Mr. J. F. REID: If the hon. gentleman was actually a farmer he would consider that a jumper and a buggy were agricultural implements and necessary on the farm. Moreover, before the hon. gentleman states definitely that the agricultural implements necessary on a half-section farm on the Western prairies would cost only $758, he should make absolutely sure he is telling the truth. I hope that he will tell his constituents on a future occasion that in order to operate a half-section farm successfully the farmer must have implements costing $1,508.55. If he wishes me to supply him with the figures, I shall be glad to do so.

The other evening the member for Brantford invited some of his friends to visit his favourite woodpile, which, I have no doubt is out on his farm. He told us that in his farming operations it cost him $1.25 to make a dollar. I am of the opinion that one of the leakages in connection with the farming operations of my good friend is due to the fact that he is still using a bucksaw. If he will buy a little gasoline, of course my good friend would not like to do that he would have to pay duty on the engine—of course, he will have to pay duty on it—and get a circular saw, he can make money by going about the towns and sawing wood; but he cannot do it by using a bucksaw.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to mention something to which I referred during the course of my remarks in the debate on the Address from the Throne. It is desirable that provision should be made for the insurance at the public expense of unpensioned men who have become undesirable insurance risks while on active military service. I know a number of men, not particularly in my own constituency, who have returned from the front and who are not considered by the Medical Board or by the Board of Pension Commissioners to be eligible for a pension, and who cannot secure life insurance with the old-line life insurance companies. It is the duty of the Government to see that the lives of these men are insured. If the Government would open a life insurance bureau for returned soldiers and not only accept risks considered undesirable by the ordinary life insurance companies, but also issue policies on other soldiers who have returned from the front, the scheme could be made a paying one and a good business proposition, and a duty the state owes the returned men I speak of. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Union Government did not bring down a Budget which the western members could accept in full. In my remarks during the debate on the Address, I gave the Government fair warning of what my attitude would be, and, having stated my opinion, I am compelled, on principle—not playing politics, for that is a game I do not know—to vote against the Budget. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment, which I do not like; but I must do so because the rules of the House will not permit of our introducing as a sub-amendment the platform of the organized farmers.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. JOHN H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say, in starting my twenty minute speech, if I may call it such, that one cannot very well be too complimentary to the Budget or of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). Either as Minister of Finance or as framer of the Budget, or as Acting Prime Minister during the absence of the Prime Minister, he has shown not only that he was capable of carrying on the country's affairs with consummate ease during that period, but that he is alert, sagacious, responsive, kindly, sympathetic and prescient. All those things we need in Canada to-day and they represent, as he represents, Canada at her very best.

I am going to touch upon a few things out of the ordinary routine. I think we might well pay that great Dominion, Australia, the compliment of asking her to send us our next Governor General, and I think we could not pay her a greater compliment than by responding to her invitation to send her our present Prime Minister as her next Governor General. By this interchange of our public men, the outlying districts of the Dominions of the Empire would show their appreciation of each other and they would have accomplished a vast deal for the unity of the British Empire.

The next question on the programme is this question: Where are we? Well, just for the moment, we are nowhere. We have the extraordinary fact that the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) says that, so far as he is concerned, he is not going to discuss protection and free trade, and that, of course is the whole burden of the Budget, the commercial expression of Canada's idea of business at the present time. It is absolutely the most important thing before Canada to-day. It concerns her vitally, and must be either agreed with or differed from. This business of quietly waving it to one side, I really do not think a patriotic Canadian, such as I aspire to be, can possibly condone in even so great and admirable a man as the President of the Council; nor can we grant to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) that ill-defined and nebulous position of sitting on the fence which he has taken to himself when he says that he has nothing to say about the Budget, but that he will reserve to himself the right to criticise. In common English parlance, that is hostility to the Budget. We have then the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) coming out flat-footed against the Budget. He says: No, to it, and that he has found the Liberals of Ontario are really conspiring with the Conservatives to be protectionists. That is true; so they are. They have experienced protection in Ontario, and after many years of it they have been enabled to lend the West money with which to buy seed wheat. But my point is this: That this is a post-war Budget which does away with many of the war taxes, because the war is over and our men are coming back as rapidly as possible. Our excellent Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn) is bringing them back with all speed, because the necessity of continuing them overseas is not apparent; he wants to get them back into peace conditions upon the land or elsewhere as soon as possible. The Budget is in no sense a war Budget; it is a post-war Budget; it is a peace Budget, and therefore, for these ministers to refuse to endorse the principle of the Budget while they are voting for it, or for them to sit on the fence is, I say with all reverence and respect, an absurdity. The country is entitled to something better. The country does not want either her Government or her representatives to camouflage their principles by saying: These are our principles, but not now. They are like the Irishman who asked his lieutenant to write home to his wife, and who said: "Dear Bridget, I am sending you ten francs, but not this week." We do not want that expression of Canada's principles or business or politics or governmental methods. We want men who know what they think and who are prepared to act up to their opinions with all speed, because this country is in no condition to temporise in this matter. I think myself, that these excellent gentlemen who at the call of duty in time of war, on the one issue, namely, that of defending the Empire, came to the rescue of the situation, should have been liberated before this from their obligations. They are placed, by the continuance of the Government in office in the extraordinary position of having to assert their principles and yet to deny them. They are between the two principles of loyalty and disloyalty to the Government. They are, I think, put in a most uncomfortable state of mind. If they were free, they might go home, if they dared, or they might express themselves more freely, or they might have a policy of their own in the House and thus free themselves from whatever odium is attached to them otherwise. But, being still bound by an obligation to the Government, they are in a position which is at once sad and laughable. I would send all these men to the Senate or other high positions, of which there are plenty. God knows, we have commissions enough. The Government seems unable to find out anything or to know anything except when it is borne in upon it by agitation, and then a commission in five minutes finds out what the high cost of living is due to, something that has agitated the whole country for weeks, if not years. It will be understood that so far as the continuance of the Union Government goes, it is absolutely impossible, and it has established that fact itself. What about the Union Parliament? Before going on to speak about a Unionist party let me say that if the present members of the Cabinet who go out are succeeded by other Liberals, those other Liberals must do the same to remain Liberals, namely, they must have Liberal principles and then not act upon them. That is an impossibility; you cannot continue a Union Government which is not at one. In England, the Unionists were Unionists, because in both their foreign and domestic policies they were at one. Had they been at one in either and not in the other, Union Government would have been impossible. Here, we were at one in our foreign policy and are at sixes and sevens in our domestic policy. I am a moderate protectionist. I believe in the national policy, which has been found not wanting, but which has proved its value. I believe at the present time that the country needs our most earnest consideration. I believe I know what the country expects of us; in fact, I know she is impatient at this moment to know why it is we do not adopt forthwith the policy which she herself has endorsed upon many occasions. To debate the question of free trade and protection now, to temporise; some to stand on the fence; some to say no, and some yes, and others, we do not know where they stand—that is no way to establish confidence in the country, or in the Government, or in this House. A Unionist party is an impossibility, because the Unionist party was founded upon something that in the case of the Union

Government was an issue on which all were united, but the Unionist party finds itself now, since the war is over, in the position of differing in its opinions. Well, God knows, the Liberals and the Conservatives of this country have furnished the solidity and respectability of Canada long enough to have opinions which are respected. But if people desire to be indefinite or to sit upon the fence, to be what is called independent, why they are welcome to be so. Every man is entitled in a free country to his opinions or to have none, and under these considerations the cross benches are the place for those people who cannot agree with the Opposition or with the Conservatives. But a Unionist party is impossible, and for my part I can see no earthly way of going on with the policy of protection to which we are pledged and which we must have, and yet have a Unionist party composed of many men who are free traders.

The thing is impossible. Let me say that the holding of 140,000,000 acres of tillable land in the three provinces of the West for speculative purposes is an absurdity. Surely it is not necessary to emphasize that fact. People must be crazy who will tie up these vast tracts of land and enhance the value of it by every effort known to them, by hard work upon railways, by expenditure of money on immigration, all for the benefit of whom? For those who sit idly by and profit by the result. This state of affairs will continue only so long as the people refuse to exercise their common sense. It will cease the minute they do exercise it. Of course, we realize that the people who are tilling the surrounding land know that if these lands held for speculative purposes were thrown open, their own lands would go down in value. So the man who does not work and the man who does are both in the same boat. Anxiety makes strange bedfellows. The principle is wrong, it is rotten. The principle of free trade is like the principle of gravitation. Free trade in the minds of some people or in their methods is an insistence that people shall be free, no matter what the consequences may be. If we were bound by the like analogy in respect to the force of gravity I would not raise my hand or foot, nor would there be one possible exertion of energy in the whole world in violation of that law.

The whole question of free trade versus protection is summed up in a very few words. One is a restriction of the freedom of the people, and the other is not. England is the most highly protected country in the whole world. It is not long since she made a law that people holding patents in Britain must manufacture in Britain or lose their patent rights there. That was a prohibitory tariff if you like. It is not a thousand years since she had navigation laws, nor a thousand years since she had a scheme by which you could import wheat at a very low freight rate into Great Britain, and flour at a very much higher rate. Why? Because they wanted to grind their own wheat and give employment to their own people. They have subsidized every line of steamers sailing from Great Britain. They take pretty good care of their money too, because exchange is the key that unlocks the secrets of the commercial world. I do not suppose there is any more intelligent or courteous advocate of free trade in this House or the country than the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). He knows that free trade must have for its motto "laissez faire" or "laissez aller," that is, let things take care of themselves, let people do what they can or will, let them be unrestricted. Now that lack of restriction must refer to labour as well as to production. It must refer to every form of manufacture and every other consideration that enters into commercial life. You must have perfect freedom to import. I see the hon. member for Red Deer moving his distinguished head in the affirmative. I want to ask him if he considers that the West has the right now or at any other time to import all the Chinese labour it wishes free of restriction?

Mr. M. CLARK: My hon. friend has asked me a question that has nothing whatever to do with the Budget. I shall reserve my thoughts on immigration until we are discussing immigration. I am listening with interest to my hon. friend, but I do not propose to be catechised or put into a box by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BURNHAM: I quite agree that my hon. friend would be put into a box. As my twenty minutes are up, I shall keep the agreement with the whip, and I fancy the House will be quite satisfied.

Mr. ARCHIBALD B. McCOIG (Kent, Ontario): The answer of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) to the question of the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) was apparently so shocking that the hon. member for Peterborough sat down in his seat without any further remarks. I cannot agree with all that my hon. friend from Peterborough has said, and I feel satisfied that if he had visited more of the consumers in his riding he would agree with me that the uppermost question in the minds of the people of Peterborough and of every other centre is the high cost of living, and he might then have been disposed to give every assistance possible to an endeavour to bring down the high cost of living. There is no better authority on this subject, I believe, than the Minister of Labour. In the Senate the other day he is reported as having made this statement:

> That there is a shortage of food in the world, that Canadian prices are regulated by demand abroad, that there is no great surplus of food supply in Canada, that the duty of Canada is food production for the benefit of itself and the world, that the Government may present a programme to regulate the cost of living, and that industrial unrest can be traced to the cost of living, were stated to the Senate to-day by the Hon Mr. Robertson, Minister of Labour.

I also notice in the Canadian Food Bulletin, issued by the Canada Food Board, the following statement by the Prime Minister of this country:

> The food crisis is grave and urgent beyond possibility of exaggeration.

We have also the remarkable statement of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) the other evening, that it was as impossible to reduce the high cost of living as it was to raise the dead lying on the battlefields of Flanders.

These statements by the Prime Minister and two other ministers of the Crown show that the Government were aware of this problem facing the country, and they had known for some time that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) intended to retire from the Government. The activities of the Department of Agriculture, so far as the Minister of Agriculture is concerned, have been practically nil during the past year. He has not taken the interest he should have taken in encouraging greater production in this country. When this great problem of the cost of living is facing the consumers of Canada we find that a deputy minister of the Department of Agriculture, has only been permanently appointed after the position had been vacant eleven months and the same is true of other permanent officials of that department. This only goes to prove my statement that the Department of Agriculture, which should have been of great service in encouraging greater production, has been very inactive during the past year. I maintain without fear of contradiction that the Department of Agriculture should have been more active during 1918, in view of the shortage of food in Canada, than was the Militia Department in 1914 when the war broke out. If it had rendered the assistance which it should have done, and the members of the Government had done their part, we would not be in the position we are in to-day so far as the shortage in production is concerned.

I have in my hand a comparative statement of the swine statistics for the Toronto market for the years 1917-18-19. There were marketed in the city of Toronto, in 1917, 216,730 hogs; in 1918, 167,574; and during the first five months of 1919, 152,331. This will prove that there was a shortage in hog production during those months of over 5,000. We are told that it is impossible for us to do anything to decrease the high cost of living, but it is obvious that there is one important thing that the Government could do in the matter. I think the Government is in duty bound to bring to the attention of the people such facts as that which I have just mentioned and strongly urge upon them the great necessity of increased production, for there is no prospect of materially reducing the cost of living unless there is greater production, and a vigorous campaign should be instituted to this end. The department has failed miserably in this respect; they should have had responsible officials conducting a campaign of this kind. What do we hear from the producers of hogs? Why, they say that they have no confidence in the Government because they will not compel the pork packers to give them a fair price for their hogs when they are ready for the market. That is the trouble. These people say that the pork packers are simply gambling in meat products and will not give them a square deal, and the effect of such a condition as this is palpable. Then we might consider the cattle situation. I believe that if the Department of Agriculture had kept themselves in touch with conditions as they really exist, and if the Government had held out some inducements to the farmers throughout the country to raise their heifers to maturity for breeding purposes instead of killing them when they were young, there would have been a material increase in the quantity of cattle produced and the situation would be far different. The same thing holds true all along the line. Absolutely nothing has been done to encourage the producers to greater efforts. In connection with the general unrest that prevails at the present time, and particularly in view of the dissatisfaction that exists on the part of the pork producers at the treatment they receive at the hands of the packers, we put a question in the committee the other day and elicited the information that in the matter of prices there is no stated agreement between packers, but the opinion was expressed that things were so arranged that prices always went down about the time the majority of hog raisers had their hogs to sell, particularly in the fall of the year when they had their necessary obligations to meet. Now, that is one of the difficulties which the Government will have to face, and if the high cost of living is to be reduced it must be seen that the hog producers are justly dealt with. Compare the treatment accorded the hog producers with the manner in which the Dominion Sugar Company deals with the producers of sugar beets for their factories in Chatham and Wallaceburg. They enter into a contract with the producers of sugar beets to raise a specified quantity of beets and they say: If sugar is worth $8 a hundred we will give you $9 a ton for your beets; if sugar advanced another dollar on the markets in Montreal we shall increase that grant to you by one dollar extra for every ton of beets you deliver to the factories. What is the result of this arrangement? It has produced satisfaction and engendered a feeling of confidence on the part of the sub-sugar beet producers, and this year they are in the proud position of having hundreds of acres more subscribed for than the factory registered. If the pork producers had the same confidence in the packers, the Government would not to-day be charged with responsibility for the great shortage there is in meat products. I stand to-day exactly where I stood two years ago on the question of the nationalization of our cold storage systems. I believe that all these systems should be nationalized, and should be under Government control. This is my attitude in regard to this question and for that reason I am opposed to the appointment of any commission to regulate the cost of living in this country. It would mean a further expenditure of thousands of dollars to do nothing but hear complaints. We have too many commissions in Canada and at too great an expense to the country, and I repeat that our cold storage systems should be under Government control. The people could be given such food stuffs as might be placed in these cold storages, plus a fair revenue for keeping them until such time as they were necessary for consumption. I would go further and advocate, in connection with such concerns as pork packers, creameries and manufacturers of such other lines of goods as are staple necessities the appointment of Government prosecutors instead of more judges and commissions. We should have Government prosecutors and in every case in which unfair profits were extracted from the consumers the offenders should be brought before the superior courts in the various provinces and prosecuted and the unfair profits taken from them. Not very long ago we heard a great deal about the conscription of man power in the country. Well, has there been anything before this House more glaring than the statement from previous speakers that the Textile Company of Montreal made 31 per cent, and the announcement in yesterday's paper that the Paton Manufacturing Company had made 72 per cent? What was said before the committee in reply to a question that was asked one man? I will read from the paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member cannot evade the rule by reading from a newspaper. Evidence taken before a Committee of the House cannot be read.

Mr. McCOIG: I am willing to wait for the statement from the committee, so far as that is concerned. But when these things are recurring not in one particular line of business but in others, and enormous profits are being rolled up by corporations, may I not call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that we conscripted our man power and sent them overseas and are failing to conscript the enormous wealth that is being amassed by these concerns. There was a solemn promise by different hon. gentlemen who took a stand in favour of the Military Service Act that they would see that wealth would be conscripted. That was their pledge to the people, and what has been done in that regard? Can you imagine, Sir, the unrest, dissatisfaction, and discouragement that will be felt by the men on their return from overseas when, with the few paltry dollars that they will have in their pockets they go into stores and find that a suit of clothes costs three times as much as when they went overseas to defend the very institutions that have waxed rich while they suffered in Europe? In view of the unrest that prevails I say it is the duty of Parliament to see that a square deal is given these men to whom we pledged our hearty support in this House of Commons when they went overseas. The Minister of Finance made the statement that he was going to save seventeen million odd dollars by reductions in the tariff on agricultural implements and other things. Well, I do not believe that he was serious when he made that statement. The hon. minister knows that the duty levied against agricultural implements during the past few years has been so prohibitive as to preclude the introduction of a sufficient number of them to assist to any great extent in increased production and thereby tend to the reduction of the high cost of living. He knows, as well as he is aware of the fact that he is Minister of Finance, that we have had very few implements coming into this country to assist in greater production on account of the high tariff, and consequently there was less production than there would be if the tariff were sufficiently reasonable to allow these implements to come in.

Now what has happened? We have a prohibitive tariff against the machinery necessary to produce more foodstuffs in this country and what has it meant? It has meant, Sir, that every article that is required on the farm, such as harrows, have doubled in price. Land rollers have doubled in price; manure spreaders have doubled in price; grain drills have doubled in price; all kinds of cultivators have doubled in price; disc harrows have doubled in price. The only machinery that has not doubled in price are grain binders and mowing machines upon which the tariff is lower. But there has been an advance on binders of $100 and possibly $40 on mowing machines. The only machine coming in free of duty when the tariff was raised to the high protective point was cream separators referred to by the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) the other day. But when the hon. gentleman made that reference, with all his eloquence he forgot the most important part of the argument, that cream separators are made to-day by Canadian manufacturers who are competing with the American manufacturers in all parts of the world. Let me add this further: When cream separators were on the free list and when the tariff went up on all other articles to which I have referred and was doubled in price, the cream separator remained at practically the same price from 1914 until 1919.

I want to call the attention of the Government and the Minister of Finance to the fact that if we are to reduce the high cost of living and to produce more foodstuffs to the advantage of both the farmer and the consumer, these matters must be given more consideration than they have received in the past.

[Mr. McCoig.]

Now let me take up the article of tractors. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) stated the other night that the Government did a wrong thing when it brought tractors into this country free of duty. In my opinion the action of the Government in importing tractors and selling them at wholesale rates was justified, and I believe it had the effect of increasing production in this country at that time. The hon. member for Brantford has stated that such action was inadvisable, but as the mover of the first resolution introduced into Parliament for the free admission of tractors, I want to say that I stated then and I repeat now that the object of bringing in those tractors free of duty was to assist in increased production. At that time I was quite satisfied, as Hansard will show, to amend my resolution so as to include 8-16 and 12-20 horse-power tractors which were not made in Canada but were absolutely the kind, weight, and size of tractors the most essential to the producers of food stuffs, especially in Ontario. Now, Sir, what has happened? We had the hon. member for Brantford stating the other night that he was not satisfied with that size of tractor, that they were not made in this country, and that they were tractors of larger size that were—the 15-30 horse-power tractor. The 15-30 horse-power tractor is the one that was referred to by the hon. gentleman. But that is a tractor of too large a size to be used for production in the province of Ontario, but it would do for other work than farm work. The hon. gentleman made the statement on the occasion referred to that there was an undervaluation of these tractors, and that they were being admitted to this country at a valuation of $1,400 and were being sold to the consumers of Canada at a greatly enhanced price. That is apparently true. We find that in the city of Ottawa the Advance Rumely Company have employed a gentleman of the name of Mr. John Bain to act as their agent. That gentleman went to the Minister of Customs, whom I am sorry is not in his seat, and obtained from the Commissioner of Customs permission to bring in 14-28 horse-power tractors to the number of 400. I am of the opinion—the Minister of Customs can correct me if I am wrong—that no person expects a 14-28 horse-power tractor to be brought in free of duty, because it is the size that is produced by our Canadian manufacturers. However, Mr. Bain obtained consent to bring in 400 of these tractors, and when he found out how easy it was to do that he got the same permision extended to 16-32 horse-power tractors, which is a much larger and much more expensive machine selling in the neighbourhood of from $2,400 to $2,500. He brought those tractors in at a valuation of $1,400 and sold them to the farmers of the West at from $2,200 to $2,500, making a spread of $1,000. That was what the producers of foodstuffs had to pay for machines that were brought in for the purpose of helping to reduce the high cost of living for the people of Canada. Mr. Bain was so successful in getting these tractors into the country at a reduced rate, that he also obtained the Ottawa agency for another concern, the International Harvester Company, and it is reported brought in several hundred machines which were sold to the farmers of the West at a price of $2,200. He brought in tractors that were valued at $1,400 and sold them to the users of such machinery at $2,200.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Do I understand my hon. friend to be complaining that the $2,200 tractors came in free?

Mr. McCOIG: What I am referring to is that tractors were brought in at a valuation of $1,400 and sold to the farmers at $2,200 and $2,400, a spread of $800 in the one case, and $1,000 in the other. My contention is that the farmers should have got the advantage of the low priced tractor as they did in the case of the 8-16 and the 10-20 tractors. In the case of the 10-20 tractors the duty was refunded to the farmers, because the Government saw the wisdom of having that duty removed. But in this case the Canadian manufacturer was deprived of the sale of the 15-30 tractor, the treasury of Canada was beaten out of their duty, and the producers of foodstuffs were obliged to pay a much higher price than they should have paid. That is what I am objecting to. I am not in favour of high protection to manufacturers of agricultural implements. I stand here to-day to advocate the cause of the consumers of this country as well as the producer. The policy under which the producers get the needed facilities to produce foodstuffs that are so badly required by the plain people of this country is the policy which meets with my approval and will result in more support to the Government if they will only adopt it.

Now so far as this question of tractors is concerned, let me make myself perfectly clear. If there was nothing wrong going on in connection with the importation of these machines, why did the Advance Rumely Company have to employ Mr. John Bain to intercede with the Commissioner of Customs, and why did the International Harvester Company have to do the same thing? When the Customs Department found out that, to use a slang expression, "the fat was in the fire," when they found out that they were discovered, an order went out from the Commissioner of Customs stating that if the size of tractor in question was being used for anything else than the production of foodstuffs duty would have to be collected amounting to between $400 and $500. I bring the minister's attention to these facts because in all probability he does not know what is going on in some departments of the Government. The President of the Privy Council has found fault with the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) in connection with food production, but if he had looked around among their colleagues he would have found stronger reasons for complaint in that quarter than he did in the case of the hon. member for Marquette who voluntarily withdrew from the Government and threw up a large salary in order to act as his conscience dictated and in what he considered the best interests of Canada.

I wish to draw the attention of the Government to this fact, because, Sir, if ever there was a time when I believe that the Government should exert every effort to pacify the dissatisfaction that exists throughout the land, if ever there was a time when we needed a campaign to produce more foodstuffs so that the people will not be held up as they are being held up at present, it is now. And I want to say with all seriousness that it is for that purpose I am making these statements, and I am glad that the Minister of Finance is in his seat, because I hope he will endeavour to take what action he can to give to the consumers of this country as cheap foodstuffs as possible, and extract from the corporations, trusts, and combines of this land the unfair profits which they made when our boys were overseas fighting for the defence of the country and of the industries from which they have rolled up such great riches. I would ask him to do now what we were told the Government intended to do before the last election—extract from the profiteers those unfair profits, conscript them and bring them into the treasury, and so have a contented people instead of the dissatisfaction which is existing from one end of Canada to the other.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) gives me the opportunity of saying a few words further on the matters dealt with in the Budget and the debate which has ensued thereon. I have listened with some interest and attention to the hon. member who has preceded me (Mr. McCoig). He has a remarkable faculty of working himself up into a fairly well simulated state of excitement when dealing with matters which he desires to place prominently before the country. There is one aspect of his speech which rather pleased me; he appears now to be in favour of conscription.

Mr. McCOIG: Mr. Speaker, may I inform the hon. gentleman that I supported conscription?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, there were two or three ways of supporting conscription. My hon. friend supported it in one sense, and in another he did not. The support of conscription was the principle which divided the parties of this country at the last general election. The support of conscription was the basis upon which this Union party was founded, and upon which it will endure. My hon. friend has spoken as if the Government had taken no action whatever in obtaining a share of the profits made during the war. I have under my hand a statement, Mr. Speaker, which shows that the Government under the Business Profits War Tax has levied assessments totalling no less than $79,000,000 during the three and a half years that the tax has been in operation. During the first three years some $66,000,000 was collected in cash on assessments aggregating $72,000,000, and since that time some $7,000,000 more of business profits assessments have been made. And I desire to say this, too, because the matter is frequently overlooked in this country, that there is not in operation in any other country to-day a more severe business profits tax than our own.

Mr. McCOIG: Maybe there is no other country where the corporations got so much money out of the people as they did in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree at all with my hon. friend. All over the world, during the war—in free trade England, in Canada, and in United States, and in all the other producing countries—large profits have been made by productive enterprises. That was inevitable. The British Government imposed a business profits war tax; so did this country; so did United States. And, so far as I know, this is the only country that is continuing its business profits war tax in its fullness this year, because I regard this as a war year. I want this House and the people of this country to know that we have imposed as severe a business profits war tax as any other country in the world, and that we are continuing it this year. Evidence is being continually given before the committee which is sitting on this question of profits. A large share of these profits come into the Dominion treasury. When my hon. friend accuses the Government of being derelict in collecting the business profits assessments, all I have to say is that he does not understand the situation, because I would not like to accuse him of misrepresentation.

My hon. friend, I have no doubt, will support the amendment. I think he can conscientiously support it, because I understood him when he was on his feet in one breath to blame the Government on the one hand for not reducing the duties on agricultural implements, and in the next breath to blame the Government, on the other hand, for admitting agricultural implements free of duty. That is the type of argument the hon. member put forward.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think there is no doubt about it, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No. Ask him.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member stated that the Government had admitted free of duty tractors valued at $2,200 when the Order in Council provided that only tractors valued at $1,400 should be so admitted. If my hon. friend had called the attention of the Government to that as a mistake in administration, that would have been one thing. But he is supporting an amendment to-day which calls for the abolition practically of the duty on agricultural implements, and at the same time he is blaming the Government for admitting free of duty agricultural implements of greater value than $1,400.

Mr. McCOIG: I must correct my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has spoken.

Mr. McCOIG: But I am misrepresented, Mr. Speaker. I think I have a perfect right to correct the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McCOIG: Of course, the hon. Minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not in order in making a second speech. If he is being misrepresented on a matter of fact that is one thing; but on a matter of argument it is quite another thing.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand my hon. friend to say that he is drawing attention only to a mistake in departmental administration, and I accept his statement.

Mr. McCOIG: Mr. Speaker, I do not say it is a mistake; I say it is a wrong.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I may say to my hon. friend that personally I have no knowledge of any laxity of administration with regard to the admission of tractors. But I cannot understand his working himself up into such a frenzy on the one hand, contending that agricultural implements should be admitted into this country free of duty, and on the other hand taking exception to agricultural implements of a certain price being so admitted.

Mr. McCOIG: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The Finance Minister has the floor. If the hon. member desires to ask a question, he may do so with the permission of the Minister of Finance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would be very glad for my hon. friend to do so.

Mr. McCOIG: May I ask the hon. minister if the Advance Rumely Company and International Harvester Company were allowed to bring in $2,200 and $2,400 tractors invoiced at $1,400, why were not other companies allowed the same privilege?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I say to my hon. friend that I have no knowledge that that was done. If any companies were allowed to bring in agricultural implements free of duty, contrary to the law, I would be the first to condemn the departmental administration which permitted it. But that is a very different matter from making an allegation against the Government, because I understood my hon. friend to say that upon attention being called to it a correction was made. In other words, what my hon. friend is dealing with is not a matter of policy but a matter of alleged laxity in departmental administration. Let us get that very plainly. I might ask my hon. friend also whether he is the agent of any agricultural implement company?

Mr. McCOIG: I am ready to reply to that question. I am the representative of the International Harvester Company in Chatham. When in Parliament I am a representative of the people of Canada.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is sometimes difficult to reconcile the two relations.

Mr. McCOIG: Well, you should know.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Speaker, I had proposed to intervene in this debate for the purpose of dealing with a number of matters which have been discussed, relating principally to the financial administration of the country. On the whole, the debate has been conducted in a very moderate tone, and, with some exceptions, has been entirely free from political animus. I think it has been generally realized by the members of the House that the responsibilities of a Finance Minister during a war of the magnitude of that through which we have just passed are great indeed. War is insatiable in its demands upon the man power, the money, and the other material resources of the country. During a war the Government and the Minister of Finance, as its adviser, have really comparatively small control over the finances, because of the enormous demands made upon them—demands which cannot be gainsaid and which must be met promptly. In the Department of Finance it is not possible to equivocate or to evade responsibility; no excuse can be taken; the money must be found, whether it is $10,000,000, $50,000,000, $100,000,000 or $500,000,000. There is no place in which the war expresses itself so markedly from time to time as it does in the treasury of a country at war.

Among the aspects of our finance which have been subject to criticism in this House is that of the national debt of Canada. I endeavoured to make a fair, frank, and absolutely honest statement to this House and to the people as to the present financial position of the country, and as I estimated the position would be at the end of the present fiscal year when demobilization would be complete. The national debt of Canada, will be, in round figures, $2,000,000,000 at the end of the present fiscal year. It has been suggested by one or more in the House that 4 p.m. the Government is to a certain extent responsible for the size of this national debt and for the extensive borrowing that we have done. I am sure that is not the opinion of the majority of those present in this Chamber. It was argued by one hon. member,—I am not sure that it was not the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie)—that the Government's bad financing and extravagance before the war had something to do with the size of the national debt. Well, I am rather conscientious regarding the manner in which I discharge my duties; I feel a heavy sense of responsibility to this country for our administration during the war, and I should like to be placed right before this House, before the country, and before posterity.

Without intention to weary the House with figures, I should like to point out—I am quoting now from the public accounts of Canada—that the net national debt of the Dominion for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1911, was $340,000,000. That was in the year in which the Conservative Government took power and in which I became Finance Minister. On March 31, 1914, the net national debt of Canada was $335,000,000, that is to say, $5,000,000 less than it was three years before. I have no fault whatever to find with my predecessor; I am not raising that question. I do not say that the net national debt of Canada before the war was excessive. I could criticise certain large expenditures which had been made, but I do not propose to do so. All that I desire in this connection is that the House shall know that the growth of the national debt of Canada is due not to maladministration before August, 1914, but to the war.

I am going to make another statement. Of all the nations that have been engaged in the war from the beginning, this country is in the most favoured position so far as the amount of national debt per capita is concerned. Just let me establish that; I simply want the House and the country to have the facts. Our net national debt on March 31, next, will be $2,000,000,000; let us say, $250 per capita. What is the situation with regard to Great Britain, who poured forth her blood and her treasure without counting the cost and whose effort was by far the mightiest of all the powers engaged? $35,000,000,000 would be a conservative estimate of the national debt of Britain to-day. Great Britain, as a result of the war, owes United States twice the amount of the net national debt of Canada. The debt of France is immense, away beyond the debt of Canada in proportion to population. And what shall we say of the debt of Italy and of the other Allies, of Germany and of Austria? They are beyond estimate; nations have become bankrupt through the war. When we come to United States, which was in the war only a year and a half, we find that her national debt is $25,000,000,000. I desire the House and the country to have these facts, not only because of the criticism of our national debt, but in order that we may be heartened by the fact that having come through this war of four years and having played a great and mighty part in it, we are in such a favourable position to face the future. How much do you think the net national debt of New Zealand is? That gallant little country has a net national debt—I cabled for the information the other day—of $900 per capita as compared with our $250. The Australian national debt as of June 30, 1918, has reached an amount fifteen times in excess of what it had been at the commencement of the war, having risen from $20 per capita to $310 per capita—and that was over a year ago. What will the Australian debt be at the end of demobilization as compared with ours?

Now, we put forth a great effort in this war, and we paid a considerable part of our debt from taxation, as I pointed out in the Budget speech. Canada was a borrowing country before the war, and if when the war broke out in 1914 Canada had at once resorted to heavy taxation, I think the effect would have been most unfortunate upon our effort in the war. I do not mean to say that the people would have been discouraged; you cannot discourage the Canadian people. But from the standpoint of finance, if, in view of the condition of the industries of this country in 1914 we had then resorted to a policy of heavy taxation, I do not believe we should have come through as well financially as we did.

There has been a good deal of talk about the money made in this country. It is true that a good deal of money has been made in Canada; a great deal of money was made in United States and Great Britain during the war. But that money was made by practically all classes, except the soldiers. The farmers made a considerable amount of money; manufacturers, traders—all people engaged in business during the war, in Canada, United States and England, made considerable sums of money by way of profits.

It is the duty of the Government—and the Government did its duty in that regard—to collect a fair amount of excess profits made during the war; but if Great Britain and United States and Canada and other countries had not been able to produce and sell their goods at fair prices, then they would not have been able to sustain the burden of the war as they did. So much for the matter of the national debt, and I think I have made it clear that, as regards financial administration and as regards the position of Canada amongst the nations of the world that have been engaged in the war, we have every reason to regard what we have done and the present situation as entirely satisfactory.

I come to the question of inflation. Some hon. members say the Dominion Government has inflated its currency. Inflation is always the result of war; Europe to-day has inflation on a scale that has never existed before,—issues of immense volumes of notes of Governments, all more or less depreciated. Our position with regard to inflation is like our position with regard to national debt—one of the most favourable in the world, and I am going to establish that, because I want this on record for the members of this House and for future members and for the people of Canada who in future may desire to know our situation at the conclusion of the war. The Dominion note circulation, as I pointed out in my Budget speech, amounted to about $300,000,000 in round figures as of March 31, 1919. Of that amount $116,000,000 was secured by gold and $144,000,000 by securities. Our gold is thus 38 per cent of the total issue of $300,000,000, and 75 per cent of the $153,000,000 against which no securities other than gold are held. What is the position in other countries? What is the position in Great Britain? The outstanding notes of the British Government—and I have ascertained this by cable—are £344,000,000 against which they have £28,500,000 of gold, or 8 per cent. The Bank of England has a gold reserve of 82 per cent against its circulation, so that the relationship of gold to total currency in Great Britain is 25 per cent, and the relationship of gold to currency in Canada is 38 per cent. Will anybody charge this Government with unsound financing? Is there any country in the world that has more severely, more strictly, adhered to the gold standard than Great Britain; and if we finish this war with 38 per cent of gold to note circulation, and the balance secured by securities, can we fairly be charged with unsound financial administration with regard to our note issues? I am the first to pay my tribute to Great Britain and to say that she put forth a greater proportionate effort in the war. There is no doubt about that, but if the British people are not disturbed and apprehensive with regard to their note circulation situation, is there any ground for apprehension as to ours? What do we find in United States? United States was in the war only a little over a year and a half—and all these comparisons as to what Canada has done financially as compared with United States, or as to what Canada has done as compared with other countries, are in a sense unsound—for the reason that you have to take into consideration all the circumstances connected with the positions of the nations in question. In United States we find that the Federal Reserve Banks had at June 6, 1919, notes outstanding to the extent of $2,700,000,000, and that gold was held against that to the amount of $1,139,000,000, or a little over 40 per cent of United States note circulation represented by gold as security.

Another matter to which reference has been made and as to which there has been some criticism of the Minister of Finance and the Government, was that exchange between Canada and United States is against Canada. What is the reason for that? The rate of exchange is against us because of the fact that we are to-day finding credits in Canada for the purchase of our wheat which used to be purchased by funds from outside of Canada. I have found up to date, for the purchase of wheat of last year's crop, no less a sum than $135,000,000, and I expect to have to find $35,000,000 more. There is criticism of the Government for finding credits for manufactured goods. The great credits have gone—and I am glad they have gone—into the financing of our western wheat crop this past year. The Government felt it was its first duty to provide this money, but if, as a matter of fact, that wheat was going forward and finding payment in New York or London, does anybody suppose that exchange between Canada and United States would be against us? Exchange between Canada and Great Britain is favourable to Canada to-day; exchange between Canada and United States is unfavourable to Canada for the reason that I have given.

It is true that if we imported less from United States, exchange would be benefited, but the essential fact connected with our exchange is not so much the depreciation of our dollar as that we must find credits for the purchase of our wheat and other commodities, which ordinarily find money outside and thus redress our exchange.

Now I come to another matter connected with finance—the issuance of securities, including Victory Loans. I listened with much interest to criticisms of hon. members with regard to finance during the war, and I must say that on the whole they have been fairly reasonable, but when listening to some of the charges made against the Administration in respect to our finance, I could not help reflecting that the parties making those charges had but a very dim perception indeed of the immense responsibilities devolving upon us and the task which was ours in this country of finding hundreds, yes billions, as we did, of dollars for the conduct of this war. I am sorry I was not in the House last year when certain criticisms were levelled against me with regard to our Victory Loan financing, but as the matter has been brought up again this year I desire the ear of the House for a moment while I speak of the financing of this country during the war, of the responsibilities which devolved upon us and the way in which they were met, and, I submit, most creditably met, by this Administration.

Before the war, Canada had never had a loan of $5,000,000 floated within its borders. The great money centres of the world were London, Paris and New York. If money was wanted in this country for railway or other development, loans were floated in London or United States, and similarly with regard to the borrowings of the Federal Government and of the provincial and municipal governments. This country was not an investing country at all. The people of Canada deposited their money in the banks, and that money was let out for the purposes of trade and commerce. On the one side of the balance sheet were the deposits of the people, and on the other side the discounts and investments into which they had gone. Anything more unfair than to contrast the financing of this country with the financing, say, of United States or Great Britain during the war, can hardly be imagined. Our task was to raise not $5,000,000, but every year hundreds of millions of dollars. We had to raise more, Mr. Speaker, than the amount required for our own war expenditure, because we had to finance Great Britain in the purchase of foodstuffs raised by the people of this country. We had to finance the salmon of the Pacific coast; we had to finance the shipbuilding on the Pacific coast; we had to assist in financing the grain raised in the Canadian Northwest; we had to finance the munitions, the shipbuilding, the bacon and other food products of Central Canada, and similarly right on down to the Atlantic coast. We had to provide millions—tens and hundreds of millions of dollars—for that purpose. These were the burdens devolving upon the Minister of Finance and the Government during the war, and I put them forward strongly because I believe that this House and the country has not appreciated the magnitude, relatively speaking, of the task that devolved upon us in raising the money we did. Some hon. gentlemen not long ago said: You should not borrow. Well, if you can carry on a war without borrowing I know I should be glad to do it. Not borrow? Why, Great Britain to-day has put on a loan of five billion dollars and as much more as she can get. United States has floated a Victory Loan since the war, and she will need more money still because this is a war year.

Now we come to the question of the issues of securities, and the prices obtained for them. Canada is situated right alongside United States. Our people invest in their markets, and they invest in ours. There is a very close connection, indeed, between the relative values of securities. What had we to contend with during the war? Great Britain at the outset of the war, in addition to sending hundreds of millions of dollars of gold to United States and selling three or four thousand million dollars' worth of securities upon the New York exchange, pledged her credit to the hilt in that country in order to obtain the money necessary to enable her to purchase on this continent the munitions, explosives, and other supplies required by herself and the Allies. To do that, she had to make continuous issues in New York, and she put them out one after the other right to the limit before United States came into the war. The Anglo-French loan, a five per cent loan, was put out, I think, in 1916, at 98. It went steadily down on the market until it reached as low as 89. In other words, British-French securities, that is, securities backed by the joint credit of Great Britain and France, were selling in the darkest days of the war, at the time when we had to sell our first Victory Loan here, at a price to make them yield 7 or 8 per cent, and several hon. members who have criticised our loans in this House know it, and know it very well, as I know. The people of this country were buying Anglo-French and other securities in New York to yield 6 and 7 and 8 per cent, and when we put our loans on, I do not say that that was a decisive factor, but it was undoubtedly a factor in the situation.

The criticisms that have been made of the cost of our loans as compared with those of United States have often been answered. Let us consider for a moment. Here is a country as large as United States —larger geographically than United States. United States has a dense population, with great centres like New York and Chicago, where you can get subscriptions of $50,000,000 and even $100,000,000 as compared with the maximum of $5,000,000 or possibly $10,000,000 that we would get in this country. We had to cover this whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific with our organization, and I say—not boastingly, but as a matter of fact that cannot be contradicted—that of all the loans that were floated during the war by any of the belligerents the last Victory Loan of Canada was by far the greatest success. How do I prove that? I think I will prove it to the satisfaction of every hon. member in this House. We raised $690,000,000 which we needed for obligations incurred, which we needed to support the men at the front and to finance Great Britain in respect of her purchases here. The population of United States is fourteen times as great as that of Canada, and her wealth at least twenty-five times as great, and I think more. A Victory Loan of $690,000,000 in Canada would have as its equivalent in United States a loan of at least 15 billion dollars. Was there ever such a loan as 15 billion dollars floated in United States?

Mr. JACOBS: The rate of interest was different.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that; I will deal with all these matters. I said that the equivalent in United States would be a loan of at least 15 billion dollars. The same can be said with regard to Great Britain, where the wealth is so much greater in proportion to the population as compared with this country. My hon. friend has contrasted the expense of the American loan with ours, But I want to ask my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Kennedy) whether he is sure he got all the cost of the American loan. I do not think he did. I want to say to the hon. member who mentioned Detroit and some other American cities in comparison with our result, that if I had put on a purely voluntary loan in this country and organized it in the way they did in United States I would have got just the same amount relatively as they got and no more. I want to point out to him the difference between the two loans, and I have the figures here in such form that every one will see the situation at a glance and will understand that this country, under the system we adopted in order to secure the money which we were obliged to have, put forth a very much greater proportionate effort, and that our system was very much more effectual, than that of United States. Last year when I was in Los Angeles, a city about the size of Toronto or possibly larger and with greater wealth, they were talking there, and I could quite understand it, of the great success they had had in subscribing $30,000,000 to the Liberty Loan, and I rejoiced that they had subscribed it. But the city of Toronto, about the same size, in connection with our Victory Loan just about the same time turned in $80,000,000, and in the last Victory Loan the city of Toronto alone turned in $140,000,000. There never was a more effectual organization got together in the history of the world than that which we had in this country in connection with the Victory Loan, and I desire to thank every hon. member of the House and every man in the country, Liberal and Conservative alike, who helped me and helped the Government in connection with this loan, and I asked all their help. I asked the press, no matter what their political affiliations were, and the press responded.

With regard to the press—there has been some talk in the House about our expenditures for advertising in the Canadian newspapers. I wish to say that there never was a body of men anywhere who gave themselves more devotedly to effect the success of any undertaking than did the journalists of Canada in connection with our Victory Loans.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The advertising in the newspapers was placed absolutely fairly through the Canadian Press Association. I did not place it, and there was no percentage in connection with it. The cost of advertising represented only a tithe—indeed, not a tithe—of the advertising value given by the press throughout this country in promoting the success of the Victory Loan. It was not only the advertising that we paid for that was of value, but the editorial goodwill and effort of the press, which was beyond price, and I want to pay my tribute to the press for their splendid support in connection with the Victory Loan. I called together the French-Canadian press in the city of Montreal and talked with them about the Victory Loan, and I found them a fine lot of fellows.

Mr. JACOBS: Were you surprised?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not at all. We had a beautiful evening and they rallied to the support of the Government and promoted the success of the Victory Loan in Quebec, and we got a very much greater result than the year before. The point I want to make is that we had all elements of the community working for us.

Now we come to the question of brokers and canvassers. I called together, before the Victory Loan campaign of last fall, all the people who had acted in an executive capacity in connection with the preceding loan. They represented some of the best men in the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There were some brokers, but the majority of those men present were business and professional men who had taken an interest in the loan the year before. We considered every aspect of the question whether in a country like Canada we could put on a purely voluntary loan, and they said, "Yes, you can"—and I quite agreed with them—"but you will get only about half the amount of money you will obtain if you put it on in that way." We had to have the money. The war was making its enormous demands upon the country; we had a vast army overseas, and the credits that we required had to be provided from day to day. We simply had to have the money—seven hundred million dollars, if we could get it. We could have got half the amount if we had a voluntary organization such as they had in United States. Let us make some comparisons. Toronto raised $321 per capita as compared with the following amounts raised in larger American cities: St. Louis (with a larger population), $115 per head; Boston, $202 a head; Detroit, $129 a head; Cleveland, $225 a head; Buffalo, $144 a head. Now, if I had to get the money—as I did get it—am I to be diverted from my purpose in a time of war because, in a country as vast as Canada, I have to engage canvassers to go and work night and day for three or four weeks for the two or three hundred dollars apiece which they received? Are we to be diverted from our course for such a reason? I think not. The main purpose was to get the money. The country raised the money, and the machinery that we devised was the best that could have been devised for the purpose. I could show the House telegram after telegram, letter after letter, from the Canadian Northwest and other parts of Canada pointing out that they could not get people, owing among other things to the shortage of help, to undertake the work for the commission that was offered. After all is said and done, what is five million dollars, the cost of the loan, in comparison with six hundred and ninety million dollars? What percentage is that? It is less than three-quarters of one per cent, and there never was a loan floated by the Canadian Government before the war that did not cost two per cent. I do not say that that is a fair comparison. I am only pointing out the fact that loans cost money to float and you must have regard to the extent of your country. You must have regard to the financial resources and the extent to which help is available. Between voluntary help and other help we got of a professional character, in addition to that of the canvassers, we put through one of the greatest loans that were ever floated in the world. Indeed, I believe it was the greatest, and it was put through at a time when the money had to be provided. Winnipeg raised $159 per capita and Montreal $195 per capita. Compare Winnipeg's per capita of $159 with the results in seven American cities, all larger: St. Louis, $115, Detroit $129, Buffalo $144, Los Angeles $152, St. Paul (right across the border) $64, Seattle $124, Portland $94. Further, in the midst of our campaign we had to contend with influenza all over this country. I went west and when I got to Vancouver I had to cancel all eastern engagements because of the epidemic which was prevailing throughout the country, and yet we did it.

Now we come to the question of financial houses. Great Britain and Australia allow commission to financial houses in connection with their loans. Great Britain allows $\frac{1}{2}$, and that $\frac{1}{2}$ is much larger than $\frac{1}{4}$ or $\frac{3}{8}$ here, by reason of the size of Britain's subscriptions. Why do they allow commissions to financial houses? Because it is the business of these houses to advise people as to their investments. Figures have been put forward in this House to show that some firms received $50,000. The hon. member who gave the figures knows that there are financial houses in the country whose running expenses amount to $250,000 and $300,000 a year. Does the hon. gentleman know that last year we started in with the financial houses in August to get ready for the loan in October, and that they worked week after week and month after month and did not finish their work for months after the loan was concluded? As I say, I cannot pay too high a tribute to every one who had to do with the success of that loan. How did we determine their remuneration? One of the best financial men in Canada is Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, and I desire to thank him for the services he has rendered me gratuitously during the war from a high sense of patriotic duty. Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, Finance Commissioner of Toronto, is one of the ablest officials in Canada and is well known to many members of this House, and an absolutely disinterested man. There is no man who speaks with greater authority upon matters of municipal and governmental finance than Mr. Bradshaw. In order that the Dominion treasury might be absolutely protected, I chose him to review the remuneration paid to financial houses in this country for the first Victory Loan of 1917, and last year I constituted a committee consisting of Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, Mr. R. J. Dilworth, one of the leading accountants of the city of Toronto, and Mr. John W. Ross, of Montreal, and no better committee could have been formed than of these men. I asked them to pronounce upon the amount of remuneration that should be paid to these houses. The arrangement that I had with the latter was: "You get your operating expenses to the extent that you are engaged in this work." These three men went over the accounts of the last Victory Loan and they determined, from an examination of books and documents, the amount which should be paid to the firms for giving their time, and their professional services to the loan.

Mr. Bradshaw wrote me a letter on April 13, 1918, in which he stated:

> The basis of remuneration to the various firms and individuals, whose services had been engaged, received careful consideration. No commission whatever was paid to them. An endeavour was made to determine emolument according to services rendered, results produced, and responsibility undertaken.

That was in connection with the loan of 1917, but in connection with last year's loan we got it down to the basis of their operating expenses, and I do not know any fairer way of dealing with it. The result is we got the organized ability and the great placing power of all the financial firms, of all the securities firms, in Canada as well as the voluntary organization which was built up throughout the country. Mr. Bradshaw points out in connection with the first Victory Loan campaign:

> The time occupied in preparing for the campaign was more than twice that of any previous one. The duration of the offering was also greater than preceding flotations, and even after the time of receiving subscriptions, the members of practically all the committees were engaged for several months in making adjustments. Investment houses were practically prohibited from engaging in any other business during the last three months of the year. Prior to the offering, those engaged were fully occupied in organizing districts in selecting, training, and supervising the thousands of canvassers who took part.

Why, we had an army of 12,000 men working for us throughout the whole of Canada in connection with the last Victory Loan. A country which is larger in area than United States had to be covered, and the results obtained justified absolutely the machinery we employed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to what the hon. member said about rates of interest. He asked what about United States, what about Great Britain? Does the hon. gentleman not know that American securities sold, before the war, on a one and-a-half and two per cent basis? Does he not know that in Great Britain securities were sold on a three and-a-quarter or a three and-a-half per cent basis? Have they been able to maintain that? What rate did we pay in Canada? We had to pay over a four per cent rate when the London market was open and we were on the trustee list there. What has Great Britain had to pay for interest? The British Chancellor of the Exchequer has been subjected to a fierce attack by some newspapers because he is putting out a fifty-year loan at five per cent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is floating a $5,000,000,000 loan and he has got to get the money. It is right to face your interest rates and to get your money. That is what he is doing. A loan for fifty years at five per cent for Great Britain, and before the war the interest rate was three and-a-quarter or three and-a-half per cent! In United States, interest rates have gone up from a basis of less than two per cent to four and-a-quarter per cent. Suppose United States had started in at the beginning of the war and had put out loan after loan as we put them out during four years? What rate of interest would she have been paying in 1918? Is it fair to compare this little country, that never borrowed, or was not able to borrow $5,000,000 within its own borders, with the great opulent United States which experienced two and-a-half years of the most unexampled prosperity before it entered the war, and then to compare our rate of interest at the end of the war with the rate of interest that that great nation is paying? Do we grasp in this House the magnitude of the effort we have made in this war? We raised 500,000 men, and if United States had been in the war from the beginning and put up man for man with us in proportion to population—and I have the greatest admiration for the efforts which she made for the time she was in the war—it would have meant an army of seven millions of Americans. And if United States had been in the war for four years and had raised proportionately the money that this country has raised in proportion to her wealth, which is at least twenty-five and I think more times as great as that of Canada, the United States' debt to-day instead of $25,000,000,000 would have been fifty, sixty, or seventy billion dollars at least. Now, I find no fault with United States; it made a splendid effort in the war—a wonderful effort. Bearing in mind the way that country enforced conscription, called its men to the colours and placed them overseas, and the splendid work performed over there I yield to no man in admiration for what United States has done. The only reason I put forward this comparison, is to show how unfair it is to contrast the rates of interest which this country had to pay, or the loans which it had to put out, with the rates of interest at which United States, and Great Britain were able to float their loans. We had to do the best we could, and if there is any criticism coming to this Government on the financial side, it is the criticism based on what an hon. gentleman advanced the other day—a principle to which neither I nor any man on this side of the House subscribe—that Canada had an unreasonable participation in this war. Whatever we did financially, and we did not count the money cost, we did because we were at war, because this country being in the war the people of Canada required the Government to put forth the utmost effort as to man power and as to money power. We did that, and if there is any criticism coming to the Government for its financing during the war, that criticism is due to the fact that we participated to the extent that we did in the war, and for no other sound reason.

Now as to tax exempt bonds. One would think there had never been any tax exempt bonds in the world before. The United States securities prior to the war were tax exempt. A very considerable part of issues which have been put out since, amounting to billions of dollars, are partially tax exempt. The state and the municipal securities of the United States were tax exempt. I had an estimate made up some time last fall which shows that some $13,000,000,000 of American securities, to some degree at least, were exempt. Now I say this: A sharply graded income tax is to a certain extent inconsistent with tax exemption. When you put out tax exempt issues you justify it on two grounds in war time; no one would ever think of putting it out in ordinary times. In the first place, your rates of interest are going up and you have to offer special inducements to the people of the country in order to get the greatest possible return. Now it is easy to say "you should not have made your bonds tax exempt." I want to say to the House, and I think I know because I discussed this question with financial institutions and with other people who know the investment situation very well, that if the last Victory Loan issue had not been tax exempt we should not have obtained anything like the amount of money we did obtain, or we should have had to pay a much higher rate of interest, and I will show you how that works out.

In United States a tax exempt bond will sell on a 1 per cent interest basis lower than a taxable bond. Supposing we had paid 6 per cent instead of 5½ per cent last year, supposing we had paid only one-half of one per cent more during the war, how much would we have had to pay in annual interest on $1,500,000,000? About $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. Now, it may be that it would have been worth while to pay that in order not to have any discontent by reason of the fact that parties can buy tax exempt bonds and get certain exemption from income taxation in respect of them. But from the purely financial standpoint I have not any hesitation in saying that if you regard what you would have had to pay in additional interest, and take that excess amount of interest and apply it on the whole volume of your securities outstanding, so far as our national Budgets are concerned they will be in a better position than they would be if the bonds had been floated at a higher rate of interest and subject to taxation.

One of the ablest public men and one of the most practical minded men in this country said to me after the last Victory loan, "You will incur some criticism by reason of your bonds being non-taxable, but I wish to say to you that although income taxation anomalies will arise, you would have got just one-half the amount of money you did if your bonds had been taxable, because there would be no certainty about the rate of interest." I do not say that the people of this country would not have subscribed, but we wanted all the available money in the country for the war. Financial institutions and wealthy individuals would say, "We will subscribe, and subscribe well, for bonds, no matter what the interest rate is." But at the same time they would take a large part of their money and invest it in other securities which would yield a higher interest. And there was no difficulty during the war in getting a higher interest—my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Kennedy) well knows that you could get 7 and 8 per cent upon the highest class of securities, and our people bought them freely in New York. So it got down to this question: In order to get money for carrying on the war, which was everything to the people of this country, are you going to make your bonds attractive and devise machinery which will make your loans a success—because you could not afford to have anything else but a success?

The answer is that the Government was in the war to the hilt, and we did whatever things had to be done in order to meet the situation and provide the money that would back our men up at the front and bring them back victorious and keep the credits going that would enable this country to continue the war. That is what we did, and that is what we stand on before this House and the country and what we will stand on before posterity.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I was in continual competition in New York with the high rate of interest paid by Great Britain and the other allied countries. We put out issues in New York in 1915, and in the spring of 1917, and these securities of ours were selling down there at one time to yield 7 or 8 per cent. I want this House to know that there were pretty heavy duties and responsibilities upon this Government in connection with its finance during the war, and I am sure that most members do appreciate that fact.

Now I want to take up a few other matters. It has been stated that we should have issued our securities so that we could call them in. Well, that is not a bad principle in ordinary times. But does anybody in this House think that the Dominion Government is likely, within a few years, to be able to call in any considerable portion of the hundreds of millions of our securities outstanding? Why, we have got to raise a big Victory Loan this fall. The best feature of our finance, and the feature which has commended itself to the greatest financiers in New York and in London, is that our debt is so well funded, and the country will have time to recover, to find the interest and to take care of the bonds as they mature. As I said during my Budget speech, if any Minister of Finance had to face the condition of our debt falling due within five years, I do not know what he would do; but it is spread over the next fifteen or twenty years, and well-spread. I pointed out a little while ago that Great Britain is putting out a 5 per cent loan that she cannot call in for fifty years. The British Government are facing the situation, for the same reason that we faced it; we faced it in order to get the money.

Hon. gentlemen have said, "Why, your bonds are at a premium." Well, I do not know how hon. members feel about it, but I am glad that our bonds are at a premium. I want to say that there are two million holders in this country of our war loans. If some people are buying on the exchanges to-day, they are paying a premium to the people who put up the money in the first instance. But does any hon. gentleman imagine because the bonds are at a slight premium on the market that it is any criticism of the rate at which we issued them? Give me $25,000,000 worth of bonds, and I will sell them below par in Toronto and Montreal. Anybody who knows anything about finance knows that when you come to consider putting out a Dominion loan in London you cannot put it out at the nominal market quotation, you have got to put it out two or three points below. When our securities were at par in England, and we wanted £5,000,000, we did not put the loan out at par, we had to put it out at 97 or 98, two or three points below. Our problem was to sell $700,000,000 of securities in this country, and afterwards we devised machinery that commanded the admiration of Washington and London for stabilizing our securities during the war, and holding them up so that people, and especially the small subscribers, could sell their securities at par, at the price they paid the Government. It was a great achievement. It is a lot better that the people of this country—and all the people practically were participants in the loans—should be able to realize their bonds, if they want to, at par, than have to sell them at four or five points discount and blame the Government for not having treated them fairly. Treat the people fairly in regard to interest rates, give them a fair deal, and they will stand by you. You may ask the people once to take your bonds below the market price, you may ask them twice, and even three times, but there comes a time when they will say, "We have lost a good deal of money on those bonds and we do not think we will invest in them again." Whereas, if your bonds stand at par or at a premium, why, they say, "Oh, well, here comes the Dominion Government again. Those bonds are good, and here is my money, Mr. Finance Minister, for your bonds." That is pretty good business. Treat the people fairly in regard to interest rates as well as everything else, and they will stand by you. Sometimes they will stand by you if you do not treat them fairly, but I do not believe that is a good position for a Government to take.

There is some talk about income taxation. Hon. gentlemen this morning stated that our income tax was less than that in United States. I desire to say that income tax of United States for 1918 was on a higher basis than for 1919. In other words, when the war came to an end they decreased the income tax, and I believe that our income tax to-day is on just about the same basis as that of United States. We aimed to make it precisely the same, and I believe it is; at least, I am so advised. Now, there is a reason for that. This country, Mr. Speaker, is inviting people to come in as immigrants and as business men. We can only meet our national debt by developing this country. We want immigration of the right kind to fill the great spaces in the West and to touch agriculture into activity which will result in great national wealth,

We desire that capital shall come in here for the development of our mineral, timber and other resources. If you have too heavy an income tax or business profits tax you will, of a certainty, debar many people from coming into Canada.

On account of our political system being that of a federation, we have three sets of income tax. You have a municipal income tax in many provinces—for example, in Ontario; you have provincial income tax as well as municipal income tax in some provinces—for example, in British Columbia; and you have super-added to that a federal income tax. Now, the Provincial Governments are considering ways and means, just as we are. At the conference of provincial representatives that was held here last fall, if there was anything that impressed me it was the representations of Provincial Governments as to the difficulty of arranging their Budgets. They would like to have the Dominion Government increase the subsidies paid to the provinces; and the representations made to me by representatives of the provinces who attended that conference were, without exception: "Do not invade our field of taxation more than you can help. If you increase your income tax to a very high figure, then we cannot raise the revenues which we need for all the purposes of our provinces, including education." Many of them besought me not to touch the inheritance tax, because they wanted it for their own purposes. It has been pointed out to me by many people that if the Dominion Government greatly increases the income tax or adds to the taxation already imposed upon estates by the provinces—and it may have to be done—the flow of money to charitable and educational institutions will be stopped. If, therefore, we are wise, we must have regard to provincial and municipal requirements. If any one thinks that income taxation in this country is not high, let him take the municipal tax of British Columbia, add to that the sharply graduated income tax of that province, and add to that again the federal income tax; he will surely be satisfied, though he be the most extreme advocate of income taxation in this House, that in Canada there is a good deal of income taxation at the present time.

One word with regard to income tax collection. How long did it take United States to get a perfect system of income tax collection. It took Great Britain many years, as the member for Red Deer (Dr. Michael Clark) well knows. Great Britain has an almost perfect system, but it took seventy-five years to develop it. United States has had income tax for ten or eleven years. For the first four or five years they were not able to perfect their organization; even now their organization is not as adequate as that of England. Here we have a country stretching from Halifax to Prince Rupert, comprising cities, towns, villages, and country-side, which our income tax administration must cover. We have organizations in all the provinces. I do not want to magnify the difficulties, but I want to tell the House briefly of some of the problems with which are confronted. As of June 16, 1919 we made 46,000 approved assessments, aggregating $11,000,000. Of these assessments, 38,000 are paid and about 5,000, or 12 per cent, of the assessments are overdue. That touches one of the features of income tax that, I think, might be dwelt upon a little. A member of this House, who was an extreme anti-tariff man, came into my office one day—he is not a member now. I said to him, rather jokingly, "I can make you a tariff man in a week." He said "how?" and I replied, "By making you Minister of Finance." I took him over to the register where every day is recorded the amounts that come in from the customs houses of Canada. Now, I am not putting up a plea for a high tariff; I am simply mentioning the difference between the modes of collecting these two taxes. The collection of income tax is, in the first place, inquisitorial; it goes into the affairs of every one so far as that can be done—although it is pretty difficult to go into them. Hon. gentlemen may think that it is easy to arrive at the amount of income assessment, let us say, of a farmer. Well, in some cases it is, but very many difficulties have to be taken into consideration. For instance, what was the amount of his grain and other products last year? What is the keep of himself and his family worth? What is his farm worth and what interest should be allowed upon it as capital? What about depreciation, and all these other things? Is it, then, an easy task? I do not say that because it is not easy the Government is to be excused for not efficiently administering the Income Tax Act, but I do say that it will take two or three years, as it has in every other country, to get anything like a perfect organization of the income tax administration. That is not unreasonable; it is bound to be so. We have an organization extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific; that organization is continually being added to, and will, I believe, continue to get more efficient. I realize the soundness of the principle underlying income tax—that those who have shall pay in proportion to their means. What I am dwelling upon now is the difficulty experienced by every country in getting an efficient system of income tax administration. I assure the House that we have done the best we could in that connection and that I look forward to continued improvement.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about large families?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is an allowance now in the income tax legislation of, I think, $200 each for children under sixteen years of age.

I have made some inquiries about land tax, the alleged merits of which have been put forward in the House. I remember reading years ago with the greatest pleasure Mr. Henry George's exposition of the theory of land taxation. He pointed out—what I knew, because I had charge of assessments in Toronto—the absolute impossibility of getting at income tax assessment and personal property assessment as it should be got at. He pointed out that the assessment should be upon the land, because the land could be seen. I am not endorsing the theory; I am merely informing the House what his views were with regard to income and personal property taxation and pointing out that Mr. George contended that land taxation was the only taxation that should be resorted to. I have given the matter a good deal of consideration and have discussed it with provincial treasurers and representatives of Provincial Governments. It was impressed upon me that to impose a federal land tax on top of the municipal and provincial land taxes would create a rather serious situation, especially in the West. I do not know how serious it would be, but I do not find any widespread public opinion in favour of a land tax. I am speaking now of a tax upon all land, in cities, towns, and villages, and throughout the country. I am told that some provinces of the West have a wild lands tax.

Land taxation lies immediately at hand so far as the municipality in the province is concerned. I do not mean to commit myself here to the principle that the Dominion Government will not at any time resort to an estate tax or to a land tax. I am simply dealing with the present situation and pointing out that we have carefully canvassed these matters, and I am giving some of the reasons why it does not appear advisable for the present at least to introduce such taxation as has been mentioned.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the minister any idea what a land tax would yield?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I estimated it once and I was disappointed. I think at as high a rate as four mills—I am speaking only from memory—it would not exceed $20,000,000, which, of course, is a substantial amount, but nevertheless I was surprised at the comparatively small amount, as it seemed to me, that would be raised by a four-mill rate.

We have been attacked with regard to our expenditures since the war and with regard to credits that we have extended. The Government have felt a very heavy sense of responsibility with regard to expenditures which we are making this year, and if we felt we could have refrained from making the expenditures we have made, we should have been glad. I pointed out to the House on one or two occasions during the session the situation with which we were confronted immediately after the signing of the armistice—hundreds of thousands of people about to be thrown out of work in our cities, soldiers returning to the extent of over 300,000 in a period of a few months—and they are coming back by tens of thousands now. That is the situation with which the Government was confronted, and we have not hesitated to spend money, nor have the British authorities. If you look at the expenditure of Great Britain, you will find this is a war year in that country. The British authorities are paying out tens of millions of dollars to men in unemployment; their expenses are colossal; they are facing the situation that resulted by reason of the profound dislocation caused by the war. Society has been torn almost to pieces; men were taken from their ordinary pursuits which were filled by others; they were taken for the war, for transportation, and all the other services connected with the war; many were placed in other industries, and society must painfully restore those men to their callings. That cannot be done in a week or a month or six months or a year. The nations of the world are to-day on a war basis as regards expenditure, and in order to keep society together in this trying period after the war we are pouring out tens of millions of dollars on shipbuilding. Why are we providing a $50,000,000 credit for the purchase of timber in British Columbia. British Columbia could not have sold her timber, and thousands of men would have been out of employment but for the $50,000,000 credit which we established for Great Britain last fall. The same is true with regard to our programme of railway extensions and all the credits we have extended abroad. I cannot forecast what the future holds, nor can any body else, but the great problem that this continent must face this next year is how to enable Europe to buy the goods which we have of agricultural and other production. That is the question that is perplexing the statesmen at Washington and the financiers in New York and us in Canada. We are going to have a great crop in the West, and we are going to have other products to the extent of probably hundreds of millions of dollars to sell, and so have the United States, only on a much vaster scale. How is Europe going to buy those? We will furnish all the credits we can and the United States Government is extending tens of millions of dollars of credit for purchases in that country. The financiers of New York are joining up with the Government to devise ways and means to help out the situation by private enterprise, and that is what we must do in this country. The sooner that private enterprise can do this, the better, and nobody will be more pleased that I shall; but if private enterprise cannot do it without governmental assistance, without joint action, then I think the Government must co-operate. This war has torn Europe to pieces. How are we going to feed Germany and Austria, our enemies as well as our Allies? If the war is going to end, how are they going to buy the millions of dollars of produce they require from this continent? How are they going to get the money in Canada and United States to buy it? Credits will have to be established. How they will be established, whether solely by Government, or jointly by Government and private interests, I do not know, but the question is one which we cannot lightly put aside. Whether we like it or not, the question will be put up to us. I have been too long in this House listening to debates to appear to instruct the House, but I have often thought that none of us, members of the Government as well as the members generally, realizes what would happen if certain action that we have taken had not been taken. Supposing, last fall, when financial arrangements for the purchase of our wheat broke down, we had said: Well, the Government cannot find $170,000,000—and I never expected in the world to have to find it—required to buy our wheat and flour; supposing the Government had taken the advice of some hon. members and said: We will not provide it; we will leave the matter to private enterprise. Well, we would soon hear about it. The wheat would all back up; the mills would stop; commerce would at once be affected throughout the country. So long as the money is provided everything goes forward beautifully. Nobody cares particularly how the money is provided; but if that money were not provided, we would have a very serious situation in this country. As to what credits we should give, I am not prepared to say, because nobody can forecast what lies ahead this next year. I know that the world will meet the situation; I know this continent will devise ways and means necessary. If you have a town in which there are two or three solvent people who have goods other people want in order to live, and if you have a number of other people around who have no money or very little and who need those goods or they will starve, or be in want, or be cold, what happens? Credit must be given, and in the same manner this continent will have to give credit to Europe, although I do not know what form that credit will take. I ask hon. members, in connection with any criticism they have of anything the Government is doing within reason, to bear in mind that this is an exceptional time, in this, that we must provide work in this country to the full extent of our capacity, and that we must, as a Government, or through financial agencies, find the money necessary to market our exportable products. The Government would be delighted if it did not have to do that. We are not putting on loans for the sake of putting them on, but we have to look forward to this fall and this coming winter with the men back from overseas and the high cost of living that has so often been referred to in this House, and the fact that we must get a market for our products. Those are the duties and responsibilities devolving upon the Government, and I need not assure hon. members that, at times, they are pretty heavy. I welcome criticism; nobody values it more than I do, because occasionally, indeed, frequently, you get an idea that is of service to you, and I am only too happy to acknowledge it. I have derived many suggestions in this House that have been of the greatest possible value, and I do not mean to say, looking over the past four years, that we have not made mistakes, because we have, but we have made very few. I say that, and I do not believe anybody holds himself to a higher standard than I do.

Mr. JACOBS: The minister admits that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend says that we admit it. How many perfect people are there in the world, outside, let us say, of my hon. friend?

Mr. JACOBS: Two of us, perhaps.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We never claimed perfection. All that we do claim is an honest intention, fair courage and resources, and a desire to promote so far as we can the interests of the people of this country whom we represent.

Now let me say a word or two about another matter that has engaged, and properly engaged, a good deal of attention in this House, and that is the high cost of living. There have been various angles of approach to it—a pick here, a dab there, and a dent yonder—but what are the great underlying causes? I believe that most members of this House know what they are. If all of us would just drop the politician and ask ourselves what is the cause of the high cost of everything, I think we would have no difficulty in ascertaining what it is. Fifty million people of the greatest nations of the world have been withdrawn from their pursuits and poured into the war; tens of millions from agriculture in Europe, and millions from agriculture Overseas. What does that mean, as far as agricultural production is concerned? It means diminished production, greatly diminished production. Then what about the destruction of the war throughout Europe—the vast areas of agricultural territory destroyed, the cattle carried off or killed, the horses taken away, the implements of agriculture broken, whole producing districts devastated? How long is it going to take to have that agriculture flourishing again, how long is it going to take to have those herds restored? How long is it going to take to replace that labour of tens of millions of men, replaced as it was, imperfectly and partially, by old women and children during the war? Large areas of Europe are starving. What are the two concomitants of war? Plague and famine. We had the plague, and it killed almost as many as the war, and in the world to-day we have many of the aspects of famine. We have food scarcity. Consider the amount of food destroyed in ships sunk by submarines, and the food destroyed at the Front. Consider the increased consumption of food by millions of men in the army, many of whom were fed as they had never been fed before. The standard of living throughout the world has been raised. All those engaged in war and other industries have been consuming more than they did before the war. The demands upon food have been much greater. What do I draw from all that? In the first place we have diminished production, and in the second place increased consumption. When you have diminished production and increased consumption, what world phenomenon do you get? Scarcity of food and of all other kinds of commodities. That is the main cause of the present high prices—diminished production and greatly increased consumption. Our cities have been filled up by people who have come from the country to engage in war industries. The farmer is clamouring for help and cannot get it. The problem of this country and of all countries, and the problem of the trend towards the city. That problem is not confined to Canada. It is present in France, in England, in Germany, and in the United States. If anybody will look up the statistics he will be startled at what they show. That is the situation which we have.

If there are combines by all means take whatever action is necessary in order that there may be free competition, but no matter what Government is in power there will be men in Free Trade England and men in this country and in United States who for one reason or another will make large sums of money from time to time, in spite of any action that may be taken by the Government, and if that money is honestly made, it is a national advantage instead of a disadvantage. As for combines if there are any, dissolve them. I do not mean to say that in time of war, or if occasion should require it, there should not be food control, but the experiments that have been made in food control during the war have not been very happy. Interfere with the price of milk, for example, and cattle are killed for beef. It is the same all down the line. I made an experiment which my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) has always commended me for in this House, that of fixing the price of news print, and it was a very difficult task indeed.

Hon. gentlemen say that if these are the main causes of the scarcity of food and other supplies, what is the use of the committee that has been appointed by this House? I think it is a great deal of use, if for no other reason than the publicity that is given; I am a great believer in publicity. There is another thing. I think we have all got into too extravagant personal habits in this country. I went into a store not very long ago, if I may be personal for a moment, to buy a hat. A hat that cost me $4.50 before the war was offered me for $11. I said " I won't buy it, that is too much."

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it a minister's hat?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was an English hat.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it a lady's hat?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: You might think so from the price, but it was not a lady's hat. It was a hat my hon. friend could have worn with that dignity with which he wears all his clothes. I said I could not afford it. My own view is that we do not inquire sufficiently as to what we ought to pay; we have got into the habit of paying almost anything we are asked without inquiring whether we could buy to better advantage elsewhere. We do not bargain. I remember years ago our wives would know where they could get a thing the cheapest. They had a wide range and did not pay any price that was asked. If the people of this country, when the price is too high, would say "I am sorry, I cannot afford it," it would tend to bring the prices down. The committee that has been appointed can do good if they get all the facts, and they should be careful to get all the facts so that no wrong impression goes out one way or the other. If high prices are due to some speculative change in prices, let us have the facts. If it is a question of return on capital, let us have the facts. The great thing under democratic government is to get the facts and give them to the people, and that is one great thing the committee can do. In addition to that, they may discover that there are certain combinations, and if they do, I shall be most happy to help enforce sound recommendations in that respect.

I want to speak about the prospects for the future. This country, as I said when introducing the Budget, has a very heavy load of debt. All the other nations that have been engaged in the war are in the same position, only more aggravated. Europe is freighted down with debt. Now the interest on that debt is going to have its effect on prices of everything for years to come, and so far as I can see the only salvation of the world is that which has always saved it—Work, work. I do not mean to say that any man should work longer hours than will give the best results from his productive powers. I am in sympathy with the aspirations of labour for a reasonable day, but I am not speaking about labour alone. I say that all classes in the world will have to work, and work hard. After Waterloo, how was the enormous debt of England met? Any one who will take the trouble to read about it will find that it was met by the people of England making up their minds that they would produce more in order that they might live up to the standard they enjoyed before and also pay that debt. United States faced a greater debt after the Civil War and extinguished it practically within twenty-five years. This great producing country, if we can get the people to produce and save, can look forward with confidence to the future, and I say that without in the least degree minimizing the extent of the debt and the gravity of the problems before us. We can do it. If we cannot, what other nation in the world, in the present situation, is going to be able to do it? I reiterate, we can do it. There is just one other thing I want to say, and say with all sincerity: I think there is too much of a tendency—I will not say in this House—to take it for granted that all persons who stayed at home were profiteers. Now, the noblest kind of service was rendered in this country by thousands of men and women from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Take our Red Cross contribution, the Patriotic Fund, and the other multitudinous enterprises in which the people at home were engaged in connection with the war. The spirit of the Canadian people was magnificent during the war. The farmers did well, the manufacturers did well, and the traders did well. My own view is that we should not have been able to carry on the war if the country as a whole had not done very well. I do not believe that men should make undue profits. I am opposed to that, but I must say that I like to see business enterprises in the country, at the beginning of a period such as that which now confronts us, in fairly good shape to keep their hands engaged and meet whatever difficulties may lie ahead. I am opposed to undue profits on the part of any one, but I like to see successful trade and its results, because we have to shoulder a heavy burden and solve the serious problems which lie before us. I believe that in the next year, two years, three years, or five years, we are going to have as keen competition as this world can produce in all lines. Why do I say that? Europe must produce and sell abroad or it cannot sustain the burdens which the war has placed upon it. So the people of Canada—and I am sure they will be able to do it—must be prepared to meet the keenest kind of competition within the next five years. I think we are in a good position to do it. Unrest? Yes! Unrest all over the world. It is partly psychological, due to the strain through which we have passed; and, in part, it is due, I think, to a sense of rather profound injustice on the part of many as to the way in which the war has distributed its burdens and sacrifices, and the feeling that there should be far-reaching social readjustment. All that is reasonable, and it will take time before the world can steady down after this war. I believe I said that work was necessary; another thing, I think, is also necessary, as an indispensable concomitant. I believe that work and the Golden Rule are going to solve many of the problems that lie before us if the people will only do the one and apply the other. Legislation? Yes! Legislation to the extent that it will accomplish justice. But it is slow and uncertain in its processes. At the basis of the dispute between capital and labour lies, in my judgment, the field of ethics. The Golden Rule, if we would all apply it, would do a world of good. The world will never be saved by legislation alone. It will be saved by the due observance of moral principles and a proper regard for ethics; in other words, religion, although I am the last man to preach. The sooner that all the people of this country and the world over realize the rights of others, and not only desire to respect them, but carry that desire into practice in all the relations of life, the sooner will things become settled and men solve successfully the troublous problems with which they are faced to-day. The war is not yet over, and until Monday next its conclusion will be a matter of uncertainty. I do not know, and I do not believe that any one in the world knows, whether it is over, and the war may continue after Monday next.

So far as fiscal policy goes, it is for governments to consider situations as they arise from time to time and deal with them as wisely as they can. It was put forward this morning that we had made some reductions in the Budget as a sop to the West. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is not true. My desire in budgets has always been to take into account the country as a whole. It is idle to disguise from ourselves the fact that a large section of Western Canada has been disturbed on tariff matters. I do not believe that there are twenty members in this House who would seriously put forward the proposal that we should undertake in this troubled period, in view of the conditions which I have mentioned, not only domestic, but international, to tear the tariff to pieces and put it together again. I do not believe that there are twenty members who would say that we could intelligently revise the Canadian customs tariff to-day. But the view is expressed that taking the duties off foodstuffs may give some relief. I think that is probably true with regard to articles that are not grown in this country. I am frank to say that I agree with the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that in a great food producing country like this where you produce more than you need, duties upon food products have an almost imperceptible effect on prices. As regards tea, sugar and coffee, and things produced only outside of the country, there is no question that if you take the duty off you get an almost immediate result. But as regards food which we produce to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars more than we require, the diminution of duties would have no important effect on prices. So far as policy is concerned I would have duties rest more lightly upon necessities than upon non-essentials. That view was carried into effect in the 7½ per cent reduction. But hon. gentlemen have said: Why did you not take it all off? Why did you not go further and take many other duties off—in effect, why did we not tear the tariff to pieces and place it below what it was in 1914?

What is my objection to the amendment? If you carry the amendment into effect, without another amendment to show how we are to get the money in order to make ends meet, at a time when we are going to do financing in New York and are going to ask the people for more money, you will adopt a policy which will result in a deficit of fifty million dollars on current account. I want to say to the hon. gentleman who challenged my figure of $17,000,000, that I do not give figures to this House without carefully considering them, and the reductions we propose in the tariff will result in a loss of $17,000,000; and by reason of the decreased consumption in the country and by reason of expected reduction in the volume of our imports and probable fall in prices our customs revenue will be on the whole $25,000,000—including the $17,000,000—less than we would have on the basis of last year's taxation. If this House adopted the amendment of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster)—and they say that in addition to that $17,000,000 we should take off $33,000,000 more—we would have absolutely nothing to take the place of what we should lose. Any man who votes for the amendment of the hon. member for Brome deliberately votes for a revenue of $50,000,000 short of what will be required for current account alone, to say nothing of capital and war expenditures.

There is a French epigram that language is a convenient instrument for concealing thought. That is the amendment. How many members over there believe in the amendment in its entirety? The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) got to cover to-day. He has got a pretty intelligent constituency up there and they are not going to be caught by verbiage. How many members opposite would vote for that amendment, having the result that I have mentioned? The leader of the Opposition says he is in favour of it, and he is in favour of the amendment which was moved to the resolution for the adoption of the Address. I remember that during the American war this line was penned by a poetical satirist:

I dew believe in freedom's cause as fur away ez Paris is.

The hon. gentleman believes in freedom as far away as some of the manufacturing and other industries in Canada are, but not in the case of Nova Scotia. He says, although not in so many words: "I don't care if you take the tariff off all manufactured goods" and then as in the case of the well-known appeal "Woodman, spare that tree" he says: "Keep the duties on coal and on iron and steel." It so chances those are about the chief products in the constituency he is interested in—in his constituency those are the two main things. He does not mind what we do to the tariff otherwise, but he says: "Do not touch the duties on coal and iron and steel. Keep the duties of 53 cents on coal." He would not have objected if we had kept the 7½ per cent duty on also." How can you keep the duties on iron and steel if you remove the duties on the products of iron and steel? How can the manufacturer pay an increased price for iron and steel and then sell his products unless he has a compensating duty? What is the purpose of the amendment? It is political. I have no objection to an amendmen being political at all, but I am using the term in the sense that the amendment is made to serve a political purpose rather than to express precisely an idea, and the question that occurred to me was: Would hon. gentlemen opposite put the amendment into effect if they got into power? This is an amendment designed for the benefit of the western grain grower. Well, I think the western grain grower, both in this House and out of it, will know what is grain and what is chaff, and I say that the amendment is not grain—it is chaff. That is what I have to say of an amendment which at this time declares: Tear to pieces the Canadian tariff that has been in effect since 1878 and as amended in 1896, in 1907, and in 1914. Tear it to pieces at this time when Great Britain by her shipping regulations, France by her restrictions, and Australia by her proposed tariff changes, are going to conserve their industries and engage in fierce competition with the rest of the world; tear it to pieces, notwithstanding the dislocation that may be caused in Canada. Would hon. gentlemen opposite do that if they were sitting on these benches to-day? They would not.

An hon. MEMBER: They did not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They did not, and they would not if they were in power.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Finance Minister says that the amendment of the hon. member for Brome is chaff. Will he say that the platform of the Grain Growers' Association is also chaff?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not for the moment dealing with the platform of the Grain Growers' Association, but I have no hesitation in saying:—I am on record on too many occasions to have any hesitancy in the matter—I believe in a fiscal policy which tends to develop and stabilize the industries of this country, and that policy will govern me in my administration. I would so direct the policy of Government that the industries of a country would be promoted and stabilized and that taxation should bear as lightly as possible upon the people as to necessities and as much as possible upon luxuries. The platform on which I stand has been too often declared by me in this House to admit of any misunderstanding. Above all, I would say to my hon. friend that no matter what platforms he shapes or adopts—because I do not think he has thought out yet the platform he is going to adopt—he has had two or three in the last few weeks—if he was occupying the treasury benches to-day notwithstanding the amendment for which hon. gentlemen opposite are going to vote, they would not tear the Canadian tariff to pieces at this time; they did not do that when they were in office. Look through the utterances of my predecessor, Hon. Mr. Fielding—and I have always had the greatest respect for that gentleman; no man will find that I have ever said much in criticism in this House of the former Minister of Finance—and it will be found that the Liberal Government continually had the interest of this industry and of that and the other, at heart. They established the steel industry in Cape Breton by bounties to which my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) subscribes. Did they refrain from imposing any particular duties on iron and steel? There were duties on iron and steel before this Government came into power. Who put them there? Let us face the facts, and it is a fact, that the Liberal Government under Sir Wilfrid Laurier did have regard for particular industries in this country. Therefore, I say that this amendment, designed to look like grain for the benefit of the farmer, is chaff, and will be so regarded, I believe, by the farming community of this country. There is an agitation in the West, in regard to agricultural implements, principally, and there has been for many years. The former Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in the reciprocity agreement provided for certain reduced duties upon agricultural implements and other products of Canada. The chief objection that I had to the reciprocity agreement was the fact that there was an agreement. What have we got to-day without any agreement? Flour is on the free list; wheat is on the free list; this Government put them there. Cement is lower than it was under the reciprocity agreement. Binders are lower than they were under the reciprocity agreement, and the other articles dealt with in the Budget are as low, if not lower than they were under that agreement. Reference has been made to the necessities of the three Prairie Provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, but in the tariff policy regard must be had to the country as a whole from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to the national interests as a whole. If you can meet the wishes to a certain degree, at least, of an important section of the community, without doing material damage to the national interest, you ought to do it; and this Budget represents a sincere attempt to keep stable at this unstable time the industries of Canada, and at the same time go as far as we can to meet the legitimate requests of those interested in tariff reduction. The first thing that any Finance Minister must do is to provide money to meet the national indebtedness. Members may say: Take the tariff down. But what will be the consequence of that? How are you going to meet your debts from day to day? As I say, the amendment would cut off $50,000,000, as between revenue and current expenditure, and provides nothing to take its place.

Another thing I pointed out in my Budget speech, that the expenditures of this country on ordinary account had been doubled by the war. $100,000,000 more interest on the public debt; of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 more in two or three years for pensions; $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 on account of soldiers' re-establishment; $150,000,000 or $160,000,000 of current expenditure added to the expenditure of the Dominion before the war. How are you going to meet it? Nobody will say that you can raise it by income taxation only, or by land taxation only, or by inheritance taxation only. No, nor a fraction of it. If you put on all the taxes under those three heads that the country can stand, you would not begin to meet the expenditure. We have got, like a manly nation, to meet our obligations arising out of the war. We have got to meet the pension fund—that is the first thing we should meet; and we have got to meet these other charges to take care of our soldiers—and there will be more to come—to provide war gratuities to help the returned soldier bridge over the time until he gets back to the productive occupations of civil life. We have got to do all that, and we are going to do it. But if you tear the tariff to pieces at this time, or at any time for that matter, how are you going to get the money?

I said in my Budget speech that the time was overdue for a rearrangement of the tariff. I say so still. And we have taken the necessary steps to provide for that at the proper time after an investigation has been held. But to put in effect this amendment at this time would be a fatal policy, fatal to the credit of the country by reason of the gap that it would leave between revenue and expenditure. And, further than that, if you diminish our revenue without providing other revenue to take its place to the same extent and on the same scale, you are going to make this country scrutinize too carefully the expenditures which we should incur on account of the returned soldier. Your Minister of Finance should have abounding revenues so that he can do his duty by the country in the way of maintaining its credit and meeting its obligations and the just claims of the soldiers upon the citizens of this country. In that spirit this Budget has been framed.

There is another thing most essential in this country to-day to my judgment, and that is that we should have national unity. This Dominion is broken up into four great sections. You have the Maritime Provinces; then you have a gap of a few hundred miles until you come to the city of Montreal and the more populous parts of Quebec and Ontario; then you have a great gap of a thousand miles of wilderness and you come to the three great Prairie Provinces—any one of them almost unlimited in its resources, and as large geographically as Germany or France; and then you have the Rocky mountains and beyond them the province of British Columbia. You have all these different sections with diverse sectional interests. What is going to be the policy of any Government—of this Government and of its successors? They have a large family and they cannot play favourites. You can hardly have a Benjamin—although I said once that Prince Edward Island should be the Benjamin, because it is so small geographically and is such a beautiful little province—you have to survey the whole situation and adopt a policy that will be best for Canada as a whole, nationally speaking, and I am sure that I am voicing the sentiments of every man in this House, because they are all patriotic, when I say that they will support a policy which best accords with the national interest of Canada and all its parts. That does not mean that we cannot redress injustice if it should exist; it means the opposite of that. It does not mean that from time to time tariffs should not change to meet changing conditions. But it does mean that in considering a fiscal policy the whole of Canada must be taken into account and such a policy adopted as will promote that end, and I believe that every section of Canada—Maritime, Central and Prairie Provinces, and British Columbia—will support that policy if they understand and believe it to be a national policy, for I have the greatest confidence in the people of Canada.

I have taken up a good deal of time, Mr. Speaker, and I feel that I should the more apologize because we asked members to cut down their speeches. But I have felt very seriously the responsibilities which have devolved upon me as financial adviser of the Government during the war; I have taken them quite conscientiously, and I did desire to place upon Hansard for the information of this House and of the country, and of those coming after who might desire to inquire, the views of the Minister of Finance upon his financial administration during the war and the conditions which confront the country immediately after the war. I have felt it advisable that I should do that; and if I have taken up too much time and wearied your patience over much, I hope that for the reason given you will be inclined to extend to me reasonable indulgence.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SAMUEL WILLIAM JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, there is very little which at this stage I can add to the debate which has proceeded for nearly two weeks. During the last ten or twelve days we have had in this House addresses from various members dealing with the matters mentioned in the Budget. Most of them have been illuminating, many of them have been interesting; and I do not feel that I can add anything to what has already been said. In the early part of the debate we had the heavy artillery; subsequently we had the cavalry galloping across the ground; after that we had the machine guns in action; and now the duty devolving upon me is to do a little sniping on my own account, if I find that there is occasion therefor.

This afternoon the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) was delivered of his second Budget speech. We had expected the delivery of one child, but thanks to the amendment which was introduced by the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) the House has been presented with twins; and the Minister of Finance tells us that he expects these children to be "protected" and cared for by the people of this country. I have no quarrel with the Minister of Finance with regard to the excellent address he delivered this afternoon, with a good deal of which I agree. Were it not for the intense heat, I am sure we would all have enjoyed the two hours or more which he took up in his interesting, didactic lecture to us upon the finances of this country.

The Finance Minister felt himself, if I may use the expression on a hot day like this, to be "skating on thin ice" in certain parts of his address. The member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) made the assertion that the Government had been robbed of large sums of money through the importation into Canada of tractors upon which the duty had not been paid, and yet that the farmer or the consumer did not receive the benefit. The minister ignored that serious charge, and went on with talk of generalities, of which he is a master.

The Finance Minister spoke about the wonderful achievement of the Government in 1914 in reducing the national debt by $5,000,000. The minister did not, however, take the trouble to enlighteen the House by stating how much money had been drawn from the people during that year. The public accounts show that in 1914 $127,384,000 were taken from the people and credited to the Consolidated Revenue Fund and spent. While I am on that subject, I wish to point out the wide divergence between the expenditure chargeable to consolidated fund under the Liberal Government during the years 1909, 1910, and 1911, and that of the subsequent years, 1912, 1913, and 1914. During the last years of the Liberal administration the expenditure was $84,000,000 in 1909, $79,000,000 in 1910, and $87,000,000 in 1911, and we find that in 1912, 1913, and 1914, the figures run up to $98,000,000, $112,000,000, and $127,000,000. No wonder the Minister of Finance was able to pay off in 1914 a paltry $5,000,000 of the national debt, when he was able to pay out on current account in that year a sum of $127,000,000.

Another criticism I have to make is that notwithstanding the present high cost of foodstuffs, the Government has granted credits to foreign countries for the purpose of furnishing them with foodstuffs from this country, thus increasing the cost of living. It has been trumpeted throughout the country that vast sums of money are being credited to countries on the other side of the Atlantic to enable them to purchase foodstuffs in Canada, notwithstanding the fact that we have not enough food to satisfy our own needs. It is a question whether the Government is justified in advancing money in order that foodstuffs may be shipped out of the country, because of the inability of our people to obtain in many cases the actual necessities of life, bringing about so much distress and consequent unrest.

I do not purpose to deal at length with the merits and demerits of protection and free trade, which have been so fully and thoroughly discussed in this House, on the one side by the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) and on the other side by the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). I would like to say, however, that the member for Red Deer is to be congratulated upon his address; I do not know that I ever heard a discourse so illuminating and so clear as that which the eloquent member from the West gave us on this subject. With some of the views that he advanced I cannot say that I am entirely in agreement. For instance, he seemed to advocate an insurgency on the part of members of a political party, looking towards complete independence of view. It seemed to me that he laboured the point, I consider that independence on the part of members of a political party, at any rate in this country, should be sparingly exercised. The member for Red Deer spoke of Cobden having been an insurgent of that class; surely he does not expect that a Cobden is to rise up every year. If we are to teach the rank and file of our party that they may at any given moment express independent views on public matters, where is this to lead? I commend to my hon. friend the remarks of that great parliamentarian and constitutionalist Sir Thomas Erskine May on the merits and demerits of party Government. I quote the following from the remarks of that learned author:

> We find that Government without party is absolutism—that rulers, without opposition, may be despots. We acknowledge, with gratitude, that we owe to party most of our rights and liberties. We recognize in the fierce contentions of our ancestors, the conflict of great principles and the final triumph of freedom. We glory in the eloquence and noble sentiments which the rivalry of contending statesmen has inspired. We admire the courage with which power has been resisted; and the manly resolution and persistence by which popular rights have been established. We observe that, while the undue influence of the Crown has been restrained, democracy has been also held in check. We exult in the final success of men who have suffered in a good cause. We admire the generous friendships, fidelity, and self-sacrifice —akin to loyalty and patriotism,—which the honourable sentiments of party have called forth. We perceive that an opposition may often serve the country far better than a ministry; and that where its principles are right, they will prevail.

By argument and discussion truth is discovered, public opinion is expressed, and a free people are trained to self-government. We feel that party is essential to representative institutions. Every interest, principle, opinion, theory and sentiment, finds expression. The majority governs: but the minority is never without sympathy, representation, and hope. Such being the two opposite aspects of party, who can doubt that good predominates over evil? Who can fail to recognize in party, the very life-blood of freedom?

I can understand, of course, why the hon. member for Red Deer made the plea that he did. He found himself constrained only a short time ago to stray from the flock, and this, I fancy, is his justification and apology for returning. We are, however, very glad to have the hon. member with us once more; we welcome the prodigal, and we hope the experience he has learned on the other side will serve him in good stead, and that we shall have the benefit of his advice as to what happened to him during the time he was away and since he left our party in 1917.

The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has our sympathy in his efforts to reconcile two such widely divergent groups in his party, and in his desire to satisfy both he has pleased neither. That is always the fate of people who attempt to do a work of that kind. The Minister of Finance, I suppose, is not oblivious of the story in Aesop's Fables of the man and his son who were riding an ass. The man was advised by his friends that it might be well if they both got down and that the ass should ride upon them, and it ended that neither of the parties were satisfied and that the ass was subsequently drowned. It is necessary for public men in this country to take a firm position upon political questions and to stand or fall by their principles, but the Government are so anxious for power, they are so anxious to retain their seats on the treasury benches that they were willing to swallow themselves and to sacrifice principle in order that they might remain where they are.

I was very much impressed by a remark which fell from the lips of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder). He said, if I remember well, that this was no time to deal with tariff revision, and I agree with him fully and entirely in that statement. This is not the time for the Government to deal with tariff revision; this is the time for the Government to dissolve Parliament and go to the country. The Government was elected for one specific purpose, namely, to impose conscription upon the country, and as they said, to win the war. Conscription was imposed, the war is won, and it is now the duty of the Government to appeal to the country for a further lease of power. That seems to me to be the constitutional aspect of the situation, and that was the course followed by Mr. Lloyd George in 1918. Hardly was the ink dry on the armistice on November 11, 1918, when the Lloyd George Government was dissolved and went to the country. Why did not this Government do the same? Why does it persist in hanging on to power? Why does this Government, with the divergent elements on the other side, the protectionist element, represented by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), the free trade element which has been represented heretofore by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), and every possible element of that kind which was banded together for the purpose of imposing conscription on this country and winning the war, persist in trying to force down the throats of its followers this tariff revision which they will not have? Many hon. gentlemen opposite are actually committing political suicide when they venture to vote for the Government as it is at present constituted. They know very well they can never come back; indeed, it is a question in many cases if they can even go home to see their people. Yet the Government endeavours to force on them this measure upon which they have not been elected to pass. If there ever were a case when the Government ought to appeal to the people, this is the occasion, and the Government is simply holding the treasury benches for the purpose of remaining in power, because if I am any judge of events in the country at the present day, this Government when it submits itself to the people will find itself on this side of the House as soon as the people declare by their votes what their views are.

I am sure we on this side of the House sympathize with hon. members on the other side who are being stampeded by the Government in the way in which they are. We see the surgings on their side. We know what is going on. Some of them have broken away—the strong ones. Some are debating in their minds whether they should follow the Government or whether they should vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). The weak ones have already gone over, horse, foot and artillery, expecting to have a little joy-ride as long as it lasts, because they know they can never hope to enter these halls again, inasmuch as, according to our view, they will have acted treacherously with their electors if they vote for this Budget which, as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) says is nothing more nor less than a protectionist Budget. Let us take the case of the repeal of the 5 per cent, and on certain goods of the 7½ per cent war tax. These war duties brought into the treasury something like $45,000,000 last year. The Minister of Finance has proclaimed in this House and throughout the country the fact that $17,000,000 of that has been taken off, leaving $28,000,000 which the people of this country will be obliged to pay in addition to the regular customs duty. Calculating that the customs duties in 1914, the first year of the war, were $100,000,000, roughly speaking—I have not the figures at hand at the moment—what does this $28,000,000 mean? It means that the people of this country are paying 28 per cent more into the treasury in the matter of import duties than they did in 1914. Yet we are told that this is a tariff revision. War duties are imposed on the people when there is no war. We have two Ministers of Militia, one an overseas minister, when there is no necessity at all for an overseas minister, seeing that our men are practically all back. We have also the Department of Agriculture not filled, and I make bold to predict that the position will not be filled for many moons, the reason being that the Government is afraid to open any constituency where a Minister of Agriculture could submit himself for election in order to test the feeling of the people. Where is the Minister of Agriculture to come from? Naturally and logically from the West. Is there any one member on the other side coming from an agricultural district in the West who is willing to submit to the test of being elected by the people before he takes his seat as Minister of Agriculture? I predict that the Department of Agriculture will be an appendage to the Department of Immigration and Colonization for some time to come. The Department of Agriculture is one of the most important departments of the Government.

Would it not be well if the Minister of Militia Overseas were to take over that department? That is a suggestion which I throw out to the Government. I am sure he would make just as good a Minister of Agriculture as he has made an Overseas Minister of Militia. Constitutionally, there never was any reason in the wide world why we should have had two ministers of Militia in one Government. The thing is unheard of. What was the use of an Overseas Minister of Militia three thousand miles away from the Council Chamber? The duty of the ministers of the Government is to meet from time to time as required, in order to discuss matters affecting the country. How could any one, who by the very nature of his office, was three thousand miles away from Ottawa, exercise his functions as a minister of the Government? There should have been sent overseas a commissioner, or perhaps the Deputy Minister of Militia. That gentleman has had considerable experience in military affairs; he is a South African veteran, and has been connected with the Militia Department for the last twenty years. In my opinion no more fitting man could have been sent across than the Deputy Minister of Militia (Sir Eugene Fiset), but, for some reason unknown to the country, a gentleman who probably never had anything to do with militia matters, and who probably did not know the difference between the artillery and the cavalry, was sent across merely to suit his own purposes or the purposes of the Government. We are not at all surprised at what happened as a result of that appointment. One of the results is that Argyll House has become a by-word throughout the whole of this country and England for inefficiency, incompetency and inaptitude. The riots that have taken place in Wales and in different parts of England and France are due entirely to the inefficiency and incompetency of the head of the department overseas. This is only what we might have expected when this gentleman was sent across.

I think it will be generally admitted that a crisis has been precipitated in this country by the resignation of the Minister of Agriculture. In his letter to the Prime Minister and in his address to the House he gave the reasons for his resignation. But the President of the Privy Council (Mr.

Rowell) has added another reason, and it is that the Minister of Agriculture resigned from his position because the tariff had been tampered with. That is the information which the President of the Privy Council divulges.

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend wishes to state what I said, I would ask him to quote my remarks.

Mr. JACOBS: I will do that. In his address on the Budget the President of the Privy Council said—Unrevised Hansard, p. 3524:

> I want to say to the House that I entirely share the view of the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization, that when this House met, the Finance Minister might have said: This is a war year, and the finance this year must be war finance. The question of a revision of the tariff must stand over until this war year is over. The Union Government was not formed for the purpose of dealing with that issue. He might have stated that to the House and the country, and I would have stood side by side with my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization in support of that position. And I am dealing perfectly fairly with all my friends and colleagues when I say that there would have been no dissent from that proposition by any member of the Government. The Finance Minister could have come down to this House with that policy and a united Government would have faced the House and the country in support of it.

If that means anything, it means that if the question of the revision of the tariff had been allowed to stand over until after the war the Finance Minister would have come down to the House with a policy and a united Government, and that inasmuch as that course was not adopted the Government was not united, and the Minister of Agriculture is no longer a member of the Government. I think that is a fair inference. At any rate, that is what the country understands by the statement made by the President of the Privy Council. The country believes that he meant that if the tariff had not been touched at all, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) would not have resigned from the Government. Now that was the statement made by a member of the Cabinet to the House, and I respectfully submit that it is divulging a Cabinet secret and is contrary to all constitutional practice. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is prevented by his oath of office from making any statement in the matter, and the statement of the President of the Privy Council must therefore go out to the country unchallenged, and he must accept the responsibility for making that statement to the House.

The President of the Privy Council further went on to state that if the question of the high cost of living was not properly dealt with, we must look to the ex-Minister of Agriculture for any inefficiency in that regard. Surely my hon. friend knows very well that there is a joint and several responsibility on the part of every member of the Government with the ex-Minister of Agriculture, who is no more responsible than is my hon. friend (Mr. Rowell). It seems to me it was rather unfair, to put it mildly, for the President of the Privy Council to try and shift the responsibility and place it on the shoulders of the gentleman who was his colleague only a few days ago.

Mr. ROWELL: There again my hon. friend is not stating fairly what I said to the House. I said that the Minister of Agriculture, I believed, had done everything which he thought prudent and wise in dealing with the whole matter, that he had acted most efficiently in the discharge of his duty. Of course, as a member of the Government, I take full responsibility with the Minister of Agriculture for all that was done in the premises.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not see that the President of the Privy Council could do anything else. Nothing was done, anyway. What I said was that the President of the Privy Council had made the statement that if there was any inefficiency, the blame must be laid at the door of the Minister of Agriculture. That reminds me of the old Levitical law, which my hon. friend knows very much better than I do. When sins of ignorance were committed by the people, how did they escape responsibility? They got a yearling goat and sacrificed it, and the sins of the people were placed upon its head. That is what the Government have attempted to do with the ex-Minister of Agriculture. The sins of the Government in connection with the high cost of living and the general administration of the Department of Agriculture are placed on the head of this poor goat the hon. member for Marquette, who is just a little more than a year old as a minister—a year and-a-half to be exact. I am glad to know that after all, the Levitical law can be made to apply in the year of grace 1919 as well as three thousand years ago.

Mr. M. CLARK: Were not two goats taken, one goat being killed and the other sent into the wilderness? Perhaps my hon. friend can give us some light on which goat has been killed. We know where the wilderness is.

Mr. JACOBS: I think probably the other goat would be my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark).

I have a further suggestion to make to the Government with regard to the appointment of the Minister of Agriculture, which position has just been vacated by the hon. member for Marquette. In the New York Sun of Tuesday, May 20, I read the following:

> As the son of a farmer on his father's farm near St. Mary's, Ontario, the Hon. Arthur Meighen "farmed" from his youth to his early manhood. As the owner of a farm in Manitoba, though not the worker of it, he has added to his knowledge of what farming means in Canada. The main point is that he has the point of view of the farmer and that he is not dealing with any new thing when he deals with settling returned soldiers on the land. He has a sympathetic understanding of Canada's agricultural conditions and needs.

Why not transfer the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) to the Department of Agriculture? He has, I am glad to learn, a sympathetic understanding of Canada's agricultural conditions. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that nothing is said of his having any sympathetic understanding of the conditions of the labourers in Canada. His comprehension of conditions is strictly limited to agricultural matters. I think the hon. the Minister of the Interior would make an excellent farmer, and at the head of the Department of Agriculture he would surely do well.

We were told to-day by the Minister of Finance ((Sir Thomas White) about large sums of money collected for the war. Well, they were collected, and no one regrets any money which was honestly spent for the purpose of winning the war. But what we do object to very strenuously on this side is that very large sums of money were misspent in connection with the prosecution of the war. Money has been wasted on camp lands, and I need only instance the case of Camp Borden ventilated in this House last year, in which tens of thousands of dollars belonging to the country went into the hands of private speculators. Then again, private cars were built and altered to suit the convenience of individuals. The former Minister of Militia and Defence, the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) required to have his car lengthened eight feet, and what do you suppose that cost the overtaxed people of this country? It cost the tidy sum of $28,000, to give eight feet of additional car space to the Minister of Militia and Defence at that time.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. member permit me a question? I know he would not like to be unfair, and I think he will admit that the whole car was rebuilt and to-day is probably as first-class a car as there is in Canada.

Mr. JACOBS: I admit the whole car was rebuilt. The original intention was to lengthen the car eight feet for the convenience of the Minister of Militia and Defence, and when they began to lengthen it they simply dismantled it, and the work of putting it together again cost $28,000. I think the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) will admit that.

Let us consider the question of customs brokers' commission for passing entries from one department of government to another. Tens of thousands of dollars went into the pockets of friends of the Government who were acting as brokers. The work they did could be done by a clerk in any of the departments receiving $700 or $800 a year, and yet for a pure matter of bookkeeping, in order to keep proper tab on the merchandise and commodities brought in for the Government from one department to another, we paid in one instance, if I remember rightly, something like $16,000 to a firm of brokers in Quebec. I am speaking without the figures before me, but I think it was $16,000. When this matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of Customs last year he expressed utter amazement that such a thing should have occurred. He promised that he would look into it and would have a report made to the House later. Since that time, however, we have heard nothing about the matter. We see frauds practised on the Government in regard to soldiers' pay, large sums of money being involved, and the Government must accept responsibility in the matter. I say, therefore, that while we have given this money freely and gladly in order to win the war, the Government must recognize the fact that this country will hold them to strict accountability when they go before the people, for then they will be asked to explain how these vast sums of money were allowed to filter through their hands, and in many cases into the pockets of friends of the Government.

I should like to say a word or two with regard to the Income Tax, in connection with which the Minister of Finance waxed so eloquent this afternoon. No one takes the income tax seriously in this country. It is treated as a joke. Nine-tenths of the people do not pay the tax for the excellent reason that statements are never sent to them. I know of instances where accounts were prepared and forms were filled up, and for the last two years not one word has been heard from the department with regard to these statements of account. They run into millions of dollars, and the interest upon these sums is also considerable. But for some reason or other known to the Government, no serious effort is made to collect this money. I understand that in Australia, which has five-eighths of the population of this country, they collect in income tax something like $37,000,000. Proportionately to that, Canada ought to contribute $50,000,000 on income tax account. But how much have we collected? I understand that last year we collected the paltry sum of $6,000,000. How long is this condition going to continue? The Minister of Finance threw an interesting sidelight on this question this afternoon. He said: I told a friend of mine that I would convert him very easily to protection if he were to come into my office, because I could show him that every day large sums of money are being paid into various customs houses in the Dominion of Canada on account of imports. He further said: It is easier to collect this money and consequently we do not have to bother about the other. Now, I submit that it is unworthy of the Minister of Finance to speak in that way. It is not a question whether or not the money can be easily collected. It is a question of proportioning the taxes of the country equitably upon all the people.

The Government deserves credit for some of its legislation, and I might instance the Bankruptcy Act which went through the House and passed the Senate a few days ago. I was very glad that the Government put through that Bill. I had the honour of introducing it myself into this House last year. This year I thought it would be more in keeping with things were the Government to take hold of an important piece of legislation of that kind and put it through, and they have done so, although they have tacked on to the Bill several anomalies for which I do not wish to hold myself responsible, and of which I disclaim the paternity. However, I have to admit that the Act was very much needed in the interests of commerce, and to that extent the Government has followed the views of the commercial community generally in putting through that Bill.

I have another Bill in my hands which I am prepared to tender to the Government. It is a Bill which has been standing in my name for the last two or three months. It had not reached the Committee stage when private members' day was taken by the Government and consequently I was unable to proceed with it further. May I suggest to my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) that this Bill is almost identical in form with one which he introduced into this House on January 16, 1908. On reference to Hansard, page 1346, I see:

> Mr. R. L. Borden (Carleton, Ont.) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 66) to amend the House of Commons Act. He said: This Bill has the same purpose as a Bill introduced last session or the session before. It is to provide that, in case the seat of any member of this House is vacated for any cause and the writ for the election of a new member is not issued within a prescribed time, it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to issue the writ for a new election.

All that the Prime Minister has to do to-day is to make that a Government Bill. As the member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) said the other day, it would go through, certainly without any opposition on this side of the House, and I do not think there would be any opposition on the other side.

It is a Bill which is very much needed just now. We have six vacancies throughout the country and those vacancies ought to be filled; there is no reason why the people of those divisions should be disfranchised. I don't know whether any change has come over the views of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) since 1908. Probably he has overlooked the fact that he entertained such views at that time, but I have now recalled them to his attention and I trust action will be taken in the matter before the House prorogues.

I do not intend to take up the time of the House much longer. It would be practically impossible to traverse in any way the remarks of the Minister of Finance this afternoon. He had already dwelt upon the subjects that he discussed to-day in what I might call his first Budget speech a few days ago, and we also had his views expressed in the various committee stages when he introduced legislation providing for credits to Roumania and other countries. The House is therefore thoroughly familiar with the hon. gentleman's views, and the matters he touched upon have been fairly well discussed previous to this time.

I do not know whether it is well that I should refer to the Winnipeg riots. A condition of things has arisen in Winnipeg which we on this side predicted a few weeks ago. We charged the Government with inefficiency and ineptitude in the handling of this situation. The Government decided that it was time to do something and they did something which we now see was the wrong thing; they have precipitated action, and we do not know where this is going to lead us. In any event, the whole of the labour organizations throughout the country are up in arms, and it is for the Government to attend to these matters inasmuch as they themselves are responsible from the very inception for the present condition of affairs.

May I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by quoting the words of a recent Canadian writer whose advice may be accepted with profit by the Government and by every member of the House. This writer says:

> The nations that refuse to learn and inwardly digest, whose statesmen, labour leaders and captains of industry and commerce proceed on their way serenely and imperturbably—the nations undisturbed by the gathering clouds of anarchy, whose leaders have souls so small and vision so narrow that they cannot find the way out of the well worn rut, whose sole conception of reconstruction is "business as usual." Will they be able to stem the onrushing tide of social unrest that has already swept into the maelstrom the mightiest European Empire and is rushing westward with gathering fury, to submerge and envelope other nations? Where in its ruthless path will it encounter the strong, arresting wall of enlightened public opinion reared on the solid foundation of social justice, against which it will impotently spend its force.

