policy by giving approval to pension plans set up according to the blue book issued by the Department of National Revenue. However, other labour unions have become interested in this problem and this year a special resolution was introduced at the recent merger convention which formed the Canadian Labour Congress by the Vancouver street railway employees' union. This resolution was widely supported in the convention and was approved by the resolutions committee, but because of insufficient time with which to deal with it it was referred to the new executive along with a number of other resolutions.

At the request of the membership of the union in Kootenay East and Kootenay West the co-ordinating committee of the union representing the union negotiating committee, prior to negotiations with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, met with the Minister of Fisheries—I must say that they spoke highly indeed of the careful consideration and attention given by the Minister of Fisheries to their representations of the problem that concerned them on this occasion—and other members of the house as well as two officials of the Department of Finance on May 11, 1955. The union representatives presented their case, they had a good hearing and the matter was thoroughly discussed.

On July 26 last year I raised the matter in the house at the request of the organizations in my district. In reply to my representations the minister quoted the closing paragraph of his latest letter to the union. The union had written to the minister what I considered to be a very excellent letter in connection with this matter and this is what the minister quoted:

> I should advise you, however, that early in this year I gave instructions to my staff to prepare a study of pension plans in so far as the Income Tax Act is concerned having in mind possible amendments to the act, and regulations, and this is proceeding. No change in present practice will occur until this study has been completed.

Then the minister went on to say:

> So the matter is under advisement and consideration at the present time.

Representatives of the union met the Minister of Finance and other members of the house this spring and again urged the department to enforce the regulations with respect to pension plans. When the union negotiating committee for the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company employees in British Columbia met with the company officials to consider a new contract this spring the committee refused to negotiate on other matters until the company had agreed to establish vesting rights in the pension plan, and only when this was done by the submission of a letter to the presidents of locals 480 and 651 did negotiations proceed to a settlement. I am going to put that letter on the record because it is the first letter of its kind in connection with negotiations between a company and union in Canada. The letter reads:

> Trail, British Columbia,
> 9th May, 1956.
> Mr. A. King, President,
> Trail and District Smelter Workers' Union,
> Local 480, I.U.M.M. & S.W.,
> Trail, B.C.
> Mr. R. C. Thompson, President,
> Kimberley Mine and Mill Workers' Union,
> Local 651, I.U.M.M. & S.W.,
> Kimberley, B.C.
> Dear Sirs:
> This will confirm that it is Cominco policy to grant leave of absence to an older employee of long service who is obliged to discontinue his active employment for a reason beyond his control. The granting of such leave is not confined to any specific age or service requirements but subject to the leave being for an acceptable reason, an older employee whose age and service reaches a total of 80 or more is automatically granted this privilege and any older employee whose service is of the order of 20 years is also generally given favourable consideration.

Leave does not extend beyond the employee's 65th birthday, and in any case leave is not granted if the reason for discontinuance of employment is discharge for cause or voluntary severing of employment.

Yours truly,
E. Benson.

Mr. Benson is one of the senior officials of the company. It was fortunate that the company recognized the concern of its employees in this matter and—I have discussed this at length with the hon. member for Kootenay East who is just as concerned about this matter as I and who has a closer relationship to the actual conditions under which the men are working as he has worked as a miner—the terms of the blue book part 10(B) are largely carried out by the leave of absence provisions included in the letter from the company to the union.

However, while the employees are glad to have this further measure of security they are still waiting for the government's decision after this very lengthy consideration of this issue because they believe that under present circumstances vesting rights should be assured by law. The group of which I am a member have for years recognized the increasing necessity for a national industrial pensions policy and plan and have urged the government repeatedly to take steps to implement such a scheme. As the years go by the government and the public and the employees concerned have an increasing stake in these pension plans because of the great investment of public funds by virtue of income tax exemptions.

The letter of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company is a concession by the company in the matter, and other companies I am told are beginning to recognize that the present piecemeal industrial pension arrangements in Canada are not adequate. I should like to read from an article which appeared in Motor Carrier of June 1956 dealing with industrial pensions in Canada and reading as follows:

"Mobile Pensions" Scheme Creeps Closer to Canada

"Mobile pensions" a scheme whereby a worker whose employer sets aside pension money for him can carry his accumulated pension credits from job to job, got a significant boost this month when 1,500 employees of Libby, McNeill and Libby went back to work at five west coast (U.S.) canneries after a two-week strike. They voted approval of an agreement between the big canning company and a Teamster affiliate, the Western Council of Cannery Workers, which provides a transferable form of retirement pay.

Retirement counsellors claim the notion of mobile pension benefits is "the coming thing". (Like unemployment insurance reserves, they're paid into a worker's account and if the worker moves to a new job, his built-up reserves move with him.)

I mention that to indicate the increasing interest of industrial workers in some mobility of pension plans and some development of law in relation to public investment in these schemes. I know that the officials of the Departments of Finance and National Revenue have been making a study of pension plans, in so far as the Income Tax Act is concerned, for about 18 months. Both employers and unions have made representations to the ministers and to officials. But, in my opinion and in the opinion of the members of this group, under present conditions this is a totally inadequate approach to this important and growing problem.

We believe that, in view of the public investment in industrial pension plans, it is the responsibility of the government to recognize the fact that the time is ripe for the development of a national industrial pension policy and plan so that in the future it will be part of our whole, shall we say, pension scheme structure in this country.

I am just going to make one brief suggestion before concluding. Because of the present conditions and our understanding of them, we suggest that a special parliamentary committee should be established at the next session to study this question, to hear evidence from employers and employees' representatives and others concerned, and to make recommendations for the bringing into effect of a national industrial pension scheme that will provide the security that the workers of this country are entitled to in this era of expanding production and increasing wealth.

I have hurried through what I have to say as quickly as possible in order to detain the house no longer than is necessary, but this is a much larger problem than rendering a verdict on a book of rules published by the Department of National Revenue. I think we have to face this thing. I am sure that if the government were able to get the employers and the unions of this country to get together and make recommendations that would make it possible for this house to establish a national industrial pension plan, it would not only benefit the employees concerned but would benefit the people as a whole, because we would then have a rationalized and established system of retirement allowances that would place on individuals some responsibility for looking after their future.

Mr. Cavers: I should like to support the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Welland earlier in this debate. In our district in recent years, pension plans of this kind have been most popular where employees and employers have, to the benefit of both entered into pension plans. Within the past month or six weeks, I have had two cases brought to my attention; one where an employee was obliged to leave his employment because of illness, as suggested by the hon. member for Welland. The employee had built up a considerable equity in his plan. It was necessary for him to waive payment of the whole of the equity that had been contributed to this plan. Then in another instance an employee had felt that he might benefit to some extent by leaving the employment of his former firm and taking a position with another establishment. In that instance he informed me that after 20 years' employment with the original firm he was obliged to forgo payment of the equity which he had built up.

I urge the minister to work out some better system of proportionate vesting of the equities of these employees. I am sure it would be very helpful to the employees and that it would meet with the approval of the unions and various industries in which these pension plans are popular. I know it would do a great deal not only to provide for a more steady employment among the employees, but the employees would feel that when they become associated with a firm they are not necessarily obliged to stay with that firm during the continuation of the plan. It would do a great deal to assist in industrial husbandry throughout the country.

Mr. Sinclair: I rise to speak very briefly on this issue, one reason being because of the reference made to me by the hon. member for Kootenay West, in which he referred to my interest in this matter as Minister of Fisheries. It is not as Minister of Fisheries but rather as a minister representing British Columbia and, even more important, perhaps, as the member for Coast-Capilano.

Mr. Herridge: I should have pointed that out.

Mr. Sinclair: I have been interested because my riding has one of the large mines of the nation, Britannia mines, in which before the war I worked as an employee. As a minister, of course, I made my representations on this matter privately to the Minister of Finance. However, I am rising to speak on behalf of my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay East, to whom the member for Kootenay West has very generously referred. I think members will agree that there have been few more diligent and attentive members in discussions this session than the hon. member for Kootenay East, who has been here from the beginning of the session long ago in January. Unfortunately, for a day or two he has been back in British Columbia because of family responsibilities, but as a miner himself and as one time president of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers in the great mine of Kimberley, I cannot think of any issue which he has pressed more consistently and more vigorously with the Minister of Finance, and myself as minister for British Columbia, than this issue.

I am sure that the minister wants to be reminded of that fact and the responsibility he has about this apparent inconsistency between this book of instructions which the member has mentioned and the law as it stands. I should just like to remind the house, since the member is not here, that this has been one of the issues he has stressed very vigorously because his feelings in this matter are like those of the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to ask whether the minister will give us the information he was asked to give us earlier.

Mr. Harris: We might as well dispose of both points on paragraph one. The first is with respect to the deduction for income tax purposes of moneys that may be paid by the self-employed by way of annuities and the like. As the hon. members for Eglinton and St. Paul's said, not only in this debate but in the one a year ago, this is a problem which is becoming more acute, and was becoming a year ago more acute, both in the United States and in the United Kingdom, and is a matter of great study in Canada. In the meantime, as the hon. members have said, the chancellor of the exchequer in the United Kingdom has introduced a bill providing for certain deductions by the self-employed where they invest money in annuities under certain circumstances; within certain limits they may then deduct the money for income tax purposes. My understanding is that a somewhat similar plan, though different in many details, is being considered by congress.

In my case, I said a year ago it would be my intention to study not only the representations made but also the plans that might be worked out by the two other governments. I have been doing that, but unfortunately I am not yet in a position to suggest to my colleagues, and consequently to parliament, any change in the law, at least at this session.

The problem is one not only of income but, of course, of trying to balance the benefits that would accrue to the self-employed from the deduction with the benefits which are granted to the other group of people. In so far as the revenue is concerned, I have been told that even those who advocate the plan cannot think of one which they would regard as reasonably adequate, that would not cost the treasury of Canada at the present rates something of the order of $60 million. Other plans are more expensive than that. However, I assure my hon. friend that the study we have been making will be continued in the hope that we may find it possible to consider favourably some of the suggestions that have been made.

With respect to the arguments that have been advanced by the hon. member for Welland, the hon. member for Kootenay West, the hon. member for Lincoln, and also the arguments so generously put forward by the hon. member for Kootenay West on behalf of his colleague from Kootenay East, may I say that I do not think there has been a real misunderstanding about the booklet issued by the Department of National Revenue. At the time the booklet was issued it was a booklet designed to cover by regulations the practice up to that time and to project for the future the regulations covering the practice of deductions by employers and employees for pension funds.

As the hon. member for Kootenay West has said, the income tax provisions have been generous—I think that is the word—so that employers could set aside money for pension plans not only for the welfare of the company in its relations with the employees but also for the welfare of the employees themselves, and since pension plans have grown in popularity and as part of the requirements of modern day union bargaining it would only be proper that the government should recognize that in its tax laws. Perhaps the committee would be interested to know that in the last taxation year for which we have figures over $120 million was set aside by employers for pension purposes and was for that reason an expense of business and not subject to taxation. At the same time individuals set aside about $135 million in the same manner. This indicates that something over a quarter of a billion dollars is being saved for the purpose of retirement and the like in industry today, a remarkable achievement and one which I think will be of great benefit to the economy from time to time. Therefore the government is bound to look upon these plans not only with interest but with encouragement.

In so far as the particular matter is concerned, I think we might just say that both from the standpoint of the employer and the employee there is a desire to have a pension plan that would be within the purview of the Income Tax Act, that would be of benefit to the employee as well as the employer, and that as a government we should not take any action which would prevent the normal growth of understanding between the two in the working out of pension plans which are of great variety and differ from industry to industry and within an industry. Therefore I think it would be unwise for us to lay down too rigid rules which might not be such as could be conformed to by either a union or an employer if they felt that some other form of pension plan would be more desirable.

I do, however, admit that the question of vesting of a pension is one in which I think most employees would feel they had a particular interest and, as my hon. friend has said, we have been studying this for quite some months. We have not been able to suggest anything more with respect to the pension legislation generally than what I have suggested here for the moment, but I do assure my hon. friends that we are looking forward to a general revision of the Income Tax Act in due course, and whether or not that is within the next two years we will continue to study the pension side of the act, particularly having in mind the booklet and having in mind the desire that we have to encourage employers and employees to get together on a pension plan for the benefit of the employees and the employer.

Mrs. Fairclough: I wonder whether the minister would say how they arrived at the figure of $60 million. Would that be on the assumption that every self-employed person who is a taxpayer now would take full advantage of the $1,500 exemption?

Mr. Harris: I have not carried the details in mind but I think it is assuming that the tax law is made available to every self-employed person and that something like about two-thirds of them take advantage of it to about the maximum.

The Chairman: I take it that subparagraphs 1 and 2 are completed. Subparagraph 3? Subparagraph 4?

Mr. Harris: I have an amendment to be moved to subparagraph 4.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That Bill 418, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended by deleting the words "in Canada" where they appear in line 45 on page 2 thereof.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I just say that this is an amendment of which we heartily approve. As a matter of fact, we already had an amendment prepared along the same line, and we are very pleased that the minister has stolen a march on us and presented it first because we know that when he presents an amendment it has a much better chance of being accepted. We agree wholeheartedly with this suggestion.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Does that complete the discussion on subparagraph 4?

Mr. Zaplitny: This deals with deductions allowed to persons who attend conventions and I am wondering how universal the words "business or profession" are. For example, do they include farmers who belong to a farm organization?

Mr. Harris: At the resolution stage I answered that question by saying yes.

The Chairman: Then I take it subparagraph 4 is completed. Subparagraph 5?

Mr. Harris: I have an amendment to be moved to subparagraph 5 and it is a rather lengthy one.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That Bill 418, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended by deleting lines 4 to 22 on page 3 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"(q) where a taxpayer is a member of the clergy or of a religious order or a regular minister of a religious denomination, and is in charge of or ministering to a diocese, parish or congregation, or engaged exclusively in full-time administrative service by appointment of a religious order or religious denomination, an amount equal to

(i) the value of the residence or other living accommodation occupied by him in the course of or by virtue of his office or employment as such member or minister so in charge of or ministering to a diocese, parish or congregation, or so engaged in such administrative service, to the extent that such value is included in computing his income by virtue of section 5, or

(ii) rent paid by him for a residence or other living accommodation rented and occupied by him, or the fair rental value of a residence or other living accommodation owned and occupied by him, during the year but not, in either case, exceeding his remuneration from his office or employment as described in subparagraph (i);"

Mr. Fleming: Does the minister intend to explain his amendment? Reading it over quickly, I gather the only change he has made is to include ministers and clergy engaged exclusively in full-time administrative service by appointment of a religious order or religious denomination? Is that correct?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The intent of the amendment as in the printed bill was extended for the purpose of clarification to a slightly different wording but the effect of the amendment will simply be this. Up until a recent decision by the income tax appeal board it was thought by the government that only those clergymen who were actively engaged as being in charge of a church or a parish and conducting services accordingly were entitled to the deduction that has been in the act. However, in the income tax appeal board there was a decision which held that the clergyman who was a professor at a theological university would also be entitled to the deduction and it was not the intention of the government to permit the deduction to extend that far. The present amendment provides that any clergyman, whether he be in fact a pastor in charge of a congregation or a member of the church body in the higher level, if I may put it that way, who engages in church work exclusively including acting as pastor from time to time, would have the benefit of the deduction. On the other hand, it does not extend to the clergyman who is a professor and whose occupation is that of a professor in a college.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment that the minister has introduced is an improvement on the clause as printed in the bill in that it includes those who are engaged in administrative duties on behalf of churches, religious orders or religious denominations. They were certainly entitled to consideration and I am glad to find that the amendment extends the consideration to the point of equalizing their position with that of the clergy engaged directly in parish work.

But the minister has pointed out that the benefits that are extended by this section to clergy in general are denied to clergy who are engaged in teaching in theological colleges. The fact that the minister has seen fit to introduce an amendment which will now include those clergy who are engaged in administrative duties it seems to me weakens his case for denying similar consideration to clergy engaged on the teaching staffs of theological colleges. Why should they be denied the consideration of this provision when it is extended to clergy in all parochial service or administrative work on behalf of either religious orders or religious denominations?

The appeal that I am making tonight is that the section should be further enlarged so that its benefits may be extended to clergy engaged, as I have indicated, in teaching on the staffs of the theological colleges. This point has already been the subject of representations made to the government. A letter was written to the Prime Minister when the bill was first printed and published. With the permission of the writer I should like to read it now because it states very clearly the case for the clergy engaged on the teaching staffs of the theological colleges.

The writer of this letter is the Rev. R. S. K. Seeley, who is the Provost and Vice-Chancellor of Trinity College, Toronto. His letter to the Prime Minister is dated June 19, 1956 and it reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

It has been brought to my attention that legislation is being introduced to reverse the decision of the Department of National Revenue that professors of theological colleges have the same status as the parochial clergy in that they are entitled to exemption from income tax on the rent which they pay for their houses and living accommodation.

As president of the conference of heads of Anglican theological colleges in Canada, I respectfully request that this legislation be not introduced, since it would bring about an injustice to a group of people, small in numbers but of great importance to the community.

Theological professors are in a peculiar position among the clergy. While they in general receive a slightly higher cash salary than most of the parochial clergy, they do not receive free living accommodation nor do they receive the revenue from fees and Christmas offerings which almost all parochial clergy enjoy. Their actual or real salary, therefore, is usually lower than what they would be receiving in parochial work. They have far heavier expenses in the purchase of books, and recent legislation has removed the privilege of obtaining income tax exemption through the contractual expenditure plan. Moreover, they are frequently engaged in work of a parochial nature for which they seldom receive remuneration or travelling expenses. It is also true to say that their houses and quarters are in frequent use for pastoral care of the students whom they teach.

I am sure you must also be aware that the proposed legislation would engender disharmony among the churches, since it would discriminate against those churches which permit the marriage of the clergy.

While I am writing primarily as the representative of the Anglican theological colleges, I know that I can say that such legislation will be looked upon with great disfavour by the Anglican house of bishops and by the authorities of other denominations.

I am convinced that the government of Canada regards the clergy as a body of men who, in the discharge of their vocation, contribute inestimably to the well-being of our country and, since their financial rewards are so scanty, they are deserving of such consideration in the tax field as can be given to them. I know also that you personally and your government are concerned about the plight of our institutions of higher education. Among such institutions our theological colleges can least afford to pay adequate salaries. Such small relief, therefore, as the present exemption provides means a very great deal to those who are responsible for the spiritual leaders of the future.

I am confident that, when these facts are considered, the government will deem it wise to suppress the proposed legislation in the interests of the public good, and I respectfully request that careful consideration be given to this matter and to the distress which such legislation would bring.

I remain,

Yours sincerely,

R. S. K. Seeley,
Provost.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that is a fair and comprehensive presentation of the case of the clergy engaged on the teaching staffs of the theological colleges of this country for the same kind of consideration as this bill has proposed to give to the parochial clergy and as the minister's amendment proposes to enlarge so that clergy engaged on the administrative staffs of religious orders or religious denominations may also enjoy it.

The enlargement I propose would not cost the treasury of this country very much. Unless some provision of the kind I have suggested is made, I think we are going to be legislating to create a discrimination. I do not believe that is the wish of members of this house. The importance of the clergy engaged on the teaching staffs of the theological colleges I am sure is not underestimated by any hon. member in this house. I make this plea in all earnestness now for that group of men who, if they are not included in the benefits of the section, I think will be entitled to feel that they have been discriminated against.

Mr. Michener: I should like to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton. The amendment appears to have been the result of a decision within the department which was perhaps not in accordance with the government's view of the meaning of the section. For that reason and for the reasons which have been advanced, it seems to me that there is no sound distinction between a man engaged entirely in related work in an administrative capacity and one who is teaching theology exclusively. If the minister would accept that viewpoint and add to his proposed amendment the words "in teaching theology" so that the amendment would read as follows:

. . . or engaged exclusively in teaching theology or in full-time administrative service by appointment . . .

and so on, it would cover the point which we wish to make. It seems to me to be a matter of simple justice to a small number of men who are equally devoted in a full-time capacity to the same causes which occupy the time of those who are parochial or administrative officers in the churches. I would urge the minister, even at this point, to reconsider the amendment which he has made. It does not affect many people, but it is an important matter for those it does affect in the everyday considerations of their inadequate financial remunerations in that high calling.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I think if I was to judge the Income Tax Act solely on my own sentiment I would be obliged to accept the arguments that have been advanced. But when my hon. friend says there is no sound reason for the distinction between a clergyman who is in charge of a church and one who is in the administrative activities of the church, he may also agree with me there would be no sound distinction to be drawn between a professor in a theological college and a professor in any other college—

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister permit a question? Is there not a difference in the salary scales?

Mr. Harris: I am afraid I cannot take into account the difference in salaries.

Mr. Michener: Is there not a very distinct difference in the ordination of one?

Mr. Harris: I was just going on to state that I think now clergymen ought to be exempt from income tax to the extent of a certain benefit for lodging and the like—

Mr. Michener: That is the basis of this section.

Mr. Harris: No, this relates to a number of the clergy, not to the whole clergy. My hon. friend is arguing that because a man is a clergyman and engaged in teaching in a college he ought to have a certain exemption. May I point out to the committee that if there had been any virtue in the exemption that was granted originally, there may be something to be said for the fact we have departed from that in admitting to the exemption certain members of the clergy who are not actively engaged in pastoral work. But we have not done this without consulting the persons who are interested in this. There is a committee known as the inter-church legal committee who have been consulted not only in the past but at the present time on the amendment, and that committee has recommended the amendment that I have moved to the bill.

So, while I accept the responsibility for excluding those members of the clergy who are in the teaching profession in theological colleges, I may also add that the inter-church legal committee has wired me to say that they would prefer to have the amendment in the words that I moved.

Mr. Fleming: The minister asks about the difference between clergymen engaged in teaching in the theological colleges and persons engaged in teaching in the non-theological colleges. I think he has overlooked the fact that all of the clergy on the staffs of the theological colleges are expected to go out and take preaching duties, relieving duties, for the benefit of the parish clergy; that is expected of them. They are out doing that kind of work all the time. I am sure there is no professor on the staff of a college who is not taking teaching duties on Sunday and relieving the burden of the clergy in all the manifold situations that arise in the ordinary course of parish duties. That was one of the considerations that was pointed out in the letter from Provost Seeley.

It does seem a very hard line to draw between the man who is lecturing to theological students for five days a week and then is going out and preaching on Sundays, and say he shall not have the benefit of this clause, whereas the man who is engaged in parish duties during the week and preaching on Sunday is entitled to the benefit of it.

I would urge the minister to give further consideration to this before we come back to it again. It is not a concession that is going to be costly. The minister's argument seems to be that there is going to be some discrimination created by the kind of amendment I have suggested.

Mr. Harris: All I was saying was that I would have great difficulty in refusing a similar exemption to all professors at colleges.

Mr. Fleming: Well, Mr. Chairman, the Income Tax Act has recognized the position of the clergy in this clause. Hon. members will recall that this was introduced a few years ago and there was much discussion about it. The introduction of this provision followed discussions over several sessions on this subject. The policy has been adopted by the house of giving a special form of consideration to the clergy because of the nature of their work.

Now, that principle having been recognized in the act, and now the matter coming to us on a question raised by the income tax appeal board, and the minister having seen fit to introduce a bill reasserting the position of the parish clergy and making sure that same provision is to be extended now to clergy engaged in administrative duties on behalf of their religious order or denomination, then surely it is not the creation of a new principle that the consideration should be extended as well to the clergy engaged on the theological college staffs.

As for the difficulty the minister foresees of denying similar consideration to professors engaged on the teaching staffs of other colleges, all I have to say is that this consideration is created for the benefit of ordained clergy and for them alone.

The Royal Assent

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act.

An act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

An act to amend the National Parks Act respecting the boundaries of Cape Breton Highlands national park.

An act to authorize the Minister of Finance to make payments to the governments of the provinces and to authorize the government of Canada to enter into fiscal agreements with the governments of the provinces.

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1957.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 418, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Harris—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take the estimates of external affairs, northern affairs, agriculture and transport.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FISHERIES—EXPERIMENT AT POWNAL, P.E.I.

Question No. 565—Mr. Matheson:

What information is available thus far from the experiment which the Department of Fisheries is carrying out at Pownal, Queens, Prince Edward Island?

Answer by: Mr. MacNaught, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Fisheries:

The purpose of the experiment is to determine whether quahaugs (hard shelled clams) taken from contaminated areas will cleanse themselves when transferred to suitable cleansing areas. Pownal bay is one of the areas found suitable for cleansing purposes, and preliminary experiments have given evidence of effective cleansing to such an extent that transfers on a semi-commercial scale for further testing are planned for the immediate future.

POST OFFICE, SAINT QUENTIN, N.B.

Question No. 572—Mr. Van Horne:

What action, if any, is being taken to build a post office in Saint Quentin, New Brunswick?

Answer by: Mr. Bourget, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

No action is being taken regarding a new public building. The department is endeavouring to secure alternative accommodation on a leasehold basis.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 573—Mr. Van Horne:

What action is being taken to implement the building of the trans-Canada highway in New Brunswick?

Answer by: Mr. Bourget, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

The construction of the trans-Canada highway in New Brunswick is the responsibility of the government of New Brunswick. In an effort to assist and encourage the construction of a trans-Canada highway across Canada, parliament enacted the Trans-Canada Highway Act with effect from December 10, 1949. Under this legislation the federal government undertook to pay half the cost of constructing a highway to the approved standard. On May 27, 1950, the government of New Brunswick signed an agreement under the legislation to complete the road across New Brunswick from Aulac to the Quebec-New Brunswick border north of Edmundston with a spur road to Tormentine.

When it became evident that New Brunswick and other provinces would not complete their undertaking within the agreed period, the federal government recommended to parliament that it be authorized to encourage action designed to close the existing gaps by enabling it to pay 90 per cent of the cost of constructing 10 per cent of the mileage in each province. This legislation was given royal assent on June 7, 1956, and New Brunswick has entered into a new agreement with the federal government thereunder.

To July 21, 1956, the federal government has paid $4,075,814.04 to the government of New Brunswick for work it has completed. The implementation of the building of the trans-Canada highway in New Brunswick, however, is, under the agreement, a matter for the government of New Brunswick.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, August 1, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

Second report of joint committee on the federal district commission.—Mr. Dumas.

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH MAXIMUM RATE—MOTION FOR RESTORATION TO ORDER PAPER

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved:

That the order for second reading of Bill No. 2, an act to amend the Interest Act, which was superseded on February 2, 1956, be restored to the order paper under the heading "Public Bills and Orders" for further consideration at the next sitting of the house.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Argue) which was negatived on the following division:

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC WORKS—WHARF AND HARBOUR CONSTRUCTION, GASPE COUNTY

Question No. 545—Mr. Dufresne:

1. Was any work done by the Department of Public Works since the beginning of 1956 on the wharves and harbours at Chandler, Newport, L'Anse-au-Griffon and Cap-des-Rosiers, in the county of Gaspe?

2. If so, what was the nature of such work?

3. What amounts were spent in each locality for materials, labour and otherwise?

Inquiries of the Ministry

4. What are the names of those employed and their respective salaries and wages, in each locality?

5. Who supplied the materials used in the said work, and in what amounts, giving a detailed list?

HEART DISEASE AND CANCER STATISTICS

Question No. 564—Mr. Leduc (Verdun):

1. According to the statistics of the last five years, how many persons in Canada, and by provinces, have died each year (a) from heart disease; (b) from cancer?

2. Are grants provided annually for research on causes of cancer and other matters related thereto, and in connection with heart diseases?

3. If so, (a) what amounts were appropriated for such purposes; (b) in what manner have such amounts been distributed; (c) what institutions are entitled thereto?

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF OLD QUOTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that many wheat farmers in the prairie provinces have not been able to market the amount of the quota as fixed for their respective marketing points, would the minister consider extending the period in those areas so that farmers might be able to continue marketing at least until the new crop in their areas becomes available for marketing?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia also asked the same question—

Mr. Argue: Yesterday.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): —at the last sitting. The matter has been given very careful consideration and it has been decided—and I may say that the decision is unanimous from all my advisers—that there be no extension of the old quotas this year. Last year the old quotas were extended and shipments under old quotas were being made until December. As a matter of fact, many of the low quota points at the end of the last crop year were points where shipments had been made on extended quotas earlier in the year. The fact remains that we have shipped from the country considerably more grain this year than last year; and whereas last year we filled the eight-bushel quota with the help of the extension, this year we have failed to reach the eight-bushel quota at many points. It will be very much fairer, we feel, to start everyone even as of this day and work out the quotas accordingly as time passes. I think that perhaps answers the question.

[Mr. Dufresne.]

INQUIRY AS TO DISCRIMINATION AGAINST LOW DELIVERY POINTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if the minister could say why, as a means of removing the discrimination that exists against producers at many marketing points who have not been able to deliver the eight-bushel quota, all shipping orders have been kept in force at the low delivery point and grain delivered against those orders is not credited on last year's quota instead of the new quota?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): As my hon. friend knows, there are shipping orders out at every point in quantity which would bring that point up to the eight-bushel quota. The purpose of leaving the shipping orders outstanding is the wish to make sure those points that did not market their eight bushels last year will have the first chance to deliver grain this year. Our intention is to remove grain from those particular elevators, in an effort to make sure that those particular points do deliver their eight-bushel quotas this year.

Mr. Argue: Is it the intention of the minister to see that those points which delivered less grain in the crop year just ended have an opportunity of delivering that much more grain in the current crop year in order to equalize it over the two-year period?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The intention is to make sure that these points get a better than average break this year. We cannot be mathematically precise. We have not sufficient control over the distribution of box cars to be able to say that we can balance out all delivery points evenly, but we will at least give those low quota points a preference in the early stages through leaving shipping orders outstanding until they are filled.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wonder if the minister would say what general plan he has in mind in order to assure a reasonable degree of equality, and to remove the discrimination that existed in certain parts? How is he going to adjust this equalization to which he has just made reference?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, Mr. Speaker, the job of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to make sure that the proper grades of wheat and other grains go on the boats to meet the export demand as it arises. Incidental to that, we are endeavouring to see that the grain is drawn fairly from all parts of the prairies, so far as we can, having in mind the grades of grain we require for export. We are starting this year by giving a very strong preference during the month of August, and as long as it takes to fill shipping orders, to points that have not delivered their eight-bushel quota.

Now, as time goes on, we will try to draw grain as fairly as we can from all parts of the prairies, but I cannot commit myself to any mathematical distribution. We will do the best we can.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I just want the general plan.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY REGARDING OFF-SITE STORAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could the minister inform the house, in view of the almost certainty of storage facilities being taxed to the limit, at least during the early part of the new crop year, if the government will give consideration to continuing last year's policy with regard to off-site storage for grain stored in skating rinks, and consideration even to extending off-site storage on properly farm-stored grain?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been considered and my advisers believe that the off-site storage of grain has been carried far enough. We find that there is no turnover of that grain and we are in some doubt as to the condition of some of it, though the responsibility for the condition rests with the elevator company which has placed it in storage. We think that grain should be available for immediate shipment as required and therefore we have discontinued the policy of further licensing of off-site storage.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCCULLOUGH, MOOSE MOUNTAIN—REFERENCE TO ANSWER GIVEN IN HOUSE ON JULY 27

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Last Friday I asked a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As reported at page 6530 of Hansard I said this:

> This seems to be a departure from previous years when flax was not under quota. Will flax be under quota during the new crop year?

The minister's answer was that last year there had been a quota but that it had been removed early in the year. In a press report of July 28 appearing in the Leader-Post, and referring to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I note the following:

> His officials said later that Mr. Howe had erred on this point. An announcement by the Canadian wheat board July 19, 1955, showed there was no quota control set for flax or Durum wheat for 1955-56. Neither had there been a quota for 1954-55.

I wonder if the minister would correct his answer to me so that there may be no misconception of the policy last year.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will be glad to do so. I was in error. I had in mind that we started with a quota on flax and Durum and that it was removed. That is not the case. We had small crops of flax and Durum last year and there was no quota on these grains from the beginning of the crop year. This year we have much larger crops of flax and Durum and it was felt that a five-bushel quota would place some limitation on the amount that would be delivered in the early stages. Of course, the quota will be raised as we are able to market the crops.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I wonder if I might be permitted to ask a further question? In view of the statement the minister has just made, that there will be a greatly increased crop of flax and Durum and that they are going to be under quota, I wonder if his department would give consideration to including those two crops under the Canadian wheat board.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): As my hon. friend knows, we are unable to do that without legislation. I have given reasons why the government does not believe that flax should be included in the crops marketed by the wheat board. I think my hon. friend will agree that the price of flax is very satisfactory at the present time. We see no reason for interfering with the situation.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PETERBOROUGH—REFERENCE TO COST OF INSTALLATION OF TELEVISION EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Does the contract price of over $50,000 for T.V. cameras and equipment, installation and maintenance for one year for the Peterborough post office also cover the cost of building the new viewing or T.V. inspection room that has just been built in that post office?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): The answer is no. That part of the work is done by the public works and paid for by that department.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): May I ask the Minister of Public Works what the cost of that viewing room will be?

Mr. Lapointe: I might say that I have made inquiries and public works tells me it is $2,447.50.

POSTAL SERVICE

SUTHERLAND, SASK.—REQUEST FOR MAIL DELIVERY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fairly recent amalgamation of the town of Sutherland and the city of Saskatoon, and in view of the desire of the people there to assure to every citizen of Saskatoon door to door mail delivery, I should like to ask the minister whether a petition has been received from those people and whether such petition has been considered? If it has been so considered, what decision has been made in regard to the matter?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, no petition has been brought to my notice. It is quite possible that one may have been received by officials of the department. I shall make inquiries and report to my hon. friend.

THE MINISTRY

REFERENCE TO INVITATION TO BRIGADIER ALLARD TO JOIN CABINET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Is the invitation to Brigadier Allard by the Prime Minister to join the cabinet considered closed, or is the matter still open?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Whenever there is an addition to the cabinet an announcement will be made. I had conversations about a year ago with my good friend, Brigadier Allard, but they did not lead to any action.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROVIDING OF LIVE AMMUNITION AT PUBLIC MILITARY DISPLAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant. In view of the tragic accident which occurred in Regina last evening, I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant will inform the house if it is the practice of the army to provide live ammunition at public military displays being held at fairs and exhibitions throughout Canada?

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): The army is making a full and complete investigation into this very unfortunate accident. Until I have seen the report I do not think I should like to comment on it.

Mr. Ellis: If this is the practice, can the parliamentary assistant assure the house that instructions will go out from defence headquarters to cease the practice of providing live ammunition at the displays?

[Later:]

GREENWOOD, N.S.—STATEMENT ON REPORTED CONVERSION OF COAL-BURNING EQUIPMENT AT R.C.A.F. STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asked if tenders had been called to convert coal-burning equipment at R.C.A.F. station, Greenwood, Nova Scotia.

There are 481 permanent married quarters heated by hot air. Of these, 100 are heated by coal and the balance by oil. In the interest of standardization it has been decided to convert the balance of the coal heating units to oil, and tenders have been called for this purpose.

WATER RESOURCES

WATER LEVELS OF LAKE MICHIGAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs has a reply to my question regarding the diversion of water from lake Michigan through the Chicago drainage canal system?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, I have not a complete reply, but I expect to have one tomorrow morning.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): May I ask a supplementary question? In view of the statements attributed to United States senators or congressmen that the diversion of water from lake Michigan through the drainage system is no concern of Canada—in other words, they intimated in the press that Canada need not be consulted, of which

I think the minister is well aware—will the minister, when he is making this legal exploration of the problem, determine whether the United States was consulted when northern waters were diverted into lake Superior, and whether that same principle will apply to the diversion of waters from any lake, especially one that is wholly in Canada? Would the same principle not apply?

Mr. Pearson: We shall look into that aspect of the question. As to the statement alleged to have been made by certain United States congressmen that this diversion is no concern of Canada, it is a concern of Canada and we have already made known that concern by a note last March which I think has been tabled.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MILAN BABIC—TREATMENT BY UNITED STATES CUSTOMS OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs a report for the house regarding his investigation of the detention of Mr. Babic of Toronto by the United States immigration department?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, although we have not yet received any complaint on this matter, as I stated the other day in the house, in view of the press statements concerning it, we have asked our officials in New York to make an inquiry. They have done that and as a result received a report from the United States immigration authorities which does not coincide in every respect with the statements made by Mr. Babic to the press. However, even on the basis of the United States report I think there is justification for complaint to the United States government. Before we decide to take any formal action I think we ought to give Mr. Babic a chance to comment on the United States immigration report.

Apparently this naturalized Canadian citizen was stopped in New York in transit to Canada, which of course is something within the right of the United States government to do. However, we feel that on this occasion the use of that legal right was not warranted and that the national security of the United States would not have been prejudiced by the immediate departure of this shipwrecked Canadian citizen to his home in Toronto.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—ADOPTION OF FLAG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the fact that Canada's native Indians now have adopted a flag of their own to signify the Indians' right of eminent domain over their land, will the minister open negotiations with Mr. Andy Paull, the Indian spokesman, for permission to adopt this flag for use by the rest of Canada, thereby solving the problem of Indian rights and of a Canadian flag at one fell swoop.

Perhaps I might say that as this flag was flown first in Comox-Alberni I am somewhat concerned about whether I will be admitted to my constituency at the end of the session.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible for the minister to open negotiations with Mr. Paull as he is engaged continuously in negotiations with him. As to the other question asked by the hon. member, I think it is outside my competence as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

FISHERIES

EFFECTS OF DRILLING FOR OIL—SUGGESTED FEDERAL ADMINISTRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries concerning commercial fishing problems on the great lakes. Has the minister received any verbal or written representations regarding loss of catches in lake Erie where oil and gas exploration is taking place and, if so, can the government do anything about it?

There is a second question I should like to ask at this time. In view of the lamprey menace and the fact that the international joint commission now has jurisdiction over the commercial fishing industry in the great lakes in an effort to stamp out this menace, will there now be divided jurisdiction between the federal government and the province? Have any representations been made to the federal government to take over the administration of laws and regulations regarding fisheries?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have received verbal complaints from other Ontario members regarding this problem of drilling for gas and oil in lake Ontario and lake Erie. I have also received some written complaints from fishermen on lake Erie. However, I have directed these people to make their complaints to the government of Ontario which administers fishing in the great lakes.

As far as the other question is concerned as to the administration of commercial fishing, the province of Ontario asked to administer these fisheries and unless they ask us to take back that administration we do not propose to take any action in the matter.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): A supplementary question: Could the minister indicate what licence fee is charged commercial fishermen in other parts of Canada where the federal government has jurisdiction as compared with the fees charged on the great lakes?

Mr. Sinclair: We have very few licence fees. On the west coast we have an annual fee of $1 for commercial fishermen who are gill netters, seiners or trollers. On the east coast we have only two fees, one of 25 cents a year for lobster fishermen and another of $1 a year as a weir licence. I do not know the scale of fees charged by the Ontario government on the great lakes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED ISSUANCE OF INSTRUCTIONS FOR GENERAL ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on July 27 the hon. member for Vancouver East asked whether instructions had gone out from the chief electoral officer to the returning officers in federal constituencies to prepare for a federal election. I have discussed this matter with him and, as I indicated, instructions were sent to all returning officers in Canada on June 18 to proceed with the revision of the boundaries of polling divisions in their respective electoral districts. As I indicated then, this revision and the selection of enumerators, which was I think the subject of the letter my hon. friend received, constitute routine preparations for a federal election.

On the same day the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe asked the following question:

> In how many electoral districts are there returning officers now established either by recent appointment or permanently from the last election?

I have been informed by the chief electoral officer that there are 243 electoral districts with returning officers in office now and 20 vacancies which it is intended to fill as early as possible.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): May I ask a further question. Have the returning officers been instructed to send out notices to members to get their enumerators in within 30 days? I understand that one hon. member has received such notice.

Mr. Pinard: I do not know the exact time in which enumerators must be designated. I was informed by the chief electoral officer that that is part of the instructions which were sent to the returning officers.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): That they have to be in within 30 days?

Mr. Pinard: I do not know about the time; I shall have to check.

TRADE

COTTON—EFFECT OF UNITED STATES SUBSIDY ON EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the announced United States policy of subsidizing exports of cotton products to Canada and the announced intention of the government to apply dumping duties on the United States retail price, what action is being taken by the department to explore the possibility of there being a lower retail price because of the subsidy which would permit a lower production cost?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I am sorry I did not catch all of the question and I shall have to take it as notice.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FISHER RIVER RESERVE HOSPITAL—INQUIRY AS TO QUALITY OF TREATMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Is the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare going to announce the answer to my question of yesterday?

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): I was not in the house yesterday and I am afraid I am not in a position to answer the question, but I shall try to find an answer for the hon. member.

Mr. Bryce: The Minister of Finance promised he would get me an answer.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

A—Department and missions abroad—

92. Departmental administration, $4,379,430.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This is an occasion of which I shall take advantage to make a statement, which I hope will not be too long, on some aspects of our foreign policy.

At the beginning I should point out to the house that the committee on external affairs had a number of useful meetings, during which not only was careful consideration given to every detail of our estimates but there was also an exchange of views, in which I participated at four or five meetings, on policy matters generally. Therefore I have had an opportunity recently to discuss some of our policies.

Also in the house, in January last I made a fairly comprehensive statement on some of the major aspects of our policy. At that time I dealt more particularly with an analysis, in so far as we were able to make it, of the recent changes in Soviet leadership. I discussed the situation in the Middle East and also, at that time in January, the situation in the Far East.

So far as the latter subject is concerned, there has been no substantial change in the situation in the Far East since I spoke in January; nor has there been any change in Canadian policy with respect to it. That situation, particularly in and about the Formosan straits, remains potentially dangerous as long as two Chinese armies face each other only four or five miles apart, but it has not in recent weeks or even in recent months deteriorated.

So far as the situation in the Middle East is concerned, the long and bitter dispute between the state of Israel and its Arab neighbours continues. That situation, while still tense, has not—and this is as far, I think, as anyone would dare go,—has not grown worse since I talked about it last. Incidents, which continue on the frontiers and which are likely to continue in the present atmosphere, have not, at least, exploded into war. The United Nations secretary-general in two visits to the area has made a useful and constructive effort to lessen tension in that area, and by his intervention he has, I think, succeeded in strengthening the truce. I know that on the cease fire and the truce which he has helped to strengthen he hopes to build an arrangement which will be more permanent.

I think we can also pay tribute at this time to the activities of the United Nations truce commission in Palestine, in which several Canadian officers are now serving. That commission is playing a courageous and selfless part in difficult and indeed—as we know from the tragic incident of last week—often in dangerous circumstances. It is operating under the objective, patient and very efficient leadership of a Canadian, General Burns, whose work, I think, deserves the highest commendation on the part of all those who are genuinely interested in establishing security and a just peace in that part of the world. Certainly there is not peace there yet, for there has been no political settlement made between the contending parties. That must come if there is to be peace, because in the long run such a political settlement under the United Nations, rather than arms, will be the foundation of security for Israel and the Arab states.

In recent days a new situation—I was going to say "a new crisis"—has developed there in connection with the Suez canal. A sudden arbitrary move on the part of the Egyptian government has aroused fears that the right to use this international waterway in peace and war without discrimination may be prejudiced, a right which, as hon. members know, is guaranteed by an international treaty. Far more than the nationalization, or, if you like, the expropriation, of the Suez Canal Company is at stake in this matter; it is the future use for all nations without arbitrary or unnecessary interference of an essential international artery of trade and of communications, a waterway which was constructed by international agreement and with international co-operation and is now maintained and operated internationally.

As hon. members know, steps are being taken at the moment in London, by three powers very directly and importantly affected by the Egyptian decision, to bring about a satisfactory solution to this problem, the problem created by this action of the Egyptian government, by establishing some form of permanent international control for this international waterway, by which the legitimate rights of all countries can be protected. Until the results of this London meeting are available—and the meeting has not concluded yet—I think I should say nothing more about this matter, except possibly to express the support of our government for the principle of such international control, with the countries having the greatest interest in the operation of the canal sharing in that control, preferably, if this turns out to be practicable, under the aegis of the United Nations.

The third subject I dealt with last January is one which will occupy our attention and at times our anxieties, namely, the relations between the Soviet union and the coalition of free states in which Canada is playing a part. In so far as the possibility of an all-out war is concerned, I think it can be said, as it has been said on more than one occasion, that we are now reaching, if we have not already reached, a deadlock of mutual deterrence through the certainty of mutual destruction. That is in a sense, I suppose, effective but it does mean reliance by both sides on the fear brought about by thermonuclear power used for destructive purposes. Therefore national security and international peace are becoming merely the probability and the hope that we will get through any year without being blown to bits.

At the very same time that we rely on this deterrence, and we have to rely on it, there is a frantic search going on on both sides for the intercontinental ballistic missile which will remove or certainly will minimize this mutual deterrence by the discovery of an annihilating weapon against which, if used aggressively, there may be no defence or, indeed, no warning. Therefore I do not think any of us can get very much permanent comfort out of a security resting on a balance of terror. Indeed, in that situation there are certain advantages possessed by the Soviet union. With its despotic government, without the restraints of public opinion, it can, if it so desires, use this situation for political blackmail in peacetime and for what have been called brush fire wars which would throw on our side the responsibility of converting these limited wars into thermonuclear ones.

That possible situation certainly has a bearing both on our defence and on our diplomatic policies and it leads me to the conclusion that atomic defence and atomic deterrence are not enough. It also leads me to stress the importance of diplomatic defences, of political unity on our side, of economic strength, of moral purpose. These things are becoming more and more important as developments occur, but while we seek them on our side the drive to extend Soviet influence by a wide variety of means still continues.

The emphasis now in tactics and perhaps in policy has been shifted, I think, since the new leadership came into power in Moscow from the military to the economic and the political. How much this shift represents a change of heart and how much is a revision of thinking forced upon Moscow by the H-bomb and the strength and unity of NATO, I am not prepared to say. I think that the latter factor, our strength, may have been if not the dominating at least a very important consideration in any changes that have taken place.

But whatever the reason, the Soviet union may now have decided to abandon for the time being at least the open and direct use of armed force for the extension of its influence lest this should lead to the outbreak of global and thermonuclear war. Yet while such a thermonuclear war is recognized by the Soviet union, as it is by us, as a calamity of unthinkable proportions, nevertheless until such time as a condition of greater mutual trust has been established between the two worlds any weakening in the defensive capabilities of the free democracies might provide a serious temptation to the Soviet union to revert to the use of armed force for the pursuit of policy. They certainly have the capacity for this. Their tactics may have changed but their military strength has been maintained. Indeed, their industrial strength has been greatly increased and that industrial and economic strength is now becoming an important agent of their foreign policy. The armed strength of the Soviet union, which is now in process of being revamped and modernized, is a central fact which I suggest we cannot and must not ignore, especially when we consider our own defence plans and defence policies.

Mr. Khrushchev, speaking at the recent 20th party congress in Moscow, said:

> We must resolve to take all measures necessary to strengthen further the defence potential of our socialist state.

It is well to remember this when we read of Soviet proposals to demobilize soldiers and when we receive appeals to take it easy and to throw away our arms because the danger has now disappeared. This strengthening, moreover, applies not merely to the Soviet state itself but to what the Soviet leaders call—and they never seem to weary of referring to it—the international camp of socialism, something which, of course, is quite peaceful and respectable although our own coalitions are always referred to by them as aggressive military blocs.

Therefore I think that all members will agree with me that we in the western world must remain on guard. But while all this is true, and it certainly is true, I think it is also true that since the death of Stalin the Soviet government and the Soviet regime have begun to eliminate some of the more objectionable features of both their foreign and domestic policies. There have been relaxations at home, and as a result I believe that certain internal pressures may be developing in Russia which could have a restraining influence on the activities of the Soviet leaders. These Russian leaders may have started a train of events which, under normal conditions, should be welcome to the bulk of their population with whom the dynamism of revolution has probably run down. That process may become increasingly difficult to reverse at home if it is permitted to gain momentum there, but it is certainly not likely to lead, as we sometimes hopefully think, to parliamentary democracy or to any kind of democracy as we understand it because that is impossible in a communist state and Russia under its new leaders remains determinedly communist.

Also it is too soon to say, I think, that irresistible forces of freedom have been set in motion and that this means a great triumph for the western world. Indeed, these relaxations and their results, both at home and among their satellite communities, may frighten the new rulers who may try to reverse the trend, and out of this effort a new Stalin, Khrushchev or somebody else may arise as the old Stalin arose out of the ruins of the new economic policy in the twenties. This accession of one man to power is consistent both with the Slav tradition of autocratic rule and the communist doctrine of what they call democratic centralism.

So we would be wise, I think, to welcome and exploit any changes that seem for the better in both domestic and foreign policies of the Soviet union without exaggerating their extent or being bedazzled or deceived by them. At the same time, we must not be too tighly bound by the analysis which we made of Soviet policy under the Stalin regime, nor must we leave the initiative in the present period always to the new Soviet leaders, and they are very adept, indeed, in taking advantage of the initiative.

But one thing we can be sure of, that any changes of this character, and there certainly have been some, are not the result of weakness or lack of confidence of the new rulers in the future of the Soviet system. They are certainly as fanatical on that score as ever Stalin or his contemporaries were. Let us not be deceived by the illusion—I think we are in the process of tearing it away—that the Soviets are a backward people, 150 million feudal, downtrodden peasants in an oxcart civilization because, as we know, nothing could be further from the truth. We are beginning to appreciate that fact as more of us visit the Soviet union. It is true that in that country individuals have not the luxuries which we consider to be necessities nor often even the necessities which we take as a matter of course. But the regime there has converted the poverty of the people into the power of the state. On individual deprivation they have built great national strength and great national confidence and pride. Two United States commentators are not always too encouraging in their prognosis of what is going to happen. The Alsop brothers have warned us that we had better drop the favourite western parlour game of searching for imaginary Soviet weakness. In an article which one of them wrote a few weeks ago he had this to say:

> . . . it is one of history's little jokes that this demonstration of the Soviet society's superior efficiency, on its terms,—

That is the terms of centralized, autocratic, communist power and control.

> —should come at a moment when the western societies are also demonstrating their superior efficiency on their terms, in the form of Britain's all-embracing welfare society and America's gorged plenty. But history does not suggest, alas, that great power contests can be won by free false teeth or even by platoons of air-conditioned Cadillacs.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, this strength and power of the Soviet under its new leaders has not been affected, as I see it, by the de-Stalinization of the regime. In fact, while Stalin has been repudiated, the essentials of Stalinism remain. We know what they are: one party-despotic government; control of every expression of free thought and free action by that government; induced fear and hostility to every form of non-communist rule, especially through education; subordination of the individual to the ruling communist group; unqualified belief in the ultimate overthrow of free democracy by communism; and refusal of any form of political freedom to subject or satellite peoples who are incorporated into the Russian political system for power political purposes, except on the basis of complete acceptance of the rule of the communist junta in Moscow itself.

It may be of developing significance—I hope it is—that there have been signs of change in this latter situation in the satellite border states. But there is no sign of change in respect of the absorption of subject peoples like the Ukranians and the Balts inside the communist centralized empire. While they and other subject peoples remain under the heel of Moscow, we certainly have the right to reject any protestations by the leaders in Moscow of their belief in self-government or the rights of peoples. Indeed, this Russian system is a new colonialism which is far more terrible, far more reactionary and far more widespread than was any form of colonial rule in history. Moreover, it is practised by men who have managed to get too many other men to accept them as champions of national freedom against the old colonialism which is now fast disappearing. Their claims to such a role in twentieth century development of national freedom represent one of the greatest perversions in history.

Then finally, Stanlinism meant the use of communist parties in non-communist states as agents of Moscow policies. These parties I think have been shaken by the overthrow of their great god Stalin; but they are recovering from this shock and they are now beginning to rally with traditional submission—as so often in the past—to the new dictates from Moscow and to become its agents as before. Their attitude to this change that has taken place will be a conclusive test whether they have any claims to national allegiance or national status at all or whether they are merely, as they were formerly, the tools of Moscow for any purpose that Moscow may decide to follow.

Hence a question which has exercised us in the past is, I think, exercising us even more at the present time. The question to which I refer is this. Have the Moscow communist leaders abandoned the cult not only of personality, as they claim, but the cult of international revolution, of the violent overthrow of our system? They, of course, insist that there is no such cult, no such design, or no such danger. Khrushchev, Shepilov and the others, it is true, have admitted —indeed they have insisted—that the capitalist and the socialist-communist systems cannot be reconciled, that one or the other must go; and they are confident that it will not be the communist system that will go. But, they add, this can be done peacefully. As Mr. Khrushchev put it in the twentieth party congress in Moscow, and his words were repeated by other Soviet leaders on that occasion:

> There is nothing more absurd than the fiction that people are forced to take the path of communism under pressure from without. We are confident that the ideas of communism will triumph and no "iron curtains" or barriers erected by the bourgeois reactionaries can halt their spread to more and more millions.

That is the fairy tale, namely that these things develop from within, peacefully and without force. The fact is, as we all know, that no single country in history has become communist by the declared will of its people. In every case force was used and force was decisive. Mr. Khrushchev really let the cat out of the bag last February when he wrote—and some of his colleagues repeated it at the last party congress—as follows:

> Of course, in those countries where capitalism is still strong, where it has in its hands an enormous military-police apparatus, there the serious opposition of the reactionary forces is inevitable. There the transition to socialism will take place in conditions of sharp class, revolutionary struggle.

What this means, in plain English, is that communism will use force when it considers it necessary to do so, and if it can, in order to destroy parliamentary democracy and establish the dictatorship of the communist party. In effect, the new position in Moscow is exactly the same as it was when Stalin, some years ago, said that the communist parties would be quite happy to achieve power by parliamentary means, by peaceful means, but that they would use force if they had to and in any event they would achieve power peacefully for the same purposes as if they had achieved it by force.

A question arising out of this which concerns us in this country and in other countries, is this. Does this mean that Moscow is still willing and anxious to assist any and every foreign communist party in its revolutionary plans, in its determination to overthrow free parliamentary government? That, Mr. Chairman, seems to me to be a vital question, the test of Soviet sincerity. It is for them to demonstrate that they are not concerned now with international revolution. I do not expect—nor can any of us—that these people in Moscow and elsewhere should abandon their revolutionary slogans. That probably would be too much to hope for. But we can expect, and indeed we can insist as a test of good faith, that they show that in fact they are keeping out of our domestic affairs. We have no assurance on this score in this country or in other countries. Nor have we any reason to believe, changing to another aspect of Soviet policy, that they have abandoned or weakened in any respect what has been for some years now the primary objective of Soviet policy, the weakening and destruction of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. NATO is still a major target for Soviet attack; that is still the greatest tribute to its value and strength. It certainly should counsel us to preserve that strength.

So far as the military side of this question is concerned it may well be, as has been indicated, that new developments both political and strategic may make a reassessment of NATO's plans and NATO's defence policies desirable. It may even make desirable some reassessment of plans and strategy to meet new circumstances. But that, I suggest, must not imply any weakening of NATO's deterrent and defensive forces.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, I think it is important, indeed I think it is essential, that this reassessment and any changes which may result from it should be made inside the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and should be the result of collective discussion and collective agreement. Unilateral decisions, without such discussion or agreement, would weaken and indeed might even destroy NATO. We must then work together as members of this coalition if unity and strength are to be preserved. That is the very essence of the NATO concept, and without it NATO is not likely to last very long. Yet, this kind of close and continuous co-operation may be more difficult now in NATO than it has been, now that the fear of direct all out military aggression against western Europe seems to have lessened. That is one of the dangers confronting us. It is also, Mr. Chairman, the reason why the non-military aspects of co-operation are becoming more and more important. Indeed that form of co-operation, and we are beginning I think to recognize this more and more, is an important aspect of collective defence in the new situation.

I hope that the committee of three which has been set up by NATO will be able to make some recommendations in this field which will strengthen this side of NATO. This committee hopes to be able to finish its work and make its report some time in October.

But while, Mr. Chairman—this will be the last matter that I will be discussing in my general statement—NATO is important and is essential to our security and the development of the Atlantic community, the United Nations, with all its disappointments and its weaknesses as well as with all its accomplishments and its strengths, remains the basis of our general international policy. One of the most important things to be discussed through the United Nations now is, of course, disarmament. As members of the committee know, the subcommittee of the United Nations committee on disarmament, of which Canada has for some years now been a member, met in London last spring and the western side did produce proposals at that meeting which provided for the limitation and reduction of armaments by stages under control in each stage. It is also true that at that time it was proposed on our side that at the beginning of the second stage there should be a limitation on nuclear tests, a matter which is of very great and understandable interest to all of us, a limitation of nuclear tests supervised by a special branch of the international control organ.

At the meeting comprehensive agreement was not possible, and therefore an effort was made to bring about a more limited agreement as the first stage to making a more comprehensive agreement. The more limited agreement would have dealt primarily with conventional forces, but there was also a provision dealing with nuclear tests. But agreement on that was also not possible. Therefore, the subcommittee reported in July to the full committee in New York and its report, one must admit, was one of progress only in a strictly academic and possibly parliamentary sense. In July the full committee met and at this meeting, at which Canada was represented by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the four western members of the subcommittee introduced a resolution reaffirming the six basic principles which they accepted for a disarmament convention. I think it is important, in view of the interest in this matter, that these six basic principles be put on the record. I believe they have been found acceptable by a great many other countries.

They are:

1. A disarmament program should proceed by stages. Progress from one stage to another must depend upon the satisfactory execution of the preceding stage and upon the development of confidence through the settlement of major political problems.

2. The program should begin, under effective international control, with significant reductions in armed forces to such levels as are feasible. There should be corresponding reductions in conventional armaments and in military expenditures. Further reductions would be carried out as world conditions improved.

3. The program should provide that, at an appropriate stage and under proper safeguards, the buildup of stockpiles of nuclear weapons would be stopped and all future production of nuclear material would be devoted to peaceful uses. There would also be a limitation, before that took place, of nuclear tests.

4. The program should provide for a strong control organization with inspection rights, including aerial reconnaissance, operating from the outset and developing in parallel with the disarmament measure.

5. Preliminary demonstrations of inspection methods on a limited scale would help to develop an effective control system and could bring nearer a general agreement on a disarmament program.

6. Finally, there should be provision made for the suspension of the program, in whole or in part, if a major state failed to carry out its obligation or if a threat of peace under chapter VII of the United Nations charter should occur.

Well that, Mr. Chairman, is the position taken by the west at the recent meeting. I emphasize that in that position, which we have supported, even a partial agreement must contain some nuclear components. The representative of the United Kingdom at this committee in New York went even farther and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom repeated in essence the other day in the House of Commons what Mr. Nutting said on this point in New York. Mr. Nutting said:

> If limitation of nuclear test explosions is not possible under a disarmament agreement, we are prepared to try other methods, without delay, and without waiting for agreement on a comprehensive disarmament program.

This means that while the abolition of tests would be part of a broader agreement, the limitation of tests could begin independent of the achievement of any such broader agreement. I can say, Mr. Chairman, that we warmly support that position taken by the United Kingdom. We feel that it is of the most vital importance to press ahead both with arms limitations and with political settlements wherever there is any hope of reaching such a settlement with the other side. To adopt any other policy would be to accept the proposition that security rests, and must continue to rest, merely on the fear of common annihilation. That policy—some people call it realism, but I think it is realism based on despair—is not a policy which I am sure will commend itself to the members of this committee, or indeed to the people of Canada. A substitute for that policy, which may be essential at the present time for the avoidance of war, something which is even more permanent and in the long run more satisfactory, would be a policy of mutual agreement, mutual trust and mutual co-operation. I hope that in the effort to reach that objective the Canadian government will play a good part, and I am quite sure that if it succeeds in playing such a part it will have the support not only of all members of this house but of the people of Canada.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether he will comment on the present situation in Burma which appears to be very serious?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think maybe I should have made clear at the beginning that I shall be glad, of course, during the course of the debate, or toward the end of it, to deal with special questions which may be raised by hon. members; but since one has already been raised maybe I can say something about it at the moment because I realize there have been some pretty alarming headlines in the newspapers. The information which we have been able to get—and it is not easy to get information because it is a remote border of Burma—is, though one cannot be dogmatic about it, that the danger and the extent of this action by the Chinese communists have been somewhat exaggerated.

The border in question is not well marked. It has been disputed for many years, before even the advent of the communist government in Peking, and there have been border forays of this kind before. It is to be hoped that this is no more serious than the previous ones, and there is not very much indication that we have had that it is. We have also learned, and the press has reported it, that the Burmese government is in touch with the Chinese communist government on this matter. It will be recalled that the Burmese government has a treaty with the Chinese government which provides for the mutual respect of each other's territorial integrity. This will be an opportunity for the Chinese communist government to show whether it respects not only boundaries, but that treaty, and for the Burmese government to confirm, or otherwise, the confidence which they have placed in an agreement of that kind between an Asian country and the communist government in China.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall follow the lead of the minister and devote less time than usual to a discussion of international questions by reason of the fact that a committee has been sitting at length in this regard and has dealt with many matters which otherwise would have received attention at this time. My remarks will be general. My colleagues will fill in the various matters respecting which they individually require information.

Before I proceed I think I should say something regarding the chairman of the committee on external affairs. I want to say this with great sincerity. The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska, as chairman of the committee, has acted throughout with dignity, courtesy, and fairness to all members of the committee. I also want to say a word of congratulations to my hon. friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on his elevation to a position of one of the free world's three wise men, and I only wish that he had enlarged somewhat on the work of the group with whom he is associated in the achievement of the purposes which he set out in the last few minutes of his address. As a matter of fact, what he said could have been said several months ago. For some reason he did not deal at length with two situations which today face the free world. One of those is the dangerous and truculent attitude on the part of General Nasser, and the other is the continuance of communist infiltration which in the last few days has seen a repetition in Burma of the communist actions in other parts of the world on other occasions. He mentioned the effects of the fear of hydrogen war. That fear of hydrogen war and its effect on the psychological attitude of nations to war were dealt with at considerable length by Sir Anthony Eden, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, in his address on foreign affairs one week ago today. The minister has stated that the mutual deterrent of war has resulted from the certainty of mutual destruction. To put it another way, the fear of thermonuclear war has made peace popular even with the aggressors of the U.S.S.R. The minister did add a qualification, I think, when he stated that protection against the effects of hydrogen war might, in the not too distant future, dilute the deterrent effect of fear today. I had thought, however, that the minister should have dealt at somewhat greater length with the situation prevailing today in the Middle East.

First, with regard to Israel, I had hoped that by now the government would have been in a position to advise the house and the country that the request of Israel for export permits for sabre aircraft would have been granted. I feel that, having regard to recent events, there can be no justification for further delay in this regard. For a long period of time the dictator of Egypt was believed to have non-agressive designs. His speeches of the last few days, and in particular the one which he delivered when announcing the stand his government intended to take to nationalize the Suez canal, had all the exuberance, all the flamboyance and all the threats that were at one time common to Mussolini. In his recent address Nasser had led the free world to believe that he has taken to himself the garb of a dictator, as did Hitler and Mussolini, and he has indicated that he dreams of the day when his nation will control northern Africa from the Atlantic to Iraq and Iran.

Certainly the U.S.S.R. has been giving every assistance to Nasser to feed his appetite for aggression. Today Egypt has 150 MIGs and 45 bombers. Israel does not ask for assistance in aggressive warfare in the form of bombers and the like; what she is asking for is a few fighters to enable her to raise her defences should Nasser change from mere truculence in words to actual aggression.

Then with regard to the Suez canal, the arbitrary action on his part, challenging as it does international law, freedom under law among nations, breaking as it does the pledged word, may I say that I feel that Canada as the leading member of the British commonwealth at this time should give public encouragement to the stand taken by Great Britain, France and the United States. We should indicate that the reasonable attitude of mind and the calm consideration which these nations are giving warrants the moral support of Canada in these dark hours.

I would have thought that the minister would have enlarged somewhat upon our relationships within the British commonwealth and would have given more information than we have received as yet from the Prime Minister with regard to the decisions or at least an indication of the decisions reached at that conference, representative as it was of a large proportion of the world's population and a major assurance for the preservation of world peace.

As far as the Suez canal is concerned, if the canal is closed the danger to Britain's lifeline and to freedom's defence is fearful to contemplate. The closing of the Suez canal would bottle up freedom's defence in the Mediterranean. It would make almost impossible the maintenance of British trade which is being challenged today as the result of the economic offensive of the U.S.S.R. At the moment Nasser claims he has no such intention in mind, but it is only a few months ago that he with sweet words and in symphony with the U.S.S.R. spoke so warmly of his intentions with regard to Britain and the other free nations. His word has been proved to be false and valueless.

The minister was kind enough to let me have some figures indicating the importance of the Suez canal. Apparently the figures for 1953 are the last that are available but they indicate the following tonnages passing through the canal:

	Shipping Tonnage
United Kingdom	31,262,257
Norway	13,926,235
United States	4,123,498
France	8,425,534
Italy	4,991,152
The Netherlands	4,230,149
Sweden	3,169,113

Those figures indicate the need of maintaining and preserving the Suez canal for our survival. The oil from the east, which represents some 75 per cent of British imports, comes through the Suez. United States imports of oil and byproducts are also very large. The economic effects that would follow are indicated by the fact that if the United States had to change the direction of its ships around the cape it would add $46,000 to the cost of every tanker. That indicates the importance of the Suez, not only as a lifeline of freedom's defence but because of what it means to British trade now fighting a life and death struggle for survival against the U.S.S.R. in its new state-directed economic offensive. I ask even now that this government give to the world approval and support of what is being done at the meeting which is today convened in London to the end that those three nations will realize that we in the free world are united.

Just a few minutes ago the minister laid some emphasis upon the need for unity. In my opinion, never before has it been more necessary and never before would it have given that encouragement and support which the statesmen meeting there and joined to us in bonds of freedom have the right to expect.

I am going to speak for a few minutes on the viewpoints expressed by the minister as to the changed attitude on the part of the U.S.S.R., in particular the change which has taken place since the meeting of the 20th congress in February last.

Everyone in the free world is still questioning the meaning of the destruction of Stalin's halo. He has been exhumed and his halo has been knocked from his head by axe and hatchet men who climbed to power by remaining his subservient dupes. Even as late as a year ago I was in East Germany and saw there something of the worship of Stalin. In every town and village, in monument and in picture, he was represented as a leader beyond reproach, one who in the words of Khrushchev was above all others the most trusted leader the world had ever seen.

Why the revelation indicating that he is a combination of mass murderer, torturer, leader of deportations and destroyer of the courts? Why should he now be pictured as a person who by mass starvation destroyed opposition? Why should he be revealed as a person to whom freedom under law consisted in the courts carrying out whatever orders he might direct or determine? I think the words quoted by Khrushchev indicate that the courts had ceased to be protectors even in the slightest degree, the words of Stalin when he communicated with the head of the security branch when the Moscow doctors were charged with having plotted against Stalin. Stalin said, "I want confessions, and if you do not obtain confessions from the doctors I will shorten you by a head." He said, according to Khrushchev's words, "It is a very simple way to get confessions. Beat, beat, and once again beat to get confessions; that is your responsibility."

Khrushchev also indicated the danger of being in public life when he stated that, of the 139 members of the communist party central committee of the seventeenth congress, 98 had been arrested and shot while they were still members of the organization.

Why the revelation? I presume that we in our generation will never find out. Why did those who followed Stalin in obsequious support find it necessary last February in an ideological convulsion to turn their backs on Stalin while at the same time failing in even the slightest degree to offer to return the loot and the spoils of his wrong-doing or even to show remorse for the mass deportation and enslavement of peoples? These are questions that we ask today.

Has the U.S.S.R. changed? The minister, I think, gave the answer, that while there appears to be a mental change there is nothing to indicate that there has been brought about a change of heart or, indeed, of destination. World tension has subsided. That is one thing that has happened. Sir Anthony Eden said a week ago today that for the moment an economic invasion seems to have been substituted for war, and he said he preferred an economic invasion to cold war. But everywhere in the world, while the leadership of the U.S.S.R. gives indication of a change, they continue their work to undermine those organizations of the free world that assure freedom.

The minister mentioned the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I should like him to deal, when he replies, with the terrible effect on North American defence which will result should Iceland decide, not to disavow NATO, but to deny NATO the bases upon which North American defence can be pivoted. What are the hopes of assuring that the airfields at Keflavik will remain under NATO, regardless of whether the United States, by force of circumstances and by orders of the new Icelandic government with communist assistance, has to withdraw? What will be the effect on the north anchor of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization if Iceland persists in the stand that it is taking? The action taken by the government of Iceland cannot but arouse fears that the U.S.S.R., by its modified policy of wanton smiles, is achieving a melting of the mortar binding NATO together.

The minister mentioned that he believed that more and more political unity is important in the shift that has taken place on the part of the U.S.S.R. from military to economic aims. I wish he would amplify that. What has been achieved as a result of the meetings so far on the part of NATO, in connection with the economic features of the U.S.S.R. world offensive? Has there been any move to assure that among the NATO nations there is a realization of the need of the preservation of our economic strength? Has there been any degree of acceptance on the part of the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization of the need of removing tariffs that today prevent that exchange so necessary of goods between those nations, so that in solidarity and unity NATO may be preserved, when the fear and the threat of potential war are removed? What is being done to meet the offensive on the part of the U.S.S.R. whereby all over the world the U.S.S.R. has salesmen who combine the purcase and sale of goods and merchandise with political infiltration? These are questions that are of immediate moment, for in the last nine months the U.S.S.R. has entered into 39 trade agreements in all parts of the world wherein the profit of the balance sheet has been secondary to the profit of submerged souls in the nations that are at the moment beneficiaries of economic assistance.

In his remarks I think the minister gave a strong word of warning to those who believe that all is changed and fear is generally removed. He mentioned the captive peoples, a matter of tremendous interest to many Canadians of various racial origins. Not one word has been uttered by Khrushchev or Bulganin that in any way proclaims liberty to captive peoples or to those imprisoned or in slave camps. The dinner in London showed the attitude of the U.S.S.R. When Khrushchev was asked to free 170 social democrats whose only offence was that they did not agree with the U.S.S.R. and its system Khrushchev replied with great heat, "Never, never, never."

Is there anything to indicate at all so far as the U.S.S.R. is concerned that free elections are going to be given to the Balts, to the Ukrainians, to the Poles, to the other captive peoples? Khrushchev said in February at the meeting of the Congress that these peoples loved the freedom of the U.S.S.R. No, there is no suggestion of remorse on the part of Khrushchev or Bulganin for their terrible wrongs and there is no hope expressed of the possibility of freedom being given to these peoples or the opportunity of free elections.

I was very much struck by one expression that the minister used. He said that nowhere in the world had any nation voted itself by the ballot into communism. Until the U.S.S.R. expresses its remorse and accompanies this expression of remorse by actual action which will enable those people behind the iron curtain to look forward to the day when freedom may be theirs, we have a right to look with great suspicion upon the spurious offers of warmhearted international co-operation. What should we do? There are many who say that in view of the change from emphasis on warlike production to economic competition there should be considerable reductions in military strength. That view is held throughout the free nations. Sometimes one is apt to forget, however, in holding that view that the U.S.S.R., while always protesting its belief in disarmament, has under arms today four and a half million men in its army, a million and a half in its air force and a million in the navy and that during the last year it has increased the number of its submarines from 420 to 450.

However, even in the face of that the Prime Minister of Britain indicated last Monday that there had been such a change of attitude that there must come reconsideration of the question of the numbers in the armed forces of the several countries joined together in freedom. Sir Anthony Eden said that the United Kingdom will not make any sudden or abrupt decision which might throw the whole military gear of our western unity into confusion, but he did state that the time has come for a reappraisal of our situation among the free nations. Within the limitations that security demands, would the minister say what is being done in this regard in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization? What happened at the last meeting of the NATO security committee with regard to this question? This matter is of paramount importance, for as long as our expenditures for military defence continue at their present heights to too great an extent the free nations find themselves in a position where they are unable to compete against the economic offensive of the U.S.S.R.

The U.S.S.R. can compete in commodity markets because price is of no consequence. The price at which it sells in order to compete successfully involves no fears for the U.S.S.R. The price which the U.S.S.R. is prepared to pay for cotton, wheat, rubber or other strategic products has had an effect in various parts of the world where these products are in surplus—I refer to products other than wheat in this regard—of undermining the determination of those nations to stand in resistance against the advance of communism. It is one o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I should point out to the hon. member for Prince Albert at this time that he has spoken for more than 30 minutes, but of course with the unanimous consent of the committee he will be permitted to conclude his remarks this afternoon.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, at the time of the adjournment, I was summarizing the representations that I had to make. I had covered the questions of the need for maintaining military strength and for enlarging and expanding the concept of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I had also dealt with the question of trade and the new Russian pattern of offensive throughout the world, and had referred to the commonwealth prime ministers' meeting regarding which little information has as yet been given to parliament. In the London Observer I read as follows:

> The economic challenge in Russia's new policy has been a dominating theme of the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London.
> The range and scale of the Russian trade drive is at present small in comparison with the commercial activity of the west. But its totalitarian methods put the competitive free world at a disadvantage, and unless a way is found to match them, could enormously increase the Russian rewards.

I feel that the house should receive in detail the picture of the problem as the commonwealth prime ministers saw it and also of what means were arrived at, whether tentatively or finally, with regard to this matter. In the speech given by Mr. Shepilov —now the foreign minister—at the twentieth congress of the communist party we had a warning that this new type of offensive was to take place. He said this:

> The countries of the socialist camp propose to test the advantages of the two social systems in competition in the arena of peaceful economy, not in rivalry on the battlefield . . . Socialism has become a world system which is gaining in stature and strength . . . Before the second war the socialist system accounted for 17 per cent of the world's territory, 9 per cent of its population, 7 per cent of its industrial production; today "we" occupy more than 25 per cent of the world's territory,— > —comprise upwards of 35 per cent of its total population, and account for roughly 30 per cent of its industrial production.

As compared with 17 per cent of the world's territory just before the war.

Mr. Shepilov has since then become foreign minister, so that his words carry with them a peculiar importance and also an ominous warning to the free world. I ask the minister whether or not, in the interests of preserving and maintaining the strength of the British commonwealth in its crusade for freedom, there should be convened a British commonwealth trade conference to the end of rectifying the present dangerous position in which Canada finds itself in relation to the United States in buying almost $1 billion worth of goods a year more than the United States sells here. Does not that situation demand that effective and vital action be taken in order to expand our trade elsewhere? For it is only through trade that the debits of trade can be met by the credits of trade, regardless of how many countries that trade may include.

I say this to the minister. He pointed out—and in this I join with him—the fears of these people behind the iron curtain, these countries that were subjugated by Stalin and also by his predecessor Lenin. I feel that these peoples who live in slavery must be made to realize that the free world has not forgotten them. The outbreak in east Berlin in 1953 revealed that there were cracks in the monolith of communist unity. Those cracks were again revealed to a larger extent in the recent uprising among the Polish people in Poznan. Those cracks reveal that communism faces increasing difficulties in restraining the pressure of freedom-loving people under their control.

A year ago, when I was in east Berlin, the number of refugees who were fleeing from communism to the west numbered about 10,000 a month, as I recall it. The number during the last month and in recent months has been up to 22,000 a month. This fact reveals clearly that however sternly the communist governments in those satellite countries look upon migrations from those countries, more and more of the peoples under their control are using every means at their disposal to escape from the tyranny under which they live. In "The Old regime" de Tocqueville said this of the French revolution:

> The evils which are endured with patience so long as they are inevitable seem intolerable as soon as a hope can be entertained of escaping from them.

That is as true today as it was then. What has taken place in Poznan in Poland and what took place in East Germany show that there is a feeling of ferment. At this time when the U.S.S.R., in such grandiloquent terms, is espousing its conversion from the awfulness of Stalinism, I think that Canada and the western powers should give consideration to calling on the Soviet union to restore freedom to the subject nations of eastern Europe. Let us give them a message of hope. The United States did that after Poznan. The state department expressed sympathy with the families of the dead. They let those people know that they were not being forgotten. At this time, when the U.S.S.R. is endeavouring with all its might to lead the western world to believe that it has changed its attitude, I think that a declaration of moral support would give new hope to the peoples of the Ukraine, Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Baltic states, east Germany and those elsewhere. It would keep burning their uncertain light of freedom. It would give to them a realization that the conscience of the free world believes that only in the restoration to freedom of the subject peoples can there be the achievement of an assured peace, something towards which all of us strive. Should we not also say this to the U.S.S.R. at this time: In order to prove that what you are saying will be matched by what you are doing, you should carry out the principles which you accepted in paragraph 3 of the Atlantic charter. You should give to the peoples under your control the right to decide for themselves the form of government they will have.

Khrushchev has placed communist control on the horns of a dilemma. If in carrying out his avowed principles a small measure of freedom is granted to the people who are today subjected, then those people will ask for more and communist rule will be in danger. If, on the other hand, those subjected people are denied any further measure of freedom, then bitter resentments will ultimately bring about outbreaks of violence similar to those that have occurred in recent months.

Then, sir, it appears to me that if Khrushchev means what he says, should he not at this time, and should not Bulganin in association with him, grant to the people in slave camps, grant to those who have been the subject of mass deportation, the freedom which Khrushchev, Shepilov and Bulganin avowed in such eloquent terms? I cannot believe that the present leaders of the Kremlin are sincere when all they do is condemn Stalin but accept the benefits that flow from the tyrannical practices of Stalin. They renounce what he did but they keep what he illegally got. To renounce wrongdoing, the wrongdoing of the thief and the plunderer, and to keep the bounty which was the result of that wrongdoing, does not carry with it a sense of conviction of repentance for wrongdoing and a desire for a better life.

Then, sir, I should like to have heard the minister deal as well with the concept which particularly is being adopted by the United States and also by Britain, namely, the expansion of economic assistance to the underdeveloped countries, economic assistance comprised within the broader concepts of defence. As the president of the United States has said, every dollar we put into this kind of thing, if it is intelligently spent, is to my mind in the long run worth every $5 we are putting into shared defence because, in the long run, it is a constructive thing. What consideration is being given of a reassessment of the question of the amount that should be spent on tanks, guns and ships and the amount that should be made available for underdeveloped countries?

I am not thinking of the kind of policy, however, that makes promises and does not carry them out or makes promises of economic assistance based on the tractability of the receiving nations. One of the reasons for the Suez situation today is the fact that the United States made certain promises, in which Britain co-operated to a degree, of assistance, fearing apparently that the U.S.S.R. was going to grant a large amount of assistance to Egypt. The promise was made but it was not kept for reasons that were given some two weeks ago. Then the nature of the U.S.S.R. policy of blackmail became apparent, for the U.S.S.R. reneged on its promises which indeed had caused in large measure the promises of assistance made by the United States. I am not speaking of assistance based on the need of the receiver to accede to the political philosophies of the free world but assistance to raise the standard, and without strings.

I should like to ask the minister to outline, if he will in reply, whether there has been a degree of unified policy between Britain, the United States, France and the other nations in this regard, for certainly the U.S.S.R. is striding across the world today, amongst the underdeveloped countries in particular, and with promises of economic assistance is asking those countries in effect to trade their freedom for a generation for the security of today.

Those are but a few matters that I thought I would bring before the committee at this time. I feel that Canada's position in the world in which we live might be one far beyond its economic power and population. Disarmament conferences there have been, although they are postponed now apparently until after the United States election. Peace and its achievements should not be dependent upon or suspended by elections in any of the free nations, as I see it. Be that as it may, free men today must not weary. All of us must endeavour to do our part to achieve a climate of peace, maintain our strength and practise the principles in which we believe. We should make democracy work in our own midst and in the market places of world competition, the competition of coexistence, be able to show that our product is better than theirs. That is our responsibility in the long run. In the shorter view, it is to preserve peace by the maintenance of our defences, by the realization of what freedom means and at the same time by doing our part to be sure that those nations behind the iron curtain, who love freedom as we love freedom, have not been and will not be forgotten.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, it is quite obvious that what is uppermost in the minds of members of parliament and, I should imagine, in the minds of a vast majority of the population, is what is the goal of the U.S.S.R., what is the meaning in the changes which have taken place there?

I think the changes of the moment have meant a certain slackening in tension which I for one welcome. I would refuse to make any forecast as to the future because it is as murky and obscure to me as it is to any other member. Nevertheless, I still retain a fairly healthy degree of scepticism as to the future plans of the Soviet union.

The member for Prince Albert suggested that Khrushchev was perhaps being impaled on the horns of a dilemma. I think that gentleman is much too shrewd an operator to be so impaled. In the near future the obvious tactics of the Soviet union are going to urge the underprivileged people to fight for their own freedom, while refusing that very freedom to the people who are within the power of the Soviet union. Nevertheless, changes are taking place and the changes unhappily are not all to our benefit. Only a year ago almost to the week there was a meeting in Geneva, a meeting at the summit, a very highly touted meeting, which received publicity the world over, at which the leaders of some of the great nations attended. I think that if one were to draw or plot a graph of the progress of the plans of the Soviet union in the past year that graph would slope upward, and if we were to draw a graph of the progress of the west in the past year it would go down. The reason for that unhappily is the lamentable lack of leadership which the west has been showing, and none of us is guiltless. That was proved perhaps most cruelly by Walter Lippman, when he said in an article some months ago that the leadership of the west is in the hands of preoccupied and harried men in London, of weak and distracted men in Paris, of a very old man in Bonn and a sick man in Washington. That being so, there is none of that moral and political leadership which I am sure many of us in this house would like to see.

The soviets are battling us in the field of ideas and at the moment they prevail and we do not understand why. It is difficult to understand, from our vantage point, because we know that when they speak to the underprivileged people of the world about the horrors of colonialism the Soviet union itself is the greatest colonial power in the world and that within its own confines it has taken masses of people into slavery in Siberia.

The Soviet union talks of peace, yet only a few months ago it armed Egypt in such a way that Egypt has become a dire threat to peace. The Soviet union wants to ban the atom bomb, yet is does nothing effective, and oddly enough it is selling this curious propaganda to the peoples of the world. It is time we in the west called the bluff of the Soviet union. It means we have to act rather differently from what we have in the past.

Certainly, there are changes taking place in the Soviet union. The heady wine of freedom is fermenting. We see it in Poland, though it is not in the Soviet union but is a satellite. We see it amongst the workers of Poznan and, if we were doing our job intelligently, we would be showing the peoples of the world just what happens to the workers of any country who rebel against the power of the Soviet union. That desire for freedom is showing itself in Czechoslovakia today, in Hungary and within the Soviet union itself in the Ukraine. There is a country which is much older than Russia, a country which has a greater history in many ways than Russia, a country which has often been submerged throughout the course of history and which yet has always survived and emerged because of the desire of its people for freedom, a desire which we see expressed in our own country, for I disagree with the minister that the Slav is essentially one who yields to autocracy. We have many people of Slav descent in our country who are amongst the strongest fighters for freedom. If that is so here, then it is so also in the people in the land from whose loins they sprang.

We have, then, to give, as was suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert, encouragement to those people. No one will suggest for a moment that we go to war to liberate them. That is not in the minds of anybody, but there is deep-seated within the human mind and the human soul this hope and desire for freedom, and somehow we have to convey to them our intention that eventually they are going to be free, as we know freedom.

I will admit the obvious fact that in the world of power politics today one cannot negotiate from weakness; but we have, in my judgment, placed far too much emphasis on arms and defence pacts, with the result that we are not able to sell the many worthwhile beliefs which we accept. Today there is a different atmosphere and it has us baffled. We knew how to deal with the blustering and belligerent Stalin. We do not know how to deal with the blandishments and lures of Khrushchev. We have not yet adjusted to the new system which apparently is prevailing.

As I said, we do not know how long this is going to last. We know now that every crime we have laid at the doors of the Kremlin has been amply confirmed; but I suspect the error we are still making is that which we have continued to make. We are fighting international communism on the ground of international communism instead of on the basis of our own specific ideas, hopes and aspirations, not only for ourselves but for the people of the world; we are fighting in an entirely negative sense, and yet the west has a great contribution to make. We have not managed to get over to the peoples of the world what this contribution is—our concepts of law, our concepts of impartial justice, our concept of representative government, our concept of the freedom of the individual. These are the things we believe in. For some reason we have failed miserably and lamentably in letting the world know that these are the positive, affirmative things we believe in, these are the things that make life worth living for any human being. But all of them have been smothered in our insistence on pacts.

Let me remind the hon. member for Prince Albert that we cannot go to the people of Asia and say we believe in these things and still ask them to join in SEATO or in any of the rest of the pacts that they themselves abhor and will have nothing to do with. What do we want these pacts for? The people of Asia believe we want them, and with much justification, to defend ourselves, and they are not interested in defending us. On the other hand, were we to go to them, the underprivileged people, the colonial peoples who still exist, and say to them, "We want to come to your defence against the evils of poverty and we are prepared to do something about it without any strings attached." then I am sure we would get much farther.

Today we are losing the political battle because of our insistence on securing alliances. Today our military security depends upon political security, and that was never more demonstrated than by the situation we see in Cyprus. The United Kingdom would have been much more secure had they come to terms with the Cypriots, but we have a situation there which has in it the elements of tragedy as we have the elements of tragedy in Algeria. We should remember that Algeria is different from Tunisia and Morocco, but in both these cases repression will not make friends; repression is not the answer in either of those instances.

Some terrible errors have been made and we refuse to learn, but unfortunately the eyes of Asia are on every mistake and every error which we make. Yet all the time we get statements, mostly emanating from Washington, which would lull us into a sense of false security. We have Mr. Dulles saying that the Soviet union has failed to keep up with the rest of the world. What a piece of utter absurdity. Then we have his statement about leading the western world to the brink of war, to be rescued later by his statesmanship. Mr. Dulles may deceive himself, but I am sure he does not delude other people in this world.

Obviously the battle today is on other fronts. The minister referred just in passing to what was happening to industry in the Soviet union. I should like to document a little more what he said. The Soviet union is going ahead at a great rate with its industrialization. According to reports issued by Lloyd's bank a few months ago, in 1950 the industrial production of the Soviet union was equal to 35 per cent of the industrial production of the United States. By 1955 the industrial production of the Soviet union was equal to 50 per cent of that of the United States. In other words, during those years United States production increased by 24 per cent while Soviet production had increased by 75 per cent. This is part of a deliberate plan of the Soviet union.

They are making progress so much faster than we are in so many ways, and one way in particular is in the field of professional manpower. I suppose hon. members got in the mail, as I did the other day, an extract from a magazine called Chemistry in Canada containing an article by Garnet Page, general manager of the Chemical Institute of Canada. Referring to the Soviet union he had this to say:

> It is expected that 71,200 engineers will graduate in June, 1956, as compared to 36,000 in 1950, and that the goal of the present five-year plan to graduate 100,000 engineers in 1960 will be realized, since the students are already enrolled in the preparatory courses in sufficient numbers.
> The total number of university and institute graduates from 1946 to 1950 was 652,000, from 1951 to 1955 was 1,120,000, and the goal of the sixth five-year plan, 1956 to 1960, is 4,000,000.

The article goes on in similar vein. There is confirmation of that in the statement of Mr. Allen Dulles, director of the United States central intelligence agency, who said not long ago that in the decade ending in 1960 the Soviet union will have 1,200,000 scientifically trained men, and that at that time they may outnumber the United States. It is conceivable that they may outnumber the United States, but as of this moment, on a per thousand basis, those in universities in the Soviet union outnumber those in Canadian universities by the ratio of five to two. It is time from the point of view of defence if for no other reason, that we paid greater attention to the training and education of technicians in this country. But heaven forbid that the day would ever come in Canada when we forget the humanities, because when we forget them we will have forgotten the most of what is worth while in life.

Yet we are living in a technical era and we are going to need the help of technical men, scientists, engineers and so on. As part of our national defence we ought to be making abundantly certain that we have a reservoir of trained talent. But that is not being done, first because it is apparently regarded as not being important and, second, because the government does not care to support the universities. They argue that that would be in the nature of aid to education. I suppose within limits the government could be right, but from the point of view of the well-being of the community as a whole I insist that they are quite wrong. Our universities must be aided and our students must be aided so that we can produce the requisite number of technicians, engineers and even philosophers which a society such as ours requires.

That is a problem which the government will have to tackle, but there are other problems in the international sphere which are of course much more immediate. One we see confronting us is the situation in the Middle East. There is something ironical about that situation. Nations are insisting that there must be complete freedom of travel through the Suez canal. I suppose it depends upon whose ox is being gored, but the Egyptians would not permit the state of Israel to send ships through the canal and that action was rebuked by a resolution passed by the United Nations. Nothing else was done but when Nasser threatened the larger powers, or when they thought he had threatened them, then action is rapid.

But what sort of action can take place? After all, the ownership of the Suez canal is not the business of Canada. We have no shareholdings in that operation. It is only when it becomes apparent that disagreement over the canal may lead to war that we become directly interested. But the ownership per se of the Suez canal does not mean very much to us. On the other hand, the right of a maritime power such as we are to freedom of access to the Suez is most important. We want to see it maintained. But we do not think this freedom can be guaranteed best by a small group of powers guaranteeing it. As the minister said today, we believe that this should be decided by the United Nations and that control should ultimately vest with the United Nations.

The minister put in a qualifying clause, "if practicable". I am convinced it is quite practicable to do that if the will is there. I am getting rather tired of the continual bypassing of the United Nations by the big powers and by some of the smaller ones as well. The United Nations is there to be used. It should be made as far as we can into a virile international instrument and that can be done only if it is used more than it is at the present time when problems arise.

I see no reason to believe that war will break out because of what Nasser has threatened to do. The main thing to remember is that to send warships there or to have a demonstration of power would be a piece of fatuity which would only be excelled by going to war over this issue. It can be settled in other ways and I think it must be settled through the United Nations. That is also the view of my colleagues.

Some reckless move in the middle east might conceivably drive Egypt to war. Egypt would not go to war with a great power, but if Nasser wishes to distract the attention of the people from what he might consider to be an affront to Egypt he might conceivably think of a war with Israel. It has been part of our general policy throughout the last few years to preserve as far as possible a balance of armaments in that area, yet we know that that is not completely possible. Israel, a nation of 1,750,000 people, cannot afford to arm to the extent of several nations with a population of over 40 million people, but nevertheless the imbalance today is much too serious and in my judgment we have to do something to redress it.

What we ought to do, in my judgment again, is to give Israel the aid she is asking in the form of aircraft to combat any attempted aggression. Israel, I am afraid, is on her own. I see no chance of peace coming in the Middle East at one fell swoop. We shall not see it for a number of years and then only by nibbling off one outstanding problem after another. That, I think, is what General Burns has been trying to do, and I join with the minister in his tribute to General Burns on his great service to the United Nations and indirectly the credit he has brought Canada.

However, there might be another way to restore some sort of peace in the Middle East. The West may not like it, but I see no alternative, if my judgment is right that peace there in the next few years is almost impossible of attainment. We have to approach the Egyptians and the Arab peoples and offer them the capital assistance they need if they are going to improve the conditions of the people who live in their countries. We should not do it unilaterally or bilaterally or trilaterally; we should do it through the United Nations, which is the proper vehicle for this purpose. The proposition should be put to the people of the Arab countries and to Egypt that the necessary money will be loaned to them for constructive social purposes if they are prepared to put up a similar amount of money and the United Nations would supervise, as far as it can, whatever construction takes place.

The hope behind that would be that, if there is a genuine desire on the part of the Arab states and Egypt to improve the conditions of their people, then the money they will put into social improvements will be such that they will not be able to devote as much as they do now to arms, and therefore in a negative way we might perhaps achieve some sort of peace within that area. The situation in the Middle East is serious, but there are no man-made problems which are insoluble if we are sufficiently generous and sufficiently wise.

There is another problem which will be facing us in the near future, that of Germany and NATO. I do not intend to discuss NATO at this present juncture, though I hope I shall later, but I am going to say this. The Dulles-Adenauer coalition in Germany is not going to work. The people of Germany want more than anything else today to be united. The policy of Mr. Dulles and Mr. Adenauer has failed dismally; in fact, it has ground to a stop. They have no answer to the problems and to the requests of the people of Germany for unity. Next year there is going to be an election there, and next year I suspect the political climate will be quite different within the government there, and then Mr. Dulles will be faced with an agonizing reappraisal indeed if the Germans decide that they are going to withdraw from NATO and, as a quid pro quo, among other things, go to the Russians to get the unity they desire.

However, I wish to talk for a few moments about Asia. All is not so quiet on the eastern front as perhaps we might imagine. It is true that there is nothing in the headlines but, although the situation of the offshore islands at this moment is perhaps calm, although the waters off Formosa are quiet, that does not mean to say that this will continue for any length of time. We know, and we have history to prove it within the past few years, that, whenever the west became interested and involved in something in this part of the world, some incident would break out in Asia. That is a matter we ought to remember.

The minister said today that the policy of the government on Asia has not changed. I regret that, although I must say that our policy has not changed either. We still believe that the people of Formosa have the right to decide for themselves how they are going to be governed. We still think it would be the better part of wisdom, no matter how much we dislike the Mao Tse-tung government, to have China admitted into the United Nations. That country cannot be kept out indefinitely, it is a piece of nonsense to suppose that Chiang Kai-shek on Formosa represents the people of China today. Why do we not do it? Perhaps there are domestic reasons but there is also another.

One of the aspects of our policy which I do not like and with which I disagree is that too often we and other nations find ourselves prisoners of a United States political system. Whenever there is an election, whether it be a presidential election or a congressional election, practically every problem in international affairs bogs down and comes to a stop for at least six months until these elections are decided. Why should we have to put up with this? We are a reasonably independent nation. Why must we always wait for the Americans to decide what they are going to do before we make up our own minds? I think it is high time we in Canada decided what policy we were going to pursue in Asia and then carry it out.

The future of Asia is going to determine the future of the world. We cannot get away from that. There you have a struggle for leadership: India is striving on the one hand and in a democratic way for leadership; China striving the other way, in the communist way, for leadership. Nehru the democratic socialist; Mao the communist; which is going to be successful? Upon that answer depends Asia, for I am certain that India's future will determine the future of Asia, as I am certain that if India goes the Chinese way all Asia goes that way.

We have not yet in North America tried to understand the Asian mentality, and it is not too difficult to understand if we, as human beings, put ourselves into the position of human beings in Asia with the problems with which they are confronted. One of the things with which we would be most imbued would be a hatred of colonialism. One of the things with which we would be most imbued would be a hatred of domination by the white man, to which these people have been subject for many decades and in some cases centuries. We have a terrible legacy to live down, and it is not going to be easy. Yet we have the spectacle today of Mr. Nehru, trying to achieve democratic government and to give his people that hope which is their right and their due. We have Mao trying in his communistic way to give the people of China the hope which he feels is their due. We cannot forget that with the great mass of Asians, despair has been their daily companion and hopelessness has been their inevitable lot. But now they are seeing gleams of hope. Where are they going to see the most hope, in the democratic country which is being built in India or the communist country which is being built in China?

We have a big task to do in Asia. There is a terrific amount of ignorance of India in the United States, and in many parts a great hatred of India and of Nehru. We have prided ourselves, not altogether rightly, in the past on being an interpreter between the United Kingdom and the United States, but perhaps we could perform a very useful function if we were to try to interpret India to the United States, and also, of course, the United States to India. I think that there we should be performing a very valuable public duty. But what we have to remember above all is that India has really no sense of identity with the western world. We are proud to call the Indians our friends; the relationship between the two countries is excellent; but India is going to look at its problems with the eyes of Asia and not with the eyes of North America. One of the problems the Indians have to overcome is the problem of poverty within their own country. All the people of Asia want equality with the west, but there is only one way they can get that equality, and that is by industrialization.

If they are going to industrialize within each country separately then they are going to depend upon the savings of the workers, the farmers and the businessmen of the country, and there are not enough savings to go in for industrialization in any wide way. The alternative is either, to use a word I dislike, the Sovietization of the economy or else we in the west who are blessed with a surfeit of the world's goods come to their aid. Again I say this should not be done bilaterally or in any other way but through the United Nations. That money should be lent at the lowest possible rates of interest and lent, of course, without any strings attached. If we do not rescue Asia from the worst menace, the worst menaces really, of industrialization, then I am afraid Asia will side with the communist powers no matter where they may be. It boils down to this one ineluctable fact, that the system which wins Asia wins the world.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, today the committee is being called upon to approve the proposed expenditures for the Department of External Affairs for this year. The amount, of course, is of vital importance but I think there is something of greater importance than that and it is the policy which is being followed by the government and by the Department of External Affairs for the furtherance of which this money is requested. We have been considering in the past days the military aspects of our national defence program, and this may be looked upon more as the political and diplomatic phase of that same program. The international scene remains, as has been stated, disturbed and threatening, and certainly with the events that are now taking place, especially Egypt's nationalization of the Suez canal, the situation seems to be becoming worse instead of better.

This afternoon I should like to refer to a number of problems that are confronting the world in general and at the same time remind ourselves of the place that Canada occupies on the stage of world affairs. It has been my privilege to be a member of the committee on external affairs for the past three sessions and I may say I have found it intensely interesting, for there we have the opportunity of getting a little more of the detailed information than is possible in a committee of the house or in any other way.

This year we had statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs followed by various officials of his department, Mr. Nik Cavell, General McNaughton and others who made reference to the particular matters for which they were responsible. Listening to the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the introduction of his estimates today, we had another view of the international situation from one who of course is in a position to know more about it than any other member of the house. I often think that we who take part in these debates speak at a great disadvantage because of the fact that we are dependent largely upon newspaper reports, magazine articles and brief reports given by the minister from time to time in trying to gather up fragments here and there and put them together in order to try to form a picture of world conditions from the various segments that are given to us.

However, as we listened to the minister today there was one thing that impressed me very definitely, and that was the continued firm attitude that the minister is taking with regard to Soviet attempts to, shall I say, disarm the western powers and get them to the place where they will soften up, relax their vigilance and thus perhaps give further advantage to the aggressive designs of Russian communism. I should like to commend the minister for the statement he made in this regard and for the attitude he has taken in this respect. Certainly we would request and urge that that policy be maintained in the interests of peace and freedom.

Therefore, in thinking of these particular matters that have been called to our attention today and having also listened to some of the other speakers who have taken part in the debate, I feel I should like to make a few comments and observations with regard to external affairs. I am not going to cover all the different fields. It may be that an opportunity will be presented for others of this group to take part in the debate. The hon. member for New Westminster in particular will be taking part because he had the opportunity of attending the session of the United Nations organization last fall and was also a member of the delegation to the NATO conference. Therefore I will leave those two matters to be dealt with by him.

As we look at the world today and face the situation we are reminded that the threat of communism is a continuing threat. Much has been said and written about the changes in Russia's internal policy. Perhaps we are interested in that aspect of the situation but certainly we are interested to a much greater extent in the seeming changes in Russia's external policy. Reference has been made today to the iron regime of Stalin, and of course we all realize that in his day a strong iron hand was exercised in every aspect of the economy and every aspect of Russian policy. There is some hope that at the present time that iron grip has been relaxed and that greater liberty and freedom are being given. But again I would say that personally I am not prepared to accept even that suggestion.

