DEDICATED

TO the brave sons of McGill who, voluntarily and unselfishly setting aside their hopes and ambitions, the comforts of home and the companionship of friends, on the fields of Flanders and of France, and elsewhere on sea and land, fought in the cause of the Allies in the Great War with courage, devotion and honour;

AND IN PROUD AND TENDER MEMORY

OF those who finally passed out of the sight of men by the path of duty, lighting up the War's dark page by their ungrudging service, glorious heroism and perfect sacrifice, to the end that we who remain and those who follow might live in freedom, contentment and peace. Their names will be held in everlasting remembrance.

FOREWORD

WHEN the founder of our University conceived the idea which has ever since been the inspiration of his successors, which has found its realization in our gray stone walls, our class-rooms, our laboratories and which lives yet in the spirit of our polity, he envisaged, we may be sure, an institution which should serve not only the individual student but also the land we love. Whether his dreams ever fashioned the McGill of to-day, whether he foresaw how great a nation in how mighty an Empire the country he was benefiting would become, we may not know, yet we cannot but think that if the departed know of the happenings upon earth, he must have looked with pride upon the service of the University he founded and that of her sons, from the day when they heard the call to arms in 1914 until the bugles blew for the Armistice.

THE University, we believe, does its duty to the state by instilling into all who enter its gates the highest ideals of citizenship, by providing for its professional students the best possible training, and last, and most important of all, by schooling young men for leadership. The actual number of McGill men who wore their country's uniform in the Great War, is evidence enough that inspiration to public service was not lacking in the University which fostered them, but the salient fact in the history of our war effort is that so high a proportion were able to assume responsibility and quit themselves like men. They filled the services which required high professional training, such as the Army Medical Corps and the Engineers, they implemented those whose technique called especially for men who had been taught how to learn, such as the Artillery and Machine Gun Corps, but their greatest achievement as a group was their acceptance and performance of the work of leaders. Out of three thousand and fifty-nine McGill men who served, one thousand seven hundred and forty-three were granted commissions, a very high number when it is considered that the Canadian officers who left England for various fields of battle numbered in all but twenty-three thousand. Of the remainder many became non-commissioned officers, members of those grades whose pride it was that they were the backbone of the army, upon which falls directly the burden of maintaining discipline and upholding morale, and there is little doubt that in due course, had the war continued, all, or almost all, the sons of McGill would have been called upon to undertake the duties of leading and of training others. We set down these things not in any spirit of boastfulness, but with heartfelt thanks that McGill men were able to do their duty so conspicuously well, and that their Alma Mater can rightly claim some share of the credit for their achievement.

THIS book has been prepared in honour of all who served, who gave so much of their lives in a cause which seemed to them so righteous that they never debated its justice. Canada was threatened, the Empire was threatened, these were reasons enough when the call came, and without hesitation, without reserve, they gathered to the standards of their race. For the great conflict Canada mustered a force which, while it exceeded in size the utmost expectation of her own people, took also a share which far surpassed our highest hopes and played a part, the importance of which could never have been foreseen. The achievements of Canadian troops were due not only to courage but to the training, the skill and the intelligence which organized and led, and the Universities of Canada contributed in no small way to that training, that skill and that intelligence. Surely here is a debt not lightly to be forgotten.