These remarks might well be taken to heart by the Government and particularly by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), who makes a special study of social questions; and if there be any social unrest just now in the country, I think that hon. gentleman will have to accept his full share of the responsibility owing to the fact that he failed to see and to grasp the import of the situation which is now staring us in the face.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: Before my hon. friend resumes his seat, I should like to ask him one question: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that in the statement I made to the House I disclosed Cabinet secrets?

Mr. JACOBS: What I did was to read, on the invitation of the President of the Privy Council, the statement which he made to the House, and it is for the House and for the country to say whether the minister divulged Cabinet secrets or not.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: Apparently my hon. friend withdraws what he said. I understood him to say that I had disclosed Cabinet secrets. If the hon. gentleman said so, he said what was not true, for I did not do so. I said nothing in my address which was not based on knowledge acquired outside the Cabinet.

Mr. FRED LANGDON DAVIS (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, as a preface to anything I may say later in criticism of the Budget, I would remark that I have a full appreciation of the difficulties of the Finance Minister at a time like the present. We have just come to a season when business is largely dependent upon governmental financing, and when as a result of that financing, prices have been disturbed, the business community upset, and the community otherwise is in an unsettled state of mind. Yet I think there are matters in the Budget which justify the course which I intend to follow on this occasion.

In the first place, the Budget has provided for the raising of about $300,000,000. If you go back to the Public Accounts of 1913-14 and eliminate the amount which we received from railways, thus bringing to a basis of comparison the finances of that period and the present, you will find that $150,000,000 was raised in that year. We all agree that the dollar has been cut in two by the events of the past five years. Hence in raising $300,000,000 to-day we are only taking up the slack in the value of money and we are imposing no more burden upon our people than we imposed in 1914 when we raised $150,000,000. The $150,000,000 of that day represents in goods and services as much as $300,000,000 is representing to-day.

Now let us consider for a moment what has taken place in Great Britain upon this question. The same alteration in the value of money and the disturbance of currency has been taking place, but there they have a Budget this year of approximately £1,200,000,000. They are raising by taxation £940,000,000 sterling, as compared with a Budget just before the war of £243,000,000, or four times as much. If we were levying our taxation to-day upon the same basis as they are doing we would now be raising about $600,000,000. You may say that would now be impossible, that it is not thinkable. Well, last year I had occasion to criticise the Budget in the same manner in which I am going to criticise it this year. I said last year, when the conditions were such as I then detailed, that we should have been raising $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 instead of the $270,000,000 which we planned for. Fortunately we got more. The same principle is at work on the present occasion. Instead of doing as Great Britain is doing, raising about twenty per cent of our necessities by loans, we are obliged to raise somewhere about 55 per cent of our necessities by loans, thereby exaggerating the condition of expansion that now persists. When I say that, I think I should correct what may be a misapprehension on the part of some: I never expect that we will get back to the value of 1914.

I think that ultimately values are going to be greater than they were, and perhaps it is a God-send to the nations that that should be so after the experiences we have gone through; because if we had to pay the accounts of to-day in the services and goods of five years ago our debts would be double what they are. Hence I do not expect that. But, on the other hand, who will now say that the disturbance which has taken place in the values has reached its limit? The fall in the value of money now represents somewhere between 50 and 60 per cent. Is that all that it is going to fall? That is one question that is now disturbing the business community; that is one reason why wages and prices are not on a fixed basis, and why business is uncertain and in need of Government support, as we grant it is.

Now, in extenuation of, or excuse for the course that the Finance Minister has taken this year in not raising greater taxes and in going so heavily upon loans, it may as well be said at once that good national finance depends upon good trade and good industry—if you have not sound trade and sound industry you cannot have sound national finance. National finance is a superstructure built upon the conditions of business generally, and we all know that these conditions to-day are uncertain, and as I have said, perturbed. But I take it that what the radicals sometimes say is very largely true, that "politics are the soul of economics." By that they mean that our knowledge of how to do business, of how to make money, of how to produce goods for the benefit of the community, is not allowed to operate without disturbance. There is unavoidable political interference—the levying of taxes, the imposition of tariffs, trade restrictions in the way of patent rights and so on, interfere with just and equitable distribution. In this view politics may justly be said to be the soul of economics. Now we are reaping in large measure the penalties of not having raised more by taxation in the past, and especially are we now reaping the penalties in this, that our Finance Minister does not know, I believe, where to turn at present for more revenue. He is jealous about letting go imposts in the shape of tariffs because he does not see just how to replace them; and that is the position, I believe, of most members of this House when they come to consider that question. There are practically five large areas of taxation; your imposts, or tariffs, your excise, your income tax, your estates duties tax, and possibly, as a last resort, a land tax.

In Canada we have undoubtedly fully developed the tariff taxation; the imposts we have not neglected, whatever else we may have overlooked. Before the war we were probably the only country in our stage of industrial development which was relying wholly upon imposts and excise for all its federal taxation. Indeed, to-day, among the great industrial nations of the world—Great Britain, the United States, France, Australia and New Zealand—we stand with the highest tariff taxation and the lowest income taxation. Now, that being so, I take it that we have not been developing along the proper lines. The war caught us unprepared to embark upon any other method of taxation, and one of my criticisms of the Budget to-day is that the Finance Minister is not now developing the other sources of revenue which he is going to require if he is to do the full duty of a Finance Minister. What is that full duty? I will read a quotation which sets it out in better words perhaps than I could use myself?

> That great ministers were not those who balanced the national accounts by sparing the national forces while renouncing the politically indispensable outlay, but those who stimulated all the live forces of the nation to cheerful activity, and so employed them to national ends that the state revenue sufficed to meet the admitted political demand.

Now, Sir, we are not doing that to-day,—we are not able to do it. The one field of taxation which I see now open to us and immediately available is one which has always been condemned by English feeling and English practice—and that is a very great extension of our excise taxation. Some one may ask about the devolution of estates duties. Well, England to-day is raising from that source but three per cent of her total revenue, and England is an older and a much wealthier country than we are. Hence, what can we expect to raise from it? Probably the same proportion,—and then cut that in two or more, because the provinces have already entered upon that field, and we would have to make the duties exceedingly high if we were to get anything out of such taxation.

Turn again to the question of land taxes. My own feeling is that of the Finance Minister, that it is not advisable for the federal power to enter upon that field as long as there is any other recourse for us. It is better, more easily, and more economically administered by the municipalities and the provinces, and it is more germane to their finances. It seems to me that we should endeavour to come to some understanding with the provinces and get them, in lieu of our touching that field, to give us the income field of taxation. However, if that cannot be done, we are going to have to consider entering upon the taxation of land values in some fashion, and if we do that it is going to take us about three years at least to put it into any kind of shape so as to get any considerable amount of revenue out of it. I know that in our own province of Manitoba we put upon the statute book a Patriotic Duty Tax. It took us about a year and a half to equalize the assessments so that the weight of that tax would fall fairly upon all parties in the province. If it took a year and a half to equalize the taxation of one province alone, how long would it take us to get returns to equalize the taxation of the nine provinces of the Dominion?

I wish now to make an application of what I have been saying. For my own part, I have with regret to depart from the Government on this occasion. The promise, implied at least, is being held out to us that the tariff will be revised downwards. I get no explicit promise of it, I do not expect an explicit promise. Then I turn to the reductions contained in the Budget and weigh them out, and what am I bound to conclude? In the first place, that the situation is one in which they cannot carry out that downward revision. It is going to be impossible next year to give us that, because this year and in past years they have not developed those areas of taxation which would enable us now to shift the incidence of our tariff taxation. I think that is absolutely clear upon the face of it.

Again, let us look at what has been done in the way of the reduction of duties, especially with regard to agricultural implements. Here the vested interests of the manufacturers of Canada has been the basis of action; the reduction of tariff has been bought from them, and the price is a reduction of freight rates. It is absolutely indefensible, as a matter of finance, to mix up tariffs with freights. The manner in which this duty on agricultural implements has been dealt with shows that the Government is not headed toward a reform of the tariff in accordance with the demands of nineteen-twentieths of the people who sent me here and in line with my own political record in the past and what my own common sense suggests. Two of the men whom I last saw before I came back from my home last May were the president of the Conservative Association and the gentleman who would have been the Conservative candidate at the last election had we not had Union Government. They both told me that this question must be pressed to a finish; that we must not be slow to demand a reform which, in the West as well as in the East, is fundamental to reconstruction.

Why was there not an absolute elimination of the duty on cement, especially in view of the fact that the capitalization of the cement merger is largely water?—I I won't say what proportion. We are told by everybody that the cement people are well able to go into the markets of the world and take care of themselves; yet the people are still charged a duty of eight cents a barrel on cement. The manner in which the Government has dealt with this cement business is an indication of its intentions. The cement business is absolutely able to stand upon its own feet, but it is not being asked to do so; it, too, must be protected. How must I judge, then, of the future intentions of the Government with regard to the tariff if that is the line which they take now? As to the question of oils, perhaps the Western members asked what was not perfectly in line with principle. I think that the farmer ought to pay taxation upon operating costs just as well as any one else, but it is a severe tax. They asked for a reduction of the duty largely because consumers of oil in Canada are in the hands of the oil trusts of the United States, and they did not see any reason why the imposition of duties should be used as a pretext for the raising of the price to Canadian consumers.

I now come to the question of the duties on wool, cotton and leather goods. You will understand that we asked that the duties be taken off only the commoner varieties of these goods, and that a limited reduction be made a matter involving, perhaps, a $3,000,000 reduction of revenue, which would undoubtedly have been made up twice over by reason of the increased revenue derived from the importation of larger quantities of that class of goods. This would have done something to reduce the cost of living. Here are some significant figures which I got together recently for purposes of comparison. In the United States, out of an importation of $225,000,000 worth of wool, $199,000,000 was free of duty, $26,000,000 dutiable, and $9,000,000 was collected by way of duties thereon. In Canada, out of an importation valued at $30,000,000, $6,000,000 was free, and we collected about $6,500,000 by way of customs duties upon the remainder. Do you wonder, therefore, that in Canada we are paying $18 or $19 per capita in tariff taxation, while last year the people of United States paid only $1.69 per capita? The Finance Minister said this afternoon that we cannot raise our income taxes beyond what they are in United States. But you cannot induce people to come here and live here if you ask them to pay from ten to fifteen times as much by way of duty upon these goods as they would pay if they lived in the United States, because no natural obstacle prevents their returning to the country whence they came.

Let us look for a moment at the duties upon cotton goods. Of course, the United States produce a great deal of their cotton, but their total importation was about $81,000,000, and ours was about $56,000,000, because we have to buy a great deal of our raw material. Of that raw material about $21,000,000 came in free, but we pay a duty of $9,000,000 on about $35,000,000. The United States, as I say, have their own raw material, but they import some special kinds of material for their own purposes, and of the $81,000,000 worth of cotton and cotton goods which they imported, $38,000,000 were free and $43,000,000 dutiable, the customs revenue from this source amounting to about $14,000,000. It must be remembered that United States duties are not on a flat rate basis, as ours are, they are not, for instance, 25 per cent upon all classes of a given commodity, the duties are scaled from 5 per cent upwards—7½ per cent, 10 per cent, 10½ per cent, and so on, so that the dearer the goods, the higher the duty, and vice versa. I cannot see why that principle is not a good one to introduce into our own tariff.

With regard to leather goods, the comparison is yet more striking. In the United States, of an importation valued at about $22,000,000, $14,000,000 was free and $8,000,000 dutiable. In Canada none of the importation is free; the $9,000,000 worth is dutiable. If the principle enunciated by the Finance Minister is right, that we cannot raise our income tax above what it is in United States, how can we expect to retain population when we impose duties which are ten, twelve, or fifteen times as high as the duties upon similar articles in United States? Our Government are conscious of the fact that capital is mobile and that it is free to move out, but they forget that labour is just as mobile and just as free to move out. This is one of the things that has been retarding the growth of Canada.

I was caused to look into the question of unemployment last year on account of certain inquiries which were made by the Committee on Agriculture. Some have wondered why the farmers of Ontario, after voting so strongly for Union Government, were so critical of Union Government six months after its formation. I do not know whether all hon. gentlemen know that the farmers of Ontario found themselves last spring 27,500 hands short of their requirements in connection with the spring work upon the farms. Only three or four years ago the Finance Minister said that our whole fiscal system had been revised with a view to building up our industries. That is true; that is the purpose of a high tariff, and it has effected its purpose in Canada. We have much more wild land than United States, being a younger community; our population, urban and rural, is distributed almost exactly as is the population of United States. But our fiscal policies have not been so designed as to cause the people to take advantage of the undeveloped natural resources which lie at our doors and offer to our people a means of profitable employment.

My great quarrel with the tariff is this, that you tax profitable businesses for the support of unprofitable businesses. That argument cannot be denied; it is admitted that that was the purpose at the beginning. It is only in the last stage that this may not be so, then the business is presumed to have become a national asset able to give us goods at world prices without protection. And the last stage in Canada—with protection continued—has now lasted how many years, and how many more years will it last if there be not resistance to the principle of protection?

Mr. JOHN A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon a discussion of the Budget, I desire to say one or two words with regard to some criticisms that have been made against the present Government and some of its ministers. I might also state that while it is my intention to give the Government full credit where I think it is due, it is also my intention to criticise as fully. Therefore, to make my position clear, I want to state first that I think the criticisms that have been coming from honourable members on your left, Mr. Speaker, as regards the Prime Minister's absence and his work overseas have been absolutely uncalled for. The criticism has been unfair at times, and it would have been much better, not only for the work and the unanimity of opinion in this House, but for the country, had that criticism not been offered. No good purpose has been served, and, in fact, the criticism may have worked the other way. We have also had criticism of some of his colleagues and of the work they have been doing overseas, which criticism, I think, was entirely uncalled for. This is probably more or less of a repetition of some things I said during my speech on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, but as the criticism was still continued and in a probably more carping form, I thought it well, because I was in a position to know a good deal of what the ministers had been doing overseas as I spent some little time there, to make these remarks.

One feature that has been dwelt upon a little too much by both sides is the attempt that has been made from both sides of this House to make it apparent that honourable members were all so desirous of doing everything possible for the returned soldier. That desire coming from certain quarters of this House does not sound very good, and I imagine I hear some of the returned boys using language something like this, probably with the addition of very strong superlatives: What cant! What hypocrisy! I can imagine hearing the returned soldier saying: Why do they not really do something for the returned soldier if they are all so anxious about him? Immediately, however, you suggest some things that could be done, they all hold up their hands and say: It is entirely out of the question; it cannot be done; it is too complicated. Such excuses as these have been offered repeatedly. One thing this Government could have done—and I think this entire House would have supported them had they seen fit to do it—was to make it possible for the returned soldier to get the complete outfit of clothing which each of them has to procure when he comes back, without paying into the treasury a duty of from 20 to 47½ per cent on the same. That may not seem much, but if you look into it for a moment or two, you will see that it amounts to large proportions. Some 400,000 soldiers have returned or will be returning to Canada, and each one of them has to buy a complete outfit of clothing immediately he comes into civilian life. I know from personal experience that the average cost of each outfit is considerably over $100, so that these returned men will have paid in the neighbourhood of $50,000,000 to purchase clothes to get back into civilian occupation again. That does not include working clothes at all; that is just for the clothes they require before they can go into their own homes and step out amongst the public as civilians. There is a duty of from 20 to 47½ per cent on the articles they have to buy. Some hon. members will say that that duty is not imposed—that prices are not raised as a result of the duty. Well, we have had several representatives of manufacturing industries in this building during the last few days, and some of them have had to admit that if you take the water out of their stock, they have been making in the neighbourhood of 300 per cent profit. Whether that is taking advantage of the duty or not, I do not know; if it is not taking advantage of the duty, it is taking advantage, by the kind permission of this Government, of the returned soldier, so that there is something wrong somewhere. The amount may not be very great, but if you figure it out you will find that these returned men will have paid about $15,000,000 duty in the rehabilitation of themselves as regards civilian clothes.

Another reason why I am just a little inclined to criticise this Budget is the tendency of the former colleagues of the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) to endeavour to land the blame for everything that is mentioned in this House on to the shoulders of the ex-minister. Practically all of his former colleagues, so far as I have heard them—possibly some have spoken whom I did not hear—have endeavoured, when any criticism was made, to place the blame on him. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) was the first to attempt to do this, and he criticised his former colleague severely. Of course, he started out by eulogizing him, claiming that he had been a strong arm to the Government, that he had been a faithful worker all the way through and had rendered very valuable services to the Government;—but almost in the next breath he practically questioned his honesty of purpose by saying that he was afraid that some members of this House were playing politics, were thinking of nominations and votes that might be got two or three years hence. I think that, to say the least, that is not a creditable thing for a minister of the Crown to say in the House, especially when he had just finished complimenting the person referred to. As I said, he undertook to question the sincerity of purpose of the ex-Minister of Agriculture in taking the course he has taken. The minister (Mr. Calder) is probably not aware that the people of Western Canada may have an opportunity of deciding just whose purpose was sincere, and I would ask nothing better than to have even the people in the constituency of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization pass judgment on the honesty of purpose of the two hon. gentlemen. It would be of very considerable interest at least if we had such a contest in that particular constituency.

A short time after that, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) took part in the debate, and discussing the question of the high cost of living he said that if the Government had not done anything to reduce the high cost of living, or words to that effect, the ex-Minister of Agriculture was responsible for it. He said that the Government had done everything that the ex-Minister of Agriculture had asked them to do. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) asked the President of the Privy Council if the ex-Minister of Agriculture had ever suggested removing the tariff in order to reduce the high cost of living, but he (Mr. Rowell) immediately side-stepped that question by saying that that matter would be attended to later when the proper time came. Perhaps the proper time has not come yet. At all events the question, which I think was very pertinent and should have been answered, has not been answered yet.

With regard to the Budget I am in accord with some parts of it, particularly the advanced step that has been taken in the matter of direct taxation by way of income tax, and the maintenance of the excess war profits tax. The increase in the income tax is no doubt very satisfactory, and my only criticism of it is that it should have gone further. Possibly it is the intention of the Minister of Finance to make income taxation higher at another session, and I can assure him that if he does he will have the hearty support of the western representatives, or at least such of them as represent agricultural constituencies. With regard to the excess war profits tax there is one feature that is very, very unsatisfactory, and one which I do not think has been mentioned so far in this debate. I refer to permitting companies that have paid the war tax in any one year to charge the amount they have so paid against their profits the next year before the war tax of that year is applied. Take an example. A company pays $100,000 in war tax, we will say, for the year 1917. Now that company is permitted to charge that $100,000 as a working expense against the year 1918. It is quite possible that that company may have over $100,000 clear profit for 1918, and yet not be called upon to pay a single cent of war tax. I do not know what the object of this provision was. If it was an oversight, it has not been rectified yet. I know concerns which have paid $300,000 to $400,000 in excess war profits taxation and were permitted to charge that amount next year against their operating expenses, the result being that although they had immense profits their war tax for the next year amounted to practically nothing. I think this should be remedied. The taxation paid in any one year cannot fairly be regarded as a legitimate charge against the operating expenses of the next year.

There are other features of the Budget that are commendable so far as they go, but taking the Budget as a whole, we find that instead of the tariff being decreased there has been an increase all round. The Minister of Finance tells us that there will be $17,000,000 less in amount collected this year on account of reductions made, providing our imports are on the same basis as last year. But he did not tell us that there would be an additional $28,000,000 to counteract this by increases made; so that instead of there being a reduction in the tariff all round there is a considerable increase. I think the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) put it quite fairly when he said that this Budget can be considered a protectionist Budget without any exaggeration.

Another feature of the Budget which has been referred is the reduction of railway rates to put the Canadian and the American manufacturer on the same footing so far as freight rates are concerned. That is all very well, but it does not help one particle those who are purchasing implements. It means that there has been practically no reduction whatever by way of the tariff on the total profits of the manufacturers, for what they lose on the tariff they will practically make up in reduced freight rates and rebates on raw material. As the Government is so anxious to put the Canadian manufacturer of implements on the same basis as the American manufacturer, I wonder why they could not see their way clear to put the Canadian user of these implements on the same footing as the American user. I think that would have been only fair, and had it been done there would have been much less criticism of the Budget, although there would still be room for criticism of it along other lines.

When the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) was criticising the ex-Minister of Agriculture I could not help wondering what was in his mind when he addressed himself so particularly to the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders). I wondered if just then he could not be considered as playing politics to a slight extent, and playing it in an entirely different way from that in which an hon. member who was opposed to this Budget would be playing politics. Of course, I do not suppose for a moment that he would do anything like that. I might just say, however, that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization has held a very unique position indeed in Canadian politics. He has been in public life for a long time, particularly in the province of Saskatchewan, and while he has been known in Government circles as a minister of several different departments—he has been Minister of Education, Minister of Highways, and so on—he is popularly known throughout Saskatchewan as the "Minister of Elections." I think it was the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) who remarked the other day that it was just possible that that mantle was slipping from the shoulders of a certain gentleman, a former member of this House, who had been distinguished in that particular line for some considerable time, and I thought he was not very wide of the mark. Events are occurring daily which point that way. All I will say on that is this—if this Government needs a Minister of Elections they will find a very capable one in the Minister of Immigration and Colonization who was so free in his criticism of the ex-Minister of Agriculture.

He also made another statement to the effect that the people of certain constituencies were not thinking of the tariff during the 1917 campaign. Well, he must have had a different experience from mine, and I think probably I took almost as active a part in the election in Saskatchewan as did the hon. minister. At any rate, I gave my entire time to that work for several weeks, and I am in a position to say that it was a very live issue. While, of course, the one outstanding issue was undoubtedly the securing of necessary men and means to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion, yet there was another current running all through, and the minister knows very well that that issue was prominent in the minds of the people at that time. But even if it was not, I might say for his information that it was not long after that until it was very present in their minds. One statement of the hon. member was that the city of Moosejaw has been continuously represented by a Conservative. I wonder if he is so unfamiliar with happenings in his constituency as not to know that the city of Moosejaw for the last year or more has been represented by a staunch Liberal, who was a strong supporter of the Laurier Government for years in the House of Commons and who was elected by a substantial majority. Furthermore, this same gentleman was a strong opponent, in the campaign of 1917, of the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization. When the hon. gentleman expresses the opinion that the people of Saskatchewan are not thinking of tariff questions, I will tell him, to use a vernacular of the street, that he has another "think" coming, and I would advise him—that is, if he contemplates dealing with the same constituency—to be just a little better informed as to what is in the minds of the people in that particular part of the country.

Another feature of the Budget to which I might refer is the fact that it does not in any way deal adequately with the necessities of life. Now, I know that some will say that the 7½ per cent super-war tax was removed on foodstuffs. We grant that, but that cannot in any way be considered as dealing with the tariff. It never has been spoken of as a tariff at all. But now all that remains of this tax in so far as the tariff is concerned becomes a part of the regular tariff, and we are informed that it will remain as a tariff until the revision takes place, whenever that may be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are expected to confine ourselves as closely as we can within a certain limit of time, and as the hon. member who preceded me dealt very fully with the different aspects of the tariff and the methods of raising revenue I shall pass that consideration over for the present. But there is another feature that I am compelled to touch upon, and that is the seemingly intense desire of certain supporters of the Government to discredit the agriculturists of Western Canada. I am sorry that a matter of this kind is brought up so frequently, but just so long as it comes up in this House, I, as a representative of agriculture, am going to refute to the best of my ability any erroneous statements that may be made.

This matter has been dealt with by several hon. members, and I think the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who, I believe, is in his place to-night, was about the first to introduce it. Personally, I do not think the subject should be discussed here to the extent that it is, but it is not my fault, and I am bound to defend our position. The hon. member begins by attacking the ex-Minister of Agriculture and myself as being at the head of large corporations in Western Canada. He did not properly name them, but his intentions were quite plain. He associated me with one institution in Saskatchewan, and for his benefit and the benefit of other hon. members I may say that the name of that institution is the Saskatchewan Co-Operative Elevator Company, Limited. The hon. member is in his seat and he will in future at least be properly informed as to the name, if he wishes to refer to that company again.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is my hon. friend the president of it?

Mr. MAHARG: Yes, sir. I have been ever since its inception seven or eight years ago.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I observe that in stating that there was such a company and that my hon. friend was president of it, I mentioned two facts, and that can hardly be construed as an attack on my hon. friend.

Mr. MAHARG: Your facts were perfectly clear in your own mind, but they were absolutely at variance with the real facts according to figures. I will say that for your benefit and the benefit of other hon. members of this House. One of the things the hon. member stated, and I do not know whether or not it is that to which he now refers, is that the ex-Minister of Agriculture and myself were receiving, as he understood, salaries anywhere from $15,000 to $20,000. Did you state that as a fact?

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, I said that my information was—I could not say whether it was correct or not—that the President of the grain company, that is, the ex-Minister of Agriculture, was receiving anywhere from $15,000 to $20,000. I did not credit any such amount to my hon. friend (Mr. Maharg). My impression was that he was getting only about $5,000 or $6,000.

Mr. MAHARG: Are you giving that as a fact? You say you stated two facts. I would like to know if that is one of the facts you gave.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

[Mr. Maharg.]

Mr. MAHARG: Did you state that as a fact?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have already told you.

Mr. MAHARG: Well, all right.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is altogether irregular for an hon member who has the floor to interrogate any member in his seat, particularly a member who has spoken.

Mr. MAHARG: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, but it was the hon. gentleman in his seat who started the interrogation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MAHARG: Very well. Now we will proceed to examine a little more closely these statements of the hon. member and try to ascertain whether or not they are facts. In the first place, Sir, your humble servant is not receiving any such salary as $5,000 or $6,000, not that he could not have got it, not by any means, I could have received a nice fat salary if I had left the present company and taken up a similar position in another company that was starting up in active opposition to the farmers' own company. But we were not out to make money. We were out to regulate conditions, and we have succeeded fairly well in doing so; and for the benefit of the hon. member for Frontenac I might go further and say that we have employees receiving double the salary I am receiving, and more. So that, so far as I am concerned, it is not a question of money but of giving service to the people. We have succeeded very well in serving the people, and I may take this opportunity to inform the hon. gentleman just why these companies were brought into existence. In the West at that time we were under the thumb of as big a combine probably as ever existed in this or any other country. It had its roots from one end of the continent to the other and was known as the great grain combine. The people of Western Canada organized to throw off its influence in the same way as we propose organizing to escape from the grip of some other great corporations which possibly may not have their entire interests in Saskatchewan.

The hon. gentleman also undertook to compare Victory Loan purchases in Ontario with those in the western provinces. That is all very well. We all know that Ontario subscribed very largely to Victory Loans, but the hon. member took very good care not to mention the donations to the different patriotic funds in those provinces.

All I need say in this connection is that it is impossible for a person to give and purchase with the same money.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) as usual had to indulge in his little tirade against the Western farmers, or the Western grain growers, or whatever he chooses to call them. He also had to talk about the profits they made. He made this proposition: He offered to swap—I think that was the word he used, or a similar expression—profits, with these companies. Not knowing what the hon. gentleman's profits were, I am not in a position to say whether it would be advisable to do that or not. But I have a counter proposition to make to the member for Brantford, and it is this: If he will give our concern the one-thousandth part of the profits that he made out of our shareholders, we will give him the entire profits that we made out of his shareholders. The profits of our concern were not made out of the shareholders of the manufacturing establishments, or the owners, or any of those connected with the industries. The profits that our concern derived were made from the shareholders of their own company—that is, if you like to call them profits. We do not call them profits, we call them savings that were made by handling our own goods instead of having to handle through other channels. If manufacturers followed the same procedure and made their entire profits out of their own shareholders, there could be no criticism of that whatever. But they seem to take the opportunity, whenever they fancy they have it, of criticising the farmers' company because they are making money within their own business which in other years they have been allowing others to do for them. I might go further and say that the charges which our concern makes are largely fixed charges—fixed by this Government in the one case and by the Grain Exchange in the other. So that if they are making profits they are doing so because their charges are fixed and they have to take those charges according to the provisions of the Grain Act and the rules of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. Therefore, I do not think there can be very much complaint on that score. The hon. member for Brantford also stated another instance; he said the city of Toronto paid more duty than any of the Western Provinces. I quite agree with him that it does, but he knows just as well as I do that when the city of Toronto pays that duty it passes it on to the other fellow, just as it does in the case of a great many other things, and Western Canada pays its share of it every time. It is not the people of the city of Toronto that pay that duty by any means. It is paid on raw material, and such like goods, as Toronto is a port of entry. Duty is paid there on millions of dollars worth of goods but these goods pass on to other destinations and the final result is that the people, probably two or three thousand miles away from the port of entry, pay this duty. I think it would be only fair if hon. gentlemen would at least consider both sides of the case and not be eternally harping on the great patriotism of the city of Toronto and the province of Ontario as a result of considering only one side of the question.

Another peculiar trait, if I might use the term, was displayed by the member for Brantford in connection with the proposed tariff committee. The hon. gentleman was very anxious to know what this committee on the tariff were going to do; if they were going to put the duties up, he was going to hold up both hands for it; if there was any possibility of their revising the tariff downwards, he did not want a Tariff Revision Committee appointed at all. Now that denotes the fair-mindedness of the people we have got to contend with here, and against whose accusations we have to spend a great deal of our time defending ourselves. There was another hon. gentleman, the member for St. Antoine division in Montreal (Sir Herbert Ames), I believe. I would not be sure of his constituency but he is a large boot and shoe manufacturer.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I plead an alibi. I have not spoken in this debate so far.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. gentleman is barking up the wrong tree.

Mr. MAHARG: It doesn't necessarily follow that you spoke here. It was possible for you to speak in another way.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should address the Chair and not another hon. member.

Mr. MAHARG: Very good, Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to act upon your suggestion. The hon. gentleman (Sir Herbert Ames) took another course than speaking in this Chamber. His method was to place questions on the Order Paper. He had the idea that he could show the position of the western farmers in so far as the income tax is concerned. He was not worrying himself about the eastern farmer. Oh no, he didn't want to touch him, he wanted to leave him in the same position. He was very desirous of being friendly with the eastern farmer and therefore did not mention him at all. But he was very anxious to know just what income tax the western farmer would pay. When the answer was given, he found out that for the hundreds of farmers that paid income tax in the province of Ontario—the great province that we have heard so much about in connection with the Victory Loan—there were thousands of farmers that paid that tax in the province of Saskatchewan. So my hon. friend's questions came back to him, I am afraid, in the form of a boomerang. As the question has been raised, I want to give an illustration of why income tax returns have not come in promptly from the farmers in the West, and for the purposes of that illustration I will cite my own experience. We all know there was difficulty the first year in getting the tax forms out, but we were prepared to make allowance for that. The forms eventually came along and probably about the early part of last June, when I was able to make a return, I sent in my forms filled out to the best of my ability. I heard nothing more in regard to those forms until the House was again in session. Then, during the month of April last, I received another form from the Income Tax Department for me to fill out, giving the different amounts received from the various sources on the farm, almost one year after I sent in the original forms that I was requested to fill in. How can you expect people to fill out their forms and send them in if the officials connected with the department in charge of the income tax do not attend promptly to their duties? My explanation shows that instead of the blame being attached to the farmers the blame rests upon the department that is carrying out the income tax law.

Then we have another protectionist gentleman who comes from British Columbia, the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Stacey). He indulged in some remarks condemnatory of the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. Among other things he states that in this resolution they say—I forget for the moment the wording but the meaning is this—no tariff assistance should be given to any one class of people without first considering the interests of all the others, and of the nation as well. I would like to ask the hon. member if he has any knowledge of the consideration the fruit growers of British Columbia gave to the agriculturists of Western Canada, whom they expect to purchase their apples, when they came down here and got the Government to increase the tariff on apples by thirty cents a barrel? —from sixty cents to ninety cents. Did they discuss that increase of duty with the western farmers, whose platform they are criticising? They did not. However, they came down to interview the members of the farmers' organizations shortly afterwards. A cry went up from Western Canada that if this was the way the British Columbia fruit growers were going to use us we would purchase American apples. Then the fruit growers of British Columbia came down post haste to see the officers of the different farmers' organizations, and they pleaded with us not to purchase American apples. They said: "Oh, we are not going to raise the price of our apples, we are not going to take advantage of the higher duty; give us your orders and you will see that we will not take advantage of that duty." But when their price list came out we soon saw very clearly whether they had taken advantage of the duty or not: it was apparent that they had taken advantage of it to the very fullest extent. Then another issue came up a little later, when an agitation was raised in connection with the admission of oleomargarine into Canada. There are large dairy organizations throughout the West, and a cry went up all over the country against the introduction of oleomargarine into Canada at a time when butter could not be purchased in the Old Country, and a movement was inaugurated here to release some of the Canadian butter in order to supply the demand in the United Kingdom. They came along and solicited our support to prevent the admission of oleomargarine into this country. They were not considering the interests of anybody else at that time. This is what we object to, this camouflage, if you like to put it in that way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Who do you mean by "they"?

Mr. MAHARG: The people referred to, the Dairymen's Associations of the Western country. They came to the organizations in the prairie provinces asking for assistance against the admission of oleomargarine into Canada. Then the same hon. gentleman goes on to defend this Government in their inactivity so far as labour troubles are concerned. He starts out by saying that the difficulty in Western Canada is not due to labour conditions,—that the labour people are not causing the trouble. But later on he forgets himself and says that we are to blame for the labour trouble in Western Canada, and a little further on he says that the only solution for the great unrest is close co-operation between employers and employees. Yet he claims that it is not a labour trouble. So far as the trouble in Western Canada is concerned, Mr. Speaker, it is not of recent origin at all. There has been trouble brewing there for years. It was quite evident before the war broke out, and had there been no war you would have had just as serious labour troubles as you have there at the present time. So there is no use getting behind the red flag and saying that this is a revolutionary movement. There may be some persons who would like to turn the trouble into a revolution, but in so far as the actual labourers are concerned, they are not out for revolution by any means, all they are out for is a fair and just deal so far as their employment is concerned.

Mr. STACEY: That is what the hon. member said.

Mr. MAHARG: I have Hansard here; if my statement is not correct, why, all right. As I said at the start, Mr. Speaker, the ground has been fairly well covered, and it is not my intention to take up much further time. But I would just like to mention, in connection with the high cost of living, what has been done in the old country. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) used words to this effect, I think, that Canada had done more work to deal effectively with the high cost of living than any of the other countries at war, that even free trade England—

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend will permit me—what I said was that in regulating packers and cold storage warehouses we had passed more drastic regulations and had more strictly limited their profits than any other country in the world.

Mr. MAHARG: My point is to show what has been done in the old country so far as the labourer is concerned. The hon. gentleman mentioned the ninepenny loaf. So far as I am aware bread was the only thing dealt with—there may have been other things—but this will suffice as an illustration to show what the Government of Great Britain did in the matter of reducing the cost of living for the labouring man and taxing the wealthy to pay it. Previous to their taking action the ninepenny loaf, as they call it, was costing one shilling and two pence—that would be fourteen pence. Originally the price had been four pence. The Government took measures to fix the price at nine pence, and the loaf has been called the ninepenny loaf ever since. Now, to make up the amount that the Government had to pay by way of subsidy to the bakers—and it was a large amount, in the first year amounting to something like £40,000,000 and in the second year to £60,000,000—in order to make better living conditions, every last dollar of that subsidy was taken by way of income tax out of large incomes,—the burden was removed from the shoulders of the working man and transferred to the shoulders of those who were in a position to pay. If our Government could have seen their way clear to do something like that I think it would have been a real benefit so far as our labouring men are concerned.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I ask one question? Does my hon. friend favour this Government fixing the price of wheat?

Mr. MAHARG: Yes, for the benefit of the producer and the consumer I have no hesitation in saying that I think the Government should fix the price of wheat; whether they fix it at a high or a low price is not the question. We have had that matter under discussion right in this building to-day. I think the consensus of opinion of practically all men handling wheat is that it is the only way it can be successfully handled this year. We are not asking for a good price or any price, but we are asking that the Government take control, because that is the only way to handle our wheat. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Harold) made one or two remarks in regard to some of the proposals of the Western farmers. He expressed doubt as to the working of the single tax, or the tax on unimproved land values, and said he would like an explanation as to how such a tax was to be applied. I remember in discussing it last session that some hon. members were of the opinion that this tax would apply only to unimproved land, and that just as soon as it was all improved you would get no tax whatever from that source, and they said they could readily see why the farmers of Western Canada wanted to have a land tax as they were eventually going to escape paying it altogether. That is entirely wrong. The principle of the taxation of unimproved land values is that you will tax all land at its unimproved land value. It matters not how many improvements the land may have on it, it matters not if it has thousands of dollars worth of buildings on it and is all under cultivation,—if there is a section or a farm alongside it not improved, the improved land will pay no more taxation than the unimproved land value, and it will continue for all time paying taxation on that value. So there is no possibility of western farmers eventually escaping payment of a tax of that kind. We think that is a fair and equitable basis on which to raise a certain proportion of the taxes of this country. We do not believe all our revenue could be raised that way, it would not be desirable that it should, but we think that the major portion of it should be so raised.

The hon. gentleman also used as an argument against any reductions in the tariff at this particular time that the United States had not seen fit to deal with their tariff during the war. There is a very good reason for that: The United States Government saw fit years ago to do exactly what we have been asking this Government to do. Their food, clothing, farm machinery, boots and shoes, and all leather goods have been coming in free—exactly what we have asked this Government to give us. Then another reason the hon. gentleman gave against the free entry of goods was the question of cream separators. Cream separators had been mentioned as an illustration of a line of manufacture that had worked successfully without protection, but he said they were covered by patents. Now, I imagine that by next session possibly the hon. gentleman will try to apply that to binder twine also, but I think he will have quite a difficult task in explaining why the Canadian twine manufacturers are able to compete with foreign rivals, and certainly the question of patents can not apply there.

However, possibly they will find some excuse. The hon. gentleman says that there is a discrimination between the freight rate on wheat and the freight rate on agricultural implements. He might just as well suggest that the freight rate on wheat should be the same as the freight rate on sand, gravel or stone; his argument would be just as much to the point. All these rates are classified according to the value of the goods, the space they occupy in the car, and so on.

As I have listened during the last few days to the excuses offered for the failure to make further reductions in the tariff, I have been wondering what excuse will be furnished next. Right along we have been furnished with all kinds of excuses. Last year it was the war; this year it has been the war and demobilization. But demobilization is very nearly completed now, and the excuse is being switched to the unrest in the country. If the unrest is successfully coped with and things become normal, I do not know what excuse will be offered next for inaction in regard to the tariff, but a suggestion in that regard came from an hon. gentleman who addressed the House the other day and who said that we would have to look after the Asiatic manufacturer next. Well, I do not think we shall have much worry in that connection, but no doubt some argument of that kind may be advanced as a reason why no tariff reduction should be made. It is amusing to see the way these excuses shift from one thing to another. I have no doubt that when we come here next year and ask for revision of the tariff, some other excuse will be offered and we shall be asked to believe that it is just as important as any that we have had so far.

So far as the amendment of the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is concerned, some parts of it are entirely satisfactory to the members from the West, but other parts of it are so indefinite as to be entirely unsatisfactory. The Opposition, having brought in a previous amendment, had to frame a resolution which the Speaker would allow to come before the House, and this may account for the vagueness of some of the clauses of the amendment. It is not because of faith in the Opposition that I support the amendment. We have had very plain indications from that side of the House that there are protectionists over there just as there are on the other side; so that there is very little to choose from.

But the amendment goes far enough to advocate the removal of the duties on foodstuffs and on raw material entering into the manufacture of implements necessary to the production of these foodstuffs, so that it goes a long way to meet the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. We are anxious and always have been that taxes on food should be entirely removed; we could not ask that other taxes be removed and not ask that the taxes on food be removed. As the amendment goes a long way in that direction, it is preferable to the Budget. However, other matters have to be taken into consideration. Some of the methods suggested by hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side for the reduction of the high cost of living are things that we have been asking for for a long time. The leader of the Opposition mentioned one—Governmental control of cold storage plants. For the benefit of the leader of the Opposition, I may say that years ago we asked the Government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of which he was then a follower, to take over the cold storage in this country from one end to the other. We knew that sooner or later the entire cold storage activities would get into the hands of private corporations in a way that would be detrimental not only to the consumer, but also to the producer of the live stock which goes through the abattoirs of the country. The advocacy, therefore, of Government ownership and control of cold storage plants is in line with what we have been contending for in Western Canada. I mention this simply to show that certain views expressed by the Opposition coincide with the views of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. For these reasons I find it my duty to support the amendment.

Mr. ROBERT H. BUTTS (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have on quite a number of occasions been pronounced out of order in this House. While I sometimes complain of the decision of the Chair, I shall not complain to-night if both the Chair and the House consider me out of order if I take up very much time, having regard to the temperature. Let me congratulate the Government, and particularly the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) on the many excellent features of the Budget. I feel that I am justified in saying—and I am more at liberty to do so because the minister is not in his chair—that such a Budget speech, or such a speech on financial matters as was delivered by the Finance Minister this afternoon, has never been heard in the Canadian Commons. The reading section of the country—even those people who cannot read but may hear read either of these addresses—will have, I think, added confidence in the Finance Minister; will have a greater confidence in him than has been reposed in a Finance Minister of this country since the day's of Canada's inception. They cannot but feel gratified at the comparison which the Finance Minister made between the position in which Canada finds itself after the struggle through which she has gone and the position of the other countries to which he referred this afternoon. I say, therefore, that I will support the Budget in all its fulness. But there is one point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Government and the Minister of Finance, more by way of recommendation than anything else.

The address delivered this afternoon by the Minister of Finance was so much in contrast with some of the speeches delivered by gentlemen on the other side of the House that I could not help remarking the difference.

Let me begin by remarking that one or two hon. gentlemen opposite, since this debate commenced, called attention to the fact that the ex-minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) has resigned his seat in the Cabinet and that no explanation whatever came from the Government. One hon. member also referred to the fact that the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) had resigned his office and that no explanation ever came from either that hon. gentleman or the Government. This thought came to me while that hon. member was speaking: Would it not occur to him that the Opposition have gone through this session without a leader and no explanation is forthcoming from them? Would it not occur to that hon. gentleman that before they appointed a leader at all, they appointed a committee to look after the affairs of the Opposition during the session, and then they appointed a leader pro tem, and, they brought him to a banquet in Montreal in order that he might proclaim the fact that he was not the leader but only the leader pro tem. There is no explanation coming to the House about that. One sees how it is that certain persons rush in where angels fear to tread.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member, if he were in the House at the time, would know that the first time I addressed the House in the capacity of leader, I explained from my seat what my position was, and he will find my remarks on Hansard.

Mr. BUTTS: That simply strengthens my remark. There has been a good deal of debate in regard to free trade and protection. Let me ask some of those extreme free traders to look over the history of Canada. I am not going to labour the question, because it has already been well argued and almost every argument pro and con has been laid before the House, but let me ask them: Where do they, the free traders, fit in? Was there ever a free trade Government since 1878? Has it not been protection, whichever party was in power? Have both parties not carried out exactly the same policy in every particular? Why, even if you go over the reciprocity pact, you will find that the late Mr. Paterson, who was one of the gentlemen who went from here to negotiate it, kept up the protection on his own biscuit and confectionery to 26 per cent. Under protection this country of Canada has built over 30,000 miles of railway; under protection she has built a system of canals that have cost, perhaps, $300,000,000; under protection she has built up all the harbours and public works of every description. My hon. friends opposite had a very fine opportunity of, as the late Sir Richard Cartwright said, destroying the tree, root and branch. They had fifteen years to do it, but did they have the courage at any time to attempt it? I ask my free trade friends: What have they to expect from the gentlemen of the Opposition? I have followed, since I was a very young boy, the politics of this country, and I never knew a free trader in this country except a Grit that was in the Opposition. I was not altogether surprised at the remarks of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) the other evening, because they only confirmed the opinion I had of his opinions. The honourable gentleman said:

> While we may have iron and steel in the raw state in this country, there may be others who can pour their products into this country and keep us forever from having any industry of that kind for our own. If I were to say that and to allow the natural resources of this country to remain forever in a dormant state, I do not consider that I would be doing what would be in the best interest of my country or in the general advancement of the people.

> If to take some specific object of that kind and provide for it in the way in which I think it should be provided for is Toryism, or protectionism, or unreasonable, as regards the general trade of the country, I must plead guilty.

That is pretty nearly as clear a pronouncement of protection as ever came from a professed free trader, even in the Opposition. I have no doubt in the world that my honourable friend was sincere when he made that statement. I ask honourable members, particularly the free trade gentlemen of the West: Where is your hope? If you had any at the beginning of this Budget address, it must have been shattered by the speech of the leader of the Opposition, for you can see from those very remarks of his that we are now all of one Lord, one faith, one baptism; we are all protectionists. But to some of the remarks of my honourable friends, the free traders from the West, I ask them if they think of the other side, or is it not true that they confined their remarks entirely to their own interests, forgetting the interests of the other different parts of this Dominion? What do they expect of us in eastern Canada when four or five or six years ago we were buying their flour at $4.50 to $5.25 a barrel, and are now paying $14 a barrel for it? Have they any complaint to make of us, or is it not we that should be complaining? When my friends who come from different districts of Ontario and Quebec where they manufacture leather goods and other articles of that description find out that the shoes I was wearing five or six years ago cost $4 or $5 a pair and that I have now to pay $11 or $12 for similar shoes, have they still any complaint? No, but they will complain if they have to pay an extra dollar on the price of coal or steel, notwitstanding the fact that we sent from Sydney harbour as far as Prince Rupert steel rails at a cheaper price than they could be bought in the Soo, after our rails had been transported by way of the Horn. And still western members complain that they are not getting fair play, although we are giving them rails, taking them all the way around the Horn, a ninety-day trip, and laying them down cheaper than they can buy rails in Ontario or the United States. It makes a great deal of difference whose ox is gored.

About the only matter I really wish to bring before the Government is that of shipping. At the outbreak of the war in 1914 we had a splendid fleet of ships plying from Sydney harbour and a few from other ports in Nova Scotia to different ports on the St. Lawrence, principally to Montreal, Three Rivers and Sorel, which would be the three largest ports.

We had ships of the Storstadt type, which you will remember collided with the Empress of Ireland in the river St. Lawrence. The Storstadt had 11,000 tons of coal on board when she collided. We had also a number of ships of a similar type. In Nova Scotia in those days we were producing over six million tons of coal, and with the exception of the domestic consumption of Nova Scotia and what we burned in our coke ovens and blast furnaces, our output of coal went largely to river St. Lawrence ports. We were able to hold our market there on account of the cheap transportation. It may surprise hon. gentlemen to know that we could ship coal from Sydney Harbour to the city of Montreal for less than 60 cents a ton. However, when the war broke out, I have no doubt that the necessities of the war made it necessary for our ships to be commandeered. We did not complain, for we knew that the necessities of Canada and of the Empire were paramount. These ships have since been under the control of the British Shipping Board. At the time they were taken over they were carrying something like four million tons up the St. Lawrence. I think the figures for 1913 or 1914 were in the neighbourhood of 4,300,000 tons. Now, when those ships were commandeered we could not ship coal to the St. Lawrence because we had no ships to transport it, and but for two things there would have been a considerable amount of unemployment in our province. The first thing that prevented it was the way in which the young men of Cape Breton enlisted. No sooner did the call come than they sprang to the sword in larger numbers, I believe, than was the case with the great majority of the counties of the Dominion. That relieved us of a great deal of unemployment. Secondly, a short time afterwards, on account of the location of our harbour, large fleets of ships came there, of from 9,000 to 20,000 tons, and were formed into convoys of thirty to forty ships and were convoyed across the ocean. These convoys left Sydney Harbour almost every week, and of course they consumed a large amount of coal for bunkering. These were the two chief factors which prevented a large amount of unemployment. We thought that as soon as the war was over the British Shipping Board would return to us all the shipping they had commandeered, but now we find—and I have made some examination of the matter—such cases as these. Seven of our coal boats which were commandeered are now on the ocean between the Old Country and Australia, either going for wheat or bringing back wheat. Now, that does not seem to me to be good shipping business while there is wheat in Canada and the United States, because you can make three trips between New York or Montreal and the Old Land to one between Australia and the Old Land.

Mr. M. CLARK: What do these ships take to Australia?

Mr. BUTTS: I really do not know, unless it is a general cargo of manufactured goods. They go from England, not from here. You will see at once, Mr. Speaker, the reason for it. Those ships were chartered in pre-war days by the Dominion Coal Company, the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, and the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company. In those pre-war days those boats, particularly the larger ones, could haul coal from Sydney to Montreal at sixty cents a ton. It is the opinion of shipping men in our province, and I think in Montreal, and I know it is the accepted opinion of people who had these boats chartered, that when they were commandeered and taken overseas, influence was at once brought to bear by the shipping interests over there to have the British Shipping Board retain these ships, because after the boats were commandeered they were chartered at war rates. To such an extent was this attempted that the owners of two of those ships went into the courts in the Old Country to have their charters set aside altogether, contending that the war had voided their charter, and that they were now at liberty to charter at any price. The courts decided against them, and one of the boats against which a decision was given is now actually in a dry-dock in England for repairs that look very suspicious, in order to finish out the remainder of her charter term, and in the meantime enter into a war-price charter.

These are a few of the matters which I think should receive the serious consideration of the Government and especially of the Minister of Finance. Before the war we had the market in the St. Lawrence that I have already spoken of. We were selling over four million tons of coal. Then our shipping was commandeered, and to-day our market is lost to us, or practically so. Every port on the St. Lawrence has been filled with American coal, and just at this very time the Minister of Finance strikes off the seven and-a-half per cent duty on coal. We are not afraid of the seven and-a-half per cent duty by any means, because we think we can sell coal in the St. Lawrence at the figures at which we have sold it in the past.

If our shipping is not restored to us something must be done to enable us to burn our own coal at home. It has always been my dream that the day would come when Nova Scotia would not ship abroad a ton of coal but that we would burn it within our own borders. That time will come, I think. It may not be in the near future but it must come. Since 1902 we have had an increase in the number of coal mines in Cape Breton county until to-day there are about thirty-one. We have erected eight large blast furnaces. We have twenty-one open hearth furnaces and several hundred coke ovens of different types. At the steel works in Sydney alone they are burning 3,200 tons of coal a day and the consumption is gradually on the increase, and with the steel business in such a prosperous shape as it has been I hope to see the day when its expansion will have reached such a stage that we can burn our own coal. In the meantime, however, we are out of a market, and there is a very considerable amount of unemployment. We sent overseas from that county over 5,000 men. At least, I am sure we sent over 4,000, and as these men pour back into one county, with the coal trade considerably impaired by the conditions I have explained, the amount of unemployment is going to be somewhat serious.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the total number of men employed altogether in these industries—coal, iron and steel—in normal times?

Mr. BUTTS: I think in Nova Scotia the Steel Company had about 2,300; the Dominion Steel Company had somewhere between 3,300 and 4,000; and there would be between 8,000 and 10,000 men engaged in the different coal mines. I am speaking roughly of course, but I think these are about the figures. We have in that county, that is North and South Cape Breton, a population of about 73,000, and compared with the mining and steel industry, most of the other industries are small.

I do not think I have very much more to say, Mr. Speaker, except this: If we are to be treated in this way, if we are to be compelled to pay such prices for western flour and such prices for Quebec and Ontario manufactured goods, and for lumber and the rest of it, it must be remembered that there was a day when there were very few persons in the Maritime Provinces who did not realize the fact and proclaim it that a maritime federation was preferable in the interests of those provinces. We have in Nova Scotia the industries that I have mentioned; we have in New Brunswick a good agricultural and lumber country; we have Prince Edward Island that has always been known as the "Garden of the Gulf," with Newfoundland at our door that could supply for years to come iron ore to the world if necessary; and besides this she has coal and copper, and a sealing industry that is one of the richest in the world. Her codfish in shiploads goes to the Brazils and the Mediterranean in competition with fish from all parts of the world. Remember, the time may come when our maritime federation, as I may call it, will feel that it is pinched rather too hard by the grain growers and manufacturers. I do not make this statement by way of threat but in order that you may appreciate the fact that there is something to be said on the other side of the question. In conclusion, I will say that if I have only succeeded in getting some at least of the hon. members in this House to concede that there are two sides to every argument I shall not consider the short time I have spent to-night wasted.

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up much time in this discussion, as I think the pros and cons have been combed over very closely, but representing as I do the large and important constituency of Prince Albert, I do not think I would be doing my duty if I did not point out some phases of the present situation in regard to the fiscal policy, as I see it. The previous speaker has proven to me what I have always believed that is, that when a tax or a tariff is put on it is a very difficult thing to get it off without protests from some interested party. This was evidenced by his objection to having the 7½ per cent tax taken off the coal. It has been stated by several members that this is not the time for a revision of the tariff. Without debating that, I would point out to these hon. gentlemen that the Minister of Finance apparently did not agree with those views, as he has to some extent scratched the surface. I have noted in some newspapers the comment that the general consumer has asked for a loaf, but has been given a stone. The honourable member for Brome was probably nearer the truth, when he said that the consumer had asked for a loaf and had been given a soda cracker. But personally I would have preferred to see it left untouched, as I do not believe that the reduction will be noticeable by the consuming public, whether that public be the working man purchasing his food and clothes, or the farmer, who, in addition to that, has also to purchase the machinery with which to produce foodstuffs. I submit, Sir, that the present occasion would have been an opportune time to deal with this matter, as the prime essential in this reconstruction period should be to encourage the greatest industry Canada possesses, an industry which is capable of absorbing more of our returned men than any other. Just here I would like to point out that there is a veritable rush of returned men from all points in the Dominion to the constituency which I represent, to secure land, so much so that the local Soldiers' Settlement Board at Prince Albert, although most efficient, has great difficulty in keeping up with the work. I stated last year, when speaking on the Budget, and I repeat again, that given proper railway facilities, including the completion of the Hudson Bay railway, and also given just consideration and encouragement in the framing of the fiscal policy, there is no portion of the Dominion of Canada which would produce more wealth, so very necessary at the present time, for the same outlay that the northern portion of Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

I wish to point out to the Government that in the West both urban and rural communities are most emphatic in their demands for a lower tariff. They have been promised tariff commissions and tariff reductions repeatedly by both the old parties until they have become, if I may use the language of the street, "fed up." We also have to contend against a most vigorous campaign conducted by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, a campaign which at times is not conducted in a fair manner. I would point out to the House, Mr. Speaker, that although the Grain Growers' Association of Saskatchewan drew the attention of the Manufacturers' Association to some misstatements of fact in their literature, no effort was made to correct them, and the following resolution was passed at a meeting of the board of directors of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association recently held in Regina:—

Whereas the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Reconstruction Association have for some time been carrying on an extensive advertising campaign, principally calculated to discredit the Grain Growers' Association by misquoting the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture and by grossly misrepresenting its policy and its purpose; and

Whereas this advertising is evidently intended to create suspicion and class antagonism between the organized farmers and organized labour by misrepresenting the demands of the former for economic reforms as being highly selfish class demands intended to destroy manufacturing industry in Canada and to relieve the farmers of their fair share of the burden of taxation and by branding the association's policy as leading to Bolshevism; and

Whereas these malicious and widely advertised misrepresentations are doubly unfortunate at this time of imperative need for a sympathetic understanding amongst all classes of citizens who are seeking the preservation of all that is best in our national institutions;

Therefore, be it resolved that this board soundly condemns these unwarranted attacks upon the grain growers and this gross misrepresentation of our platform and policy and especially does it resent the neglect of the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association to correct these mis-statements of fact in the public press after his attention was courteously drawn to them by an open letter from our secretary, and further,

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, to the offices of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Reconstruction Association and to the press.

It has been argued that Canadian manufacturers of machinery cannot successfully meet outside competition without a protective tariff, but it has recently come to my notice that one Canadian company manufacturing cream separators, which has no protection, shipped during 1918, twenty carloads of separators to California. I might also state that at the convention held in the City of Prince Albert at which I was nominated to contest the constituency, I told the assembled delegates that I had been working for a lower tariff for years, and held pronounced views in this regard, but that while the war lasted I was quite willing to lay them aside, and use my utmost endeavour to help bring about a victorious conclusion, I reserving the right to use my own judgment in matters of policy afterwards.

I have given the Union Government my best support in all matters in connection with the war, and I would do so again should occasion demand it. I wish to commend the Honourable the Prime Minister for the way in which he has handled many difficult situations; but when it comes to matters of fiscal policy, evidently his ways are not my ways. The time Mr. Speaker, has now come, for me to take a stand, and while I do not intend to cross the floor of the House, I feel it to be my bounden duty to protest as strongly as I can against what is to all intents and purposes a high protectionist Budget. It is, a Budget so far as the tariff is concerned calculated to give to him who hath, and to take away from the poor fellow who is honestly doing his best for his family and his country. I am convinced that the policy laid down in the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture would not only make the burden more equitable between the East and the West, but would also furnish a field for the providing of revenue more than sufficient to make up for anything that would be lost. Further I do not think the collecting of the income tax is being pushed forward as much as it might be. I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by quoting Goldsmith's famous and prophetic lines:

Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

Mr. RICHARD COE HENDERS (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, in attempting to address the House for a few minutes, I shall confine my remarks very largely to a statement of my position generally with regard to the tariff. Two years previous to the election by which this Government came into power, I received the nomination in the constituency of Macdonald as an independent Liberal. The time came when the struggle for liberty became so intense and absorbing that the people of Canada were constrained to turn their attention away from the ordinary course of affairs, and one supreme issue occupied the thoughts and the attention of the electorate of the Dominion—that was the winning of the war. When that time came, I felt it my duty, as a supporter of those who were prosecuting the war successfully, to place that fact in a pre-eminent position in connection with the attitude I would take in my public pronouncements and utterances. Consequently, as soon as the announcement was made that an appeal was to be made to the people on the winning of the war as the issue, I tendered my resignation to those who had been kind enough to offer me the nomination as an independent Liberal in the constituency of Macdonald. I went to the convention, as the representative from our locality, with my mind made up that whoever succeeded in securing the nomination on the win the war issue would have my entire support on that occasion. It transpired that I was selected as the representative of Macdonald. Under these circumstances, from that time until the present, the winning of the war and the cleaning up of the aftermath of the war have had the first place in my thought and in my activities. There came a time last autumn when a decision had to be reached on a very important question, touching the position I had taken and the policy I had marked out.

Our Grain Growers' convention was held in the city of Brandon, and at that convention there was a certain feeling among the members present that the time had come for action to be taken along the line of pledging the members of the Government in the province of Manitoba to a certain course with regard to the trade policy. A resolution was accordingly presented to the convention but when that was done I, as presiding officer, felt it my duty to make a statement to those present. The statement I made was that I believed the tendency of the resolution, if it were voted upon and carried, would be to divert the attention of the Government from the questions that were to my mind of paramount importance at that time, that I did not consider it would be wise to present that resolution to the convention, nor did I consider that it was an opportune time, if that resolution were presented and carried, to submit it to the members of Parliament and ask them to pledge themselves to a certain line of action. Furthermore, I said that until I had redeemed my pledge to the constituency of Macdonald, namely, to support the Government in the winning of the war, I did not feel disposed to entertain nor would I entertain for one moment, the signing of any pledge. The convention reconsidered the matter and endorsed my position, and the resolution was remodelled accordingly.

A good many of the members of this House will be able to bear me out when I say that since I became a member I have been very anxious along one particular line, namely, not to interfere with the winning of the war, and with the carrying out of all the arrangements necessary to take care of the aftermath of the war. But in connection with the taking care of these conditions, I felt that, perhaps, the time had come when the Government should declare themselves as to the fiscal policy that they intended to present to the people. Some hon. members will recollect that at the first meeting of the members of the Government party I took occasion to express myself very strongly along that line, and that I expected the Government would deal with the matter and place before the House some time during the session a clear cut policy in that regard. I was not without opinions with regard to what I considered to be a progressive and advanced, practical, commonsense fiscal policy for Canada. I might say that for years I have been an advocate of the freest possible trade relations between the different countries of the world. So long and earnestly have I entertained these opinions, that I was one of the members of the Canadian Council of Agriculture who in the early days found my way as a member of the first delegation that came to Ottawa to put the views of the West before the Government in power. The first delegation that came from the West, after we had decided on a plan to alleviate the conditions attendant upon those living out on the land in that new country, sought an amendment to the Grain Act, and also a change in our fiscal policy. This was composed of four men, of whom I was one. When the farmers' platform was prepared the Liberal Government was in power. Ten years ago, a delegation came from the West to place the platform of the farmers before that Government. I was a member of that delegation, and we sought to place before the Government what we believed to be a first-class fiscal policy for the Dominion at that time. The following year a large delegation came to Ottawa five hundred strong, and among the planks in the policy then placed before the House was our trade policy. The delegation, you will remember, presented their case, and the honorary president of the association, Mr. J. W. Scallion, was the spokesman who introduced that feature of the question before the House. In the middle of a very earnest and suggestive address he was interrupted by a member from the Government side with the question: If you put this platform into effect, how will you raise the revenue? Immediately that delegation rose to its feet and said: We will raise the revenue by direct taxation. That was the declared policy of the West at that time. They came to the conclusion that that was the fair and equitable and honourable way to raise the national revenue. They said: Tell the people of the country what you need the money for, and how much you need, and then distribute the burden equitably, and the people of Canada will get under that burden and lift it. Later on two other delegations came to Ottawa presenting the farmers' platform.

11 p.m. So that that platform has been circulated all over the country and has been prominently before the people.

I wish to say that I was at the framing of that platform and endorsed every plank in it. I endorse the planks of that platform to-night. I believe that we have in that platform the essentials to the building up of a policy that will distribute the burdens of taxation equitably and will enable us to carry on as a nation and go forward to future greatness. I have not changed my opinion with regard to these matters.

This brings me to another stage. The fiscal policy of the Government is before us. In that policy as presented there are several things with which I do not fully agree, for I think that the policy mapped out could have been improved in some directions. I believe that food stuffs should have been placed on the free list. I believe that agricultural implements should have received more consideration. I believe further that cement might very well have been placed on the free list and that cottons and woollens might have received more consideration than they did. While I believe that there is room for improvement in respect of the treatment of these items, I wish to make myself very clear with regard to one or two things that have taken place since I came down here.

I endeavoured to inform myself with regard to the position the Government intended to take on the tariff question, and after trying to get the mind of the Government on the subject as far as I could I came to the conclusion that it was the intention of the Government to consider this as a war session. In other words, I believed that the Government would take the attitude that war conditions had not yet passed away, that this was really a war Government, and that, therefore, no very great changes would be made in the tariff this year. I took exception to that position. I felt that the time had come when marked changes should be made, and when the 7½ per cent and the 5 per cent tax imposed as a war measure should be entirely removed. I felt that there should be some indication of a general reduction of the tariff, and so expressed myself.

In a measure, the 7½ per cent tariff imposed by way of war tax has received consideration along the line that I thought it should; it has been removed from agricultural implements, certain foodstuffs, and other articles in respect of which the tax bore most heavily upon the poorer classes of the people. The 5 per cent tax also received consideration. The question was asked whether it was advisable to remove the 7½ per cent tax entirely, and the position I took was that it would be more equitable to leave the 7½ per cent duty on certain lines in connection with which the poorer classes were not effected or production was not interfered with, and to make marked reductions beyond the 7½ per cent where the poorer classes were affected or the question of production which bore an important relation to the tariff came under consideration. To a certain extent that idea has prevailed in the tariff revision, and so far as that goes I give my approbation to the course pursued by the Government.

Some people say that this is a high protectionist Budget Perhaps it is. But there are greater indications of tariff reduction and tariff reform in the Budget of this year than I have seen in any Budget since I commenced to study Budgets. Had the Government taken the position that as this was a war year and it was a war Government, the duties of 7½ per cent and 5 per cent should not be interfered with at all, I believe a great many people would have supported that position. The Government gave consideration to various representations which were made in favour of a reduced tariff policy, by deciding to take a course which involves a reduction in the revenue of $17,000,000. This reduction applies where the taxation bears most heavily and affects production the most. Therefore I say that the action of the Government in that regard meets, in large measure, the view that I hold on that particular point.

In the matter of raising revenue, the Government has proceeded in large measure along the line marked out by the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. They have gone after taxes in accordance with that policy; they have taken a step in advance this year, and I commend them for their action.

Comparing the income tax in the United States with the income tax proposed in the Budget, I find that in respect of incomes from $5,000 up to $200,000 we can put on quite a margin of taxation before we measure up to the American rate of income tax. The Government would, perhaps, have been well advised if they had gone a little further in this direction. Indeed, I would have the income tax commence on a lower salary basis than the one set out in the present proposals of the Government. It is proposed that single men shall pay income tax on all income over $1,000. I contend that it would have done the single man no harm and would have caused him to take a real interest in the affairs of the country if the amount of his income exempted from taxation was no more than $700. Make the tax very light, but let the young man feel that he is a citizen of the country and that he has an interest in its affairs. As for the married men, I would have the exempted income made smaller, but I would make the tax comparatively light, because these men are not in a position to bear much of the burden. But I believe in placing the responsibility of citizenship on people as soon as it is possible to do so.

Now, what is proposed to be substituted for the Budget? While there are some features of the amendment which I could endorse very fully, I find myself in this position, that when I come to look for a source of revenue to carry on the Government, to pay the debts of the country, no provision whatever is made. No progressive policy is put before the House; we are asked to take a great big indefinite nothing and say we will vote for that and we will go out to run the country on a policy of that kind. I am forced to the conclusion that while all that I desire is not found in the present platform, there is a great deal in it that I desire, and that I am glad to find there. It is what I consider a move in the right direction, and therefore I have no hesitation in saying that I am determined and intend to support the Government in its present trade policy and I shall vote for the Budget proposals.

I have just another thought before I sit down. I have been exercised a great deal with regard to the agitation that is in the country at the present time. It seems that just now we are more interested in trying to see what little class advantage we can get and how we can shift responsibility to somebody else's shoulders. Our boys did not act like that. When the time came and there was a call to defend the country, our boys came forth from the East, the West, the North and the South, and they did not ask how much or how little the sacrifice, but they said: I am going to be there; Canada has demanded her sons, and I must be in the fray. We ought to catch the spirit of our boys and face the situation as it exists and not endeavour to see how little of the burden we can bear, but rather how much we can do to serve Canada under present circumstances. There is a splendid opportunity for us along that line. I had the privilege of addressing a meeting in Toronto not very long ago, and I made an appeal somewhat along this line and it was met with a very hearty response. I said: I believe there is a possibility of going a long way towards a settlement of the labour question if we only take hold of it in the right way. At the present time the duty of the Government is to form an organization representing the different interests of this country, the manufacturing interests, the financial interests, the labour interests, the farmers interest, and the great consuming interest, generally. There are five elements, and I believe there could be brought out of those five elements an organization or an aggregation of men who would say: We will thrash this thing out, get to a common basis, shoulder this burden and go through this difficulty harmoniously and successfully. I would just give that thought to the Government at this time. I believe it is worthy of consideration and that it could be worked out, and we could get results from it.

I do not think it ought to be a question with us how much money we can make in the next five years for our personal gain and profit. The best good and greatest happiness at present would be this, to catch the spirit of our boys who have said: I will put my life on the altar for Canada; if I come out, well and good; if not, I will give my life as a sacrifice for Canada. I believe the men and women of this country ought to take the position to-day that, even if we do not get a dollar for ourselves beyond a comfortable living, with food to eat and raiment to wear and houses to shelter us and keep us warm, we ought to give Canada everything else, if needs be, and then feel we have been doing only our duty in view of what has been done for us. I would like to see that spirit of sacrifice and service more manifest than the spirit of selfishness in our thought and action.

Mr. WILLIAM STEWART LOGGIE (Northumberland, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I have very much pleasure in saying that I heartily endorse the closing remarks of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders). His words, I am sure, stir our hearts regarding the matter he has so forcibly placed before us. This is the first time I have availed myself of the opportunity of addressing you during the life of the present Parliament, and I do not think I could do otherwise than congratulate you, Sir, and the people of Canada for the finding that they reached during the elections of 1917. I can not go on with the matter directly before the House without congratulating the country on the splendid efforts that our boys made on our behalf and on behalf of right and a righteous cause, and I am sure their work and their devotion to their country will go down in history to the credit of this young and rising nation. I do not think I would be fully performing my duty on this occasion if I did not say that my sympathy and love goes out to the relatives of the deceased soldiers whose remains lie in the fields of France and Flanders.

Having said this much, may I summarize what I see is the Budget before the House on this occasion? In a few words, as I understand it, this is the existing situation. The estimated ordinary revenue for the present fiscal year, as estimated on a basis of last year's rates and imports, will reach a total of $280,000,000. Our estimated expenditures for interest during a like period will be in round numbers, $108,000,000. Our expenditures for ordinary purposes, other than interest, will be about $162,000,000. Therefore, our ordinary expenditures will amount to $272,000,000 or $10,000,000 less than our revenues. We start out then with $10,000,000 to our credit. We revise the tariff and we lose thereby $17,000,000, so that we are behind $7,000,000. In order to make up that loss, we say to the people of Canada: We will raise it by direct taxation. We ought to bear in mind that the $17,000,000 reduction in taxation inures to the benefit of the consumers of Canada. The amount that we lose thereby in revenue is made up by direct taxation, so that the accounts balance, as it were, and leave a small amount to our credit. The remaining $350,000,000 of indebtedness is for war purposes on capital account, and it is proposed to borrow money to provide for that sum. I quite endorse that action because I believe that the raising of the ordinary revenue and the interest on our large indebtedness is all that we should ask the people of Canada to bear for some years to come.

Having summarized what the Budget is, let me say that it will give me very much pleasure to support it and the resolutions now before the House, for the following reasons. First of all, we shall have the necessary money to provide for expenditure without unduly interfering with the vested interests of the manufacturers of this country. We must realize that inasmuch as capital is invested, and as capital gives employment, it is our duty, as far as is consistent with the interests of the consumers, not to interfere unduly with the manufacturing interests of this country. I support the Budget because it gives us a reduction in taxation of $17,000,000, which inures to the benefit of the consumers of Canada, and that $17,000,000 will approximate to $30,000,000 when you add the distribution profits to it. I support the Budget also because the loss that accrues to us because of the reduction in the custo tariff is made up by direct taxation without undue hardship on the business of the country. I support the Budget for another reason. We have the promise of the Minister of Finance that next autumn he will make a scientific investigation of the whole situation as it relates to capital and production, and to the cost of manufacturing Canadian commodities as compared with the cost of foreign commodities. I think those are fairly good reasons why I should support the proposals laid before the House on this occasion.

I take this opportunity to say that I oppose the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), and I shall vote against it for this reason among others: One clause of his amendment reads in part as follows:

> That to relieve the present situation the tariff should be so framed as to free the food of the people.

If the hon. gentleman had qualified that, I might not have been able to take the stand I feel I ought to take. I oppose this provision on principle. I do not believe that all food should be put on the free list at the present juncture in Canada's history. Manufactured food should bear its just quota of customs taxation as, for example, canned fruits, canned vegetables, and so on. Let me ask the hon. member for Brome if he would go down to the city of Montreal to the proprietors of the William Clark Company, Limited, packers of meat products, and say to them: "If you cannot put up your products as cheaply as they can be put up in Chicago or Kansas City, you must close your shop." I venture to say that even the hon. member for Brome would not take that stand. I certainly would not. Therefore, I cannot consistently vote for his amendment; I shall have to vote against it.

Having said this much regarding the present situation, may I make a few suggestions as to what I consider an adequate tariff. I think the tariff should be framed along the following lines: A commodity manufactured in Canada should be placed in the hands of the consuming public at a price a little more than will give the manufacturer a reasonable return on the capital invested. For instance, if a textile is manufactured in England and placed on the English market on the basis of $1, and the like commodity is manufactured in Canada, it should be sold to the consuming public in this country on the basis of not more than $1.20. Why do I say that? For this reason: Pre-war days demonstrated to us that a textile could be manufactured in the United Kingdom at considerably less cost than it could be manufactured in Canada. There are many reasons why this can be done. First of all, the investment in machinery is not so great in the United Kingdom as in Canada, and machinery is part of the capital and ought to bear its interest. In the second place, the Canadian manufacturer caters to a population of eight million people, whereas the manufacturer in the United Kingdom caters to the world and can specialize and make a line of goods at considerably less cost than the Canadian manufacturer who is attempting to manufacture a variety of lines. This was true in pre-war days, at all events, but I noticed a statement recently that labour is pretty nearly as high now in the United Kingdom as in Canada. The conditions therefore may change in that regard, but I say that the tariff on manufactured articles should be based on facts as they exist to-day, and it should be so based that the manufacturer can get a fair return on his money, and no more.

That is to say, you should not by a tax place him or a corporation in a position to get undue prices from the consumers of the country. I would suggest, also, that all raw materials should enter Canada without duty. In order to develop our mineral resources, our iron and ore deposits, I would favour a graduated bounty rather than an indirect tax so that the consuming public would not necessarily have to pay undue indirect taxes on commodities made from iron and steel. We would not be going far afield if we paid special attention to the development of our iron and steel industry. This war has brought to our attention in a marked way the great possibilities of a self-reliant country, and my opinion is that any country that aims at real greatness must be as far as possible self-reliant. If we are able to develop our iron and steel industry we shall to that extent be more or less self-reliant, and we should have that object in view in considering the tariff.

If my suggestions were put into practice I might naturally be asked, what about the revenue? I had great pleasure in listening to the address of the Minister of Finance this afternoon and he unquestionably scored the amendment of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). If a tariff is put into effect along the lines I have suggested the revenue will be $50,000,000 less than we are getting under the present tariff. I am convinced that the ad valorem rates on many commodities under the present tariff are entirely too high. But hon. gentlemen will not forget that the general tariff we have is to all intents and purposes the Fielding tariff of 1897. It was to a small extent remodeled in 1907 and again in 1914 —remodeled, in my judgment, not too wisely. I must say that some of the items that went through in 1914 were not in the interests of the country as a whole. But the point I make is this: If we frame a tariff and reduce the cost of living and we are short $50,000,000, how are we to get the money? If you will refer to the imports in 1918 you will find that we imported into Canada about $860,000,000 worth of goods, and if we framed an adequate tariff on the basis I have indicated—and by adequate I mean in the interests of manufacturers and consumers alike—I would add a surtax of, say, 2 per cent on the $800,000,000 and would get $16,000,000 thereby. But I would still be short $34,000,000, and to raise that balance I would do this. I find by the Canada Year Book of 1918 that we manufactured in Canada $1,381,547,225 worth of products. I would put on an excise duty of 2 per cent on $1,700,000,000 of Canadian manufacturers and obtain $34,000,000, and that, together with the $16,000,000, would give me my $50,000,000. It may be argued that I am taking it off the tariff and asking the consumer to pay. That is true in a sense, but what taxation can you levy on the people, unless it be an income tax, that the consuming public does not pay? I think we should have a stable tariff and if we have a special amount to raise we can raise it by a surtax and an excise tax that could be changed from year to year.

Having said that much on the tariff I shall now refer to the high cost of living. The effect of the Budget, I said, was to reduce the tariff by $17,000,000, and that means that we reduce the per capita tax about $2 each or about $10 per family as a result of the reduction in the Budget this year. In view of the unrest in the country and the criticism that is made that the tariff is responsible for the high cost of living, it is well to consider the situation from every standpoint. I do not understand why there is so much criticism that the tariff is to blame for the present high prices. If it were true that the present tariff is to any real extent responsible for the high prices, then we should give the matter serious consideration. As a matter of fact, under the tariff that will obtain this year, we will collect only $30,000,000 more than would have been collected on the same values in 1914. And if the 7½ per cent we are collecting were applied to the values of 1914—not the quantities of goods but the values—I venture the opinion that we would not collect from the people much more than $20,000,000, which would represent $2.50 per capita, or $12.50 per family. And will any hon. member tell me that because the Government of the day is collecting $12.50 more from every family by reason of the tariff, it is fair or reasonable to say that the tariff of the day is responsible for the present high cost of living?

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the causes of the high cost of living? In my opinion they are directly traceable to the war. Early in the war, the Government, in the interests of the Allied armies, undertook to fix prices for the basic food product of the country.

They undertook to pay the farmers a very high price for their wheat, and what was the effect of that? The effect was that every other cereal, every other food product, went up in price in sympathy. Now who will say, Mr. Speaker, that the Government did not do right in the interests of the country at large? The important matter was to ensure that our soldiers were supplied with food on the field of battle. These prices still exist, and that is the cause of the high cost of living. When wheat declines, I venture to predict that every other food commodity will, in sympathy, also decline.

Then there is another basic product. Before the war, raw cotton was eleven cents per pound. To-day, it is 28 cents per pound, and textiles of all kinds that are manufactured from cotton are, of course, at fabulous prices. For Heaven's sake, the Government is surely not to blame because raw cotton is high down in the Southern United States! Then take iron and steel. We know, as a matter of fact, why these commodities advanced in price. The Government of the day were controlling steel for munition purposes, and it went up so rapidly in price that all manufactures of steel likewise advanced, and if the housewife to-day buys a stove she must pay twice the price that formerly prevailed. And yet, gentlemen will say that the Government of the day are responsible for the high cost of living. What are they going to do to reduce the high cost of living? Can the Government fix the price of cotton? Can the Government fix the price of steel in Pittsburgh? The Government may fix the price of wheat for next year by leaving it alone and letting it take the market value; I do not know but that is the starting point for getting the cost of living down to its proper standard.

Mr. Speaker, it has been well said by the Finance Minister that this is a war year. In my judgment we require the best thought and experience of the men of the Union party to guide the ship of state into safe anchorage. So far as I am concerned, I believe it was the part of wisdom to unite the men who compose that party in Canada for enforcement of a measure of coercion regarding the army. So now, in view of our present condition, I consider it would be undoing to some extent the splendid achievements we have won if we did not continue a united front along the lines indicated when the Union party was formed.

I have set out some reasons why I support the Budget and oppose the amendment. My position regarding Union Government is to-day as it was in 1917, and so far as I can see my duty, it is so to act that to-morrow shall be as to-day but much more abundant. Canada entered unanimously into the conflict. She never flinched, she suffered greatly, the manhood of Canada fought and died; and our citizens will face the future with confidence. Canada's part in the conflict will go down in history to our credit. Canada's manhood will overcome the present unrest, and not shrink in the discharge of any proper duty.

Mr. ROBERT LORNE RICHARDSON (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, after listening to this debate which has gone on for a considerable number of days, and to the many heart-searching addresses that have been made by many members of the House, who are greatly disturbed about the vote they shall give, I am sure that many of us would envy the complacency of the British politician who made the following declaration:

> I was never present at any debate I could avoid, or absent from any division I could get at. I have heard many arguments which convinced my judgment, but never one that influenced my vote. I never voted but once according to my opinion, and that was the worst vote I ever gave. I found that the only way to be quiet in Parliament was always to vote with the ministers and never to take a place.

I am quite sure that many members will appreciate the placid condition of mind of that British statesman.

In addressing myself to the subject under consideration, I find that I am under some little difficulty because we are supposed to limit ourselves to a very brief time. There is a great deal of matter that I should like to have placed before the House, but I shall be obliged to curtail it. I very much regret, therefore, that the House will not be able to listen to some remarks that I wished to make regarding the Winnipeg strike and other matters, as I feel bound to be as brief as possible.

I take the position first that this is a war Government and that the members who were elected to support the Union Government were returned on one special issue. So far as regards the constituency for which I was elected, I heard no other question discussed in the election than that of winning the war, and I have no doubt whatever that the very large majority which I secured was due to that supreme issue. I have listened very patiently and carefully to most of the addresses which have been delivered here on the Budget, and I may say that as a western man—one who has lived in Western Canada for over thirty-seven years, and has participated in the political and public life of that country during most of that time—that I have always been a low-tariff man. My aspirations have always been to have agricultural implements freed from duties, also to have foodstuffs and other necessaries of life supplied to the people at the lowest possible cost. I sat at the feet of the Liberal Gamaliels some thirty-five years ago as a boy, and learned the ideals of free trade. While I recognize that free trade is not perhaps advisable, or possible, at the present stage of our development, I have never changed my views with regard to the fiscal question in this country. Therefore, I very largely share the opinions expressed in this debate by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), and I particularly endorse those with which he closed his fine deliverance in this House in favour of closer trade relations with the United Kingdom.

I recall with great pleasure when, twenty years ago, the British preference was proposed by the Laurier Government, and I remember the enthusiasm with which it was received. The great poet of England, Rudyard Kipling, immortalized it in those verses beginning:

> A nation spoke to a nation,
> A queen sent word to a throne,
> "Daughter am I in my mother's house,
> But mistress in my own."

With the member for Red Deer, I should like to see in the very near future closer trade relations with the British people.

With most of the views expressed by the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) I am heartily in accord, as also with most of the views expressed by members from the West who were elected to support this Government but who find themselves unable to support this Budget. I want to say, on behalf of many of those members, that they occupy a very delicate and difficult position. The feeling in the West is almost unanimous, so far as the farmers are concerned, in favour of free agricultural implements and very great reductions on the tariff. In some of the constituencies represented by members who have spoken and who took issue with the tariff, nominations are being held, and it looks to me as if a new party is being organized in the West. Perhaps that may not be inexpedient; indeed, it may bring the relief which a great portion of the West has been looking forward to for many years. I think I express the views of the majority of my friends from the West when I say that an experience of thirty years with the so-called Liberal party has convinced them, as it has me, that there is nothing to hope for from that quarter, and if out of the sentiment that undoubtedly exists in the West in favour of a low tariff and free agricultural implements there should arise a virile party which will implement that feeling, I am satisfied that it will be of advantage—if not to all Canada, at least to the people of the West.

So far as my own opinion on this question is concerned, I feel that every member must do his own thinking and must make up his own mind as to what his duty is. As I said at the outset, I accepted nomination as a candidate supporting Union Government. There was only one issue during that election, and that was to support our boys at the front and win the war. I, therefore, felt, and I still feel, that so long as the war and its aftermath are before this Government, it is the duty—at least, that is my view—of those elected to support the Government to continue that support.

I was struck by the statement made from two or three quarters that the ex-Minister of Agriculture would have retained his portfolio had the tariff not been touched at all in the present session. If that be so, I cannot help thinking that he would have have rendered better service to 12 m. the West and to his country had he remained in the Government until the promised scientific tariff revision is accomplished the coming autumn. The Minister of Finance has promised a thorough inquiry to commence not later than September. It will be admitted generally that the Government have had a tremendous task to perform since they took office, and I think they are entitled to every reasonable consideration in so far as that task has not yet been completed. Although the armistice has been signed, the treaty of peace is not yet signed, and there are momentous problems facing the Government and the country, and the Minister of Finance has very properly said that he and the Government have not had time to make a complete and scientific revision of the tariff. Therefore I cannot help thinking that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Agriculture, whom I have always held in high esteem, would have better served his country, and particularly the West, had he continued his position in the Government and become a member of the tariff commission in order to be able to accomplish everything in his power to secure the relief which the West so very much desires. Perhaps he feels that he can better accomplish that purpose by withdrawing from the Government. That is a matter for his own conscience to settle, and, as he is a man of honour, I take it that his decision is the result of mature consideration and that he is satisfied that he has taken the right course. So far as I am concerned, I repeat that I have always held the hon. gentleman in high esteem. As I have already said, there are very strong reasons why many members from the West should take a stand in opposition to the proposed Budget. I am satisfied from conversation with them that it is not their desire to support the amendment, because many of them have advised me that they have no sympathy with it, and I take it that their opposition is purely against the Budget.

With regard to the policy of the Opposition, I was struck by the remark of the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Butts) that there is no difference really in the two old historic parties with regard to protection. We have had the so-called Liberal party for the last thirty or thirty-five years steadily talking free trade as they have it in Great Britain, the abolition of every vestige of protection from the tariff; but just as steadily practising protection whenever the opportunity presented itself. In support of that statement, Mr. Speaker, let me quote the words of the master of the Laurier administration. After the revision in what is known as the Fielding tariff in 1897, the then Minister of the Interior, the Hon. (now Sir) Clifford Sifton, addressed a large meeting at the town of Perth in my old home county, and declared that the Liberal party had solved the tariff issue, that, owing to the revision, it would no longer constitute an issue as between the two parties, and, he said, "If the Conservatives ever get in power again they will not change the tariff very much." That declaration was never repudiated by his leader or by anybody else in party authority so far as I know. Moreover, you have the actual practice of the party when it was in office. In some remarks which I made in the debate on the address, I dealt very fully with the position of the Laurier party on the tariff. In a speech which he recently made, the member from Brome invited the free traders or the tariff reformers on this side of the House to go up with him to Mount Delectable—he likes to quote either the Scripture or John Bunyan. He said: "If you will come up with me to Mount Delectable and gaze on the promised land of free trade, you will get renewed life." Now, as a youth, about thirty years ago, I went up to Mount Delectable with the old so-called Liberal leaders and gazed fondly at the promised land of free trade; and I put myself, under the leadership of those so-called Liberal oracles. And where do you suppose they led me? Into the promised land? Not at all; they took me back into the desert, where I wandered with them for fifteen years; and they laughed at me every time I suggested that the policy of the Liberal Party should be carried out. In fact—would you believe it, Mr. Speaker?—I was actually hounded out of the Liberal party. Because I renounced their policy? Not at all; but because I occasionally suggested, in a mild and inoffensive manner, that their policy be adhered to. After they had wandered in the wilderness for a time I think they commenced to suffer from ossification of the joints and sleeping sickness, because they never got back, so far as I could discover. True, they presented amendment after amendment on the tariff; as the member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Butts) said tonight the only free trader ever found among the Grits was some member sitting in opposition. I hope before I get through that I shall be able to prove my case to the House.

As a boy, I recall attending public meetings in Manitoba. I am sure the member for South Winnipeg (Mr .Allan) will also recall how our old friend Bob Watson used to make the rafters ring in the school houses along the road allowances about the iniquities of the tariff. Did you ever hear Bob Watson's celebrated story, Mr. Speaker? If you did not, I am going to tell it to you now. It is a little late, but honourable gentlemen will bear with me, because I have sat here six solid hours to get a chance to speak on this question and incidentally tell Bob Watson's story.

After denouncing the tariff on agricultural implements, which, he said, was bleeding the farmers until they were white in the face, Bob used to tell a story about a Manitoba farmer who died and passed—I do not know whether he went up or down; it is immaterial to the story. Anyway, he passed hence and was taken in charge by one of the guardsmen in the place that he had reached in the nether regions. He was being conducted over this vast establishment—I do not know whether it was by St. Peter or by some special person assigned to that duty—and in the course of his peregrinations they came to a lofty corridor from the ceiling of which were suspended by the hair three or four thousand male bodies dressed in homespun. "By the way," the farmer asked his guide, "who are all these people suspended by the hair from the roof of this vast super-heated corridor?" "Oh," the guide replied—(using Bob's vernacular)—"them's Manitoba farmers who voted for protection and for high duties on agricultural implements; when they came down here they were too green to burn, so we hung them up to dry." As the duties were continued practically without alteration during the fifteen years that the Hon. Bob and his friends were in office and the people of the West, farmers included, supported them. I often wonder what an immense difference there must be in the size of that corridor by now, and how many hundreds of thousands more dupes must be suspended by the hair in that super-heated spot in order that they may be dry enough to be burned when the appointed time arrives.

As a young member of this House many years ago I remember that the Tories of those days on the Opposition side were constantly introducing resolutions on the tariff—my old friend Nicholas Flood Davin used to do it—in order to put the western boys in the hole, because we were always in favour of low tariff. Amendments were offered to the Budget, and naturally, as a young man, I was exceedingly disturbed about my position and about the course I should follow. I suppose many of the young politicians who are going to vote against this Budget feel a good deal like I did then. But I have gotten over all that. I used often to have recourse to Sir Richard Cartwright for advice; but Sir Richard would say; never mind, old boy; God bless you; you are a free trader—do as you like. Then Doctor Landerkin, and Jim Sutherland and Billy Gibson, the whips, would pass around among us young Liberals and say: "Don't you mind these little motions; they are just put forward to embarrass and put you in the hole. Stand by your party; that is the only way you will ever get anywhere." Well, I stood by the party fairly well—when I look back, I think that I stood by it a hanged sight too well. But I began to see that it was not going to work, and I began to express my views on these issues. I did my level best to stand by the old '93 platform of the Liberal party under which every vestige of protection was supposed to disappear from the tariff, although the platform did not state it exactly as Sir Wilfrid Laurier did in a speech at Winnipeg, at the time when he said that the goal of the Liberal party; was free trade as they have it in England. We were to get the abolition of the appointment of members of Parliament, to office which was a great scandal among the Liberals in those days; we were to have the abolition of railway subsidies which were denounced in the company literature of the party as a bountiful source of jobbery, peculation and corruption—and what all we were not to get I have not time to tell you in the time at my disposal. But I discovered that we were not getting anything. I have a newspaper in Winnipeg, and my newspaper, had been standing by the old Liberal platform—and I thought I was on fine ground. I remember some of the leaders saying to me; "What is this you are doing, Richardson? You are not standing by the party." I used to produce the old campaign literature—you remember the pink books, Mr. Speaker—and I used to say: "Why, there it is in your own literature; surely I am on right ground." "Oh", they would say; "that is not playing politics at all; what counts is not what we said in our platform, but what we are doing now." The result was that I got into such a position that there was nothing else for it; I was hounded clean out of the party and for twenty years I remained in private life. Perhaps the country profited by that, I am not here to say although it cost the public treasury tens of thousands to defeat and keep me out of public life. Now I find myself in the position of standing by this Budget, and as a result of the predicted avalanche in favour of free agricultural implements, in the West I may probably be landed in the wilderness for another twenty years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes, but anyway, I am going to take chances on it.

Mr. BUREAU: Safe chance.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Last Sunday I was visiting my old homestead out in Lanark county, the spot where I was born. I was reclining in the heat of the day under the shade of an old apple tree, and I had a vision. Afterwards, when I came to myself, I set it down, and I had it typewritten. I am going to read it to the House, and although it will take a little while, still we are having a good time anyway and the House might just as well hear it:

Scene in the office of the General Manager of the Massey Harris Co. on a sultry afternoon in the summer of 1922.

Manager seated in mahogany chair smoking and looking a bit worried as a general election is on and the Opposition for the sixth consecutive time is talking free agricultural implements.

Knock.

Enter a bulky figure with broad, beaming face and glad hand. "I am Andrew R. McMaster, member for Brome."

"Have a chair."

McMaster. "As you know I was the financial critic of the Government in the late Parliament and (with a knowing and self-complacent wink) the prospective Finance Minister in the new Government."

Manager. "Better have a couple of chairs."

McMaster. "I came to see you at the request of our party. Some of our friends tell me that you are misled about our tariff position, especially on agricultural implements, and I decided that it was well to have a talk with you."

Manager. "Frankly I was not very seriously alarmed because I have followed political events pretty closely for 25 years, but with those western radical Liberals pawing the turf, and ready to vote against any combination in support of their principles, one can never tell what might happen.

McMaster. "Yes, I admit that the western bronchos are a bit dangerous, but our party is well seasoned, it has a record and is duly impressed with a sense of responsibility and stability."

Manager. "How about that old resolution of yours in favour of free machinery, etc.?"

McMaster. "Did you read the same carefully and study its construction? If you did you would commend its beautiful indefiniteness. Firstly, it was perfectly safe to describe the Budget as unsatisfactory, as it is designed for 8,000,000 people, most of whom think differently. Secondly, it is always safe to charge extravagance. Everybody is guilty of that. Then I think that was a perfectly heroic touch in the third place to ring in and denounce the High Cost of Living. Such a master stroke could not help but appeal to the masses. Of course you and I know it was bunk, but in politics one must not be overly scrupulous. Fourthly, while it was a platitude, there is always a mass of brainless creatures, who might be caught with an innocuous declaration about the absence from the Budget of a definite promise of downward revision. To be sure I purposely overlooked the promise of investigation and complete revision a little later in addition to the very considerable reduction accorded. Fifthly, I trust you read clauses two and three together—

I do not believe the members of the House have read clauses two and three together. It is well worth their while to get them and compare them because they are unique when you read them together. I have tried to give a little analysis here, and in addition to this analysis, I would prefer that members read the clauses for themselves.

I trust you read clauses two and three together and noted carefully that prime touch about free food, and free machinery used in the development of all the natural resources of Canada (which resources include, of course, mining, timber, oil, fishing, etc., as well as agriculture), and the succeeding clause calling for the removal as speedily as may be expedient and just to all interested, of the duties on "all other necessaries of life,"—

I think the members had better let that soak in.

—all other necessaries of life being of course, auxiliary to such necessaries of life as diamond drills, augers, gimlets etc. Can't you detect the joker? It was to laugh. Not a single member of the House exposed the artful dodge at the time. It is true the clause about removing the duties when found expedient and just to all was subjected to a hostile barrage but we escaped in the country pretty well.

I think that is the most unique thing I have ever seen in any amendment ever put before this House—that when it is found 'expedient' and 'just to all', those duties will be removed. That really deserves applause. The eloquent hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), I think, called attention to it, or some other hon. member did. We might pause and think over it for a moment, because an amendment that says that the duties will be removed when it is 'expedient' and 'just to all' is the most beautiful thing I have ever seen presented to any Parliament or to any one.

You see my dear Mr. Manager, if duties are not removed until a Canadian political party finds it expedient and just to all interested, the tariff wall could easily be continued for as long a period as the historic Chinese wall has braved the elements without crumbling. Kindly join me in an explosion of laughter.

Manager. "But so far as resolutions are concerned at least your party has a disturbing record on the agricultural implement duty, whilst the other historic party seems to me more safe and reliable from our point of view."

McMaster. "Jehosaphat! Apart from resolutions have you examined the parliamentary record since the celebrated Liberal platform of 1893 calling for the obliteration of every vestige of protection from the tariff together with free agricultural implements, was promulgated? I have, and the examination almost produced a fit of apoplexy. In 1894, the Conservative Government reduced the agricultural implement duty from 35 to 20 per cent. Notwithstanding this, our leaders continued to denounce the tariff and promise free implements if returned to power. Clifford Sifton, the western Laurier leader in the campaign of 1896, which brought our party into power, ranted over the West telling the farmer that your company sold in Glasgow, Scotland, for $70 the self-binding harvesters for which they charged the Manitoba farmer $165.

Mark the figures.

He told them they were being bled until they were white in the face, and that if they only understood it they would not stand it. Then when the Laurier Government was formed, Sifton, who was an undistinguished country lawyer, became a member. There immediately sprang up between him and your predecessor, Sir Melvin Jones, a close personal friendship and Sir Melvin who, strange as it may appear, was also one of the leaders of the then comic opera Liberal aggregation, showed Sir Clifford that he was all wrong about agricultural implements and, although you may not know it, the proposal was seriously put forward among members of the party to increase instead of wipe out the tariff as promised. It was set forth that the tariff was already too low and that to increase it would mean ruin to the industry in Canada.

Now mark.

The matter was finally compromised by reducing the duty to 17½ per cent when the revision was made, but an arbitrary valuation was placed on the implements which made them cost the farmer more than under the conservative duty of 20 per cent. It is said of Sir Clifford that he was after money and office and he got both. I wonder if to-day he is satisfied.

I want to emphasize this point about the reduction of the tariff. They reduced it to 17½ per cent, but the valuation of the binders at that time for dutiable purposes was placed at $80, and the so-called Liberal party then increased the valuation, putting an arbitrary valuation of $100, and when the farmer paid the duty, he paid one dollar more than he had paid under the duty which was in force under the Conservative regime.

Mr. EDWARDS: $1.50.

Mr. RICHARDSON: $1.50. The hon. member for Frontenac corrects me and he has the figures. Wasn't that wiping out the duty on agricultural implements with a vengeance? Let us continue:

Manager. "You surprise me but go on, I am deeply interested."

McMaster. "The next move that put our beloved party in the hole was in 1907 when the Conservatives moved in parliament to reduce the duty on agricultural implements to 10%. I hate to confess this but our party opposed it to a man, and what is worse Mr. Fielding, the Finance Minister (a fine man too) told parliament that 17½ per cent was a low revenue duty and that to lower it might drive the agricultural manufacturers out of the country, thereby involving ruin to the industry. Since then, as you know, the Union Government cut the implement duty to a point which makes the average a trifle over 12½ per cent. I regret that others of our leaders, including the Beloved Chieftain, talked along similar lines to Mr. Fielding. I tell you (with a sigh) our party is pretty badly compromised on the issue. So you see that on this question 'Grit Codlin's your friend and not Tory Short'."

Manager. "But your party at least poses as the historic abolish,-every-vestige-of-protection-from-the-tariff party."

McMaster. (Smiling even more broadly than normally) "I trust there is no covert sarcasm intented in that word 'poses'."

Manager. "No offence, my dear sir, no offence —A cigar? No, well that I had in mind was that your leaders usually talk free trade."

McMaster. (Aside) "That's a sore touch. Would to God they always did. I say would to God they did, but such is not so. I have already quoted Sir Clifford who once publicly declared at Perth that the tariff had been permanently solved by the Liberals and removed from the list of Canadian political issues. You see for yourself that Mr. Fielding is no out and out free trader. Every now and again some old liberal spills the beans. Even the Grand Old Chieftain looped the loop on us occasionally, and you surely remember the words of our beloved D. D. who, as our leader, declared in Parliamert 'that while not a very high protectionist he could not help but know that protection had done much for the country'. Selah! And there you are. No, no, I am afraid that inasmuch as the Liberals when in office from 1896 till 1911 only cut the tariff 71/100 of one per cent that we must confess that no matter what our professions may be, our practices demonstrate that you have less to fear from us than you would have from the other party. I always squirm when I hear the word hypocrisy used, but being logical I never challenge anyone who uses it to mortal combat. Don't you think therefore, in view of the record, that you can safely trust us and turn in with our organization to beat the other fellow?"

Manager. "Ins and Outs again? The same old game?"

McMaster. "Forbear, forbear. Frankly our boys are hungry and it is their turn now."

Manager. "Well, you have made out a fine case and if nothing can be done to appease the western Rads we'll see what we can do. Adieu and good luck to you."

Mr. MOLLOY: May I ask a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON: You have already had your little say. I do not propose to be interrupted.

Mr. MOLLOY: You are afraid.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I shall sit down. Ask all the questions you like.

Mr. MOLLOY: Why did you support the Laurier party and myself in 1911?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Because the Laurier party was in favour of reciprocity, and there is nothing I am more proud of than having supported the Laurier administration on that occasion. I did not believe at the time that it deserved to be returned to power on its record, but as a believer in free trade I was delighted to accept reciprocity or anything which in my judgment would make for the benefit of the country.

Mr. MOLLOY: Why did you run as Liberal candidate in 1912, supporting the Laurier Government?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. RICHARDSON: It is all right, Mr. Speaker. I am perfectly willing to answer his question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was going to ask the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy) to submit his questions to the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The plain unvarnished answer is that I did not run as a Laurier candidate in the year he speaks of, nor ever after his betrayal of the country on the tariff. I ran as an Independent candidate. If you are fooled once it may be the other person's fault, but if you are fooled a second time, it is your own fault. You can bet your last farthing I am not going to be fooled again.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman will please address the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Well, you might tell him from me, Mr. Speaker, for me, that he can bet all he has got that they will never fool me on any of these camouflaged resolutions. Let me say that I do not think the Liberal party, or the men who support the Liberal party, are a bad lot at all. What I am trying to establish is that there is no Free Trade party in this country at all. The hon. member for Cape Breton was perfectly right, the protectionists are among hon. members on both sides of the House, no matter what their political professions may be, and that brings me to a point I made a note of. My good friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) said this afternoon that just as oil and water will not mix, you cannot mix free traders and protectionists and so he concluded the Union Government and party could not succeed. My hon. friend means well, but he has utterly failed to grasp the political situation in this country. There is really no difference between the people who support both parties in this country. It is just like the Methodists and the Presbyterians; nothing really divides them; they believe in the same essentials. We have a Union Government here, and I feel just as much at home on this side as I have ever felt anywhere else. The difference between the Liberal and the Tory parties is that hon. gentleman over there talk free trade and low tariff, but practise protection, while the old Tory talks protection and practises protection, and if I had to award the palm I would almost give it to the Tory party, because the other people adds hypocrisy to their other sins. In saying this let me not be misunderstood. I am not seeking to reflect upon the supporters of one party more than another. The leader of the Opposition knows I am speaking the gospel truth. How this gold brick business can be continued up to the present time is one of the marvels of the age; I thought it was worked to a finish thirty years ago. Just think of going around with gold bricks in the year 1919, on the 18th of June, with the thermometer registering almost a hundred degrees in the shade. Why the thing is a joke, and I want to say to the leader of the Opposition and hon. gentlemen opposite that the sooner they abandon their dishonest position on the tariff the better for their party and for all concerned. Most of them perhaps think that they believe in free trade, but they do nothing of the kind, because they always practise protection. It is perfectly easy to move resolutions; that is a handy thing to do, but the question is, what do you vote for and where do you stand. So far as the Opposition is concerned on this trade question it has become a joke, and I fancy the people throughout the country are laughing hilariously over it all. I want to say that to some extent if we were not up against the situation we are at the present time, I would throw in my lot with the free trade party in the West. In fact I may find it desirable to do so later on.

Mr. MOLLOY: If you get a chance.

Mr. RICHARDSON: How delighted my hon. friend seems. I did not say with the Grits, but with the free trade party. He misunderstands the whole thing.

Mr. MOLLOY: Any old party for you.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I respect most of these western men who announce their inability to support the Budget. I have talked with many of them quite freely, and I know that they recognize that this Government has carried immense burdens during the last two or thre years and has wrestled with many difficult problems. I have no doubt they intend to continue as supporters of this Government, but they realize that on this tariff question, which is such a live issue in the West, if they did not take the position which they are taking, this Parliament and this country might have to deal with men who will be much less reasonable later on. I am not sure but that the Canadian people may yet have great cause to rejoice in the fact that an organization may come out of the West which will help solve many of these trade questions, bring relief to that western country and, in a measure, to Eastern Canada as well, and constitute a genuine low tariff party as distinguished from the old Laurier party.

One of the griefs which I have over this issue is the fear of a permanent division between the East and the West. The West has a great future. It is a great and productive territory but it has laboured under many handicaps. However, it is indissolubly united with the rest of Canada and a solution ought to be found to appease the West and bring harmony between it and the east. In my judgment the tariff should not be in politics. It should not be a political question at all but should be settled by a board of experts, a board of economy men, the best masters of economics that we could find. Let us invite men even from other lands if necessary to study the question and help us solve the tariff issue in this country. It seems a pity that the West should be divided from the East. It has always appeared to me most unfortunate that the people of this country should be divided into hostile political camps over the tariff. The division is not real for the reason that the question is not thoroughly understood, and we should have competent experts to consider the tariff question with a view, if possible, of removing it from politics.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I would like to know if the hon. member is in favour of free trade in fruit.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Absolutely. If there is one thing in the West that we need it is free fruit. In the old days, let me tell my hon. friend, the farmers used to trade a whole bushel of wheat for a dozen bananas. I have a brief here on the question that I had intended to bring before the House to-night but I cannot afford the time, before the division? I had to make up my mind to sacrifice this point, but I am delighted that the hon. member has asked me the question because it gives me an opportunity—

I have still another point to deal with on the tariff. I would not say anything to offend the sensibilities of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, because I have learned to like his personality. But in addressing some remarks to the House on this question I desire to buttress my arguments as far as possible, and I may be allowed to read a letter which I recently clipped from the Ottawa Citizen. It reads:

> Things seem to be going from bad to worse in Canadian Parliamentary conditions when the leader of the Liberal Opposition declares—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not in order for the hon. gentleman to read anything from a newspaper or a letter commenting on or dealing with anything said by a member of the House.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON: May I give the purport of it? I would put it this way—

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the hon. member reading the letter in question if it will be any consolation to him.

Mr. SPEAKER: It matters not whether the hon. member objects or not. I wish to see the rule obyed.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON: The rules of this House are far greater than either the leader of the Opposition or myself and I am perfectly willing to abide by your ruling, Sir. But I had the idea that that was one of the things that one could do. I recall Senator Edwards many years ago when he used to sit next to Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the House, and I remember how he used to talk and gesticulate until I was afraid he would drop dead from apoplexy. He was always denouncing the tariff. I do not think you were there at the time, Mr. Speaker. He was always denouncing the tariff in the bitterest manner, but he always voted with his party. You can always do all the denouncing you like as long as you vote right, and Senator Edwards, in the letter addressed to the Citizen, complained that the Liberal party was going to the eternal "bow-wows" because the leader had pronounced himself a protectionist. The senator concludes the letter by saying that if he were a young man and not suffering from an infirmity he would be delighted to come back into the House of Commons to fight the tariff issue. The Right Hon. the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) will remember all about it, because he was present in the House. We had Senator Edwards as a member of the House in 1896, and I am sure he did not denounce or oppose the protection Government of the day. It is all very well to talk and move resolutions, but as the Scotchman says: It is not what ye shall be saying or what ye shall be thinking but what ye shall be doing. The question is: How did you vote? I do not recall that Senator Edwards ever voted against the Government or against protection. If he wished to distinguish himself he could probably assist in having the duty removed from cement because I understand he is very deeply interested in this cement combine.

With regard to the tariff investigation, the Government promises thorough investigation and analysis of the fiscal question. I take it that the members of the Cabinet are quite sincere in this promise. I would however remind the Government that we have had many experiences in fiscal investigations which have been fizzles or mockeries. Every man in this House and every thinking man in the country realizes the powerful influences which would be brought to bear, and which are perhaps even now at work, to prevent anything like a really scientific and reformed fiscal system being established. Whilst free trade is the ideal and scientific fiscal or economic system, it would seem to me futile for any class of thoughtful Canadians, in view of the world conditions as they exist at this moment, and in view of our limited population, to insist upon the immediate introduction of that policy. Indeed, many thoughtful Canadians who are strong free traders in principle even feel that any ultra-radical changes in the present fiscal system, under the remarkable conditions which exist, might be fraught with grave danger. The fact that a protection system has been in operation in Canada for forty years, that under it a large industrial population has been created, makes it, in the eyes of such old free traders as I have in mind, extremely dangerous to propose any sudden or ill-considered radical change, even if our fiscal policy is not fundamentally sound, as most people will generally admit. But whilst a tariff may for fiscal and general economic reasons be necessary in Canada at present, it is still more necessary that the tariff should not be used, as it has been in the past, for the purpose of making fortunes for the owners of manufacturing plants, or, still worse, for cheap financial grafters who know just enough to be able to capitalize tariff advantages and realize on them through the issue of watered stock. The use or abuse of the tariff in this way is the main reason for such hostility to the policy of protection as it exists on this continent. But there is no intrinsic reason, if a government or parliament is honest, why a tariff policy cannot be operated without its opportunities being diverted to the benefit of the selfish or the crooked. Canada has surely progressed enough in economic intelligence to make a continuation of the "hogs and the chestnuts" era no longer possible. After living nearly 40 years in the Northwest I know what Protection, especially Protection on agricultural implements, has done to the western farmer. I vividly recall the hardship that was for many years involved in the notes which the farmers, by the thousands, gave on agricultural implements; these notes generally bore 12 per cent interest per annum after maturity. Usually these notes included a lien not only on the implement purchased but actually on the farmer's homestead. I recall the fact that farmers paid $165 for implements which cost the manufacturer, loaded on the car outside his factory, not more than $42. I believe that to a very considerable extent much similar conditions still exist. I regret to confess that so far as the agricultural implement industry is concerned I fear the tariff makes very little difference as the business is largely in the hands of an international interlocking combine or monopoly which exploits the farmers of both the United States and Canada. Other measures must be adopted to enable the western farmers to get their machines at a reasonable advance on their cost. Canada, however, is not exclusively composed of farmers. It has now enormous debt obligations like every other country, and the larger the population the less each individual will have to pay. Besides, a civic population, if it does not cost too much, is of great advantage to the farmer. Now, in Canada at the present time, a large civic population engaged in what are termed manufacturing industries might under present conditions find it difficult to exist without a certain amount of tariff protection. Recent experiences in Winnipeg, where I am very especially interested, prove that the people who live on other than farming industries find the condidtions of life not so easy.

I am admittedly opposed to Bolshevism or anarchy, not because I believe the Bolshevists or Anarchists are necessarily all crooks or vicious malignants, but because I believe that the improvement of the defective and deplorable conditions of many of the working classes cannot be improved by convulsive or hysterical paroxysms, but only by the intelligent and deliberate efforts of these classes themselves.

I hear a great deal in Eastern Canada of the great prosperity of the western farmer. Do these people know anything of the record or history in the West? Do they know that hundreds of farmers in the West have had their whole property sold out for balances that they owed on self-binding harvesters after they had actually paid on these machines double their cost of manufacture. Is this incredible? Let the Massey-Harris Company say so and I shall produce the evidence in several cases in support of my assertion.

I was born and reared on an Ontario farm. I thought I knew something of hardship, but when I went through the West and travelled and lived amongst the pioneer farmers there, as I did between thirty and forty years ago, I thank the kindly Providence that destined me to be even a newspaper man, which I fancy is the next hardest career to that of a western pioneer of thirty or forty years ago.

The journalistic sycophants of the profiteering interests are telling us how rich and how arrogant the western farmer is getting with his wheat at $2.25 per bushel. They do not tell us, however, that many of these farmers, because of drought and other natural conditions, often do not raise a bushel of wheat. Nor do they dwell upon the fact that although the debts and obligations of the western farmer are never extinguished except by payment, the climatic conditions of which he is the helpless creature are so variable and uncertain that he cannot in any year be assured that he is going to raise enough to live on. Is it not the turn of the western farmer? I have seen Manitoba No. 1 Hard wheat (a grade superior to any that can be produced to-day) sold by farmers of Deloraine, Man., for 42 cents per bushel and some of these farmers had teamed that wheat from the Antler country, twenty-five miles west. The member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy) the other day spoke of wheat being sold at Emerson for 39 cents a bushel in those days. You say that is ancient history. It is not ancient history. Many of the farmers to-day are the sons of those whom the struggle has killed, and are paying interest on the mortgage loans which their fathers were obliged to raise to meet the deficits which pioneer farming in the West made inevitable.