There may be a little different approach, there may be a little different strategy used, but certainly I feel that, as has been indicated by very recent occurrences, the iron rule of communism still is maintained in the Soviet union. There is talk of co-existence which means as far as communism is concerned no existence for those who disagree with them. There have been smiles instead of frowns, but I do not think that we can depend too much upon that as an indication of any fundamental change in the policy of the Soviet union. We are reminded of some of the statements that have been made quite recently in this particular respect, especially by Mr. Khrushchev. I have a copy of the NATO letter of June 1, 1956 in which is found an excerpt from a statement by Khrushchev used by Lord Ismay in certain remarks he made. The pertinent part reads as follows:

> If we could believe that these changes in tactics meant a real change of heart, how happy we would all be! But are we justified in basing our plans on that belief? Quite recently Khrushchev himself gave us the answer. This is what he said: "The west say that Soviet leaders smile, but that their actions do not match their smiles. But I assure them that the smiles are sincere. They are not artificial. We wish to live in peace. But if anyone thinks that our smile means that we abandon the teachings of Marx and Lenin or abandon our communist road, then they are fooling themselves.

In putting that alongside the smiles that have appeared from time to time, I think we would be well advised to remember the frowns and to remember that, in the final analysis, the great plan of communism has not changed in the least.

The suggestion has been made—and I believe it is true—that to a considerable extent the cold war has moved into the realm of economic and political warfare. What I do not like about the thing is this, there are those who say that the policy has changed, that the Soviets have changed their program and have changed their plans and that they are now going to use economic and political measures instead of military means. I quite agree that they are using these economic and political aspects of the cold war, but I do not believe they have given up their idea, their intention and their determination to use the hot war and military means in order to achieve their ends if they are not able to achieve them by these other methods.

We have been greatly interested in reading in the last few days of events as they have been taking place in various Soviet satellite nations. We find that in the different countries—and also in the countries of the free world—the communist supporters and sympathizers have been having a difficult time to adjust their thinking and their planning to the meanderings of the Soviet and Kremlin line. However, as the minister stated this morning, it seems as though they are making the adjustment. Their allegiance, I would say, is still with the Kremlin rather than with the respective nations in which they reside. Hence we hear of the reports of the riots in Poznan. I have here an article—I am not going to read it—talking about the unrest and turmoil in the Baltic states. I have another one with reference to the situation in Tibet. This is from the Ottawa Citizen of July 31 and it reads as follows:

> Reports from Tibet said today rebel Tibetan tribesmen massacred a delegation of several hundred Chinese communists after peace talks broke up in a quarrel.

Those are indications that all is not well in these satellite nations, the nations that are today ruled by the Kremlin, whether directly of indirectly. These people are giving vent to their feelings by taking their lives in their hands and staging riots and demonstrations in order to demonstrate the fact that they still value freedom and are willing to die for it. So today it would appear as I have said, that all is not well in these particular countries. As has been said by other speakers today—I have referred to the matter previously—I believe that before Russia can expect the free nations of the world to accept her propositions at their face value, before she can expect us to respond and think that her proposals are well taken and well meaning, certainly she should be prepared to grant to the peoples of the countries under her domination the right to make their own choice and the right to elect their own governments, or in other words the right to self-determination. We in this particular group believe in the self-determination of peoples. We believe that these various nations should have the right to make their own choice and to elect the kind of governments that they would prefer to have. I should just like to refer to a speech that was made by the leader of our group in Winnipeg just a short time ago. This is what he had to say with regard to the self-determination of peoples:

> It is because we place such great importance upon individual liberty that we take the position that the various peoples of the earth should be free to choose whether or not they shall enjoy independence. In our Social Credit charter we declare ourselves in undivided support of moral and political principles of national independence, the sovereignty and self-government of all nations and people, which does include the Ukraine and the other captive non-Russian nations in the Soviet union. We have always championed the principle of self-determination, and we do feel that until this principle is firmly established in our international understandings and practices there can be little hope for world peace and happiness. Moreover, we Social Crediters sincerely hope that Britain and Canada and the United States and the other free nations of the world will uphold the declaration of General Dwight D. Eisenhower when he said: "We shall never acquiesce in the enslavement of any people in order to purchase gain for ourselves."

We sincerely trust that the day will not be too far distant when these people who at present languish under communist domination will be able to exercise their rights as human beings and choose according to their own desires.

With regard to the analysis of the changes in the Soviet position in these particular matters, I think it would be well for us to remember the statements of some of the statesmen of our world. General Gruenther, supreme allied commander in Europe, speaking in Edinburgh on May 16—and this is as reported in the NATO letter of June 1—with regard to reductions in Soviet forces, said this:

> So, from the standpoint of their effectiveness against us, the changes they have made give us no reason to change our strategy or our requirements.

And then further down:

> Why the Soviets have had this tremendous force we have never been able to understand, and I feel that what they have done now is simply to come to a delayed recognition of the same type of thinking that our side has engaged in for several years.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Then finally, the last part of the last sentence:

> . . . but as to lessening our guard, as to lessening the requirements of the forces to implement the plans that have been very carefully considered, I think it would be a very great mistake if we should come to any such conclusion now.

President Eisenhower has also made statements in the same vein. I think the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have added their voice and have expressed the same opinions with regard to this particular matter. As we listened to the Secretary of State for External Affairs give his address this morning, the thought came to us that all of these things that he was saying have been said before, or practically all of them. We were glad to hear a clear-cut statement once again. He painted the picture as he saw it. However, I do not think he outlined clearly and definitely what is the government's policy to cope with this situation. While commending the minister for his address, I think we could criticize him in this particular respect, namely that he has not come out clearly and stated what the government was preparing to do and what its policy was with regard to meeting the situation, facing it and doing something positive about the problems which confront us right at the present time.

I have a clipping from the Globe and Mail of June 29 under the heading "Views of Prime Ministers Vary on Soviet New Look". This article is by Harvey Hickey, and I should like to read two paragraphs of it:

> Some of the western diplomatists—and these are not confined to the commonwealth—are getting weary of conferences poised on no other basis than on what to do about something that the communist bloc has already done.
> Why, they ask, are we always put in a defensive position? Why can't we do something that will provide a meeting in the Kremlin to decide what they should do about us? The questions merely underline the fact of the world situation today, namely, that the communist powers have taken the initiative and others must follow.

I think perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North gave expression to the same thought in different words, that the west has lost the initiative if they ever had it. Now, instead of keeping one jump ahead or at least keeping up with the Soviet, it seems as though our policy is to wait until the Soviets do something or say something or more in some direction, then we try to get together to ascertain what to do in the face of the new challenge. It would seem to me that the time has come when our government should take a very definite and pronounced position, make some definite proposals and say we believe that this is what should be done; we believe this is how it should be done, and therefore we are prepared to push it forward. It would seem that the main trouble is that we are perhaps in a state of moral bankruptcy. We seem to only half believe in our system and even in our own philosophy. We seem to lack that something which gives legs to our ideas, if we ever had any ideas.

I would suggest that if we are ever to convince the great masses of human beings that the free way, the democratic way of life is best, we will have to act as though we believe it ourselves. This means that we must live carefully what we profess to believe. When we do, our self-respect is raised high, our enthusiasm becomes catching and the underprivileged peoples of the world will want to find the same kind of enthusiasm and happiness that we have found.

So again let me say we commend the minister for his attitude in the face of continuing communist threats, but we would suggest he take a more positive attitude and come up with something that would really meet the challenge of the Russians and put them on their guard against the reality of western ideals and concepts of democratic living.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been some reference made to the problem posed by events in the Middle East. I suppose this remains one of the most threatening areas in the world. We do appreciate, and we want to place ourselves on record as appreciating, the work that has been done by General Burns and the other Canadians who are serving on the supervisory teams. We think he has been doing a magnificent job in the face of almost impossible circumstances and situations. He has been carrying on, even although there has been some opposition, and just recently a request on the part of one of the Arab nations for his dismissal. I do not believe there is any member in this house who would go along with that because we have confidence in the work that General Burns is doing and in him as an administrator.

We believe that the mission of Mr. Hammarskjold, secretary general of the United Nations, has had a very salutary effect upon conditions in the Middle East. We hope it will be fruitful, not only just to starve off a conflict but in finally resolving these problems that are so pressing in that section of the world. However, these basic problems still remain unsolved. The main problem, of course, is to get the Arab nations to even agree to recognize the existence of the state of Israel. I suppose other members have received, as I have, some reprints from editorials in the New York Times with respect to this very problem, and the attitude that the Arab countries are taking in this respect. Certainly, they have not indicated any intention of recognizing the existence of Israel and they are still committed to their professed role in world affairs of driving Israel into the sea.

The other problems have been mentioned before, the refugee problem. I asked the minister in the committee if any thought was being given to the matter of making further contributions to the Palestine relief organization conditional upon their use for rehabilitation of the refugees rather than their maintenance in these camps. Although that has not been possible up to the present I hope the minister will continue to keep that thought in mind. I believe he is pressing towards that position, that this money ought to be used for rehabilitation.

Egypt's nationalization of the Suez has placed another problem in the laps of those who are endeavouring to work out a solution for this area. Since the situation is in a very difficult and fluid state just now, I do not think any good would be accomplished by discussion of it to any great extent. But certainly, I feel that the suggestion that the Suez be put under an international board has merit. Above all, this must be maintained as an international waterway in the interests of the nations of the world. When the time comes I trust that the government will make known the stand of Canada in this particular respect. It seems as though Premier Nasser has failed to demonstrate either the desire or the intention of co-operating in the peaceful solution of the problems. He has failed to lead his people into an appreciation of a reasonably responsible course of action in the face of difficult situations. It would appear that something would have to be done to curtail his enthusiasm in some regards and bring it more into line with international law.

I had intended to speak, Mr. Chairman, on the matter of Red China. I just want to say this. I am in hearty disagreement with the hon. member who just spoke in this house when he states that he regrets there has been no change in the government's attitude regarding the position in the Far East. He suggested it was time that Canada acted independently, making her own decisions and taking action on her own account. I should like to ask this question. On what ground does the hon. member for Winnipeg North assume that, if the Canadian people did express their desire, it would be any different from the course the government is now following? Certainly, I do not believe the Canadian people are in a position now where they want to recognize the communist regime of Red China. Certainly I do not believe that. I think this government ought to continue taking a firm stand, even although the minister seems to be hedgehopping at times and according to reports in the newspapers, it would seem as though he was inclined over to this side. One writer even said the minister implied that the time was going to come when public opinion would force the government into that position. Whether that report is right I am not sure. But, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the minister himself should not assume, as I have said before, that the Canadian people are in favour of this, because I believe that the great mass of the Canadian people are still opposed to the recognition of Red China and its taking a seat in the United Nations until it has demonstrated the fact that it is a peace-loving nation, and apparently events in the last days have not indicated that in the least.

What is Canada's foreign policy? I wish the minister would make a clear-cut statement setting out the basic principles outlining our policies. Let me ask this question. Is the minister completely in favour of the national sovereignty of Canada or is he inclined to neutralism? I ask that question because certain statements that have been made recently cause me to wonder. Here is one from the Ottawa Citizen of July 11, 1956:

Pearson Decries Atlantic Union

The second paragraph reads:

"The 15 member countries of NATO are much impressed with the need for greater non-military co-operation," Mr. Pearson remarked, "but, as a matter of personal politics, establishment of an Atlantic union—a centralized sovereign federalized state is just not feasible at this time."

In the magazine Freedom and Union for July and August, 1956, there is an account of the minister's address to the English-speaking union in London on April 30, in which the minister said:

Security, peace and ordered progress call for action on a wider basis than that of the national community. This does not mean, however, that we should move at once into world government or some form of Atlantic union or broad political federation with a central legislature and executive, a common citizenship, currency, and budget, a single foreign policy and defence establishment under central control; in short, with all the institutions of a federal state.

Those who advocate such schemes of federation do so from the highest of motives. They perform, I think, a good and useful service in preparing public opinion for the political changes which will undoubtedly be called for in the future to promote international co-operation.

In the first statement, he said, we do not believe in moving immediately into world government. What do the world government people want? I am reading from the Ottawa Citizen of June 13, 1956:

World federalists of Canada urged external affairs department officials during the weekend to consider proposed amendments to the United Nations charter that would make the United Nations a world government of limited power.

The federalists, who held their meeting here Saturday, suggested Canada should "at the appropriate time" support a conference to review the United Nations charter and then put forward amendments that would give the world organization power to control arms and prevent war.

Now, I ask the minister, Mr. Chairman, is he in favour of world government, or is he in favour of the sovereign rights of individual nations? We are reading a great deal about the self-determination, and so on, of peoples, and yet on the one hand we have been crying loudly for the self-determination of peoples, the right to make their choice, and on the other hand the same people want to have a world government that will dictate policies to the entire world. Where are we going?

Mr. Chairman, in closing, I should like to present some of the policies which I believe are essential and which should be adopted and followed by this government: First, industrial rivalry is one of the greatest single factors leading to international conflict; therefore, there must be the establishment of sound trade policies designed to accomplish the mutually satisfactory exchange of goods between nations. Second, self-determination of peoples; third, the maintenance and strengthening of Canada's place in the British commonwealth; fourth, the retention of Canada's sovereign authority to govern her affairs in accordance with the will of the Canadian people; fifth, active participation in plans of assistance designed to promote the welfare of all peoples of the world; sixth, co-operation in zonal pacts where such arrangements are considered desirable and necessary for the safety of the free world.

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Chairman, my first words will be to thank very much the hon. member for Prince Albert for the reference he made today to my humble person in connection with the committee on external affairs. What he said was very pleasant, but I think his remarks should be directed to every member of the committee, because of the wonderful co-operation they granted me in carrying on the business of this very important committee.

Today, I do not intend to dwell on what I shall call the headaches of our world. Of course, everybody knows that the world has those headaches, and we have indications of it today in Algeria, in the Middle East and in Asia. I think the ground was well covered by the previous speaker in this debate. We, of course, should remember that in the past we have gone through some ordeals in Korea, in Morocco and in Tunisia and those problems were solved to the satisfaction of the whole world with the co-operation of the United Nations. Therefore, it is my hope that what we see today in the stormy world in which we live might be settled in the same way by following the same pattern.

I intend to speak about only one problem, namely, the problem of neutralism in the world. Before doing so, I wish, as a supporter of this government, to commend and praise the government and the words and deeds of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in keeping our country on the side of making peace and assuring to the world a security which is badly needed, rather than to drive Canada toward a state of war. No one more than our Secretary of State for External Affairs has done a greater and better job to save the peace of the world since I have been in this parliament, and I am glad today to pay a great tribute to his work in that direction.

Let me come now to the problem of neutralism. I know that theory is one that is sponsored by the leader of a great country, the republic of India. We have known before in international law of another principle —we call it neutrality. How many countries have lost through being neutral in these days and particularly in the period ending with 1914 when the first world war started. Some countries in Europe had agreements with other countries assuring their neutrality. But the fact is that neutrality did not mean one thing at that time.

We are glad to develop in each country a spirit of neutrality which would mean that we should assure any policy which would encourage some countries to try to establish peace by the only means known to human beings, which is getting ready to defend a country if the country or any country is attacked by a prospective enemy.

It is peculiar to find out that countries advocating such international policies are on the other hand asking us for money and technicians to develop inside ther own frontiers a self-supporting economy. I agree with that entirely, but it seems to me if we are going to live in a world where neutrality will develop in each country, if on the other hand we are going to give our money and technicians to develop a self-supporting economy, in my opinion that is something difficult to reconcile.

So between a policy of getting into a war at any price and getting peace, or trying very hard and striving for it by all means to secure peace, I would choose to maintain our connections with those countries which have the same philosophy and have built up a system of defence without aiming at going to war with anybody and trying to show to some countries in the world that we intend to secure peace and only peace by all means without aiming at anything which could bring Canada into conflict with any country.

It is a very difficult problem to reconcile those ideas, but I will rest my case with the present government and I will rest my case with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure that Canada will be maintained at peace, that Canada in the years to come will favour peace by peaceful means, assuring not only to Canada the security we need but also helping other countries in the world which have the same willingness to live in peace for the good of humanity. I shall say nothing else today, except to conclude with a few words in French.

(Translation):

I do think that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the government which he so worthily represents, will continue to serve the cause of peace by continuing to assist those countries which, like Canada, are seeking to establish peace in the world while ensuring their own security.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, at the outset let me say a brief word concerning the deliberations of the standing committee on external affairs. As in the past, I think the deliberations of that committee were most useful. The committee carried on its work in good spirit and with a co-operative attitude. I have long contended in this house that the standing committee on external affairs by its review of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs furnishes a useful example of how estimates should be treated for some of the other departments.

I take it that at this stage of the discussion we are confining our remarks to general statements and that at a later point we may address ourselves to a detailed consideration of individual items in the estimates.

The opening statement this morning of the Secretary of State for External Affairs covered a very limited field. I would be the first to acknowledge that the situation in the world today in many quarters is fluid and that dangerous elements exist, but there were some startling omissions in the statement made by the minister. I should like to mention several matters which I think the minister has side-stepped and which because of their importance warranted some statement on his behalf.

First is the current situation following the seizure of the assets of the Suez canal company by the government of Egypt. That matter received scanty treatment from the minister this morning. In a situation as formidable and as threatening as this we cannot as a country content ourselves with taking the lofty attitude of relatively distant spectators. This is a most serious matter for all countries of the western world. Colonel Nasser's seizure of the canal presents a serious and inescapable issue. It is the issue of main force on the one hand, and the role of international law and the respect for solemn obligations, on the other. In that situation I do not see how Canada properly can refrain from making her position known.

Here is a great opportunity for the United Nations and for Canada as a member of the United Nations unless Russia takes steps to prevent the United Nations from taking effective action. A fair question to be asked in this house is: Where does Canada stand? The stand of Canada and the stand of the government ought to be more clearly made known than it seems to me the minister succeeded in doing this morning in his very brief statement. Perhaps he will enlarge on this later.

The second significant omission concerns the situation in the Near and Middle East. I expect that a question which has been going through the minds of most of us is whether the situation arising out of Egypt's seizure of the Suez canal will affect the attitude of the Canadian government toward the long-pending application of the government of Israel for a permit to purchase 24 Canadian Sabre jet airplanes. This application has been pending for many months. Questions have been repeatedly asked in this house as to when the government is going to make a decision, but we have been met with vague and evasive statements. Now I ask the minister if the situation developing in that area of the world out of the seizure by Egypt of the Suez canal is going to have a bearing on the attitude of the government in relation to this application. If so, what is that bearing, and when may a decision be expected by the house?

The third matter that was not touched on was the matter of the situation in Burma, brought to our attention in a rather startling way yesterday by the headlines indicating an invasion of Burmese territory by troops of the communist government of China. The minister did not even mention that subject in his statement this morning. When he was asked about it later by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, he did offer some reassurance in his indication that the situation might prove to be exaggerated, but this raises another question. We may well hope that the reports are exaggerated. We shall follow with interest the authentic reports that come out of that part of the world, but, whether the report is exaggerated or whether the invasion is as serious as had been pictured in the first reports, the question naturally arises, and I put it to the minister, does this latest military act on the part of the Chinese communist government have any bearing upon the attitude of the Canadian government in reference to the recognition of the so-called people's government at Peking?

We have been reading in the press of late also about military activities of the communist Chinese forces in Tibet following the over-running of that country some time ago by the Chinese forces. Has that situation any bearing upon the attitude of the Canadian government in reference to the recognition of the people's government at Peking? These are questions that the house is entitled to have answered.

Another matter that significantly found no place in the minister's remarks this morning was the Colombo plan. I recognize that the minister did not set about to make a full review of world affairs, but I mention this matter now because I think that the minister should have something to say by way of enlightenment of the house on the attitude of the government in this regard.

We are dealing this year with a proposed increase of about $8 million in the appropriation for the Colombo plan. The committee on external affairs had two very interesting and instructive meetings with Captain Nik Cavell, the administrator for Canada of aid under the Colombo plan, an official who enjoys the confidence of the committee and, I am sure, the confidence of all members of this house. I think I have expressed my own view in the past that Canada is fortunate to have as the administrator of aid under this plan an official of the competence and long experience in the Far East of Captain Cavell.

It has seemed to me for some time that there is more support for extended aid under the Colombo plan in this house than the government has been prepared to advocate. As to the need that exists in the Far East for this kind of aid, Captain Cavell left no room for doubt in the mind of anyone who heard him or who has subsequently read his testimony. Let us just mention one or two of the things that Captain Cavell said on that point. As shown at page 148, I said to him:

> But you have made it quite plain that aid is going to continue throughout the lifetime of every one in this room?
> Mr. Cavell: I think that is so, in some form or other.

In the provision of aid to the recipient countries under the Colombo plan, the purpose, of course, is to enable them, through the provision of forms of capital assistance, to help themselves. It is a sound approach. The need is very great. It is not going to be met in a few years. We are dealing here with a continuing problem, a problem that the world is going to face for a long time to come, and we in Canada must be realistic in our appreciation of the scope and extent of the problem.

Further, Mr. Cavell was asked, as shown on page 198, as to the projects that the recipient countries under the Colombo plan had submitted for approval, and he outlined those at some length. I asked him this question:

> Q. Those are projects for which, if you had the money, you would then have studied in order to determine their soundness?
> A. If we had more money.
> Q. Yes.
> A. Sir, I would like to say that there is no limit to the amount of money which we could spend if we took on everything which those countries wanted done.

It is quite evident that there is need of unlimited proportions. Whilst the house, I am sure, will welcome the increase in the appropriation this year of $8 million for a specific project under Colombo aid, nevertheless there is, it seems to me, strong support in this house for more effective aid than the government has yet been prepared to recommend to the house. All the events that are occurring in the world today point unmistakably to the importance of plans of this kind and the extent of the need that they may assist in meeting.

There are several other factors in world strategy and in the present world outlook upon which the minister may have opportunity to comment later. So far as Europe is concerned, I should like to submit to the house that Germany is still the most important situation in Europe today. The division of Germany is the biggest political problem and the biggest problem confronting our hopes of preserving world peace in Europe.

The Russian attitude towards Germany and towards the German desire for reunification has evidently been stiffening in recent months. I do not think that hon. members can overlook the fact that the German government, headed by Chancellor Adenauer, has displayed considerable alarm of late—not just disturbance, but alarm—over what are thought to be indications that the countries that are members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization are relaxing their efforts and taking a less serious view of the world situation and particularly the European aspects of it, than they did before.

That leads me to say, concerning NATO, that I think that we cannot afford to contemplate any weakening in NATO under present conditions. I think the minister agreed with that point of view in his testimony before the committee. The fact that the Russians today most want to weaken NATO surely is enough to prove the necessity on our part of keeping NATO strong. That is why in the committee we asked the minister to take what steps might lie within his power to make the North Atlantic Treaty Organization effective in all respects, not merely the military aspects of it but the economic purposes as well. The minister has said that the report of the three-man committee will be available in October, and we shall await it with keen interest.

For, sir, while everyone seems to agree that the threat of military aggression in the world has receded markedly in the last 12 months, nevertheless the threat of economic aggression taking the place of the cold war is very formidable indeed; revolutionary communism with a world purpose, directed from the Kremlin, by economic tactics, is extending its influence throughout the world and is experiencing a measure of success that ought to give us all serious concern. Technical assistance by Russia to underdeveloped countries, the sending of technical advisers, are all part of a pattern of which we see some striking and disturbing examples in the provision of arms to Egypt and in even the latest of these negotiations, that between Russia and Cambodia for the provision of economic aid to that country which is so close to the recent scenes of hostilities in Indo-China.

Sir, while we take some comfort from the fact that tension has eased, we would be very foolish indeed if we slackened our efforts or allowed ourselves to become less vigilant than we have been. I fully endorse the statement the minister made this morning, as I am sure all members will, that we must never resign ourselves to the prospect of mutual annihilation. We cannot simply be passive. The responsibility on the governments of all western nations today is to be active in promoting policies that will maintain the strength of the free world and at the same time demonstrate to that part of the world that is not free or is not as well off materially as we are the advantages that our way of life possesses, and our readiness to assist other nations who desire peacefully to enjoy that way of life.

I pass on to one other matter. It is a matter that I regard as of high importance. It is the recent conference of commonwealth prime ministers. A gathering of the prime ministers of the commonwealth countries is always desirable, always a good thing. Such meetings are almost invariably pleasant, and they establish or cement very useful contacts. They provide a forum for the exchange of ideas and for the pooling of important information. In a commonwealth where symbolism plays such a signal role these conferences also play their part in that symbolism as well as in other respects.

But, sir, if our hopes were for something more than the kind of fruits I have just described from the recent commonwealth prime ministers' conference, then I am afraid those hopes would have been doomed to disappointment. The communique which was issued at the close of the conference, and which the Prime Minister brought to the house on his return at the sitting of July 9, has been described elsewhere as "a collection of cliches", as a collection of mere platitudes. I am afraid that none of us can find in that communique anything more encouraging than that.

I would be the first to recognize the difficulties in the way of reaching agreements at such a meeting, when those attending the meetings and the lands they represent are so varied in their outlook and in their geographical locations throughout the world. But we should take a closer look at this particular conference and what we might have hoped to obtain from it. We are indebted to the Prime Minister of Australia, Right Hon. Mr. Menzies, for a frank statement in regard to this conference. At the press conference during his visit to Ottawa last week Mr. Menzies made some direct comments on this particular conference, and also on the way future conferences can be turned to better account than this one. The press report in the Globe and Mail of July 27 contains these statements:

> A suggestion that future commonwealth prime ministers' conferences should limit their discussions to a single question or to a number of associated matters was made here today by Prime Minister Menzies of Australia.

Then there is this statement:

> He doubted whether it was wise of the conference to issue a final communique attempting to summarize its discussions as has been the custom at all past meetings.
>
> "People say the communique is a collection of cliches", Mr. Menzies remarked, "but in this world cliches are frequently the only things that all people agree on. You can always get unanimity on cliches.
> "My view is that we attempt to cover too much ground in these conferences. Of course, it is very interesting to hear other people's views on a particular question. Then you can pass on to the next topic without having reached any conclusion on the previous one. I would like to see some conclusions reached. I would like to see some future conference limit itself to some single question or a group of questions, related questions, and see whether we couldn't produce a statement of commonwealth opinion.
> "A statement of that kind should and could carry the moral authority that the commonwealth should possess. I think the world needs the force of judgment that the commonwealth has."

Later in the interview Mr. Menzies makes it plain that he does not favour any move toward forming a unit of the commonwealth in actions and opinions, but he is drawing attention to the weight of moral judgment, the moral weight that the world would attach to statements that could be agreed upon at such conferences.

Having regard to the fact that Canada has a very senior position within the commonwealth, and that Canada is so situated as to be able to give a very valuable lead in commonwealth discussions, it seems to me, from the results, from what we know of Canada's contributions to the discussions and from the evasive statements we had from the Prime Minister in reply to questions in this chamber before he left to attend the conference, that the government has fallen far short of contributing to the success of the conference.

It is evident that there was little serious consideration given by the Canadian government to the conference. It is evident that the Canadian government had very little to contribute to the agenda of matters that came before the conference. It is evident that the Canadian government made little or no preparation for the conference. Apart from the pleasant associations which always mark such conferences, it seems to me that the Canadian government has shown much less concern about trying to make this conference really effective than it ought to have shown.

These conferences present opportunities. I am not thinking simply about political questions; I am thinking about economic questions as well. Such opportunities to deal with these important questions were offered to the conference, or could have been, and the opportunity the Canadian government had has apparently been thrown away. We have important trade interests with the commonwealth countries. We in this house should be displaying more concern about the commonwealth markets and the loss of those markets over the years, particularly for our agricultural surpluses.

But, Mr. Chairman, one has only to look at the record to see that the Canadian government was most uncommunicative with the house in relation to its preparations for the conference and what it sought to accomplish there. As reported at page 4889 of Hansard of June 11, the Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister to inform the house as to the agenda for the conference. The Prime Minister's answer was as follows:

> The agenda has not been formally determined. There are items which have been suggested, and I think generally regarded by those who will attend as proper items for the agenda for that kind of meeting, involving principally considerations of the world situation. There are different items relating to different areas of the world, and those are the items that have been suggested for consideration at the meeting.

The Leader of the Opposition came back to the subject again on June 20 and asked the Prime Minister if he would extend an invitation to the other commonwealth prime ministers meeting in London to attend a conference in Ottawa later this year to discuss trade and economic relationships within the commonwealth. The Prime Minister replied that there was apt to be such discussion at the conference but that no consideration had been given to the question of a special conference of commonwealth representatives to discuss economic problems, and he added:

It may be a question that will arise in the course of our discussions and if it does I shall be glad to report to the house when I return.

Notwithstanding Canada's important economic stake in commonwealth relations, it will be noticed that the Prime Minister was not prepared to say that he would raise the question. All he said was that if the question was raised at the conference, he would report to the house on his return. I might say that a further question was asked on this subject on June 22. When he did come back he said nothing about this particular subject in his report to the house. When the Prime Minister made his statement to the house on July 9 he said nothing about the calling of any economic conference, either in Ottawa or elsewhere, to discuss these important economic questions within the commonwealth in which Canada has so large a stake.

So the Prime Minister was asked, as hon. members will recall and as is reported at pages 5766 and 5767 of Hansard, as to whether he had put such a proposal before the conference, and the Prime Minister's reply was in the negative, that the subject of holding such a conference had not been introduced by the Canadian delegation at the conference. He also added:

. . . we did not think it was the appropriate time to introduce the subject at the conference.

Mr. Chairman, from the attitude displayed by the Prime Minister in this house, both before he went to the conference and after his return, it is quite evident that the Canadian government is little concerned with the commonwealth or whether that commonwealth accomplishes what it might in this troubled and upset world, with the full weight of its moral influence. It is evident also that the government attaches inadequate importance to Canada's economic stake within the commonwealth, to trade which I would have thought was of such lively importance to all Canadians.

The Canadian government could do much more in making such conferences effective. It could do so without fettering in any degree the sovereignty of this country. We say that this government has shown little concern for the commonwealth. It shows little concern about our trade relations with commonwealth countries. We say it is high time that the government appreciated the opportunities that are there. We say the government should not throw away such opportunities as those which were presented to it at this conference and which are still open to the government, to initiate the calling of a conference that will produce for Canada and other commonwealth countries, in our opinion, important trade and other economic advantages.

Mr. Stick: May I ask the hon. member one question, Mr. Chairman? I waited until he had finished his speech. The hon. member for Eglinton raised the question of the sale of Sabre jets to Israel. May I ask him whether he and his party at this time favour the sale of Canadian Sabre jets to Israel?

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to reply?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the subject has been up repeatedly. Statements have been made on this subject by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Prince Albert on behalf of this party. My hon. friend will find a very clear statement in this house by them on this subject.

An hon. Member: What is your position?

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member has asked what is the position of the official opposition. I am a member of the official opposition, and I have directed the hon. member to the place where he will find the statement of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Dickey: Where?

Mr. Fleming: It was made in this house a few days ago.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Fleming: The matter was mentioned a few days ago by the Leader of the Opposition. I commend the statement to my hon. friend.

Mr. Villeneuve: Mr. Chairman, the present resolution gives a good opportunity to discuss the evolution and the trends of our foreign policy. It is one of the few moments during the session when we can together examine our national thinking regarding our relations with other countries of the world. Most of the members in this house, however, seem to limit themselves to questions connected with either the United States of America, Europe or the Far East; some will look at the Middle East or Central Europe but very few, if any, will be disposed to discuss our relations with the other important states which share with us the responsibility and pride of being the American nations. I think it is the proper time to pay special attention and give special care to the problems of our relations with the other American countries.

In order to be better informed on those problems I decided, last year, to go to Washington, the centre of the continental system itself, to the site of the inter-American organization which co-ordinates the efforts of the American states and promotes the idea of peace and friendship among the peoples of our hemisphere.

I am glad to mention that, even though it was understood that I had no official mission and that I was to be looked upon merely as a Canadian tourist visiting the beautiful capital city of our great neighbour to the south, some officials of the Pan-American union, the general secretariat of the organization of American states, had arranged for my friends and myself the most cordial welcome under very promising auspices. Although it was on a rainy Sunday, when the spacious buildings of the Pan-American union were closed, Dr. Luis Gardel, special assistant to the assistant secretary general, and Mr. Edward Davis of the division of conferences, took us on a special tour of the premises after we had exchanged pleasant words over a delicious table.

Upon entering the large room called the hall of the Americas I had a strange feeling of incompleteness, a sensation of false solidarity. It was incomplete and false because, quite evidently, in this salon des Ameriques, Canada was absent. Nevertheless when we and other tourists visit the older building of the Pan-American union, the guide usually calls attention to the coat of arms of Canada which, with those of the other American countries, adorns the exotic patio.

Our surprise was even greater when, amongst the other flags waving in the spring breeze, we saw the Canadian red ensign flying with pride and prestige amongst those of the other members of the Pan-American coffee bureau. The presence of these two symbolic emblems of our country made the absence of Canada all the more singular. We began also to wonder why Canada remained absent from such a large body as the organization of American states, when in fact it is a member of some of its specialized organizations. The problem still puzzles me because, after studying in detail the history and scope of the inter-American system, I am still wondering what motivates the absence of our great country from this regional organization.

There are two elements in that question, the inter-American system and Canada. What is the inter-American system? What is its importance in the world of today? What is its value for Canada? At the turn of the nineteenth century, when the winds of independence began to overthrow kingdoms and to tear the flags of the old colonial powers into pieces, the inter-American system was born. It was not meant to be a political doctrine and even less a weapon of domination in the hands of the American nation. On the contrary, the inter-American system was, and still is, an expression of the people's soul in search for freedom and peace under the sign of responsibility and grandeur.

In 1826 Simon Bolivar, the great liberator, called the first inter-American conference, the congress of Panama, which was followed by many others, the last one being the tenth inter-American conference held at Caracas in 1954. This long process of evolution in the relations between the American nations came to a logical and long-sought conclusion when in 1948 the charter of the organization of American states was adopted.

The charter of the organization of American states is not only a legal document binding together the nations of the new world, but it is and must be regarded as a monument erected to the victory of freedom over slavery. It represents the achievement of 150 years of struggle to ensure a climate of happiness, freedom and peace for the generations to come.

The principles of solidarity of the American nations, as conceived and expressed by the charter, are the following:

1. International law and order and good faith shall govern the relation between states.

2. An Act of aggression against one American state is an act of aggression against all other American states.

3. Controversies arising between two or more American states shall be settled by peaceful procedures.

4. Lasting peace and well-being and prosperity of the American peoples are based on political democracy.

In order to implement the basic principles of the organization of American states the following six bodies have been set up: The inter-American conference; the meeting for consultation by ministers of foreign affairs; the council; the Pan-American union; the specialized conferences; and the specialized organizations. Amongst the inter-American bodies which are connected with the organizations of American states there are some in which Canada has already shown a direct interest. By way of example, it might be recalled that the Pan-American institute of geography and history and the permanent executive committee of the inter-American travel congress have reported the valuable contribution made by Canadian delegates and observers toward strengthening the bonds between the countries of our hemisphere. Our co-operation with the inter-American statistical institute has been so close that Ottawa was chosen as the site of its congress in 1954.

I should like to mention also the very important inter-American defence board organized in 1942. While Canada is not a member of this board, the permanent joint defence board formed by Canada and the United States would be the logical extension of the inter-American body on the North American continent. It is within the framework of the inter-American system that the inter-American treaty of reciprocal assistance was conceived and signed at Rio de Janeiro in 1947, the same treaty that later inspired the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which is now the cornerstone of peace in the world. It must be remembered also that the inter-American system has received such a good appraisal it can now be divulged that the U.S.S.R. foreign affairs minister, during the Berlin conference of 1954, hinted that a similar pattern of organization should be adopted for the European states.

In view of all these facts one cannot avoid wondering how it has been possible for Canada to remain outside of this continental organization for so long. The question of Canadian participation in the inter-American system has often been discussed amongst Canadians, and even in this house. I wonder if it is not a good time to re-examine the matter now, three years after the tenth inter-American conference, at which the case of Canada was openly brought to the attention of the delegates by the secretary general of the organization, Dr. Alberto Lleras Camargo. He concluded his report with these words:

> The day is surely not far off when another great state, Canada, the only one not yet a member of the organization but just as American as any other, will take its seat in our councils and share with us the mission that providence appears to have entrusted to man in the new world, to achieve an order of peace and justice.

In two more years the eleventh conference will be held at Quito, and it is very likely that again our absence will be more than noted. It seems to me that it would be proper to reassess our policy and reverse, if necessary, our line of conduct. Why, many people will ask, is not Canada more closely associated with the other American states? Others will bluntly put the question, why does not Canada join the organization of American states?

Both the late prime minister King and the present Prime Minister have expressed views on the participation of Canada in the inter-American system. Back on August 4, 1944, the chief of the Canadian government mentioned that our country had never received an invitation to that body which was meant for republics only. Such an assertion has been clarified since by political writers and corrected by the use of the word "state" instead of "republics" or "nations" in the charter adopted in 1948. A few years later, on March 27, 1953, the present Prime Minister made a similar statement to the effect that—

> So far it has not appeared to us that there would be any decided advantage in a formal membership in the Pan-American union.

It is evident that the attitude of the Canadians who oppose the participation of Canada in the organization of American states is based more or less on the same arguments that had been used by Mr. Vincent Massey and which are quoted even today, even though they have lost most, if not all, of their significance. I even have the impression that in the light of some documents which have been brought to my attention recently, it would not be quite accurate to say that the government of Canada, or at least one of its prime ministers, had not tried to bring our country into the Pan-American union at a certain time.

The objections which are ordinarily mentioned in connection with the participation of Canada in the inter-American system are, first, that the Pan-American union has always been an association for republics only. That objection can no longer be made because in 1948, during the debates of the Bogota conference, the delegates agreed to refer to the countries of the continent as American states in order to avoid the term "republic" and leave the door wide open for Canada to enter.

The second objection has been for a long time that Canada, being a part of the British commonwealth of nations, could not join another organization. Recent history has fully demonstrated the falseness of such an argument, because the idea of joining the United Nations and NATO was sold to the Canadian public without any reference being made to our association with the British commonwealth. The same thing could be repeated regarding the organization of American states.

A third objection is that Canada has not been invited to join the continental organization. Who will believe that if and when Canada expresses a desire to join any international body, there will be objection to it? It is well known that a nation can always hint that she wishes to be invited. On the other hand, we know from different sources that the participation of Canada would be welcome, and the recent unanimous decision taken by the council of the organization of American states to invite Canada to the travel congress in April is an eloquent proof of the good will expressed by the organization of American states.

For the record, it must be recalled that many times in the past our country has shown a direct interest in some organizations and conferences of the inter-American system. To mention just a few; the first Pan-American medical congress in Washington, 1893; the Pan-American road congress, Oakland, California, 1915; the first international congress of history of America, Rio de Janeiro, 1922; the fourth Pan-American congress of architects, Rio de Janeiro, 1930; the postal congress of the Americas and Spain, Panama, 1936; the eleventh Pan-America sanitary conference, Rio de Janeiro, 1942; the inter-American conference on social security, Santiago, Chile, 1942; the second inter-American statistical congress, Bogota, January, 1950; the fifth general assembly of the Pan-American institute of geography and history, Santiago, Chile, October, 1950; the fourth inter-American conference on agriculture, Montevideo, December, 1950; the fourth inter-American travel congress, Lima, April, 1952; the third Pan-American consultation on geography, Washington, July and August, 1952.

More recently, Canada sent its ambassador to Brazil as an official delegate to the economic conference held in Rio de Janeiro in 1954, and we all know that just last spring a cordial invitation was sent to our country to attend two important conferences in Costa Rica, namely, the sixth inter-American travel congress and the inter-American port harbour conference.

I should like to mention also that only recently an exhibition of Canadian artists was held in the patio of the Pan-American union building by a group called Le Rétable, of Joliette, Quebec. According to people who actually saw the exhibition it was one of the finest ever held under the auspices of that continental organization, and it brought only praise and admiration for our artists and our country. If private individuals can sponsor and organize such demonstrations of good will and international friendship, there is no knowing how effective official co-operation would be.

At this stage it might be proper to recall that during his visit to Ottawa the vice-president of Brazil himself expressed the wish of Brazil to see Canada join the organization of American states. Last week, during the Panama conference, with all the American chiefs of state present, President Eisenhower invited all the American states to act in concert within the framework of the organization of American states to advance the welfare and happiness of their citizens. Last week also the Canadian under-secretary of state for external affairs declared during a televised interview that there was no obstacle to the participation of Canada in the organization of American states, and that such a decision rested with the government of Canada alone.

You have probably read also the report of the press conference given by Ambassador Jose Mora on the day this Uruguayan diplomat assumed his new post as secretary general of the organization of American states. On that occasion this well known internationalist said that Canada would always be welcome to the organization of American states, that this continental body is made for all the American states, and that Canada has taken part in inter-American meetings and is still invited to do so. This statement from the highest official of the organization of American states should leave no doubt in our minds about his attitude toward our country.

I have the impression the time has come for a reappraisal of our attitude toward the organization of American states. There are excellent motives supporting the close co-operation of Canada with the continental organization, and I would even go so far as to suggest a full membership in the organization of American states, for the following reasons.

First, there is not the shadow of a doubt that our economic relations would be improved and that our trade with the rest of the continent would be increased if we were using the services and the facilities put at the disposal of its members by the inter-American economic and social council.

Second, the cultural bonds between the Canadian nation and the other peoples of the Americas can only be made better through the good offices of the inter-American cultural council. And when one considers that the real values of our civilization are those that rest upon spiritual and cultural bases we see in the cultural interrelation the best solution to many of the problems affecting the international situation.

Third, there are military reasons which alone would be sufficient to eliminate the strongest opposition because, as we said before, no efforts should be spared to strengthen peace on our continent so we can present this hemisphere as an example to the old world. The participation of Canada in the inter-American defence board would be a significant step in that direction.

Fourth, as far as political reasons are concerned, who would oppose any means of assuring political unity among the nations of the new world? The organization of American states has proved its usefulness in preventing conflicts, and its importance for 21 of the 22 countries of our hemisphere should be a guarantee to Canada of a more responsible role on this continent.

The organization of American states has an outstanding record of peaceful and useful years. By joining the organization of American states Canada would complete the continental unity with the framework of the United Nations, article 51 of whose charter recommends whenever possible the setting up of regional organizations.

We belong already to the United Nations, which covers all the world; we share the responsibilities of the Atlantic nations to NATO; why not at last occupy the vacant chair which has been reserved for Canada ever since the beginning of the inter-American system? The role of Canada in world affairs will be great in the years to come. We know that all over the world present conditions have made it necessary for all the nations to assume their responsibilities and to face the future with hope and confidence. There is no doubt that through adherence to the organization of American states Canada would not only complete the continental solidarity but would at last contribute to the American community of nations her prestige, her experience, her objective approach to world affairs, and in so doing we would enlarge our own horizons in the international field and increase our influence among the other nations of the world.

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Chairman, recognition of the present Peking regime still being under consideration by the government, I would like to express my constituents' views on this matter before this possibility becomes a fact. This would of course be a new if not unforeseen development in our international policy. Anything can happen.

We are living in a fool's paradise where there is talk only of war, military preparation, disintegration of the atom and hydrogen bombs.

There is nothing surprising in all this since, left to itself, humanity is rushing to its doom. God, the only guide capable of enlightening and directing the world has been expelled from the United Nations. No one is willing to admit that human beings have been created in His image and resemblance. When a declaration of human rights was adopted by that august assembly, it was moved by the U.S.S.R., seconded by Great Britain, China and India that His name be removed from section one so as not to hurt the feelings of atheists and unbelievers.

And today, we are thinking of extending the hand of friendship to those who yesterday were butchering our countrymen and who tomorrow will be attempting to bring us under their yoke.

Fear has become the prime mover of our actions and of our alliances, and our politicians are ready to associate with revolutionaries, conspirators, anarchists, with the devil himself if need be, in order to ensure a moment's breathing spell, to enjoy illusory diplomatic victories. Resistance seems akin to treason.

Because of the ignorance, weakness and tolerance of our leaders and of the absence of a firm and clearly defined policy, the prophecies of Lenin will come to pass, possibly sooner than we may imagine. He said:

> First, we will conquer eastern Europe, then the masses of Asia, so as to encircle the United States, last stronghold of capitalism. We will not have to resort to war; that country will fall into our hands like an overripe fruit.

We are lead and pushed along by other countries along paths chosen according to the tastes, ideas and interests of their leaders. Though we may think we are playing an important part in the government of nations we are, in fact, mere puppets manipulated by others for their own purposes.

In the issue of April 2, 1954, of the U.S. News and World Report magazine, it is stated:

> Lester Pearson, representative of the United Nations is to act as "swing man" in a manoeuvre to get communist China an U.N. membership. The play is to vote the Chinese communists a membership in the U.N. assembly where a veto apparently cannot keep them out. The U.N. security council where nationalist China would retain a membership no longer amounts to much because of Russia's use of the veto . . .
> Drums are beating to pay more ransom to aggressors, to invite a bunch of bandits into polite society in the hope of reforming them. Hearts are bleeding among diplomats all around the world for the poor communist Chinese, who are shooting up the neighbourhood. No hearts, however, seem to be bleeding for the Italians, or Germans, or Japanese, or Spaniards who also sit on the outside of world councils, even when stable and peaceful and friendly.

(Translation):

I know, Mr. Chairman, that Spain and Italy became members of the United Nations on December 14, 1955, but nonetheless the report that I just quoted remains significant.

Oddly enough, it was also our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who, at the United Nations, moved the partition of Palestine and the creation of the state of Israel.

Have we thus become the tool of communists and of international jewry, as was written in England?

I say that we will be misled, duped and deceived by the Chinese communists if ever they become our partners because, no matter what our pundits say, we have not the same cards in our hands, we do not understand anything about their way of thinking; their stubbornness and their skill put us off balance and we will also be ridiculed and scoffed at by the Russians because they are more knavish and double-dealing than we are.

In war as in peace, they will remain fundamentally our enemies. Everywhere we will find them in the opposite camp. An example of it is to be found in what happened in the disastrous Korean expedition.

The December 1950 issue of the official bulletin of the Department of External Affairs reported the following, on page 474 of the French edition:

> Chinese Communists Intervene
> In the first week of November, at least three divisions of Chinese Communist troops moved across the Yalu river, together with heavy supplies of arms, equipment and some air support to bolster the shattered remnants of North Korean forces. The Chinese Communists and North Koreans launched a fierce counter-attack which obliged the United Nations command to withdraw from 50 to 100 miles to protect exposed flanks and supply routes.
> In a special communique of November 6, General MacArthur, without identifying the new forces as Chinese, branded this move as "one of the most offensive acts of international lawlessness of historical records". He pointed out that this "new and fresh army" was "backed up by a possibility of large alien reserves . . . Whether and to what extent these reserves will be moved forward to reinforce units now committed remains to be seen and is a matter of the gravest international significance". General MacArthur referred here to an estimated three hundred thousand trained Chinese troops which were reported massed in Manchuria.

Today, one thing is evident: while our soldiers were being killed in Korea, our statesmen were working behind the scenes for the admission of the aggressor among the United Nations council.

Our Secretary of State for External Affairs is an internationalist whose ambition is to unify the North Atlantic community not only from the military standpoint but also from the political, economic, racial and cultural standpoints.

NATO is much more important to Canada than the United Nations and our government is willing to sacrifice on its altars our national sovereignty in exchange for a so-called supernational sovereignty. On the other hand, Russia is opposed and is striving to destroy, if possible, the North Atlantic pact. It would be foolish to believe that China will burn incense before our idols and go against the wishes of its Moscow ally.

The statements of our Prime Minister at Manila and Seoul on his world tour gave rise at the time to strong protests, and I do not believe that public opinion has changed much since.

According to a Canadian Press despatch dated March 10, 1954, a South Korean newspaper expressed the opinion that Prime Minister St. Laurent is one of those who are "becoming the instruments and dupes" of communists.

The Daily Korean Republic took Mr. St. Laurent to task because he stated at Seoul that in his opinion the allies should be realists and recognize communist China.

> According to the Canadian Prime Minister, it would be realistic to accept murder, sickness and banditry simply because those evils are with us . . .

states that newspaper. And it adds:

> The St. Laurents in our midst are actually playing the game of communists when they unconsciously preach a policy of appeasement.

That semi-official newspaper adds:

> The Prime Minister is guilty of the same terrible mistake of communist inspiration when he asserts that the Chinese people accept their communist masters.

It is strangely presumptuous on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to state that the Chinese people wish to be administered, governed, exploited and persecuted by the present communist regime.

On March 20, 1954, The Ensign carried the following item on page 3:

(Text):

> In a declaration issued by Rev. Louis Bouchard, S.J., of the Jesuit Chinese Mission, and co-signed by His Excellency Philippe Cote, S.J., Bishop of Suchow, Msgr. Edgar Larochelle, Superior of Foreign Missions, Rev. François Prudhomme, Clercs of St. Viateur, "stupefaction" was expressed at press dispatches purporting to imply that Canada is considering diplomatic recognition of the red regime over China.
> The declaration of the Rt. Hon. Louis St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, regarding the opportuneness of diplomatic recognition of red China has caused stupefaction.
> Mr. St. Laurent could not have said what was reported. He has too much esteem for the people of his own province and too much dignity to join his voice to those who act in a way which would make Catholic Canada blush for generations.
> It is to calumny the people of China to say that they desire the communist government. This has been proved by the prisoners at Panmunjom who have abandoned all, country, family and home and have proclaimed to all the world, even to the materialist world, which understands little of the sacrifices involved, that the real China does not desire communist rule.

As a matter of fact, 90 per cent of the Chinese prisoners in Korea chose to go to Formosa rather than return to their communist-controlled mainland home.

For many years missionaries have watched communism making inroads in China, due to the complicity of lies which prepared western betrayal. One heard then that the Chinese communists were not like other communists. False hopes were spread that there would be a break with Moscow, which has never occurred. All has been sacrificed to prepare for the ascendancy of a red tyranny in China. That the missionaries know.

The missionaries were not listened to when they proclaimed to all the world through their sufferings, their devotions, their years in prison, that China does not want a communist government, that the Chinese abhor red tyranny . . .

This those who calumny the Chinese people know, and this the Rt. Hon. Mr. St. Laurent cannot be ignorant of.

The missionaries could say much more about trade with communist China and the shame that is involved. But today they only want to testify of their own deep sorrow and the suffering of the Chinese people, crushed, imprisoned and herded into concentration camps.

The missionaries want to stress the deep pain of the abandoned people when they will learn that the west has sided against them and with their executioners. The missionaries must make this declaration in conscience before the Chinese people, namely, that they cannot be a party to the people's betrayal.

Mgr. Philippe Côté, a Jesuit who lived in China for 25 years, who was kept prisoner for 20 months by the Chinese communists, whose testimony is certainly worth that of a tourist who flew over the clouds of Asia or visited only a couple of cities, stated in a lecture given in Quebec two years ago that, of more than 500 million Chinese, hardly two million were genuine communists.

That means that the great mass of the population are under Red dictatorship.

On the 23 of the same month, the Montreal Gazette reported under the title:

(Text):

Atom bomb death preferred to reds, missionary claims. Rev. Alphonse Caouette of the foreign missions society returning here after 17 years Roman Catholic missionary work in China, said last week-end many Chinese would prefer even the foreign yoke of Japan to the present communist "slave state".

"There are many who go so far as looking to the atom bomb as the only remedy for all the present ills, even if it should mean their deaths", Father Caouette said.

"These people are profoundly conservative and justly proud of their past. Those who believe that one may snatch from a people its beliefs, its philosophy, its habits of thousands of years to give them a Utopia are making a big mistake. The Marxist giant has overthrown the traditions and the liberties which were dearest to the people, most of whom live under a reign of terror and nervous tension harder to bear than death. Suicide has become an everyday affair. Prisons and political lives have the biggest roles in China today.

During the past years, Mr. Chairman, Chinese in Canada who have relatives in China have been blackmailed by the reds for large sums of money, with their relatives held as hostages. Likewise, our missionaries in China have been tortured, jailed and thrown out by the red regime. And in Korea the Chinese reds have slaughtered tens of thousands of Canadian, British, American and other U.N. boys. Now, before the blood is dry on their hands, the reds are directing further aggression and bloodshed in southeast Asia. As a reward for this savagery and butchery, our statesmen lend their voices and extend their hands not to the poor and persecuted but to the oppressor. To me it is significant that the group which is pressing for recognition of red China in this house is once again the socialists.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North again this afternoon asked for recognition of red China. On January 17 the hon. member for Mackenzie pressed the matter, as will be found at page 183 of Hansard. Despite the fact that the members of the C.C.F. party profess antagonism to the communists, I note that repeatedly they are making proposals which could only be helpful to communist nations. Let not our generation be accused before history of making friends with the torturers and butchers, while abandoning the oppressed to their fate. Let us be realistic.

It was not until the United States officially recognized and granted diplomatic privileges to the Kremlin in 1933 that the reds were able to open up an embassy in Washington and consulate offices across the United States, which were then used to organize and direct espionage against the United States, just as Igor Gouzenko revealed the reds were doing in Canada. Did this recognition benefit America? Not a bit. But it did lend prestige to the reds; it did discourage and dishearten the oppressed multitudes and advance the opportunities and facilities for communist espionage inside America.

Recognition of red China today by Canada would allow this red regime to open an embassy in Ottawa and consulate offices across Canada, which could then be used to coerce and intimidate loyal Chinese in Canada and to organize Chinese red fifth columns inside our borders. Let us ever remember that agreements with communists are not worth the paper they are written on. They are binding only upon us; they tie only our hands.

Communist teachings leave no doubt that communist leaders do not believe that communist and non-communist countries can exist side by side; one or the other must conquer. These teachings also make it clear that any agreements made by communists, or the apparent withdrawal from any position they have taken up, are regarded as tactics necessary for ultimately furthering the general communist offensive.

Once the west faces the fact that it is engaged in war, it surely becomes obvious that its first offensive move should be to refuse to continue to give the communists a false status by recognizing them as the genuine representatives of the Russian and other peoples. The immediate breaking of all diplomatic relations with the communist governments would be a major psychological victory for the west, particularly if it used every avenue to tell the peoples of communist-dominated countries why this step had been taken.

The Soviet union and the people's republic of China maintain extensive economic relations in all spheres of the economy. The U.S.S.R. supplies China with equipment for iron and steel, mining, engineering, chemical and other industries, as well as farm machinery and other equipment and materials. China, in her turn, ships to the U.S.S.R. great amounts of various manufactured goods and agricultural products. There has been a marked increase in the Soviet union's share of Chinese foreign trade. It has grown from 23·3 per cent in 1950 to 41·6 per cent last year.

An agreement on scientific and technical co-operation between the U.S.S.R. and the Chinese people's republic was signed in 1954, in accordance with which the two countries have undertaken to exchange technical documents and pertinent information, to send experts to render technical assistance, and to study the scientific and technical achievements of the two countries. This agreement was a new, important contribution to the cause of strengthening economic and cultural relations between the U.S.S.R. and China.

(Translation):

Here then are two fellow travellers professing the same political ideology, furthering the same ideal, united and associated in peace as well as in war and determined not to lose face before the rest of the world.

Let us be cautious and, before we recognize red China, let us ask ourselves if many Asiatic countries are prepared to believe that the western world is serious in its struggle against communism and would not barter its great, inspiring and noble principles of justice, freedom and the given word when powerful material interests are at stake.

It must be realized that the U.S.S.R. has never considered international conferences and negotiations,—whether it is an international conference of the Red Cross or the negotiations such as those which took place at Berlin and Geneva,—as a means to settle international problems but rather as hustings for propaganda or as a psychological weapon. Up to now, through a technique of repetition and a rhetoric of sabotage, the U.S.S.R. has exhausted its opponents in the diplomatic game, not because they were the weakest but because they were the more civilized and the more sincere, and after all, were genuinely in quest of peace. With communism, it is fatal to believe that there might be community of ideal or identity of means. They do not even speak the same language.

By its technique of repetition, the U.S.S.R. has succeeded in worrying us with the question of the recognition of red China.

To be a realist is to understand that, in giving recognition to red China, we accept the verdict of violence in Asia. To be a realist is to understand that the recognition of red China would give the U.S.S.R. its greatest diplomatic victory since Yalta, that it could even be the Yalta of the East. Finally, to be a realist, is to realize that the recognition of the U.S.S.R., some time ago, has done nothing for the peace of the world and that tomorrow, the recognition of red China will not likely bring anything more.

If, in the interest of our commerce, we must gain the sympathy, the esteem and the friendship of the Chinese usurpers, our Secretary of State for External Affairs could suggest to Great Britain to offer Hong Kong to Mao Tse-tung. To foster relations with communists, to speak of a communist regime with the same indifference as one speaks of any other political system, shows a truly astounding lack of realism.

We must show the same love for the American and for the Chinese, for the British citizen as for the Soviet . . .

Writes Dr. Endicott, high priest of the Canadian reds. As for me, I say with Meany, president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O.:

Don't go soft on communism.

To look for the good points of the communist regime has unfortunately become the obsession of some of our leftist intellectuals and some of our public officials. Associations have even been created to promote friendship between Canada and Russia. On the other hand, the attitude of the government towards the defenders of the individual, of law and of christianity is incomprehensible and equivocal.

We loathe the past and present methods of the Franco regime.

That statement was made by Canada's representatives at the political and security committee of the general assembly of the United Nations.

Such is the profession of faith of the government towards one of the nations of the world whose sons fought and died to prevent communism from taking root in their country.

We must not send an ambassador to the Vatican, because that could give a cerebral hemorrhage to sectarian Orangemen of our country, but let us send a representative to Mao Tse-tung, that beloved child of Bulganin and of the socialists, if circumstances are favourable.

It is a queer policy that would have us become friends and partners of our past and future aggressors, of enemies of peace, order and the maintenance of the economic system under which we live.

We should not become the allies of those who wish to hold sway over us, and would like us to become propagandists and unconscious supporters of a doctrine which is contrary to our mentality, our ideal and our creed.

Our drafters of treaties are no longer satisfied with coexistence; they want cohabitation.

I say that a Christian and Catholic nation like ours cannot honestly live under the same roof as communist China and red Russia. One must not flirt with death.

(Text):

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Chairman, may I first of all congratulate the minister on a very fine introductory speech on the opening of his estimates. It was presented with thoughtfulness and clarity which made it a pleasure indeed to hear. I enter into this debate with the diffidence with which I always enter into a discussion of external affairs, because it always seems to me to be rather a specialist's task. However, we all have views on certain subjects, and perhaps I may be forgiven for presenting mine.

I am sure we are all impressed in the world today with the enormous cost of armaments; yet that cost is almost entirely due to one country, namely Russia. If it were not for the policies of Russia we could reduce our armaments and turn that money to useful purposes. Russia has been a dictatorship for so long now and her ambitions have been so apparent for so long that we take for granted this enormous expense and this cold warfare which has been going on for many years.

I suppose Russia could be considered the greatest dictatorship in the history of the world. Not only is it the greatest dictatorship but it is the most efficient, the most ruthless and the most immoral one. There are people who tend to regard Russia as a homogeneous state. As any student of history realizes, Russia is not a homogeneous state but is composed of a large number of states, many of which were taken by conquest or by craft and have been kept under dictatorship in some cases for centuries. I refer particularly to the Ukraine.

The Ukraine, which has been integrated by the Russian government into Russia, was always a separate state at heart, with separate customs, separate language and separate religion. There is a tendency on the part of the Russian government to try to give the impression—and many people believe it—that the Ukraine is an integral part of Russia and wishes to be an integral part of Russia. I merely wish to point out that the Ukraine never wished to be part of Russia, does not wish to be part of Russia, and would give anything on earth to be free of the Russian yoke.

I would also refer to one of the most immoral things that has happened in history, namely the seizure of Poland by the Russian army. It was definitely part of the agreement among the allies that all countries occupied by the allies would be given back their responsible government and freedom as soon as hostilities ceased. The act of treachery by which the Russians walked into Poland and have occupied it, despite its separate government, has been one of the most barefaced pieces of skulduggery that has been performed in our time.

I think what has happened recently in Poland would indicate how anxious the people are to be free of the oppressor. That has been a terrible thing. It was unfortunate in its results. It is the type of thing that reassures people that decency is not dead in countries where they have dictatorships and where they are kept down, but that people still have freedom in their hearts and that, given any type of opportunity, they will express themselves.

It is difficult to see where the possibility of freedom lies in these countries. First of all, the Ukraine has been integrated economically into Russia for so long that it is difficult to see how the people will ever attain their freedom. It is difficult to see how they can get rid of the government in Poland which is obviously supported not by the people of Poland but by the armies of Russia. However, I am convinced of one thing, and history tells us this. Evil cannot endure forever. Eventually something happens. People are intrinsically decent and they do not intend in the long run, to permit the endurance of an evil thing.

I also say this, and I think I speak for everyone in this house. The people of Canada will never, under any circumstances, condone these tyrannies and, given any opportunity to see that they are abolished, they will certainly take that opportunity.

Mr. Lusby: Mr. Chairman, the remarks I wish to make are based on a growing conviction that if there is to be any real and enduring peace between the communist and the non-communist blocs, a key factor will have to be the Russian people themselves, as distinct from the government. During the past year we have seen an apparent subsidence of the open tensions between the Soviet union and the west, and of the immediate danger of a major armed conflict. This development, however, has not been accompanied by any lessening in the delicacy and complexity of international problems with which we must cope. On the contrary, I think it can truly be said that never before have those problems been more complicated, more thorny and more baffling than they are today. Never before has it proved more difficult to assess and evaluate them with accuracy, and to decide upon a wise course of action to adopt in relation to them.

Such a situation, Mr. Chairman, lends increasing importance to the role of the Department of External Affairs in the multitudinous functions of our government, and in such times all Canadians may congratulate themselves—and I am sure all thinking Canadians do so—upon the fact that we have at the head of that department, guiding its policies and its administration with a far-seeing eye and strong, experienced hand, such an outstanding statesman as the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Of him it is no exaggeration to say that his reputation has become world-wide. The neutral nations trust him as they do few other western leaders, and even the communist bloc pays him the tribute of a real, if somewhat grudging, respect. But it is of course in his own country and among our allied democracies that his talents are most widely esteemed and put to effective use. Evidence of this is his appointment by the North Atlantic Council as one of the special committee of three constituted to advise on ways and means of fostering NATO co-operation in non-military fields and developing greater unity within the Atlantic group of nations. In that capacity the minister will have need to exercise all his exceptional abilities to the full. This committee came into being, as I understand it, largely as a result of the emergence on the international scene of one of the most intricate and perplexing problems ever to trouble the dreams of western statesmen; that is, the far-reaching shift by the U.S.S.R. in the strategy and tactics of its continuing, unrelenting campaign to destroy us.

This shift did not begin within the past year. It probably had its inception soon after the communists realized their inability to achieve their aims in Korea. I do not agree with those who say the shift was completed within the past year, but I think it could be said it was in 1955 that it became clearly patent. Against the former merely military threat, in what now in some respects might almost be called the good old days, our policy was relatively simple, consisting primarily of maintaining our armed strength at an adequate level to discourage or repel attack by any hostile force or forces. It is evident that, as has been said on several occasions this afternoon, for all the apparent lessening of tension on the grand scale, for all the Soviet disclaimers of warlike purpose, for all the conferences on disarmament, we must still base our policies on the premise that the Russian professions of peaceful intent are not to be taken at face value. The military threat still exists and could again at any time become overt. We must, therefore, keep up our guard.

But apart from that, we are now faced with a change in Russian aggressive tactics. Make no mistake; they are still fully aggressive. Now, behind an assumed front of democracy and good will, the U.S.S.R. schemes to weaken and destroy us by economic competition. First, taking in a sense a leaf from our own book, it will strive to outdo us in the matter of economic assistance, promised or actual, to the undeveloped countries of the earth. Coupled with political machinations, subtle or not so subtle, in the Middle East, Asia, Africa and every other area where the prospect of fomenting unrest and even open conflict seems most promising, the Soviet plan, unless it can be effectively checkmated, poses a real and pressing danger that many countries friendly to the west, or at least neutral, may be imperceptibly wooed away from us, perhaps even directly into the hostile camp. I think the process has already shown its sinister possibilities. In fact I believe the present ominous situation at Suez is very much in point. By the sale of arms to Egypt, coupled with what amounted to little more than a vague indication of willingness to extend economic aid to that country, the communist bloc has been instrumental in touching off a chain of events now involving the west in an imbroglio of the first magnitude.

But in the long perspective I think there is an even more alarming threat inherent in the Soviet shift in strategy. The U.S.S.R. is,

I am convinced, bent upon a long-range course of cutthroat economic competition designed to cripple and destroy the western democracies by ruining the vast export trade on which so much of the strength, stability and prosperity of those democracies depends. As yet this danger is perhaps little more than incipient, a cloud looming upon the far horizon. The U.S.S.R. is not today among the foremost competitors in international commerce, at least not beyond the iron curtain. But if the Russians come even close to their announced goals of industrial development—and they boast that within seven years they will equal the United States in industrial output—then in a comparatively brief space of time they will be in a formidable competitive position, not only to outvie the west in economic aid to backward countries—as to which their contributions so far have been more promises than performance—but even to cut deeply, ruinously, into the export markets of the democracies throughout the world.

We can no longer comfort ourselves with the delusion which not so long ago was widely and naively held, that the Russian is a backward type with slight mechanical aptitude, congenitally unfitted to attain the technical, scientific and engineering skills and efficiency of the west. Now we view with a great deal of alarm the output, both in quality and quantity, of Soviet technicians, engineers and scientists. We admit, as we must, that the years since the last war have seen astounding strides in Russia's industrial development; that the gap between her attained standards of efficiency of industrial production and those of the west has narrowed greatly, and in all probability will continue to close. Such a situation leaves us no room for complacency on our part. If Russia once attains a near equality of industrial efficiency, coupled with its vast natural resources, the Soviet union will enjoy an immense advantage over us in competing for the markets of the world, provided that it continues to possess, as it now does, an almost limitless reservoir of cheap labour.

We in the west are committed, and rightly so, to the principle that the worker is worthy of his hire and is entitled to a full, fair share of that which he produces. Our whole economic structure, with its prevailing high standards of living, has that as one of its foundation stones. Our goal, toward which we have advanced far, is prosperity for all and not for a mere favoured few. By contrast, the Russian working force remains very much a pawn in the grandiose plan of world domination which still animates the hierarchy in Moscow. The sacrifices of the people have provided and will, according to that plan, continue to provide to whatever extent may be necessary the capital for Russia's development and expansion, both industrially and militarily, and for the steps she is now taking to implement that plan on the economic front. The cheap labour of her toiling millions could prove a decisive weapon in the projected war of markets.

It is my belief, Mr. Chairman, that if the undoubtedly dynamic powers of the Russian industrial economy, existing and potential, were directed to their only really legitimate objective, the material advancement of the Russian people themselves, rather than toward the ends of that obsession of world mastery which the men in the Kremlin show no concrete evidence of abandoning, we should have comparatively little to fear economically from the U.S.S.R. for generations, if ever.

The full economic development of the vast land mass of Russia, coupled with the raising of the standards of living of her people to a level at least in some degree comparable with that generally obtaining in the more prosperous countries of the west, and the supplying of the almost limitless internal demand for goods and services thereby created, would absorb the industrial energies of the Soviet union for the next half century or more. The normal expansion of its foreign trade which might be expected to accompany this development, based on accepted economic principles, and based perhaps on expanding mutually profitable business contacts with the west, would offer no such threat to us as does the open, ruthless, cutthroat commercial warfare which Moscow seems to have presently in mind.

A prospering people is not a war-minded people. With a rapid and steady improvement in their standard of living, the Russian people would, in my opinion, grow increasingly averse to any aggressive policies or actions of their masters toward the outer world. The U.S.S.R. might well become eventually even an influence for peace and stability, its present subversive role forgotten. That, of course, is indeed looking far ahead.

It is undoubtedly true, as I have mentioned, that the Soviet union has made substantial advances in industrial and economic development. It is equally true that there has already been a real betterment in the over-all living standards of its people. The men in the Kremlin, as a matter of self-interest, have been shrewd enough to see to that, and certainly there are few signs of any serious threat in the U.S.S.R. today, whatever the situation may be in the satellite states, where obviously different considerations apply. I might say here that I am mindful of what was said by the hon. member for Parkdale with regard to the Ukraine, and I fully agree with all that he said. None the less, I do not think, looking over the whole extent of the U.S.S.R., it can be said that there is any unrest in that country today seriously threatening its existing system of government. It may well be that many of the Russian proletariat, having in mind the poverty of the past, count themselves among the favoured of the earth. Yet such an attitude must be based largely, I suggest, upon the ignorance of the Russian people with regard to the material achievements of the west. They do not know how far they still lag behind their western counterparts in material well-being. They do not realize that a concentration of the immense potential capacities of their country upon domestic problems, upon internal improvement and development, and upon their own advancement, could speed to them, the people, within their lifetime, benefits of which they have yet hardly dreamed. Conversely, they do not realize that the diversion of much of those capacities toward conflict, economic or otherwise, with the west must largely postpone such benefits for decades, even if it does not involve all mankind in irretrievable ruin.

If one could bring home those considerations to the Russian people and dispel the fear so skilfully fostered in them that the west harbours hostile designs against them—and certainly that fear must be dispelled if the shadow of war is to be permanently banished from the earth—I believe that the wish for peace and for the abandonment of all forms of external aggression in favour of the internal development of their own country for their own good would become so compelling a force, even upon the iron totalitarianism of the Kremlin, that their masters would hardly dare do otherwise than lead them in the direction they wish to take. After all, the great majority of the Russian people is not numbered in the fanatic communist party; and though they may be, as I say, reasonably content with their form of government, having known none better, they do share the common longing of common folk for peace and plenty. Deep, too, within them must lie the unquenchable human instinct for freedom.

That it would be highly desirable to bring about a closer understanding between the Russian people and those of the west is certainly no novel idea. Hitherto, however, by means of the iron curtain, the men of the Kremlin have succeeded admirably—perhaps "notably" is a better word—in insulating the Russian masses from knowledge of the west, and exposing them only to such evil propaganda as they would have them hear.

[Mr. Lusby.]

It seems to me, however, that the present shift in communist strategy from military pressure to economic warfare gives rise to two conclusions, or rather gives rise to a conclusion and presents an opportunity.

First, in view of what I have said, it emphasizes and renders more urgent, as a means of defeating that strategy, the desirability and importance, which has long been given background recognition, of the spreading throughout Russia of a better knowledge and understanding of the west, both of our pacific intentions and of the material progress and well-being of our peoples. Our achievements in the latter respect, though neither complete nor perfect, would come, I suggest, as a revelation to the Russian masses, as would the degree of freedom possessed by the individual under our present system of government.

Second, the new Moscow strategy, as I see it, unavoidably offers to the west an opening for the propagation of such knowledge and understanding. In this regard, we can do comparatively little by way of direct action against Soviet restrictions. I question that radio broadcasts and the like, though they no doubt have their place, impinge greatly upon the consciousness of the Russian populace. But the current Kremlin policy of economic warfare, now concentrated on the wooing of the uncommitted nations by promises, implemented or not, of material aid, later to take the form of a campaign to capture the export markets of the west, involves first of all the securing of the political confidence of those countries with which closer business and other ties are sought. The lamb does not play, or trade, with the obvious wolf. Therefore the wolf must assume sheep's clothing which, in this case, is the trappings of liberty and democracy.

There has been much speculation as to the reasons underlying the uprooting of Stalinism in the U.S.S.R., with all its easily foreseeable risks of shaking the confidence of the Russian people in the present regime. To my mind, at least one cogent reason is not far to seek. The shift of the campaign against the west from the military to the political and economic fields required that the U.S.S.R. pose as a true democracy before those states it seeks to beguile into closer commercial and political association.

Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Lusby: Now, certainly no avowed apostle of Stalin could be mistaken, even by the most gullible, for a democrat. Therefore the cult of the dead dictator must be, to all seeming, eradicated root and branch and his former followers and sycophants must essay the hazardous expedient of recanting their errors without fatally jeopardizing their posts of power and their hold upon the confidence of the Russian people and of communist cells abroad.

To this exacting task they have applied all their usual diabolical cunning, but it has necessarily led to a considerable—and no doubt reluctant—relaxation of restrictions at home, as well as to sweeping alterations in the face they present to the outer world. There are many signs that the Russian people are being accorded a somewhat wider, if still pitiably slight, freedom of travel, of discussion, even perhaps of criticism. The power of the secret police is less in evidence. Visits of foreigners, not only those in official positions, such as our Minister of Fisheries, but even of tourists, to Russia are becoming commonplace, as are those of groups, carefully selected, of course, of Russian citizens abroad.

All this, mark you, implies no effective undermining of that castle of absolute autocracy wherein Khruschchev, the implacable, still sits enthroned, though latterly with as little ostentation as possible. But in maintaining even such a semblance of democratic ways it seems to me the government of the U.S.S.R. lays itself open to various pressures from the west which it can withstand only at the price of revealing the falsity of its pretenses.

The present trend—which of course may be reversed at any time and is at best unstable, as Khrushchev's occasionally verbal outburst against the west indicates—is for the Kremlin to profess a love of freedom and peace, an eagerness for friendly relations, trade and co-operation with all the outer world. These things are utterly inconsistent with the maintenance of the iron curtain in all its impenetrability. Surely then with adroitness and ingenuity western diplomacy may succeed in wringing from the Soviet's rulers, while they continue to wear their present mask of democracy, concessions in the raising of that curtain in many ways.

I suggest that the United Nations offers a most useful forum for such efforts. The shift in strategy of the U.S.S.R. leaves, shall we say, a chink in its political and diplomatic armour which, skilfully exploited, may lead to many chinks in the iron curtain, each of which may in turn prove embarrassing to the Kremlin. Perhaps I should interpolate here and say that I am not referring to Russia's relations with red China.

I submit that it should be a major aim of our diplomacy to take advantage of the opening given by the change in Soviet strategy to press in every way possible for the further and speedier lifting of the iron curtain, for the underlying purpose of affording to the Russian people a wider knowledge of the west. The task will not be an easy one; many overtures to that end will meet with refusal. But even refusals may provide useful ammunition for demonstrating the fundamental falsity of the Kremlin's democratic pose, and for this reason we may hope for compliance with at least a modicum of any proposals made. If in the end our efforts enable the Russian people to acquire a wider knowledge and understanding of the west, of its aims, its liberties, its peaceful purposes, the material standards of its workers, I believe the benefits will be incalculable on both sides, leading ultimately, as I have suggested, to the abandonment or at least the curtailment of the projected Soviet economic offensive against the west in favour of a program of internal development, to the primary advantage of the Russian people themselves.

I submit that a most vigorous and unceasing prosecution of policies designed to bring about such a wider knowledge and understanding of the west among the common folk of the U.S.S.R. is at this time well worth thought, effort and money. I am glad to present my views here in the presence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for I know of none better qualified than he to plan and implement such a program.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Zaplitny: I realize that the committee is anxious to make all possible progress in view of the lateness of the session, and I happen to be in the happy position of being able to accommodate the committee in that respect, because a great deal of what I had intended to say has been more ably said by my colleague from Winnipeg North and also by other members who have taken part in the debate. However, there are one or two matters of a general nature that I wish to raise, and I think this is the appropriate place to do so.

First I should like to say how pleased I was to hear of the great support from all sides of the house at this time for the principle of self-determination for all the nations of the world. It is of particular significance to me, because about two years ago I had the pleasure of raising that question in a speech in this chamber, and the developments that have taken place since have, I think, confirmed what I had to say at that time. I have heard today and on other occasions in this house what I consider to be a very sound approach to this whole problem with which we are faced in respect of the Soviet union and its influence on Europe and on the world. I believe that as long as this nation and other nations of what we call the democratic west stand firmly for the principles of freedom, democracy and self-determination, much of the smokescreen of propaganda that comes out of the Kremlin will in time clear away, and the people will be able to see clearly that these nations are the ones to look to if we are going to make any progress toward peace.

During the course of this debate and on previous occasions various party leaders have made statements with regard to the principle of self-determination. Only this afternoon the hon. member for Fraser Valley quoted in part a speech that was delivered by his leader in the city of Winnipeg a few weeks ago. On other occasions the Leader of the Opposition has placed statements on the record, and I think it is only fair that I should at this time place on the record part of the statement of my own leader having to do with that particular matter. It was on the same occasion as that referred to by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, and I have the honour of reading that statement to the Canadian congress which took place in the city of Winnipeg on July 7. This is in relation to this whole question of self-determination of nations. In part the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said:

> We are in full support of the principles underlying the United Nations—an organization in which I played my part as a Canadian delegate in San Francisco in 1945. We are fully in support of the principles set forth in the Atlantic charter, which acknowledges the right to freedom and self-determination for all the nations of the world.
> We are, therefore, in full sympathy with the desire of the Ukrainian people to achieve freedom and sovereignty for their nation and for the enjoyment of a progressive, democratic society which could live in peace with the other freedom-loving nations of the world.

I place that on record so it may be alongside the other statements that were made today.

In a general way, I must say that I agreed with the statement made by the minister this morning, but he did make one statement which I think should not be left on the record without comment at this time. He may not have meant to leave that impression, but at any rate the impression I received was not a good one. It was in connection with some of the difficulties arising out of relations with the Soviet union. This is only part of the sentence as I wrote it down, and the full sentence will appear on the record, but he referred to the "Slavic tradition of autocratic rule". I understand the minister is a historian in his own right and he is, of course, a diplomat of high note in this world, but I think that on reflection he will realize that that is a generalization which is not only historically inaccurate but from a diplomatic point of view rather dangerous.

When I heard that statement I took the trouble to look up the Encyclopaedia Britannica in order to establish in my mind just what the word "Slav" refers to. I find that the people or race referred to as Slavs are certainly not confined within the borders of the Soviet union, to begin with, and, second, that not all the people confined within the borders of the Soviet union are of Slavic origin. If the minister will take a look at page 789 of the Encyclopaedia Britannica he will find that there are actually three different groups of what are known generally as Slavs. There is the eastern group, which takes in the Russians and Finns. There is the northwestern group, which includes Poles, what were known in the old days as Ruthenians and later as Ukrainians, and Moravians and certain other smaller groups; as a matter of fact, that group runs right into central Germany. Then there is the southern group, including Serbo-Croats, Bulgarians, Roumanians and people from the Balkan peninsula generally, going into southern Hungary and as far as Albania.

I mention this because I think it is always a danger to generalize. To speak of the tradition of autocratic rule of the Slavs is, I think, to overlook a great deal of history. I should like to refer the minister to what was said by William Henry Chamberlin, who was a correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor in the Soviet union for a period of about 12 years, I believe, from 1922 on. Certainly he would have had a very fair opportunity to acquaint himself with these so-called Slavs to whom the minister referred. If you look at page 6 of this book called "The Ukraine: A Submerged Nation", you will find this paragraph:

> One of the finest traits in the Ukrainian national character, a trait that is commemorated in some of the most powerful verses of Shevchenko, is the love of liberty. The Ukrainian heroes of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were the Kozaks, the warrior frontiersmen who fled from the yoke of Polish squire or Russian landlord and founded their wild, free military community "beyond the rapids", on the lower Dnieper. They went on expeditions, half-crusading, half-marauding, against Turks and Tartars, liberating large numbers of Christians who were held in slavery. They were unwilling to bow to any despotic authority, either of Polish king or of Russian tsar or of the big landed Polish aristocrats. They were quick to rebel against their own elected "atamans", or military chiefs, if they found the latter guilty of oppression or of treason.

That goes back to the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. I do not know how far we have to go back to establish tradition, but certainly that is not the tradition of a people that can be referred to as having the tradition of autocratic rule. That does not refer only to Ukranians but refers equally to other so-called Slavic people. Every opportunity people in that area of Europe have had to establish or discover democracy and freedom as we understand it in our nation, they have used; and they have made a heroic effort to win that freedom.

It is true, of course, that they have experienced autocratic rule and they are still experiencing it, and in that respect I agree with the minister when he states that once the spirit of freedom begins to gain momentum in the nations under the domination of the Soviet union, no one knows where it may lead.

In this respect I am perhaps more optimistic and hopeful than some members of the house, when I state that in my opinion the time is not very far off when we will be seeing some great developments in that respect. While in some quarters the industrial and economic progress now being made in the Soviet union is looked upon with a certain amount of fear and apprehension by western nations, to me it represents a great challenge and a great opportunity because, as I think the minister will agree, economic freedom and political freedom thrive equally as well in the same climate, and if the people of that huge part of Europe get a taste of economic progress, their natural desire will be to free themselves politically and to live under a democratic system as do most of the other nations of the world. I believe it will not be long before big developments will be taking place both within the Soviet union itself and among the satellite nations.

The reason we sometimes get the impression that it is almost a hopeless cause for these people to rise up politically and cast off the yokes of dictatorship which hold them is, of course, that we receive a filtered version of what is actually going on in that nation. But we do know on the basis of history, on the basis of experience, on the basis of information which is not generally found in the newspapers, that there is a great deal more thinking, planning and discussing going on, particularly among the younger people in the Soviet union, than we give them credit for. I firmly believe that there is a strong, militant spirit for democracy and freedom within the borders of that empire which is going to burst forth into big developments before we are many years older. What form it will take it is not for us, of course, to know at the present time.

I have already quoted the opinion expressed by Mr. Chamberlain, which sets out something of the tradition of those people referred to as the Slavic race. I also want to place on the record now certain views expressed by Mr. John A. Armstrong in a book published in 1945 by the Columbia University Press of New York entitled "Ukrainian Nationalism 1939-1945" in which, after having made a study of the history of the nationalism of the Ukraine, he sets out something of the more recent efforts of the people of that nation. I think it would be useful to have it on the record because unfortunately there are some people in Canada and elsewhere who have the impression at times that this spirit of nationalism, this effort to win independence for subjugated nations, is largely led by a group of reactionaries who are out to regain sovereignty for their own personal prestige. There is an impression abroad that the nationalist movements are led by reactionaries.

Potentially or possibly that is sometimes the case, but it is certainly not the case so far as the Ukraine is concerned. I should like to refer hon. members to Mr. Armstrong's book in which he sets out a number of statements made as recently as 1944 by a conference of various groups and organizations in the Ukraine whose common object that this does not represent the views of a particular political party but represents the collective views of people who were hoping that under some circumstances they could set up their old republic based on certain principles. Here, as found in Mr. Armstrong's book, are some of the principles set before that conference and adopted by it:

(a) Assurance of popular democratic procedures in the accomplishment of the political development of the Ukrainian state by the general assembly of the people.

(b) Assurance of freedom of thought . . . and of belief.

(c) Assurance of the development of the Ukrainian national culture.

(d) Assurance of a just social order in the Ukrainian state, free of exploitation of classes and suppression.

(e) Assurance of the rule of law in practice, and of the equality of all citizens before the law in the Ukrainian state.

(f) Assurance of civil rights for all national minorities in the Ukraine.

(g) Assurance of the right of equal educational opportunities for all citizens.

(h) Assurance of free initiative in creative economic activity, regulated by the requirements and needs of the entire nation.

Then there are further principles along the same line. I place this on record to point out that far from being a race or group of people who have had no contest or have had less contact with the spirit of democracy and democratic procedures, we find that as recently as 1944, after many years of subjugation and lack of opportunity to develop these principles, an ad hoc conference is called in the midst of war at which principles are set out which I think could safely be incorporated in its platform by any of the political parties represented in this house. Certainly neither the minister nor I would think there was anything in the principles I have cited that would not find its place in our respective parties.

In other words, we have to realize that in that part of the world there is a large mass of people whose desires, whose principles, whose ideologies are in very close relationship to those existing in this very country or in Great Britain, the United States, France or any of the western democracies. Once we realize that I think it will become much more clear to us how great our opportunity is and how important it is at every opportunity, whether through the United Nations or through various diplomatic channels, to stand firm for the principle of self-determination and for the freedom of all nations.

In that respect I should like to put on the record one more quotation from a book by a man who has done a great deal of research to give hope and encouragement not only to people of Ukrainian origin but to people of various racial origins who find themselves without a nation at this time, or whose nation is under the domination of the Soviet union. That man is Professor Clarence Manning, who is a familiar figure on the Canadian scene and is associate professor of Slavic languages at Columbia University. In a book he wrote recently entitled "Ukraine Under the Soviets" he had this to say in his concluding paragraph:

> There is only one thing certain. Before the United Nations can function as it was intended, its members must be independent states and peoples. That means that the Ukrainian representatives must be free representatives of a free Ukraine who can contribute their part to the common welfare. In one way or another, that must come and the Muscovite domination must be ended. May it come soon and in a peaceful manner! Then, with that will come of necessity the ending of the process, the restoration of liberty to the countries within the iron curtain and the possibility of the co-operation of men for the elimination of suffering, want, injustice and fear and the opening of a new and enlightened period in human history.

Of course the process to which he refers here is the continuous process of Soviet imperialist expansion. These are the kind of statements, whether they are made by such men as Professor Manning, whether they are made in this chamber by various representatives of the different parties or in the United States congress or anywhere else in the world, that represent the kind of encouragement and the kind of bedrock of hope which are deeply appreciated by people whose nations have been subjugated by the Soviet dictatorship. That is the kind of thing we can do without resort to violence in order to keep alive that spark of hope and the principles for which these people stand. As long as we stand firm on those principles and use every available opportunity, through the established channels of the United Nations and our free parliaments, to give that kind of encouragement and to make our stand positive and clear, I believe we shall win the respect and friendship of those many millions, of whom approximately 40 million are Ukrainians and millions are of other races, all of whom are represented in one way or another by people who have come to this country. I believe that in this way we shall win their friendship and respect and that we shall have, in my opinion, the best possible alliance so far as our own security is concerned in this country.

I firmly believe that the time is going to come, and soon, when the Soviet union itself is going to find that the desire for liberty, freedom and self-determination within its own borders is so strong and so dynamic that those in power there will not dare to start a fire in which they themselves may become engulfed. If that is the situation it means that we are to that extent far more secure.

In closing I just want to express again my appreciation of the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, the hon. member for Parkdale and several others who have spoken, and who have given hope and encouragement to the people of the subjugated nations of Europe whose brethern are in Canada, in the United States and scattered all over the world, and who have hopes of seeing their nations becoming sovereign and independent and taking their part with the other free democracies in a free and happy world.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say a word or two on the same matter. I share with the hon. member for Dauphin the surprise, when the minister, in his address to the house today, mentioned the "Slavic tradition of autocratic rule". I think the hon. member for Dauphin is a fine example of what the Ukrainian people have produced in Canada and of what the people from the Ukraine can do in the way of taking the lead in the struggle in the world for freedom and democracy.

Anyone who has taken the trouble, as have I, to study the history of the Ukrainian people could not help but realize what they have gone through. He could not fail to realize that through the centuries they have fought and suffered loss of life and worldly possessions in order to hold the right of freedom when oppression came to them from the east or south again and again. Nor could he fail to realize that a nation which went through all that and still held fast to that spark of freedom must have people of great character who can and will take their place, with free Canadians and people in other parts of the British commonwealth of nations, in upholding the British traditions of freedom. Britain went through a similar struggle. The people of the Ukraine also developed love of freedom through it.

It has been my honour and pleasure to have known, lived among and worked with people from all parts of Europe. I can say that probably 60 per cent of the people in my own constituency come from the Ukraine and eastern parts of Europe. I do not know of any people who have done as well—and certainly few have done better—in taking their place in Canadian life and Canadian democracy. In our institutions of learning, including our universities they have taken their place as good Canadians. When we were called upon to defend ourselves against the threats to democracy, these people were among the first to answer the call. I would say that their history has created in them a great consciousness of the value of democratic freedom. They are extremely alert to any signs of decay in, or any attacks upon that freedom within their country. They are ready to work and to sacrifice in order to maintain that freedom. I think the Canadian people should appreciate that.

My first personal experience with these people was in the schools of our own province. Here I found those students taking the lead in their classes. I found students going to our universities and passing their examinations with the highest marks. I think of a girl from my area who graduated from the University of Saskatchewan in 1950 with the highest marks ever attained by any student in that university, Miss Sylvia Fedoruk, who is today giving leadership in a branch of physics at our university in the treatment of cancer. She has been engaged in the technical part of the handling of the cobalt bomb for cancer treatment.

These people in all walks of life are taking their place. I did not wish the minister's remarks today in any way to cast any reflection upon these people. The lesson which we have to learn is that people are pretty much the same the world over. You cannot generalize and say that one group of humanity is more this or more that. Given the opportunity, all people throughout the world want freedom. They want the right to live. They want the right of self-determination. They abhor dictatorships and autocracy. They dislike slavery in any form. Such people some day will show the world that that part of Europe and Asia can take its place along with the rest of the world in moving all mankind forward as one people toward a better world.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, the minister and his department in recent years have so consistently been following a satisfactory foreign policy that I had no intention to participate in this debate. But unfortunately recent rather explosive events command the attention of everyone concerned with peace in the Middle East. I therefore rise for a few moments to make some observations.

The dictator of Egypt, since his rise to power, has constantly professed that he has no aggressive intentions. What can be more aggressive, Mr. Chairman, than the arbitrary and unilateral seizure of a vital international waterway created by the terms of a legal and binding contract? It is this exposure that brings me to my feet in order to again caution peace-loving world leaders to courageously arrest any further aggression in that or any other part of the world.

It should be obvious to the entire world that the predicament in which Colonel Nasser now finds himself may drive him to further acts of aggression, unless he will know that his move will be successfully repelled. It is obvious to everyone that to retain his popularity at home he may be driven to attack Israel. I suspect that this may be his next move. I therefore, Mr. Chairman, make the forthright statement that the plea by the government of Israel for defence planes should be met as quickly as possible, and before it becomes too late.

I further emphasize that, as the hon. member for Prince Albert so clearly pointed out, Egypt is in possession of a very large fleet of offensive bombers. Israel does not ask for bombers. She asks for jet planes to prevent Egyptian bombers from destroying her. Providing Israel with these defensive planes is not only a humanitarian act but, even more, is a step in defence of the position of the western powers in that area.

Let us frankly and courageously face the facts, Mr. Chairman. The western powers have no one else in that area on whom they can rely as safely as upon Israel. This point has been constantly made by almost every speaker familiar with the problem. Why, therefore, do we still hesitate? What diplomatic niceties are permitting the exposure of our own position to such dangerous risks?

Rumours were afloat very recently in our country that Canada would sell to Israel a number of defensive planes. The impatience of the people of Israel and of many people in many quarters in Canada and the other western countries should be understandable, and I know is fully recognized by our government. Though I am not unmindful that the government of Canada must exercise great caution in view of the recent complicated developments, I must nevertheless point out, Mr. Chairman, that these complications result from the unilateral actions of a dictator who truly follows the diabolic pattern of dictators. We have learned from painful experience in this very century that dictators understand nothing better than a show of courageous strength and grim determination to stop them. The very actions of the Egyptian dictator, by themselves, should have promptly precipitated strengthening our position in the Middle East rather than retarding it. I appeal to our government to be in the vanguard in urging our allies to strengthen western defences in the Middle East post-haste, and the first move should be the shipment to Israel of the defensive planes for which this dependable ally of ours so passionately pleads.

I commend, Mr. Chairman, the position taken by the United States government not to permit itself to be duped into financing the construction of the Aswan dam. This is a courageous demonstration of policy and is a declaration that it recognizes the complete duplicity of Colonel Nasser and his military clique in Egypt.

This, Mr. Chairman, is only a step in the right direction in a negative way. Such acts by themselves are not sufficient. There must be affirmative action equally as courageous. I admire too, and commend, the speedy action of the United Kingdom in freezing Egyptian assets and in sending warships to the vicinity; that is a positive and very significant move. But I respectfully suggest that the western powers should go much further. I can think of no better or more positive act to demonstrate to the Egyptian people our repugnance of this behaviour than by sending an abundance of defence equipment to Israel. Why should we hesitate to tell Colonel Nasser we are apprehensive of his further aggressive actions? Sending the planes to Israel would be an effective warning to him that the western powers will not tolerate further aggressive behaviour. At the present stage all sense of logic dictates the strengthening of Israel's defences, which could in no way adversely affect the western position even though it might displease Mr. Nasser.

It is my respectful submission that at this point the western powers would be turning the other cheek too readily if they showed any concern about displeasing Mr. Nasser. Not strengthening Israel's defences is to be virtually delinquent in strengthening our own defences in the Middle East. Let us therefore not, by an act of omission, place ourselves in a position that may cause painful results. I do not want to pour salt on anyone's wounds, but deep down in the hearts of many diplomats in Washington and in London there must be intense soul searching and genuine remorse for having sent Egypt such an abundance of planes, tanks, warships and other aggressive weapons. They must now bitterly realize that they have built a Frankenstein. I am fearful that the statement I made on the floor of this house some months ago may yet, heaven forbid, materialize; that is, that our men may yet be facing weapons which we have ourselves supplied to an irresponsible and over-ambitious dictator.

When I said six months ago, Mr. Chairman, that the massing by Egypt of vast armaments near Alexandria was for greater game than Israel, it now becomes obvious that it was the Suez canal that was one of those greater objectives. Mr. Nasser would not have dared to do what he did last week if he had not had the vast armaments to defend by force, as he recently declared he is prepared to do, any position he has taken. He would not have dared to make that move were he not aware of the fact that he had a vast collection of armaments in his country which we ourselves helped to build up.

What he has done is what contemporary history shows that all dictators do. They follow the same pattern. They first do something aggressive, and immediately set up a smokescreen with honeyed language declaring peaceful intentions, promising readjustments and subduing the troubled waters by these false manoeuvres. This was the pattern of Hitler following every move he made into neighbouring countries. This was the style of Mussolini and is also the pattern Russia followed in Korea, China, and only in recent days again is attempting in Burma. This is precisely the course that Nasser has set for himself.

He must be stopped and stopped at once. Caressing him will be useless. Negotiating with him will be meaningless and worthless. A barrier must be set up beyond which he dare not go. Sanctions should be imposed. He should be completely isolated for disregarding unilaterally a sacred agreement entered into almost 100 years ago. That is why the only treatment he deserves is the kind of treatment that he will understand.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that fearless strength must be demonstrated if any value in the future is to be placed on an international agreement or treaty. If Nasser's action is to go unchallenged with all the vigour the civilized world can command, the value of international relations in the future will always remain in doubt. International covenants must be respected. They are sacred. Without them our civilized structure must collapse; and this, Mr. Chairman, must not happen.

The role our country is now playing in international affairs, therefore, justifies it in taking the lead if necessary in urging a vigorous course of action. Canada assumed a righteous role in helping the state of Israel to be established. It is my respectful opinion that we can likewise be helpful in restoring peace in the Middle East, but I am convinced that the most effective way of doing that is to help Israel become strong, to a point that it will deter aggression.

We should no longer accept the argument that giving weapons to Israel will fan the flames of instability in the Middle East. Israel did not cause the nationalization of the Suez canal by Colonel Nasser; Israel did not make the deal which gave Russia a foothold in the Middle East; Israel did not demand the recall of General Burns for doing a masterful, if thankless, task in trying to retain some modicum of peaceful control of the border areas between Israel and her neighbours. If all this is true, and I submit it is true, then the recent events which have stirred the embers of Middle Eastern affairs to a new heat abundantly justify the immediate strengthening of Israel, which is de facto strengthening our own position.

I therefore respectfully urge upon the government that the most effective role Canada can play in maintaining peace, as well as the dignity and self-respect of the western world, is to take immediate steps to persuade the other western powers to demur no longer, and to help create a show of defensive strength in the Middle East which will go a long way to safeguard the peace of the world.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I am as anxious, I think, as any member of the committee to get ahead with the estimates, but I believe that before proceeding the committee would expect me to try to deal with some of the questions which have been raised in the discussion and which have been addressed to me. It has been said by one or two speakers that in my earlier statement I had omitted to deal with some very important developments. No doubt that is true. I tried to keep within the 30-minute limit, but those other matters have been brought up during the course of the discussion, and I may have a word to say about them now.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether before doing so I can, though not a member of the committee on external affairs—I merely had the honour of appearing before it—associate myself with the very generous tribute paid to the chairman by the hon. member for Prince Albert.

The hon. member for Prince Albert, in his very interesting speech, raised one or two questions which I should like to deal with briefly. He asked whether I could say anything more than I did say about the work of the committee of three of NATO that is looking into the question of non-military co-operation. It is true that I merely mentioned that committee. Of course one obvious reason for that is that the committee is in the middle of its work, and as a member, only one of three members, it is not easy for me to speak about that work at the present time. However, I can say that we had a very useful first meeting in Paris not very long ago, and at that time we decided to send to all the member governments of NATO a questionnaire, a long and detailed questionnaire, about all aspects of non-military co-operation we could think about in order to get the views of governments before proceeding with the drafting of our report. That questionnaire, for instance, has been in the hands of the Canadian government for some time and our answers to the questions I hope are to be considered by the cabinet this week. When these questons are all completed it is the intention of the committee to meet in Paris and discuss each answer with a minister representing the government which has submitted the answers, and to have an exchange of views with those governments, after which we shall proceed with our report.

The hon. member for Prince Albert also —and this is another NATO matter—mentioned the situation in Iceland. It is one, of course, which is worrying to the NATO organization, and it is one that has been discussed already in the NATO council. I am hopeful that as a result of those discussions, this difficulty over the United States air base in Iceland can be solved, and that Iceland will continue to give strong and steady support to the organization. It is an important matter because the base is an important one; but probably just as important as the air base itself is the situation of Iceland in so far as radar communication and installations are concerned. Therefore we must hope and do everything we can in NATO to resolve this difficulty, and I have some expectation that this will be possible before long.

The hon. member for Prince Albert also mentioned, and it is a very important matter indeed, the question of the reappraisal—I think that was the word he used—of our defence policies which is now under way and about which there has been so much discussion recently in various NATO capitals. What actually is happening is that the governments that are concerned, understandably, with adapting their defence and indeed their foreign policies to new circumstances—but I am talking about defence policies now—have begun to exchange views as to what, if anything, should be done. Those views are to be discussed in the NATO council, which quite properly is becoming increasingly effective as an agency for consultations of this kind. As I tried to say this morning, it is of vital importance that these things be done collectively through NATO and not unilaterally by national decision without consultation with other NATO members.

This question of political consultation in NATO, which the hon. member referred to, is one of very great importance and one to which our committee is giving special attention. I think if the record could be given for the last six months or the last year it would be shown that NATO has been more effective in respect to political consultations during that time than in previous years. That is as it should be.

The hon. member for Eglinton had something to say about the recent commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London. Apparently he has the impression that this government was not particularly interested in the conference and even implied—I hope I am not doing him an injustice—that we were not interested in commonwealth conferences generally. He suggested that the Canadian Prime Minister and the Canadian delegation had not done much to prepare for this conference and had made a pretty small contribution to it. I cannot accept that particular criticism.

We are interested in commonwealth conferences. We are very concerned with maintaining and strengthening commonwealth connections, which are of as great value in the world in which we live today as they have been at any time; and largely because of the three Asian countries. I think I am correct when I say that we have participated in more commonwealth meetings, including prime ministers' meetings, during the last 10 years than in any similar period since the commonwealth was established.

I can assure the hon. member that a great deal of preparation went into the work of this conference on behalf of the Canadian and other governments. It may well be that this work and the interest we have shown has not been reflected in the commonwealth conference communique, which has been described as a collection of cliches. The hon. member was impatient, and I can understand his impatience, because we had not come to more decisions at this meeting. I would ask him, decisions on what? There are specific problems within the commonwealth between commonwealth governments, and I admit that some of the most acute of them were not discussed at the prime ministers' conference. With my own knowledge, and I am sure this is shared by others, of the background of some of these problems I can say it was a very good thing that they were not discussed. If discussion had been insisted upon it might very well have broken up the meeting.