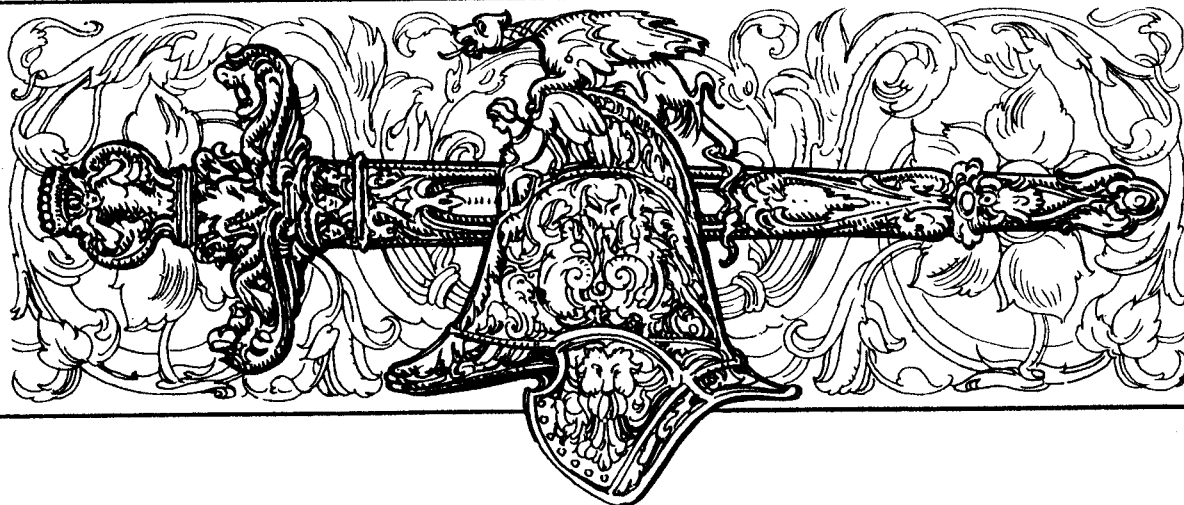

MORE even than it is an honour to the living, however, this book is a tribute to the dead, to those whose splendid souls, released in the flame of battle or in the cool hospital ward, have winged onward to a glory past all knowledge.

A TRIBUTE is all that we can offer them, for they have builded themselves a monument more enduring than any that the hand of man could raise. Their names stand in letters of gold on that great viewless roll whereon are graven too the names of Gideon and of David, of the warriors of Marathon and Thermopylæ, of Grenville, of Nelson, of Lincoln, of the mighty Saviour of Men himself, of all who have died for justice, for liberty and for righteousness.

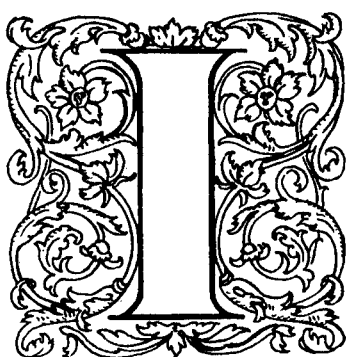

IN that glorious company they have won for themselves a place. May we that remain behind prove worthy of having been their comrades.

McGILL AND THE WAR

It is practically certain that no class of Canadian citizens responded more readily, or in greater numbers, to the call of duty during the four eventful years (1914-18), when the greatest war in the history of the world called for the sternest service which man can render, than did the eligible graduates and undergraduates of our higher seats of learning. Whilst it may be said that there were special reasons for this result, it is nevertheless safe to conclude that the main cause was the high and compelling sense of duty which is developed by a broad and generous education. Those connected with McGill University did their full share in this respect.

THE McGill Officers' Training Corps, the first of those contingents which now form the Canadian Officers' Training Corps, had been formed in the year 1912, and it was without doubt partly due to the existence of this organization that there was so little delay in commencing military activities within the University in the autumn of 1914.

AS soon as practicable after the outbreak of war the Graduates' Society decided to organize a "provisional battalion," and a skeleton cadre was at once formed in which intensive instruction was carried on, the campus being used for drill. Thus when the term began and the undergraduates commenced to enlist, enough junior officers and non-commissioned officers to complete its establishment were available from the ranks of the graduates who had received the benefit of these two months' training.

AFTER consultation with the University and those interested, the Militia Department decided that the best policy for the time being at any rate would be to authorize the enlargement of the Officers' Training Corps and absorb into it the whole of the "provisional battalion." This was forthwith carried out and the Officers' Training Corps was thus enlarged to a strength of 600 or 700, all ranks.

MAJOR Geddes, now Sir Auckland Geddes, its first Commander, was called away to active service shortly after the commencement of the term, but the battalion was fortunate in being able to replace him by Lt.-Col. Robert Starke, who guided its destinies throughout the war.