You eastern people have the idea that you made the West. This idea is a paradox. The West has made you or will make you if there is any making to you. The country with the resources is north and west of lake Superior. The people of the West know that, and they regard not only with resentment but with ridicule the idea that the people of Western Canada are a sort of tenants of the East because Canada undertook to pay the Hudson's Bay Company $1,500,000 for something the Hudson's Bay Company did not own. The West itself is, I believe, as a whole a British country to the heart. In fact I think the West is more a British than a Canadian country. The people of the West were utterly at a loss to understand the apparent reluctance of the people of old Quebec province to rush to the succor of their great and gallant Motherland. The defence of Verdun by the French I regard as one of the epochal affairs in heroic history. Why did French Canada only to a limited extent respond to the call for help from the Motherland? It is not necessary to formulate the answer. Our French Canadian citizens are a most valuable factor in our community. They have an impression that we English-speaking people are a coarse, uncouth, arrogant and bullying people. This impression is due largely to their politicians, but undoubtedly to some extent to their experience of contact with the more uninstructed elements of the English-speaking people whom they meet.

It is impossible to discuss the tariff question without reference to the business of stock watering finance, for there is a very widespread belief in the West that the interests at the back of stock watering finance are those who influence the maintainance of the tariff. I must admit that this western idea is largely shared by myself. If I support the Budget on this occasion I wish it to be distinctly understood that if I am here when another Budget is presented it shall have to be one in which the minister shall show that he has taxed all profits to their reasonable limit and that he has taken the means and has provided the machinery by which the profits of every concern in Canada shall be accurately and definitely ascertained. While under present conditions I could not demand an elimination of all tariff taxation I must assert the right of the people to know exactly where the proceeds of that taxation go.

I want, before I sit down, to say one word in reply to a statement made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) in a speech which he recently delivered. I did not happen to be present on that occasion, but I am told he denounced public ownership in unmeasured terms, and he instanced the experience in the United States, and I understand also in Great Britain, as indicating the failure of public ownership in these two countries. Let me say that I saw an extract the other day from a White Paper recently issued by the British Government in which the statement was made that the United Kingdom had netted $85,000,000 profit out of the operation of the railways there during the war. That is all I propose to say on that point.

One word with regard to the Civil Service. I spoke briefly on the Civil Service when I addressed the House during the debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I believe that one thing the Government should do is to deal radically with the Civil Service. I believe the Civil Service costs this country almost double what it should cost, and that if it were properly handled reduced and co-ordinated all the deadwood cut out, we would have a much more efficient staff of public servants and the cost to the country would not be much more tham half of what it is at the present time.

Just a word further with regard to the high cost of living. A week ago I visited Winnipeg and spent ten days there studying strike conditions and looking after my own business which was seriously threatened by that strike. I found almost universal discord and unanimous, if not indignation, at least condemnation of the high cost of living and criticism of the Government in connection therewith and I have tried since I came East to impress the Ministers with the view that great unrest exists among the people with regard to the high cost of living. Rightly or wrongly they blame the Government for it—to be accurate I found that feeling almost unanimous. Of course there is this point to be remembered—that the people are so uneasy and so filled with unrest that they blame all governments; they seem to be down on municipal, provincial, and federal governments, in fact they seem to be chafing under authority. I do not think that I succeeded in convincing the Government that the dissatisfaction was as general as it really is. I am not sure that the Government can control prices, although I notice that in New Zealand the Government have established meat shops and do control to some extent. The price of meat and the price of butter in New Zealand have been kept lower than the price for export, and the producers for export were made to contribute to an equalization fund to remunerate the purchasers of these commodities for home consumption. I pointed out to the Government that if it were not practicable to control prices they might make an effort to limit the profits. I think by coöperation with boards of trade, and with other bodies in the various cities and towns, that a reasonable profit might be set on the necessaries of life, say on twenty or thirty articles of necessity.

That a reasonable profit might be set on the necessaries of life, say on twenty or thirty articles, and that the Criminal Code might be amended so as to punish all who charged profits beyond the scale set by the board. In that way I believe profits might be controlled. Any way, I have this proposition to make: that the Government is under the necessity of attempting to control prices or of demonstrating to the people that such control cannot be effected. The unrest is so strong and so universal that I believe it is absolutely necessary in the interest of the country that it should be allayed as soon as possible. No wonder the wage earner is uneasy when he sees the prices of bacon at 75 cents a pound and profits in certain lines of manufacture ranging from 10 to 72 per cent. Unrest is bound to continue while this state of affairs continue.

I should very much like to have said a word with regard to the Winnipeg strike. I would not think of discussing the strike issue, because it has been overshadowed in the minds of the people by the idea that an effort has been made to subvert constituted authority. The people of Winnipeg, I find, have held that view almost unanimously, with the exception of the strikers themselves and their sympathizers. The people of Winnipeg deserve great credit for the manner in which they have taken hold of certain utilities; they have staffed the telephone and postal services and have been doing the scavenging, and three or four thousand have joined the militia in barracks and done all sorts of menial work, and I say all honour to them. I do not propose to pronounce any judgment as to the merits of the strike. The matter has reached such a grave position at the present time that it is my judgment that they who discuss it without considering its gravity are liable to rock the boat, and I do not wish to do that. The people of Winnipeg of course are greatly exercised over the strike, and it is to be hoped that the question will be finally and satisfactorily solved.

Before I sit down I want to say that I look very seriously on this question of voting against the Union-War-Government on this issue. The Budget is really the vital issue on which a Government exists. If I vote against the Government it means that I want to turn the Government out. That is the meaning of my vote. There is no escape from that position. Even though a small number vote against the Government, their declaration is that the Government should be defeated. In all solemnity I am not prepared to face that issue. In view of the policy on which we were elected and in view of the vast majorities, hundreds of thousands, which were rolled up in the West for the Unionist candidates, manifestly the idea of the people was to win the war, and the Government is still engaged in that great task. So, after considering this question carefully, I cannot bring myself by my vote to say that the Government ought to be turned out of office. It would seem to me rather to be my duty to tender to this House the resignation of my seat than vote against the Government on this issue.

In view of all considerations, I am utterly at a loss to see what other course I can conscientiously follow than support the Budget, even though, like many of my friends from the West, I should like to see certain changes made. The question is not my personal political fortunes which, possibly, are nil; but my duty as a citizen and as a member of the Parliament of Canada at this very critical time. I shall therefore, Mr. Speaker, vote in favour of the Budget.

[Mr. Richardson.]

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, I sympathize very heartily and very warmly with the desire of the members of the House who wish this debate to be brought to a very early conclusion, and with that object in view I shall try to respond to that very proper desire. Many things that one might wish to say under other circumstances may well be omitted. At an early stage of the session I had an opportunity of participating in a debate in the course of which tariff questions were much discussed. At that time I gave expression in general terms to my views on this tariff question, and inasmuch as the resolution in amendment moved by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is largely, though not exactly, in harmony with the views which I then expressed, I shall vote for the amendment of the hon. gentleman.

There are one or two general questions to which I should like to make reference before coming to what seems to be the main question of the tariff. From one aspect I am sure that the House generally will sympathize with the Minister of Finance in the duty he had to discharge in bringing forward the Budget at the present session. He had indeed a large responsibility and great difficulty, and the best that any Minister of Finance could do under the circumstances would surely fail to satisfy all interests. That I fully realize.

The fiscal situation generally, as disclosed by the address of the hon. gentleman, is a very grave and serious one. Possibly from some viewpoints it might be considered an alarming one, though if we have regard to the events of recent months and years, perhaps we could expect no better situation than that which he discloses. Our Budget is running into such enormous figures that I am afraid many of our people absolutely fail to appreciate their meaning. The ordinary man in the street does not quite comprehend, unless the matter is pressed upon his attention, what it means when we say that we have at this moment a net debt—not a gross debt, but the gross debt less assets which are claimed to be good—a net debt of something over $1,500,000,000, and that when this fiscal year upon which we have entered closes, it is the expectation of the Minister of Finance that our net debt will be close upon $2,000,000,000. These are vast figures—figures, which as I said a moment ago, the ordinary man has some difficulty in comprehending.

If time permitted I would like to make some comparisons to help each of us to understand just exactly what that means. It is only by comparison sometimes that we can understand things. In my boyhood days I remember the Great Eastern, that famous steamship, coming into Halifax harbour. We all knew from our information concerning her that she was a great ship, but we did not realize how big she was until some of the small harbour vessels passed alongside of her. Comparisons and contrasts are thus very helpful, and, as I say, if time permitted, and we could make some comparisons between the figures of our past finance and the figures we shall have to face now and in the early future, they would be very helpful.

For example, on March 31, 1914, our net debt was $335,000,000. That had been the accumulation of forty-seven years of the history of the Dominion. During these years great public works had been entered upon, vast railway systems had been constructed, the canal system had been extended, and public works of all sorts had been constructed, and the net result of it all was that in the year 1914 our net debt stood at $335,000,000. That was thought then to be an enormous sum.

When the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway was undertaken, many thoughtful people doubted the wisdom of the assumption by the country of the burdens that were proposed, deeming them rather heavier than the country could bear. In more recent years, when the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific was undertaken, many thoughtful men were of the opinion that the burden which was to be assumed at that time was more than the country could bear. Well then, if there was doubt of the ability of Canada to bear the burden necessary for the construction of the Canadian Pacific; if there was doubt as to our ability to stand the burden of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and if in 47 years of our history we rolled up what was thought to be the great debt of $335,000,000, what must be our thought now when we reflect, as we shall at the end of this current year, that in the last four, or as it will then be, five years, which may be called five war years, that net debt of $335,000,000 has been multiplied by six? That is to say, in five years we have added five times as much to the net debt of Canada as was created during the whole of the 47 years of our previous history.

It is by comparisons of this sort that we come to realize the magnitude of the burden which we are called upon to bear. We must all bear it cheerfully; it was assumed for what the whole country deems was a great cause. Although we contend that in this particular item or that particular item, there was extravagance and wastefulness, still, the net result is that this burden has to be borne.

The interest charge on our national debt will in itself amount to more than $100,000,000; that thought is enough to make us reflect on the whole subject. In the year 1914 our total expenditure chargeable to Consolidated Revenue Fund was $127,000,000; now we shall have to bear an interest charge of almost that amount, or over $100,000,000. Pensions will add largely to the burden. All these things go to show that there is great need of economy. And how is economy to be practised? Not with the matter of interest; that must be paid. Not with the matter of pensions; no man will want to economize in that, because it is a debt of honour which we are all proud to pay. So that if there is to be economy, it must be in connection with the administration of the ordinary affairs of Government, such as we had to deal with before the war.

Now, the Estimates for the current year do not indicate such economy as many would desire, and there has been much criticism, even from warm friends of the Government, of the proposed expenditure. I think however, that some allowance should be made for the Government in this respect. The minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Carvell) stated very frankly that he was making some appropriations for what he thought would be useful services, but keeping in mind the danger and the risk of unemployment. I think there is something in that, as applied to the current year. I look upon the coming winter as a time of considerable anxiety. When we are passing through the summer season, conditions are not so bad as they are apt to be when the severity of winter comes on. Our returned soldiers have all been given a very liberal, though not too liberal, grant on demobilization. They have some money in pocket, and they can all face the situation now, but by the time winter comes many will have disposed of that money and if there is unemployment at that time the situation will be a very grave one indeed. I make some allowance, therefore, for the Government this year, in that they are trying to guard against such a condition by making appropriations which under other conditions they might hesitate to make. But subject to that, in the preparation of future Budgets, whoever may have to prepare them, there ought to be a very firm determination to apply the pruning knife to our ordinary expenditure.

I think that the Civil Service is one which admits of much pruning. I do not mean as to individual salaries; on the contrary, I subscribe very heartily to the principle laid down by some honourable gentleman the other day that it would be a sound policy if we had fewer officials and paid them better. But there has been a very great increase in the personnel of the public service in recent years. Most of it, I am ready to believe—perhaps all of it—was necesssary; but under the new conditions that arise it ought to be possible to send a large number of these new officials who have been brought into the Service back into ordinary lines of civil life; and in that respect there should be a very considerable improvement. A committee of this House is dealing with the matter at the present time and I have no doubt that they will give it their very best attention.

There is one portion of the Service in connection with which I am not going to recommend economy. I am going to suggest something that the Minister of Finance himself cannot very well suggest. I have said before that the poorest paid officials in the service of the Canadian people are the Ministers of the Crown. There has been no change in the salaries of Ministers of the Crown for about thirty years, and I do not believe you could find any other class of people, either in official or in private life, whose income has not been increased during that period. I understand the difficulty. The ministers are in a position of great delicacy; they hesitate to make proposals to increase their own stipends. But under our constitution, if they do not do it nobody else can. I do not advocate an increase in the number of cabinet ministers; I would rather diminish the number; at all events, I suggest that it be not increased—but if the ministers will take the responsibility of making a recommendation to the end that Parliament may give due recognition to the services which they are called upon to perform, I for one will give it my hearty support, and I hope that the House will be prepared to do the same.

Another branch of our public affairs was referred to very briefly by the Minister of Finance and discussed more fully by the member for Nicolet (Mr. Trahan)—that of our currency. Before the war we had a very sound system of currency upon a gold basis. That does not mean that for every note we issued we had a dollar in gold; that was not necessary. A large number of notes issued by the Dominion do not need immediate gold protection because they are not likely to be presented for redemption. The banks are required to hold a very considerable portion of their cash reserves in Dominion notes; these notes cannot be presented for redemption. The banks, for their ordinary business, require a considerable volume of notes; these are not likely to come in for redemption. The merchant in his office, the retailer in his store, the private individual in his pocket, all need some Dominion notes for the ordinary every-day affairs of life; these notes are not likely to come in for redemption. To a considerable extent, therefore, there is a note issue which does not call for large protection. What that sum is is not determined by any arbitrary rule; it is a matter for the judgment of the Minister of Finance, with the approval of his colleagues. My recollection is that when I first had to deal with the matter the amount was fixed at $20,000,000, and all that was necessary in the interest of sound finance was that we should hold one-quarter of a dollar for every dollar of that amount, or 25 per cent on the $20,000,000. If I am not mistaken, within my own experience that amount was advanced from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000. The Minister of Finance of the present day has advanced it to $50,000,000; the growth and development of the country, our increased population and our enlarged business, would call legitimately for an expansion of the former circulation. Against that $50,000,000 I think the law requires $12,500,000 in gold. Now, we have got away from that sound standard unavoidably, under the stress of the war. If we were to apply that rule to-day to the outstanding circulation of the Dominion that is to say, take the total notes issued and take, on the other hand, the actual gold the minister holds, we would discover there is a very sad shortage. I do not want to dwell on the figures, because I do not purpose causing any alarm in the matter. I am alluding to it only that I may strengthen the hand of the minister in the desire, which I am sure he must have, to get back as early as possible to normal and sound conditions. There is a very large amount of our currency now out standing which is not represented by gold. There is a provision in the law that the minister may issue an amount of currency against certain securities. There is a statement in the Canada Gazette that a certain amount of currency is outstanding issued against securities deposited under the Finance Act. I am inclined to think that does not quite accurately describe the situation. If I remember correctly, the Finance Act only authorizes the issue of notes against securities to banks, and we are aware, from previous discussions, that the Government have made advances to others than to the banks; that they have made advances to the British Government and to certain railroads. Therefore, I do not think it is quite correct to describe these as issued under the authority of the Finance Act. That, however, is not important from the point of view of my argument. As regards the amount of note issue secured by gold, we are far away from the old sound standard. All I am suggesting is that the volume of that currency, which is now so large, and which I think is rather embarrassing to the banks, is beyond what the trade of the country is capable of absorbing at the present time. I think, therefore, the Minister of Finance will agree with me that it would be a wise policy at an early date to arrange for the redemption of a large portion of that note issue. There is, of course, the temptation to have a large amount of note issue because it costs no interest, it costs the Government nothing. But it is a dangerous form of economy, and I hope the Minister of Finance will soon provide the means of redeeming it, if necessary, by issuing a loan, changing one form of debt for another. I am not saying that in a spirit of hostility, but rather to direct the minister's attention in a manner in which I am sure his own mind will lead him.

Another matter is that, referred to so often, with regard to tax exemption on bonds. It has been repeatedly stated that the cost of our loans in consequence of this exemption is very high. That is probably correct. While the loan is nominally at 5½ per cent, when you have regard to the tax exemption and the commissions and various other charges, the loan is very expensive. That phase of the matter has been dwelt upon by many speakers, but, to my mind, that is the least serious aspect of the situation. The most serious aspect, in my judgment, is that this system of exempting bonds from taxation is going to be a breeder of trouble for us in the future. The smaller buyer of these bonds may for a time try to hold them; many are selling them now, taking advantage of the profit which attends that transaction. As the days pass it will be found that the smaller holders of these bonds will not be able to carry them, and they will pass gradually into the hands of the wealthy classes. What condition will that lead us to? We shall see, after a time, that while the ordinary man of moderate income, who has a hard job to earn that income, finds that through the operations of the Finance Department, he is called upon to pay a tax, across the street is living a man known to be wealthy, who is not paying a single penny. That is a condition which is bound to breed unrest and discontent. We are in the midst of days when there is some lack of the reverence which was once paid to old-time contracts. There is less disposition to-day than in olden times to respect what are called vested rights, and I would not be surprised if some of us are still young enough to see the time when there will be a grave agitation whether or not that contract to exempt the bonds shall be maintained. I am not for a moment suggesting that the contract shall not be kept; I say it should be, but that system is liable to breed trouble. I can, to some extent, make allowance for the Minister of Finance. The first thought that he must have when he is about to issue a loan, is how to get the money. He cannot afford to fail; if he is issuing his loan in the English market he must be careful to fix a price at which the public will take it, because failure would affect the credit of this country. When he came to seek loans in the market unknown until the last three or four years, that is, in the market of Canada, I am not surprised that he had some doubt whether he would succeed. He no doubt endeavoured to make the loan as attractive as he could and to get all the help he could. In that way he brought into his service the banks and the brokers and others whom he has to pay and he baited his hook with tax exemptions. All these are very natural things for the minister to do; but as he looks back, perhaps he feels he could have got along without some of those things. But we can all be wise after the event. Having regard to all the circumstances, I think the step taken by the minister was not a wise one, but I am not sure that another Minister of Finance would not if he were in the same position do the same. He wanted the money, and, therefore, he made the loan as attractive as possible. I would respectfully suggest that whenever he seeks a further loan, it would be better to pay a higher rate of interest and not to continue the system of tax exemption.

I discussed the tariff generally at an earlier stage of the session, and there is less reason why I should dwell upon it now, but I cannot help giving expression to this thought. Nearly all the arguments that have been advanced in support of the tariff changes are really arguments why there should be no change at all. Many hon. members have said that this is not the time to make tariff changes. The Minister of Finance himself spoke of the great desirability of tariff stability, and then he proceeded to upset the tariff.

And whispering "I will ne'er consent,"—consented.

All through the discussion we have found the argument used that the time has not arrived for tariff changes. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) dwelt upon that very strongly. He said that he did not see why there was any need of change at all. I do not say that I subscribe to that view; from my point of view, that would not be the wisest course, but from the point of view of hon. gentlemen opposite, they could have logically taken the ground that this was not the time for tariff changes; that the Government has no mandate. But while many of them argued that this is not the time for tariff changes, they proceeded to make tariff changes and not inconsiderable ones either. A reduction of 5 per cent on British goods is not a very inconsiderable change. Older men will recollect, and those who have read the political history of Canada when they were younger, will remember, that a great political party went out of power in 1878 on the question of a duty of 2½ per cent. The duties of that day were 17½ per cent, and the manufacturers interested asked Mr. Alexander Mackenzie to make them 20 per cent. He said he would not do it and they put him out of power. A change of 2½ per cent in the tariff is, therefore, not inconsiderable. Accordingly, the reduction in the duty of 5 per cent, and in some instances of 7½ per cent, is not an inconsiderable item. It is a very important change, and all I care to say now is that while I am not objecting to the changes that are being made, I regret that the arguments which most of the hon. gentlemen have used have been of the same character; they have given us good reasons for no change being made, but they are all going to vote for the changes all the same. I regret I did not have the pleasure this afternoon of hearing the Minister of Finance speak. Had I been aware that he was going to address the House, I would have endeavoured to be present, although I had an important engagement elsewhere. I have, however, had the pleasure of reading what my hon. friend said and it is very interesting.

A very interesting feature of this Budget is the various reasons given in support of it. I have already mentioned the reasons given in favour of doing nothing in support of a Budget which professes to do a good deal. But one of the most interesting reasons that I have heard given for the support of this Budget is that it is a reciprocity Budget. That is something which interests me very much, and if I might say so, without being offensive, it amuses me a little bit. To understand fully the humour of the situation we must go back to the year 1911. Prior to that time my good friend the Finance Minister of to-day (Sir Thomas White) was a Liberal in full communion, I believe, with what he and I would then call the grand old Liberal party. Prior to 1911, when things were said against that party, he gave them no sympathetic hearing. When a foolish man said that the Liberal party had not lived up to their promises the Finance Minister of to-day never allowed any nonsense of that sort to affect him in the least. When accusations of mismanagement and corruption were made against the Liberal party the Finance Minister of to-day paid no attention to them. When the Prime Minister of to-day in an election campaign said that the mere fact that the Liberal Government was spending $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 was conclusive evidence of corruption— I wonder what he would say about the $600,000,000 that is being spent to-day, the Minister of Finance of to-day did not share that view. He knew better. When the various public works of that time were constructed and all sorts of accusations of wrong-doing were made in that connection, the Finance Minister of to-day paid no attention to such cries. He stood true blue. And when that awful crime was committed of undertaking to construct the Grand Trunk Pacific, and we sometimes hear of that awful crime to-day, in spite of all that was said and done against that project the Minister of Finance of to-day was perfectly content; he had no fault to find. So you see he stood faithful down to a certain point, but the worm will turn, the line must be drawn somewhere and my hon. friend found the moment when he could no longer stand for the wickedness which was then present. What was that wickedness? There was a proposal made absolutely to have an exchange of trade with the United States. My hon. friend could not stand that; he could not stand it for a moment. He, followed by seventeen other gentlemen, formed the Noble Eighteen of Toronto, shook the dust of Liberalism from their feet, and from that time forward identified themselves with the enemies of Liberalism. On that great issue we lost the valuable services of my good friend the Minister of Finance of to-day. And now what do we find? I find the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden) in the very interesting speech he gave us the other day using this argument:

I would like to remind hon. gentlemen opposite that some of the best features in the Budget the Finance Minister has brought down are features to which they gave devoted allegiance in a pact which was introduced only a few years ago

So we are asked by the hon. member for Brandon to recognize the fact that the Minister of Finance, who could not stand for any "truck or trade with the Yankees" in 1911, is now bringing down a Budget which contains many of the best features of the reciprocity agreement. "No truck or trade with the Yankees" was the slogan in 1911. It is true that the Minister of Finance has modestly disclaimed the authorship of that expression, but it was used in the campaign very generally, and no matter who was its author it was a correct and brief account of the campaign waged against the Liberal party of that time.

We have some further testimony. I find the very friendly Ottawa Journal, in its clever column of Parliamentary Correspondence, has the following on the subject:

As for reductions (net) on agricultural implements, western low tariff men should have no complaint in regard to them. They are the precise reductions provided for in Mr. Fielding's Reciprocity Act, Sir Thomas White having apparently taken the former's 1911 proposals as his 1919 model. The same thing may be said of wheat, wheat flour and potatoes. They are made free just as was provided for by reciprocity with the added step towards Cobdenism, that they are made free not alone to the United States, but to any country which makes them free to us.

Then I come to the address of my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). He gave us some testimony which is not quite as agreeable as I should like, but I must give it as it reads. He said:

I want to remind the leader of this Government, (Sir Robert Borden) and his Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and his Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) that every one of them came into power in 1911 as protectionists; I want to know why they deserted their colours—why they were afraid to mention the word "protection" in this House, and why, when it comes to delivering the Budget speech, apology must be made all along the line for every tariff item, and not a word with regard to protection or adequate defence of the industries of this country. I say this with all kindness, but I mean it to be understood, and I trust it is. The right honourable gentleman who leads this House came into power in 1911 on the reciprocity cry, and without that protectionist cry I believe he would have been in the cold shades of Opposition up to the present time.

So do I.

The Minister of Finance did the same, and although the Minister of Railways was in the House before that, he was a thoroughgoing protectionist up to that time, but even he never mentions the word "protection.". . . . . I say that this Government have no mandate to do what the Finance Minister proposes and that I for one have no confidence in what they are going to hunt for. That is plain talk. I say I have no confidence in what they are going to hunt for. Why? Because every move they have made has been contrary to the platform on which they were elected. . . . . I assert, therefore, that the proposals of the minister are quite different to the platform on which he was elected, because he was elected on a policy which was opposed to reciprocity or to free trade with the United States. He has gone back on that policy in very many ways. Two years ago he granted free wheat, which was one of the greatest bones of contention in that tariff schedule of 1911.

So you have testimony, not from me, though I try to give impartial testimony, but from parties more directly friendly to the Government, including its loyal supporter the hon. member for Brantford, that the policy which these gentlemen have brought down now is in gross and flagrant violation of the policy on which they drove the Liberal Party out of power in 1911. I understood that the Minister of Finance this afternoon—and I again apologize for not having the pleasure of listening to his address—made the remarkable statement that the only objection he had to the reciprocity arrangement was that there was an agreement. I have read that passage in his speech once or twice, and I am bound to say I do not know what it means. I do not know whether he cares to explain what he meant when he said that his only objection was that there was an agreement.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If I recollect aright, I said that the chief objection I had was the same objection that Hon. George Brown had when the question of renewing the reciprocity agreement arose after 1866. The objection that he had was that no agreement should be entered into so as to bring the Canadian tariff into American politics. That is one of the chief objections I had to the reciprocity agreement.

Mr. FIELDING: I must say that I fail to understand the objection of my hon. friend about an "agreement." Every transaction that you have with another party involves some sort of an agreement, and I am amazed to find my hon. friend say that he objects to an agreement. Does he say that he objected because the agreement was a binding agreement?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The agreement had a denouncing clause, it is true, but in substance and in effect it would have been a binding agreement, and that was the objection I had. That objection which the Hon. George Brown had was precisely that which I have mentioned. If my hon. friend will look up the negotiations at the time I am speaking of he will find that that was a strong objection taken by as good a Liberal as there ever was in the House.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think it is necessary to look up what Mr. George Brown or anybody else said about some other agreement. We have the simple facts of this agreement. We went to Washington and came to an understanding which was embodied in correspondence. The letters exchanged amounted in a sense to an agreement. The best kind of agreement with some people is what is known as a "gentleman's agreement." There are people who will regard a debt of honour as a much greater obligation than an ordinary transaction, and there are nations which will live up to a gentleman's agreement although they will not make a written agreement. We have a gentleman's agreement with Japan. There is not a scrap of paper confirming it, but Japan has lived up to the agreement. Now, what were the words of this agreement which we had with the United States? I do not intend to occupy very much of the time of the House, but I do not think there will be any serious objection to my reading the passage in question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman to ask him a question?

Mr. FIELDING: Certainly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Was not this to be a written agreement validated by legislation?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes sir, but a written agreement which could be terminated at any moment at the will of either party. Again and again, by the opponents of that agreement, it was represented as something that was going to tie the hands of Canada. Well, nobody objected to the reciprocity of 1854 because it would tie the hands of Canada. Every bargain you make with any man ties your hands so long as it exists. In the case of this agreement at Washington it was not our desire that it should take the form of a treaty, and I frankly state that it was my view that Canada should not be bound to a treaty but should make an agreement which could be put into operation and, if it proved beneficial to both countries, it could then be confirmed by a treaty. What are the words in that portion of the letters exchanged in relation to the agreement? This letter is signed by myself and my lamented friend, Mr. William Paterson, and is addressed to the Secretary of State at Washington. The passage to which I refer reads:

> The Governments of the two countries having made this agreement from the conviction that, if confirmed by the necessary legislative authorities, it will benefit the people on both sides of the border line, we may reasonably hope and expect that the arrangement, if so confirmed will remain in operation for a considerable period. Only this expectation on the part of both Governments would justify the time and labour that have been employed in the maturing of the proposed measures. Nevertheless, it is distinctly understood that we do not attempt to bind for the future the action of the United States Congress or the Parliament of Canada, but that each of these authorities shall be absolutely free to make any change of tariff policy or of any other matter covered by the present arrangement that may be deemed expedient. We look for the continuance of the arrangement, not because either party is bound to it, but because of our conviction that the more liberal trade policy thus to be established will be viewed by the people of the United States and Canada as one which will strengthen the friendly relations now happily prevailing and promote the commercial interests of both countries.

That was the kind of agreement which my hon. friend said he could not stand for. He said to-day: What have we to-day without the agreement? We have free wheat and free flour. Free wheat? Oh, yes; but who heard the story of free wheat in 1911? Were we not told that if wheat were carried from North to South instead of West to East, the lines of the Canadian Pacific railway would become rusty through nonuse? Were we not told that? My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) said that free wheat was one of the great bones of contention, and we were told that if there was one thing in the agreement more than another which would be fatal to the commercial interests of the country, it was that we should have free wheat. And before long what happened? My hon. friend, elected to office purely and simply because of his opposition to reciprocity and because of his opposition to free wheat—because he would have no truck nor trade with the Yankees—soon went to Washington and Wall street, hat in hand, and begged those despised Yankees to lend him money to carry on the Government. What have we to-day without the agreement?—my hon. friend asks. We have free wheat, and he rejoices over the fact. But let him hesitate a bit in his rejoicing. The Canadian Reconstruction Association, which I think is a branch of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, sent the President, Sir John Willison, to study the question and he came back and reported that the reciprocity agreement which has hitherto remained on the statute book will not hereafter be honoured by the Americans. I will not blame them. For years the Americans were wrong in their negotiations, but there came a time when they were right and willing to forget the past and hold out the hand of fellowship. But unfortunately, owing to the action of hon. gentlemen in condemning all relations with the United States, Canada rejected the hand of fellowship, and if the American people were indignant in consequence, they cannot very well be blamed. But what is the state to-day? The reciprocity agreement is still on the statute book, but the Conservative press says: It is too late to talk of reciprocity now because the Americans will not stand for it. Well then, we have lost the benefit of seven or eight years which we would have had if we had accepted the hand of fellowship when the Americans were willing to stand for reciprocity. We are also told in the press that largely represents my hon. friend, that the whole trend of the United States now is towards high protection. The Republicans have come into power, they say, and there will be a revision of the tariff, and we are told that when that revision takes place it will be upwards in the direction of protection. That is the current story now, the report brought back by Sir John Willison. What does it mean? My hon. friend says we have certain things without the agreement, but we will not have many —according to their own story—so soon as the Americans undertake that revision. With the agreement we could have had these things not only for the last seven years but in the future, because out of that agreement, and through the operation of it, there would have been an improvement in the relations between the two countries, and I have no doubt that the agreement could have been continued and converted into a treaty. We have lost these benefits for seven years, and according to the testimony of my Conservative friends, we are going to lose them all in the future, for they tell us that although the Americans to-day have given some concessions, they are going to abandon them at an early date.

Now, it is not with any great satisfaction that I am quoting these things regarding my hon. friend's departure from the faith of anti-reciprocity. Of course, I cannot fail to derive some amusement from them, and my hon. friend will admit that I have a good opportunity for that. But he would be a very sad, miserable, selfish, narrow man who, in the midst of his own rejoicing, could fail to take account of the sadness and sorrow felt elsewhere. I am rejoicing in the conversion of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) the other day took credit to himself for having educated the minister in the advantages of income tax. Well, if my hon. friend is to be credited with being the preceptor of the minister in that respect, I think I should claim credit for his education in the virtues of reciprocity, which virtues he has suddenly discovered and is commending in so many ways. I am experiencing some of that joy which we are told prevails in Heaven over one sinner that repenteth, but I cannot fail to have some sympathy with those in distress. I cannot help thinking of the people of Toronto—good old Tory Toronto— who shouted for the hon. gentleman and made a hero of him simply because he was opposed to reciprocity, and for no other reason. Nor can I help having sympathy for those seventeen hon. gentlemen who broke away from the Liberal party because they would have nothing to do with the United States.

I cannot help feeling sympathy with the noble army of British-born and the Sons of England who rallied by the hundreds and thousands to defend the Old Flag against this dreadful crime. I cannot help but reflect upon the sadness and sorrow that enters their soul to-day as they find the hon. gentleman has broken away from the faith. And last, but not least, I cannot help but think of the anguish of that good Tory constituency of Leeds—Leeds that elected George Taylor. That is the kind of constituency Leeds was. Our dear old friend who has passed away was the embodiment of all that was Tory. Leeds elected

Mr. Taylor for years, and then he made way for my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) to take his place. Why, without the anti-reciprocity cry the Minister of Finance could not have had a look-in in the county of Leeds. What must be the anguish of the people in that constituency to-day as they find that the hon. gentleman has flung aside the very ladder by which he climbed into power. So I say that while I have great joy in the conversion of my hon. friend, while I welcome him and express my gladness for the returning sanity and health that has come to him, at the same time I must pay some regard to these suffering people whom he has, shall I say, deceived and betrayed—no, these are harsh words—who have been misled by the belief that he was really my opponent on reciprocity.

I am very sorry I have not kept my promise to speak very briefly. There are other features of the tariff question that I should like to speak about, but it is too late and too warm.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. FIELDING: I will be content with the observations I have already made, and thank the House very much for its attention.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): The hour is late, and I have no desire to delay hon. gentlemen, but I can assure the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that the Sons of England and the British-born of Toronto will still vote in the regular old way; they will not be misled by any argument as to whether or not they were right in the matter of reciprocity in 1911. The hon. gentleman has said that we have recently received reciprocity. I might correct him by saying that while our duties in Canada have been lowered to the level of those proposed by the United States, the American duties were lowered within six months or one year from the time reciprocity was defeated by these very same Sons of England and the British-born.

One of the other points made by the hon. gentleman was that we have to pay a debt approximately six times that which existed in 1911, when he was Minister of Finance, and he endeavours to throw the responsibility of that upon the members of the present Government and particularly upon the Minister of Finance. I believe that every man in Canada, irrespective of politics, is proud of the fact that we have that debt. It is entirely due to the fact that Canada took her proper and legitimate place in the war that has so lately ended, and furthermore the Government is not responsible for one dollar or one cent of the difference between the debt of 1911 and the debt of 1914. As a matter of fact, the exact opposite is the case. If normal conditions had prevailed the debt would have been reduced by the surplus of each year.

The hon. gentleman sees evidences of trouble in Canada during the coming winter. I would like to ask him whether he thinks that by supporting the amendment he will better conditions in this country? It is absolutely essential to the interests of Canada, whether it be Ottawa or any other city in the Dominion, that our workmen should be employed. If these workmen are to be employed, and we must necessarily keep at work, we must establish stable conditions and the amendment of the hon. member for Brome will bring about the exact opposite of that.

We have two debates in Parliament, year by year, in which members can express their general ideas on the affairs of the country—to wit, the debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, and the Budget debate. I might say, in order to allay all suspicion, and to follow the example of the hon. gentleman who has preceded me, that I intend to vote against the amendment and for the proposals brought in by the Finance Minister. I say this because I believe the amendment is not brought in in good faith, it is one of the old camouflage motions with which we are so familiar, and while I do not agree altogether with the financial propositions of the Minister of Finance, I think he is, in these propositions, making an honest effort to unite the different interests in Canada.

During this debate we have had all schools of thought represented. We have had the opinions of the hon. member for Red Deer, the only outstanding apostle of free trade. I say "only" and the hon. gentleman shakes his head at the statement. Probably he may have obtained a convert, but I do not know of one. We have had the views of gentlemen who were in favour of protection only on luxuries, or in other words that all the necessaries of life should be freed. We have had hon. gentlemen like the leader of the Opposition who believe that all the unrest in Canada is due to the fact that unfortunately two years ago we passed what is known as the War-time Elections Act and debarred certain aliens from voting in Canada. Then we have heard an hon. gentleman on the opposite side, to wit the member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) express the belief that we should take the duty off button machinery, and that if the Union Government is defeated there will be no unrest in Canada. That hon. gentleman's proposition was to reduce or eliminate the duty on button machinery, and he further believes the existing unrest in Canada is entirely due to the fact that the Union Government has been too long in power. We have had all these lines of thought expatiated upon. I believe that even the tariff question, with all its changes, and notwithstanding the fact that it appeals to every man and every woman in Canada, is not the principal thing in the mind of the average thinking man in this country. I believe that the two principal ideas in every man's mind are first, how to allay the labour unrest in Canada and second, to completely satisfy the returned soldier and to re-establish him in civil life.

We have various ideas as to what constitutes labour unrest or as to what the cause of it is. Personally, I believe that the leading reason for labour unrest in Canada is the false standard of living which has been induced by the war, and this is true of all countries. Labouring men made money more easily than they had at any time previously in the course of their lives. They spent that money more freely and they have contracted habits which are hard to abandon. Secondly, I believe the cause of unrest amongst labour is fear as to the future. We have men, even in Parliament, so foolish as to believe that this country will at some time in the near future revert to the old order of things which prevailed before the war. I believe that every man in this House and every man in the country, for that matter, should "forget" that, to use a common expression and a short and simple one. We are not going back to the old conditions of pre-war days. We will never again see labour working for one dollar or less per day. We will never again see pre-war conditions, and consequently we will never see again the prices that prevailed before the war, whether those prices apply to the product of the farmer, the fisherman, the lumberman, or the manufacturer; and we may as well make up our minds now that we should do all we can to equalize matters, without attempting for one moment to drive either the labouring man or the farmer back to the conditions of pre-war times.

The third proposition in regard to the labour unrest is the propaganda instituted by the Bolsheviks, or the I.W.W., and I do not need to enter into this. It is not confined to the city of Winnipeg. It is present in every city of Canada, even in the city of Ottawa at the present time. Literature of a very obnoxious character is being circulated all through the country, and these men have no desire to do anything except create unrest, which will eventually lead to the dissolution of all our ordinary forms of government. The fourth cause is the supposed high cost of living.

Now, no matter what one of these four reasons a man may give for the labour unrest, he invariably damns the Government. It is not necessarily this Government, but if this is the handiest one it is the one he damns first. He damns all forms of government, and he blames every one of them. He blames the government for each of these conditions I have enumerated; and my friends who are opposed to the Budget today are adding fuel to the flames by saying the Government is responsible for those conditions.

Personally, I am in favour of all legitimate labour unions, and I believe that that is the attitude of the Government at the present time, as it is also the attitude of most of the members of this House. We are all in favour of lawful unions, but not of unlawful unions, and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of every member of this House, whether on the Government or on the Opposition side, when this session is at an end—which we hope will be in a few days or weeks—to go back to his constituency and do everything that lies in his power as a citizen of Canada to allay the unrest that exists in his own riding, and to do nothing to increase that unrest, because in that event he is playing into the hands of these very men we are so desirous of suppressing.

Now, as regards the grievances of returned soldiers, it is true that some of their demands are excessive, but in most cases they are moderate and just. It is no answer to say that in many instances the trouble has been caused by neglect on the part of the soldier himself, or that his papers have been improperly made out through the fault of some one overseas. Delay in many cases is unavoidable, but every effort should be made to have all these mistakes remedied and the allowance rushed on to the disabled soldier or to his widow and orphans. It is the delay in securing justice in individual cases that gives rise to an excuse for a general cry against the policy of the Government. We have many cases, Mr. Speaker, where through neglect of the authorities on this side of the ocean or on the other side some poor man or widow has been deprived of the pension for weeks or months; and it can be readily understood how these cases, when ventilated before an audience of soldiers, give rise to a spirit of unrest. I would plead with the Minister of Militia and with all those in authority that every effort should be made to rectify these mistakes at the earliest possible moment. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the soldier who left his family and business to fight for freedom should be, and will be, the best citizen, and that he will not allow the democratic institutions he fought for to be destroyed by the slacker or by the profiteer who stayed at home.

We have been told by many speakers during this debate that the tariff is responsible for the present high cost of living. But I would like to call attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that we have had practically the same tariff for many years. The largest reductions have been made by this Government and previous Governments supported from this side of the House. We had the same tariff when prices were low. The Government was not then condemned for the high cost of living, and it cannot be legitimately condemned for the same thing to-day. It is quite true that in certain cases ad valorem duties have created a hardship. I happened to listen to my friend the member for Regina the other day when he brought up the question of dried fruits, and stated that the cost on the primary market, the country of origin, had increased 300 per cent, and consequently, of course, the ad valorem duty would increase to the same extent. In such a case I think the Government might be well advised, where the market fluctuates so violently, to put on a special duty. But I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that, after all, this matter—and it is one of the specific cases brought before the House—is a very minor one. The total duty on dried fruits last year was $166,000, and that included every variety of dried fruit imported into Canada.

I have listened with much interest, as I always do, to the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). His panacea would be general free trade. I would like to call his attention for a moment to about one-tenth of the items I have on my list. We collected last year on automobiles and parts thereof $6,008,000. At the ordinary school rate of 6 to 10 mills per dollar, which is the average rate in the province of Ontario, this would mean an assessment upon $600,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 of land value. This is an answer partly to the hon. member for Red Deer and to the Ex-Minister of Agriculture. In other words, four times that amount would represent 1 per cent upon all land at the valuation given by another member, which was $4,000,000,000. We received in duties last year upon musical instruments—which, after all, would, I think, be legitimate game for tariff—$1,039,000; upon fruits and nuts, $2,264,000; upon hats and bonnets, $1,090,000; upon meats of all kinds, $3,265,000. I would like my hon. friends to come down to some of the counties of Ontario and repeat to the farmers there the speeches they are making, first, as regards deserted farms in Ontario and, secondly, as regards protection. This duty of $3,265,000 at most cannot be more than 1½ cents a pound, and cannot be responsible for that very alarming price of 60 to 65 cents a pound for bacon. We also received upon ribbons $451,000; upon perfumery, $161,000; upon paper and manufactures thereof,—largely fine writing paper; and if not fine writing paper, it should not come into Canada, because we have all the raw material that we need for many years to come—$2,139,000; upon jewellery, $300,000; upon fancy goods, $987,000; upon curtains, $105,000; upon corsets, $135,000; upon buttons—in spite of my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), depreciating the fact that all the button machines had to pay duty, they apparently kept their prices high enough in North Waterloo to force us to import from other countries and to pay $296,000 duty on buttons alone; on books, $991,000; on oilcloth and matting, $735,000; on photo instruments, $254,000; on silks, $3,486,000. Will the hon. gentleman say that we should have free trade in that article also, and proceed to collect that amount of revenue from the farmers?

The revenue collected from duty on spirits amounted to $3,709,000. That is a past luxury; we may not get that next year. The figure for soap is $282,000, for tobacco, $813,000, and for vegetables, $1,070,000.

I now come to an item which has been very much discussed, at least throughout Ontario—that of boots and shoes. We received by the way of duties on leather boots and shoes, imported from all countries last year, $934,000, or practically 12 cents per head of population. I venture to say that ninety per cent of these shoes were high grade shoes for the city trade only. Travellers for American concerns do not go to the small towns and villages; they supply their goods entirely to the city trade. In proof of that I have only to point out that there are two items in the customs tariff for boots and shoes, one for leather boots and shoes, not otherwise provided, and the other for boots, riveted, nailed or wire-fastened. The latter are the shoes worn by the farmers around the farm or workingmen in the factories. How much do you suppose we received last year by way of duties on these shoes? The magnificent sum of $3,000. $3,000 for the workingman's shoe as against $934,000 for the shoe that is used in the city; yet the farmers are told that they are being robbed by the shoe manufacturers. When it comes down to the ordinary every-day shoe, we must remember that it is not imported into Canada, for the simple reason that the Canadian manufacturer turns it out at a price which does not justify importation from the American manufacturer.

The items that I have enumerated, which comprise a very small number of the items in the tariff and a comparatively small number of those items which may be properly be classed as luxuries, represent a duty of $30,641,000 or a tax of 10 mills, or 1 cent, upon the dollar on every $3,000,000,000 of land assessment. If you destroy the tariff on these items alone and place a tax upon the land to raise the necessary revenue, you will tax the land on a basis of one cent on the dollar without regard to any of the other items in the tariff. The items which I have mentioned amount to $30,000,000, but our total collections through the customs last year amounted to $161,000,000.

A return was brought down a few days ago showing that the total duty paid upon agricultural implements during the fiscal year 1918 was $4,617,000, of which the country lying west of the Great Lakes paid $2,713,000; and that upon these implements the war tax was $1,500,000, of which the West paid $949,000. If you divide that among the farms in the West, which, according to the latest statistics, number 218,000, you will get back almost exactly to the figure quoted by the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) last night. You will find that the average duty paid by the farmers of the West upon implements, regardless of the size of their farms, which, according to the statistics available last year, averaged a little over 355 acres, was less than $25 per year. Comparing that with the amount they would have to pay under a land tax, I am sure that the farmer of the West would be satisfied with the taxes as they are.

The proposals of the Finance Minister provide for considerable reductions in the tariff. We have been told by the various members from Western Canada that they would rather have seen the Government make no changes at all than make the changes they did. I cannot believe that they are in earnest when they say that, or, if they are in earnest, that they represent public opinion in their own ridings. I am sure that a great deal of this is camouflage, and that the reason for much of it is found in the fact that nominations are proceeding in the Western Provinces at this time. Surely they cannot expect the Government, facing as it does a very large deficit, to make material changes in the tariff without full investigation.

I have already spoken on the matter of reciprocity, and I shall not deal with it on this occasion. Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of the establishment of a regular financial board or committee which will have absolute control of the tariff and which should make recommendations to the Government from time to time. I have no doubt in the world that certain manufacturers in Canada do take advantage of the tariff on certain lines; I am quite willing to admit, from my knowledge as a business man, that such is the case. But I am equally honest in saying that the great majority of the manufacturers in Canada do, I believe, make up their price lists entirely irrespective of any duty which may or may not be imposed upon the articles which they manufacture and sell. The prices of articles manufactured in Canada are, in the main, fair to the Canadian producer; that is proved by the fact that we do not import similar articles from the United States or from any other country.

I regret that while the Minister of Finance has spoken very strongly in favour of increasing our output from the land, the mine, the forest and the field, he has not seen fit to give some assistance to the iron ore industry in Canada. Some arrangement should have been made along this line, because the production of this mineral is carried out on a basis entirely different from that on which other minerals are produced.

The facts are these. We are facing a debt of practically $2,000,000,000. The annual interest charges on this debt will be $115,000,000; our pensions will amount to $35,000,000 or $40,000,000, and in addition we have the regular expenses of the country. We are asked to produce and save, but the Government must assist by aiding new fields of production wherever necessary—in connection with the products of the field, the forest, the fisheries, the mine, or the manufacturing industries—for the general advantage of the people. I appeal to all members of the House to drop politics and to unite to make Canada a great country, worthy in peace of the place our boys made for her in war.

Lt.-Col. CYRUS W. PECK, V.C. (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in rising at this late hour and in this depressing heat to address the House I feel that I have some apology to offer, but I wish to explain my position and will do so in the briefest possible way. At the outset, I wish to welcome back to the House the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) from his labours at the Peace Conference. I congratulate him upon the position that he attained at that conference and upon the ability and the dignity with which he represented us in the council of the nations

I cannot agree with some hon. gentlemen in this House that he should have remained at home. The important part that Canada played in the war, the vigour and chivalry with which she entered the conflict, her unselfish determination to prosecute the war to the uttermost, the glory of her arms on those historic battlefields, all demanded that her leading statesman should be consulted upon the conditions of peace. Therefore, it was most fitting that the man who was foremost in Canada, not only because of his position as Prime Minister and as a first citizen of Canada from the beginning of and throughout the whole war, but foremost because of the fact that it was his unflagging zeal, his unswerving fidelity, his inexhaustible patience and his lofty patriotism that had managed to keep a Government together at all times, a Government whose chief business it was to support our armies in the field and to employ its whole energies in winning the war—I say it was fitting that this man should be the one who should sit amongst the leading statesmen of all countries, and deliberate upon the vast problems that were to be considered and the future status of the world. It will always, I am sure, be a matter of pride and satisfaction to him to remember that he was at the head of our Government when Canada emerged from her swaddling clothes and took her place in the world as a nation of first-class importance.

I now wish to pass on with all possible rapidity to a discussion of the Budget. I would not detain the House except for the fact that I have professed certain ideals throughout my life, and now in our system of politics there has to come a time in the House when we must vote one way or the other, and I want to explain why I am going to vote as I intend to do.

I notice some people have been thinking that too much money is being spent on the returned soldiers. I simply want to say, in passing, that I do not think enough has been spent upon them. We should spend more money in gratuities and pensions and things of that sort, and while we have the Soldier Settlement Board, a very good thing, and one which I wish to give all the praise I can, we should endeavour to settle the soldier in other walks of life. I want to tell the House from my experience of these men during all the grim years of war, that now in our time of trial the one we shall have to rely on is the returned soldier, and I prophesy that he will be the great balance wheel regulating our Governmental machine now that the lean and grimy hand of Bolshevism is clutching at the reins of Government. I cannot be made to believe that our soldiers who have been fighting for four years to uphold law and order in Europe are going to come back and tear it down in Canada.

As for the Budget, I regret that I do not like it. I have been a free trader all my life, and with me that is a matter of conviction. It is nothing that I can cast off as one casts off one's garments in Ottawa in the hot summer days. It has been the conviction of a lifetime, and I have not come back here after four years of war to dissemble my views before my fellow countrymen. I am strongly in favour of free trade. In considering the Budget, I wish to discuss two questions. The first one is: What was the attitude of the Government when it appealed to the people? I think I rather agree with the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) that the tariff was not an issue when the Government appealed to the country. In this regard, I disagree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark). At the same time, I think everybody will agree that the tariff was not a very important issue in that election, because the great, paramount and all-important question was the winning of the war, and we cannot expect a Government to do more than live up to its promises. As regards the hon. member for Red Deer, I always admire the stand he takes—and I think his robust eloquence in reference to this matter of free trade stands out in singular contrast to the boring platitudes of politicians in this country.

Coming to the question of how I shall vote on the Budget, the first thing I wish to consider is what result will occur if we turn the Government out, as regards, first, the general condition of the country and, second, what Government would take its place, because I mean to vote on this Budget (although people may say: Your vote will make little difference) just as if my vote was to turn the Government out. I would simply say that just at the present time in this country we are confronted by very serious conditions. I certainly do not take the pessimistic view that some people do who think that we are all to be swallowed up by a black revolution. I have an infinite faith in the calm good sense of our Canadian people, and therefore, I do not think we are going to have a revolution. At the same time, no one will deny that we are at this moment confronted with an anxious situation, because we must admit that in some parts of the country the leadership of labour has passed from the hands of our good, sane, sensible, solid labour men into the hands of men whose ideals are foreign to us, foreign to our Government, foreign to our institutions and foreign to those ideals which you and I, Sir, and all of us learned at our mothers' bosoms and our fathers' knees. On that ground, therefore, I do not think I can take the responsibility of voting this Government out of power and bringing on a general election at this time. If the present Government were defeated, the Prime Minister would have to advise the Crown to call upon the leader of the Opposition to form a Government, and an election would ensue. I do not imagine the leader of the Opposition is very anxious just now to assume the reins of Government, and some of his followers have, I understand, expressed themselves to that effect. I cannot help remembering at this time the speech of the leader of the Opposition of May 9. When I came back from the West I read this speech, and I thought at first I was reading a speech of some very high protectionist or some article in some high protectionist newspaper

The Liberal party are to hold a national convention on the 8th of August. The light, I believe, is still in the window; at least, we have had no formal notification of its having been removed except in the case of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), I understand that if he ever drags his weary and prodigal footsteps back to that " light in the window," the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) means to pull down the blind. We shall all watch that convention with the greatest possible interest, and we shall examine very closely the platform that is going to be brought down. I want, in the most friendly possible manner, to tell the leader of the Opposition and the gentlemen sitting behind him who will have a great deal to do with formulating the policy on which they will appeal to the electorate at the next election, that if they wish to attract the Liberal thought of this country, if they wish to appeal to the men in this country who want better things, if they want to catch the rising tide of democracy on the flood, they will have to present a better programme than has been foreshadowed in the speeches of the leader of the Opposition and his supporters during this session.

Therefore I say that in view of the situation in this country, in view of the Government we might expect to obtain in place of the present one, and in view of what we might obtain from that Government in the way of free trade, I am not prepared to take the responsibility at the present time of voting the Government out. After all, I think this is a Budget of expediency, but this being a time of expediency, I think it more expedient to vote for the Budget than to vote against it.

In conclusion, let me say just this: I stand for an increase in the income tax, for an inheritance tax, and above all for a tax on the unimproved value of land. I stand for greater and better and grander things than anything contained in proposals of the Budget, or that is camouflaged in the amendment of the Opposition.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before putting the question, I wish to say that when the amendment of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was submitted I reserved judgment as to its validity, because, at first view, it bore resemblance to one presented by the hon. member at an earlier stage of the present session. A careful examination, however, discloses that while a portion contains some matter substantially the same as contained in the amendment previously referred to, there is a portion entirely new, and a large part of the former amendment has been omitted. This being the case, the present amendment may properly be regarded as new within the meaning of the Rules. In coming to this conclusion I am supported by decisions heretofore given in this House, which also would appear to be in conformity with the practice in the British House of Commons.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. McMaster, which was negatived on the following division:

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE—FREE CONFERENCE.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that a message had been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate accedes to the request of the House of Commons for a free conference to consider the Bill No. 19 (Letter A of the Senate), intituled: "An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act," and any amendments which at such conference it may be desirable to make thereto, and had appointed the Honourable Messieurs Blain, Foster, Lougheed (Sir James, K.C.M.G.), Ross (Middleton), McLennan, Power, Dandurand and Bostock, as managers on their part at the said free conference.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 3.15 a.m., Thursday.

Thursday, June 19, 1919.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

JOINT COMMITTEE TO ALLOCATE SPACE.

Hon. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works) moved: That Messrs. R. F. Green, J. E Armstrong (Lambton), J A. Robb and W. C. Kennedy be appointed a committee from this House to meet a like committee from the Senate for the purpose of assisting the Joint Parliamentary Committee for Parliament Building on the allocation of space, etc.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 139 (from the Senate) for the relief of James Frederick Neild.—Mr. Ross.

Bill No. 140 (from the Senate) for the relief of Mable Anna Ferguson.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

Bill No. 141 (from the Senate) respecting Chartered Trust and Executor Company.—Mr. Nesbitt.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.).

FORT LAWRENCE, N.S.—PUBLIC WORKS EXPENDITURES.

Mr. Sinclair (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. What amounts have been spent by the Public Works Department since September, 1911, at Fort Lawrence, Nova Scotia, and how much has been spent for dredging?
2. Did the Government purchase certain dredging equipment (including tug, scows, etc.), at Fort Lawrence? If so, at what price?
3. What has become of said equipment? If sold, what amount was received for same?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL:

1. (a) $88,961.09 of which (b) $31,476.94 was for dredging.
2. (a) Yes; (b) $17,500.
3. Plant laid up at Fort Lawrence.

[Mr. Speaker.]

GOVERNMENT OUTSIDE SERVICE.

Mr. BURNHAM:

Is it a fact that positions announced as open for application in the Government Outside Service are held open so long that returned soldier applicants get no satisfaction and have to give it up?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

All vacancies reported to the Civil Service Commission by the departments and all requisitions filed in connection therewith are dealt with as promptly as possible.

Ordinary requisitions which can be filled from the eligible lists of clerks, typists, stenographers, etc., are seldom held more than two or three days as when the lists of those who have qualified by passing prescribed examinations are exhausted there are usually applications on file from which temporary assignments can be made.

When a minor position has to be filled by local advertising said advertising is authorized by return mail and ten days to two weeks is usually sufficient time in which to deal with the matter and make the appointment.

When more important positions have to be advertised in the Gazette and through the press a longer period, generally about thirty days, is allowed and time added to enable British Columbia points to reply. It sometimes occurs that so many applications are received that longer time is required to make full investigation into the merits of all applicants, but the cases where final decision is delayed longer than a few days after competitions close are few and far between.

STEAMERS "LADY EVELYN" AND "PRINCESS."

Mr. PARENT:

1. Are the steamers Lady Evelyn and Princess still the property of the Government? If not, when were they disposed of, and to whom?
2. At what price and on what terms of payment?
3. Were they disposed of for cash? If so, has the Government been paid?
4. What is the gross tonnage of each?
5. Was said sale authorized by Order in Council?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

Re Lady Evelyn—

1. Sold to the Gulf of St. Lawrence Shipping and Trading Company on the 24th April, 1919.
2. $40,000 subject to arrangement.
3. $30,000 has been paid. Balance $10,000 held pending the settlement of a claim that complete equipment was not delivered with the ship.

4. 482·99.
5. Yes.

Re Princess—

1. Princess disposed of in January, 1919, to Mr. J. A. Farquhar, Halifax, N.S.
2. $46,555 cash.
3. Yes.
4. 542 tons.
5. Yes.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. How many commissions have been appointed by the Governor in Council and by Parliament since the year 1911?
2. What are the names of the various commissions and what art the names of the members of the said commissions?
3. What was the amount of salary and travelling expenses paid to each commission and the sum drawn by each commissioner?

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.—THE BUDGET.

The House again in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Customs.

Tariff item 61a—Wheat flour and semolina when imported from a country which imposes a customs duty on wheat flour or semolina manufactured in Canada. . . . . per barrel, 30 cents.

Mr. BUREAU: Why are these two items repeated? Item No. 61 is: "wheat flour, n.o.p.; semolina, n.o.p. . . . Free." This applies to countries which reciprocate the advantages that Canada gives. I understand that articles are not free except when there is a reciprocity in their exchange.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The two items are necessary in order to give effect to the intention.

Item 61a.

Wheat flour and semolina when imported from a country which imposes a customs duty on wheat flour or semolina manufactured in Canada.

provides the rates of duty there mentioned. Then it is necessary to provide for what is not otherwise provided for, that is to say, not embraced in that item; so that wheat flour and semolina imported from a country which does not impose a customs duty on wheat flour or semolina manufactured in Canada come in free.

384a. Rolled iron or steel hoops, band, scroll or strip, No. 14 gauge and thinner, and rolled iron or steel sheet, when imported by manufacturers for use only in their own factories in the manufacture of galvanized iron or steel hoop, band, or scroll, strip or sheet. Free. Free. Free.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I desire to propose a new resolution immediately following 384a in order that the items placed in it shall conform to 384a. I move that the following resolution be inserted as 386:

386. Rolled iron or steel, and cast steel, in bars, bands, hoop, scroll, strip, sheet or plate, of any size, thickness or width, and steel blanks for the manufacture of milling cutters when of greater value than three and one-half cents per pound, 7½ p.c. 12½ p.c. 12½ p.c.

Mr. M. CLARK: Would the minister tell us in a word or two what principle has guided him in making these particular preparations of iron and steel mentioned in 384a free?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In making changes in the tariff it is necessary to enact two items where one item existed before. For example, there may be one item embracing a number of articles subject to a certain duty. When changes are made in respect to some of these articles it is necessary to re-enact the item as it stood, leaving out the articles which are otherwise dealt with, and then to enact another item. It is on that account that this has been done. The free item is inserted in order to continue in force an Order in Council under which rolled iron or steel hoop, band, scroll or strip, No. 14 gauge and thinner, and rolled iron or steel sheet, when imported by manufacturers for use only in their own factories in the manufacture of galvanized iron or steel hoop, band, scroll, strip or sheet were placed on the free list. Now we are placing this item in the customs tariff.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Might we revert to item 356?:

Nickel in bars and rods, sheets or plates. . . . . Free. Free. Free.

I would like to ask the minister whether it is the intention of the Government to pass a non-ferrous Bill similar to that which I understand has been passed in England, and, if such a Bill is not to be passed, why?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would ask my hon. friend to explain what he has in mind in mentioning the Order in Council in England?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: It is not an Order in Council. They have passed, or are passing in England, a non-ferrous Bill, which practically puts under the control of the Government all metals of the nature of nickel. They are making considerable progress in that respect. I understand this Government has been asked to pass a similar law, and I would like to know from them whether we are to pass such legislation which will be applicable to nickel, and some other metals, and if no such law is to be enacted in Canada what the reason is?

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Secretary of State): In reference to my hon. friend's question I might say that the Non-Ferrous Metals Bill passed by the British Parliament was considered very fully by a special committee, which, as Minister of Mines, I appointed last year. That Bill is designed not so much to serve the object my hon. friend has suggested, but really to get rid of German-controlled interests which were more or less predominant in certain metal interests in Great Britain. The conditions there were not the same as in this country. Our position in respect to our metals was entirely different from that of England. In this country a great many of our metal industries, and certainly a lot of our minerals are out of our jurisdiction and under the control of the provinces. If a law similar to the English Non-Ferrous Metals Bill had been passed here it would not operate in the same way as it did in England, and would have involved legislation on the part of the provinces which might or might not have been put into effect and to some extent might have had a restrictive effect in respect to the investment of American capital, which especially in our western country, is very largely interested in the Canadian metal industry. For these, and some other reasons I need not elaborate now, the Government decided they would not take any action at this particular time but would give the question further consideration if necessary. I may add, however, that even after that law was enacted in England there was quite a difference of opinion as to the wisdom of continuing it exactly in its present shape.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The explanation of the minister who has charge of the Mines Department is not quite satisfactory to me. I am told that the condition of affairs that the British Government eventually found in regard to the essential metals, and nickel is one of them, was such that it was a matter of grave consideration for the home Government, and for the defence of the Empire, that Germany did control these necessary or essential metals and that they did control nickel as made from the ores of Canada, and I have directed attention to it. As one who favours a national policy, I think it is high time we had in this country a national policy controlling these metals, yet we are allowing these metals to come in free. Who makes them? The Mond Nickel Company in Great Britain who control a great portion of the Sudbury nickel mines, and the International Nickel Company that were in New Jersey, but are now in Canada. Neither of these companies up to date, although they have produced millions and millions of nickel and exported it all over the world—and I think in certain instances some of it has got to Germany—have told us anything about their business. I for one tell the Minister of Finance now, seeing that we are talking about nickel, that this same International Nickel Company that were operating in New Jersey a little over a year ago, suddenly paid to the United States Government over $3,000,000 of a war tax on their profits. This money was got, I understand, by the seizure of a large block of so-called nickel matte, which, when examined—I have known this to be the case for a long time, but for some reason we cannot direct the attention of Parliament to it in this country—was found to be full of platinum, palladium, and all the rather precious metals that are in what is called the platinum group. The evidence was so straight that in two or three days this International Nickel Company, which controls the nickel mines of Sudbury, paid to the United States Government over $3,000,000 of a tax on profits, and that out of nickel that came from Canada and was refined in United States. I would ask the minister whether he has ever made an effort to compel this company to pay a war profits tax on the refinements of nickel that come from Canada. Then there is that other great monopoly, the Mond Nickel Company. Sir Alfred Mond is associated in the British Government at the present time. He is the head of the nickel trusts all over the world, I believe, and has had more or less relations with the Germans. He has never disclosed what his profits were on the nickel ore that he took from this country over to Wales and refined, and which may be equally charged with these precious metals. That is the position of affairs in Canada, and shows almost an absolute monopoly not only of nickel but of platinum. Platinum is worth over $100 an ounce, five times the value of gold, and was an essential war metal—the only source of it was in Canada. We have the mines, but these companies take the ore out of the country and refine it, and that is not a national policy, and it is not good business. I want to ask the minister who is in charge of the Mines Department why he, and his expensive department, have not been able to tell the people of Canada what the precious metals content is of these ores of which we have almost the absolute monopoly. I want a national policy in regard to the refinement of nickel ores in this country and I want the Department of Mines—a most extravagant department, but one well officered by men who know the situation and who know the precious metal content of these ores—why the facts are not disclosed to us. I have read the reports of the Department of Mines year after year, and they hint at the real situation, but that is not sufficient. The Ontario Government have been working on the question and appointed a most expensive commission to investigate it. That investigation was carried on for months, and yet the facts were not disclosed. We have now a refinery, a branch of the International Nickel Company, refining at Port Colborne, and they did a peculiar thing; they suddenly changed their organization. They were a New Jersey corporation, but they came back under the law of Canada, and, as I say, are located at Port Colborne. At the present time I believe their works have suspended operations because of over production. But here we have a Provincial Government, which has a high class expensive mining department, and we have a Federal department of the same type. We have a treasury to-day absolutely in need of money, and there is no place where so large an amount of money can be got to meet the expenses of Canada and to help to pay its war debt, as there is in some kind of a tax which will compel these two enormously rich companies which control these essential ores;—there is no such source of income, to my mind, as there is in these two companies. Take the one fact that the United States Government, under their law for the taxation of war profits, were able to get $3,500,000 in a few days by seizure. The facts have never yet been disclosed, but they can be ascertained; and if there is such a source of revenue open to the people of this country in these times of extreme financial difficulty, and if we have an absolute control of this ore and of the metal produced from it, why do we not avail ourselves of that revenue and assume that control? You talk about the production of iron and encouraging the reduction of iron ores in this country. Why not take charge of the precious metals we have in Canada, which are so rich and can contribute so much to help to pay the public debt.

I am not going into the question much more fully to-day, but I want to warn the Government that there are certain facts soon to be disclosed in London and in Washington in connection with these metals that will startle the world and will show a pro-German leaning during the war that Canadians will be surprised to learn. And yet none of these facts have been brought out so far. I devoted months and years trying to get out these facts. I studied the question, and the further I got into it the more I was convinced of this pro-German influence. I was probably the first one in this House in the old days to set up this doctrine; that of all things we ought to have a national policy in regard to nickel and the other precious metals associated with it. But for some reason or other the hand of the Government in the province of Ontario and in the Dominion has been palsied and nothing has been done. There is a source of revenue, and again I want to call the attention of the Finance Minister to it. If the United States Government by a single seizure could compel the International Nickel Company, which was mining our ore in Sudbury, to pay $3,500,000 in one year—I do not know what they have paid since, because the minute they were caught red handed they jumped out of the country and moved their works into Canada—it will be manifest that we are overlooking a fruitful source of revenue. Let us have a national policy in regard to this nickel. Let us keep this great store of platinum, radium and the other rare essential metals. There is not one of them that is not two or three times more valuable than gold, and they are sought all over the world. When the American Government saw that it was likely to be involved in the war it spent millions of dollars trying to get platinum. We have these precious metals, and they all played an important part in the war—indeed, they were so essential to our success that the British Government, I understand, entered into correspondence with the Dominions in regard to obtaining the maximum output.

Why have we not had a national policy in this country to see what is in these metals and what revenue is to be had from them? But this Government will not move, this Parliament will not move, and the Government of the province of Ontario will not move. The International Nickel Company for a long time defaulted in the payment of their revenue tax to the province of Ontario. Three or four times since I first introduced into this House this question of a nickel policy this so-called International Nickel Company has changed its corporate form, and men who were prominent in it have disappeared. It is known now that the International Nickel Company was controlled in the United States by a voting trust, but nobody has ever told the people of Canada or of the Empire who were behind this voting trust.

Mr. BUREAU: Who do you think it was?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I think it goes back to Germany.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I think Sir Alfred Mond—and I am speaking now of a member of the British Government—I think it may be found out that he has a big hand in the control of the International Nickel Company. He got the privilege of taking out the raw ore of our country to the United States and treating it there, and he also got the privilege of taking it over to Great Britain and treating it there, and yet he does not contribute one cent towards the revenues of this country. Did anybody see the prospectus that the International Nickel Company put out in London recently, I think about eight months ago, showing the enormous profits they had made, and how they control this essential industry? I would not take the word of any member of the British Government in connection with this matter. Such things were disclosed during the war as to German control of these essential metals, that man after man had to get out of public life in England, and man after man had to change his name and declare himself to be a British citizen. The selling agent of all the world's nickel, including the product of the Canadian mines, was discovered to be an alien enemy; and the British Government refused to do any more business with the men who were the selling agents of the products of our Canadian nickel mines, for they were found to be alien enemies. I refer to the firm of Merton and Company.

In spite of the fact of immense stores of these metals being in Canada, and only in Canada, we cannot get a national policy in regard to them. I want to know why, and I am going to make that an issue in this country. I have followed it up, but I have made no great headway yet. However, I am going to follow it up until certain facts in possession of the Government in Washington and in possession of the Government in London—and I believe that our Governments here know something about it, although so far no action has been taken—I repeat, I am going to follow the matter up until those facts are disclosed to the public? Why has no action been taken? I intend to return to this question. The people of Canada, and especially those who fought in the war, will not be satisfied until they know the facts.

Even our Canadian nickel was used to face German bullets, and we know that the German undersea boats that came into New York and other American harbours loaded up with Canadian nickel. We have not protected ourselves. I will not take the assurance of the British Government, even if it is made by Mr. Lloyd George, the Prime Minister of England and head of the Conference now sitting in Paris, if he says that we have taken every measure to control these metals. The fact is that neither the British Government nor this Government took the measures that should have been taken to prevent our nickel reaching the enemy during the war. Intrigue ran through all the metal industries during the war, and enemy influence was in control. Australia, to her great credit, caught these Germans red handed in control of Australian spelter and zinc, and her Government passed a law immediately and took over and administered the mines. I proposed in this House at the beginning of the war that we should take over our Canadian mines and administer them not only for the interest of Canada but for the interest of the Empire.

The CHAIRMAN: I must call the hon. member to order. The speech he is now making, although it would have been in order upon the Budget, is certainly not relevant to the item or clause under discussion, which concerns the admission into Canada free of nickel in bars and rods, strips, sheets or plates. The hon. member will be in order in giving his reasons why this article should not be admitted free into Canada; but he is not in order in making an attack on the Government for what occurred during the recent war.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I respect what the Chairman has said. But I say we should not allow this nickel to enter free of duty until we compel the United States to take its duty off our nickel. We are letting in free nickel refined in the United States, but the United States Government put a tax on our nickel. The very men who control these ores, after they got the right to ship them out of Canada to refineries of their own in the United States, went straight to Congress and got a prohibitive duty put upon pure nickel coming into that country from Canada, made out of ores that could be found only in Canada. That thing has never been settled. It has got to be settled, and it is one of the things that will have to be settled in the same way as the German control of zinc. I call the minister's attention to it—he may or may not explain it—but it has got to be settled, and I want to know whether the minister who has control of mines will bring down to this House any letter or circular that he has received from the British Government in connection with non-ferrous metals, of which nickel is one.

I may tell the Government that I am going into this matter later on, and the best place to fight it out may be in the country amongst the people. I never saw so much feeling in Canada as I have found to exist in connection with this nickel question. It is a shame that we should allow to come free into this country nickel which has been smelted by companies outside of Canada, who do not pay any business profit taxes to the Dominion treasury, who will not disclose the precious metal contents of the ores they take out of this country and who have renigged on every occasion as regards the payment of every just tax imposed upon them by the province of Ontario.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A certain part only of what my hon. friend has said is relevant to the item under discussion, and I confess I do not pretend to be able to follow him with regard to many things he has said. He has put forward rumours that he has heard and things that he has read, but there is before this Committee nothing definite to which reply can be made. The item under consideration is No. 356, which provides for the free admission into Canada of nickel in bars and rods, strips, sheets or plates. There is no change in that item; it has been in the tariff, and the reason why nickel has been on the free list is because nickel is not manufactured in Canada. I do not see the reason at the present time for putting a duty upon nickel which has hitherto been admitted free, when there are under construction in Canada large nickel refineries at Port Colborne and Deschenes Falls, which will provide for all our requirements and also for a large quantity of nickel for export. Those who have established these industries are not asking for any duty upon nickel, and I do not follow my hon. friend when he speaks about the national policy requiring us to put a duty upon nickel which has hitherto borne no duty, which is to be manufactured here to a quantity away beyond the needs of this country and upon which the manufacturers ask no duty. That is the position as regards the item in question. My hon. friend has put out vague statements as to the Government's being at fault with regard to permitting the exportation of nickel from this country during the war. The Dominion Government, from the very beginning of this war, has worked in the closest possible accord and understanding with the British Government as regards nickel.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The same thing was done in Australia and what was the result?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is this difference between myself and my hon. friend: that I have absolute confidence in the British Government.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Why were firms associated with members of the British Government fined?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not for one moment follow my hon. friend when he challenges the integrity of the Prime Minister of the British Empire, Mr. Lloyd George, in connection with this matter.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I do challenge it as far as the supervision of nickel is concerned, and I do so on my responsibility as a member—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend, and I very much deprecate his doing it. When I was in England in the fall of 1916—there was agitation then about nickel in this country—I consulted personally with members of the British Government, amongst others with Mr. Bonar Law, in whom also I have the most absolute and implicit confidence, and I say that the Dominion Government's action throughout has been absolutely unquestioned and approved by the British Government, which was our senior partner in fighting this war. Suppose that in 1914 the Dominion Government had shut off the exportation of nickel matte from this country. Great Britain was pouring out millions of dollars into the United States for munitions and other supplies, the manufacture of which required nickel. Would we have been justified, after the declaration of war, in preventing the manufacturers of munitions required by the British Government from obtaining the matte with which to manufacture nickel? There were no refineries in this country.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Why were there not?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend raises the question: Why were there not? I am dealing with the situation that existed in 1916 and with the charge put forward that the Government should not have allowed nickel matte to go out of this country. If we had not allowed nickel matte to go out of this country Great Britain would not have been able to obtain the munitions with which she was fighting the war. The British Government had to have available nickel in the United States for the manufacture of munitions and other supplies. The Dominion Government, through its officials, kept as close a supervision as was possible upon the output of nickel by the International Nickel Company. Mr. Graham Bell of the Railway Department, and, I think, another official visited the head office of that company on several occasions and checked up all receipts of nickel matte and all production of nickel. My hon. friend suggests that some of the nickel may possibly have got into the hands of Germans. I do not believe that is so, but it it were so, would the Dominion have been justified, there being no nickel refineries in this country, from shutting off the exportation of nickel matte, on which, as I have said, Great Britain depended for the manufacture of munitions for which she had contracts with the United States' manufacturers?

There is another thing I would call to the attention of the Committee. Had the action suggested by my hon. friend been taken, a difference of a very serious character would have arisen with the United States. The United States depends upon us for nickel matte, but this country depends upon the United States for coal, and the United States has treated us very generously with regard to coal. She has treated us most generously with regard to the coal we got last year and the year before. We depend also upon the United States for raw cotton. We must look at this question as statesmen. To come to the other point: My hon. friend says that the International Nickel Company pays a large business profits tax to the United States. So it should, if its earnings are such as to come within the scope of the United States law. The International Nickel Company is not a Canadian company; it is, as a company, absolutely outside of the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The International Nickel Company has no office in Canada, and so far as I am aware, does not carry on operations here. The operating company in this country is the Canadian Copper Company, and that company, which owns the mines here, under titles granted, I believe, by the Provincial Government, is assessed by the Dominion Government in respect of its excess profits, and we have found that company very ready and willing to pay the excess profits tax to the Dominion Government. I provided in the Business Profits Tax Act of 1915 that, where any contract existed between an outside company such as the International Nickel Company and the Canadian Copper Company operating in Canada, in determining the profits of the latter, regard should be had, not to the contractual price at which its product was purchased, but to a fair market price.

The reason for that provision was that an American company holding the stock of a Canadian subsidiary might make a contract at much less than a fair price. I submit that this Government is not to blame for not assessing the International Nickel Company, which is not within our jurisdiction. The only question that could arise is as to whether we have assessed—and we have—the Canadian Copper Company, which is alone within our jurisdiction.

My hon. friend has spoken about a national policy to develop the nickel industry. I have pointed out to him that two large plants are in process of construction in this country. The Ontario Government required the refining of ore by refineries in Ontario, and as a result we have a large refinery going up at Port Colborne, and there is another large refinery in course of erection by the British-Canadian Nickel Company at Deschenes Falls. So I do not see what ground my hon. friend has for his statement that there has been dereliction on the part of this Government in framing a national policy for developing the resources of this country, or what ground he has for saying that there has been failure to collect the business profits tax. We must deal with facts as they are, and we were obliged in war time to have regard to the international condition that existed and the supreme necessity of the British Government obtaining nickel for the use of its armies in France and Flanders.

My hon. friend puts forward the view that some tremendous revelation is about to take place involving governments, in connection with their acts respecting nickel. I want to say as a member of this Government that we have worked absolutely in accord and in perfect understanding with the British Government, and I cannot understand this House blaming the Dominion Government for co-operating in time of war with its senior partner, which has played the greatest part in this war, and the integrity of whose Government I never shall question.

If my hon. friend has anything to say respecting what this Government has done with regard to nickel, let him put forward his facts, so that we may answer them. I think I am just about as jealous of the conduct of this Government in time of war as is my hon. friend or any other member of this House, and I do not relish the suggestion that this Dominion Government has in any way played into the hands of the enemy in time of war. I took the matter up, as I have already said, with the members of the British Government, and this Government has an absolutely clean conscience in the matter. If my hon. friend has any charges to make against us touching our conduct of this war, let him bring them forward specifically, instead of simply making insinuations.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I want to answer one or two points of the minister. First of all he says that the International Nickel Company is a corporation outside the jurisdiction of Canada. As a matter of fact it has taken itself out of the jurisdiction of New Jersey, where it was compelled to pay $3,500,000 of its profits in taxation in one year. It has come to Canada; it is here now, and is a Canadian organization.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is incorrect in his statement.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am not. The International Nickel Company has its head office to-day in Toronto. It has advertised that it has left the United States.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is confusing the International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited, with the other company.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am speaking of the company that controls the products of our mines, and I say that its head office is in Toronto. If the United States could get this amount of taxation out of the profits this company made on the metal which they got from Canada, why was not our policy such as to compel the company to refine the metal in this country? This is a key industry. Sir Alfred Mond, who is head of the nickel trust, and a member of the Lloyd George Government, said in the statement I have referred to: "We have the key industry of the world in nickel, and we have it in Wales. We have it in Wales because we bring our ores from Canada, and Canada does not interfere with us." British workmen get the work that Canadian workmen should have. All this ore should be smelted in Canada, but we have not got a national policy in that respect. He says that none of this metal, so far as he knows, got into Germany. I should like to know where the Deutschland got its cargo of nickel which it took over. It was the nickel refined by the International Nickel Company in New Jersey, refined from the ore taken out of the Sudbury mines. Some hon. member says that the Germans did not get our nickel. If the German undersea campaign had succeeded, and they hoped it would, and if the United States had kept out of the war, they would have continued to supply the German munitions factories and plants with nickel from Canadian mines.

Mr. M. CLARK: Would my hon. friend say that if there was a risk of a little getting to Germany, the whole supply to Britain should be cut off?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: If we had control of this key industry, and if Britain or the United States wanted the nickel in a war in which we were associated with them, we should say to them: We want to check this metal off so as to make sure it will not get to the enemy. Before the United States entered the war, factories and foundries all over that country which required nickel for commercial purposes, as they alleged, could get a free supply. As we possessed this key metal, we should have insisted on checking it up. What I proposed at that time on the platform and in the press was that if our nickel had to be refined in the United States because we had no refinery in this country, the refined product should afterwards be sent to Canada, and we would dole it out to Great Britain and the United States. The United States to-day, I have been given to understand, had made an arrangement with this Government whereby they are to be allowed to take out of our country for their own war purposes our raw nickel ore. There has been no disclosure of that fact so far. The Minister of Finance said that I had made no direct charges against the Government, and that I should bring them forward if I have any disclosures to make. I am not in a position to make them yet, but they are coming along in a way which shows that the policy of Canada in regard to nickel has been improvident in every respect. We are not making those who control this nickel industry pay taxation.

The Mond Company of Wales, which is making enormous profits out of the nickel that it smelts from ores which it can only get in Canada, does not pay a dollar into the treasury of this country. I would bring these men out here and put them in the witness box just as the American Government did. It seized their books and found out just what they were doing and made them pay a tax on their war profits. We have up at Sudbury a belt of country thirty miles across, containing the greatest store of precious metals in the world. We have not got this nickel industry under control. We did not control it for some time during the war, and we do not control it to-day. Outsiders control it; it is controlled in England and in the United States.

This key metal would give us absolute control of the steel industry not only of Canada but of the world, and I want to press on my friends from Nova Scotia who are interested in the steel industry, as well as my other friends, that we should have control of this nickel industry and compel refinement. The United States Government has never had any confidence in the International Nickel Company or the American Armour Trust associated with it in connection with United States steel, and that is why they made that contract with the British-American Company. If an industry is being established in Canada at Deschenes it is because the British Government have guaranteed bonds for millions of dollars for the purpose. The British Government will no longer deal with the International Nickel Company and the Armour Trust who endeavoured to make them pay enormous prices for nickel steel for ships. They are looking to Canada, and the United States Government would co-operate with this country in controlling this great industry. We have had it in Canada for twenty years and it is not under our control. Outside companies come in and do what they like with it, and these very companies who are allowed to bring in their nickel free into this country actually went to Washington and conspired to prevent our nickel going in there, with the result that they got a prohibitive duty put on. With regard to the question of accepting the assurances of the British Government, this is all very well, but the British Government have given assurances of all kinds, and the revelations that are now being made in England, after the assurances of the British Government, are simply astounding as to the extent of German intrigue there. I have even heard of the case of a great insurance company in Great Britain that had an immense trust fund for the benefit of its policy holders, and during the war the fact was disclosed that a great portion of this trust fund had been suddenly, by a peculiar influence, switched over to the purchase of bonds of German municipalities and the improvement of German industries. That was only one case. The revelations in England are not yet all in the public knowledge but they are coming out, and they show that intrigue was so extensive that it permeated all America and Canada. From whatever source it originated it has worked to the detriment of Canada for twenty years, and indeed longer, for it is more than twenty years ago since Dr. Mond discovered that Canada had this store of nickel and sought to get control of it, succeeding in a measure. We have been talking about a national policy in this country, but the two Governments in the past have failed to have that industry established in this country and to compel it to pay its just share of taxes including, within the past few years, war taxes. These facts will come out and will be an issue before the country and I warn the minister and the Government that if they do not in the first place make this company disclose the precious metal contents of the ore which it takes from the country we will have no more business with them. Let us prohibit the taking of this ore out of Canada until these two great companies disclose its metal content. Why should we allow foreign companies—in which term I include British companies—to come in and take this most valuable ore which is the source of the great key metal that controls the whole steel and iron industry of the world? The only defence advanced at present is that this Government has every confidence in the British Government and accepts its assurances. After my examination of the subject, and I have looked into it pretty closely, I cannot accept those assurances. I do not think Lord Northcliffe or the American Government will accept them, because they all know better now, and I think it is high time there should be a declaration by a Canadian Government, after the experience of this war and in view of the knowledge we have of German intrigue, that henceforth we will control these ores in this industry and will not allow a pound of ores to be refined outside of Canada. We should be masters of the situation and dole out these ores ourselves, and if they contain any precious metal, as I believe they do, we should compel the companies that operate here to disclose the fact. I hope the time will come when Canada, with its expensive metallurgical and mineralogical department, will make it possible for the refinement of our nickel in our own country and ascertain the contents of these ores, not only as regards nickel but as regards other precious metals, and also undertake the distribution of it. Time after time public attention has been called to this matter, and the Opposition is just as derelict as the Government may have been. The same thing happened in the province of Ontario in connection with nickel. A clever Order in Council was drawn one day which gave the absolute title to these nickel mines to foreign companies, when, as I contend, they should have been kept on lease. Now, Mr. Chairman, I know that you are going to call me to order, but I have been replying to the minister. I have called the attention of the Government to something in regard to which the people of Canada will demand a satisfactory explanation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Chairman, I cannot allow the remarks of my hon. friend to pass unchallenged. He has made what I regard as a tissue of misstatements. I ask him whether, as a responsible member of this House he thinks that any good national purpose is served by his calling in question the good faith of the British Government merely upon rumours which he says he has not substantiated, and upon revelations which he says are about to be made but of which he confesses he knows absolutely nothing.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: No, he doesn't say—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. This debate shows how far the Committee may wander when it once leaves the clause or item under consideration. Probably the Chairman is primarily responsible for not having called the hon. member (Mr. Maclean) to order earlier in the debate, but I trust that hon. members will now keep strictly to the subject under consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is one point about that matter, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I have ruled that no discussion may take place concerning what occurred during the war.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this concerning the war? It has been disclosed that metal which is classed under the head of copper or nickel goes out of this country. The hon. member for South York says that other metals of greater value are included. Are we not inquiring into that question?

The CHAIRMAN: No. This item has nothing to do with any metal which leaves the country. It merely covers the importation of nickel in bars and rods, strips, sheets or plates.

On item 384a being again called:

Mr. BUREAU: The member for Red Deer asked a question of the Minister of Finance as to why these articles were put free on the list, and the minister replied that it was to give effect to an Order in Council which had been previously passed. I have not the same faith in the Order in Council as has the hon. member (Mr. Clark). This Order in Council does not satisfy me. Will the minister go further and tell us what inspired it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The object of the Order in Council was to promote the galvanizing of iron and steel bands, etc., in Canada, which would otherwise have been done outside of this country if the raw materials mentioned were not admitted free. The Order in Council, which is under the general law, therefore, provided for the free admission of the articles mentioned when imported for use in the manufacture of the finished products. We are now embodying in the statute what has been provided for by Order in Council for the purpose of ensuring the galvanizing in Canada of that which would otherwise be galvanized outside of Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the date of the Order in Council?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: January 19, 1919.

Item agreed to.

Item 386:

Rolled iron or steel, and cast steel, in bars, bands, hoop, scroll, strip, sheet or plate, of any size, thickness or width, and steel blanks for the manufacture of milling cutters when of greater value than three and one-half cents per pound.....7½ p.c. 12½ p.c. 12½ p.c.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the object of this addition?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To bring it into conformity with item 384, which we have changed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the object of the amendment?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Item 386 of the present tariff is as follows:

Rolled iron or steel and cast steel, in bars, bands, hoop, scroll, strip, sheet or plate, of any size, thickness or width, galvanized or coated with any material or not, and steel blanks for the manufacture of milling cutters, when of greater value than three and one-half cents per pound.....Free. 5 p.c. 5 p.c.

To which was added the 7½ per cent war tax. It is necessary under this partial revision, which we are making to take out of the item the words "galvanized or coated with any material or not," which now appear in item 384. That necessitates the reenactment of item 386.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it an oversight?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was an oversight.

Item 386 agreed to.

On items:

446. Cultivators, harrows, horserakes, seed drills, manure spreaders and weeders and complete parts thereof....10 p.c. 15 p.c. 15 p.c.

446b. Ploughs and complete parts thereof.....12½ p.c. 17½ p.c. 17½ p.c.

Mr. MAHARG: Would the minister explain to the committee, if he can, why ploughs carry a higher duty than the articles mentioned in item 446? It seems to me if he is looking to the interest of the new settler, and if we are to have any difference whatever, these figures should be reversed. The plough is the one essential that every man must have. With regard to these other articles three or four settlers can club together and get them but the plough is something that each must have. He cannot join in with his neighbours in the purchase of a plough as he can with regard to some of the articles mentioned in item 446. I would like the minister to explain why the difference is made as between these articles.

Mr. M. CLARK: Before the minister answers, I would like to enforce what has been said by my hon. friend from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg). What I propose to say may help the minister in giving a little study to this matter before he appoints his commission and it may lessen the work of the commission in the revision which is to precede the next Budget. I need scarcely explain to the minister that the plough, in agricultural operations, precedes the harrow, the manure spreader, the seed drill or the rake. In the figures of these two items we have a striking example of how easy it is for a tariff to be an unscientific thing. It would surely be the scientific procedure to make it easier to get the plough. I am thinking especially of the breaking plough. I remember very well in my earlier years, my poor boy who is now sleeping peacefully in France, tackled the willows in a piece of breaking as manfully as he tackled the Huns, and he said "Father, some of these roots must have been there since the time of Abraham." They looked like it. Would it not be a scientific tariff which may help the early settler especially in the matter of the breaking plough to get that implement which, I can assure the minister, requires nerve and strength to use?

The minister yesterday in a very able and interesting speech—his speeches are always able and interesting to me and I am sorry that one cannot avow the same sponsorship for that which they contain as for the way in which he delivers them—expressed the opinion that if he had some of us in the Finance Department for one week he would make us tariff men. Just to go to the other end of the proposition on this tariff question, may I say to the minister, that if I had him out on the farm and with a breaking plough up against some of those roots, which have been there since the time of Abraham, I would make him a no tariff man in no time at all. He should take it up in the department and say: "Breadner, for goodness sake, let us look into this thing and see if we cannot get the duty off breaking ploughs altogether." I hope my hon. friend will not think I am hostile to him when I am helping him in connection with the coming tariff revision, to arrive at a scientific tariff on breaking ploughs. He says: "Produce"; then he makes dear the very first implement you must have to get out those awful willow roots, and they are fearful things to tackle. I am not sure but that the German business was about as easy as those willow roots. I hope my hon. friend will give attention to this matter. Would he not look into it on his own initiative without any more prodding from the western members and see why this duty on ploughs should be larger than on the other implements which follow the plough? I cannot understand how he has arrived at these figures unless it be strictly on the line of Scripture. On tariff matters Scripture ought to be left out sometimes: "Unto him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not even that which he hath shall be taken away." That must be the guidance of my hon. friend in making the difficulties greatest at the very beginning of the settler's operations. I hope my hon. friend will take these matters into his consideration and I would like him to do it now unless there is something special about the plough industry which requires this protection.

I am told they are selling these ploughs in the United States quite freely. In that case, why should we not have free ploughs?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A plough is one of the most competitive articles, as far as business is concerned, of agricultural implements, and that competition is exceedingly keen from outside of Canada. There was a duty of twenty-seven and-a-half per cent, including the customs war tax upon ploughs, but we made a reduction to seventeen and-a-half per cent. I might say to my hon. friend that our mode of approach to the partial revision of the agricultural implement schedule, has been to reduce the duties as far as we could without doing material damage to established industries in this country. I have no hesitation in saying to my hon. friend that, whether I am correct or not, my belief is that if we had reduced the duties further than we have at this revision, we should have closed out many industries of this country employing thousands of men at the present time, and personally I would not take the responsibility of considering that. The partial revision which we have made this year represents a sincere effort on the part of the Government, at a time of great instability and fiscal difficulty to meet so far as we could, the request made by members of the House, and by the Western community, for a reduction in the duty on agricultural implements. Now to show my two hon. friends how close a calculation is made in connection with a matter of this kind, I would say to them, that when in 1914 we reduced the duties upon binders we made a most careful examination into the question, and we found that if we had gone down to ten per cent we would have, without any question and beyond peradventure, closed up the International Harvester Company at Hamilton, thrown out of employment its operatives and transferred the business to the plant in Chicago. I do not think I can answer my hon. friends any more clearly than that, in order to convey to them at least my point of view.

The hon. member for Red Deer has spoken of a " scientific tariff." I do not recall that I have used that expression, although it is used by others, but I think I know what is meant. It is not a happy term, because I doubt if there is such a thing as a scientific tariff. But those who use the term have this in mind: That in considering what tariff duties should be imposed in respect of a particular commodity manufactured in Canada, regard should be had to the duties upon the raw material that is entering into the production of the article or articles in question—the duty upon coal, which is a factor of cost in production, the duty upon machinery, the labour conditions in Canada, and other items of cost upon which it is unnecessary for me to dwell.

Mr. BUREAU: Including the maker of the article.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are many makers of articles in Canada that appear to have a very substantial so-called protection, and if regard is had to the duties upon their raw material and upon the other articles which I have mentioned and to their costs, it is rather exceptional to find abnormal profits. My hon. friend knows that, and I am inclined to think that coming as he does from the province of Quebec which, if not the greatest, is a very great manufacturing province, he would not, I think, if he were standing in my place, assume the responsibility, as I said yesterday, of taking off all the duties at this time, or at any other time for that matter, upon the products manufactured by those engaged in production in this province who have to pay, the duties in respect of their raw material, and are confronted with the other items of cost to which I have alluded

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not know why the hon. member for Red Deer should single out the Breaker plough in order to " break " an industry. However, I did not rise for the purpose of rebutting the hon. gentleman's argument; I simply want to know why the term " complete parts " is used, and is it intended when the part is incomplete to charge a different duty from that which is levied in the case of a complete part? The term is rather ambiguous and somewhat contradictory, it appears to me, and I want to know why the word " complete " is used in several places?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The expression to which my hon. friend has called attention, " complete parts," is that which has been used for years past in the tariff and it covers repairs. The idea of course was—I need not say this to my hon. friend—that if, let us say, an agricultural implement is imported free, but a duty is levied in respect of parts, the purchaser of an agricultural implement would consider that fact. He would not like to buy an agricultural implement without being able to obtain the parts, and the question of the duty upon the parts is a very important one in the schedule dealing with these products. I understand that incomplete parts are manufactured but not sold to the consumer.

Mr. MAHARG: There is something further to be explained in regard to incomplete parts. Take ploughshares for instance. We used to bring ploughshares into Canada and I understand without being bored; that is the bolt holes were not made in the shares; the factory making them left it for the purchaser over here to bore or punch those holes. It was to get over that, I understand, that the word "complete" was used in order that these things could not enter the country unless they were absolutely in shape to go on to the article they were required for. Why they want to draw the line I cannot understand, unless it was for the benefit of some particular concern in Canada.

Mr. HENDERS: I think it would be well that in connection with the fixing of the duty on ploughs, consideration should be given to the suggestions made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) and the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg). As I understand it we have two very large concerns that are manufacturing the major portion of the ploughs of Canadian make that are used in Canada at the present time, and these firms have been in business since the very inception of the national policy. They have had all the fostering of the National Policy up to now, and at the proper time I think it would be wise to consider whether they have not had all the fostering that they deserve.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask the hon. gentleman who the two great concerns are that manufacture all the ploughs?

Mr. HENDERS: The Massey Harris and the Brantford people.

Mr. BUREAU: Brantford?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Cockshutt.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Answering a little further the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), I would refer him to Article 444 of the tariff, which provides for the free admission of mould boards, shares or plough plates and other plates for agricultural implements, when cut to shape from rolled plates of steel, but not moulded, punched, polished or otherwise manufactured. So what he has in mind has been provided for; those incomplete parts are free.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. MAHARG: Provided they are completely finished?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, not finished. Article 444 that I called the hon. member's attention to admits free of duty mould boards, shares or plough plates, etc., when they are cut to shape, but not moulded, punched, polished or otherwise manufactured. That is the plain sheet.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: With no purpose whatever to retard the item, I would like to say one word with regard to a remark from my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). There was not a syllable I uttered which would indicate in regard to the matter before the House that I spoke for any one else than the farmers of the entire Dominion. I have as much sympathy with the difficulties, and especially the early difficulties, which were enormous, of the farmers of Ontario as with those of the farmers of the West. I think my hon. friend from Brantford will find that the point I tried to raise in a perfectly courteous and parliamentary way, drawing my illustration from the West, is interesting the farmers of Ontario to-day just as much as it is the farmers of the West. I am no sectional man in this matter. I believe—we all believe, that agriculture is the basic industry of the entire country. I just wanted to say that in a perfectly courteous but firm way to my hon. friend. I do not understand what good purpose he wanted to serve in calling my attention to the rather elementary fact in Canadian history that there have been roots taken out of the soil in Ontario.

Mr. BUREAU: There are more to be taken out, too.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: I have a matter that I would like to call to the attention of the Minister of Finance, although I am not quite sure that I am in order in doing so. It is in regard to the admission of machinery into this country for the development of new industries. If there is one thing more than another that we should encourage at the present time and for many years to come, I think it is the development of new industries. I am advised that we have very large deposits of shale in this country from which oil of a very good quality may be procured. I am also advised that there is a duty upon the machinery which would have to be imported for the treatment of the shale. If that is so, and I believe I am correct, it seems to me that it would be the part of wisdom for the Finance Minister and the Government and the people of Canada generally to encourage this industry, which is hardly established in our country, by absolutely removing the duty on any machinery required to reduce the shale from which oil may be procured.

I will give you an instance, Mr. Chairman, of what occurred in the territory which I represent in regard to dredging. Many years ago dredging was in its infancy in the Yukon; to-day it is a highly developed branch of the mining industry. When we were looking around for capital to invest in the gold dredging industry of the Yukon to mine our low grade gravel, we found that one of the obstacles to the investment of capital was the duty on gold mining dredges. There were practically no gold mining dredges in Canada at that time, or at least very few. I went to the then Finance Minister, the predecessor of my hon. friend, and explained the situation to him. He removed the duty. The immediate result of that was that we succeeded in establishing in the Yukon a very profitable industry in the way of gold dredging, in which to-day I think we have invested probably $4,000,000. We have two of the largest gold dredging machines in the world, machines that will dredge 14,000 cubic yards per day.

We have many minerals in the Yukon besides gold. We have tungsten, which is to-day a very valuable mineral; but in order to mine it successfully in competition with the other countries of production we have to have machinery, and that machinery is not now manufactured in Canada. Therefore I think it would be wise for us to permit machinery of that kind to come in free. We have antimony, copper, tin, and platinum—all these require a certain quantity of machinery to mine successfully.

Mr. EDWARDS: Are the machines you speak of made in Canada?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: No. That is the point I am making, that these machines are not manufactured in Canada. If the minister cannot see his way clear to put these machines on the free list now, I hope he will do so when the tariff is being revised, as I understand it is likely to be within the present year. I am satisfied, from the experience we have had in the Yukon, that any legislation of that kind will bring excellent rewards.

Mr. EDWARDS: I would like to say a word along the line of my hon. friend from the Yukon. In the constituency which I represent we have, perhaps, the largest and the purest deposits of feldspar in the Dominion. Most of that feldspar is mined and sent in the crude state to the United States, where it is ground into the finished article, and that ground feldspar is then shipped back to Canada to be used in processes here. A few years ago one of the companies operating in my county undertook to put up a plant for grinding the feldspar locally. I made representations to the Department of Customs and asked that the machinery for that purpose, which was not made in Canada, be allowed to come in free of duty, for the reason that we were endeavouring to start an entirely new industry. That request was acceded to and the new industry was established. I think that is a step in the right direction. I entirely concur with the remarks of my hon. friend, though I do not see the necessity, perhaps, of putting the item on the free list. A remission of duty might be made to those desiring to introduce machinery for the purpose of establishing new industries.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Before we leave this item, I would like to refer to the matter in this light. The hon. minister, I believe, said that if the rate of duty had been reduced beyond the point herein outlined many of these manufacturing concerns would have had to close down, necessitating workmen being laid off.

From the other standpoint, we must take into consideration, as pointed out by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), the fact that the plough is the one implement every man going on to the land must have. That is the starting point, and if he finds that this implement is costing him more than he can afford to pay, that is likely to keep many people from going on to the land. As pointed out by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders), there are in Canada few manufacturers of ploughs. A manufacturer is manufacturing ploughs and has to have a tariff of 17½ per cent, and yet at the same time he is manufacturing cultivators and harrows and is getting along with a tariff of 15 per cent on those articles. I cannot understand why there should be these different rates. If he can get along with a tariff of 15 per cent on cultivators, I think, as pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer, the tariff should be reversed and the 15 per cent duty charged on ploughs.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: We have got into a general discussion on the tariff, and I am not going away from the actual question before the committee now, but I wish to say this, in connection with these reductions on agricultural implements for the benefit of the people of the West, that I am a firm believer in a national policy and the encouragement of industries of all kinds in Canada. But I want to tell the manufacturers of Canada that there will be much greater agitation for still further reductions if they as a body throughout this country, endorse the resolution that was passed in Toronto the other day against public ownership of railways. If that is traced back to the so-called reconstruction organization in Toronto which is dealing with tariff questions, there will be more demand in this country for tariff reductions of this kind than there ever was in the past, and that will all come out of this fact, that the manufacturers of Ontario, from their association assembled in Toronto the other day, called upon the Government to go no further in the matter of public ownership of railways. Perhaps they were trying to prevent the taking over of the Grand Trunk. It will get very rapidly into the minds of the people of the West, as it will into mine, why the manufacturers should step aside from their special mission in order to warn this Government and this Parliament, which has the jurisdiction in this case, that they must not go any further in the matter of public ownership of railways.

Mr. PEDLOW: Would the minister explain the reason for the different classifications of farm implements for taxation purposes?

As most of these are manufactured in one shape or form in this country, I cannot see why there should be a variation in the protection afforded or the duty collected. For instance, the item under consideration, No. 446, names 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 15 per cent. Then the five succeeding items that have not yet come under discussion, but which are in the same line of products, are classified under a different classification and a different rate of duty collected in each case. Why should they not all come under the same tariff schedule? They are farm implements; they are manufactured in Canada and many of them are manufactured in the same shop. He can certainly get along with the same rates on ploughs or if he must have 17½ on some articles why should a rate of 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 15 per cent be charged on cultivators, harrows and so forth, and 12½ per cent, 17½ per cent and 17½ per cent on ploughs? These two items are produced by the same workmen in the same shops.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is my hon. friend's idea that they should all be subject to a duty of 17½ per cent?

Mr. PEDLOW: No, I think they should all be subject to a duty of 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 15 per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS: The reason why I asked that question was because my hon. friend apparently last night was willing to let them stay at 20 per cent. I do not understand how he can advocate a reduction now and say he wants them all reduced to 15 per cent. He certainly put himself on record as being opposed to the reduction which is being made.

Mr. PEDLOW: It would be well for the hon. member to explain how he arrives at that conclusion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The variation in duties is not peculiar to this partial revision of the schedule. The variation has existed for many years.

Mr. PEDLOW: Why?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I explained a few moments ago, I think, pretty fully as to why. My predecessor, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) had, under his tariff of 1907, a duty on binders of 17½ per cent, and upon cultivators, ploughs, harrows, etc., of 20 per cent. (I am quoting the general tariff.) Upon hay loaders, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, etc., the duty under his tariff was 25 per cent.

Mr. BUREAU: That is twenty-two years ago.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, it is not twenty-two years ago, if I may correct my hon. friend; it is twelve years ago, but many modifications have been made since then. For example, we have been able to reduce the duty on binders to 12½ per cent, as I stated a little while ago. Many facts must be taken into consideration. In the first place, there is the question of market, and of volume of business capable of being transacted. For example, the Massey-Harris Company, which is one of the largest concerns in the world, has an immense overseas trade, and I need not tell hon. members that the cost of production depends upon the volume of business. In the case of the International Harvester Company and the Massey Harris Company in connection with a standard article like binders, the duty required after taking into account the duties on raw materials, is not as high as upon an article like a plough which is subject to highly competitive conditions in this country and where the export volume is not as great as in the case of the other article. All these facts have to be taken into account by a Minister of Finance in adjusting the tariff. We might as well make a plain statement about the matter. I think the previous Minister of Finance would say, as I say, that, if to-day, without taking the duty practically off everything that enters into production, we should substantially reduce those duties say five or ten per cent, we would close up those plants. Hon. gentlemen might say: Close them up. There are $70,000,000 invested in those plants, and they employ thousands of men. I will give to the Committee an example that I have in mind at the moment. A year or so ago, in the interest of increased production, we put tractors valued at $1,400 and under upon the free list. Those engaged in the business suffered an immediate and very heavy loss last year, and a great part of the machinery which was manufacturing before is still closed down to-day, and many men have been thrown out of work. The condition of that industry is at present precarious in the extreme, and we can bring all those others to the same condition by just taking the duty off, but I submitted to the House yesterday and I submit to the Committee to-day: Is it in the national interest to do so?

Mr. M. CLARK: I should be very sorry to admit that the minister has, in the last utterance we have heard from him, exhausted the statesmanlike wisdom of which he is capable on this question. I do not believe that the men who are making ploughs are of such weak fibre as my hon. friend represents. I refuse to believe that. I have a personal acquaintance with some hon. gentlemen who are engaged in the plough business and those of them that I know are very, very strong men, men of good fibre. I am sure they would not be put out of business so easily.

There is another side to this question about putting men out of business and throwing men out of work. Is my hon. friend aware that 4,000,000 people have come to Canada since the year 1900? I have heard that phrase "national policy" thrown about here this morning, as if we were not in favour of a national policy. I am tired of hearing that phrase, as if it were the exclusive possession of one particular school of political thought. I believe in a national policy, beginning from the farm upwards, beginning from the coal and the steel and the iron, which we have just had an illustration of in one of the schedules which we passed this morning. Four million people have come to Canada since 1900, but our total population has not appreciably increased in that time. Would it not be a true national policy to find out what is sending these men out of the country almost as fast as they are coming in? That is the other side to this question, and I submit to the minister, rather more emphatically than I need perhaps, but I can assure him that I speak in emphasis and not in anger, that it is worth looking into. I do not like to be personal in this matter, but I should like to ask my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) if he really believes that the people who are engaged in the plough business are such weak specimens of Canadians that the taking off of the 2½ per cent necessary to put ploughs on the same level as manure spreaders, harrows, drills, and other implements would put these great manufacturing concerns out of business in Canada. I do not believe it, and that is pretty straight talk. I do not believe for a moment that it would put them out of business; I am too good a Canadian to believe it, I believe that Canadians have a little power of competition in them. They were able to compete on the battlefield, and I shall believe in their power of competition in the plough factory, until it seems they are not of the same type of Canadians as competed elsewhere.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Would it be fair to the manufacturers of ploughs and other agricultural implements, in view of the duties they have to pay on iron and steel and the other commodities that form their raw material, and upon coal which they use in their manufactures and upon the machinery which they employ in their processes, to expect them to pay the duties on all these raw materials if the duty was taken off their finished product? I do not believe my hon. friend will say that that is good sense. I am sure he will say that if the duty is to be taken off their finished product, it should be taken off all these raw materials that enter into that product. That leads us to the question whether in the national interests—I do not speak in any narrow sense—I do not say for a moment that my hon. friend has not a national policy, as well as the rest of us, in the broad sense — it would be possible or expedient to take the duties off all of these products of our great industries. I say that if he were Minister of Finance for a week he would not and could not consider it. I said yesterday that the way to make a man a tariff man—I do not say a high tariff man, but a man who favoured raising a very large portion of our revenue from the tariff—was to make him Minister of Finance. Why? Because the bills are coming in every day and they have to be paid. Millions and tens of millions of dollars have to be found, and the money must be in the bank to pay our accounts. We could not find that money without a tariff. No Government in this country since Confederation has found it without a tariff. I am not speaking of whether a tariff should be high, intermediate, or low; I was only putting forward the view yesterday that the Minister of Finance in any administration will look to the tariff for a very large proportion of his revenue.

Mr. M. CLARK: The minister has asked me whether I would knock the duty off altogether. That is not a fair question under the circumstances. I am only asking for the 2½ per cent to be taken off so as to place ploughs on the same footing as manure spreaders. I am glad that the minister is taking my ground that the proper way is to begin with the coal and the iron and the steel. I want to put a question to the minister. The Western farmer has no protection at all, and his argument is that under this thing called the national policy you have to keep the duty on coal and iron and steel and ploughs, and load the whole thing on to the Western farmer. Is that a square deal? I say it is not.

At one o'clock the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MAHARG: The minister pointed to the duty on the raw material entering into the manufacture of these machines as one reason why there had to be a duty on the finished article. If I understand aright there is provision in the Budget for a rebate of a certain percentage of the duty on raw materials. I think it amounts to 30 per cent. Does that apply to all implements or only to those dealt with in the Budget?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Those dealt with in the Budget.

Mr. MAHARG: Taking into consideration that rebate of the duty and the reduction in the freight, is the manufacturer of these articles not in practically the same position as he was before? In other words, the reduction in the duty is practically offset by the rebate of the duty on raw materials and reduction in the freight rates, which leaves him in practically the same position as before.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not in quite as good a position, he is bearing a part of the loss. I might point out what I have often pointed out in Committee and to the House: that the existing tariff is to be regarded as a structure. If the duties are reduced on a finished article there must be some modification, generally speaking, with regard to the duties on raw material and other articles purchased by the manufacturer for his production. When the 1907 tariff was devised duties were fixed upon that basis. If, for example, a change is made in a duty, then there is, generally speaking, some corresponding change necessitated in consequence in regard to raw material. The duties on agricultural implements have been fixed having regard to the factors which I mentioned this morning and which I shall not have to repeat to the Committee. In considering the question of how we could make a reduction in the existing duties we provided for the draw back to which my hon. friend has referred and also for a revision of the freight rates which would give a certain advantage. But if you take all the advantages that have been given both by way of draw back and freight reduction, the manufacturers are still bearing a portion of the reduction. I will say to my hon. friend, as I have said to the House, that we have approached this matter with a sincere desire to do all we could this year to meet the requests put forward for lower duties on agricultural implements, consistently with not doing a national damage by closing up very many establishments engaged in this industry. If I were asked whether we could have gone a half point or a point more I would sincerely say to the House that I could not say, nor could any one else. That is one reason why a deliberately considered tariff revision is necessary before duties can be finally fixed. I say quite frankly to my hon. friend, and to the Committee, that in our judgment we have done the best we could in the existing situation.

Mr. ROBB: The Minister of Finance made reference to the changes in the duty on agricultural implements and mentioned the freight concessions granted in regard to agricultural implements shipped to Western Canada. That does not apply in any way to the farmers of Eastern Canada. How will it be worked out?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With regard to the railway situation, they have water competition in Eastern Canada, and the question does not arise. But all farmers of Canada, so far as any advantage will accrue by reason of the reduction in the price of agricultural implements, will benefit because we are reducing the tariff upon agricultural implements, not only those sold in the West but those sold in other parts of Canada. There is water competition with the railways in the East, and what we had in mind was placing the manufacturer of implements in the East, as regards the market in the West, in as favourable a position, so far as freight rates are concerned, as his American competitor, who has had the advantage of him in that regard. There is a vast stretch of unproductive railway territory between the East and the West in Canada, and the freight charges which have to be met by the manufacturer in the East in competition with the American manufacturers, are a very serious item. We did not feel we were doing anything that was not strictly in accord with the national interest in placing the manufacturer of agricultural implements, so far as his Western market was concerned, in a fair position with his American competitor. The American competitor is not in as good a position as the Canadian manufacturer in Ontario and Quebec. I have been unable to appreciate the force of the argument that there has been a discrimination in regard to the freight reduction in favour of the West as against the East, especially in view of water competition.