There was one specific problem settled, and that was the admission of Ceylon, when it changes to republic status, into the commonwealth as a republic. That was a matter of no small importance to the commonwealth, to continue in its membership Ceylon as a republic.

However, in so far as the main subjects on the agenda were concerned, it was not a question of reaching decisions, it was a question of exchanging views so that each member of the commonwealth would have the benefit of the views of the others. If you looked at the composition of the commonwealth today you would realize that there would be very divergent views on most of the international matters which concern us. When you have a membership which includes—I am mentioning these countries because they do have different and sometimes opposing views on certain international matters—South Africa on the one hand and India on the other, or New Zealand on the one hand and Ceylon on the other, it is not going to be easy to come to decisions on all international matters. But from this kind of composition comes a particular value in the discussion of these problems.

I believe that was very well exemplified in the meeting at London. I think every commonwealth representative left with the feeling that he had learned something new about these international problems by listening to other viewpoints, and especially the viewpoint of the Asian members of the commonwealth. I think that was of particular advantage to the other commonwealth prime ministers.

During the discussion several questions were asked about our policy in regard to the Middle East. I touched on that matter this morning, and I went into it at very considerable length when I spoke in the house earlier in the session. The hon. member for Prince Albert felt that we should have taken, or should still take no doubt, a stronger stand in support of the three governments which are now meeting in London in connection with the Suez canal crisis.

The hon. member for Eglinton complained that we were adopting—I think I am quoting him correctly—a lofty attitude of distant spectators, and he wondered whether we were taking this crisis seriously enough. Indeed we are, because it is a serious matter. Yet I think we were well advised in this government not to intervene, and indeed no other government has intervened in the way of blanket support. So far as I know the discussions in London have not as yet resulted in a decision even among the three governments concerned. This government, however, has already expressed its concern over this matter and has indicated our support for the principle of international control of the Suez canal, a principle which they are trying to work out in London at the present time.

But I doubt, even from the commonwealth point of view, whether it would be wise for us to go much further at this particular moment. Indeed, while the hon. member was speaking this afternoon I received a telegram from our representative in one of the Asian countries of the commonwealth which indicated that the feeling in that country on this matter was quite different indeed from that which exists in Canada or in certain other parts of the commonwealth. So while I think we must condemn and express real concern over what I have called already the arbitrary action of the Egyptian government; while we must do what we can to support the principle of international control of these waters, and the time may come when we will be given an opportunity to express our support of that principle by some kind of action, I do not think at this time we would be helping anyone by expressing more detailed views.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister give the house and the country a statement of the situation generally in regard to the Suez canal? Press reports certainly give a very dark and sombre picture of the situation. Would the minister care to comment within the limitations of the restrictions which we all realize have to be imposed?

Mr. Pearson: All I can say is that the information we received earlier this evening from London does not confirm some of the alarmist headlines which have been appearing in the press today about troop movements and all that sort of thing. We have reason to believe, although the information has not reached us officially as yet, that agreement has been reached in London this afternoon by which an international meeting will be called, at which it is hoped a settlement of this problem can be reached which would protect the use of the canal, and that no action other than this will be necessary for that purpose. That is all I can say, partly because the meetings in London are not completed and partly because I do not think I should go beyond that.

So far as the problem of arms shipments to Israel is concerned, I think our position has been made clear on that. Discussions have been going on among certain governments, three or four governments, with a view not to concerting a plan or a collective arrangement governing shipments of arms to Israel but with a view to seeing whether the responsibilities in this matter can be shared and whether our plans and our policies are in agreement; those discussions had come to a conclusion a few days ago when the Suez crisis developed. As I think I said yesterday in the house, any decision on our part arising out of those discussions has been postponed for a short time pending our effort to establish the relationship, if any, of the Suez crisis to the general situation in Palestine.

By that I do not want to give the impression that we are going to delay indefinitely because of this Suez situation, but it was felt advisable, and not only by this government, to delay the decision for a few days. I know that the government has taken a long time to come to a decision in this matter. It is a very difficult and a very complicated matter. Of course if a certain resolution had been passed in this house last February the decision would have been made for us, and our decision would have been very simple indeed. We would not have been permitted to send anything. However, conditions change, and men change with changing conditions, but we want to be pretty certain before we fill an order of this kind—a squadron of F-86's—that this will be conducive to security and stability in the area concerned. All I can say in addition is that I hope in a few days this matter will be disposed of in a satisfactory way.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister permit a question? He has not dealt with the question I asked him this afternoon, as to whether the events of this week involving the Suez canal will be regarded by the government as having a bearing upon the government's decision in regard to the application of Israel for those Sabre jets.

Mr. Pearson: I have just tried to answer that by saying that there may be a relationship between those two things which has not yet been established, to my satisfaction, but it was felt advisable to delay any decision for a few days until we could, after exchanging views with other governments, decide in our own minds what relationship, if any, did exist between these two things.

My hon. friend from Eglinton had something to say also about the Colombo plan. He felt that we might do more to show our support for that plan than we have been doing. In that connection I might repeat that, as hon. members know, we are increasing our contribution to the Colombo plan very substantially this year. It will be a larger increase than that of any other member of the Colombo plan, and I am sure that increase will be welcomed by all members of the house.

The hon. member said there was no limit to what could be used by the recipient countries under the Colombo plan and, to indicate that, he quoted from Mr. Cavell, who appeared before the external affairs committee and who, I agree, is a man who has won the respect not only of that committee but of others who know him. As shown on page 145 of the hearings of the committee Mr. Cavell did say, in reply to a question:

I think I can say now that I could spend any amount parliament agrees to give me, within reason. It is not too easy to spend this money, and I do not want to give that impression—

It is not so much the spending of money; it is the spending of money effectively. On that point Mr. Cavell went on to say:

If we can press on our leaders the necessity of making these people available;—

That is technical people, who are indispensable in connection with the contributions we are making under the Colombo plan in seeing that the money is well and efficiently spent.

—and having done that I would hope the situation would change to such an extent—

Mr. Goode: It is just a hope. It is not just a matter of the government providing money.

Mr. Cavell: That is so. It is a matter of national effort.

Mr. Michener: Would the expenditure of more money today be dependent on more technical people being available to you?

Mr. Cavell: Of course . . .

Mr. Michener: I take it we could not have more projects at the present time without there being more people in your administration?

That is, technical people from Canada to administer the expenditures.

Mr. Cavell: Quite right.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Then further on:

Mr. Michener: Your experience is that it would not be easy to get more at the present time?

Mr. Cavell: I think that expresses it very well.

So, while it is true that we could spend unlimited sums of money, because the needs are unlimited in that part and in other parts of the world, nevertheless I think it is even more important to make sure that the money we do spend is used effectively. The additional amount that is, I hope, being appropriated this year by parliament can be used effectively. It will be used for the establishment of the atomic reactor in India and for the building of the Warsak hydroelectric project in Pakistan, which has been a very difficult project indeed, involving as it does the engineering and technical co-operation of Pakistani and Canadian technical people. This extra money can also be spent in other constructive projects.

I join with the hon. gentleman in feeling that what has been done under the Colombo plan is one of the most valuable and imaginative things in post-war history. I hope we shall continue to support it constructively, and I hope that other countries will take the same stand in the future as they have in the past.

There is just one other matter, and that is a question which has been referred to by so many speakers, the liberation of subject peoples who are now under the Soviet yoke. In this connection my hon. friend from Dauphin read me a lecture a few minutes ago, and I must confess I deserved the lecture, because if I ever had any reputation as a historian I have certainly now lost it as far as being a historian of the Slav peoples is concerned. I talked about the Slav tradition of autocratic rule. That, I must confess, is a careless and unhistorical expression insofar as some Slav peoples are concerned, notably the Ukrainian people, the Czech people and the Polish people. They have a long tradition of democratic rule, when they had freedom in which they could express that tradition.

I think of Czechoslovak Bohemia in the seventeenth century and the Ukrainians during their great period. In fact in Poland they carried this passion for representative government in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries to the extent that every member of the Polish diet in those days had a veto. But of course what I had in mind, and what I should have said—and I think this is historically accurate—was the Russian tradition, under the czars and under the communists, of autocratic rule. I think that does apply, and I think it might even apply to the developments going on inside the Kremlin walls now.

But I should like to join with all members of the committee in their expressions of encouragement to these subject people of the Soviet peoples whose passion for freedom has not been destroyed by the despotism of centuries, and I am thinking again of the Baltic peoples and the Ukrainians, who are now subject peoples under Soviet rule.

I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert that the people of the free world must continue to let these subject peoples know that they are not forgotten and that at every opportunity we should give them what encouragement we can. By that I do not mean that we should arouse hopes that cannot be fulfilled, hopes of immediate liberation by force, because that would be the cruelest thing we could do to them; but we should let them know that they are not forgotten and one day, please God, they will be free again. We should take every opportunity we have of making that clear to them in any way which is open to us.

I am inclined to think myself that in addition to the encouragement they will get from us which should strengthen their morale, probably the best chance of freedom they have in the years ahead is to have those forces which may make for freedom, and which have been released by the new leaders of Russia for the time being at least, also given encouragement on our side. In a country where that kind of release is taking place, if these forces can gain momentum the chief beneficiaries of that kind of impulse will be the subject peoples now under the Soviet union. If there is anything we can do in that regard we ought to be proud to do it, especially in this country which owes so much to the people of these races.

That, Mr. Chairman, I think and I hope, deals with some of the questions that were raised during the course of the discussion. If I have omitted any, maybe hon. members will bring them to my attention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I think one was omitted unintentionally. I asked what general plans were arrived at, at the prime ministers' conference or as the result of consultations among the NATO nations, relative to the new look policy of the U.S.S.R. respecting trade and economic infiltration through the media of trade. I wonder whether the minister would care to say something about that.

What are the general plans? At the commonwealth prime ministers' conference was any consideration given to trade arrangements within the commonwealth? At the NATO council meeting was consideration given among the member nations of NATO with the view that multilateral trade within the NATO nations might be encouraged and expanded to the end that the communist offensive in this regard, which up to the present has enjoyed quite a measure of success, might conceivably be met or at least stopped to some degree?

I was also wondering what the minister might have to say with regard to Iceland. As I understand the situation in Iceland, a major source of complaint on the part of the majority of the people there arose by reason of the failure of one or other of the NATO nations to maintain the extent of trade that had prevailed prior to 1952, particularly in fish and fish products. Are there any plans in mind whereby Iceland might be induced to change its attitude as recently announced by the premier of that country? What is being done to offset the tremendous increase in the fish trade with Iceland by the U.S.S.R.? Those are two or three matters on which I would appreciate further enlightenment.

Mr. Pearson: I do not know if I can give very much enlightenment on these subjects, but I shall try to deal with them briefly. So far as the first question is concerned, whether there were discussions at the commonwealth conference which would have a bearing on what has been referred to as the Soviet economic offensive, there were such discussions because we had a whole day devoted to economic matters. During that time there was a very searching examination of trade problems, especially within the sterling area, because all members of the commonwealth except Canada are members of the sterling area, and there was agreement that everything possible should be done to reduce obstructions in the way of trade and bring about the broadest possible measure of multilateral trade and payments.

But when you get to the other question of the economic offensive of the Soviet union, if you want to call it that, this illustrates very graphically the point I tried to make a few minutes ago about the divergence of membership and therefore the divergence of views within the commonwealth. There would obviously be a different approach to that subject, to its dangers and to how they should be met, if it is dangerous, on the part of India than on the part of say New Zealand. There are members of the commonwealth which are receiving economic assistance from the Soviet union of their own free will, and it is not likely that those members are going to join in any commonwealth decision to condemn what might be called the Soviet economic offensive.

But it was agreed by other members of the commonwealth, as I tried to say this morning, that Soviet policy is now expressing itself—and this has been repeated by more than one speaker this afternoon—in new ways, and one of those new ways is trade and commercial arrangements and infiltration into the economies of other countries through economic assistance. It is recognized by a good many members of the commonwealth, by some members possibly more than others, that this constitutes a challenge to ourselves. Yet I think most of us felt that we would be making a great mistake if we tried to engage in any sort of competitive auction sale with the Soviet as to who could do the most for any particular country irrespective of whether that country really needed the particular aid in question. It is a complicated and difficult subject.

It has also been discussed at the NATO council. There is probably greater unanimity of view there as to what is involved in the matter than in the commonwealth because of the nature of the NATO membership. The NATO permanent council and the secretariat have been giving a good deal of study in the last two or three months to ways and means which might be adopted by the individual governments, because after all this can only be done by individual governmental action, to meet this new challenge which is now coming from Moscow.

Then there is the question of Iceland. It is quite true that one of the reasons for discontent, if you like, in certain sections of the Icelandic population about the NATO association is the trade dispute between Iceland and the United Kingdom in respect of fish and the concept of territorial waters.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And the United States.

Mr. Pearson: Also there is uneasiness on the part of certain of the people of Iceland in having a United States air base on their territory at a time when the sense of imminent danger seems to be somewhat removed. The trade dispute between the United Kingdom and Iceland did result—and this is an interesting illustration of Soviet tactics—in the Soviet moving in and offering to take all the surplus catch of Iceland's fish, thereby possibly saving them at that particular time from economic distress.

I hope that situation can be rectified but, as I said a few moments ago, I feel that the discussions which are now taking place inside NATO and with the Iceland government will at least provide a solution for these difficulties which will permit that small but important NATO country to support an organization which is as important for Iceland's security as it is for that of the rest of us.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder whether the minister would mind elaborating or elucidating slightly that expression of his, namely "economic infiltration"? Can he put that expression in terms that we would find more familiar to us? Just what is the nature of the infiltration in which the Russians are indulging?

Mr. Pearson: I should like to go into detail but it would take a long time. Maybe my hon. friend and I might have a chat about it one day. I think it is fairly obvious what it means. It means that the supplying government, the assisting government, by virtue of its economic assistance, will achieve an influence which will be more than economic and the country which is getting the assistance will probably become more and more dependent on the supplying government; or it may mean that economic assistance is given with political strings attached which would provide for infiltration.

Mr. Blackmore: Am I right in assuming that in some respects it resembles what the United States is doing when she gives an export subsidy as a result of which her goods go into the markets of another country on an uneconomic or uncompetitive basis?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I did not have the United States in mind when I just spoke.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, if the general discussion is concluded I should like to raise a matter on the first item. It is a matter of detail. We are dealing with the general item of departmental administration.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, is it the understanding now that the first item passes and we are going along?

Mr. Fleming: No. I am raising a question as to a figure which is part of this first item.

The Chairman: Item 92 is still before the committee.

Mr. Fleming: Item 92 is departmental administration. In the details on page 174 there is a subitem that is fourth from the bottom of the page, "Publication of departmental reports and other material, $112,200". This represents an increase over last year. I wish to say a brief word about departmental publications. There are some of the publications of the Department of External Affairs that I think all of us would commend, but the use made of at least one of these publications is something that I think calls for comment in this house.

At an earlier point in the session I drew attention to the use made of a publication entitled The Canadian Weekly Bulletin, which is issued by the information division of the Department of External Affairs. On February 9, as reported at page 996 of Hansard I drew attention to the fact that in one of the January issues the information division in this publication had published the speech the Secretary of State for External Affairs made in the house on January 24 on the subject of arms shipments abroad, but had not included the speeches of any of the other members of the house, including members of the opposition. The occasion was a debate on this extremely important and vexed question. This publication of the department contained copious extracts from the speech of the minister in this house, but did not so much as mention the speeches made by other hon. members.

Mr. Richardson: They publish only good speeches.

Mr. Fleming: Apparently it suits the view of my hon. friend that only the speeches of the minister should be published at public expense. The following day I had occasion to draw the attention of the house to the next week's issue of this same bulletin, in which precisely the same thing had occurred again. As reported at page 1050 of Hansard I addressed to the Prime Minister a question in these words:

> Does the Prime Minister consider it a proper use of public funds that the information division of the Department of External Affairs should publish the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the debate in this house on January 31, and no speeches of any of the other members who participated in that debate?

The Prime Minister's answer was that he thought this was a question that he should not be expected to answer on the orders of the day. In the month of January there were thus two issues of this particular bulletin in which the same treatment had been given to speeches in this house, namely, copious extracts from the speeches of the Secretary of State for External Affairs but no mention of any of the other speeches made, although the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs were made in the course of a debate in the house.

The issue of July 25 of the same publication apparently is running true to form, because we have copious extracts from the speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this time—

An hon. Member: A good speech.

Mr. Fleming: —on pages 1, 2 and 6. Half the issue is given over to publishing, at public expense, extracts from the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the Conservative amendment to the last supply motion. That was a debate that extended over two days. I think hon. members will agree that it was an important debate on an important issue that was raised by an amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition, and in which what we consider to be an important statement of Conservative party policy was set forth. Yet this publication sees fit to devote half of this issue to extracts from the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but makes not the slightest reference to any speech made by any other hon. member in this house in an important debate.

Mr. Chairman, if this bulletin exists simply to act as a sort of mouthpiece or agency of propaganda for the government or for the minister who holds the portfolio of this department, I think it is high time that the publication was stopped. I do not consider it to be a proper application of public funds that this bulletin, at public expense, should exist for the apparent purpose of simply publicizing speeches made by members of the government in debates in this house, when apparently it lies completely outside the scope of this publication to refer to, let alone quote from, speeches made in the same debate by any other members of this house or, as in the last example I mentioned, even to refer to the amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition and which was being discussed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he made the remarks which are quoted in this issue and which occupy half of it.

Let me make my view as plain as I can put it, Mr. Chairman. If this is the purpose this bulletin is intended to serve, I think we should stop it at once. It is an improper use of public funds.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this particular bulletin is to keep our offices abroad and other governments abroad informed of statements of government policy, so that our representatives abroad may know what government policy is in these matters. It may well be that speeches made by opposition members on these particular subjects are much more instructive and much more informative than are some of the speeches made by government members stating policy. But this airmail bulletin is for circulation abroad. It has a circulation in Canada to diplomats, representatives of foreign governments and members of parliament if they desire to have it. Every six months—I think I am correct in saying this and I am having it checked—we send out cards to those who are on the mailing list as M.P.'s, foreign representatives and libraries in Canada asking whether they wish to continue to receive this service, as a statement of Canadian policy for officers abroad. If they do not reply to the postcard they are stricken off the list. So I think, Mr. Chairman, there is no desire on the part of myself or the department to use this bulletin for propaganda in Canada.

Mr. Fleming: I just wish to make this observation because I want to keep this discussion right on the point. I am aware of the fact that this bulletin goes abroad. I have been with some of the representatives of the department abroad when it has come into their hands, and certainly no fault would be found with the communication to officers of the department abroad, or diplomatic representatives of the country abroad, of information. It is necessary to keep them well posted on government policy. But it seems to me that if they are to be adequately posted on what is going on in this country, their source of information should not be confined, when it is a matter of extracting speeches made in the House of Commons, to statements made either by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Surely what is required on the part of these diplomatic representatives or officers abroad, thousands of miles from home and often out of touch with the details of what is going on here, is that they know something of the tenor of the discussion here and the various views that are expressed. A diplomatic representative abroad, let us say somebody 10,000 miles from home, reads this publication. What real information does he derive from this bulletin of July 25? Well, he knows that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has expressed these views before. Surely, it would be instructive to that diplomatic representative to know the nature of the debate in the House of Commons, and that it was not a one-sided debate with only one minister speaking. If it is information that is intended to be conveyed to these diplomatic representatives and officers abroad, then surely it ought to be adequate and well balanced information and not just these well-chosen extracts from ministers' speeches.

Mr. Pearson: I quite agree that our officers abroad should not be restricted to this kind of information, and they are not. This air mail bulletin goes out at once as a statement of government policy. We also send Hansard to all our officers abroad, as my hon. friend no doubt knows, and we send them other sources of information in respect to what goes on in this House of Commons, on both sides of the house. The air mail bulletin goes out immediately because very often a foreign government will see some statement of Canadian policy in the press and will ask the Canadian representative, "What does your minister say about this?" or, "What is government policy?" We try to get that air mail bulletin out to them for that purpose.

In so far as its domestic circulation is concerned, I think I should look into the possibility of cancelling that completely, if that meets the views of my hon. friend.

Mr. Fleming: That question arose once before. I remember being asked that question by the former deputy, and I said I would like to be continued on the mailing list because I should like to check up on the sort of thing the department was sending out. In view of the examples which have turned up here tonight I think it was a good thing I did, because I feel the Canadian public is entitled to know what use is being made of public funds in this respect. I doubt very much if the taxpayers of this country, who after all are footing the bill, are going to think that this is the way to keep their diplomatic representatives abroad fully posted on what is going on in Canada. Surely, some of the things that are said by members of the opposition in this house would contribute something to the information of officers abroad.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to ask the minister a question along the lines of the questions asked by the hon. member for Eglinton. Is this air mail bulletin the usual method of informing departmental officials abroad in our embassies and consulates as to government policy? I would rather have thought important questions of policy or changes of policy would have been sent by code or telex or something of that nature?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, of course, that is done. If there is an important statement of government policy in this house and it is of any possible interest to a foreign government, it is telegraphed to our representative in that country at once. Then the telegraphic summary is followed up by an air mail bulletin. Then if these statements were made in the house in a debate, the statements would be sent to the officers abroad in the form of a copy of Hansard, the weekly bulletin or external affairs monthly bulletin. I think it is true, therefore, to say that our officers abroad have fairly adequate information about what goes on on both sides of the house in respect to these matters.

Mr. Fleming: Only they receive the government statements by air mail and they have to wait until surface mail is delivered to learn the views of the opposition.

Mr. Hahn: This question of publicity was raised a year ago by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, and it has always interested me. I have searched through Hansard of last year in order to get the answer, but I could not find it. I am wondering if the minister would give an answer now on the question of the circulation of mail similar to that which the Soviet has the privilege of doing through our postal facilities. I am wondering if we utilize a similar system in Russia to inform them about our democratic way of life so that they can become familiar with it, or are we not privileged to do that?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Chairman, we have not attempted to circulate in the Soviet union anything comparable to the bulletin that they circulate in this country. This is a free country and subject to the observance of the law, people, even diplomats from the Soviet countries, can use the mails for the circulation of their literature. In any event, this would be a rather expensive undertaking in the Soviet union. When we considered this sometime ago we felt that the expenditure would probably not be warranted, because we would have no assurance that anything we sent through the mail would ever reach the destination we had intended.

However, there has been an easing in that situation for the time being. My hon. friend may have noticed in the press that the United States is now beginning to circulate United States information in the Soviet union and this is something I think certainly we should reconsider. We are in the process of doing that. But in so far as Soviet embassy literature in this country is concerned, they have the same freedom as other embassies and legations to use the mails as long as they do not contravene the laws in doing so.

Mr. Hahn: I was not indicating, at least I hope the minister did not interpret my remarks as indicating, that I did not think they should have the same privileges as other Canadians in using the mails. I just wanted to find out if we had the same privilege in the Soviet union.

Mr. Nicholson: I am glad the minister mentioned the new policy of the United States, because I noticed in the Sunday New York Times some pictures of the first edition of this bulletin. Is the minister co-operating with Washington with a view to giving some publicity to Canada in this publication that is going to be circulated in the U.S.S.R.?

Mr. Pearson: If we do it I think we ought to do it as a strictly Canadian venture. I think it would be more effective, if we did it at all, to do it ourselves. It would also be more expensive.

Mr. Nesbitt: Did the Department of External Affairs have any official as an observer at the recent conference attended by the President of the United States at Panama?

Mr. Pearson: No, we had no observer at that conference. It was, as my hon. friend knows, a conference of representatives of the American republics. It lasted for a very short time and no substantial business was discussed. A declaration was signed by the presidents of the American states, but I think that was the only thing that was done there. We had no observer.

Mr. Nesbitt: When other conferences take place among the inter-American countries, such as the Pan-American conference of which we are not a member, do we normally have observers at those conferences?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, it has been our practice. When there are inter-American conferences dealing with substantial matters, either political or economic, we usually have someone there to keep track of what is going on.

Mr. Nesbitt: Has the government considered any change of policy with respect to closer relationships between this country and the South American countries? I mean by that, of course, such as contemplating any entrance into the Pan-American union, or anything of that nature?

Mr. Pearson: There was a very interesting speech on that matter this afternoon by the hon. member for Roberval, in which he expressed the view that we should establish a closer association, possibly through membership in the organization of American states. We have not done so. The matter has been under consideration for a good many years. In the earlier days—and I am thinking now of the 1930's—our application for membership would not have been, I think, unanimously approved, but there is no difficulty of that kind now, I admit. Nevertheless we have not taken that particular step.

I would like to emphasize, however, that if we have not done so it is not, as I have sometimes read and heard stated, that we have been restrained from doing so by any influence outside of Canada. This is a decision we can make quite freely on our own. We have, however, as my hon. friend knows, increased our contact with the South American states in exchanging our diplomatic representation in that part of the world.

There are two or three South American states and three or four Central American states where we have not yet established diplomatic representation, but our relations are growing in importance and in intimacy, and I think that is to be welcomed. I hope it will not be long before we have diplomatic contact with every one of the Latin American states. That, of course, will also result in extra expenses.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I am very delighted to hear all the information the minister has given us. It is certainly very enlightening, but I am not quite sure that the minister answered the question I asked. Is the government contemplating joining the Pan-American union?

Mr. Pearson: Not at the moment, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it would be true for me to say that there is any immediate likelihood of our going into the organization of American states, but it is something we should keep under consideration.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask a question in connection with the general policies of the government. I wanted to ask it, in fact, before we went on with the details, but possibly I can put it now. This afternoon I placed on record several statements attributed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs relative to views expressed in connection with world government and his attitude on these matters. I wonder whether he could just take a moment somehow to clarify some of these statements and let us know exactly where he stands in relationship to that question?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I omitted to deal with those references of my hon. friend; I do remember them. He has repeated the question, where do I stand on world government and national sovereignty? Mr. Chairman, I believe of course in national sovereignty in Canada and in other countries, because it is the expression of our political freedom. I think it is quite academic to talk about world government at this time. I am not going to say, and I have never said, that in the historical development of peoples and nations there may not come a time when the existing nation state will not be a big enough political unit to face the problems that will face humanity on this planet.

Having said that, I should go on to say that we are not likely to be faced with that contingency for a long time. My hon. friend quite rightly stresses the importance of national sovereignty, but he must also recall the importance that rightly attaches also to collective security and to collective pacts to protect our security. This has a relation to national sovereignty. When we join organizations like the North Atlantic Treaty Organization we voluntarily give up, of our own free will, some part of our sovereignty in the interest of our security. That is what our membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization means, and that is why it would be unwise, I think, to be too dogmatic about this matter.

I am quite satisfied, on the basis of my present knowledge, that a group of nation states each with national sovereignty can work together co-operatively in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. There are some members of this organization—and I am sure the hon. member will approve of this—that are trying to work out special arrangements which will bring them closer together in a European system in which each one will give up some of its national sovereignty in the interest of European unity. That is a development which I, for one, welcome. I also recall, as an illustration of the danger of being dogmatic on these matters, a dark period in our history in 1940, when Mr. Churchill, always a fervent believer in British freedom and sovereignty, made an offer to France for complete political union, if that was necessary to win the war; an offer which was not, of course, accepted at that time.

Mr. Fleming: Was it not a union of their empires?

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Item 616 is under the same heading. Shall it be carried now?

Mr. Fleming: Is it not usual to leave the supplementaries to the end?

The Deputy Chairman: If the committee wishes, the supplementaries can be left to the end. In some departments we are taking them under the heading as we come to them. The supplementary will be left.

95. Representation abroad—construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, land, equipment and furnishings, and to the extent that blocked funds are available for these expenditures, to provide for payment from these foreign currencies owned by Canada and provided only for governmental or other limited purposes, $1,987,207.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a matter on this item. This relates to representation abroad, construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, land, equipment and furnishings, and so forth, a vote of approximately $2 million. The details, beginning on page 178, set forth the amounts to be expended on the various diplomatic missions abroad. I draw attention to this, Mr. Chairman, because I am going to make some comments on the subitem on page 179 relating to operational expenses and capital equipment for the post in Brazil.

I think the house every now and again should stop and look behind some of these large figures. It is altogether too easy, indeed deceptively easy, to take these large figures and not make a detailed examination of some of the expenditures that lie behind them.

Now, in connection with our post at Rio de Janeiro, I think the house ought to be aware of some of the information at least that was obtained by members of the committee at sessions of the external affairs committee by questioning officials of the department. In this regard, I think the house should be aware of the extent of the expenditure in acquisition of the embassy property at Rio de Janeiro, and also of the expenditures on the building.

It happens that the department had an option at one time to purchase for an embassy the residence of a Canadian living in Rio de Janeiro, Major MacCrimmon, a senior official of the Brazilian Traction Company for, I think, the amount of $80,000. That option, according to the wisdom of the department, was not exercised and over a period of several years the department showed interest in a property which eventually it purchased at a price of $350,000. The actual amount in Canadian funds was $341,700. That was only the purchase price of the building. The department then found it necessary to spend $25,000 in the renovation of that building. But that provided only an empty building, so the department incurred expenditures which will total $95,000 for furnishings. The aggregate of those figures is $470,000 for that one embassy and the furnishings.

Canada has now a good many of these embassies abroad, and I think hon. members will need to ask themselves whether this expenditure on this one embassy is justified under the circumstances. The expenditure has been incurred, and it is not a situation where the committee can undo what has been done, but this is the sort of information which I submit the committee should ponder well in approaching the proposed vote of $2 million for capital expenditures abroad for the housing of our diplomatic representatives.

Let me say at the outset that having seen a good many of our posts in different places abroad I am not disposed to be narrow or cheese-paring in my attitude toward the acquisition of properties abroad as embassies for our diplomatic representatives but—

Mr. Dickey: Why do it?

Mr. Fleming: If my hon. friend will keep his wisdom to himself I think we will make more progress. There is, however, a great difference between being reasonable in these matters, as I think most of us would wish to be, and approving extravagant expenditures. I should like to submit to the committee that in this expenditure of $470,000 to house one Canadian ambassador abroad we have a very striking example of extravagance.

We had comparisons in the committee with some other embassies abroad or posts of high commissioners. It seems to me that there is no reason why Rio should be regarded as a place where the expenditure of these amounts should be proper and be condoned, when in the capitals of other countries which are as important in the world family of nations as is Brazil the capital expenditures which are thought to be adequate are only a fraction of this sum. For instance, we were reminded that our property in Dublin for the high commissioner there is very modest by comparison. But I am not putting this simply on the basis of comparison with what exists in other capitals. I think the committee would wish to look at the intrinsic merits of this particular expenditure I have referred to, which totals $470,000. Let us see what was said by the officials of the department to justify this figure. Mr. Macdonnell representing the department was asked who made the decisions in regard to these matters, and he replied:

> The problem of selecting the right scale of furnishings is a difficult one which we face constantly. I do not believe that we are entirely our own masters in this field. Some regard has to be paid to local conditions, and to the type of establishments that other countries comparable to Canada maintain. Our scales of representation, of course, vary a good deal from one country to another. In some places they can be relatively modest, partly because of the customs of the country and partly because of the scale of prices when we come to buy land or property or to pay rent. It happens that in Brazil prices are high and the standards of representation are pretty high. I think perhaps the brief historical summary which I gave will indicate how long the department spent in exploring this situation before making any recommendations to the government. It was our view that this was about the best purchase that we were likely to be able to make for as far ahead as we could see. We spent five years, really, in looking for it. The house is a large one and the furnishings have to measure up to a certain standard.

In dealing with the standard, as I said, I am not one of those who would take a narrow or cheese-paring view, but—

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Fleming: If hon. members do not wish to contribute to our progress with this, they can carry on as they are; or do they wish to obstruct?

Mr. Lesage: Blackmail.

Mr. Fleming: Is that what the hon. member is practising?

Mr. Lesage: No; you are.

Mr. Fleming: Because other countries may seek to start some sort of race in regard to embellishing their embassies in a particular country is no reason why Canada should seek to keep up with the Joneses in a situation like that. Let us look a little further at the furnishings.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Harris: I believe it was the general desire of all parties to do what we could to wind up the business if possible.

Mr. Churchill: Why did you have so many of your fellows speak?

Mr. Harris: Because we have not yet come to the point where we are so anxious to close up that we would bar all government members from speaking. If that is the only way that we can wind up parliament then we can discuss it on that basis. I do not know who called ten o'clock and I did not hear it myself, but would it not be possible to continue with this for some time in order to see what progress we could make?

Mr. Nicholson: There had been some hope that we could finish up by the 11th of this month, but that was based on the understanding that we would have to finish this today. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has said, five government members spoke today, several of them reading speeches which took quite a long time. There does not seem to be any chance of getting through now, and there is therefore no point in going on beyond ten o'clock tonight.

Mr. Harris: When we have arrived at ten o'clock with an item almost completed I think it could be said that by sitting a few minutes longer we might be able to complete it.

Mr. Fleming: We are not through with this item yet.

Mr. Harris: If there is any disposition to make suitable arrangements now so that parliament might be prorogued by the end of next week it would hardly seem possible to maintain the ten o'clock closing hour. Even if it was not certain that we could complete a particular item or a particular department I think the extra time could be put in so those who feel they have to speak in the interests of their constituencies would be able to do so. Perhaps we ought to take the extra time even if we realize that we would have to adjourn an hour later or something like that and still not have carried the item. We would have got behind us some of the discussion which would have to be dealt with anyway in order to ultimately carry the item.

Mr. Nicholson: There was general agreement that we would sit beyond ten o'clock, but we were not able to finish the first item until nearly nine o'clock this evening, and with that situation I think we might as well call it ten o'clock and then see what can be done from now on.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might have leave to revert to motions in order to obtain first reading of the amendments to the Customs Tariff pursuant to the resolutions which were passed in May.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions for this purpose?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Mr. Harris moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 448, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Fleming: What is the reason for the long delay in submitting the bill after passing the resolution?

Mr. Harris: I was not satisfied with the wording of some items, and we took a good deal of time to get it to my satisfaction.

Mr. Fleming: Is there anything more than the wording? Are there any substantive changes?

Mr. Harris: Nothing other than the wording.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow I hope we can complete external affairs and go on with the other items that I mentioned for today.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION

Question No. 354—Mr. Starr:

1. Have any provinces requested federal aid for education purposes since 1946?
2. If so, which provinces and with what result?

Answer by: Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister):

1 and 2. Yes. At the conference of the federal and provincial governments, December 1950, the premier of Manitoba, Douglas Campbell, made a submission stating that the nature and the cost of education had reached the point where substantial contributions were required from the federal treasury. The proceedings of this conference were tabled in the House of Commons on January 29, 1951, and this submission is shown on page 39.

The government of Manitoba also requested some form of federal assistance to education in the speeech made by Premier Campbell at the October 3 meeting of the federal-provincial conference, 1955. The proceedings of this meeting were tabled in the House of Commons on January 11, 1956, and Premier Campbell's remarks are on page 66.

Question

Also, in the conference of October, 1955, the premier of Prince Edward Island, A. W. Matheson, stated that education today should be no longer a matter of provincial concern and requested conditional grants for education. Premier Matheson's comments are shown on page 80 of the proceedings.

The governments of all provinces except Quebec have made specific requests for the continuation and increase of federal financial aid for technical and vocational training.

The assistance to provincial governments for vocational training has been continued.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

A—Department and missions abroad—

92. Departmental administration, $4,379,430.
93. Passport office administration, $275,251.
94. Representation abroad—operational—including authority, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, for the appointment and fixing of salary rates of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff by the governor in council, $7,210,961.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, August 2, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ROYAL ASSENT TO LEGISLATION CREATING BRITISH CARIBBEAN FEDERATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, today Her Majesty the Queen is giving royal assent to United Kingdom legislation enabling the creation of a British Caribbean federation. The federation will not legally come into being until a constitution is adopted and a governor general appointed. Nevertheless, the passage of the Caribbean federation bill is such an important milestone that in those colonies which will eventually comprise the federation, that is to say, Jamaica, Trinidad, the Leeward islands, the Windward islands and Barbados, today is being celebrated as Federation day.

I am sure all hon. members will wish to join with me in expressing, on behalf of the people of Canada, our gratification at the substantial achievement represented by the legislation which is being submitted for royal assent today, and our warmest wishes for the future of the federation.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I know that every hon. member of this house, and I am sure every Canadian, welcomes this historic milestone. I think there is one reason why all of us must feel a sense of the historic significance of what is taking place, and that is the fact that it was from the area of the Caribbean that the first reported knowledge of the new world was brought back to Europe. Christopher Columbus discovered what became known as America first of all by a visit to the Caribbean. Therefore today we are seeing the fulfilment of a great historic event, and I know that every one of us here will wish to the new federation success, happiness, prosperity and a great future within the commonwealth of free nations which we all respect.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT EXTENDING PROVISIONS TO PERSONS ENGAGED IN FISHING

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to authorize the unemployment insurance commission with the approval of the governor general in council to make regulations providing for the extension of the act to persons engaged in fishing notwithstanding that they are not employees of other persons, and for including as an employer of a fisherman any person with whom the fisherman enters into contractual or other commercial relationship in respect of his occupation as a fisherman, and also to modify the provisions relating to the requalification requirements for certain subsequent benefit periods and to adjust the duration of regular and seasonal benefits accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO FILLING OF VACANCY ON CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the report which I noticed in the press the other day to the effect that the civil service association has made representations to the Prime Minister for action in the filling of the vacancy on the civil service commission, will the Prime Minister say when he expects to make that appointment?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I hope it will be made very soon. We have had the matter under active consideration. As the hon. lady knows, there are a great many ladies who feel that they would be well qualified to occupy that position. It is a matter to which we have to give serious consideration, because it is never easy to make a proper selection as between so many qualified candidates.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure the Prime Minister is quite correct, but may I take it from his words that the appointment will be a woman?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I sincerely hope so, and we have not been considering anything else.

TRADE

COTTON—STATEMENT ON UNITED STATES SUBSIDY ON EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I took notice of a question by the hon. member for Lambton West as to the action being taken by the Department of National Revenue in the light of the announcement of the United States government's policy of subsidizing exports of cotton. Section 6 of the Customs Tariff provides for the application of dumping duty on imported goods of a class or kind produced in Canada where the selling price to the purchaser in Canada is less than the fair market value as sold for home consumption in the country of export. On July 25 instructions were issued to all collectors of customs requiring them to alert their appraisers to the present situation and to require extra vigilance with respect to imports of these commodities. I shall now read the instructions and place them on the table. They are as follows:

Value for Duty Cotton Textiles

For some time, there has been a two-price system in the United States for raw cotton. Manufacturers in that country have been required to pay a price for their supplies of raw cotton that was approximately 6 cents per pound higher than the price at which similar cotton was sold for export.

Beginning August 1, 1956, United States exporters of yarns, fabrics and manufactured articles made from cotton will be eligible to claim an equalization payment from their government based upon the estimated amount of cotton used in the manufacture of the goods and the difference between the United States domestic price and the export price of raw cotton.

This arrangement could enable exporters to sell their products to Canada at prices below the fair market value obtaining on sales in their home market. It will, therefore, be necessary for appraisers to exercise extra vigilance. All entries of goods from the United States containing cotton are to be taken subject to amendment and careful attention is to be given to ensure that invoice descriptions are adequate and certified fair market values are in compliance with the law.

In respect to any importations where the appraiser considers investigation by the department is warranted, a copy of the invoice and, where possible, a sample of the goods are to be promptly forwarded to the department. Samples of fabrics should not be less than 12 square inches in area and should be large enough that the pattern may be identified. In each instance, where invoices are submitted, the importer should be advised that the value is being inquired into and amendment of the entry and any subsequent entries of similar goods may be required at a later date.

WATER RESOURCES

WATER LEVELS OF LAKE MICHIGAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister now prepared to answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Lambton West on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week with respect to diversion of the waters of lake Michigan?

[Mr. McCann.]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I have the answer here in reply to both those questions.

A bill providing for temporary diversion of an additional 1,000 cubic feet per second of water from lake Michigan to the Illinois waterway for experimental purposes for the aid of navigation and for a period of three years was passed by the United States congress in Washington in the session which just recently ended. The President, however, according to our information, has not yet taken any action with regard to signing that bill or vetoing it.

By the definition in the boundary waters treaty of 1909, lake Michigan is not a boundary water. It does, however, come within the scope of the treaty because article II makes specific reference to "all waters which in their natural channel would flow across the boundary or into boundary waters", as is the case with lake Michigan. The interpretation of article II is a rather complicated matter and I think it would not be very useful for me to go into it now. It was, however, discussed at some length in the standing committee on external affairs in 1955. It appears that the proposed diversion of the waters of lake Michigan would not come under the jurisdiction of the international joint commission unless it was referred specifically to it.

The Canadian government expressed its views to the United States government on the proposed additional diversion in a note dated February 13, 1956, which was tabled in the house on March 8. In this note Canada took the attitude that the enactment of the proposed legislation would be prejudicial to the navigation and power interests of both countries. By doing so we have already expressed our concern with regard to it.

In so far as the other question was concerned regarding the Long Lac-Ogoki diversion, I should point out that Canada consulted the United States concerning this diversion into lake Superior, because the effect of this diversion was to increase the total amount of water at Niagara, and Canada wished to receive due credit for that increase in the arrangements for the division of water at Niagara for power purposes. This being a diversion into boundary waters and not out of boundary waters, it did not require agreement between the two countries under the boundary waters treaty, though a special agreement was reached and embodied in the Niagara treaty of 1950.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED TOUR BY COMMITTEE SURVEYING CANADIAN NEEDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, press dispatches recently have reported a tour by a committee surveying immigration needs in Canada. I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether this is a new committee or whether it is just the annual survey of employment opportunities for immigrants being made by his department. In either event, can he say whether that survey has yet reached British Columbia and, if so, whether any action is being taken to meet the acute shortage of farm labour out there, about which he knows?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, from the rather vague description which the hon. gentleman gives I cannot identify what it is he is talking about. However, I will see my deputy minister shortly and see whether he can throw any light on the matter.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister would refer to his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because the press dispatch is datelined Fort William, and it says the committee was in Fort William and was having interviews in that city.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not doubt that it was.

TRANSPORT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ALLEGED SHORTAGE OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct to the Minister of Transport this question which will create a record that will never be equalled again in this parliament. Has the minister received any complaints with respect to the shortage of box cars for fertilizer and lumber in British Columbia?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that question may be answered in the negative.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EGYPT—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN CITIZENS IN COUNTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell us whether or not there are any—whether few or many—Canadian citizens in Egypt at the present time?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell the hon. member the number. However, we are taking steps to inquire of our embassy how many Canadians have registered there. I hope this reply will not be taken as indicating that there is any special crisis or emergency in Egypt with respect to Canadians at the present time.

Mr. Nesbitt: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that this morning's news report over the Canadian broadcasting system pointed out the British government had warned its nationals to leave Egypt, I was wondering if any similar action was being contemplated by our department.

Mr. Pearson: We have had no official confirmation that a warning of that kind has been given by the United Kingdom government. We have also made inquiries about that.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO BASIS OF SALE OF MACHINERY TO AVRO AND ORENDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. What was the basis for the price paid by Avro and Orenda for the crown-owned machinery and equipment sold to them, as announced yesterday? Was it fair market value or depreciated value, and was any consideration given to the company for the undertaking to maintain these facilities for aircraft and engine production for 10 years with a prior right of user for the crown?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the basis of the sale was the cost of the machinery less straight line depreciation at economic rates usually provided for. There was no special compensation for the undertaking to maintain the machinery for 10 years. We do not sell machinery of that kind unless we get the undertaking to maintain it for 10 years.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the minister in a position to table a copy of that agreement?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not think there is any agreement. A price was quoted and accepted. I doubt if there is any agreement, but if there is one I shall be glad to table it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CLEANING OF CARS—INQUIRY AS TO HAVING WORK DONE BY TENDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to let by tender the cleaning of passenger cars in each of the cities where that type of work is done, instead of having it done by the regular employees of the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): If the hon. gentleman would care to put that question on the order paper I will endeavour to obtain an answer from the Canadian National Railways.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT ON SHOOTING OF CANADIAN SEAMAN AT HAWAII

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): On July 24, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked a question concerning a shooting incident which occurred recently in Hawaii. The commanding officer of H.M.C.S. Crescent reports that able seaman I. W. Thompson was shot and seriously injured by a United States marine corps private in civilian clothes, who was attempting to rob him during a car ride that this Canadian seaman had accepted from Honolulu to Pearl Harbor.

The bullet lodged close to Thompson's spine, resulting in partial paralysis of the lower limbs; but medical authorities at Tripler hospital, where he is under treatment, consider this a temporary condition and there is every hope that he will make a complete recovery. Criminal charges are being prepared against his assailant by the United States police authorities in Honolulu. I might add that seaman Thompson's interests are being looked after by the British consul in Hawaii.

WINNIPEG—ALLEGED LOW FLYING OF R.C.A.F. PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, and ask him whether he has yet received a report concerning the alleged low flying of R.C.A.F. planes over the cities of Winnipeg and St. James? This has become a weekly question that I put to the department.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I have not yet received the report, Mr. Speaker, but I shall make inquiries and try to have an answer for the hon. gentleman within a day or two.

Mr. Churchill: That is what the minister said last week.

PARLIAMENT HILL

PARKING ARRANGEMENTS IN LIBRARY AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister aware that the height of the weeds in the jungle which his department is cultivating to the north of the parliament buildings has now reached about three feet, and they are doing nicely?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I wish to thank the hon. member for the information on the subject.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—STATEMENT ON PROGRESS OF DEVELOPMENT SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday the hon. member for Charlotte asked me, as he has asked me previously, whether I could report on the proposed reference to the international joint commission concerning the Passamaquoddy tidal power project. I can now announce, Mr. Speaker, that the governments of Canada and the United States have agreed upon the text of a joint reference to the commission on this subject. The reference was delivered to the commission this morning in Ottawa.

Hon. members will recall that in 1948 a joint reference was submitted to the commission by Canada and the United States for the purpose of carrying out a preliminary investigation to ascertain the scope and probable cost of a full scale investigation of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project. Based upon the report submitted by the commission in 1950, the governments of Canada and the United States have agreed, as previously announced in this house, to submit a reference on this matter. The terms of that reference are being made public this morning in Washington and in Ottawa.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with reference to the statement he has made. Has the agreement that has been reached by the United States and Canada in this connection been based on a memorandum sent to the United States on April 5, 1956, in which Canada said that she would bear no part of the cost of the investigation outside of that connected with the fisheries, and also that in joining in the reference to the international joint commission the Canadian government would make no commitment regarding the eventual construction of this project?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have not the text of the reference, which is of considerable length. My hon. friend will be able to read it, because it is being made public. However, it does provide for a division of the cost and on our side we have set a limit to what we think should be our proportion. I am not aware at the moment of the latter condition which the hon. member mentioned, but I will see that he gets a copy of the reference this morning.

Mr. Brooks: I have here a copy of the recommendation the department made, which indicates that Canada would bear $300,000 of the cost and the United States would bear $3 million, and that Canada would in no way be obligated to help with the project even though it was found feasible.

Mr. Pearson: I am not sure whether those conditions are repeated in those terms in the reference, but I will be glad to look into that right away.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FISHER RIVER RESERVE HOSPITAL—STATEMENT ON QUALITY OF TREATMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on July 31 the hon. member for Selkirk asked the following question:

> When Peter Thom, treaty Indian, was admitted to Fisher River reserve hospital, was a third-year medical student the only person available to treat him?

This Indian was admitted to the Altona, Manitoba, hospital on July 1 following injuries he had received across the border. At the request of the doctor in charge at Altona he was transferred by ambulance to St. Boniface hospital the same day. He was treated there for dislocation of both hips and placed in a plaster cast. His condition improved, and on July 13 St. Boniface hospital authorities asked the regional office of the Indian health services if he could be transferred to an Indian hospital. A bed was available in the Fisher River Indian hospital and he was transferred that day to this hospital.

The doctor in charge at the Fisher River hospital had resigned and his replacement had not yet arrived, and his assistant, a third-year medical student employed for the summer, was at the hospital. This medical student had instructions to call a practising physician 20 miles distant for assistance at any time, and it was this physician who was the designated physician in charge at the hospital and available when required.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): May I ask a supplementary question. Why was this treaty Indian, Peter Thom, moved to Fisher River hospital when no doctor was due there for three or four days? I should like to know this, also. At the inquest was it established whether the Indian, Peter Thom, was run over intentionally or accidentally?

Mr. Robertson: Mr. Speaker, I presume the authorities at St. Boniface hospital felt that this man was in a suitable physical condition for transfer to the Fisher River hospital. As to the latter part of the question, I do not believe that that feature of the case comes under the jurisdiction of the Indian health services, but I understand that a further investigation is being carried out by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Bryce: May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he will look into it? The man died in this hospital.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into the matter. The regional supervisor in Manitoba drew this case to the attention of the attorney general of Manitoba and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have investigated it; but since this accident or crime, or whatever it may have been, took place in the United States, in the state of North Dakota, the only thing the attorney general was able to do was to draw the proceedings at the inquest to the attention of the state authorities in North Dakota. I am informed that is being done and that the police are keeping their file open.

Of course, it is not the duty of my department, or indeed of the federal government, to enforce the law in the province of Manitoba, and much less in the state of North Dakota; but because this man was an Indian we did follow the matter up with the appropriate provincial authorities.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO AVAILABILITY OF PIPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Trade and Commerce any information as to when shipments to Canada of 34-inch pipe for the trans-Canada pipe line will be resumed?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the shipments of 34-inch pipe have been coming in regularly, and as far as I know they are still coming in regularly. I do not think I have any information I can give my hon. friend. I could point out that the building of the pipe line is a private transaction. We like to keep posted on its progress, but we do not feel obliged to give day to day bulletins concerning it.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

95. Representation abroad—construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, land, equipment and furnishings, and to the extent that blocked funds are available for these expenditures, to provide for payment from these foreign currencies owned by Canada and provided only for governmental or other limited purposes, $1,987,207.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, last night I had been engaged in bringing to the attention of the committee the facts concerning the purchase by the Canadian government of a residence for a Canadian embassy at Rio de Janeiro, the capital of Brazil. I had pointed out that the house was purchased at a price of $350,000. The renovations cost $25,000 and the furnishings when complete will, according to the department's estimate, cost a total of $95,000 making a grand total for the building, renovations and furnishings of $470,000.

I said to the committee last night that I looked on this as an example of prime extravagance. Sir, what is it that has led the department to spend so much money on this one embassy abroad? I think the department sought to plead as extenuating circumstances the statement which I read last night from the proceedings of the committee on external affairs at page 390, that at Rio—

. . . the standards of representation are pretty high.

That was the statement of Mr. Macdonnell, the deputy under-secretary of state for external affairs in relation to the level at which other countries are apparently embellishing their embassies in that beautiful city. I submit to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that the taxpayers of this country should receive more consideration than they have been given in connection with this particular expenditure. Canada in its representation abroad, it seems to me, should see that its representatives are adequately accommodated, but there is no occasion for Canada to engage in any contest with other countries to keep up with the Joneses, or to compete with them in the luxury attached to the accommodation provided for their diplomatic representatives abroad.

An expenditure of $470,000 on this one embassy is, in my submission, an example of inexcusable extravagance. Rio de Janeiro is, of course, an important capital, but the post there is not regarded as a senior Canadian ambassadorial appointment. It does not rank in priority within the department with London, Washington, and Paris, and it is not the place, I submit, to engage in this race to keep up with the Joneses.

Now let us look a little further into what extravagance of this kind means. I have referred to the fact that at one time the department was considering the purchase of the residence of Major MacCrimmon, a Canadian and a senior official of the Brazilian Traction Company in Rio, at a reported price of $80,000.

Mr. Pearson: That is quite a wrong figure.

Mr. Fleming: I said that was reported.

Mr. Pearson: It is a wrong report.

Mr. Fleming: I should be glad to have the minister's correction of that report, but that was a property in which the department was interested at one time. But it turned from that to a much more expensive property.

As I said, let us look a little further at what these furnishings mean, and let us consider that in terms of the interests of the Canadian taxpayer. The department furnished for the committee a breakdown of the principal expenditures on furnishings at this embassy. That is to be found on pages 441 and 442 of the proceedings of the committee on external affairs. The expenditures are listed by rooms:

Main salon No. 3
Furniture	$4,079.02
Rugs	1,575.00
Drapes	487.48
Chandelier and lamps	1,738.35

Furniture	$3,123.00
Rug	472.50
Drapes and bedspread	355.60
Lamps	301.50
		$4,250.60

I shall not delay the house with details of some of these other rooms. In bedroom No. 18 the furnishings cost in the aggregate $3,191.92. For bedroom No. 16 the total is $2,500. For the hallways, the furniture, rugs and lamps cost $3,223. For the terrace off the library the furnishings cost $1,392; those for the terrace off the dining room, $1,816; those for the swimming pool gallery, $1,898. Then there are miscellaneous furnishings; silver flatware and hollowware, $4,400; china, $648; formal and informal table linen, $2,305; and so it goes.

Mr. Pickersgill: What did they pay for the flag?

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration regards extravagance as a very light matter. In this he is far out of contact with the experience of the average Canadian taxpayer. The exemptions allowed to Canadian taxpayers are quite inadequate; and if the minister would exercise his ingenuity to eliminate extravagance it might be possible for the Minister of Finance—I think it is possible now—but it might bring the Minister of Finance to make these exemptions adequate, to raise them beyond the present inadequate figures of $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons without dependents.

There was a point raised about mirrors, and the question was asked in the committee about the price of two eighteenth century mirrors, that were purchased for the embassy. The first information we had from the department is shown at page 390 of the report, where the official said:

> I am told that it was approximately $2,000 for those mirrors.

Later on the price of the mirrors was inquired into further by the department and the answer was brought back to the committee at page 433 that the two mirrors did not cost $2,000 but cost $1,078.

I have read these details to bring to the attention of the house the rather impressive items which lurk behind some of the big figures that appear in these estimates. It seems to me that we are too disposed in this committee to take these items in the aggregate without going back into the details behind them. When we go back into the details, this is the sort of thing that unfortunately we find there.

As I said last night, we cannot now undo this extravagance. This expenditure has been incurred, but I bring it to the attention of the house in order that the house may warn the government and the Department of External Affairs that it does not intend to tolerate extravagance on this scale in the future.

There is, however, one thing we can do in reference to this year's estimates in this respect. We are dealing with item No. 95, which provides approximately $2,000,000 for construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, land, equipment and furnishings. In this item, as we see in the details at page 178 and following, there are specific amounts set out for capital as well as operational expenditures at various embassies and diplomatic posts abroad. There is one subitem at the end, at the bottom of page 183, to which I invite the attention of the house. After listing in detail the proposed expenditures on operations of a capital nature at all these posts abroad, there is one item headed "Miscellaneous—unallotted capital items"—$805,000.

The facts I have brought to the attention of the house in connection with the embassy at Rio ought to alert the house to the necessity of exercising as much supervision over proposed expenditures by this department in this respect as may be possible, but here we are told that there is in this item a sum of $805,000 that has no tag whatever attached to it and which, if it is passed, the department is at complete liberty to expend in the purchase or improvement of any property or the purchase of furnishings anywhere in the world. There are no strings attached to it.

I submit to this house, as I submitted to the standing committee on external affairs, that this is not the way in which the House of Commons ought to do its business. One of our duties here is to assert the principle of strict parliamentary control over expenditures, and here we are told, on the face of these estimates, that there is a sum of $805,000 that is not earmarked for any place in the world and which can be used for the purpose of a capital outlay by the department anywhere in the whole globe.

I submit that is not a proper way for the House of Commons to deal with proposed expenditure. I moved in the committee that the subitem should be stricken out, because while we are quite prepared to deal on its merits with any proposed expenditure for which a case is made out, nevertheless we do not believe in just providing money loosely after this fashion for the government to use in any way it sees fit. I am glad to say that in the committee my amendment came very close to passing. It was defeated by a vote of only nine to six. It was supported by all Conservative and C.C.F. members of the committee although, of course, it was opposed by the Liberal members, and they were supported by the Social Credit member on that committee.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to renew that motion now, and I hope that what I have said about the extravagance in connection with the purchase of the embassy at Rio and its furnishings will alert the house to the danger of placing large sums of money like this at the disposal of the department without any strings attached to them. It is difficult enough in the case of these expenditures that are made abroad, where it is only very rarely that a member of the committee or a member of the house has an opportunity of seeing with his own eyes the results, without placing a sum of nearly $1 million at the disposal of the department without any strings attached to it save that it must be expended abroad on capital account for buildings or furnishings.

The excuse given by the department is that they may have the opportunity of making a good buy somewhere, that there are capitals in the world where the department wishes to acquire property for the housing of its diplomatic representatives and if opportunities present themselves they should be in a position to take advantage of them. I think that is a very dangerous doctrine to follow. That doctrine, if followed, could result in a very serious weakening of parliamentary control over expenditures. We are sitting here now seven months a year, or perhaps even more, and we have estimates and supplementary estimates introduced about four times a year. I cannot see that any lengthy period is ever likely to elapse before parliament would be in a position to deal with any opportunity that is offered.

The principle of parliamentary control over public expenditure is a very important principle and we should not be parties to weakening it. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move:

That item 95 of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs be reduced by the sum of $805,000 by elimination of the "unallotted capital items" on page 183.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this matter was, of course, discussed in detail in the committee on external affairs, and I am glad it was. The hon. member has also discussed it in detail last night and this morning, and I certainly have no quarrel with that because I am just as interested in the avoidance of extravagance in the expenditure of Canadian funds as he is. The hon. member knows, of course, because he has been a guest and I am sure a very welcome guest at a good many of our missions abroad, that an embassy or a legation is not a private residence. It is the official residence of the representative of Canada, and when we buy property naturally we try to keep that in mind. It is Canada in that particular foreign capital and we want that property, that residence, to be suitable. We also want it to be permanent. In the case of Rio, for instance, we hope that this embassy will be the official centre of Canada in Brazil for 50, 75 or maybe 100 years, and so we purchase for a long time.

In purchasing we look for something suitable, a house for the job and not for any particular person. That means that an embassy, which is not a private residence, has to have accommodation for official receptions, official dinners and all those things which are an important part of diplomatic activities especially, if I may so, in a South American state. There is nothing in our mind—and I mention this because the hon. member referred to it two or three times—of keeping up with the Joneses. That does not seem to me to be a very pertinent observation in any event, because whether one wants to keep up with the Joneses in any activity would depend very largely on where the Joneses are and where they are going. Very often we should be well behind the Joneses and possibly at times we should be well ahead of them.

So far as Rio is concerned, in this capital we are not concerned with aping the customs and the habits of the diplomatic representation of any other country. We do what we think is right for Canada. If we had wished to keep up with the Joneses in Rio, some of the Joneses have spent between a million and a million and a half dollars on their embassies in that capital. We buy buildings when we are able to buy them with economy as well as efficiency, and with representational propriety in mind. So far as Rio is concerned, it is a great metropolitan capital of an important South American state, the South American state with which we in Canada probably have our most important commercial and political relationships, and I say that without implying any reflection upon our relations with any other South American state. But it is possibly true that our commercial contacts with Rio are more important than those with any other South American country.

It is also true that Rio is one of the most expensive capitals in the world, and that has a bearing on the purchase of property there. In other places where it is not so expensive we get property much more cheaply, and that does not mean that we attach less importance to our representation in those capitals or more importance to our representation in Rio. It just happens that in those capitals, some of which are comparable to Ottawa in real estate and residential values, we are able to purchase residences for our representatives at $42,000 in one place, $85,000 in another, $44,000 in another, $56,000 in another and $73,000 in another. Those residences for those sums of money are suitable for Canadian representation there and we do not pay any more if we do not have to.

As for Rio, there is obviously an advantage in trying to buy property there rather than renting, if we can do so. We have been renting a property in Rio for 14 years, and if my hon. friend could see some of the rental figures and compare them with rental figures in Rio generally he would realize that this is not an economic or effective way of doing business there. During that time we have turned down places for purchasing because they were too expensive, and we have been offered residences there which were less expensive but which were entirely unsuitable.

My hon. friend referred to the fact that we had an option to purchase Mr. MacCrimmon's residence there at $80,000. The fact of that particular matter is that two or three years ago we offered the owner of this house $190,000 for that residence and were turned down. We made that offer even though our ambassador on the spot said that in his opinion it was not suitable for a Canadian embassy in Rio. However, after further investigation we thought it was suitable and we offered $190,000 and were refused. Meanwhile we were paying a very high rental. In this last year we were told that we would have to vacate the house we were renting at a figure of something over $2,000 a month, and the owner of a very good residential property in Rio came back to us with an offer which was about $250,000 less than he had made to us a few years before.

Having regard to all the circumstances and after an independent valuation by, I think, three real estate dealers, and as the alternative was renting another house at a figure comparable with the rental we were paying, we decided this was a satisfactory purchase. If we had rented another house we would have had to pay a rental which included all the taxes on the property and other charges. When we purchase diplomatic property we get diplomatic exemption from these taxes and these charges, and that fact normally makes it desirable to buy. The furnishings of the embassy have been gone into in detail. This house was not furnished by the man who happened to be ambassador at the time. It was done by somebody brought from Canada, an independent interior decorator.

More important, possibly, is the question which is the subject of this amendment, that we should not have in our estimates a sum of money—the figure is $800,000—for the purchase of properties abroad without specifying how much we want for each property in each country. We would be limited in this way to the purchase of properties within that amount in any country.

I submit that this would be an uneconomic procedure, and I make that suggestion for two reasons. One is that we in this department are still in a period of expansion. I hope we are reaching the limit of our expansion, though we are continually approached by other governments and indeed we receive suggestions in this house that we should expand our diplomatic representation. When the period of expansion is over we will have satisfied our residential property requirements and we will not need more houses for that purpose. But we need them now. We need to have accommodation in five or six capitals, and we may need more if we have to open more offices.

There are times during the course of the year when we are offered property which is satisfactory and economic for the job to be done. Sometimes those offers are kept open only for a few weeks, because in some of these capitals it is extremely difficult indeed to get property. If we had to specify our purchases in advance, one of two things would happen. We would only put in the amount we were absolutely certain of spending because we had agreed on valuations for properties which we know we would need during the course of the year. Or we would put in for each capital where we needed property an estimated amount, and at the end of the year we might find that as offers had not been forthcoming at prices we could pay we would have been able to spend only one-third or one-fourth of that amount. Hence we would have either inflated estimates on the one hand or we would have to miss economic opportunities to purchase on the other.

That is why we in our department have considered it good business to put in this lump sum, so we can take advantage of opportunities during the year when we know there are certain places where we want to buy property if we can get suitable property.

It is not correct, Mr. Chairman, to say there are no strings attached to this amount.

Whenever a suitable property is available and it is felt by the department to be suitable on representational as well as business grounds, treasury board has to agree to purchase after a very careful examination and valuation of the property. Of course we in the department cannot spend any of these sums of money without treasury board approval and without an exhaustive survey by the board. It is therefore my opinion that this amendment, far from leading to economy, might have the effect either of the inflation of our estimates to take advantage of any opportunities that might arise, or might lead in the other direction, namely that of extravagance; because we might not be able to take advantage of good offers during the year. With property values going up in these capitals, in common with property values in Ottawa, if we did not have the money to buy a property on the spot, next year we might have to pay 50 per cent more for something else.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, there is one question I should like to ask the minister, in view of his statement, and it is this. When the national gallery purchased some pictures which cost a great deal of money—I believe about $800,000—from the Prince of Liechtenstein last year, they did not have the money on hand with which to do it. However, the deal was made and then the sum was put in the supplementary estimates. That seemed to be the policy of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, or rather the policy of the minister under whose jurisdiction the national gallery comes. What would be the objection to using that same method in the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. Pearson: There would be no objection, Mr. Chairman, if it could be done in connection with property purchases. But our experience has been that the owners of property that we consider suitable to purchase are not willing to hold the property for us until we can get an estimate passed by parliament at the next session. We feel that if it were not done in the way in which we are proposing to have it done, we would lose these properties.

We have taken this matter up with treasury board in order to see whether there is some way in which we could work out interim financing, so we would be able to have the exact amount later in the estimates to confirm the interim financing. We are still discussing the matter with them, but so far treasury board has not come up with any solution which appears to be any more effective or economical than the one we are proposing.

[Mr. Pearson.]

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In his remarks the minister indicated that furnishings for residences of this kind were recommended or purchased through an independent interior decorator who, I assume, is taken down for that purpose. What is the basis of compensation for such a man? Is it a percentage basis, or does he get a fixed fee?

Mr. Pearson: When we ask an interior decorator or someone with those qualifications to advise us on a matter of this kind we normally pay his travelling expenses to the foreign country and a fee for the services performed.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Then the fee is not tied in any way to the amount of money that is spent in the purchase of the equipment?

Mr. Pearson: No. I am informed that the fee is not related in any way to the value of the property or the value of the furnishings purchased.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister this question. What was the fee paid to this gentleman, and what was the amount of his travelling expenses?

Mr. Pearson: In the case to which the hon. member refers, the interior decorator was willing to give us his services and his advice on this matter for travelling expenses only.

Mr. Fleming: What were they? Can the minister give us the amount?

Mr. Pearson: I have not that amount with me, but I shall be glad to find out, Mr. Chairman, and give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Fleming: Is it concluded in this particular figure, or does it come under another item in the estimates?

Mr. Pearson: I think it is under another item. We are looking it up. I shall give it to my hon. friend just as soon as I can get it.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment of Mr. Fleming.

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 66.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman. This is perhaps not the item under which this matter should be brought up, but I do not think there is such an item, so I will bring it up here. I know it is an item in which the minister is interested. I just received a telegram from Mr. Milan Babic of Toronto, and perhaps I should read it. It is addressed to me and reads:

> Reason no protest my solicitor Louis Herman just arrived Toronto from Mexico. As per news story detained over 20 hours after being taken out of steamship pier by back door and apparently listed as missing. Friends unable to ascertain my whereabouts and when I requested permission to communicate with Canadian consul I was told by officer consul's office closed and could not be contacted. Strongly protest gestapolike treatment without slightest justification.
> (sgd.) Milan Babic.

The Chairman: May I remind the hon. member that we are discussing an item in connection with the construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings. I do not see how this matter can be taken up under such an item.

Mr. Hees: I asked permission to bring it up. I am speaking very briefly.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to speak on this item?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Shall item 95 carry?

Mr. Hees: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman; if the Liberal members of the house are not interested in the trials and tribulations of Canadian citizens, then—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hees: —then those citizens know where they stand with those Liberal members.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The members on this side of the house are interested in the proper administration of the Department of External Affairs, and they do not think that administration should be guided, to the extent to which the hon. member himself feels it should be guided, by him.

Mr. Hees: I understood, Mr. Chairman, the minister said he was interested in receiving a communication from this man. Here is the communication—

Some hon. Members: Order. Sit down.

Mr. Hees: —and I should like to know what the minister proposes to do about it.

The Chairman: May I point out to the hon. member that there are proper times for bringing up these matters, but under this item a matter of this kind could not possibly be brought up.

Mr. Nesbitt: On page 179 of the estimates there is an item for diplomatic missions abroad. One of those items is for China, Nanking, and it is for $6,305. Then on page 183 there is an item for Shanghai, China, $2,625. I inquired about these items when we were in committee and was told they were for maintenance. What I should like to know is why, if these are maintenance expenses, it requires $6,000 to maintain whatever buildings there are in Nanking and $2,600 to maintain the office in Shanghai. Are those the expenses of a caretaker or two caretakers, or exactly what is involved?

In addition, I should like to know whether or not we have any buildings or a place of representation in Formosa?

Mr. Pearson: In so far as the Nanking expenditure is concerned, Mr. Chairman, we still own property in Nanking where our embassy, as my hon. friend knows, was situated before the communists took over. That property has not been interfered with. It is in charge of a housekeeper and a part-time gardener, and this $6,000 is the expense of keeping the property in shape and looking after it during the period the communist Chinese government is in charge of China. We are not permitted to inspect the premises ourselves.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps the minister could tell us who makes these arrangements. Is it the British embassy there?

Mr. Pearson: Yes. When we have to have contact with the government in Peking we make it through the British government representative in Peking.

Mr. Nesbitt: The other question I asked was, do we have any buildings or offices of any sort in Formosa?

Mr. Pearson: I am informed that the Shanghai charge is related to the fact we had a consul in Shanghai before the Chinese communists took over. This charge is to pay for the storage and maintenance of our office equipment there. We operate through the British consul in this matter.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have asked the minister twice now if we had any office or building of any sort for representation in Formosa?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman, we have no representation in Formosa. Our diplomatic contacts when required in Formosa, as in other cases where we are not represented, are maintained through the British representative there.

Item agreed to.

96. To provide for official hospitality, $30,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Realizing the difficulties that are inherent in the present dispersal of this department amongst several buildings and the resultant difficulty of providing for official hospitality, would the minister care to say whether or not consideration has been given to bringing external affairs into one central location, and to the establishment of a foreign office? I mention that because as the situation is today I realize that entertainment is done either at the Chateau, at other hotels or at one of the clubs, and I should like to know what consideration has been given to the establishment of a foreign office in Ottawa?

Mr. Pearson: A good deal of consideration has been given to it by our department in consultation with the Department of Public Works. It is true that external affairs employees are scattered, but that is true also of other departments in the government, where the situation is probably worse in that respect than it is with us. So we have taken our place on the list of priorities. We are not at the top, but in due course we hope there will be a separate building in Ottawa as a foreign office where all the employees of the department can be working under one roof and where provision can be made for the kind of activity which my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say whether or not any plans have been drawn in connection therewith, and the general idea and concept of this foreign office? What is the general concept the department has in mind?

Mr. Pearson: Plans have been drawn up, but as I have said our priority is low and they are not likely to be realized for some years. I doubt very much, though I have not the details of the plans in my mind, whether there is any provision even in those tentative plans for the inclusion of facilities for entertainment. I think that will have to be done in the future outside the foreign office.

Item agreed to.

98. Canadian representation at international conferences, $200,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: There is one question on item 98. I see the amount in the estimates this year is the same as it was last year. Could the minister tell us whether there will be approximately the same number of conferences each year?

Mr. Pearson: There are international conferences which are held annually and we can provide for them. But in addition there are conferences that are periodic and some that are called in emergency situations. All we can do is estimate for those. This amount is designed to cover the ones we know we will have to attend, and to make some provision for emergencies. For instance, the newspapers this morning talk about a possible conference in connection with the Suez canal. If that took place and if we were invited to it and went, that is the kind of conference for which we really cannot provide in advance except in this way.

Mr. Nesbitt: Does this item take into consideration any conferences which are held as a result of United Nations activities, for example?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Chairman; this is designed to cover the regular United Nations conferences.

Item agreed to.

99. Grant to the United Nations association in Canada, $11,000.

Mr. Nicholson: Is the minister making any progress in discussions with the United Nations association on the possibility of having better public information services in Canada in connection with the work of FAO, WHO and UNESCO?

I raise this question each year when the estimates come up and also discuss it with the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but apparently no department of government in Canada seems to worry a great deal about making known to our people in Canada the problems that are being faced by these international organizations.

I noticed that in the Toronto papers yesterday a great deal of publicity was given to a swimming star, but rarely do we see anything in the Canadian papers regarding the very imaginative work which is being undertaken by some Canadians in different parts of the world.

The last Colombo plan release I had gave information that some 40 Canadians are in different parts of the world. It is on a typewritten sheet, but there is no information about their names, where they are or what they are doing. It would seem to me that some of these people come from Halifax, Regina, Calgary or Vancouver, and some of the people in the cities where these young people live should be given some information from time to time regarding their work. I think it is going to be increasingly difficult to get additional funds for these agencies that must have additional funds if the taxpayers of Canada are not given more information from time to time.

About a year ago the minister mentioned that probably a United Nations organization would be the organization—it would not be the responsibility of government—that should be given this responsibility. If they are given that responsibility then more funds should be made available. Can the minister make some comment as to whether any discussion has taken place with a view to increasing the grant, or whether his own department feel they should set up an agency? I realize that criticisms have come from the Progressive Conservative party from time to time regarding what is being done with respect to new expenses, but I feel that here is one important sector of the work of external affairs that should have additional funds.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I know that my hon. friend has a very special interest in this matter, because we have discussed it, and I know that for some time now he has not been satisfied with what is being done in this respect, both in the government and possibly outside the government, through grants of this kind. All I can say is that in our information division we have not been allotted appropriations which would enable us to do more than we are doing in publicizing the activities of international organizations and the Colombo plan in Canada.

But I would point out to him the grant we make to the United Nations association to assist it in this work, and I think the more of this work that can be done by voluntary organizations the better. This particular grant has helped the United Nations association do a good deal of publicizing of the activities of the United Nations and its specialized agencies. For instance, the association prepares and distributes the world review of United Nations activities for Canadian schools, and about 52,000 copies are printed monthly, which are distributed by the provincial departments of education. I also know that the Colombo plan organization has increased its information activities through its central office fund in the last year; but I am not going to quarrel with the suggestion of the hon. member that more could be done, and I am not going to quarrel with him that more should be done. In fact, the resources we have now do not permit us to do any more.

Item agreed to.

102. To authorize and provide for the payment of fellowships and scholarships and travelling expenses to enable Canadians to study in France, The Netherlands and Italy, and to the extent that blocked funds are available for these expenditures, to provide for payment from these foreign currencies owned by Canada and provided only for governmental or other limited purposes, and for payment to the Royal Society of Canada of amounts not to exceed $10,000 in all to meet travelling and other administrative costs incurred by the society for those it may designate to act on its behalf in selecting persons to receive fellowships and scholarships, $125,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this item to authorize and provide for the payment of fellowships and scholarships and travelling expenses to enable Canadians to study in France, The Netherlands and Italy, will the minister give some general idea as to the qualifications required of applicants in connection with these fellowships? There seems to be a lack of general information in this regard. I think it is a most laudable purpose and one that deserves every co-operation on the part of the Department of External Affairs. There is a worthwhile contribution to be made under this system of fellowships, and I do feel there is not that general knowledge of the basis for qualification that should be available to those who might consider applying, if they knew of its existence.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this amount covers, as my hon. friend knows, the graduate fellowships and scholarships which are granted to Canadian students from federal funds for study abroad. As he also knows, the scholars in question are chosen not by the government but by the Royal Society, which administers these schemes.

In 1955-56 the Royal Society allotted 16 scholarships, 12 fellowships and 28 other awards. These awards are given for study abroad not only in the natural sciences but in the social sciences. As my hon. friend knows, the money was originally paid out of blocked funds in European countries which accrued after the war, but that source of assistance has come to, or is coming to, an end. It is hoped that we can continue this assistance to scholars through a regular appropriation of this kind, not from blocked funds.

I agree that possibly there has not been as much publicity given to this as is desirable, but the Royal Society of Canada has from time to time issued pamphlets to universities where the information is available. The most recent one I have before me was issued just a few weeks ago, which gives a good deal of information as to how to apply, the qualifications required and the nature and scope of the assistance. This should supply all the information that is required by any applicant for a scholarship, and I am informed that it is given quite wide distribution by the Royal Society.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, when the day comes that blocked funds are used up and we shall appropriate money in this parliament specifically for this purpose, would it be the intention of the government to see that scholars and students are able to go to countries other than those mentioned in this vote?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, if or when the time comes that this is a normal vote and not out of blocked funds, there will be no limitation except those limitations laid down by the Royal Society itself, on the institutions where this work may be carried on by the fellow or scholar.

Item agreed to.

105. To provide for the Canadian government's contribution to the United Nations expanded program for technical assistance to under-developed countries in an amount of $1,800,000 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1955, which is, $1,798,875.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, this item is to provide for the Canadian government's contribution to the United Nations' expanded program for technical assistance to under-developed countries. This matter was given considerable attention in the committee, and it is not my intention to make any extended remarks on this item. I am sure we all appreciate the work that is being done in this connection.

I was somewhat perturbed to come across an article in my home town newspaper, the Abbotsford, Sumas and Matsqui News for Wednesday, June 27. The heading of this article is "Critical of Assistance Given Asiatic Countries" and it has to do with both the technical assistance programs and the Colombo plan. I want to read just two or three paragraphs from this article and perhaps the minister would like to take notice of the contents. The first paragraph is as follows:

That the technical assistance agencies attempting to raise the standards in industries in Asiatic countries are failing in the task for which they were designed, is the personal opinion of Dr. John W. A. Brant, physiologist, who is currently vacationing with relatives in Abbotsford.

The third paragraph from the top in the article reads as follows:

His work during the past year was similar to his year in Ceylon with a team of United Nations technical officers.

I am just picking out pertinent paragraphs. Further down in the article the following appears:

Dr. Brant suggests the technical programs are far-fetched. They are not in step with the culture and historical progress of the country. Dr. Brant explains that United Nations technical experts and experts from other similar agencies, when they are sent to the Asiatic countries, are assigned to government branches or commercial and academic institutions. Quite often those who are trained turn their knowledge to personal gain, rather than passing it on to the masses.

Another paragraph is as follows:

In many instances, the technical assistance being given is causing more harm than good. In effect, the present programs are attempting to force 1,000 years of progress on these countries overnight.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

A final paragraph reads:

Of the three agencies, Colombo plan, United Nations, and the United States, which are currently supplying assistance to Asiatic countries, the Colombo plan is the most effective, Dr. Brant believes.

I do not know just how qualified this gentleman is to make these observations, but certainly if he has been a member of the teams in these various countries his words should be worth something. I thought possibly the minister might be interested in making some inquiries regarding this gentleman, learning by what authority Dr. Brant speaks and whether or not his observations are correct.

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to do that, Mr. Chairman. I know, of course, there have been some criticisms made of the technical assistance programs. It would be surprising if that were not the case, because there are great difficulties in the provision of technical assistance in these countries. So often it is not possible to get enough of the best technicians to do the work. That is one of the reasons I wish we could have some kind of international civil service organized under the United Nations, so people would be continuously available for this kind of thing. Having regard to these difficulties, I nevertheless think the project itself has been effective and successful although, as I have said, it has had its disappointments.

I hope the committee will feel this expenditure of $1,800,000 is very worth while. In some ways the Colombo plan—and we are not talking about that—has been more successful than the United Nations technical assistance program because of the intimate relationship between the member countries, which has made it easier to develop co-operative projects; but the United Nations scheme which is now under good organization and administration—the head is a Canadian—is doing a very worth-while job. I shall be glad to look into the particular matter raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if it might not be possible to do something under our own civil service in this regard. We know there is a great shortage of competent personnel to assist countries whom we would wish to assist in a technical way. Would it not be possible to open up a new sort of career for Canadians, both men and women, who would be interested in devoting their lives to this very significant form of aid to those who are less fortunate than we are? In other words, is the department considering at all giving some sort of moral support to universities in the training of young men and women who would be prepared to enter this new concept of civil service, nomadic perhaps in a certain way, whereby they would be on tap, as it were, to be sent to different countries when requests come from them.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I know our own civil service commission has tried to help whenever it could in the provision of experts of this kind for the United Nations, but I realize that my hon. friend would go further than that. I should tell him that this very matter is now under active consideration at the economic and social council meeting now being held in Geneva. This is a matter in which our delegation is very interested, and the secretary general of the United Nations is also very interested in it. I hope that in the course of time something will be developed along these lines on an international basis.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately there are many committees sitting which makes it impossible for one to be here when one wishes. The hon. member for Fraser Valley indicated in his address on the first item that I would take part in this debate. I rather hoped to deal quite extensively with the United Nations, but I see that we have reached the technical assistance stage, so I will have to try to confine my remarks to the particular item we are discussing.

I am thinking now of the question that was dealt with to some extent in the United Nations. That is the matter of SUNFED, the special United Nations fund for economic development. I found in the discussion, which interested me a great deal, the suggestion made by a great many of these countries who would take part in it that in the operation of the fund those who were the contributors would not be in a position to regulate the use of the fund. I know there is a great deal of argument in favour of that course, though I would personally prefer to see those who are contributing in some way have a greater say in the actual expenditure.

Earlier in this debate the hon. member for Prince Albert quoted a statement to the effect that every dollar put into investment in this field is worth $5 in defence. Possibly he is quite right, but I would say we should only invest to the degree that the investment can be absorbed in the particular country that is being given assistance. I think that is one of the problems we have to deal with specifically.

We find that the countries of southeast Asia are generally considered to be neutral. I do not know what a definition of neutrality would be, unless it could be that a decision would be reached by that country as to whom they might think would be the victors in the event of a catastrophe and on that basis they would decide on the country of which they would be in favour. Be that as it may, that is the only field from which we are going to be able to draw any reserve in the event of war or a similar catastrophe; therefore I think we should do everything within our power to see to it that we assist these people in every way possible.

I am satisfied that if the United States today is being held in some disregard by these countries—or for that matter, if we ourselves are being held in disregard by them—the reason is that they feel every time they receive financial assistance of any kind certain strings are attached to it. For that reason we have to revise our thinking on technical matters.

Asians, I believe, fear it. They have just got over a long period of colonialism, over 300 hundred years of it, and they do not want to have any more of it. I have listened with a great deal of interest on former occasions to speeches in this house having to do with United States investment in this country. We find in this country and in this house a great number of people who are completely opposed to further United States investment in this country because, they say, there are strings attached to it. We might only place ourselves in the same position in Asia in some of these underdeveloped countries, and we come back to the same conclusion that these people reach in this country. They are no more desirous of that help than we are, because they feel there are certain strings attached.

Therefore, as I said earlier, I think we should revise our thinking to a degree on this particular problem. I wonder whether the government has given any thought to a different approach to the question. We have the field of technical education and university training, authority for which is given to the provinces alone. I would propose, though, that instead of just continually giving aid to the underdeveloped countries we change our thinking and possibly develop in Canada an international university and technical training school, to which Canadians would not be allowed to go, perhaps centralized in one of the prairie provinces because of the facilities we have there, agricultural and otherwise. We could invite students from India and some of the other underdeveloped countries to come to this college or school, whichever you call it, for the purpose of training them in our field of agriculture, in irrigation methods and any other things we feel it necessary that they must know before they are able to utilize the machinery and equipment we send them.

I am satisfied that our provinces would not take exception to this, because we would not be entering into their field of education. We would be doing something for the world in an effort to stimulate an interest in those underdeveloped countries in becoming more familiar with our techniques of operation. I am satisfied that the U.S.S.R. is doing something along similar lines. In reading the text of many of the bulletins they send us in this house I find that they frequently make reference to students who are there. But because of our charter under the British North America Act our government is not in a position to assist at this time in a similar way to the Soviets, and it is my suggestion that this other course be given due consideration by the government, only for the purpose of teaching these people how to utilize machinery and giving them the technical training they require and, indeed, going on to give them a university training, or the engineering training that is required if the underdeveloped countries are going to become of any value to us.

The over-all effect might be that coming into contact with Canadians as they are bound to do, they would appreciate more of the problems that we have, for indeed we have certain areas of our country that are underdeveloped in the way of capital investment by this government. However, instead of continually putting more and more dollars into a field of investment which is not appreciated because of the strings attached, I think we should find some new approach that would be acceptable to these former colonial countries.

Mr. Blackmore: Before the item carries I wish to discuss a matter which I intended to discuss the other day. I have been greatly intrigued by the "package deal" that the Minister of National Health and Welfare endeavoured to negotiate in relation to the United Nations last fall. On July 26 I asked the minister if he would be here during this discussion, and he said he would be; but yesterday he gave me to understand that he is prevented from being in Ottawa because of an unfortunate accident to one of his children, which detains him at home.

I wonder whether I might ask of the Secretary of State for External Affairs the questions that I desired to ask of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, if he does not feel that that would be imposing on him? If he would be willing to answer the questions or give his idea as to what the Minister of National Health and Welfare would have said, then I should like to talk about that matter for a little while.

I am interested not only in the fact that there was a "package deal" which this house did not know was going to come up. There was no announcement whatever about it, and as far as we know the government knew nothing about it. If people, with no more permission from this house to go and speak for it respecting international affairs than, as far as I know, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has, are able to go to the United Nations and commit Canada by implication as that minister did last year, I do not know what outrageous things we might expect to be sprung on us at almost any time. I feel that under the circumstances a matter so serious as that should never have been taken up until we had a chance to discuss it. Perhaps I am quite wrong; I just want to be advised in the matter.

I had several questions which I desired to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Probably I would be well advised to read those questions first so the minister will have a chance to give them some thought.

First, will the minister give the house an account of his attempt in November and December, 1955, to obtain the admission of 18 nations into the United Nations general assembly in the so-called "package deal" which he supported?

Second, what in a general way did the minister conceive to be the advantage to be derived from the admission of this "package" to the United Nations general assembly?

Third, why were these particular nations chosen?

Fourth, name in order the nations on the list, and in the case of each give the special reason for including that particular nation on the list.

Fifth, where was that list made up—in Ottawa, in New York, in Moscow—or was it the result of the collaboration of all three?

Sixth, it was reported that when a United Nations person asked the minister what was the reason for Canada's stand to admit all 18 of these nations, including Mongolia and other communist countries, the minister said, "Our interest in the matter is government policy." Did the minister say those words?

Now I think I have something on which the Secretary of State for External Affairs can go to work, if he so desires; but while his experts are going into this matter, which probably is quite a surprise to them, may I say just a word or two about this question of Outer Mongolia? This matter of attempting to get Outer Mongolia into the United Nations brings up the whole question of the recognition of red China and the whole question of Chiang Kai-shek, the Chinese nationalist government, and their right to be recognized as the government of China and to be in their position in the United Nations.

It probably is not generally known that Outer Mongolia never did belong to Russia except during the years 1912 and 1913, when it belonged to czarist Russia for a little while. Mongolia, Manchuria and Sinkiang formed a belt of territories or possessions along the northern border of China. They had been Chinese possessions since the days of Genghis Khan, if I am correctly informed. Consequently these three provinces were under the control of the Manchus, and when the Manchus were disposed of as the result of the work of Dr. Sun Yat-sen and Chiang Kai-shek, naturally the ownership of these three territories would come into the hands of Chiang Kai-shek and nationalist China. There can be no doubt about that.

Russia did nothing sufficient herself to get control of these three provinces although she had been trying to do so for a long long time, even before the days of the communists. Why should Outer Mongolia, which, as far as rights are concerned, still belongs to nationalist China and Chiang Kai-shek, be made into an independent nation, "a liberated nation" I suppose, according to modern terminology used by the communists, the pro-communists and the communist dupes? Why should a nation like that be admitted as a member of the United Nations general assembly? That is a question that will require a lot of answering and a lot of explaining. I should like to have the minister say a word or two on that matter. Perhaps his experts are not prepared to do so. If they are not, I shall read a statement which will indicate—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear what the hon. gentleman is going to read but I am quite ready to deal with the question he has raised, though I am not sure how it can be brought under this item in the estimates. I would tell him on this matter—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Before the minister replies, may I say that I am afraid if he does reply at this moment he may be just as badly out of order as I am afraid the hon. member for Lethbridge is. I do know that notice was given by the hon. member for Lethbridge of his intention to bring up this matter and that it was delayed in order, if possible, to have the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the house at the time, but I should like to suggest to the hon. member for Lethbridge and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that item 105 now before the committee is to provide for the Canadian government's contribution to the United Nations expanded program for technical assistance to underdeveloped countries.

I might point out that item 617, which we have not yet reached, is to provide for the Canadian government's assessment for membership in international organizations. I think the points brought up by the hon. member for Lethbridge deal entirely with the policy to be adopted by Canada. Perhaps his arguments might deal with the desirability or otherwise of paying our assessment to certain international organizations, but they hardly deal with our contribution to a program of technical assistance.

Therefore I suggest to both hon. members that we would have a more orderly discussion if we completed item 105 and the similar items which are for specific purposes, on the distinct understanding that the questions raised by the hon. member for Lethbridge will be dealt with under item 617. If that is agreeable to the committee, I think it is the proper conclusion to arrive at.

Mr. Blackmore: I entirely agree with you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: I want to say a word or two about the item. I have had the opportunity and the pleasure of getting to know a number of students from India, Ceylon and other countries who have come to Trail to receive additional training at the plant of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. These people are all very intelligent, in many cases highly trained and well versed, and I must say that I have made a point of asking them what they thought of our system of technical assistance. In every case they have thought that it was to their advantage to be trained in various industrial plants, universities and so on in Canada, and I am quite sure from my experience and the experience of the people of the district that it is to the mutual advantage of the student and the community concerned to have these associations. They have been most happy ones in the Trail district.

I might also mention at this time that I have had some long conversations with these men. They are most interesting people to meet. I have asked them what they thought of our Colombo plan and in every case they have expressed the highest appreciation of the work that is being done by Canada in their countries under the Colombo plan.

106. Contribution to the United Nations children's fund, $650,000.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, this is a vote which, of course, is going to get the support of the whole house because we are all interested in the United Nations children's fund. I am glad to see the government taking the lead in providing money for that fund, but I do not think it is good enough just to have the government do it. We have to spread the idea that individuals should help. We have tried in the past, though not altogether successfully, and we have to spread the idea amongst the citizenry of Canada so they can play a greater part in helping this most essential fund. The most important citizens of all are the youngsters of Canada, and I am going to suggest to the department that perhaps they have a job here they can do.

I noticed that last year at Halloween quite a number of children, instead of going from door to door dressed up in various disguises and getting apples, candies and other little benefits for themselves, went around collecting for UNICEF. It was an excellent idea indeed. I wonder whether it would not be possible for the Department of External Affairs to get in touch with the provincial departments of education and suggest that they in turn write to the school principals suggesting that on the last day of October, Halloween, the children of the various schools be encouraged to go around not gathering gifts for themselves but for the United Nations children's fund. It would be a good thing for the youngsters to do for their own sakes, and I am sure it would be of inestimable value to UNICEF. I think perhaps a lead might be given here by the department, if it would follow out this suggestion.

Mr. Pearson: This department has a great variety of activities, but I confess that this is one that had not occurred to us. However, we will be glad to follow it up.

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe the Canadian branch of the United Nations association is doing very excellent promotional work in this regard. Is that not right?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, they have done some good things in this regard. UNICEF is an organization that appeals to everyone; nevertheless these efforts, governmental and non-governmental, might very effectively be supplemented by what my hon. friend has just suggested although, of course, it is a matter for the provincial education authorities. We will take it up with them.

North Atlantic Treaty Organization—

107. To provide, subject to the approval of the governor in council and notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, for special administrative expenses, including payment of remuneration, in connection with the assignment by the Canadian government of Canadians to the international staff of the North Atlantic treaty organization (part recoverable from the North Atlantic treaty organization), $35,484.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

Mr. Hahn: Last year it was my privilege to be in attendance at NATO with a group of parliamentarians from this country. As a matter of fact it was just about a year ago now. The session had been called for the purpose of seeing what could be done to implement the economic aspects of NATO. I was very pleased indeed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs saw at the time of the drafting of the charter a need for this particular clause, for it becomes more and more apparent as time goes on that NATO itself would be dying more quickly or would be dead if it were not for the hope that there would be some greater binding force than the military aspect that we have at the present time.

I know there are certain newspapers or certain groups that take a dim view of parliamentarians making these annual excursions. I might say this, however, Mr. Chairman. Aside from the matter of fellowship, which was irrelevant and unimportant, I certainly obtained a greater degree of understanding of the problems that are facing our European friends and other members of NATO in this regard. While it is true that some of us can speak from time to time on questions pertaining to our own country, when it comes to this matter of international problems it is necessary that we be somewhat more familiar with them than we are at the present time if we are actually to understand what are the problems that face these member nations.

The only way in which that can be done, so far as I can see, is to take a group of parliamentarians to Europe—and I would say a different group each year—in order that they might become more familiar with those questions and might come back with some intelligent reasons for what they think should be done to assist our cause.

In my discussions with these friends I found that it was the fear of war that was responsible for the bringing into existence of NATO. But fear is not a binding force, in my estimation, and we want a binding force. I would therefore say that the other aspect which the Secretary of State for External Affairs emphasized when he was on the committee drafting the charter is the more important one, and that it should be emphasized more and more. It is up to us as members of this house to try to give him ideas. As one of the three wise men I am sure he would be anxious to hear how we would implement the economic factor, for in that way alone lies the continuance of NATO.

The world today is divided into several blocs. We have the Arab bloc, the Soviet bloc, the China bloc, the Southeast Asia bloc, and the American bloc, as it is sometimes called. In trying to analyse these problems as we see them, we can arrive at a reasonable solution only by integrating ourselves, by becoming more closely associated more particularly with the nations which we have reason to believe are our friends and allies, and by co-operating with them. General Gruenther, who is to leave the association, has certainly gained the respect of everybody. However, I am satisfied that his successor will prove to be just as able and capable as he was.

We were particularly well represented. We were very fortunate I might say, in our own organization in having with us—he has now been transferred to the head office—Air Vice Marshal Campbell and Brigadier Anderson, who are doing a noble work. Indeed, I am satisfied that it is only as a direct result of the fine work that Brigadier Anderson has done among our troops in Soest that we have today men and women who have become ambassadors at large in Europe, following the unfortunate incidents when the Canadian troops first came over and settled in that area. It was only through his work, his integration, his ability to sell the fact that Canadians are human beings just the same as other people, that they were made so acceptable to the German people. I am sure we cannot compliment this man too highly for the work he has done and for the high regard in which he is held by Europeans, particularly by the Germans in the community with which he is associated.

There is, however, one other factor that interested me. When I was at the United Nations last year I was privileged to be in attendance at a special meeting that was called by some of the original signatories to the North Atlantic treaty. Senator Robertson was the guest speaker, and at that meeting were representatives from each of the NATO countries. I believe the only country which was not represented on that occasion was Turkey. Each one of us was privileged to give a five-minute address following the senator's remarks. The feature that stuck with me most was the statement by every last representative from those countries that NATO would die unless the economic aspect was brought forward and developed.

This suggestion is very definitely borne out by the action of Iceland. There just the military aspect has been emphasized at all times; we have sacrificed the economic aspect. I would say that we must develop that aspect in order that we may re-establish ourselves as a North Atlantic Treaty Organization that will continue to function in order to offset the forward march with which the Soviets are plaguing us today. NATO can be, and in the future should be, developed more and more in the economic field.

I see that it is just about one o'clock, Mr. Chairman. However, if the committee will bear with me for about two minutes, I shall have finished. I have only one or two observations to make with respect to methods.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member has consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hahn: My reference is to methods of developing the economic end of NATO. They are only three in number, in fact. I would make the suggestion that while we have the three wise men, the organization might set up a special committee for the purpose of studying only the economic aspect of this matter. It would be more a committee to inquire into the possibilities of integrating trade between these nations.

First I would suggest an overseas investment program. There would be no give-aways as far as I am concerned, because of the strings attached on the basis I mentioned earlier in respect to the United Nations, but it would be just as applicable in NATO. This program would be administered through an advisory council in consultation with investors.

Then, in the matter of civil production, it would be most important to develop primary production for use and marketability; develop a nation in proportion to its adaptability, but at all times decentralize the organization so no part is solely dependent on the other. I think every nation wishes to keep its sovereignty and that it wants to seem independent even in this matter of trade, and not dependent solely on what someone else is producing. There should be a recognition of NATO by all members, they should recognize that they have a role to play either in economic or military matters, or both, to be protected at all times.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could tell us how many Canadian cabinet ministers attended meetings of NATO in Paris last year, and for how many days each were they at those meetings?

Mr. Pearson: Offhand, Mr. Chairman, I am not sure if I have that exact statistical information in terms of days. I attended three meetings of the NATO council last year myself, and the average length of the meetings was two or three days. I am now talking of the full ministerial council. My colleague the Minister of National Defence was also with me at the annual meeting. I think we were the only two, although I should like to check whether or not the Minister of Finance was at one of the meetings.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I think that points out one of the weaknesses of the NATO organization. There is no real meeting of minds between governments. I have a very high regard for the civil servants who are acting there on behalf of the governments, and particularly for the one who represents Canada. But if there is going to be reality in this subject of Atlantic unity there has to be what I call this meeting of minds, and it cannot come through meetings, no matter how frequent, of civil servants. It can only come through the meeting of ministers, those who really make policy.

What has happened all too frequently in the past is that arrangements have been arrived at, and properly so; then cabinet ministers have gone over and within a matter of a few hours have agreed to the arrangements which had hitherto, of course, been agreed upon. I do not think that is good enough. If we are going to make something out of NATO ministers must meet ministers, and problems must be threshed out in the council. I hope Canadian ministers will take a far greater interest in the work of NATO than they have in the past. I exempt the Secretary of State for External Affairs from that condemnation.

Item agreed to.

International joint commission—

109. Salaries and expenses of the commission including, subject to the approval of the governor in council and notwithstanding the International Boundary Waters Treaty Act, as amended, payment of salary of the chairman of $17,000 per annum, $100,745.

Mr. Green: This item, Mr. Chairman, has to do with the international joint commission. It would be helpful if the minister would explain the scope of the instructions given to that commission with regard to the Yukon river. Apparently there is some difference of opinion between the United States and Canada concerning the use of that river for power purposes. In any event, some problems have arisen. This is very important to Canada because of the tremendous power potential in the headwaters of the Yukon river and its tributaries. Incidentally, these headwaters lie not only in the Yukon but also in the northern part of the province of British Columbia. I should like the minister to explain just what is being done with regard to this matter.

While the minister is dealing with that, perhaps he could tell the committee whether the government has in mind undertaking any negotiations with the United States concerning access from the western boundary of British Columbia through the panhandle of Alaska to salt water. As the minister knows, this panhandle drops down over that western boundary for about half the whole length of the western boundary of British Columbia. In recent years there have been extensive developments taking place in the mining field in that part of British Columbia. There has been some suggestion that there should be a very large power plant somewhere on the Taku river a few miles inside the Canadian border, but always they run up against this problem of getting access to the sea.

At the same time, the Alaskan centres at tide level are not progressing very rapidly. I believe they are very anxious to have some solution so they can do a great deal more business than they are doing at the present time. If some arrangement is not made I think it will be only a short time until British Columbia will be forced to open up a highway system north and south through that part of the province's territory. While that would be more expensive, it would give an outlet by means of which the resources of that part of the province could be taken to market.

This is a question which will have to be handled quickly. It cannot be left indefinitely because of the developments that are taking place at the present time in that portion of the province. I wonder if the minister would deal with those two points this afternoon.

Mr. Pearson: In regard to the second point, Mr. Chairman, the proposed Yukon river reference for which there is an item in the estimates, the government of the United States has made overtures to the government here regarding a reference to this commission, the international joint commission, on the water resources of Alaska and the Yukon river. The Canadian government, up to the present, has not indicated whether it is willing to join in such a reference. At present, however, there is little or no factual information on the resources of the Yukon river and the Canadian section of the international joint commission—General McNaughton had something to say about this when he appeared before the committee on external affairs, and his evidence on this point appears on page 333—feels that at least a preliminary survey should be made of the river in the event a joint reference is agreed upon. This is being done.

In the light of past experience of the Columbia river reference in 1944, when Canada had very little information on the potentialities of that river thereby placing the Canadian section of the international joint commission in a difficult negotiating position, it is felt that this preliminary investigation should be made on our side before a decision is made in regard to referring the matter to the joint commission, and that is being done.

Mr. Green: There has been no agreement yet to refer the question to the commission?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman, there has been no agreement and will not likely be an agreement until we get the information from our side of the joint commission to which I have made reference.