FROM this unit during the next few years, there flowed a constant stream of officers and men to the fighting forces of the Empire, whilst at the same time McGill graduates, wherever they were, lost no time in ranging themselves under their country's flag. The table at the end of the record of enlistments contained in this book shows how full and strong this stream was, but the facts may be more clearly evident if they are placed in a somewhat different form.

DURING the first three years of the War, or up to the time that the Military Service Act came into force, there were enrolled at one time or another in the University about 1,900 male students of eighteen years of age and over. Of these fully twenty per cent were not British citizens, or if they were, they had so recently become such that they could not be blamed if they were not particularly enthusiastic in the matter of enlistment. This will leave a little more than 1,500 of a real recruiting constituency. Of this number, judging by the result of medical examinations generally, probably twenty per cent were physically unfit for regular service, leaving a possible total of 1,200. Of this number, about 850 actually enlisted. The great majority of the remaining 350 were enrolled in the Faculty of Medicine with a view to rendering service as medical men on graduation.

THE record of McGill graduates is not less creditable. In estimating the part played by these classes, it is necessary to remember that practically all who graduated prior to 1892 were over military age when the war broke out. The only ones who should be taken into account, therefore, are those men who obtained their degrees after that date, about 3,000 in all. If we deduct from this figure twenty per cent for physical unfitness (and this probably should be higher), and take into account the fact that the great majority had contracted domestic and business ties which could not be easily broken even for a short time, we need not wonder that the percentage of enlistments among the Alumni was not so high as it was among the undergraduates, and yet it is higher than one on first consideration would suppose when all the circumstances are taken into account, for, of the 3,000, quite fifty per cent enlisted in one branch of the service or another across the sea. The list of killed and died on service and of the distinctions won, given in the record which follows, is a striking indication of the manner in which that service was performed.

IN the first year of the existence of the McGill Regiment (the first year of the war), the organization of a full McGill battalion for active service was at one time put forward as a serious proposition, but wiser counsels prevailed. Had the attempt been made to carry this suggestion into effect, it is altogether likely that it would have proved a failure, as probably the majority of our students thought (and rightly so) that they could render better service in some other capacity than that of privates. Although the idea of a full battalion was abandoned, however, it was thought possible that companies could be raised from time to time as reinforcements for some particular unit. One such was raised before the session 1914-15 closed, and left for overseas in the early summer. This Company was attached to the 38th Battalion of Ottawa, but it was later arranged that subsequent companies should be used as reinforcements for the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry to which also the original Company had in the meantime been transferred. Five companies were sent over in rapid succession, and three or four drafts of fifty, from a sixth, which never reached its full strength, as voluntary enlistment had by that time practically ceased.

WHILST these Universities Companies were raised at McGill, it must not be supposed that they were composed wholly of McGill students, or that McGill students even formed the majority, for, as a matter of fact, there were students from every Canadian university, chiefly from the West and from Toronto, whilst their friends and others from the same rank in life made up the remainder. What stands to the credit of McGill in this connection is not so much that she contributed men to these companies, but that they were organized under her direction, that the Commanding Officer was in almost every case a McGill graduate; that she took a special interest in their welfare; that her campus was their parade ground, and that her buildings were given up for their use as barracks during their training. Moreover, they were adopted in a general way (the first two especially), in so far as finances were concerned, by the Graduates' Society of the University, through the Officers' Training Corps.

ALTHOUGH the Universities' Companies did not bear the name of McGill, there were two important fighting units which were permitted to do so, namely the 7th and 10th Siege Batteries, commanded by Major W. D. Tait, now Professor of Psychology, and Sir Stopford Lauder Brunton, a graduate of the University, respectively. The other officers of both Batteries were also McGill men (including Dr. Cyrus Macmillan, now Professor of English), as were the greater number of the non-commissioned officers and gunners as well.

MENTION might also be made in this connection of another unit, the 148th Battalion, which, though not organized under McGill authority, was nevertheless very closely associated with it, through the fact that the Commanding Officer, Colonel A. A. Magee, had been the Major and active officer of the Officers' Training Corps of the University, and not a few of its officers and a considerable number of those in the ranks were McGill men. The Battalion always drilled on the University Campus, was by resolution of Corporation affiliated with the McGill C.O.T.C., and before its departure for Overseas their colours were formally deposited in the McGill Library.