Mr. ROBB: I think the minister misunderstands me. In what regard will the reduction in the freight rates be helpful to the Eastern farmer? The minister has referred to the competition in water rates. As a matter of fact, the manufacturer of agricultural implements in Toronto or Hamilton has the advantage of cheap water rates as far as Fort Willian on shipments to Western Canada. But these cheap water rates are of no value as regards the Eastern Townships, or the northern part of Ontario, or the interior points of New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia. If the manufacturer of agricultural implements in Chicago wishes to take advantage of cheap water rates he can get a water rate from Chicago to such assembling points as Toronto or Montreal, and in that way he will have an advantage over the Canadian manufacturer. That is the point I would like to have explained.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Speaking of freight rates as implicated in these tariff resolutions, I would point out that in government-owned railways, and in the Government having control of freight rates, lies the real adjustment of this great tariff issue that is now being considered in this Committee and that will come up in the country in a wide way. As regards the manufacturing interests of the East and the farmers of the West, the compromise between these conflicting territories lies in controlling the freight rates and in a reasonable tariff in the interests of the manufacturer, and the Government in regulating rates in this way is doing a great work. I desire to point out to the minister, as I had intended pointing out last night in the general discussion on the tariff, that the adjustment of this conflict between the farmers of the West and the manufacturers of the East in the obtaining of their rights, at the same time treating the Western farmer reasonably, lies in the Government controlling absolutely the freights of the country; and they will control it in no better way than by public ownership. That is why I regret that we have not had a full declaration before to-day that the Government had taken over the Grand Trunk, or that it is to be taken over shortly.

By controlling the great Transcontinental Railway system, controlling railway freights and ocean freights, there should be an adjustment. I am glad to hear the minister say that he is trying to find a solution in regard to freights even if only with reference to this one item of agricultural implements. I want to see Quebec, Ontario and the East in a position to maintain a reasonable national policy by the aid of the tariff. While that might create a grievance for the western farmer, it is open to Parliament to so adjust the freight rates as to set off any inconvenience or overcharge that the western farmer thinks he suffers from by reason of the tariff. I want to tell the western farmer that from my point of view there is nothing of greater value to him than controlled freight rates, not only railway and inland waterway, but especially, ocean freight rates. In working out the policy of this country there should be harmony established between the East and the West and there should be an arrangement which will allow manufactures in the East, especially in Ontario and Quebec, to be developed and to keep forever a portion of the market under fair competition in the West. As an offset against that, give the western farmer the advantage of an improvement in freight rate conditions. The minister has adopted this idea in controlling the freight rates even on these special articles. Carrying out this suggestion to a greater extent will be the solution of the conflict, and there is conflict. As one who believes somewhat in the national policy in regard to manufactures, I should say that the adjustment of that conflict will be reached by taking these two propositions together—the tariff and the relief that can be afforded to those who have to pay the freight rates. Let Parliament and the Government control these freight rates and especially the ocean freight rates.

Mr. BUREAU: Does my hon. friend lay it down as a proposition that Parliament should control and settle freight rates?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Through its control of the railways—yes; first of all getting control of the railway system and then getting control of the ocean freight rates. We have had control of railway rates for a long time but the farmer has got very little benefit from any reduction because whenever a reduction was made in freight rates, the ocean shipping combines took it all away. That still prevails. We have to take these two questions of the tariff and freight rates together. If we take these two conflicting interests of West and East and harmonize them by considering these two matters at the same time we will have a solution of the matter.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like to get a clearer statement from the minister in regard to the difference between the position of the eastern and western farmer as to freight rates. The reason that the minister has given does not apply, when he says that the eastern farmer has already the advantage of cheaper freight rates from points in Canada than the western farmer has. The western farmer has the advantage of cheaper rates from Chicago to points in Western Canada, and consequently the minister gives a reduction to the western purchaser of implements for the purpose of equalizing the rates for the western farmer between Toronto and other points in Eastern Canada and the West. If it is true that the rates from Boston to Halifax are less than the rates from Toronto to Halifax, the same reason applies, and the minister should reduce the freight rates from Toronto to Halifax to make them equal to the low water rate that he speaks about. Perhaps the minister can give us the rates from points in the United States such as Boston to Halifax, St. John and Sydney, and points in the vicinity of Toronto to Halifax, St. John and Sydney. The reason that has has given does not apply, I think, because the rates are not exactly on the same footing. At the same time, if this advantage is to be given to the western farmer, I claim that it should be given to the eastern farmer as well.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair), I would say there is no discrimination whatever against the eastern farmer. Let me explain what the situation is. Freight rates from points west of Montreal and the Canadian Northwest were higher than from Chicago to points in the Canadian Northwest. On the other hand, freight rates from points west of Montreal to the Maritime Provinces are not higher than freight rates from Chicago to the Maritime Provinces. A condition of inequality existed before in regard to the West and a condition of equality in regard to the East. We have rectified the inequality existing in respect to the West and left the condition of equality respecting the East as it was. So much for that aspect of the matter. In regard to the price of implements—to the extent that the reduction of the tariff affects any reduction, the farmers all over Canada will get the benefit of it. I think I have covered both points. There is no discrimination in so far as freight rates are concerned, but only an equalizing of conditions which formerly were unequal. In so far as any advantages are to accrue to farmers by reason of the reduction which has been made in the duty on agricultural implements, the farmers of all Canada will participate in its on an equal basis.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Do I understand the minister to say that freight rates from Chicago to Halifax and St. John are higher than the freight rates from west of Montreal to the Maritime Provinces?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I said that they were no lower.

Mr. HAROLD: I think that the question of freight rates has been unduly magnified. I have figured it out on a number of implements on which a reduction has been granted and it averages only from three-quarters of one per cent to one per cent. I think the principle involved is perfectly right and that the Minister of Finance is to be congratulated upon having taken these steps. In relation to the water rates, as practically all the implements for the West are shipped in the winter season, because it would be impossible to carry over these implements in warehouses or factories until navigation opens, the factor of water freight does not enter into the question to any extent. Furthermore the implements would be injured more or less from the handling into and out of the boats. There is another point I would like to speak about because a very false impression has gone forth in reference to the cost of certain articles. I would like to refer to the Trade and Commerce report which shows that the total manufactures of these goods for the year 1917 was $32,000,000; cost of the raw material entering into the same was $16,000,000; or one-half the selling cost of the goods was represented by the cost of raw material. Then there is labour $10,000,000, making a cost of $26,000,000 and leaving $6,000,000 for overhead charges and all expenses. Last evening we had figures presented here that showed a total cost of one-third of the selling price and it is in order to correct that very false impression that I make this reference. Another thing that I would like to refer to is the fact that owing to the necessity of having to give long terms and to carry materials for a long time the total capital is shown to be more than twice the turnover. For that reason the manufacturers are certainly entitled to more of a return in the way of profit on the turnover than those dealing in such articles as permit of the turnover of the capital some three or four times a year.

Mr. MAHARG: In the matter of discrimination I think the minister is absolutely right in so far as the farmers are concerned. I believe the farmer gets no advantage whatever from the lowering of this freight rate; that goes entirely, as he has stated, to the manufacturer to put him in the same position as his American competitor. However, the point I want to emphasize, and it has been demonstrated I think to a certainty by the figures we have just now received, is that the cost of the material equals one-half of the price of the finished article.

Mr. HAROLD: That is right.

Mr. MAHARG: Now see what that means. They get a rebate of practically one-third of the duty imposed and they are rebated the duty on one-half the cost of the raw material going into the machine if they import the goods, and if they export the finished article they get a rebate of 99 per cent. So when you take reduction on the freight rates I venture the prediction, if it is correctly figured out, that an advantage of 2½ per cent will result to the manufacturer.

Mr. HAROLD: I have figured up those costs, I have the actual figures and I can bear out what the Finance Minister says that the two items do not make up the amount of reduction on the general tariff.

Mr. MAHARG: That is taking the average of the 5 and the 2½. My point is that the 2½ per cent is practically, if not wholly, covered.

Mr. HAROLD: It is not; I can show the hon. gentleman the figures.

Mr. MAHARG: Well, if you have the figures, will you be good enough to give them.

Mr. HAROLD: I have not the figures here.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I want to point out an error my hon. friend has inadvertently fallen into. He states that we are giving 30 per cent drawback on half the raw material that enters into the manufacture of these articles. He has in mind that the 30 per cent applies to the whole of the material, but he has overlooked the fact that a considerable part was free before. Therefore, it is not accurate to make a computation based upon the assumption that we are giving back 30 per cent on one-half of the value of the manufactured goods.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The practice, as far as I understand it, of manufacturers in this country is to buy all the raw materials that are possible from our own factories that produce them and are called subsidiary interests, or subsidiary factories. For instance, the malleables, which constitute a very large item in agricultural implements, are almost entirely made, and we hope will continue to be made, in Canada. We will only earn the 30 per cent to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, providing we take the unpatriotic course of buying those goods in United States. We do not propose to do that, although we are rather induced to do so if we take a strictly business view and buy absolutely in the cheapest market. My policy has always been, and I hope will always continue to be, to buy all the raw materials made by our subsidiary factories for use in the manufacture of implements or any other line in which I am interested. I think it would be a lamentable fact if this 30 per cent rebate which is proposed were to induce all Canadians who are manufacturing these lines—and they are mentioned in Nos. 446B, 447, and 591—to buy all these raw materials that enter into the construction of these articles from United States so as to qualify for the 30 per cent rebate. We are already importing far too much stuff from United States, in my judgment, and I would rather diminish than increase those imports if possible. I wanted it to be remembered that this 30 per cent does not go into the pockets of Canadian manufacturers by a long way, and is not likely to go there more than to the extent of 10 to 15 per cent at the outside, because we will continue to buy our raw materials in this country.

Mr. BUREAU: By subsidiary companies, does the hon. gentleman mean companies formed and controlled by the bigger concerns to which he refers who have to buy this raw material?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: No. As a rule, the manufacturer is not interested at all in the investment that is employed in the manufacture, say, of malleables. The paints, bolts, screws, and a thousand and one things that go into the manufacture of implements are made by subsidiary factories or interests, but the stock is not at all the same. I would not say there is never a case where a manufacturer has not stock in some of them, but it is not the usual thing, and so far as I am concerned it is not the case at all.

As to the question of freight rates, I do not think they should be linked up with tariff rates, but the question has been settled by the House, and I bow to the decision which has been arrived at with regard to it. I might point out, however, that the saving is not going to be as much as some imagine. For instance, take the ordinary walking plough—although it is not a plough that walks, it is drawn by a team—which is the ordinary plough used in Canada and weighs about 250 pounds. According to the schedule submitted by the minister the saving in freight rate to nearly all the points in the West is 10 cents per 100 pounds. Now taking a plough weighing 250 pounds at 10 cents a hundred and you have a saving of 25 cents in freight rate. That is not a very enormous saving on the price of ploughs which I believe is ranging at present from $15 to $25 for the ordinary plough in use. I admit that the westerner uses a more expensive plough on account of the stubborn nature of the soil. That is, the soil does not clean from a plough in the West as it will clean from a plough in the East on account of the difference in the nature of the soil. The material for ploughs used in the West has to-day to be of a quality almost comparable to finished steel. It has got to be of a hardness which is extremely difficult to produce and can only be produced by using a special kind of steel of which the United States is the sole manufacturer in the world. Great Britain has never been able to overtake that monopoly. The steel is made from a patent process controlled by the United States Steel Company, and the product is known as "Soft-centred Steel." That is one reason why the plough in Canada or in the United States has a hardness, a finish, and a durability and strength that no British implement has ever been able to attain. For that reason if implements were put on the free list so far as my hon. friend's district of Red Deer is concerned I would not kick at all because it is a competition that does not apply to the class of goods that is used in our country to any great extent. I wish to say further that on the larger implements which weigh say from 750 to 1,000 or 1,500 pounds the freight rate would relatively be the same and would amount to—as my hon. friend from Brant has just said—less than one per cent on the cost of the goods. Therefore, I think members will see this is a comparatively small item that the minister is allowing. I would like to see that the Ontario farmer in this respect is placed at no disadvantage. Of course it is quite true that the Ontario and Quebec farmer is very near to the factory that produces the implements and the freight on the implements that he gets is a comparatively light matter in comparison to what the western farmer is obliged to pay. I hope I have made my point clear and that the House will understand that it is not a very large item that is being conceded to the manufacturer in the matter of freight rates on these implements.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am afraid the Committee is getting away from the real point of disposing of these items. The freight rates question is very interesting. May I say in passing that I am very glad to have from my hon. friend from Brantford the concession that we have some difficulties in the West which do not prevail in the East. I have no doubt, Sir, that roots are as bad in Ontario as they are in the West. But he admits that the soil is harder to work in the West. I hope he will remember that when getting into a proper frame of mind in regard to the point that is really before the Committee.

My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Harold) I do not think was in the House this morning, and perhaps I ought to explain to him what was the difficulty. There are six kinds of implements under item 446, which have opposite them the figures 10, 15 and 15 per cent. In the next item, 446b, are ploughs and complete parts thereof, and the figures opposite those are 12½, 17½ and 17½ per cent. Now, it is not entirely that the eye is a little offended by the want of symmetry in the two lines; although the figures 10, 15 and 15 would meet the eye nicer and would be just the same as on the other implements. But as my hon. friend very well knows from his experience in Ontario, in the West we use the plough before we use the manure spreader. Why should the plough have a 2½ per cent advantage in the tariff over the manure spreader? You cannot break virgin soil with a manure spreader; you want a plough. And what is the sense of putting all manner of difficulties in a man's way when he is dealing with the virgin soil and using a breaking plough, and then making it easier for him by 2½ per cent when he comes to use a manure spreader? Before you get your manure spreader you have to use your plough, and you have to get a cow or two. Then you have got to consider the manuring of the soil after it has been broken. But you put 15 per cent on the manure spreader and 17½ per cent on the plough. Is that a scientific method of handling the tariff? I appeal to my hon. friend from Brant, who has a very good mind—a mind that I admire very much—and who comes from a centre where these things are manufactured; I appeal to him because I am not quite satisfied with the explanation given by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and my hon. friend from Brantford. My hon. friend from Brantford says that he buys all the raw materials he can in Canada. I would tell him that we are just as loyal in that respect in the West. I never want to use a better plough than the Cockshutt plough. When I get back home I shall do all I can to influence my sons to use the Cockshutt plough, after the way my hon. friend stood by us last night and voted against the Budget. But when I acknowledge to my hon. friend that the Cockshutt plough is so good, does he not see that that carries with it the implication that it ought to be able to compete with other ploughs, come from where they may—and, certainly, it ought to be able to compete with the manure spreader. If the Cockshutt plough is as good as I say it is,—and my hon. friend has not contradicted me,—then why not press the Minister of Finance to put it on a level with the manure spreader? That is all we want. I wish the hon. minister would be conciliatory and make the two lines exactly alike. Why should he compel us in the cross benches to adopt almost obstructive tactics? We have practically to be the Opposition because the regular Opposition are gone out of business in regard to these matters.

Mr. BUREAU: I object to that.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I do not want that opposition to be obstructive or obstreperous. I would rather be on friendly terms, as I always have been, with the hon. minister. I would like him to do the big thing. We have a good deal of unrest in the country, and I would ask my hon. friend to soothe the frayed edges of our nerves and put the plough on the same platform, so to speak, as the manure spreader.

Mr. HAROLD: It is my desire to thank the member for Red Reer (Mr. Clark) for his kind remarks. It was not my intention to say anything if he had not brought up certain questions. If the hon. gentleman thinks it will be ever possible to find any uniformity of principle in this tariff now before us, I regret to inform him that he will be disappointed. In the first place, if he is going to follow up that argument, I would call his attention to the fact that he handles the harness before he does the plough, and the harness pays a considerably higher rate of duty.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Not under this item.

Mr. HAROLD: But it is the principle involved in the whole tariff. The fact of the matter is that the manufacturer of implements is already greatly penalized, and these rates as fixed—which I am not voting against—do not do justice to these people as compared with the manufacturers of other lines of goods. I believe my hon. friend is exceedingly fair, and I know he has very sound ideas in regard to things as they should be when many years have elapsed; therefore I hope he will accept the rates as they are, and also consider the fact that a very large quantity of these goods is coming into the country from which the Government will derive revenue.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Red Deer thinks that we on this side of the House have abandoned our functions as the Opposition. I notice that not only is the hon. member a critic of tariffs, but he has lately developed as a critic of scriptural quotations or learning of any kind that we may make pretence to on this side of the House. It will be remembered that recently he brought the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) to task for misquoting the Scriptures. But I am sure my hon. friend's knowledge of the Good Book is very extensive, and he will remember the very good advice given therein that there is a time to speak and a time to keep silent; that there is a time when there is profit in talking, and a time when there is no profit at all. He will also find recorded there that the noble King David on one occasion had a sick child. While the child was sick the King threw himself down on the ground and prayed and put himself in sack-cloth and ashes, but immediately the child died he got up and washed himself and took breakfast, because there was nothing further that he could do.

We have fought the Government for the benefit of the West while there was any good in fighting. We voted against this tariff and for the amendment that would better conditions in the West; we did the very best we could. Now it has reached the stage when I realize that it is no good to ask the minister to stultify himself and change the tariff. I do not think he will. We are like King David, we have washed ourselves and taken our breakfast. We did the best we could. We stood by the West while there was any possibility of accomplishing anything.

Mr. ELKIN: I would like to ask the hon. member for Brantford a question in connection with this 30 per cent rebate on raw materials which come in for the manufacturer. A large portion of the raw materials to be used in these ploughs and other agricultural implements would come from mills making these basic materials—malleable iron and things of that kind. The 30 per cent, therefore, becomes or is a duty; it is a duty by way of protection to the manufacturers of these basic materials. In quoting prices based on the Pittsburg or United States prices, to what extent do they take advantage of this 30 per cent protection?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am afraid I do not fully understand the argument of my hon. friend. We buy these raw materials in Canada. We buy almost entirely the rougher classes of steel in Nova Scotia where the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) comes from, and we get a good deal of steel from the city of Hamilton.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Therefore, there will be no 30 per cent rebate if we continue to buy from those sources, because you get the 30 per cent rebate only if you import the raw material, and that I would not purpose doing even now.

Mr. ELKIN: Perhaps I might make my point clearer if I quoted the figures, although they may not be exact. Supposing the price of pig iron at Pittsburg is $24. I am not familiar as to what the duty on pig iron is, but let us say it is $5.

An hon. MEMBER: $2.80 a gross ton.

Mr. ELKIN: Under this tariff you get a drawback of 30 per cent on the $2.80 if you import the raw material from Pittsburg. What proportion of the 30 per cent drawback on that $2.80 does the Canadian manufacturer take in quoting a price based on the price of $24 at Pittsburg?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am afraid that has not been in operation long enough for prices to be settled. If it has, I have not yet heard of any change in the price as a result of the proposals. Any one can see that, as only 50 to 100 pounds of iron would be used in the manufacture of an ordinary implement, with a price of $24 a ton, the amount would be very small if you got a refund on only $2.80 per ton, and under the operation of the tariff as I understand it, you would certainly not get the whole rebate. Prices have not yet been revised and I have not had any opportunity of finding out where we stand in the matter; but as far as I can see, I think the minister stated rightly when he said that under the old tariff the manufacturers were getting what was already an exceedingly small profit—and I say that advisedly and I know what I am talking about. That being the case, then under the new proposals profit is going to be smaller, and because a low tariff means larger imports, and larger imports in the country will, I think the minister will agree with me, result from this tariff, we are, with a reduced tariff, going to be placed in this position that we shall have a circumscribed market and reduced prices, and in face of that, we have demands from labour which are very insistent at the present time for advances in wages of 25 to 30 per cent and, in some cases, for shorter time as well. So, if you take all these things together, the lot of the ordinary manufacturer of implements who is doing his best to satisfy the wants of the country in every respect is not a rosy one at the present time.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the hon. member argue that the raw material is costing him more in Canada than he could import it for?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: On the lower grades, no. The Steel Company of Nova Scotia is able, I think, to produce the lower grades of steel which are used to a large extent, as cheaply or cheaper than they can be bought in the United States. If you take the cost, with the duty added to the price, it would still be cheaper to buy the raw material in the matter of the lower grades of steel largely from Nova Scotia.

Mr. CAHILL: Then where does the hon. member's patriotism come in? Why does he state that it would not be patriotic to buy outside of Canada? If he is buying as cheaply or cheaper in Canada, there would be no call to import from the United States. I took from the argument of the hon. member that he was probably paying a little more for Canadian goods, but that his patriotism would cause him to buy them. Am I correct in my assumption?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not know that a question at issue on the tariff is my patriotism, and it is not a question I wish to dwell upon. I used the term because I believe we should all use Canadian goods where they are as cheap and as good as can be bought elsewhere, and I believe every one will agree that that is a sound policy. It was only in that sense I spoke, and the policy of the manufacturers is to buy all their raw materials in Canada, thus building up our own country, and perhaps if we are not building up our own business, we are building up that of some one who is close to us. I do not want to succeed and see everybody else fail; I want as far as possible to see everybody successful, and for that reason I think the patriotic course of the manufacturer would be to continue to buy his raw materials in Canada so far as market prices will admit of his doing so. I think that is a sound policy.

Mr. ELKIN: I do not want the point I have been endeavouring to make to go by without getting it on Hansard. I used the case of pig iron only to demonstrate the fact that many other things enter into the manufacture of ploughs and reapers and other farm implements, and there is no getting away from the fact that, in rebating 30 per cent to manufacturers of farm implements, a principle is established whereby one-third is added to the present duty on raw material and the protection is made absolute. If you rebate 30 per cent on the goods you place in the farm implements, you protect the basic manufacturer to the extent of one-third; in other words, he, knowing that he is going to get 30 per cent back from the Government on those goods can add a certain portion of that 30 per cent of the duty to his price.

Mr. HAROLD: He has to take it off, not add it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Very little pig iron comes from Pittsburg, because I understand Canada is able to produce pig iron as cheaply as any other country in the world if it has a fair chance, and I hope the iron mines will be brought into such a state of perfection that we can get all our pig iron in this country. To say we are going to buy pig iron in Pittsburg is a proposition which I do not think is likely to obtain. I think we will buy our pig iron in this country, and I would like to see every one else in this country follow a similar course.

Mr. ROBB: Will the reduction in freight rates bring the present rate down to the same basis as prevailed prior to 1912, or when the hon. gentleman became minister?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The rates, as my hon. friend knows, have all been raised both in Canada and the United States owing to the increased cost of operation of railways. I have not the figures before me, but I am quite sure reductions will be made, although not to what the rates were before the war. But the point in this matter is the disadvantage which the Canadian manufacturer has against his American competitor owing to the higher rates in Canada. It is only the reduction that is in question here so far as it has a bearing upon what we have done in the way of reduction in the duty.

Mr. KAY: It was rather surprising to hear the appeal from the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) for help from the Opposition. His opinion of the Opposition, as expressed frequently during the session has not been very high. Although I cannot always agree with the hon. member, I had a great deal of pleasure in supporting him in his appeal for a lowering of the duty on ploughs.

There is no doubt that greater production and cheaper food is one of the essentials of this time. Now, the plough is the first essential in production, and should be made as cheap as possible to the farmer. A further strong reason why it should be made as cheap as possible is that at the present time we are trying to induce a great many returned soldiers to take up farming. I would go further than my hon. friend from Red Deer and my hon. friend from Maple Creek. I would suggest that the minister put both ploughs and the raw material entering into ploughs on the free list.

Mr. MAHARG: The longer I listen to this discussion the more convinced I become of the injustice of this duty on the items under consideration. I have heard no good reason advanced why these implements should not all be on the same basis, so far as the tariff is concerned. I therefore beg to move:

That the duty on ploughs and complete parts thereof be made uniform with the rates covering item 446.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks made by certain hon. gentlemen in discussing these items of the tariff. If I may say so without offence, I think that the concern of certain hon. gentlemen for a reduction of 2½ per cent is, to say the least, rather amusing. Hon. gentlemen were here yesterday until an early hour this morning debating the Budget and the counter proposals contained in the amendment of the hon. member for Brome. I can understand certain gentlemen voting for the amendment in preference to the Budget on the ground that it promised more in the way of a reduction in duties than the Budget, but I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen who claim to be following along the line of free trade and are eager to grasp every reduction that is being offered, once they fail to get the whole loaf, can declare, as hon. members did last night, that they would sooner starve than take a part of the loaf; for that was precisely the position taken by those who voted against the Budget last night. They said by their votes: If I cannot get what I want as proposed in the amendment of the hon. member for Brome, then, if my vote can prevent it, we will have no reductions at all. They voted against a reduction of from 2½ to 5 per cent on many of these implements last night, and have agitated for hours here to-day for a further reduction of 2½ per cent. If there is anything consistent in that attitude, I, for one, fail to see it. It has been suggested by some hon. member that it would look better if the 12½ per cent, the 17½ per cent, and the 17½ per cent, covering the last item on page 2 of the resolutions were changed to the figures covering the item immediately above No. 446. There would be more uniformity in the printing; it would look better, they say. I might suggest, then, that perhaps it was an oversight that item 446b was not put on the top of page 3, because then we would have had more uniformity in the printing, which certain hon. gentlemen present as an argument for making a reduction in the item under consideration. If we adopt the amendment to change these figures it seems to me it will be up to the committee to go through the whole thing over again. I contend that the whole matter has been thoroughly thrashed out in the debate which took place in the House, and the proper time for moving an amendment was last night, when this matter was under consideration. If the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Brome did not cover all it should have covered, that is the fault of those who brought in the amendment; that should have been attended to when the amendment was being prepared. The House has expressed its opinion as to what these duties should be. I therefore do not intend to support the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Maharg), although I am in favour of a reasonable reduction in the duty on implements required on the farm. But this is not a proper time for a general revision of the tariff. That revision must take place in the not far distant future after careful investigation into what duties should be lowered and what should be raised.

Before I sit down I want to place myself on record in regard to the freight rate arrangement. In my judgment, it is absolutely illogical to combine tariff adjustments with railway rates, and it is bound in the long run to lead to endless difficulty. I trust it has been adopted in this case only as a temporary expedient, which will be done away with as soon as we have a general revision of the tariff.

Mr. M. CLARK: I want to meet one or two points raised by the hon. member for Frontenac. He is a very old member of this House, and has a very strong, and, usually, a very logical mind, but I do think that what he has advanced just now is practically an argument for never considering a Bill in committee at all. So far as the details are concerned, it does not matter how we vote on the principle, which is settled in the main debate, usually on the second reading in the case of a Bill. My hon. friend says that those who voted for the amendment yesterday voted for free agricultural implements. Very well. A large majority settled that for the moment we were not to have free agricultural implements, but in the details of the schedules each item is presented to the committee separately for separate consideration, I take it, or the reading of the items by the Chairman is surely a gross waste of time and has no conceivable purpose whatever. While we have voted on the principle and the principle has been settled, nevertheless there may be inconsistencies or incongruities which may very well be settled in committee, and that I conceive is the reason why each item is presented separately.

Now our simple, and, it seems to me, logical and extremely supportable position, is that there is no good reason why ploughs, which are the primary and fundamental implements of agriculture should be put under a handicap in regard to the tariff as compared with cultivators, seed drills, horse rakes, manure spreaders, and all the other articles mentioned in the previous item. My hon. friend did not deal with that point at all. He simply seemed to indicate that we ought, having voted on the question of implements being free or not free, to leave the details to be settled without any further discussion or any consideration of them at all. I have only to repeat that that is really an argument against the Committee stage of legislation and is not worthy of what is usually the extremely logical mind of my hon. friend from Frontenac. I do not wish to say more on the subject. I have spoken at greater length than probably I should have done, and it is with the desire that the discussion may not be unduly protracted that I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Maharg) has moved the amendment. I shall vote for the amendment because it seems reasonable and logical, and as we could not get the whole loaf we propose now to take a small portion of it. This position is entirely defensible from my standpoint.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not intend to boast about my logic in this House when it comes to a question of reasoning, but it does seem to me that the man who took the position in this House that he would vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Brome because it was giving him what he thought he ought to have and who, failing to get that, voted for the Budget because, although it did not give him all he wanted, it gave him some consideration, is in a position to come here and logically say: I voted for the Budget because it gave me something. It did not go as far as I wanted it to go and therefore I am here to ask you to make this further reduction of 2½ per cent. That man would be taking a consistent position. But the man who last night voted against the reduction of 2½ per cent or 5 per cent cannot logically come forward now and ask for the reduction he opposed yesterday. That is my position.

Mr. PEDLOW: Before the Committee rose this morning I raised a point which has been under discussion ever since, and that is the elimination of ploughs from the category included in item 446, cultivators, harrows, horse rakes, etc. I find on looking up the schedule that has obtained up to the present that this item included ploughs, and I should like to know why it is now eliminated. The minister's explanation does not quite satisfy me and I would like to have some further light on the subject. I know that the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Maple Creek who has moved the amendment are also of the opinion that there is no valid reason why ploughs should not be included in the same list as cultivators, harrows, horse rakes, seed drills, manure spreaders and weeders and complete parts thereof. These were all included in the same list a year ago and there is no reason why they should not be in the same class to-day. I should also like to know the reason for the small variation of 2½ per cent in the duty to be collected on ploughs in excess of the duty proposed in regard to the other items.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think I explained fully this morning the reasons why we had to differentiate in the reduction in the articles to which reference has been made. I explained that there were varying competitive conditions. There is a great range of ploughs, drills, etc., and—

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like to know whether—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Just a moment, please. I would call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that the importations of ploughs for the last fiscal year from the United States amounted to $2,500,000, whereas the importation of all the other implements embraced in the item amounted to only $860,000. I say again what I have already said two or three times, that we gave this matter our most careful consideration and reached certain conclusions as to the amount of reduction which it is possible to make. Having reached these conclusions, as we believe, soundly and certainly sincerely, we are not able to accept the motion of the hon. member for Maple Creek.

Mr. ROBB: The minister has given a fair reason why the Government will not accept this amendment. They want greater protection to keep these ploughs from coming into the country, and this policy is perfectly consistent with the whole policy of the party on trade questions ever since it came into office in 1911. As was pointed out last night, the Minister of Finance was elected to office in 1911 because he opposed more particularly reciprocity. I am not going to labour that question, but I will say that on four different occasions in this House when the Liberal party presented to the people of Canada through this Parliament their policy in favour of reciprocity the Minister of Finance opposed and voted against it, and on two different occasions he made a speech giving a very good reason, to his mind, for that action. He opposed free wheat because free wheat, along the lines of the United States tariff by which we were also bound to give free flour and semolina would, in his judgment, ruin the dairy industry of Eastern Canada. Having pronounced himself twice in this way, the Finance Minister in 1917 put through an Order in Council placing wheat upon the free list. We are not without evidence as to why that was done. We are not without the evidence of hon. gentlemen who are to-day supporters of Union Government. We have the statement in Hansard of the hon. gentleman who at that time represented Assiniboia and who is now a member of the upper House. That gentleman told us in this Chamber that the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) who was then Solicitor General had made a trip to the West. The supporters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier had intimated their objection to an extension of parliament and the Government discovered that they had to go before the people. The Solicitor General made a trip West, and in the opinion of Senator Turriff as expressed in this House and as reported in Hansard, the Solicitor General had there learned that they must give free wheat or not one Conservative member would be returned to parliament. So they put through a hasty Order in Council of 16th April, after the western farmer had parted with his crop and it was in the hands of the grain dealers and speculators. For that particular crop year, therefore, reciprocity in wheat was of no value whatever to the western farmer.

The Union Government was formed, nominations were all in sight, everything looked safe, there was no danger of the Government being defeated, they had captured the organizations of both parties, and on the 4th of December of that year they put through another Order in Council which practically nullified the Order in Council of April.

I submit that the reciprocity proposal in wheat has never been of any benefit to the West. The legislation put through in these tariff resolutions, 60-61, has no more hope of being useful to the West than had the Order in Council of April 1917. Why do I say that? The Government know very well that the wheat situation is controlled by food boards in the United States and Canada who will see to it that there is no exchange of wheat for the present any way, and that wheat will not go into the United States. Western provinces may pass resolutions and western members may go into private caucus and resolute against this Government, but the fact remains that the Government are in power and supported by the very men who have been calling for relief for all these years. To-day we have the spectacle of the Minister of Finance saying that he is not prepared to grant the simple concession asked for by the western men. He is perfectly right and consistent with his whole attitude since 1911, he is not in the House to legislate for anything that will help the western farmer.

Referring again to this wheat situation; if the Finance Minister says that the Government are sincere and that they intend that wheat shall go into the United States under the provisions of the United States tariff, then I submit to the minister that he must go farther. He is discriminating against, and attempting to ruin, one of the natural industries in western Canada. If there is one industry that is natural to that country it is the flour milling industry. If the Finance Minister is going to create conditions which will enable the United States miller to put flour into Canada free of duty, he must go a little farther and admit to this country free of duty flour mill machinery. He must go still farther and admit free of duty the belting that is used in the flour mill and the bags into which the flour is put before it is shipped. He has placed a duty of 27½ per cent on cotton and on jute cloth. He says that if you employ United States labour to mill flour from Canadian wheat, if you like, and pack it in bags in the United States, he will allow that cotton to come into Canada free.

He allows to come in free with every car load of flour from 850 to to 1,000 yards of cotton or jute cloth free of duty. That is the position that the Minister of Finance has placed himself in after eight years of experience in trying to frame a tariff. Seventy-five thousand dollars will go as far in building a flour mill in the United States as $100,000 will go in Canada. You can buy your cotton and jute bags about ten cents a barrel cheaper in the United States than you can in Canada and under these circumstances who is going to build a mill at Winnipeg, Fort William, or anywhere else in Canada, if you can build a mill in Buffalo and get your flour into Canada just the same? That is the position in which the Minister of Finance has placed one of the industries in this country by his tariff muddling.

My Western friends, who have upbraided us during this session to some extent as having run away from the interests of Western Canada, apparently have short memories. They must not forget that we went down to defeat in the attempt to get free markets not only for wheat but for the barley, oats, grain and cattle of Western Canada. That was refused. After it was refused the United States did a little tariff amending on their own lines and they said: "If Canada does not want to trade fair with us, we will amend the tariff to suit ourselves." So they placed cattle, milk and cream on the free list. We are in this position to-day that our cattle go into the United States free of duty. But if we have a shortage of cattle in this country and want to bring any back, we have to pay the Government, on the basis of a cow worth $100, $34.38 to get that animal in. If we want to bring back butter manufactured from milk shipped by our own dairies into the United States we have to pay the Government four cents a pound. On cheese we pay them three cents a pound. That is one reason why the cost of living has gone up in this country. The tariff is all made one way and we penalize ourselves if we want to buy any article. I am somewhat in sympathy with the views expressed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) when he said it is high time that we should go through these items and amend and remodel them so that we can get down to a basis that will be of greater advantage to all Canada.

Amendment (Mr. Maharg) negatived, yeas 40, nays 58.

Item 446 B agreed to.

591a. Freight wagons, drays and sleighs, and complete parts thereof: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; Intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. MAHARG: Has not the duty on sleighs been increased under this item? Comparing this item with the tariff set forth in the Canadian Almanac there has been an increase of 2½ per cent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The general tariff is 25 per cent and has been. The intermediate is 25 per cent; it was 22½ per cent. There are no sleighs imported.

Mr. MAHARG: Then I am right. There has been an increase of 2½ per cent in the duty on sleighs.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are no importations. I have no objection to make the rate 22½ per cent intermediate.

Mr. MAHARG: I was not pressing the point, but merely asking for information.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We will have regard to it in the general revision.

Mr. MAHARG: Do I understand that the Minister of Finance is now making the duty 22½ per cent?

The CHAIRMAN: I did not understand the minister to move an amendment. If he does I will be glad to put it to the committee.

Mr. MAHARG: I am not very familiar with Parliamentary procedure, but I understand that the Finance Minister said he had no objection to making the change.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I take it to be unnecessary to make any change; there are no importations.

Mr. MAHARG: Why will the Finance Minister not make the change?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would need a formal resolution. The matter is not of any consequence, it does not appear to me to be of importance.

Mr. MAHARG: I do not wish to press the matter.

Mr. ROBB: Let us understand each other as to the point raised by the member for Maple Creek. Is it correct that the duty has been advanced 2½ per cent?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The intermediate tariff is 25 per cent; it was formerly 22½ per cent. It does not apply to any country from which these articles come.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved that it is expedient to provide that the following goods shall be exempt from the provisions of section 3 of chapter 3 of the Acts of 1915;

(r) materials imported to be used in the manufacture of goods enumerated in tariff items 446, 446b, 446c, 447, 448, 449, 450 and 591;

(s) olive oil and peanut oil for canning fish;

(t) materials imported prior to the first day of September, 1920, to be used in the manufacture of oleomargarine as described in The Dairy Industry Act, 1914, and amendments thereto;

(u) linen or cotton clothing, n.o.p;

Mr. McKENZIE: Has this resolution reference to the 7 per cent war tax?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The war tax is 7½ per cent.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a point that was not sufficiently explained by the minister. So far as I remember he has not dealt with the 7½ per cent war tax as he did with the 5 per cent tax on British goods. When both these taxes were taken off I do not see why the reduction was not made all round. I would like to have some explanation from the minister why he takes the 7½ per cent off in some instances and leaves it on in others?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has forgotten that I dealt with the matter in the Budget, though probably not in express terms that would fix themselves in his mind. My hon. friend will recollect that we derived last year a revenue of $45,000,000 from the imposition of the customs duty war tax of 7½ per cent general, and 5 per cent British preferential. On account of the difficulty that we have this year in raising sufficient revenue to meet our current expenditure it was not desirable that we should go further than we have in the reduction of the duty of 7½ per cent. We took off the British preferential and by reason of that sustained a loss in revenue of $3,700,000. Then we dealt only with articles of necessity, so to speak, classifying them as foodstuffs, boots and shoes, and clothing, and we took the duty off agricultural implements for the reasons which I have given. The answer to my hon. friend briefly is this: The main reason for not taking the 7½ per cent off entirely is that we shall require the money. I desire to say to my hon. friend and the House, that I do not believe this year, with the reductions which we have already made, and also the increases which we have made in income tax, we shall quite bridge the gap between the ordinary expenditure and revenue; in other words, I should not be surprised if there is a deficit this year on ordinary account. That is the principal reason why we did not take off the entire 7½ per cent, and I would submit that it is a good reason.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I have not the tariff schedule before me, and therefore I would ask the minister if, in the various items that are mentioned in this resolution, provision is made for taking the 7½ per cent duty off cordage and twine used in the fishing industry, which were formerly free?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My recollection is, and it is confirmed by the Chief Commissioner of Taxation, that the 7½ per cent duty was not imposed upon those articles in item 15 and they are therefore put in the free list.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would the minister tell us how many articles formerly admitted free will be taxable under the seven and-a-half per cent after we pass this new law?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot tell my hon. friend the number. I can only say to him that $15,500,000 is the estimate of the loss which we shall sustain in duties by reason of taking off seven and-a-half per cent from the articles upon which it had been imposed.

Mr. KAY: Would the hon. minister explain what materials are to be brought in under item (t) for the manufacture of oleomargarine, and also why they are not to be imported after 1920? Is it the intention of the Government to prohibit the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine after that date?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Oleomargarine is now being admitted free of duty. It is also being manufactured in Canada, and the purpose of this remission of duty upon materials used in the manufacture is obvious; it is to put the Canadian manufacturer of oleomargarine in as good a position as his foreign competitor who has his materials free of duty. The hon. gentleman will observe that the Dairy Industry Act of 1914, and amendments thereto, is referred to. There will be introduced at this session legislation under which—I am speaking from memory—the importation of oleomargarine will be admitted until the first of September, 1920. The matter will then be subject to such further consideration as may be thought proper.

Mr. ROBB: I notice that item 66, biscuits, sweet, is not changed at all; the seven and-a-half per cent surtax still applies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It never was on that item.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved, 1. That it is expedient to amend The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, as amended by chapter six of the statutes of 1917 and by chapter ten of the statutes of 1918, and to provide that the provisions of section three of the said Act shall not continue in force after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen;

Mr. MAHARG: Is it the intention when this is repealed to continue the income tax on profits in connection with incorporated companies?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The effect of this legislation is merely to continue for a year the Business Profits War Tax Act, which under the legislation of last session would have come to an end on the 31st December last. This does not involve the question of income tax, to which no termination is put by the legislation governing it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that I have not given very close study to those two systems of taxation, if I may so designate them, that is, the Business Tax and the Income Tax. I cannot very well understand why there should be both. The profits of an individual from his business constitute his income, and apparently the Government is going to tax him on those profits. Why do they also go after his business? Is it not sufficient to get the tax in one way and with less trouble?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend asks a very natural question. He has not followed the legislation. The justification for the Business Profits Tax is the abnormal conditions prevailing during the war under which unusual and what might be regarded as excessive profits were made—profits beyond the normal return to capital in enterprises of a similar character in peace time. The Business Profits War Tax Act is much more severe in the amount of such profits which it takes than is the Income War Tax Act, which is designed not only for the period of the war, but also for peace times. No citizen is subject to both taxes. Probably my hon. friend had in mind that an individual is liable to assessment under both the Business Profits War Tax Act and the Income War Tax Act. He pays the amount which is greater. Whether one would be larger than the other would depend on the profits being excessive or not. If the profits are very excessive they would come under the Business Profits War Tax, which always governs if the amount is larger than the Income Tax.

Mr. NICKLE: Do I understand that it is the purport of this section necessarily to discontinue the Business Profits War Tax Act for next year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not necessarily. I believe this follows the wording of the Act for the past two years which provided for the termination of the Act at the end of the calendar years 1917 and 1918. Now we are extending it for another calendar year. It will be for the Government to consider in connection with the next Budget whether the Business Profits War Tax Act will be repealed or not, and, if so, to what extent.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That with respect to every business liable to taxation under the said Act the period for which the returns shall be made and during which it shall be liable for assessment shall be at least sixty months, commencing with the beginning of the first accounting period ending after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, or for such less period as the business may have been carried on from the beginning of the said accounting period to the end of the period for which the said tax may be levied under this Act;

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Chairman, the existing legislation provides for assessment for forty-eight months. This merely provides for the sixty months—in other words, for the extension of one year which I mentioned.

Mr. McKENZIE: Sixty months?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A five-year period altogether from the time it was originally enacted. The amending Act extended it for forty-eight months, now we are extending it a year, which means sixty months to take the place of the forty-eight.

Mr. McKENZIE: That means you are going over the same ground?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. The amendment necessary to make the extension will show my hon. friend we are not extending it beyond the period I have mentioned.

Mr. McKENZIE: I rather thought that perhaps parties who had already accounted for their profits would have to make a further accounting, that this was intended to be retroactive. Is it the intention to make this retroactive?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The intention is not to add anything in the way of retroactive legislation to that which has already been enacted. When we enacted this legislation in 1916 it was made retroactive because quite large profits had been made in speculation or otherwise in the previous year and a half since the outbreak of the war. That retroactive feature was objectionable, but Parliament enacted it. This does not add in any way to the retroactive aspect of the legislation.

Mr. PEDLOW: From a ruling I received a short time ago, I understood that each accounting period, that is, each financial year, stood on its own basis. This resolution speaks of a five-year period and not each accounting year. I would like to have a ruling on that point, because a man might have an enormous profit one year and be assessed and then next year he might have a loss. Is it the intention of the department to make the assessment over an average of five years?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, each accounting period stands upon its own basis. We are dealing with the accounting periods over which the legislation extends and not the accounting period in connection with any business. If this legislation is adopted, as has been the case in previous legislation respecting the Business Profits War Tax Act, all parties will be in the same position so far as accounting periods are concerned.

Mr. PEDLOW: This means that even if a man has paid his income tax for 1917 the department can go back to 1914 and exact a statement from him for 1914, 1915 and 1916, and collect taxes under this legislation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not unless he was taxable before. If a man started a business in 1917 he would not be taxed in respect of 1915 and 1916, because he was not in business in those years. But if a man was in business in 1915 and 1916, but was not assessed, then, if found to have been liable, he would be subject to assessment for the previous years.

Mr. PEDLOW: Notwithstanding the fact that he was not assessed before?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Notwithstanding that fact because he did not pay what he should have paid.

3. That the word "commencing" be replaced by the word "ending" in the proviso to section twenty-six as enacted by chapter ten of the statutes of 1918.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was a typographical error last year which completely reversed the intention of the Government and Parliament in respect of the Bill. We are correcting it this year.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the provisions of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, as amended by chapter 25 of the statutes of 1918 and to provide,—

1. That income liable to taxation shall include the salaries, indemnities or other remuneration of members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada and officers thereof, of members of Provincial Legislative Councils and Assemblies, of Municipal Councils, Commissions and Boards of Management, of any Judge of any Dominion or Provincial Court appointed after the passing of this Act, and of all other persons, including those whose salaries, indemnities or other remuneration are paid by His Majesty in respect of His Government of the Dominion of Canada, or of any Province; excepting therefrom the income of the Governor General of Canada.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount of income tax was collected last year, and what did it cost the country to collect it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The total number of assessments up to June 17, 1919, was 46,176, and the amount of assessments approved was $11,000,000 in round figures. The number of assessments paid was 39,000 and the amount of assessments paid was $9,000,000 in round figures. I have not the precise cost, but together with the business profits tax administration, the cost will be about $400,000, that is to say, for the administration of the two. I am unable to separate them.

Mr. CAHILL: Are they kept separately at all, or are they combined?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The expenditures are not kept separately because they are administered to some extent by the same office.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have there been any appeals?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Notices of appeals have been received in some cases under the income tax. With regard to the business profits tax, usually, after an investigation, we have been able to make an assessment that is accepted, and thus an appeal is avoided.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many parties made returns?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: About 150,000 the majority of them not assessable.

Mr. ROBB: During the debate on the Address there was an expression of disappointment at the amount collected from the income tax, and that brings us back to the proposition submitted from this side of the House when the Act was first introduced, as to the method of collecting it. I should like again to ask the minister if he does not think he could obtain better results by collecting this income tax through the secretary-treasurers of the different municipalities? They know every man in their community and his business, and if we made them officials of the Government, we could obtain much better results with a minimum of expense. Surely we should be able to collect a greater revenue from this income tax than was the experience of the past year.

Will this income tax apply to Government pensions, whether paid to judges or colonels or generals drawing large pensions?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has called attention to two matters. Personally I do not think it would be practicable to have the income assessment made as he suggests. I do not believe it would give us as good results as we are getting now, or nearly as good results as we shall get when the organization is more complete. My own view is that instead of the cost of administration being high, it is too small. I believe that to render the organization completely effectual for the administration of the income tax in Canada there must be a very considerably increased expenditure. The Commissioner of Taxation may not altogether agree with me. He is very desirous of keeping the cost down to the lowest possible point, but if the income tax is to be administered with a high degree of efficiency I think we must have a much greater organization than we now have. We might even be obliged to have an organization—it would be an immense one—under which practically every individual in the country would be visited and assessed as men are now assessed under the municipal administration. We naturally have been anxious not to increase beyond what is absolutely necessary the administrative expenses in connection with this legislation, but the task of administering the income tax in Canada is a very great one indeed. I pointed out yesterday that in the United States it had taken them some nine years to render their system reasonably effectual. The first few years they encountered all the difficulties that we have encountered. I would weary the Committee if I mentioned all the obstacles which present themselves to the efficient administration of the income tax. I will give this one example which I recall at the moment. The inspector who is in charge of the taxation administration in one of the western provinces told me that he had found insuperable difficulties in attempting to assess a large farming section of that community, in which, he said, twenty-one different languages or dialects were spoken, and from which he could get practically no returns. I do not want to dwell upon the difficulties because it might be answered that difficulties are to be overcome. That is true. When you have an income tax in effect in the country the Government must do its very best to administer it; I am the very first to say that, but hon. gentlemen here, all of whom are practical men, will realize the very great difficulty we have in enforcing this taxation in many of the sections of Canada. I called attention yesterday to the extreme difficulty of ascertaining, for example, what is the net income of a farmer. Why, with the best intentions, it is very difficult for the farmer himself to know what his net income is. Again, in a province like British Columbia you may have a man liable to assessment who is engaged to-day in mining, and who a week or ten days from now may be in the timber industry or may be in another part of the country. I am not using that illustration to magnify the difficulties, because hon. gentlemen may say that that is an exceptional case. I am simply putting forward to the Committee that the administration of an income tax in a country of the size of Canada, with the diversity of occupations that we have, is a very difficult one indeed.

Some criticism has been made of the fact that we have collected only $10,000,000 from the income tax which was imposed a year and a half ago. I called attention to the fact, in replying to the leader of the Opposition some time ago, that if an individual, or a firm, or a company was liable for a higher assessment under the Business Profits War Tax Act than under the Income Tax Act, the higher assessment was made. Now if we eliminate the cases in which the assessment paid was on the basis of the Business Profits War Tax Act, and not the Income Tax Act, and consider what would be the additional amount payable if the parties in question were subject to income taxation and not to the Business Profits War Tax, our estimate is that $10,000,000 more would be derived, so that if the Business Profits War Tax Act were to-day repealed and we were thrown back solely upon the income tax, the revenue for this year, on the basis of the rates of last year would be about $10,000,000 more.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was one of the first to agree with the Minister of Finance that the time had come to impose income taxation in Canada. I think it is the fairest mode of taxation in the world because it reaches the man most able to pay, and furthermore, it makes the citizen a little more attentive to the activities of public men, and especially of the hon. gentlemen who hold the country's cash box. My only regret is that under the present proposals the big man does not pay enough income tax, but I suppose that every year there will be an increase in the rates.

The minister says that the task of administering the Income Tax Act is most difficult. As income taxation is new in Canada I can understand that it would be rather difficult at first to put the machinery in motion; but in other countries, in England, for a century I believe, and in France, for the same length of time, they have had an income tax, and I think that we might very well adopt the methods which are followed in those countries in administering the Act. I quite agree that conditions are somewhat different, that Canada occupies a vast area and has a diversified population, but I think there must be some system which can be adapted to every country. The main thing is to have an efficient board of administration. I have known for many years the chief Commissioner of Taxation, and I must congratulate the Government on their choice in that regard. I think no man knows better than Mr. Breadner how to administer such a complex taxation Act. The officers who are employed in this branch of the service in Ottawa and Montreal and throughout the country, do not come under the Civil Service Commission, I am told. I do not know why, and I should like to know if there is any special reason why they do not come under the Civil Service Act. I would urge the minister to see to it that these officers who are called upon to administer the Act should not be appointed, unless Mr. Breadner is satisfied that they possess the necessary qualifications.

There have been some complaints and I personally interviewed Mr. Breadner who gave me satisfactory explanations. I would urge upon the minister the necessity of appointing without any reference to political parties the men who have charge of that administration. As the minister said a moment ago, it is a very delicate matter to scrutinize and investigate the private business of any individual and if the appointments were made—I do not say they are—only at the dictates of political proclivities, my hon. friend would encounter some trouble in parts of the country, for human nature is universally the same. My hon. friend said there were difficulties in certain sections of the Northwest where there was a medley of various races. May I ask him to bear in mind that we have only two official languages in Canada, and also to inform him that in my province last fall and winter there were legitimate complaints that the blank forms were not issued in one of the official languages? Remonstrances were made and after a while the blank forms were sent. It is quite natural on the part of the habitant in Quebec to say: I received a blank form in English but that is not my language. I want the blank form in French and I shall keep Mr. Breadner waiting until I receive it. I think the grievance was remedied at the time, but the department ought to see to it that such remonstrances are unnecessary. These blank forms should be circulated in our province to preclude the possibility of any delay. I want to know from the hon. gentleman, in view of the amendments contained in this year's resolutions, what are his expectations for the coming fiscal year? In view of these amendments, what does he expect to obtain from the income tax source?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My recollection is that in the Budget I estimated $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 additional.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why is it that the officers are not selected by the Civil Service Commission?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member will recall that when the Business Profits Tax Act was first enacted it was regarded as of a temporary character, and it was considered that it would not continue more than three years. A staff was got together of as efficient officials as could be had for the administration of the Act throughout the country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In other words, they must be practically experts?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. My hon. friend has put his finger precisely on the point. We do not believe that we can get by advertising, as the Civil Service Commission advertise, the class of expert ability required for this work. It is work that is of a highly confidential nature and all the men engaged in it should be exceedingly competent. We aim to get men having in some cases, in addition to the other necessary qualifications, legal experience. Let me say to my hon. friend further that except on the occasion of their coming here last February for a conference, I do not know personally one single member of the staff, nor have I recommended any member to the Commissioner of Taxation. My hon. friend will gather from that how much political patronage has been exercised. I have said to the Commissioner of Taxation, in whom I have the utmost confidence—and what my hon. friend has said about him is wholly deserved; I hold you responsible for the administration of that department. I give you a perfectly free hand in selecting and recommending to me men who you think are competent to carry out this work. I have not interested myself in these appointments beyond discussing with Mr. Breadner the importance of getting the best men we could, and it has been exceedingly difficult to get men, especially during the last year of the war. I have had many things to engage my attention and have fully appreciated the importance of the efficient administration of this department; and if there is any fault in connection with it it certainly does not lie in any endeavour on the part of the minister to exercise patronage. Of that I can assure my hon. friend.

With regard to the other question raised by my hon. friend, namely, the use of the French language, we have always realized in our department the fact to which he has called attention, of the French language being official for certain purposes. In the case to which he referred the order was given originally by the department for the returns to be printed. I think there were a million for Quebec in both French and English. There was a slight delay in translating from English into French and consequently the French printing was retarded. It might have been by inadvertence that the citizens to whom the hon. member referred received their returns in English. I am quite aware that in Quebec there are tens of thousands of people who are familiar only with the French language, and the department, I can assure the hon. member, is anxious to meet their convenience and live up to its obligations in furnishing returns in French to be filled in by those who speak that language.

One other point was referred to in regard to pensions. I am not sure that I quite recollect what the hon. member who raised the point required. Subsection (b) of section 6 on page 5 reads:

> Any part of the remuneration of a taxpayer retained by his employer in connection with insurance, sick benefit, superannuation, pension fund or plan shall be allowed as an exemption or deduction from the income of the taxpayer for income tax purposes, and any payment to an employee out of such fund or plan shall be included as taxable income of the employee.

Is that the section to which the hon. member refers?

Mr. ROBB: I was speaking more particularly in regard to judges' pensions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before the minister answers the question may I be permitted to say a word or two on the question? If my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) wishes to apply this principle to pensions received by judges who have retired, I would not approve of retroactive legislation. Judges who have retired and who receive a pension from the state are exempted by the Judges' Act from all taxes from any source whatever. I do not think it would be fair to have retroactive legislation apply to them. There are old gentlemen—one of whom I have in mind—who have been on the bench for many years and who have now retired. Possibly within the next few months or the next year or so they may not be of this world. Their pensions, under the present high cost of living, afford them a bare subsistence. And in regard to civil servants, I might mention the case of my own father. He was in the Civil Service for fifty years and receives a very small pension.

Fortunately, he has something else; he has his boys and he has himself. But would it be fair to apply this principle to those who received a pension based on salaries of fifteen or twenty years ago? Civil servants since that time have obtained increases and if they were retired they would obtain much better pensions than the old superannuated civil servants receive. I do not believe in retroactive legislation. As to the future, it is different. Let us respect rights which are real vested rights.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not think that the words "retroactive legislation" are used in the right sense at all. There will be no attempt made, in asking judges or those receiving a pension to pay income tax, to compel them to pay it on income received five or ten years ago. They will pay it on what their income or pension is to-day.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I speak of retroactive legislation in the case of judges who were retired and who are pensioned by the state. According to the Judges' Act, the moment they are appointed, their salaries and pensions are debarred from all taxes in the future.

Mr. EDWARDS: I understand that and that is what I protest against. There is always a sufficient number of lawyers in this House to look after any and every member of the legal fraternity and there is no reason under heaven that you can give and that is logical why a judge, any more than anybody else, should be exempted from taxation on his income.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is the law.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is no answer to say that you have a Judges' Act which exempts them. An Act passed by this Parliament can be changed by this Parliament. My contention is that we have laid down a principle here that an unmarried person is exempt from paying income tax up to a certain amount, that a married person is exempt from paying income tax up to a certain amount, but if an unmarried or a married person has an income which comes within the schedule provided under the law, he is liable to pay the income tax and I do not care whether that income is derived from a pension for services that a man has rendered as a civil servant, if the income reaches the amount stipulated in the law, that man has to pay income tax just the same as any person else. If he happens to be a judge who has retired and has an income within the meaning of the schedule I do not see any reason under heaven why he should be exempt from payment of the tax. We pay entirely too much attention to judges and we give them certain privileges in this country that they are not entitled to any more than any person else. They are not white winged angels in my estimation, and I do not propose to place them on any pedestal of superiority over any person else. Let them meet their obligations to the State just as every other person has to do. Who is to provide for the old age of the farmer who has worked all his life trying to get a little property around him? Talk about the high cost of living! My hon. friend speaks about the retired judge who has been pulling down $5,000 and $6,000 of a pension, but there is no consideration for the man who has worked hard all his life trying to get a little property together and to give his children an education. He can get along as best he may. Judges should be made to conform to the laws of the country and to meet their responsibilities just the same as other men.

Mr. J. H. THOMPSON: I quite agree with the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I am in favour of the income tax, but I think that it will take time to get it working smoothly. On going through the country I find there are a great many farmers and people in villages who do not understand the Act. The form sent out for them to fill in is too complicated. I believe that ninety per cent of the people do not understand it. They are quite willing to pay the tax, providing that they feel that their neighbour is paying it also. If a man is conscientious in filling in the form, he is taxed highly, while another man who thinks that he does not have income enough and does not go into the matter closely, gets off scot free. There should be a change. I am quite in accord with the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). I believe that the work of collection could be managed better by the secretary treasurer of the municipality. If that is not workable, I would like to ask the minister if it would not be possible for the income tax collector to be moved around from place to place. I will give you an instance. In my riding there are five villages. A great many people live in those places who do not understand how to make the return. If the collector would spend a week in those different villages, assisting farmers and others in making out their returns, it would go a long way in helping the situation. I am sure that these people are willing to pay. But there are questions on the form that no farmer can very well answer. There is one question in connection with horses: How much does it cost to produce a horse? Different farmers have spoken to me about this. One year hay is worth $10 a ton, while another year it is worth from $20 to $30. No man can tell what it costs him to produce a horse. That form might be simplified, and, if it cannot be, I would like to see the income tax collector spend a week in different parts of the riding to assist the farmers and others in making out their returns. They are willing to make them out, but they do not understand them.

Mr. LALOR: I do not know what system is followed in Hastings or in other parts of the country, but I do know how the system is administered in the Niagara district. I would like to compliment the minister upon the man that he has appointed there. We have a very competent man in that district who can give any person any information that he requires in connection with the income tax and advise him as to the proper manner of filling out the form. He is located in the county town and he looks after Haldimand and Norfolk. If such as he are appointed throughout the country generally the Government have good officials in that particular line. It was not a political appointment, because the man I speak of held for many years the position of secretary of the Liberal Association in the county of Haldimand. He lost his son and son-in-law, both officers, overseas, and he deserved the appointment. He was formerly in the registry office, he is a first-class official, and I want to take this opportunity of complimenting the Government upon appointing such a man.

I believe there should be such a man in every district of the country. As the member for East Hastings (Mr. T. H. Thompson) has stated, the idea is that people should get this information in order that they may be instructed as to what the law is, and how the tax should be paid, and that they should get the proper forms and fill them out correctly.

Mr. T. H. THOMPSON: Perhaps my remarks were misunderstood. The officer in charge, in the case referred to, is a competent man and I believe is trying to do his duty. I was speaking in the public interest, and dealing with the distance that people will have to travel in order to get in touch with the officer.

Mr. ROBB: Before the clause carries, I would point out that owing to the discussion which has taken place I have not received a reply from the Minister of Finance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend from Maisonneuve has raised the question of the principle that is involved in the exemption of judges from the provisions of the Income Tax Act. The point is that a bargain was made with the judges when they accepted office that they would receive their compensation, including their pension, free of any deduction whatsoever made by, or under the authority of, the Parliament of Canada. Now let us regard the situation for a moment. Take the case of an eminent lawyer who is making twenty-five, thirty, or forty thousand dollars a year, or not so much for that matter. Say he goes upon the bench. He accepts a salary of $8,000, let us say, or $10,000, with provision for a retiring allowance. Now, the terms of his engagement are governed by the Judges Act, which expressly provides that he is to receive the whole of that amount without reduction. That is the bargain that is made between him and the Government, and Parliament, for that matter, when he accepts office, and I submit that the question before the committee is as to whether the Government would be justified in imposing income taxation upon those judges who have accepted their appointment on a definite, positive understanding governed by legislation. I have no hesitation in saying for myself that I think it would be inadvisable for the Dominion Government to enact legislation of that kind. I understand, I think, fully, the views of hon. members who feel that the judges should be assessed. They proceed upon the assumption that as everybody else receiving an income beyond the exemption is liable for income tax so should the judges be. I submit the distinction lies in the bargain to which I have referred between the judges on the one hand and the Parliament and the people of Canada on the other. It is a question of whether we are going to follow a contract or not. In the amendment which we suggest we propose that income taxation shall apply to those who are appointed from the date of this legislation. In other words we are not adopting retroactive legislation, which would have the effect of breaking contracts entered into by the judges with the Government and people of Canada, but it will apply to future appointments. The justification of the amendment which we propose is this: that although we have the Judges Act, no laywer accepting appointment as a judge hereafter can allege that he should not be liable to assessment under the income tax by reason of the provisions of that Act because he will be aware, as all citizens are deemed to be aware, of the provisions in the legislation which we are now enacting. It is undoubtedly a question of whether the Government should break its contract with the judiciary. The judiciary has always been regarded as being in a peculiar position, and rightly so, under the constitution, a position of great independence so far as the Government of the day is concerned; and I believe it is in the national interest that any contract or agreement that we have with the Judiciary enacted in a law by this Parliament, as it is in the case in question, should be scrupulously observed. It may be that no untoward results would ensue if we were to make all judges, who are exempt under the Judges Act, liable to income taxation, but I submit that the preservation of the principle is important and should be respected by the Government and by Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: I fully agree with what the Minister of Finance says that the statute governing the appointment of judges and their responsibilities, as far as contribution to municipal and other taxes are concerned, should be observed. In my opinion it is a very grave mistake for any person to think that it is all right to commercialize a judge like any other person in the country, and that he should be subject to the same commercial laws and conditions. A judge may be getting $8,000 a year, and a railway manager may be drawing the same salary, but the two positions are entirely different; and we would be sorry to suppose that the judge was not on a higher plane, as far as independence, mentality, and frame of mind in dealing with his business is concerned, as compared with the railway manager. I am not saying that the railway manager must not be a good man in every sense of the word, but the duties of a judge are of a peculiar cast. It has always been said that the law is a very jealous mistress, and that the man who desires to have a proper knowledge of the law and be able to apply it properly, is a man who gives his entire time, attention, and ambition to its study and its application. For that reason it is in the best interests of the country that certain safeguards should be thrown around the judiciary, not for the sake of the judge alone but in the interests of the people in general. I am not only in favour of leaving the Judges' Act as it is, but I am entirely opposed to this amendment which will be drawing a line between the judge that will be appointed after this legislation is passed and the judge that is now holding that exalted position. It is the law that a judge is not subject to those exactions and it should stay that way. I think it would be a pernicious distinction, and a highly pernicious system of legislation that the judges of the land who are to-day appointed and occupying those positions are exempt under the present Judges' Act, whereas the man who is appointed to-morrow, or any day after this legislation passes, shall be under a different law and different conditions entirely. I think it is entirely a mistake, and I hope that whatever law is enacted in regard to judges that they shall all be in the same position and subject to the same conditions.

Mr. NICKLE: Last year when this subject was under discussion I took the same position as the Minister of Finance takes to-day—that a contract was entered into by this country with the judges who had been appointed prior to the income tax becoming law entitling them to exemption from taxation under this Act. I think that in all human probability when the Judges' Act was passed it was never contemplated for a moment that income taxes would ever be effective in Canada; but whether that is so or not it is a matter of no very great importance when one considers it in relation to the maintenance of the national integrity. A contract was made between this country and those who have been appointed to the judiciary. It may not have been a wise contract—I am not discussing that, I am not saying that it was or was not right. But when a bargain is made, even if it is a bad bargain, I believe that it should be respected. I therefore agree entirely with what the minister said: That those who were appointed before the Income Tax Act became effective should continue to enjoy the exemption that that Act gave them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Otherwise it would be simply a scrap of paper.

Mr. NICKLE: Otherwise, as the ex-Postmaster General remarks, it would be a mere scrap of paper. But I am quite at variance with the position taken by the leader of the Opposition. A judge may or may not be in a different position from other men in some respects, but when it comes to his bearing his share of the burden of the war, I think, provided he was appointed after this Act became effective, he should bear his fair share of the taxation imposed upon him. To do anything else would be to pass class legislation of a most pernicious character, and I think that the people at large would have reason to complain, as the hon. member for Frontenac did this afternoon, that those on the bench were given exemption—provided, of course, that their appointment was subsequent to the passing of this Act. It is quite true that the hon. member for Frontenac went further than the leader of the Opposition; he thought the legislation should be retroactive. I do not agree with his argument. It would be a mistake, a breach of contract. But in relation to those judges who were appointed subsequent to the passing of the Income Tax Act, I think they should carry their share of the burden of taxation the same as any other citizen.

Speaking for a moment or two on the general principle of income taxation, in my opinion, though I have no specific cases by which I can back my judgment, I think there are scores of people evading payment of this tax, and I think they are evading payment for the reason that they are only asked to certify as to their incomes. Being legally educated, I have great faith in the restraining power of an affidavit, coupled with the possible penalty that may follow if the affidavit is false. Under the Income Tax Act all a man is asked to do is to sign a form. There may or may not be an investigation as to the correctness of the return. If there is an investigation, and the return is found to be incorrect, there is no criminal penalty incurred. I have on several occasions submitted to the officer who is responsible for this Act that all these returns should be made on oath, because I do not believe there is any restraining pecuniary disadvantage that can be compared with the sanction of an oath. I think that every return should be sworn, and that in the event of its being found to be false, that is, not having been sworn to in good faith, there should be a possibility of punitive results. We have it under our income tax legislation in relation to municipal taxation, we have it in relation to succession duty taxation, and if you have it in respect of these classes of taxation, why should this Government make the Dominion income tax a matter of less importance than a municipal or a provincial tax? I believe the people would take the situation in more serious spirit if they had to swear to their returns, and I urge on the minister that he give consideration to my suggestion, although I know that his officer, with his broad experience, is distinctly and flatly opposed to it.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There is a very general suspicion throughout the country that we are not getting income tax from the men who are liable to pay it. I do not know what steps have been taken by the department to see that every man with an assessable income is taxed. I do not know whether any prosecutions have been instituted or whether much energy has been spent in that line. The Minister of Finance will excuse me for saying so, but a few weeks ago, at the request of a prominent merchant in a certain Canadian city, I asked the hon. gentleman if he would give me a list of the men in that city who had made returns. My friend was suspicious that some of his neighbours had not made a return, and that they were escaping from year to year. He said to me, "I do not want to know what they are assessed for, I do not want to know how much income they have returned; but if you will get me the names of those men who have made returns, that is all I want." The hon. minister gave consideration to my request, and he very politely told me that he did not think it advisable to give me such a list. I can see very grave objections to giving out any information as to what the returns contain, but I am not able to see any good reason why the names of the men who have actually made returns should not be given. If the Minister of Finance has any good reason against granting the information, I would like him to place it on Hansard, because I feel if there was some publicity with regard to men who are making returns it would assist his officers in various parts of Canada to do their work properly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend, as a member of Parliament, desires information regarding the assessment of any citizen, he may obtain it by applying to the Commissioner of Taxation. But it was common ground at the time the Income Tax Act was passed that it was undesirable that the incomes of private individuals throughout the country should be published to the world. It may be that we shall come to the time when that is required and desirable; there is a good deal to be said in favour of it; but I believe that the view of Parliament at the time the legislation was enacted was against such action. If any member of Parliament desires, for his own information and not for publication to the world, to know what income is assessable, or what business profits are assessable against any individual or firm, he can get the information by applying to the Commissioner of Taxation. If that were not so it would remove a rather valuable safeguard upon administration. I do not say in regard to the present administration, because I know the Commissioner of Taxation desires to do only one thing, namely, his duty. But it would be possible to have these matters too secret, and I have always taken the view that a member of Parliament desiring to obtain information as to assessment should get it, but I do not believe that he should publish it to the world. There is a good deal of spiteful feeling existing in this world, and very often people take a certain amount of satisfaction in rather maliciously publishing statements about neighbours which may place the latter unjustifiably and unwarrantedly in a false position. My own experience has been that if a man is reputed to be wealthy, his wealth is always exaggerated in the public estimation. On the other hand, if it is reported that a man has lost a certain amount of money, that also is exaggerated. People like sensational news. Very few men indeed are found to be nearly as wealthy as they are generally supposed to be, and many who are reputed to be wealthy are poor indeed. I remember for several years after I came down to Ottawa I laboured under the most unjust odium of being a well-to-do man. The House has long since realized how unjust was the feeling against me.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I do not want to be misunderstood. I was not asking for a statement of the assessment.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I did not misunderstand my hon. friend at all.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am simply asking for a list of those who have made returns, merely for the use of the gentleman who requested me to obtain it for him. I was going to send it to him, and he would see if Mr. John Smith of his city had made a return, and, if not, he could write a letter to your officer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think he should see the income tax inspector in the district and communicate his view to him as to the assessability of the parties in whom he is specially interested. The gentleman referred to is not an official. His motives may be of the very best—I have no doubt they are—to get the information, but it would be a violation of the Income Tax Act if such information were given to him, that is to say, made public.

Mr. PEDLOW: It is the practice in Great Britain that where life insurance premiums are paid by individuals, up to, I think, one-fifth of their income can be used for the payment of premiums, and that amount is exempt from income taxation. I submitted this proposition to the manager of this department, and his ruling was that no exemption would be made of the premium paid and that the returns from life insurance policies would not be included for taxation purposes in an estate. That is perhaps a fair ruling, but insurance should be encouraged to the limit, not only with those who are able to carry large amounts of insurance on their lives for the protection of their wives and families, but with those who are able to carry only smaller amounts. The minister should consider the advisability of exempting from income taxation up to a certain amount of the income of an individual when applied towards payment of premiums on life insurance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think, if my hon. friend will reflect, he will see it would not be sound to grant exemption to the extent of premiums paid for life insurance. Life insurance is an asset. A man might pay out of an income of $10,000 a year premiums on a very large insurance payable during his lifetime if he should live a certain number of years, and he might deduct that from his income. Especially is it objectionable where you have a sharply graded income tax. A man with an income of $10,000 a year is assessed on a higher basis than a man who has an income of $5,000 a year. If you were to exempt premiums paid on life insurance, the man with an income of $10,000 a year might take out a very large amount of life insurance, either on the tontine or straight life plan and thus get the benefit of a lower income tax rate. To safeguard against any injustice, we, in this Income Tax Act, provide that moneys derived from life insurance is not assessable as income. For instance, an estate or a beneficiary of a deceased person receiving a large amount upon the death of the testator is not assessable in respect of that amount. It would not be fair to assess it as income. We considered that matter very carefully, and my recollection is that it was debated pretty fully at the time the income tax measure was introduced, and we have not been able to see our way to allow it.

Mr. PEDLOW: When a premium is paid on a life insurance policy, the actual cash paid is not the value as an asset from year to year. Therefore, it is hardly fair that the insurer should be compelled to pay an income tax on a value that is only apparent and that is not real.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the particular objection to a little more publicity in regard to income tax collection? In the United States, I understand, they have had considerable difficulty for eight or nine years in getting it on a sound basis. I presume the tax commissioner has had consultations with experts from the United States and possibly from Great Britain. Do they give publicity to income tax collections? I cannot see any reason why the tax collector should not give any man who cares to go into his office and ask for it the amount of money any individual in the community is paying. Until you have that publicity the feeling will prevail that some people are dodging their income tax. It seems to be a pretty general feeling in the country that people are dodging the tax, and I do not know that publicity would do a great deal of harm or hurt the false pride of people who are allowing others to think they have very large incomes when they have not, or people who have the false modesty of gathering a large amount and who want to make it appear small. At present there is no way of finding out whether a person has paid the tax or not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The practice in the United States and Great Britain is precisely the same as ours; if anything, it is more strict. I remember when the question was asked in the House as to what our policy would be with regard to making public assessments made under the Business Profits War Tax Act, I cabled the Canadian High Commissioner in London to find out the British practice. The reply I got was that under no circumstances would they bring down the information to the House of Commons. I am not saying that because they do that we should follow their example, but the British Government have had a long experience with income tax administration, and they are pretty efficient in their methods, and they have thought it undesirable to give publicity to the details of the taxation of individuals under the Income Tax Act or the Business Profits taxation measure which has been in effect during the war. The reason for their attitude is that which I have mentioned, namely, that people's private affairs are brought into publicity in an undesirable way, and that a great deal of injustice may be done to individuals who may have made perfectly fair returns and who yet may not appear to have done so in the eyes of the public. There is a great deal to be said for publicity. Personally, I am a great believer in publicity along all lines, but I would hesitate, without a very full expression of opinion on the part of the House, to consider favourably making public the details of income and income assessments. If you take the case of municipal assessments of income, I had a good deal of experience in that years ago in Toronto, the assessment rolls contained the names of all individuals who were subject to assessment and any citizen could come in and look them up. I found there was practically no interest in them, and I do not think there is anything gained in Toronto to which I specially refer because of my long experience there years ago, by reason of the fact that individuals may come in and look up assessments, because the great body of the people certainly do not bother much with it. The only recollection I have of the income tax assessment in the city of Toronto was that I almost became a convert to Henry George's theory that the only kind of assessment was against land, because he held, for the reasons which he elaborated in his work, that it was absolutely impossible to assess justly or fairly either personal property or income.

Mr. McKENZIE: I realize this resolution is going to pass, but I wish to register my most emphatic protest against making this distinction between the judges. The Minister of Finance will find no precedent for it in England or France or the United States, or any where in the world. I wish to protest in a most emphatic manner against legislation under which three judges of the Bench will pay taxation while three others on the same Bench will be exempt, under which one county court judge will be taxed while the judge sitting by his side will be exempt. I realize that I cannot prevent this resolution from passing, but I say it should not be passed. Whether men are judges of the Supreme Court or of any other court in this country they should all be in exactly the same position with regard to taxation. It is pernicious taxation to tax the one and exempt the other. So long as the law is that they are subject to taxation, that law should prevail with regard to all the judges.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I may say that one reason why this resolution was brought down was that there was a very strong view prevailing in the House last year that the judges' incomes should be liable to assessment. I confess to having a good deal of sympathy with the views put forward by the leader of the Opposition, but on the other hand I realize the strength of the feeling which exists that all should contribute to income taxation, especially at a time like this.

Mr. McKENZIE: What the minister gets will be a mere trifle.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I appreciate my hon. friend's point, but what appealed strongly to Parliament last year when the matter came up was the principle involved, and this resolution has been brought down in deference to what the Government believe is the majority opinion of this Parliament with respect to the matter. Personally, I think there is a great deal to be said for the view of my hon. friend. I have a great regard for his opinion, but I think I must ask the House to adopt the resolution.

Mr. ROBB: I do not share the views of my leader or the leanings of the Minister of Finance. I believe that the feeling in the country is that judges must share the obligations of the country with the rest of the people. I think Parliament will only be interpreting the view of the country if we put through legislation compelling the judges to pay their fair share of taxation.

Mr. FIELDING: I took part in the discussion of this question last year and my view was emphatically in accordance with that which the Minister of Finance now presents. I am therefore not able to agree with the leader of the Opposition. I think if a vote had been taken in the House last year there would have been no difficulty in carrying a motion to abolish the exemption from taxation of the judges, but some good Conservatives like the hon. member for Kingston and myself paid due regard to vested rights and said: "A bargain is a bargain, and must be kept." I would suggest one way of removing the inequality, which perhaps will satisfy the leader of the Opposition. There is a movement, which may or may not take effect this session, to provide an increase in salary for the judges. If that matures, I would suggest that a condition should be made that on any increase in salary being granted, all the judges shall be subject to the income tax without any exception.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Chairman, now that the question of judges and the taxation of their incomes under the new resolution is being discussed, I think it is not inappropriate that I should make a personal statement. When the Judges' Amendment Act was before the Committee of the House on May 30 I had occasion to make some observations and I brought to the attention of the committee the fact that certain judges in Quebec, in my opinion, held cases pleaded before them, too long under advisement. I said that within the last few years there had been appointed to the bench some judges who I thought delayed their decisions too long. Hansard has me reported as saying "five" judges instead of "some" judges, and as a result I understand that five of the most recently appointed gentlemen have taken this to mean that my remarks were intended to apply to them. These judges are: Justices Allard, Tellier, Duclos, DeLorimier and Loranger. I wish to say that I did not have in mind any of these gentlemen. They are expeditious in the handling of their cases and in delivering judgments as those who practise before our courts know quite well. What I should have done, was to ask for an Order of the House for a return showing what judges have had cases before them for two years and upwards without delivering judgments thereon, and when the return was brought down discussion could have been had. I have made the necessary correction in revised Hansard and have written to express my regret to the complaining judges. My object in rising on this occasion is that this explanation may be given the same publicity as my remarks on May 30.

2. That the exemptions and deductions allowed from taxable income by paragraph (a) of subsection one of section three of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, be amended to provide for such reasonable allowance as may be granted by the minister, in his absolute discretion for depreciation; by striking out the exemption for any expenditure of a capital nature for renewals or for the development of a business; and by adding the provision that the minister when determining the income derived from timber limits shall make an allowance for their exhaustion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In estimating the net income of a business it is proper to deduct a reasonable amount for depreciation. Under existing legislation depreciation is a question of fact and I need not suggest to the committee that a great number of parties subject to assessment are exceedingly desirous of wiping off as large a sum as possible for depreciation. It is very desirable that regulations should be made, having regard to various classes of business, providing for scales of depreciation so that all may be dealt with, as far as possible, on the same basis. I need not say that the department will act in no arbitrary or high handed manner. Our administration, I think, can be trusted to allow a reasonable amount of depreciation, but we have found that advantage is sought to be taken of the provisions of the Act and demands are made for an unreasonable amount of depreciation, with the result that the net income is reduced below the figure at which the assessment should be made.

The second part of the section, the question of renewals and the amount of expenditure for development of business, under existing legislation, lends itself as in the other case, to demands that are in many cases unreasonable. We propose, therefore, to strike out the provision permitting a certain amount to be set aside for renewals and development of business. Men's ideas as to the amount of earnings which should be kept back for development or renewal vary greatly. In sound income tax legislation allowance should undoubtedly be made for depreciation, and the taxpayers should be given the benefit of any doubt; but where large profits are made and are put into renewals of a capital nature, or set aside for development of business, it is obvious that net earnings are cut down very materially. During the war, I think, it was proper that we should have those provisions, because many firms, for the purpose of getting war business, put up additions to their plants which would not represent in peace time the amount of capital invested in them. The cost of everything was very high and to meet war conditions there were expansions of plants which would not be required in a time of peace. But now that the war is, we hope, practically at an end and conditions are more normal, we propose to strike out the provision under which exemption is made for expenditure of capital for renewals or for the development of business.

As to the third matter mentioned in the section, it is of course only reasonable that in determining the net income derived from the working of timber limits, allowance should be made for exhaustion. That principle is applied in the case of mines, oil wells and other businesses.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Real estate?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. The depreciation varies according to the business. In one business it might be proper to allow 2 per cent and in another 5 per cent, while one can imagine a business in which as high as 10 per cent or more should be allowed. It depends on wear and tear of machinery and strain generally upon plant.

Mr. PEDLOW: Are the provisions of this paragraph intended to refer to retail merchandise on hand?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is any provision made covering the handling of stocks in retail merchandise on hand?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has reference to depreciation in value of goods on hands. The inventories show that. There is a valuation of the goods on hand, and allowance is made for any fall in price.

Mr. PEDLOW: If the merchant has to give a return of merchandise on hand at cost under present conditions, it would be absolutely unfair, because the fluctuations are very great in the market on all kinds of merchandise. Certain merchandise may be valued at so much to-day, and be very much less a month hence. A merchant buying merchandise to-day may have goods on hand a year from now, and when he takes stock his goods may not be worth the present cost price. What latitude will be allowed the commissioner in dealing with a case of that kind? It is important that there should be a decision along definite lines.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Under our regulations adjustment may be made within a year. My hon. friend has in mind that a fall in price occurs. If within a year after the close of the accounting period it appears that a fall has taken place in the price of the goods from that shown in the inventory, allowance is made by the department. But it would not do to allow for depreciation on an apprehension that goods may fall in price, because, on the other hand, they might go up. The fall has actually to occur, and a year is given within which claim may be made for a reduction by reason of such fall.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understood that each accounting period had to be dealt with by itself.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Commissioner of Taxation tells me that the matter is being carried out.

Mr. CAHILL: With regard to the income derived from timber limits, what is the basis of estimating profits? I would suppose that the difference between the value of the standing timber and the cost of taking it out would represent the profit. Is that the basis?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, and on the basis of stumpage, which varies according to the different provinces. I need not tell the hon. member how difficult it is to ascertain what the net income is from the working of timber limits. The estimate has to be made as nearly as possible on net profits, and one of the items of deduction—I think a proper one—is depreciation in the exhaustion of the limit by reason of the cutting that has taken place.

Mr. CAHILL: You know what it costs to cut the timber and you know just what the timber is worth standing, so that your profit would be the difference between the worth of the timber standing and the cost of putting it on the market, and I do not see why special provision is made in regard to timber.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If this special provision were not made the department could not allow an amount for exhaustion. In the present Act provision is made in the case of mines.

For example, if you simply take all the revenue from a coal mine, on the one hand, and deduct all the expenditures on the other, the net income that will be derived will be too great, because you have made no allowance for the exhaustion of capital, so to speak, from taking out the coal. The principle in the case of timber is precisely the same. The reason why we are inserting this provision in the Act is that there is no provision in the present Act relating to timber and the wastage of the property. We have legislation which enables us to allow for the exhaustion of mines and oil wells.

Sir HERBERT AMES: In the original Income Tax Act there are two clauses which allow for exemption—clauses 3 and 5. We have been dealing with clause 3. I do not see that clause 5 is dealt with at all, but it relates to exemptions. I would like to make a few observations with regard to a matter that I desire to call to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). Paragraph (j) of clause 5 provides that:

> The military and naval pay of persons who have been on active service overseas during the present war in any of the military or naval forces of His Majesty or any of His Majesty's Allies.

——shall be exempt from taxation. I would like to put in a plea for the same provision with respect to the pension that may be awarded to the widow of a man who has been killed in service, or afterwards, or the pension that is derived by a person who is disabled. It is quite possible that there may be a little other revenue in addition to the pension. If the widow of a colonel or a major has an income derived from life insurance, her pension income and life insurance income might bring the amount up to the point where a portion of her income would be taxed. I think the principle having been once adopted that the military pay of persons engaged in the war should not be taxed, the same principle should be applied to pensions and disablement allowances. Strictly speaking, the Government simply pays with one hand and takes back with the other. As these deserving people will have to live mainly upon the pension allowance, I do not think this Government should exact from them sums that might otherwise be properly collectable, and I would ask the minister, when the Bill comes down, to please include a clause to that effect.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to support with all my heart the proposal or suggestion made by my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames). I think that just as the military pay was placed beyond the reach of the tax collector so ought the pension paid to the widow. As my hon. friend says, that pension at the present time, until further amendment—and I hope amendment may come—is small and gives the recipient just the bare necessities of life. Under these circumstances I would certainly support any amendment which would provide for an exemption in favour of the widow who receives a pension.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am disposed to regard very favourably the suggestion put forward by the two hon. members. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) had drawn the matter to my attention and it strongly appeals to me. It is not necessary to make any amendment to the resolution, because it is open to us, when the Bill is in the committee stage, to extend the exemptions by cutting down and not adding to the burdens of taxation. I will have a note made of the suggestions and get an appropriate amendment to the Bill when it is in the committee stage.

Mr. PEDLOW: There is another matter that possibly I might call to the attention of the minister. One of the provisions in regard to making up the schedule that the department requires is that no deduction shall be made in the case of a merchant for bad debts that have occurred outside of the accounting period. If there are no transactions within the year it will not be permitted to be deducted in the statement in order to determine the actual incomes of the merchant. That is a very exacting provision. It is hardly fair, because in many cases amounts are carried from one year to the succeeding year in the hope that it may be collected before the current year ends. If that requirement were followed out it would impose a hardship in many cases. There should be some more elastic ruling in a matter of that kind.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The ruling applies only to bad debts incurred prior to the Act coming into effect, 1st January, 1917. These debts were treated as capital at the time the Act commenced to have effect. It would, I think, be unwise to consider bad debts that had occurred prior to the coming into effect of the Act, when such debts had been treated as capital because the Business Profits War Tax Act has regard to capital in the determination of the amount that shall be payable.

Mr. PEDLOW: You can easily understand that in many cases a merchant would carry an account when there was no provision to be made for a payment of that kind to the department. He would not be as careful in his accounting in a matter of that kind. When there was no object in deleting such accounts he would allow them to be carried on from year to year in the hope of eventually having them paid. He may have discovered since that that is impossible and that the accounts have to be written off. I think it is hardly fair to ask a merchant to pay income tax on an account that is actually worthless.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Bad debts incurred since the Act came into effect are allowed, but in dealing with the matter of income it would seem to me that one would not be on sound ground in going back prior to the passage of the Act and making allowance for bad debts then existing which were assumed to be good. I think we can only deal with the accounting period since the beginning of the Act, making whatever adjustments may be necessary in respect of depreciation in the face value of the accounts since that time.

Resolution agreed to.

That the allowance of two hundred dollars for each child under sixteen year of age who is dependent upon the taxpayer for support as enacted in paragraph (b) of subsection one of section three of The Income War Tax Act, 1917 as amended by chapter 25 of the statutes of 1918 be allowed for the purposes of the normal tax only.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It seems to me that my hon. friend should encourage the increase of population in Canada.

Mr. JACOBS: Produce and save.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Instead of making an annual allowance of $200, my hon. friend should base his exemption in the case of children upon the well known rule adopted by all political economists. A child, according to the doctrines of political economy, is worth to the state $1,000. That is the average value of a citizen to the state, and it seems to me that the allowance provided for here does not give justice to those who are accomplishing their duty towards the state and towards the country. I am sincere in making this plea. Our country will not, in spite of all the expectations and the hopes which I would like to share with my hon. friend, get in the years to come a large increase of populations for reasons which are very obvious. The countries of Europe have been devastated. Millions have died on the battlefield. From some allied countries we cannot, under any consideration, expect any flow of emigration. Even from the British Isles, I think, the tide of emigration towards Canada will be rather limited. I am not referring to the enemy countries. From that source the Minister of Immigration and Colonization will not and cannot expect any population for this country. So that we will be limited, so to speak, to the continent of North America. We will encourage the coming of immigrants from the United States. They may not come in very large numbers on account of our financial situation, but many will come because we have such fine lands yet available for settlement left in the West. American settlers will be attracted to Canada only to a certain extent, and we must base all our hopes and expectations, and they are the only legitimate ones, on the birth rate in Canada. Now I do not wish to draw any invidious comparisons between the provinces, but the comparisons are self-evident. In some provinces the people have deserted the old homestead and have drifted to the cities, and in the cities, it is noticed by statisticians, the rate of population has decreased —for what reasons I do not know, and if I did know I would not care to state. At all events, the fact exists that the birth rate in this country has not been as high as it should have been during the last decade. Now, what is the first duty of a government if it is not to encourage the settlement of the country out of its own population? That population must not remain stationary, and it is the duty of the State, as it is the duty of all constituted authorities, lay and civil, to encourage the increase of population, to view favourably a large birth rate. The income tax is an excellent mode of taxation. I have said so on many occasions before the Government adopted the policy, and I repeat it to-night. It is the best mode of taxation, but it is nevertheless taxation and it should rest upon the shoulders which can carry it the more easily. The father, or the mother, of a large family should be considered favourably by the Minister of Finance, and it should be proclaimed throughout the country that the larger the family the lighter the taxation. In the old motherland, France, the birth rate has decreased enormously, especially since the Napoleonic wars. After those glorious but deadly wars the people of France realized that the procreation of children had had until then only one effect—it had swelled the ranks of the army. In those days people thought only of war, of conquest, and as a matter of fact, I am sorry to say, the old motherland, led by Bonaparte, did not live up to the best traditions of the race as regards population. I have seen statistics on that point which are simply appalling. France faced the stern reality at the beginning of the recent war when realizing that she, at one time the great nation of the continent of Europe, had dwindled in population to a point where she was dangerously threatened by her neighbour, Germany.

There was a feeling of anxiety among all patriots in France at the beginning of the war. They had the spectacle of that nation of 70,000,000 facing their Motherland which should have had a population at least equal to that of her enemy. They realized that her birth rate had dwindled to such an extent that her population did not reach the 40,000,000 mark. So the best minds of all churches—and I may say that there are many churches in France—the various academies and the moralists of all shades, started a movement to promote the legitimate increase of population. Of course, this is a very big subject and I might dwell upon it until late this evening. But, to be brief, let me say in just two words that the question came up before the House of Representatives in France and a law was introduced embodying exactly the principle that I am now propounding. The Bill did not meet the fate it was expected to meet, but the question is still a very live one in France as to whether or not the State should not revert to the laws of Augustus and of Louis XIV and give a bounty to the fathers and mothers of large families—so much per child. The French income tax—I have not the law under my hand—is graduated according to the number of children, the amount payable decreasing as the number of children increases.

A gentleman who visited Canada some four or five years ago, a very distinguished writer, M. Etienne Lamy lately gave his whole fortune, which was quite large, to be applied in the shape of bounties to large families amongst the peasantry, and I am proud to say that he has succeeded in his patriotic appeal to the French peasantry to create a public opinion on the matter. M. Etienne Lamy in one of his writings, recalled the fact that in 1759, at the time of the defeat of the French on the plains of Abraham, the French colony was composed, in round figures, of only 60,000 souls, and that at the last census it had reached the figures with which hon. members are familiar. He said that it was a miracle; he called it "the miracle of French colonization in New France;" and he appealed to his fellow men in France to rejuvenate themselves and to take example from French Canada.

I am only making these remarks, Mr. Chairman, to seriously call the matter to the attention of my hon. friend so that he may consider whether he should not extend the principle of tax exemption for children up to $1,000, which is the amount fixed by all economists as being the average value of a child to the State.

Mr. BURNHAM: I have heard with considerable pain the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, and whose opinions I have always respected, as, indeed, I do the gentleman himself. He has enunciated clearly and absolutely a utilitarian doctrine. The old-fashioned idealism, if it is not now the subject of universal laughter and ridicule according to the speaker, has almost disappeared. That idealism meant belief in the efficacy of prayer; belief that man was in touch with a providential God, that when man appealed rightly to that God, he was sustained, that God watched over the world, and that not all the force of Germany or of the Bolsheviki could overcome one single man if he were under the protection of the Almighty. But having forgotten that old idealism, having seen it recede from a philosophy and a religion to a theory, and then into thin air, we find the disposition is to trade off all the old idealism of the efficacy of prayer and the intervention of Providence for a good battalion; people, apparently, are prepared to give a bounty for flesh and blood. They revive the common utilitarianism of the negro era of the South, when the slaves who were strong of limb were led around like stallions, and population was increased in that way. This is utilitarianism. It has crept upon us like a thief in the night. We must either face it or succumb to it. It is, in the last analysis, the doctrine of materialism, the doctrine of force. If, then, we have nothing to rely upon but our good right arm, the subtlety of our intellect, our cunning, or the genius of a Foch,—if there is no longer a God that rules over us, let us know and we will put the matter in the Estimates and rely upon what we can do for ourselves!

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) I think the principle of an allowance for each child is sound. We have recognized that principle by an effective allowance of $200. I would call the attention of the Committee, however, to the fact that under our income tax legislation there is already an exemption of $2,000 in the case of married people or of widowers or widows having dependent children. I have thought the matter over somewhat, and will consider increasing the age from sixteen to eighteen years so that the $200 allowance will be made in respect of children up to and including those of eighteen years of age. That will be an extension, and at the same time it will not seriously affect our revenue—after all, this is intended to be a revenue-producing Bill.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That in lieu of the provisions of paragraph (d) of subsection one of section three of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, it be enacted that dividends received by or credited to shareholders of a corporation which is liable to taxation under the provisions of the said Act shall not be liable to normal tax in the hands of the shareholders but shall be liable to the supertax and surtax provisions of the said Act and to the surtax provisions of these resolutions. The amount of the exemption from normal tax to the shareholders shall not exceed the net amount of such dividends after the deduction of the interest or carrying charges, if any, in respect of such dividends. Provided, however,

(a) that in determining the income no deduction shall be allowed in respect of personal and living expenses, and in cases in which personal and living expenses form part of the profit, gain or remuneration of the taxpayer, the same shall be assessed as income for the purposes of this Act;

(b) that deficit or losses sustained in transactions entered into for profit but not connected with the chief business, trade, profession or occupation of the taxpayer may not be deducted from income derived from the chief business, trade, profession or occupation of the taxpayer in determining his taxable income.

Mr. CAHILL: Does paragraph (a) apply to farmers?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, it always has so applied. When the Income Tax Bill was before the House in 1917, it was provided that the net income should be assessed, and that all incomes should be taken into account and that no deductions should be made for living expenses. The Bill went from this House to the Senate, who tried their hand by way of an amendment, which, as a matter of constitutional practice, they had no right to do. They inserted a provision which was intended to make clear that there should be no exemption by reason of living expenses, but they worded it in an ambiguous manner. For example, take the house of a bank manager or other cases that will occur to the Committee. The Senate amended the Bill by putting in this provision:

Provided, however, that in determining the income, the personal and living expenses shall not be taken into consideration.

That language is equivocal. The Senate, no doubt, intended to make it clear that if a man got his living in addition to a certain income or had any allowance by way of a house, his net income should be determined by the addition to the amount of money he received of a fair amount in respect of the other advantage that he got. But unfortunately the wording is such as to lend itself to another interpretation. Therefore, it has been put forward that a man who has his living expenses or an allowance by way of a house in addition to his salary should be assessed for income in respect of that advantage which he has in getting his living or in occupying his house. The department, in interpreting and administering the Act, takes the view that was taken by the House of Commons and that was undoubtedly meant by the Senate. This provision is to make it perfectly clear that, if a man gets his living expenses in addition to a money income, the two shall be taken together for the purpose of computing the income upon which he should be assessed.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This section provides that a shareholder of a corporation shall not be liable to normal tax provided the tax is paid by the corporation. I understand it is also provided that he shall be liable to the supertax. Is there a change in the law in this respect?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no change in this respect. My hon. friend is aware that we tax the corporation in respect of its net income, and we have increased that to ten per cent. The dividends a man receives into his hands are not liable to assessment in respect of the normal tax. The principle of the law is not changed, although we have increased the normal tax to eight per cent in respect of incomes over $6,000. The supertax applies to dividends in the hands of shareholders, and that is a sound policy. Let me explain a little further in regard to this section, because I think that would be helpful to the Committee in considering it. The section reads in part:

The amount of the exemption from normal tax to the shareholders shall not exceed the net amount of such dividends after the deduction of the interest or carrying charges, if any, in respect of such dividends.

Let us say that a shareholder is carrying shares with a bank, upon which shares he derives dividends to the amount of $1,000, and let us say that, to carry the stock, he has borrowed from the bank an amount which would cost him $1,000 a year by way of interest. He has no net income from that stock. But some shareholders have desired to set off against their whole income the amount of money that they pay the bank by way of interest for carrying their stock, and at the same time, to claim exemption as to the normal tax upon the whole amount of the dividends which they receive from their shares. They, as the saying is, " want it coming and going," and this is to make it clear that only the net income in the hands of the shareholders, that is to say the difference between the amount he receives from his dividends and the amount he pays out by way of interest for carrying charges, shall be taken into account in exempting him in respect of the normal tax.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would it not be better, when he is allowed to debit any interest he pays during the year, if he paid his tax on his dividends and charged the interest on the other side of the account? Then he would not come under this section at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend. He would take the $1,000 he paid by way of interest in carrying this stock and deduct it from the income which he receives, say, in his calling, and in that way cut down the gross amount. The amount of income is important because of the imposition of the supertax. Under the suggestion made by my hon. friend, he would get exemption as to normal tax upon the whole amount of the dividend, and on the other hand, he would apply the $1,000 in cutting down the amount of his income otherwise received.

Mr. NESBITT: Is the report in the press that 31,000 people are the only ones who paid income tax in Canada for 1917 correct? And does the minister expect to get any more income taxes for the year? Was the amount reported in the press only for 1917, or was there any amount for 1918 mixed up in it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This afternoon, I gave the committee information showing that 46,176 assessments had been made in respect of 1917, aggregating an amount of assessments of over $11,000,000, of which 39,496 assessed parties had paid a total sum of over $9,000,000. I would point out also—and this is apt to be lost sight of—that with the Business Profits War Tax in operation there are many firms and companies which, but for the Business Profits War Tax Act, would pay on income account, because, as my hon. friend will remember, an assessable party pays whichever amount is the larger. If we did not have the Business Profits War Tax Act and were operating only under the Income Tax Act we would have received last year in income tax about $20,000,000. The amount of income tax which we received is apt to mislead by reason of the fact that so many individuals, firms and companies are assessed under the Business Profits War Tax Act for higher amounts than they would have been liable to pay under the Income Tax Act; in other words, instead of paying income tax they paid the Business Profits War Tax.

Mr. NESBITT: It is reported in the press that 31,000 individuals paid income tax for 1917: Was that the total number of individuals who paid income tax for that year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That report was published some time ago. The number is greater than that. There were 46,000 assessments altogether, and I understand that 37,000 of these were individuals. It must be borne in mind that when the income tax was first brought down an exemption of $3,000 was allowed, so the tax applied only to those in the country having an income of over $3,000.

Section agreed to.

On section 5:

5. That it be enacted in lieu of the provisions of subsection four of section three of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, that the share of a taxpayer in the undivided or undistributed gains and profits of a corporation shall not be deemed to be taxable income of the taxpayer unless the minister is of opinion that the accumulation of such undivided and undistributed gains and profits is made for the purpose of evading the tax and is in excess of what is reasonably required for the purposes of the business.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What change in the law does this section make?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Under the present law it is provided that:

For the purpose of the supertax only, the income of a taxpayer shall include the share to which he would be entitled of the undivided or undistributed gains and profits made by any syndicate, trust, association, corporation or other body, or any partnership, if such gains and profits were divided or distributed, unless the minister is of opinion that the accumulation of such undivided and undistributed gains and profits is not made for the purpose of evading the tax, and is not in excess of what is reasonably required for the purposes of the business.

With regard to partnerships, we find that profits are allowed to accumulate. The partners do not mind very much if the profits are left in the business. They will draw only a certain amount, and claim only to be assessable for that amount. But it is perfectly clear that if a partnership of two persons makes a net profit of $100,000 a year they should be assessed for that full amount, because they have made it. The two partners in question might say "We will leave $50,000 in the business and draw out $25,000 apiece," because the present supertax is a pretty serious thing. We are repealing that clause in the present Act and providing, with regard to corporations only, that the profits shall not be deemed to be taxable unless the minister is of opinion that the accumulation of such undivided profits is made for the purpose of evading the tax and is in excess of what is reasonably required for the purposes of the business. A corporation with a great many shareholders divides substantially all its earnings, setting aside a balance for reserve. The department will have to determine whether the amount set aside is an unreasonable amount or not. Many joint stock companies earning ten per cent net profits pay out seven per cent to the shareholders, and carry three per cent to reserve or to undistributed profits, which in time may be distributed to shareholders, or may become reserve so-called. We desire to improve the legislation so as to get at the profits of those engaged in syndicate operations and partnerships, and others whom now we have great difficulty in getting at. We also want to bring it about, so far as we can, that companies shall distribute the amount which may fairly be distributed to their shareholders. If they did not we would have to try to assess the shareholders, although that is a very difficult thing to do. It must be borne in mind as a safeguard in the case of a corporation that we are increasing the income tax upon a corporation to ten per cent of its net earnings, so that any company to-day earning $100,000 net profits will pay the Dominion Government $10,000 to start with, no matter what amount it may set aside or distribute. If it distributes $70,000 of its net earnings, then we assess the $70,000 in the hands of the shareholders in accordance with the law.

Mr. CAHILL: Suppose that this company making $100,000 net profits per year was investing $10,000 a month of its net profits in tax-exempt bonds; what taxation would it pay?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the company's net profits were $100,000 they would be assessed for $100,000, no matter what they invested the money in, because they have earned that amount; but supposing that in that year they had made no distribution to their shareholders, but had carried those bonds to reserve, from which the shareholders would draw earnings later—that is, added to their capital—the income from those bonds would be exempt. But their earnings, whether they were invested in Victory Bonds or not, would be assessable.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the minister regard the sums which a shareholder might obtain by selling his rights to shares as income or as an accretion of capital?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not sure that I follow my hon. friend. If a man owns shares and sells them, that is a realization of assets.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not mean that. Let us take a case which happened very recently, and which I had in mind. The Bell Telephone Company recently increased their capital stock, and every shareholder had the right to subscribe for a certain amount of the new stock. Those rights were quoted on the exchange at a few dollars per share. Would the minister regard the money which was obtained by a shareholder disposing of his rights in that way as income which could properly be assessed for income tax, or as an accretion of capital?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If a company distributes any part of its earnings by issuing stock, then that would be income. On the other hand, if there is a mere distribution of capital stock representing reserve, and a sale of that, I should say off-hand that that would be a matter relating to capital, provided the reserve was there before the first of January, 1917.

Mr. McMASTER: I have not made myself quite clear. Let us take the case of the Bell Telephone Company. Quite recently that company increased its capital stock. It invited its shareholders to take up new stock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: At what rate?

Mr. McMASTER: At par. For every four shares which a man held he was allowed to subscribe at par for one share of Bell Telephone. People sold their rights that were inherent in the old issue of shares to subscribe for new shares. It went first to about 5½ or 5¼ and then to 2¾ and up again to 3. I would be glad to know the minister's view as to whether, when a man sold that right that would be income that would be properly chargeable with income tax or whether it would be regarded as an accretion of capital.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My view would be—but I would not like to commit the department to it—that that is an accretion of capital. He would not be able to sell it at a premium unless by reason of the reserve of the company which would give it a value above par. The company could issue it to him at a premium representing its real value so that he would not be able to sell it on the market at a higher figure than that. Suppose they had issued at 125 and there was no value in the rights on that. That would mean that the company had distributed part of its reserve to its shareholders. They issue stock to the shareholders at 125. Why would it be worth 125? By reason of the value of the assets or earning power of the company. That being the case it would seem to me, speaking off-hand, that that would be an accretion of capital. I do not say that positively, because it often requires a court of last resort to determine whether receipts are assessable as income or should be treated as accretion of capital. It is difficult to answer these questions, which depend upon the interpretation of the Income Tax Act and upon decided cases. But speaking off-hand I would say it is an accretion of capital.

Mr. NICKLE: If the Minister of Finance is correct in his contention, an anomaly is created. Take three instances. First a stock dividend is declared and given as a stock bonus. This has been held assessable as income. That happened to myself last year, therefore I speak with authority. I also happen to be a shareholder in the Merchants Bank of Canada which issued at 150 one share of stock for every four shares held by the shareholder. But before that stock reached us it was worth 195 or thereabouts. There was an increase of 45 a share in that which entitled us to participate in the advantage of the increased dividend and in the reserve and which meant $45 profit on each four shares of stock by virtue of one new share issued. To an extent the same thing occurred in the case of the Bell Telephone Company. It would seem to me that in all these cases the increase in value, that is, the difference between what the stock was sold for to the shareholders and the market value of the stock when sold, should be treated as income and income tax should be paid upon it. I fail to see how a distinction may be made between a bonus of stock issued as bonus without anything being paid by the shareholder and an allotment of stock sold to the shareholder for much less than the market value of the stock. In each case the difference in value in the hands of a shareholder should be treated as income. In regard to the first case to which I directed attention, where stock was granted as a stock bonus and the income tax was collected on it, the result of the transaction was that the holdings of the shareholders were worth proportionately less than before the stock was issued, and yet it was held that being a bonus the tax had to be paid on it. I should be sorry indeed to think that the position taken by the minister was going to be regarded as a rule in relation to these stock dividends or bonuses or allotments to participations in reserve, because certainly it is a very subtle and gentle way of getting around the income tax.

Mr. LALOR: I do not agree with my hon. friend. If stock is worth $45 more in increased value the man who holds it pays an income tax upon the dividend he receives, which must be large or the stock would not be worth so much. If you assess the man for the increased value of the stock and then assess him again on the dividend he receives on the stock you would be assessing him twice, which would be unfair. If the view of the hon. member prevails, any stock which a man held that increased in value could be assessed on the increase. You must assess a man upon the dividend and revenue he gets, not upon the increased value.

Mr. NESBITT: If you pass a law like that there will be no increased value and you will not get dividends.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a legal question which we shall be glad to look into.

Mr. CAHILL: How are the rest funds of the banks treated, as for instance in the case of a bank declaring a dividend of say 8 per cent and putting a rest of a similar amount?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We assess the banks upon their net profits whether they distribute them to their shareholders or carry them to reserve. Where a bank distributes $600,000 to shareholders and carries $400,000 to reserve we make an assessment of 10 per cent on the whole million.

Mr. PEDLOW: With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) I think the ruling of the department which is already in force is quite clear. Suppose a man speculates outside his own business and loses. He is not allowed to deduct that amount from his income or his capital. The same law ought to apply the other way around.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is my own view but I do not like to commit myself to a decision involving a legal interpretation of the statute. The Commissioner of Taxation is of the opinion that there is a decision in England on the point, and that the sums in question are regarded as a return to capital.

Sir HERBERT AMES: As I expressed acquiescence in the ordinance of silence in the Budget debate, I want to take this occasion to say a few words with respect to the income tax. Before the war we were enjoying an income of about $100,000,000. Now we are endeavouring to raise a new income, under present conditions, of about $300,000,000. We have put that additional taxation at about the amount that we are called upon to raise. In doing that we have not only strengthened our previous sources of revenue but have introduced new modes of taxation. In strengthening previous sources of revenue we naturally availed ourselves of both the customs and excise taxes. In the increase of these two taxes the amount levied fell upon all parts of the population, but when it came to the business profits war tax and the income war tax the impost bore more heavily on one class of the population than on another, because the class that was presumably able to pay was marked out as the one from which it might be expected to secure the extra amount that was required.

When the income tax was first put on we started at a fairly reasonable low rate. We started out to raise about $10,000,000. In the second year the income tax was increased so that we planned to raise $15,000,000. It is now being increased so that we plan to raise $20,000,000. We are constantly being told in the House that the income tax should be increased, especially on the incomes of the millionaires and on the wealthy men of the country. The Government is being repeatedly told that it would not be necessary to do anything else than to increase the taxes of the millionaires. The Government has already made two very material increases in the income taxes. When we compare the three years, 1917, 1918 and 1919, we find the following results:

Income Tax.

Married man.

Income.	1917.	1918.	1919.
$ 5,000	$ 80	$ 100	$ 120
10,000	300	329	590
15,000	660	887	1,200 est
25,000	1,620	2,042	2,850 est
50,000	4,980	5,782	9,190
100,000	14,310	17,607	31,190

You see that the original income tax, which was moderate and which was more or less experimental, was increased, first in 1918, and is again now being very materially increased. I do not think, judging from the debate that I have listened to in this House, that hon. members realize to what a very considerable extent the income tax is being increased by the legislation now before the House. I think we should all realize that a very heavy burden has been placed by way of income tax. Of course we are not being taxed as they are in England. Canada does not begin to possess the amount of liquid wealth they have in England. We do not begin to have the number of people who can pay heavy income taxes that they have over there, where they have a country that has been accumulating for a thousand years. We have comparatively few wealthy men in this country, and if we tax these out of existence we shall have none left. Our income tax differs very little from the American income tax. It is only a trifle lower.

Mr. M. CLARK: Has my hon. friend any comparative figures as to that?

Sir HERBERT AMES: Yes, I have the figures of 1918, if you wish them. They are as follows:

Income Tax.

	Canadian, 1919	American 1918
$ 5,000	$ 120	$ 180
10,000	590	830
16,000	1,370	1,850
24,000	2,690	3,490
30,000	3,890	4,930
50,000	9,190	11,030
100,000	31,190	35,030

Ours is slightly but not very materially lower.

Mr. LALOR: Is that the present American income tax?

Sir HERBERT AMES: That is the American income tax for the year 1918. The Americans have since decreased their income tax. It was higher than ours until we made this last increase. I want to point out further that some of the provinces have income taxes and very severe ones. Do you realize that the province of British Columbia is taking more from its people by way of income tax than has the Federal Government by its income tax. The Provincial Finance Minister estimates in his Budget speech, delivered on the 4th April, 1918, that the provincial income tax in British Columbia should yield $2,215,000. That is more than we have taken out of British Columbia in any year so far by our income tax. For the man living in British Columbia and in some of the other sections of Canada there is a double income tax. If you add the two together it makes a very material burden.