The question of the panhandle was rather exhaustively discussed in the committee, and I submitted a statement on that matter to the committee which my hon. friend may or may not have read. I wonder whether I could refer him to the page—I think it is page 421 of the committee hearings—where this matter is gone into in some detail. I might add at this point that there is a difference of opinion as to whether a corridor of the kind he suggests would be desirable or is necessary at this time in the interests of the people of British Columbia. We have had evidence both for and against that.

In any event, we felt that nothing would be gained at the present moment by bringing this matter up officially in Washington, because we were quite convinced that we would get nowhere if we suggested some cession of territory for the sake of creating a corridor across the panhandle to the Pacific coast. On the contrary, we felt that if we raised that matter officially at this time we might get some counter-proposal from the United States government which would be embarrassing.

Mr. Green: What is the United States asking for with regard to the Yukon river? On what basis are they requesting a reference to the commission with regard to that river? The only part of the river which flows through Alaska seems to be a very long way from the area where power can be produced. On what basis is the United States asking for this reference?

Mr. Pearson: I am not quite sure whether I can answer that question, Mr. Chairman, without further information. All I know is that at the present time we have not given them any reason to believe that any such reference would be acceptable, and we would want to look into it very carefully before we came to a decision. In view of our lack of response I do not think the basis on which they made the request has quite so much importance. My colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources would know. His estimates are coming up next.

Mr. Green: Can the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources give the committee any further information on that point?

Mr. Lesage: I do not recall, sir, exactly what was the basis of the request of the government of the United States for a reference to the international joint commission on the Yukon river, but I believe our attitude has been pretty well described by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Our response, as he said, has been pretty negative; in the discussion that we shall be having with the United States we will be discussing the Yukon river as well as other important international rivers.

Mr. Green: When are those discussions to take place? Has a date been set?

Mr. Lesage: No date has been set, sir. We are having preliminary exchanges of an exploratory nature in order to try to define exactly what are the questions that are to be discussed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask about a very closely related subject which is going to be one of the matters to be discussed, I understand, at the forthcoming meeting of governments just referred to by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, namely the question of the Columbia river.

Mr. Lesage: My estimates are coming up next.

Mr. Fulton: But this is the item for the international joint commission.

Mr. Lesage: I also have one.

Mr. Fulton: While I am prepared to co-operate, I do not want to be foreclosed by one minister saying, "You should have brought it up under the other's estimates".

Mr. Lesage: Bring it up and we shall see.

Mr. Fulton: What I wish to ask is simply this. Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs prepared to discuss the present situation with regard to the Columbia river in so far as the international joint commission is concerned and the problems about which we both know, or would he himself prefer to leave the whole matter to be discussed on the estimates of the other department; because if we can have a better discussion there I would be prepared to defer it.

Mr. Pearson: I think there would be a better discussion on the estimates of my hon. friend's department, because his department is making the preparations for these intergovernmental talks that are about to take place with which the international joint commission, the Canadian side, will be associated; therefore I think it would be more constructive if we could postpone it until his estimates come up, and they are coming up right after mine.

Item agreed to.

110. To provide for Canada's share of the expenses of studies, surveys and investigations of the international joint commission, $199,180.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I just want to make a few remarks on this item. This morning I was pleased to hear the minister say that the proposed Passamaquoddy development had been referred to the international joint commission. The minister will recall that on May 7 I moved:

> For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged during the past three years between any department or officials of the federal government and the international joint commission, the government of the United States of America, and any other government or organization or individuals, relating to a survey or surveys of the economic feasibility of the development of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project.

I had a partial return from the department, and I had hoped for a full return before the minister's estimates came before the house. However, the minister said this morning, I think, that tomorrow at Washington there would be a joint statement—

Mr. Pearson: Today.

Mr. Brooks: I wish to thank the minister for sending me a copy of the reference, which I received just a few minutes before I came down to the house. It is too bad that this reference had not been made public earlier, so that a study could have been made of it while the minister's estimates were before the house. From a cursory study I notice that the reference to the commission authorizes them to determine the costs, to determine the effect on the economy of the United States and Canada of this development. They are given the advantages of the reports of 1950 and 1952. I also note that the United States government, subject to the availability of funds, is to incur costs of up to $3 million and the Canadian government up to $300,000.

[Mr. Fulton.]

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is a great discrepancy in the amount Canada is contributing to this investigation as compared with that which is being contributed by the United States. It is ten to one. We in the maritime provinces are interested not only in the proportion of one to ten in this development, I can assure the minister. I wish to assure the government that is not the case. We feel that if this Passamaquoddy project is developed it should be more or less a fifty-fifty proposition, and any benefits which accrue from the development of the Passamaquoddy—I see the hon. member for Charlotte here and I am sure he will agree with me in this—should go to the United States and Canada, and the maritime provinces in particular, in equal proportions. There is no doubt as to the interest that exists in this project in the maritime provinces, because in the return I received from the minister there were recommendations from boards of trade of the county of Charlotte which the hon. member represents and from other boards of trade in the maritime provinces.

I do think, Mr. Chairman, our federal government was rather dogmatic in its reply to some of the representations made by the United States government with reference to this development. I am afraid there has been a very lukewarm attitude on the part of the federal government with regard to this development. This has been recognized not only by the people in the maritime provinces but also by people in the state of Maine. I had a letter from Senator Smith of Maine which I read here some time ago in which she said she was very much afraid that the Dominion of Canada was not taking the vital interest in this matter that the state of Maine was, and which she hoped the United States in general was taking.

I should like to quote from a memorandum sent by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to his excellency the ambassador of the United States. It is dated April 5, 1956. I quote from this memorandum:

> The Canadian authorities concerned have given careful consideration to this matter—

That has reference to the international joint commission. I continue:

> —and it is assumed that further discussions will take place concerning the specific terms of the reference which might be presented to the international joint commission. It also seems desirable to include in the joint reference provision for an investigation into the effect that the proposed tidal power project would have upon the fisheries in the area.

That is naturally very important, but it is not the only consideration which we in the maritime provinces have in this proposed development. The memorandum goes on to say:

> Having regard to the foregoing, the Canadian government is prepared, on the following conditions, to join with the United States government in a reference to the international joint commission on a survey of the proposed Passamaquoddy tidal power project:
> (a) It is proposed that each country assume responsibility for part of the required surveys and investigations. Canada would be responsible for the investigation into the effect the project might have upon the fisheries, and Canada would assume the cost of this investigation to an amount not exceeding $300,000.

I point out again, Mr. Chairman, this rather indicates that the main interest Canada has in the Passamaquoddy development is simply in connection with the fisheries. I continue:

> (b) Each country would facilitate the extension to it of the required surveys by agencies of the other country, as well as the entry of personnel and equipment, on the understanding that all information obtained in the various surveys would be made currently available to each country through the international joint commission.
> (c) In joining in the reference to the international joint commission, the Canadian government would make no commitment regarding the eventual construction of the project.

I hope this is not an indication that the Canadian government is not anxious to bear its full share of the Passamaquoddy development if it is found feasible and practical. We do not wish to see the United States achieve control and have the absolute use of the Passamaquoddy development, and we do not wish to see Canada having an interest only in protecting the fisheries of the bay of Fundy.

I understand, and I think it is general knowledge in the province of New Brunswick, that there are quite powerful fishery interests in that province that are more concerned over what might affect the fisheries in the bay of Fundy than they are over the great power project in that province. I also understand that from inquiries made in 1950 the fears of the fishermen in the bay of Fundy are rather unfounded, and there is no great danger to the fisheries there. However, this investigation will determine that. I also understand it will take three years in order to complete this investigation, and possibly we will not know what the attitude is going to be until the three-year period has elapsed.

I would like the minister to tell us this afternoon whether the federal government is as concerned about the development of Passamaquoddy as is the United States, and particularly the state of Maine, or whether we are interested only in protecting the fisheries in that area.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I can assure my hon. friend that we are sincerely interested in both aspects of this investigation, the development of power and also the effect any such development might have on our fisheries there. We share the interest of the United States in this investigation, and we will share fully with them in the results of the investigation.

Mr. Brooks: Financially?

Mr. Pearson: We will share in every way in the results of the investigation. If this investigation shows it is economically feasible to proceed with this matter and we are satisfied to that effect, then naturally we will be happy to share with them in future developments. It has been felt, however, that the fisheries aspect of the matter is one in which we have a very special interest, possibly a greater interest than our friends on the other side of the line, and therefore we have taken a special responsibility in regard to that aspect of the investigation.

The cost of that part of the survey will be about $300,000. The United States will be putting up about $3 million in this investigation, but that does not mean the ratio of our interest or the ratio of our participation in the results of the investigation will not be 50-50. There have been technical experts on our side, I know, and my hon. friend knows this better than I do, who in the past have been sceptical about the economic feasibility of this development. It has already been investigated.

Mr. Brooks: Some have been optimistic, I might say.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, some experts have been optimistic about this, possibly more on the other side of the line than on this side. However, the investigation is going to take place. We must all hope that as a result it will make possible a power development which will be economically advantageous to that part of Canada, and will not interfere with our very important fisheries industry.

I think there is nothing more I can add at the present time, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry this reference was not before my hon. friend prior to today. We have been doing our best to get the United States government to agree to a joint reference. We had ourselves agreed on terms some weeks ago. They have been considering it in Washington ever since, and we received their final agreement to this particular document only yesterday.

111. Colombo plan, $34,400,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: I might say, Mr. Chairman, that the question of the Colombo plan was discussed in some detail in the committee and I shall not take the time of the house in repeating all the evidence that was produced there. However, I would like very briefly to indicate the point of view of a great many members of the committee, in fact I think I would be safe in saying practically all members of the committee.

There was a considerable interest in the Colombo plan revealed in the committee, probably a greater interest than in any other single item. Most of the members of the committee I listened to felt that the government would increase the appropriation for the Colombo plan in coming years. Mr. Nik Cavell, the witness who appeared before the committee, indicated that it was not always possible to spend all the money that could be spent because there were not always technicians readily available. In the light of what Mr. Cavell pointed out, there was some hope expressed that through the co-operation of industry and so on, if further moneys were advanced by the government for the Colombo plan we could obtain this technical assistance. In other words, the intimation was that if more money were advanced by the government in the coming years for the Colombo plan Mr. Cavell could certainly find the technical assistance to carry it out.

The question of the Colombo plan is something which is of great interest to the general public, at least that is the case in my part of Canada. During the last three or four months I have received 70 or 80 letters not only from individuals but from various organizations including missionary groups, the women's institute and various church groups as well, concerning the request I put forward in this house that the government should increase its annual appropriation for the Colombo plan. From what I have been able to learn many other hon. members have also received similar letters.

It is to be hoped that next year the government will see fit to increase this annual appropriation for the Colombo plan. We all know that the Soviet union and its satellites have apparently adopted a new method in their aim for world domination, and the new method, as all hon. members know, is the smiling war, the economic war, the handing out of promises of more assistance than we are giving to those parts of the world that have not taken sides as between the east and the west.

I think it is worth while on this point to note that since hundreds of millions of people in India, Pakistan, Indonesia and parts of Africa have just recently regained their political freedom, they are now very anxious to obtain their economic freedom as well.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

It is probably quite truthful to say that most people in these countries have never had enough to eat at any time in their lives, and now when they have obtained their political freedom they see an opportunity for economic freedom so they will be able to get enough of the necessities of life. Naturally they will be very anxious to look to any country that promises such help, regardless of its political ideology.

The people to whom I have talked who have spent a considerable time in those countries and speak with some authority on the subject point out that people who have not enough to eat are not interested in political ideologies. I think that is something any hon. member could easily understand. They tend to look with favour on countries that promise them aid and so on. I know that in previous debates in this house various hon. members have shown the amount of aid the Soviet union is promising to these various so-called underdeveloped countries, and an article in one of the principal newspapers of Jakarta, the capital of Indonesia, which pointed out that aid under the Colombo plan was a mere pittance by comparison. Of course the Soviet union apparently has not delivered much of the aid it has promised these various countries, but there is little doubt that it could, if it wished, deliver a good deal, particularly in the form of technical assistance and machinery, since it has been pointed out in this debate and many times in this house before that the Soviet union is no longer a land with an ox-cart economy.

Bearing all this in mind, and particularly in view of the great interest in this country in the Colombo plan, the government should see fit to increase the appropriation in another year. If nothing else, it is a matter of self-defence. Apparently the Soviet union is going all out in an attempt to gain the minds of the so-called underdeveloped countries and, if you will pardon me for coining a phrase, it is entering the mind by means of the stomach, so to speak. Unless we want to see all the sympathies of the people of these countries slip away from us, it is in our interest to increase aid to them.

There is one other matter I wish to mention in this regard, and that is the question of training people from underdeveloped countries to help themselves. All hon. members know, I think, that many students from Pakistan, India and so on have come to this country and obtained training of one sort or another. I believe the hon. member for Kootenay West mentioned this morning that he thought it was a very good idea for the students to actually work, if necessary, in our factories, farms and so on.

I should just like to say that I have had some experience of that in my constituency. We had nine students from Pakistan who were there under the Colombo plan. They were learning about farm machinery at the Massey Harris Ferguson plant in my city, and they were there for about six months. They lived in homes throughout the community. They took part in all the social activities of the community. They played badminton, took part in little theatre activities, spoke at the service clubs and so on. They were invited out socially at all times and everybody, if I may say so, treated them very hospitably and, I might even go so far as to say, made a fuss over them. This treatment was genuine and from the heart, and I am quite sure it would be the same in any community or small city in this country.

After those people went back to Pakistan I received letters from them, as did many other people in Woodstock. The impression that was created in their minds as to the merit of our way of life is something those people will never forget and will carry with them always. Now that they have gone back to Pakistan they will hold positions of considerable importance in the country, and they cannot help having a very great influence on the thinking of the people with whom they associate. I have no doubt that the administrators of the Colombo plan will continue to carry this out. I think it is something that can be carried out and expanded, because I can think of no better way of selling our way of life to people in the eastern countries.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): During the past year or two, very often the Soviet union has been either threatening or promising—I am not sure which it is—to indulge in large-scale schemes of assistance to underprivileged countries. I am not sure that their performances have matched up with their promises, but we would be making a very serious error, as has been pointed out before, if we in the west tried to enter into some form of competition with the Soviet union in the giving away of forms of assistance. The most productive way of stopping this rivalry, of course, is through the United Nations. If the Soviet union is really serious about improving the lot of the underprivileged people of the world, and if we are really serious about improving their lot, then let us together help them through the only international agency which really can do it; that is, the United Nations.

I see no reason why Canada cannot do far more than we have in the past to make the special United Nations fund for economic aid a reality. If we want to avert this competition in give-aways with the Soviet union, we can only do it through the United Nations, and we in Canada have to do far more than we have in the past through that agency.

I, too, would like to see the funds allotted to the Colombo plan increased, as would all my colleagues. But, important as the Colombo plan is, I do not think we ought to forget that, taking the over-all picture, the assistance which can be given by the United Nations in the long run would be more important. I have always opposed unilateral programs of giving money and assistance to other nations, because no matter how generously it is done or how genuinely it is done, there nevertheless rests in the minds of the recipients a certain fear that the donor has perhaps some ulterior motive. However, if we were trying to help the underprivileged people collectively through the United Nations, then I am sure that fear would disappear.

Yesterday the minister told us that the increase in the funds allotted to the Colombo plan was very substantial. There is an absolute increase of $8 million, which even these days is substantial, an absolute increase of some 32 per cent. But when one breaks it down into the per capita contribution by the people of Canada, what does it amount to? In our supreme generosity, from the fund of wealth we have in this country—and next year when there is an election we shall be told how well off we are—we are only giving away another 5 cents per capita per month. That is what $8 million amounts to. I am convinced that were there any will in this government to do better, they could do so, because they would have the support of the people of Canada. Time after time I have said in this house that the Colombo plan has caught the imagination of the people in a way much more obvious than, of course, has NATO.

I say we could make a much more substantial increase, and I am convinced it could be used productively. The minister yesterday reminded us that we could advance money to our friends under the Colombo scheme and it could be wasted. That I grant. But we can also waste money in this country just as easily and just as expeditiously. However, I doubt very much whether there would be the waste which perhaps some fear.

Let us take the case of India alone, and what applies to India of course applies to other nations. Within the next five years the Indian government intends to invest some $10 billion in capital goods in that country. I do not think for a moment that the Indian government has that amount of money behind it, either in its own treasury or in the savings of the people. Then how is it going to finance this great scheme of industrialization, which is only another five-year plan, another instalment of a general plan? Either India has to get more generous help—I am not talking about gifts but about loans at low rates of interest—from the more fortunate nations of the world, or India is going to print paper money, and the result of course will be devastating inflation with all the social consequences which will ensue.

I am quite sure that India and the other Asian nations who are partners of ours in the Colombo plan could very productively use much more money than we are prepared to give. We also ought to remember this fact, which a recent United Nations economic survey has pointed out. We industrial nations find that our standard of living is constantly rising, but the nations which are the primary producers of the world, the nations of Asia, find that their standard of living is constantly falling, so that as the years go by there is a greater disparity between the industrial nations who have much of the riches of the earth and these people in Asia who have not. We can afford to give much more than we have given, and I am convinced that the people of Canada would like to see it done.

But there is another aspect of the Colombo plan or of any other plan such as this. This, after all, is a plan to assist other nations, aid from government to government. I am not yet convinced that is always the best way of achieving the end we have in view, and I am certain that the end we do have in view is that of improving the lot of the less fortunate people in this world. Just a few months ago a brief was presented to the Gordon economic commission by the United Church of Canada, of which I happen to be a member, and if I am critical of that body then I am inferentially critical of myself. But this brief said in part:

> Empty stomachs do not linger over the dissertations on the advantages of democracy. They go where food is and make friends with those who can provide it, without too much regard for political theories. If communism outwits and outruns the western world in feeding the hungry, we will have only ourselves to blame.

That is true. The United Church brief asks the government to do very much more than is covered by these estimates, and I am convinced that the government should have done very much more. But there is something else which the people of Canada can do. I believe the government of Canada ought to give the lead, but I think the people of Canada as responsible citizens ought to ask themselves, what can we do as individuals? I remind the committee of a scheme started in Norway two or three years ago, when the people of Norway collected money amongst themselves to give to the less privileged people, a gift from people to people. A gift from people to people is a much more significant thing than a gift from government to government.

The other year I put a proposition before the congregation to which I belong, which happens to be a fairly well off, middle class congregation of about 1,500 people. I suggested that we might all perhaps give the sum of $1 each, no more and no less, not somebody giving $10 and nine others giving nothing, but that each of us might give $1 each as a gift to less fortunate people in another part of the world, a gift obviously without strings attached, a gift without any connotation other than that we felt a sense of brotherhood and a sense of responsibility for those who were not as well favoured as were we. I received the most inestimable assistance from Mr. Escott Reid, our high commissioner in India. I wrote telling him what the plan was and asked him if he could find in the area of New Delhi a village of perhaps some thousand souls who might be able to use productively as a gift from Canadian people the sum of $1,000.

Mr. Reid went to great pains and great trouble. He located a village, sent me photographs of it and gave me a breakdown of the social characteristics of the village. I thought for a while that I had sold my colleagues in my congregation on an idea which I considered worth putting into practice. Unfortunately I was wrong. The matter came before the governing board of the congregation and they took the position that this was the responsibility of government. I think that was an abdication of citizenship. We cannot pass everything to government. Individuals themselves must take some responsibility, and I suggest to the officers of the United Church that they approach their own congregations and see if we as individuals in Canada cannot build up a scheme whereby in our own small way we will do something to show the people of Asia that in our own well-being we have not forgotten them.

Two Canadians did do something about it, and I believe the minister knows of this case. A couple of Canadians who live in British Columbia, Dr. and Mrs. Naranjan Grewall, went to India two years ago. Dr. Grewall happens to be a native of the Punjab. He had come to this country as a young man, worked hard, arduously and successfully, and he took his Canadian wife back to the area where he was born. He saw once again the poverty from which he himself had fled. He saw the need of the people in that community. He saw children who had no building in which they could be taught.

There was no school of any sort whatsoever. He said right then and there, "I am prepared to build you a school. I have gone to Canada and have been lucky. That is now the land of my adoption. I should like to share some of my wealth with you in the land of my birth." He built a school for the people of his native village.

A little later his wife, Mrs. Grewall, offered to build a hospital, and it is now being built. The school was opened by one of the officials in the office of the high commissioner. There, I think, is a very practical example of citizenship at its best, the sort of citizenship that realizes that out of our own wealth, out of our own well-being, we must give some part to help those who are less fortunate and less well favoured.

This does not in any way mean that the government can abdicate responsibility for giving leadership, but I do think the people of Canada, if they were given the proper lead, would be ready to play a much more significant part in helping others by way of gifts from people to people.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate to congratulate the minister on increasing our gift to the Colombo plan by $8 million. I think that has been endorsed by all Canadians. But, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to get on the band wagon and say that we should give another $10 million or $20 million. I do not forget that the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the C.C.F. and others—and I agree thoroughly with them in their position have said that there should be an increase in the pensions of civil servants who are not getting enough to keep them living. I can give as examples some cases where they do not get two meals a day. I know the good book says that charity begins at home. I say it begins at home here with respect to the civil servants who have spent their lives in the service. I think of one man especially. He was a mail carrier. He is getting $85 a month, and he is keeping a wife who is ill. I think those civil servants have the first call. I am not going to vote for any increased contribution to the Colombo plan until these civil servants are taken care of.

Mr. Dinsdale: I want to join with the other hon. members who have spoken in support of the increase in the assistance to the Colombo plan this year. I do so because I feel that it is one of the most positive aspects of our Canadian foreign policy. It seems to point in the direction of the new diplomacy of economic assistance. Canada has come through various stages of assistance to underdeveloped countries since the war. After the war Canada took part in aid to Europe, which was largely based on the need for reconstruction in war-devastated areas. Then indirectly through the Marshall plan we rode on the United States coat tails in further assistance to Europe. Today I feel that in the Colombo plan, in the program of mutual aid and technical assistance, we are pointing in the direction of an objective in the field of external affairs that is greatly to be desired, namely the time when we shall be able to match our program of military assistance with a program of technical and capital assistance.

The reason I wanted to say just a word at this time, Mr. Chairman, is that I feel that in the Colombo program we are making a real contribution to the moral aspects of the problem of international relations. It is a program that is carried out largely within the framework of the commonwealth. I have always felt that Canada's position as a member of the commonwealth of nations places her in a very favourable role so far as international affairs are concerned. But during a short stay at the United Nations last fall I was very much impressed to find that actually it is Canada's position as a commonwealth nation that gives us a role in world affairs, as one of the middle powers, far exceeding in importance that which our numerical and economic strength would otherwise justify. I think this commonwealth Colombo plan is evidence of the excellent contribution we can make in this regard.

The commonwealth is one of the few positive moral forces in world affairs today. We had the Earl of Home speak to us recently, and I was impressed as he gave us his interpretation of the new role of the commonwealth in world affairs. He referred to it as a positive moral force. He referred to it as a community of nations which is actually operating in that respect in this day when we are depending upon an atomic stalemate to give us a rather uneasy peace or, in the phrase often used by the minister, to establish a balance of terror. It is an encouraging aspect of Canada's foreign policy that we are able in this way to make a positive contribution to the role of Canada in world affairs. It is one that we trust we shall be able to increase as the years go by, as the immediate military emergency declines and as we are able to move into the more positive external affairs policy of providing economic assistance rather than military assistance on a large scale.

On this point, Mr. Chairman, there is just one question that I should like to present to the minister. In making personal contacts in the UN with members of the delegations from the southeast Asia countries, especially the members of parliament from those countries, I found that they had an extremely warm attitude toward Canada. We are not suspect in any way as a colonial power. Our background is absolutely beyond suspicion in that regard. We thus have a tremendous advantage in promoting the program of the west in that very important arena of world affairs.

However, I had pointed out to me by several of these representatives the fact that very little literature presenting the western viewpoint is available in cheap form. It would appear that the U.S.S.R. is making available all sorts of penny pamphlets telling of all the marvellous things the Soviet is doing or is intending to do in this new phase of foreign policy, of economic and technical assistance. These pamphlets are made available at a nominal sum to the millions of people in these Asiatic countries, and they are read avidly. They are mainly political tracts.

On the other hand, these people who have been in touch with the situation point out that there is available very little cheap literature presenting our side of the story. The only books they saw that would be within the price range of the ordinary people in those countries were our cheap paper-back novels. I am wondering whether that is a legitimate observation, and whether the Department of External Affairs has any interest in this particular problem.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a few words on this particular point. There are a great many things that I should like to have said on the minister's estimates, but some of us were tangled up with the labour estimates. At this stage of the session it is necessary to figure out where one is needed most. I figured that my main concern was at home, so I stayed with the Minister of Labour. I knew, of course, how well our interests in this department were being looked after by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Gillis: Yes; I mean the hon. member for Winnipeg North. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is so prominent around here that everybody forgets that there is any other Winnipeg member.

The particular matter under discussion, namely the Colombo plan, is something that I believe we should think about a little bit more. I am not concerned about the amount of money, provided it is spent in the right manner and provided that the people who are contributing it are getting some credit for doing so. I might say that I have always taken the position, and I always will, that the United Nations was set up for the purpose of handling all the problems of rehabilitation after the war and the maintenance of peace. That organization has within it all the machinery to take care of all the problems that we are attempting to sort out on a regional basis. Because we are getting away from the United Nations, in my judgment it not only weakens the United Nations but it will make for a lot of duplication and waste in the money that is appropriated for such purposes as economic aid under NATO or the Colombo plan which have separate administrations.

I am not so sure whether the ordinary people who are the recipients of such aid under the Colombo plan are getting the full benefit of it or whether the countries contributing are getting any credit for it. The history of aid for the last 15 years, at least in countries such as China and Egypt and others, has been that it has not paid off by way of friendships. The governments presently in power in those countries which need economic aid take the money and distribute it for their own purposes, so very little is made known to the people as to the country that was the source of the relief.

My main point in making that statement is this. If you take a look at the United Nations set-up you will find that, starting with the general assembly, the security council, the trustee council and those small bodies, which with their secretariat run the show, built around that organization there are committees and commissions designed to take care of every problem connected with rehabilitation and maintenance. I do not believe the scheme of taking pieces out of the U.N. and setting up duplicate organizations in every part of the world is going to strengthen the U.N. in the final analysis. In my judgment, the future peace of the world will hinge upon the proper operation of the United Nations as such. For example, if it is desired to distribute food to any part of the world, there is an adequate organization connected with the United Nations to take care of it, the world food organization. When it comes to building up and taking care of the children of the world, there is also a committee of the United Nations functioning for that purpose.

As the hon. member for Brandon-Souris said a moment ago, the Soviet union makes a lot of promises on paper. Canada and the other countries of the commonwealth contribute a great deal towards that children's fund through the United Nations. I have seen a lot of films and a few magazine articles on this subject, but I have never yet seen a film in which there was one Canadian shown. It is always United States nurses, doctors and technicians. No other country has received any credit in any of the films or articles that I have seen, except the United States. Now, perhaps the United States is the only country that has doctors, nurses and technicians out in these far-flung parts of the world.

A moment ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North suggested that we could set up a citizen to citizen organization in this country through which we might make our contributions individually. Such an organization is already in existence, with all due respect to his efforts. There is a national organization now with headquarters in Ottawa at 106 O'Connor Street and that is known as CARE. I received a copy of their 10th anniversary report in the mail. It shows that in this very field in which the Colombo plan is working, in the last 10 years they have distributed some $7 million. This has gone towards providing some equipment, aid to children and general rehabilitation in those countries that require aid similar to that for which the Colombo plan was designed. So, there is an organization and that is the address. Anyone who wants to make a contribution to any section of the world in which relief is needed will find that is an international organization set up for that purpose. The hon. member for Winnipeg North did not get the co-operation of the church organization, but the parishioners who were ready to gather $1,000 can send it in to CARE and parcels will be made up and shipped to any section of the world where assistance is needed. I am only trying to help the hon. member, I am not criticizing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is about all I wanted to say. I wanted to stress that we should take advantage of those agencies that have been set up around the United Nations. If we have anything to contribute to any section of the world there are these trained people heading up these different committees and commissions of the United Nations through which we should channel our contribution. Any section of the world that is getting relief should get it through the United Nations. As I have said many times, I do not think putting people on relief, nation by nation, is going to make any friends for us. It is like backing a note at the bank for one of your friends. He may be a good fellow, but he generally defaults on that note. He resents you forever after, so you have lost a friend and you have lost your money. I think that is equally true of Canada putting India or some other section of the world on relief. If the relief is given through some United Nations agency, the money is channelled through it and you avoid duplication. Then, too, the proper organization gets the credit. We all contribute to the United Nations. I wish I had been in the house earlier for the minister's estimates because there are several things I would have liked to say. I will not say them now because they might open up a whole new series of speeches.

Mr. Enfield: I will not add to the length of the debate or the erudition of the discussion with the few remarks I wish to make. I just want to say a very few words—if that phrase has any meaning now—to put something on the record which I think might be worth putting on the record. This refers to a petition I received from a United Church. When my petitioners receive this copy of Hansard, which I will send them, perhaps they will read the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North at the same time and perhaps his remarks will not fall on barren ground.

This is a petition from Washington United Church in Scarborough and reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Enfield,
> It has been brought to our attention that consideration is being given by the parliament of Canada to an increase of $9,000,000 in Canada's contribution to the Colombo plan. We, the undersigned members and adherents of Washington United Church, Scarborough, believing that moneys thus spent are well spent for peace, urge you to use your influence in support of this increase.

This petition is signed by over 51 members of the congregation and happily I was able to report to them that, although the increase was not $9 million it was $8 million and this is a very substantial increase indeed. I think this is the type of expression of opinion that is very important to us and very encouraging indeed. It comes to me unsolicited and as a complete surprise. It shows us all that the people of Canada—I think these people speak for the majority of the people in the country—are extremely interested in the type of help that we are giving under the Colombo plan, which is the finest type of help because it helps other people help themselves. I would encourage the government to carry on in their liberal attitude in this regard. I think we can spell "Liberal" with a large "L" and a small "l" in this context. The government should carry on its good work and gradually increase our contributions to the Colombo plan as long, of course, as they are consistent with common sense and good economy.

Mr. Nesbitt: Just one question. I mentioned earlier that most of us were quite glad to see that the Colombo plan appropriation was increased by $1 million this year.

As I recall what was said in the committee, actually this $8 million is not an increase for this year. As I understand it, most of this $8 million is to be expended on the atomic reactor to be built in Bombay, India. Actually, it will be spent in slightly more than two years. Therefore, there is not an $8-million appropriation for the coming year but rather it is to be spread over a period of time amounting to 28 months, I believe. Perhaps the minister might comment on that.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, before I deal with that last point I would just like to say that I am in hearty agreement with all of the things that have been said in the house as to the value of the Colombo plan, both in terms of international friendship, political co-operation and economic aid, so that the underdeveloped countries may be able to help themselves.

I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South that it is undesirable to duplicate activities of this kind, and when otherwise practicable it is a good thing to do everything we can through the United Nations. But there is room, I think, for a commonwealth initiative such as the Colombo plan. It has, in certain respects, some advantages over the multilateral aid under the United Nations; although I certainly do not think there is any contradiction between the two because, under the Colombo plan, we can make arrangements directly with the country that we are assisting. We can share with the experts, the technicians and the workers of that particular country the construction of the project in question, and I think that has some obvious advantages. But we must not expect to get credit for these things. If we do these things merely in the hope that we are going to get a lot of credit, as my hon. friend said, we will be disappointed.

I think he suggested that the United States, in some of the pictures he had seen, was getting all the attention and therefore getting all the credit. I think there are a lot of Americans who would question how much credit they are getting in some of their activities in this field. That brings me to the point made by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris on the desirability of publicizing more what we are doing and, I am sure he meant by "we" not only Canada but other countries of the western world. He had a very important point there. I have had personal experience of the inadequacy of our own side in this regard. It is quite true that when you travel through Asia, if you happen to stop at a station in India, in Pakistan or in any Asian country, you will see a lot of literature, Marxist literature, or communist propaganda literature sometimes disguised, that sells commercially for a penny or two. It is very hard for some of the people in those countries to pay more than a penny or two, and it is very hard for them to find any literature expressing our way of life for a penny or two. There is obviously some subsidizing going on. I have more than once interested myself in this aspect of our general propaganda activities and I have often expressed the hope that we could form amongst ourselves, not as a government enterprise, but as a private enterprise, some kind of international book society which would devote itself to the distribution of that kind of good western literature well below cost with a subsidy which would be received from official sources.

I have now to go from the sublime almost to the ridiculous. We have increased our vote for books and subscriptions for presentation this year from, I think, $2,000 to $10,000. Therefore, we have $8,000 more with which to distribute literature on this subject.

Then, there is the last point raised by the hon. member for Oxford. The increase—and I share in the general satisfaction expressed about this increase—is $8 million this year. It could be more. There could always be more; but I am glad we have $8 million more, and it will enable us, I think, to increase our activities under the Colombo plan, with the qualification that has already been expressed that one of the difficulties is getting suitable experts, technical people, to carry out the projects which we already have under way. That $8 million is for the financial year. It is an additional appropriation for one year, but under our system, which has been approved by parliament, any unexpended funds during the year can be carried over and I think we have already about $3 million unexpended funds from a previous appropriation. It is expected that this $8 million will be spent during the next year.

Mr. Nesbitt: Just one question: Is that $8 million entirely for the atomic reactor?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman. It is thought that this $8 million will take care of our expenditures for the atomic reactor, and probably more than take care of items in the coming year; but it is not earmarked specifically for that purpose. If we had not received this increase this year it might have been more difficult for us to undertake this additional commitment.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am sorry to keep labouring this point. I realize the hour is getting on.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I want to go on but I shall wait until the noise stops. At page 151 of the minutes of proceedings, No. 6, of the standing committee on external affairs, Mr. Cavell, in reply to a question of Mr. Michener, said:

> No, it was last year. We had $25 million in the first two years and $26 million last year and that increase of $1 million was provided for technical assistance to countries to which we had not given technical assistance. The increase this year is from $26 million to $34 million and that takes care of the reactor to India which cost $7 million.

Mr. Pearson: That is correct, Mr. Chairman. If we had not obtained that increase we would not have been able to accept this extra commitment for the reactor without cutting down on some of our others. We expect to spend about $5 million this year on the reactor; but I do not think there is anything inconsistent between what I have said and what my hon. friend has read. We did not earmark the $34 million for any specific project in whole or in part, or any part of that money; but without that $8 million we might have found difficulty in carrying out the existing projects in which we are engaged and adding to them.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think there is general agreement in the house that the provision for aid under the Colombo plan is a good one. There are some of us who would like to see such provisions made through the United Nations. Whenever, for some reason or another, it does not appear feasible, we certainly support a commonwealth program like the Colombo plan.

I do not think that in the general field of economic assistance Canada is measuring up. I believe that in relation to the needs of the world, in relation to the needs of democracy, in relation to Canada's ability to provide assistance, we are doing a dismally poor job. Even with the increase in the Colombo plan provision our contribution is just over $2 per capita for the year under review. It is something less than one-seventh of one per cent of our gross national product.

I was amazed at the remarks of the hon. member for Fort William when he said that as far as he himself was concerned until the government did something to improve the lot of a certain group of Canadians he was opposed to any further increase in provisions under the Colombo plan.

I do not think any modern nation would be making progress in the world today if its governing representatives took the attitude that until a given situation were improved they would not do anything to help anybody. I think the hon. member's view is one that is not shared by a majority of Canadians.

I have taken some interest in the Colombo plan for some time. I do not know all the details concerning how it operates but I am aware that certain allocations have been made to counterpart funds, as they are called, in the past. According to the minutes of the external affairs committee for June 7, 1955, steam locomotives valued at $23 million were sent to India and the account had been set up as a counterpart fund. The same is true of trucks, buses and workshop machinery valued at $4 million, copper and aluminum valued at $5 million, and so on. Under the Colombo plan in the past certain provisions of grain have been made to India totalling $15 million, to Pakistan totalling $5 million and flour valued at $1,300,000 was sent to Ceylon.

I would like to learn from the minister what has been done recently under the Colombo plan to explore with India, Pakistan, Ceylon aid other nations that participate in the plan the possibility and practicability of making additional funds available for the purchase of food from Canada and the provision of that food along the same lines followed in the past.

There can be no argument to the effect that Canada does not have the food. The crop year is just ending and while these are tentative estimates it has been estimated that even with the increased sales in the crop year just ended the carryover of Canadian wheat will be up some 23 million bushels. Although the prospects for a large Canadian crop of wheat were rather doubtful six weeks ago it now appears that if good weather conditions prevail over the next four weeks the chances are this year Canada will produce only slightly less wheat than was produced last year. There is no question about our not having an abundance of wheat. The question is, can India use additional quantities of wheat?

India is not receiving any wheat from Canada now. In the crop year just ended India did not purchase a single bushel of wheat from Canada for the first time in many years. In 1951 India obtained 18 million bushels of wheat from Canada, 14 million in 1952, 4 million in 1953 and in the period 1954-55 the purchase dropped to 2.3 million bushels.

From information I have been able to obtain I believe India wants more wheat and needs more food. As a matter of fact, an associated press report which appeared in Canadian newspapers on June 28 last indicated:

> India today announced its decision to open negotiations with the United States for the purchase of 3 million tons of wheat worth more than $200 million.

That would amount to negotiations for the purchase of a quantity in excess of 100 million bushels of wheat. The report went on to say:

> Informed sources said India hopes to obtain as much wheat as possible under the U.S. surplus program which would enable India to pay rupees and then borrow the money back for economic development projects.

It would appear from this report that India is entering into negotiations with the United States to obtain a large quantity of United States wheat under precisely the same type of arrangement by which India purchased substantial quantities of wheat from Canada a few years ago.

I am asking the minister if the Colombo plan officials have discussed with India and other nations involved in the plan whether they need additional food and whether the Canadian government would be prepared to provide additional funds in order that such food may be made available?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we have discussed with the Indian, Pakistani and Ceylon governments on accasion the provision of food under the Colombo plan and it has been agreed that the Colombo plan should not be used for that purpose except in a case of emergency and that it should be restricted to its original aim which was the provision of capital and technical assistance.

It is quite true that we have provided Pakistan and India with wheat—I think in 1952 and 1953—for which counterpart funds were set up, but those were during emergency food conditions. I think there was a famine condition in India at that time and we were requested by India as an exception to the agreed principle to provide food under the Colombo plan. They have made it quite clear to us that normally they would prefer to receive our help under the plan in the form of capital and technical assistance.

One form that assistance takes is in irrigation and power projects. We have participated in such projects. The irrigation part of these projects makes possible the growth of food in the country concerned. We have made it possible notably in the Mayurakshi project, for hundreds of thousands of agricultural acres to be brought under cultivation. In the long run that is of much more help to India than sending food directly from Canada.

It is also my information that India had a good crop this year and does not require wheat to meet the needs of her own people. She may have made a special arrangement under advantageous financial circumstances with the United States; however, I am not aware of it. The Colombo plan was not designed for this purpose and we have been told by the three governments in question that they would much prefer our contribution to take the form of capital and technical assistance under the Colombo plan.

Mr. Argue: I do not know whether or not the minister understood my question. I was not asking him whether the money now appropriated under the Colombo plan or any part of it could be used for the purchases I referred to. I can well understand the position of India that they would be prepared to tighten their belts today in order to go forward with irrigation and other development projects in order that they might have an abundance of food in the future.

My question was this. Has any consideration been given in discussions with India as to whether she would purchase substantial quantities of grain from this country if our government were prepared to allocate funds in addition to the funds that are now being discussed?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry if I misunderstood my hon. friend. To my knowledge we have not discussed additional funds to be provided under the Colombo plan for this particular purpose with any Colombo plan government.

Mr. Argue: Did I understand the minister to say when he was speaking formerly that India has no need for wheat in the immediate future? If that is the case, is the minister saying that India is not now undertaking negotiations with the United States for the purchase of an extremely large quantity of wheat, namely over 100 million bushels?

Mr. Pearson: No, I did not say that, Mr. Chairman. I am not acquainted with that particular negotiation. When the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are under discussion they will deal with exports of wheat specifically and my hon. friend can no doubt obtain some information concerning that aspect of the question.

All I have said is that while we are anxious to sell wheat wherever we can, and India is included in the countries with which we would like to do business, I have been informed that India had a good crop year and this makes it unlikely that she would want to obtain much wheat from Canada.

I went on to say that we had not discussed with India or any other country an increase of this kind to our appropriations under the Colombo plan because the Colombo plan was not designed for that purpose. The Colombo plan was designed for the provision of technical and capital assistance.

Mr. Argue: Someone in the government is falling down very badly. I am surprised that, with the plans under the Colombo plan, such a discussion, at any rate an exploratory discussion, has not taken place. The minister said that India does not require wheat, but in the crop year just ended a few days ago, according to the very latest report, whilst India did not purchase a single bushel of Canadian wheat in that crop year, it purchased from the United States 10,170,000 bushels and from Australia 6,170,000 bushels. So India is buying wheat. India is buying wheat from countries other than Canada, and India is now, according to this report, having discussions with the United States to get a very large quantity of wheat and on precisely the same kind of terms as Canada dealt with India a few years ago.

Mr. Low: I am interested in this discussion between the minister and the hon. member for Assiniboia. I have been interested in the Colombo plan for years. I am very glad to see the increase in the appropriation. I believe that it will be all to the good to make available larger funds for the work which, the minister said, is so well in hand. I am also inclined to believe that the Colombo plan was never designed for the purpose of distributing relief foods for other products. I can understand the anxiety of the hon. member for Assiniboia in the light of the fact that we have a very large surplus of wheat in our country.

Mr. Argue: And these negotiations with the United States.

Mr. Low: And the negotiations that have gone on with the United States, but I am also of the opinion that the distribution of surplus products and commodities ought to take place through such an organization as was envisaged by the Food and Agriculture Organization a few years ago: an international commodity clearing house. Until we get such an organization set up and working effectively, I am afraid that we shall go on as we are at the present time, with countries needing and going without while other countries have their large surpluses, and perhaps surpluses that may eventually be destroyed or deteriorate. If we press more strongly for the international commodity clearing house, which was turned down some years ago—

Mr. Argue: And by this government.

Mr. Low: Unfortunately, it was not pressed too strongly by the government.

Mr. Argue: The government opposed it.

Mr. Low: But I can quite understand the position of the minister in connection with the Colombo plan. These funds are made available more for capital assistance, the purpose being to make it possible for the people who are the beneficiaries of the plan to help themselves; not so much to bring relief at the moment. I think that is what they want: capital assistance, the building of works, increasing their capability of production. I think that is right. I can understand why the minister would hesitate to offer much encouragement that we could distribute our surplus wheat under the Colombo plan, but I think the hon. member for Assiniboia is quite right in pressing for the recognition of a need there. That need is growing, and it seems to be daily more impressive.

Mr. Nicholson: In the meantime they should have all the bread they need.

Mr. Low: I think that is correct. As long as there is surplus food in the world, certainly it should be made available through some means to the needy people. There is great virtue in some of the things said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North earlier this afternoon. He thought that gifts of produce, foods and other things, from people to people would be the ideal arrangement. I think it would be, too, if you could get the people to do it.

We have got into the habit of looking to the government for almost everything. If anything goes wrong, we say that the government is to blame. However, frankly I believe that such a thing as providing relief to other nations could very well be undertaken by private agencies and the citizens of a country where the surpluses exist. I can see the possibility of forming an organization of the people themselves. That has been done; I have seen it done. Our people for many years —and when I say "our people" I mean my own church group in particular—have formed what we call a church welfare program. Under that program we co-operate in building up a stockpile of all kinds of produce. That is not the general stockpile of the nation; that is supplementary to the stockpiles of the nation, one we build up as a consequence of a co-operative effort amongst ourselves and in our spare time. That is set aside, put into warehouses and prepared thoroughly; what has to be preserved is preserved, and so on. We had done this for years and, when world war II was over, within hours we had trainloads of those goods on their way to the seaboard where they were trans-shipped and sent to Europe and distributed as from our people to the people there who needed them. There was no thought of getting credit for it. We thought only of making available to those people, out of the surplus of goods we had, enough to keep them from starving.

That principle is good. It is a sound principle, and particularly what it would do for the people who produce and made available the commodities is something we cannot possibly estimate. It would be far more effective than if we looked to the government to do it all. Just the same, in relation to this business of distributing surpluses of produce, particularly foods, throughout the world, we need the international commodity clearing house set up. The sooner we can get it, the better it will be. I commend the minister and his department on what they have been doing with regard to the Colombo plan. It has been something you could not have done through the United Nations, with all the intransigence of some of the members of the United Nations. It is filling a tremendous need, and the people who are the beneficiaries of it are remembering that Canada is putting up a sizeable sum of money each year, which can be increased, I am sure, as technical assistance and technical direction are made available so that the money is properly spent. I agree with that principle.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I had not intended to say anything on this matter until my hon. friend from Assiniboia raised this rather interesting suggestion. However, since he has done so, I should possibly say, to begin with, that over the years I have been a most strong supporter on behalf of an increase in the amounts being expended under the Colombo plan.

I have a strong recollection of an occasion in 1951 when, having been in Australia and New Zealand and having met there with representatives of India, Ceylon and countries in the other commonwealth areas in Asia, I returned to Canada and asked that the amount then being expended on behalf of the Colombo plan, which was $25 million, should be doubled if Canada was to take its place among the nations of the commonwealth in preserving and maintaining our defences against the on-rush of communism. Over and over again at the parliamentary conference in Australia and New Zealand the representatives of those countries warned us that, unless material assistance of this type was forthcoming, in a few years communism, by its propaganda and by its promises of improving the economic lot of the peoples of those countries, would make invasions into the hearts and souls of the peoples of those countries to a degree that might never be retrieved by the free world.

Having said that, I come to the suggestion of my hon. friend with regard to wheat marketing. I am at one with him that we should do anything that is necessary in order to secure markets for our surplus products, and in particular for our wheat. However, from that point on I do not follow the same path as he has followed. He suggests that we should get into line with what the United States is doing. To me that is a dangerous course to follow.

What the United States is doing is simply this. With its vast surpluses of wheat, cotton and the like it is going to underprivileged areas in various parts of the world, making available amounts of these surpluses and receiving a credit in the form of local guarantees and then using these local guarantees for economic assistance in those countries. What the United States is doing in fact by that policy is breaking up the markets for farm commodities all over the world. It is part and parcel of its give-away, fire sale assistance agricultural policy.

Mr. Low: That is where an orderly system of international distribution would be helpful.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some aspects of the United States disposal plan mean disorderly distribution. The plan is having its effect and to some degree has disturbed Canada's markets for agricultural products in various parts of the world. I believe that the only way in which we can hope to compete against that policy so dangerous to Canadian agriculture would be through the medium of advances to these NATO countries with which advances purchases of our wheat and other products can be made.

What we have been condemning has been the United States attitude of going throughout the world without regard to its responsibilities under GATT and NATO and under the guise of this plan undermining our markets for agricultural products. I think it would be a dangerous course to follow to endeavour to emulate the United States in this regard. What I believe should be done is to protest to the United States government, as members on this side of the house have asked over and over again, against a policy so dangerous to the maintenance of a free economy among the free nations and so detrimental to those countries that are joined together in freedom in the marketing of their agricultural products.

In saying that I am all for the objective that the hon. gentleman has in mind, but I must say that I believe that for us to imitate the United States in this regard would be detrimental and dangerous to future farm markets, in particular markets for Canada's wheat, and would be using the Colombo plan in a manner that was never contemplated.

One of the aspects of the Colombo plan to which our attention was directed by representatives from India and Pakistan was that the cost of transportation of wheat and wheat products was so high as to render practically useless the importation of these commodities except in emergency cases. What they wanted was some form of material assistance that would enable them in their own countries to transform areas at present unproductive into productive areas, thereby enabling them to meet their own needs.

While I am altogether in favour of the objective of the hon. gentleman, I am afraid that in adopting the course he has suggested we would be in fact following a course which we have been condemning on the part of the United States and with respect to which I for one have suggested over and over again to the government that the strongest note should be sent to the United States government indicating that by that course they are undermining the free economy of the world and denying Canada and other nations joined with them in freedom the opportunity to maintain the strongest and most effective agricultural organizations.

Mr. McIvor: I believe that the hon. member for Assiniboia perhaps did not understand what I said. Probably an Irishman needs a second chance to make himself clear. I congratulated the minister on the increase of $8 million. I support the United Nations completely, just as strongly as anybody in the house, but I think that next year we should give the first consideration to retired civil servants who have not got enough to live on. I support that before I will support any further increase in our contribution to the Colombo plan over and above the $8 million. I think that is quite clear.

Mr. Argue: I think the member for Prince Albert has completely misunderstood and misinterpreted what I have said. He said, as I understood him, that I was advocating the same kind of policy as the United States, and I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought you did.

Mr. Argue: I said nothing of the sort because, as I believe the hon. member for Prince Albert well knows, the Americans do not have just the one so-called give-away policy but have policies under three different acts of congress.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is one of the means.

Mr. Argue: This is not a give-away program at all. According to the report I read to the house, the Americans are not giving anything away. It is not a give-away. All the indignation that the member for Prince Albert was able to generate was completely misdirected because I did not say anything like what he said I did. However, if you are going to say that the whole United States policy is wrong and that Canada should not do any of the things the United States is doing—I emphasize "any"—then it means that we say to the nations of the world that unless they have hard currency, unless they have dollars, they can starve to death because we are going to keep our wheat until they find the dollars.

I do not agree with that kind of policy. We have lost the Indian market for Canadian wheat. In the last crop year just ended a couple of days ago we did not sell or send a single bushel of Canadian wheat to India, and that is what I think is wrong. I think we should adopt policies that will not only enable us to dispose of Canadian grain but will also enable us to do our part to see that the people of India, who are hungry and need grain, have a chance to obtain grain.

I want to say that the farm organizations support this point of view. The Saskatchewan wheat pool, the Alberta wheat pool, the Manitoba wheat pool and the Interprovincial Farm Union Council support this point of view. They say that wherever a nation is in need of wheat and has not the currency—the dollars—with which to purchase the wheat, Canada should negotiate with such country to the end that we may be able to accept their currency and to provide them with a reasonable quantity of Canadian wheat over a period of time. That is precisely, as I understand it, what India is endeavouring to do with the United States. It is the same thing precisely as we did under the Colombo plan a few years ago, namely provide wheat, set up counterpart funds and pay the Canadian producer for the wheat and by that means assist in economic aid and economic development.

I want to assure the hon. member for Prince Albert that I had no intention of saying that we should adopt the United States wheat policy, and I do not believe the record will show that I said that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, may I say just one word. I am surprised at the use of the expression "indignation". There was no indignation. It was simply argument. When my hon. friend says that this is the plan of the farmers union and these other organizations, may I say that I do not believe that it is. What these organizations said is this. They said that we should take foreign currencies—that is soft currencies—for our wheat and sell for those currencies. But what the United States is doing is accepting the currency of India—and then using that currency in India for the amelioration of conditions in India. That is quite a different proposition from the one that has been advanced on the part of the organizations to which my hon. friend has made reference. What this plan on the part of the United States simply amounts to is this: The United States has available many millions of dollars for economic assistance abroad. It says to the countries in question, in effect: We are going to give you this assistance. You accept our wheat or other surplus agricultural products. We will take your money. Then we will use that money within your territory, within the limitations imposed by the agricultural laws of the United States, in order to raise conditions and to improve the economic lot of your country. What it amounts to, in fact, is that the United States is granting direct assistance to those countries in the billions of dollars. It uses this means as one of three methods to assist needy nations and at the same time dispose of its surpluses.

Item agreed to.

114. Contribution to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the Near East, $500,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a contribution for a grant to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the Near East. In this regard I should like to ask the minister what if any advance has been made during the last year to meet the extremely serious problem created by these refugee camps in Arab countries. As one visits these camps one cannot but be impressed by the need for their existence while at the same time realizing that they constitute festering sores among the individuals occupying them. Has any advance been made in the last year towards the demobilization of these refugee people? How many were in these camps a year ago? To what degree has there been any decrease during the last year? Has the minister any message of hope that this, one of the darkest blots on the probability of maintaining peace in the middle east, may be obliterated and removed?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I am more anxious than confident about the nature of this problem and a solution if it. As my hon. friend has said, it is a desperate problem. It is a desperate problem economically for those concerned and it is a dangerous problem politically. In those refugee camps in Palestine I think there are about 905,000 refugees. I think that number is greater than it was when this problem first faced us. The contributions that are being made to this fund are for the purpose of relief, in order to keep these refugees alive, and also for the more constructive purpose of rehabilitation and resettlement. Not so much has been done in the latter category because the activities that have been under way for purposes of rehabilitation and resettlement have been bedevilled by the political difficulties which it seems will have to be solved before rehabilitation can take place. Some progress has been made by the agency in developing a works program—the Sinai Works Program—and some refugees have been settled in works projects of one kind and another. But there has been a very inadequate response to the challenge of this problem. The larger project of the Jordan dam which would take care of a good many of these refugees and give them employment is not likely to be implemented as long as political conditions remain as unhappy as they are. With great reluctance I say that we feel that in making a contribution to this problem now we are not making a very constructive one because about all we are doing is keeping these people alive. However, someone must do that. We must hope that future developments will make possible both rehabilitation and resettlement. So far as resettlement is concerned, that aspect of the problem is complicated by the fact that the refugees themselves want to go back to Israel. There is not room there for all of them, in and around Israel, and I doubt whether it is possible to find a solution by wholesale repatriation there, although the state of Israel has agreed to receive some. The other way to solve this problem of resettlement is to find other parts of the world—that is of the Arab world and other places—where they might be resettled. The refugees themselves are showing great reluctance to leave the camps for that purpose and are not being encouraged to do so by the Arab governments. That is all I can say, Mr. Chairman. I am afraid it is not a very encouraging report.

Mr. Castleden: I should like to ask the minister this question. Is there any possibility of increasing the amount so that these people can get a more adequate allowance than they are getting at the present time? According to reports that we receive—and there has been very excellent commentation here through the C.B.C. recently—it is not adequate. Is there any possibility of United Nations increasing this amount so that these people will not be left so much on the verge of starvation? Apparently the amount that is given is, according to our standards, terrifically low.

Mr. Pearson: That is true, Mr. Chairman; but my information is that the condition of the refugees in the camps—though rather deplorable, no doubt, when comparison is made with our own standards—is as good as if not better than that of those Arabs in the same position outside the camps. I do not think there is any foundation for the stories that go around to the effect that the refugees in these camps are on starvation diets, and that sort of thing. That is not the case. They are not badly looked after.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I can vouch for the truth of what the minister has just said. All one has to do is to visit some of the Arab settlements that are outside the camps. He will see that those who are inside the camps or the compounds are not being too badly treated by comparison. Indeed, the horrible thing about the camps is that these people are deteriorating year by year. They have been in there now since 1948 and they have become completely dependent. As the minister said, it grows worse daily. It looks to me as though the United Nations organization will have to be prepared to spend a considerable sum of money in developing some settlement schemes in Syria, Jordan and the other Arab states.

One of the things it seems to me they could be doing is to develop the potential irrigation projects out of the waters that come down from northern Syria. There is a lot of land that could be irrigated and made habitable for these people. If they are given a chance to settle on a piece of land where there is some water, I feel quite sure that in a few years at least they will put themselves on an equal basis with the Arab peoples elsewhere. I am quite sure that Israel is not prepared to take them back, not only because there is no room but because a good many of these people took up arms against the government of Israel in the war of liberation in 1948 and therefore are guilty of treason in the true sense of the word, so they could hardly take them back. This does not for one moment, or should not at any rate, militate against every effort being made to see that they are being rehabilitated in a proper manner.

I can understand what a difficult problem it is when you can get the full co-operation of the governments of the Arab states, but you have not got it. How you are to get it is a problem. May I right here issue a word of warning? We in the western world have done so much now to lose the friendship of the Arab states generally that I think we had better be careful of the sort of sanctions we attempt to impose for the purpose of getting this rehabilitation complete. Just the same, it is a great humanitarian problem that has to be solved somehow.

115. To provide for the cost of Canada's participation as a member of the international commissions for supervision and control in Indo-China including authority, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, for the appointment and fixing of salary rates of commissioners, secretaries and staff by the governor in council; and to ratify the appointments made by the governor in council to the said commissions and the salaries relating thereto fixed by the governor in council prior to the current fiscal year, $564,500.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister in this regard what the present position of Canada's supervisory commission or the members of it is. Were they not supposed to leave at the end of two years and has that period not expired? Has there been any culmination of the idea that there should be elections between the peoples of north and south Viet Nam? Is it or is it not a fact that what is taking place there, in the continuing delays and procrastinations imposed by the communists, is just another example of duplicity on their part?

Mr. Pearson: We had hoped that we would have discharged our responsibilities in Indo-China by now as a member of the international commission, but that has not been possible. As my hon. friend knows, there are three commissions. The one in Cambodia has had its activities reduced greatly. Military teams have been disbanded and we have merely a skeleton military and external affairs staff in the capital. We would, I think, have been able to withdraw completely from Cambodia by now but for the fact there is a connection in the Geneva agreement between the three commissions.

The commission in Laos has not been able to complete its work because of the difficulty of absorbing the two northern provinces now under Pathet Lao communist control into the state of Laos. The commission is doing its best to bring that about because if these provinces remain under communist control and the communists become established there, it would be an unhappy development.

So far as the Viet Nam commission is concerned, under the Geneva arrangement elections were to have been held by July 20 of this year, this has not been possible because the government of South Viet Nam, the Diem government, has not been willing to accept the legal responsibilities that were accepted by the French under the Geneva agreement. French troops and French authorities have now withdrawn from South Viet Nam. Negotiations are going on now by which we hope the Diem government will accept in practice, if not in theory, certain responsibilities under the Geneva agreement which will enable the commission to carry on. The other difficulty is the understandable reluctance on the part of the Diem government to take part in any elections unless they can be given absolute assurance that these will be free elections, in our meaning of the word. They have no confidence whatever in the co-operation of the communist authorities in the north in bringing that about.

So it looks, Mr. Chairman, as if we may be in Viet Nam for some months. We have an obligation to stay there as long as the commission is able to do a useful job in preserving peace and stability in that area. There are about 170 Canadians still in Indo-China.

The Deputy Chairman: Supplementary estimates—item 616.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this the item on departmental administration?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes, this is for departmental administration.

616. Departmental administration—further amount required, $121,199.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I thought. My hon. friend the hon. member for Broadview brought up a question some hours ago with regard to the treatment accorded to Mr. Milan Babic, who was travelling on a Canadian passport and who, according to the telegram my hon. friend read to the committee this afternoon, was forced to submit to two hours of interrogation. In addition to that, he had to wait overnight until word was received from Washington to permit of his clearance being granted. I should like to know from the minister what justification there is for more than a mere cursory examination being made of a person travelling under a Canadian passport, having arrived in the United States and having no intention to do more than pass through the United States to his Canadian destination. Is such a person not entitled to receive more courteous and considerate treatment than was accorded to this man? According to the Associated Press dispatch from New York on July 31, this man's name was on a list which called for close check by the service. A spokesman said a name may be placed on the list for 101 reasons. Sir, most of us would be satisfied with one of those reasons being explained.

Why was this man treated in this way? Does a Canadian passport not convey to the holder certain rights which were apparently violated in this case? Was this an examination that applied to a Canadian any of the principles of McCarthyism? Why should a Canadian, once the Canadian government has seen fit, through its Secretary of State for External Affairs, to grant him a passport, be required to be examined as to whether or not he is a fit and proper person, since he has been so designated and considered by the Canadian government, before a passport is issued? I would appreciate it if the minister would advise the committee of the latest information on this question, because it is one that has aroused a considerable amount of feeling in our country. I am sure that such feelings should be appeased at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, as I advised the house, I have already sent a telegram to this naturalized Canadian in order to get his version of the facts as they have been related in the press. So far as I know a reply to that telegram has not yet been received, although I have had a chance to see the telegram that he sent to my hon. friend opposite who brought this matter up earlier. I would say that on the basis of the information that I have already received there appears to be no justification whatever for the treatment that was given this shipwrecked Canadian when he reached New York.

Of course, the possession of a Canadian passport does not give anyone immunity from the investigations and the attentions of the representative and the officials of a foreign government once the holder of that Canadian passport reaches the land of that foreign government. As I said yesterday, the United States has the legal right to question and to detain anybody on its soil. A legal right is one thing, propriety and justice are something else. I do not feel that the United States authorities should have taken the action they did take in these circumstances. We have been informed by those authorities that he was treated and questioned with courtesy. In that respect the information which appeared in the press does not coincide with that which we have been given by the officials of the United States government.

We were also informed, Mr. Chairman, that this particular man, for some reason or other and I do not know why—was on some security list of the United States and that was why he was singled out for this special attention. After the case was cleared up, I believe through intervention from Washington, he was allowed to proceed.

I am not going to challenge the right of any government to detain any foreigner on its soil if it has a legitimate reason for detaining him on security grounds. But we have no reason to believe that this particular Canadian was a security risk in any country. He is certainly not on any security list of ours, and therefore I regret very much that he should have been subjected to this kind of treatment. After we hear from Mr. Babic himself, if the facts of his own message indicate that it should be done, we shall follow this matter up by protesting to the United States authorities in Washington.

617. To provide for the Canadian government's assessment for membership in international (including commonwealth) organizations, as detailed in the estimates, including authority to pay the amounts specified in the currencies of the countries indicated, notwithstanding that the payments may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of May, 1956—further amount required, $160,491.

Mr. Blackmore: Is this the item under which the minister was going to answer questions that I asked a few minutes ago about the package deal?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to go into this matter at this particular moment in very great detail and I wonder whether my hon. friend, who is always so considerate in these matters, would agree if I sent him a pretty full and complete written report on this whole question of the package deal? I will, however, say to him now in answer to his particular questions, that the policy of the government in this matter was stated long before the United Nations assembly met in New York and therefore we were not, as he rather suggested this morning, doing something behind the backs of the people of this country, who had no reason to believe that we were taking this stand.

I said previous to the assembly of last year that we supported the principle of universality of membership. So we did support at the United Nations assembly all outstanding applications for membership in the United Nations except those on behalf of states which were divided. Those applications included some strongly anti-communist states like Japan, Italy, Spain, Austria and Ireland. It included some states that we call now uncommitted, and it included some communist states. In order to get our friends into the United Nations—and we thought they certainly should be there—Japan was one of them—we had to accept the whole list that I have mentioned, and an arrangement was made that all of those countries should be brought into the United Nations at this time. That arrangement was not carried out because the government of nationalist China, at the security council, vetoed Outer Mongolia, and because of that fact the Soviet union vetoed Japan. But the rest of them were admitted, and I think, with respect to my hon. friend, there is a good deal to be said—notwithstanding the views we may have about the governments of some of those countries—for having them as sovereign states in the United Nations. At least that is the view that we took at that time.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to be difficult about this matter. I shall welcome the full statement that the minister will send me but I do believe the people of Canada are entitled to be able to read some details in Hansard about this whole experience we went through, especially as we find such statements as the one I propose to quote from the Daily Mirror of New York of December 15, 1955, which in an editorial referring to this matter of the package deal said:

It was an obvious, childish trick to get Red China into the United Nations by subterfuge.

This paper is not a minor paper in the United States; I think it has over 2 million circulation and is rather reputable. The editor and the staff were right there where they were able to follow the whole situation right through. This particular editorial, which is entitled, "The United Nations Veto", closes with these words:

Canada is also at fault for serving Russia's purposes, even if unwittingly.

This is a pretty strong indication, I would say, that it is important to have some explanation. Here is another editorial entitled, "Suggestion for Dulles". I do not know whether this is the same paper—no, it is another paper. It is one called The News. In its editorial are these words, reporting Nationalist China's delegate T. F. Tsiang:

As U.N. Nationalist China delegate T. F. Tsiang says, four of these are nothing but captive nations of the red slave empire: Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania.

By letting them in, Dr. Tsiang adds, the U.N. in effect recognized their present robber governments and promised never to lift a finger to help free these enslaved peoples. For that, Tsiang doubts the slaves "will ever forgive us".

As I said before the committee recessed for lunch, it looks to me as though in recognizing Mongolia we recognized first of all that red Russia has a claim to Mongolia which I do not see how she can possibly establish, and second that she has a right to take any province of Russia and erect it into an independent nation and have it admitted to the United Nations.

Under such a rule it ought to be possible for the United States to gain admission to the United Nations for everyone of the 48 states and Alaska as independent nations. It also ought to be possible for Canada to gain admission for every one of the ten provinces in this country; but I will wager that if we made a request or even hinted that Ontario, for example, should be admitted into the United Nations there would be plenty of protest forthcoming from Russia and many other nations.

That is a serious principle, too. In addition to that, the admission of outer Mongolia into the United Nations is tantamount to saying that this section of territory no longer belongs to nationalist China and she has no claim to it whatever.

Every one of the assumptions I have mentioned is an unsound assumption. No matter how we may look at it, there is still in effect a state of war between nationalist China and red China because they have never come to terms nor agreed to a treaty. That is a serious matter. If we are going to go forward in the world with any principles of international fair dealing we will have to give consideration to matters of this kind.

There has been a great deal of suggestion on the part of Canadian authorities—more or less veiled, ambiguous and in a form that could be denied—and a great deal of pressure for the recognition of red China. It is pointed out that Great Britain has recognized red China and consequently we should do the same. I feel that in the interests of international fair dealing and the stability of moral principles we should draw up a standard and a set of principles which would have to be met by a nation in order to have it be worthy of recognition and admission to the United Nations.

I do not believe communist China could qualify under any combination of valid principles as being worthy of entering the United Nations. I have no desire to labour this point but those people who are interested in pursuing this matter in a scientific way might with some profit read my House of Commons speech of April 21, 1955 and my House of Commons speech of May 5, 1955. They will find plenty of evidence and authorities to back up my statements. I will challenge any man on earth to question the conclusions which are drawn in those two speeches or the authorities which are used.

They show beyond a question of doubt that China was simply stolen from Chiang Kai-shek. Communists and members of the United States communist organization, working through the United States state department, are guilty of robbing Chiang Kai-shek of China. There is evidence beyond any possibility of question that such was the case. In the light of those considerations I say that while the minister has given a reply it is far from being an adequate answer. I think it leaves the whole international situation absolutely awash. No community of people knows where it stands.

Personally I object to Canada being a party to the recognition of principles which in the history of this world up to the present time have never been deemed valid by any reputable nation. People may say, "Well, the reds are in charge of China; they are the government de facto. What are you going to do about it?" This amounts to saying that if a gang of robbers carries off 1,000 steers into the mountains and holds them there for a year the gang of robbers owns the steers. I do not think anyone will recognize any validity in that assumption.

Now, may I say a word or two concerning what did occur in connection with China? I do not wish to go into too much detail concerning what did occur in connection with China but one or two of these considerations must be taken into account, it seems to me. Franklin D. Roosevelt at the Yalta conference in February 1945 granted Stalin rights to Manchuria which gave Stalin a chance to overrun all of China unless China was ably assisted by those countries she had already befriended, such as the United States.

What conceivable right had Roosevelt, who was visiting from the United States, to make any commitments whatsoever in respect of land which he had no right to by any conceivable stretch of the imagination? Fundamentally, however, it was that commitment upon which Russia acted and this put Chiang Kai-shek in a set of circumstances from which it would have been difficult to extricate himself.

Harry S. Truman followed up that course of action at the Potsdam conference and confirmed that commitment. Again, what right had Truman doing that? From that point on some of the most treacherous manipulations, scheming and downright interference from the United States took place, as in the case of General Marshall, who was sent over to China in 1946 by the United States administration with the express mission of stopping Chiang Kai-shek from driving the red communists back into Russia.

By the most disreputable and disgraceful set of actions, the United States, under the guidance of Dean Acheson, succeeded in putting Chiang Kai-shek into a position in which he had to withdraw to Formosa. Then apparently the Korean war was brought on by the administration of the U.S.A. with the calculated purpose of giving the United States an excuse for putting the U.S. seventh fleet in the strait so that Chiang Kai-shek could not possibly go back to the Chinese mainland and recover it, notwithstanding the fact that, when Chiang Kai-shek withdrew, he left 1,250,000 loyal, fully-trained soldiers in China, facing the communists there, he left 150 million loyal Chinese on the west and southern borders of China, and with his navy he was able to blockade and prevent ships from going up and supplying the north red China people with munitions, and with his air force of 250 aircraft he was able to deliver goods to support his 1,250,000 soldiers on the Chinese mainland.

There are people who revolt at the idea of saying that the south Korean war was engineered. The evidence to support that presumption is so strong that I believe that any judge of any reputation whatsoever would rule that, on the basis of circumstantial evidence, the south Korean war was engineered, by the United States administration and for no purpose whatsoever other than to prevent Chiang Kai-shek from getting back on the Chinese mainland and reconquering China, and at the same time also to let Russia get control of south Korea.

I do not wish to labour this any further but I certainly think that we should have no more tormenting and tantalizing of any Canadian government official, from the Prime Minister right down, urging that red China be recognized. The Chinese are just a group of red robbers. They do not undertake to keep any treaty. What they are doing now in Burma, according to the reports, if we can rely on them, indicates that what I have said is true, that they are just a lot of robbers. I think I have said enough to show that I have good reason for bringing this matter up. I shall take up the minister's promise and accept the material he sends me and read it through with great care, and probably next year I shall talk to him again about this matter.

619. To provide for a contribution towards the erection of a monument at Steinkjer, Norway, in honour of the Arctic explorer, Otto Sverdrup, $1,400.

Mr. Herridge: Could the minister explain this item?

Mr. Pearson: This is a contribution to the erection of a monument at Steinkjer, Norway, to Otto Sverdrup, who discovered the islands in the north of Canada which now bear his name during his voyage as captain of the Fram in 1898. The Norwegian government later, after discussions with the Canadian government, renounced any claim to sovereignty over the islands by virtue of this discovery, but many of the Norwegian people since that time may have felt some resentment towards Canada for ignoring the Norwegian interests there and the fact that Norway discovered these islands. When the proposal was made in Norway to erect a monument to this great explorer, who discovered, among other islands, these Canadian islands, we thought it would be a friendly gesture to participate in the erection of the monument to the extent of $1,400.

Mr. Herridge: I think it is an excellent gesture.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

292. Departmental administration, $543,934.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): On July 12, when we were able to devote about ten minutes to the study of these estimates, I had time to make a general statement, and then I said I wished to place before the house a statement of our fundamental concepts and policy in administering the national parks of Canada.

I believe that the first question that we should ask ourselves is: what are, in fact, the national parks of Canada? I believe we have across our country a system of national parks that are second to none. There are 17 of these parks from British Columbia to Nova Scotia, and it is likely that one other will be added in the near future in the province of Newfoundland. They have a total area of more than 29,000 square miles. They contain examples of the finest scenic beauties in mountain, forest and water that can be found anywhere. They provide refuge for wildlife where it can be seen and enjoyed under natural conditions. Some of the older parks such as Banff and Jasper have become famous throughout the world. Above all, the parks provide Canadians in all walks of life with beautiful areas preserved for all time for their benefit and enjoyment.

The next question, and it is very important that we ask these questions of ourselves from time to time because of the requests we have to build and make various installations in the parks, is: why do we have the parks? Year after year, the members of this house have shown strong interest in the further development of the national parks, in having them made more available and enjoyable for the Canadian people. Today there are few who do not recognize and appreciate the value of the parks, but this was not always the case. Years ago, both in Canada and the United States, many persons interested in the exploitation of natural resources looked on the establishment of parks for the use of the people as a foolish dream and a waste of potential profit for themselves. It is to the credit of our legislators in the past that they had the foresight to see the needs of the future and to ensure for us the preservation of that great heritage which is ours in the national parks of Canada today.

We hear so much now about the parks in the travel advertising; we hear so much about their value to the tourist industry, the stimulus they provide to draw tourists from outside Canada, the contribution the parks make through the tourist and other industries to the general economy of Canada, that it would almost seem that the parks were created for the economic benefits they bestow. How far people can depart, even in this day and age, from the ideal that inspired our fathers and forefathers and that, I am convinced, rests firmly in the hearts of the great majority of Canadians who know and love the parks and who know why they have been established.

The parks are dedicated under the National Parks Act to the benefit, education and enjoyment of the Canadian people, and the act requires that they be used and maintained in such a way that they will be left unimpaired for the benefit of future generations.

The parks were not established for the tourist industry; they were not established for commercial pursuits, or for their direct and indirect economic benefits. They were established, I repeat, for the benefit, education and enjoyment of the Canadian people. They were established so that Canadians would have for all time great areas where they could relax and renew their strength in settings of unrivalled beauty.

To be sure, there is value to Canada in the industries that derive benefits from the parks, but infinitely greater is the value our people derive, in their hundreds of thousands, in happier minds and healthier bodies gained through rest and recreation in our great park areas. The important reasons, therefore, that we have the national parks are: first, to provide unspoiled areas, and I draw this to the attention of a number of members who sometimes make suggestions for installations in parks which will spoil the parks. Our aim is to provide unspoiled areas where people can enjoy rest and recreation in surroundings that are a complete change from what they meet in their normal lives; to provide unspoiled areas where people can enjoy and appreciate the God-given beauties and wonders that we in Canada are fortunate to possess as part of our national heritage; to provide unspoiled areas wherein people can learn about the world of nature, and become better people through the knowledge that there are other things in life of importance apart from man's creations. It is obvious that the value of the parks to the Canadian people rests more in the realm of the spirit than in the realm of commerce, and that this value of the parks can be lost forever unless they are preserved unspoiled and unimpaired to the greatest possible extent.

How then, Mr. Chairman, should we approach the administration of these parks? In the United States, where the pressure of population on land use and a growing appreciation of conservation principles led to the establishment of a great parks system even earlier than in Canada, the fundamental value of the parks was fully realized by many public spirited citizens, even when commercial interests were fighting the creation of the parks with every instrument at their disposal. In 1918 the then secretary of the interior, Franklin K. Lane, set out the basic principles behind the parks in these words:

> First, the national parks must be maintained in absolutely unimpaired form for the use of future generations as well as those of our time.
> Second, they are set apart for the use, observation, health and pleasure of the people.
> Third, the national interest must dictate all decisions affecting public or private enterprise in the parks.

These words of secretary Lane, set down almost 40 years ago, could not be improved upon in describing our own approach to the administration of the national parks of Canada. In meeting day to day problems and in planning future developments we must never lose sight of the ideal. To leave the parks in an absolutely natural state would mean that they could be used by very few people. We must have some man-made improvements but no more at any time than are necessary to make the parks accessible and to meet the needs of visitors in their enjoyment of the parks.

The most difficult problem, therefore, in national parks administration is to preserve at all times the best possible balance between visitors' needs and the preservation of the unspoiled beauties they come to see and enjoy. In achieving this balance there are four rules of the utmost importance that we endeavour to follow with the greatest care. 1. Impairments of the parks must be accepted if without them the average Canadian could not get into the parks, stay in them and reach the natural features that are there for him to enjoy. 2. An impairment for that purpose should not be incurred if it is very serious and if the added benefit in enjoyment of the park is not substantial. 3. All impairments should be regulated and controlled so that they are as small and as few as possible. 4. No impairment should be permitted if its purpose is to provide an enjoyment that can equally well be achieved elsewhere unless that impairment contributes towards or promotes the enjoyment of outdoor recreation in keeping with the purposes for which the parks are established.

Because the parks are preserved for the people of Canada as a whole for very special purposes, not for the inhabitants of one area but for the people of Canada as a whole, it follows that special groups and interests do not have within the parks all the rights and privileges that may be theirs in other parts of the country. To maintain areas in a special way requires special rules and regulations which in other places would be quite unnecessary. When we realize that the government of all community life across the country is based primarily on the needs and wishes of the local people and is conditioned by a desire to stimulate their commercial and industrial life to their greater gain and higher living standard, we can appreciate that, without special regulations, the natural beauties of the parks would be destroyed within a very few years.

We have seen countryside ruined by billboards. We have seen ugly industrial buildings erected in areas that formerly were beautiful. We have all seen these things, and in most areas we have to accept them as part of our normal way of life, but is there anyone among us who has not thought of this occasionally with regret?

In the national parks we have the priceless opportunity to avoid all this and to preserve some of the most beautiful parts of Canada for all time for all the people. To this end, the National Parks Act and regulations made thereunder are designed, and the government of Canada is charged with an important responsibility. Our regulations must meet the needs now and in the future of a nation-wide park system. There are basic management requirements common to all the parks and our approach to these must always be the same. To give special treatment in one place would lead to special treatment in another, and the national character of the system would be lost. For this reason, decisions have to be taken nationally here in Ottawa, in spite of the criticism that we hear at times from the local people. These decisions have to be taken on a nation-wide basis because they could affect more than one park and some of the cases have to be handled with great care.

Moreover, we have to consider the effect of our decisions on conditions that will exist 50, 100 or even more years in the future, and this is an administrative problem that is rarely appreciated. If at times our reaction in the department to changing times and modern innovations may be slow, there are, I am sure, few thoughtful persons who would wish us to make hasty decisions and in so doing endanger the heritage of Canada's future.

But, Mr. Chairman, what are these daily problems that we face? Many of our problems lie in trying to give the best possible service to a steadily increasing number of visitors with a limited budget. These are met without too much difficulty, and I can say with certainty that the vast majority of visitors to our parks have returned home well satisfied, to the credit of our dedicated staffs in the field and often as well to the credit of conscientious private operators of cabins, hotels, motels, restaurants and other concessions within the parks.

The most continuing problems that we face and the most criticisms that we receive arise from the desire of various persons to do things, to build things or to regulate things within the parks for their own personal or local benefit. Even the minister is in danger when he says "No" of being branded as a bureaucrat. There is a tendency for some people to imply that we make regulations for the fun of making regulations. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that there is nothing that is less fun than the making of regulations. What we are doing we are doing honestly and conscientiously in order to try to protect the serious purposes that are basic in the parks.

When a person wishes to erect a large advertising sign and we say no we are told that we are standing in the way of business development. Would hon. members like to see billboards in our parks? I doubt it. There is room enough outside, as a matter of fact. I am sorry that the hon. member for Bow River is not here; because I should like him to hear this. When a person wishes to take up permanent residence in a park, to retire there, even though his presence is not required to serve the needs of visitors, and we say "no", we are told that we are interfering with personal freedom.

Mr. Low: May I just tell the minister that I will take careful note for the hon. member for Bow River. He is ill and is not able to be here today.

Mr. Lesage: I am sorry to hear that.

Mr. Low: I will take careful note for him.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I was not complaining about his absence. I was just saying that I was sorry he was not here. I am sorry to hear that he is ill.

I am sure that hon. members can figure out for themselves what would happen if a private citizen demanded public land in a municipal park—or, let us say, in any park in Canada—for his private home. It comes to exactly the same thing.

When it becomes necessary, in view of the greatly increased numbers of visitors, to rearrange camp grounds or to restrict their use to the period of a normal holiday, and when in the course of these changes certain persons lose some of the privileges they have enjoyed in the past—such as that of occupying the best place in the camp grounds over a whole season—we are told that we are depriving people of their rights, and our decisions can be most unpopular among the groups concerned.

We do our best to meet particular interests when this can be done without prejudice to all the people of Canada; but once a situation becomes such that the interest of the people as a whole is suffering or is likely to suffer in future, we are duty bound to all Canadians—to whom the parks belong—to make the best arrangements possible.

There is a special problem in some of the parks, namely that of the townsites. I should like to say a few words about that matter. There are major townsites at Banff and Jasper and there are smaller townsites in a number of other parks. There is a tendency for those businesses serving visitors to concentrate at one point within a park, and as tourist volume increases these townsites grow in size. A large proportion of our problems in administering the parks arise out of the townsites. They have many of the aspects of municipalities across Canada and there must be regulations to control their orderly development.

Outside the parks, municipal control is in the hands of the local people and is exercised through their elected representatives. The driving force in this control is naturally the economic betterment of the particular community, and the people there do not have to worry about the effects of their actions on other communities across Canada, or even to any great extent about the effects on visitors except from the standpoint of potential business. All of this is right and proper, as the community exists to meet the needs of the local people.

In the park townsites, however, the situation is totally different. The communities are in themselves an impairment of the natural state of the park, and can be permitted under the Parks Act only because they are required to meet the needs of visitors. That is their only reason for existing. For this reason, the development of park townsites must be governed from the point of view of the needs of visitors to the parks—those of the present and those of fifty or even one hundred years from now—and not of the needs of those whose interest in the parks is commercial operation in one form or another.

In administering the townsites we endeavour to create an economic atmosphere within which sufficient businesses to meet genuine tourist needs may reasonably prosper; and to some extent, therefore, regulations must take into account the needs of these businesses. Their needs, however, must always be judged in the light of the interest of all Canadians now and in the future in having the parks preserved for their benefit, and their right in that connection. The preservation of the parks is the essential object and at the same time, the limiting factor not the requirements of any particular business that is or would like to be within a park.

While residents and businesses in the park townsites do not have the same control of their local affairs that would be the case outside the parks, they do have the opportunity through their local representatives to present to the park administration their problems and needs. An example of this is the Banff advisory council, and at the present time one is being formed in Jasper. As far as possible, the wishes of these local representatives are met; and when this cannot be done we always endeavour to give full explanation of all our actions. Sometimes, of course, there simply are not funds available; at other times local wishes run counter to the principles on which the parks are founded and there is no choice but to withold consent.

While local people in the townsites do not have the normal control over the operation and development of their communities, they also do not have to bear the normal tax load. Townsite residents are charged nothing for construction and maintenance of streets, for snow removal, for police services, for public park areas or for administration costs. They contribute generally less than half the cost of the installation and maintenance of water, sewer and fire protection systems wherever these are provided. A resident of Banff townsite, with a property assessment of $6,000 would pay tax of about $107 per year, including school and hospital taxes. The average tax on similar property in three towns of comparable size in Alberta would be over $300. One may compare $107 with $300.

For a typical business site with an assessment of about $13,000 in Banff, the tax would be about $225. In the other three towns in Alberta which I have mentioned, it would be over $750 or more than three times as much. If townsite residents in the parks were to find themselves located outside the parks tomorrow, they would be faced with a tremendous added financial burden, even if an outright gift were made to them of the extensive capital works that have been installed almost entirely from taxes paid by Canadians as a whole.

Before I resume my seat, may I say this. We might ask ourselves what we are doing about the future of the parks. The most immediate need is for better road facilities. A major increase is provided—as I mentioned on July 12—for this purpose in the 1956-57 estimates. This is part of an 8-year program completely to reconstruct all major park highways and bring them to adequate standards. The cost, apart from the trans-Canada highway across Banff and Yoho parks, will probably exceed $60 million. During this same 8-year period, while a large portion of funds made available by parliament will be devoted to highways, it is proposed to continue with the present major program of improvement and extension of park facilities used by the public, including camp grounds and picnic areas, comfort stations, bathing beach developments, and many others. Improvements and extensions will also be made in facilities required by the department for the better maintenance and operation of the parks.

Work is now proceeding on the establishment of a special planning group within the parks branch of the department which will be charged with the task of gathering data and working out and recommending long-range plans for the development of all the parks so that this development may proceed in an orderly manner and in keeping with the anticipated steady increase in the number of visitors over the years. I have outlined at some length our approach to national park management and development. I hope this will help all those who are interested in understanding our problems and the way in which we endeavour to solve them. Canada receives many benefits from the parks, such as increased tourist business, a livelihood for those catering to the tourist industry and the provision of work for many hundreds in the operation of the park. Above all, Canadians receive those intangible benefits of quiet relaxation and recreation in our priceless areas of peace and grandeur. The preservation of this heritage and placing it within easier reach of the people of Canada is the constant aim that I have, together with the officials of the department.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has just given us a considerable discourse on national parks inspired, I have no doubt, by the fact that there has been a great deal of criticism of the administration of the parks, particularly in Alberta where the two largest parks are situated. Quite a lot of the minister's speech was taken up with the basic conceptions which were in mind when the national parks were formed, and with those I must say that I agree, on the whole, as I think does nearly everyone in the country. The minister also took up quite a bit of time I thought in setting up straw men and knocking them down. He took up some time also in making analogies which were not applicable in point of fact. I am not going to deal with all those points in detail at this time, as I think perhaps the criticisms which I have to make of the administration of the national parks might perhaps be more appropriate when we come to deal specifically with the national parks branch.

I would just comment on one of the points the minister made shortly before he sat down and of which he seemed to make a great deal. It was that taxes are a great deal less in Banff than they are in comparable towns. The fact still remains, Mr. Chairman, that there exists in Banff and Jasper, as well as any other town sites which may exist in national parks, taxation without representation.

Mr. Lesage: They are not taxes, they are service charges.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to remind the minister that the tea tax which provoked the Boston tea party was a very small tax, in fact it was only a token tax, but it gave rise to the American revolution. I think the minister, by trying to make a big point of the fact that taxes are less in Banff than in places of comparable size outside national parks, is batting on a very sticky wicket indeed.

I should like to deal somewhat generally with some of the phases of this department which, of course, consists of five more or less non-related branches. There is the northern administration of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon; national parks; water resources; the forestry branch and the travel bureau. There is very little connection between most of these branches, and therefore I will touch on some of them in a general way at this time and leave what we may call the detailed criticism and questions until we come to the specific items. I think perhaps that is a more orderly way of conducting a discussion.

The government administration and development of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon territories is probably the most important matter to come under this department, at least from the long-term development of Canada as a great nation. At the present time there is much more interest directed to our northland than used to be the case. There is a variety of reasons why this should be so. First of all, our other frontiers have disappeared and this is the only great frontier left. Naturally, people who are interested in new things and new developments have had their attention directed to the north. Then, the great improvement which has taken place in transportation, especially air transportation, has made the north much more accessible than it was before. This has made it possible for a greatly increased number of people to go into the north country, carry on developments there and see what the prospects were.

Then, there have been some considerable mineral discoveries which, of course, have excited a good deal of interest and have taken a considerable number of people into our north country; especially has this been true so far as uranium is concerned. Of course, there has been quite a bit of gold prospecting and development of gold mines in this territory. However, I think the greatest factor in opening up the north and increasing the interest of the people in it has been defence requirements. The string of radar stations now being constructed to constitute the D.E.W. line will, of course, be permanent establishments right across the Arctic. The supplying of these D.E.W. line stations means constant and regular transportation to areas of the far north in which no white man, or very few, had ever been up to a very short time ago.

Now, in connection with the establishment of the D.E.W. line, it seems to me that the Canadian government has not been sufficiently in evidence—in fact, it has not even been represented at all in some of the places where development is occurring in that area. In that connection I should like to read a few excerpts from an article which appeared in Maclean's magazine of May 26, written by Ralph Allen. The article is entitled, "Will D.E.W. line cost Canada its Northland?" I should like to read a few excerpts from this to indicate to the committee what the situation in the north was found to be by a very experienced writer. Talking of the D.E.W. line he said:

> It is the charter under which a tenth of Canada may very well become the world's most northerly banana republic. For a sum of money that has been officially estimated at $400 million we have at least temporarily traded off our whole northern frontier. In law, we still own this northern frontier. In fact we do not.

I am not going into the military end of this at all. I am going to deal with it entirely from the point of view of northern affairs because the minister's department is responsible for administering northern affairs and for maintaining Canadian law and order in that area, maintaining our sovereignty over it. Therefore, the problem can really be placed squarely on the doorstep of the minister.

Another excerpt from this article reads:

> The suggestion that Canada is only the nominal ruler of this important part of Canada and that the United States is the real ruler is not taken seriously anywhere except on the D.E.W. line itself. There the truth is palpable and inescapable.

Now, I am not saying that Mr. Allen was the only newspaper reporter who went on the trip. There was a considerable number of United States and Canadian newsmen and all the articles I have seen written by Canadian newsmen were along the same lines as this article by Mr. Allen.

Another excerpt:

> The significant point, it seems to me, is that in this single area alone—the whole vexed and tortured area of security—there lie the seeds of serious discord and possible further encroachments on Canada's control of the Canadian north.

I should like to emphasize that last phrase, "possible further encouragement on Canada's control of the Canadian north". Well, it is the job of this department to assure that this encroachment does not take place.

I have one final excerpt:

> The most experienced and responsible Canadian I met in the north was a man I'd rather not identify more closely than that. I asked him bluntly: "Do you and your friends resent the presence of the Americans here?" "No", he said sadly, "It's the other way around. They resent our presence here".

I think that that article and articles by other people who were on this trip have caused a considerable number of Canadians to think pretty seriously about what our situation is in the north, the extent to which our control of that area still remains in our hands, the extent to which it has been lost and particularly what steps should be taken by our defence department, yes, but by this department particularly, to ensure that Canadian control of that area continues, is not further impaired and, as a mattter of fact, is restored.

There was an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal in April on this same matter, and it gives some suggestions as to what might be done by this department in order to correct the situation which was found by the newsmen who went up to the north. I should like to read part of it: It reads:

> It is not sufficient to proclaim a right and then walk away and forget it. There is need of official Canadian representation at every D.E.W. line site where more than a few men are stationed, a continuing reminder that the final authority is not the construction or operations superintendent but the government of Canada.

And the situation as found by these newsmen was that the final authority—in fact, practically the only authority at these various D.E.W. line stations—was the senior operations man present, who was an American. The editorial continues:

> The representative may be a mounted policeman or northern service officer of the northern affairs department. It is essential that he be there to see that Canadian laws and regulations—and if necessary Canadian dignities—are observed and it will be poor economy if the government thinks that this task can be done adequately by sporadic visits by policemen and service officers.

The present understanding is that there will be a man from the R.C.M.P. or other representative at every main site on the line when it is in operation within the next two years. There are also to be auxiliary and intermediate sites where it may be assumed there will be smaller groups of employees. In this ice-bound land each of these isolated units must be thought of as an island to which will come voyageurs of the air, some of whom will be from the United States with no landing until they reach their northern destination.

None should be left in any doubt, no matter how new Canada and the Arctic may be to him, that this is Canadian soil. This requires the Canadian ensign be given pride of place in displays of flags. It requires too that there be an agent of the Canadian civil power on hand to see the formalities of immigration, customs, game laws, and all the rest, are properly observed.

No citizen of the United States will object to such an arrangement but if Canada fails to see it is provided she invites embarrassment.

This is a matter which I would like the minister, when he speaks later when we get to this particular item of the Northwest Territories, to say something about, and it is a matter on which I hope there will be some immediate action taken, and that it will be provided that there will be a northern service officer or a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at each of these stations, not only at a few of the main stations. The cost would not be very great, and I think the significance of it, and the effect it would have, would be far out of proportion to the relatively small cost which would be involved.

I should like to say something about the resources of our north country. They are, of course, much greater than was thought up to only a few years ago. As a matter of fact, until quite recently the north was considered only as a great non-productive waste, mostly rock and barren lands. We now know that there are great mineral deposits there. I have already mentioned uranium and gold, but there is, of course, one of the greatest lead-zinc deposits at Pine Point which has ever been discovered and one which makes it quite likely that a railroad will be, and could profitably be, built into that area. There is water power there to be developed. Some has been developed already to a limited extent. There is a field at Fort Norman which has been under development for some time and, of course, the whole valley of the Mackenzie river is potential oil and gas land, and undoubtedly a good deal of oil and gas will be discovered and produced in that area.

There is a considerable amount of forest cover in the Mackenzie river area, particularly the western Arctic area, and on the basis of that undoubtedly a considerable amount of timber will be cut, and there is the possibility of a paper mill or paper mills in this area.

Mr. Lesage: The Slave river.

Mr. Harkness: That is the Mackenzie river valley. When I speak of the Mackenzie river valley I mean the Mackenzie and rivers running into it. It is all the Mackenzie river valley or system.

There is also, of course, the possibility of a certain amount of agriculture, sufficient, at any rate, to supply the local inhabitants living up there with vegetables, dairy products and things of that sort.

Fishing in the lakes is already a considerable industry and will, no doubt, be expanded. And then, of course, there is what was the original only wealth of the country, namely, the fur industry, which unfortunately has now declined very considerably. However, rather than being a great non-productive waste, we now know this north country is rich in resources, capable of supporting quite a considerable population and capable of sending down materials to the rest of Canada which will support a great many more. In other words, we have a great area there which is well worth developing. Unfortunately, the development has been very slow in coming.

Transportation, of course, is the most important thing in order to develop our north country. The department now seems to be much more aware of this than they were even a year ago. When the estimates of this department were before the estimates committee last year we spent quite a bit of time, and a number of us placed a great deal of emphasis on the development of roads, waterways and air transport and the building of a railway. At that time the minister was rather discouraging in the remarks that he made to us and more or less gave the impression that this was fairly fanciful; it was quite a long way in the future, and so on. As I say, since then apparently there has been a change of heart and the department now seems to be more aware of the need of developing transportation, and developing it immediately, and not waiting until some long period in the future. I was greatly cheered by the brief entitled "The Northwest Territories—Its Economic Prospects" which was presented to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects by R. G. Robertson, commissioner of the Northwest Territories and deputy minister of the department. On page 19 of this brief I find the following:

. . . any program designed to stimulate the economic development of the territories must begin with a determined attack on the problem of transportation.

There is absolutely no question about that. I am glad the department has now recognized this fact and I am particularly glad that it envisages something more extensive being done than was the case a year ago. On page 23 of the brief the following appears:

The most important element, however, is a whole set of high costs due, directly and indirectly, to problems of transportation. These costs can all be brought down substantially.

That is one of the things we harped on last year and from the brief I gather that the department is now working on this question, I hope vigorously. The paragraph continues:

Nothing else will have so great an effect in stimulating economic development.

On page 24 and subsequent pages the brief refers to the building of the railroad to Pine Point. We spoke about this at some length last year. I will read just a brief section concerning this subject:

. . . three methods by which transportation facilities into the Northwest Terrtiories might be improved. The first is the construction of a railroad to Great Slave lake. The second is construction of roads into promising resource development areas when and as indications suggest that these areas, given highway transportation, would be economic to develop. The third is the adoption of the policy of supplying the newly constructed defence stations in the Northwest Territories by commercial air services and the establishment of a network of scheduled commercial airlines in the Arctic.

I would really have liked to take up considerably more time dealing with transportation in the north and what might be done to improve it and I would particularly like to have referred at greater length to the projected railway to Pine Point; however, I will leave the subject of transportation at this point and merely ask the minister when he speaks if he will tell us how far along the plans are for this railway, if anything concrete has been arrived at and when construction may be expected to begin.

The problem of the native population is, of course, one of the greatest problems in the Northwest Territories. The old means of livelihood such as trapping for fur and fishing, particularly the former, are rapidly disappearing. I understand that the cariboo have been disappearing and have been killed off at a fairly rapid rate. The cariboo constituted the bulk of the food of a considerable proportion of the northern population and something has to be substituted in its place.

Some of the Eskimos and others in the north are securing employment on the construction of the D.E.W. line which, of course, serves to accustom them to our way of life. As a result of accustoming them to our way of life it perhaps makes it difficult for them to return to their old way of life. What to do with the native population of the north, how most usefully to employ them, how to keep them fed and particularly how to put them in the position of being able to feed themselves are some of the chief problems in the whole matter of administration of the north.

The department concerned puts out what is called a northern affairs bulletin. I have in my hand a copy of the June-July 1956 bulletin and dealing with the subject of education it says:

. . . every effort is being made to provide adult education of a type which will equip all able-bodied men to take on jobs which will result in a higher level of economy and standard of living throughout this vast area.

I am in very great sympathy with the idea of training men in the north to take on jobs but after this has been accomplished the main thing is the provision of jobs. It is of little use to train an Eskimo to be a machinist, we will say, if there is nothing to which he can apply his trade. I realize that the problem is an extremely difficult one and I would like the minister to give us at least some indication of what is being done to meet this problem.

Mr. Lesage: It is all in the annual report.

Mr. Harkness: I would like next, Mr. Chairman, to say something about the system of tendering and the letting of contracts in this department.

Mr. Lesage: The system of tendering?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, the system of tendering and the letting of contracts in the Department of Northern Affairs. This applies particularly in the parks branch but I think it applies throughout the whole department. I do not think the system is good and I feel it could be improved. In my opinion the old patronage system is still in effect in this department to a considerable extent, perhaps to a greater extent than is the case in any other department at the present time. It has been eliminated to quite an extent from a number of other departments but I do not think it has been eliminated to any great extent in this department.

Mr. Lesage: There is no park in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Harkness: I am not talking about the province of Quebec; I never mentioned Quebec. I do not know why the minister has brought up the question of Quebec.

Mr. Lesage: You are talking about patronage?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, and I said I think there is perhaps more patronage in this department than in any other department. I am talking about the whole of Canada and not any specific part of it. In any event there is a great difference between the matter of tenders and the letting of contracts in this department than is the case in the Department of Defence Production. In the latter department—

Mr. Nicholson: Six o'clock.

Mr. Harkness: Well, I am quite prepared to go on for a few minutes longer.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, please finish; go ahead. We will take two or three minutes.

Mr. Harkness: I think perhaps I could conclude before we recess.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, the staff has to have time for dinner. We have been cutting down on our dinner hours.

Mr. Harkness: All right, I will call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Harkness: Before we took dinner recess I had just been mentioning the fact that in my opinion the system of tendering and letting of contracts in this department leaves much to be desired and that the old patronage system is operating here perhaps to a greater extent than in any other department in the government.

An hon. Member: May I ask a question?

Mr. Harkness: No, I only have seven minutes left to me now and I do want to finish what I have to say. I shall be glad to answer any questions as soon as I have finished.

In connection with this matter, to begin with, there is not a free system of tendering, as far as I am aware, in regard to quite a number of items which are secured by this department. The only people who are allowed to tender are those who are on a preferred list. People who are not on that list do not even get an invitation to tender. In other words, the tenders are not advertised in the newspapers as they are in other departments, and only those political friends of the government who happen to be on that particular list get an opportunity to tender at all.

When a tender is put in, whether it is on that basis or whether it is on the basis of an open tender, the unsuccessful tenderer is not told who has got the contract or the price at which he has got it. In the Department of Defence Production, on the contrary, for example, if an unsuccessful tenderer sends in a stamped addressed envelope he can return a form which they actually give to him, and he will be sent the name of the successful tenderer and the price at which the tender was let. In this particular department, if a man asks for the name of a tenderer and the price at which it was let, they send him back a letter saying, "It is not the policy of this department to divulge prices or suppliers." In other words, the whole thing is kept under a veil of secrecy, and the people who have tendered have no means of knowing who got the contract. Perhaps they can send people to investigate and find out eventually, but they are not told and have no means of finding out what the price is.

I have just referred to what is done in the Department of Defence Production. It is quite plain that the method of tendering in that department is very much better than what prevails in this department as far as the public interest is concerned. A man sends in and he gets back the name of the successful tenderer and the price at which the contract is let. I am glad that the Minister of Defence Production is coming in, as I am holding up his department as a model for the one that is under discussion in this particular case. As a matter of fact, the method used in the Department of Defence Production is a very much better system, as far as the public interest is concerned. The unsuccessful tenderer then can see at what price the contract was let, and the next time a tender is advertised and he puts in a bid for it, he is naturally going to sharpen up his pencil and put in as good a price as he can. As a result, the government and the people of Canada are going to get the contract filled in most cases at a better price than they would if this policy of secrecy and refusal to give prices existed as it does in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: I have only four minutes.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, but I shall consent to an extension of time.