It should be mentioned as well that McGill also contributed her quota (twenty-six officers and one hundred and eighty-six men) to the Tank Battalion which the Government authorized to be furnished by the universities of Canada.

PERHAPS the best known war organization, however, bearing the University name, was a non-combatant one, namely the McGill General Hospital, officially known as No. 3. This was distinctly a McGill unit, as all its officers were members of the Staff or graduates of the Faculty of Medicine, and all the men of other ranks were drawn from the student body. The nurses were graduates of either the Royal Victoria Hospital or the Montreal General Hospital, which are so closely connected with the Faculty. This Hospital was first intended to be on the lines of communication and to be of medium capacity, namely five hundred and twenty beds, but before leaving Canada, the capacity was doubled and later on was increased to twenty-one hundred beds with a corresponding increase in the personnel. The Hospital unit sailed from Canada on May 6th, 1915, under Colonel H. S. Birkett, Dean of the Faculty of Medicine, with Colonel J. M. Elder, Assistant Professor of Surgery, as second in command. It was first established, as intended, on the lines of communication, but was later transferred to Boulogne as a stationary hospital. Up to the beginning of 1918, one hundred thousand patients were treated, exclusive of surgical cases, the mortality being 0.5 per cent, and among the seven thousand who underwent operations, the mortality was only 2.5 per cent.

THE greater number of McGill graduates and perhaps of the undergraduates as well, however, took up active service in organizations other than those which bore the McGill name, or which were closely connected with the University. Indeed, there were few, if any, military units in Canada which did not contain within its ranks a number of McGill students or graduates. There were many besides as, the list shows, in other units, chiefly in Great Britain and the United States of America. The McGill Officers' Training Corps, moreover, can be directly credited with the enlistment of many outside of the student body, for the activities of this organization did not end with the College Year. During the summers of 1915 and 1916, a course of intensive training was given on the University grounds, under the direction of this organization, and in this way many were fitted to take the position of non-commissioned officers, and, with not much extra instruction, of commissioned officers as well, in regular battalions, but perhaps the most useful purpose served by the corps was the imbuing of their members with the spirit of service, in consequence of which hundreds of them went to the front as humble privates.

THE sum total of the University's war work is not stated, however, when the enlistment of her sons is told, for in many other ways did she lend herself in support of the Allied cause. The University buildings, grounds, and laboratories were freely given up for meetings, barracks, research work, store-rooms, lecture rooms, for the re-education of returned soldiers, and for the work of the Red Cross Society, which was carried on in McGill through the Women's Union, composed almost exclusively of the wives and sisters of the members of the Staff.

IN any account of what McGill has done, one should not fail to tell of the splendid assistance given by the Graduates' Society of the University. Apart from the example set by many of its members in enlisting themselves, and from their strenuous endeavours to promote enlistment by word and pen, they contributed very largely in a financial way to the support of the cause. Their first big undertaking was to provide uniforms and other equipment for the McGill Battalion at a cost of well over $25,000. Later, as already stated, they undertook to help out the funds of the Universities Companies, especially the first two, and still later the Siege Batteries and the 148th Battalion.

THE record of McGill in the Great War is surely one of which there is no need to be ashamed. To her noble sons who brought her honour through their ungrudging and valiant service, she owes a debt of gratitude for the reflected glory they have shed on her name, and for the undying fame which will ever be hers because of the supreme sacrifice of those of them who "gave their lives that we might live."

EVERY effort has been made to obtain full and correct information for this publication but doubtless names have been omitted which should appear, and it is just possible that some are included which should not, as the information was in many cases indirect, vague and impossible of verification. It may be, too, that the record of service is not always correctly given. Such mistakes are inseparable from a work of this kind. It is only hoped that fewer may be found herein than is usually the case.

The Dead

"These laid the world away; poured out the red
Sweet wine of youth; gave up the years to be
Of work and joy, and that unhopd serene,
That men call age; and those who would have been,
Their sons, they gave, their immortality."