I have listened many times to members who have been getting up and saying: "Tax the millionnaire; if you will only tax the millionnaires who are rolling in wealth you will not need to do anything else." That may sound very well when it is given to a popular audience on the street corner, but when we are seriously considering how to raise revenue we have to look such statements fairly in the face. I moved for a return which was brought down on the 9th June, 1919. That return gave information up to April 30 of the operation of the first Income War Tax Act. It set forth that there were 31,310 people who had paid income tax up to April 30, and that of those 31,310 people three per cent only had paid on incomes of more than $20,000. Ninety-seven per cent had paid on incomes below $20,000. I took the precaution of asking that they be put into categories. I think we may reasonably believe that with these categories we have a fair inventory of the rich men of Canada because the income tax gatherers had been at work for a year and being after the largest sum of money they could get they would regard as a shining mark every man with a considerable income and they would naturally first collect all that it was possible for them to get from that source. I think we may safely conclude that out of the 31,310 this three per cent represents pretty nearly all the men who have big incomes in Canada.

Let us see then how that figures out. Of men with incomes exceeding $100 000, according to this return, there are twenty-four in Canada. That is one out of every 1,300 of the income tax payers.

[Sir Herbert Ames.]

There are in Canada 125 men who pay incomes on amounts between $50,000 and $100,000, or one in 250 of the total number of income tax payers. There are 241 who pay on from $30,000 to $50,000, or one in 130 of the total number of income tax payers. There are 461 who pay incomes on from $20,000 to $30,000, or one in 67. All told, you will see, there is just about 3 per cent of the total number of people who have paid up to the 30th of April, who enjoy what may be regarded as large incomes. But you will say: "Oh, but get after the millionaire. Make him disgorge. Use him as the means of meeting all your war obligations." Very well, supposing we do, let us see how we will come out. Let us get after the millionaire. We will strip that terrible millionaire down to a point where he will enjoy an income not exceeding $20,000. A man does not need to have $1,000,000 of invested capital to have an income of $20,000 you all know that a man may have an income of $20,000 with perhaps a capital of $200,000 of $250,000 which would be a very reasonable return. So we are getting down from the millionaire to the semi-millionaire and the quarter-millionaire. Let us see how we will fare if we get after all of these. Let us hang them up, strip them of every dollar they have, and see how far it will go to meet the needs of the State. There are twenty-four of them whose incomes exceed $100,000. Those twenty-four pay $994,552. You will see that averages out at $41,500 each. Now if you take the old rates that were in force under the first income war tax you will find that a man to be assessed $41,500 income tax would need to have an income of $190,000. Therefore, the average income of these twenty-four is $190,000. All right, hang up the twenty-four men, strip them of every dollar they have got, and how much do you get. Why you get twenty-four times $190,000, or only $4,560,000. Very well put that to one side. Let the twenty-four millionaires get along as best they may without a penny left of income.

Now let us get after the second category: 125 men under the first war income tax up to the 30th of April, 1918, paid between $50,000 to $100,000. They paid altogether $881,153, or an average of $7,050 apiece. That sum will pay income tax on $55,000 of revenue at the rates that were in vogue at that time which of course, were very much lower than the rates in force to-day. Now let us take those 125 men. Each enjoys an income on the average of $55,000. Multiply 125 by 55,000 and you have $6,875,000. That is their whole combined income, every penny of it. So strip them all of it and put it into the fund you are trying to meet your indebtedness with.

Now let us take the third category. Two hundred and forty-one persons have an income between $30,000 and $50,000. They have paid a total to the treasury up to 30th April, 1918, in the way of income tax of $821,659, or an average of $3,400 each. That amount is the tax that would be collected under the first Income Tax Act upon men having an income of $39,000, therefore, $39,000 is the average income of those 241 persons. How much would the whole 241 receive as an income? They receive $9,400,000. Very well, take it all and put it towards meeting your war indebtedness.

Now we come to the fourth category, the persons who have an income of from $20,000 to $30,000—461 persons. They are paying $700,216, or an average of $1,500 apiece. Now $1,500 is the tax a man would pay, under the first Income Tax Act, on $24,000 income. Very well, the average income for these 461 persons is $24,000 a year. Let us take every cent and the total amount is $11,064,000. That takes in the whole of them.

Now then to recapitulate. We have twenty-four millionaires with an income of $190,000 apiece; 125 semi-millionaires with an income of $55,000 each; 241 one-third millionaires with an income of $39,000 each; and 461 quarter-millionaires with an income of $24,000 each. Add all these amounts together and you get 851 so-called rich men whose total income amounts to $31,899,000. But under your present taxation you are going to take from these people $4,750,000. Consequently if instead of assessing at usual rates your 851 millionaires, semi-millionaires and demi-semi millionnaires you would strip each one of his total income you are going to get $27,000,000 more than you otherwise would. That is not going to go very far towards meeting $300,000,000 required. Of course, this is ridiculous, and we all admit it. No government outside of Russia, would undertake to strip a man of every dollar he receives of income over $20,000. Suppose you leave them with $20,000 each and deduct $17,000,000 income from their combined total income and you would get just $10,000,000 if you took every dollar that every man in Canada who made return, has by way of income in excess of $20,000 a year. I only need to lay these figures before the House in order to show you how ridiculous is the argument that we hear so constantly put up: "The only thing we have to do, is to make the income tax press more heavily on the millionaire." Of course the state could take every penny a man has over $20,000 income. If you do that it will not increase your total revenue to an extent that will make any appreciable difference in the immense total that you have to raise.

Now let us take another phase of the subject for a moment before I sit down—and I do not want to speak very long tonight. Nobody likes to pay taxes. We city men do not like to pay taxes; and the farmer has shown that he does not enjoy this any better than we do. In the legislation we have had since the beginning of the war the farmer has not had much to complain of; for whenever a new tax is put on he has not been called to pay it to any considerable extent. When we come to put on a business profits tax—yes a business profits tax—oh, what care we take to put in a clause that the business of farming and live stock raising shall pay no business tax. Yet there are ranchers in the West who have been reported to have an income of $100,000 a year, and there are some grain growers that make almost as much. I think I can point to one in Alberta who made that much in one year.

Mr. J. F. REID: Would the hon. gentleman give us the average?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I cannot give the hon. gentleman the average. I would if I could because I have nothing to hide. Now we will take up the matter of the income tax paid by the farmers. I had the curiosity to ask a question as to how many farmers paid income taxes and my hon. friend from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) who spoke last evening, and who is the President of the Grain Growers' Association I think, attributed to me sinister motives. I did not have in my mind any intention of placing any section of the country in unfavourable contrast with any other section; I simply wanted to learn how much the farmers paid in income tax. The farmers are 54 per cent of our population. I think we all admit they enjoy a very considerable degree of prosperity at the present time and therefore we hoped they would pay some income tax. Out of the 31,130 income tax payers, I find in that first return there were 3,623 farmers. In other words 14 per cent of the total payers of income tax were farmers, and 86 per cent consisted of the rest of us. I find that the farmers paid 3½ per cent of the total sum collected while the rest of us paid 96½ per cent.

Mr. BOYCE: Do you mean that the farmers are practising fraud ?

Sir HERBERT AMES: No, Sir, I do not. I mean that nobody enjoys taxation, but I would point out that the farmers are enthusiastic in the support they give to a tax on business, to a tax on income, and to these other taxes which they themselves pay in a very small measure, indeed. That is only natural. But "the worm will turn," and some of us who have to pay these taxes feel that it is desirable that the real facts should be known.

Mr. BOYCE: You will find no farmers getting big contracts for boots and making millions of dollars of profit.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I do not know that anything is to be gained by being personal. I was trying to deal with a general matter.

Mr. EDWARDS: Just while you are on that point, you stated that the farmers paid three and-a-half per cent——

Sir HERBERT AMES: I stated that out of the total amount that had been raised under the first income tax up to the 30th of April, the farmers had paid three and two-fifths per cent, while the rest of the population of Canada had paid ninety-six and three-fifths per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS: The information I would like placed beside that, if you have it available, is: What proportion of the total income collected in the United States, was paid by the farmers?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I cannot give you that.

Mr. EDWARDS: I think the information is in the hands of the minister, or of Mr. Breadner. I would like that put on record.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I am afraid I cannot give you the figures so far as the United States is concerned. Our own figures are bad enough, and I give them for what they are worth. We are all willing to do our share in meeting taxation, but when it comes to making sacrifices, I contend that one element of our community should not be constantly clamouring for relief, but that we should all bear our due share of taxation and not grumble over it. We city men are perfectly willing to shoulder our share. There is no section of the community that suffers more to-day under taxation than the business section under the excess profits tax, which is much heavier in Canada than it is in the United States, and which we hoped would be discontinued this year. Was there any murmuring when we found it was to be continued ? No, Sir. If necessary the business community will go on paying it for five full years—— although Parliament is very careful to see to it that no farmer or stock raiser shall pay a business tax. We are adding to the weight of income tax year after year, the Americans have found it expedient lately to reduce theirs. The American scale I mentioned to-night, I am now informed by Mr. Breadner, has been reduced so that it is now the same as ours. There, again, the farmer does not pay the income tax as a rule; it is the other classes of the community. We are paying, but we are not grumbling. We only ask the other people that they do not make excessive and continuous demands for relief.

Mr. EDWARDS: I would like permission to place on the record along with the very interesting figures the hon. member (Sir Herbert Ames) has given, this information, that the American farmers paid 1½ per cent of the total amount collected for income tax.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Undoubtedly there is the same enthusiasm for income tax among the farmers in the United States that our farmers have. I listened with a great deal of interest to what the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) said about the method of raising taxation. I know nothing at all about the single tax, or the tax on land, but I can imagine that if the tax was made on farm land generally throughout the whole Dominion it would not meet with very great approval by those who have to pay it. But I do know something about succession duties and income tax. I have already pointed out that one province at least to-day is collecting by way of income tax from its own citizens as much as we are collecting in that province, and a resident in British Columbia when the two Governments get through with him, and perhaps municipal governments as well, has mighty little income left. As far as the succession duty is concerned, that is a line of taxation that has been worked to the limit in many of our provinces. I know the figures for my own province. We have had the succession tax there for many years, and we have collected from $1,500,000 to nearly $5,000,000 in one year, the duties being very heavy. If you are going to levy a federal succession tax as well, you are going to make exceedingly heavy taxation, and you will incur the enmity of the provincial treasurers, who feel that that money should be used for their own purposes. In Ontario that is the tax the universities depend upon, and they would resent very much any attempt to cripple them in that respect.

There are two fields of taxation then: Income tax, which has been already exploited to the limit; and succession duties, which really belong to the provinces and are thoroughly worked by them, and therefore should not be considered as a possible means of additional federal revenue, notwithstanding the opinion of the ex-Minister of Agriculture. Whether any money can be raised from a tax on land I do not know; I leave that to the western gentlemen to take up. But I say we none of us enjoy paying taxes. Taxation, to be fair, should be levied on all classes of the community as nearly as possible in equal ratio. There are a certain number of taxes being levied which do not hit certain classes. Those who are paying those taxes do not grumble, but they do think it is scarcely fair to load such taxation on one section when other sections which do not pay those taxes are constantly asking for consideration which is not awarded to the section which is already bearing its full share.

Mr. LALOR: We hear a good deal of discussion about farmers not paying taxes. Although not a farmer, I represent a farming community, and I just want to give my view on that class of people in the county which I represent. The county of Haldimand is a large and successful farming county. The farmers are prosperous—we will admit that they have done well during the war; prices are good. But I have thought it over carefully, and I do not know five farmers in the county who have an income of $5,000. It is all right to look over the list of income tax payers and say that not enough farmers are paying the tax, but it must be acknowledged that farmers with incomes of $5,000 to $10,000 are scarce in Canada, and in the county of Haldimand I cannot think of any man with an income of over $10,000, and we are a pretty good county in the Niagara district. Farmers have not large incomes, but they are doing well. A farmer thinks he is doing well in the province of Ontario if he is making $1,000 a year over and above his living expenses. When you search for farmers with incomes of from $3,000 to $5,000 you do not find them in the province of Ontario, or, if you do, they are very exceptional indeed. I think a lot of stress is laid on our farmers not paying income tax that is altogether unwarranted when you consider that they have not large enough incomes to bring them under the income tax law. In the western country they may have a class of farmers with large incomes, but in Ontario we have not got them. The hon. member for St. Antoine is generally correct in his figures, but I think he is mistaken about the income tax in the United States. He is figuring his income tax a year too early.

The latest income tax in the United States is almost absolutely identical, dollar for dollar, with the present income tax now proposed. So the figures my hon. friend has presented do not give the American income tax correctly as compared with ours. Ours are just as large as theirs; I have compared them, and they are identical except that in respect of some of the very large incomes there may be some slight differences. I do not believe the farmers have incomes sufficient to make them liable to income tax as some of us in other lines of business think they have.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) seems almost to lay the charge at the farmers' doors that they have incomes that would come within the limit of the law, and that they are shirking the tax.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Please, may I interrupt the hon. member to this extent: If in anything that I said I should be interpreted as saying there was any intention to avoid legitimate taxation on the part of the farmer I want it to be understood that that is taken back. I simply say that the figures show that they are not paying the tax; they are probably not being asked to pay it.

Mr. SEXSMITH: They are asked to pay it if they have the income. In my opinion, outside probably of a few big grain growers and an occasional farmer between the Atlantic and the Pacific, very few farmers come within the limit of the income tax law. The agricultural statistics of 1917 show that the total capital invested in farm properties, land, buildings, machinery and stock, is in round figures $5,200,000,000. The same year, on a high scale of prices for wheat, flour, butter, cheese and all other farm products, the earnings, as estimated by the statistical branch of the Department of Agriculture, amounted to $1,600,000,000 in round figures. Therefore, the gross earnings of the farmers in the Dominion of Canada in 1917, with all the high prices, amounted to only 31·1 per cent of the capital invested. Will any one tell me that the farmers on an average were, in 1917, making 6 per cent on the capital invested? Because, if he does, he does not know what he is speaking about. There is not in the Dominion of Canada to-day a better class of men than our farmers, and there is no class more willing to pay their taxes. While the farmers do not come under this income tax, they are paying taxes all the time in other ways just as the rest of the community, and they are willing to do so. It is unfair to insinuate that the farmers of this country are not willing to pay their taxes. The very argument that the hon. member for St. Antoine has set forth here is the best argument under Heaven why our farmers are leaving the country and why the young men will not stay on the farms. Why do they not stay there? I have discussed the matter with people throughout the country and I find the young farmers go to school and they absolutely refuse to go back to the farm because they have to work from twelve to fifteen hours a day. And what for? Not for an income of $2,000 a year, but, as the farmers have done for the last half century, to feed the people of the urban centres for less than it actually costs to produce the food at an average wage of $2 a day. There were no complaints from the city people when they got butter at fourteen, fifteen, or sixteen cents a pound, but there is a serious complaint when the farmer can get enough to break even, let alone make a dollar. I wanted to say a few things last night, but at the late hour I would not impose myself upon the House. If you take the best one hundred acres in the experimental farm at Ottawa, or the best one hundred and fifty acres in the experimental farm at Guelph, and run that on a mixed farming basis, producing butter and cheese and other farm produce at the average wages men are asking from the manufacturers—still more, at the minimum wage that Ford is giving his men—you cannot produce butter at $1 a pound and make a profit. I hope the people of this country will not think that the farming community are trying to shirk their duty. When I went through my riding in 1917, when the cry went out for more production, I saw old men with hair like the snow of winter out between the plough handles, and when their work was finished, their limbs were trembling. Were they there to make a dollar? No, they were there to try to help out in the war.

Mr. BOYCE: I heard an hon. member saying that he was not a farmer, but that he knows a good deal about them. I am a farmer and I know a good deal about farmers, and they are not making the fortunes that are attributed to them. Since I came into this House, I have found that when any hon. member ran short of a subject and wanted to get one, he started to say hard things about the farmers. I want to tell those hon. gentlemen that, as long as I remain in this House, let that be long or short, I will, as far as lies in my power, put a stop to this habit of saying harsh things about the farmers. The farmers contributed both men and money when they were needed, and they will be only too glad and proud, if need be, to do the same again. My hon. friend (Sir Herbert Ames) made some insinuations that we were not paying our share. Let me tell him that to make an income of $2,000 off a farm comprising 100 or 150 acres is pretty hard to do. He seems to think not, and he seems to have produced those figures to make a kind of assault, if I may say so, upon the farmers. Before the hon. gentleman begins to make any insinuations against the farmers, I would advise him to take some of the surplus money he has and visit them and make close inquiry, and if any farmers are making above the minimum, we are the men who will pay our share just as readily as my hon. friend or any other capitalist or millionaire raised in the Dominion of Canada. This discussion will probably do him good and do me good because I have sat silent here for quite a while. I thought I would have been able to say something upon the tariff, and I may be able to say a word or two later on. This discussion will only make us better friends, and I trust when he makes that visit, he will call upon myself and I will drive him around. I am not like my hon. friend here making a poor mouth—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. gentleman. He is not to blame. The fault is that of the Chairman in allowing a miniature Budget speech in Committee. That started the discussion. It is not relevant to the clause under consideration and I cannot allow it to proceed further except by unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BOYCE: I am not a law breaker although I am a farmer, and I obey your ruling, Sir, gladly. I do not, however, want to sit down as a criminal or a law breaker, but as one of the independent farmers of the Dominion of Canada, and I may say, of the county of Carleton.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I do not wish my farmer friends to imagine for a moment that I insinuated that there is any deliberate evasion on the part of any portion of the farming community of the payment of their just dues. I was giving certain figures, which establish certain contentions, and I want them to be accepted in the spirit in which they were given. I did not make any insinuations, and I therefore trust that my figures will be taken on their merits. I stand by them.

Mr. CAHILL: The hon. member for St. Antoine claims great credit for the people of the cities and towns for paying something like $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 in income tax. He stated that about 54 per cent of the population of Canada was rural. Now this year we paid something like $140,000,000 in customs taxes, and I think my hon. friend will give the rural population credit for paying half that amount, which would be about $70,000,000. I have also heard it stated in this House on numerous occasions that Canadian manufacturers, through the policy of protection which prevails in this country, were collecting from the consumers of this country, chiefly from the farmers, between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 per annum. If you take 50 per cent of $300,000,000, which the farmer presumably pays, it means the farmer is paying $150,000,000 to the manufacturer, out of which the manufacturer pays about $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 in income tax. That is what it amounts to. The farmer is the man who is producing. He supplies the money to the manufacturer to pay his income tax. He pays taxes on all his farm implements, and I think it is very unfair to attack him for not paying more income tax, when as a matter of fact he is paying all of the taxes, not only to the Government, but to the manufacturer and the city man as well.

Mr. NICKLE: Before this section is passed I should like to say one or two things in reference to the figures of the hon. member for St. Antoine. I am inclined to think that the income tax returns in the future will be a great deal better from the point of view of the country than the figures quoted by the hon. member might lead the House to believe. The figures he gave were figures up to the 30th day of April, 1919, under the Income War Tax Act of 1917. I would assume from the return which he has handed me that those figures were the return for incomes for the year 1917, that is, the fiscal year ending on the 31st of December of that year. That is a most unfortunate year to choose for the purpose of comparison, to indicate what will likely be collected from incomes in Canada in future. For this reason: Those of you who were privileged to file statements and were called upon to pay income tax for that year, will remember that the taxes were levied—if my memory serves me right, and if not, Mr. Breadner will correct me—on incomes earned and collected during the year 1917. In other words, if the dividend on a stock or the coupon of a bond were payable January 2, 1917, the amount of money paid in respect of that dividend or coupon was not assessable for income tax because the money from which that return was made was earned in the year 1916. The returns for the year 1917 in reference to income tax only show the incomes that were taxed in respect of moneys, putting it generically, paid and earned in the year 1917. Any payments made on stock or bonds in respect of dividends or interest which was earned in the year 1916 paid no income tax for that year. Take, for instance, Canadian Pacific Railway. Dividends on that stock, I believe, are paid on January 2, and quarterly thereafter. Numerous other stocks pay on the same day, many of them in February, some in March or April, and so on throughout the year. Now in respect of all these stocks, and bonds, unless my memory fails me absolutely, an allowance was made in respect of the amount that was earned in 1916, although the money was paid to the person receiving it during the year 1917. My inclination would be to assume roughly that the year 1917, the return for which the hon. member for St. Antoine has quoted, would probably not show more than from 50 to 66⅔ per cent of the incomes in Canada upon which income tax might be hereafter collected. My hon. friend remarks that we get all the big ones. I do not think we get all the big ones. The big ones are the very ones who would escape. Their dividends are largely from debentures and stocks, and they were the class of people who could show beyond possibility of contradiction that their incomes was not earned in 1917—although paid in that year—but in 1916. I make that explanation because I do not want it to go out to the country that we are not likely to get from the income tax a greater amount than the hon. member for St. Antoine appeared to show by his return.

There is one other point. I have not the figures before me, nor the legislation, but I am credibly informed, and my recollection is that the United States last year varied its income tax, it lowered the amount and I think the income tax in Canada this year approximates, and probably equals, the income tax levied in the United States.

There is another point to which I should like to direct the attention of the House and particularly of the Minister of Finance. On two previous occasions I have discussed the matter here without very great success, although the Acting Minister of Finance last year held out the hope that this year my contention would have weight and might be crystallized into legislation. What I have urged, and what I am urging now, is this: That in the case of married people the extra exemption be not given to both the husband and the wife. Under the resolutions brought down, an unmarried person is entitled to exemption up to $1,000, and a married person up to $2,000. Now the fundamental of the distinction would appear to be that a married person, having the responsibility of a family on his shoulders—I use the masculine, because as a rule, the responsibility for the household is on the man of the House—an additional $1,000 exemption should be given before any income tax is collected. But the way the resolution is drawn, and as the law has always been in Canada, if a woman also has an income she is entitled to the same exemption as a married woman as her husband is entitled to as a married man. Now why should a man and a woman, because they are married, be entitled to an exemption of $3,950, whereas a brother and sister would only be entitled to an exemption of $1,950? I think that is one reason why our income tax has not brought into the coffers of the country just as much as we expected it would, because the great majority of incomes are small incomes, and when you start off with an exemption for a married couple of approximately $4,000, it necessarily follows that the great majority of the families of the country escape. It has always seemed to me it was but fair that only one exemption should be given to man and wife, and that the aggregate income of the two should be taxable thereafter. I think it should be taxable for this reason: There is no class in the world that can more easily escape income taxation, if they desire to do so, than a man and wife who are not prepared to accept the legislation in the spirit in which it was enacted.

For instance, if a man has an income of $3,800 and he desires to escape, or have his family escape taxation altogether, it is the simplest thing in the world for him to transfer half of his stocks into his wife's name. All he need do to make that transfer is to send one-half of the stock certificates to the headquarters of the company or the trust company that looks after transfers for the company and have the transfer made and the stock issued in his wife's name. If he desires to protect himself from any possibility of her keeping the stock and not being willing to return it to him later on, he can insist that she endorse the certificate in blank back to him, and all that he has to do is to keep it in his strong box and when the time comes he can use the certificate because it has been endorsed in blank. The income on the stock will be paid to the wife because the record of the company shows the stock in her name. But while the stock is in her name the actual ownership of it is in the husband. I do not say that much of this is done, I do not know of any case in which it has been done, but I think we should endeavour to frame our legislation so as to avoid subleties of the kind to which I have drawn attention, and to provide that married people should not be afforded an exemption to which they are not entitled.

Resolution agreed to.

On section 12:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I move that this section be struck out, as it is not necessary.

Motion agreed to.

On section 13:

13. That every person required to make a return of his income under subsection one of section seven of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, who fails to make a return within the time limited therefor shall be subject to a penalty of twenty-five per centum of amount of the tax payable, and every other person who is required to make a return under the provisions of the said section who fails to do so within the time limited therefor, will be subject to a penalty of ten dollars for each day during which the default continues, and all such penalties shall be assessed and collected from the person liable to make the return in the same manner in which taxes are assessed and collected. Provided that the minister may on application extend the time for making a return in such circumstances as he may approve.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Has the minister any power to enforce penalties under this section?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The minister has no power. Under existing legislation the only thing the minister can do in the event of a party who is assessable failing to make a return is to summon him before the magistrate. I need not enlarge upon the difficulty of administering the tax. After giving the matter careful consideration we determined upon the imposition of penalties. I am greatly impressed with the necessity of efficiently administering this income tax, and we must have power to compel the making of returns.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Whose duty is it now to institute prosecutions against those who fail to make returns?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The department.

Resolution agreed to.

On section 14:

14. That the date of assessment fixed by subsection one of section ten be changed from the thirtieth day of April to the thirty-first day of October, and in default of payment within one month from the date of the mailing of the assessment notice, a penalty of five per centum of the amount of such tax shall be added thereto, and thereafter a further penalty of one per centum per month shall be added for each additional month or portion thereof during which the said tax and penalty remain unpaid.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is the reason of the change?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is quite impossible to get in returns by April 30. We are getting in returns now of over a year ago. It is necessary to extend the time to October 31. Although the legislation of to-day calls for a reply by the 28th of February, the returns do not come in and you have to extend the time, we are providing to make assessment may be made up to October 31.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Is it intended that this penalty shall be enacted in the case of delay for which the party assessed is not responsible but which is attributable to the department? Frequently matters are not absolutely clear as to what the amount of taxation should be in respect of some claims, and in the result there is a delay on the part of the department in informing the assessed person how much his tax is. If the delay is due to no fault of the man who is assessed is it intended to exact a penalty from him?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The penalties are intended to effect the making of returns and the payment of the tax. Governments are always very lenient in the exaction of penalties and in a case such as that suggested by the hon. member, if the party assessed were not responsible for the delay one could not conceive of the penalty being fairly exacted.

Mr. McMASTER: May I make one suggestion at this time which I made in my address on the Budget? The Government could receive a considerable portion of the tax long before it does by allowing people, when they make out their returns, to assess themselves and send in their cheques, subject, of course, to correction afterwards either by way of refund or the payment of any amount payable.

It has come under my observation that people have been quite ready and willing to pay their assessment under the income tax and the Government might have got very substantial sums a few months before they actually touched the money. Is there any practical objection to that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I see no practical objection to it. I think it is a very valuable suggestion. The Commissioner of Taxation tells me that as a matter of fact he is quite willing to do that. If a party in making his return sends his cheque along he will be credited with the amount. If it is necessary, upon examining the return, to add to it the party can be billed for the additional amount. In that way the money can be got in more rapidly.

Mr. ARGUE: Last year, in March, I sent in my return, and, when I went home in June, I got a notice from the department in Regina stating that there were discrepancies in my return. I went in and fixed them up satisfactorily to the collector there. When I came down in February I got notice from the department that I had not made my return for 1917. I informed the department that I had made my return in June of that year in the office in Regina. I never heard from them afterwards.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That would appear to be a case in which the department had made a mistake. The commissioner states that the inspector at Regina informed the department he had not received the return. It was clearly a departmental error. I am sorry.

Resolution agreed to.

On section 16:

16. That any chartered bank of Canada shall receive for deposit without any charge for discount or commission any cheque made payable to the Receiver General of Canada in payment of tax or penalty imposed by this proposed legislation, whether drawn on the bank receiving the cheque or on any other chartered bank in Canada.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the department pay for that service?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The cheques are paid at par. It is a great convenience to the taxpayer.

Resolution agreed to.

On section 17:

17. That excepting such provisions as are applicable to income tax returns and assessments of income for the year 1919, and accounting periods ending in 1919 and subsequently, and as are applicable to income tax returns and assessments of income for the year 1918, and accounting periods ending in 1918, and subsequently, all other provisions of the proposed legislation shall, for the purpose of administration, be deemed and construed as having force and effect as from the date on which The Income War Tax Act, 1917, came into force.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is the meaning of that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is to legalize rulings that we have made, some of which are embodied in this legislation which we have passed to-night.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Sir Thomas White moved for leave to introduce Bills founded on the resolutions. Motion agreed to and Bills read the first time, as follows:

Bill No. 142, to amend The Customs Tariff, 1907.

Bill No. 143, to amend The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916.

Bill No. 144, to amend The Income War Tax Act, 1917.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT—CONFERENCE WITH SENATE.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden the House returned to the Order of Motions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That Messieurs Bristol, Bureau, Cahill, Calder, Henders, Lemieux, Mowat, Reid (Grenville), Rowell, Sinclair, and Tweedie be appointed managers on behalf of this House of the free conference with the Senate with respect to Bill No. 19, (Letter A of the Senate) and any amendment thereto, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PATRIOTIC FUND.

On the motion of hon. Mr. Calder Bill No. 134 respecting the Canadian Patriotic Fund was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. CALDER: I think that a brief explanation of the purposes of this Bill may be given. It has come to the Government from the officers of the Patriotic Fund, and as the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) has been largely connected with that organization and its work I think a brief statement from him as to the purposes of the measure would be acceptable to the Committee. It is proposed to add one other section to the Bill as printed, viz.:

Subsection 3 of section 1 of chapter 2 of the statutes of 1915 is hereby repealed.

I have not had an opportunity of looking into this section and do not know exactly what the effect of it is, but I think the hon. member for St. Antoine will be able to give the necessary explanation.

Mr. McKENZIE: We are anxious, of course, to get away in view of yesterday's prolonged sitting.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Knowing the good-will of the House towards the Patriotic Fund and hon. members' knowledge of all its activities, I do not feel it is necessary to make an extended explanation, further than this: Demobilization has taken place much more rapidly than was expected, and as a result the Canadian Patriotic Fund finds that it will cease its regular labours for the dependents of relatives of men in the service with a considerable surplus on hand. Our executive met in conference a few days ago and unanimously decided that they should ask Parliament to permit them to continue their work for the families of discharged sailors and soldiers while their funds lasted, feeling that was in conformity with the wishes of the subscribers. That is all this Bill does. First of all, it takes away the restriction that has been on us heretofore whereby we were unable to assist the dependents of soldiers after the man was discharged; it secondly provides a method by which, when the fund's moneys are exhausted it could be legally closed up and the association declared to have finished its labours; and thirdly, the repeal of the clauses in the amending Act which limited our operations for six months from the expiry of the war. That is all the Bill contains. I will be very glad to answer questions that any hon. gentlemen may desire to put, but I felt it was necessary for me to make this explanation.

Mr. BELAND: Without any desire to delay the business of the House in the slightest degree, I would like, and I think the committee would be interested to know what is the total amount that was received or collected by the organization, and also what amount is still at the disposal of the Patriotic Fund Committee?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I am most happy to give these figures to the House although they will be in round numbers. The Canadian public have been extremely generous to the Patriotic Fund. We have raised altogether about $47,250,000, we have expended to date about $40,000,000, and we have at the present time in hand and collectable —for there are some moneys yet to come in—somewhat over $7,000,000. We expect to finish our regular legitimate work by the time the troops are discharged, that is by September 1, with about $6,000,000 in the treasury which will enable us for some time to do supplementary work for the dependents of soldiers. The Pensions Board and the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment cannot meet the necessities of a number of families that are in chronic need, or families that are temporally in hard luck. We hope in that way to be able to alleviate suffering wherever it occurs in the families of men who have fought for us overseas.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the organization propose to continue the machinery which it now has in different parts of the country in order to carry on the remainder of the work as it has been carried on during the war?

Sir HERBERT AMES: The machinery for the distribution of relief will be continued and will in some cases have to be strengthened, because our task in dealing with post-war cases will require even more careful investigation than the work that we have been doing, but our machinery for the collecting of money will not be continued as we do not expect to ask the public for any more money.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us how these accounts are audited, whether they are audited officially by the Auditor General or privately?

Sir HERBERT AMES: The Auditor General is the auditor of the fund. The treasurer of the fund is the Finance Minister, and the head office books are nominally kept by him, although they were actually kept by a very able member of his staff, Mr. E. L. Brittain. The Auditor General is our auditor, and he takes such steps from time to time as he sees fit to secure a proper audit at the end of each fiscal year, 30th of March. We ask, in this Bill, that before the Fund can be closed up, a comprehensive audit, satisfactory to the Governor in Council, shall take place. Then there must be published in the Canada Gazzette our intention to close up, together with a statement of this audit, before the Fund can be declared to be officially at an end. I might say that at our principle branches like Montreal and Toronto we have our own auditors; for the Montreal branch, P. S. Ross & Sons, and for the Toronto branch, Price, Waterhouse & Co. Our several large branches also have their own auditors. To our knowledge there has never been a dollar stolen or misappropriated by any official of the Fund.

Mr. KAY: What is the present cost of distributing and managing this Fund?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I might say that the operating expenses of the head office and all its branches—for we have had to have a certain amount of clerical assistance, although the great bulk of the work for the last five years has been done by volunteers —has not exceeded the amount of interest that the banks have paid us on our moneys on deposit, so that we are in position to say to-day that every dollar that has ever been contributed to the Patriotic Fund has either been paid to the soldiers' wives, to the extent of one hundred cents on the dollar, or is in the bank, and the interest earned while the money was lying in the bank has paid all the operating expenses.

Mr. JACOBS: Then the interest has amounted to a very considerable sum?

Sir HERBERT AMES: The interest during the last two years has amounted to a considerable sum. Our expenses all told for the head office and branches ran to about $25,000 a month.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. McKENZIE: We are taking the clause entirely on faith. I do not know what you are repealing, but I presume it is all right.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I will be glad to read the clause that is being repealed. The Patriotic Fund Act was amended in the second year of the war, and in that Act was contained this clause:

> The corporation may also during the war and for six months after the termination of the war, assist in case of need incapacitated officers and men—

Then follows the description:

> No assistance shall be given to any person under the provisions of this subsection for a longer period than six months, or to any person who is in receipt of any gratuity, pension or allowance paid by His Majesty or by any foreign government in consequence of incapacity or death occurring as aforesaid.

Now that we have decided to go on doing post-war work we would like to have that limitation removed.

Mr. JACOBS: Have these large sums of money been deposited in one bank or in various banks?

Sir HERBERT AMES: In twenty banks. That has been done at the discretion of the Finance Minister. The method of distribution was this: In every part of Canada we have branches of the Fund raising money. Very often a branch secured the local banker as its treasurer. We always made it a practice that whatever bank a cheque was drawn on should be the bank in which the money was deposited in the branch of that bank here in Ottawa.

Mr. MANION: I had the pleasure of hearing the member for St. Antoine explain this proposition to a number of us returned soldier members, and I think in five minutes he could give the House an explanation which would be exceedingly interesting.

Mr. JACOBS: We adjourned at half-past three this morning.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill as amended reported and read the first and the second time.

Mr. CALDER: There is no objection to this Bill being now read a third time. I think it would be desirable to do so, because there are a good many cases that will have to be treated under this new law, and they are waiting to be dealt with just as soon as it is put through.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: To-morrow we will take up the resolution respecting Vancouver Harbour Commissioners standing in the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; also Bill No. 39, to amend the Fisheries Act; Bill No. 131, for the Promotion of Technical Education; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries concerning the Canada Shipping Act. We shall also ask that public Bills and orders be taken up, and that the second reading of Bill No. 77, respecting divorce, be proceeded with.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

[Sir Herbert Ames.]

Friday, June 20, 1919.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

CHARTERED TRUST AND EXECUTOR COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. Nesbitt, Bill No. 141, (from the Senate), respecting the Chartered Trust and Executor Company was placed on the Order Paper amongst Private Bills for second reading this day.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILLS.

Bill No. 146, for the relief of Herbert John Lawrence.—Mr. Ross.

Bill No. 147, for the relief of Annie Miville.—Mr. Mowat.

THE WINNIPEG STRIKE.

TRIAL OF CERTAIN ARRESTED PERSONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen), I desire to bring to the notice of the right hon. the Prime Minister the reports that have appeared in the press this morning about the strikes at Winnipeg. It is said that certain men who have been arrested are to be tried before a lay commission composed largely of officials of the Department of Immigration. I submit to the Prime Minister that such should not be the case, that these are grave charges, and that they should be tried before the best trained jurists of the land, or judges. I wish to know from the Prime Minister what method of trial is proposed.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) is labouring under a misapprehension in regard to the matter. The Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) has telegrams this morning from Winnipeg, which I have not seen. I therefore speak under reserve and subject to any information which may be contained in these telegrams. There are two entirely distinct proceedings so far as my information goes. The men were arrested under the criminal law of the country, upon the charge that they had engaged in a seditious conspiracy, and they were placed under detention upon that charge. In addition to that, there was a proceeding taken under the Immigration Act for the deportation of some or all of them—I am not quite sure which. That is entirely distinct from the criminal proceeding. They, of course, could not be tried under the Immigration Act on a criminal charge; they would be tried upon such a charge under the ordinary criminal law of the country, according to the proper criminal procedure established by law. The procedure under the Immigration Act is one which was established many years ago, which has been acted upon many times in this country during the past fifteen or twenty years, and which can be carried on, as I understand—I still speak under reserve—concurrently with the proceeding under the criminal law. That is all the information I can give to my hon. friend at the moment. The Acting Minister of Justice may be able to give further information.

REPATRIATION OF CANADIAN SOLDIERS.

STRIKE OF SHIP LABOUR IN LIVERPOOL CAUSES DELAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I desire to ask the Overseas Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) if the strikes in England have interfered, or are likely to interfere, with the repatriation of our Canadian soldiers, and if so, to what extent?

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of the Overseas Military Forces): There have been strikes at the docks in Liverpool for the last ten days or more, and these have very seriously interfered with the embarkation of Canadian troops. No Canadian troops have been embarked from Liverpool since about the 14th inst. Our programme for the month of June contemplated the repatriation of some 55,000 Canadian troops. We brought back in the month of May about 55,000, and we had hoped that by the end of July, or even a little before that, we could get nearly all the Canadian troops back to Canada. I am inclined to the view, however, that the strikes will seriously interfere with that programme. It is feared, and it is possible, that the strike may extend to Southampton, where the very large ships sail from. However, I have information this morning which gives reason to hope that the strike may be settled to-day.

CANADIAN TROOPS FROM NORTHERN RUSSIA.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There are a certain number of Canadian officers and men who have been in the vicinity of Archangel in Northern Russia. Twenty-two officers and 455 other ranks were due to arrive in England yesterday. There will be a few still to be repatriated, but we hope to bring them back at a very early date.

RIOTING BY NEGROES IN ENGLAND

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers): I notice from despatches which appeared in the press that negroes rioting in England cannot be deported on account of their British citizenship, but will be invited to leave that country by the offer of their passage money. I would like to know from the Government if any steps have been taken to ascertain whether any of these men are Canadians whom it is intended to return to Canada and if so, what action the Government intend to take as to their reception in this country when they arrive?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Do I understand my hon. friend to inquire whether or not these negroes are Canadian citizens?

Mr. BUREAU: I am asking if any steps have been taken by the Government to ascertain whether any of them are Canadian citizens, and if so what action the Government intended to take with respect to their return to their own country, and what disposition would be made of them as being undesirables?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I did not gather from the information which I read in the press that the negroes at Liverpool to whom my hon. friend refers were Canadian citizens. If there are any negroes in the Canadian army that are Canadian citizens they would be scattered throughout the forces—one or two here, and two or three elsewhere—and they would be treated exactly the same as other Canadian citizens.

Mr. BUREAU: My question is, have any steps been taken to ascertain if there are any Canadians among them? If so, how many are there and how is the Government going to dispose of them in view of their being undesirable?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No such steps have been taken with respect to the negroes referred to, because it was not supposed there were any Canadians amongst them.

BUSINESS COMBINES IN GREAT BRITAIN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): I hold in my hand an excerpt from a local paper containing a despatch from London, which states as follows:

> Business rings, combines and trusts, perfected during the war, are controlling Great Britain's industries, according to the findings of a Government Committee appointed by Sir Auckland Geddes, Minister of Reconstruction.

If this report is true will the condition referred to have any effect upon the trade relations of Canada?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The attention of the Government has not been directed thus far to the communication in the press to which the hon. gentleman refers.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

ADVANCE OF $5,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES.

On motion of Hon. C. C. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine) for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide,—

1. That the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay the Corporation of the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners, hereinafter called the "Corporation," such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of five million dollars, as may be required to enable the Corporation to carry on the construction of works to provide such terminal facilities as are deemed necessary for the proper development and equipment of the harbour of Vancouver.

2. That during the period of construction of the works referred to in these resolutions, the interest payable on the debentures deposited with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General under the provisions of the Act to be based upon these resolutions, in respect of the construction of such works, shall be deemed to be money required to enable the Corporation to construct the said works, and to be a part of the cost of the construction thereof, and the said interest may be paid out of the said sum of five million dollars. The period of construction herein referred to shall begin on the day when the first advance is made on account of the said construction, and shall terminate on such date as the Governor in Council shall fix and determine.

3. That no construction of any works shall be begun, and no advances shall be made under the proposed legislation, until the necessary plans, specifications, and estimates in detail to govern the construction of such works have been submitted to and approved by the Governor in Council.

4. That applications for the said advances shall be made monthly by the Corporation during the period of construction of said works, with statements detailing the total expenditure on any work in the month which the requested advance is to cover, and such other statements and information as the minister may require, and no payment shall be made on any application until the application has been approved by the Governor in Council.

5. That the Corporation shall, upon any advances being made, deposit with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, debentures of the Corporation equal in par value to the advance so made (which debentures the Corporation is authorized to issue by the proposed legislation), and each such debenture shall be for such amount as the Minister of Finance and Receiver General shall prescribe. The debentures shall bear date of the day such advance is made, and shall be repayable within twenty-five years from the date of their issue. They shall bear interest at the rate of five per centum per annum, and such interest shall be made payable half yearly on the first day of July and the first day of January in each year.

6. That the principal and interest of the sums advanced to the Corporation under the authority of the Act to be based on these resolutions, shall be payable by the Corporation out of all its property and assets, and out of all its tolls, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income, and shall rank as a charge thereon next after, and have precedence in regard to payment next after, the principal and interest of all debentures or bonds heretofore issued by the Corporation to the public and amounting to the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, said debentures or bonds having been issued under the provisions of chapter 54 of the Statutes of 1913.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Leader of the Opposition): Will the minister please explain the resolutions.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This legislation is to empower the Government to loan to the Harbour Commissioners for the port of Vancouver a sum of $5,000,000. I wish to explain that while there is a Board of Harbour Commissioners at Vancouver, no moneys have as yet been voted to them by Parliament. The terminal facilities at that port are very inadequate for shipping, more particularly in view of the fact that the Dominion Government now owns and operates what will soon be a very large mercantile marine. It will be necessary to build one or two deep-water berths there to accommodate not only the Government vessels but also the ships of other companies that ply to the port of Vancouver. It must not be understood that the $5,000,000 is to be expended immediately at this port. The Bill to be passed will merely be an enabling Act so that the money may be voted to the Harbour Commissioners and expended from time to time subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. Fees will be collected by the Harbour Commissioners of Vancouver, from wharfage dues and other sources, similarly as fees are now collected at the ports of Montreal and Quebec. The revenues so obtained will, it is considered, be sufficient to enable the Harbour Commissioners of Vancouver to pay five per cent on this loan.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like the minister to give the House a statement, if he is in a position to do so, as to how we stand with respect to these different loans. My experience is that they merely amount to giving money away; we never get that money back and we never get the interest.

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL: The port of Montreal pays its interest.

Mr. McKENZIE: The result is that these ports get more rapidly into debt. They come back for a further loan and the old debt and the new borrowings are incorporated in a new Act, and further sums advanced by the Government. Would the minister be kind enough to tell us how we stand with respect to these various loans made from time to time to ports such as Vancouver?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will be very glad, indeed, to give the hon. gentleman the information. As I have already stated, no advance whatever has been made to the port of Vancouver out of money voted by Parliament. A few years ago the Harbour Commissioners floated a loan of $300,000, but no extensive work has been undertaken there. I think we will all agree that the port of Vancouver is a very important one and that it is going to become more important, but we cannot accommodate the Government steamers, or the other vessels entering the port, unless piers are built. With regard to the port of Montreal, the Dominion Government has from time to time advanced sums totalling $26,485,000, the rate of interest on some of which loans has been three per cent and on others three and a half per cent. That port has always paid interest on these loans—

Mr. CHARLES MARCIL: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: —and will continue to do so. There is a Bill now on the Order Paper standing for second reading, under the provisions of which the rate of interest on loans to all harbours that are now under the direct control of the Minister of Marine will be advanced to five per cent, so that the port of Montreal in the case of any future loans will pay five per cent instead of three and three and a half per cent as in the past. I am quite satisfied, from an intimate knowledge of the affairs of the port of Montreal, that it will have no difficulty in meeting its interest even at the advanced rate. The port of Quebec, which is also administered by Harbour Commissioners, has been advanced the sum of $11,732,548, and the outstanding debentures amount to $1,150,000. I regret to say that the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec have never received sufficient revenue to enable them to pay any portion of the interest on the moneys that have been voted to them in the past. However, as Quebec is one of Canada's national ports, and its maintenance is necessary in the interests of the whole country, the successive governments have deemed it advisable to incur the expenditure I have just mentioned. The only three ports that are under commission and to which loans have been, or will be, made, are Vancouver, Quebec, and Montreal.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR :Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us—

Mr. SPEAKER: This proceeding is most irregular. At the instance of the leader of the Opposition, it was understood that an explanation should be offered by the minister at this stage, but that any further questions should be put in committee. The motion is that I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider this resolution.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Boivin in the chair.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This method of advancing money to the great ports of the country is much better than the method adopted in Halifax, where the Government themselves built the docks, and consequently all the incidental expenditure is a burden on the whole country. My idea is that the ports ought to pay the interest on these loans; the whole country should not be taxed for it. Of course, advances should be made with care, and I would like to be assured by the minister that the revenue of Vancouver Harbour is sufficient to warrant our embarking on this expenditure.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I went over this matter very carefully with the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners when they were here a few weeks ago. The revenue in the past has been very small, and would not meet the interest on the loan I am now proposing unless the dues were collected at that port as they are collected at Montreal and Quebec. I have instructed the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners to follow the same procedure as is followed at Montreal, and from the figures which they presented to me, they will have no difficulty in paying the 5 per cent interest on this loan.

It is my view that the various Harbour Commissioners ought to provide a sinking fund so that when these debentures fall due the Harbour Commissioners may themselves be able to take them up out of revenues collected. At present these debentures have to be taken up by the Federal Government when they fall due. I hope to make these advances real loans to the various Harbour Boards, so that they shall not only pay the interest on them, but also meet the debentures when they fall due; and to that end I am taking steps to provide for a sinking fund at the various ports.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What was the revenue of Vancouver harbour last year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I had thought that this morning we would simply give notice that the resolution be considered in Committee of the Whole to-morrow; and therefore I have not before me, the statement which I have had prepared showing the present revenue and the estimated revenue for the ensuing year. I shall be glad to get the information for my hon. friend, but I point out that the revenue has been extremely small, because they had no interest to meet except the interest on the loan of $300,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: When the Bill based upon this resolution is brought down, I would ask the minister to have the details of the revenue of the port and of the tonnage which entered the harbour during last year.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I suggest that the minister give us, at the same time, information respecting the arrivals and departures of ships from the port during that period.

Mr. COPP: How much is it proposed to advance to the Harbour Commissioners during the present year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The programme has not really been decided upon. Representations have been made to me that these deep water piers should be erected at False Creek, on the Kitsilano Indian Reserve. Representations have also been made that that is not the most suitable place; that the piers ought to be built in Burrard Inlet—that is, in the harbour proper. I intend to go to Vancouver about the end of August to look over the ground, and after obtaining local and technical advice on the subject I shall recommend to the Government as to where these piers should be built. In any event, the expenditure during the next two years should not be more than $2,000,000. From what I learned from the Harbour Commissioners, I am under the impression that if they had two deep-water piers each of which would accommodate four ocean ships, that ought to be enough to carry them along for some years.

Mr. COPP: Will the loan of $300,000 already outstanding be paid off out of this advance?

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have not before me the date of maturity of the loan of $300,000, but I understand that the bonds will not mature for some years, and I hope that by that time the Harbour Commissioners will be able to redeem them out of revenue. But if the revenues should not be sufficient to take these bonds up, they would have to be redeemed out of this loan.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not opposed to the development of the harbour of Vancouver, or of any other national harbour, but I differ from my honourable friend (Mr. J. H. Sinclair); I believe that the harbours of all national ports, and all expenditure in connection with them, should be under the control of the Federal Government. I submit also that one or more engineers who are specialists, should be appointed to look after the necessary engineering in connection with the building of these docks. We cannot expect local commissioners to have the knowledge that is necessary to the proper carrying out of this work, because the harbour dues are not sufficient to enable them to engage such expert engineering services as are necessary to the proper construction of these docks. In a sense, docks are world-wide property; they do not belong to us. in a way, any more than to any other part of the world, because ships from all parts of the world must use them. We must, therefore, have men in charge of the construction of these docks who have wide knowledge of matters of this kind, and it is impossible to expect that from a harbour commission.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: While I do not want to enter into any controversy with the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), I still maintain my position that these great national ports can better be handled under local control than they can from Ottawa, and I think that is sound. We have the experience of the port of Montreal to fall back upon. It is the one bright spot in the management of the ports of Canada, and it has been managed in that way, that is, the Dominion Government have guaranteed the bonds where it is necessary to make large expenditures, and the port of Montreal has undertaken the full responsibility of paying the interest. It has continued to pay the interest for many years, and the whole arrangement has been very satisfactory. Who should know better how the port of Montreal should be run than the city and the people and merchants of Montreal? If you want to undertake to run the port of Montreal from the city of Ottawa, you will have the same kind of trouble we are experiencing in other directions. What is true of the port of Montreal is true of the ports of Quebec, St. John, and Halifax. If you are going to adopt a system of this kind, you will be following the example set in the port of Montreal. The same is true in all parts of the world. The great works on the Clyde are managed by the city of Glasgow. The Clyde has been dredged; great docks have been built; it is one of the cheapest and best ports of the world, and the whole matter is under local control. The city of Glasgow is proud of the work on the Clyde, and the whole matter is well managed. It could not be managed in the same way from London. The same thing is true of the ports of Liverpool, London, Hamburg and all the other great European ports, which are all under local control. I have no doubt, with our vast distances in Canada and the difficulty of managing the port of Vancouver from Ottawa, it would be a great mistake to introduce such a system as is suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I have no desire to delay this matter at this time, but I should be untrue to what I know to be economic truth if I did not, in a single sentence, dissociate myself from the somewhat antediluvian views of the leader of the Opposition and associate myself most heartily with the up-to-date and progressive views of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair), founded as they are upon a long experience of shipping and some knowledge of what goes on at the ports of the world in this matter. The views of the leader of the Opposition on a matter like this are the growth of protectionist sentiment. The whole question of how far we are to have shipping depends upon the extent to which we believe in a protectionist tariff, and I can quite understand that it will be necessary for the national government to spend and keep on spending money upon our ports if we keep up our tariff, because after you have spent as much as you like, unless you have a fiscal policy to expand the commerce of the country, your expenditure on the ports will be largely in vain. I do not want to elaborate this much at this time; but there can be no doubt in the world, on the part of any one who knows anything about or who has studied shipping and international trade that, on this matter, the views of my hon. friend from Guysborough are more progressive and more in accordance with the trade facts of the world than those of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am quite willing to be regarded as antediluvian, if antediluvian means the ownership and control by this or any government of the national ports of this country. If that be antediluvian, this Government is most antediluvian, because, within the last five or six years, it has spent on the harbour of Halifax $35,000,000, for every dollar of which the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), without the slightest demur, has voted, who all the time was, according to himself, piling up the barriers of antediluvianism and who yet had nothing to say against it. We all agree that, in that most magnificent harbour of Halifax, it was necessary to spend $35,000,000 to make it more of a national harbour and for world-wide commerce. Since the war began, we found it of great advantage that we had spent the most of that money on the harbour of Halifax. If that harbour had been left under a commission, the great ships that came into Halifax and facilitated the transportation of our troops, could not have come into that harbour had it not been for the expenditure of that money. My hon. friend says that the nationalization of the harbours is protectionism. I do not know what subject I could discuss in this House on which my hon. friend could not find a corner for a discussion on free trade. I do not know whether I could discuss horse racing without his finding an opportunity for bringing up the subject of free trade in regard to it. If the harbours of this country are put under the control of local boards, that will mean that they will make those ports suitable for themselves without having regard to foreign commerce, and that would be along the line of protection and restriction. But if harbours are made free, nationalized in the fullest possible sense, with the money, intelligence and talent of the nation making them proper ports capable of receiving the commerce of the world, that would, in my opinion, be free trade in its best and most effective form, as compared with localism and parochialism in putting those harbours under the control of a few men who have nothing to spend. How many millions have we spent in the St. Lawrence river to make a port at Montreal? If the port of Montreal had to dredge the St. Lawrence, it would never do it. Nevertheless, every foot of water from Quebec to Montreal is essential to making Montreal a port. Montreal does not spend money there; the nation spends it, and we should reflect, before we come to the idea of a port doing everything, that we must dredge the river St. Lawrence to make a port at Montreal. We dredged the St. Lawrence and made the port, and they get the honour of the whole thing because they carry on the immediate necessities of the port itself. I hold the view that, after the port is put in proper shape, it should be managed locally under local engineers and everything done in a first class manner, but the commerce and shipping of the world should be as free as possible. I am in favour of free ports, and I do not want to be taxing shipping at all, because it is in the interest of this country that our ports should be free. I am sure, if things were better after the flood than before the flood, during the flood, at all events, all the ports were free.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) has made a most effective reply to the leader of the Opposition, so that really I have not much to say. The hon. member for Guysborough has shown that he has a very thorough knowledge, not only of the ports of Canada, but of the ports of the world. I wish, however, to say in reply to the leader of the Opposition, that whether our ports are nationalized and operated by a local harbour commission, appointed by the Governor in Council, or whether the improvements in the various ports are carried out by the Department of Public Works, the Government in both cases is the owner. Everything within the boundaries of the ports of Montreal, Quebec, and Vancouver which are under commissions at the present time, belongs to the Government, and the lands are Crown lands. I agree with the leader of the Opposition in so far as he goes in that direction, but where I would differ from him, in all friendliness, would be when he thinks that the improvements in those ports can be better carried out by the Department of Public Works than by a local commission appointed by the Governor in Council.

The personnel of these boards has been of a very high order. Our commissioners at the ports of Montreal and Quebec are among the leading citizens and most successful business men of those cities. It is also necessary at our big seaports for our commissioners to have a staff of the most highly skilled technical and engineering experts that can be obtained. With all due respect to the engineers of the Public Works Department, I say that there is not an engineer in that department to-day who has as full a knowledge as is necessary of the development of ports to see that the improvements are of the character that the port demands, and that the work is properly carried out. When I had the honour of being one of the Montreal Harbour Commisioners during the big development years of that port we had to send to England and bring out an engineer from the port of Bristol to supervise the carrying out of the large plans. I am thoroughly convinced that when the harbour commissioners are appointed, if we get the proper men, and we have so far, the public interest will be better safeguarded and the work will be carried out more in keeping with the demands of the ports than if the work were done by the Department of Public Works. Some of the ports of Canada could tell a sorry story about the facilities that have been decided upon rather hurriedly without proper thought, but I will not go into that. I have, however, a very intimate knowledge of the mistakes that were made at the port of Montreal and other ports by the Department of Public Works, and to avoid such mistakes being made in the future I am a thorough believer in the Government appointing harbour commissioners to look after our ports. I am therefore in thorough accord with my hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. Sinclair).

Mr. BURNHAM: I should like to correct the impression which will probably go out to the country, coming as it does from the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), that the expenditure of money on our harbours is necessitated by the policy of protection. When a nation or the public assume a burden for the benefit of a private interest, that is protection. In England all the taxes in connection with the development of the ports of London, of Liverpool and of the Manchester ship canal, for instance, have been assumed by the public for the benefit of the shipping industry. It is a bonus or subsidy to encourage the shipping companies. Steamship companies are subsidized. Now that is pure unadulterated protection.

Mr. M. CLARK: I am delighted to find that my hon. friend from Peterborough is in perfect harmony on this shipping question with the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, but I have the gravest possible doubts whether the two gentlemen combined will be able to commend their views to this House and the country after a careful study of the methods by which ports are managed and shipping is developed in Britain, and of the methods which I understand both of these hon. gentlemen to recommend.

The position is a very simple one. The leader of the Opposition knows, of course, that, to put it mildly, there is considerable shipping done in the port of Liverpool. I suppose it is, perhaps, the biggest shipping port in the world. Now, when one goes out of that beautiful harbour of Bedford Basin, as I have done more than once, on the beauties of which the leader of the Opposition is prepared to expatiate at any given moment, one cannot but be struck by the dearth of ships in Bedford Basin as compared with the plentifulness of ships in the port of Liverpool. The contrast is most striking to an observant traveller. The port of Liverpool has grown up as a free port, as I understand free ports. It has grown up under a system of free importation and free exportation—under a system of free trade. The want of trade in Bedford Basin, I think, can be traced to an opposite fiscal policy. I understand that the leader of the Opposition's idea of a free port is a port to which all the nations of the world would be allowed to send their ships, provided they could get their goods over the tariff wall that is now preventing the admission of the goods. I want to tell my hon. friend that he may spend as much money from Ottawa as he likes to make Bedford Basin ten times more beautiful and effective as a harbour than it is to-day, but if he keeps his tariff wall high enough the shipping will not come, because commerce will not be profitable.

My idea of a free port is not a port in which ships do not pay dues. The ships that come to Liverpool harbour, of course, pay their dues to the Harbour and Dock Commissioners, and the Harbour and Dock Commissioners of Liverpool conduct the port where the greatest shipping in the world is done. My idea of a free port is a port where goods come in and go out freely, and on that free method of business will grow up a trade under which the ships will be only too glad, because of the profits they make by their ships, to pay any dues that come against them, and the central government will, of course, avoid responsibility for expenditure which is very much calculated to be altogether unproductive.

I am not opposed to spending money on the harbour at Vancouver. It is an equally beautiful port, and has every possibility of doing a world business. I, of all men, should be the last to be suspected of being opposed to the expenditure of money on the port of Vancouver, but what I want is a fiscal policy which will make Vancouver another Liverpool, and I do not think that the hon. member for Vancouver will be opposed to that ambition for his city, whether or not he quite agrees with me as to the method of doing it.

I want to reason with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I address him in the language of Scripture, if he will allow me to do so, " Come let us reason together " upon this question. Why the other Friday evening, before my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) had resigned the portfolio of Agriculture, and was getting through his estimates, there was some talk about cold storage facilities, and the leader of the Opposition made a speech to which I listened with interest and some degree of wonder, in which he showed that a million dollars could be most profitably spent by this Government in establishing a cold storage plant at the port of Halifax. Does my hon. friend think that there are no cold storage facilities at the port of Liverpool ? Liverpool has abundant cold storage facilities, provided by the harbour and dock commissioners of Liverpool, and paid out of the shipping of the port. That is my idea of a free port. I put this to my hon. friend, who has a good head for business: If this Government is going to spend a million dollars upon a cold storage plant, is going to spend $5,000,000 upon harbour improvements elsewhere, and is going to go on handing out millions, how is he going to carry out the policy of economy for which he voted the night before last, and where are we going to land if we launch into all these expenditures without making our fiscal arrangements so that we can do business to meet the expenditure in the only way it can be met. If my hon. friend was at all annoyed by the expression " antediluvian views," I withdraw it.

I applied it to his views, and I still hold that if those views are not quite antediluvian they are pretty ancient at this time of day, and when my hon. friend studies the question he will find that he lacks the current knowledge of men who have moved around the world and studied shipping. I tell him that in all friendliness because I want to get him on my side and he has been coming along splendidly. He says: I find this free trade protection question in everything I approach. Surely my hon. friend does not think that the fiscal policy of a country has not anything to do with its shipping. He would not take that position. What is the good of his bringing in a reference to horse dealing? I think I could demonstrate to him that international horse dealing has had a very intimate connection with shipping up to now. No number of horses worth mentioning have yet been sent across the seas in aeroplanes, they have all gone in ships. Just another word to my hon. friend. He mentioned expenditures in recent years in this connection, to which I made no objection. I made very little objection to this Government's policy in time of war, and my hon. friend knows the reason. We did not send a man to France who was not vitally needed, and this Government did not make an effort during the war that was not called for to do Canada's full part in the struggle, and we are only in the position we are in internationally to-day, and the world is only freed from the menace that threatened it for several years, because this Government combined with all the Governments of the Allies to exert the last ounce of our ability in every possible direction.

That is why we are in the magnificent position to-day of being able to dictate terms to Germany. But I said the other day that one of the first duties of the Government now was to get away as far as possible from certain methods that were indispensable in war time, and that is my answer to my hon. friend who chides me for not having taken upon myself duties that would have devolved upon him as leader of the Opposition if there was any real objection to be made to the expenditures in the last few years. I am not objecting to this expenditure now. I am only trying to throw out a few ideas by which we may be guided to see that we get profitable results from the expenditure.

Mr. BURNHAM: It is well for us to learn even from our enemies; the hon. member will agree with that. How did it come about that the year previous to the declaration of war the ports of Hamburg and Rotterdam exceeded the ports of London and Liverpool by 1,000,000 tons in shipping?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I have not alluded to that question and I would like to have documentary evidence of the truth of my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. BURNHAM: I can assure the hon. gentleman that it is true, and I should like him to consider the question.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: The hon. member may rest assured that I shall study the question.

[Mr. M. Clark.]

Mr. ROBB: At this stage in the proceedings, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that you should bring the Com-
12 noon. mittee back to the subject under consideration. If we are going to have a debate on theories of free trade and protection and incidentally introduce a discussion of the war we shall spend all summer here, and I think we had better get back to a consideration of the subject and pass the resolution.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would point out to the hon. member for Red Deer a little incident that happened in this House during this session. I remember well that on the 25th of March a resolution was introduced into this House which, in my opinion after a long experience in this Parliament, was the most advanced resolution in the direction of free trade that was ever moved in the Parliament of Canada. I voted for the resolution and the hon. member voted against it. He will have to explain to his people, in the light of his advanced views, why when the question comes squarely before the House he refuses to support it. As regards the expenditure in Halifax, all I can say is, that this money which was expended there was voted long before the war which had nothing to do with it. The hon. member speaks of Bedford Basin. Bedford Basin is not really the harbour of Halifax. It is a magnificent inside basin, and while it is a part of the harbour it is not usually used commercially. If the hon. member had seen Bedford Basin during the last three years of the war I am sure he would have been very proud of it, not as a commercial harbour but by reason of the fact that no part of the Empire has served such an excellent purpose in connection with the war during its last three years. Bedford Basin has been simply crowded with vessels from all parts of the world coming there to receive proper orders on their voyages to various ports. I venture to say that no country in the world could by artificial means or by local expenditure produce such a magnificent body of water as Bedford Basin, and my hon. friend, with all the glories of the harbours of the Old Land, never saw anything in England, Scotland or Ireland in the shape of a harbour that could in any way compare with Bedford Basin. The harbour of Glasgow, of which we have heard so much, was made out of a field. Not so many years ago it was just a field and, all credit to the people of Glasgow, it was converted into a harbour. They had no harbour at all, but there was a large field in the vicinity and they scooped it out and made a harbour of it, much to their glory. But we are not talking about that sort of thing but of the importance of improving the natural harbours we have, and it is no use my hon. friend comparing conditions in Liverpool and London, in a very small country where there are about 50,000,000 people and the oldest commercial establishments in the world, with a country of the vast area and distances of Canada with only eight millions of people. Great Britain is an old country and Canada is new. Their resources and trade are developed; ours are not. We have to deal with primitive conditions and I think we are doing splendidly along international lines, and in that respect I intend to encourage the people of this country.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: May I reply to one specific point raised by the hon. member? I regret to occupy so much time of the Committee. In so far as the geography and the various characteristics of Nova Scotia are concerned, I confess my lack of knowledge and am prepared to sit at the feet of the hon. gentleman and be instructed by him. With regard to what is known as the McMaster resolution introduced at this session, the hon. member says I need to explain to my people squarely why I voted in a certain way. Well, I will explain to him squarely now why I did. I explained at the time I voted against the McMaster resolution that I did so for exactly the same reason that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and I both voted against similar resolutions under the guidance of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's when our party was in power and when such resolutions were raised on going into Supply instead of on the Budget at the proper time. I did that under the Liberal Government with my hon. friend, and it will be he who will have to explain how what I did under the Liberal Government was quite right but what I did under the Unionist Government was utterly wrong.

Mr. MAHARG: I should like some information as to the internal management of our own harbours. Is it the intention that the grain elevators at the port of Vancouver will be under the management of the harbour commissioners there?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is.

Mr. MAHARG: We have been told of the success of the Montreal harbour from the standpoint of management, and we have also been told about its finances, and while we have not been told that it has not been a success in the matter of facilities, I know there is considerable difficulty in that respect. If I am correctly informed, the net receipts from the grain terminal elevator in the harbour of Montreal takes care of almost the entire cost of management of that harbour. If they are charging the same rates as obtain in the other terminal elevators, they are receiving in the neighbourhood of from $350,000,000 to $500,000,000 of revenue from that harbour, depending on the amount of business done there. We are given to understand that the receipts from the handling of the western grain take charge of the entire expense almost of Montreal harbour.

The minister shakes his head. Evidently he thinks that is not so, but I think that a close analysis of the work of the harbour under men in a position to know where the overhead expenditure is placed in the management of the harbour will go to show that what I say is approximately correct Now, this harbour of Montreal is in a different position. We were given to understand when the National Transcontinental railway was built that the harbour of Montreal and the harbour of Quebec were going to be put in a position of handling the immense quantities of grain from the West. We were given to understand, and I think properly so, that the rates for carrying grain from the head of the lakes to Quebec would be considerably reduced, even all-rail rates, on account of the shortness of the distance. There seems to have been absolutely nothing done in connection with the improvement of the facilities at Quebec to take care of that grain. Evidently the grain does not go that way and there may be the explanation that it cannot be handled as cheaply by that route. But if it can be I think it should be, and that the National Transcontinental Railway should be given every advantage that can be given to it to carry grain over that route if it can be done at the same rate as by the lake and rail route. I would like an explanation as to why there has been no more business handled through the port of Quebec, and why it should not get a share of the revenue received at Montreal from the handling of western grain.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In answer to my hon. friend from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) I wish to inform him that he has not obtained accurate information as to the sources of revenue collected at the ports of Montreal or Quebec. I will speak first of the port of Montreal because I have been a harbour commissioner there for six years and I am naturally familiar with how they get their revenue. When we come to the second reading of the Bill, for the information of my hon. friend from Maple Creek and other hon. members I will give the total revenue of the port of Montreal and I will further give itemized the sources from which that revenue is received. Broadly speaking, I can give that information now but I cannot of course, give the amounts collected from each one of these sources. The port of Montreal charges steamship companies rental for the use of all the steel sheds. The rental is by no means light. It would run possibly somewhere between $50,000 and $70,000 from that source alone. The Harbour Commission also collects a revenue from what is known as wharfage dues. There are wharfage dues levied on all goods coming into the port of Montreal and all exports leaving the port. The port of Montreal, being the largest port and doing the biggest business in the Dominion of Canada hon. members will realize that the amount of revenue received from wharfages alone must necessarily be very great. Then, take another source of revenue, which is one of the best sources which the port of Montreal possesses and that is from what is known as the transportation department. The railway companies leave their freight cars at a certain point. The harbour commissioners have their own locomotives and their own qualified staff of terminal operators. They pick these cars up and place them at the sheds, or wherever they should be placed throughout the harbour. I cannot at the moment say what the charge is per car but if my memory serves me right it is something like $5 and they also charge for all cars that pass directly over the wharves.

My hon. friend (Mr. Maharg) is not correct when he suggests that the bulk of the revenue collected at the port of Montreal comes from the revenue collected from the grain elevators there. The harbour commissioners do collect a very good sum in the shapes of charges on grain that goes into the elevators but it is nothing in comparison with the total revenue of the port. I am also very glad to be able to say here, speaking about the shipment of grain, that there is no port which is so well or so modernly equipped, or can handle grain at such a low rate as can the port of Montreal. If my hon. friend from Maple Creek has not visited the ports of Montreal and Quebec I hope he will do so before he again leaves for the West. I have no hesitation in saying that there are no ports in any other part of the world including those in the United States and Europe, that possess facilities that can compare with the advantages that the ports of Montreal and Quebec have. They take grain in there with two marine legs from the lake vessels at the rate of 20,000 bushels for each leg or 40,000 bushels an hour. They can unload 250 cars in twenty-four hours and they can send it out by belts that run over the grain conveyors from the elevators to the ship at the rate of 60,000 bushels per hour. These three different operations are going on at the same time and a ship does not need to move from her berth at all. The grain is taken from the elevators along the conveyors in the form of rubber belts at the rate of 60,000 bushels an hour and when it comes opposite the hold of the ship it is tripped off the belt and shot down a spout into the hold of a ship. When you compare that method with the method that was in vogue some years ago of using floating elevators to elevate the grain into the ships, there can be no comparison at all as to the cost and quickness of handling the grain.

Then, the port of Quebec is just as well equipped as the port of Montreal. It is quite true that the elevator storage capacity at the city of Quebec is not as large as the elevator storage capacity at the port of Montreal, but the elevator at Quebec is a transfer elevator and will store 2,000,000 bushels of grain. It has equipment identical with that which I have outlined for the port of Montreal. The port of Quebec did handle a lot of grain last year, and I am quite satisfied that it will handle a great deal this year. One of the big problems confronting the Government and the people of Canada, more particularly the grain-growers, is as to how this year's crop is going to be handled, inasmuch as none of the grain will be allowed to go by American ports. It is a big task, but if we can get the ships we can certainly handle the grain. With the quick handling and the modern facilities at the ports of Montreal, Quebec and St. John we can take care of the grain if the tonnage is available. With regard to St. John, I might mention that there is only one elevator at St. John without grain conveyors at the present time, but we hope that they will be installed shortly, which will enable us to handle the grain if we can get the ocean tonnage. On the second reading of the Bill I will be able to give to my hon. friend from Maple Creek an itemized account showing how the revenue is raised.

Mr. MAHARG: I think the minister must have misunderstood me. I did not intend to convey the impression that the receipts from the handling of grain were almost the entire receipts. What I did intend conveying was that the receipts from the handling of grain took care of the entire cost of the operation of the harbour.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sure my hon. friend does not mean the entire expense of operating the facilities at the port of Montreal or what one might properly call the harbour. I have no doubt that what my hon. friend means is that the revenue received from the elevators at the port of Montreal is used for the operating expenses of the elevators, but not for the entire expenses of operating the port of Montreal.

Mr. MAHARG: That is exactly what I maintain: the net receipts are not applied to capital purposes but to the actual operating expenses of the port, under the jurisdiction of the Harbour Commission. I have not had the pleasure of visiting the elevators at Quebec, but I have inspected the entire equipment at Montreal from start to finish, including the harbour facilities. The minister will remember that we had the opportunity of donating two thousand sacks of flour to the British Government and the Commissioners at Montreal were good enough at that time to permit us not only to fully survey the harbour and its equipment, but also to take a camera along which was something entirely contrary to the rules in force at that time, and to take photographs of the facilities for the handling of flour.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maharg) is possibly right to a certain extent in his statement that the grain passing through the elevators at Montreal does contribute considerable revenue to that port. I fancy, however, my hon. friend will be surprised when the minister brings down his statement to find that in some years a greater quantity of United States grain has gone through those elevators. Furthermore, a large quantity of United States corn comes over the Canadian route because of the advantage of being able to re-ship and re-elevate it along the line in order to keep it cool. The butter and cheese from the whole of Canada that goes through, and also the incoming goods, likewise contribute largely to the harbour receipts. My hon. friend is also right in his contention that it was represented that the Grand Trunk Pacific railway would be used to give cheaper freight rates from the Prairie Provinces to the ocean ports. That was the intention, but unfortunately a change of government took place and the new administration proceeded to destroy the usefulness of that railway. Therefore, my hon. friends opposite—who are to-day supporting the present Government, heirs to those who destroyed the usefulness of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway—are supporting an administration that has considerably advanced the freight rates in this country. Our friends from the Prairie Provinces are always holding out to us the advantages of the United States market. Do they realize that this Government—perhaps not the Government, but the Conservative Government, of which they are the heirs—

Mr. BUREAU: They are practically the same.

Mr. ROBB: ——the Government which my hon. friends support brought about an increase of rates almost equal to the duty on wheat going into the United States? When the Liberal Government went out of office in 1911, wheat could be carried from Brandon all rail to Montreal for thirty-three cents a hundred, and from Moosejaw to Montreal for thirty-eight cents a hundred. To-day there is an advance of eight and three-quarters cents a bushel. Just think of it, an increase of eight and three-quarters cents a bushel on all wheat grown in the North-west shipped from the Prairie Provinces to Eastern Canada, and that has taken place under the Government which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maharg) is supporting! My hon. friends had better reflect upon these conditions, and remember that the next time they go before their people they will have to give some explanation as to why they are supporting a government that is responsible for conditions resulting in an increase of 8.70 cents per bushel on wheat going from the Prairie Provinces to the ocean.

Mr. MAHARG: I would ask my hon. friend if he will reflect upon the fact that the estimated cost of building the Transcontinental railway, which at the time we were given to understand would reduce the rates, has been nearly trebled, which will make considerable difference, I presume, in the cost of operation.

Mr. ROBB: If the cost has been trebled it is because when this Government came in——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROBB: ——wait a minute. It is because the Government destroyed all the grades along that line——

Mr. BUREAU: Especially in Quebec.

Mr. ROBB: ——destroyed the bridges, tore up the rails, and practically ruined the road.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Has not everything else gone up? Have we not heard of the high cost of living? Did the hon. gentleman expect that freight rates would remain stationary during war time, in recent years, when other things have gone up? Is not that part of the general results of the war? Surely the hon. gentleman does not blame this Government for bringing on the war?

Mr. BUREAU: The rates ought to be lower on patriotic grounds, following your argument.

Mr. MAHARG: We are wandering away from the point and the question will no doubt come up again on the second reading of the Bill, to be founded on this resolution. If the Government spoiled the grades of the railway, it only proves what I say that the cost of the line would have been greater if it had been built according to the plans and specifications, and the Liberal Government would have been just that much further out in their estimates of the outlay.

Mr. ROBB: It is amusing to see how my hon. friends are prepared to advance one excuse after another to defend their betrayal of principles which they for so many years advocated in this House.

The CHAIRMAN: I must follow the good advice tendered by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) a few minutes ago and ask the committee to return to the consideration of the resolution with respect to the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I am glad the House has been afforded the opportunity of discussing the facilities provided at the ports of our country. I am not opposed to expenditure for this purpose at Vancouver, or elsewhere, but I would draw attention to the fact that the port of Quebec, as stated by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) is able to take care of the grain traffic of the West. Therefore, that port should also get its share of the money voted for improving these ports and be developed in such a manner as not only to handle the grain trade but to make a proper use of the Transcontinental Railway and carry out the purpose for which it was built, thereby enabling traffic to avail itself of the shorter route and consequently permit of a reduction in freight rates. We had the pleasure of a visit to Quebec last fall from the Minister of Public Works who came to inspect the port and the works for the improvement of the Transcontinental terminal. The minister expressed the opinion that those works were a tragedy. The minister was perfectly correct in using that term bearing in mind the manner in which the works have been handled at Quebec of late years. The country has made large outlays in Quebec to develop the port, but after the present Government came into office everything was changed, despite the formal promise of the Prime Minister in 1913 that the works at Quebec for the proper equipment of the port and the Transcontinental terminal should be carried on not only in the interest of the port and province of Quebec but in the interest of the entire Dominion. In his opinion at that time Quebec occupied a unique position and should receive a share of the favours of the Federal Government.

The Prime Minister was accompanied by several of his ministers—Hon. L. P. Pelletier, Hon. Mr. Hazen, Hon. Mr. Cochrane, and others, all of whom endorsed the policy of the Prime Minister with regard to the development of the port and harbour of Quebec. The Prime Minister at that time laid the corner stone of the St. Malo workshops and inaugurated the works on the St. Charles river, upon which the Government has expended, as was stated by the Minister of Public Works a few days ago, $1,600,000. If my information is correct, the Government have acquired the plant and equipment from the contractors, Quinlan and Robertson, for the amount of $300,000, and although they are spending $15,000 to $20,000 a year to keep it in order, it is lying there doing nothing. At a cost of over $2,000,000, the Government have acquired a property which has a frontage of over three miles along the St. Lawrence river and that property is lying there idle. To a stranger coming down the river to Quebec this property gives every evidence of being in the last stage of decay. The Prime Minister said that the port should be developed; that grain elevators should be constructed to take care of the grain from the West, and that proper terminals should be built. It was the intention of the Government to spend millions of dollars in the development of the port; the works inaugurated in 1913 were only the beginning of an extensive programme of development. But not a single cent is being voted in the Estimates this year for any improvement at Quebec, although the St. Malo workshops are idle and freight cars and rolling stock which are in need of repair are taken from the Eastern division to Winnipeg or Transcona, a distance of 1,350 miles. That is the way Quebec has been treated by this Government. I take this opportunity of airing some of the grievances of the citizens of Quebec in this regard; I am not opposed to any expenditure which the minister proposes for the development of any of our ports.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the minister replies to the statement of the member for Quebec county (Mr. Lavigueur) I must direct the attention of the Committee very seriously to the fact that the recent discussion has been entirely out of order. To be strictly within the rule, the discussion should have related only to the port of Vancouver; but it has wandered far afield, and while I think it is only just and right that the minister should be granted the privilege, by unanimous consent, of replying to the charges which the hon. member has made, I would ask hon. members thereafter to keep more strictly to the rule. The clerk assistant has drawn my attention to that fact that if only one resolution is passed at each sitting of the House, it will be a long time before the end desired by the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) and other hon. members will be attained.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The public works on the Saint Charles river and the railway shops at St. Malo have been brought into the discussion. I shall not make any reference to public works, because they come under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Carvell); and the St. Malo workshops come under the Minister of Railways (Hon. J. D. Reid). But as to the port of Quebec, during the last few years millions of dollars have been spent at that port. The hon. member knows that a modern two-million bushel elevator has been erected there within the last three years; that modern steel freight sheds have been built; that grain conveyers have been constructed; that railway tracks have been laid down. While I do not feel called upon to defend the late Government, it is only fair to point out that they spent millions of dollars at the port of Quebec, chiefly in connection with the items I have mentioned.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I admit that a two-million bushel elevator was built at Quebec, and it is a very good one; but it is not capable of taking care of one-fifth of the grain traffic of the West. If we had the equipment that was promised to us in 1910, we would be able to take care of some of the grain that is now diverted to the United States, and the grain growers of the West would be able to take advantage of the haul which is shorter by 214 miles than the haul to United States ports, as well as of a considerable reduction in freight rates. Mr. Chairman, we have the finest port in the world—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I gave a ruling a moment ago concerning this discussion;

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I bow to your decision.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. gentleman bows to my ruling, he should take his seat.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want to take exception to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I wish to point out that in discussing the port of Vancouver it may become necessary to discuss it in relation to the whole system of harbours and ports in Canada. I submit that if we are to be barred from making a comparison of this port with the larger ports and of suggesting that the best interests of the country would be served by applying some of this proposed expenditure to other ports, then we might as well not have any discussion in this committee. A good way of reasoning is by comparison, and if we cannot compare the ports of Montreal or Quebec with the port of Vancouver in connection with this proposed expenditure, we might just as well stop discussing the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Rule 13 says very clearly that all speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. The Chairman did not take objection to the institution of any comparison between the port of Vancouver and any other port in Canada, but the Chairman did take serious objection to a debate upon free trade and protection and also to a discussion of the way in which the city of Quebec had been treated in connection with the Transcontinental railway and everything else in connection with that city. He again declares that discussion to be out of order.

Mr. BUREAU: That being understood, we will confine the discussion to the harbours. I am in favour of this item, and I do not think there is in this House a man that is more in favour of developing harbours and harbour navigation and foreign shipping than I am; but there is one harbour on the St. Lawrence which I think is the best in Canada with the exception of Vancouver which I do not know anything about, and the harbour I refer to seems to have been forgotten. I would ask the minister if this policy, which is to be extended to Vancouver, is to cover one of the best harbours in Canada, at least the best of all on the St. Lawrence, and if improvements are to be made to the harbour of Three Rivers. I will not discuss the merits of the harbour of Three Rivers, because I know the Minister of Marine has developed the harbour of Montreal and has made it one of the best harbours, if not the best harbour in the world, but at the harbour at Montreal there are difficulties which are not to be found at the harbour of Three Rivers, and the same difficulties are to be found at Quebec. There are no tides at Three Rivers, and it is not necessary to keep men at the hawsers when the tide flows out or in to lengthen or shorten them, and there is no necessity for tugs. As this is practically laying down a policy on the part of the Government, if the harbour commissioners are to be on the same footing as at Montreal, and if the Government is going to render assistance by lending money for improvements on various harbours, I submit the best harbour on the St. Lawrence is Three Rivers, and I desire to ask the minister if this policy, which seems to be that of the Government, is to be extended to that particular harbour, and, if so, within what time we may expect to see the result of this new policy.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. BUREAU: May I get an answer from the minister before it carries?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I could not, of course, attempt to describe the natural advantages of the port of Three Rivers as well as my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau), and I agree with him as regards many things he says in favour of that port. They have a magnificent quay there now by the name of Bureau. I do not know if we can do anything more. The port is under a commission also, and if ocean tonnage increases so far as the port of Three Rivers is concerned, and the facilities are found to be inadequate, I am sure the hon. member, with his usual forceful ability, will bring it to the attention not only of the Minister of Marine, whoever he may be at that time, but of Parliament.

Resolution read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I move for leave to introduce a Bill based on this resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member a copy of the Bill?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I regret I have not the printed Bill before me. It is on the way over from the Printing Bureau now, but it will be identical with the resolution, and I would beg leave to introduce the Bill at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER: This procedure would, as I understand it, be quite without precedent and entirely irregular. I do not see how we can introduce the Bill without having a copy of it.

Mr. BUREAU: We are in a time of irregularity and we can all consent.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I was not in my place in this House when it adjourned last night, and I was not aware that the Prime Minister had moved that this resolution be considered in Committee of the Whole to-day. Not having noticed that, I thought, when I came into the House this morning that all I was called upon to do was to make that motion; but the Prime Minister having very kindly performed that duty for me last night, and the resolution going into Committee of the Whole to-day, the matter has proceeded a little more rapidly than I looked for. While I have not the Bill, I can assure the House that the Bill will be here almost any minute.

Mr. McKENZIE: We can revert to the Bill when it is in the hands of the minister later on in the day.

Motion stands.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution—Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Canada Shipping Act, and to provide:—

1. That a transfer or a mortgage or a transfer of a mortgage of a British ship registered in Canada to a person not qualified to own a British ship, or to a foreign controlled company, shall not have any effect unless the same is approved by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on behalf of His Majesty.

2. That any person who makes or purports to make such a transfer, mortgage or transfer of mortgage without this approval shall, in respect of each offence, incur a penalty of a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars or imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years, or both fine and imprisonment, and such penalty may be imposed either upon summary conviction or upon indictment.

3. That the expression "foreign controlled company" shall mean any corporation,—

(a) where the majority of the directors, or persons occupying the position of directors by whatever name called, are not British subjects; or

(b) where the majority of the voting power is in the hands of persons who are not British subjects, or who exercise their voting powers directly or indirectly on behalf of persons who are not British subjects; or

(c) where the control is by any other means whatever in the hands of persons who are not British subjects; or

(d) where the executive is a foreign controlled company, or where the majority of the executive are appointed by a foreign controlled company.

A corporation shall not be deemed to be a British subject for the purposes of this resolution unless it is established in and subject to the laws of some part of His Majesty's dominions or of some British Protectorate, and has its principal place of business therein.

4. That the minister may require any person who is the owner or mortgagee of a British ship registered in Canada, or who applies to be registered as the owner or mortgagee of a British ship registered in Canada, to furnish to him such particulars as appear necessary to him for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not that person is, or is a trustee for, or otherwise represents, a foreign controlled company, and, in the case of a corporation, may also require the secretary, or any other officer of the corporation performing the duties of secretary, to furnish those particulars.

5. That if any person fails to supply such particulars as it is in his power to give when required, or furnishes particulars which are false in any material particular, he shall be guilty of an offence and shall incur a penalty of a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars or imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years, or both fine and imprisonment, and such penalty may be imposed either upon summary conviction or upon indictment.

6. That where, after the passing of the Act based upon these resolutions, any person who is the owner or mortgagee of a British ship registered in Canada ceases to be a British subject or becomes a foreign controlled company, that ship, or, in the case of a mortgagee of a ship, the interest of the mortgagee shall be subject to forfeiture under Part I of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

7. That in these resolutions, unless the context otherwise requires, any reference to a ship shall include a reference to a share in a ship.

8. That the Act embracing this proposed legislation shall continue in operation during the present war and for three years after the conclusion of peace.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have read this resolution somewhat carefully, and it suggests to me that there may be special cases with which the minister intends to deal. I should like the minister to explain to the committee if there are any cases in which ships have found their way into the hands of wrong parties. It is, of course, the common law of this country that foreigners can own almost every kind of property except a ship. If it is found that ships have got into the hands of foreigners, as this would appear to indicate, it might be well to explain. It would be better, perhaps, in cases of that kind to deal specifically with any one specific case that may have gone wrong than to create a general policy. I do not think the old common law should in any way be departed from. It should be made abundantly clear that foreigners are not qualified to own any interest in a British ship.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The object of this resolution is to enable the Government to control, for a period of three years after the declaration of peace, the transfer of a British ship registered in Canada to a person not qualified to own a British ship or to a foreign controlled company. Such restriction naturally involves the mortgaging of a ship and the transfer of such mortgage. I might also explain that the Imperial Government passed the necessary legislation for this purpose in 1915, the Act being entitled "The British Ships (Transfer Restriction) Act, 1915." The Act is valid for three years after the declaration of peace, but it does not apply to ships registered in Canada. Shortly after war broke out, by order in Council, it was made necessary for those who wanted to have transfer of registry or transfer of mortgage to apply to the Minister of Marine to get such authority. Orders in Council were passed, one on the 9th March, 1915, and another on the 9th October, 1917.

After the signing of peace I have very good authority for doubting whether these Orders in Council will remain valid, and this Bill has been introduced with the object of ensuring the authority we had under the Orders in Council to control the transfer of registry and of mortgage. We have a good deal of ship construction going on at the present time, and I think hon. members will agree that it is in the best interests of the country that we should keep a watchful eye on this tonnage, not only now, but during the reconstruction period of three years, let us say. Great Britain is doing that, and I think we should also. In answer to the question of the leader of the Opposition as to how many transfers or registry or mortgage have taken place, in the year 1917 the number of vessels transferred to foreigners or neutrals allowed to be owned to foreign-controlled companies was 73, and the mortgages allowed to such interests during the same period amounted to 12; in 1918, 138 vessels and 9 mortgages. The British Act which I have just referred to, and which is known as the Transfer Restriction Act of 1915, will also remain in force for three years after the declaration of peace. There is no intention to embarrass or interfere in any way with shipping, but we think it wise to exercise this control for three years after the war. We must look after our Canadian tonnage, and this is one of the safest ways of doing it.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I assume that the minister intends to introduce a Bill founded on this resolution.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have it here.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister is proposing to change the law on a very important question. Prior to the war a British subject owning a ship in Canada was at liberty to sell it without asking anybody's leave. If he could sell it to advantage to a foreigner he did so, and there is no good reason in time of peace why that should not be the case, but when the war broke out we needed all our tonnage for our own use, and a change was very properly made. I question the wisdom of making the present provisions permanent. I do not know what the minister's idea is, but I would think we ought to go back to peace conditions, when it was open for a man to buy or sell a ship without the minister's approval. Is there any good reason why we should embody these provisions in a statute? If this is intended only as a temporary measure, it is all right. Are we to be in the position permanently that the sale of a ship is to be made only with the consent of the authorities at Ottawa?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not think it wise that foreigners should control any of our shipping, either at this time or for three years after the war. This Bill, if passed, will remain in effect only for that period. Prior to the war it was unnecessary either in Great Britain or here for any one to have the Government's approval for the transfer of registry or mortgage. They merely went to the registrar of the port and got the transfer made, and they can get the transfer now without any undue delay from the Minister of Marine, if he thinks it is in the national interest. We have not in mind the British subject so much as the foreigner. It would certainly be unwise to let any of our shipping pass into foreign hands during the reconstruction period. That is why the provisions are made applicable for three years after the war. When that time is up I presume England will go back to the position she was in before the war, and Canada will do the same. We are simply guarding against foreigners getting possession of Canadian tonnage.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: "Foreigners" is rather a broad term. The United States is our nearest neighbour, and a good many of the ships that are being built in the Maritime Provinces to-day are being built for sale to the United States. That is a profitable business to our people. I presume the minister does not intend to interfere with the building of ships in Canada, even if they are not to be placed on Canadian registry. The minister tells us that the leave of the department is freely given; if so, that is satisfactory, but I would be opposed to restricting the sale of a ship unless it is absolutely necessary. If a Canadian citizen owning a ship can sell it to a foreigner and replace it by a better one, why should he not be allowed to do so?

Mr. McKENZIE: I understood my hon. friend from Antigonish to say that a man could build and sell a ship in Canada before it is put on the Canadian register. That is not my understanding.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No. Before the war, if a man wanted a Canadian ship put on the United States register, he would apply to the registrar of one of our principal ports and the transfer would be made without any difficulty. Now the approval of the Minister of Marine has to be obtained. We are only too glad to consent to the transfer. I have approved of at least a dozen transfers to the United States and other countries. We want to encourage the development of shipping in every way, but we must see that during the reconstruction period none of our shipping passes out of our hands against the national interest.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for Antigonish did not get my point. I understood him to say that Americans are giving orders for the building of ships in Nova Scotia, for instance, and when those ships are finished they take them off to the United States as they might take anything else that was built. I understand the law to be that when you build a ship in Canada she must be measured and registered and classed in this country. She has to comply with the law before she can be taken to any other country and sold.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is also my understanding. The law is strictly enforced that a ship must be registered before she is sent to the United States, but it is only a formal matter to get the registry transferred from one country to another in peace times. My point was that there should be no interference by the department that would have the effect of discouraging the construction of ships. As the minister says, we want to encourage shipbuilding. It is only a matter of detail placing a ship on Canadian registry and then transferring her to American registry the next day.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Quite right.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

Mr. Ballantyne thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 148, to amend the Canada Shipping Act founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

ADVANCE OF $5,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Marine (Hon. C. C. Ballantyne) has handed me a printed copy of Bill No. 149, to provide for a loan not exceeding $5,000,000 to the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners, founded on the previous resolution, and moves that it be now introduced. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

MONTREAL AND QUEBEC HARBOURS—RATE OF INTEREST ON LOANS.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, Bill No. 135, respecting the rate of interest to be paid on loans by His Majesty to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal and Quebec, read the second time and the House went into Committee on the Bill.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—five per cent interest to be paid on advances made after 1st April, 1919:

Mr. McKENZIE: I notice that the two harbours referred to are those of Montreal and Quebec; is that sufficient for any other place?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The only harbours that have had any moneys voted to them have been those of Montreal and Quebec and the advances were made to these harbours at the low rate of 3 and 3½ per cent. But now that money is higher it was thought better to raise the rate of interest to 5 per cent. The resolution that passed the committee this morning relating to the Vancouver harbour provides that the rate of interest shall be 5 per cent. These are the only three ports which are under commission at the present time. If any other port comes under a commission the rate of interest to be charged will be 5 per cent.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does this Bill give the minister authority to lend money to other ports are 5 per cent without coming back to Parliament?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: All I have to say about the rate of interest is that the Government should not be losing money on it. If the money can be obtained at 5 per cent it is fairly good business to lend it at that rate. We are not looking to make any money but I rather suspect that it costs the Government more than 5 per cent to get money to lend. If it costs us more than 5 per cent to get the money it is poor business to be lending it at less than it costs us.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I think a fair average would be 5 per cent. The Government have paid as high as 5½ per cent for a certain amount but it seems to me that if we charge the harbour commissioners 5 per cent it should be a fair and reasonable average.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FISHERIES ACT, 1914 AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne the House went into Committee on Bill No. 39, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1914, as amended by the special committee. Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—license fee for British Columbia increased from $50:

The CHAIRMAN: The first amendment is, that in line 1 of paragraph 2, the word "such" shall be replaced by the words "a salmon cannery." Then a sub-clause has been added as follows:

The annual price for a salmon curing license shall be $50.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I might explain that when this Bill was introduced it was referred to the Special Committee on Marine and Fisheries and they have considered it and referred it back with the amendment which has just been read. The object of the Bill is to raise the annual canning license fee in British Columbia from $50 to $500 and also the additional charge according to their fish catch. This Bill as it is now meets with the approval of all the British Columbia members. I discussed it myself with those interested in the cannery business some months ago. My reason for recommending it is twofold; first of all, I consider that the fee of $50 per year is altogether too low in view of the volume of the business that each one of the canneries does. The Royal Commission which was appointed in 1917, and which was composed of Mr. Sanford Evans, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Black, recommended in their report that the cannery fee be raised to $1,000 per year. My department thought it advisable to make the fee $500 and impose the additional fee according to the catch which, we think, will make nearly $1,000 for the 92 canneries in British Columbia. It will also enable my department to increase its revenue which is very sorely needed. In the administration of the service on the Pacific coast, there is a deficit of $135,000 and it is believed that the changes which we are making with regard to the revenue will wipe that deficit out. On the merits of the case I think we are justified in raising the fee.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The facts before the committee disclosed that the salmon fishery of British Columbia is a monopoly, that the department has restricted the issue of licenses to something like 94 or 95 and that when a license is granted to anybody it is bought up by the monopoly. It is worth a good deal of money. That is not a healthy condition of affairs. I may say to the minister that the same attempt was made in the Maritime Provinces in regard to the canning of lobsters. The packers were endeavouring to control the number of licenses knowing that if they could control the number of licenses they could build up a monopoly. But the Department of Marine and Fisheries at that time refused the request of the packers and threw the business of canning open to any man who could qualify. The buildings and plants are inspected and care is taken to see that the goods are well packed.

Every man who can put up the money to build a cannery and carry on packing is allowed to do so. If this were the procedure in the province of British Columbia we would not have the condition which exists there to-day where a business which should engage the activities of a great many manufacturers is in the hands of a few people who keep up the prices of canned salmon and control the fishermen. The fishermen out there are said to be, to all intents and purposes, the bond slaves of the packers; they do not own their own boats, or anything else, they simply do what the packers tell them to do, they have no initiative of their own and no ambition —at least that is true in the case of most of them—to make any progress. Has the minister considered the question from this aspect, because he must have all the facts before him. It is not a new question, it has been before the House for a great many years, but despite that fact nothing has been done. I would suppose that at the present time when the price of food is so important it would be a wise policy to throw the whole industry open and allow any one who can qualify for packing salmon to do so.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: When I came into office what is known as attached and unattached licenses were issued and each one of the canneries was allowed so many. It was represented to me that this was not a fair and equitable plan and that fishing licenses should be open. Accordingly I gave notice to the canneries that commencing with the first of January, 1919, the licenses would be open to everybody. Therefore it is not true that the canners control the fishermen to the same extent as when they were able to hold a certain number of licenses. When attached licenses were issued, the canners made their arrangements with the fishermen and supplied them with boats and equipment, but with open licenses the conditions are different. I should explain, however, that the object of restricting the number of canneries is not to create a monopoly, but to conserve the salmon. If a monopoly exists now it certainly existed in past years, and to allow the license fee to remain at $50, if the canneries do enjoy a monopoly—which I am not prepared to admit is the case, but for argument's sake we will admit it—is to allow them a further advantage. But the reason for restricting the number of canneries was in the interest of the conservation of the salmon.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would not the preservation of the salmon be better controlled by shortening the fishing season, than by refusing to grant licenses to pack?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It costs a great deal of money to erect one of these canneries and I think we must pay due regard to the expenditure incurred by the people engaged in the industry. I do not for a moment say that the present policy will be continued permanently, but after going into the matter very carefully with the fishery officials on the coast, as well as the officials here, I do not see that any monopoly exists. I think we have enough canneries for the time being, but nevertheless we are granting other licenses from time to time, and during the last few days I have agreed to two additional. I wish to assure the members of the committee that no monopoly will be allowed to exist on the Pacific coast while I am minister, and I certainly do not consider that such a thing exists at the present time. My object is to make these canneries pay a reasonable license for the privileges that they enjoy. We ought not to grant a license for the paltry sum of $50, which is practically giving it away, when we should receive something like $500 or $1,000 a year.

Mr. CAHILL: I notice there is a charge of four cents for each case of forty-eight one-pound cans of salmon. Is the minister, or his inspectors, convinced that these cans contain one pound of meat?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That question has been very much debated in the House, not so much with respect to salmon as to lobsters. It is rather a technical point. Where the can contains liquid or pickle as well as meat I would say yes. Where the contents consists of dry meat only, I would answer in the negative.

Mr. CAHILL: Are there inspectors to examine the pack and ascertain what the amount of meat in each can is?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There are inspectors and the matter is governed by regulation as well. The contents of the can are supposed to weigh sixteen ounces to the pound, but that includes liquid as well as dry meat.

Mr. CAHILL: Is there any regulation governing the dry meat content of the can?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is, but I do not have it under my hand at the moment. If necessary I will obtain a copy for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: If the minister doubts the existence of a monopoly on the Pacific coast, I must refer him to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. McIntosh) who made a speech to the Fisheries Committee and produced evidence which satisfied myself and everybody present on that occasion that there is one.

Mr. McKENZIE: I deem it my duty to bring to the notice of the minister some protests which I have received from four or five of the large packers in British Columbia against an increase in the license fee. The minister did not say so, but it might be inferred that the canners were behind the increase and that it was done for the purpose of creating a monopoly. Whether or not there is a monopoly, I cannot say, but at any rate I have received these protests against the increase in the fee so that the parties concerned in them are evidently not favourable to the advance. I am not quite clear that it was ever the intention of Parliament to tax any industry for its own promotion. I think that is protection and I must gain the good will of my friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) by opposing it. I want the fisheries—as well as anything else in regard to which we can take action—made free, and I do not think it is good policy to tax any industry for its own individual support, although I would favour the appointment of any necessary official for the proper supervision of the packing done in these factories and tax the industry for the purpose of meeting the expense. Of course, we are now imposing taxation for war purposes in many directions and we have to do a great many things contrary to our ordinary policy by reason of it, but the taxation in this case is not attributable to the war; it appears to be a policy for the purpose of getting revenue, and I do not think there is any justification for such a proposition. As regards the lobster canneries in the Maritime Provinces, the object in imposing the license fee is not to secure revenue. The purpose was to give the Government some control over those establishments, in order to see that they were properly equipped and maintained and that it would not be open to any one to start packing lobsters in a haphazard way that might result in giving a bad name to the industry.

The idea was not to raise revenue, but to exercise proper control over the industry. I do not think there should be one rule in connection with lobster packing and another in connection with salmon packing; there should be no exactions except such as I have mentioned. It is a mistake for the minister to try and get a revenue in this way.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This request certainly did not come from the canners. When I read the recommendation of the Royal Commission that the fee be increased to $1,000 a year, and when I looked into the matter myself—saw their balance sheets and found out what was the volume of the business and what the profits were—I thought at once that the fee was far too low. When the canners were here some months ago I told them that I proposed to increase the license fee, and that I did not want to do it without first consulting them. They were not particularly pleased, but they unanimously agreed to it. I understand that since then some of these canners have wired their objections to the leader of the Opposition. I do not blame them as business men for trying to get a license at the lowest possible rate; but it is my responsibility as minister to see that, having regard to the volume of their business and the privileges which they enjoy under their licenses, they pay a reasonable fee. From my knowledge of business charges, I do not consider that $500 a year, with the additional tax on the fish catch, is at all out of the way. Our fisheries inspectors in British Columbia inspect the canneries and the processes of packing, and see a proper weight is put into the cans; the inspection is of a most thorough and efficient nature. I should be derelict in my duty if I allowed the gentlemen who own canneries to have licenses at $50 a year, and I strongly recommend the approval of the fee of $500.

Mr. DUFF: What license fees do the canners of lobsters pay?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: A Bill respecting the lobster industry will be before the House for second reading in a few days, when it is reported from the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries, and I shall be glad to discuss that matter then. If we are to get through with the business which we have to do and prorogue in the near future, I think we had better stick to what is now before the Committee.

Mr. DUFF: I think that the question is perfectly in order. I want to make a comparison between the fees paid by lobster packers and those which are paid by the salmon packers. It is not fair that the minister should answer me in that manner.

Mr. McKENZIE: The member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) is perfectly in order. The hon. member wants to know how the fees which we are fixing in respect of the salmon fishing industry compare with those applicable to another industry very closely allied to salmon packing.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not desire to withhold any information from the hon. member; I simply wished to save time, and if the Chairman rules that the question is in order, I shall cheerfully give the hon. member the information that he wants. For lobster packing the charge for license is $5 for the first hundred cases and $2 for each hundred cases thereafter. The provision reads:

> The annual fee for any such license shall be at the rate of $5 for the first 4,800 pounds of canned or cured lobsters or fraction thereof canned or cured under such license and $2 for each additional 4,800 pounds or fraction thereof canned or cured under such license.

Of course, lobster packing is quite different from salmon packing; the volume of business is much greater in one case than it is in the other.

Mr. DUFF: Subsection 2 of this clause provides that in addition to the $500 license fee, the packers shall be required to pay a fee of three cents for each case of 48 cans; consequently the license fee in the case of salmon packing would appear to be very much greater than that which is paid by the canners of lobsters. It seems to me that this license fee of $500 will prevent the man of small means from going into the canning business; it certainly is putting the business of canning salmon in British Columbia into the hands of the big interests. In the interests of common people the license fee should be much smaller so that any one may can salmon who is able to raise enough money to start a factory.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: We were told in the committee that about ninety four licenses had been issued to canners in British Columbia, and that no new ones were being granted. By what authority is the department refusing to grant additional licenses to persons who wish to can salmon in British Columbia?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The department is not refusing to grant licenses; as I said a moment ago, I granted two additional cannery licenses within the last few days. Discretionary powers are vested in the minister as to the number of canneries there shall be in British Columbia; but no minister would act without consulting his officers in that province and taking into consideration the situation as a whole.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister says that after looking over the business of these companies, examining their balance sheets and observing the profits that they make, he has come to the conclusion that he should get more money from them for the general purposes of the country. The price of salmon is soaring, as is the price of practically all other foods, and here was an opportunity for the department to say: You are charging extraordinary prices; you have practically a monopoly of this business; you are not charged high license fees, and you should not sell this excellent food product at such a high price. If, therefore, he had asked the canners to reduce their prices, that course would have been more acceptable to the people than the taking of surplus profits by way of fees.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is there any restriction against the importation of canned salmon into Canada?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not know of any, outside the customs tariff.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I have seen the statement in the press that the canners have large quantities of canned salmon in stock and that they have requested that steps be taken to prevent the importation into Canada of salmon until they have disposed of the stock which they have on hand. I am anxious to know if any steps have been taken in that direction.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No steps have been taken in that direction, nor will any be taken. It is well known that the canners have a large stock, but certainly neither the Government nor the Department of Marine are going to take any such steps as those suggested by the hon. member. As regards the price, inasmuch as the United States produce 82 per cent of the canned salmon and Canada a very small fraction as compared with our neighbour to the south, the canners have to arrange their prices in competition with the United States. Salmon, of course, advanced in price during the war as there was a big demand and a large amount was shipped overseas for our soldiers, but now the war is over, the canners find themselves with very large stocks, and as a natural consequence the price will have to drop.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this amendment I find added to the Bill a new section? It reads:

The annual fee for a salmon curing license shall be $50.

I do not quite understand the difference between the two kinds of licenses. One is for $500 and the other for $50.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The $500 license is for a salmon cannery, and the $50 is for what is called a salmon curing establishment of which there are only two in British Columbia. They catch the spring salmon and cure them; they do not can salmon. One is curing; the other is canning.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, the House proceeded to Public Bills and Orders.

ACT RESPECTING DIVORCE.

SECOND READING OF DIVORCE BILL MOVED BY MR. NICKLE.

Mr. WILLIAM FOLGER NICKLE (Kingston), moved the second reading of Bill No. 77, respecting divorce.

He said: On the 20th February, of this year, I gave notice of the following motion:

That, in the opinion of this House, the procedure under which divorces are granted by Parliament and the consequent unreasonable expense thereof are so unsatisfactory besides being prohibitive to the great majority of the people of Canada that a committee of members should be appointed to enquire into the existing procedure and to report, as promptly as possible, what more satisfactory procedure should be provided.

At the time I gave notice of that motion, it was my intention to introduce the subject to the House in an academic way and not by way of a Bill. As, however, time progressed and the notice of motion was not called, I received from various parts of the country such assurances that public opinion was ripe for the discussion and probable passing in this House of a Bill respecting divorce, that I decided to proceed by way of a Bill rather than by way of a motion. I might say that among the recommendations to which my attention was directed, was this recommendation from the Women's Advisory Committee of the Committee on Repatriation:

That the present system of granting divorce in Canada be abolished and that a National Mobile Divorce Court be established, which, at the request of, and by arrangement with the individual provinces, would sit in the provinces and adjudicate claims for divorce. The Women's Advisory Committee consider that legislation on Divorce should be national in scope and character, but that the privilege and right of availing themselves of such legislation and such a national court should be reserved to the discretion of the individual provinces and should not be imposed on any of them.

The Women's Advisory Committee fear that social conditions resulting from the war may give rise to many claims for divorce and to presentation of insufficient grounds for same, and they apprehend that if the question of divorce be left for settlement to the provinces, it may lead—not only to varied legislation but also to lack of a uniform standard in the application and interpretation of the divorce laws. If this were the case, the present high standards of family life in Canada would be jeopardized.

A Mobile Court, national in character, interpreting a National Divorce Act and administering the laws connected therewith, would be not only a national safeguard of the bulwark of the nation—its homes—but, by reason of its mobile character, would also save expense to individuals and to the provinces, being accessible to applicants on request of the province at periods of the year to be fixed by mutual arrangement by the National and Provincial Governments.

The Women's Advisory Committee again emphasize the need of making arrangements in legitimate cases of divorce whereby the man or woman of average means be not prohibited from obtaining same because of the excessive cost of legal and court fees.

I also received numerous resolutions passed by representative Army and Navy Great War Veterans and Grand Army of Canada organizations with reference to the domestic condition in which many of their members found themselves, requesting that some steps be taken to establish a national divorce court or a national divorce law. It would unduly take up the time of the House if I were to read many of the letters I received in regard to individual cases, but there is one so pathetic in form and so generic in spirit I received from a returned soldier, that I think I would not be unduly taking up the time if I read it to the House. The letter is addressed to myself, and reads as follows:

Dear Sir,—In reading several papers I see where you are trying to revise our present divorce laws. I am one of the unfortunate chaps who would benefit by your good work.

I am a returned soldier and was three years away from Canada and spent considerable time in the trenches. I am writing this letter to ask you to do all in your power for to help the returned lads. A large majority of them have been unfairly treated by unfaithful wives while overseas. In fact there is a score of cases here alone, and other cities are just as bad.

Just imagine the feelings of a chap who, on coming back to Canada, finding his home gone, everything he ever possessed gone. I was comfortable when I went overseas. It was humble, but was home to me. I came home in December last and everything was gone, my child deserted. I had no place in the large country and the money I made over to my wife was keeping a worthless drunk instead of clothing my child.

Now my allowances were $13 a month (thirteen dollars a month) while in the army and I had to buy a little to eat while overseas as the army food was far from enough to ease our hunger. So where can I, out of that sum, pay $1,500 to be separated from one who has wronged me. We fought for liberty and justice and I fail to see where we unfortunate chaps are getting it.

I tried to get my wife to come and help me to get a home together again, and as soon as I got her settled and gave her some money she tried to kidnap the child which the authorities took from her owing to her immorality and went to live with this chap again and I believe, married him. She has no reasons for doing this as she told the judge I was a good man to her and had nothing against me. So you can plainly see it was done wilfully. I have a little girl six years old that was neglected shamefully in my absence.

Sir, I appeal to you to help us. I think it is right in the sight of God for you to take this step as his punishment for adultery is death.

Hoping this letter will help you in your good cause and hope you have success.

This is typical of many communications that I received, and moved somewhat by the communications and resolutions that reached me I decided I would attempt to secure the passage by this House of a divorce law.

I quite appreciate that in some of the provinces of the Dominion divorce has not at the present time any legal status, and to that particular aspect of the case I propose in a few moments to direct the attention of the House. To understand the position of divorce in Canada it is necessary that one should trace, possibly briefly, divorce practice and legislation insofar as it pertains to Great Britain and to Canada. The argument must necessarily be legal, and at certain times what I have to say and may say may touch men in their religious and conscientious beliefs, but I shall try as far as in me lies to avoid saying anything that would be insulting to the conscience or belief of any man who may differ from me on this essential question, and I would urge on those who have conscientious beliefs in reference to divorce, who believe that marriage is a sacrament and that it should not be dissolved, that they endeavour to see conditions as they are in Canada to-day, and to treat us who differ from them with the same consideration that I shall endeavour to show them this afternoon.

As I said, divorce may be divided into two classes. First, there is a partial divorce, which is technically known to lawyers as a divorce a mensa et thoro, that is, a divorce from bed and board, a separation, but not a dissolution of the marriage. Such a divorce when obtained does not give either of the parties the right to marry again, nor does it bastardize the children subsequently born. It may be granted at the suit of either husband or wife on misconduct being shown by either, provided either is of the opinion that the misconduct of the other has made it impossible for them to live together as man and wife.