Mr. Harkness: But somebody else might not.

Mr. Lesage: I am sure they would.

Mr. Harkness: All right.

Mr. Lesage: Could I ask the hon. member to give me an example or an instance of such a letter in which it would have been said by me or by an official of the department that it was not the policy of the department to give the name of the successful tenderer and his price? I have given that to whoever has written to me.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, I have one here but I am not going to give it to the minister, because the man concerned probably would never get another contract as long as this government was in power. I certainly will not give the name of the person concerned, but there is no doubt that this sort of thing has taken place. In other words, the general tendering system of this department is not good. I should hope that it would be corrected and put much more on the same basis as exists now in the Department of Defence Production, where the unsuccessful tenderer can secure the price at which the contract was let and as a result perhaps be in a position to sharpen his pencil and give a better quotation the next time.

Of course, the basic difficulty comes from the fact that there is only a selected list of people who are allowed to give tenders, to begin with. So there are two difficulties, as far as this department is concerned. There is the selected list and the fact that the whole thing is kept secret and the unsuccessful tenderer cannot find out what the contract was let for.

Mr. Lesage: Could I ask the hon. member the name, not the man who received the letter, but the man who signed the letter?

Mr. Harkness: No. As a matter of fact, I do not think it is fair for the minister to try to get this information.

Mr. Lesage: I deny the charge.

Mr. Harkness: I think the only reason why he wants it is to ensure that this man never gets another contract. So I certainly am not going to put him in that position.

I know that my time has almost elapsed and I shall pass on very briefly to one of the other branches of the department, that is, the travel bureau. Travel used to be a very considerable source of income, as far as foreign exchange was concerned in this country. Last year, and for many years perhaps before last year, the number of United States dollars we received into this country over and above the amount spent by Canadians in the United States helped us very considerably, as far as our balance of payments was concerned, and prevented our adverse trade balance from being nearly as bad as it might have been otherwise.

Last year exactly the reverse prevailed. Travel, instead of being an asset to the country, is now a drain as far as the general balance of payments is concerned. Last year we had $110 million deficit as far as travel was concerned. In other words, Canadians spent $110 million more in travelling to the United States and other countries than people in the United States primarily and those from Europe spent travelling in this country.

I do not think that that is a situation that should be allowed to continue. I think that much more vigorous steps are needed to improve our general travel situation to attract people to this country and to keep Canadians in this country and have them travel in this country rather than travelling across the United States. It is very easy for people in any part of Canada to get into an adjacent part of the United States, and it is perhaps not to be wandered at that a very considerable number of Canadians do travel down to the United States. Of course, I would be the last one to suggest that anything should be done in a compulsory way to stop that, but I think that we can correct the situation to quite an extent by taking steps in the way of publicity and otherwise to encourage people to travel in Canada rather than go across the border to the United States.

I realize that I am already over my time, and I shall leave the remainder of the remarks that I may have to make to the particular administrative items of the branches as they come up.

Mr. Purdy: I should like to take this opportunity to make a few remarks on this resolution, and I promise that I shall not be as lengthy or as inaccurate as the member who has preceded me. I should like, however, to direct a few remarks to the minister whose estimates are before us at the present time not particularly with respect to the problem of northern affairs although coming from Nova Scotia as I do I cannot help but remind the committee that Nova Scotia is one of four provinces, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, which should have more to say with respect to the development of our northern resources than we have because at one time we were equal partners in those great resources. However, at the moment I wish to direct my remarks to the minister in his capacity as minister of national resources.

As I visualize his responsibility in that position, it covers the development of our renewable resources such as our forests, and of course I appreciate that while our forests are renewable they are only renewable within a limited time. You can cut down forests and it takes a good many years before they will reproduce themselves. Then we have water power, another important national resource and one which we must utilize to the fullest extent. Along with our water power we must consider our non-reproducing natural resources such as coal and similar minerals.

I am going to subdivide our water resources into two parts. First of all, I should like to refer to the water resources found in the natural flow of our rivers, and I am going to refer specifically to the province of Nova Scotia. Here I should like to say that in my opinion the development of hydro power on our non-tidal rivers in Nova Scotia is most uneconomical because in order to provide the necessary storage basins and a level flow of water throughout the year it is necessary to flood such large areas of the river basins that the natural growth in those basins, whether agricultural or forest, is destroyed, and the initial cost of such a development is not a true picture of the actual cost to the economy of the country. In other words, we should consider when we flood such tremendous areas of our province what the potential production of those areas would have been in future years and add that to the cost of the development.

We do have one great source of power in our province which I believe has never been actually explored to the hilt. It is true that an investigation was made, and there is one going on now, of Passamaquoddy bay to see just what we could do to develop power from the tides of the bay of Fundy. A few years ago an investigation was also made on the Petitcodiac and the Memramcook rivers, in New Brunswick. At that time I believe a report was brought in that the development of power there was not economical compared with the development of power from coal, but in that regard I want to make this point. The coal of the maritime provinces, Nova Scotia particularly, is expendable but the tides are not expendable. They have been going out and coming in ever since mankind was created and they will go out and come in just as long as humanity exists.

Therefore I am saying that while it might be more economical to develop power from coal in the immediate future nevertheless from a long-range point of view and knowing that our coal supply is exhaustible I believe the whole situation should be taken into consideration with that in mind. I suppose hon. members will say to me: What has this all got to do with the present situation? They may say that power, after all, is a provincial matter and that therefore the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources should not be concerned with it. However, I have great hopes from the announcement made by our great Prime Minister that he was fully aware of the financial problems some of the lesser provinces have to meet and that the federal government would go along with those provinces in any way possible to secure their development.

There is another feature. The minister is responsible for the tourist industry. I suggest to him that one of the greatest undeveloped potentials in our national production, or whatever you like to call it, is the undeveloped tourist industry in the maritime provinces. It does seem to me to be a crime that Canadians in the central provinces, who have waxed rich from the business they have received from the Atlantic provinces, should go to the United States when they have a chance to go to the sea coast for summer holidays instead of going to the coast of the Atlantic provinces. I suggest it is a responsibility of the minister to see that proper facilities are provided so that the people from the central provinces will come to our great Atlantic sea coast. I should like to go on to try to develop this idea a bit further and I am going to refer to my own constituency. In the area of Minas basin and Cobequid bay tremendous water power is produced by the tides of that great basin which rise 60 to 62 feet from low tide to high tide every day. Do you not agree that there is a great undeveloped water power potential in that tremendous tidal reservoir, one that renews itself every day and is inexhaustible? It will go on into eternity, and I am asking the minister to give consideration to the possibilities there.

As I said a moment ago, the survey of 1945 indicated that the development of power from the tidal waters of the bay of Fundy was not economical compared with coal. Again, our coal supply is exhaustible but our tidal power is inexhaustible. I have another thought to put to the minister, and I appreciate that what I am about to say falls to some extent within the purview of the provincial government. Nevertheless, I come back to a thought I mentioned a few moments ago, namely, that one of our national resources is the tourist business and therefore so far as the tourist business is concerned it would be quite within the province of the federal government to help along the lines I have suggested.

I am coming now to the problem of highways and transportation facilities into our tourist attractions.

Would you gentlemen around me who are talking kindly go outside and carry on your conversation there while I am trying to talk to the minister?

An hon. Member: Address your remarks to the minister.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Purdy: Thank you. Mr. Minister, I should like to direct your mind to this matter, on a dollar basis, of turning the tides into power, as an economic goal. I am suggesting to you at least two situations in my constituency, one at the estuary of the Shubenacadie river and the second one on the Avon river. Not only could we turn the tides into power there but at the same time we could do away with the building and the maintenance of railway bridges and highway bridges. In other words, at one fell swoop, if practicable, we could make a triple-purpose utility at the mouths of those great rivers. I have in my files a letter from an engineer who was born in the vicinity of Windsor and who says that he is satisfied—he is now removed to the United States—that power could be developed on the Avon river. He says that 250 thousand horsepower could be developed at the rate of $100 a horsepower. He says that in the United States that is considered to be a low rate. If at that cost we could add the triple purpose of a railway crossing and a highway crossing and duplicate that at the Shubenacadie river, what a great thing we would do in the province of Nova Scotia. That is only a dream, I suppose, but still I suggest and consider that it is something that should be taken into consideration. This idea of the federal government, doing something for highways is not too far afield. If I recall correctly, I read in the paper yesterday that the federal government is going to make a heavy contribution toward a highway out of Ottawa. What has Ottawa got that the maritime provinces have not got? Certainly we have got to have our share in the maritime provinces. I stand up here prepared to fight for that share every time. Let us give the Atlantic as fair a deal as Ottawa is getting now that they are starting to deal with the highway problem.

There is one more thing I want to bring to the minister's attention. I want to say to you, Mr. Minister, that you have been very kind to me. I wonder, Mr. Minister, if you would let the hon. member for Quebec East sit on his right side of the house for one moment.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member for Quebec East does sit on that side of the house.

Mr. Purdy: Mr. Minister, would you just listen to me. Let him sit back and blat by himself for a while.

An hon. Member: It is the hon. member for Quebec West.

Mr. Purdy: It does not matter where he comes from. I am talking to the goat over here now; that is the one I am talking to.

Mr. Minister, what I was going to say was that you have been very kind to me in connection with some of the requests I have made to you in the past. At other times you have not been quite so fair. A year and a half ago I asked you if you would not consider having the spot where the largest sailing vessel in Canada was built and launched—and I was thinking of the William D. Lawrence from Maitland—made a historic site. You very kindly arranged through the historic sites and monuments board to have that site commemorated. You have not told me when it is going to happen. Before this debate is through, at the proper time, I hope you will tell me that.

I spoke of the Shubenacadie crossing. That is the point that I wanted to bring to your mind from a tourist standpoint. There is the land where the sailing ships of the days gone by were built before confederation, where the men went out and the tides came in. But today it is a situation which is undeveloped. I believe if you will really sit down and consider the proposal to build this crossing from Black Rock to Maitland, you will come to a favourable conclusion. By the way, it was a service which was maintained before confederation. It was turned over to the federal government at confederation to maintain the wharves and ferry there and to give a subsidy on the ferry. For some reason or other—and I do not blame this on the federal government—it has gone down. But there is a certain responsibility there. If you will just take this matter into consideration and consider that not only could we build a power unit which would develop power but we could provide a crossing by means of a railway bridge and provide a crossing for highway traffic—a triple unit—I believe it would commend itself to you. I believe that your engineers would say it was economic and feasible. That is what my plea is tonight. I ask you just to give us a break and to send your engineers down to look at this place. I know that the provincial government, if it gets a lead in this matter will co-operate one hundred per cent.

I am going to close in a moment, sir. I think it would be the greatest thing that could happen if this house would only decide to close its discussions and not let the members stay longer in Ottawa. Just let them take one week along the seaboard of the Atlantic provinces and it would do far more good than sitting here for the next week. I know they would come back here prepared to go along with me and that next year, after the minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources considers it as part of his responsibility to help us develop the highways into these great tourist areas, they would come with us and they would be very happy.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on the first item in these estimates in order to impress upon the minister the importance of taking early and effective action to bring into the northern territories the one very important thing that will surely contribute to the development of that great country. Before I say what I have to say on that matter, I should like to comment just briefly on the statement of the minister this afternoon in connection with our national parks. These playgrounds of Canada come under the supervision of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I listened very attentively to the statement he made and I found myself in almost complete agreement with his policy as he expressed it this afternoon. I was born and raised right close to one of these great national parks. For many years I have been somewhat concerned about the future policy in respect of them. More particularly I have wondered whether we might get into the same frame of mind as have people in the United States where the national parks have become commercialized and it is difficult for people to find rest and relaxation and the enjoyment of beautiful and natural things such as we have been able to find in our parks in this country. So I was gratified when he said it will be the continued policy of the department to operate the parks in such a manner that for many years to come they will be unspoiled, that the natural beauty will be retained. I took for granted from what he said that commercialism in these parks will be restrained just as far as it possibly can be. I commend the minister for that attitude because there are so many of us who would like to see these parks remain in perpetuity, if possible, unspoiled by the commercial hand of man.

I hope it will be possible for us to induce the building of sufficient facilities so that tourists will be able to come from far and near to enjoy our natural beauties with us. I am convinced that in our national parks in Canada we have the most beautiful playground in the world, without any question. I have travelled over much of the world and I think that I have never seen anything to equal the beauties that we have in Banff, Jasper and Waterton national parks in Alberta. I am only naming those that are in my own province but there are others, also. I will support the minister 100 per cent in the expressed policy that he brought before the committee this afternoon.

Now, I should like to say just a word about the northern territories that the minister has visited on several occasions. I am glad to see that he has familiarized himself with the territory. I was very happy when the minister furnished me with a copy of the brief that was submitted to the royal commission on economic affairs by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories. I read what Mr. Robertson had to say about the development of that vast north country. Anyone reading the report and studying the maps and other facts that are obtainable about the north country cannot help but be convinced that the northern territories have a very great part to play in the future in the building of a strong and secure Canada. When we think of the recent developments in the area, what those who have been prospecting throughout the country have found, the evidence of great natural mineral wealth, I am sure that we cannot escape the conclusion that the earliest possible development of this territory would be desirable in the interests of a strong Canada.

I am not only interested in the northern territories from the point of view of having their development assured in the near future for building a strong Canada, which is of course our paramount consideration, but I am also interested because the development of the northern territories is so closely bound up with the development of my own area, the Peace river country. So I speak just briefly at this time in support of what Mr. Robertson has so well pointed out in his brief. I do not intend to read it at all, but merely refer to it in a general way. He has taken the position that the most important thing is transportation. I agree with him wholeheartedly. I will go further and say that the northern territories cannot contribute what they can possibly contribute to the strength and security of Canada until we do have adequate transportation. Further than that, I am satisfied that we cannot see the possibility of the early development of the resources of the great north country until we have rail transportation.

We can talk about water transportation and air transportation from now until doomsday, but it will not solve the problem of the area for the simple reason that water transportation into the northern territory is possible only during a short part of the year and it becomes exceedingly costly at other times. Air transportation is always expensive. There are only two ways of getting into the northern territories today by the water and land route. One way is through Fort Smith and the other way is through Hay River, which is a settlement on the Great Slave lake.

Now, the Fort Smith route starts from Waterways, the railhead, and is not a good possible route for the reason that you have a long portage and the costs are too great. Not only that, but the river and lake freeze over very early in the fall, making it impossible to carry on transportation beyond the latter part of September, usually. The other route by which you can enter the great northern territories by land and water is through Grimshaw, the railhead in the Peace river country, and down the Mackenzie highway into Great Slave lake by way of the settlement at Hay River. Now, that distance from Grimshaw on the Northern Alberta Railways to Hay River on the Great Slave lake is about 381 miles, almost the same distance as it would be from here to London, Ontario. This gives some idea of the tremendous distance. The route down the Mackenzie highway is an easy gradient. It is not a difficult one through which to build a rail route at all. Much of the clearing has been done along that route and every few miles one finds a very fine farming area which, when it reaches its full development, will contribute immeasurably to the support of a railway to cover that 381 mile distance.

Mr. Robertson quite correctly points out in his brief that if we had a rail route approximately 400 miles closer to the Mackenzie valley than it is now, which would be possible if we were to extend the Northern Alberta Railways from Grimshaw to Hay River, the rates would be cut down to the point where the working of the ore bodies that have been recently discovered at Pine Point would become quite possible and competitive. Now, that is an important point because we know that there are at least 60 million tons of high grade lead and zinc ore in that area that can be mined very largely by the open cut method. If we had the rail transportation to carry that ore out, then the mines would become competitive and that ore bed would contribute to Canada's strength because one of the things we do need is new sources of base metal. There is one just across the borderline from the northern part of Alberta and along the southern shore of Great Slave lake fifty miles or so east of Hay River settlement.

I point these things out merely to emphasize the need for early action to get that rail connection from the Peace river territory into that area to make transportation possible the year round; to make it possible for these mines and ore bodies to be worked on a competitive basis. Not only that, but I am satisfied it would help open up vast areas of fine farm territory which would contribute to the support of the railway in the years to come. I am sure the minister agrees with me when I say that in times past transportation has preceded intensive development rather than following it. I am quite sure that he must agree with me when I say that in the early days of Canada the railways did not wait to see the development well on its way before they started building railroads. They had some pioneering spirit in those days.

Today it appears the railways do not want to move unless they see an assured immediate return from freight haulage that will make it possible for them to pay their full expenses from the beginning. I do not think that is the spirit at all, and I am certain—the minister I believe will agree with me—he will if he thinks upon it—that if the Northern Alberta Railways were not operated under a joint ownership, if there were more competition up there a rail line would be built into the Northwest Territories very early. I believe that the northern areas would have rail transportation much sooner if the Canadian National Railways owned and operated the Northern Alberta Railways by themselves. The Canadian Pacific Railway, of course, because of the fact that it is deeply interested in the Pine Point ore bed through the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company which owns, I think, the greater portion of the mineral rights there, will continue to stay in the area just as long as it possibly can. It may never get out. But I do believe that the minister, if he will put pressure on his colleague, the Minister of Transport, and others of his colleagues, could succeed in getting a railhead 400 miles farther down in the Mackenzie area than it is now, and he could get that soon.

I know the argument has often been raised —and I believe the railroads have said this recently—that if the government of Canada were to subsidize the full cost of the building of the road at the present time there would not be enough tonnage hauled over the railroad from Grimshaw to Hay River to pay the costs. Well, I am not so sure of that. I should like to see more figures. That may have been true a few years ago, but I remind the minister that every few miles along that route down the Mackenzie highway farming areas have been opened up that are now producing very large quantities of grain and livestock and lumber. I remind the minister that those areas are being extended. The Alberta government is opening up very large tracts of land for settlement. They are offering it on a homestead basis to young men who wish to establish themselves in farming and for a $10 registration fee they are able to get 320 acres of that land for development, and it is going fast. The area is building up rapidly and within a few years, if transportation were provided, the tonnage of agricultural products coming out of that country would be a surprise to everybody because it is good country; it is productive, and the change that has taken place on the face of that land in the past four or five years is amazing to anybody who has seen it.

This is completely apart from what is being found in the northern territories, and I am sure the minister will agree with me when I say this: add the potential ore development, the potential oil development, the other developments in the north to the farming possibilities in the northern Peace river country and you can make a very fine case for the early building of a rail line from Grimshaw into Great Slave lake. Therefore, I urge the minister to use every energy that he possesses to get that development. He should talk sternly and earnestly to his colleague, the Minister of Transport, and to the railways. We will back him, and we certainly do not want to do anything to make it difficult for him to talk. We want him to know that we are supporting him and, certainly, the policy which was outlined by him this afternoon and by the commissioner of the northern territories, Mr. Robertson, as we find it in his brief to the royal commission.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Chairman, because the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Calgary North dealt with several of the matters which I had intended to bring to the attention of the minister I will attempt to save the time of the committee by not repeating some of the things that have already been said. Therefore, in the few minutes at my disposal I shall confine my remarks to a few general observations on one or two other aspects of the minister's department. I think everyone agrees that the prosperity of Canada at the present time depends very largely on our oil and mineral resources. The continued expansion of those resources will bring greater returns to the economy of this country, and therefore we can say that Canada's north holds the key to Canada's future economic prosperity in so far as it depends on our oil and mineral resources.

Someone said a while ago that the potentialities of Canada's north are tremendous. I would suggest—and I think everyone would agree, including the minister—that at the present time we are unacquainted with those potentialities. Certainly, the expansion and the development that have taken place in our north country have been very spectacular. Spectacular as that development may be, it must be remembered that little or nothing was done prior to the outbreak of world war II. For that reason, and because of recent happenings in the north, the developments have been somewhat of a spectacular nature. However, it seems to me the problem we are confronted with today is to see that there is a successful and orderly development of our north country.

I am sure that those of us who have had an opportunity—and the minister will agree with this, too—of flying over our Canadian north could not help being impressed with that vast land, its sparse population and the over-all inhospitality of the country. Certainly, it would be a bold and irresponsible person who would suggest that to develop the Canadian north does not present apparently almost insurmountable problems. However, we have to tackle the problem. The pattern of development must be such that the wealth that is created accrues to the people of Canada; and secondly, and possibly more important still, we must see to it that the social aspects of the native people are protected in order that there is the least possible dislocation so that those people might be integrated into the kind of life that they are going to have to come in contact with if they are going to survive and get for themselves the kind of welfare that is necessary. It is to be hoped that we shall not repeat the blunders and do the things that we have done in the past with regard to this very important problem of seeing to it that the native people of the north are given a fair break, a chance to retain their dignity and to get for themselves the kind of economic security that is so necessary.

Mr. Chairman, this problem of the native people seems to me to have been uppermost in the minds of the commissioners of the Northwest Territories when they presented their brief to the Gordon commission on Canada's economic prospects last fall, for these commissioners pointed out in many instances the great necessity for the immediate development of the mineral and oil resources of Canada's north in order to make it possible for the native population to survive. They point out that because of the health services that have been given to these people over the past few years the population has increased and the effect has been that the game resources are almost depleted.

As those of us who have had anything to do with Indians are aware—I am not acquainted with Eskimos but I presume they would have the same characteristics—native people are not conservation-minded. Because of this the game resources upon which these people rely for their welfare have become depleted. We now have the situation where the native people are depending more and more upon commercial food supplies. Because of the fact that fur prices have declined and deteriorated substantially over the last two or three years the native now finds himself in a very precarious position. With the money he receives from his furs he is not able to buy enough food to maintain his health.

I wish to refer to the report made by Mr. Gordon Robertson, one of the commissioners, when he was giving evidence before the Gordon commission. He said that:

> The Indian population had to live on sub-1933 incomes while paying 1956 prices plus high freight charges.

The result of what has taken place is that the natives are moving to the settlements and are accepting seasonal employment whenever it is available. They are recipients not only of the family allowance but also relief payments.

It has been suggested that relief payments should be increased and one suggestion is that they should be doubled. I think that would be disastrous because the recipients of large amounts of relief soon become economic derelicts. They lose their self-respect and it automatically follows that they lose their place in society; and when the day comes when economic opportunities are made available for these people they will not be able to fit in nor grasp them because of their dependency on relief payments.

In the interim I think it is important to maintain their natural way of life. I think we will have to do that for some time to come until the day arrives when integration will be possible. This will facilitate an orderly and natural adjustment to a new way of life. I think the government is going to be forced to undertake a conservation program to conserve not only the fur but the game in that area in order that these people will have some source of income in the intervening period which they must face.

Along with the recommendations made by the Northwest Territories council I would also suggest that the government give serious consideration to supporting the price of fur.

[Mr. Bryson.]

I realize that this presents a genuine problem and I believe the commissioners who are close to the situation realize this, too. However, surely it is not an insurmountable problem; surely a solution can be found. I can foresee that there might be some abuses and some bootlegging might take place although supporting the price of fur would be comparatively costly. I wonder if we can afford not to do this. I would strongly suggest that this should be given serious consideration by the government in the interim period these people are going to experience.

I believe, too, it would be feasible for the government to establish trading stores in the north. We have established trading stores in the province of Saskatchewan and they have been of great benefit to the native population. It would appear to me that this would do away with many of the questionable practices that are carried on by the occasional free trader and also by the Hudson's Bay Company.

I recall being in a trading store in the comparatively far north not long ago and seeing on the shelves rows of canned dog food. I said to the trader, "It looks a little ridiculous to me to see Indians buying prepared dog food in cans and paying the price that would have to be asked for this commodity." I was told that they did not feed it to their dogs but were using it as the basic ingredient to make home brew. I think we have here a glaring example of the exploitation of these native people by unscruplulous operators. I would strongly suggest to the minister that he give consideration to the establishment of trading stores that would have the interests of the natives at heart.

I would also suggest that the government should undertake a program of providing free air transportation and other free facilities to native people in order that they may go out prospecting for minerals. I believe these people could do an excellent job in this regard. They have become perfectly adapted to the country and the climate and I am sure this would be one means of providing extremely profitable and suitable employment for them.

Concerning the question of education, while I agree that under some circumstances residential schools perhaps cannot be avoided I would suggest that wherever possible the government should establish day schools in preference to residential schools. I urge that there should be the closest co-operation between the officials of the Northwest Territories council and the minister's department in selecting a curriculum.

I was glad to learn this afternoon that the minister is co-operating with the council and that the curriculum being drawn up is emphasizing various skills that will be of some practical value to the native people rather than more academic subjects.

I also suggest there will have to be a revision of salaries for school teachers going into the north country. I think it is unfortunate that a school teacher going from a province into the territories is not able to have his or her superannuation recognized by the province which he or she has left to go into the territories to take up a teaching job for the minister's department. I know of one or two instances where qualified teachers with a certain dedication went into that country and found out that their superannuation ceased, and they immediately returned to the province which they had left. I think that is unfortunate.

Mr. Lesage: Might I draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the teachers in the north are federal civil servants?

Mr. Bryson: That is the point I am trying to make. If they had ten years in a province, as an example, their superannuation would cease, and they would become civil servants.

Mr. Lesage: I shall have to discuss that with the Minister of Finance. I am not aware of that policy.

Mr. Bryson: Much has been said today about transportation. I am not going to deal at length with that. I think the question was covered ably by the last two speakers. I am not acquainted with the situation as it applies to the railroads and some other aspect of the subject that was discussed, but I suggest that the minister give greater assistance to the mining roads in the provinces. In many instances the provinces are unable to finance roads within their boundaries, and so I think it is imperative that the department give greater assistance for more roads from the provinces into the territories. If it means that a railroad would help, it should be built. Certainly the brief presented to the Gordon commission about that question showed very forcibly that it would be in the interests of Canada and the interests of the north country that such a railroad be built.

We have spent a great deal of money on the D.E.W. lines and on other military installations in the north, and I am convinced in my own mind that they will add little or nothing to the economic prosperity of this country in the future. I would stress again greater supervision of the native population. I think that point has been brought up over and over again in this house during this session, that the native population, Eskimo and Indian, will need to have greater supervision if we are going to get the kind of results we all hope for. I noticed an item in the press not long ago; I am not going to read it, but it is very critical of the kind of supervision that is being given to these people by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

In conclusion I should like to say that it is the prime interest of the government and the minister who has charge of this department to see to the welfare of our northern native people. We have two resources to develop: our natural resources and our human resources. I am sure that our record in the past has not been too good, but certainly, we can develop and integrate our northern native human resources if we tackle the problem with determination and imagination.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I rise tonight to take part in the discussion of the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources because of the fact that, whilst the department deals more with northern Ontario, we in western Ontario are very much interested in the department, and I should like to make a few comments on it.

People from the United States are much more inclined to pay attention to their historical background, whilst we Canadians, on the other hand, are probably prone to under-emphasize our historical past. Those of us who pay any attention to history will realize that it is only through the building up of history and traditions that a nation becomes great. It has been said that at the time of the French revolution all the past was cut off and forgotten, and since that time the French nation has never been able to rebuild the traditions of that country as they once were.

Consequently, I am asking that the minister, through the historic sites and monuments board and otherwise, may influence the Canadian people to take a greater interest in our history. While I am dealing with that, I may say that the present chairman of the historic sites and monuments board, Professor Fred Landon of the University of Western Ontario—he is from London, Ontario—has done very fine and worthwhile work in that connection. However, whilst that is being done, I do not think that enough is being done. Some encouragement should be given to municipalities to pay some attention to their historical backgrounds. There are a good many societies of one kind and another—I shall mention only the women's institute—that could devote one day or one of their programs to the historical points of interest in the local community. I think there is a very worth-while field for work there.

History does not mean perhaps quite so much to present as to future generations of this country. It is because of that fact that I make this plea tonight. In my county of Middlesex there are now streams on which were situated water mills on which pioneers depended for the processing of their wheat into flour, and many of the people living in those areas are not aware that in those very communities there exist these water mills. I am thinking particularly of the one on the Medway creek, a tributary of the Thames—I am coming to the Thames valley—and that comes under the minister's department. That old mill stream there is almost within the boundaries of the city of London, which has now grown up around it. At one time there was a thriving community at that mill which is now forgotten and which could well be commemorated. It is almost within a stone's throw of the University of Western Ontario.

While we are speaking of historic sites and monuments, I should like to mention that the first minister of agriculture in Sir John Macdonald's government was a Londoner, Sir John Carling, and he established the experimental farm system throughout Canada. The first director of that institution was also one of the illustrious Saunders family of London, Ontario. I think some recognition should be given to the contribution these people have made to the development of Canada, not forgetting Sir Adam Beck, the father of Ontario hydro.

To change the subject for a moment, we are interested in developments thousands of miles from Canada and we spend a lot of money abroad, but at the same time I think we should give some thought to the conservation and use of our resources at home. I am thinking particularly of our water resources. We in western Ontario are very much aware of the scarcity of water at times and yet we are situated in a peninsula almost surrounded by the great lakes. While the minister and I are well aware of the fact that the Ontario water resources committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Snider is doing very worth-while work, the installation of water mains to serve the western Ontario area will be a costly process. As that region is bound to develop industrially and as federal income from that area is also bound to increase with the development of that part of the country, I think it would be wise to develop some plan that would guarantee long-term loans to the municipalities of western Ontario to assist them in the installation of water mains. I feel certain this could be worked out.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

On unimpeachable authority I understand that a 12-inch water main could be installed from Ipperwash to London which would serve the many municipalities through which it would pass for some $8 or $9 million.

I also want to point out to the minister that western Ontario and the county of Middlesex particularly were rather disappointed that no provision was made in the estimates for the completion of the dams and water conservation project on the upper Thames river during this year. However, we are satisfied that while it was not included in this year's estimates it is certain that next year will be our turn. I think I should also point out to the minister that it would be wise to complete one river development as far as humanly possible and as quickly as possible in order to have it as a pilot plant, as it were, or pattern from which to gain experience in any future river developments, whether they be in Quebec, the maritimes or the western provinces. When we have gone as far as we have with the development on the Thames it should not take a great deal more to complete it, and then you would have a pilot plant in operation.

Fundamental to soil and water conservation is the development of forest. I think that is one thing about which a lot is said but about which not enough is done, and in my opinion many more submarginal areas than are now used for forest purposes could well be devoted to that use. Unless it is the growing of Christmas trees, it is not likely that any one private individual in western Ontario could plant a forest and expect to reap a harvest from it in his lifetime. Consequently, private individuals are not inclined to go into the reforestation of private land. Therefore I think the future of reforestation must be placed more and more in the hands of river development and conservation authorities if we are going to get the maximum results from forest planting.

I should probably mention here that the forest area in the county of Middlesex is somewhere around 7 per cent, which is about the lowest of any county in the province of Ontario. On the other hand, that only demonstrates how much of the land in the county is suitable for agricultural purposes and has been devoted to that for the last 100 years.

To return to the minister's opening remarks, I was certainly glad to hear him speak in such glowing terms about our national parks throughout Canada. Now is the time to make provision for these parks. As he mentioned, once the development period is over the costs will not be too great and we will have these parks as an investment for future generations for a long time to come. With the vast area that we have in our country, I think we can well afford to have the beauty spots and large areas of Canada as national parks.

Finally, I want to join with the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings in his plea that the old supreme court building at the foot of the hill be kept as a national monument because of the associations that it has for the people of Canada and its historical association with the fathers of confederation and 1867.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I assure you I shall not be long, but I do not want the minister to take it, from the fact that I do not intend to speak for very long, that I do not want him to listen to me. First of all, I should like to say that I appreciate a great deal the co-operation I have had from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and his department in connection with some very vexing problems. I assure him that I appreciate it very much. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Peace River bring to the attention of the house the need for transportation facilities in the area lying north of the Peace river. I should like to call attention to the fact that I believe it is the intention of the British Columbia government to push the Pacific Great Eastern Railway 50 miles farther north to Fort St. John in the Peace river area which is in a direct line toward the Hay river district. I do not know whether or not the route is feasible. I have been told that it is, and it would be a very direct route for trade going to the coast.

In dealing with transportation I would mention again that I should like to see closer co-operation between departments so far as that problem is concerned. I realize that highways are not a problem of the minister unless they are within the parks, but the development of the northern area depends on transportation facilities, air, rail and highway. I would hope that the minister would get together with the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of National Defence and try to work out some way by which at least a portion of the highway between Dawson Creek and Fort St. John could be paved. It is a very important section of the highway that leads to Alaska. The traffic is very heavy and the dust conditions have already caused loss of life in numerous instances.

I should like to make one more point before I sit down. I agree wholeheartedly with the minister in what he has to say about the national parks being for Canadians. However, there are some of our national parks which are astride great passes throughout the Rocky mountains. These parks having been laid out astride these passes in the mountains, it becomes evident that highway traffic for trucks and other commercial vehicles should be allowed to go through. The park with which I am mostly concerned is Jasper park. The total distance from the east boundary to the west boundary is only about 65 miles. I suggest that for 65 miles of highway it would not be amiss if the tourist traffic had roads for it only. Those people that are going to use the park—the Canadian people and others such as Americans—would like to have roads for tourists only. It is only a matter of 65 miles and there is lots of room for other highways, if necessary, to be built from one border to the other of the park and thus allow commercial traffic to pass through this particular area.

I know that the minister has the matter in mind and I know he is working towards that end. However, I do not know whether it is fully realized just how urgent the need is for something to be done in the very near future in that regard. I would hope that the park would be labelled as a natural playground as much as possible and yet have the facilities for through traffic developed through this area within the very near future.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the minister's statement as given on July 12 and completed this afternoon. I agreed with his attitude towards our national parks so much that I had great difficulty in not saying "amen" a good many times. However, one must realize that the minister does not make a comprehensive and complete statement without a background of some fairly good officials. I want to pay a compliment to the officials of his department. I think we in Canada are very fortunate in having the officials we have in the water resources branch, the parks division, the forest branch, the wildlife service and the northern administration. In this department we have some officials whom I know other governments would be very pleased to take from us. I do not say that only from my personal experience. This is a particularly interesting department to me. I meet persons in universities and persons in other governments and I have heard those comments made on a number of occasions.

The minister has responsibility for a most interesting and important department. In fact, the welfare of millions of Canadians and their happiness to a great extent depend upon the policies and the administration of the minister's department. I have a few brief comments to make on particular items of the minister's estimates but at this time I want to advance what I consider to be a good idea. I must admit that those who know me say that I am rather fertile as far as ideas are concerned. Once upon a time I thought I had invented a device for perpetual motion but it did not work. However, I invented an everlasting stoneboat that would nearly run itself. I have experimented with so many things in my lifetime that my wife and daughters are now inclined to refer to me as Major Hoople. Anyway, I suggest that the idea I wish to advance briefly this evening is a sound and good idea.

For several years I have introduced a resolution urging a federal-provincial conference on conservation with a view to establishing a nation-wide policy on this question. However, at this time I wish to stress the necessity for a national voluntary organization that would promote an understanding, as a result of voluntary action, of the principles of conservation and would develop what I think should be termed an ecological conscience in Canada.

We in this group are concerned with the health of human beings and the health of our national resources. I think that fact has been very appropriately indicated this evening by the remarks of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort who does not think it worth while to stop and listen to what I am going to say this evening. He dealt with the human resources that come under the administration of the minister's department. I am going to deal very briefly with the renewable natural resources. I think that on the health of both of those resources depends the prosperity and the happiness of the Canadian people.

I suggest that this department and the provincial departments of a similar nature require the co-operation of a national voluntary organization to assist them in the same way as the Health League of Canada assists the Department of National Health and Welfare and the provincial health departments.

I understand that the Health League of Canada was formed in 1921, at the request of this dominion government, to assist in a nation-wide publicity program and campaign in connection with the co-operative efforts of the dominion and provincial governments to control certain diseases at that time. In view of the need for popular education in many health fields, the scope of this organization has greatly broadened in recent years, and it now undertakes a nation-wide education program in the field of health generally. It also sponsors two annual events in Canada, namely national health week and national immunization week which I understand are considered to be the greatest single annual events of this type recognized in Canada. These events receive the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments. I understand that the health league also publishes a national magazine known as "Health" and sends weekly news releases on health to all the newspapers in Canada in French and in English. In recognition of the valuable services it renders in this field—services that a government department cannot render, namely in education and the building up of public opinion in support of progressive health legislation—the government of Canada in recent years has been in the habit of giving a grant of $10,000 a year. I think that is far too little. As a matter of fact, had I been in the committee the other day when these estimates were under consideration, I intended to say so. But you cannot be in two places at once. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that we need a similar type of national voluntary organization to perform similar services in preserving the health of our national resources in this country. I believe we need two aspects of co-operation. We need government organization, government conferences decisions and programs. If these are going to be promoted and administered effectively, we need the same type of voluntary organization in this field that we have in the field of national health and welfare. I know that in this country at the present time we have the Canadian Forestry Association, the Agricultural Institute of Canada and various engineering institutes and wildlife organizations all doing valuable work in their particular fields. However, while they all do a certain amount of educational and publicity work, their problems are largely technical and scientific. The greater part of their membership is composed of men with technical training and experience in the development of research and programs and things of that type.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we need a national voluntary organization to supplement the activities of government. Such an organization, in my opinion, could deal with the subject in general, not in a scientific way, in order to build up a philosophy in support of the spirit of conservation and it would obtain the support of multitudes in this country. Its prime purpose would be to get the people interested in and concerned about the conservation of our natural resources. Now, before proceeding—I am not going to detain the house very long this evening—I do want to quote very briefly from an excellent article that came into my hands. This was an address, I believe, given by Mr. Mair, who is director of the wildlife service, to a wildlife conference in the United States. It is entitled "Towards an ecological conscience". I do consider that an excellent title. I would advise anyone who is interested in this subject to get a copy of this address. I think in its general contribution to the whole question it is well worth anyone's while studying and publicizing the ideas contained therein.

I just want to quote two or three brief paragraphs because I think Mr. Mair has presented the subject in a most interesting and, in my opinion, somewhat unusual manner. He has this to say in one place:

> Let us confine our thinking for the moment, however, to the more immediate future. There is grave reason to doubt that we are presently sufficiently aware of our own place in the web of life to intelligently utilize our natural resources. To quote from another article, published in the Pennsylvania Game News: ". . . We have never learned the art of living with each other in this world without destroying ourselves and the natural resources that have made possible this great technological progress. Our tendency towards wars of self-destruction is surpassed only by our devastation of the resources that support them."

Then, there are two more paragraphs which I think are well worth inserting in the record.

> Those of us convinced of the vital place of nature, its waters, trees, flowers and wildlife, in our way of life must be strong to fight for retention of adequate living space for all these and ourselves today, and every day. But we must do very much more. We must be unceasing in our efforts to bring to others an understanding and an appreciation of the ecological concept and their place in it, of the land ethic and their close dependence upon soil and water.

Then, again:

> We must ensure that our people become intellectually and emotionally concerned with the land and water and the complex pattern of growth they support. Unless we can do this, to the end that every person, from the trapper and farmer to the business magnate and legislator, is proud to work with our living natural resources rather than ready to abuse them, we are fighting a losing battle.

I think Mr. Mair puts the ecological concept of the problem before us in very interesting language. I think if that is going to be done we have to have more than just government action. We have to have voluntary action along very much the same lines as we have voluntary action in support of the Department of National Health and Welfare. We have the foundation for such an organization now. We have the various conservation leagues in the various provinces across Canada. We have the wildlife associations; we have naturalists societies and we have youth organizations that could be utilized to great advantage. In British Columbia we have an annual provincial conference on natural resources. What we need is co-ordination of all these voluntary activities on a national basis to focus attention on this question, to develop interest and carry on a continual educational program.

This will require three or four things. It will require naturally a small, devoted and well informed national staff. It would demand an annual conference something after the fashion of the conference held in the United States by the wildlife organization, which over there also includes forestry resources, water resources and so on. It will require a national magazine of popular content, not a technical magazine. It will require continual publicity, news releases in the press after the fashion of the national health league. Now, if we can get this type of organization going by co-ordinating all the persons and organizations interested in this country, I think we can do a great deal. The work ought to be supported by much greater expenditures on the part of federal and provincial governments in the protection of these most valuable natural resources.

Now, all this will require money. In my opinion the minister's department would be well advised to copy the example set by the dominion government in 1921 when it invited the public to form a national organization on a voluntary basis and at that time gave a grant of $20,000 a year. I think the minister's department would be well advised if it were to promote the same type of national organization that would have a popular appeal and that would build up support for this idea across the country, and I suggest do the same work for the health of our natural resources as the health league is doing for the health of human beings. Now, such an organization, if it were developed and promoted, should receive grants from the federal government and possibly some assistance from the provincial governments.

There is one point I wish to make. We have a lot of Canadians who have benefited materially and financially from the development and exploitation of natural resources. I think the support for such an organization provides a splendid opportunity for our wealthier citizens to assist in financing this type of educational organization. I believe this is a very necessary step in the development of the concept of an over-all conservation program across this country. In my opinion, we must use every effort possible to bring Canadians to an appreciation of their kinship with the soil and the resources which sustain and develop the abundant life which we in Canada at this time are fortunate to enjoy. I believe this can be done most effectively by the co-operation of the government and a voluntary organization such as I have suggested. When the minister replies on the various items I would very much like—I have submitted my resolution for quite a number of years without much success—to hear his comments on the suggestion I have put forward at this time.

Mr. Dinsdale: The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources covers a great variety of activities. I do not intend at this time, and at this late hour in our proceedings to make any comprehensive or detailed survey. Rather, I would reserve any comments I have to make on the incidental items of the department until such time as we come to those items. Also, I would think it would be a good thing, if there are no other speakers, if we had a chance to hear a reply from the minister.

There is a matter that is in abeyance that I should like to bring once again to the attention of the house. I did so on June 22 and at that time the Minister of Finance, speaking for the government, said that a reply would be made at the appropriate time. I raise the matter again on the estimates of this department because it is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources that this matter now lies, according to the information I have. I refer to the Fontana case, which is becoming somewhat of a celebrated case in Canada. It concerns the expropriation of a certain parcel of property in the vicinity of the town of Virden in the province of Manitoba. Just to give the committee and the minister some idea of the nature of this particular case I will take a few moments to review it briefly.

The case is named after one August Fontana who was farming this parcel of land up until the year 1940. At that time a part of his farm was required for use as an airport and expropriation action was taken by the government through a representative of the Canadian National Railways land branch to carry out the necessary proceedings with Mr. Fontana. Mr. Fontana, incidentally, was a successful farmer by this time, after having passed through difficult years of the early 1930's, the dirty thirties of the drought, and was once again on his feet in cultivating this land. He had come to this country from Italy in the early part of the century, and became a naturalized citizen in the year 1904. Since he was a patriotic Canadian, as I indicated on June 22, he quite willingly allowed his land to be used for defence purposes. Unfortunately, Mr. Fontana is not literate in the English language, and he was not fully aware of all the legal niceties involved in the expropriation transaction. Therefore, no steps were taken to reserve the mineral rights, although at that time—and I feel this is important to the case—he did request the privilege of continuing to remove gravel from this particular piece of property. Since that time—in 1950 to be precise—minerals in this particular section of the country had become valuable. Oil had been discovered, and Mr. Fontana took steps to inquire about the ownership of the mineral rights. He was under the impression that they had been reserved in his name, but he discovered that they had been reserved by the crown and through a series of proceedings the crown refused to take any action to reconvey them or to make any compensation for their loss. The original price that was paid to Mr. Fontana was $9,000. When the minerals were offered for lease by the crown I believe a bid of some $200,000 was received, with other concessions. Therefore, it would appear that the crown stands to make a substantial sum of money at the expense of Mr. Fontana.

Various parties have concerned themselves with this particular case. I had a return on the subject brought down in the house on June 25 of this year. It is sessional paper No. 243. It contained many interesting letters from various people, legal advisers and so forth, who were making representations to the government on behalf of Mr. Fontana. One letter I do wish to refer to is from Dr. Hannam, who is president of the Canadian federation of agriculture. On March 15, 1955 he wrote to the Minister of Agriculture, and the two pertinent paragraphs I should like to place on the record are the following:

> Considering that the action taken by Mr. Fontana in selling his land was involuntary in the first place, and that federal acquisition of the mineral rights was not necessary to the purpose for which the land was expropriated, it would not seem unreasonable to us that these mineral rights should revert to their original owner.
> However, we understand the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, which has administration of these oil rights, as in an advanced stage of negotiations for selling them on lease, and court action to halt these negotiations has, as of today, failed. Mr. Gerrand is asking Mr. Lesage if he will hold up the completion of sale of the lease until he can, if his request is granted, make further representations on this matter to a committee of the cabinet. You have, we understand, a copy of the letter to Mr. Lesage. We certainly feel that Mr. Fontana's claim to consideration is sufficiently well-founded that completion of the lease arrangements should be held up until further consideration is given the possibility of returning the mineral rights on the property to him.
>
> In the hope you will do whatever you can to avoid an injustice being done in this case, I am
> Yours sincerely,
>
> H. H. Hannam,
> President and Managing Director.

A copy of the letter was sent to the Minister of Justice as well. Now, I re-echo the sentiments of Dr. Hannam in reference to this case when he says that unless some action is taken to compensate Mr. Fontana for the inadvertent loss of what would have normally been his had he not been asked to surrender the property, unless something is done to recompense him, to make some suitable adjustment, it seems to me that a grave injustice is going to be done to this Canadian citizen. He is 88 years of age today; he has a large family who are also interested in the matter and, as I emphasized on June 22, he is merely asking for the same privileges that have arisen from the possession of this land in this particular section by other farmers who, because of fortuitous circumstances, were not required to surrender their parcels of property for defence purposes.

Several prominent lawyers have interested themselves in this case. Dr. Hannam, of the federation of agriculture, as I have already indicated, has become extremely interested and I feel it is important because it concerns the rights of a private citizen being invaded by government. I am sure that if the government will view it in this way they will take every step possible. Certainly, there are all sorts of provisions in the Expropriation Act to make it possible for them to compensate Mr. Fontana or reconvey the mineral rights to him. In this day and age when governments more and more are invading the rights of private property owners I think we should lean over backwards to see that no injustice is done to this particular citizen. I leave the matter with the minister; I believe it is the responsibility of his department.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Kootenay West I will be answering the various questions that have been raised during the general discussion when we reach each branch of the administration. Because of the diversity of this department may I suggest that we pass the supplementary estimates as we go along. May I have the unanimous consent and cooperation of my hon. friends in this regard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

293. Northern research co-ordination centre, including a grant of $10,000 to the Arctic institute of North America; and an amount of $15,000 for grants in aid of northern research subject to allocation by the treasury board, $75,158.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I raised this particular matter when the minister was introducing his bill concerning northern power development and I discovered I was somewhat out of order in doing so during the discussion on that particular piece of legislation. It would seem to me that item 293 concerning itself with the Northern Research Co-ordination Centre might have something to do with all manner of research that is taking place in northern Canada as well as the northern part of the U.S.S.R.

The minister will recall that the other day I referred to an article in the Financial Post of March 3, 1956 which suggested that rather interesting experiments were being carried out in weather modification and water diversion in the Soviet Arctic which would have some considerable bearing upon climatic conditions in Canada's northland.

In order to indicate that this is a subject which is being seriously considered I want to read a brief excerpt from this article which is entitled, "How Russ Plan to Heat Arctic Hits Canada". The author, a Mr. W. G. R. Cameron, is a responsible scientist, so I am told, and as the introduction to the article says:

> This is not science fiction.

The article continues:

> W. G. R. Cameron, the co-author of this article with Post staff writer Donald R. Gordon, is an economist who has devoted special study to announced Russian plans to change the northern hemisphere. This article is based on Russian announcements and on the interpretation thereof by Canadian scientists.

Apparently our Canadian scientists are concerning themselves with this question. The body of the article goes on to say that as a result of the program that is to be undertaken by Russia we can perhaps anticipate:

> A vast market garden in the Northwest Territories. Tennis in November on the shores of lake Athabaska.

The article goes on to state further:

> . . . it's Russia's dream, and the dream could have that impact on Canada. As successive steps of the red master plan are completed, these disturbances could occur:
>
> Disruption of the fragile climatic balance over Europe bringing longer, more bitter winter weather, eating into the vital European food growing season.
>
> Diversion of chill Arctic waters down the Canadian east coast past Halifax, adding to storms and early frosts in the fall, lengthening the winter perhaps tying up Halifax as a winter port.
>
> An estimated five foot rise in the world's ocean levels, flooding parts of London, New York, the Netherlands and hundreds of acres of coastal land.

Now, that sounds like science fiction—

Mr. Lesage: I believe you have touched it.

Mr. Dinsdale: —but it appears in a responsible newspaper, the Financial Post, and the introductory statement which I have read indicates that this is not science fiction.

Already the U.S.S.R. is taking steps to cut off the flow of Arctic waters into the Pacific ocean and this will have a climatic effect.

It is damming the two large rivers, the Ob and the Yenesei flowing into the Russian Arctic, and it would appear they are experimenting extensively with weather modifications.

I would like to ask the following question, Mr. Chairman. Just what negotiations go on concerning matters of this kind on an international level?

Mr. Lesage: There is none, sir.

Mr. Dinsdale: Pardon?

Mr. Lesage: There are no international negotiations concerning this matter. I had occasion to read the article just mentioned by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and that is the limit of my knowledge of the question.

Mr. Dinsdale: There are no international channels of communication?

Mr. Lesage: On this question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: There are no international discussions on this question, I can assure the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

National parks branch—

294. Branch administration, $90,852.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Saskatoon.

Mr. Nowlan: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word concerning national parks. I have just come from a committee meeting and I do not know whether or not this is the item.

The Deputy Chairman: We are discussing item 294, concerning national parks.

Mr. Knight: Do you want me to call it ten o'clock, sir?

Mr. Lesage: Please proceed.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Knight: I do not know who is going to make the decision but as I am on my feet, may I proceed? I understand we are on item 294 concerning national parks.

Some years ago I had occasion to quarrel with the administration of the national park at Waskesiu on the subject of what are commonly called shack tents. Might I say first of all that my main interest in Waskesiu as a national park is that it provides a healthful and pleasant holiday ground for many people who cannot afford to go elsewhere. I might say, too, that while it is outside of my constituency my particular concern is due to the fact that the people of my city use that park almost exclusively as a holiday ground.

The shack tenter is usually a humble person. Quite often he does not have a car of his own and he has to use the facilities of bus transportation to go for his holiday.

I can well understand that it is a laudible ambition for the superintendent of a national park to keep the most frequented part in an orderly condition. He likes to have cottages built there that are a credit to the place; but if my conception of what a national park ought to be is correct, then I think there is some validity in my argument that these people should perhaps have even particular consideration.

The man who can afford a better holiday who is not pleased with the place can take his car and go off somewhere else and can afford to pay for accommodation. These people, however, are pretty well required to stay where they are because of their financial situation.

On the occasion I referred to a number of years ago, seven or eight years ago perhaps, these shack tenters had a very good location and were on the edge of the water. At that time the administration apparently thought of these shack tents as rather unsightly dwelling places and attempted to move them back into the bush away from the best facilities. They rented and sold the ground previously occupied by the shack tenters at expensive rates to people who could construct a class of cottage that was acceptable in the eyes of the park administration. I did take up the matter with the department. I think I had some influence in getting a better deal for those people, because, particularly in a national park, I think, those people have just as much right as anyone else to the waterfront. That went along for two or three years, but after that they were not able to resist the pressure and they were moved away from there, with the result that the location is not as good as many other locations were. That is the background.

Now I want to come to the particular situation today and I want to put in a particular plea with the minister for the type of person to make sure that those people have at least equal consideration with other people, and when they have set up homesteads—I use that word, of course, in a metaphorical sense —when they have squatted, if you like, or homesteaded on that particular piece of ground, I think it would have to be something important before they are moved away from a place which they have used for years. I expect that the same applies not only to the national park at Waskesiu but to other national parks of the same nature.

Now I come to my second point, and it is very short, that is to say, a great many of these people who build shack tents think that there is a good deal of unnecessary fuss about having to take them down every year. Whether they use this piece of land with the shack tent on it for one month or for two or three, they are charged the same fee, and under those circumstances they think they should be allowed to leave that building, because it is a little building, in position. Some of them think they should not be forced to take these things down in the wintertime. Although they are only going to spend a week or two weeks there, they have to have that erected again, and they are put to a considerable amount of trouble.

Just for the record, I want to define what I mean by a shack tent. A shack tent is a small building of which the walls are made of lumber, and it is customary to have on top, to cast off the rain, a peaked roof usually made of canvas. Those who complain about this say that most of them would be perfectly willing, if the department would allow them, to leave those things there permanently and that they would be perfectly willing to finish them off in a more substantial shape by putting on a permanent roof rather than the wobbly canvas thing, which gets out of repair and makes the place look not as neat as it otherwise would be. That is a cause for complaint, and, although it is not my constituency, I make no apologies for raising the point, because it is the people of Saskatoon city in particular, and more than other people, who use that as a playground.

However, the regulation of the department as it is now, I understand, is that these things have to be taken down. The top has to be removed. The sides have to be piled up. I presume that a caretaker or someone at the park takes care of them. When these people come up for a short holiday for a few weeks in the following summer, the whole process has to be gone through again and the thing has to be erected, only to be taken down in the immediate future.

Those are the two points I wanted to draw to the minister's attention. If I have to make a judgment, the first one is the more important, that is to say, a rather humble person who probably needs a holiday more than the others but who cannot be selective in a choice of a location or indeed of a park should get some special consideration in that matter, particularly if he has established through time something of a right in that particular manner. I should like to hear from the minister, who has his officials in front of him, his comment on what I have said and whether he could tell me if in fact I have painted something of a true picture of the situation.

Mr. Lesage: The plea that has been made by the hon. member for Saskatoon is exactly the kind of demand that I deplored this afternoon when I outlined what the policy of the department was on the national parks. The shack tents in Waskesiu are not very beautiful to see. I do not know whether the hon. member for Saskatoon has seen them as I have seen them, but they are certainly not a great asset to the beauty of the national parks. It is not surprising that we have to have certain regulations.

This afternoon when I was outlining the policy that we should follow with regard to the parks, one which was approved tonight by the hon. member for Kootenay West, a colleague of the hon. member for Saskatoon, I said:

> When it becomes necessary, in view of the greatly increased numbers of visitors, to rearrange camp grounds or to restrict their use to the period of a normal holiday, and when in the course of these changes certain persons lose some of the privileges they have enjoyed in the past, such as that of occupying the best place in the camp grounds over a whole season,—

And I could add "season after season."

> —we are told that we are depriving people of their rights, and our decisions can be most unpopular among the groups concerned.

That is what I said this afternoon, and I added:

> We do our best to meet particular interests when this can be done without prejudice to all the people of Canada; but once a situation becomes such that the interest of the people as a whole is suffering or is likely to suffer in future, we are duty bound to all Canadians—to whom the parks belong—to make the best rearrangements we can make.

I went to Waskesiu and I saw the shack tents. I know the condition of the people who use them, and I do not want to deprive those people of the only vacation they can get that is within their means, as the hon. member for Saskatoon has said, and I agree with him on that. However, they must understand that when they go to the parks they are not going to a summer vacation home that they have bought, on land that they own. They are going to a park which belongs to the whole people of Canada, and it is not the man who wants to stay in Waskesiu because he lives in Saskatoon and it is easy for him to go to Waskesiu. It is not his particular interest that should be the determining factor in our policy towards the park. It is in the interests of all the people of Canada that the natural beauty of this park be conserved as much as possible in its natural beauty for the whole of the people of Canada. That is our policy.

Mr. Knight: Would the minister state that it is the intention of that particular section that being a thing of beauty is the most important function of a national park?

Mr. Lesage: Why should the front view along Waskesiu lake be available to the same people year after year? Why should we not change the people who have the waterfront available to them? There must be some policy—

Mr. Knight: I of course do not agree with the minister at all because these people have not been allowed to stay there year after year. As I said in the earlier part of my remarks, they have been moved back. Why should they be put out of there in favour of somebody else? I am going to ask the minister this question. If his rule is that they are going to move these people out in sort of checker-board fashion so that all members of the public may enjoy for at least some time the finest sites, is the minister prepared to apply that rule to those who have built cottages costing $5,000, $6,000, $10,000 or $15,000? That is different, I take it.

Mr. Lesage: No, but since I have been in the department it has been impossible for anyone to lease land to build a cottage in the national parks. They have not been allowed to.

Mr. Knight: Cottages have been built there costing $5,000, $10,000, $15,000.

Mr. Lesage: Not since I have been in the department.

Mr. Knight: The minister is still the responsible minister, whether or not the cottages were built while he has been in office. I am asking him if he is prepared to apply to these particular cottages or houses the same rule that he is prepared to apply to these unfortunate people who can only afford shack tents.

Mr. Lesage: The situation when I came into the department, and I do not know for how many years before I came there, was that these people with cottages had 21-year leases which I understand are renewable under our regulations for another 21 years. That is quite different from the renting of land from week to week or for a fortnight or from month to month. It is a different situation completely.

Mr. Knight: My point is that the question of enjoyment has been sacrificed to a foolish idea of what the minister considers beauty. The minister says that the natural beauty of any park must be preserved. No one can agree with him more than I do, but I am going to suggest that the way to preserve the natural beauty of a woods and lake park is not to build town houses in it with beer stores and all the rest of the silly things that we have to put up with around our homes. When we go to this place we find city conditions, exactly the same conditions that prevail in the cities, and the people who can least afford that sort of thing are shoved back into the woods.

I am not going to use the word "slums" but according to the minister's ideas apparently that is what he will be prepared to create. You will be prepared to create an aristocracy in the place close to the water with the best conditions and all the rest of it and, somewhere in the bush behind, you are going to put the people who do not matter too much. I am warming up a little on the subject, and may I say that this is not the only direction in which this government shows the same kind of preference for this kind of people and not for the others. If you do not believe me, go into the small loans committee or somewhere else.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Nowlan: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hahn: —I do not wish to be critical in this instance.

Mr. Nowlan: Do you see the clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Hahn: The hour is late, as I realize, but I understand that during the recent visit of the minister to British Columbia he had a discussion with the premier of that province as a result of which he made a certain undertaking in respect to an historic site in my area. I wish to compliment him on behalf of my constituents, the people of Fort Langley and the people of British Columbia generally for recognizing that the government does have a responsibility in preserving historic sites. The site I am speaking of is Fort Langley, the original capital of the province of British Columbia. I understand that the federal government has undertaken to pay half the cost of restoring the buildings on that site as well as the palisade and that it is to be opened for the B.C. centennial in 1958. I do not know whether the minister has anything to add on that point but I wish to thank him on behalf of the people of the province.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I have a considerable number of remarks in connection with parks, and there are some members who wish to speak on parks who are not here at this time. I suggest that perhaps we might make more progress if we held this item over, went on and finished the other items under this particular section and then came back to the administration item, No. 294.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that item 294 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I have some remarks I want to make on item 294. I happen to be here now and if we are going to continue consideration of the minister's estimates in committee I cannot really see any reason why I should not go on. I do not want to interrupt the orderly procedure of the committee, but I came here from one of the standing committees hoping that I might have a chance to say a few words on this item. I do not want to extend the sitting tonight beyond the wishes of other hon. members, but I cannot see that we will make much more headway by doing one thing than by doing another.

As it happens, the subject matter on which I want to say a few words is related to the remarks just made by the hon. member for New Westminster. In considering the item having to do with the administration of national historic sites at this session I feel that something should be said about the forthcoming centennial celebration in the province of British Columbia. I hope that the centennial, about which something has already been said in connection with the minting of a special coin, will be an event which will enable members of the house from other parts of Canada and the people of Canada generally to come to realize that when British Columbia entered confederation it did so as a crown colony which already had something of a history behind it.

I have noticed that there is some little disposition on the part of the people in the eastern parts of Canada to fail to realize that fact. I think there is a tendency to regard British Columbia as an adjunct to upper and lower Canada which suddenly came into being because of confederation. I hope that a growing sense of appreciation of the history and traditions of British Columbia will arise out of the centennial. Not long ago it happened to come to my notice, and I was a little startled by it, that the historic city of Halifax which, if my date is correct, was founded in the year 1746—

Mr. MacNaught: 1749.

Mr. Barnett: 1749—is only 100 years older than the city of Victoria which some people may regard as being out in the raw, wild and woolly west. I think it is important to realize, that without British Columbia in being as a crown colony at the time of confederation, Canada as we know it today would probably not exist because there would not have been a western anchor to tie Canada together.

I think it is also important to realize something of how that came to happen. Along with the member for New Westminster I also am very glad that historic Fort Langley is going to be restored. However, I should like to point out that Fort Langley and New Westminster are in fact by-products rather than the cause of the coming into being of British Columbia. They came into being because of the discovery of gold. If we are going to give recognition to what caused British Columbia to come into being to create the anchor which made Canada as a nation extending ocean to ocean possible, we must cast our minds into a rather plain and ordinary little gash between two hills in the heartland of the Cariboo in British Columbia and recognize that while, at a casual glance that little strip of land there is like a thousand and one other places in Canada, nevertheless, because in that valley there was discovered the richest piece of placer ground of its size that has ever been found anywhere on the face of the earth, British Columbia came into being as we know it today; that it became something more than a fur-trading outpost, which I think in all probability would have fallen into the hands of the expanding United States. For that reason, and because I happen to have lived for a number of years in that particular little area, and perhaps caught something of the spirit of the pioneers of British Columbia that I feel one can still hear whispering in the quiet hills of the Cariboo, I should like to suggest that, in this centennial celebration, and perhaps in some renewed interested on the part of the national historic sites and monuments people, the historic site of Barkerville will not be forgotten. I do not think that the matter of some suitable recognition and restoration of Barkerville would be as expensive as that of the restoration of Fort Langley. But nevertheless because of the fact that Barkerville came into being, I think I would venture to say that Canada as we know it today exists, and has its being as a national entity. I am very happy to know, in making particular mention of Barkerville tonight, that His Excellency the Governor General did see fit in his recent tour of British Columbia to make a special side trip from Quesnel back into the hinterland 60 miles to Barkerville, and that while he was there he met some of the oldtimers there, including that grand old man named Fred Tregillus, whom it would be a privilege for anybody to know. I hope the report which His Excellency will bring back with him of his tour of British Columbia will perhaps help to emphasize what I myself feel about Barkerville as a valuable historic site in Canada.

Barkerville was in its heydays in the early 1860's. Because of the fact that the entire town was burned in the winter of 1868-69, nothing really exists there which antedates the rebuilding in 1869. Some very interesting buildings were built by the people, many of them young sons of the province of Ontario who lie buried in the old graveyard there. Unfortunately many of those original buildings have gone which were there when I first saw the town. I think for example of the old Royal Cariboo Hospital building, of the No. 2 Masonic Lodge building of British Columbia, and of the old Theatre Royal which have all gone. In the days when Barkerville was the second largest place west of Chicago on this North American continent, stock companies used to travel all the way from San Francisco to play the Theatre Royal in Barkerville. You can imagine what a trip that must have been in those days.

An hon. Member: They had a brewery, too.

Mr. Barnett: Oh, yes. I myself have seen the remnants of some of the old stage settings that used to be used in the Theatre Royal in those days. I do not know whether or not any of those are left around Barkerville. I could tell at some length some of the things that I learned from some of the early pioneers who were still living while I was there, but I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee tonight. However, I want to point out that in addition to the rather historic church which was built in 1869 there is still in existence one other building which I feel is worthy of preservation as a national monument in Canada. I refer to the old court house at Richfield which lies just above the present site of Barkerville. I paid a visit to that building last summer on my way home from the session. I must say that I was grieved to see this building slowly but surely destroyed as something of permanent value, although a number of years ago some work was done on that building by the British Columbia historical society in putting in new foundations. This is the court house where the first chief justice of British Columbia, namely the famous Chief Justice Begbey, held court. That is a building which I feel should be preserved. It is true that there is one of those stone cairns at the entrance to Barkerville marking the end of the Cariboo trail. But apart from that, very little indication of national interest in that site has occurred. I hope that, in co-operation with the interested people and agencies in British Columbia, during the period approaching the centennial year the national historical sites and monuments people and the minister will take some special interest in the retaining of Barkerville as one of the most historic and significant national sites which has gone to the making of Canada as we have it today.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 294 stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Rowe: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Item 294 stands by agreement.

295. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,973,938.

Mr. Dinsdale: On item 295—

Mr. Fulton: It is 10.30.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe that I have the right item for the question, and I may say that it is a question. On looking at page 403 I notice that the vote for Riding Mountain park is increased this year. Last year it was $130,848 and this year it is $230,538. I am pleased to see that increase because—

Mr. Lesage: That is vote 296 that you are talking about.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is item 296?

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Ask your question now.

Mr. Lesage: No. Carry item 295 and ask your question on item 296.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 295 carry?

Item agreed to.

296. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $9,337,340.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am glad to see this increase—

Mr. Dufresne: He was anxious to express his satisfaction.

Mr. Dinsdale: —because in recent years Riding Mountain national park has tended to be the Cinderella of parks, notwithstanding the fact that it is one of our more popular national parks. For years now it has maintained an attendance record that was second only to Banff national park. I think that is largely accounted for by the fact that it is a part of that excellent system of tourist attractions on Highway No. 10 that include the international peace garden as well as the Riding Mountain national park leading on into the fishing country up in the Flin Flon region. Now, if the minister could indicate some of the larger items that will be covered by this expenditure I think it would be interesting to the committee.

Mr. Lesage: It is mainly for equipment; the increase is for the purchase of equipment.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is there any major construction such as, for example, the improvement of the tourist camp site?

Mr. Lesage: The decrease in construction this year is due to the fact that last year a new administration building was erected in Riding Mountain national park. This year the increase is due to the acquisition of new equipment. I had a list here and it is a long list. The main item is for one mobile truck crane equipped with a half cubic yard back-hoe, $35,000. The total for equipment is $129,843.

Mr. Harkness: I just have a short question. The bulk of this item, about $7·5 million, is for trunk roads. I wonder if the minister would tell us what is meant by trunk roads?

Mr. Lesage: Trunk highways.

Mr. Harkness: Or trunk highways, on which this $7·5 million is to be spent.

Mr. Lesage: I did mention that in my statement on July 12, but I do not mind repeating it. The trunk highways are the highways in the parks which link one park to the other or which are main thoroughfares through the park. For instance, we consider as a trunk highway, highway No. 10 through Riding Mountain park.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is the main street of the Americas.

Mr. Lesage: There is also the highway which goes through Prince Albert national park; the Banff-Windermere highway and the Banff-Jasper highway. As I said this afternoon, we are planning on an eight-year construction program on these main highways in the national parks. This does not take into account, of course, the trans-Canada highway which goes through Banff and Yoho parks and which is being built by public works.

Mr. Churchill: In connection with this item, page 403 shows an expenditure of $361,710 for historic sites.

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: Could the minister inform us what the sites are?

Mr. Lesage: The details of those?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, unless it is a lengthy list.

Mr. Lesage: There is a very long list but I can give the main items. There is the restoration of Signal Hill in St. John's, Newfoundland. This site is just being transferred to us by the city of St. John's and the government of Newfoundland. The cost is $25,000. There is the continuation of works at the fortress of Louisbourg, $25,000. There is the continuation of restoration and repair of the Halifax citadel, $120,000; repairs to the fortification and walls in Quebec city—this is an annual amount—$25,000; the restoration of Fort Langley. While there is $15,000 in this vote, the total cost will be $125,000 for the federal government and the same amount for British Columbia. The Fort Langley restoration is to be ready in 1958 in time for the celebration of the centennial of that province.

There is the construction of a small building at Lower Fort Garry, $10,000. The erection of new memorials throughout Canada will cost $25,000. Then, there is a long list of amounts below $8,000. I knew when I reached Lower Fort Garry, $10,000, we would not have to go any farther.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, the minister has just mentioned an amount of $25,000 for the Quebec fortifications and has said, I think, that this amount was voted annually. Can he explain why this is an annual vote?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, this amount of $25,000 has been voted annually, at least ever since I have become Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, for the maintenance and proper care of the walls and fortifications of Quebec city.

Mr. Dufresne: Are these the walls and fortifications which stand on the battlefield?

Mr. Lesage: Not at all. This does not concern the battlefield, but rather the Citadel, the St. Louis and St. Jean gates, etc.

Mr. Dufresne: Very well.

(Text):

Mr. Matheson: I have a request to make of the minister in connection with the highway development program in Prince Edward Island national park. I know the minister agrees with me that it is a very important development because when completed, if it is completed, it will link together what are now three separate portions of the park which are divided by inlets on the north shore of Prince Edward Island. I should like the minister to put on the record very briefly what this will amount to, and I should like his assurance that what is on the record will be carried through.

Mr. Lesage: The estimates for this year are as follows: for what I have called up to now the Ocean View highway: There is seal coating with asphalt, $54,000, and this covers the Dalvay, Stanhope and Cavendish highway, 11·15 miles; there is an item here for the construction of a pile trestle bridge at Covehead inlet, 24 feet wheeling, 18 foot curb, 600 feet long, $368,000. There is the construction of a road from Stanhope to the trestle bridge which will cost $208,000.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to ask the minister if any decision has been reached yet by the historic sites and monument board regarding Chiefswood, the birthplace of Pauline Johnson? I have had a considerable amount of correspondence with the board in regard to this matter as well as with the minister just recently. I see nothing in the estimates regarding it and I wonder if a decision has been reached? I understood a decision was going to be reached at the last meeting of the board. I had not heard from the minister since and I am just asking now if a decision was reached?

Mr. Lesage: I am informed by my deputy ministers that this matter was discussed at the last meeting of the board. I have not received as yet for consideration the final recommendations of the board. I know they are in a division of the department, but I have not received them in their final form.

Mr. Charlton: I know that certain members of the band asked questions and were given some information that the recommendation was going to be accepted. How did they get that information?

Mr. Lesage: I will have that information available as soon as I have the final report of the board. They make a report after every one of their meetings. I expect that in a week or 10 days I will receive it and my hon. friend may rest assured that I will let him know what the final recommendation has been and how it has been received and if I can approve of it.

Mr. Green: Within the last two or three weeks it has been decided that the trans-Canada highway will go through Rogers pass in British Columbia and most of that route will traverse Glacier national park and Mount Revelstoke national park. So that a good portion of the cost will have to be paid by the minister's department. I think this particular vote which we are now discussing is the one from which that money would have to come, and I wish—

Mr. Lesage: I am afraid the hon. member is under a false impression. The whole of the money for the trans-Canada highway through the national parks is provided in the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Green: In what way is the minister's department involved?

Mr. Lesage: The department provides the land.

Mr. Green: The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has nothing whatever to do with the construction of the highway?

Mr. Lesage: Not with the construction; the only thing we do is to provide the land and approve the route.

Mr. Green: Why has the minister in the details on page 403 the following:

National parks trunk highways, $7,454,775.

Mr. Lesage: I believe, Mr. Chairman, I explained a few moments ago what the trunk highways were, and I was careful to except the trans-Canada highways from the trunk highways.

Mr. Rowe: Tributary to it?

Mr. Lesage: No, not necessarily tributary. The Banff to Windemere highway is a trunk highway and the Banff to Jasper is a trunk highway and they come under the jurisdiction of this department. Money is provided for such highways in these estimates. It is for the rebuilding of a part of these two highways and other similar highways. The construction of the trans-Canada highway through the parks is the complete responsibility of public works except that this department supplies the land and approves the route.

Mr. Green: Who pays for the maintenance?

Mr. Lesage: Public works.

Mr. Green: That is true of the trans-Canada highway wherever it goes through a national park?

Mr. Lesage: I am informed by my officials that they are still discussing the question with the officials of the Department of Public Works as to who is going to maintain the trans-Canada highway through the parks and they have not come to any conclusion yet.

Mr. Green: That is a very important subject because the maintenance of the highway through these particular parks will be quite expensive.

Mr. Lesage: The maintenance?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: Well, yes.

Mr. Green: Maintenance would include clearing snowslides and things like that.

Mr. Lesage: Yes; there is quite a lot of snow. Yes, it would.

Mr. Green: You had better get a snow shovel.

Mr. Lesage: This will have to be discussed.

Item agreed to.

297. Grant to Jack Miner migratory bird foundation, $5,000.

Mr. Harkness: This grant has been $5,000 for a number of years. In view of the amount of inflation which has gone on, if $5,000 was justified several years ago I would think that possibly there might be the addition of $1,000 or $2,000 to this grant in order to bring it up to something like the level it was when it was first granted. It is a small item, of course, but I understand that the Jack Miner foundation is having difficulty financing owing to the very fact that the cost of everything has gone up. Therefore, I think there is some justification for making a small increase in this grant.

Mr. Lesage: This would have to be considered for next year, of course.

Item agreed to.

298. Grant in aid of the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba, $10,000.

Mr. Dinsdale: Just a brief word, Mr. Chairman; I would be remiss in my duty if I did not make an annual report on the progress of the international peace garden. The grant for the international peace garden is $10,000, and I suppose the argument that was raised by the hon. member for Calgary North with reference to the grant in aid of the Jack Miner foundation would also apply to the international peace garden; in fact, it would apply to a greater extent because unfortunately recently, owing to a misunderstanding of the importance of this very worth-while project, the grant was discontinued for a short period and then restored at the reduced rate of $10,000. I say "reduced rate" because for several years the international peace garden was supported to the extent of $15,000 a year. Rather than meeting the problem of the inflationary conditions by an increase in the grant, it has been decreased.

I draw this matter to the attention of the minister because I am sure that, as a result of all the representations that have been made in recent years by members of the cabinet and by citizens across the country, he is fully aware of the importance of this development not only as a symbol of the universal longing for peace but also as a practical tourist attraction. The tourist industry in Canada has been lagging in recent years in comparison with the relative number of Canadians visiting the United States. But, so far as the peace garden is concerned, the reverse is true, there is a larger number making a pilgrimage to this very important development. For example, last year cars from 48 states were registered in the garden. There were international visitors from countries as far away as Scotland, Switzerland, South India, South Rhodesia, and so on. More and more voluntary groups having an interest in international affairs are choosing this site for their gatherings. For example, an international band camp was held. Some of the outstanding musicians of this continent were brought in.

I do not need to enlarge further on the theme, Mr. Chairman, except to point out that this is a very worth-while development. I do hope that the government can see its way clear at least to restoring the grant to the former level. The development on the United States side of the boundary is moving ahead much more rapidly than on the Canadian side, and I am sure, in the interest of national prestige, national pride, almost everyone would like to see us keep up our end of this development.

Item agreed to.

299. National battlefields commission—to supplement the sum of $125,000 granted by an act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec (chap. 57, statutes of 1908, as amended) for the purposes and subject to the provisions of the said act, $21,331.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of delaying the estimates of the minister and I shall certainly not undertake to go over the history of the Quebec battlefields. I shall simply say that we were greatly pleased last year, when these same estimates were under consideration, to grant a supplementary amount of $25,000 which was apparently needed for the maintenance and administration of the Quebec battlefields commission.

However at this stage I take the liberty of making a few suggestions to the honourable minister.

I believe it would be most advisable—and I have no objection to it—to grant a supplementary amount to bring about the necessary improvements to the belt road around the battlefields. We note with regret that at some places the road is in very bad repair. It is bad publicity in view of the many thousands of tourists from everywhere who come to visit one of the most beautiful historic sites of the old capital.

I would also ask the minister to avail himself of his position to recommend to the battlefields commission that they ask those who are entrusted with the supervision of the battlefields, that is members of the R.C.M.P., about the possibility of giving a little more attention to the lands under the jurisdiction of the commission. I know that those people fulfil their duties very well, I have no doubt about it; they may not be sufficiently numerous because we of Quebec often receive complaints to the effect that the battlefield grounds are a danger to morals. I believe there should be a much closer supervision at that place.

I also wish to congratulate and thank the honourable minister who undoubtedly authorized our national society, the St. Jean Baptiste society, to use those grounds on June 24 last for the great parade held at Quebec on our national day.

Mr. Chairman, I see that an extra sum of $21,331, which did not appear last year, has been inserted in this year's estimates. Would the hon. minister be kind enough to explain that supplementary amount?

Mr. Lesage: One word only, Mr. Chairman. Obviously the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) is growing old, since he is now requesting closer supervision in a park which, no doubt, he frequently visited in his younger days—

Mr. Dufresne: I was just as staunch a defender of morals twenty years ago as I am now. I have been well brought up. In fact, you may ask the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I beg your pardon?

Mr. Dufresne: I was saying that my upbringing has been good.

Mr. Lesage: The member for Quebec West complains about the condition of the belt road in the park. I am rather surprised since I have accompanied the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Australia (Mr. Menzies) last week on a visit to battlefields park. I drove him around the belt road and I did not find it in bad condition. It may be that I was driving a little slower than my hon. friend, since the speed limit there is 15 miles per hour. However, I will bring the remarks of the hon. member for Quebec West to the attention of the officials of my department.

As far as the amount of $21,331, that is item 299, is concerned, that money is needed to bring the salaries of the employees of the battlefields commission up to the level prevailing in Quebec and the vicinity.

Last winter we instituted an inquiry into the salaries paid the employees of the national battlefields park and we found out that these salaries were below those paid to workers holding similar jobs in the city and the district of Quebec. Following these findings we came to the conclusion that in order to bring the salaries of these employees to the level of those paid for similar occupations we needed for the fiscal year running from April 1, 1956 to March 31, 1957 an appropriation of $21,331.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources made that statement, for it simply proves the importance of the opposition. Last year—

Mr. Marler: You certainly need proof.

Mr. Dufresne: Pardon? Would the minister repeat?

Mr. Marler: I said you needed proof.

Mr. Dufresne: We need proof? The size of the opposition is proof enough today of what we say. Last year, when we went into this item of $125,000, that is to say, when we increased the required contribution from $100,000 to $125,000, I pointed out to the minister that to my mind, most of the employees of the board were not getting the salaries that they would have received elsewhere for similar work. I understand that, following those remarks and representations on behalf of the workers, the minister was kind enough to make the investigation I just referred to and granted the workers the salaries to which they were entitled.

So, I want to express my thanks on behalf of the workers, particularly those of my county, a county which has long been Liberal, and where a good many of the workers have been given jobs by the Liberals—

Mr. Lesage: And it is going to be Liberal again soon.

Mr. Dufresne: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Lesage: It is going to become Liberal again soon.

Mr. Dufresne: Well, it might be presumptuous on the part of the minister to mention such things, and I would advise him to take care of the Montmagny-L'Islet county. As far as Quebec West is concerned, I am going to look after it myself.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. minister for improving the lot of the workers and, on their behalf, I renew my thanks.

Item agreed to.

National battlefields commission—

662. To provide for special works at National Battlefields park, Quebec, $10,000.

Mr. Rowe: Eleven o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Carried?

Mr. Lesage: Item 662 also relates to the battlefields commission.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, it is well past ten o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, carry 300 and 301, too.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Fulton: Item 300 carried.

Mr. Green: No, item 300 is not carried.

Mr. Fulton: Well, I did my best for you.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we will continue with these estimates tomorrow and then take agriculture and transport.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): It being after ten o'clock this house stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

It being eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NAVAL BARRACKS, CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

Question No. 566—Mr. Matheson:

1. When are tenders expected to be called for a new naval barracks at Charlottetown?
2. On what date is actual construction expected to get underway?

Answer by: Mr. Hellyer, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of National Defence:

1. Approximately October 1, 1956.
2. Approximately January 31, 1957.

SHIPPING FACILITIES, DALHOUSIE, N.B.

Question No. 571—Mr. Van Horne:

What action, if any, is being taken to implement and construct adequate facilities to accommodate shipping demands at the year round port Dalhousie, New Brunswick?

Answer by: Mr. Bourget, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works: No decisions have been taken.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PROPERTY EXCHANGES, HALIFAX

Question No. 579—Mr. Balcom:

In the exchange of several properties between the city of Halifax and the Department of National Defence in 1946, what was the agreed and fixed market price placed, at that time, on the property known as Bellevue, corner Spring Garden road and Queen street, Halifax?

Answer by: Mr. Hellyer, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of National Defence: $10,000.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

95. HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, August 3, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON ESTIMATES

Sixth report of special committee on estimates.—Mr. Tucker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CHANGE IN ORDER OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it occurred to me today that we might facilitate the business of parliament by changing the order of business a little bit to dispose of the first three items on the orders of the day so that in the other place they might be considering these matters while we were going on with other things. I would suggest to the house that we take the third reading of Bill No. 388, third reading of Bill No. 349 and third reading of Bill No. 343 this morning in that order, and then go on with the estimates as I indicated last evening.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EGYPT—STATEMENT BY FRANCE, UNITED KINGDOM AND UNITED STATES ON SUEZ CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the representatives of the governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States issued a communique last evening after their conference in London. I just received the text of the communique a few moments ago, and perhaps because of the importance of the matter involved it might be of interest to the house to have the text read into the record.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It reads as follows:

The governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States join in the following statement:

1. They have taken note of the recent action of the government of Egypt whereby it attempts to nationalize and take over the assets and the responsibilities of the Universal Suez Canal Company. This company was organized in Egypt in 1856, under a franchise to build the Suez canal and operate it until 1968.

The Universal Suez Canal Company has always had an international character in terms of its shareholders, directors and operating personnel and in terms of its responsibility to assure the efficient functioning as an international waterway of the Suez canal. In 1888 all the great powers then principally concerned with the international character of the canal and its free, open and secure use without discrimination joined in the treaty and convention of Constantinople. This provided for the benefit of all the world that the international character of the canal would be perpetuated for all time irrespective of the expiration of the concessions of the Universal Suez Canal Company. Egypt as recently as October, 1954, recognized that the Suez canal is "a waterway economically, commercially and strategically of international importance", and renewed its determination to uphold the convention of 1888.

2. They do not question the right of Egypt to enjoy and exercise all the powers of a fully sovereign and independent nation, including the generally recognized right under appropriate conditions to nationalize assets not impressed with an international interest which are subject to its political authority. But the present action involves far more than the simple act of nationalization. It involves the arbitrary and unilateral seizure by one nation of an international agency which has the responsibility to maintain and to operate the Suez canal so that all the signatories to, and beneficiaries of, the treaty of 1888, can effectively enjoy the use of an international waterway upon which the economy, commerce and security of much of the world depends. This seizure is the more serious in its implications because it avowedly was made for the purpose of enabling the government of Egypt to make the canal serve the purely national purposes of the Egyptian government rather than the international purpose established by the convention of 1888.

Furthermore, they deplore the fact that as an incident to its seizure the Egyptian government has had recourse to what amounts to a denial of fundamental human rights, by compelling employees of the Suez canal company to continue to work under threat of imprisonment.

3. They consider that the action taken by the government of Egypt, having regard to all the attendant circumstances, threatens the freedom and security of the canal as guaranteed by the convention of 1888. This makes it necessary that steps be taken to ensure that the parties to that convention, and all other nations entitled to enjoy its benefits, shall in fact be assured of such benefits.

4. They consider that steps should be taken to establish operating arrangements under an international system designed to assure the continuity of operation of the canal, as guaranteed by the convention of October 29th, 1888, consistently with legitimate Egyptian interests.

5. To this end they propose that a conference should promptly be held of parties to the convention and other nations largely concerned with the use of the canal. The invitations to such a conference to be held in London on August 16th, 1956, will be extended by the government of the United Kingdom to the governments named in the annex to this statement. The governments of France and the United States are ready to take part in the conference.

Inquiries of the Ministry

The list annexed to the statement is as follows:

Following is list of countries to be invited to conference:

Parties to the convention of 1888.

Egypt, France, Italy, Netherlands, Spain, Turkey, United Kingdom, U.S.S.R.

Other nations largely concerned in the use of the canal either through ownership of tonnage or pattern of trade.

Australia, Ceylon, Denmark, Ethiopia, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, India, Indonesia, Iran, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Portugal, Sweden, U.S.A.

At the same time I received a personal message from Sir Anthony Eden explaining the real difficulties they have had in settling the list of countries to which invitations should be sent in order to have a basis which would keep the conference within reasonable limits and expressing the assurance that in spite of the fact that within that criteria Canada was not included we would be kept in the closest touch possible during the conference. I can only say that this government supports strongly the objectives of the conference as stated in this communique, and that I am replying to Sir Anthony Eden's personal communication to me that such is the attitude of the Canadian government.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—PRESS REPORT GAS NOT AVAILABLE IN WINNIPEG THIS YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he will comment on the accuracy of the report that appears today as a Canadian Press dispatch and which came over the Canadian broadcasting news this morning, to the effect that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited has said that natural gas will not be available in Brandon and points east until the summer of 1957, whereas Winnipeg and Brandon had expected to have natural gas this winter?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can hardly understand the concern of the opposition considering that they fought like tigers to have no start made on the pipe line. I cannot understand their concern about delay, if there is delay.

Mr. Fleming: I will tell you what the concern is. It is that you should be held to the assurances you gave to the house; that is the concern.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Are you speaking on the orders of the day? I communicated with the vice-president in charge of construction, and he has authorized me to make this statement:

No authorized representative has made any statement to anyone that gas will not be delivered in western Canada this year. The company is laying pipe and expects to continue to lay pipe just as long as the supply of pipe and weather will permit. Trans-Canada has not given up hope of completing the section to Winnipeg this winter nor has it so indicated to anyone.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, does that mean that the information given the minister is that the telegram referred to in the dispatch as having been issued over the name of Mr. Bernard Low, vice-president in charge of sales for Trans-Canada, was not authorized?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Low denied it himself.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Low himself denied sending such a telegram as was reported on the radio. If my hon. friend had listened to the broadcast he would have noted that fact.

Mr. Fleming: No, Mr. Chairman, any expressions I used were taken from the press dispatch concerned.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF MISS CHARLOTTE WHITTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I apologize for not sending him notice, but the idea was of too recent birth to be transmitted by messenger. It concerns an appointment that is intriguing many people in Ottawa. I shall ask three questions in order to save the time of the house, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday the Prime Minister told the house that he "very soon" would be appointing a woman to fill the vacancy on the civil service commission. Would he tell the house today:

1. Whether, among the many "well qualified candidates" he spoke of as being available for the position, he has considered the appointment of Miss Charlotte Whitton?

2. Whether he would not agree that Miss Whitton's appointment would be well justified both on the grounds of her unquestioned qualifications, and of providing the commission with a strong-minded and vigorous administrator?

3. Whether he has considered the other advantages that might accrue from Miss Whitton's appointment, not excluding that of having Miss Whitton campaign in the coming election as a Tory candidate?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I thank the hon. gentleman for all the implications of his question. I can assure him that they will be considered, but that the appointment to the civil service commission will not be made by me but will be recommended by me in consultation with my colleagues. This recommendation will not involve any consideration of who may or may not be a candidate in the Ottawa region at the next election.

HOUSING

MORTGAGE MONEY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY ON ALLEGED SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister given consideration to a brief submitted by the western management committee of the national house builders' association? Will he comment on their representations, particularly this one, that unless mortgage funds are available not later than September 1, 1956 there will be a very serious unemployment situation in many centres throughout Canada during the winter of 1956-57?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall having seen the brief, but in commenting on the last statement made by the hon. member, I do not think I can add to the statements I have already made in the house.

THE MINISTRY

REFERENCE TO FILLING OF CABINET VACANCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Now that Brigadier Allard's rejection of the Prime Minister's invitation to join the cabinet is known to be complete and final, does the Prime Minister intend to consider his own followers in the house as possible candidates to fill the vacancy which exists in the cabinet at the present time, or does he intend to continue to look outside in an attempt to find a suitable man to fill this vacancy?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's intentions will be made known by the actions that will be taken and I can assure the hon. gentleman that in considering members of the house I had not thought of considering the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I had not really thought that he had. May I ask him a supplementary question? Is it the intention of the government to continue to have the portfolios of post office and veterans affairs held by one minister, or is it his intention to have each portfolio held by a separate minister as soon as possible?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I can only repeat that the intentions of the government will be made known by the actions taken.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PUBLIC SERVICE—REQUEST FOR HOLIDAY ON AUGUST 6

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since members of parliament are working tomorrow and Monday in preference to taking holidays, is consideration being given to making holidays tomorrow and Monday available to the maximum number of civil servants owing to the fact that they worked over the Dominion day holiday?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I realize the inconvenience that arises because of our being here on holidays. It has been our practice to do that when parliament is sitting, but I am quite sure we shall be able to work it out in such a manner that there will not be too much inconvenience to those who have to service us while we are here.

MEMBER FOR MOOSE JAW-LAKE CENTRE—ALLEGED AGREEMENT WITH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I think in view of the present mood of the house this is the time for me to ask my question. I would like to direct this question to the Prime Minister and ask him if his original agreement with the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) upon his joining the government side of the house contained any release clause so that he could return to his original party now that it has changed its platform?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there was no agreement; there was merely applause for the action of the hon. member.

REQUEST FOR HOLIDAYS FOR PAGE BOYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that you are in charge of the House of Commons staff I would like to direct this question to you. As it appears that the present session will last almost until the time that school starts—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hees: —I wonder if some arrangement could be made for the page boys in order that they could have a rest—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is a very bad habit for anyone to remain on his feet when the Speaker is on his feet. If the hon. members were saying "order" it is because the hon. member indicated he was directing a question to me and according to the practice and the rules traditionally followed in this house no questions are directed to the Speaker from the floor by hon. members. See citation 302, Beauchesne's third edition.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works which perhaps he will relay to the proper quarters. In view of the fact that it appears likely the present session will last almost until school starts and that the page boys have been working throughout the session, will someone give consideration to allowing them to stop work at six o'clock? I think we can get along very well from eight o'clock until ten o'clock without the page boys.

PAMPHLET DISTRIBUTION BY SOVIET EMBASSY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, has the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce been drawn to a pamphlet recently distributed by the Soviet embassy to all hon. members of this house which he might find most helpful? It is entitled "On Overcoming the Cult of the Individual and its Consequences".

POTATOES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON TARIFF ON UNITED STATES IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I was able to send him notice of it only a few minutes ago, and if he prefers to take this as notice and make a statement later it will be all right. It is in reference to the report from the tariff board which was received by the government, I believe, some time earlier. Will the minister make a statement indicating the government's intention with reference to tariffs on United States potatoes entering Canada on and after September 1 next? Will they permit United States potatoes to come into Canada free of duty? In case the minister wishes to take more time, my next question would be: Are any negotiations under way between our government and the United States government in connection with the equalization of duty so that the duty will be the same both ways; or, on the other hand, free of duty both ways?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I may have something to say about this on my estimates.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED REDUCTION IN TRAIN SERVICE IN LONDON DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is there any foundation to a report in the London Free Press of August 1 to the effect that the railway service between London and Palmerston, and Stratford and Goderich, is to be reduced after September 30?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have made an inquiry of the Canadian National Railways on this subject and we have not received a report as yet.

Mr. Monteith: May I ask a supplementary question? I wonder whether the minister would look into the matter to the extent that he might find out whether or not this line has shown increased revenue over the past year?

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith). The Canadian Press reports that an official of the railway has announced that railway service will be cut in our district and this will curtail the service from Palmerston to Kincardine and from Palmerston to Southampton. My question to the minister is this. Is the minister aware that Bruce county has subsidized the Canadian National Railways greatly over the past number of years?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, if an investigation of the facts reveals that the statement the hon. member has just made is well founded I shall indeed be very greatly surprised.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have another question to direct to the minister. Is the minister of the opinion that the population of Canada will increase rapidly in the near future?

Mr. Fulton: And if so, what is he doing about it?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate to express a "no" to such a question as that; in fact, I think that would be the lowest form of pessimism.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I have one more question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the minister if he thinks it is wise to curtail train service into Bruce county at this stage when it is expected by all economists in Canada that the population of this country is going to increase very greatly.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I could not answer the question in the general terms in which it was put. I think every case must be considered on its own merits.

REPORTED CURTAILMENT OF SERVICE IN BRUCE PENINSULA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the anticipated increase in lake and rail traffic when the seaway is opened is it wise to curtail traffic in Huron, Bruce, Perth and Wellington counties on the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of any intention to curtail services in those counties. Until I know what are the facts I prefer not to comment.

POSTAL SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGES IN BRUCE PENINSULA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Can the minister tell the house if any change is contemplated concerning mail service from Palmerston to Kincardine and from Palmerston to Southampton?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot say that any changes are contemplated. If this question is based on the information concerning changes in train service and how this would affect the Post Office Department, I can assure the hon. member that should the train service be curtailed the transportation of mail will be provided through other means.

PUBLIC WORKS

NEW WESTMINSTER—REQUEST FOR DREDGING OF CHANNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Because of the number of residents of Burnaby who work in the grain elevator at New Westminster, British Columbia, will the minister order the dredging of the channel which is required in order to allow deep sea vessels to have access to that elevator?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I take that as notice.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING APPROVAL BY MINISTER, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works) moved the third reading of Bill No. 388, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest a minor amendment in order to correct a situation which was brought about as a result of a change made when the bill was in committee. Hon. members will recall that at that time section 6 of the bill which dealt with section 10 of the act, was dropped. There are three words in the preceding section which refer to section 10 which would no longer be applicable. I should like to ask my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, to move that there be deleted from the preceding section, line 20, on page 3 of the bill the words "and in section 10".

Mr. Prudham: I so move.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order; I am not raising this in order to delay matters but I am under the impression that in order to make an amendment to a section of the bill it would be necessary to refer the bill back to the committee of the whole. I am quite sure there would be no interference with that process.

Mr. Winters: I was aware of that and I canvassed the situation. I spoke to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). They agreed on behalf of their parties to having it done this way. The amendment I am recommending at this time is not one of substance, it is simply to correct a situation which was overlooked when the bill was in committee of the whole.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order; I am not raising any objection to this being done and I do not think it would take more than two minutes at the outside to do it according to the rules. Would it not be better to have it done in the usual way?

Mr. Speaker: If there is unanimous consent the amendment could be made in this way. Of course if there was not unanimous consent there would have to be a motion the effect of which would be that this bill be not read a third time but be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in one particular. The bill could be amended there and returned to the house, when there could be concurrence in the amendment and then the bill could go on for third reading. However, if there is unanimous consent the rule may be dispensed with. I take it that it is merely a verbal amendment and that there is general agreement about it.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, clause 6 of the bill, which would have had the effect of enacting a new section 10, was dropped at our suggestion, and it is perfectly obvious that the amendment required now to clause 5 of the bill is purely a technicality. Therefore we are perfectly willing to have it done in the quickest possible way.

Mr. Speaker: Is the amendment proposed agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the bill as amended carry?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REGISTRATION, CERTIFICATES, ETC.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 349, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN CONNECTION WITH APPEALS, ETC.

Hon. J. J. McCann (for the Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 443, to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we have some amendments to suggest with respect to this bill and I had proposed to move them in the usual manner, namely, by moving that the bill be referred back to the committee, but if the government would prefer that I move them on third reading, following the practice in the earlier bill this morning, I would be quite happy to do so.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The purpose of the amendments can be stated quite briefly. They would accomplish the same result as we attempted to accomplish in committee of the whole a day or so ago when the bill was before the committee, namely, to prevent the passage of the proposal to raise the floor on the amount that must be in issue before an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in a civil case will lie as of right. The proposal now is to raise it from $2,000 to $10,000. We object to that proposal.

The other objection we have is that the government has not provided in the bill that appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada in capital cases shall be as of right. I am not going to restate the arguments with respect to the matter of the increase from $2,000 to $10,000. The objections were quite adequately discussed when the bill was in the committee. But I think I should say a word or two more about the failure to provide that appeals in murder cases shall lie as of right and the government's proposal instead to continue the process of requiring an application for leave to appeal and now providing that that application will be heard by a quorum of five.

One reason why I think this matter requires some further brief discussion is a thoughtful editorial in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, August 1, which expressed the view that the government's proposal was an adequate safeguard and went as far as was necessary to ensure that those cases of merit would be heard by the Supreme Court of Canada. With respect, I believe that those who hold that view, and of course the minister and the members of the government obviously do, do not quite appreciate the points which are advanced from the other side.

On an application for leave to appeal the full merits of the case will not be automatically before the Supreme Court of Canada and therefore before the judges who hear the application. The application must of necessity involve technical considerations and would properly be opposed on technical grounds. While I imagine that the judges in their character as human beings would be inclined to permit counsel for the applicant to stray somewhat outside the strict field of his application in order that they might hear something about the merits, nevertheless in their capacity as judges of the court they would be properly urged by counsel for the crown to confine the hearing within the narrow limits of the application itself. Therefore it cannot be said with certainty that in every case the hearing of the application for leave to appeal is in effect the same thing as though they were hearing the appeal itself. If that could be said, then I think there would be the strongest argument along the lines of that advanced in the Globe and Mail editorial and put forward by the minister here that the rights and interests of accused persons are adequately looked after in the government's proposal.

In our view that is not the case for the reasons I have stated, and we feel that nothing short of an automatic right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada will meet the needs of the situation. With respect to the argument that may be advanced that this would involve a heavy increase in the burden of the court because their time will be taken up by hearing appeals in murder cases, I suggest there is very little difference between the proposal we advance and the government's proposal because I think it is strongly arguable—of course, only experience will prove—that in the great majority if not all cases applications for leave to appeal will be made. Certainly in any case where counsel would have recommended an appeal on the case he will also, if he feels there is any chance of success, apply for leave. You are not going to cut down the number of issues before the Supreme Court of Canada. You will merely alter the form. If our proposal carried, it would be the appeal itself. Under the government's proposal it will be the application for leave. The only difference is that an application will be heard by a quorum of five and the general practice with regard to appeals is that they would be heard by the full court.

I do not think there is going to be very much difference in the burden of extra work that will be put on the court under one process as compared with the other. Personally I do not believe it is a tenable argument that the court would be overworked. I do not believe the court or the minister would advance it but it has been advanced in other quarters, and therefore to meet it I say that there will be very little difference in the number of applications that come before them and very little difference in the amount of work imposed on the court as the result of the fact that an application is heard by a quorum of five instead of by the full court.

A quorum of five means that there are four judges not engaged in hearing an application. As far as other cases are concerned the quorum is never less than three in hearing a case, and I do not think there would be any difference in the amount of work or saving of time or advance in the efficiency of the court simply because you provide that an application shall be heard by five judges. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks):

That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to amend the said bill as follows:

(a) by deleting section 2 thereof and renumbering the following sections accordingly;

(b) by amending present section 19 thereof to provide that appeals from convictions in capital cases shall lie to the Supreme Court of Canada as of right.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Fulton) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the main motion lost. Shall the main motion carry?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

The Chairman: I understand that resolution 294, Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, was allowed to stand last evening. Shall I call that resolution now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

National parks branch—

294. Branch administration, $90,852.

Mr. Harkness: Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, the minister spoke at some length in connection with national parks but most of his remarks were of what I would call a general nature and did not, I think, meet the very numerous criticisms which have been made of national parks administration, particularly in western Canada and the province of Alberta where the two largest parks are located. The criticisms which have been made of the way in which parks are administered, of course, are not new. They have been voiced in this committee in I think most years since the war.

First of all, there is the matter of roads. I am glad to hear that there is a program which involves the spending, as the minister has said, of some $60 million over the next eight years in order to improve the roads in the parks. I think that is all to the good. I hope it will be successful in giving us sufficiently good roads in the park that tourist traffic will not be discouraged as has been the case in the past. The road from Banff to Jasper has been a sore point ever since it was first constructed. The road is now to be rebuilt, I understand, as part of this program and I would hope that a considerable amount of that construction might go ahead this coming year.

Last year and the year before I brought up the matter of better maintenance of these roads. The minister assured me last year that improvement would be made in this regard. However, last year I again heard a very large number of complaints about the condition of that road, so I would take it that there was still not a sufficient number of graders put on that road to keep it in reasonable shape. Another thing I would draw to the minister's attention so far as roads are concerned is that the road in Banff itself, leading immediately into the town of Banff, has been very rough and full of potholes for some years. It seems to me there is no excuse for that particular road especially being left in that condition. I do not know whether any work has been done on it this year, but if none has been done these potholes and the general rough condition of that road should be corrected immediately. It gives an extremely bad impression to the very large number of people coming into Banff to have their car wracked to pieces just on the outskirts of the township and within the town itself. I think there is no doubt that as far as making the parks available to Canadian citizens and citizens from the United States and other places is concerned the provision of good roads is perhaps the most important thing if you are going to get any return business. People come into one of these parks and they strike bad roads in it. It is very unlikely that they are going to come back. Not only do they not come back themselves but they tell all their friends about the bad condition of the roads and thus discourage a large number of prospective visitors from coming to the parks.

The next matter in which there has been considerable lagging behind is that of accommodation. There is just not enough tourist accommodation in Banff particularly to accommodate the number of people who go there. Many people have to sleep in their cars every night. One of the reasons for the lack of accommodation is the extreme difficulty people have in trying to put up motels, tourist cabins and things of that sort. They have extreme difficulty in getting a piece of land from the park in order to erect tourist accommodation. They run into difficulties of all sorts in trying to erect buildings, once they have secured permission to get the land. Perhaps there may be some fault on both sides as far as this is concerned; but the basic reason there is not more tourist accommodation is the way in which the administration is carried on, the slowness with which decisions are made and the difficulty people have in trying to do anything along that line in the national parks.

There is also the need for considerably increased facilities of various other kinds. There has been a need for many years for a civic centre and auditorium in Banff. Nothing has ever been done about it although propositions have been put up frequently. There is the necessity there for at least one outdoor movie. There is land available where such a thing could be put up, but permission to construct an outdoor movie has been refused up to date.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, sir, and it will be.

Mr. Harkness: The situation with regard to people having anything to do to amuse themselves in the evening, particularly in Banff, is very poor. They wander around. Once darkness has fallen they cannot see the scenery. The movie accommodation is extremely limited and very frequently there is really nothing else for people to do.

Another thing which is lacking is ample picnic grounds in the summer time. The picnic ground at Banff is dreadfully overcrowded and many people who want to get into it are unable to find room on the picnic ground. There is also need for improvement as far as hiking trails are concerned. I have spoken about this, I think, for the last 10 or 11 years in this house, the provision of more trails on which people could hike in the summer time and on which they could ski in the winter time.

Another project which a group of people wanted to put into operation was the construction of a gondola lift up Sulphur mountain. We have been refused permission to construct that lift. Why I really do not know. There is a ski lift up Norquay mountain but it is the type of lift which is not very easy for older people particularly to ride up in and many of them are afraid to ride up in it. In view of the fact that a gondola lift up Sulphur mountain would give an opportunity to anybody who comes to Banff, no matter what his general health and physical condition is, to get up on top of the mountain and be able to see the magnificent views which are available from the tops of the mountains, it is very difficult to understand why there has been refusal to construct this lift. There has been consistent refusal to allow this gondola lift to be constructed. I think the excuse that was given was that the road to where the lift would start would not be sufficient to handle the traffic. Well, it seems to me that this is a very poor excuse. To begin with, the road could be improved or widened and I doubt whether there would be any severe difficulty from that point of view, in any event.

I think a whole lot of the difficulties in the national parks come from the fact that you have administration by remote control. In attempting to meet this point yesterday the minister said that decisions have to be taken at Ottawa because they may affect more than one part. I agree that general policy decisions have to be taken at Ottawa. That is quite correct. We should have a general policy which applies to all the parts and I think general policy decisions should be taken at Ottawa, as the minister said. But this is an entirely different matter than every decision being taken at Ottawa as to whether a man is going to build a house or a tourist cabin, or whether he is going to do any little thing at all. As a matter of fact, the same thing should apply as applies in almost every other department, or applies in any business. There should be decentralization. Whilst the general policy is laid down in Ottawa, the local application of that policy should be left to a much greater extent than has been the case before in the hands of the superintendent of the park. The way the thing has been going on, with all decisions having to be taken here in regard to any matter I think involving expenditure of more than $100, it means that the whole business of getting anything done is terrifically slowed down. It is extremely difficult for people to do anything which would help to improve the facilities and the amenities in the park.

As to the situation that prevails there, a letter appeared in the Calgary Herald last November 29, as a matter of fact, written by a man who has been a resident of Banff for the last 51 years. I should like to read some excerpts from it to give the committee an idea of the situation which does prevail. The letter reads:

> On your editorial page November 23 you reprint an article from the Camrose Canadian in regard to the tourist attractions at Banff, and having lived there for the past 51 years, I can heartily endorse the criticisms that are made. Once a visitor has taken a dip in the hot springs or the cave and basin, and perhaps taken a ride on the chair lift on Norquay mountain, there is not much left to do, as the small picture theatre cannot accommodate one-tenth of the crowd which lines up for five shows per day.
> The parks department in Ottawa has, for many years, adopted a policy to prevent and slow down any improvements or private enterprise whatever.

Mr. Lesage: Commercialism.

Mr. Harkness: I continue:

> They have refused any idea of a drive-in theatre, though there is a magnificent site on the slopes of the lower town of the ghost mining town of Bankhead.

I am not going to read all the letter; I will leave out a considerable part of it:

> Every suggestion by private enterprise to build houses and homes, motels or service stations has been met by opposition from the parks head office at Ottawa. The local superintendent has never been allowed any discretionary power more than a chief clerk, and has to refer every detail to Ottawa.
>
> There is a need for many more attractions at Banff to keep people there, and yet the parks department has refused a permit for the erection of a gondola-enclosed lift up Sulphur mountain from the Upper Hot Springs, making excuses that the road would not be wide enough for the traffic.
>
> Scores of people wish to retire and live in Banff, but cannot get a building site, the government stating that they will only consider applicants who have lived in Banff for 18 months. Yet, they are opening up building lots by the dozen for their own employees or those of the public works department on the trans-Canada highway, and allowing cheap houses to go up which do not meet the requirements they have set for other applicants.
>
> The only major improvements in the Banff park since the war have been two small blocks of building lots put up for tender, with priority to Banff veterans and Banff residents of 25 years or more, and the outsider has no chance to come here to live, yet he is told he may file on a lot after he has been a resident of Banff for 18 months. Where is he to reside during these 18 months?
> D. M. Soole.

Mr. Soole is a very well known old-timer in Banff. As stated in his letter, he has been there for 51 years. As a result of all the complaints in connection with Banff the Calgary Herald sent a reporter out there to conduct a thorough investigation of these complaints. Following that, the reporter wrote a series of articles in which he outlined the various things which were wrong so far as he could determine. One of the articles is dated December 12, 1955 and it reads:

> There is no vote in this town. What is life like where you have no vote, no say in your municipal government, where your daily affairs are controlled by a bureaucracy thousands of miles away?
> In Calgary's own backyard, in the town of Banff, 3,000 persons live under this kind of regime. It is a national park, walled off from the province and run from Ottawa.

There was a series of articles but I do not intend to read all of them. I shall just pick out a few headlines and an occasional interesting excerpt to indicate what is the actual situation. There is no date on this article but it reads:

> Remote Control Stifles Growth of Rockies Gem—A lot of people would call it dictatorship, the way this town is run. Even the more moderate person readily agrees it's a tough place to earn a living, under the iron grip of government control and no appeal against its all-powerful edicts.
> This is what the Herald found in an investigation prompted by recurring and increasing complaints during the past few years of government management of the town of Banff—a federal island inside our province.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Lesage: If they are not satisfied they can always change place. We do not force them to live in the parks.

Mr. Harkness:

> It found people wary of discussing their problems in fear of government disfavour; it found evidence of inequality in administration of the law; it found evidence of high-handed tactics and sometimes inexplicable interference with the normal conduct of business.

The minister has just indicated that—

Mr. Lesage: Sure, I agree with that.

Mr. Harkness: —if they do not like it there they do not have to live there.

Mr. Lesage: Surely not.

Mr. Harkness: However, surely that is no defence for carrying on the administration of the park in a high-handed dictatorial manner.

Mr. Lesage: I do not agree that this is the case.

Mr. Harkness: As the minister said yesterday, these parks exist for the enjoyment of the people of this country.

Mr. Lesage: Another advocate for commercialism in Banff.

Mr. Harkness: As a secondary thing, the parks increase tourist traffic in this country. If the parks are not to be run in an efficient way, if they are not going to provide the amenities which people want, they are not going to attract people and they are destined to fail in their purpose. It is absolutely useless to say that if people do not like it in the park they are not required to live there. That is no defense at all for the numerous complaints which have arisen concerning the way the administration is carried on. The article continues:

> . . . Here are some of the complaints. What would a Calgarian say if he returned home in the evening to find a civic official parked in his living room, having entered uninvited?

That goes back to the bill which the hon. member for Bow River, in whose constituency Banff lies, introduced this year.

Mr. Lesage: That incident occurred ten years ago; you know that. It has been discussed in this house many times; it is an old bogey. It is nothing but a skeleton which is taken out of the closet every session by the opposition because a member of the park administration in Banff made an error for which he was punished. He had no right to do what he did and he was punished for it. The incident took place ten years ago and there has been no recurrence. Please stop taking old skeletons out of the closet.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says there has been no recurrence but that is not my information.

Mr. Lesage: Then your information is wrong.

Mr. Harkness: At any rate the law allows this to be done. It is for that reason the hon. member for Bow River introduced his bill this year to amend the law to prevent this being done.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member knows very well that he is misinforming the house. The only time—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, who has the floor?

Mr. Lesage: That is misinformation.

Mr. Harkness: Who has the floor, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member is misinforming the house—

Mr. Byrne: The Calgary Herald has the floor, as far as I can see.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member is one of those who want to make of Banff a Coney Island.

Mr. Harkness: By the fact that this bill was introduced this year it seems quite clear there have been considerable complaints concerning this matter in the town of Banff.

Mr. Lesage: That is no indication at all.

Mr. Byrne: Let us hear from the Herald.

Mr. Lesage: Why not say something for yourself?

Mr. Harkness: The minister is saying that there have not been complaints and he is denying the existence of these various wrongs I have mentioned, but any number of other people declare that this situation exists. It seems to me the minister would be better advised to devote some study in an effort to find a means of improving the situation rather than to sit here indignantly denying that any of these wrongs exist. I will continue with this article:

> What would a Calgarian say if he wanted to build a home but had to wait 18 months for a piece of land, only to see government men moving into new houses without waiting at all?
> What would a Calgarian say if his yard was being used as a shortcut, ruining his lawn, but he couldn't do anything about it? What would he say if the street on which he lived for 40 years still didn't have a sidewalk, not even a curb and gutter?
> An energetic citizenry would be expected to scream loud and long to rectify these situations. In the final event, they would turn out the administration at the polls.

In Banff, of course, they have no chance to do that because all they have is an elected advisory council which has no powers. Even the superintendent there has very little power and all the decisions are made down here. In many cases mistakes are made and in all cases it is an extremely slow process to get a decision.

There is a great deal more in this article and I am not going to take the time required to put it on the record. Another headline reads:

> Park Policy is Dead End for Complaints—
>
> That is frustrating answer when townspeople want needed changes.

Mr. Byrne: The Southam press is heard from again.

Mr. Harkness: Another reads:

> Take Away the Scenery, What Have you Left?
> Bump your way into town and gape at mountains; there's little else.

That is in connection with the failure of the administration to provide the various amenities the need for which I referred to previously. I will read just one more excerpt from an editorial dated December 22, 1955 which appeared in the Calgary Herald. It reads:

> Anyone who has visited Banff at the height of the summer season is aware that it has outgrown the facilities which it has to offer. There is little to do for the person with small income, for it is a high-priced town where almost every form of recreation requires money. The picnic grounds in the town, on a weekend, are hopelessly overcrowded. The number of trails which are open for people who want to take a walk, not a hike, are few. The park around the public buildings is very nice, but after that what is there for the non-athletic, budget-conscious visitor to do?

An hon. Member: Stay home.

Mr. Harkness: These are some of the very numerous complaints concerning the administration of Banff national park. These complaints and this situation have been in existence for many years. It seems to me it is useless for the minister in charge of this department, whoever he may be, to say each year, "Well, perhaps we will look into this and see what can be done," and then allow the same situation to prevail year after year.

The roads are bad and the administration is extremely slow in its operations. The people who want to improve the facilities are discouraged or prevented from doing so. In other words, it is long past the time for what I would call a thorough shake-up in the administration of the national parks.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I believe that I might be permitted to deal immediately with the criticisms raised by the hon. member for Calgary North.

The first complaint of the hon. member is that the road leading to Banff has potholes and is in bad shape. The information which the hon. member has seems to be insufficient or he has not been to Banff since last summer because the road was reconstructed last fall. As to Banff avenue, which the hon. member mentioned also, there is an item of $250,000 in the estimates to reconstruct the services of Banff street, Banff avenue, Marmot street and Wolf street in Banff townsite. These streets are to be completely reconstructed to take care of present day traffic.

Mr. Harkness: I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. Lesage: Before criticizing, the hon. member should get the right information as to what is being done.

Mr. Harkness: It has not been done yet.

Mr. Lesage: The road to Banff, which the hon. member criticized, was reconstructed last fall.

Mr. Harkness: How far was it reconstructed?

Mr. Lesage: Up to the entrance of the townsite.

Mr. Harkness: What about the townsite?

Mr. Lesage: I have said that there is a quarter of a million dollars in the estimates to reconstruct the facilities in the townsite at no cost to the local people, and I would like the hon. member to take that into account when he talks about lack of self-government for the people of Banff.

Mr. Harkness: Every year we get these stories about the roads that are going to be reconstructed the next year, but they always are left in this particular shape.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member says that there is a lack of amenities and facilities in the park. If there is not enough of these to attract people into the park, how is it that the popularity of the park has increased every year? The number of visitors has increased from year to year and this year there have been still a greater number in spite of the bad weather. Is that because there is a lack of amenities and facilities? No, it is because the people who go to our national parks or to Banff park know very well that they are not going to see an outside movie or all the things you can find at Coney Island; they go to our national parks to benefit from the beauties of nature.

I am afraid the articles in the Calgary Herald on which the hon. member bases his criticism have been dictated by commercial interests who are interested in only one thing, in the making of profits out of this great asset we have in the form of natural grandeur in the west. As I said yesterday, as long as I am in charge of this portfolio there will not be a drive-in theatre in Banff or any other park. You can find those in the cities.

I consider it my duty to see that our national parks are preserved in their natural beauty as much as possible. Visitors will be provided with the essential facilities but not with the ugly things that the commercial interests would like to put up there.

The hon. member referred to the gondola lift. I am sure he is familiar with Sulphur mountain road which leads not only to Sulphur mountain but to the hot springs which are very popular. I do not know whether he has been at the hot springs in the summer and has seen the traffic congestion that creates a hazard on that winding road up to the mountain. I feel that if we had a gondola lift there would be so much more traffic that the hazard would be increased and accidents would be inevitable. There would be traffic jams every day.

We decided that before we asked for tenders for the establishment of a gondola lift we would have to widen the road. I was in Banff in 1954 with my deputy minister and we decided to spend about $25,000 each year in widening and straightening the road. This year we are providing $70,000 so we can finish the road and then be able to call for tenders for the gondola lift.

Then with regard to the picnic grounds. Those grounds may be crowded perhaps on one or two days in the year but they are sufficient. They are being improved constantly. Every year since I have been in the department we have spent large amounts of money improving and expanding the facilities at Tunnel mountain and elsewhere. Last year we spent $50,000 and this year we expect to spend a similar amount. We are always increasing the facilities for the people who want to visit our national parks. We have a limited budget and we must follow strict rules. In spite of what the hon. member for Calgary North has said, and what the Calgary Herald, with the interests behind it, has said, I certainly will not adopt any other course.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I did not plan on getting into this discussion, but I feel the hon. member for Calgary North has indicated a very parochial point of view. The minister has a responsibility as minister of the department and as a citizen of Canada I have an opinion which I feel should be expressed for what it is worth. I may say that I visited the Alps in Switzerland and Austria before I visited the Canadian Rockies. I think it is important that Canadians should go to Europe before seeing our own country, because then after having travelled they will see why they have reason to be proud, particularly of our parks at Banff and Jasper.

The people of Calgary should realize that these national assets belong to Canada rather than to the Calgary Herald or the people of Calgary. It is hard to understand why the people of Calgary get so excited about the lack of democracy in Banff where the people do not have the right to elect their civic authorities. If that is what the people of Banff want, then they can go to reside in Calgary. The hon. member for Acadia is not here, but I am sure he would not object to my saying that he has decided to retire and live in Banff rather than in Calgary. He tells me that even with the disadvantages that may be considered to exist Banff has the lowest taxes of any place in the west and the fishing is very good.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the minister will stand by his commitment and will never permit a drive-in theatre in Banff as long as he is minister. I can see a drive-in theatre at Tisdale or a dozen other places on the prairies where they have nothing else to do but to go to these theatres. But to ask the people of Canada and the United States to come to our Rockies in order to see cheap Hollywood pictures in drive-in theatres is I think the last suggestion that should be taken seriously.

The hon. member for Calgary North is complaining because people have to stand in line in order to go to a theatre in Banff. I hope the minister is not going to be influenced by the free enterprisers who would like to make Banff trashy by putting up a lot of cheap theatres to present an artificial picture of life in Hollywood when we have there the most majestic scenery I know of anywhere on this continent. I think the minister is quite right in refusing to yield to those greedy interests in Canada who would like to change Banff into a cheap Coney Island type of place rather than the holiday place it should be for people who want to go to Banff because of the scenery there.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Chairman, I had not planned to take part in this debate. However, my colleague, the hon. member for Bow River because of illness is unable to be here today and, as the minister knows, any discussion concerning Banff national park is something in which he is very keenly interested. As has already been mentioned, he placed on the order paper this year a bill to amend the National Parks Act. He did so for a reason. He spent a considerable amount of effort and time studying the existing situation in Banff national park, and I am satisfied that many of the arguments advanced so capably this morning by the hon. member for Calgary North would have been supported by the hon. member for Bow River had he been here.

I have visited Banff and I am prepared to admit that it is one of the nicest parks to be found on the North American continent or anywhere else. The scenery is there, the mountains are there, and wild life as well. On the other hand, I think the minister must admit that in order to accommodate the huge tourist traffic visiting Banff during the summer months something more could be done without destroying for one minute the natural beauty that is to be found in the area. I can well remember one word that made an impression on me when I visited Banff the first time. It was as much impressed on my mind when I left Banff as were the mountains, the hot springs and so on. It was the word "occupied".

One evening my wife and I spent hour after hour going up one street and down another trying to find a place to sleep, and we wound up sleeping in the car. Tourist accommodation is not ample in Banff, and I suggest that the minister should give the matter some consideration. Any tourist who goes there without sufficient funds to stay at the Banff Springs hotel or the other hotels finds it difficult to get a place to sleep. The minister must know that.

Roads have been mentioned. It is not too long ago that the hon. member for Bow River spoke about the oil on the road leading into the town of Banff. I am very happy to note that the minister has assured us that something is being done to improve that road, and I can only suggest to him that he take in kindly fashion the advice given to him by men such as the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Calgary North. They are not out to destroy the beauty of Banff at all. They are out to make it a better place for all Canadians to visit.

I live close to another national park in the province of Alberta, Elk Island park. We have there the largest remaining buffalo herd, I believe, with the exception of Wood Buffalo park in northern Alberta, to be found in the world. It is a fine park. It has not been destroyed at all by modern buildings. People go there by the thousand to visit the park and to see the fine herd of buffalo. It is located along highway 16 running from Winnipeg to Jasper. I have one suggestion to make to the minister. I suggest that he consider or have his officials consider very seriously the building of a buffalo paddock along the highway with a little road leading off the highway so that tourists in a hurry to go on through can stop and see the buffalo.

This came to my mind last winter as I was travelling to Edmonton. I was in a bus and I noticed buffalo in large numbers along the fence. I heard people say that this was the first time they had ever seen buffalo. The buffalo were there because the salt licks had been located along the fence. I suggest again that the minister give consideration to the building of a small buffalo paddock, perhaps near the main entrance to the park, so that tourists travelling through can see a few buffalo anyway living in their natural state. Perhaps it would encourage them to go into the park and see the fine herd there.

Finally, I should like to make this comment with respect to the national parks I have visited in Canada. I have always been treated with courtesy, and I think that by and large the officials of the minister's department administering the parks are doing a fine job to the best of their ability within the confines of the act under which they must operate. I suggest to the minister that during the holiday season, which we hope will be coming soon, he give serious consideration to a thorough overhaul of the National Parks Act and the regulations associated with it so that when we come here next session we will have something definite to consider.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Calgary North certainly seems to have plenty of troubles. He reminds me of certain cartoons I have seen on this particular aspect of life, but I do not intend to describe them. One has to do with an old milch cow that is in very serious difficulties. It was difficult to understand whether the hon. member was the member for Mackenzie, the Yukon or Calgary North. I am happy that he is not too familiar with the national parks in British Columbia because the type of publicity he has given to the national parks today was anything but good. I am sure that the boards of trade in the Banff and Jasper national park regions and certainly in the vicinity of Kootenay and Yoho parks would be very angry if they read his speech. I hope that the last part of his speech will be relegated to the garbage can where it belongs. It has been said that there has been tampering with Hansard, but the hon. member certainly has my permission if he wishes to do so to remove the last portion of his speech from Hansard entirely. He has done a disservice to the national parks and to the people who live there.

I had occasion recently to visit Kootenay and Jasper parks. While the road conditions are not of the very best they are good when one considers the amount of reconstruction that is taking place in those parks. The hon. member seems to forget that the construction season is very short in the national parks. The parks are in many cases in the higher mountain regions, in this instance in the Rocky mountains. Snow is found at the very edge of the highways even in mid-summer, and that is the period when the traffic is heaviest. One cannot rush in with a large amount of equipment and do the road jobs in a very short period when the traffic is heavy. The time for such work is very limited.

I was certainly happy to learn that the minister has a progressive plan to spend $60 million over the next eight years to improve the roads in the national parks. I am sure that much of that will be spent in Banff and Jasper where a great deal of construction is taking place at the present time.

There is one thing about the national parks in British Columbia, particularly Kootenay park. It does not receive the amount of publicity that is accorded to the other two parks where they are sponsored by the two large railway companies. But certainly if one had to resort to the type of publicity that has been given to Banff and Jasper here in the house today, we would be pleased to do without it and to struggle along as we have been doing in the past.

The hon. member for Calgary North has two difficult problems. Because of the roads he finds that no one is returning to the parks. Yet on the other hand he finds that there is no parking place and that throngs of people have to return to Banff. Let us have some consistency. Let us be fair. Criticism is fair when it is constructive and is directed towards doing something for the benefit of the area concerned.

There is one problem respecting the operators of Kootenay park and Yoho park which I feel is sufficiently important to demand the attention of the minister. While it is not something that comes entirely under his jurisdiction, I would hope that he would make representations to the minister of municipalities in the province of British Columbia. Last evening the minister pointed out that an operator in Banff, with an establishment to the value of $13,000, would pay about $225 in taxes. I should say that an operator in Kootenay park would pay approximately the same amount of tax to the federal government for the various services which he receives and for the concession that he has established. However, in addition he must pay to the province of British Columbia an improvement, school and hospital tax. This the operator in Banff and Jasper parks is not obliged to do.

The operators have no objection to paying school and hospital taxes, but the improvement tax amounts to about 50 per cent of their total tax, so that they are discriminated against in this way. Their establishment is rated by the department and they are allowed to charge a certain rate for their accommodation, and it is identical in both provinces. Yet I am sure that an operator with the $13,000 establishment would pay in the neighbourhood of $500 in addition to the provincial government, so that in all he would be paying some $700 while the operator in the Alberta parks would be paying about $225. I know it is not something on which the minister can take action on his own, but I would ask that he make representations to the appropriate minister in British Columbia.

Mr. Harkness: The minister seems to think the fact that the number of people entering Banff national park has increased is the answer to all the criticisms about conditions there, as did the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Such an idea is ridiculous. The population of this country has increased very materially in the last several years. The population of the city of Calgary has gone up —including its immediate environs—to about 200,000 people. You have enough people in Calgary alone, if they made two or three trips a year,—and a large number of people do so because it is the closest place for the people of Calgary to go—to constitute the total number of people that have passed into the park, apart from people from other parts of the country.

In addition to that, the thing which brought many people into the park, with really nothing being done as far as the park department is concerned, was the establishment and development there of the Banff school of fine arts. But to say that, because the numbers of people going into the parks have increased, there is no cause for complaint and so on is just completely begging the question. The point is that if Banff park had been operated in a really efficient manner the number of visitors would be well over twice what it is at the present time. I do not think there is any question about that.

The minister expressed some scorn and opposition to the idea of an outdoor theatre in Banff.

Mr. Lesage: A drive-in theatre.

Mr. Harkness: Why he did that I do not know. I would say that both he and the hon. member for MacKenzie just do not know the facts of life particularly as far as Banff is concerned. They both put great emphasis on the fact that people go there to enjoy the beauties of nature. That is quite right. That is one of the main reasons they go there. It is the main reason, perhaps. Some people go there for the hot sulphur springs and things of that sort. In the wintertime, of course, people go there primarily to ski. Those are the three main reasons for people going to Banff. But as I pointed out to the minister previously, after 8 o'clock at night at the present time—and soon it will be seven at night—you cannot enjoy the beauties of nature. Darkness has fallen by that time and you just cannot do it.

Mr. Lesage: If you want to see the beauties of nature early in the morning, you have got to go to bed early at night.

Mr. Harkness: What are people going to do in the evenings? That is one of the difficulties. In the evenings particularly there is little for visitors to Banff to do, and that fact makes them discouraged. They do not know what to do with themselves.

Mr. Lesage: That is tough! Nothing to do in Banff!

Mr. Harkness: They crowd out the beverage rooms and things of that sort. I think it would be only reasonable to provide an outdoor theatre in order to give at least one more means by which people might enjoy themselves during the evenings in Banff.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member tell me whether what he has in mind is an outdoor drive-in theatre or an outdoor theatre?

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact I think there is a need for both. I think there is a need for an outdoor theatre which would preferably be placed perhaps on the grounds of the Banff school of fine arts and where, in connection with the work they do at the Banff school of fine arts, this outdoor theatre could be used as a means of presenting plays and so on outdoors.

Mr. Lesage: That is sensible. That would be a good idea.

Mr. Harkness: There would be the possibility of accommodating there a large number of people. I see that the minister nods his head. Apparently he agrees.

Mr. Lesage: Surely.

Mr. Harkness: In addition to that outdoor theatre I think there is a need for a drive-in theatre.

Mr. Lesage: No.

Mr. Harkness: Without spoiling any of the beauties at all, it could readily be placed on the site of Bankhead which was a mining town. There is a sort of natural ampitheatre there where it could be placed. It certainly would not detract from the general natural look of the whole area around Banff. I do not think there is any question as to the need for something along that line in order to provide additional means by which people may occupy themselves during the evening in Banff.

In addition to that, there is the matter of an auditorium which I mentioned previously and on which the minister did not comment. There has been quite a strong demand for a sort of civic centre including an auditorium. It would probably also include bowling alleys and things of that sort which would be available for use particularly when it was raining and people could not use the outdoor theatre, for use in the wintertime by people who go out there to ski and things of that sort. One of the greatest ways in which Banff has fallen down is in connection with attracting skiers. We have there the natural facilities for the development of one of the greatest skiing areas in the world. The number of people that use it is very limited. They are mostly local people from Calgary, as a matter of fact. They constitute the bulk of the people who ski at Banff. The number of people who come from other parts of Canada is very limited. One of the reasons why it is very limited is the lack of facilities which should be provided.

Mr. Brown (Brantford): I should like to say a word or two in connection with the historic sites service of the department. I was wondering whether consideration should not be given soon to acquiring the homes of former prime ministers and eminent Canadian statesmen. Now, I know that this would cause the department to embark on a considerable expenditure, but it occurs to me that it might be worth while to consider now projects of this kind. Canada is growing very fast. We have now a considerable number of historic properties and they are increasing in number. I feel that it would be worth while for our Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to consider this matter.

In making whatever tours I have made in the United States I have found that the homes of former presidents of the United States have been nearly all kept as museums and are open to the public to visit and to enjoy. Here in Canada as yet we have not begun projects of this kind. For example, in the town where I was born I remember very clearly the residence of the Meighen family, the parents of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, a former prime minister of Canada. I think it would be wonderful if some day that property could be purchased. It seems a shame that we have a lot of premises like this that have to be obtained through private subscriptions. I think it would be worth while for the government to consider expending money in this way from time to time to acquire properties across Canada and not merely erect monuments around the parliament buildings at Ottawa. I mentioned the Meighen property because I know about it. Although I am a Liberal member, I would be very proud if our government would consider honouring a former Canadian statesman in this way.

Now, at Brantford we have a large property which I believe was the former summer residence of the Hon. George Brown, one of the fathers of confederation. It is one of the largest farms in Canada, but it is a very interesting property. I am just thinking generally, and I do not want to pick out any particular persons. We all know there are houses right across this country that are of historic interest. I believe it is time we began to consider acquiring some of these properties so that the past of Canada will be brought before this generation and kept as something of which we are all proud. I believe that, although it will cost us money, it will be eminently worth while. Every time I have visited the United States and seen these historic properties I have thought, why do we not have something like that in Canada; why do we not preserve the records of the past? I am only bringing this to the attention of the minister now as something about which I have thought and which I should like him to consider some time in the near future.

Mr. Thomas: Some days ago I received a letter from the scout master in Lacombe, Alberta, which is in my riding, regarding a group of scouts who are taking a tour through Banff and Jasper parks. I gave the minister a copy of this letter for his consideration. However, I should like to mention it again. These boys worked during the first six months of the year to get sufficient funds to pay their way on this trip. They worked rather than rely on getting the money from their families. They took the trip in a school bus. It might be just as well if I were to read the first paragraph of this letter which, incidentally, is signed by David Rodger, the scout master.

He says:

Throughout the first six months of 1956 the first Lacombe troop of boy scouts was preparing for its annual summer camp. Every boy was working hard, individually and in group enterprises, such as the scouts bean supper, and selling confections at the local ball tournament, since the proposed 1956 camp was a very ambitious undertaking comprising an eight day camping tour of Banff and Jasper national parks. On the eve of departure when all was in readiness, the boys received a rather severe jolt: Word from superintendent Strong that the school bus, the scouts' proposed means of transportation, would be charged ½ cent per passenger mile for passage through the park. It was too late now to call off the plans and the tour proceeded in hopes that some means of avoiding the toll could be arranged at the park gate. This was not the case, however, and the 32 boys, after eliminating all proposed side trips and by robbing funds originally designated for swimming and other group activities, scraped together the 36 dollars required to get them from the Banff to the Jasper park gate.

Now, I should like to urge the minister to take into consideration group activities such as these, particularly as applied to boys and girls groups, the scouts, C.G.I.T. and other youth activities, because it is a very commendable thing when a bunch of boys go out and earn their own money to take these trips. They were forced because of the regulations—I agree that the regulations were such that superintendent Strong had no alternative but to charge them the fee—to use up their money to pay that toll. They denied themselves group activities, swimming and side trips that they wanted. I am sure that these boys take a rather dim view of the regulations. I can understand why the regulations should be made to apply to commercial vehicles because they are taking these groups through the parks and making money. It is only right that they should pay. However, these boys could have borrowed the family car and taken the trip through the park at the regular $2 fee. Rather than do that they earned the money to hire this bus and because of these regulations were denied the right to take the side trips into these scenes of beauty which the minister described the other day. I would urge the minister to give consideration to the exemption from the regulations of such group activities, the boy scouts and other groups, so that they could take advantage of the tours through the parks to see the wonders of these parks without having to pay commercial tolls.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I will try to make my remarks on this item of the estimates as brief as possible. This morning I was very interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Brantford regarding marks and traditions of our national heritage. In any young country such as Canada, if physical marks of historic interest are swept away, we lose a great deal of our national heritage. In a country as it grows, I think hon. members will be prepared to admit, it is items such as these, visible signs of our past history, that build up national pride and national character. In this respect we have a building in my constituency which I think should be preserved, namely, the city hall of Woodstock, Ontario.

The city hall was granted a plaque by the historic sites and monuments board about a year ago. Only last night the city council of Woodstock approved a motion to allow the plaque, which was granted by the historic sites and monument board, to be placed on the city hall this coming fall. You may ask, why should the Woodstock city hall be singled out by this board for this honour? Well, the reason is this. The Woodstock city hall is the only city hall in Ontario which has been continuously in use as a city hall since it was built. Perhaps I should say it is the oldest city hall which has been continuously in use as a city hall since its construction, which was in 1853. It has served as a city hall ever since that date.

It is interesting to know, Mr. Chairman, that when Upper and Lower Canada were combined the Baldwin act was passed in 1849, and the Baldwin act was the basis for municipal government in this country. It set up municipalities and gave them powers of self-government, and so on. We believe the Woodstock city hall—we have not completely verified it yet—was the first city hall built after the passage of the Baldwin act and, as I mentioned before, it still serves as a city hall and has served continuously as such since that date. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, you might say that Woodstock city hall is the original forum of democracy on the local level as we know it, in what was the original nucleus of Canada, namely, Upper and Lower Canada.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say I think you will agree—I hope the minister will—that this building should be preserved. There has been some discussion at the local level, I know, of building a new city hall because obviously when it was built Woodstock was very much smaller than it is now, and the present building has become inadequate to serve the purposes of a city hall at the present time. There has been some talk of possibly tearing down the building. A great many of us in the area are very upset about this and wish to preserve it. It has been mentioned many times in the house, Mr. Chairman, that municipalities—maybe the federal government is at fault; possibly the provincial government is at fault, I do not know—are pretty hard up for money these days. When you have a valuable piece of property in the middle of a city, while the city may wish to retain a valuable historic building like this, for financial reasons it may not be able to do so. I would certainly hope that the minister might consider, not this year, of course, but next year, placing in his estimates an amount to purchase this building and thus preserve for posterity what was the original seat of local government in a physical sense in Canada. It would be a great shame if this building were to be lost.

There is another matter that I should like to mention very briefly. It is a subject that I have brought up in the house numerous times before; therefore, I shall make my remarks on it very brief, as I have already placed on record the pertinent facts about this place. I refer to Long Point island in lake Erie. Hon. members may recall that this island was purchased in 1866, one year before confederation, by a company composed of quite well-off United States citizens, who have since used it as a hunting preserve. The island is in the middle of lake Erie. It stretches out from the Canadian shore. It is 19 miles long and is composed of approximately 19,000 acres. In my opinion this island should certainly be acquired as a national park for the following reasons. Firstly, it has about the finest sandy beach anywhere in the country. Secondly, the water for bathing and swimming purposes off this island is always warm. The reason is, of course, that lake Erie, unlike some of the other lakes and certainly the ocean, being very shallow, never gets very cold. It is an ideal place to bathe in. Since it is very shallow the area is safe for children and people who do not swim very well. More than that, the population of southern Ontario is increasing by leaps and bounds. As hon. members know, it has become a highly industrialized and specialized agricultural part of the country. With the increasing rise in the standard of living and the increase in leisure time, people must have some place to go to spend their vacations and leisure time. While there are many fine beaches on lake Huron and lake Erie, most of them are pretty well taken up. Here we have this island situated within driving distance of an hour or so of London, St. Thomas, Woodstock, Stratford, Galt, Guelph, Brantford, Kitchener and Hamilton, and a thickly populated rural area around. This island is denied to Canadians. It is owned by very few people, most of them from New York. One or two Canadians belong to this company, called the Long Point Company, that owns this island. They keep private police on the island and do not allow anybody to get on it at all. They use hardly any of the territory. They come there, I understand, only about 10 days in the fall to do some duck shooting. That is all the use they ever make of it.

I am not suggesting that this company, which has kept the island in a fine state of preservation for 90-odd years, should lose all its rights and privileges. I am not suggesting that for a minute. That is not fair. But I am suggesting that the minister make some arrangements with Ontario to acquire a large portion of this island so that the Canadian people may make proper use of it for vacation and recreation purposes. It could be kept as a national park and the wild life be preserved.

I may say that the island is considered one of the best bass-fishing and duck-shooting places in the country. When the bass fishing season opened on last July 1, 25,000 bass were taken in a day adjacent to the island. In addition to this, as I say, this island ought to be made a public place. With the proper restrictions, wild life and game could be looked after. At the present time this island is covered with bush and, as I mentioned, gamekeepers are employed by this Long Point Company. In spite of their looking after it, people do land on the island, and about a year or so ago a large portion of the island was burnt over and some of the original timber was lost forever. If the island were taken over as a national park the timber would be preserved.

I hope that the minister may find it possible to come and have a look at the island. I cannot invite him; I am not one of the exclusive set who own the island, but they would probably let the minister come and look at it. It would not look like Banff national park, which we heard so much about this morning. It would not have mountain peaks. However, I am told that more snakes exist per square yard on the island than in any other place in the world. I am told that there are about 30 varieties and some of them are quite big, about seven feet long. The minister need not be alarmed. I am told that some of these snakes get quite friendly. I remember hearing a story about a young man who was trespassing on the island one evening and sleeping in a sleeping bag. He woke up in the morning and found one of these seven-foot snakes sleeping in the bag with him so I promise the minister that if he should visit the island he will not be in danger.

Then, as I said, duck shooting is still very plentiful. If it was a national park with possibly restricted days with a minimum bag it could be open to the public, as Pelee island is, which is a national park at the other end of lake Erie and which is open to the public for pheasant shooting on certain days. They tell me that at Long Point island you do not even have to take a gun in order to get ducks. There are so many ducks there that they fly into the lighthouse at the end of the island and fall to the ground. If you stand there in the evening when the light is on you can simply pick the ducks off the ground after they have flown into the lighthouse. I have mentioned this matter many times before. I am sure the minister is familiar with this problem and therefore I shall conclude my remarks at this point.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, anyone who has been outside in the summer sun today will say that this is an appropriate time to be discussing parks with their cooling streams, wading pools, their swings and the lovely drives in and out; it is very refreshing indeed. As the opposition is showing some inclination to speed up the conclusion of the business of the house I shall just speak for about three minutes.

I hope that some day I will have the opportunity of thanking the minister for the establishment of a long overdue park at Fort William. We have an outstanding site there but it is on the Indian reservation. I am referring to Mount McKay.

No doubt the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe has driven over that mountain and looked out over Thunder bay with its beautiful scenery and all its charm. We have a ski jump there that is not second to the ski jump at Calgary. There is beautiful skiing there and splendid ski trails which are second to none in Canada. This beautiful Loch Lomond about 15 miles around supplies the city with water. It is 800 feet up.

I do not think we have any site in Canada to excel Mount McKay. Of course, the difficulty is that the province and the dominion own this mountain and arrangements would have to be made through the department of Indian Affairs. I hope to see the minister out there this year. If he does come out to see us we will introduce him to something which he has not seen anything to excel.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this debate I shall be very brief. I spoke about this matter to the minister at noon.

I would like to see a small park near Fenlon Falls in Victoria county in memory of Champlain. The old Champlain trail which runs from Simcoe lake to Balsam lake has been preserved by the province and the road has been preserved along the same trail. In fact, it is still called the Champlain road and it always will be.

Up near Sturgeon lake there is a place known as the Champlain camping ground. The first house built in that part of the country still stands there. The people who owned it for a number of years kept the house in relatively good repair and although it is not in an excellent condition now it could be cheaply fixed up.

I believe a park could be provided there and that it would not run into much money. I think the province and the county could share with the dominion in the cost and it could be done on the basis of a three-way split in some way or other.

I would like to see a small national park provided there in remembrance of Champlain, the first white man to travel in that country. He made more than one visit to the place and this particular spot was always his camping ground.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, before the item carries I would like to draw the attention of the minister briefly to one aspect of this branch administration with a reference to historic sites. A moment ago the hon. member for Oxford discussed a historic site in his constituency with the minister and I would now like to draw the minister's attention to another historic site which I think is of even greater importance and about which I spoke on another occasion.

The definition of a historic place in the Historic Sites and Monuments Act is as follows:

> "Historic place" means a site, building or other place of national historic interest or significance, and includes buildings or structures that are of national interest by reason of age or architectural design.

I repeat the words:

> . . . of national historic interest or significance.

Then, under section 3 of the act, the minister is given power to preserve these sites by marking them with plaques and under sub-section (e) he can provide for the administration, preservation and maintenance of any historic place that has been acquired, and so on.

I am thinking of a historic site that does not have to be acquired, one which is presently vested in the department, and located at the foot of parliament hill, the old Supreme Court of Canada building. I can imagine no building which more closely falls within this definition of historic interest and significance than the building in which the supreme court of this country was first established.

When I say "first established", I am not overlooking the fact that at one time the court met in the railway committee room in the former House of Commons. It may be if tradition is justified—I presume prime ministers are often confronted with many problems —that the then prime minister had to placate people and it may be that the then chief justice of Canada did not like the then prime minister too well and the then prime minister did not like the chief justice of Canada too well, and it may be that the chief justice was promised if he moved into this old building that shortly afterwards the new supreme court building would be built.

If that is so, so much the better and all the more reason for preserving this building. If tradition is correct and that building was first used by stonecutters who were cutting the stone for the predecessor of this building, and if afterwards it was used by coachmen who kept their hands and their horses warm while waiting for the cabinet ministers of the day, Sir John A. Macdonald and Alexander Mackenzie, whoever the cabinet minister may have been, then this serves to enhance the tradition, because out of that old building has been evolved the Supreme Court of Canada.

What do we find now? Within three minutes' walk of the old supreme court building which first served as a shed and later served to house the supreme court we have the present magnificent supreme court building. What better symbol could there be of the development of this country than the preservation of these two buildings located within a stone's throw of each other?

In our present Prime Minister we have a gentleman who was a former president of the Canadian Bar Association. He knows and appreciates, as does the minister concerned, the value of tradition and of law and what it has done for this country. Out of the principles of law has evolved everything we preserve and value. I think that of all buildings of historic importance this old supreme court building should be preserved, because, to use the old legal and constitutional expression, the warp and woof of our constitutional development is contained within that building. There is not a lawyer from the Atlantic to the Pacific, nor is there anyone interested in the law, who does not value that building and believe that it should be preserved.

As someone once said, writing of another building:

> A nation is not built of stone, to be sure, but it is built essentially of memories that have more force than any statute law or public policy. The stone laid by ancient, nameless masons long ago and inhabited by the men who made Canada contains the nation's most important asset—its myth.

One might substitute for "myth" the word "tradition". This building is now vested in the crown and I was rather shocked to read the other night that one minister announced that it is shortly to be destroyed. Why is it going to be destroyed and what is going to be substituted therefor? A parking lot. It is proposed to replace this cherished building with a parking lot which could perhaps accommodate 20, 30 or 40 automobiles.

On parliament hill we have a statue of Sir Wilfrid Laurier looking down at the great hotel which bears his name, the Chateau Laurier. We also have here a statue of Sir John A. Macdonald looking at the parliament buildings. He contributed so very much to the establishment of our parliamentary system. We are also going to have a statue of Sir Robert Borden, one of Canada's great constitutional lawyers, and if the proposal I have referred to goes through he will be surveying a parking lot. I hardly think that is in keeping with his station in life, particularly since the old supreme court building can be preserved at very little cost. The building may need a little repair but not very much.

Someone may ask, "What can you use it for?" I would reply by asking why the people of the United States preserve so many buildings in that country. They preserve them as part of their tradition and history. In the city of Philadelphia one can see a little brick building located in the centre of the city. One is almost required to take off his shoes and remove his hat as he approaches it because those people value and treasure it as a part of their national tradition, a symbol of their national development.

There are many hon. members here who lay great emphasis on the necessity of our having a Canadian flag, and with them I do not quarrel. They want all the trappings, shall we say, or many of the tangible signs and symbols of our national development to prove we are a nation. We will not become a great nation and preserve that nationhood unless we preserve the traditions of the past, and that can be done in connection with this building down here more than any other building in Canada. The minister has a responsibility to preserve that building. It is true that there may be some conflict with the ideas of the federal district commission and there may be overlapping jurisdiction with other departments, but for five months I sat in on the committee dealing with the affairs of the federal district commission and

I can say that there is no hard and fast rule that the dicta of that commission shall apply and necessarily be binding. Without taking up further time on this matter I simply want to re-emphasize that in my opinion this building should be preserved and it is the responsibility of the minister to preserve it.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and urge the minister to take appropriate action with regard to this building. It must be the oldest building among the group on Parliament Hill if it was built originally for the stone cutters and carpenters engaged on the other buildings which grace this site.

Not only is it possibly the oldest building on this site, it has a tradition extending back 60 or 70 years as the home of the Supreme Court of Canada. Special interest should be taken in this building and I deplore any suggestion that it be torn down simply to provide parking space.

The building lacks some of the architectural grandeur of the other buildings, but nevertheless the exterior is of the same material. If there was some care taken in fixing up the roof and windows the building would look much better from the outside than it does at the present time. There is some value in keeping that building as it is and restoring it to make it more suitable than at the present time. It may be used for other purposes, but I suggest that it should be restored to its original condition as the old home of the supreme court. At least one portion should be open for those who are interested, as are so many Canadians, in the past history of our country.

In looking over the records of the Supreme Court of Canada I find that in 1890 an article was written in a United States journal by Mr. Robert Cassels about the Supreme Court of Canada. In describing the building itself, he says, and I quote from page 255 of this publication:

> The building in which the court meets is at the extreme westerly end of the government grounds. It is built of the beautiful Nepean sandstone, but without architectural ornament of any kind, having been originally erected for use as government workshops, and since altered to suit the temporary requirements of the judges and the court. The accommodation is quite inadequate to the needs of the court, with the exception of court-room, which with its arched roof and fittings of natural coloured pine and large Gothic windows is bright and cheerful; it is also easily ventilated and heated, and possesses excellent acoustic properties.

And then at page 241 is to be found a picture of the supreme court room which has just been described in those words. There people can see that court room as it was originally set up and used at the time when there were only six judges of the supreme court. In the American Bar Association Journal of 1946 is an article by E. K. Williams, Q.C., now chief justice of the Queen's Bench in Manitoba. This deals with the move of the supreme court to its new building, and referring to the new building he says in the concluding paragraph:

> The building a photograph of which is reproduced on the cover of this issue of the Journal, is a worthy home for the Supreme Court of Canada, but even so the barristers of Canada, who have appeared before that august tribunal in the comfortable and friendly atmosphere of the old court room, with its faded hangings but excellent acoustics, will think, with nostalgic longings, of the glories of the simpler days now gone, of the great judges who presided and the eminent counsel who pleaded before them, and while rejoicing in the new, will still fondly reminisce about the old.

I submit that this building might very well be preserved as a national shrine in order to give due importance to the judicial branch of the government of Canada. A little pamphlet dealing with the Supreme Court of Canada has this to say:

> The government of Canada consists of three branches, the legislative which enacts the law, the executive which administers it, and the judicial branch which interprets.

The Supreme Court of Canada represents the judicial branch. I shall conclude by suggesting that consideration be given to the preservation of this building, the restoring of the central portion containing the old court room to the condition in which it was in the early days, and the making of this building an historic site to which many people could come to see the beginnings of the Supreme Court of Canada. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, the contrast between the old and the new buildings will be immediately evident. Here we have a chance to preserve an important historic site in Canada. As it is situated right in the centre of our national capital on Parliament Hill, we would be well advised to take steps to preserve this building and make it another national historic site and museum emphasizing the development and growth of law in Canada.

Mr. Green: Is the government giving any consideration to taking over Garibaldi park as a national park? It is within easy reach of Vancouver and of at least half the people of the province of British Columbia. For many years the suggestion has been made that it should be taken over as a national park. Of course at the moment it is a provincial park. I remember nearly 20 years ago when the Honourable Mr. Crerar was the minister in charge of national parks he flew over this particular park because the question was being discussed at that time.

Last month the Minister of Fisheries was interviewed while at the west coast about the taking over of this park. According to press dispatches he stated that he still wanted to see it developed as a national park. From time to time there have been statements from Ottawa indicating that the federal government would be willing to take it over on certain conditions. Can the minister state whether or not the federal government would be willing to take over this park on certain conditions and, if so, what are those conditions?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I believe my reply can be quite short. When I was in Victoria at the beginning of July I mentioned the matter to the premier of British Columbia, Mr. Bennett, and he authorized me to say that the development of the park by the province was now receiving consideration.

Mr. Green: So there is no possibility whatever of the dominion making an arrangement with the province to take it over as a national park?

Mr. Lesage: I do not know. I am just reporting what Mr. Bennett told me and what he authorized me to say if I was questioned in the house.

Mr. Nowlan: Before the item carries I should like to ask the minister one question. The minister knows that we have had some discussions and correspondence with respect to the proposed acquisition of the park at Grand Pré as a national park. I know that negotiations are in progress, and I wonder whether the minister could make a short statement telling us exactly where the matter stands at the moment.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings made a motion for the production of all correspondence with respect to this matter. Since the correspondence was tabled the following events have happened. I have had a meeting with Mr. Adelard Savoie, president of La Société Nationale l'Assomption. We have discussed the conditions under which a national historic park could be established there, the main condition, which I outlined last year when I spoke at Grand Pré during the Acadian celebration, being that La Société Nationale l'Assomption turn over to the department the museum in the middle of the park and also the land of the museum. Up to recently La Société Nationale l'Assomption has not been ready to transfer to the department such land and museum.

However, after my conversation with Mr. Savoie, he went back to Moncton and the directors of La Société Nationale l'Assomption had a meeting. On June 29, I received a telegram from the secretary, Mr. Daigle telling me that following my conversation with Mr. Savoie La Société Nationale l'Assomption had passed a resolution authorizing the transfer to the department. I immediately advised the Dominion Atlantic Railway of such acceptance by La Société Nationale l'Assomption so that the offer of the D.A.R. would be held open, and two or three days ago I received a letter from the president, I believe, of the D.A.R. telling me that the offer was open.

As I said, the telegram was dated the 29th of June. Last week, the letter containing the conditions not having reached me yet, I took it upon myself to write to Mr. Daigle the secretary of the society, to ask him to inform me what the conditions were. That is where the matter stands now. As soon as I get the letter and if the conditions are acceptable—I believe they will be because I have a good idea of what they will be—we will proceed to acquire the property of the D.A.R. and of the society and will hold the park and maintain it.

Mr. Barnett: I should like to return for a moment to the subject raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. Can the minister say whether the discussion with the premier of British Columbia to which he referred also included any reference to Strathcona park on Vancouver island?

Mr. Lesage: No, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: We will proceed now to item 300.

Canadian wildlife service—

300. Wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $472,331.

Mr. Green: The minister will remember that about two years ago we had a discussion in the house concerning wildlife in the Northwest Territories, and at that time he gave us a report with regard to the muskox and the government reindeer herds. Apparently reindeer are not considered as wild life, but perhaps the minister could deal with that situation at the same time. I raise this matter because five years ago there was a very interesting article in Maclean's magazine by Vilhjalmur Stefansson in which he had this to say:

> As far as reindeer are concerned the United States department of agriculture estimated some years ago that Alaska could permanently support about 4 million head without overgrazing. Since Canada has about ten times as much permanent grazing land, I consider that it could support a reindeer industry of 40 million head, which in terms of pounds of meat is equivalent to about 80 million sheep.

The muskox, whose feeding habits are even better suited to the north than the reindeer, could do far better. I estimate that Canada's north could maintain a hundred million muskox, which is the equivalent of 400 million sheep. What such a vast industry would do for Canada, and what such supplies of food might do to assist in other developments of the north such as mining and oil, I leave to your imagination.

In the intervening years there have been great developments in the north, more particularly in the opening up of the D.E.W. line and the mid-Canada line, and I think it would be very helpful if the minister would bring the committee up to date with regard to these two situations involving the muskox and reindeer herds.

Mr. Lesage: As members of the committee will know, the muskox is a wild animal. I made a report on muskox two years ago when my estimates were before the house, but it is difficult to know what the numbers are. It is believed that the number has increased, but certainly not to a sufficient extent to allow us to do away with the regulation forbidding completely the killing, hunting or molesting of muskox.

As to the reindeer, I have to say that our experience in the last 20 years has not always been very satisfactory, and I have to admit that in the last year it has been very disappointing indeed. We have always had some trouble in making herders out of the Eskimos, who are natural hunters, but with the jobs available at Aklavik and on the D.E.W. line where a good number of Eskimos are employed it has become even more difficult to interest Eskimos in being herders. But that is not the only disappointment. There is worse than that. The original herd of about 2,300 deer 20 years ago has increased to 6,500 this year but the figure of 6,500 is a decrease from last year.

The losses have been heavy this year. The causes of the losses have been straying, predation, poaching, sickness and injury. A disease of the bones has developed which weakens the spine and has caused the loss of a good number of reindeer. We are trying our best to find something that we can add to the diet of the reindeer to prevent that weakness of the bones. Studies are being made to determine the cause of the weakness and, as I said, we are trying to find what supplementary fodder, mineral salt or other thing we can use to prevent the generalization of the disease.

Reindeer herding has not been easy anyway. In Alaska, as the hon. member knows, they have had serious losses. However, I am really confident that our scientists will find what supplementary food or diet has to be given to these animals so that they can continue to grow in numbers. After all, the meat of these herds is the only meat the people of Aklavik and the Arctic coast and especially the people of the delta of the Mackenzie can get except that when there is a real scarcity we fly in buffalo meat from Wood Buffalo park.

Mr. Green: Are they having some trouble in Alaska with the reindeer?

Mr. Lesage: There are very few. They have declined at a terrific pace. In one year—I do not remember which one—I believe they came close to disappearing completely.

Mr. Green: What about caribou herds?

Mr. Lesage: The story is not any more encouraging. This is quite a serious problem for the natives, this depleting of the caribou reserves. According to a survey which was made in 1950, in the Northwest Territories there were approximately 670,000 head of caribou. According to the survey of last year—that is in 1955—the number was approximately 300,000 which is less than half. That decrease occurred in five years. Caribou is a major source of meat for the Indians of the Mackenzie valley and for the Eskimos of the Keewatin district. This decline we consider is most serious. The causes of it appear to be predation, human utilization, forest fires, unfavourable weather and the parasites. Since last year, we had a very good discussion on that subject, or rather I should say that there has been discussion. I was not there. My deputy as commissioner of the Northwest Territories had with the members of the territorial council a very full discussion of what should and could be done in the way of conservation in order to try to increase the herds of caribou and bring them back to the numbers that we used to have. It was felt that we should increase our predator control, something which has been done all over the territories. By the known means of wolf traps and poisoning we have taken a much greater number of wolves this winter than ever in the past and we hope that this control will help somewhat to bring back the herds of caribou to what they were.

Another thing that we have done is steadily to increase our educational program among the natives with respect to conservation. I have here in my hand a booklet which is written in Eskimo and which has been widely distributed. It teaches the Eskimos in a simple manner the rules of conservation and what they should do. It tells them not to kill more than they need, and not to leave any meat around as they used to do in the past when the caribou were plentiful. We are really doing our best. By all known means we have sought to teach the Indians and the Eskimos the rules of conservation in the case of caribou.

Finally, in the north and here in Ottawa we have formed technical and administrative committees. We have formed those committees with representatives of the federal and provincial governments, because some of the caribou come down below the 60th parallel into Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The provincial governments have been very co-operative. At this time I wish to express my appreciation of that co-operation. In a few words I would sum up the situation in this way. As far as reindeer are concerned, the situation is disappointing. As far as caribou are concerned, it is more than disappointing. But, with the measures we are taking, we hope that we can overcome these difficulties and bring the herds back to what they were.

Mr. Green: The minister said there now were about 6,500 reindeer?

Mr. Lesage: About 6,500.

Mr. Green: The figure on December 10, 1953, was 7,730.

Mr. Lesage: That is right. That has been the loss in the two years. Only last year the loss was 1,130, as a matter of fact. I do not want to be too exact. Let us say it was around 1,100. One must take into account the fact that in the last 20 years we have slaughtered about 11,000 head for human consumption.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I understand this service functions somewhat in the backwaters of the department's activities, at least so far as the public is concerned. It is a very important service, but I am quite sure that its good work is not recognized as widely as it should be recognized. I understand that the minister's department in, let us say, the water resources branch in recent years have got into the very good habit of having special conferences on a particular problem, and that possibly the same thing occurs in the forestry branch and in the national parks branch.

Wildlife is a very important thing to consider in any development in this country, whether of water resources, forest resources or of park areas. What I am wondering is this. Is it the practice of the minister to have the senior officials of the wildlife service present when a conference is being held to make decisions with respect to any forest development or water development in this country? I think it is a most necessary thing that all these various activities within the minister's department be correlated and that every consideration be given to every aspect of a problem before a final decision is made. I just ask the minister this question. Is it the practice to have the wildlife service represented at conferences making decisions on the development of water resources?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, we in the department do not take decisions on the development of water resources in the provinces. We make the study, but the decision as to where and when a water resource is going to be developed is something that is up to the provinces. This is not our field. I do not agree with the hon. member when he says that the wildlife division in the department is nothing but a backwater in the department.

Mr. Herridge: I did not go as far as that, Mr. Chairman; I said that it functions somewhat in the backwaters—

Mr. Lesage: Then let us say "somewhat".

Mr. Herridge: —in the public mind.

Mr. Lesage: Oh, in the public mind. I was going to say that in the figures in the estimates that I have in front of me, the total estimates for the wildlife division in 1943-44 were $46,000. This year the total estimates are $472,000.

Mr. Herridge: I am highly pleased to see that, Mr. Chairman. But just to follow the matter up, may I say this. I understand that—in fact I should say that I know it—the minister's department does not make decisions. However, it does discuss possibilities. Obviously the minister's officials came to a definite conclusion as to the propriety of a certain development in British Columbia. But while his department does not make decisions, I think it would be a good idea to have the practice of this department meeting in conference so that all aspects of the problem would be considered when they were even possibly making recommendations or coming to conclusions among themselves.

Mr. Lesage: I am not sure that the hon. member realizes that we have no wildlife officers in British Columbia other than those connected with the administration of Migratory Birds Convention Act. In British Columbia wildlife is a provincial responsibility. It is a provincial responsibility, as are waterpower development and forestry. Our wildlife people co-operate with the provinces. They also have to look after the migratory birds convention application in Canada and they have to deal with wildlife in the territories which are ours north of the 60th parallel—that is in the Yukon and Northwest Territories—and also in the national parks.

But the problems of wildlife in the provinces are a provincial responsibility. However, I may say that whenever we have to take a decision which is our decision and which could affect wildlife, of course Mr. Mair, the chief of the wildlife division and his associates are consulted by us, that is by the various branches of the department including the forestry branch, the water resources branch and the deputy minister's office. This applies whenever we have to take a decision on something that could affect wildlife anywhere in Canada.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to follow that up with an illustration where one of the ministers' officials did perform a very useful service two or three years ago. There was an application before the international joint commission to drain what was known as Duck lake for agricultural purposes. It was the evidence, I think, of the department's chief wildlife officer at that time and his obvious mastery of the situation that obviously had some influence on the decision of the international joint commission—that was in British Columbia—in regard to the wildlife and in relation to the interference with a water resource in the province. We appreciated that very much indeed.

Mr. Brooks: I was very much interested in hearing the minister say, in connection with the conservation of wildlife, that his department worked in conjunction with the provinces. I think that is quite understandable because wildlife does not recognize provincial boundaries.

Mr. Lesage: Not even international boundaries.

Mr. Brooks: Nor international boundaries. He mentioned the parasite infection of the caribou. In my province we are very much interested, for instance, in the moose herds, and I was wondering what success his department was having in dealing with this parasite infestation of the caribou and whether they found that the moose herds in the northern part of this country were being depleted on account of parasites. I am wondering whether the provinces and his department are working in conjunction in research, for instance, that might deal with this very serious problem, because the moose herds are being wiped out, except in Saskatchewan, where I understand they have opened the season after a good many years of closing. Could the minister give us some idea of what is being done?

Mr. Lesage: I shall be very frank and I shall read the note I have here. I am no expert either on parasites or wildlife, and I do not believe I could be expected to do more than offer the information I have here. Parasites may have an adverse effect on caribou population, but the information available is insufficient to make definite statements.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister what research is being carried out by his department?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Mair, who is the chief of the wildlife division, says that it is a continuing research program by the Canadian wildlife service and that some research is also done in various provinces and there is constant exchange of information between the provincial and federal authorities in this matter. As a matter of fact, I know that in the domain of wildlife the co-operation between the Canadian wildlife service and the wildlife services of the various provinces is very close indeed. Every year there is a federal-provincial gathering of the experts on wildlife, and every year also there is a North American convention. I had the pleasure and advantage of attending one in Chicago. Very serious work is done at these conferences. All the information that is obtained in the United States by the federal officials and state officials and in Canada by the federal officials and provincial officials is freely exchanged all over North America.

Mr. Brooks: Might I ask, with what success?

Mr. Lesage: With whatever amount of success the human mind can attain in such matters. Of course, being human, we cannot say that we know everything about wildlife and how to conserve our resources of wildlife. We know a good many rules. We have a good many basic data. Research is going on all the time, and this research is producing results, but man has never attained perfection, and I am sure that until the end of the world we will learn more and more every day in the field of wildlife as in the field of philosophy and the sciences.

Mr. Brooks: That is not much encouragment.

Mr. Campbell: When this item was discussed last year I had something I wished to say but I happened to be absent from the house and missed the opportunity. However, the member for Kootenay West brought up the subject to which I now wish to refer for a few moments, that is, the question of man's inhumanity to wild life. I refer to the method that we have used for many years to trap our fur-bearing animals.

I do not think that many people other than those who are actually doing the trapping realize the terrible torture that is inflicted on our fur-bearing animals when they are caught in steel traps. As you know, the trapping is all done during the cold winter months, and when an animal is caught it may not die for a matter of days. It will slowly starve to death, and there is a long story that I cannot go into at this time, telling of this terrible suffering that they put up with. There are millions of these animals killed by the use of traps every year, and, if all their suffering could be added up, people would be so incensed that something would be done to put a stop to it.

One of the big problems has been to find some method of getting these animals and getting their furs in a more humane manner. After the hon. member for Kootenay West spoke last year, I said that his speech was an effective speech, and it was so much so that he received a very interesting letter from the minister, who showed his interest in this matter. I want to quote from that letter:

> From time to time we have received representations against the use of steel traps from humane societies and other organizations. The problem is a difficult one and so far it has not been possible to do away with the use of steel traps, not because of any lack of sympathy with the aim of avoiding unnecessary cruelty, but because no practical solution to the problem has been found. As you pointed out in your remarks, "it is not so easy to find a replacement as one might imagine if one has had no experience in that line."
> For many years efforts have been made by a number of societies in Canada and the United States toward more humane practices in trapping and prizes have been offered for the invention of improved traps. There has been little progress in this direction, usually the attempted improvement has been found to be considerably less efficient, difficult to use or much more costly to manufacture. Those interested in the fur trade have also tried to evolve more humane and more efficient equipment. No practical alternative for the steel trap has yet been produced in Canada and its use, therefore, continues to be general throughout the country. I might add that a Mr. Frank Conibear, a former resident and trapper in the Northwest Territories for many years, has been experimenting with an improved type of trap, which he claims would be more humane and more efficient. We have asked the warden service in the Northwest Territories to assist in arranging and assessing field tests of Mr. Conibear's trap . . .
> This department is in complete sympathy with the views which you have expressed. I hope that a trap can be found which fulfills, as far as possible, the requirement for humane treatment of animals and which, at the same time, meets the needs of those who must follow the trapline for a living. Difficulties can be expected in getting the trappers, particularly the natives, to adopt any trap which is either inefficient, cumbersome or difficult to use. For that reason, I am glad to know that other types of traps have been found satisfactory in the Scandinavian countries and Germany. We will pursue the matter and I am grateful to Mr. Campbell and yourself for bringing this information to my attention.

The minister speaks there of the efforts that have been made by Mr. Conibear to develop a more humane trap. I have a news letter which was sent out by the Association for the Protection of Fur-bearing Animals.

This is an organization with headquarters in Vancouver. They talk about this new trap that Mr. Conibear has developed and they say:

> There have been setbacks encountered in the past months. First, there was some unavoidable delay in having the traps ready in time, and, on account of the abnormally early winter, this meant that some of the trappers who had promised to try out the traps had to leave for the hills before the traps could reach them, and so they are unable to test them this winter. Mr. Collier, who is president of the B.C. registered trappers association, has now taken all the traps himself, and he and his son are working with them this season. First reports were disappointing on account of some trouble with the trigger, which made the traps hard to set in zero weather. Now, however, adjustments have been made and the last lot of traps have gone out with an improved trigger which has proved entirely satisfactory. The last report we had from Mr. Collier was extremely hopeful.

Then they go and report later that the traps have been proving very successful. I could take a lot of time to give a complete report to the committee on the traps up to date, but I do not want to do that this afternoon. The last thing that is written in this report is that Mr. Collier has been successful in getting mink and many other kinds of animals, but he still has to test for beaver.

I am wondering whether the minister has any knowledge of what has been going on in this sort of experimentation? I would suggest to him that if this new trap proves to be a success he might institute a program somewhat similar to the program that has been used in the province of Quebec in the changing of sap buckets. We all know that the sap producers in the province of Quebec receive some help in exchanging their old sap buckets for a newer kind. I was hoping that if this trap proves to be a success the minister might develop some kind of a scheme whereby the trappers could get some assistance in making the change so that it would not be too hard on them. I would be interested to hear the minister's comment and whether he has any further information regarding this trap or not.

Mr. Lesage: Here is the up-to-date information I have on this new trap:

> Arrangements were made for the warden service in the territories to assist in arranging and assessing field tests of Mr. Conibear's trap. Mr. Conibear had also arranged for field tests to be conducted in British Columbia, Ontario, and some of the states of the United States of America. Reports received from Fort Simpson and Wood Buffalo park were very favourable concerning the use of Mr. Conibear's trap which the trappers agreed killed the animals immediately, but, an adverse report was received from Aklavik. British Columbia also reported quite favourably on the use of this trap but in all instances it was suggested that further tests be held this coming winter with many more traps of varying sizes. Mr. Conibear has agreed to furnish sufficient traps of different sizes for use next winter on all species of fur-bearing animals and the results of these tests should prove conclusively whether or not Mr. Conibear has succeeded in producing a more humane type of trap which could be adopted generally.

Mr. Harkness: Since the reindeer question has come up, may I ask the minister whether the cost of the reindeer program is paid out of this vote or whether it is not paid out of the Northwest Territories vote?

Mr. Lesage: It is paid out of the northern administration vote, but the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra suggested that he speak about it on this vote and I agreed.

Mr. Harkness: I just want to clarify out of what vote it is paid. What has been the cost of that program?

Mr. Lesage: A little over $1 million.

Mr. Charlton: Reference has been made to the diseased condition of reindeer and other wildlife in the north. Can the minister tell me what departments are co-operating with his department on this program? Is he making use of the available services of other departments to help along this line?

Mr. Lesage: The Department of Agriculture and the department of health and welfare.

Item agreed to.

Water resources branch—

Water resources branch, including federal share of expenses of the Lake of the Woods control board—

302. Administration, operation and maintenance, including grant of $350 to the international executive council, world power conference, $838,204.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I am going to try an innovation this afternoon and speed up proceedings by making two speeches at once. I am speaking in my own behalf and in behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Perth, who is in the banking and commerce committee, but we both have the same problem. I imagine the minister is well aware of what it is. It is the completion of the works of the upper Thames river conservation authority. I have a number of briefs before me on the desk. I know the minister has received them and I do not intend to go into them any further. The minister is probably well aware, or much better aware of what is in them than I am. But I should like to urge upon the minister that he do his very best to persuade his colleagues on the treasury benches to put up the money to complete this project.

As I understand it, the water conservation and flood control—although the water conservation aspect is the aspect that concerns us in this house—works on the Thames river are intended to serve as a sort of prototype for similar works on other rivers. We all know that in this country at the present time, particularly in heavily populated rural and industrial areas such as southern Ontario, the water problem has become a very big thing indeed. Rivers are being drained for irrigation, and during the summer—I grant you, probably not as much this summer as in others as we have had an unusual amount of rainfall this year—water supplies in urban areas which have greatly increased in population have become a very serious problem. I know in southern Ontario it is almost certain that water will have to be piped in from the great lakes to the inland industrial cities such as Kitchener, London, Quelph, and so on.

Mr. Hosking: Not Guelph; we have all kinds of water in Guelph. We do not want any industries that are thinking of coming to Guelph to believe that there is not plenty of water there for them. There is plenty there.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am glad to hear the hon. member for Wellington South say that he has such an adequate supply of water, and that they will not have the problem that other cities have. I was just using his city an as example. I believe his city must be the only one so situated, with the possible exception of my own.

The water problem is a very large problem in southern Ontario, and the minister and officials of his department are well aware of it. Certain works have, of course, been completed on the Thames valley project, such as the Fanshawe dam near London and the channel improvement scheme near Ingersoll, Ontario. But really, if this very extensive water conservation project is to work, all the dams and other projects must be completed to find out. If it works as well as I believe it is expected it will, then similar projects no doubt will be instituted in other parts of the country that have the same problem. To complete the work on the upper Thames valley authority, the following dams are required to be completed: Glengowan dam and reservoir; Wildwood dam and reservoir; Thamesford dam and reservoir; Woodstock dam and reservoir; Cedar Creek dam and reservoir; St. Marys channel improvement scheme; Mitchell channel improvement scheme. Everybody in this part of the country, of course, is greatly interested in having this project completed.

I should like to bring to the minister's attention a resolution which was adopted by the corporation of the city of London and endorsed by the Woodstock city council. It reads as follows:

Whereas the watershed of the Thames river on March 7 and 8, 1956, received a very heavy rainfall averaging 1½ inches over the watershed;

And whereas the south and middle branches of the Thames river were at high flood stage and the south branch threatened to inundate several low-lying areas in the city of London;

And whereas flooding of the south branch was only avoided by storing approximately 20 feet of water at Fanshawe for a period of 24 hours, thus enabling the south branch to empty more rapidly;

And whereas the volume of water in the southern part of the watershed could not have been handled if a heavier rainfall had occurred in the northern portion or more rapid run-off had occurred and heavy flooding in the London area could not have been avoided;

And whereas the only remedy for this situation lies in the construction of further dams at Wildwood, Glengowan, Thamesford, Woodstock and Cedar Creek as well as channel widening and improvement works, all as referred to in the brief of the authority submitted to the minister of planning and development (Ontario) and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Canada) on or about January 31, 1956, and as planned in the initial program for control of flooding in the Upper Thames watershed;

Therefore be it resolved that an immediate and urgent plea be lodged with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources for the assumption by the dominion government of 50 per cent of 75 per cent of the cost of the said projects; it being pointed out that the provincial government, through the minister of planning and development has already undertaken to assume its 50 per cent share of the share of the said 75 per cent of the cost of the enumerated works; and that the assistance of the minister of planning and development for the province of Ontario be sought in pressing for immediate and favourable action by the dominion authorities;"

Damage caused by flooding of properties in the Cedar Creek watershed in Woodstock is in the thousands of dollars. We believe the need to proceed with this work now is most urgent. Your earnest consideration is requested.

Yours very truly,
R. G. Given,
City Clerk.

No doubt the minister has had other representations made to him but I am making this one now. I do not want to extend my remarks any further than necessary but I would like to refer the minister briefly to one or two items in the last brief that was presented to him. I have in my hand a brief sent to the minister on February 12, 1955.

The subject of flood control is of vital importance although it is not of direct concern to this house because it is a provincial matter; but the conservation of water is of importance, too, and it is of direct concern to us.

It is intimated in the last brief sent to the minister by the Upper Thames Conservation authority that if the dams I mentioned were constructed the value of the water that would be conserved would be approximately $70,000 annually.

I would very much like to refer to page 5 of this brief sent to the minister last February. I will not read the brief but will merely paraphrase it. It points out that the conservation of water in these areas, created by the dams which we hope will be constructed, will raise the level of the watershed all through the southern part of the province, will prevent wells from drying up and will prevent the turbidity of water—I think is the term used—that is, water that has to be processed for drinking purposes in the urban areas, and will in general relieve the acute water situation which has developed as a result of the greatly increased population and the increased industrial use of water.

I say that this problem is acute in most parts of southern Ontario but I am delighted to hear it is no problem in Guelph.

In conclusion I again urge upon the minister that he do his very best to complete this project as soon as convenient. It certainly would be most interesting to see if the whole project, from the water conservation point of view, works out as is hoped; and, if so, other parts of the country can gain from the experience gathered in the building of this prototype conservation project.

Item agreed to.

304. To provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $465,010.

Mr. Fulton: On this item, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if he would give us some information regarding the proposed inter-governmental meeting between representatives of this government and the government of the United States at which, as the Prime Minister informed us earlier in the session, it is expected that the matter of the Columbia river basin will be discussed.

As I understand it, the reason why this inter-governmental conference will be discussing this matter is because it is considered at the present time that something of an impasse has been reached in the international joint commission. That is to say, the views held by the Canadian section and the United States section do not appear to be capable of reconciliation with reference to the particular subject of the possible diversion of the Columbia river or a substantial part of it through a tunnel below the Mica Creek dam or from a point between the Mica Creek dam and Revelstoke and thus down the Fraser river system.

I should like to know just what importance the government of Canada attaches to that diversion, not to our right to make it but to the diversion itself, because recently there have been so many conflicting statements as to whether it would ever be possible to construct power dams on the Thompson and Fraser rivers down which those diverted waters would flow without irreparable damage to the fisheries interests. I think we should know now whether the view of the government is that those interests can be reconciled.

The minister was kind enough to give me an interview earlier this session which I would only refer to in general terms. As a result of that interview, however, and as a result of what has already appeared in the press, it is obvious that the fisheries interests up to date, so far as my information goes, are unalterably opposed to the erection of power dams on the Fraser river below Lytton and on the Thompson river between the outlet of Kamloops lake and its junction with the Fraser at Lytton, whereas the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources under the direction of the minister has extended something in the neighbourhood of a quarter of a million dollars to study the power potential of that system in the light of the proposed Columbia diversion.

Mr. Lesage: Not only that; not only the power potential. The contract we have given to B.C. Engineering is to make a complete survey as to the economic feasibility of the diversion, and I have not yet received a report

Mr. Fulton: No. I have a copy of the contract with the British Columbia Engineering Corporation dated June 14, 1955 and the contract price is shown as $241,000.

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: The point I am most concerned with is whether there is any possibility of reconciliation, because up to date the fisheries have been saying, "No dams"; they have been saying they will never agree to the construction of dams on the Columbia and Fraser rivers because they say it cannot be done without irreparable damage to the fisheries interest.

Mr. Lesage: The matter is presently under scientific study, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Fulton: I know it is under scientific study, but statements have been made that those concerned are not now contemplating the erection of power dams on those rivers for that reason. I have seen those statements. The government of the province of British Columbia has taken the position, publicly at any rate, that at the present time it is opposed to the erection of these dams. I should like to know just what is the position so far as the two departments of this government are concerned.

Then I should like to know also the stand this government intends to take at the intergovernmental conference with United States representatives. As the committee knows, the United States has expressed the gravest concern at the possibility of Canada diverting a very substantial portion of the waters of the Columbia down the Thompson and Fraser river systems. General McNaughton has rendered a most outstanding service to this country in the skilful and comprehensive manner in which he has developed Canada's case and placed it before the international joint commission, resting it on the provisions of the international boundary waters treaty and completing it to the point where it is established clearly and absolutely that Canada has the undeniable right to divert these waters within our territory.

That being the position we have taken, then what is the purpose of the inter-governmental discussion? I think the committee is entitled to have from the minister assurance as to the position he intends to take. I hope and I imagine and I expect that it will be that Canada intends to give up nothing, to make no concessions which will in any way jeopardize our right to make this diversion. It has occurred to me that one of the things which should be mentioned in the course of these discussions with the United States—I suppose this must have occurred to those concerned but I have not seen it mentioned very prominently anywhere—is that the United States without any discussion or consent on the part of Canada so obstructed the Columbia river by their dams that they ruined that fishery. We have been most careful to conserve the Fraser system fisheries and to rehabilitate them to the point where they are now most valuable assets, the proceeds of which the United States share to a considerable extent.

I think that that must be borne in mind should any discussion arise as to intransigence or lack of co-operation or unilateral action on the part of the two governments. It is my view that if there has been such intransigence or lack of co-operation it has lain pretty well exclusively in the past on the side of the United States and not on the side of Canada.

I should like to have from the minister the assurance that the studies being carried on by the British Columbia engineering corporation on the Thompson in connection with this diversion and in connection with the power sites on the Thompson and Fraser are being carried on in a realistic manner. I should like to know what additional funds if any are being provided in order to expedite research into the problem of getting spawning fish up and fingerlings down, over or around power dams. In my view there has not been anything like sufficient energy and funds expended on this most important research.

Secondly, I should like to hear when it is expected that the survey with regard to power being carried on by that engineering corporation will be concluded. Thirdly, I should like to hear, and I hope in considerable detail, just what position this government is going to take in the conference with the United States government on this particular subject.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kamloops has touched upon one of the most important matters, if not the most important, which I and my associates in the department will have to deal with in the next few months. It is most important, not only for British Columbia but for the whole of Canada because other provinces have rivers which cross the boundary. I agree that the international rivers in British Columbia have the greatest power potential. I can well understand the concern of the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Kootenay West and the hon. member for Kootenay East over the development of the Columbia river, and we should not forget the Yukon river as well.

I understand their concern and I share that concern with them. Dealing with the Columbia, with which the hon. member has dealt, I want to see the optimum economic development of that river in the national interest of Canada and of the province of British Columbia. The hon. member for Kamloops has asked me what importance we attach to the right to divert the waters of the Columbia river to the Fraser river and what importance we attach to the fact of the diversion itself.

As to the right of diversion, we have contended and I contend this afternoon, along with General McNaughton, for whom I think everyone here has such respect, that we have a complete right to divert under article 2 of the treaty of 1909. I believe we have the right to make that diversion if it is economically feasible to do so.

Then the question is asked whether we attach much importance to the diversion itself. We do attach great importance to it if it is in the interest of Canada, if it is economically feasible, and if it is proved that there is no other way of proceeding which would bring better results and greater benefits. I believe that is quite clear.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The hon. member wishes to know whether in the view of the government the fish and power interests can be reconciled. In the over-all study of the possibilities of the diversion the cost of the diversion is a factor, the amount of power which can be developed is a factor, the disruption of certain essential services along the Fraser is a factor, and of course the fisheries are a primary factor. But it is a factor which has to be taken into account in the over-all study of the economic feasibility of the diversion, and that is why this report on fisheries was made, for the benefit of those who make the study on the economic feasibility of a diversion. I do not remember the exact wording in the report that I see the hon. member for Kamloops has in his hands now, but it is said, I believe, that at the present time it would be difficult, if not impossible, to have a series of dams on the Fraser without killing the fisheries. But that is not necessarily the final word, and evidence of that can be found in the fact that some studies are going on at the University of British Columbia and that studies are being made constantly and continually in the Department of Fisheries on the possibility of having the fingerlings and other fish go over the dams.

As we say in French it is a vérité de La Palice, that science is improving all the time, and it may very well be that in the very near future some ways and means will be found of overcoming these difficulties. Why should we discard these possibilities? I believe that no possibility should be discarded. We talk about the differences in views and the differences between the fisheries and the power interests. Of course there are differences between the fish and the power interests, and of course we hope it may be possible to reconcile them if we study more deeply the problem that is presented. But to say immediately that we should stop any economic study of the diversion because at the present time we do not have sufficient scientific knowledge of how to cope with the fisheries problem is, I believe, not reasonable.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I believe so too, and I hope the minister is not suggesting that we are saying anything different. It is his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, who has been saying it.

Mr. Lesage: I do not agree with the hon. member that the Minister of Fisheries has said that at no time could there be any reconciliation. I do not agree with the hon. member. The Minister of Fisheries has not said that.

Mr. Fulton: May I refer to page 43 of the report where I find the following:

> Since one of the alternate routes for diverting Columbia river water into Shuswap lake is by way of the Seymour river it can be stated that the environmental change in the spawning and incubation area will be so severe that the existing run of sockeye will be exterminated.

That deals only with one particular part of—

Mr. Lesage: That only deals with one way of developing the Fraser, by ten dams. There may be all kinds of other ways which no doubt will be visualized in the report we expect from the B. C. Engineering Corporation. No, there is no final impossibility of reconciliation, and I am sure that the Minister of Fisheries would agree with what I say now. There is no insurmountable difficulty that I can foresee.

Finally, the hon. member for Kamloops asked me what stand we intend to take in our negotiations with the United States in the matter of rivers crossing the international boundary. In answer I have to put a question to the hon. member. I do not know if he is a poker player. I have played quite a bit in my life but never with my hand face up on the table.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister has already answered the question in part and to that extent has put his hand face up on the table. I do not think it will weaken his bargaining position because he has told us that we take the stand most definitely that we have the right to make this diversion. He has indicated that we are not going to depart from that position. I suppose if it comes to the point where the United States is going to make us some offer in terms of return of power if we will abandon not the right to do it but indicate that we do not intend to exercise that right, it then becomes a question of negotiation. But I cannot at the moment foresee any return or promise they could make to us, in the light of our present limited knowledge of the potentialities of that diversion, which we would be justified in accepting as full compensation not only for now but for the future for what might be the potentialities to us of our development of the Columbia river. Therefore my view at present would be, and I urge this upon the minister—perhaps it will strengthen his hand when it is dealt—that because of the lack of definite knowledge of what this might mean to Canada when this potential is developed there should be no concession made to the United States. I do not think we are in a position to know what we would be giving up if we agreed now to give up anything in terms of potential development.

I do not see how the minister can take any other position and in fact protect Canada's rights, as he has said he is concerned to do, and as I know he is concerned to do. Therefore I do not see that there is much bargaining that can actually be done. I think we have to say something to them to this effect: You can rely on us, whenever and however we exercise our rights, to exercise them first from the point of view of Canada's interests as the paramount consideration but then to exercise them, of course, in such a manner that they will inflict the least possible damage or disadvantage upon you, and that we will at all times be ready to discuss modifications of our plans whenever the time comes to implement them.

I do not think we can go any farther than that at the present time because I believe we might be placing ourselves in the position where we did not think we would be giving up anything of real value but might find in 10 or 15 years that we had parted with an interest or a right or an opportunity which in the intervening years had become most valuable, valuable beyond anything that we think at present it would represent.

As to the fisheries, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear what the minister said with regard to his colleague and the Department of Fisheries because it certainly has seemed to me in the past, and I have come to this conclusion in part on the basis of the report which I hold in my hand entitled A Report on the Fish Facilities and Fisheries Problems Related to the Fraser and Thompson River Dam Site Investigations, that the official attitude of the Department of Fisheries was that they were opposed now and for all time not only to discussion of the idea of a diversion but to any further studies and investigations of it. I think the minister would agree with me on reflection that the conclusion to be drawn from a reading of this report in its literal sense is that it is the official view of the Department of Fisheries—

Mr. Lesage: That is a conclusion.

Mr. Fulton: —that there can be no reconciliation.

Mr. Lesage: That is the conclusion that you are drawing.

Mr. Fulton: I say based on the reading of this report and the various sentences, paragraphs and summaries that are contained in it. If the minister tells me that in fact this report is merely a cautionary statement, all right, I hope he is right. I assume if he says so that he bases it on discussions with his colleague and discussions among the departmental officials. I hope he will insist that that is the proper course to follow. To talk in terms of the impossibility of the reconciliation of the interests of fisheries and power would to my mind result in an inevitable and sharp conflict with, I think, only one conclusion, however regrettable that would be, namely that power would win. If there were the creation of a spirit of conflict, I believe the result would be that fisheries would be swept aside and really damaged, and perhaps eliminated.

It is therefore essential that there be co-operation. With the minister I believe that if there is co-operation and effort, and above all effort and work, some way can be devised of having both power and fisheries, and in that way the interests of the two can be reconciled. But without such co-operation, and if any more statements like these are made and public opinion is aroused on one side or the other, it may become impossible to reconcile the two. The public demand for an immediate start on projects for power may be such that, as I say, fisheries will be brushed aside, and that would be a very disastrous development.

The minister mentioned the question of research. Research is being carried on at the University of British Columbia, but the bulk of the contribution is made by private industry. Research is being carried on in the fisheries department.

Mr. Lesage: Private industry has the contract.

Mr. Fulton: Yes. I do not want to get into a discussion of the fisheries estimates—

Mr. Lesage: Please don't do that.

Mr. Fulton: —but I may say I do not believe that anything like the effort that is necessary for the solution of this problem is being made in that department.

Mr. Lesage: Tell my colleague that.

Mr. Fulton: I shall do that. What is the minister's department doing in addition to that study which is, after all, a ground survey as well as what I might call a scientific or research study? What funds is this department making available for specific research into the question of how you are to get these fish and fingerlings up and down the river past these power dams?

Mr. Lesage: That is the responsibility of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Fulton: I am not sure that it is.

Mr. Lesage: I am seeking your advice.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know that that is a sound attitude. Let us be serious.

Mr. Lesage: I am being serious. I am listening to the hon. member.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: I have just said—and I understood from the minister's expression that he agreed with me—that what you need here is co-operation, not conflict.

Mr. Lesage: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: I know you must not have duplication. But if there is some doubt—and I have some—that the fisheries interests are getting on with this problem of research to the extent that they might or should, why does not the department here, which has a tremendous stake in power, say this: "All right; we will pursue some studies of our own, or if we cannot do it on our own we will make funds and facilities available for other research"?

While I think the British Columbia Power Corporation, which has a very direct interest in this whole development, is to be commended for the money it has made available to the University of British Columbia for the study, I do not think the industry which has such a great stake in the matter has gone any too far. I believe the sum was $50,000. I do not think that is in any way out of proportion on the plus side having regard to the interest which the company has in the problem. I think the fishing industry as well as the department, those interested in power development and government have an obligation to get on with this job of research into the reconciliation of these otherwise conflicting interests.

I should like to hear from the minister also whether, in his discussions with the premier of British Columbia which took place recently, any consideration was given to the setting up of a joint development authority for the Columbia river basin; whether the problem of who is to build the dam at Mica creek was discussed; and whether any mutually acceptable approach was worked out to the question of who will generate the power and where the power will be made available.

There is danger of another conflict of interests. Already the minister's colleague, namely the Minister of Fisheries, has said that he hopes all the power to be developed at Mica creek will be reserved for Vancouver and the lower mainland area. I do not know that it is altogether a proper thing for a federal minister to be saying to which part of a province power will be allocated. The interior of our province, which is rapidly developing—in the Kootenay area where the dam is to be situated and in my own part of the interior—has an industrial potential which most definitely will be in need of power.

I hope we are not going to have a situation where a federal minister is taking the position that only one area of British Columbia should be served by this tremendous project which is actually situated in the other area. It is another case where I think there should be consultation and co-operation, rather than that ministers should be rushing out and taking sides in a conflict over a development that has not even taken place. But since those statements have been made by the Minister of Fisheries I should like the minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to tell us whether there were discussions with Mr. Bennett on the mutual development of this project, and as to whether there will be any mutual sharing of responsibility in the allocation of the results.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I do not know what declarations the Minister of Fisheries might have made as a citizen of British Columbia, but there is one thing that is sure. The only interest of this government as a government in this matter, and of myself, is to see to it that Canada gets the greatest amount of power possible from the development of the Columbia river. As far as the distribution of the power in the province of British Columbia is concerned, that is a matter exclusively under provincial jurisdiction; and I am not going to tell the premier of British Columbia how he should distribute the power in his own province. That is none of my business.

Mr. Fulton: Will you suggest to your colleague that he refrain from making these statements?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, my colleague is a citizen of British Columbia and I suppose he has a right to express his opinion on provincial matters in British Columbia if he wishes to do so. I have expressed my opinion on Quebec matters, and I do not see why I should be prevented from doing so. Consequently, I do not see why the Minister of Fisheries, as a citizen of British Columbia, should be prevented from giving his own opinion on provincial matters in British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Fisheries might not have any greater success.

Mr. Lesage: The provincial government is the provincial government, and I for one am not going to tell Premier Bennett how he should run his own business and how he should distribute the power in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: The question was this. Were there discussions between the minister and the premier of British Columbia—

Mr. Lesage: Surely there were.

Mr. Fulton: —as to the co-operative steps that might be taken to further this development, not only with respect to the construction of the dam but with respect to the installation of power machinery? I am glad to have the minister's assurance, but I find it the more acceptable in that it seems to run counter to the attitude of his colleague the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Lesage: Oh, no. I met Mr. Bennett on July 4 in Victoria. After our meeting we issued a press release. As I said in the house on my return, we both agreed that we would not add one thing to that published statement. As I have pledged my word, I must keep it.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, as one member who quite frankly will be glad to complete the business by the end of next week, I am going to be as brief as possible. But this is an important matter to my constituents.

I was very pleased to hear the minister reaffirm the government's decision to keep Canada's interests to the fore in the development of the Columbia. In that connection in view of the government's attitude and the attitude of the minister, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and of General McNaughton, chairman of the international joint commission, with respect to the former proposal for the development of the Columbia, I think we can have every confidence as to the outcome of the discussions between the representatives of Canada and the United States.

I want to support what the hon. member for Kamloops said in respect to the considerable concern existing in the interior as to the possibility of this power being developed on the Columbia and being sent to the mainland area. We stand firm in the belief that the Kootenay's needs for power must be recognized, must be met and must be protected, but I think the minister is quite correct in saying that it is a subject that is under provincial jurisdiction, and so we shall have to keep our watchful eye on Mr. Bennett.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister two questions in connection with this item? What is the position with regard to the proposed diversion of the upper waters of the Kootenay river into the headwaters of the Columbia river at Columbia lake? He has dealt this afternoon with the suggestion that there might be a diversion from the Columbia river to the Fraser river system, but I do not think he said anything about this other diversion in east Kootenay. Perhaps he might answer that question first.

Mr. Lesage: This is a possibility which is under study, with the whole question of the development of the Columbia river, by the international joint commission and by our engineers.

Mr. Green: Is that proposed diversion actually being studied this year, or has it been given up?

Mr. Lesage: No, it is a part of the over-all study. We have not had the final report on the whole basin of the Columbia river. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra might be interested to know how the studies are proceeding and how far we have reached, if I could give him the figures:

The mapping is 100 per cent completed;
River reconnaissance surveys, 100 per cent;
Dam site investigations, 95 per cent;
Flowage surveys, 75 per cent;
Irrigation surveys, 90 per cent;
Soil surveys, 100 per cent;
Other ancillary investigations and reports, 40 per cent;
Office studies, 60 per cent;
Design of works, 60 per cent.

Mr. Green: When is it expected that all these studies will be completed?

Mr. Lesage: In late 1958.

Mr. Green: The other question is this. Have there been any applications received for a licence under the provisions of the International River Improvements Act which was passed last year?

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Green: What were the applications, and in what manner were they dealt with?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, but only for existing improvements, not for new developments; only for existing installations.

Mr. Green: Could we have a list of those?

Mr. Lesage: I could supply it to the hon. member. The assistant director of the water resources branch is with me now, and he will forward one to the hon. member.

Mr. Hahn: Am I to understand that the minister's statement that his only interest is in the distribution of power indicates that he is not interested in the conservation and preservation of the fishing industry?

Mr. Lesage: Oh, no, I have been completely misunderstood. I believe if my hon. friend reads what I have said in the context of the discussion he will find that that is not at all what I said.

Mr. Hahn: You did at one point say in connection with the resources that your only interest was in the distribution of power.

Mr. Lesage: No, I said the contrary. I said that in studying this question of water resources, particularly referring to the water resources of British Columbia and more particularly to the Columbia river basin, the interest of this federal government, and my interest as a member of this government in charge of the portfolio involved, was to see to it that we obtain the maximum power economically from the development of the Columbia river, but it was up to the provincial government to look after the distribution of the power in the province.

Mr. Hahn: I thought you did not feel that way about it, but that was the understanding I had when you made the statement. I have one other question. Is the minister aware that the publication called "Facts on Fish" issued by the fisheries association of British Columbia on August 16, 1955, had this to say:

> It has been established that changes in temperature in the waters of the spawning rivers has a direct effect on the survival of the fingerlings. To divert the waters of one river into another with the subsequent change in temperature could cause untold damage.

Could he just make a statement as to what has been done in connection with taking that into consideration?

Mr. Lesage: No, I have not read the article.

Mr. Fulton: When does the minister expect the report of the British Columbia Engineering company to be available?

Mr. Lesage: In as few months as possible.

Mr. Fulton: At the end of the year?

Mr. Lesage: I hope so. I hope to have it even before that, because I think it would be useful in our discussions with the Americans.

Mr. Fulton: Has any progress been made toward setting a date for that meeting with the Americans?

Mr. Lesage: No. We are in the summer now, and my hon. friend knows what is coming in the United States.

Mr. Fulton: I was wondering whether the minister felt that possibly for that reason it might be postponed until after November.

Mr. Lesage: It is possible that the official discussions will be after November, after the election in the United States.

Item agreed to.

305. Fraser river—federal expenditures in connection with investigations to be carried out by Fraser river board, $127,750.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister to say a word on this item. This is a board that used to be under the Department of Public Works and has only fairly recently been transferred to this department, where it has perhaps a more natural home than it had with the other department. I am hopeful that the vigour and interest which I am sure this minister will show toward this subject will produce some results in the near future. But what interests me here particularly is this. I should like him to make a brief report on the state of the investigations at present, the progress they have reached to date and the efforts being made to coordinate the studies of this board with the studies being made under the item we have just passed, because it seems to me that the two are very closely related, at least in so far as the diversion of the Columbia river is concerned.

Mr. Lesage: The study of the possible diversion is a pretty specific study, whilst the studies made by the Fraser river board are of a general nature. As a matter of fact these investigations are made to determine what developments for the control of the water and incidental resources of the Fraser river basin would be advisable, practicable and in the public interest, with particular reference to flood control and hydroelectric generation. It is the over-all picture, and the study has been made on pretty general grounds. I have received in the last week a letter from my provincial colleague who looks after the Fraser river board, Mr. Williston, the minister of lands and forests, asking me whether the board could obtain a further delay to produce its interim report. A letter was prepared by my assistant deputy minister for my signature, graciously saying yes, and I signed it.

Mr. Fulton: They put out a number of interim reports, I take it the minister is referring to the final report?

Mr. Lesage: No, an interim report; my memory is pretty clear on that. The request was for a delay to September 15.

Mr. Fulton: Would this board have any special interest? If so, can the minister tell me what studies have been carried on with respect to the Moran dam? That would normally be a provincial matter because it is above the junction of the Thompson and the Fraser, but it falls right within the terms of reference to this board to study the development of the Fraser river from the point of view of hydro development and flood control. I should like to know whether the board been giving any special consideration to the Moran dam, because I think it should.

Mr. Lesage: I am told by my officials that the possibility of there being a Moran dam is taken into account in the study the board is making of flood control.

Mr. Fulton: Will that be covered in the interim report?

Mr. Lesage: No, it would not be reported on specifically; it would be reported on only as part of the total reservoir that would be needed for flood control on the Fraser.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am going to say something that I hope the minister will not take as applying to his departmental officials. I have had a great interest in the Fraser river basin, and I have felt for some time there was not sufficient interest in it down here. I am not sure that there is on the part of the government at Victoria, so it is probably a mutual blame if blame is to be attached. I say to the minister, it is a fascinating study. I know the minister is busy, but would he, between now and the time his estimates come up next year, just look into it. If he does I think he will find it is a matter which will arouse his interest and enthusiasm. I hope next year we shall be able to have a lengthy and informative discussion on the work of this board.

Item agreed to.

306. To provide for a contribution to the cost of constructing a dam on the Conestogo river near Glen Allan, Ontario, for the purposes of flood control and water conservation, in accordance with the terms of an agreement entered into between Canada and the province of Ontario, $750,000.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Oxford completed my case for me in a very able manner, but he misdirected his request. I live on the great watershed of the Grand river, on which this government has done a great deal of work. I think I should speak for a minute or two on this item.

It was almost 20 years ago that Dr. Hugh Templin, the editor of the Fergus News Record, started the campaign for control of flooding on the Grand river. As a result he persuaded the minister of works of the provincial government, Brigadier Colin Campbell, who was then a very prominent cabinet minister in Mitchell F. Hepburn's cabinet, to build the first of those control dams, and that was built in my riding just above Fergus. This worked out very successfully and prevented a great deal of the damage which was done annually in the towns of Fergus, Elora, the cities of Galt and Brantford, and on the outskirts of Waterloo and Kitchener.

It was an experiment. Because of that experiment there have been several others built since. The second one was built on the Grand river, in the marshes in Luther. The Luther marshes have been famous in our section of Ontario for a number of years. When I first heard of them the idea was to drain them so we would have more farm land. Now all those drains have been flooded by the second dam built at Luther, and it has created possibly the greatest natural wildlife source in the province. I suppose there is more and better duck hunting in the Luther marshes, because of the work done there jointly by the provincial and federal governments, than anywhere else in Ontario. It is excellent hunting, and we are not depleting the wildlife of the country by shooting the wild fowl that come to the Luther marshes. It is an ideal nesting place, and more ducks are raised in the Luther marshes than are shot. It is not just a case of shooting off the ducks that fly in from the north to rest there on their way south.

The third project on the Grand river watershed has been started at Conestogo, so we have a very complete large dam project on the watershed of the Grand river. I would recommend to the minister that he now do exactly what the hon. member for Oxford suggested should be done, namely complete the control of this watershed.

There is a very good reason why this control should be completed. It is closer to completion than any other watershed control system that is being undertaken anywhere. We should complete the small dams that are waiting to be built on all the small tributaries leading into this watershed. There are two dams which should be built in Eramosa township, near Rochwood to protect Guelph, Hespeler and Preston. When these and some others are built, then we will have a good idea of the type of plan that should be arranged for the other various watersheds in the highly industrialized areas of Ontario.

This brings me to another point mentioned by the hon. member for Oxford, when he said the city of Guelph is short of water. Every city has a problem in finding water for drinking purposes. Guelph happens to be most fortunate in having good springs, and no doubt the flow of water in those springs is added to greatly by those control dams in the watershed close to them. The water table must obviously be raised because of those control dams, and that gives Guelph an excellent supply of spring water. Then they also have deep wells in Guelph to augment the supply of spring water. It is quite logical to say that those deep wells are supplied with water that is held in the ground by those control dams.

I say to the minister that if he is going to complete any watershed with control dams, the logical one is the Grand river watershed. This was promoted extensively by Dr. Hugh Templeton; and the present editor of the Elora Express, Mrs. Marsden, is now a member of the Grand river authority, and so is the former warden of the county of Wellington, Mr. Norman Williams. They are almost anxious that the project that has pioneered in these control dams be completed first. I could not agree more completely with the hon. member for Oxford in his request that you go ahead and finish this. Certainly the Grand river watershed is the one that has given leadership, and these people should be looked after who have done the spade work in this valuable field of flood control.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I think I might be allowed to ask this question here. Have any further representations been received from the Humber valley conservation authority since the new group was organized, dealing with an over-all plan for that area?