Then there is the complete divorce technically known to us lawyers as a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, that is, a severance of the marriage tie. This divorce differs from the divorce a mensa et thoro, or the judicial separation, in that the parties to such a divorce, if obtained, have the right to re-marry, and any children born to the woman thereafter will be illegitimate children provided she has not married again. Divorce a vinculo matrimonii, or complete divorce, divides itself in the law into two classes: First, there is annulment, which strictly speaking is probably not a divorce at all, because it is a judicial declaration by the court that there never has been a legal marriage and if there never has been a legal marriage there could not be a severance of the marriage tie. Leaving aside for a moment that technical distinction, the court does regard annulment of the marriage, and it has been regarded, as a divorce, and the effect of such a decree is that children born of that marriage are regarded after the judicial decree has been obtained as having been illegitimately born. Divorce, as we ordinarily understand the term, is really a rescission of the marriage contract. It is a dissolving of the tie that binds the man to the woman or the woman to the man, and is granted in consequence of some supervenient conjugal transgression which, having risen subsequent to the marriage, makes it impossible for either party to live with the other. It is here that I find it necessary to touch for a moment on the religious aspect of the case. Prior to the Reformation the causes for the annulment of marriage, as recognized by the Roman Catholic church, were greater in number by far than were recognized by the law of England since the time of Henry VIII. Mr. W. B. Northrup, once a member of this House, and now the Clerk of the House, in 1914 gave a very exhaustive and all-embracing address in this House in reference to the legal status of divorce in the British dominions, and I quote from his speech when I direct the attention of the House to the evidence of Monsignor Moyes given before a commission of 1852 of the English House appointed to look into this question. In his evidence he said:

> The impedients which are held by the Catholic Church to be diriment or nullifying are the following:
> 1. Error, as to person.
> 2. Condition (if A marries B, a slave, believing B to be free).
> 3. Solemn vow of chastity on entering religious order, made before consummation of marriage.
> 4. Consanguinity to third degree.
> 5. Crime (if A during a former marriage with B has committed adultery with C, with promise of marriage after death of B, and if A or C has attempted the life of B, the marriage of A and C is null).
> 6. Disparity of worship, viz., marriage of a Christian with a non-Christian.
> 7. Duress or violence affecting liberty of consort.
> 8. Holy order to which is attached obligation of chastity.
> 9. The bond of preceding marriage (if either party have a husband or wife still alive).
> 10. Public decorum (if one of the parties is solemnly or publicity bethrothed to another person).
> 11. Madness or amentia (viz., imbecility precluding reasonable consent).
> 12. Affinity.
> 13. Clandestinity.
> 14. Impotency.
> 15. Rape.

For any one of those causes the Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical courts prior to the Reformation would have granted an annulment of marriage. They would have preserved their position, as a church, that marriage was indissoluble, but they would have said that such causes as those to which I have directed the attention of the House would have been a reason, not for the dissolution of the marriage, but for the declaration that the marriage never had existed. They would have declared an annulment and the parties would have been free to marry again. However, the Reformation came in England, and Henry the VIII by 38 Henry VIII, Chap. 38, restricted the grounds on which marriage might be dissolved by annulment, and since the passing of that statute the only reasons that will permit, according to English law, a marriage to be annulled are: relationship within the forbidden degrees, a previous marriage, corporal imbecility, or mental incapacity.

Now what was the effect of that? It was this: Prior to the Reformation those who desired a divorce could obtain it, often easily, by annulment, or much more easily than they could after the passing of the statute to which I have just referred, and the Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical courts would recognize it. But after the Reformation, when the grounds of annulment had been tremendously curtailed, those who found themselves joined together in an unfortunate matrimonial alliance, found themselves unable to free themselves, so to speak, from the entanglement, and men did as they have always done when oppressed by a harsh law, they endeavoured to find some way by which they could get around the law, and I want to trace very briefly for the information of the House just what took place in England.

As I said in my opening remarks, by the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church marriage is a sacrament, and as such is indissoluble. As I have pointed out, the Reformation brought a change in the British point of view, and after the Reformation marriage was no longer regarded by the English Church as a sacrament, a divine institution alone, but as a civil contract, and there was therefore no reason why the contract, provided there had been a breach of the terms in reference to which the parties had entered into it, should not be terminated or dissolved. How was this to be done? The first great outstanding case is the one commonly known as the Parr case, the case of the Marquis of Northampton, in 1548. That case is referred to at some length in Macqueen's Practice, of the House of Lords, pp. 468 and 469, where Bishop Burnet is quoted as follows:

"11 January, 1548 (1 Edward VI.) The Marquis of Northampton, brother to the Queen Dowager, had married Anne Bouchier, daughter to the Earl of Essex, the last of that name; but she being convicted of adultery, he was divorced from her; which, according to the law of the Ecclesiastical Courts, was only a separation from bed and board.

That was divorce a mensa et thoro to which I directed the attention of the House on rising to my feet.

Upon which divorce it was proposed, in King Henry's time, to consider what might be done in favour of the innocent person when the other was convicted of adultery. So, in the beginning of King Edward's reign on the 7th of May, a commission was granted to the Archbishop of Canterbury,the Bishops of Duresme and Rochester, Dr. Ridley and six more, ten in all, to try whether the Lady Anne was not by the word of Good so lawfully divorced that she was no more his wife, and whether thereupon he might not marry another wife. This being a new case of great importance, Cranmer resolved to examine it with his ordinary diligence; and searched into the opinions of the Fathers and Doctors so copiously that his collection about it grew into a large book (the original whereof I have perused), the greatest part of it being either written or marked and interlined with his own hand. This required a longer time than the Marquis of Northampton would stay; and, therefore, presuming on his great power, without waiting for judgment he solemnly married Elizabeth, daughter to Brooke, Lord Cobham. On the 28th January information was brought to the Council of this. So, he being put to answer for himself said he thought that by the word of God he was discharged of his tie to his former wife; and the making marriage indissoluble was but a part of the Popish law, by which it was reckoned a sacrament; and yet the Popes, knowing that the world would not easily come under such a yoke had, by the help of the Canonists, invented such distinctions that it was no uneasy thing to make a marriage void among them; and that the condition of this (the Reformed) church was very hard if, upon adulteries, the innocent must either live with the guilty or be exposed to temptations to the like sins, if a separation only was allowed, but the bond of the marriage continued undissolved. But since he had proceeded so far before the delegates had given sentence, it was ordered that he and his new wife should be parted; and that she should be put into his sister the Queen Dowager's keeping till the matter was tried, whether it were according to the will of God or not, and that then further orders should be given in it. Upon this the delegates made haste; and the whole question was divided into eight queries, which were put to some learned men (who these were does not appear), and they returned their answer in favour of the second marriage, and, by consequence, confirming the Marquis of Northampton's marriage to his second wife; who, upon that, was suffered to cohabit with him."

[Mr. Nickle.]

That is the first recognition in an important case of the position of the Reformed Church. Four years later (6 Edward VI) the Marquis secured an Act confirming his second marriage. This was not a divorce bill. It only declared that the adultery of his wife, followed by the ecclesiastical sentence, entitled the Marquis to take a second wife. And let me direct the attention of the House to that point. It was necessary that the ecclesiastical sentence in divorce a mensa et thoro should be obtained before Parliament took action. The ecclesiastical sentence having been obtained, it was held that the Marquis was entitled to take a second wife and the Act was so passed. The principle on which the Act passed assumed the jurisdiction of the Church Courts to dissolve the marriage. The Act did not divorce the parties, but merely declared them to be already, by the ecclesiastical sentence, sufficiently divorced to admit of the Marquis marrying again.

In the following year Mary, as the House knows, a Roman Catholic sovereign, came to the Throne and the Act confirming the marriage of Parr was repealed.

Cranmer's commission, appointed pursuant to statutes of Henry VIII, to order and compile such laws ecclesiastical as should be thought convenient, proceeded with its inquiry. It was composed of 16 ecclesiastics, and advised that in cases of adultery (sec. 1); malicious desertion (sec. 8); long absence (sec. 9); deadly hostility (sec. 10); prolonged ill-treatment (sec. 11); the marriage should be dissolved, with liberty to the injured party to marry again. If both parties were guilty of adultery, no divorce (sec. 17). Husband not entitled to divorce if he incited his wife to adultery (sec. 16).

It was also recommended that the remedy of divorce a mensa et thoro should be entirely abrogated and done away with. This report was completed in the reign of Edward VI. Owing to his premature death the whole scheme fell to the ground, and was never crytallized into legislation. The result was that in England under the Reformed Church from 1550 to 1601 marriage was held to be capable of being dissolved.

In 1597, the ecclesiastical authorities (105th Canon) pronounced the following doctrine:

> Forasmuch as matrimonial causes have been always reputed among the weightiest, and therefore require the greatest caution when they come to be handled and debated in judgment, especially in cases wherein matrimony is required to be dissolved or annulled; we strictly charge and enjoin that in all proceedings in divorce and nullities of marriage, good circumspection and advice be used, and that truth may as far as possible be sifted out by the depositions of witnesses and other lawful proof, and that credit be not given to the sole confessions of the parties themselves, howsoever taken upon oath, either within or without the court.
> In all sentences pronounced only for divorce and separation a thoro et mensa, there shall be a caution and restraint necessary in the said sentence that the parties so separated shall live chastely, and neither shall they, during each other's life, contract matrimony with any other person.

The reason I direct attention to that canon is this: That canon apparently laid down the doctrine, as I have read it, that the Church would require that a divorce having been obtained from an ecclesiastical court, during the life of each neither party should marry. That cannon proceeded:

> And for the better observance of this last clause the said sentence of divorce shall not be pronounced until the party or parties requiring the same shall have given good and sufficient caution and security unto the court that they will not in any way break or transgress the said restraint or prohibition.

Clearly, therefore, by implication, the bond being required that no remarriage would take place, it necessarily follows that the ecclesiastical courts regarded the ecclesiastical divorce as of such a character that the parties could legally remarry, but the pecuniary penalty was imposed to prevent marriage in so far as the penalty would prevent it. If any gentleman in the House cares to follow this matter more fully than I have time this afternoon to deal with it, I would suggest that he read Bishop Cozer's argument, which is reported in State Trials, page 1331.

Up to this time—summarizing my remarks—the ecclesiastical courts of the Reformed Church recognized the marriage tie as being capable of dissolution. The Roman Catholic Church regarded marriage as a sacrament and therefore refused to recognize divorce. From 1500 to 1601 the Reformed Church held that marriage could be dissolved, but in that year a new doctrine was introduced into the church courts. Foljambe's case, 44 Elizabeth, 1601, came for decision before John Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury who, on the advice of the most eminent divines and civilians of the period declared that a second marriage, the first wife living and divorced for adultery, was invalid, and re-asserted the doctrine of matrimonial indissolubility. And the law in England until 1857 (and in Canada excepting in those provinces in which there are divorce courts) was, therefore, that marriage was indissoluble.

In 1604, the Statute of Bigamy was passed by Parliament, making that offence a felony. In this way, jurisdiction for the offence was taken from the ecclesiastical to the civil courts. There was an express provision in the Act that it should not extend to any person divorced by a sentence of the ecclesiastical court.

[Now the very fact that that exception was incorporated into the statute affecting bigamy makes it reasonably clear that the civil law of England regarded parties divorced by ecclesiastical courts as having had the matrimonial tie dissolved and that they were in a position to marry again.

If that had not been so the exception in the statute of bigamy would not have been passed.]

The historical review makes it clear that husbands were trying to find a tribunal that would, in consequence of adultery, free them and permit a second marriage, the first wife living. One of the chief grounds of the desire for a remedy was to prevent the fathering of illegitimate children on the husband as followed from a divorce a mensa et thoro. The next effort to get relief from the ecclesiastical courts was the Lukenor case. In this case an Act was obtained to bastardize the issue born while the wife, against whom sentence of divorce had been obtained, continued to live in open adultery, but it did not dissolve the marriage bond or allow the innocent party to marry again. The Act simply laid down the principle that the ecclesiastical courts having pronounced a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro, and the wife continuing to live in adultery, and there being a possibilty of subsequent issue, Parliament was of the opinion that the husband should have removed from him the responsibility of having to father the children born under such circumstances.

The next case is the Lord Roos case in 1666, in the reign of Charles the Second. It established the principle that Parliament recognized that the marriage tie could be dissolved. Lord Roos had obtained an ecclesiastical divorce for adultery. The previous Act of 1666 which he had obtained had declared any subsequent children to be illegitimate. He stated that there was no possibility of posterity on his part to support the family in the male line unless he was entitled to be put in such a position that he could again be married and that the children of the subsequent marriage would be legitimate.

In 1669 there was a declaration by the English Parliament to the effect that Lord Roos might marry during the lifetime of his former ecclesiastically divorced wife and that subsequently born children would be legitimate. This was practically a statement that according to the parliamentary belief of that day the marriage tie could be dissolved. The argument of that time and the position taken by Parliament is very amply stated in MacQueen's Parliamentary Practice, and it bears so cogently on conditions of to-day that I think I would not be unduly taking up the time of the House if I should read what is there said, because I realize that the question that is before us this afternoon for consideration is one that vitally touches the social life of the people, and is one upon which many people feel very strongly, not only for social, but also for conscientious reasons. I am endeavouring to show the House that the procedure in England exactly parallels what has been the procedure in Canada, and, by the analogy of what took place in England, that the establishment of national divorce courts is the solution for the difficulties as we find them in Canada to-day.

In MacQueen's Practice, pp. 472 and 473, it is stated:

"The successful argument of Bishop Cozens in that important case (Lord Roos' Case) gives us a very clear conception of the principles on which the Legislature originally interposed to grant relief in this form. The Bill was vehemently opposed by the Roman Catholic members of both Houses. It was also opposed by persons who, though professing the reformed religion, were yet of opinion, that the allowance of divorce a vinculo—

That is a Bill of absolute divorce.

—would be productive of injurious consequences to the public morals. The advocates of the measure, on the other hand, while they abjured an unlimited freedom of divorce, at the caprice or volition of the parties, contended that divorce a vinculo might safely be conceded for the Scriptural causes of adultery and malicious desertion; which, according to God's ordinances, dissolved the marriage contract. By the Mosaical institutions, the terms of divorce were "Be thou expelled from me, and free for anybody else." Under the dispensation of the New Testament, a husband whose wife was dismissed for fornication might take another wife. The words of our Saviour on this head, as recorded in the fifth and nineteenth chapters of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, had rendered it a matter of necessary and irresistible implication, that a second marriage, under such circumstances, was valid and unobjectionable. As to the supposed inconveniences that might arise from awarding divorce, the supporters of the Bill maintained, that greater inconveniences would arise from refusing it. They urged, that to declare marriage positively indissoluble, under all circumstances, and in spite of all descriptions and degrees of conjugal transgression, would be not only unscriptural, but highly impolitic; that marriage, a holy estate, intended for the comfort and enjoyment of both the sexes, ought not to be converted into an instrument of punishment; that to withhold divorce from an injured husband was but to tempt him to commit sin, and to give his wife an opportunity of palming a spurious offspring upon her husband. And, finally, they maintained, that if a second marriage were not allowed in cases of adultery, the consequences would be dangerous to society; for the spouses condemned to a hateful and inextricable union, would be apt to resort to practices against each other, worse in their consequences and example to society than any evils that could possibly arise from a moderate and Christian exercise of the remedy of divorce. These arguments prevailed....."

The first example of the actual dissolution of the nuptial tie by Parliament was in the case of the Countess of Macclesfield, 1687-8. Skilful opposition had prevented an ecclesiastical divorce a mensa et thoro being obtained. The circumstances of the domestic life were scandalous and most flagrant as any one may prove who cares to read the case. A judgment had not been obtained for damages against the respondent who had seduced the wife. The facts in reference to the whole case may be obtained by looking at the report of the Matrimonial Commission of 1852, page 261. The proceedings in the House of Lords were so new, and the issue was so unusual that a protest was made by the Duchess, in which she said:

"My Lords, I had rather stand charged for High Treason before your Lordships than with this ignominious crime. In the charge for High Treason, the manner of trial and the ways of proceeding are known, and so is the punishment. But your Lordships are now creating new ways of proceedings, and a new law to punish me, and this for a crime supposed and alleged to be committed seven years past, in another reign, and after public indemnities in many sessions of Parliament."

That was the first case in which Parliament declared a dissolution of the matrimonial tie. The next case was the Duke of Norfolk's case 1699-1700. The ecclesiastical courts had again refused a divorce, but damages had been recovered against the adulterer. I again read from the report of the British Commissioners, page 260, what Bishop Burnet said:

"The matter was one of great importance, and it occasioned great and long debates in this and the former session of Parliament. It related to the Duke of Norfolk, who had found his wife guilty of adultery, and did move for an Act of Parliament dissolving his marriage, and allowing him to marry again. In the latter ages of Popery, when marriage was reckoned among the sacraments, an opinion grew to be received that adultery did not break the bond, and that it could only entitle to a separation, but not such a dissolution of the marriage as gave the party that was injured the right to marry again. This became the rule of the Spiritual Courts, though there was no definition made about it before the Council of Trent (1565). At the time of the Reformation, a suit of this nature was prosecuted by the Marquis of Northampton. The marriage was dissolved and he married a second time; but he found it necessary to move for an Act to confirm the subsequent marriage. In the reformation of the ecclesiastical laws that was proposed by Cranmer and others in King Edward's time, a rule was laid down allowing of a second marriage upon divorce for adultery. This matter had lain asleep above a hundred years, till the present Duke of Rutland, then Lord Roos, moved for the like liberty. At that time a sceptical and libertine spirit prevailed; so that some began to treat marriage as a civil contract, on which the Parliament was at full liberty to make what laws they pleased; and most of King Charles's courtiers approved of this, hoping, by this doctrine, that the King might be divorced from the Queen. The greater part of the bishops apprehending the consequences that Lord Roos's Act might have, opposed every step that was made in it; though many of them were persuaded that, in the case of adultery, when it was fully proved, a second marriage might be allowed. In the Duke of Norfolk's case, the Bishops were desired to give their opinions with their reasons; all those who had been made during the present reign were of opinion that a second marriage in that case was lawful, and conformable both to the words of the Gospel and the doctrine of the primitive church, and that the contrary opinion was started in the late and dark ages. But all the bishops that had been made by the two former kings were of another opinion, though some of them could not well tell the reason why they were so."

Now what is the summary. In Lukenor's case, a parliamentary declaration of illegitimacy was desired and obtained.

In Lord Roos's case the object was to continue the succession and probably the peerage in the male line.

In the Macclesfield and Norfolk cases redress was asked which the ecclesiastical courts had refused.

In 1701 though, a change took place and it is as a result of that application to Parliament that our parliamentary practice has the existence that it has to-day. In 1701 a man by the name of Ralph Box made application for a divorce from his wife Elizabeth Eyre and to enable him to marry again. No appeal had been made to the ecclesiastical courts. The Bill was passed, adultery of course being proved, and the precedent was established, and from that time on until 1857 the British Parliament constituted itself a court for granting divorce a vinculo matrimonii, that is a complete divorce. The right of Parliament to grant the divorce was recognized, but in the rudest and most inconvenient manner as the procedure was a judicial one by legislative process, which is the procedure we have in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and in those cases that are brought to us from the other provinces, in the Parliament of Canada to-day.

From 1700 to 1775 only five divorces were granted by the English Parliament. From 1715 to 1775, sixty divorces were granted, from 1775 to 1800, 74 were granted, and from 1800 to 1852, 110 were granted. The better the right came to be recognized, the greater the number of applications that were made and granted. The British Parliament laid down the principle that they would grant a divorce to a man when he established adultery on the part of his wife, but they took a somewhat different position in reference to an application made by a woman. The first application that was made by a woman to the British Parliament for divorce was made in 1801. To 1857—and the reason I use that date is because it was the date at which divorce courts were established in England—as a result of the report of a commission which was appointed, to which I shall shortly direct attention—only four wives obtained divorce a vinculo. These were only granted where there was aggravation. The wife had to show adultery and also other aggravating circumstances. The unfaithfulness of the husband and the wife are alike criminal from a religious point of view, although there is a great difference socially, as members of the House will readily see, in reference to the amount of injury that might be sustained, when the wife commits adultery as compared with a case in which the man commits adultery. When a woman commits adultery there is the possibility of spurious issue being created, and there is certainly a confusion of progeny, and of the parentage of the children likely to result. When a man commits adultery that is not so likely. The result was that the British Parliament laid down the doctrine that in reference to an application for divorce on the part of a woman the divorce would only be granted when there were aggravating circumstances. When divorce was asked by the man the divorce would be granted providing the woman had committed adultery. In 1909 a British commission looked into this matter and the result of its consideration is to be found in the Bill which I have introduced into this House in which I put the man and the woman on a parity in reference to the right to obtain divorce. I give them the same right in the courts as this Parliament and the country recognizes—that if adultery is proved and the court is satisfied upon the point, the divorce is to be granted to the woman just as readily as to the man. The British Commission found and said:

"No satisfactory solution of the problem, which is raised as to the personal relations between husband and wife, can be found, except by placing them on an equal footing, and by declaring that, whatever grounds are permitted to a husband for obtaining a divorce from his wife, the same grounds shall be available for a wife in a suit against her husband. It may be safely left to a woman to consider whether she will exercise her rights, and it may reasonably be expected that, as has been proved by actual experience in Scotland, physical, social, pecuniary, and other considerations will have their natural effect, and lead to such rights not being exercised, at any rate in the great majority of cases, without such good and sufficient reason as will meet with the approval of relations and friends of the wife."

If any member of the House cares to follow this matter further, I would direct him to the proceedings of the Divorce Commission of 1912, at page 24, and if they wish to read further in relation to the matter, they might refer to Lord Lyndhurst's appeal to the House of Lords in 1857.

Lord Brougham also, and I shall not take up the time of the House in reading his remarks, dealt with the matter very fully. His observations may be found on pages 446 to 448 of his speeches.

This testimony was given before the commission appointed by the British Government in reference to the law of Scotland by Lord Salveseb (senior judge in the Outer House of the Court of Session, Scotland), in giving his evidence:

"That he regarded the Scottish law, by which, since the Reformation, no difference has existed between the sexes, as better than the English, that there is no demand for a change and that he was expressing the views of the Scottish Bench on the subject. He considered that the Scottish law very much conduced to the morality of husbands and the peace of families."

So far, I have endeavoured to show the House how the parliamentary procedure had grown in England, and I have only to impress upon the members present that the argument seems to lead irresistibly to the conclusion that husband and wife should be treated in the same way in relation to a divorce being granted, providing adultery is proven. I have also endeavoured to show to the House by what manner divorce applications reached the House of Lords in the British Parliament.

Until 1798 there was no well-defined procedure in the British Parliament, but in that year Lord Loughborough established a definite method of procedure. The British Parliament determined that before a divorce would be granted an application first had to be made for divorce a mensa et thoro and all proceedings brought into the House of Lords on oath. They also said that a judgment must be obtained for damages against the adulterer, or evidence must be brought to show that proceedings had actually been prosecuted, or that there was some good reason to the contrary where these proceedings had not been taken. What was the result of this? The result was that tremendous expense was incurred, and it was found that the parliamentary divorce courts were practically closed to those who had not very substantial means. An English divorce at that time would cost about £1,000, and if it was a contested case and many witnesses the expense ran to three or four times that amount. A climax in British national life was reached in 1845. A prosecution was laid by the Crown against a man by the name of Hall, who was charged with bigamy. I referred a few moments ago to the address that the present Clerk of the House delivered in 1914, and I am taking advantage of his work when I quote from something he said as reported at page 822 of the Hansard of that year.

Speaking of the case of Regina vs. Hall, Mr. Northrup read the following sentence pronounced by Mr. Justice Maule:

Prisoner: You have been convicted upon clear evidence; you have intermarried with another woman, your lawful wife being still alive. You have committed the crime of bigamy. You tell me, and indeed the evidence has shown that your first wife left her home and her young children to live in adultery with another man. You say this prosecution is an instrument of extortion on the part of the adulterer. Be it so. I am bound to tell you that these are circumstances which the law does not in your case take notice of. You had no right to take the law into your own hands. Every Englishman is bound to know that when a wrong is done, the law, or perhaps I should rather say the constitution affords a remedy. Now, listen to me, and I will tell you what you ought to have done. Immediately you heard of your wife's adultery you should have gone to an attorney and directed him to bring an action against the seducer of your wife. You should have prepared your evidence, instructed counsel, and proved the case in court; and recollect that it was imperative that you should recover, I do not mean actually obtain, substantial damages. Having proceeded thus far, you should have employed a proctor and instituted a suit in the ecclesiastical courts for a divorce a mensa et thoro. Your case is a very clear one, and I doubt not you would have obtained your divorce. After this step your course was quite plain; you had only to obtain a private Act of Parliament to dissolve your marriage. This you would get as a matter of course upon payment of the proper fees and proof of the facts; you might then have lawfully married again. I perceive, prisoner, that you appear scarcely to understand what I am saying to you, but let me assure you these steps are constantly taken by persons who are desirous to dissolve an unhappy marriage; it is true, for the wise man has said it, that "A hated woman, when she is married, is a thing that the earth cannot bear," and that "A bad wife is to her husband as rottenness to his bones." You, however, must bear this great evil, or must adopt the remedy prescribed by the constitution of your country. I see that you would tell me that these proceedings would cost you £1,000, and that all your small stock in trade is not worth £100. Perhaps it may be so. The law has nothing to say to that; if you had taken these proceedings you would have been free from your present wife, and the woman whom you have secondly married would have been a respectable matron. As you have not done so, you stand there a convicted culprit, and it is my duty to pass sentence upon you. You will be imprisoned for one day.

The report in the London Times gives this additional sentence:

> And as you have now been in jail since the commencement of the assizes, your term is more than expired; you are free.

That case so shocked the common sense of the British people that they began to look about to see if something could not rectify the condition, with the result that in 1850 a Royal Commission was appointed "to inquire into the present state of the law of divorce and more particularly into the mode of obtaining a divorce a vinculo matrimonii". That commission reported in 1853, the inquiry having been mainly directed to the substitution of a proper legal tribunal for the procedure by private Act. The result was the Act of 1857, under which, by section 27, divorce is permitted on the following grounds:

A. On the petition of the husband, adultery.
B. On the petition of the wife—
1. Incestuous adultery;
2. Bigamy with adultery;
3. Rape;
4. Sodomy;
5. Bestiality;
6. Adultery coupled with such cruelty as without adultery would have entitled her to a divorce a mensa et thoro (the equivalent in the Ecclesiastical Courts of judicial separation);
7. Adultery coupled with desertion, without reasonable excuse, for two years or upwards.

By section 30, the absolute defences are:

1. Denial of facts alleged in the petition.
2. Connivance (such conduct by one party to the marriage as to show that he or she corruptly intended that the other party to the marriage should commit adultery).
3. Condonation (forgiveness of a conjugal offence with full knowledge of all circumstances followed by cohabitation).
4. Collusion (presenting or prosecuting the petition by agreement between the parties to the marriage or their agents).

By section 31 the discretionary defences are:

1. Adultery of the petitioner.
2. Unreasonable delay in presenting or prosecuting the petition.
3. Cruelty to the other party to the marriage.
4. Wilful desertion or separation without reasonable excuse from the other party before the adultery complained of.
5. Wilful neglect or misconduct such as to have conduced to the adultery complained of.

Various subsequent amendments have been made from time to time, but it is not necessary that I should direct the attention of the House to them, because the Divorce Act of 1857 is the Act which is in effect in certain provinces to which I shall shortly refer, having been introduced by the introduction into these provinces of the British law as it stood in 1870.

What was the result of all this? The result of this enactment was that the moral right—not the legal right—to legislative favour as recognized by the granting of the parliamentary divorce was crystallized into a legal right enforceable at law; and that is what I am arguing for in introducing the Bill which this afternoon I ask the House to approve.

It is well known to every member of this House that any person who has the means and cares to present a petition to Parliament, if he is in a position to demonstrate that adultery has been committed, has a moral right to divorce, but in Ontario and Quebec, because we have no divorce courts, there is no legal right to a divorce. In various other provinces, as I shall shortly show, there are divorce courts with varying jurisdiction and a varying practice. I believe that the time has come when in this Canada of ours we should, in connection with this all-important social question, have one Canada-wide, all-embracing law, so that the same practice, and the same right shall be enjoyed by all domiciled Canadians, no matter in what province they happen to live.

Let us see what the Canadian law is—because if members of this House realize the patch-work condition of the Canadian law they will realize that I am not trying to obtain, by the enactment of this divorce law, the adoption of any new principle, so to speak, but that I am trying to turn what I may call patch-work legislation and patch-work rights into some co-ordinate scheme of equality of right for the people.

By section 91, subsection 26 of the British North America Act the jurisdiction in reference to legislation touching marriage and divorce is retained for the Dominion Parliament. The British North America Act, by section 129, also determined that existing laws should remain in force in the province in respect of those subjects that fell under Dominion jurisdiction until they were changed by some legislative authority which was competent to do so.

Now, what is the position in regard to divorce in the various provinces? Prince Edward Island, by a statute of 1836, 5 William IV, chapter 10, has a divorce jurisdiction; the Lieutenant Governor and five members of the Executive Council may grant a divorce. There has been no change since Confederation. Only one divorce, in 1835, was granted by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, other divorces in respect of that province having been obtained from the Dominion Parliament. No case has arisen under the Act since the Island entered the Federal Union. It is apprehended that if a case does arise there may be some difficulty in deciding whether the powers given by the Act are exerciseable by the Governor General and Council under section 12 of the British North America Act, 1867, or by the Lieutenant Governor and Council under section 129 of the same Act. Hon. gentlemen who wish to follow this subject further may do so by reading Gemmill on Divorce, page 37. The grounds for divorce in Prince Edward Island are adultery, impotency, consanguinity.

In Nova Scotia a divorce court exists, under 29 Victoria, 1866, chapter 13. The grounds are adultery, impotence, cruelty, consanguinity.

In Quebec, a divorce court does not exist; Parliamentary procedure is necessary. The same is to be said of Ontario.

Now I come to Manitoba, and it is very interesting to watch the development here, because the Dominion Parliament, probably without knowing it, created divorce courts in Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan and the North West Territories; and if hon. gentlemen are interested and care to follow me, I shall endeavour to show how that was done.

In Manitoba it has been decided by the case of Walker versus Walker, 1917, 28 Supreme Court Reports, that the Manitoba courts have jurisdiction in divorce, because the Dominion Statute of 1888, chapter 33, section 1, introduced the English law as of the 15th of July, 1870. As the House will remember, a few moments ago I showed that in 1857 a divorce court was established in England, and the Supreme Court of Manitoba held that the divorce law of England, as it existed in 1870 by virtue of the Act of 1857 in Great Britain, introduced into Manitoba the law of England in reference to divorce without introducing the procedure, and the Manitoba court adopted the English law with its restrictions in reference to the rights of women, although the English procedure was not introduced, and the Manitoba courts have developed a procedure, so I understand, of their own.

In Alberta and Saskatchewan the Dominion Statute of 1887 introduced the law of England as it stood on the 15th July, 1870, just the same as the law was introduced into Manitoba, and exactly the same argument applies. There has been a case before the courts recently, the case of Board versus Board, which is reported in the Supreme Court cases of Alberta and is now in appeal before the Privy Council, to determine whether or not the introduction of the law in England as it stood in 1870, that is the Matrimonial Act of 1857 of Great Britain, is the law of Alberta, and it seems to me it is inevitable that the conclusion must be reached that that law was introduced. The Supreme Court of Alberta has held that the law is effective and that Alberta has a jurisdiction of its own. The Manitoba courts held the same thing, and, therefore, in the light of a British Columbia case to which I shall shortly direct the attention of the House, it would appear to a lawyer to be impossible that the same principle shall not be held applicable to Alberta as the Privy Council held to be applicable to British Columbia. What will be the effect? British Columbia will have divorce jurisdiction; Manitoba will have jurisdiction; Saskatchewan will have jurisdiction; Alberta will have jurisdiction; Nova Scotia will have jurisdiction; New Brunswick will have jurisdiction, and Prince Edward Island will have jurisdiction. Ontario and Quebec, the two greatest provinces, will be the only provinces that will not have a judicial jurisdiction and will be the only provinces from which the residents must come to the parliamentary forum in case a divorce is desired. The British Columbia case is that of Watts versus Watts, which is reported in the English law reports, 1908, Appeal Cases at page 573, in which the House of Lords, the court of final jurisdiction, held that the English law, that is the law of 1857 with the amendments as they stood at the introduction of the law into British Columbia, was introduced into British Columbia, and, therefore, the British Columbia courts have jurisdiction in regard to divorce. New Brunswick has a court for divorce and matrimonial causes similar to that in England. The grounds are, adultery, impotence, consanguinity. It is specially provided, however, that no decree on the ground of adultery shall affect legitimacy of any child subsequently born, that is prior to the divorce court.

What is the history of the Canadian parliamentary divorces? The first case was in 1839. This was an application by J. Stewart to the Parliament of Old Canada, and it is interesting to note that the Governors General of Canada from 1867 to 1878 were expressly instructed by the British Government that they were not to consent in Her Majesty's name to any parliamentary divorces. Confirmation of that statement may be had in Bourinot's prefatory note to Gemmill on divorce.

Let me summarize to the House just for a moment or two what the divorce law and the divorce practice is in this country. In the first place in those provinces in which a divorce court existed prior to Confederation, that is in the Maritime Provinces, jurisdiction is vested in the provincial courts and apparently, generally speaking, husband and wife are on a parity. In Ontario and Quebec there is a moral right to a divorce providing adultery is shown on application to the Parliament of Canada, but there is no legal tribunal to which an applicant domiciled in those provinces can apply. But when you go to Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia, you have the British law by which husband and wife are not on a parity. The husband can obtain a divorce from his wife by simply proving adultery, but if the wife wants a divorce in the legal tribunals in those four provinces, she has to prove not only adultery but aggravating circumstances. If she cannot prove that, she is still entitled to a divorce provided that she has the means, not to seek divorce in the local court, but to come to the Parliament of Canada, because Parliament has been consistent in recognizing for many years the right of husband and wife as being equal where adultery is shown. I do not think this is right when we know of venereal disease and other matters to which it is not necessary for me to direct the attention of the House, the matter having been put clearly by the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) when he introduced his Bill regarding public health.

I should like to place before the House a record of the number of Canadian divorces and, with the permission of the House, I will put on Hansard the entire record, although I will read for the sake of saving time, only the record from 1914.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may say to the hon. member that it will be absolutely impossible for it to be placed on Hansard unless he reads it.

Mr. NICKLE: Then the House will have to go to sleep, as it is a rather long record, and I will endeavour to wake them up when I am through.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It could be done by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Anything may be done by unanimous consent of the House, if the hon. member will ask for it. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to have a certain statement printed in Hansard, it not having been read?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. NICKLE: This is the record:

In 1919, due to the fact that the men were returning from overseas, 87 applications were made to the Parliament of Canada for divorces, and so far, that is to the 17th day of June, 48 divorces have been recommended to this House, and the western cases, so I am told by an official of the Senate, have not been pressed owing to the fact that the applicants are hoping that this divorce court for which I am urging may be established.

Judicial divorce exists in practically every country in the world, with the exception of Italy, Spain and Ireland, and the reason divorce courts do not exist there is easily understood. These are, substantially speaking, Roman Catholic countries, and Roman Catholics, as I said at the inception of my remarks, recognize marriage as a sacrament and hold that it cannot be dissolved. It would, therefore, be inconsistent on the part of the people of those countries, staunch as they are to their Church, to establish a divorce court when they are not prepared to recognize that marriage may be dissolved. I may say in passing that Newfoundland has not a divorce court. In some countries, there is equality as between the sexes; in others divorce is granted to the wife only when she can prove adultery combined with aggravation. In practically every country in the world, when there is a divorce procedure of any sort, adultery is recognized as the ground on which divorce may be obtained.

I have endeavoured to place before this House the history of divorce not only in Great Britain but in Canada as well. I have endeavoured to show how subsequent to the Reformation the Protestant population, cribbed, cabined and confined by the ecclesiastical courts, sought relief from unhappy marriages by an appeal to Parliament, and how that appeal was successful, and subsequently became engrafted on our parliamentary system. I have endeavoured to show how the legislative forum was found to be so thoroughly unsatisfactory that scandals resulted and the British Isles found it necessary to constitute a divorce court. It is not difficult for him who runs to read that exactly the same thing that took place in Great Britain has taken, and is taking place in Canada. Parliamentary procedure became necessary in Canada when there was no legal forum to which an appeal could be made, and it is becoming absolutely obvious to him who cares to give the matter consideration that the number of divorce applications that are being made to this Parliament is becoming so great that it is impossible for any member to carry out his parliamentary duties and sit on these cases and give them consideration in a judicial and fair-minded manner. Interested as I was in this subject I endeavoured this year to keep apace with the printed memoranda that came to me from time to time from the Senate, but it was no time at all until I found myself absolutely swamped. It is quite true that I could read in a cursory way what came to me, but I could not value the evidence and weigh the facts as a man should when he sits as a judge on a case, and I submit that every member of this House who gives a vote or silently refrains from voting while a marriage is dissolved in this House takes a responsibility either by his silence or by his vote. So far as I personally am concerned I frankly admit that if parliamentary divorce proceedings are to continue in this House it is going to be quite impossible for me to discharge my duties as I believe they should be discharged. No member can weigh the proceedings of eighty divorce cases, weigh the facts, balance the degrees of probability, and give a decision as a judge, and at the same time attend to his other parliamentary duties.

The interests of the country to-day demand that something be done to facilitate divorce. We must view facts as they are. The conditions in Canada to-day are not a theory; they are facts, they are something every man knows unless, ostrich-like, he hides his head in the sand and is blind to what is taking place. I know, not one, but a dozen, yes fifty cases, and I am satisfied if I made inquiries I could find hundreds of cases, in which men are coming back to Canada and finding, unfortunately, that their wives have not conducted themselves as they should have when the men were away. The Patriotic Fund knows what has been going on in Canada, be it said to our shame, by many of the women since our men went overseas. Only yesterday in this House a representative of one of the western branches of the Great War Veterans' Association handed me a list of members of his association who had returned to Canada to find an illegitimate child in the house from which they had gone, and in one case it was an illegitimate child of a Chinese laundryman in the district in which the woman lived.

What are these men to do? What is society to do? Are we to force these women to live improperly with the men with whom they have taken up and bring into Canada a brood of illegitimate children? Or are you going to try to force the true husbands to go back to the wives who conducted themselves improperly? If you do not force the men to go back to the wives that conducted themselves improperly, and I am satisfied that in a great majority of cases they will not go back, you are going to have more common law marriages in this country than you have any idea of, because—we may as well look the facts straight in the face—the men who are now returning to Canada are demanding that they be given a forum in which they may be able to secure separation from the women who have not conducted themselves as they should have when the men were overseas. If this demand is not met they will live improperly in many cases with the woman of their choice.

I do not want to put all the blame on the women. There are dozens and dozens of men who went overseas and left Canada married men who are coming back to-day with women with whom they went through a form of marriage in England, and these women coming back with them find that there is a wife in Canada and that they have to live with a man who is not their husband, because they have no other place to go. Conditions in Canada to-day, in my judgment, are so serious that Parliament must do something to relieve the situation. There is no use in shutting our eyes to the facts, because it is facts, and not theories, that we have to face in this country.

There is another class of women. There is the true, loyal, straight woman who stayed here in Canada and never departed a fraction from the true and beaten path, but whose husband is not coming back. He has deserted her and taken up with another woman in England or France and is staying there, and here this woman is in Canada not knowing which way to turn; she does not know what has become of him. Have the deserted wives no rights? It is not as if we had not recognized divorce in this country. It is not as if it were something that had not found its way into our national life and Parliamentary procedure. We have it as a moral right. We have it in various provinces by judicial right. Is any one prepared to say to the residents of the province of Ontario, which sent such a magnificent number of men to the front, that the soldier men and the wives of the soldier men in Ontario shall not be entitled to a divorce simply because they have not got $600 or $700, as the case may be, to come down here and secure a parliamentary divorce. I have read not one, but I think half a dozen—and I do not know how many more there are—of the proceedings of the Senate Committee on Divorce this year, in which the fees were rebated because the soldier or the woman said: "Every dollar that I have got I have had to put into this thing, and if you insist before my case is heard that I must deposit the $210 that is necessary I cannot go on," and the Senate, moved by a sense of compassion and of righteousness, has rebated the fees, or a very substantial part of them, in a number of cases. But the rebate does not cover the entire situation. It has been clearly shown in the proceedings before the Senate this year—and if any gentleman cares to follow this point up he can do so by looking through the divorce cases that have been sent to him—that the parliamentary agent gets $75 for his services, witnesses have to be brought tens, and in some cases hundreds, if not thousands of miles, with all the incidental expenses, and the application for the proceeding has to be advertised in the Canada Gazette and in two or three papers, as the case may be, in the locality. All this mounts up, and the evidence goes to show that the expense of securing a Senate divorce is in the neighbourhood of from $350 to $750, and sometimes more, depending upon the number of witnesses required and the intensity with which the case is fought.

The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach) directs my attention to the fact that this varies very much according to distances, and the further people have to come the greater the expense. This means that there is a territorial disadvantage to those who live far from Ottawa. It means a tremendous territorial disadvantage to every woman in the western provinces who cannot get her divorce in western courts unless she can show adultery with aggravation. She must come to Ottawa. If she has been an adulteress and her husband cares to prosecute a divorce against her he can get a divorce in the western court, she on her part cannot get it, because the English law does not recognize adultery without aggravation as being a ground for divorce. It is an anomaly that we cannot allow to continue in this country. Women's societies from the Atlantic to the Pacific are alive to the fact, and they are petitioning for redress; and I do not think that there is a man in the House with any spirit of chivalry who will not recognize the correctness of their position.

The member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) asks me the question: Can provincial laws be amended by the provincial legislatures? No. Marriage and divorce, by the British North America Act, is restricted to the Dominion Parliament. The only parliament that can amend these provincial laws is the Dominion Parliament, and when an effort has been made in times past to amend them it has not been successful in this House. If my memory serves me correctly, Sir John Macdonald at one time tried to secure the appointment of a judge to carry on certain divorce work in the province of New Brunswick and the House would not vote for it because certain members, for conscientious reasons, felt they would be indirectly facilitating divorce if they created machinery by which divorces might be obtained. The net result of it was this: Old, inapplicable, inelastic laws must continue to exist unless this Parliament takes action in the matter. Either it will create a nation-wide divorce tribunal with plenary jurisdiction and equality of law, or it will permit to continue to exist the patch work judicial and parliamentary practice that prevails at the present time.

Now, Sir, I am not going to say for a moment that the Senate have not honestly endeavoured to grapple with the situation. Their rules are very clear. They state that provided certain requirements are met the Committee of the Senate are, with all reasonable despatch to hear and inquire into matters set forth in the petition, and shall take evidence upon oath touching the right of the petitioner to the relief prayed for. I admit that the technical procedure in the Senate is good; and while I do not wish to be considered unduly critical, it seems to me, without criticising that august body, that they have been unduly driven with the applications that come before them. I, a member of Parliament, have been driven this year in endeavouring to keep pace with the printed proceedings as they have come before me, and as every hon. gentleman will understand, it takes longer for the Senate to hear evidence than for a member to read it. And they have been so driven that divorces are being granted on evidence on which I would not convict a man, if it were equally strong in relation to the facts, in a case of drunkenness. If my wife wanted to get a divorce from me and I were willing to assist her in obtaining it, I do not know of any country in the world, nor do I know of any procedure, in which it can be more easily obtained than in this Parliament. You ask why? The reason is this. The applicant comes to the Senate and puts before the Senate Committee and generally without any sharp or conclusive cross-examination, the alleged facts as set out. As a rule one question is asked the applicant: Has there been any collusion, connivance, or condonation? I have explained what these terms mean. The applicant says, no. Now let me explain why it is easy for a wife to get a divorce from her husband. If a man wanted to facilitate his wife obtaining a divorce from him he would tell her: You have to tell one lie to the Clerk of the Senate. He will ask you: Has there been any collusion, connivance or condonation, and you will say, no. If you are prepared to tell that one lie I shall proceed to manufacture the evidence of adultery although I shall never commit it. I shall proceed to obtain some young woman, through a detective agency or otherwise, who will be prepared to lend herself, for a consideration, to the fraud. I shall say to the detective agent: At a certain time tonight I am going to be in a certain hotel. I am first going to a theatre, and then I shall take the young lady to some well known and fashionable restaurant and I want you to be there and see me with her and identify me and the lady. I shall then take her to some place of which I shall inform him, where I shall obtain a room. I shall say to him: We shall register at that hotel as Mr. and Mrs. Doe and you will call me up on the telephone and I shall answer. You will ask for Mrs. Doe and I shall have the young lady go to the telephone, and you will swear there was a lady in the room with me when you go before the Senate Committee, and to make the adventure absolutely certain the next morning you will come to the room and rap at the door and I shall arrange that you will see both of us clothed in such costume that the natural inference will be that we had been conducting ourselves not as persons should. You will go before the Senate Committee and swear to that and if necessary I will get confirming evidence by others who are prepared to support me in the fraud. The evidence would be taken with all due dignity and recorded in the proceedings, and our natural conduct would be presumed from the circumstances. In due time there would come into the House a recommendation that the marriage of John Doe and his wife should be dissolved, and that the said John Doe and his wife should be free to marry again. Now, Sir, do we want that kind of thing to go on, or do we want a judicial proceeding established by which there will be a thorough inquiry and examination of all the evidence submitted in divorce cases.

I have told you that I at least am doing my duty as I see it, in coming to Parliament and saying that I for one cannot discharge my duty and sit as a judge on these cases and I am asking this House to place the proceedings before the courts, and that simply means the creation of a court for the province of Ontario and a court for Quebec and unifying the procedure throughout the provinces. By the British North America Act if you pass the Bill to which I am asking this House to give support the divorce courts in the various provinces will be abolished and the new court will be established.

I wish to direct the attention of the House to another aspect of this subject, and that is the political and petticoat influence that is often brought to bear in the endeavour either to secure or to prevent the obtaining of divorces. You get a strenuously contested case before Parliament and there is not one of us who has not seen an attractive applicant or an attractive respondent, if she desired not to have the marriage ties dissolved, not by herself alone but sometimes by equally attractive friends endeavouring to make personal influence a factor in the determination of the case. There have been times when I have known the subtle breezes of political influence to blow in and have seen its effect. There should be nothing of that sort in relation to divorce which should be a judicial proceeding. The facts should be weighed and the rights of parties respected and nothing should be done that would not bear the closest scrutiny and entitle a man to say that the decision was given on the merits of the case regardless of extraneous circumstances.

I do not know whether or not what I have said will impress members, their experience probably will, but I would like to read to them as a sustaining statement something that Lord Brougham said in one of his speeches in reference to the position of divorce in England. He said:

> It is certain that no inquiry can be more proper for a court of law or less adapted to a chamber of Parliament than that of the facts which should entitle parties to divorce.

That puts the matter succinctly, puts it fairly before this Parliament, and I appeal to gentlemen on the other side of the House, and on this side as well, whose religious tenets and whose conscientious beliefs will at least not permit them to vote for the establishment of a divorce court, who resent the establishment within Ontario and Quebec of a divorce court, or who, if they do not resent it, do not desire it—to stand aside at least and let us, whose religious beliefs are not on all fours with theirs, do something to clarify a domestic and social condition that is bound to bring distress and sorrow to many homes in Canada.

The desire is not to make divorce easy in the sense that the Bill is creating new causes or new reasons for which divorce may be had. It is not the time now to go fully into the details of the measure; yet the fundamental principle that governs the Bill is the recognition of the supreme courts in each of the provinces and the establishment of a general court for the Dominion by the vesting of power in the Exchequer Court. Let each court lay down its own procedure, let each court have its rules of practice, but tie it down so that it can only grant a divorce of the marriage tie for adultery or bigamy. The only reason for adding bigamy to adultery is that adultery is very often difficult to prove. You have got to hire detectives, prove identification and a thousand and one things. You may grant a divorce for bigamy because any one would naturally accept the proposition that if a man had married a wife the tendency would be towards the consummation of the marriage and by implication it would be said that where a man had gone through, or contracted, a bigamous marriage, the implication of an adulterous relationship existed. In this way divorce may be secured, but the causes will not be increased or the procedure widened. I doubt if there are many members of this House who realize the change that has taken place in the practice of this House, or, rather I might say the enlargement of the Parliamentary practice. Until this year it was a rare thing for a marriage to be annulled on account of impotency. But two cases have gone through, I understand, this year. I do not set this out in any critical spirit but I speak of it as a lawyer. I would like every lawyer in this House to read the evidence in those cases. I do not believe any lawyer sitting on either side of this House would have granted a divorce in the Sherk case on the ground of impotency as it was proven. There is another case—Hawkins—where the evidence is no better. That is a case this year I do not know whether or not it has passed this House—but I think it has—where a divorce was granted, the respondent not being present, evidence of the adultery being given by the housekeeper of a house of ill-fame who swore that some six or seven years ago she saw a man whom she alleged was the original of a photograph that was produced to her in a position from which it might reasonably be presumed that he had committed, or was about to commit, adultery. Is there a lawyer in this House who would commit a man on the charge of theft on the ground that some body said that he identified the man because he had seen him six or seven years ago and there was produced for identification a photograph? That is what it is coming to—indeed, that is what it has come to—because this House is not the tribunal which should act. If conditions are bad to-day they are going to be worse to-morrow. Are we going to stand by and allow conditions to grow worse until there is a national scandal simply because we have not the courage to handle the situation?

The conditions to-day are not fair. Parliament has recognized the moral right to a divorce being granted. When a man who has the money can come to this House, prove adultery and get his divorce, is it fair that those who went overseas should be deprived of this right because they do not happen to have the $300 or $400, as the case may be, which may be necessary to get through a Bill? Is divorce to be the rich man's luxury? I am not going to say for one moment that if we had no divorce in Canada some members could not with reason say we are going to keep this thing out of our national life; but are the men who have conscientious objections against this thing, are the men whose religious convictions will not permit them to vote for this Bill, going to vote against it and allow a worse condition to exist than would be the case if this Bill were allowed to pass?

I cannot believe it possible. Members may object on the ground of conscientious scruples, object on the ground of religious convictions, but they should maintain the morals of the Canadian people and maintain a high plane in the national life. I believe this will best be done by the Bill which is now before the House securing the consent of a majority of the members of the House and I am satisfied that if the matter is given fair and due consideration, freed from extraneous or irrelevant objections, the consent I am asking for will be obtained.

Mr. W. A. GRIESBACH (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I rise only to thank the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) for the splendid presentation of the case he has given and to place myself on record as supporting the Bill.

Mr. A. E. FRIPP (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the speech made by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) but I must say he has not convinced me that it would be a wise thing for the House to pass this legislation. On the contrary, I am convinced that it would be very dangerous to pass a Bill that would place the marriage contract and all that it involves upon the same footing as any ordinary contract or dispute to be disposed of by our courts of justice. I have had a great deal of experience in our courts and I regret to say that the respect that was formerly held for the administration of justice is not increasing nor is the oath which is taken by litigants considered with the same solemnity as it was some years ago. If you open the door to granting divorce I venture to say you will increase the crime of perjury to a great extent.

The argument, as I understood the hon. member, really resolves itself into this: He quotes practically the case of the returned soldiers as a reason why we should depart from the practice that at present prevails. What is the remedy for that? There is a remedy under the present procedure for people of small means. It is not the case that divorce, under the present system, can only be secured by a person who has a long purse. I have seen cases this session in which the Senate have remitted the fees so as to put divorce within the reach of any person who can go to any court.

This Bill provides, as I understand it, for an appeal to the Court of Appeal of this province from the decision of a judge sitting nisi prius. Why an appeal of that kind to the Court of Appeal in the province of Ontario, and probably a further appeal to the Supreme Court, would exceed a thousand dollars. So that the ground of expense does not seem to me to be sufficient ground for opening a door. Make divorces easy to obtain and you will multiply them, I venture to say, in the next five years, by a thousand. Do we want to have in the Dominion of Canada the same condition of affairs that exists in the United States? If there is one thing that Canada and Canadians ought to be proud of, I think it is the respect for the marriage tie which is displayed in this country, and the difficulty there is in getting that tie dissolved. I, for one, Mr. Speaker, would hesitate to depart from the practice that now prevails. Every hon. gentleman in this House who practices law must have hundreds of people coming to him each year, wives or husbands, with difficult matrimonial matters and asking "Cannot we get a divorce?" I say to such people: "No, you can only get a divorce by going to the high court of Parliament. It is a very expensive proceeding, you will have to make out a very strong case," and the result is that these people go home and make the best of their married life as they promised when they entered into the matrimonial state—for better and for worse. If you make it easy to get a divorce, if you say to any person who consults you: "Yes, we will bring an action to dissolve this marriage, or we will bring an action for divorce," I venture to say that nine-tenths of the litigation before our courts within the next few years will be composed of divorce cases. Hundreds of people consult me about their troubles at home. When you explain to them the present difficulty of getting a divorce, they are perfectly satisfied, and I never hear any more of them. I fancy they return home and by the exercise of a little forbearance are able to live together as man and wife should. If you make it easy for them—and we have unscrupulous practitioners in the legal profession as well as in other businesses—if you put it in the power of solicitors to inaugurate these actions, then, Sir, we will find that the state of this country would be practically the state of the United States so far as the dissolution of the marriage tie is concerned. Holding these views, I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I., (Mr. McIsaac):

That this Bill be now not read but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I come from a province in which a divorce court has existed ever since Confederation, and I think the view which the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) has expressed would be very much modified had he ever lived in a province and under a jurisprudence in which divorces were granted by the courts and not by Parliament. The hon. member for Ottawa put his finger upon the real point in issue when he said that it is a question of practice, that is to say, of procedure. This is precisely the question which the House must consider this afternoon. We are granting divorces in Canada in respect of every province within it at the present time. No one has any doubt of that, no one can for a moment question that fact.

It is not a question of establishing any new principle. It is purely a question as to the procedure by which and of the conditions and safeguards under which divorces shall be granted. Can any one believe that so important a matter intimately affecting the social life of our people should be decided under loose procedure by a Parliamentary Committee of the Senate and afterwards by a Committee of the House of Commons rather than in a Court of Justice under all the safeguards which are provided under the practice of courts which deal with such matters?

What is the practice in divorce courts whether in this country or in Great Britain? It is the practice to provide every possible safeguard and to take every possible precaution that no divorce shall be granted without absolutely satisfactory evidence. It is the practice to provide every possible safeguard against collusion. How is that carried out? By the appointment of a King's Proctor, as he is termed, an able lawyer selected by the court, who is charged with the duty of representing the court and the public interest, who has the right to cross-examine every witness and to address the court and who has the right also to call witnesses in case he suspects the bona fides of the application, the character of the evidence or the probability of collusion.

Compare such practice and such safeguards with the course which prevails in this Parliament, of which I have known something for more than twenty-three years. My hon. friend (Mr. Fripp) truly declares that the question involved in this Bill is one of procedure and of practice; but if he will compare the practice of the courts, the safeguards there provided, with the practice which prevails in the Committees of the Senate and of this House, he will invite at once the defeat of his motion.

I am not desirous of making divorce easy, and I venture to say that the experience of every province in Canada which has a divorce court indicates that the safeguards which are thrown about these applications do not lend themselves to easy divorce. I would challenge any statement to the contrary, because I know—at least I knew very well up to 15 or 20 years ago when I was engaged in the active practice of my profession—the record of the province of Nova Scotia, and the number of divorces up to that period was not large. Contrasted with the record of this Parliament it would, I think, compare very favourably.

Then, so far as is concerned the question of cost; I have been told of witnesses being brought from as far as Edmonton during this very session for the purpose of giving their testimony before the Divorce Committee of the Senate. If we are to grant divorces in Canada, does any good reason exist why that evidence should not be given in the city of Edmonton, or in the city of Calgary, or before some court there under the safeguards that I have mentioned, instead of having these witnesses brought eighteen hundred or two thousand miles to the city of Ottawa that they may give their evidence here. If it is a question of practice, as my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) has said, then, as far as I am concerned, the practice of placing this question under the safeguards of a court and committing applications for divorce to tribunals which are convenient to the people who may unfortunately be obliged to resort to them, is an infinitely better practice than that which we now have in Canada. Therefore, for the reasons which have been very cogently and clearly stated by the hon. member for Kingston, I am in favour of the Bill, the second reading of which he now asks the House to approve.

I do not commit myself to every detail of the Bill because I have not studied it; I am dealing only with the general question whether divorces in Canada ought to be granted under proper safeguards by the duly constituted courts of the country, or whether they ought to be dealt with by a committee of the Senate and, in a perfunctory way, by a committee of the House of Commons, and without the safeguards which are always available for the trial of causes in the courts of this country.

Sir HERBERT AMES (St. Antoine): Mr. Speaker, with a view to obtaining certain information that was necessary for the Canadian Patriotic Fund in determining whether there was a field of usefulness for it after the war, I circularized all the principal branches throughout Canada to find out whether, if the fund should suddenly terminate, there would be any considerable number of residual cases, that is, cases of women and children who would be left without any means of support and who would not be provided for by the military pension, or other allowances. I asked our branches to state in all cases what were the reasons why certain families now on the fund would be without means of support if the fund should terminate. I was surprised to find in looking over the returns—we got them from every part of Canada, long lists of cases of women and children in distress—that a very considerable number of them were deserted wives of men who had gone overseas; the wives of men who had been married overseas or of men who, having gone overseas, had discovered wives that they had previously had over there and remained with them. There was no means by which these families could be helped except through the Patriotic Fund, and I realized what the people of this country do not realize: That when a woman permitted her husband to enlist and go overseas, she ran not two risks, but three. She ran, first, the risk that he would be killed and she would be a widow; in which case she would undoubtedly be adequately provided for by way of pension by a grateful country. She ran the second risk that her husband would be seriously maimed or injured and that she would have to live with a cripple for the remainder of her life. The Government recognizes that contingency under the pension law and will undoubtedly meet it in the future. But no one has realized the third contingency: That when a woman lets her husband go overseas and be absent a number of years, conditions might arise, aside from casualty, under which he might not come back; and there are a great many women in Canada to whom that third condition has come.

I want to put in a plea for these women, many of whom are without children, some of whom have one, two, or three young children. I want to put in a plea that it be made possible for them to begin life again under new and better circumstances. These women, for the most part, are poor; they cannot earn any considerable sums of money. The obtaining of the three or four hundred dollars necessary to enable them to come to Ottawa and get a divorce is as impossible to them as the raising of enough money to build a Parliament building. It is impossible for them to secure any form of relief. Are you going to ask these women to live the remainder of their lives neither married or unmarried? They have to look after themselves, and if you do nothing for them in this connection you put them in a position where they are likely to fall and to increase that portion of the population which we consider undesirable. If you establish divorce courts in the various provinces, in cases of this kind distressed wives may, without great expense, appear before them and prove desertion without difficulty by producing letters from their husbands showing that they are living with other women; and in this way you will make it possible for them to secure relief. You will make it possible for a woman so situated to begin life again, to re-marry under happier circumstances, to open another home, perhaps, in some western portion of Canada where she and her children may live an honourable and a happy life. In view of the special war conditions that have arisen and of this special consideration which was not with us before, we must face facts as they are; and I submit this argument to the House as one of the reasons why legislation of the character suggested should be passed, and passed now.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens) Mr. Speaker, the member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) in strongly opposing this measure, said that if it should pass, the cases of divorce would be multiplied by thousands. If his statement is well founded —and I know it is his deliberate judgment —then that which he regards as a reason for the rejection of this Bill is the strongest possible argument in its favour. If thousands of honest men and women in this country are entitled to divorce, not on new grounds—as the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has shown, we are not introducing new grounds—not on trifling grounds such as, we are told, divorces are granted in some other countries, but upon the well-established grounds recognized by our courts and by this Parliament, the fact that these men and women are entitled to divorce and are unable to get it because of the present machinery is the strongest argument why that machinery should be discarded and some better machinery set up.

There are strong religious objections to divorce. The most numerous religious body in this country is known to have strong objections to divorce, and another very considerable religious body has, to some degree, similar objections. These objections, which are based upon religious grounds, are entitled to our most profound respect, and if they succeeded in preventing divorce then we might by all means commend them. But they do not do anything of the sort. We are not considering to-day the question whether or not divorce shall be granted. Divorce is granted in some of the provinces, as has been shown, by judicial machinery, and at Ottawa by machinery which cannot be called judicial and to which you can hardly properly apply any term of respect. Divorce, therefore, is being granted and is going to be granted; the only question is whether it shall be granted by decent machinery, or by that which is a burlesque of justice. That is the whole question. If any hon. member thinks that he can prevent the granting of divorce by opposing this Bill I understand his position and respect him for it. But since divorce is going to be granted anyhow, and since the only question is whether it is to be granted in the decent way described by the Prime Minister when he referred to the method pursued in the province from which we both come surely there should be no hesitation. I very cordially support the member for Kingston.

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (King's, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, as the seconder of the amendment submitted by the member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp), I wish to say, without going into the matter at any length, that I am opposed to divorce on moral grounds, and I will not give my vote to facilitate it. I am convinced that divorce accelerates and increases immorality, and I for one shall not vote for anything which, in my humble judgment, will have any such effect. I am proud to say that I come from a province where there is not on record, so far as I know, any account of a divorce having been granted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is there not a divorce court there?

Mr. McISAAC: I presume the Supreme Court can grant a divorce, but I do not know. There is no divorce court there.

Mr. NICKLE: There is a procedure there. The Lieutenant-Governor, assisted by a number of members of the Executive Council, has the right to grant divorces, but, of course, a few applicants come to Ottawa.

Mr. McISAAC: I have not known nor have I heard of any divorce taking place in Prince Edward Island so long as I have lived there, and that is all my life. For these reasons, briefly, without going any further into the question for the moment, I second the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp).

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): It does not appear to me that this Bill is one which this House should pass. It may be quite true it is the better method of conducting divorce proceedings, but one of the first things that struck me when I went overseas a few years ago was the ease with which divorces were granted in the old country. It did not seem to my mind to lend any dignity to either the judicial proceedings or to the nation. It looked very much as though it were a case if a man wanted to get a divorce from his wife, that practically all he had to do was to spend a night with a certain party, notify his wife of the fact and tell her to get a divorce, which probably she proceeded to do. It acted, of course, in the reverse way as well. I think when we compare conditions in this country, bad and all as they may be, with conditions in the United States or Great Britain where divorces are undoubtedly made easier, all credit will stand in favour of Canada. The marriage tie is a question which should not be made a football. People should not enter into a contract of that kind without serious consideration, without estimating all the consequences, and this Parliament should hesitate before placing this country in a similar position to that which may exist in such places as the American Republic and even in Great Britain. Such a course does not add to the dignity of the nation, nor to the dignity of Parliament.

Mr. T. M. M. TWEEDIE (Calgary West): I wish to say just a few words in support of this Bill. I have been somewhat surprised at the line of argument in the speeches of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) and one or two others. They would lead us to believe that divorce when procured before the Senate is, in all cases, founded upon fraud and corruption, and that if applicants go to the courts and the jurisdiction is transferred, we are still going to have fraud and corruption there. There is no distinction whatever between divorce evidence and any other evidence, and it is only fair to assume that the people who are applying for divorce, no matter what the forum may be, are entitled to be credited with being as honest as any other citizens. It is true there may be some fraud or some corruption, but the question is: Should divorce be granted in the Dominion of Canada at all? I am absolutely of the opinion that it should be. I cannot conceive of any law which should compel a man to be tied to a woman, or a woman to be tied to a man for the rest of their natural days, when either one of the parties is living openly in adultery or has committed bigamy. That is all this Bill provides for; it confines the grounds upon which divorce may be granted to those simple grounds, and as the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) fears that divorces may become common in this country and may be easy, if he will read the report of the commission to the Imperial Government, which commission reported prior to the war, he will find there what will be practically a revelation to him as to what, in their opinion, may be considered as grounds for divorce. We do not wish to extend the jurisdiction; we wish simply to transfer the place where the case may be heard, and it is absolutely unfair, as it has been in the past, that any person should be compelled to come from Alberta and bring his witnesses with him and, in some cases, his counsel and incur expenditure of anywhere from $2,000 to $5,000 before securing a divorce. If a divorce is good for the man who has the means, it is absolutely as good for the man who has not, and money, that is, the ability to supply the necessary funds to defray the costs, should not be the test; the test should be the two principles that are set down in this Bill, that either party is chargeable with adultery or bigamy. The jurisdiction of Alberta has not yet been determined, but it will be determined by the Privy Council. I do not think, however, we need wait for that. If any doubt exists at the present time, in my opinion, it is the duty of this Parliament, as regards that province and indeed all other provinces, to remove that doubt. There should be uniformity. Why should the divorce court in Nova Scotia or the Supreme Court in British Columbia have jurisdiction over marriages and be able to grant divorces, while the interior provinces are denied that privilege? If, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) points out, those courts can administer that branch of the law satisfactorily, that privilege can safely be extended to the other provinces to which it has been denied in the past. This is one of the best pieces of legislation which has been introduced into this House at this session, and I trust the majority of the members will see their way clear to give their support to the hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. DANIEL LEE REDMAN (Calgary East): I am very glad that the hon. member for Kingston has brought in this Bill. I have nothing further to add to the excellent reasons he has given in favour of it than perhaps to mention two conditions which pertain to soldiers particularly and also to the West. For the last year or so, I do not think a week has passed but I have had soldiers in my office at Calgary who have furnished me with sufficient evidence to make it perfectly clear that they are entitled to a divorce, but I have had to tell them that it will cost them possibly about $2,000 to get that divorce, when they consider the number of witnesses they have to bring from that point, their hotel expenses here and possibly the necessity of making another trip to Ottawa, because sometimes divorces have been only partly heard when Parliament has prorogued and the witnesses have had to return to their homes and to come back the next year. When I told them that, it became perfectly apparent that those men could not get a divorce. Divorce should not be a luxury only for the rich; it should be open to the poor, and on that broad ground I wish to give the Bill my support. I have had soldiers say to me such things as this: We have gone overseas to fight for our country; we have come back; we cannot get our rights here, and we will go to the United States, where we can get our rights. I have known of several cases where soldiers have gone to the United States to get their rights.

As regards the question of uniformity, even if the Privy Council decides that Alberta has power under the old English jurisdiction to grant divorces, that divorce will still have that fault mentioned by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), namely, the fact that the wife, in order to get a divorce, must show additional aggravation, and I do not think we desire that to have any part in our divorce law in Alberta. For these reasons I shall support the Bill.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth): A few years ago I would have been inclined to oppose this Bill, but during the last four years I have had the honour of being chairman of the Private Bills Committee, before which the divorce Bills come, and with other hon. gentlemen I have had the privilege of attending, by arrangement, the Senate Committee on Divorce. I must confess that my attendance there has entirely changed my views on the existing procedure for granting divorce in Canada. In the light of that experience I am prepared to support the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). I think the House is unanimous in desiring to prevent any pulling down of the bars in the granting of divorce. I quite appreciate all the arguments that have been put forward as to the necessity for keeping the expense of securing a divorce down to such a figure that the poor applicant will be able to secure one as well as the rich.

I shall support the Bill, not only because it may reduce the expense of securing a divorce, but because I believe that we should make it as difficult as possible, when the case is actually being tried, for the applicant to secure the divorce, and no divorce should be granted unless evidence is produced that absolutely proves the charges.

Under our present system the greatest evil is not the cost because after all the only essential cost so far as the Committee of Parliament is concerned is a matter of $210, all the other costs being incurred through the employment of counsel and travelling expenses; the great evil is that under the present system divorces can be obtained, and are being obtained, on evidence which, as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has said, would not be accepted by the judge of any court in the land. I have seen several divorces granted during the present year which no judge or lawyer entrusted with the examination of witnesses would have been disposed to grant for one moment. I therefore think that the change in the procedure that is proposed will reduce, rather than increase, the number of divorces, and that is the reason I am supporting the Bill.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. Fripp, which was negatived on the following division:

Wallace,

Main motion (Mr. Nickle) agreed to, on division, and the Bill read the second time.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill No. 64, respecting the High River, Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Tweedie.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 126, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: When this Bill was before the Railway Committee the words "or without" in the eleventh line were struck out in a somewhat hurried manner. I am satisfied that these words should be included in the Bill. Without these powers the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will not be able to operate their air service between any city in Canada and New York. We have granted the right to other aircraft companies to operate between Canada and the United States and other countries, and it is only a reasonable request to make that these words should be included in the Bill. I would therefore move that the words "or without," which were struck out by the Committee, be re-inserted. The members of the Government have been canvassed in regard to the matter and I understand they are in favour of these words being included in the Bill. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company claim that it is impossible for them to operate in the United States without these words being included in the Bill. They say they will be compelled to come under any restrictions that may be imposed upon them in operating in that country.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NICKLE: What is the amendment that was made in the Railway Committee?

The CHAIRMAN: There is a proviso added as follows:

> Provided that the exercise of the powers hereby conferred shall be subject to all such legislation and regulations by competent authority, whether general or special, as may have been heretofore or may hereafter be enacted or sanctioned for regulating or prescribing the conditions of aerial navigation or carriage and the obligations incident thereto.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: If that provision had been in the Railway Act of 1902 we would not have had any conflict in regard to the Toronto-Niagara Company.

Section as amended agreed to, Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 139, for the relief of James Frederick Neild— Mr. Ross.

Bill No. 140, for the relief of Mabel Anna Ferguson—Mr. J. M. Douglas.

Bill No. 141, respecting the Chartered Trust and Executor Company—Mr. Nesbitt.

MESSAGES FROM THE SENATE.

SPACE IN NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS —INTOXICATING LIQUORS—RAILWAY CONSOLIDATION BILL CONFERENCE.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have appointed the Hon. Messieurs Fowler, Ross (Middleton), Bostock and Casgrain, a committee, to act with a like committee from the House of Commons for the purpose of assisting the Joint Parliamentary Committee for Parliament Buildings in the allocation of the space in the new Parliament Buildings between the two houses and also allocating certain space to various members and officials of the respective Houses.

Also, a message informing this House that they have passed Bill No. 107, and to confirm the Order in Council of the 24th day of February, 1919, prohibiting the importation, manufacture and transportation of intoxicating liquors, and the Order in Council of the 12th day of April, 1919, in amendment thereof, with an amendment.

And also, a message informing this House that the managers of the free conference on the part of the Senate will meet in the Senate Committee Room No. 70, on Tuesday the 24th June, at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

MILITIA PENSION ACT.

Consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 118 to amend the Militia Pension Act—Major-General Mewburn.

Major-General MEWBURN: It was agreed that the amendments as passed by the Senate should be re-drafted by the law clerk. I would therefore move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ACT RESPECTING DIVORCE.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 77, respecting divorce—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—Definition of "Superior Court," "Court."

Mr. MOWAT: The draughtsman of paragraph (b) has not remembered that the proper designation of "Court" in the case of the province of Ontario should be "The Supreme Court of Ontario." There is a high court division but only for the subdivision or distribution of business. The title as given in the paragraph is therefore not a proper one. The words "High Court Division of" should be deleted.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) to strike out the words "High Court division of" from the eighth line, in paragraph 2

Mr. NICKLE: That is acceptable.

Mr. FIELDING: What is the object of having the Exchequer Court, as well as the provincial courts, charged with this function?

Mr. NICKLE: It was thought that while a court should be constituted for each province it might also be well to have one Dominion court with co-ordinate jurisdiction in reference to divorce.

Mr. FIELDING: Then you will have two courts. An applicant for divorce may choose whether he shall go to the provincial court or to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. NICKLE: With this difference, that any person domiciled in Canada would have the right to go to the Exchequer Court, but any person domiciled in one of the provinces must confine his application to the court of that province.

Mr. FIELDING: To be domiciled in Canada one must be domiciled in one of the provinces of Canada or in the Yukon territory. What is the difference? It looks to me like creating two courts for the same purpose.

Mr. NICKLE: The person would have the right of electing either to go to the court of the province in which he is domiciled, or to the Exchequer Court with Dominion-wide jurisdiction.

Mr. FIELDING: Why should there be two courts, why should there be any choice in the matter?

Mr. NICKLE: It was thought that certain conditions might arise that might make it advantageous to have a Dominion court. For instance, in the event of a divorce being sought, possibly in the province of Quebec, and the judiciary being at any time of the Roman Catholic faith and having conscientious objections to granting divorce, they might find themselves in a most embarrassing and difficult position providing they had to consider an application for divorce and give a decision, and I thought it unfair to put them in such a position.

Mr. BUREAU: There is no danger so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, because the judiciary there are not wholly Catholic, they are divided in the matter of religion; there are Protestant judges as well as Catholic judges. In such a case as the hon. gentleman speaks of, it would only be a question of changing the venue.

Mr. McKENZIE: I had intended raising the same objection that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has made. I do not quite appreciate the necessity of vesting jurisdiction in the Exchequer Court of Canada, for the very reason that the hon. gentleman has advanced. The practice in the courts of the different provinces is quite different from the practice in the Exchequer Court, and usually in the latter case is much more expensive, although I do not know whether that would hold good with respect to divorce cases. Unless there is some good reason for it, I certainly would urge upon the hon. gentleman who is promoting this Bill to reconsider the question.

Mr. NICKLE: I would imagine that if the Exchequer Court were a more expensive court, the probabilities were that litigants would not seek redress there. I felt very much impressed by the necessity of avoiding anything that might bring embarrassment to any judge. I have a high regard for people's conscientious objections and religious beliefs, and to avoid the possibility of causing offence I thought there could be no objection to giving the Exchequer Court jurisdiction in these cases. I trust the leader of the Opposition will concur in that idea, although he may be of the opinion that Exchequer Court jurisdiction is unnecessary at the present time.

Mr. McKENZIE: My objection is based on the reason advanced by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), that we are duplicating the courts. It is true that at present, as regards the provinces, some cases can go to the County Courts and also to the Supreme Court. There is concurrent jurisdiction, but those cases are all in the one province. As I understand the Exchequer Court procedure, the Attorney General, representing the Crown, can start an action without a fiat, and anybody else desirous of instituting proceedings has to get a fiat from the Government, and there is a lot of preliminary difficulty in regard to it that is foreign to the issue of a writ in the ordinary courts. If the necessity does not exist, I think it is rather undesirable to be multiplying difficulties.

Mr. ARTHURS: The explanation made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Nickle) brings to my mind another set of cases that might arise under the proposal to give jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court. The very fact that it is more difficult to enter an action in that court, and perhaps more expensive, may lead to cases where the applicant for divorce will purposely choose the Exchequer Court in order to involve the respondent in financial or other difficulties. For instance, an action might be brought in the Exchequer Court where the respondent lived in British Columbia and the applicant in Quebec. This would put the respondent to a great deal of expense and trouble, and not only that, but it would, perhaps, lead to a divorce going through which might not be granted in the provincial courts.

Mr. NICKLE: I would hardly imagine such a situation as that would arise, for the reason that the Exchequer Court moves from place to place; it has no fixed location from which its decisions are given; and in the determination of the place at which the trial should be held consideration would have to be given to the request and the position of the applicant, and others, and no doubt the question would be settled on motion.

Mr. BUREAU. There are only two judges of the Exchequer Court. Suppose the senior judge should die; the assistant judge is a Roman Catholic, and until a successor was appointed the condition would not be as it is in Quebec, where a great many of the judges are not Roman Catholics.

Mr. NICKLE: I should imagine that in that case the vacancy would soon be filled.

Mr. COPP: With regard to subsection (e), I would point out that in New Brunswick the Divorce Court is presided over by a judge of the King's Bench Division; he is not specially a judge of the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. Why delay the application of this Act until this incumbent's time expires? Why not make the change now?

Mr. NICKLE: The intention was, as far as possible, to respect the courts as now constituted while the incumbents were alive, and that so soon as they passed away there should be a reconstitution of the judiciary, to be determined by the Bench of each province.

Mr. COPP: It dosen't make a particle of difference in the case of New Brunswick, because a judge of the King's Bench Division presides over the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

Mr. NICKLE: That would be a matter for the judges of New Brunswick to determine among themselves. In that case the section would practically come into effect forthwith.

Mr. FIELDING: The same argument would apply to Nova Scotia, although in that province the judge is designated as the Judge of the Divorce Court. In New Brunswick, according to my hon. friend (Mr. Copp) the Judge of the King's Bench Division is not specially designated as Judge of the Court of Divorce.

Mr. COPP: He is so designated, but he is Judge of the King's Bench Division, and sits in other courts besides the Courts of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—jurisdiction:

Mr. McKENZIE: I direct the attention of the member for Kingston to paragraph (c), which reads in part:

> For kindred within the degrees prohibited in an Act made in the thirty-second year of King Henry VIII entitled "An Act concerning pre-contracts and touching degrees of consanguinity.

Whatever these prohibitions are, they should be in the Act. Only a few lawyers in Canada can conveniently go back to that old statute and hunt up this reference. My hon. friend may find it congenial to look into these things and to go back to the time of King Henry VIII, but I am always opposed to a conditional law of this kind; the portion of the other statute referred to should be in the Act.

Mr. NICKLE: I shall be very glad to incorporate it as schedule A to the Act. To that end, I move that paragraph (c) be amended by adding after the word "consanguinity" the words "as set out in schedule A of this Act." I will read the proposed schedule A:

A man may not marry his—

1. Grandmother.
2. Grandfather's wife.
3. Wife's grandmother.
4. Father's sister (i.e. aunt by blood).
5. Mother's sister (i.e. aunt by blood).
6. Father's brother's wife (uncle's wife, i.e., aunt by affinity).
7. Mother's brother's wife (uncle's wife, i.e., aunt by affinity).
8. Wife's father's sister (wife's aunt).
9. Wife's mother's sister (wife's aunt).
10. Mother.
11. Step-mother.
12. Wife's mother (mother-in-law).
13. Daughter.
14. Wife's daughter (Step-daughter).
15. Son's wife (daughter-in-law).
16. Sister.

(b) 17. Wife's sister (sister-in-law).

18. Brother's wife (sister-in-law).
19. Son's daughter (granddaughter).
20. Daughter's daughter (granddaughter).
21. Son's son's wife (son's daughter-in-law).
22. Daughter's son's wife (daughter's daughter-in-law).
23. Wife's son's daughter (stepson's daughter).
24. Wife's daughter's daughter (step-daughter's daughter).
25. Brother's daughter (niece).
26. Sister's daughter (niece).
27. Brother's son's wife (nephew's wife).
28. Sister's son's wife (nephew's wife).
29. Wife's brother's daughter (niece by affinity).

(b) 30. Wife's sister's daughter (niece by affinity).

A woman may not marry her—

1. Grandfather.
2. Grandmother's husband.
3. Husband's grandfather.
4. Father's brother (uncle by blood).
5. Mother's brother (uncle by blood).
6. Father's sister's husband (aunt's husband, i.e., uncle by affinity).
7. Mother's sister's husband (aunt's husband, i.e., uncle by affinity).
8. Husband's father's brother (husband's uncle).
9. Husband's mather's brother (husband's uncle).
10. Father.
11. Step-father.
12. Husband's father (father-in-law).
13. Son.
14. Husband's son (step-son).
15. Daughster's husband (son-in-law).
16. Brother.
17. Husband's brother (brother-in-law).

(b) 18. Sister's husband (brother-in-law).

19. Son's son (grandson).
20. Daughter's son (grandson).
21. Son's daughter's husband (son's son-in-law).
22. Daughter's daughter's husband (daughter's son-in-law).
23. Husband's son's son (step-son's son).
24. Husband's daughter's son (step-daughter's son).
25. Brother's son (nephew).
26. Sister's son (nephew).
27. Brother's daughter's husband (niece's husband).
28. Sister's daughter's husband (niece's husband).
29. Husband's brother's son (nephew by affinity).
30. Husband's sister's son (nephew by affinity).

(b) This has been altered by the Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907 (7 Edward 7, c. 47), which legalized marriage with a deceased wife's sister—including a sister of the half-blood.

Mr. SHEARD: I suggest that we go through these relationships seriatim; as the hon. gentleman has read them, they are nothing but a Babel of confusion.

Mr. NICKLE: Of course, it is most confusing. Really this provision was the adoption in the time of Henry VIII of the canonical law in reference to consanguinity and affinity. It has been the law of the British Empire and of Canada for years, with this exception: Some years ago there was an agitation for the legalization of marriage to a deceased wife's sister, and by the Deceased Wife's Sister Marriage Act of 1907 an amendment to that effect was incorporated into the law.

Mr. SHEARD: Did I hear the words "sister-in-law" read in the schedule? If I mistake not, I have seen something like this in the English Church prayer book. If that is in the schedule, would not a deceased wife's sister be a sister-in-law?

Mr. NICKLE: Yes, but a brother's wife would also be a sister-in-law. While it is legal to marry a deceased wife's sister, it is not legal to marry a deceased brother's wife.

Mr. SHEARD: Is the word "sister-in-law" in that schedule?

Mr. NICKLE: Yes, it is in to this extent, that a brother's wife is a sister-in-law.

Mr. SHEARD: Is it so defined?

Mr. NICKLE: Yes, and I so read it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know of a case where a man married his brother's widow. I certainly did not approve of it; I thought it was not a proper thing to do from a moral standpoint, but I did not know it was against the law because we have no Statute on that point in any province so far as I know.

Mr. BUREAU: We have in Quebec.

Mr. McKENZIE: In Nova Scotia, we have no Statute on that point. We would regard it as being common law with us according to the law of Henry VIII.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is there not something in this that might be an encroachment upon the rights of the provinces? According to the British North America Act, matters concerning marriage and divorce come under the Federal authorities, but on the other hand, in the following clause, it is stated that all things pertaining to the solemnization of marriage come under provincial jurisdiction. In some provinces, at least in the province from which I come, there is a law concerning the degrees of relationship that are prohibited. Supposing those provisions should not be the same, shall it be said that a man who is married according to the laws of his province could see his marriage annulled by a law of this Parliament as the one which will be passed now? There might be a conflict. I think the question ought to be studied before we pass this legislation.

Mr. NICKLE: I would be inclined to think that "marriage and divorce" as defined in the British North America Act would give the Dominion the right of determining the status of the parties and their right to enter into the state of matrimony. I would hardly like to go the length of saying—and I do not think my hon. friend will so argue—that the relationship of the parties had anything to do with the ceremony incidental to the marriage. If I may use the expression, I would think the status of the parties went to the very heart of the question, whereas the ceremony was more a surface arrangement, to carry my figure through.

Mr. MOWAT: I do not profess to be an authority on ecclesiastical law, but my recollection is that when the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill was passed in Canada in 1883 —my hon. friend refers to 1907 which was the year the British Act was passed, but we were quite ahead of Great Britain in that respect—the leaving out of the deceased husband's brother was a mere omission. Logically there is no reason why we should not do now what should have been done in 1883, and say that if a man can marry his deceased wife's sister, a woman can marry her deceased husband's brother. They are in the same degree of consanguinity, and we should not perpetuate the error of 1883.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: What is the difference between a marriage which will be dissolved and a marriage which will be declared null and void ?

Mr. NICKLE: The distinction lies in this: A marriage is dissolved when a marriage has actually taken place, and a marriage is annulled when it is declared by the court never to have existed. As I endeavoured to explain this afternoon, the word " divorce " as commonly used in English jurisprudence is used as applicable not only to a recision but to an annulment. The difference would be this, to give an example: If A and B were married and had children, and if as the result of the misconduct of either, the marriage was dissolved, the children would still be legitimate. If, on the other hand, a man and a woman, although within the kindred degrees prohibited by the Act to which I have just directed attention, had gone through a form of marriage, that marriage would be void ab initio, and the children would not and could not be legitimate. One determines the dissolution of the marriage, determines the separation as from the date of the declaration. The annulment is a declaration of the fact that the marriage never existed and never should have existed in the eyes of the law.

Mr. BUREAU: If the issue is illegitimate, that is not right.

Mr. NICKLE: It was to get over that point that the proviso was put in:

> Provided, however, that no marriage shall be declared null and void after the death of one of the parties thereto unless such marriage was void ab initio.

But there is no question whatever that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) is correct in this, that an annulment which dates back to the date of the marriage makes any children subsequently born illegitimate and illegally born.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the unfairness of the thing. People might have been married in good faith, ignorant of any of the causes which would render the marriage void, and yet the issue would be illegitimate. A provision ought to be inserted which would make children born from that marriage legitimate. Of course, technically and legally, there never was a marriage, but for all purposes of society, if people have been living together in good faith and find out later on that, on account of a legal technicality, they were not married, the issue should not suffer from that.

Mr. NICKLE: My idea in drafting this legislation was to disturb as little as possible the general law of the land as it has been recognized for generations.

Mr. BUREAU: We could improve on that.

Mr. ARTHURS: This Bill goes further than the hon. gentleman contemplates. As I understand it, it will dissolve a marriage solemnized in the United States or any other country where the parties in question are domiciled in Canada. In the United States, they have not this law according to Henry VIII, and marriages are celebrated there within much closer degrees of consanguinity than we have in Ontario or any other province. As a matter of fact, the marriage law of Ontario does not go as far as the schedule enumerated by the hon. member (Mr. Nickle). I know it is placed on the back of the application for a marriage license, and I am sure there are not nearly so many degrees of consanguinity mentioned. In certain states in the American Union a man may legally marry his deceased brother's wife. I have in mind at present two cases in which such a marriage has been solemnized and the parties are residents of this country. By this Bill, if it goes through, the children by such a marriage will be illegitimate to all intents and purposes and can be so declared by anybody. We should go slow in this matter, because it certainly involves the rights of innocent parties.

Mr. BUREAU: Could not a proviso be inserted to protect the issue in a case like that? My hon. friend says this has always been the law, but even so, that is no reason why, if that law is not just, we should not improve it, if we are going to legislate on the subject.

Mr. NICKLE: In reply to the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), this legislation was, of course, drafted for Canada.

Mr. ARTHURS: Does it not dissolve a marriage which has been celebrated in the United States if the parties are domiciled in Canada?

Mr. NICKLE: No.

Mr. ARTHURS: It declares it to be illegal.

Mr. NICKLE: No, it says that the Exchequer Court of Canada shall have jurisdiction and may declare the marriage null and void in certain specified cases. I have very grave doubts if a court would declare null and void a marriage that had been solemnized in the United States, provided that the parties came to Canada and had a matrimonial domicile in this jurisdiction. I would incline to the view that the court would say: "Having entered into the contract of marriage under regulations in another country that entitle you to marrriage, this court refuses to exercise its discretionary power and relieve you from the contract which you entered into in good faith."

Mr. ARTHURS: Why not remove all doubt by placing that in the Bill?

Mr. BUREAU: I would ask my hon. friend to reconsider that point; the clause might stand in the meantime.

Mr. McKENZIE: I voted for the second reading of this Bill in good faith, believing that the only question involved was a better method of enforcing the law as it now stands respecting divorce. I think that what this House desires is that we should provide a better means of enforcing the law as it now stands, but not that we should not in any way disturb the present status of the marriage laws or widen the grounds on which divorce may be granted. The clause we are now dealing with has a very wide scope, and is capable of constructions that might cause a great deal of trouble. I do not profess to understand the full effect of this clause. If I had had time to read the Bill before the second reading I would have strongly urged the hon. member to send the Bill to a special committee, and if there is any way now of having that done, I would suggest that it be done. Very nice and highly technical questions are involved affecting the most sacred relations of the people, and I am afraid that the Committee of the Whole is not the best place in which to deal with this Bill.

Mr. NICKLE: I quite appreciate the difficulty of the situation and the nicety of the questions involved, but I doubt very much if I have in any way widened the scope of the law, or extended it in such a way as to make it any broader than the parliamentary practice that now prevails or the practices prevailing in the various courts. Let us analyse for a moment the different grounds on which marriage may be declared null and void. If a marriage is a contract it necessarily carries with it the idea that each of the parties to the contract must give consent,—you cannot have a contract without the parties to that contract being at some time at one. Let us take the sections as they appear. Paragraph (a) says that any marriage may be declared null and void:

> —at the suit of the injured party, or the incurable physical impotence of a party to a marriage which existed at the time of the marriage.

In my remarks to this House this afternoon I directed attention to the fact that during the present session two marriages have been declared void by Parliament, or are in the process of being so declared, on account of physical impotency. That has been the law in this Parliament and is the law in the various provinces.

Mr. McKENZIE: I take no exception to that. That has always been understood to be the law.

Mr. NICKLE: We come now to paragraph (b) which says that the marriage may be declared null and void.

—for duress, coercion or want of consent at the suit of the injured party, unless such party has by his consent confirmed the marriage.

As those in the House who are lawyers know, duress means obtaining consent, I suppose, by force. It simply means that a marriage may be declared null and void where there has been no re-consent, provided that the injured party, that is the party who has had the marriage forced on him or her, is desirous of having the marriage dissolved. It would be radically unfair that a marriage should be declared null and void where there was duress, provided the party forced into the marriage was not desirous of having it dissolved. For instance, in the case of a woman forced into marriage by friends or otherwise, in the event of her having become pregnant it would be radically unjust that the marriage at the suit of the husband should be declared void. She being injured, and having been forced to consent, it might be that she might not be willing to have the marriage terminated, and her father might demand that it be not terminated.

Mr. McKENZIE: The word "duress," so far as I know, does not appear in our Nova Scotia statutes. If a person was forced into marriage it might come under the head of cruelty. Cruelty is a ground for divorce in Nova Scotia, but I think the word "duress" is new.

Mr. MOWAT: I think that the idea here was to deal with the cases of very young persons. There is a statute in Ontario, passed five or six years ago, which provided that the courts should dissolve the marriage of two young persons who are under the age of eighteen, I think it is, provided the marriage has not been consummated, and several applications have been made under that Act. The point raised by my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) has been discussed in the courts, and one learned judge, Chief Justice Richard Meredith, has very definitely stated that he does not think the statute comes within the powers of the legislature. I think that this Bill would undoubtedly come within the power of this Parliament. These want of consent cases would be those of persons so young that they are not supposed to have arrived at the age where they can give consent, and the legislation before us would implement the existing legislation providing that a marriage should be dissolved which had been entered into foolishly and without consideration between two young persons.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that the object of this Bill is simply to give jurisdiction to the various provinces to try divorce cases, instead of those cases coming before the Senate. I think the object of my hon. friend from Kingston, from his point of view, is laudable. It is to avoid the publicity and cut down the expense. Why not enact that divorce cases shall be tried before the courts enumerated in the Bill without changing the grounds for divorce in any respect whatever? I do not know just what the grounds are; I have never closely studied divorce law because, as my hon. friend will understand, we do not touch these cases. But I would suggest that the grounds for divorce which exist to-day should still subsist, and we need simply transfer the jurisdiction from Parliament to the courts of the different provinces as enumerated in the first section. The whole thing could be done in one clause.

Mr. NICKLE: The impracticability of that suggestion will be seen when I draw attention to the fact that in the various provinces divorce may be obtained for different reasons. In Nova Scotia, for instance, I think cruelty is a ground for divorce being granted; in some other province it is desertion, sometimes for a longer and sometimes for a shorter period. But when you apply that principle to Ontario and Quebec it will not work because we have never had in either Ontario or Quebec any law in regard to divorces. It has always been a parliamentary discretion. Parliament is not limited in any way as to reasons for which a divorce may be granted. If Parliament were capricious and decided that two persons might be divorced in the event of both having red hair, if that Bill could be forced through Parliament, the divorce would be illegal, because parliamentary divorces are by way of private bills and they dissolve marriage simply in the case to which reference is made. I therefore had to incorporate in this Bill the general principles of the law as they are and have been recognized up to the present by parliamentary practice and procedure. There is, however, one exception to which I would like to direct the attention of the committee, and that is section (c) which states that marriage may be declared null and void:

—(e) at the suit of the husband, when the wife is pregnant at the time of the marriage by a man other than the husband, if the husband was ignorant of the pregnancy at the time of such marriage and has not, after the discovery by him of such pregnancy, by his conduct confirmed such marriage;

That struck me as being an eminently fair reason for which declaration of nullity might be obtained. In the event of a woman having been indiscreet and having reached a condition that demanded marriage to protect her name, if she inveigles some man into unknowingly marrying her and he subsequently discovers that she is pregnant to another man, he is entitled, if he so desires, to have the marriage declared null and void. Directing my attention for a moment again to the remarks of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) and referring to subsection (d) in which power is given to declare the marriage null and void for insanity at the time of the marriage of either of the parties, it still carries out the same principle to which I at first directed attention, that if there was no consent there could be no marriage, because marriage is a contract and if a person is insane he or she is unable to give valid consent. And taking subsection (f) which gives power to the courts to declare marriage null and void at the suit of the injured party, when the other party wilfully refuses to consummate the marriage, these are all a confirmation of principles repeatedly recognized in this Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to say now, in the presence of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) that I voted for the second reading of the Bill with the understanding that I was affording more complete machinery for enforcing the law as it now stands. If the hon. member for Kingston were able to present to the Committee the various grounds upon which the Senate of Canada had been granting divorces for the last fifty years or so I would feel no difficulty. I am quite willing that we should furnish machinery for the granting of divorces for any cause for which the Senate would grant them. But I am not familiar with any cases of the class last mentioned by the hon. member as having been before the Senate, and I do not think that they grant divorces in cases of that kind. If they do, I would be satisfied, but I am not in favour of widening the scope of grounds for divorce.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not been present during all the discussion. I am impressed with the view put forward by the hon. member for Kingston, that if we are to establish courts in those provinces which have none at the present time, and to provide a law in those provinces because no divorce law exists there, it would be an unfortunate course if we should so frame our law that one ground for divorce would be sufficient in one province and not in another. The principles in that respect would not be uniform. It is necessary not only to establish courts in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec but also to establish principles; and if you establish principles there, then you must have regard for the principles which have already been established in the provinces where jurisdiction in divorce exists. The course that has been taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Nickle) is, as I understand, to examine the grounds which prevail in Great Britain and in the various provinces, and the jurisdiction that has been exercised, and out of that to bring certain principles here, which certainly do not extend the grounds upon which divorce may be granted in some of those places. The section in that respect is rather restrictive than enabling, and I think that every one of the grounds here, except the one which the hon. member for Kingston has just now alluded to, is regarded as a proper ground either for pronouncing a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, or declaring a marriage null and void ab initio

Mr. McKENZIE: The Prime Minister will consider the case of insanity. This is a very insidious disease and exists sometimes for a long time before it can really be pronounced as actual insanity. I do not want to give any excuse to any man to get clear of the responsibilities of the marriage contract. If a man's wife happens to get out of her mind—or it may be the other way about—he will say: Although I did not discover it at the time, she was insane when I married her and the contract ought to be set aside. That, I think, would be giving rise to a very grave difficulty and something that is not known in our courts. I have never heard of any attempt being made to set aside marriage because some person has happened to develop insanity, and this principle is capable of creating a great deal of trouble.

Mr. CANNON: I hold in my hand the Civil Code of Quebec and would direct the attention of the hon. member for Kingston to titles of it, section 115 and the following sections. The hon. member for Kingston has read a schedule he has attached to his Bill, and I think that this schedule would be in contradiction of section 126 of the Civil Code of Quebec. If I understand the matter rightly the situation would be this: A man could apply to a court in accordance with our federal divorce law and obtain an annulment of his marriage, while, under our Civil law, his marriage would be valid. The consequence would be that although he was divorced from his wife nevertheless, according to our Civil law, she would still have the rights of a wife.

Mr. NICKLE: As I said before the hon. member (Mr. Cannon) came into the House, in my opinion marriage and divorce is set out in the British North America Act and jurisdiction is in this Parliament enabling the Dominion House to determine the status of parties and the relationship of each to the other permitting them to marry. If this Act passed, I think the kindred degrees regarded as entitling persons to legally enter matrimony would be those I read to the House as expressed in subsection (c) which I promised to make a schedule.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Subsection (d) is absolutely useless unless this Parliament is going to enforce a medical examination of both parties at the time of marriage. No man will take six months, twelve months or two years after the marriage has taken place to know if the party was sane or insane at the time of marriage.

Mr. NICKLE: I think the hon. member overlooks the position that the court would take. The Act says that the court may declare the marriage null and void for insanity at the time of the marriage of either of the parties thereto. It will be incumbent upon the person desiring a declaration of nullity to prove to the court that the other party was insane and the principle upon which the decision is generally given is that the onus of proof is on the party making complaint. If the condition is that six months after the marriage it would be impossible to say whether or not the person was insane at the time of marriage, the proof would fail and the marriage would be declared legal.

Mr. McKENZIE: The difficulty is that once a husband and wife enter the court for the purpose of dissolving their marriage it is an end to all happiness. The court may refuse a divorce but that does not re-establish happy relations in that family. If a man is encouraged to go into court thinking that he has an insane wife, that is the end of it. He may not succeed in proving that she is insane but it breaks up the family and destroys the confidence that should exist between a man and his wife. My view is that we should confine the reason for divorce to the grounds of immorality. I am not fond of making new contractual relations and that sort of thing. The reason why a marriage would be set aside on the ground of insanity would be the same as the setting aside of a deed or conveyance given by an insane person—because the party signing it was insane when he signed it. This question of insanity is entirely new to me. I cannot bring myself to agree to this provision.

Mr. STEELE: With regard to this clause making insanity a new cause for granting divorce, it seems to me that it goes too far or it does not go nearly far enough. If the clause is inserted here merely for the purpose of dissolving a contract made between two parties, one party to the contract being insane at the time, it may be justified. But I think there is a far wider reason for preventing the marriage of those who are insane or those who tend to become insane. That, to my mind, would be a good reason for inserting a clause such as this in a divorce Bill. I believe that one of the chief functions of marriage is the reproduction of the species. I believe also that many people who may not be pronounced insane to-day are on the road to becoming partially insane, and people on that road, to my mind, should not be allowed to marry; or, if they do marry, the marriage should be dissolved at the earliest possible time so as to prevent people in that mental condition reproducing their kind. I am glad this provision is here, for the reason that it is a recognition by Parliament of the fact that people who are insane, or who may possibly tend to become insane, should not enter into the marriage relation. Having recognized that fact, I think that Parliament, not in this Bill, but at some time, should go very much farther and prohibit the marriage of those who, if they reproduce their species, will produce children or offspring who will be mentally defective. Subclause (a) perhaps requires an explanation, or very careful consideration. It says that the marriage may be dissolved:

> At the suit of the injured party, for the incurable physical impotence of a party to a marriage which existed at the time of the marriage.

I am not aware if that term "physical impotence" has a well-defined legal meaning. If so, perhaps, no objection can be taken to it. But if it is to be taken in the medical sense it should be defined. I might also draw attention to the fact that bigamy is now given as one of the causes for the dissolution of marriage. I would like to ask the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) to explain how it will affect the present practice in regard to the granting of divorce?

Mr. NICKLE: The reason bigamy was put in as well as adultery is this: As I explained in the House this afternoon, it is often most difficult to prove that adultery has taken place. The fact that there is a bigamous marriage is more easily proven. If a man who is already married goes through a form of marriage with a second woman and commits bigamy, it is not unreasonable, but rather natural, to suppose that as a result of that bigamous marriage an adulterous relationship with the second wife will take place.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: This Bill is more important than some hon. members may realize. It has been introduced by a private member of the House when there is no time for the consideration of private members' business. No one expected that the Bill would be proceeded with this session, and that is a good reason why we have not studied it as it should have been studied before being discussed by the House. I respectfully suggest that the Committee should rise and report progress and that members should have an opportunity of studying the Bill before discussion be proceeded with. The question of provincial rights arises, which is most important. There have been many discussions in this House about the rights of the Dominion and the provinces concerning marriage matters. There is the question of civil rights which has been raised by my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). It is only fair that I should ask the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) to give us an opportunity of studying the Bill. It is a most important piece of legislation, and I ask that its consideration should be postponed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As far as postponement for a reasonable time is concerned, I think the hon. member (Mr. E. Lapointe) is quite within his rights in asking it. I do not like to undertake any engagement further than that. If that is the desire, I shall move that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

On motion of Hon. J. A. Calder (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) Bill No. 131 for the promotion of Technical Education in Canada was read a second time, and the House went into Committee thereon—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—definition:

Mr. BUREAU: Would the minister give an explanation of the words in paragraph (c): under which the various forms of technical education are to be——approved by agreement between the minister and the Government of any province as being necessary or desirable to aid in promoting industry and the mechanical trades.

Why is it necessary to have the approval of the minister and the Provincial Government interested? I think it would be better to define in this section what me mean by technical education. I understand the intention of the Bill is to promote technical education and I do not think that the definition as to what it is should be left to any agreement but should be made by law.

Mr. CALDER: "Technical education" as used to-day is a somewhat loose term. Sometimes it is used almost synonomously with "vocational education," and we also have the term "industrial education." The purpose of defining the term in this way is, as the paragraph states, to leave the character of the education to be carried on to an agreement between the provincial and the federal authorities. Personally, I am inclined to the view that the real purpose of the Bill will be served best by leaving that as a matter of agreement between the two Governments. Technical education as strictly applied usually refers to the class of work that is carried on in a technical institution, but it seems to me that we must give it a broader meaning. I know the Minister of Labour has in mind the advisability of arranging for a class of education that will be carried on outside of these technical institutions that are provided for in some of the provinces. Probably the term "industrial education" would be more applicable than "technical education." Allow me to give an example. In one of our cities certain industries are established in which there are a large number of employees. It may be advisable to provide means whereby certain classes of instruction can be carried on in those industrial establishments. The idea is to have the widest possible meaning in order that in the provinces concerned the Minister of Labour may reach an agreement as to the application of the term "technical education" as it is desired to be used in many particular instances.

Mr. BUREAU: The definition given in the paragraph seems to be wide enough. It seems to cover everything from teaching a man how to saw wood with a handsaw to imparting instruction in industrial chemistry. Why should the system of instruction proposed under this Bill be determined by special agreement? In our province we have a technical school at Three Rivers and one at Shawinigan Falls. At the latter place there are various industries. For instance, the Canadian Chemical Company manufactures chemicals, and they have a branch in which industrial chemistry is taught. Paper is also manufactured there, and instruction in paper-making is given. The manufacture of calcium carbide is also carried on. Each town or centre ought to be able to provide the means to help develop its particular industries. Now, suppose the minister makes an agreement with a province, and in the meantime a new industry should be established as to which some special institution for giving instruction might be needed; in that case, apparently, it would derive no advantage from the money which is to be voted under this Bill.

Mr. CALDER: The idea back of this legislation may be shortly put as follows: The Minister of Education of a province—or whatever provincial minister has the administration of the Act—will, in conjunction with the Minister of Labour, determine the manner in which these moneys are to be supplied for the purpose of technical education within the province. Now it seems to me that if you get down to a restriction of this definition it will only tend to defeat the object of the Bill. My own idea is that the more elastic the provision the safer it will be. The Agricultural Aid Act, as I understand it—I have nothing to do with the administration of the law—has worked out very well indeed. As the hon. gentleman can quite well understand, where we are providing advances for agricultural education and agricultural extension work, there is a great variety of undertakings to which that might be applied. But the provinces and the Federal Government have had practically no difficulty in coming to an agreement as to the manner in which those moneys should be expended, and I think there will be very little difficulty in this case, if the law is left as it is.

I think it will be distinctly advantageous to leave the law in such form that the provinces and the Dominion may come to an agreement as to the manner in which the moneys are to be expended. I have not the slightest doubt that the wishes of the province with regard to the application of these moneys will be very largely respected by the federal authorities.

Mr. BUREAU: I agree that we should not impose undue restrictions as to the application of the moneys, on the contrary, we should provide that all cases where expenditure of this kind may be desirable shall be covered, and it is just for that reason that I think these things should not be defined or determined in an agreement entered into between the Federal Government and the provincial authorities. Let us set out in the Act the full interpretation and signification of the words "technical education."

Mr. CALDER: The hon. gentleman's contention would be sound if an unlimited amount of money was to be applied to this purpose. But the amount is limited, and there must be some selection of the many forms of activity available for this purpose.

Mr. BUREAU: I want to leave it to the province to make the selection.

Mr. CALDER: The selection may, I think, very well be left to an agreement between the provincial and the federal authorities. That phase of the question was very fully discussed at the interprovincial conference. I was present during all the conferences, and not the slightest objection was made by the premiers of the provinces to this method of procedure. They referred to the manner in which the administration of the Act respecting aid to agriculture had worked out, and intimated that they saw no reason why the same procedure should not hold good in the case of grants in aid of technical education. I do not, therefore, anticipate any difficulty in that regard.

Mr. TRAHAN: I would suggest that agricultural education be included in this definition. The Government intends to encourage technical education, to develop our industries, and to promote the welfare of returned soldiers. I understand also that the Government have made arrangements with the various provinces under which returned soldiers will be induced to settle on the land. Agriculture is our basic industry. Broadly speaking, the two chief classes of the community are the workingmen and the farmers; why should the Government aid one class in the matter of education and not the other? Agriculture is a science, and in order that it may be carried on successfully it must be studied. In all countries large sums of money are spent for the development of agriculture and for agricultural education. I suggest that the minister add after the word " vocational " in the second line of paragraph (c) the word " agriculture ".

Mr. CALDER: The hon. gentleman has overlooked the fact that in 1913 an Act was passed in this House providing for grants for the very purpose which he mentions. Section 3 of that Act provided that for the purpose of aiding and advancing the farming industry by instruction in agriculture, and for the purposes authorized by the Act, a sum aggregating $10,000,000 should be distributed among the provinces in much the same way as is provided by this Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: The matter of technical education is one which comes within the purview of the various provinces. In view of the industrial development which has taken place, the provinces have been making efforts to promote special lines of education. Why should the Government not hand these sums to the provinces and let the provinces, without any string or agreements, continue the systems which they have developed? We must proceed on the assumption that the Provincial Governments are going to do their utmost, as they have done in the past, to promote technical education, and that they will use this money to the best advantage. There is a clause here which provides that in case of any disagreement the Minister of Labour shall be the sole and final judge. But there is a way of avoiding any disagreement. We are confident that the provinces will use this money for the purposes indicated in the Act; let us make the advances to them and let them use the money for these purposes according to their particular requirements.

If we are doing this to assist the provinces in promoting technical education, to go on and develop further what they have already commenced to do, let us make conditions that they shall use the money for this specific purpose, hand over the money and let them distribute it as they please. A certain control must be exercised, but it ought not to go further than to say: We give you this money for technical educational purposes, and we trust you are going to carry out the purposes for which we give it to you. We ought to trust the provinces enough to permit them to administer the money without any specific agreement, without any surmise that they will not use it according to the intention, or even suspecting that a disagreement may arise requiring a court to decide it. I do not anticipate any disagreement, because I know there is enough laudable rivalry between the provinces as regards education that we may trust them to use the money to the best possible advantage.

Mr. CALDER: I can only repeat what I have already said, namely, that that phase of the question was very fully discussed at the conference. I was present at the conference, took part in the discussion, heard everything that was said, and I am quite within the mark when I state that at the conference not the slightest objection was raised along the line mentioned by the hon. member. The conference agreed that if grants of this kind were given, the Federal Government should retain the right to enter into agreements for the expenditure of that money just as they had done under the Agricultural Aid Act, and it was further stated freely by the provincial representatives that in the working out of that law no difficulty had been met at all, that everything was running along harmoniously, and that they expected the same would occur in the administration of this legislation. As a matter of fact, the question of arranging for some sort of inspection to see that this money was expended for the purposes mentioned in this Bill, was discussed, and the provinces agreed if the Federal Government thought that necessary, to allow federal inspectors to go into their institutions in order to see that the money was expended properly. I thoroughly agree in one sense with the viewpoint of the hon. member (Mr. Bureau), but we shall not reach that stage until we make direct subsidies to the provinces to a greater extent than they are now receiving in order that they may carry on their affairs as they see fit. Just so long as we must make special provision by federal acts, by special grants to the provinces, the expenditures of those moneys must be a matter of arrangement. Personally I would be only too glad if the time had arrived when an arrangement could be entered into whereby the provinces would receive a larger sum in order that they might carry on their domestic affairs as they see fit; but we have not reached that stage yet, and it may be some time before it is reached.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I quite agree with the minister that the best system would be for the Dominion to advance the money to the provinces and to allow the provinces to use it in their best judgment for technical education or any other matter in the provinces. I pressed that view on the minister at the time when he introduced the resolution, advocating that he amend his Bill so as to adopt that principle. There are many cases in which the Federal Government is trying to tie up the Provincial Governments in regard to provincial expenditures. This is not the only one; I know other similar efforts are being made to control the policy of the provinces as regards questions of this kind. That is not a good policy. My hon. friend says that the time has not yet arrived. The time seems never to arrive with my hon. friend; it is always to-morrow that things are to be done. There cannot be a better time than the present to do this, because we are now embarking upon the course of assisting technical education. It will not be denied by my hon. friend that in every province a great deal of interest is being taken in this question, and splendid work is being done in certain provinces now in the prosecution of technical education. Surely, if this be the case, we can very well trust the provinces in the expenditure of the money. In the United States there is a similar system by which, I understand, money derived from public lands of the western States is used for purposes of technical education in various States. The State has to comply with certain regulations, to furnish certain equipment, before it can partake of the grant; but a condition of that kind would be reasonable for my hon. friend to impose. The Act in the United States is called the Morell Act. This system has been in existence in the United States for a good many years, and I understand the Federal Government there does not exercise the same control as my hon. friend purposes exercising over the provinces I see no good reason why this should be done, and I think the point is well taken, and I should like if my hon. friend would give it his consideration now and this money be given to the provinces without any string to it, without the Federal Government's exercising any control over the manner in which it is to be expended, except that it shall be expended for technical education and that the province shall do its share in providing certain funds. That would be a reasonable proposition; but when my hon. friend undertakes to lay down the kind of technical education a province shall teach, he is going a little too far. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) has pointed out that the interests of the several provinces differ very much, and it is by the province itself that that question can best be decided and not by the Federal Government.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I am glad this point has been raised as I intended to raise it myself. I view with a certain degree of apprehension these pieces of legislation which relate to matters coming under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. CALDER: I think the hon. member will consider that this question is not entirely within provincial jurisdiction. If he followed the discussion which took place in this House two or three years ago on the motion of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), he will know that the general consensus of opinion was that the Federal Government had concurrent jurisdiction in this particular field of technical education, and I should like him to bear that in mind in his remarks.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The kind of education to be given and the manner of giving it are purely provincial matters. The Government could certainly help the various provinces by way of subsidies, but as the hon. members for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) have stated, no string should be attached to the grant given by the Federal Government. Formerly in this country many big battles were waged on this principle. The Government have tried to get around the difficulty in this way:

Instead of taking away the rights of the provinces outright, they seem in some way to buy those rights by giving money to the provinces under certain conditions, which conditions, after all, involve the surrendering by the provinces of some of their rights and privileges. At the time of Confederation the provinces relinquished some of their rights to the Federal Parliament, and retained other rights. Now it is not fair for this Parliament to interfere in matters reserved exclusively for provincial jurisdiction, even by way of giving subsidy under certain conditions. My hon. friend says, and the Bill states, that there should be agreements between the minister and the different provinces before the grant is made. Now, if one of the provinces fails to reach an agreement with the minister, that province will not get anything, but the citizens of that province will be taxed to pay for education in another province which should be paid for altogether by the citizens of that second province. That is not fair. If it can be done with regard to technical education it may be done with regard to anything else.