Mr. Lesage: No, I have not received anything since the original submission was withdrawn.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In other words the minister is still waiting for a new submission to be made to the federal government?

Mr. Lesage: No, Mr. Chairman; I am not waiting for it.

Item agreed to.

Northern administration and lands branch—

307. Branch administration, $791,592.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might be allowed to take one or two minutes in connection with this item. I think my remarks will relate to it.

Last evening I read a very interesting article which appeared in the Toronto Evening Telegram of that date, written by Mr. James M. Minifie. The title of the article is "And Now: The Ultimate Missile". Mr. Minifie was referring to material which apparently he had at his disposal in Washington in connection with the ICBM, the intercontinental ballistic missile, and he referred to the fact that giant strides were being made in connection with a counter missile that would require the very best and latest type of radar detection in order to be put to work.

In his article Mr. Minifie mentioned that minutes would be very vital in connection with the detection of the ICBM by the counter missile, and apparently the indications are that a new D.E.W. line will be required located 500 or 600 miles farther north than the one which is being constructed at the present time. I might read from this article his reference to the fact that a new D.E.W. line would be required. Mr. Minifie says:

> Success in this fantastic project—

That is the development of a counter missile; those are my words, Mr. Chairman.

> —would have important repercussions in Canada. For one of the essentials would be another D.E.W. line, 500 or 600 miles farther north, running from Ellesmere island westward out over the Arctic ice. This sea area is regarded by Canada as Canadian territory on the sector principle by which eastern and western boundaries are carried northwards to the pole.
> The United States however does not recognize this principle, and might not concede Canada's claim if it were formally presented which has not yet been done.

The indication further on in the article is that the chief of research and development of the United States army, Lieutenant General James M. Gavin, is thinking of the same thing because he is quoted as saying:

> As we look ahead we see considerable pay-off in being able to put stations out on the polar ice cap to detect missiles early in their flight, perhaps detect them at the instant of take-off.
>
> The ability to live out there, to reinforce out there, to explore and patrol out there may be of great importance to us in the immediate future in fact.

Mr. Minifie goes on to say:

> Thus consideration is being given by the United States armed services to American military occupation of an area which Canada considers its own.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Calgary North dealt with the over-all picture in the northern area, and the fact that there is considerable concern as to the continuation of at least the show of Canadian sovereignty in that area.

We now have an indication that a further step is being planned, and I do not think the hon. member for Calgary North referred to this. Here is a situation in which we are now informed that steps may be required to be taken in the foreseeable future by the country to the south of us in order to provide a form of continental defence for all of us which may bring into dispute two theories concerning the ownership of the polar ice cap north of the Canadian land mass. Mr. Minifie's article indicates that it might be wise to make plans here to ensure that when the time comes there will be no dispute concerning our claims to sovereignty in this area, and to establish it beyond any question of doubt.

I would ask the minister if any steps have been taken to consider this problem, if there have been any discussions between his department and any department in Washington or among his department and any other department of this government and Washington to deal with this particular problem? It seems to me there is no point in waiting until the horse is out of the barn before closing the door. If we are going to be faced with a new D.E.W. line situation our government should now be taking steps to ensure that there is no question about our sovereignty in this particular area. I think we all welcome assistance from the United States in terms of continental defence and it is absolutely essential that we receive it, but I do believe it should be under conditions which are acceptable to the mass of the Canadian people.

Mr. Lesage: To my knowledge, Mr. Chairman, no approach has been made by the United States government to the Canadian government for another defence line to the north of the D.E.W. line.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Has there been any discussion of the principle of ownership of the ice cap north of the land area where, according to the indication in this article, we assert one principle and the United States asserts another?

Mr. Lesage: We have never subscribed to the sector theory in application to the ice. We are content that our sovereignty exists over all the Arctic islands. There is no doubt about it and there are no difficulties concerning it. Our sovereignty has never been endangered by the existence of the D.E.W. line. We have agreements with the United States and the facts are there to prove we have sovereignty over our northern territory. We have never upheld a general sector theory. To our mind the sea, be it frozen or in its natural liquid state, is the sea; and our sovereignty exists over the lands and over our territorial waters.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Do I gather from the minister's answer that if the situation were reversed and it was Russia which intended to make use of this area for a warning line of some kind, we would not be concerned because that does not affect our principle of ownership?

Mr. Lesage: As far as we are aware, Russia has never claimed water or ice as being in the territory over which it has sovereignty. I have not heard that the United States wants to establish a line on the ice cap north of the islands of Canada because this area is the high sea, be it frozen or in liquid form. I suppose and I certainly hope that my hon. friend believes in the freedom of the high seas.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I do not think there is any question about the freedom of the high seas. What I am requesting from the minister is an answer to a simple question. If we do not assert the sector principle which has been referred to in this article, does that mean that we are quite satisfied to have any power occupy the polar ice cap north of our territory?

Mr. Lesage: The ice cap is in exactly the same situation as the Atlantic ocean; it is the high sea.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The minister has not answered the question.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member can answer it himself. I have indicated the principles. I do not have to apply them for you.

Mr. Harkness: I think the minister is evading the question. There is no use saying that the polar ice cap is the high seas because it is not. You cannot sail a ship over it or anything else. As he probably knows, permanent establishments have been erected on the ice cap in the way of landing fields, radar stations and so on. As the minister also probably knows, at the present time a big scramble is going on among half a dozen countries to establish sovereignty over various parts of the Antarctic ice cap.

Mr. Lesage: There is land there.

Mr. Harkness: Some of it is land.

Mr. Lesage: It is a continent.

Mr. Harkness: Nobody knows.

Mr. Lesage: That is the difference.

Mr. Harkness: Nobody knows. The minister says there is land, but nobody knows just how much is land. It is an ice cap; nevertheless nations are attempting to establish sovereignty over parts of that ice cap. As far as this Arctic ice cap is concerned, nobody knows how much of it is water and how much of it is land. I do not think it is good enough for the minister to evade this question by saying that these are the high seas. They are not. This is an ice cap upon which permanent installations have been established and supplied by air transport.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is that all the answer we get?

Mr. Lesage: I do not know just what the hon. member wants to know. Do hon. members want to know what the ice cap is under international law? Do they want to know what the ice cap north of the Arctic islands is? My answer is very simple. It is the high sea in frozen form. The ordinary laws of the high sea apply to high seas whether they be in liquid or frozen form. That is the limit of my knowledge of international law on this. If my hon. friend knows more about it than I do I hope he will tell us what he knows.

[Mr. Hamilton (York West).]

Mr. Hamilton (York West): What the minister is saying in effect is that we have absolutely no plans for dealing with this area when in fact there is evidence of intention by someone else to make use of it. The hon. member for Calgary North has suggested that you cannot consider this as an ocean because planes are flying in that area right now.

Mr. Lesage: My hon. friend is a lawyer, and if he has studied his international law he should know that it is the ocean, that it is the high seas.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The knowledge of any principle of international law has never prevented a war or a dispute over a territory like this. The asserting of a principle as the minister is doing now is not going to prevent an unfriendly power making use of this area unless we do something about it. If I accept the answer of the minister it is that as long as there is a friendly power going to come along and do something for us we will talk—

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I never said what the hon. member is saying I said. He has said that. It is he who talks about a friendly power occupying the ice cap north of the Arctic islands. I never said that at all.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): What I said, and I repeat, is that from the answer the minister has given the only conclusion we can come to, whether or not he likes it, is that that is the case. I repeat that there is no plan. There may be a legal principle which the minister is asserting and in so far as it relates to a friendly country that is wonderful and we can sit back and do nothing, but it certainly is not a principle that is going to do us any good if there is an indication that an unfriendly power is going to make use of this area. I agree with what the hon. member for Calgary North has said, that anyone who has travelled in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon and the far north realizes that these places are not far out of touch with the rest of the country. As a matter of fact, with the development of the longer range planes we are going to have criss-crossing traffic by intercontinental planes. This is going to become a very important area. What I am suggesting to the minister is that we do not rely on some theory of international law, but that we prepare for the time when someone unfriendly to us may assert a right.

Mr. Lesage: Could I ask the hon. member what he suggests we should do with the ice cap?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am suggesting right now that as a first step, if there is an indication from the United States that they are intending to make—

Mr. Lesage: No.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): There is an indication in this article, and had the minister been listening he would probably know more about it.

Mr. Lesage: I was listening, but I do not rely on articles.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): There is an indication that this area may be considered vital by a friendly power to assist in transcontinental defence.

Mr. Lesage: That is an opinion.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): On the basis of that information we should prepare for that day by asserting our own rights over this area and ensuring that any protective stations or even aggressive stations that may be required shall come within the orbit of power of this country, not within that of an unfriendly country. Unless we assert those principles it may soon be too late.

Mr. Harkness: The minister just asked the hon. member for York West what he would suggest should be done. I suggest that we assert the sector principle. As a matter of fact there is a publication put out by the Canadian government where that has already been asserted. I brought up this question of sovereignty over these northern areas and the ice cap about two years ago, and at that time I was told that there was no question in anybody's mind in regard to our sovereignty over all that area extending right up to the north pole. I hold in my hand a book entitled "Boundaries of Canada" put out by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Right at the front of the book is an outline map which shows the boundary of Canada running up to the north pole straight along the degree of latitude which separates the Yukon Territory from Alaska. That is shown on the map as the boundary.

Mr. Lesage: It is not the boundary.

Mr. Harkness: Then it shows the boundary coming down from there in a somewhat wavy way to what would be the northwest corner of Labrador. There is a more detailed map at page 42.

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of public bills.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the intention to proceed with one or more of the public bills, or is it agreed that they shall all stand?

Mr. Harris: I have been informed that they will all stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that all public bills shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The items under public bills having been exhausted, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

Northern administration and lands branch—

307. Branch administration, $791,592.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I was just pointing out that at page 42 there is another more detailed map, and it shows the same thing. It shows the boundary running right up to the north pole along the longitude separating Alaska and the Yukon, and then coming back down again between our northern islands and Greenland and then down to the tip of Labrador. I do not think there is any question that the Canadian government, in the making of its maps and so forth, has tacitly at least given adherence to the sector theory of the possession of this northern area. I think the minister is in error when he says the Canadian government has not adopted that theory and that it has been more or less taken for granted.

Some two years ago I raised this matter in connection with an ice island, I think it was, which some Soviet scientists were occupying and which was floating around up in this northern area. I wanted to know at that time what the situation was, whether Canada exercised any sovereignty over it and so on, and at that time no question was raised as to Canada's sovereignty over this sector extending right up to the north pole. From what the minister has said today, apparently without saying anything to anybody the government is going to abandon that theory altogether and thus perhaps put us in a very awkward position as far as bargaining with any foreign power is concerned.

As the hon. member for York West has pointed out, if the Americans want to put radar stations there we will be delighted and have no objection to it, but if the Russians or somebody else wanted to do the same thing it would be a totally different matter. In order to protect ourselves I think we should certainly return to what I have always understood was our theory of sovereignty there, the sector theory, and assert our sovereignty over that sector extending up to the north pole as, indeed, it is shown on both maps in this publication on the boundaries of Canada by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Furthermore, before the minister makes the statement that we do not claim any sovereignty over that area, I think he should consult the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys under whose authority these maps are issued and also the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the other members of the government.

Mr. Lesage: I do not need to consult with my colleagues, because the government of Canada has never adhered to the general sector theory.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask the minister, then, why maps are put out showing this as Canadian territory?

Mr. Lesage: If I am given time I will tell you. In 1903 these lines were put on the maps of Canada for the first time. It was not to show the boundaries of Canada. It was to show the lines within which the lands and the territorial waters around those lands were claimed by Canada, because at that time and for a number of years afterwards many of the islands of the Arctic had not been discovered and it was not known what islands might exist in the interior of that sector.

Our claim since 1903 has been to all the land within these lines, but we have never adhered to a broader sector theory. If you adhere to the general sector theory you claim that you have sovereignty over waters beyond your territorial waters. We have never done that. It is said that because it is ice we might claim sovereignty over it, but the ice is moving all the time. It is never the same ice. Do you believe that any country in the world would recognize our sovereignty over the air space above this water in its liquid or frozen form? If you claim sovereignty over a piece of land or your territorial waters, you also have sovereignty over the air space above that land and territorial waters. Other countries would never recognize our sovereignty over these high seas, be they in liquid or frozen form, and which in the frozen form are moving all the time.

That is the law. That is what the position of the Canadian government has been all the time. I do not need to consult my colleagues, but I believe the member for Calgary North would have done well if he had consulted someone before asserting the things he has asserted without knowing what he was talking about.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has not explained why all the maps show it in that way. I only mentioned two of them but there are a dozen more.

Mr. Lesage: I just said that.

Mr. Harkness: You did not explain why all these maps show that area as part of Canada. Here is one found on page 112 of Geographical Regions of Canada. The whole area from the north pole down to the Mackenzie area and from there over to Labrador is shown as the Arctic area, and it goes right up to the north pole. Every other map in the book shows the same thing.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think what we have seen here is an example of an assertion of a principle established over a period of years which, if allowed to continue in a laissez-faire manner, will result in our being confronted with a very serious situation. The minister has said that no country would recognize the assertion of our sovereignty in this particular instance. I say to the minister that with conditions changing, with the present use of air transport in the northern areas, and the fact that an ice cap of this kind may be very useful for detection purposes in warfare and even useful for emergency landings of civil air transports, it is time we as one of the major northern powers took steps to ensure that this type of sovereignty is recognized. If we do not, we will be left with no alternative if an unfriendly power steps in and says it is going to make use of the ice cap for offensive purposes.

Mr. Lesage: It is not an ice cap. This is floating ice which is moving all the time. Any establishment that you might put on that ice could not last for very long. It could not be permanent because the ice is melting, floating and breaking all the time. This is not an ice cap like the ice cap of Greenland. This is ice floating on water.

Mr. Zaplitny: On the 22nd of June last the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and myself raised a question with regard to Mr. Fontana of Virden, Manitoba, and his claim for redress for certain mineral rights which were taken into the ownership of the crown. At that time the Minister of Finance, who was leading the house said, as found at page 5314 of Hansard:

> I can assure hon. members, in particular the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and the hon. member for Dauphin, who have spoken on one particular matter, that it will receive serious consideration and an answer will be given at the appropriate time.

I understand this is the appropriate time. I know that very serious consideration has been given, and we are anxiously waiting for the minister to inform the committee that the government, in its wisdom and generosity, has decided to accede to the request of Mr. Fontana.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I believe I am ready to reply to the pleas made by the member for Brandon-Souris and the member for Dauphin when they spoke in the house some weeks ago. The land, 320 acres, owned by Mr. Fontana was required for an airport near the town of Virden in Manitoba for the purposes of the commonwealth air training scheme. The land department of the Canadian National Railways acted as agents for the government in acquiring the land.

In August, 1940, an agent of the company interviewed Mr. Fontana and obtained an option dated August 7, 1940, signed by him and his wife, agreeing to sell the land for $9,000. There were no exceptions mentioned in the written documents. In recommending the acceptance of the offer to his superiors at Winnipeg, the agent expressed the view that while the assessed value of the land was only $5,900—that was $5,200 for the land and $700 for the building—the price asked by Mr. Fontana was not unreasonable.

Although the Department of Transport filed a plan of expropriation on November 2, 1940, there is nothing on the files of the railway company to indicate that when Fontana agreed to the price three months before, there had been any threat of compulsory taking or that he was influenced by it.

Following the signing of the option, the completion of the transaction was handled by the company's lawyers at Winnipeg, who dealt with Mr. J. Pritchard, a lawyer at Virden who acted for Mr. Fontana. Some delay occurred because part of the land was registered in the name of a third party from whom he had purchased, and with the consent of Fontana some of the purchase moneys had to be paid to him. When these difficulties had been arranged, Fontana executed a transfer under the real property act in favour of His Majesty. This transfer was prepared in the office of Mr. Pritchard and signed by Mr. Fontana in his presence on November 6, 1940. The transfer covered the complete interest of Mr. Fontana and contained no reservations.

I have inquired about the matter. I know that in the province of Quebec, according to our civil law—and I am told by the lawyers I have consulted that the situation is the same under the common law—whenever you purchase land, you purchase the land—and I am translating word for word the expression in the civil code—with what is under and what is above unless something either under or above is excepted. When you purchase land and there is no reservation you purchase the land with everything which is under and everything which is above.

The transfer was registered and the certificate or title was issued in favour of His Majesty for the land, including the mineral rights. Of course it included the mineral rights because they were not excepted. The balance of the purchase moneys to which Fontana was entitled was then sent to his solicitor, who acknowledged them on December 14, 1940. I believe it is worth quoting the receipt. It reads as follows:

> Re Virden Airport—August Fontana
> Your reference 22-302-34-B
> This will acknowledge receipt of your letter herein of the 13th instant, inclosing cheque in favour of August Fontana for the sum of $3,694 in full settlement of all his claims in the above connection, and for which kindly accept my thanks.
> J. Pritchard.

It was not until March, 1954—that is to say nearly 15 years later—that Mr. Fontana, through his solicitor, made a claim for the mineral rights. This was some time after oil had been discovered in the Virden district. In view of the claim made by Mr. Fontana, the question of the title to the mines and minerals was referred to the justice department which expressed the opinion that Fontana had no claim in law for their return.

Mr. Fontana and the person from whom the adjoining section, which was needed to make up the airport, had been acquired, each filed a petition in the exchequer court claiming that they had not been compensated for the minerals, that it was not the intention of the crown to acquire them, and that they should be held in trust for the petitioners. Motions were made by the crown to strike out both petitions on the ground that they were frivolous and vexatious. The court granted the orders. Fontana appealed to the supreme court but his appeal was dismissed.

The applications to the exchequer court and the supreme court were both made on the ground that, assuming the allegations in the petition were correct, there was no arguable cause of action. The courts agreed with that view. The legal ownership of the mineral rights has therefore been finally determined. It should also be mentioned that nearly all the grounds upon which the present petition is based were contained in the material before the two courts.

Notwithstanding the decision of the courts Mr. Fontana, through his solicitor, filed another petition addressed to His Excellency the Governor General and to me, claiming practically the same relief. The cabinet has studied the petition very carefully and has rejected it because there were no grounds at all for it.

The only thing I want to add is this, and I shall be very brief. Some reference has been made to the Crichel Down case by one or even two hon. members. They have mentioned Crichel Down as being the name of a man. May I say it is not the name of a man; it is the name of a place in the United Kingdom or a locality in the United Kingdom. The case that was dealt with in the British House of Commons was as follows. The land was owned or leased by several persons all of whom died before the matter was discussed in the British house. Some of the executors laid claim to the property but it was never given back to them, because it had already been leased to an outsider and what had been done could not be undone.

The facts of the Crichel Down case are not similar. In that case the land was no longer required for government purposes. In our case it is still required for government purposes because the Department of Transport still owns and operates the Virden airport. Instead of accepting offers from the previous owners to buy the land back, it was rented to an outsider as a single unit. The previous owners in the British case were not even given a chance to tender. In this case this department publicly advertised the mineral rights for sale. Mr. Fontana had a right to tender and could do so. That was not the case in the British case. It is completely different.

In the Fontana case it is asked that the mineral rights revert to the owner. This was never done in the English case. It was never suggested by anyone in the English case that they would not have to pay the going price when it was resold to them. The view was expressed in the English case that the normal practice would have been to have the tenancy offered for public tender, just as the oil rights in our case have been offered. As a matter of fact, what was contended by the majority of the critics in the Crichel Down case is exactly what we have done here in putting up for public tender the oil rights under the Virden airport.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am glad to have the reply of the minister with regard to this important matter. I anticipated that the reply would be couched in legal terms, and that has fairly well been the case in the argument of the minister here this afternoon. Harking back to my first presentation of this case on June 22 last, may I say that at that time I stressed the factor of moral obligation with regard to this particular matter of public business. At that time I outlined the three grounds upon which Mr. Fontana had a reasonable claim against the crown.

First of all, he lost his mineral rights by a mere accident of conveyancing. I understand that is a term that has some legal significance. He was asked to surrender his land for wartime purposes and this he did; and by the legal process of conveyancing, unbeknown to Mr. Fontana, he also lost the underground rights. I think that is the first point that is significant in this case.

In the second place, it is quite obvious that when the crown—through Mr. Johnston, working in the C.N.R. lands branch—approached Mr. Fontana, the mineral rights were not required. The surface rights only were required for the purpose of establishing an air training field under the commonwealth airtraining scheme.

Third, Mr. Fontana was never compensated in any shape or form for other than the surface rights. He received the sum of $9,000 for the land, and that was merely for surface rights. The minerals, according to the statement of Mr. Johnston, who carried out the transaction on behalf of the government, were not in question. We have a letter from Mr. Johnston, dated December 6, 1955, in which he says:

> At that time mineral rights were not considered of any particular value and were not a factor in arriving at a valuation for the acreage. Some mention was made of sand and gravel and, to the best of my recollection, Mr. Fontana had promised delivery of some sand or gravel and it was suggested he had better remove same before acceptance of his offer to sell by the crown.

In other words Mr. Johnston, who carried out the negotiations with Mr. Fontana, acknowledges that the evaluation of minerals was not a consideration at the time. So on the basis of these three factors I submit that there is strong moral obligation involved in the case.

There are some legal rights as well, the minister in his reply has suggested that the matter was considered by the courts, both the exchequer court and the Supreme Court of Canada. However, from the evidence in the return tabled on June 25, return No. 243, it is quite clear that at no time were the merits of the case reviewed by either of those courts; rather it was the petition of the crown to have the appeal to the courts struck out that was considered. The motion by the crown was to the effect that this appeal was vexatious and frivolous, and it was on those grounds that the courts turned down the appeal.

I think there is an important principle at stake in this regard. It is obvious that even in democratic countries power is passing from the courts to the departments of government at an alarming rate, and I feel that this is a principle that arises in this instance. If this had been a private transaction between two private citizens there would have been no way of keeping Mr. Fontana from having the merits of his case considered in the courts, but because the crown was involved this was not possible.

There is also the opinion of legal counsel in this instance. There have been three reputable lawyers involved, as I read through the return, in this case.

An hon. Member: They all are.

Mr. Dinsdale: I hear somebody say, "All lawyers are reputable", and perhaps the use of the word is unnecessary. I shall substitute "outstanding lawyers".

An hon. Member: That is better.

Mr. Dinsdale: Three outstanding lawyers were involved in the case; Mr. Harold Riley, Q.C., of Calgary; Mr. E. W. Gerrand, Q.C., of Regina; and Mr. William R. Appleby, of Winnipeg. I understand that all these men are devoted to the cause of pure Liberalism, and I think that it is from that standpoint that they have reviewed the merits of this case. I believe the men in question will be well known to the minister. In the various presentations they have made to the cabinet they have stressed the legal aspects of the Fontana appeal, particularly the justice of the case. I think I shall just quote one paragraph from a communication that was directed to the Minister of Justice in this regard on May 11, 1955, over the signature of Mr. William R. Appleby. The final paragraph says:

> I am writing this letter to you in order that I may request your earnest and serious consideration to a very important problem, one which, in my opinion, concerns itself with the very basic principles of government. This certainly is exemplified through the Crichel Down debate in the English House of Commons. May I respectfully suggest that the proper answer to this question is to re-vest the mineral rights in Fontana, pursuant to section 24 of the Expropriation Act. If this were done, I believe that the basic principles of equity and justice according to our law, would be served.
> Yours very truly,
> (sgd) W. R. Appleby.

The other legal advisers have written in similar vein to Mr. Appleby's letter. I shall not take the time of the house to quote further from their letters, but I must refer briefly to the reference made by the minister to the Crichel Down case. I must admit that at the time, that is June 22, I did not have comprehensive knowledge of this particular case which was thoroughly discussed in the British House of Commons as well as by the public generally. I got my information from the Canadian Liberal, volume 7, No. 2, Summer 1954, and I am afraid that I was led up the garden path in reading this Canadian Liberal, because it was merely a passing reference—

An hon. Member: Up the Gardiner path.

Mr. Dinsdale: —it was merely a passing reference. I have since had access to the House of Commons debate on the question, and I see my error. However, the paragraph that aroused my interest is on page 139 of this magazine, and it says:

> No statesman or politician who relies for the maintenance of his position upon the support of a great party can ignore its beliefs and passions.

I should explain that this is a discussion of political affairs in the United Kingdom. Continuing the quotation:

> Sir Winston has himself been bound to a certain extent, but his standing in the country and the world has been great enough to secure for him exceptional freedom as leader of the Conservative party. I believe that the party will try to re-assert its hold over Sir Winston's successor. It has in fact already begun to be assertive. As the period of war-time control grows more distant, the Conservative dislike of state intervention emerges more clearly. Nothing in recent months has angered the Conservatives more than the discovery that their own government refused to sell back to private individuals some farm land which had been compulsorily acquired by the air ministry in 1937 as a bombing range but is no longer wanted for that purpose. This land, the Crichel Down estate, has been acquired by a state organization, the commissioners of crown lands. Former owners were given no chance to bid for their old property.

In brackets at the end of this quotation there is the editorial note:

> The Conservative Minister of Agriculture, Sir Thomas Dugdale, who had jurisdiction over crown lands, has since resigned from the cabinet.

That was my original source of information on this case and I still maintain, after reading the parliamentary debates thoroughly, that it has a close bearing on the case that we have under consideration in this house.

The minister has referred to the long period of delay, between 1940 and 1954. In the case of Crichel Down, the delay was from 1937 to 1954. Of course the time element has no bearing on the justice of the case involved. Also, the discussion in the British house largely emphasized the increasing powers of government and ministers of the crown over the rights of the individual. As you read the debate you find that member after member who participated—it was a long and extensive debate in the House of Commons—emphasized the fact that governments should lean over backwards to assure that the privileges of private citizens should be recognized in instances of this kind.

I am not going to deal further with the Crichel Down case. I thought I would make passing reference to it in view of the minister's observations. There is also this further fact. Most provincial governments have recognized the rights of private citizens in these matters. The minister referred to the situation in the province of Quebec. In the province of Manitoba, on the other hand, the provincial government has now taken the stand, after severe public criticism, that in cases of land expropriation for crown purposes the expropriation would not include the mineral rights. The Manitoba government has gone even farther in this matter and has returned the mineral rights on several parcels of land that were expropriated for rights of way for highways, and so forth. They did so because they could see there was a moral as well as a legal obligation involved in transactions between private citizens and governments in cases of this kind.

Then we have the petition of over 200 citizens of this area intimately in touch with the situation, who had a meeting to consider all the facts. They submitted a petition to the government, which has been placed in the hands of all members of this house. They recognize as private citizens that there is a violation of the rights of the individual citizen, and there is a violation of the elementary justice that we should expect from a democratic government.

Consider the position of Mr. Fontana himself. He is a man well advanced in years. He is an immigrant from Italy who came to Canada in pursuit of the wider opportunities of the new world. He worked hard in railway construction gangs, and in very heavy labour of that kind, to accumulate enough money to buy this parcel of land. He passed through the period of the dirty thirties, and by 1940 he was slowly getting back on his feet again. The government came along and asked that he transfer the land to the crown for defence purposes.

The minister raised the point this afternoon that expropriation action as such was never completely carried out. That was only because of Mr. Fontana's patriotism. He was only too willing to allow this land to be used for defence purposes. Unfortunately Mr. Fontana, a typical representative of that generation of immigrants, was not literate. He came to Canada and was one of the pioneers of the Virden district. He worked long and hard to establish himself in our Canadian economy; and it is largely on the basis of the blood, sweat and tears of this generation that we today enjoy the privileges and the prosperity that are ours.

He was not aware of the legal niceties of this expropriation procedure. All he could see was the opportunity of expressing his gratitude for the privileges Canada had granted to him and his family as a naturalized citizen here. Both he and his wife had to sign the documents with an X; but we have the confirmation of Mr. Johnston, who carried out the negotiations, that while Mr. Fontana did not inquire about minerals Mr. Johnston himself, because of the inquiry concerning the gravel, assured him that minerals were not involved.

I pursue this subject this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, because I feel it is a case of a further invasion of the rights of private citizens by big government. We cannot compare this with a transaction that would take place between private citizen and private citizen. This is a transaction that took place during the exigencies of war between the government and a private citizen. During wartime we all had to make sacrifices of personal liberty, those who served in the armed forces as well as those who stayed behind to support the home front, but we did not expect that the violation of the liberties and the freedoms—

Mr. Hosking: Carried.

Mr. Dinsdale: I hear somebody across the way repeatedly say "carried". I think it is the hon. member for Wellington South. If he is not interested in the rights of a citizen of Canada—

Mr. Lesage: There are no rights.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Has my hon. friend no confidence in the courts of Canada?

Mr. Dinsdale: The merits of this case have never been heard in the courts of Canada, merely the motion—

Mr. Lesage: The courts said it was frivolous.

Mr. Dinsdale: —merely the motion that it be stricken out as frivolous and vexatious.

Mr. Lesage: That is what it was. That is the decision.

Mr. Dinsdale: But let me carry on, notwithstanding the noise from the ministers and the backbenchers opposite. Let me conclude the point I started to make.

Mr. Richardson: On a point of order, I dissociate myself from the reference to the backbenchers, but I now seriously question the chairman as to whether the hon. member who spoke last evening on one vote, namely, 294, is really in order now in speaking for such a long time on this matter on the present vote under consideration?

Mr. Dinsdale: I spoke on the first item last evening, sir.

Mr. Byrne: Are you repeating your speech.

Mr. Lesage: You are repeating your speech.

Mr. Dinsdale: The first item allows an hon. member the opportunity to discuss policy. In view of the fact that the minister has spoken on this item I think I should have the opportunity to reply.

Mr. Dickey: It is the third time you have made the same speech.

Mr. Dinsdale: There are one or two interesting additional items that I should like to bring to the attention of the senior member for Halifax.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): It takes a long time to get the point across.

Mr. Dinsdale: Obviously it takes hon. members opposite a long time to get the point. I am surprised that hon. members opposite, who are nominally Liberals, are not willing to listen to the presentation of a case which has been supported by three Liberal lawyers in this country as having a bearing on the fundamental rights of an individual citizen. If the rights of a private member in this house are to be denied by the government backbenchers, I think parliamentary democracy has descended to a very low level. I am trying to present the reason—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Just Conservative backbenchers, that is all.

Mr. Dinsdale: I would suggest there is no noise at all coming from the backbenchers of the opposition. All the noise is coming from the back benches on the government side of the house. I am speaking on behalf of over 200 citizens who have presented a petition to every hon. member of this house.

Mr. Goode: No, you are not; you are just speaking for one of your constituents.

Mr. Dinsdale: They have presented a petition to this house.

Mr. Goode: The hon. member has tried my patience too far.

Some hon. Members: That is too bad.

Mr. Dinsdale: I would suggest that the hon. member—

Mr. Small: —pick up his marbles and go home.

An hon. Member: He has no marbles.

Mr. Dinsdale: —read the Crichel Down debate which took place in the British House of Commons. It occupied almost a day and it was on a point as simple as the one we have before this house, as is suggested by some hon. members; the point of the fundamental rights of a private citizen. I think that is deserving of even greater consideration than the rights of an overwhelmingly powerful government. However, let us carry on with the discussion.

An hon. Member: Yes, let us get on with it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Under the Expropriation Act, in cases of expropriation the person affected, as I read the act and have had it interpreted to me, should be left as nearly as possible in the same position as his neighbours. This being so, Mr. Fontana should be restored to a position of equality with his neighbours who are enjoying their rights because their lands were never required for war purposes. It might be argued that this establishes an unfortunate precedent, but if that is the case I would say it is a good precedent, because justice, freedom and liberty have already been damaged to a considerable extent in this country.

We have moved far along the road of arbitrary government action. Perhaps in view of the comments we have heard during this discussion this afternoon I might urge the supporters of the government and the people of Canada to appeal to the Prime Minister that justice in this instance might prevail.

Mr. Zaplitny: I would like to ask the minister one question. In his remarks a few moments ago he mentioned that the mineral rights have been offered for public tender in this case.

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Zaplitny: I wonder if the minister could state just when this was done?

Mr. Lesage: Sometime in 1955; I do not recall the exact date.

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask what were the results of that offer?

Mr. Lesage: The highest tenderer tendered for $200,000, but it was not only for the minerals on the property about which the hon. members have been talking. There was also an adjoining property of the same size.

Mr. Zaplitny: The reason I ask that question is because I think the very reply the minister has just given pretty well takes the rug out from under his feet so far as the argument he has been using in reply to the representations we are making is concerned.

The minister rested his case largely on the fact that the government is justified in the attitude it is taking because of the fact that after the minerals contained in that property were found to be valuable they were offered for public auction, and that Mr. Fontana had the same opportunity to bid—I think I am using the words of the minister—as had anyone else for these mineral rights.

Mr. Lesage: Sure.

Mr. Zaplitny: We have to be practical, of course, as well as technical. The minister knows as well as I and as well as the hon. member for Brandon-Souris that Mr. Fontana would stand no chance whatever in attempting to bid for mineral rights in competition with Imperial Oil, British American Oil, Gulf Oil and all the other friends of the government.

Mr. Lesage: What if you had purchased the land?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Would you have given Fontana $200,000 15 years later?

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, if we could break that duet down to a solo I would be able to answer the questions. There are two hon. gentlemen speaking and I cannot hear either one.

Mr. Lesage: What if you had purchased the land; what would you do?

Mr. Zaplitny: If I had sold the land to whom?

Mr. Lesage: If you had purchased the land from Mr. Fontana 15 years ago would you feel obligated to give him $200,000 or to give him his mineral rights? I am sure you would not. You would keep them as any man in Canada who has purchased property when there was no reservation of the mineral rights has done in the past.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That is not a forced deal. It is the same thing; sure it is.

Mr. Lesage: There was no forced sale. You are proving to me this afternoon that you are a very poor lawyer, Hamilton.

Mr. Pearkes: Don't be personal, now. This is supposed to be a House of Commons; don't bring personalities into it.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the minister—

Mr. Zaplitny: If the legal talent will hire themselves a hall they can argue this out, and I shall continue to speak in the meantime.

What the minister has just said throws much light on the question. He asked me if I or any private individual for that matter were to purchase that land and a grievance was raised 15 years later, I would be inclined to take the mineral rights into consideration. What the minister seems to forget is that this is not the case of one private individual purchasing from another. This is a case where the government approached a private individual and at first threatened expropriation. The government found later that it was not necessary to go through with the expropriation, and it purchased the property for an airport which was used for war purposes. When the war was over the property was no longer required for that purpose.

I think the minister was not quite accurate when he said the government still operates this airport. As a matter of fact it is not operated any longer by the government, but was leased to the town of Virden, I do not know under whose jurisdiction. I am informed it is now used by a flying club.

The situation is this. Here is the government of this country that obtained this property for the purpose of using it in the war effort and with no thought in mind at all of gaining anything other than the use of the surface of that land. The government did not have in mind gaining the mineral rights in that property, and the government admits even now that it had no such thought in mind. It so happens that the government obtained valuable mineral property from an immigrant who could not read or write, and now the government turns around and uses a technical argument to say that Mr. Fontana has no claim.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Zaplitny: The reason I mention this is because it is not so long ago—only a year ago, in fact—that I had occasion, as did other hon. members, to raise the question of certain tax remissions made to certain corporations in the province of Quebec which involved several million dollars.

The minister raised the question, as did some of his legal supporters on his side of the house, that after all the Fontana case went to the supreme court and the court ruled that Mr. Fontana had no possibility of a claim. The matter I have just mentioned also went to the Exchequer Court of Canada, and the exchequer court ruled quite clearly that these corporations were liable for the taxation that had been imposed on them. They were ordered to pay and they did so. What did this government do then? It turned around and refunded half the money to the corporations after the exchequer court ruled in favour of the crown. It did that under the Financial Administration Act, which permits the government to do that if it is in the public interest.

On one or two occasions the Minister of National Revenue attempted to prove that the government was justified in doing this and that it was done in the public interest. He never did prove this to my satisfaction nor to the satisfaction, I think, of the taxpayers of this country; but this is an indication of the difference between the way in which the government leans over backwards to accommodate these huge corporations which are in a position to finance the Liberal party during elections, as compared with the attitude the government adopts toward a private individual, in this case a man who did not even have the advantage of education. He came here to Canada as an immigrant and served the interests of this country, and because of an inadvertence the government has obtained certain valuable property which they neither sought to obtain nor expected to get. In effect they received an unearned increment which they are not willing to share with this individual.

It has been said before that in this country there is one law for the rich and one law for the poor, and certainly the actions of the government in these two cases has done a great deal to confirm that view. I think the government would be well advised if instead of using these legal arguments and technicalities they took the humane view and shared this wealth which has been discovered with this poor man who parted with it through inadvertence, or through a technical error on the part of his legal counsel. In that way the government would indicate that they are willing to lend an ear and open their minds and hearts to the poor individual as well as the large corporations in this country.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, to come back to the item we were discussing a little while ago, the question of sovereignty over the northern areas, the minister indicated that Canada has not been a supporter of the sector theory. Would he explain to us what the attitude would be in the case of new lands which might be discovered north of these islands by another nation as a result of its explorations?

Mr. Lesage: I have explained the reasons for the lines which have appeared on the maps of Canada since 1903. The claim is made to all discovered or undiscovered land which exists within those lines drawn on Canadian maps. I am assured by my deputy minister, who is quite an expert in territorial waters and waters generally, that there are no new lands to be discovered.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Are we to assume from this that Canada makes no claim whatsoever to the waters in that area or to a measure of sovereignty and control over those waters?

Mr. Lesage: We claim our territorial waters.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am not going to document this at great length, although it could be done very appropriately. I would point out to the minister at this time that he is putting forth a most dangerous proposition. This publication by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys points out:

> —the presence of the sector boundaries on official maps almost implies a claim to the "high seas" forming part of the Arctic ocean, over which it has always been presumed that it is impossible for national sovereignty to exist.

Mr. Leboe: Should not this matter be dealt with by the Department of External Affairs rather than this department?

An hon. Member: Quite right.

Mr. Lesage: That is all right; I do not quarrel with that.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): This publication of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys definitely suggests the presumption that by drawing these lines these rights exist. Then at page 48 reference is made to Senator Poirier's sector. He was the man who first expounded the sector theory. I quote:

> Senator Poirier's "sector", therefore, still remains in an indefinite official state, but it has recently come to take on added meaning with the possibility that large areas of sea ice may be used as airfields. If this becomes a reality, then the question of sovereignty over the ice in "Poirier's sector" will no doubt have to be examined, for it will have some of the aspects and uses of dry land.

With the time at our disposal it is regrettable that we cannot really hammer out this thing, because it is in the interests of Canada and the national defence of Canada. The minister's assumption that any country can come in and establish air bases and other defence efforts immediately north of Canada and south of the north pole flows directly—

Mr. Lesage: I did not admit anything; I gave the legal position.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is one of the most dangerous propositions that has been expounded in this house for a long time.

Mr. Lesage: You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Harkness: The minister casts doubt on the assertion I made some time ago that we had never made any claim to this northern sector.

Mr. Lesage: To the water and ice in the sector.

Mr. Harkness: At page 43 of this same publication put out by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys we find this:

> The polar claims do not appear to have been officially stated in public until June 1925, when the minister of the interior stated, on several occasions, during debates in the House of Commons, that Canada claimed "right up to the pole" (44a, pp. 3773, 4069, 4083). He also defined the longitudinal limits of the claim and tabled a map showing its extent. In December 1953, the Prime Minister of Canada reiterated the claim during House of Commons debate when he said:
>
> "We must leave no doubt of our active occupation and exercise of our sovereignty in these northern lands right up to the pole."

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, just before we took recess I had been quoting from memoir 2, Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, geographical branch, on the boundaries of Canada and its provinces. I was just on the point of quoting what our present Prime Minister said, which was as follows:

> We must leave no doubt of our active occupation and exercise of our sovereignty in these northern lands—

Mr. Lesage: Lands.

Mr. Harkness:

—right up to the pole.

Mr. Lesage: Lands.

Mr. Harkness: The minister is trying to emphasize "lands". I emphasize "right up to the pole". Nobody knows yet whether it is land or floating ice in the vicinity of the pole. I hope the minister will not dispute that. The publication continues:

> Lines delimiting the sector have subsequently appeared on political maps of Canada published by the federal government.

This goes to the point that the minister has been trying to make as to why these lines have appeared showing our sovereignty extending right up to the pole.

> These it is presumed, however, should merely be regarded as lines of allocation, which are delimited through the high seas or unexplored areas for the purpose of allocating lands without conveying sovereignty over the high seas.

I will not read again the subsequent passages read by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, but they indicate the fact that there was in existence in Canada for many years what we might call a sector psychology in regard to this area to the north of Canada, and that everything in this sector running up to the north pole was looked upon as under Canadian sovereignty.

I do not want to enter into any further controversy with the minister over whether these ice masses are floating, anchored or high seas, but I would say that nobody knows whether there is or is not land there. Nobody knows how much of this ice is anchored on land and how much is floating. In any event, I think the minister has followed a completely contrary line to that which has been followed by successive governments in Canada probably from 1903 on but definitely from 1926 on, when the minister of the interior in effect claimed all these areas for Canada, and in going contrary to that position I think he has done a great disservice to the country by what you might call foreclosing any claim we might have to that area.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Make it short.

Mr. Hamilton (York West):—my minister in front of me is giving me some advice to make this as short as possible, but I really do not need too much advice from over there. But since I may get the credit or the blame for starting this, I should like to say simply this in conclusion. I do not take any credit as an international law authority; therefore I was not too much taken back this afternoon by the minister's remarks, but I should like to add this to what the hon. member for Calgary North has said. I think what constitutes a land mass, an ice mass or what are territorial waters in a sea area, is over and above any argument on the basis of legal principle. What we are stressing now is that changing conditions may necessitate a new outlook and a new statement of principle.

The minister has said that nobody will recognize it. There was an article in The Economist of Britain indicating that Russia had asserted the sector principle. It is true that they have named these floating islands, if that is what you want to call them. They have given them numbers, S.P.1, 2, 3 and 4, and as they disappear they go on with the numbering, 5, 6 and 7. As I understand it, these islands are on their side of the pole and are within their sector. But they have been using them for purposes of scientific research. I do not want to give the minister the opportunity of quoting all the authorities he has, but I would respectfully suggest in closing that the minister should have another look at the situation with respect to whether a new principle should be enunciated before it is too late.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, when I spoke yesterday on the general item I posed several questions with regard to northern administration, and I should like the minister to answer them now. One had to do with what steps the government is prepared to take, if any, in order to ensure continued Canadian control, particularly as far as civil powers and rights are concerned, in the northern areas where the D.E.W. line stations are now established. Another was in connection with transportation to the northern areas. I will not take the time to repeat exactly what the questions were. Perhaps the minister has made a note of them and can reply.

Mr. Lesage: As far as sovereignty is concerned, I dealt with that this afternoon in the course of my remarks which were prompted by the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for York West. I said, and I repeat tonight, that there has never been and there cannot be any questions as to our sovereignty on the continent and in the Arctic islands.

Mr. Harkness: If I may interject, it is not a matter of sovereignty. It is a matter of ensuring that Canadian civil rights and civil law are in operation and effect at all these northern D.E.W. stations.

Mr. Lesage: I do not have with me the agreements which were signed between Canada and the United States and which were tabled at the last session. They are pretty voluminous documents. They guarantee that Canadian civil laws apply, that the area is under Canadian control, that our native population up north will be employed and protected, that our natural resources, including wildlife, will be protected. These things are all in the agreements and we have had no trouble at all with the United States authorities. Canadian law is applied according to the agreements and it has been applied in fact. There is no United States control on the D.E.W. line area.

I have visited the D.E.W. line myself. I accompanied the Minister of Defence Production and the Minister of National Defence on a visit to some of the stations. There is no doubt that Canadian sovereignty and control are recognized all along the line. Let us not forget that over 80 per cent of the people to be found at these stations are Canadian. They come from the various provinces and there are also Canadian Eskimos, who are Canadians with full citizenship rights. There are also a few Indians working in the Mackenzie delta at the present time.

The stations will be manned, maintained and operated under the direction of the Federal Electric Company, but arrangements are being made so that most of the employees for the maintenance and the operation of the D.E.W. line will be Canadians. I am glad and proud to say that the discussions we have had with the Federal Electric Company have been very successful from the point of view of providing as much employment as possible for our Eskimos in the north. There has been no difficulty. There has been some doubt cast about sovereignty or control. I am not referring to the hon. member for Calgary North because he has asked questions and has not made assertions, but I am afraid some people have asserted that Canadian control is not effective along the D.E.W. line. To use an expression used by the hon. member for Calgary North, these people have built a straw man and they have been trying to destroy it in their papers.

Nothing exists which one could call United States control in the north. It is Canadian control. Our northern service officers are constantly touring the line. The R.C.M.P. are constantly touring the line looking after order, peace and good behaviour on the part of everyone concerned. It is clear that Canadian law is applied and enforced, and that the control is in the hands of Canadians.

Mr. Harkness: Before the minister goes on to the transport end of it, I think perhaps I should say that in my opinion he is begging the question. He started out by saying that certain agreements were made with the United States and that that covered the whole question. I do not think that covers the question at all, and it is directly contrary to the reports we have received from Canadian newspapermen who were on the trip through the north.

I think the main point I made was this. While there was no overt claim about sovereignty or anything along that line, in effect Canadian sovereignty and control of that area was not being excercised. In other words there were no Canadian civil authority officers at a considerable number of the D.E.W. line stations. As a matter of fact these particular newspapermen who went up there had to go down to New York, report to the United States authorities, and get clearance from the New York authorities, and as far as Canada was concerned she had nothing to do with it at all. All the security arrangements and everything else in connection with the matter or in connection with this particular trip were in the hands of the United States authorities. Possibly the minister is obliged to get authority from Washington before he can make a trip around those stations. I do not know whether that is so. That may be the situation. In any event, as far as Canadian custom regulations are concerned and everything along that line, that sort of thing just had no application whatever.

Mr. Lesage: Oh, yes.

Mr. Harkness: The point I made when I spoke yesterday was that we should have officers of this department or of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at all these stations so that Canadian civil authorities are always in evidence, always apparent and always recognized.

Mr. Lesage: Even during the construction of the D.E.W. line our northern service officers have been touring the line constantly. Moreover, to hear the hon. member talk one would think that the contractors up there were all United States contractors, whereas the fact is, as we know, that in connection with half the line—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): All of it.

Mr. Lesage: —the contract for the construction of half of the line, the western half of it, was given to Northern Construction Company and that for the construction of the eastern half of the line to Foundation Company of Canada, which are two Canadian companies.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I will say this finally in connection with this matter. I have not been up there. I do not know, to my personal knowledge, what the situation is. But all the Canadian newspapermen who went up there told stories about it and gave reports. The stories they wrote were more or less unanimously to the effect that Canadian control of the area had practically disappeared. As a matter of fact Ralph Allen said, "do the Canadians here resent the Americans and the American control of affairs?" and the man replied sadly: "It is exactly the other way around. The Americans resent their being here".

Mr. Lesage: Only two or three newspapermen have written stories in the sense just mentioned by the hon. member, out of a total of 20. The balance have not said anything like that.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, in the newspaper stories I have seen, all the people who went up there indicated that.

Mr. Lesage: You saw the ones you wanted to see for the purpose of discussion of the estimates.

Mr. Harkness: No; I read everything on these things that I can find. As I say, the stories in the papers and magazines have all been along the lines I have indicated.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The Chairman: Shall item 307 carry.

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman. The minister has not said anything about this business of transportation in the north. I have reference to the matter of this railway to Pine Point, about which I spoke yesterday.

Mr. Lesage: I believe that the case for the desirability of a railway has been very well made in the report which was prepared by the commissioner of the northwest territories for the Gordon commission. I do not see exactly what my hon. friend wishes me to add further, because I am sure he has read this brief.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I said yesterday that I was delighted to see that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources was alive to the necessity for improved transportation in the north. I was extraordinarily glad to see that they had presented this brief, which I think was an excellent one. I should like to compliment the deputy minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on this brief. I think it was an extremely good brief. But the question I asked the minister yesterday was whether anything definite was being done or has been done with regard to getting this railway to Pine Point started.

Mr. Lesage: I have had discussions with the railway authorities, and I personally have no doubt about the desirability of such a line. It is a question of timing under the present circumstances, when so much of our physical resources are being used for the huge development which we are witnessing at the present time in Canada. Our physical resources are taxed to a much greater extent than we expected them to be taxed. They are taxed to the point that we had a warning from the Bank of Canada on the subject not later than last week. It is a question of timing.

As I said, I personally have no doubt of the desirability of this railway. It is a question of timing in the over-all economic situation in Canada. I shall be greatly interested to see what the royal commission will have to say about this specific project in relation to the over-all development of Canada.

Mr. Harkness: I agree with what the minister has said, namely that it is a matter of timing. But he still has not answered the question. In other words, has anything definite been done with regard to getting this started?

Mr. Lesage: What do you mean?

Mr. Harkness: Have there been any conversations with the C.N.R.? Have there been any conversations with the C.P.R.? Have there been any arrangements made or tentative talks been had with contractors other than these two railways with regard to building this line? In other words, has anything definite been done about it?

Mr. Lesage: I personally and my officials have had talks with the officers of the railways, but I do not believe I should at this time say what those conversations have been. They were confidential.

The Chairman: Shall item 307 carry?

Mr. Harkness: No, no, Mr. Chairman. The minister still has told us absolutely nothing definite with regard to this railway.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): He has told you all he proposes to tell you.

Mr. Harkness: What is the Minister for Defence Production saying?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I say he has told you all he proposes to tell you, but you keep on talking.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Defence Production is indicating his usual dictatorial attitude as far as parliament is concerned. He is implying that I have no right even to ask questions.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You have asked them.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, if the Minister of Defence Production had his way we would not be sitting here at all.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: And we would not be asking any questions. If we attempted to ask any questions, the Minister of Defence Production would tell us to go home, that it is none of our business. He does not understand or recognize the democratic principles of government. He just does not understand democracy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not understand it as expounded by my hon. friend.

Mr. Harkness: He does not understand democracy; otherwise he would not be interrupting in a discussion of this kind. I would repeat the question that I asked yesterday. Can the minister not tell us anything definite whatever as to when there may be any move with regard to starting this railway?

Mr. Lesage: No, sir.

Forestry branch—

312. Branch administration, $140,887.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to get to my feet on item 312 but I became immersed in this other discussion. I am only going to be a minute or two.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to revert to item 312?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herridge: My remarks will be very brief because I realize that we want to get through the estimates. This is an extremely important branch. I am pleased to know that there is an increase of something over $26,000 in the estimates of this branch. I think that is a very good sign. I am sorry to see a decrease in the item connected with the grant for forest inventory. I hope that does not indicate that the department is gradually going to back out of that field, because in my opinion forest inventory must be a continuing inventory if it is going to be worthwhile and of value to the persons concerned.

I am just going to mention two things. I want to mention briefly a point I tried to make on a previous occasion, that in my opinion, and in the opinion of a large number of the people I represent, particularly those interested in the lumber industry, the most vital thing this government could do to assist in the protection of our forests at the present time would be to consider making grants to provincial governments toward forest fire protection. Just yesterday in the Kootenays there were 2,000 acres of timber burned within 24 hours. That is a tremendous loss. Yesterday in my own district of the Arrow lakes there were 15 fires started within one hour by lightning. This large number of fires commencing at once in one area create very serious problems for the the forest service. You have to have equipment to cope with that satisfactorily; you have to have men, and that means money. I do make an appeal for the consideration of grants to the provinces for the improvement of forest fire protection.

In that connection I am just going to quote very briefly from this very excellent booklet published this year by the forestry branch of the minister's department and entitled "Research Work of the Forestry Branch." I had intended to say a bit more if we had not been cruising around the Arctic for quite so long. I am just going to quote this paragraph, "Forest fire protection section".

> The chief natural enemy of the forests of Canada is fire. This statement is confirmed by the fact that about 50 per cent of the total expenditures by provincial forestry departments are incurred in connection with fire protection. Although great advances have been made in the development of fire protection services during the past 30 years, the danger that investments in forest improvements may literally go up in smoke continues to be a major deterrent to the development of sound forest management.

Those are very true words indeed. It is because of the fear of the loss of forests and of the investment in timber by fire that some companies and some governments still fail to practice the forest management policies that they should be practising at this stage.

The research work of the forestry branch in this field seeks to provide new information and to give assistance in the development of better methods which are essential to the further improvement of fire protection.

I give the branch credit for what it has been doing in this connection. This booklet mentions the very excellent work that is being done. Again I say I think the federal government could well reinvest part of the large sum of money it receives in the form of taxes from the forest industry in grants to the provinces for fire protection purposes. The same conclusions were reached at the conference held at the Chauteau Laurier in 1954 on renewable natural resources. I am not going to read the paragraph, but there again a request is made for some consideration by this government of grants to the provinces for this purpose.

Having said that, I want to mention one other matter. I think the branch does excellent research work, but I plead again for a wider distribution, if possible, of the literature the branch publishes. I know that every effort is being made to get this information into the hands of the people who will appreciate it; but within the last month I have had correspondence, for instance, from the mill manager of a company in which I am interested and the forestry engineer of the same company, asking for information on this and that. I know they have been pleased to receive many of these pamphlets and bulletins that I have sent. In my travels around the constituency I run into a number of lumbermen who operate on a small scale who are not aware of this information.

I do suggest that either through the lumbermen's association of British Columbia, the interior association or the other associations, a greater effort be made to get this excellent information, resulting from research on the part of this branch, into the hands of the men who are producing logs and manufacturing lumber in this country.

Now I want to make one suggestion in respect of research. I have been very interested for some years in fire-resistant paints and things of that sort for wood. I made some inquiries of the national research council and found they had not carried on any research or investigations in that respect. They had dealt with private companies. I think they do give information as to those who are dealing with this matter, and I understand they consider it best to leave research in this field to the private companies in Canada.

I understand this branch has done some work in this respect. This is a type of research that I hope the research branch of the forestry branch will carry on extensively, because it offers a great opportunity. I have heard the question discussed amongst lumbering people and people who want to use our splendid cedar, fir and other woods for roofing and interior and exterior finishing.

I understand that in the United States considerable work has been done along this line. I know of people who desire to use wood not because of the cheapness but because it is a long lasting type of roof. I might mention that regardless of what the manufactured roofing might be, asbestos or whatever it is, according to the Washington department of documents the cedar shake roof is the most efficient and longest lasting, and in the long run the cheapest roof you can put on at the present time. The same is true of the red cedar shingles of British Columbia.

I suggest this is a problem worthy of the very close attention of our forestry branch, because if we get some solution for the protection of wood by coating it with paints or other commodities that will reduce the fire hazard, we will have accomplished a very important thing for the lumber industry as a whole and for those persons in Canada who prefer to use Canadian woods in building and beautifying their homes, rather than these synthetic materials that are foisted on people today because they are in some cases, under present circumstances, the most easily available and more fire-resistant.

Item agreed to.

318. To provide for a contribution to the province of New Brunswick for assistance in a program designed to combat the spruce budworm infestation, in accordance with an agreement entered into by Canada and the province, $650,000.

Mr. Brooks: I shall not detain the committee for any length of time, but as any hon. member can see by reading this item it is very important to my province of New Brunswick. There is a vote of $650,000 for assistance in combating the spruce budworm infestation in our province. I might say that this work has been going on since 1949, or for the last five or six years anyway. I want to congratulate not only the federal government but also the New Brunswick government and the different companies in New Brunswick like International Pulp and Paper, the Fraser Company and the Bathurst Pulp and Paper Company for having joined in combating this great menace to our forests.

I have spoken on this before and it has been mentioned in the house by others. I do not believe in continued repetition so far as these matters are concerned, but I should like to ask the minister whether or not this infestation has spread to other parts of Canada. Has it spread to Quebec, for instance, or into the state of Maine in the United States or the province of Ontario? I notice the estimate is designed principally for the combating of this infestation in the province of New Brunswick.

I should like to ask the minister how much has already been spent in New Brunswick. What success is the department having? Does it feel that this infestation is well under control? How much longer does the department feel it is necessary to carry on its activities in trying to combat this infestation? Will the minister give us a general report on what the situation is regarding this matter in New Brunswick?

Mr. Lesage: I am informed—I know for a fact—that the budworm is spreading into Quebec. I know the government of Quebec has announced that it was spraying and has done so for the last two years. There has been no request for a contribution from the government of Canada. I am informed by the director of the forestry branch that there is some infestation in the state of Maine, and that they are spraying there.

Mr. Brooks: We will not give any assistance to them. How much money does the minister think it will take from the federal government to combat this infestation?

Mr. Lesage: I do not know, but the agreement with New Brunswick that we renewed last year was for 1956, 1957 and 1958.

Mr. Brooks: How much has been spent already?

Mr. Lesage: We spent $1 million in 1953-54 and $314,271 in 1954-55. We spent around $300,000 last year.

Mr. Brooks: The department spent one-third of the cost?

Mr. Lesage: That is right. Of the total cost of the operation, which is carried out by Forestry Protection Limited, which pays one-third—pardon me, the paper companies pay one-third—

Mr. Brooks: What is the situation regarding infestation?

Mr. Lesage: Well, I have a very long report on forest protection, but I can say that the gist of the report is that the situation is very encouraging.

Mr. Brooks: It is under control?

Mr. Lesage: I will send a copy of the report to my hon. friend.

Mr. Rowe: It seems to me that the service to forestry development in this country by the dominion government has been sadly neglected for many years. It is not a case of political differences with any one party, but there seems to be a lack of understanding as to the part that forestry plays in our whole economy.

The hon. member for Royal has mentioned the budworm. We know very well from historical facts that down through the years since 1850—in fact again in 1875, and again later on—we have had these budworm infestations. I do not want to hold up the estimates, because I would like to see this house prorogue; but I feel that this is one very important factor of which the government should take more cognizance. It is not a matter of political differences; it is just a matter of lack of appreciation. From no industry in Canada does the government receive so much income tax and so much benefit as from the pulp and paper industry.

We hear a great deal about the conservation of our resources and of this government not preserving those great natural resources, and I hear a lot of people talking about what has been done to those forests by cutting down the trees. Yet the same people will probably throw half-burned cigarettes in a forest district and do more harm than all the harm they have been talking about that others have done to the forests of this country.

I sometimes think that people have a misconception of our forests. Our forests are like crops. Trees grow as people do. They develop, ripen and mature and become overripe and ready for harvesting. You would not take a wheat field and say to the farmer, "You should not cut that golden field of wheat because it is so beautiful. You are ravaging the agricultural soil by cutting the wheat. It is the same with spruce, balsam and poplar and any trees that are ready to cut and be developed into resources and put into our economy to give employment to our people. It is a crop.

I do say this, Mr. Chairman, and I can say it now, as you probably know, with better grace than I could have some time ago, because I am not connected with any pulp and paper industry in Canada in any managerial or executive position. I do say, independent of politics, that the government of Canada should stop, look and listen with respect to the development of our great resources. I have been a farmer all my life, and I have urged that expenditures be made on agriculture. We have expenditures on agriculture in western and eastern Canada, but no industry in Canada has contributed so much to the national economy and received so little from the Ottawa government as the forestry industry. I take part of the blame myself. It is not a condemnation of the present government; it is the attitude of the government at Ottawa, irrespective of what party is in power.

The budworm infestation, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows probably better than most members in the house—I think he will agree with me in this—destroyed probably 10 million cords in the district with which he and I are so familiar.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The lake Nipigon area alone.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, in the lake Nipigon area alone, 10 million cords. I think he will agree that this industry has returned to the treasury of the dominion tremendous amounts in income tax and so on. We return enormous sums to agriculture, the basic industry, as it is called, of this country, which many of us are interested in; but the pulp and paper industry is criticized for having ravaged the forests. I think the minister will agree with me that from Newfoundland right out to the far west coast, which several hon. members to my left know so well, the companies have tried to play the game. They have tried to establish protection for the forests; they have tried to establish reforestation. The provinces have helped some, but the provinces have not given as much as they might have done, and I think the dominion government should take a new look at what could be done.

We talk about the trans-Canada highway. We need highways through the forests. Don't let us charge the tourists with having thrown out cigarette butts and started fires. The good Lord and nature with lightning start far more fires than anything else. It is almost impossible, either by helicopter or plane, to get into many of those areas. There is nothing that would help more than highways through those areas, and a great deal could be done along that line.

I urge the minister to try to get the members of the cabinet to take a new look at this great resource because, after all, we stand out as the greatest country in the world so far as pulp and paper and timber resources are concerned. During the years of the 1930's, in those awful years, the gold of this country and our forest resources were the key links keeping this country going.

As the hon. member for Royal has so well said, the budworm infestation is terrific. You hear people saying, those who probably have not studied the issue very carefully, that the pulp and paper industry and the lumbermen are stripping the forests and cutting down the beautiful trees and not planting anything else. But keep in mind that the whole pulp and paper industry in Canada consumes only a little more than 25 per cent of the annual depletion of our forests, while fire alone takes almost 25 per cent. The firewood to keep houses warm in districts that have no coal or oil takes almost another 25 per cent.

It seems to me that we are often carried away by the idea that 10 million, 12 million or 13 million cords of wood are cut to keep the pulp and paper industry and the lumber industry going, which bring in about $1,500 million a year in our balance of trade; yet we hear—and I am not critical of this in a political sense—that about $3 million will be spent to protect this. I have urged before in the house and I urge at this time that the government take another look at what could be done to help perpetuate this great resource. The only difference between a crop of golden wheat and a crop of black spruce is that it takes about 60 years to grow a crop of black spruce and something less than six months to grow a crop of wheat. They both must be harvested in time; there shall be a time for seeding and a time for harvesting.

The hon. member for Fort William and others who have lived in the north country know that what I say is true. If a forest is properly harvested it is not depleted, and just because you cut down a beautiful tree it does not mean that another one will not grow in its place; it simply means that perhaps you and I may not be here to see it.

The budworm infestation has been the tragedy of the forest over the last 75 years. The infestation came over from the state of Maine into New Brunswick and Nova Scotia probably 80 years ago, and then it moved on down into Ontario. It has been most devastating, and I know it is almost impossible to eradicate. In the province of Ontario the budworm was sprayed from aeroplanes and various other measures were taken to kill the budworms; but they moved out into the lakes and killed the fish, and there were all sorts of repercussions along the line.

I do believe that the dominion government should be more active in co-operating with the various provinces across Canada in an effort to defeat the budworm. It must be remembered that the budworm does not understand or acknowledge provincial boundaries. I realize that this matter is a provincial responsibility, but I think it is a matter the importance of which we in this chamber fail to emphasize in relation to our whole national economy.

For instance, let us think of our fire protection system. A fire could start in the province of Quebec and sweep through the province of Ontario. Forest fires disrespect provincial borders; we have seen them do that. I feel there should be closer co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. As a matter of fact I think the provinces should co-operate more in building highways through the various forest areas, and I think the federal government should be as interested in developing such roadways as it is in building the trans-Canada highway.

Another aspect of this matter I have mentioned once before in this house and would like to bring up again at this time is that if we should ever become involved in another tragic war—and God forbid that it should ever happen—we should try to conceive what might happen in view of the development of these disastrous and terrible instruments of destruction that could destroy our national wealth very quickly if two or three bombs fell in our forests during a dry season in the summer. If this should ever happen the highways I have referred to would be extremely important.

I am not going to delay the house because I am anxious to see this session expedited and concluded, but I urge upon the minister to talk to his colleagues, especially the Minister of Trade and Commerce, for he knows as I do that what I have said is true. Let us look at this squarely, independently of parties, as an issue that involves one of the greatest resources of this country, and let us give some consideration to doubling, trebling and possibly quadrupling the money that is spent for our forest development and protection.

Personally I would like to see some arrangement made whereby we would have highways built through these forest areas, areas that are not yet taken up by any company, so that in case of fire, budworm infestation or enemy attack we would have ways and means of reaching those districts and safeguarding one of the greatest resources we have. No other people in the world have ever had a single resource such as we Canadians have. We have the greatest forest resources in the world. Canada is now supplying 85 per cent of the world's newsprint, almost all of it, and about 65 per cent of the world's pulp. This is a resource that is worth as much as gold itself. I can speak in this way because at the moment I am not identified with any company.

As a member of this house I feel that we in this chamber have not fully comprehended the importance of this vital resource, and independently of our party affiliations we have not quite done all that we should do to safeguard and protect it. As a farmer I do not mind if the government spends $12 million, $18 million or $100 million in subsidies for agriculture, but I shudder to think that in relation to this great resource which returns so much to the federal treasury we on both sides of the house appear to consider it as picayune and are adopting an attitude of reckless abandon.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I have another question I should like to direct to the minister. In the last few weeks we have heard statements by the Minister of Fisheries to the effect that he is taking action, either criminal or civil, due to the destruction of certain fisheries in the province of New Brunswick caused, as he says, by the spraying of D.D.T. in the process of eliminating and destroying the budworm.

As the hon. member who has just taken his seat said, the work that is being done by the federal and provincial governments and by the companies concerned has meant a saving to the economy of the province of New Brunswick as far as the pulp and paper industry and the forests are concerned.

I would like to ask the minister if any investigation has been made by his department to find out whether there is any responsibility on the part of his department for the destruction of the fisheries, and if there is any great justification on the part of the Department of Fisheries for bringing such an action. I am not certain whether the department is bringing action against the department of northern affairs, the province of New Brunswick or one of the individual aviation companies that have been doing the spraying. A great deal has been said by the ministry of fisheries in connection with this matter.

The people in New Brunswick are very much concerned to know whether there has been any great lack of responsibility on the part of any of the parties concerned in connection with the destruction of certain fisheries in our province. I thought perhaps the minister might be able to enlighten us on this particular matter.

Mr. Lesage: My department has no responsibility for the actual spraying operation, and I would not know—

Mr. Brooks: You do not know?

Mr. Lesage: I do not know if the aviation company is guilty of negligence.

Mr. Brooks: Are they not the agents of your department?

Mr. Lesage: Not at all, Mr. Chairman. The only thing we do is contribute one-third of the cost to Forest Protection Limited, which is responsible for the whole operation. It lets subcontracts, and I suppose it has let a subcontract to an aviation company. That is all I know about it.

Mr. Brooks: You have made no investigation of any kind?

Mr. Lesage: I have no investigation to make.

Mr. McBain: Mr. Chairman, I was concerned with a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition on July 20 of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources regarding the spruce budworm outbreak in the Cape Breton highland national park area around Ingonish beach.

I had the pleasure of spending a few days in the Cape Breton highland national park and I visited that area two or three days before the question was raised in the house. I was concerned about the minister's reply when he said that he had obtained a report from the forest biology division of the Department of Agriculture to the effect that there was no real, sudden outburst. There may have been some infestation in the national park, but there was nothing extraordinary. After you drive into the park for a bit you find an area which was burned over seven years ago, and that certainly is not a beautiful sight for tourists. An area of burned bare trees cannot be considered a tourist attraction.

I am concerned that in the Ingonish area there has been a serious outbreak of the spruce budworm. Wherever you look you see nothing green; the new growth has been completely devoured. If you walk into the trees in a few moments you are completely covered with grubs. I would hate to see that beautiful park area devoured. Cape Breton national park is one of the outstanding parks in eastern Canada, and with the improvements being made on the road it should be a real tourist attraction. I wonder if the minister has any comments to make.

Mr. Lesage: I am informed that there has been an outbreak, although not too serious. This is not confined to the park area but covers that part of the province. Our technical people are studying the matter along with the officials of the forest biology division of the Department of Agriculture, and there will also be talks with the appropriate officials of the provincial government to see what can be done.

Mr. McBain: Is any spraying being done at the present time?

Mr. Lesage: I will have to get a report from the technical people before I can make a decision that spraying should be done. I am not an expert, but I understand that spraying must be done in June if it is to be effective, because that is the only time you can kill the budworm. The hon. member for Royal nods his head. If any decision is taken as to what can be done and if it involved spraying would have to wait until next June.

Forest products laboratories division—

320. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $540,125.

Mr. Barnett: Coming from one of the major forest areas of the country, I want to make an eloquent plea for a greater interest in our forests. I join with the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West, who have emphasized the need for an increased use of cedar products. In British Columbia we have some fine stands of hemlock, which is a good pulp timber, and cedar, and the adequate use of cedar products has presented quite a problem. The amount in this item represents a significant increase over the amount provided last year, and it would be interesting if the minister could explain briefly just what program is involved.

Mr. Lesage: I announced some time ago that the government had decided to build a laboratory at Pointe Claire, near Montreal, for the pulp and paper research institute of Canada. We used to grant $100,000 a year to this institute, and after two years of discussion it has been decided to the satisfaction of the government and the institute that we should cease making that grant and, in lieu thereof, build a modern research laboratory at an estimated cost of $2,250,000. The half million dollars provided by this item is an estimate of what can be done this year.

Mr. Barnett: Is there to be an expansion of the forest products laboratory at the University of British Columbia?

Mr. Lesage: We are building a new laboratory on the university campus, which is covered by an item in the estimates of the Department of Public Works. There is also a laboratory being built at Ottawa for which money is being provided in the public works estimates. As a matter of fact I am informed that tenders are in for the two laboratories.

Mr. Brooks: Have you any other laboratories in Canada besides those two? Have you any in eastern Canada?

Mr. Lesage: We have forest research stations all across Canada, with a good one at Acadia.

Canadian government travel bureau—

323. To assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada, $1,567,559.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, this item which deals with the Canadian government travel bureau is important to all Canada, because travel in this country by people from the United States or other parts of the world represents one of our major sources of foreign exchange. In recent years, while there has seemed to be an improvement in our travel position, the actual case is that we have been falling back rather badly in the number of people who come to Canada as tourists. The best basis of comparison which can be offered is the expenditures of United States citizens for travel in other countries. I intend to compare 1948 with 1954.

We find that in 1948 United States citizens expended about 21 per cent of their travel expenditures in Europe. This has increased to 38 per cent. In 1948 they spent 19 per cent in Mexico; today they are spending about the same, 20 per cent. In the case of Canada we find that their expenditures in 1948 represented 44 per cent of the total, but those expenditures had dropped to 30 per cent in 1954. That is clear and conclusive and definite evidence that the Canadian government travel bureau is not doing the job it should or which it could do to attract the citizens of other countries to Canada to spend their time and money in this country.

This tremendous dropping off in the proportion of United States travel funds spent in Canada is masked by the fact that their dollar expenditures have gone up, but the fact remains that we have been getting a smaller and smaller share of that amount.

Mr. Lesage: They are going to Europe.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I have already pointed that out.

Mr. Lesage: They could not go before.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to have the minister bring up that point. That is why I deliberately chose the year 1948. By 1948 the war had been over for several years. Transportation to Europe—

Mr. Lesage: How many years? Seven years?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I chose 1948 and 1954, and I said that by 1948 the war had been over for several years.

Mr. Lesage: Three years.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Communication with Europe had been opened up again. Transportation by boats and planes was available.

Mr. Lesage: Not much to eat though.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Hotels had been renovated. One of the great attractions in Europe at that particular time was the exchange situation, which was very heavily in favour of the United States traveller going to Europe. Despite all these advantages, in that year we were still able to attract 44 per cent of the total United States dollar expenditures on travel, but by 1954 that percentage had fallen to 30 per cent. I am delighted that the minister gave me the opportunity to emphasize that point.

As I have said, these statistics would seem to indicate that the department has been doing an unsatisfactory job in this field. I suggest also that in the coming years travel will be of increasing importance as a source of foreign exchange to a country like ours, which needs it so badly. With automation, the reduction of the work week and a higher standard of living, more and more dollars are going to flow into travel expenditures, and we must be prepared to get our share. Therefore if our attractions for the tourist or our way of merchandising them are unsatisfactory now, it betokens a condition which will become increasingly serious in the future.

Having said that, I should like to proceed to a few points that might be of some assistance to the minister in dealing with this problem. The first suggestion I would make is that the responsibility for the travel bureau be transferred from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to the Department of Trade and Commerce. Travel is not a natural resource. It is a trade; it is something which has to be merchandised and sold. In the foreign countries of this world we already have a magnificent organization of Canadian government trade commissioners. They can do an excellent job of handling tourist promotion in those areas. While we are taking advantage of their services to a very limited extent at the present time, there is no co-ordination and no integration. Therefore I suggest the transfer of this branch of the government to a department where it would be genuinely at home.

Because on occasion I have been known as a critic of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for having too much to do and too much under his control, I suggest in passing that he trade to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources the Eldorado Mining and Refining operation in return for the Canadian government travel bureau, for I can realize that nobody likes to lose part of his empire without getting a little bit from somebody else. The Northern Transportation Company, which is closely allied with Eldorado Mining and Refining, might also go along to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, or it might find its way into the Department of Transport.

However, while that suggestion would deal at least in part with improving the merchandising of Canada's tourist attractions, it would not deal with one of the biggest oversights in the work of the bureau at the present time. I refer to its complete concentration upon selling Canada and travel in Canada to other nations and in the process overlooking completely the possibilities involved in Canadians travelling from one part of Canada to another and becoming better acquainted with their own country.

The reason I bring that up at this point is that it does not matter whether we attract a United States dollar into this country to be spent by a tourist or whether we retain a Canadian dollar in this country rather than see it go south of the border to the United States. The net effect on our exchange position is exactly the same.

Therefore it would seem to me that by persuading some of the millions of Canadians who go to the United States each year to stay in Canada and see Canada our exchange position would be the same or better, and we would have a great rebirth of interest in this country. I would also point out that it would be of tremendous benefit to certain areas such as the maritimes, which are keenly interested in increasing their financial resources at the present time.

Turning from this point to the question of the extent to which the travel bureau is actually doing a job at this time, I wonder whether the house and the minister realize that a little country like Mexico, little in comparison to Canada, is spending approximately $4 million on the promotion of travel for its purposes as against $1,500,000 by us, or almost three times as much as Canada. A few minutes ago I quoted figures which showed the effect of that expenditure. From 1948 to 1954, while expenditures by Americans on travel in Canada dropped from 44 per cent to 30 per cent, expenditures by Americans in Mexico remained almost static. They were 19 per cent of the total expenditure in 1948 and 20 per cent in 1954. That is very directly the result of proper and adequate merchandising by Mexico.

I would point out to the minister that little places like the Bahama islands and Bermuda, places with not a hundredth or a thousandth of the resources of Canada, surpass our budget in their expenditures on tourist promotion for their countries.

In some respects the work of the tourist bureau is very attractive. I hold in my hand their booklet called "Canada, Vacations Unlimited". It is an attractive piece, well printed and well done; but if the minister will consult with advertising experts or experts on tourism I think he will find that most of the bureau's promotional literature, including "Canada, Vacations Unlimited", has missed one of the main points of tourist promotion, the need for regional promotion, to make a thing come alive in terms that the person reading it can understand.

This booklet first of all promotes Canada as a whole; and while that is a good thing, it is something which it is difficult to sell. Next it promotes features of tourism in Canada such as adventure in the wilderness, scenic transportation, fun and games. You can have fun and games in any country in the world. Certainly that is no special feature which is going to draw people to this country. Then there is reference to national parks. We have very attractive national parks. So has the United States. The booklet refers to shrines and historic places in Canada. I shall deal with that in a moment but in general terms all countries have shrines and historic places. In other words this booklet and this expenditure is not showing with respect to Canada anything new or different which would have a special attraction for people outside our borders.

It then goes ahead to deal with the provinces, and that is a good thing, more under the basis of regional promotion; but it still does not make the reason come alive in the minds of the prospective tourists to Canada as to why they should come here rather than go somewhere else. I suggest to the minister that he would get immeasurably better results from his expenditures in this field if he would promote vividly very narrow regions, taking not a province but small areas in a province and showing much more specifically what the tourist will find.

I also suggest to the minister that far more emphasis should be placed by his department on the specific aspects of Canadian history which tie in so closely with the United States of America and with the European countries. We were the first settled country on the North American continent. We have a history which comes vividly alive in various parts of this country, as in Quebec city itself, Montreal, Kingston, the point where the first passage was made through the Rockies, and in a thousand and one places. There are in Canada for tourists tremendously exciting experiences which have never been promoted and have never been brought to their attention by the federal tourist bureau.

These suggestions will admittedly make many demands upon the budget of the tourist bureau. I am one of those who seldom rise in this house and advocate a specific additional expenditure. When I do so I like to feel that the expenditure which is being advocated is tied to a specific return to this country or to the federal government. I suggest to the minister that there are very few fields in which a dollar spent will bring a greater return to Canada than would be brought here through proper expenditures by the federal tourist bureau, expenditures which would be somewhere in line with or equal to those of a country like Mexico, whose resources are so much more limited than are ours, or an area like the Bahama islands or Bermuda, all of which are spending on their tourist promotion more than we are spending. I suggest to the minister that our limited promotion is at the very root of the reason we are enjoying or rather suffering—that is a far better word—such a serious adverse balance of trade in respect of our tourist business.

There are many more things that could be said on this matter, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me that I have put quite a few ideas forward, and at least I have drawn the minister's attention to the matter. In deference to his wish to get through his estimates as quickly as possible I shall now await his reply on these matters.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the committee in order to record a few facts which are of vast importance to my own province and which I think perhaps might be of great importance to people in other parts of Canada and elsewhere.

I have in my hand the issue of the Charlottetown Guardian of July 10, in which is reported an interview with Dr. Elzear Campagna who is recognized as an expert on ragweed. In the interview he is reported as follows:

"You have a gold mine here on Prince Edward Island and you don't know it," said Dr. Elzear Campagna of the faculty of agriculture at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, Quebec, yesterday who has pioneered in the eradication of ragweed in eastern Canada since 1936.

The article continues further:

From surveys which he started in 1936, he has found that Prince Edward Island is one the the areas most free of ragweed which is one of the main causes of hayfever. Dr. Campagna states that the hayfever season is from the 15th of August to the 15th of September and if Island conditions are sufficiently advertised this province could easily become a mecca for sufferers from the affliction. These people could be, as it were, a "second harvest" to the regular tourist business which is pretty well over at this time of year.

Dr. Campagna notes that many sufferers from hayfever spend large amounts of money trying to find relief from the affliction and only a small percentage of these have been successful. "It would be much cheaper and a great deal more pleasant for them to come to a place which is free from affliction such as your province," he said.

In case it might be of some value to places which are trying to eradicate this weed I might say that Dr. Campagna said that the eradication of the plant is not an expensive procedure. He says that about two ounces of 2-4D to a gallon of water will effectively destroy it. I might conclude by quoting the closing words of the interview:

In concluding his remarks, Dr. Campagna said: "You have something here which is even more valuable than gold—gold may be mined and sold and you do not possess it any more—but an area which is free of ragweed is a constant source of income to its people."

The Chairman: Shall item 327 carry?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman I thought perhaps the minister was going to make some reply to the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. I had a quite lengthy speech myself to make on this subject, but in view of the lateness of the hour and the lateness of the session I think I will let it go.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lesage: Send it to me.

Mr. Harkness: I will merely say this. The general travel situation in Canada is evidently quite unsatisfactory. However, I should like to say that I think that is no fault of the director of the travel bureau, who has probably done as well as anybody could possibly have done with the funds at his disposal as far as promoting travel is concerned.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Is the minister not going to explain at least something of what is being done in meeting the situation as far as the tourist trade is concerned?

Mr. Lesage: I listened very carefully to the speech of the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, who said that we were wrong in all we were doing in the travel bureau. But he was contradicted by the hon. member for Calgary North, who said that the director of the travel bureau is doing a splendid job. What can I say?

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the minister should put words in my mouth.

Mr. Lesage: That was not my intention.

Mr. Harkness: I started out saying, as he will recall, that the travel situation in Canada was not good. However, I did not blame it on the director of the travel bureau.

Mr. Lesage: You said he was doing a splendid job.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In order that there may be no doubt in the minister's mind, since he is trying to muddy the water may I say that I did not state, first of all, that the director of the travel bureau himself was doing an improper job. I laid the blame at the door of the government. In the second place, I will state that Mr. Dolan is one of the most charming people I have ever met. He is one of the most capable public speakers I have ever heard. He has carried the story of Canada to a great many places. All that still leaves the bureau and the government's policy and their operation in a deplorable condition. It is not necessarily the fault of Mr. Dolan, but it is the minister's responsibility to give us some idea whether he plans any changes or any improvements, or whether he has any plans whatsoever for the future.

Mr. Rowe: Give him more money.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: Did I hear somebody yawn?

Mr. Brooks: You need not be surprised at that.

Mr. Herridge: With reference to what the hon. member who has just spoken has said and what the hon. member for Calgary West said, I might say that I have in my hand a pamphlet entitled "Nature Trails in Mount Revelstoke National Park". It is a guide to items of interest, including some of the flora and fauna at the summit of Mount Revelstoke and along the trails to Millar, Eva and the Jade lakes. I have read this and I think it is a most excellent pamphlet, which is issued under the authority of the minister and published in co-operation with the Canadian travel bureau. This is the sort of thing that is real publicity. It does not contain a lot of information about hot dog stands. This is something that anyone entering the park would like to have. I was very pleased with it, because it concerns Mount Revelstoke national park which is in the Kootenays. I ask the travel bureau to continue issuing these booklets with regard to the other national parks in British Columbia.

Mr. Lesage: We have such pamphlets for every park in Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): This is not going to make me popular with the government, but I think it is about time members on the treasury benches learned that some of us do not come here just to make speeches. We come here, first of all, to put forward what we consider are cogent comments and perhaps a few helpful suggestions. We also believe it is the responsibility of the appropriate minister, when he brings estimates before this house, to give some explanation about future policy when such a request is made. We believe it is the responsibility of the appropriate minister to make at least some comment. We have become accustomed, in some cases, to rather cavalier treatment from certain ministers, but I do not think that has been the usual course of action of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I am asking him again if he will make some comments on the points I have made in connection with the tourist bureau, and what future plans and future expectations are in this field.

Mr. Lesage: I shall discuss with the director of the travel bureau and my deputy minister the suggestions that have been made by the hon. member.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Has the minister any intention of applying for an increase in the budget next year?

Mr. Lesage: This will be shown in the estimates of next year, sir.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Has the minister any answer for the condition which has been apparent, not only in one year but ever since 1948, in which United States dollars have been spent in increasing amounts in Europe and in decreasing amounts in Canada?

Mr. Lesage: Every year in the last five years there has been an increase in the number of visitors and the amount of money they have spent in Canada, as well as in the extent of their stay. A greater number of United States citizens have been going to Europe since 1948 for the very good reason that conditions have been improving steadily in Europe since 1948. Another reason is the fact that there has been more money available in the United States, so that people could spend larger amounts and thus be able to go to Europe instead of coming to Canada as they used to do.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Does the minister expect the situation in that regard to continue in the future? Does he expect that situation to continue indefinitely?

Mr. Lesage: An increased number of tourists in Canada; definitely, every year.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No; a decreasing proportion of United States people coming to Canada?

Mr. Lesage: I do not know; it will depend on economic conditions.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

35. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $15,500,000.

Mr. Charlton: Earlier I brought to the minister's attention a resolution that was sent in by the county council of Simcoe and endorsed by the Brant county council regarding the feed grain situation in eastern elevators. I have here a letter from the secretary treasurer of the Wellington county federation of agriculture which I am presenting on behalf of the hon. member for Wellington-Huron, who is unavoidably absent tonight. This resolution concerns the beef producers and their desire for more information in marketing reports given over the C.B.C. Perhaps I had better read it:

> That the Wellington county beef producers' association annual meeting request the marketing service of the federal Department of Agriculture give more information in their livestock marketing reports for radio broadcast. This information to include the number of cattle sold at the prices quoted. And that the information re the price quotation of cattle and numbers be taken from the sales office.

This is signed by Alex Anderson, the secretary treasurer. I am bringing this to the attention of the minister on behalf of the hon. member for Wellington-Huron, who is unavoidably absent.

I know the minister is aware of the feed grain situation. As I said earlier, I brought to his attention a resolution from the Simcoe county council and the Brant county council when the estimates were last being considered. The situation apparently is that the eastern elevators contain a high percentage of grains other than feed grains. There is not sufficient room for the storage of feed grain for the eastern Canadian market, and consequently it is necessary for the farmer to pay the extra freight that is entailed in bringing that grain down by rail after the water shipping season has ended.

I wonder if the minister could not do something about that situation. This is an extra cost to the feeders in eastern Canada, the extra freight on this grain, and according to reports there is some of the grain in the elevators that has been standing there for some time.

Mr. Gardiner: The matter of shipping grain of all kinds from the west to the east or from the west to any part of the country comes under trade and commerce, and much of it is regulated through the wheat board. Shipping in general is taken care of in that way.

So far as payments are concerned, we do make payments on the freight, whether it goes by water or whether it goes by rail. I think it is correct to say that there never has been any hold-up in so far as these particular payments are concerned, as a result of anything that has been done by this department. I am not in a position to explain all the intricacies of the trade as represented in trade and commerce, but I do know every effort is made to get as much feed grain as possible down to the east and have it stored in places where it can be distributed to the farmers as readily as possible. While there have been some complaints from certain areas, I do not think there has been a general complaint with regard to it.

Mr. Brooks: I notice that the amount this year is $15,500,000, the same as last year, and I am wondering whether any consideration was given to the fact that freight rates have increased during the last few months or even in the last few weeks. The fact that the amount for this year is the same as last year would mean the farmers in eastern Canada, and particularly in the maritime provinces, would be in a different position from what they were in the previous year. I wonder whether any consideration was given to the increase in freight rates which the railways have recently received?

Mr. Gardiner: Consideration has been given over the years to the increase in freight rates, and in so far as the freight on grain for the maritimes is concerned we have retained the assistance at the same level as it was prior to the changes that were made two years ago. The changes that were made two years ago applied to British Columbia and the central provinces. We base this upon the payments that are made to the maritimes, and try to keep the rates at the same level in the maritime provinces.

Mr. Brooks: But no consideration was given to the recent increase in freight rates?

Mr. Gardiner: Not to those that have taken place since that time, but consideration was given up until the change that was made two years ago.

Mr. Brooks: We would be in a different position this year from our position last year?

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister has conveniently at hand an account of the amount of grain that was shipped from the west down to the maritimes during 1955?

Mr. Gardiner: Total tons shipped in the fiscal year 1955-56—perhaps I had better give this for all the provinces, or I can have it placed on the record as it is here—to Ontario, total tons, 878,973; to Quebec, 1,049,588; to New Brunswick, 91,212.

Mr. Blackmore: Is that oats or barley?

Mr. Gardiner: It is the tonnage all told; to Nova Scotia, 133,398; to Prince Edward Island, 31,403; to Newfoundland, 18,800; to British Columbia, 214,657.

Item agreed to.

36. Agricultural lime assistance, $500,000.

Mr. Montgomery: Can the minister break down the amount of lime assistance given to each province? What is the freight assistance given now per ton?

Mr. Gardiner: For the last year?

Mr. Montgomery: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: In 1955-56, to Prince Edward Island, 25,049 tons; to Nova Scotia, 41,036 tons; to New Brunswick, 30,514 tons; to Quebec, 261,355 tons; to Ontario, 41,625 tons; to British Columbia, 22,715 tons; to Newfoundland, 4,160 tons.

Mr. Brooks: What is the assistance per ton?

Mr. Montgomery: I just want to follow that up. I think the minister missed the other part of my question. What is the assistance per ton?

Mr. Blackmore: Where are the lime deposits?

Mr. Gardiner: It is $1.50. To answer the other question, there are lime deposits here and there across the country, and the lime is sent from the nearest deposit to the place where we ship it.

Item agreed to.

37. To provide for quality premiums on high grade hog carcasses and administration costs, $5,700,000.

Mr. McBain: Can the minister give us any information as to whether the department is giving consideration, or will give consideration, to the request of the hog producers for an increase in the subsidy on grade A hogs from $2 to $3?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, the department has given consideration to the suggestion that a change should be made in the payments as between B hogs and A hogs; but after giving it careful consideration we arrived at the conclusion that it would not be wise to make any change at the present time.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): In view of the fact that hog production in Canada is going down, and because of the grade of hogs we have in the west, I wonder whether the minister would keep this under consideration for a while?

Mr. Gardiner: The matter of the premium?

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: We have it under consideration all the time, of course, but we do not think it is wise to change at the present time.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I am talking of the future.

Item agreed to.

38. For assistance in construction of potato warehouses under terms and conditions to be approved by the governor in council, $25,000.

Mr. MacLean: I notice there is an increase of $15,000 in this item. Can the minister give us some indication of where this money is to be spent in the present fiscal year? When potato warehouses are built, is any consideration given to temperature control so those warehouses will preserve potatoes in good condition in hot weather as well as preventing them from freezing during cold weather?

Mr. Gardiner: No new warehouses have been put in since 1950. There is about $4,500 in Prince Edward Island and about $6,000 in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Brooks: None in New Brunswick?

Mr. Gardiner: None in New Brunswick.

Mr. MacLean: Would consideration be given to assistance in cases where it is considered advisable that temperature controls be installed in those warehouses to keep the temperature down in hot weather so that potatoes can be stored in good condition near the point of production, rather than necessarily in the large cities during the hot weather in the summer?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, that is taken into consideration. Where we do give grants, they must meet the conditions in connection with temperature and things of that kind.

Mr. MacLean: Is that one of the requirements at the present time?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister mentioned expenses in only two provinces. Are we to gather that the other provinces are equipped adequately with warehouses and that no more money is being spent in them?

Mr. Gardiner: No: we have had applications from only the two provinces.

Mr. Montgomery: Is assistance in the way of contributions to warehouses given only at ports where export shipments take place? What are the conditions that prevail?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it is not at ports; it is out in the country, or at any particular place where it is thought by the producers it would be helpful. In Saskatchewan, for example, it is out near Lumsden, and that is about in the centre of the province.

Mr. Montgomery: Must the applicant be a co-operative, or something like that?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the application must come from a co-operative organization.

Item agreed to.

40. To provide for administrative expenses, agricultural Prices Support Act, $89,650.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether the minister has given any consideration at all to equalizing support prices on hogs across Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, we have given consideration to it, but we give that consideration having in mind the many applications that have been made in an attempt to equalize freight rates across Canada, and it would be very difficult to apply it to one product without applying it to others. One need only say that to realize the enormous amount of money that would be involved if we attempted to do any such thing in the movement of products generally across the country.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I am prepared to go quite a way with the minister on this, when one considers the pressure that is on us at the present time; but I do think that the hog producers of the province of Alberta are being called upon to face a situation which they should not have to face. For example, in the city of Edmonton the floor price for hogs is $18.50. Ninety per cent of the hogs that are exported from the province of Alberta go to the British Columbia market. It only costs $1 a hundred to move them out. I think the hog producers in the province of Alberta are actually being called upon to do something they should not have to do. Someone is making something on this.

In closing my remarks I urge the minister and his department to give serious consideration to trying to do something in the way of equalizing the support price on hogs throughout all of Canada within the next year.

Mr. Gardiner: As I said, Mr. Chairman, we have been giving consideration to the matter and we are inclined to think that probably Alberta is better off than any province. They are not far removed from the Vancouver market and their hogs can get there at a comparatively low freight rate. The price, too, is generally favourable on the coast. If we were to do what the hon. member asked, we would have to consider paying the freight on a much greater number of hogs that go down to the eastern market.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): From Alberta?

Mr. Gardiner: No, from Saskatchewan and Manitoba. We deal, of course, with hog producers right across Canada, and provincial boundaries do not count in that kind of thing. As my hon. friend has said, over 90 per cent of the hogs move from Alberta to Vancouver, which is a relatively short distance; and few hogs, say 10 per cent, move from Alberta east. Practically all the hogs that are moved from Saskatchewan and Manitoba are moved to the east. I can assure the hon. member that freight costs on those hogs would be very much higher. If we tried to equalize out in Alberta we would be expected to equalize in the other provinces as well.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will take this under advisement and study the problem, because I cannot yet see any justification for a floor price of $23 a hundredweight at Toronto and Montreal for the hog producers in Ontario, and the floor price of only $18.50 for the hog producers in Alberta. I shall drop it at this point.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the minister give us some idea why this inequitable disparity should prevail?

Mr. Gardiner: The disparity may prevail on the floor price but not on the price the farmer receives for hogs in Alberta as compared with the price received in other provinces. The price in Alberta is considerably more above the floor than is the case in the other western provinces.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Chairman, I cannot accept that, and I must state that is a very debatable point. However, we shall continue with this discussion at another time.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, could the minister give some figures to justify the remark he has just made? We in Alberta do not feel satisfied about this matter. Could the minister give actual figures, for example, for the month of February or January at Alberta points and at Manitoba points? What the minister says is not in accordance with the information we have.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry, but I do not have the prices here. I have them on my desk over in my office. They come in every morning and are put on my desk. I do not check them every morning but I check them throughout the week, and we have studies made of them from time to time. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that the situation is as I have outlined it.

The hogs do sell on the western coast at a price that is at least as good as that which they obtain in other markets; this is true most of the time. The province of Alberta is able to take advantage of the Vancouver market. The market is too far away from Saskatchewan and Manitoba for the hog producers there to take advantage of it, and therefore any advantage there is in having that market goes to Alberta. I think that is generally understood by the trade.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister will recognize the fact that much has been said about the amount of the subsidy that is paid to agriculture. According to the annual report of the department for the year ending March 31, 1955, the total amount paid at March 31, 1954 was some $80 million, of which the sum of $69 million was due to the foot-and-mouth epidemic in 1952, and this has to do with pork and beef. Another amount of $923,000 is charged up in the 1954-55 period and that brings the total to barely $1 million a year which has been spent on agricultural price supports not including beef and pork during the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease.

The sum of $2 million is put aside by the government each year for this purpose, and apparently the sum of only $1 million a year has been spent. I think no one could criticize that too much, and I hope the urban people realize how little is paid to agriculture as compared with the amount paid to other industries across this country that are non-agricultural.

I did not give the figures for the end of 1954. The last report of the agricultural prices support board gives figures including the year ending March 31, 1955, and the sum of only $3 million more was spent in the 1954-55 period.

I think the minister should give some kind of statement concerning the amount of subsidy paid to the agricultural industry as compared to the amount paid to non-agricultural industries, because I am sure that coming from the minister this information would mean more than if it were to be given by an individual member of the house.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, Mr. Chairman, I thought it was not going to be necessary for me to say anything, because I understood the hon. member to be speaking favourably of the amount that has been paid out. I only wish to state that the total amount paid out over the years beginning with 1946, which was the first year there were any payments under this, is $89,196,061.31. That includes the figure for the 1955-56 period, which is a year in addition to the years for which the hon. member has just given us the figures.

That sum is made up of an amount of $2,036,000 on potatoes. I will just give round figures in most cases. It also includes $6,700,000 on apples, $194,000 on dried beans, $177,000 on extracted honey, $677,000 on dried skim milk, $155,000 on cheddar cheese, $8,542,378 on creamery butter, $673,194.39 on eggs, and on hogs, practically all of which came in the foot-and-mouth activities, $36,673,894.07. On cattle, again including the foot-and-mouth disease, it was $33,358,015.86, making a total of $89,196,061.31.

The fund is a revolving one in the amount of $200 million. We can, of course, utilize up to that amount each year to the extent that we get the money back into the fund again without drawing any more from the treasury. We simply draw from the treasury from time to time when it is necessary to do so and the sum of about $350 million has been utilized altogether. From year to year we get a certain percentage of it back into the fund from selling the products. There has only been a net amount spent of $89,196,061.31. That is the total for fighting foot-and-mouth disease and to carry on the other activities.

Mr. Charlton: Outside of the foot-and-mouth disease it would amount to about $1 million a year?

Mr. Gardiner: The total is about $19 million now.

Mr. Charlton: Over the ten years that is the total?

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Chairman, around May 3 I put on the record the actual cost of raising a hog from the weaning stage right up to the market stage, and I should like to ask the minister if during the coming year he will have one of his experimental farms make a careful survey of how much it actually costs to raise a hog to market stage. If the minister wishes he can do it on his own farm, taking everything into consideration except his own salary as cabinet minister.

Mr. Gardiner: This has been done a number of times at the Guelph agricultural college, but I do not know whether it has been done in the last two or three years. It has been done at the university at Edmonton and at quite a number of places. I am afraid if farmers were to follow the course followed in setting up these figures there would not be many of us producing hogs. I do not think it is fair to say that if you do not meet all the conditions set out in these figures no farmer is going to make money out of producing hogs.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): The minister has just asked me to spend a little longer on this. The farmers of Canada are not raising hogs to the extent they did last year, and I think the minister knows that as well as anyone else. I should like to quote from the Wheat Pool Budget of July 27, which contains the following hog forecast:

> The number of hogs on Canadian farms as at June 1 was 6½ per cent below the previous year's figure, reports the dominion bureau of statistics and a continuing downward trend is forecast. In western Canada the reduction was 11 per cent. A June 1 survey showed a Canadian total of 5,680,000 head compared to 6,075,000 a year ago.
> This spring's pig crop amounted to 4,300,000 or 11 per cent less than the 1955 total. In the west the reduction was 14 per cent.

I do not wish to prolong this debate at all, but I submit to the minister that the reason for this is that the farmers in western Canada just cannot afford to raise hogs at the prices they are being paid.

Mr. Blackmore: Can the minister suggest an adequate reason why there should be that falling off in the production of hogs? I think in Alberta we have conditions which are probably as conducive to the production of hogs as can be found anywhere in the nation, so why should we have difficulty producing hogs?

Mr. Gardiner: I think the other side of the picture ought to be given. The last time we had these estimates before the house we were complaining that the price of hogs was down to the floor; as a matter of fact we were afraid that they were going to go through the floor. The price of hogs today and yesterday was about $29.50, or $6.50 per hundredweight above the floor.

This question has been discussed over a long period of time. If the number of hogs produced did go down very far it is due to the fact that the people who were in and out are out at the present time. Those of us who stayed in all the time have gained the advantage. The trouble with figuring on this basis as to whether a man makes money producing hogs is that there are many people like the fellow who tries to guess the time to get in and the time to get out. He has more difficulty; but those of us who go along producing hogs—and I may say for the benefit of my hon. friend that I have just as many sows as I had in the wartime, and so do nearly all the regular hog producers; they have not been in and out—are not in the position of those who went out at the end of the war.

That helped the fellow who went on producing hogs all the time because he had to. That is, they are making money. There are farms in certain parts of Canada which could not be run if they did not have hogs, but there are farms in other places where they can quit feeding hogs and produce something else.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I do not want to leave this without again asking the minister to make several surveys. I want to point out to him that the provincial co-operative association which has been in hogs for a number of years is not an in and out concern at all. I cannot accept the minister's argument at all.

Mr. Gardiner: The total hog production is up 8·9 per cent, not down; those are the marketings of hogs. It is true that they are down in western Canada but they are up in eastern Canada. I think my hon. friend understands the reason for that. Most of us in western Canada would rather produce wheat than feed hogs. When we can make enough to get by with the wheat that is what we do. There are other times when we feed hogs.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I certainly hope the minister is not under the impression that the wheat farmers of western Canada are in a position today where they can forgo the marketing of hogs because of the huge profits being made out of the marketing of wheat.

Item agreed to.

41. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $4,142,965.

Mr. Bryce: Will the minister review the work which has been done in northern Manitoba and particularly in the interlake country by the federal and provincial governments in an effort to lower the lake levels? Two years ago a survey was started to see if anything could be done to lower the level of the lake because so many people were being drowned out. At that time it was thought the survey would take five years, and the dominion and provincial governments were each to pay $150,000 per year for the five years. When I discussed the matter with the minister some time ago he agreed to do some checking into the matter so he could give me some up to date information when his estimates came up. Perhaps the minister can indicate what the position is and if the agreement has been signed.