Take the question of national schools which was raised here the other day. I did not happen to be present when the matter was under discussion, but I think most hon. members will agree that that is a matter which does not come within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The question of education is a very delicate question in this country. Suppose this Government does in the matter of national schools what it proposes to do in the matter of technical schools, and grants subsidies to the provinces provided those moneys, shall be spent on the establishment of national schools, would that be fair? Some of the provinces would refuse to accept the money. Would it be fair for this Parliament to ask the citizens of those provinces to pay for education in other provinces, when education is a matter of exclusive provincial concern?

I think the Government should consider very seriously before taking away to such an extent the rights of the provinces, especially at a time when we are not blessed with so much money that we do not know where to spend it. At the present time there is a gap to be filled between our expenditure and our revenue, and we do not know where to get the money, and I submit that now is not the time to give away millions and millions of dollars either for highways or technical education or anything else which is a matter of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. If the country was in a state of great prosperity we could afford to be generous, but in view of the financial condition I think we should wait a little before giving away this money especially in connection with a matter which is not under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. TURGEON: When the Minister of Immigration brought down the resolution upon which this Bill is based, he will remember, I called his attention to the fact that it might interfere with provincial autonomy. I suggested at the time that instead of the Federal Government launching upon a programme of housing, highways, and technical education, it would be wiser and more advantageous to the country at large simply to grant a subsidy and leave these matters to be worked out by the provinces. The provinces would be only too glad to encourage technical education. They have not been able to do much in the matter up to the present moment, especially the smaller provinces, because of lack of funds. In New Brunswick, for instance, it is entirely due to lack of funds that in the matter of education we have not progressed like the provinces of Nova Scotia, Quebec and Ontario, which have much larger revenues. At the same time, during the last ten years, the expenditure of the province of New Brunswick on education is double and treble the amount we spent in former years. Ever since the admirable report of Dr. Robertson on technical education, six or seven years ago, we have been awaiting with anxiety the decision of the Government, to apportion that amount of $10,000,000 according to the very letter of his recommendations. That report did not say that there should be an agreement between the Federal Government and the provinces regarding the manner in which the money was to be spent. I was under the impression, from the minister's reply when the resolution was under discussion, that there would be no such provision as we find provided for an agreement between the Federal and Provincial Governments, but that the money would be given to the provinces to be spent as in their judgment seemed best to meet the local needs. I trust the minister will consider the objections made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have preceded me, and that every safeguard will be provided against any interference on the part of the Federal Government. The minister might say that provincial autonomy is well safeguarded in this Bill, but I trust that after he has heard our arguments he will accept the proposed amendment of my hon. friend from Kamouraska.

Mr. CANNON: The province of Quebec would never have entered into Confederation unless guarantees had been given that education would be absolutely and exclusively within the competency of the Provincial Government. This is a Bill purporting to encourage technical education. Now, education, as the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) has said, is a matter of the greatest importance. The greatest and the most unfortunate conflicts we have had in Canada have arisen out of educational matters. It is needless for me to remind the House of the unfortunate conflicts which arose, for instance, in the province of New Brunswick at the beginning of the Confederation era, or of what happened in Manitoba, and in more recent years, in the province of Ontario. These conflicts on educational matters have retarded the union of the different races in Canada, and the less we have of them the better for all concerned.

This Bill, although it does not appear to be so, is in reality a very serious encroachment on provincial rights. The Bill provides that should there be any conflict between the Federal Government and the Provincial Government the matter would be decided by the minister. The minister would therefore have the right to impose his views on a province in connection with an altogether provincial matter. Further, the Federal Government will have the right to appoint all officials in connection with the operation of this law, with the result that the minister may appoint a man to go into Ontario, Manitoba or British Columbia and in connection with their technical schools impose his decisions on the Provincial Government. That principle is a very unsound one and violates in a flagrant manner the agreement entered into by all the provinces in 1867, when it was agreed among the provinces that formed at that time the Canadian federation, that matters educational would be left altogether within the purview of the provinces without any interference from the Federal Government. If the Federal Government wishes, and has the means, to be generous, let it enable the provincial authorities to promote technical education. But as hon. members have already said, let these grants of money be without any string whatever. We do not wish to have educational conflicts in Canada, and if this Bill is passed as it is now, we shall have a direct intervention of the Federal Government in educational matters, which are a most delicate point in this country as the Committee knows. I do not think that a Bill such as this would promote the welfare of our country, but to the contrary. If the Federal Government wishes to make grants to the provinces, let it give the money to the Provincial Governments and leave it to them to decide what to do with it. If these loans or grants are to be merely a pretext for the Federal Government to take hold of educational matters in the provinces, so far as I am concerned I would rather not have a cent, and retain the liberty and freedom that we enjoy in our province in regard to education.

Mr. FIELDING: From my viewpoint as well as from that of the hon. member, it would be more satisfactory if the provinces were placed in possession of sufficient funds, through increased subsidies, to handle these enterprises themselves. because in a large degree they are provincial. Still, however, as a choice between letting technical education go by the board and receiving aid for such purposes under this Bill, I prefer to have the grants. I am not prepared to take so strong a view as to say that we should not have them at all. If we could define technical education in such clear and distinct terms as would be beyond the possibility of debate, perhaps that would be a help. But in the absence of such a definition, which, I fancy, would be difficult, I see some reasons in favour of the agreement which, I think, ought to commend themselves to my hon. friend from Three Rivers and those who agree with him. If there is to be no clear, distinct and indisputable definition of what constitutes technical education, then it is most desirable that there should be an agreement with each province to guard against any dispute. The machinery is to be largely provincial, and more than that, the province can only avail itself of a grant on the condition that it shall put up a large amount of money. It is therefore of vital importance that the province and the Dominion shall come to an understanding at the beginning. If there is no general definition of technical education, and I admit the difficulty, there are advantages in having an agreement with each province at the beginning, because you could then adapt your agreement—although uniformity is desirable if possible—to the different forms of technical education which the provinces already have. Without such an agreement you may find yourself getting into trouble with the Provincial Governments. It seems to me that from that viewpoint there is much to be said in favour of having such an agreement. The hon. minister will recall that in the resolution stage of this matter, anticipating the possibility of some difference between the Dominion and the province, I suggested that perhaps by the time the Bill came before the House he might have some draft of what he proposed to ask the province to sign. I do not anticipate for a moment that any effort will be made to crowd out any particular province. Least of all do I fear, as my hon. friends from Quebec do, that any interference will be made with the recognized principle that the local governments control education. As regards technical education, it is worth remembering that this grant, although it is late in coming, is the outcome of a policy which the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier took up some years ago, when we appointed a technical education commission which made a tour of the world and gathered information, upon which they made a most valuable report. It is sometimes made a matter of complaint against the governments of a later day that they pigeon-holed that report and did nothing. Well, the Government is doing something now, and I would rather have them do it in this way than do nothing at all. When the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier appointed that commission, headed by Professor Robertson and including a number of able men, we certainly created the impression that in some degree the matter was a Dominion one, and I look upon this movement as a belated endeavour on the part of the Government to carry out the intentions which the Liberal Government had in mind when they appointed that commission. There is, however, force in the criticism that the minister has too much individual power in this matter, and provision should be made that any report he makes under this Act should, at all events, be subject to approval by the Governor in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not wish to be understood as objecting to a federal grant to the provinces for technical education. My objection is to the procedure and the mode in which the grant is to be made. It was never intended by the previous Administration that the grants to be made for technical education should be subject to certain terms or conditions or any specific agreement, or should be determined by special considerations to be laid down by the Federal Government.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think they got as far as that.

Mr. BUREAU: No, but there was talk of it, and I for one certainly would not entertain for a moment the suggestion that any agreement should be made necessary that would in any way restrict the policies which have been established by the various provinces. There is a good deal in what the member for Kamouraska says. It is possible that some provinces may not take advantage of the scheme, owing perhaps to some condition imposed, and if no agreement could be reached between a province and the Federal Government it would be most unfair that that particular province should be called upon to pay any part of the subsidy that might be paid to other provinces. If the Federal authorities are in earnest about this matter and are really anxious to develop technical education, they should trust the provinces and rely upon their seeing that the money advanced shall be used to the best possible advantage. Why give rise to any suspicion as certain legislation has heretofore done? As my hon. friend from Kamouraska says, this matter may be regarded as a bait for the provinces to enter into agreements to receive money for technical education purposes. He pointed out that if this principle extended to some other system of education and some province should refuse to enter into any agreement with the Federal Government, it would be unfair to tax that province. I do not believe that the minister need have any fear about the misuse of the money which may be granted to the provinces for technical education purposes.

The minister can put it in another way; he can say that no amount greater than the amount expended by the province shall be granted. Let the province be allowed to expend the money. If the minister is entirely satisfied that the money has been expended for the purpose for which it was intended, let the grant be paid. There can be no misunderstanding or dispute. Technical education may be different in different provinces, and it may cover various branches of industry and manufacture. Let the Federal Government determine that the amount to be granted shall be granted upon the basis of the population and the expenditure made by the province, and let the money be paid over without requiring them to enter into any agreement defining what form of technical education shall take in a certain province, and without having to pass a law with so many clauses as this. As far as the other danger which was pointed out by my hon. friend from Dorchester and my hon. friend from Kamouraska is concerned, I think, to use the expression that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House used in 1911, it is the entering of the thin edge of the wedge, and it is an encrochment by the federal authorities on provincial rights in so far as education is concerned. I have enough confidence in any province to say: Here is the money for technical education; take it and use it for that purpose. If it is not used for that purpose the fact will be easily ascertained, and under those circumstances cut off the grant next year and let the province be deprived of the money that they would have otherwise have got for that special purpose. I do not see that any good reason has been given by the minister for this restriction and agreement. He says that at the conference of the premiers the matter was discussed and that they were all agreed. They could not do otherwise. We have a French saying, "A cheval donné on ne regarde pas a la bride." I do not know how it could be translated, but the meaning is that when some one makes you a present of a horse you do not examine the harness in detail.

Mr. FIELDING: You do not look a gift horse in the mouth.

Mr. BUREAU: You do not look a gift horse in the mouth, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) says, but in this case you do not have to, because it would cost you too much. We do not have to adopt the conclusion that members may draw, but we have to take into consideration the impression that this measure will create upon the minds of the outside public and the fears that may be created. We do not know what will happen. Things change so fast these days that we must be prepared for almost anything happening, and we must try to prevent anything happening that may give rise to the idea that something is being done which will curtail the rights of the provinces. It would be very easy for the minister to say: This Government will give so much money; this money shall be proportioned according to the population; it shall be payable in so many years, and the province which desires to have the benefit of the money shall spend so much for technical education purposes. I think that would cover the ground and it would do away with any idea that this is the beginning of an encroachment upon provincial rights. Of course, it was hard for the provincial ministers to discuss the question of provincial rights at the time of the conference. They did not know what the provisions of the Bill were to be. The details were not enumerated. These men were prepared to say that they would use the money for the purposes of technical education, but they wanted the Government to take their word for it. The Federal Government says that it has the jurisdiction and that it ought to be the final judge as to the proper use to be made of this money, but it ought to have enough confidence in the other people to take it for granted that the money will be used for the purpose for which it is appropriated and for that purpose alone. Rivalry in education is noble and laudable. There has been sufficient industrial development, and there have been enough sacrifices made by the provinces to establish industrial schools and provide technical education, that the Government should not be afraid, or feel the least suspicion, that this money will be diverted from the purpose for which it is granted. This grant ought to be made nobly and grandly and you should say to the provinces: "Here is the money; use it to promote technical education." I think that should be sufficient.

Mr. MANION. I thoroughly agree with the granting of aid by this Parliament for educational purposes, particularly technical education, but at the same time I feel that there is a good deal to be said for the arguments of the last speakers, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). With many of the points made by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) I entirely agree, but I do not agree with one argument he put up and that was that at this time when money is so much needed in this country we should perhaps consider not making this grant for educational purposes. Education is perhaps the most important question to be considered next to that of the health of our people, and I do not think that because of this war we should permit ourselves to be stampeded into withholding money that is so much needed for technical education. The point I would like to make regarding the importance of education is that if you look over the commercial history of the world for the fifteen or twenty years previous to the war you will find that the United States and Germany were rapidly gaining upon England commercially and the reason was that Germany and the United States stood very high with regard to their systems and types of technical education. The United States spent vast amounts of money on their educational system, including technical education, and I took the opportunity the other day of putting down some figures from a pamphlet that I read that I thought would be interesting to this House in regard to the amount of money spent by the United States on education, including technical education. The sums are stupendous as will be shown by the following statement:

U.S. total expenditure on education—
1871—$69,000,000; 1915—$605,000,000.
U.S. gifts to education by rich men—
1874—$6,000,000 1914—$31,000,000.
Rockefeller gave up to 1913—$118,000,000.
Carnegie gave up to 1913—$150,000,000.
Properties of universities, colleges and technological schools, in 1914—$802,000,000.

I mention the contributions of Messrs. Rockefeller and Carnegie because they might possibly give a certain amount of inspiration to some of the gentlemen in our country who have made vast amounts of money out of the war. With regard to the points mentioned by the hon. member for Three Rivers, the hon. member for Kamour-aska and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's I believe many of them are well taken. There is no question which has been thought of so jealously by the provinces as that of education. I do not believe there is any real basis for the fear in some of the provinces that this may be the entering of the thin end of the wedge of interference with the present system of education in those provinces, but I think we have enough causes for misunderstanding in this country—and I believe they are misunderstandings and ont intentional injuries to any province—to make us careful and avoid the possibility of giving cause for any fresh misunderstanding at the present time. For example, I notice that one paragraph in the Bill says:

> The minister shall be the sole judge of all questions and differences that may arise under this Act or under any agreement made in pursuance of this Act.

In another paragraph it is provided that if the minister is not satisfied that the money was to be used to his satisfaction by a certain province he may refuse to grant it. My own personal opinion is that that is too much power to put in the hands of any minister. I do not for one moment believe that any of the present Federal ministers would think of using that power wrongly; but in my opinion, too great a power should not be placed in the hands of any one minister. I think if the Government decides upon such a paragraph as that remaining in the Bill the suggestion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) that the power be vested in the Governor in Council rather than in a single member of the Cabinet would be a far better provision. At the same time I believe that the point made by another hon. gentleman is a good one, to this effect—that the money should be given to the province with the distinct understanding that it be spent on technical education. If it is not so spent the grant should be withheld the following year. I believe the Government would be well advised in any question of this kind to avoid in the case of any particular section of Canada any cause for misunderstanding. I wish to say positively that I believe that if any unpleasantness arose it would be due only to a misunderstanding, because I do not mean to insinuate for a moment that any member of the Government would wrongly use the power granted under this legislation. I repeat, however, that we should not give too much power to any minister and the substitution of Governor in Council in the questionable clause might be better.

Mr. McISAAC: If I apprehend the matter correctly the same principle is involved in this legislation as was embodied in the law by which special grants are made by the Dominion Government for the purpose of promoting agriculture in the several provinces, and also in the Bill still before the House providing for Dominion assistance towards the construction of highways. Under the present Bill the provinces will contribute money equally with the Dominion, and that before any agreement can be entered into between the Federal and provincial authorities. It may be said, why not give this money as additional subsidy to the provinces and not have any limitations such as are here provided. As I understand the proposition it is experimental in this way: The grant is limited to a period of ten years in the first place, doubtless with the idea of seeing how the matter will work out. At the end of that time it may be possible to provide new conditions and new arrangements, but in the meantime it does seem reasonable that while the federal and provincial authorities are equally to make grants there should be an agreement entered into as to what the nature of technical education should be. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bureau) does not seem to entertain any distrust of the Provincial Governments; he is fully convinced they will carry out their part of the agreement, he is willing to trust them through thick and thin. Why should he not have equal confidence in the Federal Government or in the federal minister who may be empowered to enter into this arrangement? His confidence seems to be a little one-sided. The spirit of generosity and confidence which he expresses ought to be extended to the Dominion Government as well. Of course, if a Provincial Government is unwilling to enter into an agreement with the Federal Government, I suppose there is no obligation on their part to accept the money; they can appropriate money from their own revenues for the purpose if they choose. In any case the arrangement is only tentative, as I understand, and would apply only to a period of ten years in order that it shall be seen how the arrangement will work out. That is the way the situation presents itself to me. To my mind, the proposed legislation does not offer any insuperable difficulty. As to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) that the Governor in Council might be a court of appeal, so to speak, in case any dispute should arise between the federal authorities and a Provincial Government, that might be well, but the proposition in its present form does not seem to me to afford any reason for objecting to an agreement with any Provincial Government, or any one really desirous that the experiment of introducing and advancing technical education in his province should be tried.

Mr. WHIDDEN: I am sure we are all very glad that the Federal Government is making some provision for aiding technical education in the provinces, although I suppose there will be differences of opinion as to ways and means. I think that if we study the Bill on its face and do not attempt to read into it what is not to be found there, there is practically very little to cause any alarm. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has pointed out, this is really the second step on the part of this House to carry out in part the recommendations of the Robertson Commission. I am not familiar with the Act which has made possible certain work along the lines of agriculture, but so far as I can learn the money granted to the provinces desirous of using it, on the advice of the Commissioner of Agriculture, has so far been wisely expended and received and used by the provinces in such a way as to commend their action to the Department of Agriculture here. My impression is that the Minister of Agriculture from year to year has had a good deal to say, in consultation with his Commissioner, in connection with the expenditure of that money, amounting to nearly a million dollars a year. I do not see why there should be any objection to conditions being insisted upon such as are provided in this legislation—in fact, this Parliament should not vote large sums of money to the provinces for this, or any similar purpose, without the imposition of some conditions, and especially where the provincial governments have a great deal to say in making the necessary agreements and adjustments so far as details are concerned. I think we know that the representatives mainly called upon to act in the several provinces will be the Minister of Agriculture and the Premier. These two men in most of the provinces would have the most to say. I think one of the things we must bear in mind in making a grant for technical education to a province is whether the money shall be spent on capital account, for example, or in connection with current expenditure. As one who comes from a western province where our equipment and our buildings as well are still in the pioneer stage, I do not think for one moment that we in this House could vote for a blanket grant to the province of Manitoba for technical education with the understanding that the Provincial Minister of Education could decide perhaps, that, during the first year all of that money was to be spent for buildings and equipment in the city of Brandon.

I think it would be a misuse of funds, Mr. Chairman. Therefore, I favour the laying down of fair and reasonable conditions under which these moneys shall be advanced. If any wise multi-millionaire should at any time—I hope it may be in the near future—establish an educational fund and make possible the expenditure of a million dollars a year on some particular kind of technical education, that fund could best be administered by a group of trustees, and any province or municipality accepting moneys out of that fund would undoubtedly have to agree to certain conditions; otherwise the trustees could not provide for the distribution of the moneys. I realize that the analogy is not perfect; that, as the member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) has said, one of the provinces may be unwilling to accept the conditions, and, having in a sense contributed a part of the $10,000,000 to the Dominion Treasury, would not get back its share of it for the purposes of technical education. But I believe there would be very little danger of that; I do not think we need be afraid of the result of laying down reasonable conditions. We ought to trust each other a little; the federal authorities should repose some confidence in provincial departments, and vice versa.

One word with regard to a remark made by my hon. friend (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) in connection with the experience of the United States government in this matter. Leading authorities in technical education in the United States have felt for some years that the Federal Government made grave mistakes shortly after the conclusion of the civil war, during the early part of their reconstruction period, by making blanket grants for agriculture. They had no way of conserving the investments that they made and it is felt by those who have studied these investments that they were very largely wasted. With regard to the more recent grants in aid of technical education made by the United States government there is a feeling that there must be a measure of fair control; there must be a few simple conditions if the investments made are to be conserved in the interest of the nation as a whole. I support the Bill as it stands.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he would not trust the Government of Manitoba with the expenditure of money for buildings in Brandon unless control was exercised over the expenditure by the federal authorities?

Mr. WHIDDEN: No, I do not say that. I said that I would not want to see money granted to Manitoba spent in any one year on buildings and equipment in the city of Brandon.

Mr. BUREAU: Probably they would not do it.

Mr. WHIDDEN: But they might, if you granted it without laying down any conditions.

Mr. BUREAU: If we are to proceed on supposition and hypotheses, then I say that the Federal Government might do worse.

Mr. BURRELL: I had the privilege of introducing into this House the Agricultural Instruction Act, and had something to do with its subsequent operation. Although it is not precisely the same as this—

Mr. BUREAU: There is all the difference in the world. You have a Department of Agriculture here, and there is concurrent jurisdiction.

Mr. BURRELL: I would not say that there is all the difference in the world, though I admit that the two Acts are not exactly on the same footing. But there is a sufficient analogy to enable a good many of the same arguments to apply to both cases. It is one of the first principles that when Parliament votes money it must exercise a certain amount of control in connection with the expenditure of that money. In fact, it was strongly urged, not only from our side of the House but also by hon. gentlemen opposite when the Agricultural Instruction Act was introduced, that there was not sufficient federal control over the expenditure of the money which was being advanced. I did not take that view, because it seemed to me that the scheme as it worked out in the Act would develop on lines that would be thoroughly satisfactory to the federal and to the provincial authorities. Under that Act a certain sum was granted, which this year amounts to $1,100,000, for distribution among the various provinces. The conditions under which the expenditures were to be made were laid down broadly in the Bill itself, and agreements were entered into between myself as Minister of Agriculture and the Ministers of Agriculture of the different provinces in which, after a general discussion of the whole subject had been had, the class of work which would rightly come under the provisions of the Act was laid down. Occasionally there would be disputes on the question whether such-and-such a line of activity did come within the scope of the Bill, but these differences were finally adjusted amicably, and I am quite sure that the fact that the discussions were held served a good purpose and led to unity of action. It was much better to do this than simply to hand over a sum of money to the provinces which they might expend as they saw fit, and then find out afterwards whether or not the money was properly spent. The member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) suggested that this money be handed over to the provinces to be spent by them on technical education as they might themselves determine, and if there were any disputes afterwards we might withhold the money at another time. His contention was that we should trust the provinces. But I am absolutely sure that in any agreement that is made the air will be cleared and satisfactory arrangements will be come to. As a matter of fact, in connection with the Agricultural Instruction Act, once we got the thing working on lines that were mutually agreeable, the programme for this educational work was really laid down by the provinces themselves; the federal minister simply made suggestions as to whether the expenditure of moneys on a particular line of activity was in accordance with the terms of the Act or not, and so on. That procedure led to greater continuity, and there was no difficulty at all. Nor do I apprehend any difficulty in connection with this Act. The minister representing the province concerned will, I have no doubt, outline the conditions in that province, state what work they are doing and what schemes they are carrying out, and I am sure that any agreement arrived at will meet the views of both Governments and still preserve a rightful measure of control or supervision by this Parliament over the expenditure. I would expect such a procedure to simplify the situation rather than complicate it, as my hon. friend suggests. As to handing the money over to the provinces with the idea that they might spend it as they wish, we must remember that provincial governments change from time to time and that ministers change; you may have great discretion in one case and great indiscretion in another. I think it will lead to far less confusion, to greater unity of purpose, and to continuity of effort if the provinces and the Federal Government agree from year to year upon what form the expenditure shall take. I feel sure that there will be no trouble at all in that connection.

Mr. CALDER: The point at issue is quite clear, that is, whether or not the Federal Government should retain any measure of supervision over these expenditures, or whether some money should be given directly to the provinces to be expended by them as they see fit for purposes of technical education. I do not see that I can add anything to the argument, as the whole case has been placed before the committee. The Government, after considering the whole proposition have come to the conclusion that the wisest thing to do, under all the circumstances, is to carry out the idea as embodied in the Bill, and very largely for the reasons explained by the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell) and for those given by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden). In the United States the federal system is very much as it is here. Education is a State right. The Federal Government does not interfere with education in the various States. Nevertheless, during the past ten or fifteen years it has made many provisions of a similar character for aiding in agricultural, vocational and technical education, and in every one of those instances under the various laws, the United States Federal Government has retained a measure of control and supervision. Under their last law, passed in 1917 called, I think, the Smith-Hughes law, provision is made for very liberal machinery for the purpose of co-operating with the States, and, I think, for a very definite, specific and useful purpose, the purpose mentioned by the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell). That is, if we can succeed in getting all the provinces in Canada to endeavour to work as far as possible along well-defined modern lines to secure the one result for the whole of Canada, instead of each province working as a separate unit, in the end we shall secure better results. As a result of the many conferences that were held between the representative of the Department of Agriculture, Mr. James, who is looked upon as one of the best agriculturists in Canada, and the heads and chief officials of the Provincial Departments of Agriculture for the purpose of considering what was best to be done in the interest of agricultural education in each province, I have no hesitation in saying that the $1,100,000 that has been expended up to date is being far more wisely expended than if the matter had been left entirely to the discretion of the Provincial Governments. Last fall we had the largest interprovincial conference ever held in Canada, comprising all the premiers and from three to five ministers from some of the provinces, and we had a very interesting and important conference. This matter was very fully discussed, and I do not think the representatives who were present hesitated to speak their minds. They spoke their minds on other subjects very freely, and during the whole discussion, if I remember aright—and I think I do—not the slightest objection was raised by any representative at that conference to the conditions underlying the aid given under the Agricultural Aid Act.

Mr. BUREAU: That is different.

Mr. CALDER: That is quite true, but when we were discussing the question of providing a system of grants for technical education, time and again reference was made to the manner in which the matter had been worked out as regards the Agricultural Aid Act, and there was not the slightest indication upon the part of any representative at that gathering that any difficulty at all was anticipated. The Secretary of State has put his finger on a principle we cannot overlook. Where the Federal Government is making a grant for a specific purpose, we have a right to retain a measure of control in order to see that that money is expended for that purpose. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's referred to this agreement being made by the Minister of Labour. He will find, however, that under clause 6 every such agreement must be submitted to Council and approved by the Governor in Council.

Mr. FIELDING: There is a later clause which says that in the event of a dispute the minister shall be the sole judge. It was to that clause I referred.

Mr. CALDER: Yes. Individual agreements with the provinces must all be approved by the Governor in Council. As regards the Minister of Labour being the sole judge in case any dispute arises under an agreement, I am quite prepared to meet the wishes of the Committee. I can see where there may be an objection to that provision, and we are quite willing to frame the clause so as to meet the objection which has been brought to our attention.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister seems to want to get out of this by referring to agriculture, and the Secretary of State seems to put the two classes on a similar basis. There is all the difference in the world between the two classes. In the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa, the work is, I understand, mainly along experimental lines, and it has all the equipment necessary to assist the provinces and to work in co-operation with them. But in this case the Government, in making a grant, wants to have a string on the end of its generosity so that the grant may be pulled back at pleasure, and this in a matter in which the Federal Government has no jurisdiction and which is entirely and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces; and I may say that this is liable to cause suspicion to the outside world. The two cases are not on a par at all. If the Government wants to make a grant—this is not experimental work, we want to educate our children in certain trades and sciences—it is very easy for the minister to say: These are the conditions we are to impose upon those who want to benefit by the grant; you shall use the money for building technical schools or for salaries for technical instructors; those who want to benefit will come and take it; everybody is on the same footing; Parliament will support that, and Parliament will discuss and determine the conditions under which it is willing to vote the money and to give it to the provinces for such special purposes.

The Secretary of State says that Provincial Governments may change, and that a different Minister of Education in a province may not be up to the standard of his predecessor, or he may be unwilling. That argument works both ways. This Government may change, and if you are going to distrust the provinces there is no reason why you should not distrust this Government. If you are going to make a grant, do not ask the provinces to come on their knees and sign all sorts of agreement. Let Parliament that votes the money determine on what conditions the money shall be given to the provinces. Let the whole world know what the conditions are. Let the statutes define what shall constitute technical education, and let Parliament declare under what conditions the grant shall be given, and under what conditions it shall be refused. There is no danger, however, of any province refusing the money; at least, I hope not. Now I do not want my words to be distorted; I do not want to be understood as being opposed to this grant. It is not the grant we are considering, but simply a question of ways and means. I say that if we are to vote the money we should determine the conditions under which it shall be given, and let everybody know the conditions. There is another clause in this Bill—I may not be in order in referring to it now, but we have to take the Bill as a whole—which says that the grant shall not be used for extinguishing any indebtedness or liability incurred before the 1st of July of this year. I think that is hardly fair. A province, for instance, which has taken the lead in educational matters may have bought sites and put up buildings. Is that province to be penalized because it has gone ahead of the others?

Mr. COWAN: Let it keep ahead.

Mr. BUREAU: Why should it not be allowed to use the grant for extinguishing the indebtedness incurred in buying the site and erecting the building? Why should it be penalized for what it has done? A province that makes a contract for the erection of a building or the purchase of a site on 2nd July can use the grant for extinguishing that indebtedness, whereas the province that made its contract on 29th June cannot do so; yet each province may have expended the same amount of money. I think that provision should not be in the Bill. That is why I say, let us determine here in this Parliament the conditions under which the provinces shall be entitled to receive the money, and then let the Government decide before making the grant whether the provinces come within the four corners of the law. If they do, let them get the grant and dispose of it for technical educational purposes as in their judgment seems best.

Mr. TURGEON: The Secretary of State, an ex-Minister of Agriculture, (Mr. Burrell) has told us of what took place in the matter of agricultural education as between the Federal Government and the provinces. Now we cannot compare agricultural education with other educational work. There is a special clause in the British North America Act providing for co-operation between the Department of Agriculture in the Federal Government and the provinces in matters of agriculture, but another clause makes it imperative that education shall be left solely to the provinces, and without that clause Confederation would not have been accomplished. It is one of the most vital clauses in the British North America Act, and the one perhaps most conducive to the happiness of the people. My hon. friend when Minister of Agriculture was perfectly within his rights in trying to bring about co-operation between the provinces and the Federal Government in matters pertaining to the development of agriculture, but I claim that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization is not in the same position, and therefore we must safeguard provincial rights which are here endangered. I want the money to be given to the provinces for technical education. We all know that every province is anxious to have technical education, and I believe they are all willing and anxious to co-operate in every possible way for its development. The minister need have no fear that the money will not be spent for that purpose. I say that the provinces should be allowed to decide in what way the money shall be spent. It may be that in some provinces where technical education is not so far advanced as in others, in New Brunswick, for instance, for the first year or so perhaps the teachers of the primary schools may be entrusted with the duty of imparting technical education. At all events, all that the Federal Government is interested in is that the money is spent for the purposes of technical education. If the grant was made to the provinces and they were left to decide how it should be spent, without any conditions being imposed by this Government, there would be no encroachment upon provincial rights, which are always regarded jealously by the provinces. I trust, therefore, that the minister will be satisfied with a provision that will enable the provinces that receive the grant to spend it for the purposes of technical education according to their best judgment.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I realize that to oppose the granting of any money to the provinces is not a very popular thing, but as far as I am concerned, I would oppose the granting of this money if by accepting it the provinces have to relinquish any of their provincial rights. I think the mere fact that the ministers are citing the grant for aid to agriculture as a precedent, shows how dangerous this legislation is. The two things cannot be compared, because agriculture comes under federal jurisdiction as well as under provincial jurisdiction; but that is not the case with regard to education. The British North America Act explicitly provides that education comes exclusively—the word "exclusively" is used in the Act—under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. BURRELL: If you want to labour that point you can apply precisely the same argument in the case of the Agricultural Instruction Act—not the Act for aid to agriculture; that was the first Bill, passed in 1912—because the work we were carrying on under that Act was educational work. This Government was not establishing, and never has established, agricultural colleges or carried on educational work, but the money was voted specifically for educational purposes.

Mr. BUREAU: Experimental farms are educational work.

Mr. BURRELL: If you are going to argue that, then every form of governmental activity is, in some sense, educational. The specific educational work, as far as it applied to agriculture, was done under this Agricultural Instruction Act and was done by the provinces. I am sure there is no invasion of provincial jurisdiction because practically they would mutually agree. My hon. friend is rather anticipating a bogey that does not really exist.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: This shows more clearly the danger of establishing such precedents. This Government started by giving agricultural aid to the provinces. Next came educational help with regard to agriculture.

Mr. BURRELL: For which they were very glad.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Now it is used as a precedent to give help to technical education, this Government keeping control of the manner in which the education shall be carried on. Other matters will arise, and the legislation of to-night will be used as a precedent for new legislation. The first precedent is agricultural education, and the second is technical education. As I said at an early stage of the proceedings, nothing will prevent a government, with such precedents, to give subsidies to provinces which will be willing to establish national schools within their borders. This is a dangerous procedure. This Government is gradually encroaching on the provincial area and it has done so in many matters. Take the question of the Department of Health which has been created this year. I have read in Hansard of many years ago a debate when a resolution to create such a department was proposed in the House of Commons at a time when Sir John A. Macdonald was Prime Minister. Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper and other leading statesmen of that time stated emphatically that under the British North America Act this Government could not establish a Department of Health. This year, of course, with all the precedents which the minister has adduced, a Department of Health has been created. The Government have given subsidies to the provinces for agricultural education, keeping control on that education. They want to give subsidies for technical education with a string attached, keeping control on a purely provincial matter; and they will do it in other cases on the strength of the precedent which we are creating to-night. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) says there has been an inter-provincial conference at which no one objected. I would submit that the proceedings of provincial conferences should be made public. The atmosphere of the 20th century is not conducive to secret proceedings. If the great diplomats of the world have to make their proceedings public, our own diplomats in Canada, the ministers of the Federal Government and of the various provinces, ought to make their proceedings absolutely public too. But even if the minister agreed to that, I submit, the Bill was not prepared at that time, and I would not be surprised to learn that all the conditions which I read in the various sections of the Bill were not submitted to the provincial ministers at that time. However, even if they were submitted and the provincial ministers agreed to the legislation, that would not relieve me of my responsibility, as a member of the Canadian House of Commons, of the duty to uphold the constitution of Canada so far as provincial jurisdiction is concerned. I am in earnest in the objections I have raised against this particular Bill. I want to tell my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) that I have not said I am opposed to technical education. I only said that this particular year is not a propitious year to give the money of this country to the provinces for works which are of a provincial character. The provinces are in a better position financially than this Government at the present time. I know some provinces which are in a pretty safe condition financially and are able to undertake works which come under their jurisdiction. Here, at this time, we do not know where to get money. I think expenditures which are of a purely provincial character should be borne by the provinces this year. When the country is more prosperous it will be time to consider the giving of help to the provinces by this Government. But, even then, I think this grant should be given freely to the provinces without any string attached to it. The provinces should be free to expend the money for the purposes stipulated, and there should be no control by the Federal Government of questions that are purely provincial.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: The essential fact that has been overlooked, that Parliament, which is responsible for collecting the money, must of necessity be responsible for the expending of it, and that when this Government votes a grant to any province for any purpose it must necessarily see that the money is spent for the purpose intended. I cannot see how this could be done if the grant were not accompanied by some regulation. I agree with the statement of the member for Shelburne and Queen's on a former occasion that most of these objections generally disappear when accompanied by a large grant of money. I think the objections which have been raised to-night will not materialize to any great extent, and if they did I could not see the force of them. The difficulty ought to be overcome. It would be most unfortunate if a Bill of this kind, which holds out such great possibilities for Canada—and no doubt this matter is long overdue, for Canada has been living on the brains of the world to a great extent in industrial lines for a great many years—could not be taken advantage of by every province. As the hon. member for Three Rivers said, the provisions could be fought out and incorporated in the Bill. I am quite convinced that the Government must control the money and see that it is used for the purpose for which it is given. And it is necessary to see that the idea conveyed in the definition of technical education as given here is carried out by the provinces. As I said on a former occasion, it should also be seen to that the money is distributed to different parts of a province because education should be universal. The tendency in the past in all provinces has been to centre technical education in the cities and large towns, and even small cities have not benefited. That is one thing which should be guarded against in this Bill. Altogether, I think, the minister must of necessity accompany the grant with certain regulations.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. member says that expenditure of the money given by the Federal Government should be controlled by the Government. The argument at first appears to be a strong one, but in the relations between the Federal Government and the Provincial Governments large sums of money have been given by this Government, which has absolutely no right to supervise their expenditure. For instance, the provincial subsidies given by the Federal Government every year amount to large sums. That money is given and it has never entered the mind of any minister of the Federal Cabinet to claim the right to ask an accounting of these moneys from the Provincial Governments.

Mr. BURRELL: That is given under the terms of Confederation which is a very different situation.

Mr. CANNON: But the reason for granting this in no way changes the system under which moneys have been given by the Federal Government to the Provincial Governments without the Federal Government retaining control or supervision thereof. If that can happen in connection with the payment of a subsidy I do not see why the same thing should not happen in connection with this Bill. The Secretary of State has made a comparison between his own Bill passed a few years ago and the Bill that is now being examined by the committee. I have under my hand the statutes of 1913 containing that Act. Without laying any stress on the argument put forward by my hon. friend from Kamouraska that there is a wide difference between agriculture and technical education, I must say that there is a wide difference between the two Bills themselves. Section 2, paragraph (c) gives a definition of technical education so general and elastic that all kinds of things may be included in the interpretation of the words "technical education." The Bill regarding agriculture contains no such provision. Why should we, in this new Bill, provide that the Federal Government shall exact an agreement from the Provincial Governments and shall define education, technical or vocational, when no such requirement was made in regard to the grant for agricultural education? We find, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Kamouraska, that the Bill passed in 1913 is being used as a precedent by the Minister of Immigration and Colonization. He says that after having passed a Bill as regards agriculture we are passing a similar Bill as regards technical education. But that Bill did not contain the definition that this Bill contains, and that is where the danger lies. We do not want in our province any federal interference with educational matters. We have had enough trouble in the past, we do not want to have any more trouble now. Our province, as regards technical education, has done wonders. The minister knows what Quebec has done. We have technical schools in Montreal, Quebec, Shawinigan, Three Rivers and Sherbrooke. There is one being built in the city of Hull. I repeat, the province of Quebec has done wonders as regards technical education. We have never needed help from the Federal Government. Naturally, as business men our Government will certainly not refuse any help if it is being offered, but the Provincial Government and members from our province will not be willing to give away our privileges as regards education for any amount of money. If the Government wish to help us, we will not refuse the offer of $100,000, or $200,000 or perhaps $500,000, but let not the Minister of Immigration or any other minister attempt to interfere with educational matters in our province. We do not admit the principle because it is a principle altogether opposed to the British North America Act and also to our privileges and interests.

Let the Bill concerning technical education be the same as the Bill concerning agricultural education. We will not take any, or as strong, objection as we have to the present Bill. But there is also a new clause and every one of these new clauses is an encroachment upon our present privileges. The Bill shows the tendency of the Federal Government to interfere with and encroach upon provincial rights. What is the reason? The reason is very obvious. Confederation was accepted at the time only as a compromise between certain portions of this country. We know that. Lots of people in this country, instead of having a confederation as we have it now, would have preferred a legislative union. That has been the aim of a great many people. The aspiration of those people has not died with them. They have their successors in politics; they have had their heirs. Of course, it is impossible to-day for any man, or any Provincial Government to come out and say directly: We want to abolish the present system; we want to have only one government, a central government sitting in Ottawa and governing this country. Any man who would propose such a system would have practically no hearing in any of the provinces. But the Government is clever. The Government is taking an indirect route to attain that object. It is giving money to the provinces in different forms and interfering with provincial matters in different ways. What will be the result? Very soon the Provincial Governments will have such liabilities towards the Federal Government that they will become the mere tools and instruments of the Federal Government, they will disappear and instead of having in Canada the beautiful political machine invented by Sir John Macdonald, Sir George Etienne Cartier and many others, that system will be destroyed and we will have a central government. We are not in favour of a central government. We are in favour of the present state of affairs and in order to safeguard our privileges we insist that there shall be no encroachment. Compare the Bill referred to by the Secretary of State, which is chapter 6, 3 and 4 George V with this Bill. There are no clauses in that Act such as we find in the Bill. There is no provision that the minister shall be the sole judge in case of disagreement. Yet the minister comes with this Bill and says that his only aim and object is to help technical education in the provinces. Although he is giving money to the provinces, if he wishes to restrict their privileges we will not accept the Bill. We think the Bill may be interpreted in such a way as to enable the minister to interfere with our privileges. Therefore, we are against the Bill and no matter if we do lose the money, we would rather do so than give up any of our existing privileges.

Mr. CALDER: During the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat made the statement that if this Bill providing for grants to technical education were practically on all fours with the Bill providing for agricultural education he would have no objection to it.

Mr. CANNON: Not so many objections, I said.

Mr. CALDER: If I remember the hon. gentleman's remarks correctly, he said he would have no objection.

Mr. CANNON: No.

Mr. CALDER: A portion of his song was that this Bill was materially different from the other Bills.

Mr. CAHILL: What does the minister mean by "song" in this House?

Mr. CALDER: It has an ordinary meaning that I think everybody understands. I must ask the Committee at this stage to allow me a few minutes and I think after I close we may as well report progress and rise. But before the House adjourns tonight, I would like to make the members of the Committee acquainted with what the real provisions of the Agricultural Aid Act are. This Act, which was passed in 1913, was originally called the Agricultural Instruction Act, and its preamble reads as follows:

Whereas it is desirable that encouragement be given to agriculture in all the provinces of Canada, and whereas great and permanent benefit will result to education, instruction and demonstration carried on along lines well devised and of a continuous nature———and so on. The third section of the Bill reads as follows:

For the purpose of aiding and advancing the farming industry—

By what?

—by instruction in agriculture.

Mr. CANNON: Would the minister be fair? I based my comparison mostly on section 1. Also, I would not like the minister to skip section 2 of the Agricultural Bill.

Mr. CALDER: If the hon. gentleman will wait, I am coming to his main contention. His contention is that there is no definition in this Act of agricultural instruction.

Mr. CANNON: The same as in this Bill.

Mr. CALDER: Exactly, the same as in this Bill, and the hon. gentleman takes exception because in section 2 of the Bill that is now being discussed there is provision for an agreement between the provinces and the Federal Government as to the manner in which these moneys shall be expended. Well, I do not understand the hon. gentleman at all. Just another moment, and I am through. If the Committee will refer to section 5 of the Agricultural Instruction Act it will be found to contain this provision:

The payments hereinbefore authorized shall, as to each province, be conditional upon agreement between the minister and the Government of the province as to the terms, conditions, and purposes, within the meaning of this Act, upon and for which the payments are to be made and applied, and such agreement shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. CANNON: That does not define "instruction."

Mr. CALDER: The two Bills are practically on all fours.

Mr. CANNON: It does not define "instruction."

Mr. CALDER: Neither is "technical instruction" defined——

Mr. CANNON: Certainly, it is.

Mr. CALDER: One of the objections made to the Bill by an hon. gentleman opposite is that as such instruction is not defined the Bill would be the better for it. Well, "agricultural instruction" as used in the other Act is not defined either.

Mr. CANNON: Not defined at all.

Mr. CALDER: Now, section 7 of the Agricultural Instruction Act reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may make such regulations as are deemed advisable for giving effect to the objects and purposes of this Act, and, notwithstanding anything in this Act, the minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council and with the consent of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of any province and upon such terms and conditions as are prescribed by the Governor in Council, may expend in any such province in any year the whole or any part of the grant provided for such province under this Act for the purposes set forth in the preamble of this Act.

In other words, in the Agricultural Instruction Act there is the fullest provision made for the entering into of an agreement between the provinces and the Federal Government for the purpose of expending the grants provided for in any form of agricultural instruction that may be agreed upon between the provinces and the federal authorities, and that is exactly the provision in the present Bill. I can quite understand the argument that is advanced, that technical education is not exactly on the same basis as agricultural education, but that there is a wide difference between the provisions of the Agricultural Instruction Act and the provisions of this Bill, I cannot see at all.

Mr. BUREAU: Between the subject matters as stated.

Mr. CALDER: That is an entirely different thing. The view I have stated is the one that is taken by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat.

Mr. CANNON: What about section 6?

Mr. CALDER: That has reference to the minister having the power which I have already stated. That might be a provision inserted into any agreement between the provinces and the Federal Government. There is nothing in the provision at all to preclude an agreement of that nature. I quite see the objection that has been taken to that, but as I have already intimated to the committee I cannot see any reason why we cannot agree upon a clause that will meet with its unanimous approval. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Calder the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Saturday, June 21, 1919.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Progress reports of the Medical Services, Overseas Military Forces of Canada, from 1st January, 1917, to 31st March, 1919.—Major-General Mewburn.

CREDIT TO ITALIAN GOVERNMENT.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: I desire to lay upon the table of the House copy of the Order in Council providing a credit for the Italian Government, as promised yesterday by the Minister of Finance.

PATENT, TRADE MARK AND DESIGN, COPYRIGHT AND TIMBER MARKING ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 150, respecting the Patent Act, the Trade Mark and Design Act, the Copyright Act and the Timber Marking Act.

Mr. BUREAU: Explain, please.

Mr. MACLEAN: Until a year ago the Patents Branch was administered under statute by the Minister of Agriculture, but last year the Patents Branch was removed from the Department of Agriculture, as the then Minister of Agriculture desired that the deputy minister should be concerned with no public duties other than those relating to agriculture. The Patents Branch was then, by Order in Council passed under the War Measures Act, placed under the administration of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The purpose of this Bill is to give power to the Governor in Council to place that branch under any department of the Government or under any minister. The Bill also provides for the creation of the office of Commissioner of Patents, who will be the chief administrative officer of the branch. These are the only two amendments.

Mr. BUREAU: Is there any change in the mode of obtaining patents or trademarks?

Mr. MACLEAN: There are no substantive changes in the Patent Act. I did think earlier in the session that it was desirable to make further substantial amendments to this Act, but, chiefly for the reason that very important changes are likely to be made in connection with patents by all countries after peace is signed, I thought it better to postpone any important amendments to the Act until next session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

APPOINTMENTS IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

BILL TO ENABLE PERMANENT APPOINTMENT OF P.O. EMPLOYEES IN CERTAIN WESTERN CITIES.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 151, respecting certain appointments in the Post Office Department.

Mr. BUREAU: Explain.

Mr. ROWELL: This Bill is introduced at the request of the Postmaster General (Hon. P. E. Blondin) to meet the situation created by the withdrawal of a number of postal employees in Winnipeg, Calgary, and Saskatoon from the service during the month of May. Members of the House will recall that it became necessary, in order to maintain the postal service, to take on a number of men in these post offices, and a number of men were taken on, mostly returned soldiers. It was not possible, if the public service was to be carried on, that these men should be required to take the ordinary examinations; there was not time for it. The object of this Bill is to authorize the Civil Service Commission to appoint to the public service in the Post Office Department those who were taken on temporarily at that time, provided that they are recommended by the Deputy Postmaster General and that the postmasters in these different cities certify that they are efficient in the performance of their duties.

Mr. BUREAU: Is there not in the present Civil Service Act a provision that that may be done legally in case of emergency?

Mr. ROWELL: No, the Civil Service Act as it stands does not cover the present situation. This is to appoint them permanently; under the Act as it stands, they might be appointed only temporarily. In order to secure the necessary men for these positions the postmasters in these cities felt that is was necessary to assure the men that their positions would be permanent; that they would not be dismissed in a few weeks' time.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the Bill provide for similar emergencies in the future, and if not, why not?

Mr. ROWELL: The Bill does not contain any provision dealing with the future. I understand that the amendment to the Civil Service Act, which is now before the House in the form of a Bill introduced by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. A. K. Maclean), contains provisions which cover cases of a similar character arising in the future.

Mr. BUREAU: This is an exception to the Civil Service Act?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, to meet the exceptional conditions that developed in May last.

Mr. CAHILL: Might I ask the minister if this is only to apply to men already appointed to the service? It is not intended for future appointments, is it, under similar circumstances?

Mr. ROWELL: It applies to any one who may have been taken on to fill vacancies in the service in these three post offices in the month of May last.

Mr. BUREAU: Confirmation of appointments, I understand.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ROYAL NORTH WEST MOUNTED POLICE ACT.

AMENDMENT MADE BY THE SENATE.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the amendment made by the Senate to section 8 of the Bill to amend the Royal North West Mounted Police Act, appears to have been made to some extent under a misapprehension. The object of the Senate was to introduce into the Bill an amendment of the same character as they introduced into the Militia Pensions Bill. It was not necessary, because the Bill already contained a provision dealing with the matter. I should, however, point out to the House that the Senate amendment goes somewhat further than the provision of the Bill itself, and I shall point out wherein it does so. The Bill itself prevents the widow or dependents of any member of the Force receiving a pension under the Mounted Police Act and also under any Canadian Pension Act. The amendment extends that provision and would prevent them from accepting a pension from the Government of Great Britain or of any other portion of the Empire and also a pension under this Act.

I have conferred with the Comptroller, and from the standpoint of administering the Police Force and in the public interest, we think that the amendment is not desirable, for the reason that we frequently get into the Force men who have served overseas, residents of the British Isles, who may be pensioners to a limited amount for services rendered in the British army, and if this amendment prevailed, their widows and dependents would be compelled to elect between that pension and the pension they would receive under this Bill. So far as the Police Force is concerned, we do not feel that any pension or gratuity which any member or his widow or dependents might receive from the Government of Great Britain should necessarily be taken into account in dealing with the situation here. Therefore, I would move:

That the House do not concur in the Senate amendment, the matter having been already provided for in the latter part of section 8 of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: There being some question as to the precise form which a motion of this character ought to take, I would suggest, if it be agreeable to the hon. minister, that the order stand for the time being while we make sure of our procedure.

Motion stands.

PURCHASING OF DEPARTMENTAL AND OTHER SUPPLIES.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING COMMISSIONERS' SALARIES.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell (President of the Council) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide in the proposed Act respecting the Purchasing of Departmental and other Supplies and Materials for His Majesty, (Bill 46), now before the House, that the Chairman of the Purchasing Commission for Canada shall be paid an annual salary of seven thousand dollars, and each of the other commissioners shall be paid an annual salary of six thousand dollars, and that such salaries may be paid monthly out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Mr. ROWELL: When the Bill was before the House, we discussed the matter at some length, and certain clauses stood over for further consideration, it also being understood that in committee the principle of the Bill might be discussed if any hon. member desired to do so. I think that was on the suggestion of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). What I would suggest to the committee, if the committee would consent, is that this resolution go through in order that it may be referred to the committee for consideration with the Bill, and the whole matter may be discussed when the Bill comes back into committee. As a matter of form, it is necessary to get this resolution into committee so that it may be discussed with the Bill.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. BUREAU: I was unavoidably absent at the time, but after reading the debate, I remarked that the clause relating to the number of commissioners had been amended by substituting the words "not more than three" for the word "three." By this resolution is it not intended that the number of commissioners to be decided by the clause in the Bill shall be entitled to the respective salaries mentioned in this resolution? My impression was that if we were asked to pass a resolution authorizing the expenditure of money, the amount had to be definite and the number of positions, for the emoluments of which the amounts were to be paid, had also under the rule to be definite. If we do not know how many commissioners are to be appointed, if that is left to the discretion of the Governor in Council, it is very hard to appropriate moneys for officials who might not be appointed at all.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will see that this resolution does not deal with the appropriation. There will have to be a vote in the Supplementary Estimates for that, and the number of commissioners must be determined before the Government introduces in the Supplementary Estimates the necessary appropriation. The effect of this resolution will simply be to provide a salary of $7,000 for the chairman and salaries of $6,000 for any other commissioners who may be appointed. It is necessary, as a matter of form before we can consider that clause of the Bill, to have a resolution of this kind. The number of commissioners will be determined before we bring down a Supplementary Estimate dealing with the matter, which can be discussed further, if my hon. friend so desires, when the Bill is in committee.

Mr. BUREAU: All right.

Mr. McKENZIE: That safeguard which the President of the Council mentions as regards the voting of the money does not seem to be necessary under this resolution, because it says:

And that such salaries may be paid monthly out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

That would appear to me to give license for the payment of the salaries of these commissioners out of any money that is unappropriated. Therefore, if it is necessary that we should specifically know what amount of money is to be paid for this service, the amount ought to be named, because this resolution gives carte blanche to get it anywhere if it is available at all and not ear-marked for any other purpose. While I do not want to obstruct the work of the minister or the progress of the Bill on that ground, this is the first time in many years that a resolution for a money Bill was introduced at this stage. I have been in this House for a long time now, and I never before saw a case where, if a resolution was at all regarded as necessary, such resolution was not introduced first and passed by the House before the Bill was introduced. There may be some provision for this, but there is nothing in the rules about it. Of course, there is what might be regarded as common law education in the books dealing with Parliamentary procedure, but the minister will find, if he consults those authorities, that he has not followed the practice. The clauses dealing with the money part should either be left blank altogether in the Bill or be printed in red ink so that that would be a blazing notice to everybody that this Bill was something apart from the ordinary procedure. Here we have a Bill printed in the ordinary way and the only blanks in it are blanks for the salaries. I understand they have had such cases in England, and the other procedure was followed, namely, the money provisions were left blank altogether or written in red ink to give notice to the House that there was something to follow. I cannot understand why the time-honoured practice was not followed in connection with this Bill just as in connection with any other Bill regarded as a money Bill which has been introduced into this House for many years past.

Mr. MORPHY: I have repeatedly in this House referred to the ease with which high salaries in new appointments have passed through this House. It has come to be a hobby with me, and I have made many a fight for the man who is getting only $600 a year, with probably a wife and five or six children to support, and who finds it very difficult to get an increase. He is thrown over practically as a man undeserving of any consideration by the House, and he cannot fight his own way through the departments except on a set grading starting very low. I notice this resolution provides for an initial salary for the chairman of $7,000. Why should that not be $6,000? It shows $6,000 salary for each of the other commissioners. Why should that not be $5,000? We are burdened with debt in this country; the cost of living will probably soon come down, and yet we are establishing a principle of the highest grade of salaries after the war is over as though the war were to continue for ever. I believe a man can be got as Chairman of this Commission for $6,000 as good as a man who is paid $7,000. Especially as we do not know who the man is, it is unwise to my mind to set a grade of salary which is going to be followed throughout the departments of this Federal Government.

It is an example that everybody else will be able to point to and say, "I want $7,000 for the position I hold, because this commission has set a new standard." I think that is a pernicious example to set; it is not economical, and I think the House should be plainly told before this resolution passes who the man is that the Government propose to appoint, what experience he has had, and what is his general fitness for this position. I am not making the argument that the salary is necessarily too high for the position, but a general argument bearing upon the salary question. I can conceive that if this commission is to perform its functions to the best interests of the country, before we are through we may require a man who would not accept less than $25,000 a year; but that is not my point. My point is that we are appointing a man at $7,000 a year and we have absolutely no idea who he is. That is a radical advance to my mind, and will be an incentive to every other branch of the public service to reach the same starting point. I have said before in this House that the $600 man receives no consideration. When a Bill of this character was under consideration some time ago I made a direct appeal to the President of the Privy Council, and he replied that the re-classification would take care of the $600 man. I have not had time to analyze the report, and I should like the minister to say before this resolution goes through whether the re-classification will better the salary of the $600 man.

Mr. ROWELL: Dealing first with the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, of course I cannot speak from experience in this House as to what the procedure has been in the past. I can only say with reference to the form of this procedure that it is the form advised by the Parliamentary Counsel as being the proper procedure in a case where the salaries had not been fixed when the Bill was introduced. The amount of the salaries was left blank in the Bill showing that they had not been fixed, and the resolution was introduced subsequent to the introduction of the Bill, but before the Bill had been considered in the House and as soon as the salaries had been fixed. I know that it was a very common practice in the Legislature of Ontario, of which I was a member for many years, to leave the money clauses of a Bill blank until the resolution was introduced. When the resolution had been passed it was referred to a Committee of the Whole House for consideration with the money clauses of the Bill.

Coming now to the question raised by my hon. friend from North Perth, I do not now recollect just what the provisions of the reclassification are, but I do know that the position of the men my hon. friend refers to is substantially improved under the reclassification. If my hon. friend will turn up the report which has been laid on the table of the House by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce he will see what is there proposed, and what is there proposed is not all that the men drawing the lower salaries will secure. There will also be a war bonus, which must be added to the amounts mentioned in the schedules, until the cost of living more nearly corresponds with what it was before the war than it does to-day.

Coming now to the question of the salaries of the Purchasing Commission, my hon. friend says, and very properly, that if we are to secure a man possessing the ability and experience which we should hope to secure for the chairmanship of this commission, we might have to pay a very substantial sum to secure him. I quite agree; I do not believe we could get a man of the ability and experience required for $7,000, if $7,000 was the only consideration, and he was dependent on that amount for his support; but I think we can make an appeal to public spirited citizens of this country, to some of our business men who have been willing to give war service in the past and who would be willing to serve their country at this time for a reasonable amount, having regard to the fact that they are rendering public service as well as receiving compensation.

Mr. MORPHY: Have the War Purchasing Commissioners received salaries in the past?

Mr. ROWELL: No, they did not receive salaries, and I might say that none of the existing commission will serve in the future. One, unfortunately, has died, and the other two, for business reasons are unable to continue. My hon. friend asks why the salary of the Chairman has been fixed at $7,000. There is one reason; it may not be a very good one. Personally I thought the amount should be higher, and I have no hesitation in saying so, but $7,000 is the salary of a Cabinet Minister, and the view prevailed that we should not fix the salary of the Chairman of the Commission higher than that of a Cabinet Minister; so $7,000 was agreed upon.

Mr. BUREAU: Cabinet Ministers' salaries are too low.

Mr. ROWELL: I agree that they are too low, but that is the situation.

Mr. BUREAU: Raise them.

Mr. ROWELL: I have frankly told my hon. friend how the $7,000 was arrived at. There is this further fact, that $7,000 is the salary of the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, and it was thought that these two commissions might be put on a parity. Any other commissioners appointed, whether it be one or two, would receive $1,000 less than the chairman, which is the salary the Civil Service Commissioners will receive.

Mr. BEST: I understood that there is a purchasing committee in each department; are these committees to be done away with? What I should also like to know from the minister is this: About a year ago some men were appointed to re-classify the Civil Service, and it was understood their report would be presented to Parliament by the 1st of April of this year. In view of the fact that the Government knew that that report was being prepared, why is it that in the meantime some men have received increases ranging from $100 to $2,000? Why were their salaries increased before the report was brought down? My opinion is that this country is being run altogether too much by commissions. There is one other commission which I think the Government would appoint if we gave in to them, and that is a commission to tell us how to vote. I want the money of this country saved and conserved. Our public debt is large, and there are many men throughout this country to-day who are sacrificing because they know we owe so much. Why is it that cabinet ministers do these things that can only cause dissatisfaction in the Civil Service? Any one who has looked over the report must realize that nothing could do more to create dissatisfaction among civil servants. Some men are granted salary increases ranging from $100 to $2,000. In one particular case, a civil servant who was receiving $1,000 less than another man appears in the report as entitled to $300 or $400 more than this other man. The head of one department is getting $5,000; and the head of another department $4,000; and the report of the Classification Committee says that the man getting $4,000 should get $4,800, and the man who is receiving $5,000 should be given $4,500, or $300 less than the other. Will this Government allow this sort of thing? If we want satisfaction among the people and among the civil servants, we must do something to stop that kind of thing. If we allow this condition to continue, considerable dissatisfaction will be caused. This is a very drastic step we are taking in the appointing of so many commissions. We do not know how many men are going to be appointed. We were told a year ago that there were to be three, and now there are two more, and as I am informed this addition is absolutely unnecessary and will result in nothing but a debating society. But in addition to these new men, there will be stenographers and clerks, and altogether the people are being called upon to pay thousands of dollars for many things that are entirely unnecessary. I think it is all right that we should try to pay every civil servant what he ought to get. The hon. minister told us they would give this man only $7,000, because Cabinet ministers were getting only $7,000, but the classification says that the deputy minister can get as high as $8,000. Why did the hon. minister not raise the chairman another thousand to put him on a level with the deputy? That would be only fair. I hope we shall have fewer commissions and that the people's representatives in this House will have some say in what is going on, and not have Bills, as happened last year and this year, forced through the House in the dying hours of the session, when we expect Parliament to prorogue. We do not know what legislation is coming down, and it is only fair to the members of the House that we should be given some idea of what is to be done in the dying hours of the session.

The CHAIRMAN: Before this discussion goes further, I must remind hon. members that this is certainly not the proper time to discuss the classification of the Civil Service. It has very little to do with the resolution before the House, to which I would ask that remarks be confined.

Mr. BEST: Mr. Chairman, I was just answering the minister. He took the matter up and I think I had a right to reply.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not call the hon. member to order. I merely asked that other hon. members should not discuss the Civil Service Report.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. member has raised an important point.

The CHAIRMAN: The point is not raised at the proper time.

Mr. ARTHURS: There is another point that I would raise: What will be done with the present purchasing agents of the various departments when this new commission takes charge? Are these men to continue to draw large salaries as in the past, or will their services be dispensed with? We have purchasing agents in every department, some of them very efficient men who are conversant with conditions and prices of goods which they have been purchasing for years, and I would like some information as to what the intention is in this regard.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think my hon. friend was in the House on the second reading of this Bill, but if he would turn up the debate that took place on that occasion he would see that the matter was fully discussed. If my hon. friend does that and is not satisfied with the explanations and the statements then made, the whole matter can be reviewed when we get into Committee on the Bill.

Mr. MICHAUD: How many purchasing agents are there already appointed for the several departments of the Government, and will they still act as separate agents if this commission is appointed?

Mr. ROWELL: That matter is all explained in the debate we had. There was a lengthy discussion of some hours and all these matters were dealt with. The total number of employees at present in all the departments of the Government dealing with the matter of purchasing is in the neighbourhood of 300. I am not sure of the exact number, they deal with purchasing, receiving, inspecting and passing upon supplies.

Mr. BUREAU: The resolution provides that the Chairman shall receive $7,000 and the members of the commission $6,000. The number of commissioners is not determined, but there is a maximum number who may be appointed. This is an absolutely new expenditure over and above the present expenditure. These three men are being given powers already exercised by the ministers in the various departments, who are being paid salaries, small if you like.

Mr. ROWELL: It is new and additional, but we are convinced, as the old commission which recommended this is convinced, that the net result will be a substantial saving in the actual cost of administration, by a combination of all these branches into one. But the greatest saving will be in the actual purchasing of all supplies for the Government where they can be purchased in larger quantities at the same time for all departments requiring the same classes of supplies.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that, as I read the discussion that took place on the previous occasion. But I contend that we are paying $19,000 for administration over and above the expenditure under the old system. Whether or not the Commission will be a matter of economy can be discussed in the Bill, although I see that opinions differed very much on the question. It has been claimed that there have been extravagance and mismanagement, but that can also be discussed in the Bill. I am merely pointing out that this is an additional burden of $19,000.

Mr. ROWELL: It is an additional expenditure which the Government believes will enable them to reduce the existing expenditure.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a proposition that ought to be opposed at every stage. I opposed the Bill as strenuously as I could when it was before the House and I intend to oppose it again, and I oppose the resolution. The minister will find that instead of reducing expenses of the various departments this will send them sky high above what they are to-day. I would imagine that deputy ministers and ministers, who are ordinary individuals, should have pride in seeing their departments economically and properly managed in the matter of purchases. If the heads of departments have no responsibilities at all except to pass orders over to an outside commission who will buy goods and pay the prices, there will be a keen rivalry between the departments to obtain things of the greatest excellence which they would do without if they had to shoulder direct responsibility themselves for the purchase of them. We are creating an institution to buy for all departments, and it is absolutely impossible for the Commission to know the requirements of the departments, or whether an order sent to them is reasonable or not. I cannot conceive of any difficulty in a deputy minister sitting for ten minutes in consultation with a man who is selling goods. He knows what he wants and the man is willing to sell to him, and he surely can get goods as cheaply as they are going into the market anywhere else. I am clearly of the opinion that this is absolutely a mistake. I am sick and tired of hearing of people serving their country for nothing. We have heads of big concerns serving the country gratis so far as salary goes, but they are drawing grist to their mills in other ways ten thousand times greater than their salaries.

I hope we have heard the last of this extraordinary patriotism that is abroad in this country. When this thing is inquired into we find that the man who has served without compensation has simply served as advance agent of a circus, or something else, to find out the best way to put up his posters. In like manner, these high patriots find their way into the departments and government positions and simply utilize those positions for the advancement of their own business, or to put money in the way of their friends. Whether they are getting a rake-off from it afterwards I am not going to say, but that is what is going on. It is better for this Government and this country to hire a man who has no such high ideas of patriotism, pay him and let the business of the country be done in a business way. We had never heard any complaint about the departments not doing their business properly until this War Purchasing Commission arose and found that they were in a position to do big things and to do them in a different way from what they had been done before. I look for no good from it at all. I would say, as has been said already by hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, that this is no time for extravagance or plunging into new experiments involving hundreds of thousands of dollars. The minister has been honest enough to tell us that he must increase the staff of this new department and that he must start with something like 300 or 400 men and women. He proposes to take whatever number of men are engaged in that commission now and pitchfork them into this new service over the heads of the Civil Service Commission, and, in that way, violate the law. Although there is no doubt that this resolution will pass, my good friend from Durham —I think it is—says that the next thing will be the appointment of a commission to tell us how to vote. I think there are sufficient commissions abroad now to tell hon. gentlemen supporting the Government how to vote on this resolution. All we can do from this side of the House is to protest against it. It involves extravagance and the unnecessary expenditure of money at a time when every dollar should count in the judgment of the Government, and particularly when we are in the financial position that we are in to-day.

I submit to the Government that if any private concern were in the financial condition that the Government is in, it would be regarded as hopelessly insolvent. I say that seriously. What would we think of a merchant, a manufacturer, or a man at the head of any industrial concern in this country, whose finances were in the condition of the finances of the Government, plunging into unnecessary extravagance of this kind? I submit that there is not one financial law to be applied to the Government and another financial law to be applied to every going concern in this country. The Government should cut their coat according to their cloth and when money is low and hard to get, and the cost of living high, it should get along with the least possible expense. For this, and many other reasons, which have not yet developed, but which will develop under this Bill, I submit that it should not be passed at all. As for myself, I am determined to do everything I can against the piling up of any expenditure for this year, or possibly next year, that we can get along without.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ROWELL: Would the hon. gentleman allow me just one word? If the members wish to further discuss this matter I have no objection to moving that the committee rise so that it may be brought up again. I would do so for the reason that we have two or three matters of important Government business that it is desired to proceed with to-day. I had assumed that the committee would possibly accept the suggestion that I made, allow the resolution to pass and then the matter could be dealt with on the Bill in committee. But if it is the desire of hon. members to discuss the question further, I will move that the committee rise and report progress.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Mr. Chairman, I cannot sit quietly in my seat and allow such aspersions as we have listened to, to be cast by the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) upon the men who have given their services free of charge for the last five years. I know man after man who has left his business, who has been under great financial loss, who has come here to Ottawa, and slaved as he never worked for himself, while our boys were at the front, actuated only by patriotic motives. When the leader of the Opposition arises here and imputes to every one of these gentlemen sordid motives and alleges that they were endeavouring to bring grist to their own mill he does something that he ought to be ashamed of. If there is anything that we shall look back to when this war is over with credit to ourselves it will be the fact that we had men in Canada, not five, or ten, or twenty, but scores who were willing to sacrifice their own private interests in the public cause while this war was on. I can point, as every one knows, to man after man who, when he goes back from Ottawa, having served at his own expense for the term of years that he has given to this service, will go back and live a quiet life, for the rest of his days, simply because there is nothing left in him. Let me just say one word in respect to the chairman of this War Purchasing Commission, a man from my own province whom I have known all my life as a man of the highest integrity and patriotism; he left a big business, left his family, came here and worked twelve months in the year for five years in order to save this country thousands of dollars as the head of the War Purchasing Commission. For any one to tell this House or this country that that man had some sordid motive other than the desire to render patriotic service is to make a statement that is unworthy of the House and unworthy the leader of a party.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps Colonel Allison is one of those. He is one of that class and if my hon. friend wants to get into Colonel Allison's class—

Sir HERBERT AMES: No, I do not.

Mr. McKENZIE—let him get into it and drop his knighthood.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. McKENZIE: No; I am not going to take any aspersions from the hon. member. If honesty in public life is required, let the hon. member go into the office of Mr. Bourassa and ask him what he found about the hon. gentleman's honesty in handling public moneys and moneys wrung from the people of Canada.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I do not know to what you refer.

Mr. M. CLARK: I think I shall probably pour some oil on these troubled waters. I would like the committee, unless the leader of the Opposition says there is an insuperable objection, with a view to getting the business of the House forward in a reasonable manner, to take seriously the request of the minister that we should pass the resolution and take up the principle of the Bill. I may say to the leader of the Opposition that I had intended to express the hope, which I do not see any need now to express, that he would not, like myself, be prevented from performing his constitutional duties as watchdog over public expenditures by any such vehement onslaught as was made upon him by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames). The committee will agree that the leader of the Opposition does not need any such advice as I was about to give him because he has given evidence that he can meet vehemence with vehemence in any line of debate in this House. I do think that it would be a reasonable thing to accede to the request of the minister. I make the appeal all the more readily because I am entirely in accord, as the leader of the Opposition knows from a previous debate in this House, with his views on the question and will be prepared to speak in that sense when we debate the principle of the Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: The motion made by the minister is that the Committee rise and report progress; and that motion is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion that the Committee rise was certainly not made by the President of the Council.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister said that if members desired to debate the matter further, he would make that motion. If the Chair had not understood that the President of the Council had put in the proviso which I have mentioned, of course the Chair would not have allowed any debate upon the motion, because the leader of the Opposition is right in saying that the motion is not debatable. But I understood that the President of the Council said: "If hon. members wish to continue the debate, I will move that the Committee rise".

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister made the motion twice. He may have qualified it in that way the first time, but he certainly made the motion without qualification the second time.

Mr. ROWELL: Is it the desire of hon. members further to debate the resolution, or will they accede to the suggestion that the resolution be adopted and that the whole matter be discussed when we are in Committee on the Bill?

Mr. McKENZIE: If we pass this resolution we commit ourselves to the principle of this Bill and of the whole business, and I do not agree to that.

Mr. ROWELL: We have already committed ourselves to the principle. The House voted upon the principle on the second reading of the Bill. I move that the Committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

BRITISH NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND ALIENS CONSOLIDATION ACT.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 138, to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to British Nationality, Naturalization and Aliens.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): At the risk, Mr. Speaker, of making an unpopular suggestion, I submit that we should not be compelled to discuss this Bill at the present time. The Bill, which is a very important one, was introduced on Wesdnesday of this week, only three days ago. Its most important sections are based on the Imperial Act of 1918, and I went to the library and tried to get that Act in order that I might study the Bill and give it proper consideration. I was told, however, that there was only one copy of the Imperial Act of 1918, and that it was in the possession of the Solicitor General (Hon. Mr. Guthrie). Of course, being a plain private member, I could not compete with my hon. friend in the securing of that book, and I do not think it is fair to the House or to the country that this Bill should be forced through three days after its introduction and before we have had time or opportunity of studying it and considering its various provisions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Technically, under the rules, the Solicitor General exhausted his right to speak when he submitted the motion. I take it, however, that the House will concur in permitting him to make his explanation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Certainly.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I recognize that upon a casual reading of the Bill, it would appear to be somewhat involved and to require a good deal of consideration. However, I may explain that the Bill is merely a consolidation of the two Acts now in force in Canada in respect to naturalization, to which has been applied the Imperial Act of 1918, the precise language of the various sections of the Imperial Act being employed as far as possible. I have prepared a copy of the Bill showing precisely, by indicating them in red ink, what are the clauses of the Imperial Act, and showing by marginal notes the verbal changes in each section. It will be remembered that a few days after the outbreak of the war—I think on the 7th of August, 1914—the Imperial Government passed an important Naturalization Act. This Parliament had passed an Act on the 24th of June, 1914, without knowledge that the Imperial Parliament contemplated any action in the matter. After the Imperial Act had been passed, this Parliament passed a further Act, on the 22nd of August, 1914, at the short summer session, to bring into force in Canada certain sections which had been adopted by the Imperial Parliament on the 7th of August preceding. On the 8th of August, 1918, the Imperial Parliament passed a further Act by way of amendment of the Imperial Act of 1914, and the two Acts now in force in Great Britain are cited as the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Acts, 1914 and 1918. It is provided in the Imperial legislation that any self-governing Dominion of the British Empire may adopt Part 2 of the Imperial Act, and that if it does so, a naturalization certificate thereafter granted in that dominion shall have force and effect throughout the whole of the British Empire; but until the Parliaments of the various self-governing dominions expressly adopt the provisions of part 2 of the Imperial Act, certificates of naturalization granted in the self-governing dominions shall have force and effect only in the British dominions in which they were granted. The matter was discussed at the last Imperial Conference, and it was generally agreed that a uniform naturalization law would be in the interests of every part of the Empire; but it was recognized that each dominion had a perfect right to regulate the matter for itself, so far as its own jurisdiction went. However, from a discussion which took place in the British House of Commons, I learned that practically all the self-governing dominions had expressed their intention to adopt part 2 of the Imperial Act. I do not really know how many have actually done so, but I think all save Canada and Australia. However, I am not certain in that respect. The main change effected in the Imperial law was in regard to the revocation of certificates heretofore granted, and in regard to the status of married women. We know that in Canada, prior to 1914, under the provisions of our law certificates of naturalization were granted after residence of three years. In 1914 we changed that law and made the period of residence five years; that is, in conformity with the requirement of the Imperial Act. But the Bill which is now before the House has included in it only the provisions of our own law passed in June, 1914, and in the following month of August, and in addition thereto the provisions of Part 2 of the Imperial Act, without any change whatever in the language except so far as is absolutely necessary to make it applicable to Canada. For instance, the tribunal in England which deals with the question of revocation of certificates, is not identical with the tribunal which will deal with those certificates here. Mere matters of form of that kind have had to be changed, but in other respects the language of the sections included in the present Bill is identical with the language in the British Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: What tribunal deals with the revocation of certificates in England? We have not had a chance to see the Imperial Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In Great Britain under the Act of 1918 the inquiry in regard to applications for the revocation of certificates is held by a committee constituted for the purpose by the Secretary of State. This is the language of the section:

> An inquiry under this section shall be held by a committee constituted for the purpose by the Secretary of State, presided over by a person (appointed by the Secretary of State with the approval of the Lord Chancellor) who holds or has held high judicial office, and shall be conducted in such manner as the Secretary of State may direct:

The language of that section would of necessity have to be changed in a Canadian statute.

My suggestion would be, if the Bill is given its second reading, that discussion in Committee go forward and that any reasonable time should be allowed members to make comparisons and further investigate the Bill. But until we can discuss it clause by clause, I do not think more can be gained by amplifying the general explanation which I have sought to give the committee. I know it would help very much in considering the Bill if this copy were used, and I would like to hand it to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition so that he can see the manner in which the Bill has been consolidated.

Mr. BUREAU: Are there many copies of the Bill that my hon. friend is proposing to turn over to the leader of the Opposition? I see it is a printed document.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I made this single copy myself. Any one can do the same who will take the time. It is only to indicate the clauses in the Imperial Act that are not law in this country now, but which will become law if this Bill passes. This also indicates the necessary change. The other sections are all sections passed by this Parliament in 1914 and prior years.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand from my hon. friend that this is a consolidation of the Canadian Acts, with the addition thereto of part of the Imperial Act to make a Canadian a British subject in any part of the Empire. The Act of 1914 was passed under war conditions, and we then departed from the very basis of the other Acts. Heretofore our tribunals have been granting citizenship; if a man wanted to be naturalized he had to go before the courts. To-day we have taken away that jurisdiction from the judiciary and placed it in the hands of a political body—the Government or the Secretary of State.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think if my hon. friend will read the section he will find he is mistaken. A man desiring to become naturalized still has to make application to the courts. The old Act was passed before the war, on the 24th of June, 1914. We have left the war-time procedure behind us.

Mr. BUREAU: I did not notice the change. I think applications for naturalization should not be left to the decision of any political body, neither should the revocation of certificates of citizenship. Under the Imperial Act which my hon. friend has just read the Secretary of State may appoint a committee under the Lord Chancellor or some man with judicial experience—some one who would be above any political feeling.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Our Bill provides for investigation by the judges of the superior courts in the various provinces.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Only if the Secretary of State thinks fit.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. There are four distinct cases; in three of them the Secretary of State is bound to cause an inquiry to be made; in the other case—and it is the case only of a man who has been out of the British Dominions for seven years and has not kept up any connection therewith—the Secretary of State may cancel the naturalization papers. But these are matters that can be discussed in committee, and I do not think we can very intelligently deal with them on the second reading.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I was about to call the attention of the House to the rule that on the second reading only the principle of the measure can be discussed. We are departing from that rule in this case and are discussing the effect of certain clauses.

Mr. BUREAU: I want to say on the second reading that I am against the principle of this Bill as indicated here. I am of opinion that these powers should not be left in the hands of the Government or of any politically organized body; the judiciary is the best tribunal to decide whether certificate of citizenship should be granted or refused. I also wish to register my most emphatic protest against the provisions in regard to revocation. If a man becomes a citizen of a country he is supposed to abide by the laws of that country, and if he commits such offences that revocation of his papers should be necessary, I think we ought to be able to make laws to remove such a man from society, instead of throwing him out of the country without any citizenship at all. We ought to think twice before taking such drastic steps and telling a man: "You foreswore allegiance to your native country; you have failed to observe the laws of this country to which you swore allegiance; therefore you are an outlaw." It is far better, if that man is so dangerous that he ought not to live in Canada or any other part of the British Empire, that you should jail him. Let us make laws to punish a man according to the offence he commits. We have power to do it, and we ought to exercise that power. To revoke a man's citizenship and place him in the position that he has no citizenship, that he is, in fact, an outcast, nationally speaking, is so drastic that in my opinion he would be better off in jail or dead. Any offence which merited revocation of citizenship might merit life imprisonment or the gallows.

He is better dead, and if any offence is such as to merit the revocation of a man's certificate of citizenship, it might merit a jail sentence for life, or even the gallows. We can pass laws here which will cover every such case. I wish to register my protest as regards the principle of this Bill on this ground, and possibly on other grounds, because I have not yet had time to study the Bill which I regard as a most important one. This Bill, which is going to determine the citizenship of a man, was brought up on the 18th of June, and we are called upon to-day to pass upon it and discuss the various conditions. We have not had any opportunity to look into the Imperial Act or to see the conditions upon which that Act was framed and what the conditions are in this Bill. I do not know the opinions of the other members, and I am not going to call for a division, but I desire to object to the principle of the Bill as brought before the House.

Hon. Mr. BURRELL (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I could not quite follow my hon. friend's argument in his earlier remarks, but I understood him to make a protest against the Act as it seemed to depart from the old practice by placing the naturalization of persons into the hands of political parties.

Mr. BUREAU: I said a political body, not party.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend surely cannot mean that, because the fact is at the present day the Act under which we have been granting hundreds and hundreds of certificates—I am signing about 1,200 a month—is the new Act of 1914.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not change my views.

Mr. BURRELL: That is an Act which this House passed. In the previous Act what happened was this: Commissioners on naturalization were appointed, and they could simply take a man's affidavit that he had lived in the country for three years, he having been in that district for such and such a time. He took the oath of allegiance; this was handed into the court; a list was prepared; at the end of the court the list, comprising perhaps 100 or 200 names, was read out by the clerk without any examination of the applicants being had; the matter went through almost pro forma, and, in fact, numbers of naturalization certificates of this kind were known to be handed out in blank, no care being exercised. In 1914, that Act was changed by this Parliament, and, as a matter of fact, it has been in operation under much more satisfactory conditions since, because the old Act and the new Act were allowed to run concurrently for three years, from 1914 to the end of 1917, as it was thought that those men who were naturalized for Canadian citizenship for three years should be given an opportunity of taking up their homesteads under the old Act. But the new Act, under which we have been acting since 1914, and which was the only Act since January 1, 1918, instead of providing the old method, has provided a method under which naturalization is infinitely better safeguarded in the interest of this country than it ever was before, because the Act says this: A man shall pass in his application for citizenship, for naturalization, to the court; a three months' notice shall be given; that notice is sent to the Secretary of State, and the judge has then to hear the case for naturalization. The man has to have been residing for five years in Canada; he has to have an adequate knowledge of either French or English and to be a person of good character, and the judge has to satisfy himself on all those points. It is, I think, obvious to every hon. member that it is a most important matter, especially in view of what has taken place in this world during the war, that the naturalization and citizenship of every person should be of an absolutely irreproachable character. It is a thing we have to safeguard. No political party has had an opportunity of advancing its own interest under the Naturalization Act which has been in force for the last few years. The judge has to decide according to the provisions laid down in the Act. That is, therefore, not a new feature; it is simply embodied in this Bill which, as the Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) said, is simply to consolidate the Acts and also to embody the provisions which he has mentioned regarding revocation. No hon. member would argue that there should not be any power vested in the Government of a country to revoke naturalization where naturalization has certainly been improperly bestowed. That is a principle we could not accept; the details of that will be taken up in the clauses of the Bill.

Brigadier-General GRIESBACH (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, there is an aspect of naturalization to which I should like to direct the attention of the House, although I am not sure whether it might come up properly at this time or later. I refer to the question of the status of aliens who apply for naturalization, who come from a country in which there is legislation that prevents the alien from becoming a British subject even if he is naturalized here. I refer particularly at the moment to my understanding of the Delbrück law which obtains in Germany. By the provisions of that law, as I understand it, a man may be naturalized in Canada or elsewhere, but he still remains a citizen or subject of Germany with all his rights in Germany and with his responsibilities in Germany, and particularly the responsibility for military service. The situation was that, when the war broke out, citizens of Germany, impelled either by motives of patriotism which are to be commended, or because of the operation of this law, sought to return to Germany to bear arms and, in many cases, succeeded in getting back to Germany and bore arms, a matter as to which some of us here can testify. I remember, in 1915, in trenches opposite a position which I held, Germans from the trenches shouted out inquiries as to conditions and persons in Edmonton, and we had reason to believe they were men from that city. Pressure is exercised under those laws in those foreign countries in this manner. A man is liable for military service notwithstanding the fact that he is naturalized in Canada, and if he does not return when his call is made, they confiscate all his property; they imprison him should he ever return to his own country again; they provide that he shall never be able to inherit any property in his own country; they deal even with his relatives and friends, and they bring pressure to bear upon him in every conceivable way. Indeed, it has, as a matter of fact, been found that the law is very effective. I am strongly of opinion that this country cannot afford and ought not under any circumstances to give naturalization to any man who comes from a country where a law exists that makes it impossible for him to become a citizen of this country, and this Bill should especially provide that no certificate shall be issued to any person who comes from any such country, the law of which makes it impossible for him to become a citizen in fact, in law and in every other respect.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Guthrie (Solicitor General) that the House go into Committee on the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: I understood from the Solicitor General that some time is to be granted for members to look into this Bill, and that it will not be discussed now in Committee of the Whole House. Is that right, or are we to be forced to go on now?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We could go on now with the old clauses that have been in force for the last few years and before the war, and any clause that my hon. friend wants to stand over, can stand over for a reasonable time, but many of these clauses will not require much discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

[Brigadier-General Griesbach.]

On section 1—definition of natural-born British subject:

Mr. BUREAU: I see this is taken from the Imperial Act of 1918. What changes does it make in the existing Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The section is precisely as it was in our law of 1914, with the exception of the words in paragraph (b) " or had become a British subject by reason of any annexation of territory, or was at the time of that person's birth in the service of the Crown; and " those words are taken from the 1918 amendment to the Imperial Act. Their object, of course, is obvious.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: What is the exact date of the Imperial Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: August 8, 1918.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Was that after or before the Imperial Conference?

Mr. ROWELL: The Act was passed after the Imperial Conference.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The reason I ask is because the Imperial Conference passed a resolution that another conference composed of the representatives of the United Kingdom and the Dominions should be called in order to agree upon a uniform law of naturalization. Is this Bill the result of such a conference?

Mr. ROWELL: No. The Bill was passed by the Imperial Parliament after it had been approved by the representatives of the Dominions, but there were two or three points that were considered of importance which were not covered by the Imperial Act, and the conference to which my hon. friend has referred was called for the purpose of considering those particular points. I do not just recall them at the moment, but I think I indicated them when we were discussing the report of the Imperial Conference.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Did the representatives of the Dominions agree on these outstanding points?

Mr. ROWELL: No conclusions have yet been reached on those points, and they are not embodied either in this Bill or in the Imperial Act. They will be covered by subsequent legislation.

Mr. PEDLOW: Take the case of an alien residing in territory annexed by the British Government. It is altogether likely that the British Government will annex or control for some time East Africa, for instance.

What would be the status of a German resident in that territory?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This Bill would not affect him one way or the other. This Bill only deals with those who have become British subjects by reason of annexation. There might be reasons why the people of that territory would not become British subjects, but any one who had become a British subject would have the privilege of continuing one under this Act. When the Imperial Act was introduced by the Secretary for the Home Department on the 12th of July last, Sir George Cave said:

This Bill was approved in principle at the Imperial Conference in the spring of 1917. Since that time a draft Bill has been circulated throughout the Empire and the draft has been approved by all the self-governing Dominions and India, with the exception of Australia, which has not yet approved the draft, but has indicated no dissent to it. The main purpose of the Bill is to introduce wider powers of revoking certificates of naturalization.

Mr. PARENT: Paragraph (c) says:

Any person born on a British ship whether in foreign territorial waters or not.

Now if the policy of the Government is to establish a Canadian merchant marine, would it not be well to insert the words "or Canadian" after the word "British" unless "a British ship" includes the ships of all the Dominions?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the clause as drafted would cover every ship sailing under the British flag. The restriction here is in the case of a birth occurring on a British ship in a South American port, for instance. The object of this restriction is that a person born on board a foreign ship shall not be deemed to be a British subject simply by reason of the fact that the ship was in British territorial waters at the time of his birth.

Mr. BUREAU: Suppose a British subject is naturalized in the United States, and a child is born to him while there. The next day he moves to Canada and becomes a British subject here by naturalization. Would the child take the citizenship of his father when he reached a certain age?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The status of children and married women is dealt with in subsequent sections of the Bill, beginning at section 11.

Mr. BUREAU: But the provisions have to be read as a whole, and that shows the necessity of going through the Bill very carefully. I understood from the President of the Privy Council that further legislation is to be brought down next year covering certain points that were to be dealt with at an Imperial Conference.

Mr. ROWELL: What I said in answer to my hon. friend from Kamouraska was that a committee had been appointed representing all portions of the Empire to consider certain questions which were not covered by the existing legislation, and that no final conclusions had yet been reached by that committee. When final conclusions are reached by that committee, they will have to be embodied in new legislation.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Certificate of naturalization.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsections 5 and 6 are entirely new and are taken verbatim from the Imperial Act of 1918. Subsection 5 is taken from 5 George V, and subsection 6 from the Imperial Act of August, 1918.

Mr. GRIESBACH: I move:

That Section 2 subsection 1 be amended by inserting the following proviso after subclause C:

Provided that under no circumstances whatever shall a certificate of naturalization be granted to any person, a citizen or subject of a foreign state in which there exists a law, rule or regulation which qualifies limits or restricts the citizenship by this Act conferred or in any way exacts or requires from such foreign applicant military allegiance or service to such state on the event of threatened or actual war.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That would hardly be appropriate in the present section. If my hon. friend will give me the proposed amendment I will consider it. It would be more properly inserted about the end of part 1. I move that consideration of it be allowed to stand in the meantime. I will see that it is submitted at the proper time.

Motion stands.

Mr. BUTTS: Subsection (b) provides that any one who is of good character may be granted a certificate of naturalization if he has an adequate knowledge of either the English or French languages. It does not say anything about other languages, and in the great war we had other Allies than the French. For instance the Italians were our allies. Are they to be excluded?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is only a matter of making persons British citizens. Before the war the opinion of this Parliament was that they should be familiar with the English or the French language, and in Great Britain, they have confined it to familiarity with the English language. I think that there should be some familiarity with either the English or the French language provided for.

Mr. BUREAU: The languages of the country.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

On section 3—Effect of certificate of naturalization:

Mr. COOPER: How does this affect the Oriental?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not aware of any law that provides for the naturalization of Orientals in this country.

Mr. COOPER: The Oriental at the present time has no vote. Under this section he would be allowed to vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not prepared at the moment to answer that question. I shall have to inquire into it and answer it at a later stage. I was under the impression that they had no right to be naturalized or to become British subjects.

Mr. CROWE: There are two or three thousand Japanese in British Columbia who have taken out naturalization papers but they have no vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I can answer the question now. I understand Orientals have a right to be naturalized in Canada, but under certain local laws of the province they are not enfranchised, notwithstanding their right to be naturalized if they comply with all the requirements.

Mr. CROWE: The naturalization does not give them the right to vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. It does not change the laws in force for the last thirty years.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Give them the provincial franchise and it would be all right.

Mr. BUREAU: Take the case of women—an Indian woman is a British subject. What would be her status? Would she be deprived of the right to vote by special legislation in this Bill? If she can exercise all the rights of a British subject she should have the right to vote, because under federal enactment all women who are British subjects and who have reached the age of twenty-one have the right to vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When we come to the Franchise Act that will be a fair matter to deal with, but not under this Bill.

Mr. MOWAT: If it is thought wise in the provinces to limit the franchise to certain nationalities there might be a contest with the provinces. If a certain class of Orientals are given all the rights, powers and privileges of British citizenship, we would be passing a law that would perhaps be inconsistent with provincial franchise laws.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Franchise Act of a province can apply only to its own provincial franchise, which is beyond the jurisdiction of this Parliament.

Mr. MOWAT: I want to avoid the possibility of the Dominion franchise being different from the provincial franchise, and there might be a contest. By passing this law what will be the situation in regard to Orientals?

The CHAIRMAN: All these questions relating to franchise can much better be discussed on the Franchise Bill. They are not relevant under this section.

Mr. FIELDING: Suppose there is no Franchise Bill?

The CHAIRMAN: When it comes.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Political rights are mentioned in this section and the franchise is therefore relevant.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We confer all political rights on a person on naturalization. If any province, having jurisdiction, desires to limit the franchise in regard to persons who are not naturalized, it has the full right to do so under our constitution.

If in the province of Ontario they passed a law to exclude an Oriental from voting, or from exercising the provincial franchise, they would have a perfect right to do so. But they have no right to pass any enactment that limits or alters the Dominion franchise. We grant a certificate of naturalization to an alien and if a province did not want that alien to vote it would say so, but in so far as this Dominion is concerned, as soon as we grant the certificate we clothe the person to whom the certificate is granted with all the rights of a British subject.

Mr. COOPER: If an Oriental in the past has had a right to vote in federal elections that right has never been exercised and British Columbia would not desire that it should be exercised.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The provincial lists were used in the federal election according to the old Election Act. That is why Orientals do not vote in federal elections.

Mr. COOPER: That is the reason.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: If we use the provincial lists for federal elections they have the right to vote unless you deprive them of that right.

Mr. BUREAU: The right to say who should exercise the franchise in federal elections was delegated by the Federal Parliament to the province and that right will still be exercised by the province unless the delegation is cancelled and the Federal Parliament takes into its own hands the duty of legislating for that purpose. But, when a certificate of naturalization is given to a Chinaman, Japanese, or Hindu, that man gets the full rights of citizenship the same as any other man.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There has always been a provision in the law about conditional naturalization. I am speaking of the case of a man who receives full naturalization.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I think the limit of five years should be raised because I do not believe you can take a Chinaman or a Jap and make a good citizen out of him in five years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You must adopt that period of time if you are going to make the provisions uniform throughout the Empire. Great Britain will not recognize our right unless we conform to their general scheme. Otherwise, our naturalization will be purely for Canada.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Why not get them to raise their limit?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They were requested to but they have definitely made the term five years and it will have to be adhered to.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I think that is a dangerous standard to set up.

Mr. ROWELL: Five years is two years longer than it used to be; it is raised from three years to five.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: The time is altogether too short.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there not some safeguard in the discretion of the court? Even if a man had been here for five years, if the Secretary of State, or the court, think he is not a desirable party to receive a certificate, I think they can refuse it.

M. FIELDING: There has been a distinction between the status of a British subject in Canada and a British subject in England. Is not the object of this to put them both upon a common plane?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: There will be no such distinction in the future?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it will be the same throughout the Empire. I move that the Committee rise and report progress. In the interval perhaps we will have an opportunity of studying the matter more carefully.

Mr. BUREAU: Will that be before Tuesday?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, not till after Tuesday?

Progress reported.

ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. ROWELL: Referring to the Mounted Police Bill, which was up this morning—I beg to move:

That this House doth disagree with the Senate amendment for the following reasons:

The amendment is inconsistent with the provisions of the proviso to clause 8 of the Bill and unduly extends the restriction contained in the said proviso.

And that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, the House went into Committee on Bill No. 53 (from the Senate) to amend the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, as amended by Special Committee, Mr. Stevens in the Chair.

Mr. McKENZIE: What was the result of the sending of this Bill to the Special Committee?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: The report of the Special Committee, with suggested amendments, was submitted to the House some time ago, and the amendments have been printed and circulated among members of the House. The amendments recommended by the committee are substantially in line with the views expressed by a majority of the House when it was up for second reading. The committee have recommended that the sale of opiates containing opium or derivatives of opium be absolutely prohibited.

Mr. BUREAU: Before he went away the member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) made reference to the fact that certain hon. gentlemen, including, I think, the member for Muskoka (Mr. P. McGibbon), had taken a particular interest in this Bill. I understand that the subject matter which the hon. gentleman had in mind was with reference to drugs containing opium or other narcotics. Are the proposed amendments incorporated in the Bill?

Mr. MACLEAN: We propose to incorporate the amendments in the Bill. I am accepting absolutely the recommendations contained in the report of the Special Committee, which, I understand, was unanimous.

On section 7—Prohibited medicines.

Mr. PEDLOW: I do not understand exactly how we are proceeding. Are you reading all the amendments?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stevens): I might explain that practically the whole Bill is one section amending various sections of the Act.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think section 7 is subject to some discussion.

Mr. FOURNIER: In subsection (g) "If the article to be represented as a cure for any specific disease," we are going further than the law of any other country. The United States regulation on this subject is usually considered the most stringent, and it provides that the preparation may not be designated as a cure unless, as a matter of fact, it can be depended upon to produce the results claimed for it. I venture to say if you pass this clause you will have a whole lot of trouble. If you want to wipe out patent medicines that are no good, I might suggest to my hon. friend (the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) to not go any further than the United States and the British law.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The section, as amended, will prevent the advertising of any drug as a cure. We are going just as far as the United States, but I think we are putting ourselves in a better position, although the legislation is practically the same.

The United States legislation is to the effect that patent medicines must not contain any false, misleading or exaggerated claims on the wrapper or label. It is very difficult to prove that. It is doubtful if any medicine is a cure for anything. Medical men who are members of the committee assured the committee that there was practically no such thing as a medicinal cure for any specific disease, except, perhaps, three or four. The effect of the United States legislation is to prohibit any advertisements of a patent medicine as a cure, and it is quite proper that we prohibit the advertisement of any medicine as a cure. This does not prevent manufacturers from selling their product.

Mr. FOURNIER: I think this would prevent a manufacturer of anything like antitoxin from selling his product.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Antitoxin is not a patent medicine it is one of the things that might be denominated as a specific cure. A patent medicine is a medicinal preparation which is patented, and the formula is not disclosed to the public. If the formula is disclosed to the public, the preparation is not a patent medicine.

Mr. MANION: The reason that the medical men object to the word "cure" is practically what the minister states except that he goes further. Most of them state—and I think correctly—that there are only a few medicines in the world, such as antitoxin, which cure disease, and they are not patent medicines, they are medicines which are usually used. In the past manufacturers have quite often put up patent medicines representing them as cures. For instance, a manufacturer may put up a patent medicine representing it as a cure for consumption when, as a matter of fact, there is no such thing as a cure for consumption, and inestimable damage has been done to the people of this country by advertising such patent medicines as cures for consumption. The elimination of the word "cure" will do no harm to the patent medicine manufacturer, and it will give protection to the public whom we are only safeguarding in taking this stand.

Mr. PEDLOW: I do not think you can enforce this to the limit, because journals and periodicals printed outside of this country contain advertisements of medicines, the announcements claiming that the medicines are cures. How are you going to regulate in a case of that kind? If you discriminate against advertisements appearing in Canadian journals guaranteeing these medicines as cures, the owners of these proprietary medicines will have to go outside for their advertising mediums, and they can have their announcements published in English journals and those of other countries.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This Bill will prevent the importation of any medicine which is represented as a specific cure for any particular ailment. It cannot prohibit the advertisement in foreign journals of any medicine which is asserted to be a cure for anything. Clause 7 begins by stating:

No proprietary or patent medicine shall be manufactured, imported, exposed or offered for sale or sold in Canada if—

As in this particular instance, —it is represented as a cure.

So the public are protected in that way. They can have the pleasure of reading in foreign journals advertisements about these medicines promising a cure, but that is all.

Mr. PEDLOW: Will that prevent an individual from sending outside for them?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): I think I said the last time this Bill was up that the only object of a Bill of this kind is to protect the public, and I submit with all due respect to the minister that this clause does not give them any protection at all. It is rather around this clause that all the curse of patent medicines hinges. It is quite true that formerly we had a number of medicines advertised as cures for certain diseases, but that time has long since passed away, and now a manufacturer simply sets down symptoms which are peculiar to a certain disease and advertises his medicine as a cure for those symptoms, and that is far more effective than advertising it as a cure for any particular disease. This clause opens the door to all kinds of fraud, and innocent people will be imposed upon by the hundreds and thousands, and this clause ought to be eliminated.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If we eliminate this clause, there is no protection whatever for the public. As the subsection stood in the original Bill, it read:

If the article be represented as a cure for any specific disease.

The word " specific " is stricken out in the amendments recommended by the Committee, so that the result of the amendment is that no patent medicine can be manufactured, imported, exposed or offered for sale in Canada if it contains the representation that it is a cure for anything, so that this is a positive enactment against representing anything as a cure for any ailment. If we strike this clause out altogether, then there is no protection for the public, and manufacturers can import and expose for sale any medicine represented as a cure. I thought my hon. friend did not quite understand the situation.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): I quite understand the situation, but probably I did not make my point clear. This allows manufacturers to get around the purport of the Bill by simply changing the wording of their advertisements. The objections taken a few minutes ago are quite in order, namely that we ought to follow the lines laid down in Great Britain and the United States, or else we should put in a clause specifically prohibiting manufacturers from advertising a medicine, not as a cure, but as a relief for any specific set of symptoms, because that is the line all these advertisements are taking now. A manufacturer does not advertise his medicine as a cure for consumption, but the advertisement will describe the symptoms of tuberculosis and then describe the medicine as a cure for them. There is no protection for the public at all.

Mr. MANION: The intention of the committee was to eliminate the word " cure " altogether. It is possible, as the hon. member says, the word might be used as a cure for symptoms. You cannot eliminate advertisements of medicines claiming that they will give some relief, because they may give some relief to certain symptoms of certain diseases.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): If you follow the law as it is in the United States and in England, you would have more effect.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have also this clause containing a prohibition against any representations of a false, misleading or exaggerated character being used on the label or wrapper. That is really the American provision. The Americans do not make an enactment against the use of the word " cure ". They state simply that no false, misleading or exaggerated claim shall be printed on the wrapper or label, and under that clause, they presume to prohibit the use of the word " cure ". We have specifically enacted against the use of the word, so that we are in a much clearer and stronger position than the United States, and besides that, we have their clause for what it is worth. If you attempt to prosecute a vendor of patent medicines on the ground that the wrapper or label contains misleading or exaggerated claims, it is, in my judgment, a very difficult thing to prove. I think we have in this Bill everything of importance in the American Act. We are also specifically providing against the use of the word "cure." Unless I had an opportunity of giving further consideration to the suggestion of my hon. friend, I would hardly care to accept it. We are enacting pretty sweeping legislation, and I thing it will meet the case.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I submit again that I am not interested in the manufacturers of patent medicines, but in protecting the public from deception. If I were a patent medicine manufacturer I would not want a different law from this.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am unable to agree with my hon. friend. We are specifically providing against the use of the word "cure" for any disease, and I think under that provision we could prosecute a man who advertised a cure for the symptom of any disease.

Mr. FOURNIER: I know something about the drug business, but I am thankful to say I have absolutely no connection with it now. I certainly think the minister will have a lot of trouble if he leaves the Bill as it is now, and I would suggest that he add after the word " disease," in paragraph (g), the words " unless it can be depended upon to produce the results claimed for it."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I fail to see how a direct enactment against the use of the word "cure" is not better than an enactment against the use of that word with the qualification that my hon. friend has suggested. If we adopted his suggestion, it would be very difficult to secure a conviction. I am assuming that my hon. friend wishes to prevent the sale of patent medicines representing to cure certain diseases.

Mr. FOURNIER: Take the case of jaundice, for instance; that is not a disease but a symptom.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am told there is no cure for jaundice.

Mr. MANION: I do not like discussing medical questions on the floor of the House, as it smacks of talking shop, but as my hon. friend has mentioned jaundice, I agree that it is not a disease but a symptom. There is no distinct cure for jaundice, because it arises from many different causes, and anybody who advertised that a medicine would cure jaundice would come under the clause against exaggerated advertising, because there is no one thing that will cure all types of jaundice.

Mr. FOURNIER: I trust that the minister will accept my suggestion to add the words I have proposed to paragraph (g). That will be as far as the British and the United States law goes, and the Swedish law, too, I believe. It is the only way you can deal with patent medicines.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. STEELE: I would direct the attention of the committee to subsection 2 of section 7. One of the matters that was urged in connection with this Bill was the necessity for curtailing the use of medicines containing opium for children. Subsection 2 says:

> No proprietary or patent medicine intended for administration to infants under one year old shall contain any opium or any derivative of opium, or any derivative of coal-tar.

I think the weakness of that subsection lies in the word " intended." Intended by whom? A manufacturer may put up a soothing syrup exactly along the line of the old-time soothing syrup and disclaim any intention of its being administered to a child under one year of age. The mother, knowing that it is really the same soothing syrup, or that it will have the effect of quietening her child, which she desires, buys it, and administers it to her child just the same as she did formerly. She is not responsible in any way under the law. It seems to me this subsection is absolutely useless for the purpose for which it was intended, and I would suggest that it be amended in order to meet the views of many people, and especially of the social workers of the province of Quebec.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 6 says:

> All proprietary or patent medicines containing opium, or any derivative of coal-tar, and intended for administration to children over one year of age shall be labelled with the words " Dangerous for infants under one year old."

Mr. STEELE: Possibly that covers the situation.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is any penalty provided for an infraction of the provisions of this Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a general penalty clause in the Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—new section 7A.

Mr. FOURNIER: It is provided that five members shall be appointed on the Advisory Board, and I think that pharmaceutists actively engaged in the drug business should be represented.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is a fair suggestion.

Mr. FOURNIER: It should be made plain.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think it is good legislation to specify any classes of persons who shall constitute the membership of a board to be appointed under the law. The department must be trusted to select the proper personnel. I quite agree with the suggestion that the class mentioned by the hon. member should be represented.

Mr. FOURNIER: The druggists, who number about 5,000 or 6,000 in this country, are respectable citizens and are entitled to consideration. It is no more trouble to include druggists actively engaged in pharmacy than it is to insert the Dominion Analyst.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The statute does not designate any particular class for the board. We simply state that the chairman of the board shall be the Dominion Analyst, and he is the official of the department administering this and similar Acts. When the department constitute the board they will have in mind, of course the particular interests of the pharmaceutical profession in Canada. Personally, if I were asked to give an opinion, I would say that they are entitled to representation on a board of five, but if you say that one particular class shall be represented, you must stipulate in the Bill what other four classes shall have representation. The statute framed in that way would be unsound and too restrictive.

Mr. FOURNIER: I think that men actively engaged in the drug business should be represented. After all, we copy the United States in many ways, and there you will find that pharmacists are represented on boards of similar character, being represented even on the Board of Health.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not mind saying that they will be represented.

Mr. McKENZIE: What Act is repealed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There was an Act known as the Doherty Act which contained a clause that had reference to patent medicines, and that should not have been in that Act. The amending Bill at page 3 in the second last paragraph contains an amendment by inserting immediately after section 16 a provision to the effect that any penalty incurred under the provisions of this Act shall be deemed an addition to and not in substitution for any penalty incurred under the law of any province. That is the section which we are repealing and which is in chapter 19 of the statutes of 1916. We are taking it out of one Act and putting it into this, because it has relation to patent medicines.

Bill as amended reported.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions—Steam service between Quebec and ports on the north and, or south shores of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and, or between the ports in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and the Magdalen Islands, $70,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What are the sudsidies under this item, and what trips will be made, and so forth? I should like some information in this respect.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is a combination of services that were performed last year under separate services and separate votes. It means no increase whatever. It is a re-arrangement of old services. It does not mean an additional vote of money. The contractors have not been able so far to perform the Newfoundland end of the service. They were to call at Prince Edward Island, Pictou, Mulgrave or Hawkesbury proceed through the lakes and on to Newfoundland. The company have been unable to obtain a steamer suitable for the service but we are hopeful that they will be able to do so any day now. At the time the contract was entered into last year it was thought that the steamer leaving Quebec and calling at ports of the south shore of the St. Lawrence would proceed:— en route to Newfoundland but the company have been unable to do that. Later, they asked to be allowed to take a portion of this subsidy and apply it to a direct service between Quebec and Newfoundland via Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton ports. While, up to the present time they have been unable to get a steamer to go on the service, we are hopeful that they may get one any day now.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the minister name the ports that they call at in Nova Scotia?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I find I was in error in saying that there were several ports in Cape Breton that the boat would call at. Apparently there is only Sydney.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the name of the boat that used to perform that service?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It has not been performed for several years. It is a revival of an old service that was performed by some of the Dominion Coal Company boats.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Black Diamond line?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Black Diamond line. Very strong representations have been made by the people of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland and Montreal for the establishment of this service but unfortunately it has been impossible up to date to get a steamer to perform the service. There is no service but I am asking for the vote so that it may be available at the time that a boat is available.

Mr. CHISHOLM: If this service is to be established, I want to make a strong appeal to the minister to have the boat call on the western coast of Cape Breton. I think that the boat might call at Cheticamp. It is right on the route to Sydney. The only question is whether there is enough water and, due to the fact that there are no boats, we cannot discuss that feature of it. The boat that usually comes down there calls at that port. There is 21 feet of water. There is considerable amount of freight to be carried and if the boat calls at this port, it would give connection between that part of the country and the port of Sydney.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If my hon. friend will be good enough to write a letter to the department covering that matter it will be inquired into.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I will do so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not in a position to give him any more definite answer. If Cheticamp harbour has not a sufficient depth of water to accommodate the steamer that would be a sufficient answer. I think that the Newfoundland subsidized services from Nova Scoia require rearrangement. There are too many different subsidies voted.

Mr. DUFF: At what port in Newfoundland will the boat call?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: St. John's.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister say that St. John's is the objective?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In this service. There is a subsidized service to Newfoundland, I think from Halifax. They go through the Bras d'Or lakes and then on to some port on the west coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not know that it is good business to send boats around to St. John's from Quebec unless it can be shown there is really business to be done. There is a line of boats running between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, connecting with the line of railway across the island of Newfoundland unless it was found that the railway and the Reid line are unable to cope with the traffic and that there is business to be done it would hardly be desirable to add another subsidy.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a very real demand for a steamship service between Canadian ports and Newfoundland at the present time. The Reid-Newfoundland company are unable to handle the traffic arriving at North Sydney for delivery to their railway system. Great quantities of goods are now in Canada which should have been in Newfoundland months ago. Owing to the inability of the Reid company to handle the traffic, the Government had before it yesterday a representative of the Newfoundland Government who was here to ask that we loan them temporarily a boat to run between Sydney, or North Sydney and St. John's so as to relieve the congestion on the Reid-Newfoundland line. It will also be helpful to the Intercolonial railway. I think the Minister of Railways, or the Canadian National Railway Board, was enabled to meet to some degree the request of the Government of Newfoundland. There is a great congestion at the present time.

Mr. McKENZIE: The route between Canada and Newfoundland is established as far as North Sydney is concerned because the trade converges by rail at North Sydney. If it is necessary to add a further boat to carry the goods from the terminus of the Intercolonial railway at Sydney to Newfoundland I think it is good business but I do not think it is good business to start a boat from somewhere on the river St. Lawrence calling at intermediate ports and then going to North Sydney to take on goods. The railway is quite capable of handling the traffic going out through North Sydney and which can then be carried by boat across to Newfoundland.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a considerable quantity of goods being purchased for Newfoundland in Quebec and Ontario. There is apparently a very substantial amount of business in Prince Edward Island which goes to Newfoundland. The steamer en route can call at Charlottetown. Later, I suppose, when the Reid-Newfoundland Steamship Company are in a position to purchase more steamers, they may be able to relieve the congestion. Our trade with Newfoundland is developing and Canadian merchants are anxious to maintain and improve their position in that regard. Unfortunately, we have not yet been able to get this additional steamer.

Mr. DUFF: The trouble is that at Port aux Basques the facilities are not adequate. Moreover, the steamship service which is now proposed to be subsidized will carry quite a different class of goods from that which has been handled by the ships of the Reid Company. Cattle, for instance, could not very well be transported by the boat engaged in this service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques.