I am anxious to have this information because I told some people back home that the agreement between the dominion and provincial governments had already been made, under which the federal government would pay one-half and the provincial government the other half, with the work being done by the provincial government. I want to get myself clear with my constituents when I go back. I thought this had all been arranged but some time ago the minister told me that he was not quite sure and would make some inquiries.

While I am on my feet and to save time, there is another matter I should like to raise. It is in respect to the P.F.R.A. helping the provincial government to run a ditch from Rembrandt to meet the Drunken river and thence into lake Winnipeg to take care of a lot of water they have in that district. There seems to be a lot of surplus water there, and a fair sized ditch would be needed to bring it into the lake. It would help do away with flooding in that part of the country.

I am informed that the public works department of the provincial government has done some survey work in this part of the country from Rembrandt to Arnes and thence into the lake. The great problem, of course, is the cost. I am informed on good authority that the provincial government is prepared to pay half the cost if the dominion government will give some consideration to putting up the other half. In fact, I am informed that $15,000 was put in the Manitoba estimates for this work if the federal government would agree to pay the other half.

I want to appeal to the minister at this time to have the officers of his department look into this matter and see if it would be possible for the federal government to comply with the request to have the ditch built to drain this part of the interlake country.

[Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose).]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact we do not take the responsibility for drainage in any of the provinces. Even in the area that is under P.F.R.A. in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba we do not take the responsibility for drainage. That is considered to be a purely provincial matter, as in all the other provinces of Canada. The area between the lakes in Manitoba is not even under P.F.R.A. The boundary line, as my hon. friend knows, strikes the south end of lake Manitoba and then runs almost directly across to the Red river. The area south and west of that line is in the P.F.R.A. area. The works concerning which we have agreed to pay dollar for dollar with the province of Manitoba are over on the west side of lake Manitoba. Some of the streams drain into Dauphin lake and some into lake Manitoba.

But in those cases where we have gone out of the Assiniboine river drainage basin we have only gone there where the waters have their origin in the national park and flow out from the park on to some of the land. In those instances we have agreements with the Manitoba government under which we spend a certain amount. That has been going on for some years. In the year we are now in the amount being expended is $150,000, as was suggested. At the time we were discussing this before I was in the hope that we would have an agreement extending over three or five years, but that has not materialized. We have made agreements year by year, and last year's expenditure was $150,000. I presume this one will be about the same, and we may go on for some little time under that arrangement.

But, as was said, the Manitoba government carries out these works. We pay all the engineering cost and half the cost of the construction work that is done and our expenditure, as was suggested, is about $150,000. With respect to the other drainage in between, we have no part in that unless it be that the province asks us for some engineering help. We might do that, but we take no part otherwise.

Mr. Bryce: You would not look favourably on giving us a little money to help us to get that ditch?

Mr. Gardiner: We do not.

Mr. Bryce: But would you look favourably on it?

Mr. Gardiner: We will treat Manitoba exactly the same as we treat all other provinces. I will look that favourably upon it.

Mr. Bryce: There should be something done there. If it could not be helped I would not make the request, but if a ditch is put in there it will drain that country and allow people to earn their own livelihood without coming to the minister and asking for assistance under P.F.A.A. It is only a matter of $15,000.

Mr. Gardiner: This house has not voted me any authority to spend any money on drainage.

Mr. Bryce: I am asking for assistance and help, and I am asking you to let your department go a little bit farther north and do something about it. That is the work of the P.F.R.A.

Mr. Gardiner: No, that is not a prairie farm rehabilitation area.

Mr. Bryce: Then I do not know what it is. They are producing grain, and I think they have all the qualifications necessary to qualify.

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder whether items 41 and 42 could stand. The hon. member for Assiniboia has some remarks to make but he is at another meeting. I could speak for half an hour, but I think it would facilitate the business if we allowed these items to stand and went on with the others.

Mr. Gardiner: That is quite all right.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that items 41 and 42 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Items 41 and 42 stand.

45. Land protection and reclamation; clearing and settlement of new lands under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $850,000.

Mr. MacLean: Would the minister be good enough to give a further word of explanation in addition to what is in the details? I should like to know particularly where the money is chiefly being spent and under what conditions areas qualify for benefits under this item. Does it apply only to crown land or some scheme in which a provincial government is interested, or might it also apply to privately owned land in the case of a co-operative or a group of farmers?

Mr. Gardiner: This amount is voted for special projects that may be in any of the provinces across Canada, and we only make expenditures where we have entered into agreements with the provinces. The northwestern escarpment region is the Riding-Duck mountain watershed which I was talking about a few moments ago. There is $150,000 for the watershed in the Porcupine forest reserve. That is the amount in the estimates for that. Then there is the Saskatchewan river reclamation project in the Pasqua area. It is the Saskatchewan river but it is in Manitoba, and the amount for the work being done in the Pasqua area is $500,000. Then there is an unallotted amount of $200,000 covering situations that did not exist when this was drawn up. Of that amount $125,000 has been allotted to Newfoundland.

Mr. Blackmore: What is the nature of the work being done on the Saskatchewan river? The minister said that $500,000 was being spent there. On what kind of work is that being spent?

Mr. Gardiner: It is a project down toward the mouth of the Saskatchewan river in the province of Manitoba, where there is flooding in the spring of the year. When the water is high at any time of the year there is flooding. That is being diked very much in the same way that we diked lands in the maritime provinces to keep the ocean out. This is being diked to keep the river out. The Manitoba government asked us to do that work on their behalf. We do it and pay for it and then we are paid back from the sale of the lands in that area behind the dikes. I should say that 75 per cent of what the lands are sold for comes to us and only 25 per cent goes to the province. Over a period of years the greater part of it will be paid back.

Mr. Blackmore: In many places we find that where a river makes a rather sharp bend it tends to cut into the bank and cause caving in of the soil above the cut. Has the minister any policy for taking care of situations like that? Sometimes a number of acres will fall right into the stream.

Mr. Gardiner: Again that is pretty much a provincial matter unless it is a navigable stream. The federal government does take action in connection with any matter of that kind, and even on the Assiniboine river not very far removed from these other works we have done diking and in some places we straighten out the stream. Where we straighten out the stream that is done because that stream has always been rated as a navigable stream and the work was originally carried out by the works department. Three or four years ago the vote was transferred to this department and the work is done under P.F.R.A. but it is the same type of work.

This particular piece at Pasqua is not that type. The whole province of Manitoba has been built from the old lake Aggasiz which constituted practically the whole area which is now Manitoba; the earth had been washed down from the mountains. That is still going on at the mouth of the Saskatchewan river before it flows into the lakes and if dikes were not put there it would rise up and flood and leave another layer or maybe two or three inches of earth; and in due course over a long period of time they would flood. But the government is stopping the flooding now in order that farmers can go in and work that land.

Mr. Blackmore: Suppose a province had a particularly difficult situation on its hands and it sought the assistance of the dominion in dealing with the problem. Does the dominion enter into the picture in a situation like that?

Mr. Gardiner: That is what this vote is for. Where a province makes application and where it is prepared to spend a certain proportion of the amount, we enter into an agreement with it.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Zaplitny: I understand, Mr. Chairman, this would be the correct item under which to inquire with regard to the special projects in the province of Manitoba which I have discussed on one or two other occasions. I should like to ask the minister at this time if he is in a position to inform the committee as to what specific projects in regard to flood control are being undertaken in the province of Manitoba, more particularly in the northwest portion in the run-off area of Riding mountain and Duck mountain.

I might say that I have inquired on one or two occasions of the minister of agriculture of the province of Manitoba and he has informed me that for one reason or another which I shall not go into now, he would prefer that the information be given by the federal government rather than from his own office. Specifically, I should like to know what projects are being undertaken this year or will be undertaken this year in the area north of Riding mountain and east of Duck mountain.

Mr. Gardiner: I read those a few moments ago; I do not think my hon. friend was in the house at the time. Riding-Duck mountain watershed and Porcupine forest reserve, $150,000; Saskatchewan river reclamation, Pasqua area, $500,000. The other amount that is being allotted is down in Newfoundland.

Mr. Zaplitny: It so happens, Mr. Chairman, that I was aware of that. What my question refers to is this. Specifically what is being done with that $150,000? That is information which I am not able to obtain from the provincial department of agriculture. This therefore seems to be the only place where it can be obtained. As a matter of fact that is the advice I received from the minister of agriculture of Manitoba. He referred me to the federal department on account of the fact that, according to him, these projects must be approved by the federal government before their contribution can be made. I should like to know specifically what is being done with the $150,000 this year.

Mr. Gardiner: The agreement that is entered into with the province which results in a dollar for dollar expenditure is made for an amount to cover a certain area. The province determines where that money is going to be spent and they spend it, as a matter of fact, on the works around Dauphin lake on both sides of Riding mountain. That money is spent by the provincial government and they bill us with half the cost. Hence they have more information about it. Until the work is actually going on or until we are billed we have no information; that is we have no final information. We do the engineering, and from that we have some idea as to what they are going to do.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am inclined to take the same view as the minister in this regard. That was my understanding also. But may I quote to him a portion of a letter that I received from the minister of agriculture of Manitoba dated July 5, in reply to an inquiry of mine. In that letter he said:

> I suggest you inquire from either Mr. Matte in Ottawa or directly from Dr. L. B. Thomson, the director of P.F.R.A., who will be at liberty to inform you of those projects that are acceptable to P.F.R.A. and possibly to inform you what projects are under consideration by federal authorities at the present time.

The situation seems rather strange with regard to that information. If it is not available from the province of Manitoba and if it is not available here, and if there is an amount of $150,000 to be spent for these special projects, where are we to obtain that information?

Mr. Gardiner: If this $150,000 is spent you can get the information from here as to where it is spent, because we will not pay it unless we know where it was spent and how it was spent. But to ask us at this stage where it is going to be spent and how it is going to be spent is useless. I cannot give you the information. Probably the Manitoba government cannot give it to you, either.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am hardly satisfied with that answer, Mr. Chairman. We have now reached the third day of August. As the minister knows, with the kind of season we have in western Canada on the prairies, any work that is to be undertaken this year will certainly have to be at least in the blueprint stage by August 3. The authorities are not going to wait until October 1 to make up their minds what projects they are going to undertake. We have a rather short summer out there.

I do not want to pursue this subject unduly or to weary the committee, but I should like to have it established clearly where this information is supposed to come from. The provincial department refers us to the federal department, and we have just been referred back to the provincial department. Somewhere in between someone must know what is being planned.

I strongly suggest that it is not good enough to say that perhaps the province does not know either. If they do not know by July 5, and if the federal department does not know by August 3, then when are these projects going to be outlined and planned? If the minister takes the stand that this information must come from the province I shall have no reason to pursue this matter further today. But somewhere in between, I think, the two departments will have to get their heads together and make up their minds who is responsible for getting this information out. Inquiries are coming in.

I might say that this matter does not concern my own constituency alone. It refers to a great extent to the constituencies of my friends the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa and the hon. member for Churchill. These inquiries have to be answered. I see no reason why this matter should be kept as a sort of military secret. We are in the month of August and no one seems to know what is going to be done with this $150,000. I will ask this specific question of the minister. Does the minister take the stand that this information should be forthcoming from the provincial department rather than from his department?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I am not going to take any such position. I have told my hon. friend that neither the provincial government nor this government can give him detailed information with regard to the expenditure of this $150,000. Neither of them can do so at this moment. We have made an agreement with the province under which we are prepared to pay half the cost up to $150,000. They may spend $1 million. I do not know what they are going to spend. However, we will pay only our share of $150,000. So until that work is completed and we are billed for it, we do not go into the details. We go into it then and check it. I am not able to give you the information. I do not know whether or not the provincial government are able to do so. If they say they are not able to do so, I presume that they are in the same position as we are at this moment.

Mr. Zaplitny: Then do I take it that what the minister is saying is that the provincial government have not yet informed his department what projects they intend to undertake?

Mr. Gardiner: No, that is not correct. They may have told us what projects they are going to undertake, and we may take note of them. Then they go on and spend money on these projects. Perhaps a million dollars is too much to say they would spend in Manitoba on that kind of project this year, but suppose they spent $500,000. They only bill us for $150,000, that is the outside figure. If they only spend $200,000 they will only bill us for $100,000. So we do not know yet for what amount we are going to be billed. As I stated a few minutes ago we do the engineering; therefore our engineers are in a position when they do bill us to give us full information as to how the money was spent before we make the payment.

Mr. Zaplitny: Does that mean then, Mr. Chairman, that the province is free to undertake whatever projects in their opinion are desirable, and after having completed them to bill the government for anything up to $150,000 as the federal government's share of the cost of those projects? If that is the case, then of course I can see some reason for the minister's lack of information as to what is being done or planned. My understanding had been that before these projects were undertaken, and before expenditures were committed by the provinces, the provinces had to obtain the approval of the federal government for the kind of project being undertaken. Is that the case or is it not?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the responsibility for this work is primarily with the province. The province comes along and says, in this particular place you have a park and the reason so much water is coming down over this land is because that park is there. They say they would like us to help, and over a considerable number of years the matter has been taken up in that way, the way I have just suggested, with whatever government was here. After doing that for a considerable number of years we eventually agreed that we should probably pay something toward it. They go ahead and lay out the work and we say to them, the limit we will pay you is $150,000. You have to turn over to us the particulars and the record of expenditures you have made; and when we are billed with that amount of money, then we make the payment. The maximum we will pay is $150,000. It may be down as low as $75,000 or $50,000, or it may be the whole $150,000. However, until they have gone through the work and billed us for our share, we are not able to give particulars about it. The responsibility is theirs and not ours at all.

Mr. Zaplitny: I understand the responsibility for initiating these projects lies with the province but my specific question is—

Mr. Gardiner: I know what your specific question is and I know what you want me to say, but I am not going to say it.

Item agreed to.

46. Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, $1,920,601.

Mr. Purdy: I just want to say a word with respect to this maritime marshland scheme. This is a project which has been carried on in the maritime provinces for a number of years. I know that in my own constituency it has already done a tremendous amount of good. You can see a considerable increase in the livestock population. I have every reason to believe that similar circumstances exist in other parts of the province. I hope the work will continue to go forward.

I may say that it seems to me when the engineers first undertook this project they were dealing with something about which they did not know very much. They had not the experience, coming from the west as some of them did, with the tides of the bay of Fundy around which these projects are located. However, they are beginning to become acquainted with the problems and I think the work is now being conducted in a very efficient manner.

In this connection I have before me a resolution which was passed by the Nova Scotia federation of agriculture at its annual meeting at Truro last December. This is resolution No. 2 and reads:

> Whereas loss from fresh water erosion continues to be a serious problem to farmers throughout the province, and
>
> Whereas there is no provision made to control fresh water erosion as it affects farm land,
> Resolved that the federation of agriculture petition the provincial and federal authorities to enact legislation similar to the marshland reclamation act to control fresh water erosion of agricultural land.

My request tonight, Mr. Minister, now that we have a very efficient organization of engineers working on the marshland problem, is that thought should be given to some sort of similar scheme for work on the valleys of our rivers in the maritime provinces where every year, with every flash flood and every freshet in the spring, we are losing a good many acres of very valuable land. I suppose it could be said that there is a water act under which the federal government will pay 35 per cent and the provinces and municipalities will pay the rest, in order to control floods. I am afraid, however, that there is little chance of any work being done under that act.

We have this engineering staff down there and I know there is a big problem on such rivers as the Salmon, the Shubenacadie, the North, the Stewiacke, the Musqodobit, the Nine Mile and many others. As I say, each year the farmers are losing a lot of their valuable land. I am just asking the minister if he will take under advisement having his engineers, when they are around these other projects, study the nature of these valleys. There are members of the staff there who could develop some workable scheme that would be of immense value to our agriculturists in the maritime provinces.

Perhaps I might also come back to the suggestion of the Prime Minister, that if the Atlantic provinces produce a scheme for their general good the federal government would give serious consideration to it. I am suggesting that possibly this scheme which I have suggested for the benefit of agriculture in those provinces would be a good place to start.

Mr. Nowlan: There are one or two questions I should like to ask about this, and then having obtained some information about the present situation there is something I should like to say with respect to the future. I notice the amount is reduced by $295,000 this year over last year. Incidentally I might say that I approve and entirely agree with everything the hon. member for Colchester-Hants has said about the value and the contribution which this expenditure has made during the years.

I wonder if the minister could tell us what projects are proposed for this year. I notice that the total reduction is $295,000, and of that the reduction in the acquisition of property and construction is $250,000. I take it, therefore, that the construction work which will be carried on this year will be approximately a quarter of a million dollars less than that which has been carried on heretofore. I wish the minister would tell us just what he is proposing to carry out under this expenditure.

I should like to have him tell me also something of the problems with which I know he is confronted occasionally. As we know, there are times when substantial amounts of money have been spent in the recovery of certain dike lands, and when they have been offered to the adjoining owners the cost of the project has been such that the owners felt they could not purchase the property. At least that was the situation some years ago. I am wondering if there are properties still on the hands of the department or what has been done with respect to those lands which have been reclaimed by this expenditure? I know, for instance, of one very large lot of dike lands in my own constituency in respect of which the farmers felt that if they had to pay back the amount expended it would probably cost twice as much as the land was worth.

I suspect there have been problems such as that, and I should like to know whether the department do have properties on their hands today, or whether they have handed them all back to the farmers. If so, on what basis? After the minister has answered that I should like to make one comment about the future.

Mr. Gardiner: As to the first question, about what is to be done this year, because we have no large project like the Shepody river project of last year, which was completed—

Mr. Nowlan: Which river was that?

Mr. Gardiner: The Shepody river.

Mr. Nowlan: That is where?

Mr. Gardiner: In New Brunswick.

Mr. Nowlan: Can you tell us what projects you do have in contemplation?

Mr. Rowe: It would be interesting to know what projects are in contemplation for next year.

Mr. Gardiner: So far as we have them at the present time—there may be some change—they are the Mantua-Poplar grove marsh, $98,000; Bartletts Beach marsh, $46,000; Brown Salt Pond marsh, $35,000; Goose Bay marsh, $45,000; Kentville marsh, $40,000; Elderkin marsh, $19,000; College Bridge marsh, $47,000; Turtle Creek marsh, $12,000; Jones Creek marsh, $8,000. The first six of these are in Nova Scotia and the last three are in New Brunswick.

Mr. Nowlan: Two of them are next door to me. Can the minister say anything about the lands? Has he had that problem?

Mr. Gardiner: The arrangement we have with the province through the legislation which was passed here and in the province is to the effect that we are responsible for the building of the dikes. The province is responsible for getting the right of way for the building of the dikes and for the drainage in behind the dams and taking care of anything that has to do with that. I think all the difficulties referred to, that is correcting the situation in relation to lands which are required for the work on the dams, are cared for by the province.

Mr. Nowlan: You have no problems at the moment so far as lands are concerned?

Mr. Gardiner: No, we have not.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I have one other comment that I should like to make in connection with this. It is a matter that I raised with the minister two years ago, I think it was. He said at that time that surveys were in process. The minister will probably recall, although he naturally cannot be conversant with all these details, that there has been a suggestion along the Annapolis river that instead of maintaining the dikes on each side of the river there should be co-operation between the provincial and federal governments in the erection of a dam or causeway across the Annapolis river which would conserve about 25 or 30 miles of marsh on each side of the river from Annapolis Royal up beyond Bridgetown.

The minister told us a year or two ago that some surveys had been continued to that end, and I am wondering whether there has been any further progress in that direction. I think there may be, Mr. Chairman, because I heard of one or two persons who are buying property along the place where the proposed dam would be erected, and I think possibly they may be a little bit optimistic in thinking the dam will be constructed.

In the not too distant future there will undoubtedly be an opportunity there to save substantial sums of money in the maintenance of those dikes, although actually in the meantime I think the minister under this project has rebuilt quite a few of the dikes. Even so you have, as I say, probably 25 miles of dikes running along each side of the river; and if, as the minister intimated two years ago, the surveys indicated that a dam was feasible, then by building a relatively short dam across the river one could avoid the necessity of maintaining 40 or 50 miles of dikes.

I am bringing this to the attention of the minister now particularly because in a letter I had from an engineer, who is resident in the constituency and near this point, he told me that in his opinion the situation is such that the bridge across that river will require major repairs and probably reconstruction within the next four or five years. It would seem to me that if anything is ever going to be done on this project, it should be done in the relatively immediate future when, by the combination of a bridge and a causeway, the minister could effect co-operation with the provincial government in so far as the department of highways is concerned.

If you put a bridge across the river it will conserve a tremendous quantity of marshland and also save current expenditures, which will be substantial, on the dikes running up and down the river for many years to come. I would like the minister to tell us what the situation is at the moment.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, the situation is that it is possible to build the dam across the mouth of the river and to prevent the sea from coming in. It is a combination of two things. The sea comes in, as my hon. friend knows, and creates a sort of greasy mud situation which is not very good to look at and not very useful for any purpose. Therefore in most cases we simply build the dikes and keep the water out. Along the river we have been doing that, at least it has been done in past ages by people who were there, and we have taken it on recently and are considering building the dams up along the river.

The suggestion is that instead of doing that we should build a dam right across the mouth of the river. There is a bridge there which is not in very good repair, and probably would have to be rebuilt. I think the provincial government have estimated that it is going to cost them $1 million to put the bridge in and maintain it. They have said they are prepared to pay $1 million toward the building of the dam, the total cost of which would be something over $3 million, about $3,500,000. Some people argue that the cost is so great, as compared with the amount of farm land that is going to be put into use as a result of having built it, that it is out of all proportion.

There are some who take the position that that is not the right way to look at it. Up to now the discussions have gone on, but no conclusion has yet been arrived at as to whether it will be proceeded with or not.

Mr. Nowlan: Discussions are going on between the provincial and federal governments?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, still going on.

Mr. Nowlan: If the estimate of $3 million is relatively or approximately correct—we understand, of course, that estimates have a wide margin of error—then I think it would be a worth-while expenditure to make, because I am quite sure that if this marshlands reclamation project is continued and the minister continues to make expenditures on the running dikes on each side of that river over a period of years, the money he will expend in maintaining those dikes will be far more than the interest and service charges on the $2 million which his department has suggested it might have to spend in constructing the dam.

I think the province drove a remarkably good bargain with the Minister of Transport over the building of the Bluenose some years ago. They said they would pay one-third or up to $1,500,000. I think they are driving a fairly good bargain now. I suggest they cannot replace that bridge, which is probably the longest bridge in Nova Scotia, to modern specifications for $1 million. If the minister explores with the provincial government the proper field of co-operation, then I think the province might possibly raise its ante a little, and he would find that he could have a co-operative enterprise under which not only would he have the dam to keep out the tide, not only would he have reclamation dikes, but also, if the causeway were properly constructed, he would have a fresh water lake running from the bridge as far up as Bridgetown which would provide building and other accommodation which I am sure would more than justify the expenditure which is proposed. Frankly, I think if they got away with $5 million instead of $3 million they would be remarkably fortunate. But even so I think the expenditure would be justified.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the minister one further question. Will he give us the total amount paid out by the federal Department of Agriculture under the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act and also the total amount paid out under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act?

Mr. Gardiner: The total amount paid out under the maritime marshland reclamation scheme is $10 million.

Mr. Brooks: That is since the act was passed?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; in Nova Scotia about $5 million and in New Brunswick about $5 million.

Mr. Brooks: How much under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act?

Mr. Gardiner: On P.F.R.A. alone is about $66 million.

Mr. Brooks: It is more than that, is it not?

Mr. Gardiner: Taking into account the large projects it is about $96 million.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to the matter raised by the hon. member for Colchester-Hants in respect to engineering projects that would help to prevent fresh water erosion of soil in Nova Scotia. I noticed that the minister's attention was directed to another questioner and therefore he did not reply to the hon. member for Colchester-Hants. I wonder if the minister could tell us whether or not there are some plans in operation in Nova Scotia for the prevention of fresh water erosion of the soil?

Mr. Gardiner: The answer is just the same answer I gave to the hon. member for Selkirk a while ago. That is a provincial matter, and that is true of fresh water drainage right across Canada.

Mr. Blackmore: It does not refer to drainage, Mr. Chairman, but to the prevention of fresh water erosion of the soil.

Mr. Gardiner: It is all the same thing.

Mr. Blackmore: Is there any arrangement for co-operation between the dominion and the provinces in respect of matters of that sort?

Mr. Gardiner: No. The only place there is any arrangement at all with regard to these matters is in the P.F.R.A. area, apart from where we enter into agreements under the other vote we were discussing a few moments ago. We enter into these agreements in any province where the province meets the conditions. We spend money there, but there is no definite legislation. It is assumed that the provinces have the responsibility under the British North America Act.

Mr. Blackmore: May I suggest to the minister that in my opinion he should make provision for co-operation between the dominion and the provinces in respect of matters such as the prevention of fresh water erosion in the maritime provinces.

I thoroughly sympathize with the maritime provinces for looking with a somewhat critical eye at the large expenditures which are being made under the P.F.R.A. The expenditures there are not excessive; in fact, they have not reached what they ought to be yet, but they are a great blessing to western Canada. I think there ought to be similar provisions in respect of land in the maritime provinces.

May I remind the minister that the maritime provinces are not usually as able financially to bear a share of such expenditures as even the western provinces would be. If the western provinces had to take care of the financing of P.F.R.A. projects they simply could not be financed, because the western provinces would not be able to finance such expenditures.

May I suggest in all fairness to the maritime provinces and in the interest of equality across the dominion that provision ought to be made for assisting the maritimes in a very generous way in respect of preventing fresh water erosion in the soil.

47. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration, $502,137.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the minister is well aware that there are perennial complaints concerning the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, particularly in the province of Manitoba. When the session began this year we anticipated that some amendments might be made to the act which would have solved some of these difficulties. Unfortunately these amendments have not been brought before us, and I would just like to briefly bring to the attention of the minister once again the major points of complaint concerning the administration of the P.F.R.A.

The problem that reaches me quite regularly is that of crown lands where no assistance is payable in cases of crop failure. The complaint arises because notwithstanding the fact that farmers operating on crown lands are forced to contribute to the P.F.A.A. fund, when they need assistance they are not permitted to receive it under the regulations. I understand that V.L.A. land is the only crown land that is exempted from this particularly discriminatory regulation.

There is also the other problem that has arisen as a result of repeated flooding in the area of the Assiniboine valley. Some of the farmers along the Assiniboine valley have suffered crop failures as frequently as three years in succession, with the result that they have had to seek employment off the land. Unfortunately when they have earned income other than from the operation of their farms they are automatically disqualified from receiving payments under the act. This is a special problem. I do not know whether the special cases could be taken care of by regulation under the act, but it is a problem that occurs frequently enough, especially in Manitoba, to require some attention.

Then, of course, in contemplating any amendments to the act there is the fact that the present rates of payment were established in 1939 with a maximum of $500, I believe, and $2.50 per acre. Those figures are out of touch with reality in terms of today's inflationary conditions. I feel that any amendments contemplated should take into consideration the changes in the value of our money and the effects of increasing inflation, and should be designed to place the scheme in a more equitable position.

In Manitoba we are faced with an additional special problem. It is well known to the minister that we always contribute more to the fund than we are able to withdraw because there is not so much marginal land in the province of Manitoba. As a result of the situation the provincial authorities appointed a commission to consider the possibility of establishing some sort of an insurance scheme.

That commission reported, and the essence of their report was that it would be impossible to operate a crop insurance program by one province. Any adequate crop insurance coverage would require the co-operation of the three prairie provinces. The report intimated further that any initiative in an attempt to bring the three provinces together to make a more comprehensive insurance scheme would possibly have to come from the federal authorities. I wish the minister would comment on that particular aspect of the commission's report.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, there is the special problem which has also arisen from recurring floods in Manitoba. Some payment was available from the prairie farm assistance fund, but there has been almost universal complaint that the payment of $1.25 per acre has hardly been adequate to meet the disastrous effects of the flood conditions.

If I might be allowed while I am on my feet to deal with a matter out of order, Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed with it. We have stood item 41, but I think it will save time if I speak about this now. I would like to direct this question to the minister because I think some attempt to deal permanently with flood conditions would be a much better scheme in the long run than attempting to meet the cost of damage resulting from annual flood conditions. This, of course, must be taken up under the prairie farm rehabilitation scheme.

The minister is well aware that farmers in Manitoba have become very active in seeking a solution to this problem of flooding. During the Easter recess I attended a meeting at which the director of the P.F.R.A. spoke, and he made a very excellent presentation and helped to clarify my thinking as to a solution to this problem. He placed the responsibility for initial action squarely on the provincial and municipal authorities, and he was supported in this approach to the problem by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa. The hon. member conducted a survey of flooding on the Assiniboine when it was at its height during the recent spring condition.

The Deputy Chairman: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but items 41 and 42 have been allowed to stand. I think it is obvious that they will not be carried tonight. We are in the middle of a discussion of item 47, and I think perhaps it would be fairer to hon. members who have delayed their remarks on item 41 if we were to continue with this item and then the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act would be open for discussion when it is called again. If the hon. member agrees I think that would be fairer to other hon. members of the committee.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. Dinsdale: I can put my question in the next sentence and that will save a speech on item 41. I was saying that the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa had interested himself in this problem, and he indicated that the initial action would have to be taken by the provincial authorities if we are going to get any solution for this problem of annual flooding. I should like to have a confirmation of the viewpoint expressed by the director of the P.F.R.A. as well as by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, as to the last question I think we had better leave the answer to that until other hon. members have presented their case. In so far as item 47 is concerned, I should like to call attention to one or two things. First, for the first time we have paid out a greater amount in Manitoba than the 1 per cent levy that has been paid in. In 1954-55 the amount collected under the 1 per cent levy in Manitoba was $748,694.05 and the amount paid out was $5,009,814. That is largely due to the fact that the act was amended to cover such conditions as we had in 1954. The 1955 amendments made it possible to pay where it was not drought that caused the damage, and so from now on the Manitoba position will be different from what it has been in the past. I just wanted to say that so hon. members might examine the figures and find what had been paid out.

That does not apply only in Manitoba, it applies to the eastern side of the province of Saskatchewan. Drought is the big problem in the western and southwestern portions of the province, it is not so much a matter of submarginal land. My hon. friend referred to the fact that there was not as much submarginal land in Manitoba as there was in Saskatchewan. In that area I am not too sure about that. The reason we apply this act to a township rather than to individual farms is to eliminate the submarginal land. The fact that there has been a crop of more than 8 bushels to the acre in a whole township prevents a man coming in who has poor land and that is the reason his crop is down rather than the weather. Those are facts which are sometimes forgotten when we are discussing this matter.

Then there was the other question as to the value of the dollar. That was not the main thing taken into consideration when the act was set up. The first thing was that we based it on so much per acre, but the other was based on so much grain produced on the acre. When you take into consideration the price of grain now as compared with the price then and add the two things together, you find that the amount of money paid now more than takes care of the difference in the value of currency at this time as compared with when the act was set up.

Then the statement was made that some people do not like not being paid when they have land and are engaged in some other line of activity. If a man is actually on a farm, if farming is his main operation, then he comes under the act. He can go to work for a neighbouring farmer or go out threshing, but he still comes under the act for payment. But if a man is carrying on farming but his main occupation is that of a merchant he is not paid.

The whole objective of this legislation was to make it possible in a dry year for the farmer to pay his store bill. When he pays his store bill the storekeeper is presumed to get as great an advantage from the act as does the man who has a store bill to pay. It is not intended that the amount paid will be any more than the average store bill. The act was set up to help not only the farmer but the merchant in the small town. Therefore we say that if a man is a station agent or is running an elevator or is in the business of selling commodities, he is taken care of in other ways than under this act and we do not pay him.

I agree that there have been some complaints in Manitoba as well as in the eastern side of Saskatchewan. The reason is that most of these people have come in for the first time, and we get many complaints from storekeepers and others. But where they have been in since 1939 we find there are not the same number of complaints. We always get complaints when a new district comes in, and until they have had experience with the act we will continue to get them. But after they have been under the act for a few years, as it is now in Manitoba, there are not the same complaints made.

Mr. Dinsdale: What about the farmer in a dry area seeking supplementary employment off the farm when the farm is in a flooded area? A man may have a crop failure and take temporary employment, for example in the oil fields around Virden. This is the area where most of the complaints have originated. They have been denied payment under the act because they have been in receipt of income from other than agricultural activities, but this employment has been temporary in order to meet an emergency.

Mr. Gardiner: The act provides that in order to draw under it a man must be actually engaged in farming from about May 1 to the end of November. If he goes away at the end of November and takes a job he has to be back on the farm in the spring before he is paid. The intention of the act is to make it possible for a man to stay on the land and to be there to produce a crop next year, having lost one this year because of drought. That is the intention. If he merely goes away in order to be able to live and comes back in the spring to put his crop in again and stays there he will be paid after he comes back, but not until he does come back.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, obviously we cannot get through tonight. I call your attention to the fact that it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Harris: Do I understand that the item we have been discussing is carried?

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that item 47 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nicholson: There was a general desire to finish agriculture tonight, and if we are to finish by a week from tomorrow we really have to finish this tonight. I think we could sit a little longer.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, we agreed to sit until eleven o'clock and it is past eleven o'clock now. I think we should call it ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Without unanimous consent I think I am in the position that I must rise. Is there unanimous consent to continue?

Mr. Green: No.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take the remaining agriculture estimates, then transport and then justice. On Monday we shall take the legislation on the order paper in the following order: the resolution with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act, the international wheat agreement, the bill to amend the R.C.M.P. Act, the bill to promote equal pay for female employees, the bill to amend the Income Tax Act, the bill to amend the Post Office Act, the bill to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act and the bill to amend the Customs Tariff.

I should say, Mr. Speaker, that it has been agreed that the international wheat agreement resolution will be dealt with by one speech from each of the parties in the house and that after that has been done Your Honour will put the question.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

PUBLIC SERVICE, REGINA—WORKING HOURS

Question No. 578—Mr. Ellis:

1. Are there any employees of the federal government in the city of Regina who are not yet working on a 40-hour week?
2. If so, what is the number and classification of such employees?
3. What is the reason for such employees being denied the 40-hour week, and when is it expected all federal government employees in Regina will be so included?

Answer by: Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State):

1. Yes.
2.

Cleaner and helper	4
Farm foreman 1	1
Farm labourer special	3
Fireman-labourer	2
Gardener 2	1
Gardener 1	1
Hospital cook 3	1
Hospital cook 2	1
Hospital cook 1	1
Hospital maid	2
Hospital nurse 3	1
Hospital nurse 2	2

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, August 4, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BURMA—REPORTED INVASION BY RED CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, according to a radio report this morning the government of red China is claiming that there has been no invasion of Burma. Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs could tell us whether there has or has not been such an invasion.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to deal with the question asked by my hon. friend. We have had further information on this Burmese incident. That information indicates that, while the situation is potentially serious, of course, there is nothing to justify some of the alarmist headlines and reports that appeared some days ago and were based, as I understand it, in the first place on a report which appeared in an English language newspaper in Rangoon, the accuracy of which has since been denied by the Burmese government itself. The difficulty seems to be over a remote part of the border between China and Burma which has never been formally established to the agreement of both countries. That particular area of the border is therefore in dispute. It may well be that the action which has been taken by the Chinese troops in that area is to force a settlement of that part of the boundary and on their terms.

MILAN BABIC—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now that he has received a letter from Milan Babic of Toronto outlining how he was detained for 20 hours, searched several times and grilled several times—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hees: —does the government plan to make a strong protest about this outrageous treatment of a Canadian citizen to the United States government? Is there an officer at our consulates who is available 24 hours a day to Canadian citizens? If so, will the minister advise the United States government that that is the case? If it is not so, will he arrange that it is so in the future?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. gentleman has been more fortunate in his receipt of information from Mr. Babic than I have because the letter to which he refers has not reached me, though we sent him a telegram two or three days ago asking for details. I have received a telegram from Mr. Babic which states:

Regret did not reply sooner to your wire as just received. Preparing complete account to be sent to you by mail special delivery.

I have not received it yet, but it may be in the mail, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: It is in the mail. If the minister will check, he will find it there because I have a copy of the letter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Weir: Did you write it for him?

Mr. Hees: The situation is as I have stated it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Why don't you fix it?

Mr. Hees: Will the minister answer the second part of my question? Is there an officer at our consulates available 24 hours a day?

Mr. Pickersgill: They go off work at six o'clock, as the hon. member suggests in other cases.

Mr. Hees: If so, will the minister advise the United States government to that effect? If not, will he arrange that it is so?

Mr. Pearson: We will take appropriate action when the letter is received, I am sure. In so far as the consulate at New York is concerned, they do not work in the consulate 24 hours a day. It is possible, however, to get somebody 24 hours a day because there have been arrangements made with the telephone company of New York for that purpose.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR HOLIDAYS FOR PAGE BOYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works or whoever is responsible. Has the minister considered yet whether the page boys are to be relieved of their duties at six o'clock for the balance of the session?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not hear that question.

Mr. Hodgson: Will the page boys be relieved of their duties at six o'clock for the balance of the session?

Mr. Winters: I am not quite clear, Mr. Speaker, how that matter becomes the responsibility of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Hodgson: I said the Minister of Public Works or whoever is responsible.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the matter and give an answer later.

Mr. Fulton: We did not hear the answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: This is a matter that comes under my jurisdiction. Standing order 44 does not allow questions to be put to the Speaker from the floor of the house. See citation 302, Beauchesne's third edition. However, I take it that some members are very ingenious and they manage to put the questions anyway in some other form. Is it the pleasure of hon. members that the page boys be relieved of their duties at six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: As a matter of fact, shall we do away with them altogether during these summer months?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps through the usual channels opinions may be gathered from the various parties and the whips can report to us.

REPORTED VISIT TO NEWFOUNDLAND BY MEMBER FOR BROADVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): I have in my hand a copy of the Evening Telegram, St. John's, Newfoundland, for July 27, 1956. It contains a picture of the hon. member for Broadview and below the picture it says:

> George Hees, national president of the Progressive Conservative party, will arrive in St. John's on a visit to Newfoundland on August 18, Malcolm Hollett, leader of the Progressive Conservative party in Newfoundland—

Mr. Fulton: Question, question.

Mr. Garson: We are giving you some publicity.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

[Mr. Hodgson.]

Mr. Hees: What a wind-up.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member raising a question of privilege?

Mr. Hosking: I am asking a question of the minister from Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member put his question?

Mr. Hosking: My question is, is it the opinion of the minister from Newfoundland that the people from Newfoundland are so ill-informed that the writer of this article does not realize that the member for Broadview has been fired as president of the Conservative association and that he has been replaced by a member from the province of Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: When a question is directed to the government it must be on a matter of administration.

Mr. Hodgson: I think it would be well if the hon. member for Wellington South got out of the gutter.

GRAIN

FLAX AND RYE—REQUEST FOR MARKETING UNDER WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he has received a telegram from the Saskatchewan farmers' union stating in part as follows:

> Since wheat board has announced intention to extend quotas on open market grain now to include flax as well as rye, we urge complete marketing jurisdiction of these grains be placed under wheat board operations, thereby according complete price equality to producers regardless of space situation at country elevators.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not received such a wire personally. It may be in the department, but if so it has not been brought to my attention. The fact that this is a partial holiday for most people in Canada may explain the reason it has not been brought to my attention.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): May I ask a supplementary question? When the minister receives this telegram, which I understand has been sent to him, would he consider immediately introducing a bill to make provision for the Canadian wheat board having jurisdiction to handle flax and rye? I might say that with the temper of the house we could get that through without any trouble.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Unfortunately, the government has promised the house there will be no further bills introduced this session.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

WINNIPEG—STATEMENT ON ALLEGED LOW FLYING OF R.C.A.F. PLANES

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has asked about low flying over the cities of Winnipeg and St. James, and a report has now been received.

Since the construction of Stevenson field the city of Winnipeg has greatly expanded. Residential areas on the west side are now in danger of surrounding the airport. At the same time the international, itinerant and local civil traffic, which accounts for more than half of the total flying at this field, has increased greatly.

In order that this volume of traffic may be accommodated safely, an arrival procedure known as a circuit is sometimes necessary. This pattern which, at Winnipeg, is under the control of experienced Department of Transport officials, is done in excess of 1,000 feet above ground and permits an orderly transition to final approach. In conformance with these requirements, a number of aircraft may fly over certain areas. Residents estimating the altitude by sound alone may believe the aircraft to be low flying; whereas in fact they are at the maximum safe legal altitude for the procedure involved.

R.C.A.F. operations at Winnipeg are comprised mainly of navigator and radio officer training. This training, of course, includes night as well as day exercises. For these flights as for all other operations based at Stevenson field, only competent and qualified pilots are used.

There has not been any confirmed instance of actual low flying reported over Winnipeg with the exception of one isolated case involving an aircraft from another base. In this case, the pilot was subjected to severe disciplinary action.

PUBLIC WORKS

NEW WESTMINSTER—STATEMENT ON DREDGING OF CHANNEL

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) asked a question about dredging at the Searle elevator in New Westminster. This elevator and wharf are leased by the New Westminster harbour commissioners to the Searle Grain Company Limited. Under the terms of the lease the commissioners assume certain obligations to maintain at all times adequate depth of water in the berths and in the channel to and from the main channel of the Fraser river.

The present lease expires August 31, 1956. We are still engaged in discussions and considerations as to what the long-term arrangement and allocation of responsibilities will be. In the meantime, the government has authorized the Department of Public Works to undertake the dredging for a period of one year following the expiry of the present lease; that is, until August 31, 1957.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

47. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration, $502,137.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, on three or four occasions this session I have talked about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, therefore it would be a matter of repeating myself if I started to go into details. However, I had hoped that the minister would have brought in some amendments to the P.F.A.A.; in fact, I am disappointed that he did not bring in an amendment to deal with the farmer who bought land from the provincial government after 1940 and cannot participate or even get any assistance from the P.F.A.A. fund.

The fund is in this position: A man who bought crown land contributed to the fund every load of grain he sold to the elevator. That is quite definite and plain and he cannot participate in any of the benefits of the act. For that reason I do not think the government should collect from these people.

Perhaps a test case should be made of this to see if it is really possible to collect money from them without giving them any benefits. It may be wise to have a decision of the Department of Justice on this question.

I do not need to point out to the minister that this is a very sore point in the north of my constituency. I had hoped that the minister would have brought in an amendment to correct this grievance. In fact, even at this late date I ask the minister to give it some consideration.

I could never understand how the government can collect money from farmers contributing to the P.F.A.A. fund when the act distinctly says they cannot participate in the benefits.

I have had a great deal of correspondence with the minister concerning P.F.A.A. and while he was good enough to send some of his officers to explain the act I am still receiving complaints from people who are wondering why they were left out.

One matter has always puzzled me and it is not because I have not endeavoured to understand it. I am referring to where the line is drawn dividing the people who can get paid on crown land and those on the south side of the line who cannot get paid.

I am going to send over to the minister a map of Selkirk constituency and I will ask him if he would be kind enough to have the officers of his department draw the line on the map so that in the future when I am challenged about it will be able to take out this map and show people where the line is.

I am not going to say any more at this time. I have conveyed to the minister the wishes of the farmers of my constituency regarding this act. The act has been of considerable value to many people in my constituency who suffered the loss of their crops. I know that the minister could improve this bill a great deal if he were to bring in amendments.

I am now sending over to the minister the map I have referred to. I hope the minister will put the line on it. If he does he will save me a lot of arguments this fall.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Well, Mr. Chairman, while the map is being sent over I would just like to say that any change in the line would have to be made by legislation. The line has been set by legislation and I think on two different occasions the question has been raised in the house. I would say that the map which is submitted will be considered. There is some question, of course, as to where the line should be drawn across the north. It may possibly be that the line is not in exactly the right place but we will consider that before the next session and if legislation is necessary we will bring it down.

Mr. Bryce: But will you be kind enough to have an officer of your department draw the line that you are dealing with now on the map I am sending over?

Mr. Gardiner: Oh well, that should be a simple matter for them to do and I will see that it is done.

Mr. Bryce: Thank you; I hope it is done.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a few questions regarding the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I am referring particularly to the form which farmers are forced to fill out in respect to individual farms. My first question is this. Are the farmers left with a duplicate copy of the statements they give to the inspector?

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry but I am not able to hear the question.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Are the individual farmers left with a duplicate copy of the statement they give to the P.F.A.A. inspector when he calls around?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that that has not been done in the past but it has been arranged that it will be done in the future. Someone asked that question earlier in the session.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Are all farmers required to make a statutory declaration that the answers given to the questions asked are true?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; there is to all intents and purposes a statutory declaration taken.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I understand that that will be uniform throughout the west.

Mr. Gardiner: That is correct.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, we in this group contend that the present payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are too low. The act was brought in in 1939 at which time a maximum payment of $2.50 per acre was provided on half the cultivated acreage up to a maximum of 400 acres. The maximum payment has been $500; when the crop yield was from 4 to 8 bushels per acre the payment has been $300.

Since 1939 the cost of production and the cost of living have eaten away most of the value of the payments that were established in 1939. Today we have a dollar which is perhaps a 50 cent or a 40 cent dollar, but still the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act remain the same. I suggest that the time has come when the government at least should double the payments under this act. Last year the hon. member for The Battlefords brought in a resolution on behalf of this group to that effect.

I would point out that today $1,000 will buy less than $500 would have bought in 1939. There is not only that factor to be considered, there is the factor of the one per cent charge which today brings in two and a half times as much revenue as it did in 1939 because of the increase in the price of wheat. I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration has been given by his department to increasing the benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, to doubling the benefits as I have suggested to the point where a farmer would have the protection that he should receive under the act.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, as hon. members who were here throughout the sitting last night know, I dealt with this question at that time. I regret very much if my hon. friend was able to watch a football game while I remained here to take up this matter, but in any event the matter was dealt with. Just to answer the question which has been asked, I would say that we have given consideration to the matter and have decided that the act as it is at the present time does meet the situation in spite of the fact that there has been a lowering in the value of the dollar. That was provided for when the terms of the act were drawn to make it possible for a person who is affected drawing, not only the sum provided in the act but also to have earnings from the marketing of whatever grain he has. It was estimated that the increase in the price of grain or the decrease in the price would take care of any difference that occurred. Our examination of the records indicates that that has been the case. The amount which the farmer receives now, with the exception of the man who has no wheat per acre, and there are very few of those, there is anywhere from two to three bushels an acre to be sold, and when those facts are taken into consideration the return in proportion to costs is just about the same now, or a little higher in most cases, than it was in 1939.

Mr. Argue: I am sure that no one understands the gobbledegook we have just listened to now.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the football game you are talking about.

Mr. Argue: Any farmer knows that $500 today will not purchase as much as it did in 1939.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend will read my speech in reply last session he will find it is all there and it has been proven outright.

Mr. Argue: I have read it, and it is gobbledegook, but there was more gobbledegook last time than there is now because the minister took longer to say the same thing.

Mr. Gardiner: We get all the gobbledegook when you are speaking.

Mr. Argue: I want to tell the minister that the farmers in western Canada are completely dissatisfied with the amount paid under the act. There have been certain improvements made in the past in regard to the area where it is paid, and that is all to the good, but the schedule of payments is completely inadequate.

I wish to say that I was in the chamber last night when the minister made his remarks on this subject, and I am sure I would have had a much more enjoyable time if I had been able to go to the football game. Last night, if I remember correctly, the minister's excuse was that there is sufficient money to pay the grocery bill. Was that not it? Today he has gone to a certain quantity of the wheat that a farmer may or may not have to be considered to have a crop failure.

Mr. Gardiner: You will find that is what I said last night; you were not listening.

Mr. Argue: I wish to point out that, even though the price of wheat has increased substantially since 1939, the purchasing power of a bushel of wheat is no greater today than it was in 1939, so that any wheat a farmer may have when he is said to have a crop failure, one, two or three bushels of wheat per acre will buy no more than the wheat in 1939, and the prairie farm assistance benefit is worth not much more than one-third of what it was worth in 1939.

Mr. Thomas: Last year when the minister's estimates came up, I pointed out to him that there was a large area of land in western Alberta, a good part of which is in my riding, that had been exempted from the act when it was drawn up; that since that time the new methods of farming, different types of crops, new knowledge and so on have made at least part of that land productive; and that still most people, although they are paying into the P.F.A.A. all the time, are unable to get any benefits out of it. I asked the minister last year if he would consider putting that land under the act because it is now a productive area and these people are unable to come in under the benefits. I would ask the minister whether any consideration has been given to that area and, if so, what decisions were made.

Mr. Gardiner: As I understand it, it is the same question that was raised by the hon. member for Selkirk with regard to a section of Manitoba. That is, we amended the act some few years ago to make it impossible for lands which the government disposed of after a certain date, January 1940, to come under the act, the understanding being that should the provincial governments of Manitoba, Alberta or Saskatchewan make agreements with the farmers,—in Saskatchewan it is an agreement on a 33-year lease, and in the other two provinces it might be a sale of the land to the farmer—we maintained that if the governments in the prairie provinces were disposing of land to farmers after the date when this act came into effect they should do so on terms which made it possible for the farmer to carry on without the benefits of this act. So a line was drawn which left out from under the act the area where the lands had not yet been disposed of or had been disposed of after that date.

Through the southern parts of the province the same thing applies, namely that where submarginal lands, as they were referred to last night, are defined as submarginal lands by the provincial governments, they do not come under this act at all. If the provincial governments' enactment adds to those lands, then those lands are taken out. We simply stated in the act at that time that if the provincial government were leasing those lands to farmers who were on adjacent lands and bringing them back under cultivation or back where they would otherwise come under the terms of this act, these lands are not covered by this act.

On the question of paying in, everybody in Canada pays in to this act. This is not an insurance bill, as was suggested a few moments ago. It is not an insurance bill in any sense of the term. If it were, we could not pass it. Insurance bills can only be passed by the provincial governments. The first thing we had to satisfy the authorities here on, including the justice department, at the time we put the act through was that this is not insurance. It is not the paying of a fee in order to get a service. When the act was first drafted, it did not have in it any terms for the paying of one per cent. After the discussions which took place in this house, the farm organizations in the west suggested that in order that it might not be said that they were getting payment from a fund which was created entirely by setting up a tax collected from all the people of Canada, they should make a special contribution, and that special contribution is in the nature of one per cent on the grain sold. Hence the one per cent is simply a payment in order to make it possible for the farmers to contribute something throughout the years towards the fact that they may collect. I would point out to my hon. friend also what happens in spite of the fact that some people who may collect may not have any grain at all. Some of the people who collect may have only livestock, and when they do have those for sale nothing is paid when they sell. If they have only livestock, they may grow some grain in order to feed the livestock. But they collect just the same as do the people who have only wheat. Such a person does not pay anything in, but he collects. Both sides of the picture do turn up in this particular legislation.

Mr. Thomas: I understand that, Mr. Chairman; but what I wanted to know was this. What possibility is there of these people getting in? I refer to those people on what was at that time considered to be submarginal land and left out of the act until examination had been made, as a result of agreement between the provincial and federal governments. I was wondering what the possibility is of some of these people, on what was considered at that time as being submarginal land, getting in under the act now. Owing to improved methods and improved knowledge they are now able to grow fairly substantial crops in this area. Would it be a provincial responsibility to request that these lands be included under the act or would it be a federal responsibility or would it be a matter of negotiation between the two governments? If so, which government should initiate the discussions? Is there any possibility at all of their getting in?

Mr. Gardiner: My understanding is that at the time this matter was before the agriculture committee when the legislation was last going through the house, the lands in the special areas—which I presume are the lands which are referred to—in Alberta were specially dealt with in the legislation. If there is any reason for taking another look at it, we can do it along with the province. The representatives of the provincial government were here and they appeared here before the committee at the time we dealt with the matter previously. I will have to check back and see what lands are involved and if it would be necessary to have further hearings on the matter. I do not know whether or not the hon. member for Peace River recalls the discussions that took place at that time. I think he does so because his northern area was concerned. We did try to meet conditions there then. If developments have taken place which indicate that we have not met them, that matter can be discussed again.

Mr. Thomas: This does not apply to the special areas. It applies to the grey wooded soil along the foot of the foothills.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Low: No, Mr. Chairman. There is one question that I should like to ask the minister, but before I do so I should like to say this about the act. In the main there is satisfaction with the changes that were made some years ago and which have just been referred to in the interchange between the minister and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. Up in my country I think that those changes were accepted with considerable enthusiasm and that they have worked well. But there is still a good deal of dissatisfaction amongst the people over two rather specific things. One is the very close definition of "farmer". The matter was dealt with last night by the minister and I can understand the position that he takes. But oftentimes people get the feeling that the regulations are used in order to cut out as many farmers as possible from receiving benefit. I am not saying that is the case, but I say that the feeling is there.

For example, here is the case of a chap who works only part time on the railroad and who works a farm close by. He operates that farm as an efficient farmer and is doing well with it. In a normal year he gets more out of his farm than he gets out of his job on the railroad. But just the same, when a year comes along when he does not get a good crop and when he applies for prairie farm assistance because the yield has fallen below 4 bushels an acre, they say this to him: "You cannot have it because your chief income this year comes from your job on the railroad." I can understand that that chap would have a case for justifiable complaint.

An hon. Member: Justifiable homicide.

Mr. Low: That sort of thing, I believe, is resorted to in many cases. I wonder whether it would not be possible to recast the definition of "farmer", taking into account the sort of thing I have mentioned. In these cases the people are farmers in the full sense of the word. They are carrying on quite efficiently. They feel themselves to be entitled to the benefits because they are paying what they consider to be a sort of premium.

That brings me to another point. I wonder whether the minister and his department have given consideration to what has been urged, very largely by the hon. member for Acadia, namely, that a crop insurance program be considered, and that part of what is now being done under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act be transferred to such a crop insurance program. I think the only way in which we shall ever get satisfaction out of the paying of a premium out of the product produced by the farmer will be through a crop insurance plan rather than through this prairie farm assistance. A great many of the farmers have come to look upon P.F.A.A. as a sort of crop insurance program. Whether that view is realistic or justified, they look upon it as such because they pay a premium as they think. One per cent over the years out of their production justifies them to a degree in thinking that they should receive benefits whenever their yield falls below 4 bushels an acre, whether or not they are considered to be farmers under the act.

Another question is this one of river lots. I wonder whether the minister has had any experience with them. As I understand it, under the act or the regulations—I cannot tell which—the river lots that are registered as river lots are treated as separate townships. Very often in the bends of these large rivers, like the Peace river, you can find areas that are called river lots and are registered in the land titles office as such.

I have not been able to find out why the department looks upon these river lots as separate townships rather than having them registered as part of the township to which they belong. This past year quite a number of the people who occupy river lots found themselves unable to get benefits under the act, although their own yield fell away below the eight bushels per acre. They were told by the officials in Edmonton that they could not get benefits because their river lots were registered or were looked upon by the department as separate townships, and since they were separate townships they could not be dealt with in the ordinary way.

I just wondered if the minister had much experience with that sort of thing, and if he would have an answer as to why river lots are looked upon, no matter how large or small they may be, as separate townships. Why could they not be attached, let us say, to a contiguous township for the purpose of payment under the act?

Mr. Gardiner: If I understand what the hon. member for Peace River has been saying with regard to the river lots it does not exactly conform to what our experience with the matter is. We did find, for the orderly administration of the act, it was impossible to bring river lots under the terms of the act. We, therefore, had a meeting with the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta where these river lots are and had an understanding reached as to what would come under the terms of this act as constituting a township. I would be surprised if any small area had been called a township, any small holding of an individual. The objective was to put enough of these river lots into an area to make up an area approximately the same as a township, and then to decide whether or not they were entitled to payment on the same basis as other townships are. It was simply a matter of defining them. There is quite a long list of them here. There are 6½ pages for Manitoba, about a page for Saskatchewan and about two pages for Alberta, listing the areas that are defined.

For example, group 70 is river lot township "B", improvement district No. 102; lots 1 to 41 inclusive in township 67, range 14, west of the fourth; townships 67 and 68, range 15, west of the fourth; township 68, range 16, west of the fourth, all in the Lac la Biche settlement. Now, that is one and there are two pages of those, so I think what my hon. friend has in mind has been done, that we have brought them together for the purpose of making areas that, to all intents and purposes, would be about the same size as a township.

Mr. Low: I have a letter, Mr. Chairman, from Mr. Rowbotham in Edmonton, in which he says that these river lots are treated as separate townships. I gathered from that that, regardless of their size—

Mr. Gardiner: He is wrong in saying that about river lots. They are in groups, and when you put them together in a group and give them a number then they are dealt with the same as townships.

Mr. Low: Now, would the minister comment on the other two questions? I will just repeat them. Is his department prepared to give some further and early consideration to this whole question of the definition of a farmer under the act? Is his department giving any consideration or any study looking towards an arrangement in Canada for a crop insurance program to take over part of the functions now performed by prairie farm assistance?

Mr. Gardiner: With regard to the first question, I would say we are not allowed to forget. Several times a week when we are putting the act into effect in the fall of the year we get complaints from people who state their position. One man, for example, who followed very closely the case that was referred to, is a man who works for the railway. He indicated to us that he only got $600 for working on the railways, and therefore he should be paid prairie farm assistance on his farm. We examined into that and found he had been paid $1,800 by the railway. It was not difficult to find that out. Then, we found he was collecting unemployment insurance and had collected $350. He was not doing too badly. I would suggest to you that these individual cases are all checked and considered. Sometimes a decision is made in favour of the individual who applies and sometimes it is not. The act makes provision for appeal in all these cases, and the appeal goes to a committee of three which meets periodically to go through all these cases and determine whether or not they are entitled.

On the question of insurance, as I said a moment ago, if we are going to speak of insurance, then under the constitution this government could not set it up. This question was decided years ago in connection with hail insurance, with the result that the three western provinces introduced legislation in connection with hail insurance. In so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, it is still on the statute books. I think it is in the other provinces, too. This was done simply because we could not set up hail insurance from Ottawa. It had to be set up provincially. The same thing is true of crop insurance. Last night the hon. member for Brandon-Souris referred to the fact there was recently an investigation in Manitoba by the provincial government relating to insurance. The provincial government set up a commission. I have not recently read the report but I think I am right when I say that the commission was very much of the opinion that prairie farm assistance should not be removed, even in Manitoba.

I think it will be found in that report that, after examining into all the efforts that had been made anywhere on the continent to deal with this problem, it was decided this legislation was dealing with it at least as well as it was being dealt with anywhere else. They report some efforts were made in the United States to insure, but that there is not anything conclusive with regard to those efforts which would indicate to apply them here would be helpful in coping with the problem.

After saying that, I understand they did recommend that something ought to be done on the basis of the three western provinces to deal with a problem which is more or less common to all three of them. As I understand it, that was not based on the idea that we should drop the prairie farm assistance, but wondering if we would find some way of turning the same support into an insurance plan. I would think that an insurance plan of that kind would probably require to become a federal insurance plan, which again is unconstitutional. We have been looking at it from time to time, and we have been reading articles from time to time, and we have concluded that this is giving as much satisfaction as can be given when we have not the authority to bring in insurance.

I must say this, too, that I do not know of any insurance organization, not even Lloyds, who will take on crop insurance in an area like Saskatchewan, for example, and a considerable part of Manitoba and Alberta. They will insure almost everything but they will not insure a crop against loss in an area like the prairies, and neither will anyone else. There is no way by which you can collect enough in the way of premiums in order to take care of a situation of that kind, and that is not what we are attempting to do. I did say last night we were attempting to help the fellow pay only his store bill; we are not attempting to do any more than that.

If we attempted to pay the fellow for the loss of a crop, that would be insurance, and there is not any insurance fund created by anyone, not even by the provincial government of Saskatchewan, that would undertake to set up an insurance plan of that kind. Therefore, I would like to suggest that we ought to be reasonable in talking about these things. We have done this because no organization would put on the insurance; no one would insure the farmer against drought. We did this in order to allow him to pay his store bill and keep the merchant and others in financial operations throughout the year when they had little crop.

Mr. Low: Just one more question in connection with insurance. I think I appreciate fully what the minister has said, but as far as the constitution line is concerned, in the United States crop insurance was instituted on a federal basis, and we have a federal constitution much the same as theirs. I understand it is not quite the same. I think the major difference is the residual powers; but certainly they got around state rights in some way over there. I was wondering whether some consideration had been given to a method of getting around it in Canada so that a federal scheme of crop insurance might be instituted. The minister would not say it is impossible, would he?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I would say the advice we have had up to date is that under our constitution it is impossible; but I would not say it is impossible to change the constitution.

Mr. Low: I do not think it would be necessary to go quite so far as that. Was it not possible to have marketing plans instituted in Canada by agreement with the provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: Just in war time. In wartime, of course, the constitution all goes by the board and everything comes under the War Measures Act, and we did all kinds of things in wartime that we cannot do at other times; but the matter of entering into agreements is quite different from the matter of adopting an insurance act that brings everybody under it. For example, we entered into an agreement with all the farmers to pay them $23 a hundred for hogs, but that is an agreement. We agreed to buy the hogs, that is all. That kind of thing can be done, but if we were to try to compel people to do certain things, well, that would be different.

Mr. Low: Yes, I agree.

Mr. Thomas: When crop insurance came up for discussion in the house the minister, of course, said that it was a provincial responsibility. He indicated at that time that the only conditions under which his department would consider such a thing as crop insurance would be if the initial move was instigated by one of the provincial governments, or a number of provincial governments. If a number of provincial governments indicated to the federal government that they would be willing to come into a crop insurance scheme, then it could be instituted. I was wondering whether the minister has up to this date, or since then, received any request from any of the provincial governments that the federal government consider coming in with them in a crop insurance scheme?

While I am on my feet I might mention one thing. The minister mentioned the case of a man asking for prairie farm assistance, and he had found out that he had made $1,800, and at the same time he was receiving unemployment insurance. The minister always likes to point out that there are two sides to a question. I should like to point out that I have had one or two instances of farmers who have applied for prairie farm assistance. I know of one instance where the prairie farm assistance administration turned him down because they said he was employed, he had another means of livelihood. He lost his job and applied for unemployment insurance, and they told him he could not get unemployment insurance because he was a farmer. Therefore, it works both ways.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I want to take some exception to what the minister said in the early part of his remarks. I suggest to him that if he would like to get his estimates through without too much controversy he should not utter complete untruths. I am now referring to the remarks he made with respect to the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Gardiner: He corrected it and I accepted it. He said he was not there.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): There is no member in this house who has more fidelity to his duty as a member, and in particular in respect of agriculture, and this is known by all hon. members.

I want to say a few things in support of what the hon. member for Assiniboia has said. He pointed out that the farmer's dollar, his purchasing power, is worth about 50 per cent of what it was worth in 1939. I support that contention. According to the minister, the act was set up in 1939, not as an insurance policy but as a policy under which the farmer, when he lost his crop, would at least be able to pay his store bill. Because of the cost of living today it does not even do that. No matter what gobbledegook the minister may use in respect of this matter, as the hon. member for Assiniboia pointed out, the fact remains that in 1939 and 1940 the farmer was getting an average of only 50 cents a bushel for his wheat in those first two years of the war; while today the price of wheat has gone up, it still leaves him in much the same position.

The payments made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are completely insufficient to enable the farmer to meet even the dire needs of his family, if he loses his crop. Therefore, I go along with the bill which was proposed by the hon. member for The Battlefords last year, which asked that something be done with the act to include the payments in it. I suggest that if it were increased 100 per cent, that is, if the payments were increased to $1,000, it would be in line with the intention of the government as stated by the minister in 1939 when the act was passed.

I want to refer to the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River and others in connection with payments made under the act to part-time farmers who are finding it very difficult to get along. Figures have been given to the house to indicate that the western farm income has gone down so drastically since 1952 that it is necessary for the small farmer to go out and try to get additional work in order to bolster his income. I want to give credit to the western Prairie Farm Assistance Act administrators. When we take these individual cases to them they are given very good consideration and payments are made to those individual people; but the fact remains that there is still a lot of controversy and there are problems in the administration of the act with respect to the farmer who does not come under the complete designation of a farmer who perhaps has additional income. If he takes up his problem with a member of parliament and he in turn tries to get a re-hearing of the case he will not likely lose any payment under the act. However, I think this is something which should be clarified.

I do not go along with the minister's repeated statement that this is not an insurance scheme but is a scheme in which everybody in Canada participates by paying into the fund. I want to point out to him and to other members of the committee who do not perhaps understand the situation that this act is no different from many other pieces of legislation in this country. I know that on one occasion the minister made the statement that people in Montreal pay into this fund. He meant, of course, that the taxpayers paid into the fund because a portion of the fund is taken out of the consolidated revenue fund. In that regard I might point out to him that there is no single group in Canada that has subsidized the consumers of Canada more than the western farmer. During the 4-year period of the British wheat agreement all wheat consumed in Canada was subsidized by the western farmer. We received $1.25 a bushel f.o.b. Fort William and Port Arthur, whereas we were getting $1.55 for export wheat under the British wheat agreement. The difference was purely and simply a subsidization by the western farmer. We are not kicking about those things but we are pointing out that the western farmer is caught in a cost price squeeze.

The act drafted in 1939 did meet the dire need created by crop losses—

Mr. Gardiner: It never did do that.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): —but today it is not sufficient and I suggest to the minister that he should take cognizance of what we on this side of the house have said and try to draft legislation which will more adequately meet the situation which obtains today.

Mr. Zaplitny: I would like to ask the minister one or two questions and I hope he will not say, as he said last night, that he knows what I want him to say and he will not say it.

Mr. Gardiner: I will if you make the same kind of proposition.

Mr. Zaplitny: No, this is a little different. Section 11 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act provides for the 1 per cent levy. There are certain penalties provided further along in the act in the case of licensed companies, elevator agents and so forth, if they do not comply with the provisions of that section. I would like to ask the minister if there have been any prosecutions within the last two years under section 11 of this act?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not catch the question because I have another one here from Hansard.

Mr. Zaplitny: I asked if there had been any prosecutions under section 11 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Mr. Gardiner: No, there has been none.

Mr. Zaplitny: None in the last two years?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not remember any at any time, but there has been none in recent years in any event.

Mr. Zaplitny: In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, I think it is my duty to place on the record a resolution passed by the Manitoba farmers' union at their convention last fall dealing with this act. I am not asking the minister to do anything about it immediately because he has already indicated that it is not the intention to bring in any amendments during the course of this session but I think it should be on the record because there are one or two excellent suggestions contained in it. The resolution reads:

Be it resolved that we petition the government of Canada for the following amendments to said act—

That is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

(a) Payments on crop losses to be made on the individual basis.

(b) Payments to be based on the actual cultivated acreage in the year of the crop loss.

(c) Payments to be made on damage from all or any natural causes.

(d) Payments to be made to all who contribute to the scheme, or—those not eligible for payment within a qualifying area to be exempt from contributing to the plan upon application for such exemption.

(e) A statement to be attached to payment cheque, stating upon what basis payment is being made.

In the interests of saving time I will not comment on all of these points but I do want to point out that paragraph (e) in particular is, I think, a perfectly reasonable request and would as a matter of fact save a great deal of trouble and correspondence so far as the administration is concerned.

Quite often when farmers receive their prairie farm assistance payment a cheque is sent to the farmer stating the amount and sometimes he is not able to calculate on what basis the amount was arrived at. In order to do so he has to write to the prairie farm assistance board or if it is more convenient he complains to his member of parliament who has to handle it for him. This requires correspondence back and forth, file keeping and extra unnecessary work. I think it would be quite simple to include with the cheque a statement showing on what acreage and on which parcel of land the payment is being made, the amount per acre, and the total amount. I think that would save the department a great deal of administrative work.

I might point out, too, that the situation referred to in paragraph (d)—and I do not need to enlarge upon it because it has already been discussed—is a real injustice that might be rectified. Under certain provisions of the act there are certain parcels of land which are not eligible for prairie farm assistance and particularly that land which was purchased by a farmer after January 1, 1940 from the provincial government.

Of course, that does not apply to V.L.A. land and certain other lands. There is a great deal of the kind of land I have referred to being farmed in the province of Manitoba. Farmers who farm that land and grow grain year after year have been contributing the 1 per cent levy under the provisions of the act with no hope whatever, unless the act is eventually changed, of ever benefiting at all from the fund.

Over a period of years the 1 per cent contribution amounts to a considerable sum of money. If the government is going to take the stand that this land is sub-marginal, or for one reason or another is never to be eligible for prairie farm assistance, I think the fair thing to do would be to exclude those farmers from the 1 per cent levy.

I think there is a great element of unfairness in asking a farmer to contribute year after year 1 per cent of the value of his grain into a fund and then telling him that under no circumstances can he receive any benefit from that fund. As a matter of fact, if the farmers refused to pay the levy I do not think the government could do anything about it. I am not advising them to refuse because there is always hope while there is life and the act may be amended to have them included, but if it were challenged in the courts it is doubtful whether the courts would uphold the government in a situation where the participants in the fund raising or levy are denied any benefit. Under those circumstances I think the farmers could successfully challenge that section.

Instead of doing it that way, I think it would be wiser either to include as much as possible of that land by entering into a new agreement with the provinces with regard to that kind of land, or else, in areas where the governments both provincial and federal feel there is no possibility of including the land, if it is definitely submarginal in their opinion, then it should be excluded from the 1 per cent levy in order to bring about some sort of rough justice at least.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I asked the minister whether or not any of the provincial governments had approached his department regarding a crop insurance plan. I would like the minister to answer that question if he could.

Mr. Gardiner: No, there has not been any proposal.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, before the item carries I have a short question. The minister is no doubt aware that he has been very generous recently in having had a Social Credit candidate as one of his P.F.A.A. officers in Saskatchewan. I am referring to Mr. R. F. Claypoole of Mistatim.

Mr. Argue: He got by the blood test.

Mr. Nicholson: I think I would be remiss in my duties if I permitted this item to pass without drawing attention to the fact that the minister has been very generous. Mr. Claypoole apparently received the sum of $892.17 for his services as a P.F.A.A. officer during 1955. My question is this. Was Mr. Claypoole continued on the payroll after he became a Social Credit candidate in 1955?

I have received no criticism of the work Mr. Claypoole has done. As far as I know he has been a very faithful officer of the P.F.A.A. administration. Could the minister advise us whether Mr. Claypoole continued on the payroll after he became a Social Credit candidate?

My second question is this. I hope we will never have to qualify for P.F.A.A. payments in my area but now that the election is over I hope the fact that Mr. Claypoole has been a Social Credit candidate will not be held against him if his services should be required for the work of P.F.A.A. in the area.

Mr. Gardiner: I may have some questions to ask about that myself. I would like to know who nominated Mr. Claypoole, for one thing. The fact is that we have not done anything about it. Mr. Claypoole is still on our list and is called upon when he is needed. I do not know how much work he will do in the future nor do I know how much he has done in the past but apparently he did get paid for his work last year. Whatever the future may hold for Mr. Claypoole, it will not be because he has been a candidate of the Social Credit party. If we do not use his services it may be for some other reason.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Is this a good inspector in the opinion of the department?

Mr. Gardiner: I suppose he is or we would not have used him or put him on in the first place. He has been on for some years and I presume has given good service. I do not know whether hon. members understand how these men are called up. It is on the same basis as those who are used to check hail insurance. The hail insurance companies have a list of people whom they call up and who can give service in the summertime. Some of them are professors in agricultural colleges. We have made a ruling that no one is put on the list who is tied up to a job which would make it impossible for him to operate when we want him. Sometimes we may need him three days out of a year, or three weeks or three months depending on the kind of crop. For example, last year up in that section there was a great deal of inspection to be done because the act had been changed and new things applied. The men had to give considerable time. As a rule a man will be called up perhaps for two or three weeks. He does his work and then goes back to his other job. We do not consider he has a job with us at all, we just call him up because he is efficient at doing that job and is not looking for something permanent from us.

Item agreed to.

48. To provide for a grant to the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, $3,000.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to congratulate the minister upon his liberality in connection with the women's institutes. He recognizes that these women are doing an outstanding job. The vote is for $3,000 and I would like to see it $10,000. These women's institutes are doing a great work all across Canada in preserving the produce of the farms and helping farm wives to measure up and keep the farmers in tune with the time.

Mr. Herridge: Does the hon. member realize that this amounts to 5 cents per member per year?

Mr. Argue: Liberal generosity.

Mr. Gardiner: This is to send a delegation to the international meeting being held in Ceylon.

Item agreed to.

602. To compensate the New Brunswick potato marketing board for certain losses on payments to producers for potatoes marketed from the 1953 potato crop, which were not specifically covered by an agreement under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, $177,000.

Mr. Montgomery: This item is to cover losses which were not covered specifically under the agreement and I should like the minister to indicate what it has cost the treasury and what features there are on which losses have been paid that were not covered by the agreement.

Mr. Gardiner: The total amount paid is $2,680,000, and this additional amount of $177,000 is to be paid after consultation with the banks. As hon. members know, the government guarantees the banks against losses up to an amount not exceeding 80 per cent of the average price of the previous three years. In this particular case the amount guaranteed was about 40 per cent of the average price of the preceding three years and the payments being made are to cover that guarantee.

There was some law-breaking in connection with this and a committee made up of representatives of the Department of Finance, the Department of Justice and the Department of Agriculture made an investigation which indicated that some payments had been made which should not have been made. This $177,000 cleans up everything that is not involved in the possible charges.

Mr. Montgomery: How much has the 1956 potato starch program cost the government?

Mr. Gardiner: Approximately $5,000.

Mr. Montgomery: The minister mentioned an investigation but no report has been made public. As the taxpayers' money is being used I submit that this report should be made public or be tabled in the house.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not customary to make reports or bring down returns when a matter is still under what might be called police investigation. I do not know what the position will be after this is completed.

Mr. Montgomery: Apparently the investigation has been completed and it is a matter of deciding whether there will be prosecutions. I cannot see why the report should be withheld until that is decided.

Mr. Gardiner: There may be two sides to a question of that kind and up to the present we have not thought it wise to publish the report. We are still making inquiries as to whether some people broke the law and should be subject to prosecution.

Mr. Montgomery: Do I take it from the minister that this $177,000 will be all used to settle these claims, or will there still be outstanding claims?

Mr. Gardiner: It will all be used to cover the guarantee which we gave, and there are some more still in question.

Mr. Brooks: Is it the intention of the government to publish this report later?

Mr. Gardiner: I would not like to answer yes or no because it concerns two or three other departments.

Mr. Brooks: If it is found that there has been wrongdoing would it not be in the interests of the public to publish it?

Mr. Gardiner: I think if there has been wrongdoing anywhere it will be aired in the courts. It is not usual to indicate what evidence you have or that you lack evidence before a case of that kind is proceeded with. If it is not proceeded with I do not know what will happen.

Mr. Brooks: It is not the intention of the government to suppress it in any way if there has been wrongdoing?

Mr. Gardiner: No. Whatever proceedings are followed in connection with cases of this kind will be followed in this case.

Item agreed to.

41. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $4,142,965.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to say just a few words on this item. For a number of years this group has urged the extension of the operation of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to all agricultural areas in Canada, and quite recently the hon. member for Dauphin had a private members' motion on the order paper to that effect, which received the support of all members of this party. As a British Columbia member, ever since I have been in this house I have been urging the extension of the operation of this act in the province of British Columbia, but so far none of us have been able to influence the minister or the administration in that respect.

I am just going to read a paragraph from an editorial in Country Life of September 1955, which asks the minister a question. I might mention that Country Life is the official organ of at least 98 per cent of the agricultural organizations of British Columbia and, I should think, almost a similar percentage of the farmers in the country. This is entitled "No Wonder There's No P.F.R.A. in B.C.":

> From Vanderhoof came a press release this summer which indicates that the Canada and British Columbia agricultural departments are co-operating to make a survey of central British Columbia to determine the possibilities from an agricultural standpoint.
> Country Life is mighty pleased to hear of this action because we feel it is long overdue.
>
> At that, it isn't nearly enough. The work should be extended over the entire province and co-related with the future prospects of industrial development and population increase.
>
> For years farmer groups have been hounding the province and Ottawa to have the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act enlarged to include this Pacific coast province. The appeals fall on deaf ears.
>
> With the exception of Pemberton and VLA projects the assistance of P.F.R.A. has been denied B.C. and we cannot find it in our hearts to blame Ottawa overmuch for this oversight.
>
> Most of the blame can be laid on the doorstep of the British Columbia government. It is little use to cry to Ottawa that B.C. needs development of its agricultural resources when no surveys have been made to provide an overall picture of the future possibilities of this graet province agriculture-wise.
> We are told in a broad sweeping way that five per cent of the land in B.C. is useful for agricultural purposes. But what we haven't been told is what each untilled section can best be used for and whether there is a sound economic future in developing any particular section for agriculture.

In view of our repeated requests throughout the years for the extension of the operation of the act to British Columbia, I want to ask the minister this question. Is there some substance in the contention in this editorial, and are we wasting our breath in this house until the government of British Columbia organizes surveys of the areas suitable to the operation of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act?

Mr. Gardiner: The question that is raised is not just along the line that has been suggested by the editorial. I spoke to the organization for which, I think, this newspaper speaks, last fall when I was out in British Columbia, and they raised the same question as to why we did not apply P.F.R.A. to British Columbia. I indicated to them that the name itself suggested why we do not, that it is prairie farm rehabilitation, and I think it will be agreed that outside of some very very small areas in British Columbia that term would not apply. Then I went on to say that P.F.R.A. did not even apply to all the prairie provinces; it applied only to the Palliser triangle, which is probably considerably less than half of the prairie provinces, and so it is put there for certain reasons, one of the reasons being that during the time that the lands were owned, operated and controlled from Ottawa they settled those areas in a manner which was not suitable to the districts, and it was thought that Ottawa should do something to change that situation.

That act, as is known, was brought down in 1935 by the government previous to this one. Very little had been done at the time we came in. We changed the act somewhat and went on to administer it from there. It was impossible at that time, and it might be impossible yet, to get the exact terms or anything approaching the exact terms of the P.F.R.A. here, even P.F.R.A. outside on the prairies, and I explained all this to them at this particular meeting, and they said after the meeting was over that they understood why it was not done.

I think that the question that is raised in this article has not especially to do with the P.F.R.A. It has to do with these special votes that we have already considered and passed. There was one there that was especially for British Columbia. It started in the Pemberton flats and went on to operate in other places, more particularly in assisting returned men to settle on lands in the fruit-growing areas in my hon. friend's constituency and elsewhere. We did pay toward those lands out of this special fund. That special fund, in so far as British Columbia is concerned, I think, what is considered to be probably the last vote, is in here now and has already been passed to clean up those expenditures that we had undertaken before. Between now and the next session there may be something else that has to be put in that vote, but there is no intention this session of putting in new amounts to start new projects in connection with that vote.

What they have in mind is, I think, since the lands and resources are entirely under the provinces—and in British Columbia they have always been—that is a provincial responsibility, and, if they were coming here to ask for assistance, then they should have all the details that are necessary in order to place the case before the government here. Then the matter would be considered on its merits at that time.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his complete answer. I might mention that the works that were undertaken in the fruit-growing areas were in Okanagan south.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: I understand, then, that you would expect that if an application were to be made for further assistance under this act, British Columbia would base that application on a survey of the areas which they were considering at that time.

Mr. Gardiner: They would be in a much stronger position if they did.

Mr. Hahn: I have been interested in that question, and I raised the question earlier in the session, as indicated at page 3455 of Hansard this year and again on May 10, when the minister indicated something of what he has said today. I do not want to extend the debate any further, but he did raise a few questions in my mind in his answer, which I suppose is not unnatural. He said, as I recall it, that the reason for non-extension was that certain sections were settled in British Columbia that were not suitable to Ottawa. The area about which I spoke earlier in the session was the lower mainland of British Columbia, which was certainly suitable for agriculture but which required particular work.

Later he went on to say that the reason why it is not extended is that lands and resources have been under the provinces, and these have been under the province of British Columbia, ever since confederation. I am satisfied that lands and resources are under each of the provinces. Today we have the P.F.R.A. in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and those provinces have control of their lands and resources. I cannot agree with the argument of the minister when he makes that particular statement.

I wish to ask him, though, as he has perhaps indicated that this is not going to be extended this year, has he not received a request from the British Columbia government as outlined by the member for Kootenay West and as outlined by the minister himself, for an extension of this particular service under the special act that the minister cited a few moments ago, asking that special consideration be given to the lower mainland of British Columbia, more particularly to the section of the Mud bay diking area and the Colebrook diking area and the others raised earlier this session?

Mr. Gardiner: All I can say is that there have been applications made and that so far the government here has not been prepared to spend money on those projects.

Mr. Hahn: Is the reason for it included in the two reasons mentioned just a few minutes ago, namely that the areas are not settled in a way suitable to the wishes of Ottawa or because the provinces have controlled all lands and resources since confederation?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not understand that I said a few moments ago that it was because they were properly settled or not properly settled. If I did, I want to withdraw it because I did not intend to say that. The reason I gave was that the lands and resources are under the provinces. I think my hon. friend misunderstood what was said with regard to the P.F.R.A. area. Those lands and resources were not under the province—either the province of Alberta or the province of Saskatchewan—when those provinces were set up. They were settled from Ottawa until 1931. Practically all the land in those areas had been homesteaded. All that were fit to homestead were homesteaded before that time. So it was decided here over 20 years ago —21 years ago this month, to be exact—to make some expenditures in that P.F.R.A. area because of the past history of it, and that past history does not apply any other place in Canada. All the other lands were under the control of the provinces right from the time they went into confederation.

Mr. Hahn: I fully recall when the provinces received their provincial autonomy in respect of lands and resources and that it was in 1931, because I lived in Alberta at that time. But it seems to me that P.F.R.A. came into effect a while after that period. Was it not about 1934?

Mr. Gardiner: In 1935.

Mr. Hahn: Then am I to gather that P.F.R.A. was instituted in compensation for or in lieu of the fact that from 1905 to 1931 the provinces did not have control of their natural resources?

Mr. Gardiner: I would not say it was in compensation. It was realizing the fact that the people had been put on land where they could not earn a living. They were in the drought area. It was realized that there were 1 million people settled there and that a very considerable part of them were having some difficulties on account of the fact that drought prevailed there. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was set up for the purpose of trying to alleviate their position and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was set up to take care of them in the meantime. We attempted to get as many people as we could out of the area. We have been moving them out into irrigated districts, some of them in Alberta even when the person was moved from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Hahn: I have one final question, or at least I hope it is final. Has the department any particular question on which they are making a decision in respect of the extension of this special grant to the province or this special allowance that is being considered, but not at this time? I understand we passed it earlier. In other words, at this time is any consideration being given to any project in British Columbia that the government might assist in?

Mr. Gardiner: No. The position is that when we went into the Pemberton flats and had this vote set up for the purpose of taking care of the situation, the settlers in the Pemberton flats were returned men of the first war. They had been put on the land by the federal government. They had been put on land in that area which, as matters turned out, was flooded periodically. The stream in question, namely the Pemberton river which flows through that area, overflowed its banks. If even a tree fell into the river it started a dam to form from the silt that came down from the mountains, and started the river running in through these men's farms. When we went there first, these men could not work their farms at all in the summer months because the river had spread across their farms. We undertook to dike that river so that their lands would be safe. We did that because they were returned men who were put on the land by the federal government. We carried out that project at considerably greater cost than any of us thought would be involved when we started. Then we took on a similar thing down in the Okanagan district for returned men of the second war. They were largely sons of returned men of the first war. The fathers lived down on the flats near the river. This was at Penticton. There is an area above that on the higher lands on which the sons who came back from this war wanted to settle. We joined up with the Department of Veterans Affairs and the provincial government in making it possible for them to settle there.

Then the other project that was proposed was at Kamloops and it also had a percentage of returned men on it. But eventually we came to the time when, because of the discussions that were going on with regard to the marketing of apples and the marketing of fruit in general, we could not take the position from here that we were going to extend the production of the crop in British Columbia, and that any responsibility for that action would have to be taken by the provincial government. I think that the provincial government and ourselves were somewhat in doubt as to whether we should be extending apple growing at a time when we were finding difficulty in marketing the apples that were there. But the projects that we dealt with at Pemberton, Penticton and elsewhere through that area were for returned men and we thought we had some special responsibilities in that regard. The provincial government put in roads and helped put in bridges and that kind of thing for which they felt they had a responsibility. We made agreements and carried them out.

Mr. Hahn: From the answer I have received, Mr. Chairman, I fully realize that the minister did not answer the last question I put to him. He has given a fine historical background of the present condition to which I have referred.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I must say that if I did not answer it, I intended to do so, because I said this. Both the provincial government and ourselves came to the conclusion that we should not be extending apple-growing areas in British Columbia at a time when we could not market the apples we already have. We said definitely to the British Columbia government that, under no circumstances, will we take responsibility for saying that a change should be made in the farming operations in British Columbia, that such a thing will have to be done by the provincial government and that we will consider the question as to whether we will support it. But the main reason why we have come to the end of the expenditures at present is that we were dealing only with returned men and we think we have gone as far as we can in that matter.

Mr. Hahn: The point I wish to make is that the district about which the minister is speaking is the apple-growing district. I am not interested in the apple-growing district because apples are not the chief crop, by any means, in the area which I represent and the area about which the minister of agriculture for the province of British Columbia wrote to this minister, as I understand it, asking for an extension. The province of British Columbia apparently has changed its mind in respect of this question which the minister has explained so well. But I am more particularly interested in this matter: What consideration is going to be given in future and what consideration must be brought to the government's attention if there is going to be any extension? Is it going to be necessary, for instance, that the province of British Columbia prove to this government that there are war veterans in these areas or that the major number of the farms are operated by war veterans? Is that one of the underlying reasons behind the extension of P.F.R.A. or the special grant, or is it just a matter of application by the provincial government? I should like to know,—and I am satisfied my province and more particularly the farmers would—how they are ever going to be able to get assistance from the federal government. We had the mudflats flooded, the dikes went out. I think the provincial government spent some $10,000 in assisting the farmers there. I do not know what the federal government did, if anything. We have each of these diking areas, as I mentioned,—and I do not wish to have to repeat this—which are growing vegetables or used generally as a market-gardening area of British Columbia. That is the finest part of it, at least on the lower mainland, and it is most important that these people get some assistance. Has it been established to the satisfaction of the federal government and the provincial government alike that this is entirely a provincial responsibility? Are they agreed? If so, then I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the house.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the case.

Mr. Hahn: That is, it has been definitely established between the two governments it is a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Gardiner: That is not only the best farming area in British Columbia but it is the best farming area in Canada and the best farming area in the world that I know anything about. The lands were originally owned and operated by the province. They are entirely under the administration of the province. We are not assisting in that kind of thing anywhere else in Canada, so we do not assist there.

Mr. Charlton: Certainly, it is not my intention to hold up these estimates, but in view of the remarks that have just been made by the hon. members for the Kootenays, and since that suggestion was made to the minister, I want to say that we in this group also have suggested on various occasions that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be extended to take in all of Canada. I have suggested before in the house that I thought it probably could be worked in co-operation with the provinces. A scheme could be designed to take over flood control, conservation and rehabilitation. There are just as many places in eastern Canada as in western Canada that should not be farmed, as the minister well knows. I think probably this whole question could be worked out in co-operation with the provinces and would go quite far towards working out flood control, conservation and rehabilitation of land that is not suitable for agricultural purposes.

Item agreed to.

42. Major irrigation and reclamation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,050,000.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I want to deal with a situation that has been brought up many times in this house by me as well as by other members from Saskatchewan, namely, the flood situation which developed in Saskatchewan last year. I want to say first that I think this government has been profound in its indifference and its inaction in respect to the situation in that province.

At the beginning, I want to say to the Minister of Agriculture that he did make certain statements in Saskatchewan during the course of a visit there, as recorded in the Leader-Post of February 18, 1956, which should be smacked right on the nose at this time. The minister is reported to have said that flood relief is a provincial responsibility and the government failed the people. They waited for us, he said, while the other provinces went ahead with what they had to do and billed us later. I would like to say right at the beginning that nothing could be more false because in the early days of the flood, not only did the provincial authorities set up committees of the municipalities throughout the province to gather information and determine with all possible expedition the extent of the damage, but in addition they immediately set up a fund of $1,600,000 for an emergency drainage program. The government also voted $1 million in the supplementary estimates for the municipalities.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, and I think all members of this house will agree, that I want democracy in this country to work for the benefit of all our people. We do not want discrimination, and we have had discrimination. I am asking that this Liberal federal government come out from behind the curtain and be fair with all the people of Canada. I want to say, too, that I think the statements made in this house by the Prime Minister concerning the flood have been completely misleading. They misled the provincial authorities in the early stages of the disaster which struck that province. On many occasions I asked what assistance was this government going to give to the province of Saskatchewan—

Mr. Gardiner: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. If my hon. friend was going to discuss that he should have discussed it on the last item. This question has nothing to do with the large projects here, and that item has been carried.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I would suggest to you, sir, and to the house that perhaps the minister would like these estimates to go through. I have been waiting for some time for the other members, and I am speaking on 41.

The Chairman: Item 41 was carried some time ago.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I do not care if it is 41, 42 or 43; they were all allowed to stand.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I can understand why the Minister of Agriculture would not like me to make my remarks.

Mr. Gardiner: I have no objection to my hon. friend making remarks. He says that what I said was false, and everything he has said up to the moment is false. I can answer everything here or elsewhere anytime, but he is out of order; it is not this item.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I am going to leave it to you, Mr. Chairman. I say that perhaps I am using live ammunition and pretty heavy artillery on the minister and he does not like it.

The Chairman: It is not a question of artillery, it is a question of relevancy. If I may interject here, we are now on an item dealing with major irrigation and reclamation projects in the prairie provinces. Now, I presume, without having too much knowledge of the item—would the hon. member please resume his seat—that it deals with specific items of expenditure. If that is the case, we must relate our remarks to those specific items. I would ask the hon. member to co-operate in that respect.

Mr. Castleden: Speaking to the point of order, I would say that I believe the hon. member was on his feet getting ready to speak on item No. 41 when several people shouted "carried".

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: On the other hand, may I say this? When the hon. member rose I said "on 42", and the hon. member proceeded to speak on 42.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Moose Mountain has been in his seat all morning waiting to make a speech on the flood situation. It may be that No. 41 was passed, but I suggest to you that we would make better progress in committee if you did not firmly rule that 41 was passed or you let him make his statement on 42. I think it is a little debatable whether prairie farm rehabilitation would cover the project to which the hon. member refers or whether it might more properly come under a general reclamation project as was done in connection with the floods in Manitoba. In any event, I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Moose Mountain be allowed to proceed.

The Chairman: In that respect, of course, I cannot transgress the rules of relevancy. It is my duty to apply them to the best of my ability. I am in the hands of the committee. If the committee wishes to give the hon. member for Moose Mountain permission to revert to No. 41 for the purpose of making this statement, I am in the hands of the committee. Is the committee agreed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Surely, at this stage of the sitting we should abide by the rules. There is no reason why the hon. member should be allowed to depart from them.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I am not just too clear on this point. I do not think the Minister of Agriculture will disagree with me when I say that this whole matter has been confused by his statements. In other words, I do not know just what item is the proper one under which to deal with this matter. There has been a reference made to the Water Conservation Act; the reference has been made to P.F.R.A., and I am not too sure that I am out of order regardless of what this item says.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The Chairman says you are out of order.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I would have to refer to these various pieces of legislation, so I think I am quite in order.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member was in the house, there is no question about that. We had a discussion here for at least half an hour about flood control and what this government did about flood control. In answer to the hon. member who just took his seat a few moments ago, I stated that we did not do that in any of the provinces of Canada and therefore we were not going to do it in British Columbia. Now, that was the question. That is the question that is being raised now, this matter of handling flood control in those areas. The detail of the item we are on now appears on page 132, and it is as follows:

Bow river irrigation project, St. Mary's irrigation project, South Saskatchewan river development, Boundary dam, Fifty mile reservoir, Buffalo Pound lake reservoir, engineering services for major irrigation and conservation projects.

Those are all the items that make up the $7,050,000. There is nothing in here about flood control at all. Anything that I may have said or anyone else may have said with regard to flood control does not properly come under this item.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Unless you rule me out of order I feel, sir, that I am quite in order. While we were discussing the item some hon. members called out "carried". I rose to my feet immediately, and whether or not we were on the present item or the previous item, I think I shall have to leave to the Chair to decide. I felt that I was quite in order in rising at this time to make my remarks. I want to continue, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May we have your ruling, please?

The Chairman: Order. I regret there has been a misunderstanding with regard to the passage of item 41, but I think it is quite clear that item 41 carried. When the hon. member for Moose Mountain rose to his feet I said, "On resolution 42", and the hon. member commenced his speech. He well knows that if he had wished to speak on item 41 he would have said, "No, Mr. Chairman, on 41". Therefore, I must rule that item 41 was duly carried and that we are now discussing item 42.

The hon. member well knows also that when we are discussing an item in committee of supply we are governed by standing order 59, subparagraph 2, which reads as follows:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

As the Minister of Agriculture has pointed out, the details of resolution 42 are found on page 132 of the blue book. The particular projects are as follows:

Bow river irrigation project, St. Mary's irrigation project, South Saskatchewan river development, Boundary dam, Fifty mile reservoir, Buffalo Pound lake reservoir, engineering services for major irrigation and conservation projects.

These are specific projects, and I regretfully must rule that a general speech on flood conditions would not be relevant to this item.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): In view of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, the only thing I can ask is the indulgence of the committee to revert back to the other item, if the committee feels inclined to grant it.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member permission to revert to resolution 41?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Goode: I think some members of the committee should reply to that. The hon. member is an experienced member of parliament. He sat here and knew that item 41 had passed. He has been on his feet much of the time this morning. He knows exactly how to handle himself. I think your ruling is correct, and we should now go on with the business of the committee.

The Chairman: Resolution 42.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, at this time I want to express the support of the C.C.F. group and the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan for an immediate start on the building of the Saskatchewan dam.

The Minister of Agriculture still has an item in the estimates for $500,000 entitled "South Saskatchewan river project". The minister has kept this thing alive in the press and in the house for only one purpose, and that is to mislead the people of western Canada into thinking that he or the government has some intention in the near future to do something about this project. Although the Minister of Agriculture and other colleagues of his in the cabinet at every election campaign for the last 10 years or more have dangled this before the people of Saskatchewan, nothing has been done about it. One excuse after another has been used. In the 1945 federal election campaign and in the 1949 federal election campaign, the line was, we are making surveys, we believe it will be in the national interest, elect us and we will be prepared to proceed with the building of the South Saskatchewan river project. But in spite of all the promises nothing has been done. Instead of getting ahead with the project we are going back.

The minister has taken the attitude over the years, until very recently, that the federal government was prepared to build the project. Now they are trying to slough off some of the cost on the provincial government without any clear commitment that they are prepared to go ahead with the project. The Prime Minister has set himself in opposition to this project. He has asked the people of Canada to produce hundreds of millions of dollars for the St. Lawrence seaway, for projects in other parts of Canada—

Mr. Hosking: Do you disagree with that?

Mr. Argue: Not at all. But he has said, as far as the people of Saskatchewan are concerned, they will not get the dam. "We do not think the project is in the national interest." I suggest to you that that is rank discrimination against the people of one province and of one section of Canada. The Prime Minister himself is the great obstacle to this project. The Minister of Agriculture, of course, knows that perfectly well. When from time to time we ask the Minister of Agriculture questions on the orders of the day about the South Saskatchewan river project and when the Prime Minister is in his seat, the Minister of Agriculture is not true to his normal form when he is prepared to stand up and make a statement quickly and in a clear voice, and debate the issue if necessary; he slumps back in his seat, looks at the Prime Minister, worried. He wonders whether he can get a nod; he takes another look at the Minister of Trade and Commerce and, because the Minister of Agriculture knows full well that his colleagues in the cabinet, with the Prime Minister of this country, are determined that this project shall not be proceeded with because they have said so—

The Chairman: It being one o'clock—

Mr. Harris: Before we do that, may I say I think it is obvious that we are getting behind in our plans for prorogation. We have accommodated my hon. friend, I think, twice in this debate. I wonder whether the committee would agree to sit on until we complete it; otherwise we shall not even reach our understanding.

Mr. Nicholson: I am quite anxious to co-operate, but I think we should remember the staff are under a tremendous strain. We can duck out, but we should think about the Hansard staff and the protective staff. They have a very tough job these days and they should get their regular luncheon period.

Mr. Harris: I think we can abridge it by half an hour at least.

Mr. Nicholson: Could we give the staff an hour and a half from the time we finish until we meet again?

Mr. Harris: I think an hour would be sufficient, surely, if we could go to half past one and meet again at half past two.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I object to any changes being made in the procedure of this house. We have been sitting here from eleven o'clock in the morning to eleven o'clock at night.

Mr. Argue: You asked for it a little while ago.

Mr. Castleden: That is what you wanted. There is no unanimous consent, sir.

The Chairman: It being after one o'clock I do leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, at one o'clock I had been saying that the Prime Minister of this country has told us time and time again that as far as he is concerned building the South Saskatchewan river dam is not in the national interest. The people of Saskatchewan resent that attitude very much because they feel they are entitled along with the other provinces in Canada to a share in the beneficial public works that are inaugurated in this nation. They resent it, too, because they believe the South Saskatchewan river project is one that is very definitely in the national interest because it is important to a large geographic area and because a large irrigation project such as the South Saskatchewan dam would mean the irrigation of some 500,000 acres of land. This would assist in stabilizing agriculture in western Canada, would save the provincial government undertaking fodder and seed measures from time to time and would go a long way toward stabilizing the whole economy of that region and subsequently the economy of the nation.

In spite of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture knows full well it is the Prime Minister and others of his colleagues in the cabinet who are standing in the way of the South Saskatchewan river project the minister does not hesitate to make public statements that are misleading, and not in accordance with the facts. As a matter of fact the Minister of Agriculture has attempted to transfer to the government of Saskatchewan the blame for no progress being made on the South Saskatchewan river dam. He went out in his recent Saskatchewan election campaign and not only attempted to blame the Saskatchewan government for the delay of the federal government but he came rather close to using political blackmail when he said that as long as the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan, Mr. C. M. Fines, occupied that post, as far as he, the Minister of Agriculture, was concerned, there would be no development of the South Saskatchewan river project.

The Minister of Agriculture made other statements as reported in the Regina Leader-Post of June 12 under the heading "Gardiner Blames Fines for Delay", and said that the federal government was prepared to pay 75 per cent of the cost and the province had refused to pay the other 25 per cent.

In case it might be said that I am not quoting from the press report correctly I shall quote the article. The first paragraph reads as follows:

> Estevan (staff)—Speaking in support of Jim Cinnamon, Liberal candidate for the Souris-Estevan constituency, agriculture minister James G. Gardiner, at the Canadian Legion hall Monday, blamed provincial treasurer, C. M. Fines for the delay in building the South Saskatchewan river dam. Mr. Gardiner said the dam was a provincial matter—

Listen to this.

> —and except for the matter of costs and size of the project, was no different from the proposed dam for Long Creek. He said the federal government had agreed to pay 75 per cent of the cost and that would leave $20 million for the provincial government to find.

As soon as the premier of the province of Saskatchewan saw this report in the Regina Leader-Post he immediately sent the following wire to the Prime Minister under date of June 14, 1956:

> Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent,
> Prime Minister of Canada,
> Ottawa.