Steam service from Sydney to Bras d'Or Lake ports, and ports on the east and west coasts of Cape Breton, $14,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is a new service which will be performed by a company now operating from Sydney. It will be a weekly service. The boat will leave Sydney, proceed through the lakes, and to points in Northern Inverness, and then run to Sydney via the south and west coasts of Cape Breton island.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What are the ports of call?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Sydney, North Sydney, Baddeck, Grand Narrows, Marble Mountain, Castle Bay, East Bay, Big Pond, Irish Cove, Johnston's Harbour, St. Peter's, Poulamond, Grandique, Port Hawkesbury, Port Hastings, Port Hood, Mabou, Margaree, Grand Etang, Cheticamp, L'Ardoise, Arichat, Gabarus, Louisburg, Main-à-dieu, Port Morien, North Sydney and Sydney.

Mr. McKENZIE: If this was a service all-around the island of Cape Breton, commencing and ending at Sydney, I would look upon it as a splendid service. But the ports which the minister has mentioned are already served by subsidized boats. For instance, that part of the Bras d'Or Lakes south of the Grand Narrows bridge is served by the Richmond.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Richmond has been taken off and is replaced by this new steamer, which will carry out the service formerly performed by the Richmond. The new boat is larger and faster than the Richmond.

Mr. McKENZIE: A service such as the Richmond was giving in that part of the Bras d'Or Lakes should not be changed at the whim or caprice of any steamboat owner. The people have been getting a service; it is the money of the people that is being paid out in the granting of these subsidies, and merchants and others interested should be consulted. They were getting two trips a week from the Richmond, which is a very good little boat; now they are to get a weekly service simply because the owners of this boat think that they can make money in that way. When traffic or trade routes are established by a service subsidized by the Government, that service should not be thrown aside for something less serviceable without giving the people concerned an opportunity of expressing their views in the matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have been under the impression that this new service would be more satisfactory to the people of the ports concerned than was the service rendered by the Richmond. It is a very much larger boat.

Mr. McKENZIE: She worked very well.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: She probably had to call at these ports in order to carry freight, and consequently had to make two trips a week. However, if it transpires that this service does not meet the local requirements, it will have to be reconsidered.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have a Government creamery at the town of Baddeck. The great body of people on the Bras d'Or lakes south of the Grand Narows used to send their cream by the Richmond to the Grand Narrows and then it was transferred to the Blue Hill, and there must have been three or four trips a week. If there is only one trip that service is absolutely abolished.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has my hon. friend any objections to the changed service?

Mr. McKENZIE: If it is less efficient than the old, I certainly have. Those people are not in my county, but the creamery is, and it is a Government creamery. If this new boat is giving less efficient service to the people than the Richmond was giving, I certainly object to the change.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Would the minister be good enough to tell the Committee the total amount of money that is paid out in steamship subsidies?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In round figures the total amount to be paid this year is $2,400,000. Of course, that includes all sums paid for services on the Atlantic and the Pacific, which form the greater part of the total I have mentioned. After all, the moneys paid out for subsidies to local services in the Eastern part of Canada do not amount to very much. I cannot give my hon. friend exact figures.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I am not particular about what is paid out in the East; I merely want the total. Have the Government control, and do they exercise control, over the tariff arrangements made by these boats with the people who trade with them? If so, what is the nature of the control ?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have a very decided control over freight rates. In the first place, the freight schedules must be approved by the Government.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: What department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Department of Trade and Commerce. For instance, we subsidize a service between the British West Indies and the ports of Halifax and St. John. We fix their rates. The rate on flour per barrel is ninety cents, and it has remained so during the war, constituting a decided advantage to Canadian millers. It was a cheap rate, too. It has the effect of keeping the freight rate on flour from points in Canada to the British West Indies via New York at ninety cents, and had we not control of the rate charged by this subsidized service, the freight rate would be very much greater to Canadian exporters of flour.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Do I understand that the rates are fixed by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and that the department are in a position to know what rates should be charged along the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast without having some official set aside for that purpose?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All subsidized services must have their rates approved by the department. They submit their freight schedules to the department for approval, and the department advise themselves in the best way possible as to the fairness of those schedules. We have an inspector of the local services, in regard to which it would be most difficult to ascertain whether the freight rates are fair or not. So far as the Atlantic and Pacific freight rates are concerned, it is not a difficult matter for the department to be advised as to what are fair rates, because they are in touch with the commercial rates and can secure the advice of men competent to advise them.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I am puzzled to know the extent to which these rates are examined into from time to time. While I know the Department of Trade and Commerce are very efficient in so many ways, I can hardly believe that they can possibly be in touch with the conditions existing at the different ports of entry that these boats are connected with, and I would be surprised to know that the department were able to control the shipping rates in the sense that the Railway Commission control railway rates.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Our control is absolute to this extent, that unless a contractor will enter into an agreement with the Government as to the rates to be charged by him, he cannot get the subsidy.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Does he file a schedule of his rates with the department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am struck with the disparity in these items, Mr. Chairman. I know the services very well. There is a most important service under item 184, from Sydney to Whycocomagh performed by the steamer Marion. While I do not want to disparage the service rendered under item 185, I submit it is not one whit as important to that part of Canada as the service performed between Sydney and Whycocomagh. I cannot reconcile those votes. Then there is the service performed by the same people who expect to run this new boat between Sydney and the Bay St. Lawrence, along a rocky coast; they are to get only $6,000, against $14,000 for the service under item 185.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The supplementals will contain an additional $1,000 for the service.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend knows the island of Cape Breton and the service performed between Sydney and Whycocomagh, serving a large number of people along the Bras d'Or Lakes. The owners of the boat get only $3,000 for that service, while the other service is subsidized to the extent of $14,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Might I ask the minister to kindly jog the memory of the Hendric Company, Halifax, I think, about which I wrote the minister a few days ago? This service is performed by the Strathlorn, which carries the goods past ports such as Margaree down to Cheticamp and Grand Etang, and if the weather is not sufficiently fine, carries those goods back to Halifax, and they are dumped down upon the wharf there. Such conduct is unjustifiable, and I do not see why they should be permitted to do such a thing. More than that, this year they have departed from their obligation as regards carrying out their contract to Inverness and have gone into another service, to Guysborough, which is entirely different, carrying goods to way ports, and returning to Halifax without going to Inverness ports at all back when it suits themselves.

If this be true, I would ask the minister to see to it that this is stopped or the boat be discontinued entirely. We are dependent upon that service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The company will be asked for an explanation.

Trade and Commerce—trade commissioners and commercial agents, including expenses in connection with negotiations of treaties or in extension of commercial relations: miscellaneous advertising and printing, or other expenditures connected with Canadian trade, $180,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is the increase for?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This increase is asked for just to have the supply necessary if any extraordinary expenditures are undertaken during the year in the way of development of Canadian trade abroad and by way of establishing additional trade commissioners. It is quite improbable that the additional amount will be used this year. Since the termination of the war, however, the department is frequently in receipt of requests to send trade commissioners to many new places with a view of ascertaining if it is possible to develop trade in those places. One would expect that these requests would be made at this time when all nations are contesting very keenly for commercial supremacy in all parts of the world. I thought it would be well that we should have, perhaps, a small amount in addition to that of last year for this purpose. At the present time, I cannot say that it will be used; it does not look as if it would be this year.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The statement was made by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) the other day that some $6,000,000 was expended by the Government in financing the sale of meat to Italy. Can the minister tell us what prices are being paid to producers of this meat and from whom it has been purchased?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it was my hon. friend who asked the minister about this matter or, perhaps, it was some other hon. member, and upon his request I laid upon the table of the House this forenoon a copy of the Order in Council to which I would refer my hon. friend. I think it will give him the information he desires.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does this Order in Council give the names of the parties from whom the meat was purchased?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, I do not think it would do that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Can the minister furnish us with the names and the prices the meat was sold at?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot promise to do it to-day, but I would be in a position to do it on Monday.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is the meat taken from cold storage warehouses?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This was meat that was purchased in anticipation of sale to the Allied powers for army purposes, and, in fact, I think the Allied powers were morally obligated to take this meat. When the armistice came, the demand was reduced very materially, and the meat was on the hands of the contractors, who endeavoured to sell it to the Canadian public, but I believe they were unable to do so almost at any price. The British Government, my recollection is, undertook to make a disposition of it so far as they could, and they entered into some arrangement with the Government of Italy whereby they would take this quantity of meat that was in cold storage in Canada and which was in danger of being destroyed altogether or becoming useless. It was for that purpose the Canadian Government gave credit to Italy.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understood the minister to say that the British Government was handling this business and that the meat had to be sold and that Canada undertook to finance the transaction. Is the Canadian Government by taking this step relieving the Imperial Government of a responsibility?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is a matter of business with which I have nothing to do, and I am speaking without accurate knowledge of the facts. I will send for a copy of the Order in Council, and I will endeavour by Monday to get the further information for my hon. friend.

Mr. McKENZIE: I must reiterate what I said to the minister some time ago about the sale of goods of this character or the sending of such goods out of the country. The law of supply and demand means the supply in a country itself and the demand in that country for that supply, or the demand that a foreign country might make upon that supply with its own means or money. The Canadian consumer was entitled to the competition that would arise in this country in connection with the sale of supplies of food that were in this country and the Government is not dealing fairly with the consumer when it is furnishing money to a foreign country in order to buy those goods and take them out of Canada, because that has certainly a direct effect on keeping prices higher than they would be if the matter was left to trade and traffic in this country itself. I cannot see any justification why the Canadian consumers are compelled by this Government to a foreign country, when that money is to be used for the purpose of keeping prices at the high top-notch figures at which they are now. If we have a reduction at all by competition, it is by the supply becoming large and people being obliged to bid or do the best they can to get the current prices for their goods.

Mr. BURNHAM: What method would the hon. member adopt to establish the proper balance between the producer and the consumer?

Mr. McKENZIE: The law which exists and which is as old as the hills, the law which regulates itself as to supply and demand. If there is a large supply of beef in this country, and the merchant or the owner of it cannot keep at his high prices in order to get rid of it, he must sell at a lower price. But this Government steps in and says to that man: You need not sell at any lower price; we will keep you at war prices, and we will give money to foreigners so as to enable them to come into this country and buy that extra supply and take it out of the country and enable you to keep at your high prices. The law of supply and demand, as I understand it, is put out of operation in that way by artificial means, and I say that the Government of this country is not justified in doing that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are just two views on the question which my hon. friend has raised. One is that no aid in the form of credits be given to our export trade, and that it be allowed to operate as in pre-war days. The other view is that you assist the purchasing country to pay for our goods by lending them the money. My hon. friend says that we should allow the law of supply and demand to govern all trade and commerce. Every nation desires that, but there is no such thing in some countries to-day as the operation of the law of supply and demand. The question of wheat, for instance, which we are likely to discuss some day next week, presents a great many difficulties. We shall have a wheat crop this year of probably 300,000,000 bushels, and an exportable surplus of from 200,000,000 to 225,000,000 bushels. Everybody knows that it is important that this Canadian wheat gets out of the country. Wheat is no better than any other product, except that it is more useful as a food than some others, and the wheat producer has no right to expect better treatment than the farmer who is producing other products, but it is very desirable from the standpoint of exchange that the wheat should get out of the country, because it is one of our exportable products. If we export 200,000,000 bushels of wheat, that means $400,000,000 coming into this country with which to pay for our imports from the United States, and therefore it is desirable that we should have a movement in our grain trade this year. But the Western farmer cannot export his wheat unless he gets paid for it in some way or other. Suppose that Great Britain says next September or October "We will not guarantee the price of wheat, and we have no way of buying your wheat unless you advance us the money. We will buy of Argentina or of Australia, who are willing to give us a credit." If that event should occur the situation would be serious, unless we loaned Great Britain the money.

Money will never pay for the imports of a country. Great Britain's gold supply would be exhausted in a week is she had to pay for her imports in money. So while natural trade is desirable, and is better for producer and consumer, and the sooner all nations get back to it the better, still conditions prevail which prevent it and for which nobody is responsible. I quite agree with the views of my hon. friend, but it may very well happen that we may yet have to give credits to help our export trade. Where would Canada be to-day if we were not exporting what we are under the credits that were given last year. There would be a congestion in this country of our exportable goods, and production would immediately diminish, because there would be no encouragement to produce. However, that matter has been discussed several times in Parliament, both sides of the case have been presented clearly and ably, and the question is likely to come up again next week on the amendments to the Grain Act. The Government are not anxious to establish further credits to any other country. It may well be that we have reached the point where it would not be wise, and might even be impossible, for us to grant further credits. I can assure my hon. friend that no one is more anxious to cease the granting of credits than the Government, because many difficulties are involved in securing the credits and taking care of their distribution.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister has not dealt with the main question at all, that this manipulation of finance maintains high prices. Does he expect to go on doing this or is he going to stop? If it is true that the granting of credits is the cause of the inflation of prices, every time a credit is granted increases the price to the home consumer. When is it going to come to an end?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the end will come when we reach the time hoped for by the leader of the Opposition when natural trade conditions will prevail, when the nations of the world will be importing and exporting as they did before the war, when we shall again have international competition. When Canadian products are sold, the price is agreed upon by the purchasing country. If Canada furnishes credits for the purchase of Canadian products by other countries, we do not fix the price. There is such a demand, particularly for certain food products and some manufactured articles, that prices are extremely high to-day. Take the case of wheat. The fixed and guaranteed price in the United States for this year is $2.26; ours last year was $2.24. That is a very high price for wheat, but I doubt very much whether the world will ever see again the price levels of days gone by when wheat was selling below a dollar a bushel. Although $2.24 seems a high price, the view prevails that it is not an excessive price. When the United States fixed the price at $2.26 last year, they submitted the whole matter to a committee of eight very expert men, and it was their judgment that that was not an unfair price for the producer. I have discussed this matter with a great many Canadian wheat producers, and I am bound to say that I doubt very much whether it is an excessive price, particularly if there is a small or average crop. The cost to the farmer of producing wheat is exceedingly high at the present time, or at least very much in excess of the cost which prevailed prior to the war. I suppose that if credits were granted freely by governments to all countries desiring to purchase their goods it would have the effect of driving up prices, but no country is anxious to give credits to-day. The United States Government is not giving any, although they realize that somebody in the United States must make advances to European countries or they would not be able to sell. I cannot see how any European country can purchase anything of any kind to any extent unless somebody advances them the money.

Mr. BURNHAM: We can all buy if you give us the money.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But these credits have to be repaid.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister is speaking as if he were solicitous about the farmer, but it is not the farmer that is going to be benefited by this transaction which we are discussing; it is the owners of the cold storage plants, who have hoarded up this meat to fetch a high price. The people of Canada needed this meat, but the cold storage men would not sell it to them. They held it until, as the minister says, it was in danger of being destroyed, and then the Government steps in and furnishes money to export it to Italy, financing the bills for Italy. I have no doubt Italy is just as able to do its own financing as Canada. Why does the Government do this for the cold storage people? It is not in the interests of the farmers, for not one dollar of this money will go into the pockets of the farmers; it will go to the profiteers. That is what makes it so difficult for the people of Canada to accept the situation. It is not only in regard to meat and wheat, but in regard to other things as well. I was speaking to a merchant tailor this morning and he told me about the difficulty he had in securing cloth to keep his business going. He said that if you went to one of the jobbers' shops there were half a dozen persons looking for the same web of cloth, and one man would offer $5 a yard and another $6. They would bid against one another because they had to have it. The mills are busy making cloth for Rumania, and the Government is borrowing money from the people of Canada to finance the business. The millers do not care anything about Canadian trade. They are doing very well by selling their goods in foreign countries. This has to stop, and the sooner the better.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I quite agree that it must stop, and the sooner the better. I am sure that it is the desire of all countries to get back to normal trading. But unfortunately there has been a war for four years or more and all trade and commerce has been disrupted and has been conducted for some time along artificial lines. I did not know when I was speaking that my hon. friend had in mind this credit to Italy for the purchase of wheat. I was speaking generally of the policy of granting credits. I am not very well acquainted with the facts concerning the sale of meat to Italy.

Mr. CAHILL: Who were morally obligated?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The British Government acting on behalf of the Allied governments. The producers in Canada were urged to get supplies together and have them ready for export, and the goods would have been required had the war continued. I understand that this meat that was sold to Italy was of such a quality that no purchaser could be found in Canada for it. It was known as "thin" beef and the owners offered it to the Canadian public at, I believe, very fair rates. I remember conversing one day with an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who was engaged in this business in Quebec or Montreal, and he informed me that in that particular city—I think it was Quebec—you could not induce any one to purchase this beef because it was frozen or chilled. I shall endeavour to get the information my hon. friend requires about this sale of beef to Italy. I must repeat that I am not well acquainted with the facts.

Mr. CAHILL: Are these bonds in the case of Italy taken at the same rate as in the case of Rumania—5 per cent?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At 5½ per cent.

Mr. CAHILL: Does not the Government attempt to do business with these countries on something more approaching a business basis? We were told the other day that Rumanian debentures were only worth 72 We are selling goods to Rumania and taking only 72 cents on the dollar, whereas we have to pay 100 cents on the dollar. The Government is making loans to other countries and increasing the cost of living to the people here. The cost of living in Canada is a very serious problem. The Textile Company and other concerns make exorbitant profits while the people are groaning under the burden of the high cost of living. The Government should try to reduce the cost of living rather than enhance it and make it harder for the people to live. I cannot understand why we should lend our money to the manufacturers of this country to sell goods to foreign countries whose credit is not good and take their securities at par when they are not worth par. Why should we look for the worst customers in the world and take their note at prices offered by the best customer? You cannot continue this artificial trade. The time will come when there will have to be an accounting. If these countries are not able to pay the people of Canada will have to pay, and are paying now. They are paying exorbitant prices for the products they buy here and the Government are only enabling the profiteers to get more money out of the Canadian people. I cannot see, for the life of me, how the Government can justify loans to foreign countries and take money worth only 70 to 80 cents on the dollar. The Government is enabling the profiteers to exploit the people of Canada, as was the case during the war.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not desire to delay the Committee, but it would be a mistake to allow to pass unchallenged the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cahill) and others. The hon. member's opinion that the trade policy of the Government at this time is simply pandering to the profiteer is absolutely unfounded. He evidently overlooks the fact that the market in Europe today is bare of goods of all classes, including foodstuffs, which must be supplied and will be supplied. Where will the supplies come from? Chiefly from the American continent, that is, from Canada and the United States. We can, if we choose, take advantage of this extraordinary position, by arranging Government credit—where private credit has been eliminated by the war—through no fault of the manufacturer or trader—in Rumania, Belgium and France, where the factories have been blown up and storehouses have been under German control for years. These business concerns have no organization or credit, and the Rumanian, Belgian, or French Government, as the case may be, establishes national credit which this Government takes advantage of, and to the result of which I invite the attention of the hon. gentleman, because it is a matter of vital importance to Canada. Taking advantage of this dearth of goods in Europe, and being in the fortunate position of being able to supply those goods by the medium of Government credits replacing the shattered private credits, we are putting Canadian goods on the European market where they never were before. In other words, we are building up foreign trade. I have heard hon. gentlemen on the floor of this House chide the Government for not sending out more trade commissioners, and time and again attention has been drawn to Great Britain, the United States, Japan and other enterprising counties that were spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in sending trade commissioners the world over to develop foreign trade, Now, here we have a perfectly natural opportunity to inject our trade into the European market. I come now to the point suggested by my hon. friend from Peterborough. The argument is advanced that we should not send goods to Europe at the present time under any arrangement of Government credits. It is contended that because there is a scarcity in Canada we should keep these goods here for the local market and prevent export. Let the hon. gentleman consider this point:

Supposing we shut off these Rumanian, French and Belgian credits, what would be the result? The American buyers would come over here, buy these goods, ship them to American ports, send them into Europe as American goods, and we would be in the same position as we are in to-day, except that we would not have secured an entry into the foreign market. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) smiles. I speak in all seriousness when I say that that is exactly what would occur.

Mr. CAHILL: That would be fine; we would get our money back then.

Mr. STEVENS: We would get the money back then? Then the hon. gentleman hinges his whole argument upon the point whether the French, Belgian or Rumanian Government will redeem their pledges. The hon. gentleman suggests that, because of the low value of the bond, this Government is selling goods worth 100 at 72. He knows perfectly well that that is—I was going to say a false argument—but I will say an inaccurate argument. These bonds may only be worth 60 or 70 or 80 but the value of the goods fixes the amount that is paid for them in bonds. If the goods are worth 100 in gold, and the bonds are worth only 72 in gold, they will have to make up the difference in bonds.

There is another point. We were told by the hon. member for Guysborough a moment ago that this Government was encouraging the cold storage companies to hoard up meats for the purpose of shipping goods overseas. I have absolutely no sympathy with the so-called packing institutions. I have no brief for them; in fact, if I could drag anything out of them to show that they had been doing wrong I would be almost pleased to do so. But still we ought, as a Parliament, and as the leading element in this country, to send forth to the public the facts. As near as I can judge from the facts produced, the situation was simply this: There was a surplus of frozen beef last winter brought about by this condition, namely, that at the signing of the armistice current contracts—not prospective but existing contracts—were cancelled leaving, as it were in transit between the farmer and the ultimate market, large quantities of beef. My hon. friend suggests that the beef was spoiling, but experts of the Government have told us that this beef cannot spoil as long as it is frozen and that it will keep in good condition for a long time. There is no truth in the story, or inference, that the beef was spoiling. But there was a large accumulation at that period caused by the cancelling of these contracts. That beef was exported. As to the hoarding of other stuff in cold storage plants, no evidence has yet been brought forward, so far as I have been able to learn, either before the Cost of Living Commissioner or before the special committee of this House, to show that there has been a hoarding of other foodstuffs in cold storage warehouses. If that is so, we ought to know it. Let me just again emphasize this point at issue, which is all important in connection with getting into the European market, that if we fail to take advantage of the opportunity now, we will simply give the same privilege to the American traders and will not be one whit better off in Canada as far as the shortage of food is concerned. It is infinitely better for us to sell our goods at their market value in order to establish a market for future trade, even at the cost of a slightly enhanced value here at the present time. If there is anything that should be done by this Government at all it is the fixing of the spread at home. That possibly is a matter that may be brought to the consideration of this House a little later on, but under no circumstances should anything be done to interfere with the establishment of a Canadian foreign trade.

5 p.m.

Mr. CAHILL: The hon. member has given the best argument in the world why we should discontinue these credits. He says that the American people would buy the goods. If they did so we would be paid for them. We would get our money at the rate of 103 cents on the dollar instead of 72 cents on the dollar. The condition, according to the argument of the hon. member, is that Europe is bare of goods. I tell him that the pantries of this country are bare of goods and it is our duty to see that the people have provisions at a reasonable price. If the European markets are bare of goods, and we have the goods, surely there is a market here. If we trade on a cash basis we should be able to get the money for our goods. The argument of the hon. member (Mr. Stevens) is that we are getting the bonds at 72, but that is not my understanding of it. I heard a question asked by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) the other day, and my understanding is that the Minister of Finance said that the Government were taking the bonds at par.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: Is that right?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: If the bonds are selling at 72 we are not getting them at 72 but we are getting them at 100. Therefore we are losing the difference.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We expect that these bonds, when they mature, will be at their par value of 100. If Rumanian bonds could bring par in the markets of the world they would not have to ask for credit, but they would buy their goods wherever they liked.

Mr. CAHILL: I suppose that we may expect that our dollar in New York will be worth 100 cents but it is not so to-day; it is only worth 97. That condition of affairs prevails at all times and there is always fluctuation in the value of credit.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The very reason that Great Britain cannot buy to an unlimited degree in Canada is that the British pound is worth about $4.60 and it is liable to go to $4 any day. If the rate of exchange was $4.86⅔ Great Britain would not ask for credit for the goods she buys from us. The fact that Rumanian bonds are quoted at 72 does not prove that they will not be retired at par when they mature.

Mr. CAHILL: It is a mighty poor business man who pays 100 for bonds that are only worth 72. It is mighty bad business to send goods to some foreign country and take their bonds at 100 when they are only quoted at 72. There is no argument for that. The people must suffer as they are suffering. While you are telling the people that the dealers are not able to sell their meat in this country and that they are sending it to Italy, it is significant that the price has been increasing and is higher now than when the armistice was signed. If these dealers offered these meats to the Canadian people they would find a ready market for them here, but perhaps the price would go down. Instead of doing that they have held them, shipped them to a foreign country and they have sold the goods on the strength of Canada's credit. When you take these credits which have been granted to Great Britain, that is a different proposition. The Canadian people probably owe Great Britain a billion dollars to-day, taking into consideration the obligations of cities, corporations and municipalities. That is a matter of adjustment between Great Britain and Canada. But there is no adjustment between Italy or Rumania and Canada. When we sell goods to these countries we should take their money for what it is worth in the market. There is no question in my mind but that we are doing mighty bad business when we charge our people 100 cents on the dollar and sell to a foreign country the same goods at 72 cents.

Mr. BURNHAM: The most serious question before the country to-day is the high cost of living and if we bonus certain industries at the expense of the general consumer the high cost of living for the consumer will not go down but will go up and there will be greater unrest than there is now. The hon. member (Mr. Stevens), at the close of his remarks, said that there is a great temptation to make use of, or to take advantage of, the foreign market at the enhanced price. That is to say, the subsidized exporter is to have the benefit of this credit at the expense of the general consumer. But the general consumer will not stand for it. It is all very well to have a brilliant prospect, but it may be a rainbow dream; and that is what this is. If the money we were making by taking advantage of the foreign market and of foreign possibilities enured to the general benefit of the Canadian consumer, then the argument would be justifiable, but when it is not so, you are, to use plain language, robbing the general consumer in order that the exporter may profit. The people of Canada are endeavouring to find out what the difficulty is, and when they find that it is because our butter, eggs, meat, and so on, are being rushed to a foreign market which is subsidized by our own people, and that they are being tortured accordingly, I am very much mistaken if they do not rise up and call a halt, saying: The limit is the suffering which we have to endure and the extra high prices which we are asked to pay but which we refuse to pay. If we are going to play fast-and-loose with the affairs of the country in this way and take advantage of a temptation which is only going to carry its own sting with it, any attempt to solve the difficulty will be hopeless.

There is a prevailing heresy amongst some members of this House that if you sell goods in a given market you can always buy other goods from that market; that people must have goods bought from them if they expect to buy goods from you, or you hope to sell to them. That takes no account whatever of the element of profit, all of which is comprised in the single phrase "rate of exchange." Everybody knows that when the rate of exchange is against a country, as it is against Canada and in favour of the United States at the present time, this country pays from $13,000,000, to $15,000,000 in hard cash for the privilege of having the balance of trade against it—and that is the very thing that has come up in this argument now. To my mind, it shows a complete absence of a grasp of the difficulties of the situation.

Salaries, rents, wages, and contingencies under the Canada Grain Act, $1,150,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The increase is due to that which we have just been discussing, namely, the increase in the cost of living. The Government have to pay higher salaries to all those who are engaged in administering the Canada Grain Act. But there is this comfort: the revenue derived from the operations of the Grain Act is more than enough to pay for its operation. Up to February 28 of this year, during a period of eleven months, the fees collected amounted to $998,000, while the expenditure was $906,000, so that we have a surplus of some $92,000

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Upon what basis are these fees collected?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are elevator charges, fees for the inspection, weighing, and storage of wheat, and so on.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I saw some time ago a criticism by the Auditor General that these receipts had been placed to the credit of the Grain Commission and had not come into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Has that been adjusted?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That was in connection with the work of the Board of Grain Supervisors which was created to handle the wheat purchased in Canada last year and the year before by the Allied Governments. They controlled the wheat movement, designated what amount should go to the British and Allied Governments. and what amount should be kept in the country for domestic purposes, and what amount should go to the mills. The operations of this commission cease on the 31st of July, when all the wheat crop of last year will be out of the country. Unless fresh arrangements are made for financing the marketing of the Canadian crop, the Board of Grain Supervisors will not continue to exist.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the large balance that they have on hand be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): The item under discussion has to do with the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many persons are employed in connection with the administration of the Canada Grain Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are four members of the Grain Commission. On the inspection and weighing staff there are 140; Port Arthur elevator, 33; Moosejaw elevator, 17; Saskatoon elevator, 10; Calgary, 12; Vancouver, 3; total number of permanent employees, 224. Last year there were 254 temporary employees. This makes a grand total of 478. The total disbursement last year for salaries of permanent employees was $395,815; and wages to temporary employees amounted to $277,000: total, $673,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Who is the superintendent at Saskatoon, and what is his salary?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no permanent superintendent at that point. The acting superintendent is Mr. Seddon, whose salary is $2,500.

Mr. CAHILL: Why has the appointment not been made, Mr. Chairman? The vacancy has existed for a couple of years, I think.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Board of Grain Commissioners are of the view that the amount of work done there does not necessitate the appointment of a permanent superintendent, and they think the present arrangements are quite sufficient.

Mr. McKENZIE: I read in the newspapers, or was told, that the grain elevators in the Northwest and at Port Arthur and Fort William were practically commandeered by Americans last year, that they filled those elevators with their grain to the exclusion of Canadian grain, and that that is causing stagnation of trade among our own wheat producers. I submit to the minister that whatever facilities for transportation we have should be first utilized for our own people, and that no foreign country should be permitted to take advantage of them to the exclusion of Canadian wheat growers and transporters. Of course, I am only giving you rumours, Mr. Chairman, but if such has been the case I hope it will not be permitted to occur a second time.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman is wrong in thinking that the elevators at the head of the Lakes were so used. Some elevators down on the Georgian Bay ports had American wheat in them, and there was a certain amount of blockade on that account. It really amounts to the same thing as the hon. member speaks of, but I just wish to make that correction.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the elevators were outside the control of the Government, I do not blame the Government. But I am referring to any facilities we have in Canada; our first duty should be to ourselves, and those facilities should not be permitted to get into foreign hands.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Of course, the Government last year could control the movement of grain in or out of all elevators, whether owned by the Government or by private individuals. It is quite true that last autumn some American wheat did come into the elevators on the Georgian Bay ports, but none went into the elevators in the Prairie Provinces or at Port Arthur or Fort William. My recollection is that about 10,000,000 bushels of American grain came into the Georgian Bay elevators, and some people were apprehensive that it would react to the detriment of Canadian interests. However, as it happened, it did not injure our interests and has not caused any delay in the export of our wheat. At the present time the wheat crop of last year has been almost wholly exported either in the form of wheat or flour; in fact, there is hardly enough wheat left in the country for milling and seeding purposes, plus whatever the Wheat Export Company want. They feel they were rather oversold. I might say that recently permission has been given for the use of our elevators and railways for the carriage of American grain in transit to Atlantic seaboard ports for export, but we will only allow this for the next two months, July and August, and whenever any American grain gets into a Canadian elevator it will be only upon the understanding that the owners have shipping space for that wheat when it leaves the elevator and gets to an Atlantic seaboard port. If we have a large crop of wheat this year in the Canadian Northwest, as appears probable, our elevator storage capacity will be taxed to the utmost to carry our own wheat over during the winter.

To provide for the construction, acquisition, leasing or expropriation of terminal elevators, $30,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are any new elevators under construction?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. It is rather an emergency vote we are asking for in the event of there being an unforeseen necessity of constructing some buildings in connection with our elevator system.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There have been no demands for elevators this year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I know of only two demands for elevators this year, one from Ontario, and one from Alberta. No definite decision has been reached by the Government as to whether those demands will be met.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, $125,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Why the increase?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is due to the development of this particular Bureau. Arrangements have been made to acquire a much wider, and I hope, more useful range of statistics. The Bureau of Statistics is working closely in co-operation with the provinces in relation to certain statistics, and is also embarking upon a wider field of statistical work, necessitating a bigger staff to cope with the additional work.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will a census be taken next year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think so, but in 1921.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the Department of Railway Statistics been taken over by the Statistics Bureau?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Practically, although there has been no formal transfer yet. As soon as the Railway Bill passes Parliament there will be a formal transfer. The Bureau of Statistics is making preparations for taking over the work, and, in fact, has commenced to do so. When the transfer is completed the railway statistics staff will be taken over there.

Mr. CAHILL: The Minister of Railways and Canals has a Bill on the Order Paper which he intends to bring forward if the general Railway Bill does not pass this session; that is, the Bill pertaining to the location of railways. He intimated that possibly the Railway Bill may not pass, and, as we all know, it has been up to the Senate and back here on numerous occasions. The Government have one view on certain clauses and the majority of Parliament have another view. Now——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have power, anyway, under legislation already passed, to take over and transfer to the Bureau of Statistics the Statistical Branch of the Railway Department. Some of the clauses of the Railway Bill as originally drafted provided for the continuance of the statistical work of the Railway Department, but that was amended later, and the Bill as it now stands is, I think, satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. CAHILL: In the event of its not going through Parliament this year, will the Statistical Branch be taken over by the bureau?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Canada Year Book, $13,500.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this Canada Year Book a product of the Statistical Department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why is it not all in one item?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It gives to the House a little more detail of the expenditure of the Bureau. By having this appropriation assigned directly to the Canada Year Book, the committee will readily see just what it costs to get out that publication, and perhaps it is better to have it that way. The item has been inserted in that way for a long time.

Mr. COPP: Does this item cover the exact cost of the Canada Year Book?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In 1918-19, up to February 28, that is, eleven months, the expenditure was $12,058.13; so this appropriation barely covers the cost.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that the only blue book that is published by the Statistical Department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No; there are a number. Trade and Commerce Reports, Trade Statistical Reports, Agricultural Reports, Customs Statistics, will all be prepared and issued by the Bureau of Statistics hereafter, except one report of the customs showing the imports. Several other departments have their statistical work now performed by this Bureau. It is hoped that ultimately all statistical work will issue from this one department.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would be very much better, particularly for the information of members of Parliament, if all the statistical information of the different departments were found in one book.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Canada Year Book now contains figures referable to all departmental activities. The statistics of the Bureau will in the future be on a much more elaborate and useful scale than at present. But it takes a little time to get ready for that. I quite agree with my hon. friend that the greater compilation of statistics we have under one cover the better, particularly for the use of members of Parliament.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Some practical work could be done by this Bureau in connection with the proposed new methods of taxation. So far as I know it gives very little attention to questions of that kind. We want, for instance, to know how much the different provinces are levying for income tax and how that compares with the income tax levied by the Dominion. There is a proposition to levy a tax upon unimproved lands. Does this Bureau give any attention to these questions so as to give information?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the hon. member mean, to give a comparative statement as to the different income-tax laws of the provinces?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think it does.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That would be a practical thing for it to do. It would give us some information on the question.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would be very desirable for the Canada Year Book to contain a summary of all the taxation laws of the several provinces and of the Dominion.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: As regards taxation of land values, if we knew the assessed value of all the land in the various provinces, under the ordinary municipal assessments and how much of that was city or town property, so that we would be able to tell how the taxation of land value affected the farmer, that would be practical information that we would find very useful, when these new methods of taxation are proposed. At present we have no source of information on which to come to a decision whether such a tax is practicable or not.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the department purpose dealing with the last suggestion of my hon. friend, that is, as to assessable properties in Canada.

West India Cable, $38,933.33.

Mr. COPP: Why are the odd cents added to this amount while the others are in round figures?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is Canada's share of the cost of cable communication with the West Indies, £8,000, by agreement with the Imperial Government, and it happens that our proportion contains the odd cents. This contract came into operation on the first of October, 1914, and lasts for a period of ten years.

Supervision lake and ocean freight rates, $6,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is this for?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This appropriation has been in the Estimates for a long number of years, but as a matter of fact, it has never been used up to date. We have in the Maritime Provinces a person who supervises subsidized services, but no person has yet been appointed to perform this particular service.

Mr. McKENZIE: I suggest to the minister that it would be entirely irregular to pass this item in the absence of the hon. member for Lambton East (Mr. Armstrong) who has given so much time and such painstaking industry of this matter. He attends very regularly the sessions in this House, but he is not here at present.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall make the apology.

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose it is understood that he can discuss this whenever he wants to.

To provide for the development and extension of Canadian trade, $150,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is just the same amount as last year. The previous item of $180,000 has reference merely to Trade Commissioners work. These expenditures refer generally to our exhibits at fairs throughout the world. For instance, at the Lyons fair this year we had a total expenditure of $44,000. That fair took place in March and April, and Canada was very well represented; in fact, our exhibit is said to have been the most presentable and spectacular of any that was shown there. We had fifty stalls where Canadian products were exhibited, and, as a matter of fact, by virtue of this fair, several millions of dollars' worth of goods were sold in France, tentatively.

Mr. CAHILL: For money?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Very little money, but the mere fact of exchange conditions has prevented the consummation of the tentative sales that were made.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What does the minister understand by "tentative" sale?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A tentative sale means this, that somebody in France is willing to buy goods of a Canadian manufacturer exhibiting at Lyons within a given time if the former could make arrangements to pay for the goods. The prospective buyer might be very well off, but on account of exchange conditions as between France and the rest of the world he might have no means of paying. A man might be worth many millions of dollars in France and still be unable to pay for a small importation of goods from Canada.

Mr. CAHILL: There are dozens of such "tentative" bargains every day. Every boy that passes the store down here has the inclination to buy, but he is short of the money as a rule. Since we have to furnish the money to buy our own goods, I think we could very well do without this item altogether. The credit should surely be inducement enough, without spending more money to get this trade for which we are getting in return no money and no goods.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If my hon. friend had his way he would make no effort whatever to develop Canadian trade.

Mr. CAHILL: I would let the Canadian people do that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Canadian people are very largely inexperienced in foreign trade. The Canadian producer has been kept fairly busy supplying the domestic market in recent years, and our manufactured products are not generally known throughout the world. A nation must develop as an exporting country just as a child develops into a man, and anything that facilitates our exports and advertises abroad our capacity to produce and supply the needs of foreign countries is beneficial to Canadian trade and helps to establish us abroad. If we had no exhibitions and no fairs, if we declined to send our official representatives abroad, Canada would make no progress whatever in its export trade. We must pay for everything we import by our exports.

Mr. CAHILL: We are paying for both our imports and our exports.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Oh, no, my hon. friend is quite mistaken about that. We are exporting a great deal to some countries, and it is being paid for. I hope within a few months my hon. friend will have all the ground cut from under his feet about these credits, so that he will not be put to the trouble of making so many speeches on the inadvisability of furnishing credits. I agree with him as to the undesirability of having to do this, and the desirability of having natural trade conditions here and throughout the world, and I hope that if the Germans sign the Peace Treaty on Monday next the world will gradually, if not rapidly, reach the conditions in relation to international trade which prevailed prior to the war.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Did the Trade Commissioner at Paris represent us at the Lyons Fair?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. I am deliberately brief in my explanation of the Lyons Fair, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce was at the Fair this year, and I shall ask him to give an account of it on some other item.

Bureau of Industrial and Scientific Research: —Salaries and expenses, including printing and stationery, and the collection and distribution of information, and for Studentships, Fellowships, Special Problems and Forestry Studies, $120,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Did the bureau find out anything new this year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am sorry my hon. friend is so sceptical about this vote.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am not sceptical.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I recollect that last year and the year before he was rather sceptical. I have great faith myself in any expenditure of money for scientific research purposes, and I think we are open to criticism for not having voted very much larger sums of money for that purpose in the past. It might interest my hon. friend to know that it was wholly through the Research Bureau that an industry is about to be established in his home county at Canso. A company has been organized to utilize fish waste to produce an animal food and some by-products.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it a private concern?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is private capital, but the investigations were made by the Bureau of Scientific Research. After making a very thorough investigation they succeeded in inducing a man in the province of Ontario to invest sufficient capital.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What kind of food will this plant produce?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Cattle feed—linseed oil cake, and products of that character. The Bureau have also been considering the desirability of securing the establishment of a similar institution on the northern coast of the province of New Brunswick, and another on the Pacific coast.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will this enterprise be able to utilize dog fish?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bureau of Scientific Research have given some attention to that matter, but I am not in a position to say how far advanced they are in their investigations. I know they are of the opinion that the plants that were erected some years ago for reducing dog fish, and which have since been abandoned, were not suitable for the purpose. They are further of the view that proper management was not secured either for the plant at Canso or for the one at Sable island, and that not sufficient scientific work was done while these plants were in operation. They think that a great many of the difficulties that confronted these plants might have been overcome had the proper men been in charge.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister may not be aware that a private company has been engaged in reducing fish offal for fertilizer for some years past. Will the new concern that is starting utilize dog fish in making cattle feed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know whether it would be suitable for making cattle feed; I doubt very much whether it would. It would all depend on the success they had in extracting the oil from the fish.

Mr. COPP: This new concern is not being bonused at all? It is all private capital?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All private capital. It is not being bonused.

Mr. COPP: That will come later, I suppose.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At one time it would have been a fair question whether the Government should assist, but private people were found who were willing to go into the enterprise.

Patent Record, $25,000.

This vote has been transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Trade and Commerce. There is no increase.

Mr. McKENZIE: For some years there has been talk of discontinuing this publication, and circulars were sent around last year asking members their opinion as to whether the publication should be continued or not. I stated myself last year that I did not think it was any good, and I think most members would find it useless to them. There is only one man in a hundred who might care to look at it. I can never find time to read it, and I do not think it is a good expenditure of money.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Personally, I would be disposed to agree with my hon. friend that the publication is very apt to provoke profanity from the average person on receiving it through the mail. Nevertheless, the department feels that it is under obligation to print these records for circulation in foreign countries. The matter has not yet been fully settled. If there is any way of curtailing the expenditure I think that should be done. However, I believe there are difficulties in the way.

Grant to Canadian Engineering Standards Association for the promotion of uniformity of standards in metallic and other products, $10,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Is this a new item?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Canadian Engineering Standards Association (incorporated 1919) is a branch of the British Engineering Standards Committee founded sixteen years ago and closely associated with the British Board of Trade. The British Engineering Standards Committee was brought into existence for the purpose of introducing uniformity (Standardization) wherever possible in taps, dies, chasers and screw threads, all types of rolled steel sections, such as beams, deck joists, rails, angles, couplings, pipings, etc., and all detail parts in engineering structures and machinery. This standardization, if accepted throughout the British Dominions, would permit of such a uniformity that a lost part, for example, in a reaping machine—bolts, nuts, plates, etc.—could be replaced by purchase from some local manufacturer, and thus a very large amount of time would be saved and a great convenience afforded to the users of such machinery. The parts of a Canadian reaper sold in South Africa or New Zealand, for instance, could thus be forwarded from an adjacent hardware store. The aim of the Canadian Engineering Standards Association would be to provide for this standardization for Canada and to promote it by co-operation with the American standardization organizations. If it succeeds in bringing about standardization in Canada it will repay vastly more than the outlay that is likely to be involved. At present no work has been done in Canada on standardization of mechanical apparatus or parts. The field is an untouched one and it may be, therefore, a crusade of considerable magnitude to bring about the result desired. This association is comprised largely of trade engineers and it has to secure from the public a further $10,000. Their total expenditure this year they anticipate to be $20,000. They are not paid anything themselves, the work being purely voluntary. It was deemed a very good expenditure on the part of the Government to assist this voluntary organization by giving them a grant this year.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it a branch of the Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, it is not. The British Government renders the same assistance in Great Britain, as does the government in the United States. If we can have standardization in our products, it is generally conceded, there will be a great saving the world over and in our own country.

To provide for bounty on linen yarns spun in Canada from Canadian flax, including expenses of supervision under Order in Council of September 3, 1918, $30,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Owing to war conditions no linen thread has come forward from Great Britain since January 1, 1919. As Canada would be unlikely to secure adequate supplies, and as a suitable quality of flax is grown in sufficient quantity, in Canada, and as there were manufacturers of linens here who were disposed to undertake the spinning of linen threads and yarns from Canadian flax, an Order in Council was passed to bonus for a limited period the manufacture of linen thread. It is provided that the following bounty be paid for three years from 1st April, 1919, to 31st March, 1922.

.03c per lb. on linen yarn not coarser than 12 lea or finer than 20 lea.

.06c per lb. on linen yarn 20 lea and finer, but coarser than 40 lea.

.09c per lb. on linen yarn 40 lea and finer.

The total bounty is not to exceed $25,000 in any one year, or a total of $75,000 in the three years.

No bounty is to be payable until the day following the declaration of peace.

Resolutions reported.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean the House adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Monday, June 23, 1919.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

THE JUVENILE DELINQUENTS' ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): I desire to ask the Acting Minister of Justice when Bill No. 40, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents' Act, will be brought on, as there are a great many members very much interested in it.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): Bill No. 40 when it was introduced in this House had already been passed by the Senate. As I understood, the Bill had been requested by the Greek Catholic Church, as they wished their children to be disposed of under the Juvenile Delinquents' Act in the same way as Roman Catholic children. I have since found that the Bill did not originate with and was not asked for by that body, but was requested by the Associated Children's Aid Societies of Canada. The representations from the former body were that they did not wish to recognize the authority of the Roman Catholic church, but rather the authority of the Holy Roman See. On that being explained to me by Mr. Gisborne, I immediately took steps to ascertain the attitude of the Greek Catholic church, but so far I have had nothing come before me to convince me that the people of that church are anxious for the measure. Unless I do hear from them to that effect, I do not propose proceeding further.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In case the hon. minister should receive any such intimation from the Ukranian organizations, will he be good enough to notify those who have expressed an interest in the matter?

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: There is no reason why notice should not be given.

INDUSTRIAL UNREST IN CANADA.

WINNIPEG STRIKE—RIOTS.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: In view of the appalling reports that we get from Winnipeg, is the Acting Minister of Justice able to tell us anything about the circumstances prevailing there at present?

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: Matters in Winnipeg have been principally dealt with by the Royal North West Mounted Police. The President of the Privy Council will accordingly make a statement.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL: Mr. Speaker, the position of affairs in Winnipeg, particularly as it relates to the part taken by the Royal North West Mounted Police in the incidents of Saturday, is briefly as follows: In the month of May I received a telegram from the Attorney General of Manitoba asking if the Mounted Police could act in co-operation with the provincial authorities for the preservation of law and order in Winnipeg, in case such action should be necessary owing to the disturbed conditions prevailing there. I thereupon caused instructions to be given to the Commissioner of the Mounted Police in the following terms:

> Attorney General of Manitoba has requested that force should assist in maintaining law and order in Winnipeg if required. Therefore kindly instruct local officer Mounted Police to co-operate with Attorney General if required by him.

At the same time I sent a letter to the Attorney General of Manitoba, and, in fact, a similar letter to the Attorney General of each of the Western provinces, to this effect:

> The Government here is anxious to render every assistance in its power to the provincial and municipal authorities in maintaining law and order, and protecting the lives and property of citizens from mob or revolutionary violence.
> We, of course, fully recognize that the initiative and responsibility in connection with the maintenance of law and order in each province rest with the Provincial Government, and with the municipal authorities, and that any action we might take should be in co-operation with, and at the request of, the provincial authorities. I write this to assure you that anything the Federal Government can do to assist in maintaining law and order in your province will be most cheerfully done, both from the standpoint of the military authorities and of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police.

It was with the full concurrence of the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major General Mewburn) that I stated in that letter that the military authorities would co-operate with the provincial and municipal authorities in maintaining law and order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The minister has no authority in the premises. These troops must go out if they are called out by the provincial authorities, must they not?

Mr. N. W. ROWELL: I have just intimated that I wrote that letter with the full authority and co-operation of the Minister of Militia and Defence in advising that the Federal Government, through the Military and through the Mounted Police, would co-operate with the provincial and municipal authorities in maintaining law and order. Any action, of course, would have to be taken under the provisions of the law which defines the conditions under which the militia may co-operate.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Whether the Government is willing or not.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so. The militia could be called out at the request of the municipal authorities; but this was simply to indicate the attitude of the Government in reference to these matters.

I understand that on Friday evening last a mass meeting of strikers, in which there were some five hundred or more returned soldiers, decided that they would on Saturday parade the streets of Winnipeg, notwithstanding the proclamation of the mayor that no parades should be permitted. They sent word to the Minister of Labour (Hon. G. D. Robertson) that they intended to meet in Victoria Park at 2.30 p.m. on Saturday, and that they would parade from there to the Royal Alexandria Hotel, where the minister was staying, and that the minister would there address them, on pain of violence if he refused. The Minister of Labour, desiring to avoid any possibility of a conflict with returned soldiers, or any possibility of a violation of the mayor's proclamation, sent word to the strikers, through the solicitor for the strike committee, that he himself would go to Victoria Park on Saturday at 2.30, and there address the strikers. That, however, apparently was not satisfactory to them, and the committee requested a meeting on Saturday morning which was duly held, and at which the Minister of Labour, Commissioner Perry of the Mounted Police, and Mr. Andrews, representing the Department of Justice, were present. The committee insisted that the parade would go on unless the strike were settled before 2 o'clock; the street railways, which had been operating for several days, were stopped, and the minister and others should address them, on Saturday afternoon at the Industrial Bureau, of which they would take possession. The mayor intimated that under no conditions would the proclamation against parades be withdrawn; that it must be strictly observed, and that he would not discontinue the street car service. The Minister of Labour intimated that it would not be possible to secure a settlement of the strike within the time limited, namely, 2 o'clock that afternoon; but he promised if the mayor's proclamation was respected and the parade cancelled that he would endeavour to secure for them the Industrial Bureau, in which to hold their meeting; and said that he would be prepared to address them there. Mr. Andrews left the conference for the purpose of securing the Industrial Bureau for the committee, and succeeded in doing so; but before he got back the trouble had commenced. The strikers—at least a group of them—insisted that the parade should go on. The mayor, with the approval of the Attorney General and in his presence, went to the headquarters of the Mounted Police and asked their co-operation in preserving law and order. That was the joint request of the mayor of the city, representing the municipal authority, and the Attorney General of the province, representing the provincial authority.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It was done in legal form?

Mr. N. W. ROWELL: It was done in proper form, yes. The Mounted Police were thereupon called out, and, as has already been stated in the press, moved down Main street, endeavouring to disperse the crowd. There was evidence of violence almost at once—so much so that the mayor read the Riot Act and then proceeded to militia headquarters and asked that the militia be called out. As I say, there were acts of violence; a street car which was passing down the track was seriously broken up; bricks, stones, and other missiles were thrown at the Mounted Police, and shots were fired from the mob. As a result, there were several casualties, and the condition was such that the officer in command of the police felt it absolutely necessary, as a matter of self-defence, that the police should fire. This they did, with the result that there were a number of casualties. The latest report is that the total number of casualties was thirty-four, of which sixteen were in the Mounted Police; that would make eighteen casualties in the mob. I am glad to say that the casualties among the police, though at first some were considered serious, have proved not to be so serious. All the police are out of the hospital now with the exception of one, who was more seriously injured than the others. Of the men in the crowd who suffered casualties, one was killed and one or two were probably seriously injured; as to the condition of the others, we have no specific information. I should add that the militia came immediately to the assistance of the Mounted Police and the mob was dispersed in the course of half an hour or a little more. Since that time the city has been quiet; there has been no trouble since the dispersal of the mob.

Let me repeat that the first shots were fired by the paraders or those associated with them, and that Mounted Police fired only in self-defence. The information that we have is that the police acted with great coolness, great courage and great patience, as is characteristic of men of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. What is true of the police, is equally true of the militia. As a matter of fact, I believe that the majority of the police were returned men, as were large numbers of the militia who were called out. Up to 7.30 p.m. last evening some 80 arrests had been made by the police.

Every one must regret that life has been lost on this occasion. Every one must regret that serious casualties have been sustained, but I am sure that members of the House and the sane and thoughtful people of the country will agree that law and order in Canada must be maintained. The sooner all classes fully recognize that it is the intention of the Federal Government and of the provincial and various municipal governments in Canada to maintain law and order and to protect life and property, the more speedily we shall reach a common understanding in relation to all matters affecting the public interest.

Mr. CAHILL: It is reported in the Ottawa Citizen this morning that returned soldiers in favour of the strikers started the parade; that crowds joined and a clash ensued. Is there any truth in the report that the parade was led by returned soldiers?

Mr. ROWELL: As I have already intimated, the group that presented the request to the minister was composed largely of returned soldiers, who, however, constitute only a small section of the returned soldiers in Winnipeg, the great majority of whom are entirely out of sympathy with the action of this group in starting the trouble.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (East Edmonton): Is the strike in Winnipeg being continued on a demand for centralized power for collective bargaining?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Labour): The demand for collective bargaining is still dominant, I would imagine, in the minds of the strikers; they are still insisting upon it as one of the terms of settlement. The Minister of Labour, who is still in Winnipeg is in constant negotiation with representatives of employers and employees endeavouring to reach a settlement of the main issues which were the original cause of the strike.

Mr. M. CLARK (Red Deer): Can the minister give us any information as to how far it is true that three firms of employers are now prepared to concede what they at first refused?

Mr. ROWELL: My colleague has asked me to reply. I presume my hon. friend refers to the statement which was issued by the three employing firms on Monday last I think, as a result of a conference between them and representatives of the railway organizations. I am sorry I have not with me a copy of the statement, which has already appeared in the press. That statement recognized the principle of collective bargaining as defined in the statement. The representatives of the various railway organizations issued a statement endorsing and approving that definition of collective bargaining, and the railways themselves and Senator Robertson also approved that statement. It was a statement issued by the employers and approved by the Minister of Labour, the various railway employees' organizations, and the railways themselves, and it defined collective bargaining, as I understand, substantially in the same terms as it is now in use in the various railway organizations in dealing with the railways. As to how far that goes beyond what the employers were prepared to concede, I am not in a position to say.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has a date been set for the trial of the strike leaders who were arrested the other day?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No date has yet been fixed.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Is it the intention of the Government to give these men a speedy trial? It would appear in the public interest to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): The Government does not decide on questions of that sort. The matter of the administration of justice is, of course, provincial, and under the Act any one accused of an offence can elect within a certain period whether he will take a speedy trial or not, that is under a certain section of the Code. I am not sure whether that section applies to charges of seditious conspiracy, but even if it does not, this Government has no say whether the men shall take speedy trial; that is for the men to elect. If they do not apply for it, the Government cannot give it to them. It is a question of law, not a question of authority.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Bill No. 147 (from the Senate), for the relief of Annie Miville.—Mr. Mowat.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

THE 1919 WHEAT CROP.

Mr. MYERS:

1. Has the Government taken any steps, or does it purpose taking any, relative to the disposal of the wheat crop of 1919?
2. Have any financial credits been arranged for?
3. Have arrangements been made for sufficient transportation facilities for the marketing of this year's crop?
4. Are there any negotiations pending with the United States Government regarding the using of the United States ports for shipment of wheat as in former years?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. The matter of the marketing of the wheat crop, 1919, has been receiving the continuous attention of the Government. The Governments of the Allied European countries have not apparently yet determined whether their wheat supplies for this year shall be purchased and controlled wholly or partially by the said Government or whether normal trade conditions shall prevail in respect of wheat and flour importations. Until these matters have been definitely determined it is difficult to forecast with exactness the manner in which the Canadian wheat crop for this year will principally be marketed. The Canadian Government have representatives in the United Kingdom and Europe observing very carefully the probable wheat market conditions, the development of public policy in respect of this matter, and are closely in touch with Allied governments and governmental agencies dealing with this matter.

2. By reason of the facts set forth in the answer to question No. 1, the necessity of providing financial credits has not yet arisen.

3. The matter of the transportation of the wheat crop for 1919, both rail and water, in so far as possible is receiving the attention of the Government. It has been impossible to make arrangements in advance for ocean tonnage required for the unsold exportable wheat surplus, but it is believed that the Canadian wheat export trade will not suffer for lack of ocean tonnage during this year.

4. Informal negotiations have taken place with appropriate persons in the United States in reference to this matter. An abnormal wheat crop is anticipated in the United States this year, which will probably heavily tax the elevator storage capacity of that country for its own grain productions and thus render the same less available than usual for the export of Canadian wheat. It is expected that the port of Portland will as usual be available for the export of Canadian wheat, together with the elevator facilities there located. It is expected that the facilities of United States ports, outside of elevator storage, usually available to Canadian exports, shall continue to be available to Canadian wheat exporters during the present year.

RELEASE OF NAVAL RATINGS FROM ROCKHEAD PRISON.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Are the six naval ratings from T.R. No. 30, who were last year sentenced by court-martial to eighteen months' imprisonment in Rockhead Prison, still incarcerated in said prison?
2. If so, is the Government taking any steps to have the sentences of these young men commuted?
3. What steps, if any, are being taken to have them released?
4. When will these young men be released from custody?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. The Minister of the Naval Service issued orders for their release as from 14th June, 1919.
4. Answered by No 1.

ENEMY ALIEN PATENTS.

Sir SAM HUGHES:

1. What action has been taken by the Government regarding patents from enemy alien countries or enemy aliens in Canada?
2. Has the Government taken any of these patents over, as was done in the United States?
3. Are licenses for use of these patents granted to Canadians or others in Canada?
4. Will the Government publish a complete list of such patents now held by enemy firms or alien enemies resident in Canada?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Under the War Measures Act, 1914, orders and regulations were made by the Governor in Council on the 2nd of October, 1914, enabling the Commissioner of Patents to grant licenses for the use of patents held by subjects of states at war with His Majesty, and preventing the assignment of such patents.

2. No.

3. Yes.

4. The matter is receiving the Government's consideration.

MR. B. L. WARREN.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. Referring to the answers in Hansard, that B. L. Warren, Sub-Collector of Customs, Bear River, N.S., also occupies the position of shipping master, harbour master and preventive officer at said port, is the said B. L. Warren receiving remuneration from the Government for filling these various positions? If so, how much?

2. What was the gross amount paid by the Government, or out of any funds under Government control, to the said B. L. Warren for his services for the calendar year, 1918?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Nil, so far as the positions of shipping master and harbour master are concerned. Salary as Customs officer, $850.

2. Amount received from Customs Department: salary, $850; war bonus, $187.50; total, $1,037.50.

DALTON SANITARIUM, P.E.I.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens):

1. Has the Federal Government taken over the Dalton Sanitarium in Prince Edward Island, by purchase or by lease?

2. If by purchase, how much was paid for the said sanitarium, and to whom was it paid?

3. If by lease, what amount of rental is paid, when does the lease expire and to whom does the property belong?

4. How much does the said sanitarium cost per year for upkeep and maintenance?

5. How many patients would it accommodate when it was taken over?

6. How many patients will it accommodate now?

7. What did the new buildings, furnishings and equipment, etc., erected and installed by the Federal Government, to the said sanitarium, cost to date?

8. Were the contracts for the said new buildings, furnishings and equipments let by tender? If not, how were they let?

9. If by tender, what were the names of the tenderers, the respective amount of each tender, and the name of the accepted tenderer in each case?

10. Was the money paid direct to the contractors in each case? If not, how was it paid?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. By agreement.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. (a) Rent free; (b) One year after peace is restored; (c) Board of Commissioners, Charles Dalton Sanitarium, North Wiltshire, P.E.I.

4. As the extensions and alterations to the sanitarium are not yet completed, it is impossible to state what will be the cost per year for upkeep and maintenance.

5. 27.

6. 75.

7. $139,574.55.

8. By tender. (Separate tender): H. & S. Lowe, septic tank, $2,375.78; H. & S. Lowe, alterations to buildings, $2,432.50; H. & S. Lowe, sash, $888; H. & S. Lowe, floors, etc., $900; H. & S. Lowe, various small items, $1,532.50; E. Parkman & Co., ventilator, $35; E. Parkman, frost proof pipes, $262.50; McRory & Son, painting sash, $550; Bruce Stewart, fittings for pumps, etc., $255. (Public tenders): XI. Stanley, Shaw & Peardon, plumbing, $590; X2. Stanley, Shaw & Peardon, heating, $1,900; X3. W. F. Douall, wiring, $4,320; X4. Phillips & Mutch, power-house and laundry, $68,250; X5. Brantford Oven & Rack Co., bake oven, $270; X6. Renfrew Refrigerator Co., refrigerator, $115; X7. McClary Mfg. Co., steam table, $193.71; X8. Geo. Sparrow & Co., battery of urns, $400; X9. Can. Chicago Bridges & Iron Co., water tower, $5,-510.

9. X1. Stanley, Shaw & Peardon, plumbing, accepted, $590; Currie & Murnaghan, plumbing, $625; X2. Stanley, Shaw and Peardon, heating, accepted, $1,900; Currie and Murnaghan, heating, $,600; X3. W. P. Douall, wiring, accepted, $4,320; Maritime Electric Company, wiring, $4,750; X4. Phillips & Mutch, power house and laundry, accepted, $68,250; Stanley, Shaw & Peardon, power house and laundry, $73,000; Russell & McAuley, power house and laundry, $69,568; H. & S. Lowe, power house and laundry, $75,000; X5. Brantford Oven & Rack Co., bake oven, accepted, $270; Montreal Metal Works, bake oven (not heavy enough), $125; Gurney-Massey Co., bake oven (not heavy enough), $208; McClary Manufacturing Company, bake oven, $352; Wrought Iron Range Company, bake oven, $279.50; X6. Renfrew Refrigerator Co., refrigerator, accepted, $115; Eureka Ref. Co., refrigerator, $175; Thos. Davidson Co., refrigerator (too small, not up to specification), $52.50; X7. McClary Mfg. Co., steam table, accepted, $193.71; Wrought Iron Range Co., steam table, $213.50; Geo. Sparrow Co., steam table, $225; Geo. Prowse Range Company, steam table, $229; Gurney-Massey Company, steam table, $266.95; Montreal Metal Works, steam table, $300. X8. Geo. Sparrow and Company, battery of urns, accepted, $400; Geo. Prowse Range Co., battery of urns, $455; Wrought Iron Range Co., battery of urns, $477; McClary Mfg.Co. battery of urns, $516; Gurney-

Massey Co., battery of urns, $507.30; Hamilton Brass Co., battery of urns, $510; Montreal Metal Works, battery or urns, $600. X9. Canadian Chicago Bridges, Steel Tank and Water Tower & Iron Co., lowest tender, $4,685, (additional capacity in tank and heating pipes), accepted, $5,510; Canadian DesMoines Steel Co., steel tank and water tower, $5,317; Ontario Wind, Engine and Pump Co., water tank, $5,200; H. S. Lowe, water tank, $6,100; Stanley, Shaw & Peardon, water tank, $6,765; Bruce Stewart & Co., water tank, $7,000.

10. Direct to contractors through their bankers.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. BUREAU:

What are the names and addresses of all those who have been connected with or who have formed part of the 22nd Battalion?

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka):

1. How many pensions were granted by the Board of Pension Commissioners during the year ending December 31st, 1918?
2. How many pensions were refused by said Board during 1918?
3. Did a member of the Board of Pension Commissioners examine each case before granting or disallowing the same?
4. Was the granting or disallowing of claims signed by a member of the said Board, and individually checked by them?
5. How many complaints regarding pensions were made to the said Board of Pension Commissioners during 1918 and during the months of January, February, March and April, 1919?
6. What was the total expenditure for pensions for the year ending December 31st, 1918?
7. What was the total expense of administrating the Pension Act for the year ending December 31st, 1918?

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all reports, Orders in Council, and all other papers in connection with the Halifax Relief Commission, including a statement of all receipts and expenditures in this connection up to May 31st, 1919?

INTERNMENT CAMP, AMHERST, N.S.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, telegrams, findings and other papers connected with an application for a pension made by Charles Walker, a Guard in the Detention Camp at Amherst, N.S.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): Should not "detention camp" referred to in this motion be "internment camp"?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, it should be.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then, should not question 21 be also changed accordingly?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes. I move that the change be made.

Motion agreed to.

SOLDIERS SETTLEMENT ON THE LAND.

BILL TO ASSIST SETTLEMENT OF RETURNED SOLDIERS UPON THE LAND.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) Bill No. 95, to assist returned soldiers in settling upon the land, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

Mr. CAHILL: I would ask the Government to lay copies of Bills on the Table. Many members have no desks, and it is impossible for them to carry around their files with them. The result is that we have to hunt around for Bills. The Government knows what Bills are to be presented and might have copies ready to be distributed among the members.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Copies of the Bill have been sent for. The field of administration covered by this measure has been entered upon now for some considerable time and a very substantial amount of work has been performed, and the Committee is entitled, I think, to some account of the achievements in that field and the policies that have been followed, as well as to an explanation of the more ample powers which we are asking for by this Bill. The obligation of meeting the special requirements of returned men in connection with land settlement has been from the first partially, although not wholly, assumed by the federal authorities. Land settlement has been a federal administrative responsibility, at all events in connection with returned men from the South African war, and it has been so particularly for the reason that the Dominion was in possession, as owners, of the lands in the three western provinces upon which such settlement would most likely take place. In 1917, assuming that responsibility in that partial sense, a Soldiers' Settlement Act was passed, under the provisions of which the returned soldier was entitled to an entry for Dominion lands of 160 acres in addition to his ordinary homestead right. That Act of 1917 went beyond the previous legislation in providing as well for a loan to the settler not exceeding $2,500 upon his land. That was the first time that the Dominion Parliament ever ventured into the loaning field; a new sphere of encouragement of settlement. That Act has now been in operation for something like twenty months. Naturally at first those taking advantage of it were few, but as time went on a considerable number have come under its provisions, until at the present time the exact figures total 2,156, of whom only 90 have abandoned the land. To some of those—by no means to all—loans have been advanced, and as time went on it became apparent that the area of available land suitable for agriculture still left unhomesteaded in the western country was going to be insufficient to permit the Soldier Settlement Board, established under that Act, to meet the demand or, indeed, to engage on any very extensive settlement afterwards.

As a consequence, the necessity arose of launching upon some scheme whereby lands that had been already alienated from the Crown and were lying unused in the various districts of the country in all the provinces should be acquired and made available for entry by these returned men. It was necessary that some such scheme should be devised, and we were then confronted with the question as to whether or not the Dominion Government should assume the responsibility of administering such duties as the acquirement of private land and the supervision of it within the boundaries of the provinces. That was a question fraught with very considerable difficulty. It would appear to many, and did appear—indeed, we were urged by many—that as the lands were private lands and as civil rights and the administration of matters connected with civil rights were by constitution a provincial responsibility, and, indeed, could be better handled by the provinces which were nearer to the scene of activities, we should enter into some co-operative scheme with the provinces whereby on the receipt of Dominion assistance actual administrative duties would be performed provincially. We were encountered, however, by a determined attitude on the part of the provincial governments, particularly in the West, against the assumption of any responsibility for settlement by returned soldiers, they taking the ground that in so far as soldiers were concerned the original line of demarcation between provincial and Dominion duties should be altered, and that as to soldiers the entire responsibility should be federally assumed.

That was, more determinedly, the attitude of the provinces; their attitude being explained, on their part at all events, by the fact that the federal lands were still held by the Federal Government. However, all argued that in so far as the soldier was concerned, the Dominion should assume the responsibility.

Under those conditions there seemed no course open to us but to venture upon a very much wider field and to launch upon a great scheme of settlement such as I think no federal authority had ever launched upon before. Accordingly, on the 11th day of February last, an Order in Council was passed under the War Measures Act, the necessity being upon us, in view of the earlier armistice that had been declared and the fast returning men. An Order in Council was passed whereby the Minister of the Interior, or, rather, the board under the Minister of the Interior, was given authority to acquire privately owned lands and to sell these privately owned lands to settlers as defined by the Soldiers' Settlement Act, 1917.

In Australia, where they have conditions paralleling ours in many respects, these duties have been undertaken by the state authorities and a system of co-operation has been worked out, complicated in many ways; but this was the system adopted there for the reason that they did not feel that the fact that the men were soldiers altered in any degree the division of constitutional duties that had been outlined in the Imperial Act creating the Commonwealth of Australia.

In Canada, however, we have, as I say, under all the circumstances, decided that it was the duty of the federal authorities. Indeed, it was imperative that this great task be not receded from, that some one undertake it; consequently we undertook it and our first step was the passing of the Order in Council of the 11th February last. Under the terms of that Order in Council the Soldier Settlement Board was empowdered to acquire in any province of the Dominion privately owned lands and to sell to any individual returned man as defined by the Soldiers' Settlement Act, a not greater acreage than 320 acres, with the provision that the land should be sold at the price at which it had been acquired, and that the amount owed by the returned man on the land should not exceed $4,500, he paying 10 per cent, as the minimum percentage, of the cost. It was also provided that the board should have power to acquire stock and implements and to sell the stock and implements also at cost to these men, $2,000 being the maximum allowed to each, and to loan to a man upon his improvements, or upon improvements to be made, a sum not exceeding $1,000. In this connection it must be remembered that under the old Act of 1917 power was given to loan not only upon the homesteads of soldiers, but as well to men who owned their land, a sum not exceeding $2,500.

Mr. MORPHY: Do I understand that power was taken in the Order in Council to lend to a soldier on his implements $2,000 and on the stock also another $2,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, on stock and implements to loan a maximum of $2,000. By the terms of the Order in Council of the 11th February last such land as was acquired by the board must be resold to the soldier and the unpaid balance of the sale price should be repayable in twenty-five annual instalments including interest and amortisation, the interest being at the rate of 5 per cent. The $1,000 maximum loan for improvement was to be repayable on the same terms but the stock and equipment loan, as it was made on perishable articles, was to be repayable in four instalments, commencing in the third year and the settler was to be relieved entirely of any obligation in respect to it for the first two years. No interest accrued upon his stock loan for the first two years at all and he commenced to pay in the third year.

Provision was made in the Order for the protection of the settler against executions which might interfere with the Dominion security and also other safeguards were thrown around the investment which we undertook by that Order to make. Subsequently —on the 20th March of this year—it was provided that the loan upon the stock and equipment, which we were authorized to make to the man who purchased land, might also be made to the man who had homesteaded under the Act of 1917. From that date onward he became entitled, if classed as qualified, to a loan of $2,000 in addition to the $2,500 loan which he was entitled to by the previous law.

Under that condition, in the main, we come up to the present time. Other legislation was passed but it is of a character that can best be dealt with as I proceed subsequently to describe the work of the board. I should have said that under the Act of 1917 a board composed of Mr. Samuel Maber, who has been an official of the department for many years previously, Major Ashton, D.S.O., and Mr. Charles F. Roland, was constituted to carry out the provisions of the Act, Mr. Roland resigned his position in the fall of last year and shortly after his resignation, Mr. W. J. Black who had up to that time been Commissioner of Agriculture in the Department of Agriculture of the Dominion, was appointed permanent Chairman of the Board. As to these officials, they have worked with devotion and unsparing energy in the performance of their duties and I want to say that particularly to the conspicuous ability and application of the present chairman, the marked success, as I venture to describe it, of the board, is largely due. Under these Orders we have done considerable work up to the present time. Immediately the Order of the 11th February was passed, we deemed it our duty to address ourselves first to that considerable class of men who were in possession of their lands having returned from the front and who were facing seeding operations but were not in a position financially to undertake them. These men had their lands and seeding time was upon them but they were not able to get the seed in for that spring. Consequently an emergency organization was put on to take care of these men and it achieved its end.

After the land and loan regulations had been passed, we proceeded to the work of establishing the necessary organization to take in hand the far greater part of the task of acquiring suitable farm land and selling suitable farm land to suitable men. The line of policy to be pursued was not easy of determination. We were anxious to prevent too large and heavy an organization, and at the same time we were aware of the difficulties we were bound to encounter both in acquiring land of a proper quality and at a fair price, and in selecting the men to go on that land who had a reasonable chance of success.

We first of all took the ground that the principle that should govern us throughout was the welfare of the soldiers. First, we held that it was no assistance to a soldier to place him upon land upon which he was not likely to succeed, and no assistance to place him on good land at a reasonable price unless he were a man who was likely to succeed at that occupation. We therefore decided to appoint in the various districts, loan advisory committees, advisory councils and qualification boards composed of men of high standing in the community who would determine respectively the following questions (the loan advisory commitees being bodies composed of three men, one in each district to determine the quality of the land, and the amount of loan that could be advanced upon it) viz: the qualification of the soldier applicant as to whether or not he ought to be admitted to the benefits of the Act; and, if admitted, in what category he should be classified to guide the operations of the supervisor in the subsequent supervision of his work. We have established accordingly qualification boards—some of which have been in operation for three or four months, and others for a lesser period, at the following points: At Victoria, and Vancouver in British Columbia; Calgary and Edmonton in Alberta; Regina, Saskatoon and Prince Albert in Saskatchewan; Winnipeg in Manitoba; Toronto in Ontario; Montreal, Sherbrooke, and the city of Quebec in Quebec; and one in each of the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island. Besides these, however, and for their assistance, there is a sub-office for determining the qualifications of soldiers at Nelson in British Columbia; in the Peace River district in the province of Alberta; and in the province of Ontario we just have one qualification board. We are enabled to confine ourselves to that number in Ontario by reason of the Provincial Department of Agriculture having representatives in many counties in Ontario which representatives act as sub-officers for the qualification board at Toronto; and every man in that province who desires to apply to be admitted under the provisions of that Act goes first to the local provincial agricultural representative. His experience and his general make-up and prospects are noted there and, unless it is a case of doubt, he is there passed upon, is admitted, and then goes down to the central qualification board at Toronto and they determine the question.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Is there any age limit for applicants?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no fixed age limit, but the man's age is, of course, considered, along with other questions, in determining his qualifications.

Mr. BUREAU: Am I right in understanding the minister to say there is an officer to whom application is first made and that he decides whether or not the man shall be referred to some other tribunal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is in Ontario. We utilize the provincial agricultural representatives in the various counties, and in that way we are able to get along in Ontario with only one qualification board. In the province of Quebec there are three qualification boards—one each at Montreal, Sherbrooke, and the city of Quebec.

Mr. MORPHY: Is there any provision made for a county in the province of Ontario which has no agricultural representative?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not that I know of. The applicant in that case would have to go to the nearest agricultural representative. In this connection let me say that we have arranged transportation with all the railroads whereby any soldier who desires to be tested for his qualifications to be admitted under the Act will be given a rate of one cent per mile going and coming, and as well a rate in these ways for every soldier who goes to settle upon the land; he gets a one-cent rate going to select his land and a one-cent rate returning; he gets another cent rate returning for his family, and another one-cent rate in actually going to reside permanently upon the land.

Mr. MAHARG: Does that reduced rate apply to the members of his family?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it does, but if the hon. member will repeat the question later in the day, I will give him a more definite answer.

Our advisory councils are sitting at each point where the qualification boards are sitting. The advisory councils are composed of what we believe to be expert and fair-minded men, whose experience and qualifications enable them to determine the value of land and the amount of loan that should be made thereon. I might say in this connection that we do not follow particularly the loan company's rules in determining the maximum that can be loaned upon land. We follow a much more liberal scale, because in our operations we select our men, we believe, more carefully than they are selected if there is no organization for the purpose. Because of that the soldier who goes upon the land under the terms of the Act has a much better chance to succeed (for reasons that I will dilate upon fully at a later period) than has the ordinary settler, and for the reason as well that we have now installed, and purpose continuing, a system of supervision and assistance whereby his chances of success will be very much improved. That, however, is the function performed by our advisory council. Then we have in each district a superintendent, and in the larger districts where a greater amount of work is done an assistant superintendent, and then such clerks as may be necessary for the proper conduct of the work. We have had to expand our organization with marked rapidity, with much greater rapidity than we ever imagined, because the rush of settlers to the offices of the board has passed all anticipation and continues still with unabated vigour. In every office in Western Canada the officials are working day and night, and in one office alone the number of callers in a single day was 800.

Mr. MORPHY: To what does the minister attribute the fact that ninety of the returned soldiers have abandoned the land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The percentage is a very small one and it shows that in the main when these men visited the land they found it was not such as they had expected. Possibly their first inspection of the land when they entered for it was too hurried; and more likely the men who abandoned entered by proxy—some one entered for them, as can be done under the Dominion Lands Act. Then when the actual settler went there he found that the land did not suit him. A third explanation would be that in the meantime he found some other land suited him better and he decided to take it instead. In that connection we have arranged that where a soldier, who has previously made a homestead entry, makes a soldier entry, he is at liberty to abandon his homestead and get credit for the duties he has already performed upon it, and take up a homestead near his soldier entry and be, as regards the new homestead, in the same position in which he was when he left the old one. Under the various district superintendents, there are expert inspectors and valuators of land. These men have been selected with the greatest care we could exercise, and their duty is one of the most responsible that falls to the lot of any of our officials.

It is their business to inspect and value the land, and wherever they find that the soldier has elected to purchase land at a certain price, they, after examination, determine whether the land is fit for the purpose, that is, is good agricultural land, and the price is not unreasonable. If they deem the price unreasonable, it is their business to advise the soldier that he will not be recommended for the assistance that the Act provides, unless that land is sold to him at a less figure. As a consequence—and the statistics that can be placed upon Hansard if it is desired—very large sums indeed have been saved to soldiers from the prices at which they were ready to buy their land—amounts running all the way from $100 to $2,000, and even above that sum.

Mr. MORPHY: Must every purchase come before the advisory board before the soldier can complete the transaction?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Of course, we do not say to a soldier: You cannot buy the land yourself if you wish. He is a citizen with the same rights as other citizens. But we warn him that in buying without the approval of the advisory council he is not certain to obtain the assistance that the Act provides, because the money will not be advanced against his purchase except on their approval. This is the routine followed. The soldier selects his land. That land is then inspected by one of our appraisers, and after the price is brought to a level that is deemed to be fair and just,—at a level that, having regard to the value, the soldier can earn a living upon the land by reasonable application, the board buys the land and takes title to it, and then enters into an agreement for sale to the soldier, who pays down at least 10 per cent of the price,—sufficient in any event to reduce the balance owing to a maximum of $4,500.

It is somewhat difficult to decide what is the best order in which to take this up, but I think I had now better state the number of entries that have been made, the commitments, the Government supervision throughout, and the conditions in which the work now is. Up to the 14th of this month the number of applications before our qualification committees by returned soldiers for the benefits of the Act was 17,450. The number that had actually been passed upon was 14,726. The number that had actually been passed as qualified was 12,594. The classification is in three divisions. Class A are the men who have done nothing but farm most of their lives,—perhaps hired on farms, but at all events have done nothing but farm, and who from all that can be learned from the record of their habits and character are men who in all reasonable certainty are going to succeed as farmers. Of those 12,594, 6,176 are in class A; 3,494 are in class B, who also have had experience in farming, although that has not been their sole occupation; 2,924 are in class C, which comprises those who are on a lower scale and are recommended for the special care and supervision of the supervisors under the board after they get on the land.

Coming to the financial aspect of the work—

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the minister leaves that, could he give us information as to where those men are located in the different provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I can give it province by province. British Columbia, 1,894; Alberta, 3,438; Saskatchewan, 2,025; Manitoba, 2,349; Ontario, 723; Quebec, 261; New Brunswick, 366; Nova Scotia, 269; Prince Edward Island, 193. Alberta shows the largest figure. That is owing to the Peace River district, and to the fact that Alberta has much the largest area of any of the western provinces of available Dominion lands suitable for agriculture.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: How many applications have been refused?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The number of applications is 17,450; the number disposed of is 14,726. The difference between those totals represents the applications not disposed of at all by the qualification boards. The number passed upon favourably in all three classes is 12,594. So that the total number refused is 2,132.

Mr. PECK: When is a man passed as qualified?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No man is passed as qualified who is recommended for training. This will be a suitable time to treat of that phase of the work. We established in each of the provinces in the agricultural institutions already there courses of study, or rather of hard work, of about three months' duration, of the most practical character, designed to fit the men—not to be experts in agriculture, that is the work of the agricultural college proper—but to fit them to be useful men on the land, to be able to take care of horses and stock, to understand implements, and to be familiar with the general rudiments of farming. That three months' course is given, and as well we have a system whereby selected farmers are listed who will undertake to give special attention to men who come to work for them as a special preparation for actual farming. The qualification boards dispose of many cases by advising the men to take courses in these institutions or to hire out with a farmer and learn the practical work in that way. By far the greater number are recommended to take the latter course. Those who take either course are not passed as qualified until they again appear before the board and a report is obtained of their progress at the institution or on the farm. The number attending institutions is 273, and the number on the land is 1,174.

We have also established a system of sustenance both for those at the agricultural colleges and for those on the land. The rates allowed, I am afraid, I do not carry in my head. They are on a scale considerably lower than the scale of rates allowed to disabled men for sustenance under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, but they are such that the man will not, while he is attending the institution or while he is on the farm, be dissipating his own money, with which he hopes to buy land later. For example, the married man who is recommended by the board to go on the farm is entitled to $20 a month from the board in addition to the wages that he gets on the farm, and he is entitled also to a certain amount for each child—$6 a month, I think—up to a maximum of $25. Corresponding rates, perhaps somewhat more liberal than those which I have mentioned, are allowed in respect of men who are attending the agricultural colleges and taking these courses. The purpose of all this is to enable the man to conserve what money he has been able to save and have it at his disposal when he becomes qualified and wants to buy land for himself. Of course, all this agricultural training is free, and those who take advantage of it have their board paid.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: What is the policy of the department with regard to boys of sixteen or seventeen who were turned down because they were too young?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not made special inquiry into those cases, but I imagine that there must be very few of them. I was asked by the board to give this general instruction: That boys who were turned down because they were too young should be advised to hire out and learn farming, because a boy of sixteen or seventeen can hardly be a competent farmer. I would judge that the board might deem him too young.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: But many such young men have been passed by representatives of the department as having sufficient knowledge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They might be passed as having sufficient knowledge, but they would scarcely be qualified; they would be too immature in years to be held to the provisions of the Act. But as I say, there will be very few of that class.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: What is the age at which returned men may qualify?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think any age has been fixed. The board simply size the boy up. Many boys are more immature at eighteen than others are at twenty-one; the age is taken into account, along with the man's experience and general get-up.

In Manitoba, the board consists of the following men: Professor C. H. Lee, of the Agricultural College; Mr. Peter Wright, a farmer of Myrtle, Manitoba, who has had long experience and who, with Professor Lee, has rendered inestimable service to the soldiers of that province, and Mr. Sam Larkin, a returned soldier. In Saskatchewan the chairman of the board is Dean Rutherford, of the University of Saskatchewan. I cannot recall the names of the other members. In all the provinces we have boards of a similar character.

Permit me to refer just here to another precaution that we have taken. Early in April we established a Committee of Inquiry to survey the agricultural sections of British Columbia and to report upon the character of farming that had been profitably carried on in those various sections —because they differ almost as widely as agricultural sections differ in all other parts of the Dominion—upon the character of farming, if any, that should be encouraged in each district; upon the acreage that it would be most advisable for each man to secure, and upon the nature of the supervision that would be most appropriate for these localities. Mr. B. E. Patterson, a native of Nova Scotia but a man well acquainted with British Columbia, was made chairman of that committee. They inspected, I think, every portion of that province and made a report of the utmost value. Of the work of that committee I have no doubt the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Stacey) will later address the Committee.

Another special committee was appointed to look over the lands embraced in grazing leases in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and to report upon what areas in those leases, if any, were agricultural in character, and should be taken away from the leases and made available for returned men. That committee is headed by Dean Rutherford. Mr. Walter Govan is also on the committee; the name of the third member is Mr. T. Smith. This committee has finished its work and submitted its report.

We have also a Small Holdings Committee in these three provinces—there are similar committees in Ontario and in the Maritime Provinces—whose business it is to examine into small holdings which may be taken up by disabled men who desire not to go into farming in a general sense, but to take up garden farming, poultry farming, bee keeping, and the like. This committee is to report as to the number of men who should be encouraged to engage in this kind of work in each of the provinces; as to the areas each man should secure and the character of operation or combination of operations that he should conduct thereon. The Ontario committee submitted an excellent report about two months ago, and upon it we are proceeding. I do not think that the committees for the Prairie Provinces and for the Maritime Provinces have yet reported.

I now wish to say a word about our general organization. This is a returned soldier enterprise; it is developing into a great settlement enterprise. It was desirable that as far as possible, a returned soldier personnel should take care of the work. I want to give the figures to show how far we have been able to succeed in getting a returned soldier organization that would meet the requirements and that would measure up to the responsibilities, financial and otherwise, involved in this great undertaking. It must be remembered in this connection that we had to establish the nucleus of our organization at a time when the type of men that we were after were, for the most part, overseas. Indeed, it was only in recent months that we had a pretty general field of selection, having regard to the kind of men we desired to get.

There are in the whole organization at the present time 475 persons, of whom 305 are males and the remainder are stenographers, and other female help. Of the 305, 246 are returned soldiers, or 81 per cent of the whole organization. Of the 246, no less than 51 have received decorations in France. I fancy that there is not a more distinctive soldier organization in any other belligerent country.

Mr. McKENZIE: How is that organization distributed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The distribution of the organization is as follows: The total for Prince Edward Island is 7, of whom 4 are males, 3 of whom are returned soldiers. The man who is not a returned soldier is the agricultural expert whose business it is to watch, assist and supervise the men actually working on the land. We could not get a returned soldier to qualify for that position. Nova Scotia has a total of 9, 8 males, 3 of whom are returned soldiers, or 38 per cent. That is the smallest percentage of any province. For the other provinces the figures respectively are: New Brunswick, 12, 9, 8 or 89 per cent; Montreal, 14, 10, 8 or 80 per cent; Quebec, 3, 2, 2; Ottawa, 128, 66, 52. These 52 returned soldiers are in the head office here.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are these men under the department or do they come under a separate organization?

Mr. MEIGHEN: THE Soldier Settlement Board is a separate organization under the Minister of the Interior. It does not report through the Deputy Minister of the Interior, but through the chairman of the board direct to myself. The figures for Winnipeg are respectively, 55, 37, 28, or 76 per cent; Calgary, 41, 34, 30 or 88 per cent. I may say, with Calgary in mind, that among the best class of returned soldier we have been able to get is the private. We find that if we can get the private returned soldier with the necessary ability—and we have certainly succeeded in some cases in getting men with the necessary ability in a conspicious degree—his influence and his acceptability with the men generally is even greater than that of the returned soldier officer. Such a man we have in Calgary—a Mr. Thomas Smith, a returned soldier with one arm. The figures for Edmonton are: Total, 37, 28 males, 23 of whom are returned soldiers, or 82 per cent. Regina 40, 24, 20 or 83 per cent. Prince Albert 23, 16, 13 or 81 per cent; Saskatoon 19, 13, 11 or 85 per cent; Vancouver 35, 24, 19 or 79 per cent; Victoria 20, 10, 8 or 80 per cent. That is the distribution of the organization throughout the Dominion.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it the duty of these groups to operate exclusively in a certain province, or are their duties of an interprovincial character?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are provincial divisions. In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island each organization operates for its own province. The same is true of Ontario, where we have a somewhat different system by reason of the provincial organization fitting in and being used as an auxiliary. In Saskatoon we have three head offices—at Regina, Saskatoon, and Prince Albert. In Alberta two—at Calgary and Edmonton. In Manitoba one. In British Columbia two—at Victoria and Vancouver. In Alberta and British Columbia we have also a suboffice in the most active outlying points.

Mr. M. CLARK: Will the Committee be right in assuming that most of these male employees have had previous experience of farming?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I am safe in saying they have all had experience of farming without a single exception. In fact, in all positions of any responsibility the man is an expert, in a greater or less degree; he is the best expert we can get. For example, Colonel Innes is the head of the agricultural training work. He has done academic work as well as practical farming all his life, and is a very distinguished graduate of an agricultural college. It is men of that type we have sought and have succeeded, I think, in securing.

I was about to enter upon a discussion of the stock and equipment sphere of our operations. The board lends money at 5 per cent on the land. That, of course, is one-half of one per cent less than the Dominion Government can secure the money for, and taking into account the length of time given for payment the saving to the soldier over what another man starting farming has to surmount is a very substantial sum indeed, to say nothing at all of the total remission of interest on his stock and equipment loan for two years. Not second in any way to that important consideration is the advantage he gets in the purchase of his stock and equipment out of the proceeds of his loan.

Having decided that we ought to address ourselves to the task of getting the soldier a better price in the purchase of all these articles than the ordinary retail price, we entered into arrangements with the manufacturers of every article that the soldier desires—that is, everything he is entitled to buy out of the Government loan. The Government, as is manifestly necessary, supervises every purchase. Not a single dollar of the money we loan to the soldier is spent except under the specific supervision, as to every article, of the board itself, and in the determination of what he is allowed to purchase and the payment, care is exercised and definite and irresistible rules are followed. For example, the board has determined that a man shall not be permitted to purchase a tractor. We did not think he should enter upon that phase of farming, as it is based upon a scale of operations that is beyond the capacity of a man starting out as a pioneer to be made a settler of. That is something which he could reach later on. If we permitted any infraction of that rule we would be engaging upon payment and launching men upon work that perhaps they could not cope with, and so we do not permit it. Limits are also placed upon the price that can be paid for horses, and so on.

We have managed to succeed in effecting arrangements with the producers of all the goods that the soldier will require and pay for, out of his own money which redound to the very great advantage of the soldier settlers. In the first place, we have effected arrangements with all, or at least all the principal manufacturers of agricultural implements, whereby the manufacturers of implements use their organization for the delivery of the implements the soldier may choose, and they get those implements to the soldier at the wholesale factory price, and the wholesale cash price at that, without any further charge whatever. In addition to that, the manufacturers pay the cost of distribution. They pay the agent's commission for handling the implements. The soldier pays nothing at all except the ordinary bulk freight rate on his implements, and the wholesale cash price.

As regards harness, a still better arrangement has been made. The general saving which he makes on harness is 30 per cent of the retail price. It is even less than the wholesale price, and he gets his choice. Our arrangement is such that the payment is made through the board. The manufacturer of harness has no difficulty whatever. Shortly after the harness is delivered he gets his pay. Owing to the fact that there were considerable stocks on hand, we made an especially advantageous arrangement as regards that commodity. An arrangement is made as well whereby the wholesale price is secured for the soldier for his hardware. He can get it where he likes and pays the wholesale cash price and no more. He pays the wholesale cash price also for his lumber. They do not generally buy in less than carloads, in which case they get the mill price, but if they do not all they pay is the actual disbursement in handling. The same arrangements have been effected as to the other commodities he buys, and I have here tables to show what the soldier settler saves at each point and what he would have to pay if he were buying as an ordinary purchaser. The total he saves is a most substantial sum. I do not think I should delay the committee or burden Hansard with a recital of the various advantages he enjoys.

Mr. CAHILL: If it is not too long I think it should go on Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is rather long, but I can give some instances. I suppose it should be put on Hansard. The first point I have is Calgary. The average saving that he has from the United Grain Growers' ordinary price—and they have an especial arrangement for distribution at the lowest prices—is 13 per cent; 15 per cent, John Deere Company; 9 per cent, Massey-Harris; 18 per cent, Cockshutt Company; 19 per cent, International Harvester Company. He saves 30 per cent from all manufacturers of harness at Calgary; 20 per cent off the cash price for all lumber used. At Edmonton the rates on implements run as follows: 18 per cent, 14 per cent, 20 per cent, 10 per cent, 16 per cent, an average of 16 per cent better than the ordinary purchaser of implements; and on harness the saving is 30 per cent. It runs that way throughout, except that at one point he saves actually 40 per cent on the purchase of harness. The board undertook some months ago to purchase stock, including horses.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Will these rates and arrangements apply in the older provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the arrangements as to stock and implements apply to every province.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Will these figures be placed on record?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. At Vancouver the average rate saved on implements is 14 per cent, harness 30 per cent, lumber 20 per cent. At Victoria, implements 13 per cent, harness 30 per cent, lumber 30 per cent. At Saskatoon, 15 and 11 per cent on implements from different manufacturers and 30 per cent on harness. There is no figure for lumber there, but it would be 20 per cent. At Regina the rates are 14 and 11 per cent on implements from the United Grain Growers' and John Deere Company respectively; 30 per cent on harness and 20 per cent on lumber. At Winnipeg, the United Grain Growers, 14 per cent; Massey-Harris, 9 per cent; International Harvester Company, 17 per cent; Cockshutt Plough Company, 13 per cent; John Deere, 15 per cent; Canadian Fairbanks-Morse, 15 per cent; on harness from 27 per cent to 40 per cent. In lumber the reduction in price at Winnipeg is 19 per cent. At Toronto on implements, the Massey-Harris, 15 per cent, the International Harvester 20 per cent. Harness, 26 per cent and lumber 20 per cent.

Mr. COPP: Are those reductions on the retail prices?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The retail cash prices. I have not the figures for Montreal. In Halifax the rate is 14 per cent on implements. I have not the figures for harness there but I presume the same arrangements obtain. At Charlottetown the rates are 20 per cent on lumber and 20 per cent on implements.

We ventured upon the rather perilous enterprise of purchasing horses and cattle.

Mr. ARTHURS: Do these prices apply to purchases by soldiers who are not taking advantage of the Soldier Settlement Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: All that a soldier has to do who is buying his own land is to go before a qualification board and he is passed and entered upon our list and is then entitled to all these advantages.

Mr. MORPHY: Would that apply to a soldier at home with his father?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the soldier has to be a settler. I shall conclude what I was dealing with and come back to that. We purchase, through the best experts we can obtain at each point, horses and stock, each animal being examined and passed as sound and fitted for the purpose for which it is required. It is then sold to the settler at the price of purchase. The Board believe they have extraordinarily efficient means for purchasing this class of stock. Indeed, that has been proved. The purpose is to guard the returned man against any possibility of imposition at the hands of shrewder men than himself. We do not prevent a man from buying his own but the soldiers are coming more and more to buy through the Board and that fact indicates their belief that they get better results.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Have you a maximum price for horses?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the maximum I think is $200. The average prices that have been paid for horses in each province are very interesting. In Calgary in the month of April the number of horses purchased and sold to settlers is 118; milch cows, 39; cattle, 60; swine, 9; poultry, 79. The average cost per head of horses is $145.79. In Saskatchewan, where a great deal more has been done in the way of stock and equipment, particularly in stock purchases, the average price for horses is $133.82; milch cows, $108.62; and for other cattle, $49.58. The average for horses in Vancouver has been $180; the average at Victoria office, $174; the average at the Saskatoon office, $177.51; at the Regina office, $160.73; at the Winnipeg office, $179.86; at Halifax, $161.43.

We did the same to all classes of stock as we did in regard to horses. There is a point that I omitted to note as I went hurriedly past. While our maximum of $7,500 is the total liability as respects the individual soldier—a high maximum indeed—we have a special provision whereby men who have had adequate and successful farm experience in Canada and are qualified by the possession of equipment, or other special qualifications—we have always so far required them to be married—may acquire land without paying the ten per cent, and may secure a loan up to a maximum, in those special cases, of $8,000. While the maximum in general is $7,500 and in special cases $8,000 the actual fact is that the average loan is $3,394.

Mr. CAHILL: And the average acreage?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not the average acreage. The average loan to 4,262 men is $3,394. As a man's security gets better and he demonstrates the fact that he is succeeding, he can come back and his application for a further loan will be considered.

Mr. MICHAUD: What is the limit of the loan?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On improvements, stock and equipment the limit in general is $7,500, but in the special cases that I have described, of which there are very few, the limit is $8,000. Such has been the operation of the board up to this time. I think I have covered the major part of the work.

I should have said, however, that we have been assisting the soldier in the building of his house. We have provided him with suitable plans free and information which will enable him to build his house at the price fixed in the plan. We have had plans of two or three types of houses prepared and we give such information along with the plan as will enable the soldier to erect the building within the limits fixed thereby. However, we are expanding that branch of the service and,, under the direction of Colonel Foster of British Columbia, a returned man, we are arranging to assist the returned soldier in the erection of his house by co-operation with firms engaged in the actual work. We believe that in doing that we can still further reduce the cost to the soldier of building his home.

That covers, in the main, the activities of the board. From this on we will engage more largely than we have in the past in encouraging the small holding farm because we feel that we have now got to the stage where we have sufficient information to enable us, without too great risk, to launch upon this phase of our work.

Mr. FRIPP: Before the minister takes his seat, would he be kind enough to tell us what the Government propose to do for the men who are not farmers, what assistance is to be rendered to the mechanic, and wage earner, who has served at the front, to rehabilitate and re-establish him in his profession or calling? Is any provision to be made or is there to be class legislation entirely for those who wish to take up land?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question naturally has received some thought. This is settlement legislation. I explained at the beginning that the Government, in addressing itself to this work, in venturing to attack it, had overstepped the usual line of the division of responsibility that had been observed up to this time when we got beyond the stage of settlement on Dominion lands. So long as we were within that end of it, we of course were doing nothing beyond what had always been recognized as the duty of the Dominion. When we get on private lands we are going beyond that; not that we are going beyond our constitutional powers, because we cannot do that, but we are assuming a responsibility that ordinarily devolves upon the provincial authority and not upon us. However we felt, under all the circumstances, that it was our duty to do it and inasmuch as the settlement of Dominion lands have been under the Department of the Interior, because those lands were administered by the Department of the Interior, soldier settlement on these lands necessarily came under that department as well. Ordinarily speaking this much more extended sphere of work that we have now launched upon is agricultural and pertains to the Department of Agriculture more properly than it does to the Department of the Interior. It would not be practicable—at least it would be very difficult—to administer Dominion land settlement under the Department of the Interior and have private agricultural lands administered by another department. But what I am trying to point out to the hon. member (Mr. Fripp) is that in so far as I, the Minister of the Interior, am concerned, I am certainly at the limit of my powers in venturing to administer such an extensive scheme of land settlement as this. If assistance is to be given to soldiers who wish to follow their avocation it would not come under me. It would be a general question which would be taken up by the Government as a whole and the inquiry should be addressed to the Government as a whole rather than to myself as administering that phase of the work. But in the consideration of the question the House should keep in mind that in taking care of land settlement in general on private lands, as well as on federal lands, we are already carrying the Dominion responsibility to a very great length indeed. Of course, the policy of the Government as regards housing, has special application to returned men and that is the policy of assistance to the provinces by way of loan for that purpose. It is very difficult indeed to venture upon any scheme of assistance, particularly one administered centrally and extending over the tremendous area of the Dominion, where the security is anything else than land. Whether it will be or not, it might be better administered under local authority and local control.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does the Government contemplate any assistance towards clearing land? In my own province, as the minister knows, a great part of the lands which would be available for settlement are covered with numerous large stumps. Of course, it is impossible to ask the returned soldier to go on land of that kind without first taking the stumps out. I was wondering if it would not be possible for the Government to make some kind of an investigation with a view to assisting in the removal of these stumps. This is a very important question and I can inform the House and the minister that it requires consideration if we are to make a success of land settlement in British Columbia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman must remember that this is a settlement scheme, not a clearing or improvement enterprise. Consequently, it is a basic principle that before the Soldier Settlement Board takes hold of land it must be fit for settlement, it must be land upon which the soldier can go and make a living. It may be that much of it will require clearing, but so long as he can make a living on the land that is cleared, or make a living in the process of clearing it, then he is encouraged, if he desires to go on it; but we do not, as a board, take hold of land of that kind and endeavour to make settlement land of it. That question came up in connection with the handling of provincial crown lands, the great bulk of which are of the type described by the hon. gentleman—not necessarily stump land, but something a lot harder, and very often land that would cost more, or as much, to clear than the soldier could afford to pay for it if he intended to meet his interest, discharge his obligation, and make provision for himself and family. So we came to this general conclusion: That before the Dominion could interest itself in private lands, or in provincial crown lands, those lands must be brought to such a state of clearing; to such a state of suitability for agriculture from the point of view of roads, of even schools, and ordinary settlement advantages as would put them on a parity with the Dominion crown lands of the West upon which we loan. If they were brought to such a stage that a man could go on that land, and do as the farmer does upon ordinary land,—use his lumber and the like, and by living on it make a livelihood—then we offer no discouragement at all, we help him all we can; but we do not set ourselves up as an institution, using for the purpose the capital of Canada, to bring stump land, or any other land, into ordinary settlement conditions.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: What is this Government going to do for the returned soldier in the case of Alberta where the provincial government refuses to take advantage of a federal loan in connection with the housing problem?

Mr. MEIGHEN: One course would be to wait until the provincial government has changed its mind. I do not think we can have a separate policy in that regard.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: My information is that the Alberta Government has declined to take advantage of the loan. In that event, what is the policy of the Dominion Government on the housing problem in the interest of the returned soldier in Alberta?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My answer still stands. No other course has been decided upon, or is open to us, except that of treating all the provinces alike.

At one o'clock the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the House rose we had reached clause 2, definitions. Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister had not quite finished his statement at one o'clock. I intended asking him a few questions before he goes into the further details of the Bill. Could he tell us, first, what land owned by the Government, they intend to utilize in connection with this soldier settlement, stating the area in each province; and also what land, if any, the Government has purchased, its location, and the price per acre.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member's question has to do with the purchase of land, and intimates an assumption that we buy land and then hold it for sale to the soldiers. That is not the principle followed.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understood the minister to say that that was done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will explain. We do buy land and resell it to soldiers, but the plan of operation is to allow the soldier to select his land first—not from the land we own, but wherever he wants it. He selects his farm, he comes to an arrangement as to what he is prepared to pay, and then the office of the board is, through its inspector, to see that he is not paying too much and, if necessary, to have the price reduced before the board will itself purchase the land. The price having been brought down to a satisfactory basis, the board buys the land for the soldier and accompanies the purchase by a resale agreement to him. We do not buy areas of land and trust to its being suitable for soldiers. It may be that we have on hand some areas that we bought, but I do not think we have. I do not think the board is to-day the owner of any land that has not been selected and already purchased by soldiers.

Of course, it would be incorrect to say that we have now no land for soldiers, for we have Crown lands of various kinds. Throughout the Prairie Provinces, of course, all the homestead land is available for them, and that still runs into many millions of acres, but it is not to any extent close to railways and at the same time suitable for agriculture. But, over a year ago, we reserved from homestead settlement all land within fifteen miles of a railway, and it is on that land that the soldier alone has been able to settle since. We reserve other parcels of land, wherever asked for, for special disposition to soldiers. Where a number of soldiers want to settle together, while we cannot hinder them, yet we do not offer them any help if they are going to settle on the community system and all assume the burden of the conditions. We do not encourage that system and have nothing to do with any such community. We do, however, permit them to gather in communities if they wish to work together and buy and sell together on the co-operative plan, but we insist in every case on individual responsibility to the board itself, and we see that every individual soldier gets the full value of his money so far as that money is supplied by the board.

In addition to the fifteen-mile strip in proximity to each railroad we have reserved many special areas for returned soldiers. For example, last year it seemed to me that the time had come to finally clear up the many complicated questions that had arisen with respect to the Doukhobor community in the province of Saskatchewan. I do not mean to recite the long history of that community and the various attempts that were made to have the Doukhobors comply with the law. Many of them complied, resulting in a rather complicated condition of affairs as to the holding of the different sets of land in the community. But after inspections and negotiations we finally succeeded in clearing up the whole district, so that now there is nothing in the way of a Doukhobor community, as a community; that is a thing of the past in the province of Saskatchewan so far as Dominion lands are concerned. Wherever the lands were reserved for Doukhobors, and they were still doing in a measure, but not wholly, the homestead duties, we cleaned up the whole thing, and we sold to the heads of families their fair proportion of that land at an unimproved valuation of, I think, $10 per acre. They paid for that and we took the individual responsibility of the head of each family. After determining what they all were entitled to, there was finally left an area of about 64 quarter-sections of land, which were taken out of the reserve once and for all, and those 64 quarter-sections we have made available for returned soldiers. That land of course is away above the ordinary homestead land in value, and as a consequence it would not have been fair to the soldiers generally to have opened it for entry, and in the meantime it was too soon to deal with it otherwise in view of the large number of soldiers still overseas. So we leased the land, chiefly to returned soldiers, for this year.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it broken land?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and much of it is improved. Some of it is worth $40 or $50 an acre. What I contemplate as the fairest method of dealing with that land is to put a fair valuation on it, not the outside limit, and to sell it under the ordinary terms, because I think it is only just that some attempt should be made to build up an insurance fund to take care of what will necessarily follow—a certain amount of loss in connection with this phase of the enterprise. Therefore, in dealing with lands of an exceptional value, such as those, it seemed to me that the sale price should be paid.

It will also be noted that some days ago we took considerable areas for this purpose out of the forest reserves. That class of land is not by any means as valuable as the 64 quarter-sections taken from the Doukhobor reserve. I may say that that plan of dealing with the Doukhobor reserve in Saskatchewan, as it finally eventuated, met with the satisfaction not only of the community, but of the other people of the district, including the returned soldiers' organization. They felt that they had been fairly dealt with and expressed their satisfaction with the course taken.

As regards land taken from the forest reserves, the principal reservation is in the Porcupine reserve. That is being opened up for entry on July 2. But we do not propose to allow homestead entry there, but only entry by returned men. A special survey has been made of the land and the idea is that there will be 240 acres available for each man. It is mixed farming land, leaning to stock raising rather than to grain farming land, although undoubtedly it is a grain farming country too. We purpose giving the men who are successful in the allotment one quarter-section each, reserving the immediately adjoining 80 acres to be used by the soldier under some arrangement with the board in the meantime, pending his establishing that he is farming his 160 acres properly and is going to succeed in discharging his obligations, in which event it is intended to sell that 80 acres to him at not its full value, but at some fair valuation, based, of course, upon inspection in each case. Then there are lands that have been held for stock—

Mr. COPP: In this Porcupine district are the soldiers who settle there entitled to a loan for stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, they will be entitled to the loan of $2,500 provided for by the Act of 1917, in addition to the advantage which the soldier has had since March this year, namely, the right to a further loan for stock, implements and improvements. He does not get the full $4,500 that the man gets who buys, because he gets the bounty of the Crown in getting his land; his maximum, therefore, in every case, will be $4,500. He does not get that, of course, unless there is some additional security in the land.

Mr. CAHILL: Have the Government arrived at any basis upon which they will allot this land in the reserves?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is being done by a system of drawing lots; the whole plan has been worked out and is accepted as satisfactory. I do not like the chance system, but I do not know of any other. From all appearances, there is going to be a rush for these lands more resembling a Klondike rush than anything else. We have had to put up tents on the grounds and provide for the accommodation of the soldiers who are going to be there for entry on the 2nd of July.

Mr. CAHILL: I suppose that the plans and regulations can be obtained from the Department of the Interior?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, all details can be had from the Soldier Settlement Board, Union Bank building.

There is one other matter to which I wish to call attention. Under the 1917 Act the soldier homesteader is entitled to a loan of $2,500. That is not added to, except in this way: He is not entitled to the improvement loan of $1,000, because his $2,500 is all he gets on his land; but he is entitled to the loan of $2,000 for stock, and implements, provided the total amount he get does not exceed $3,000. It is felt that if we assist the homesteader by a loan on his land and by a loan for stock and implements, the whole aggregating $3,000, inasmuch as he gets his land free he has no cause of complaint when he compares his position with that of the man who buys his land. As regards the man who owns his land, and, under the 1917 Act was entitled only to a loan of $2,500; to him we grant the privilege of application for the $2,000 for stock and implements and the $1,000 for improvements, provided his total does not exceed $5,500. It will be noted that we do not do the same for the man who owns his land as we do for the man who buys his land and becomes a settler. From some points of view that may appear hard to justify, but the reason is this: The great purpose of the soldier settlement scheme is not to become a big loan venture, not to take the place of loaning companies, but to make men settlers. It is a settlement institution, not a loaning institution; you do not make a man a settler merely by assisting him. But because we assist so much those who become settlers, we cannot altogether deny help to those who already are settlers; so we have decided that this is a fair arrangement to make with regard to the returned soldier who is a farmer, owns his land, and is therefore entitled to some of the advantages of our general scheme. Having said that, I think that I have answered, in the main, the question put through this morning by the member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy).

I omitted to mention this morning one feature of the activities of the board. Some little time ago the board established a branch known as the Home Branch, or domestic science branch, the purpose of which is to assist the soldier's wife. The head of that branch is Mrs. Muldrew, who for many years has qualified herself for this work. Indeed, she was previously engaged in work of a similar character, and is the best person we could possibly get to assume the responsibility of this branch of the work. The Home Branch endeavours, by a system of circulars and correspondence, to help the soldier's wife in her domestic work and in the management of the home, and to prevent, as far as possible, waste and extravagance there. One assistant in each province undertakes the responsibility of the work for that province, and supplements the correspondence by actual visits to the homes of the soldier settlers. That is as far as the organization as yet has gone. In the United States this branch of the agricultural work has reached a considerable degree of efficiency; indeed, it is looked upon there as, perhaps, the most useful phase of the work of the Department of Agriculture. We are trying it in the soldier settlement work—so far, we have every reason to believe, with considerable success.

I think I have finished about all that I should say before we come to the actual clauses of the Bill, except that I should forecast, in general, the main provisions of this legislation so far as they amplify the powers that the board has already exercised under the Orders passed. Under the main basic order regarding private lands, that is, the Order of the 11th of February, the board had power to acquire, by purchase, gift or otherwise, lands for sale for soldiers and to acquire stock and implements for the same purpose. But they have no power to take the land by expropriation, if satisfactory terms could not be arranged with the owners. The power of expropriation was one which we did not feel justified in taking by Order in Council; moreover, it was a power which, for the time being, we did not require, as sufficient lands were available and were being offered for sale to make it reasonably certain that, without expropriation, there would be little, if any, difficulty in providing all the soldiers who would come in with suitable lands for their purposes. At the same time, we cannot altogether rest on the basis of voluntary purchase. There will be lands which we will have to expropriate; consequently this Bill vests power in the board to take lands by expropriation. There is no intention, nor does the Bill evidence any intention, of taking from any man land for soldier settlement which is now reasonably utilized; the only purpose is to compel the owners of lands of which an unreasonable proportion is idle to place those lands at the disposal of the board at a fair price. Consequently in this Act provision is made whereby the board can declare settlement areas in various portions of the country wherever there appears to be land being withheld from utilization and the holders of which are not disposed to sell at a reasonable price so that the lands can be settled under this Bill. When a settlement area is declared, the Bill provides that certain results ensue. It becomes the duty of the owners of the land within those areas to state a price to the board at which they will sell, and to answer questionnaires which will give to the board an adequate knowledge of the land owned by them—of its character, the terms of holding, all the parties interested therein, and so forth. So the whole country, immediately this Act passes will not become subject to expropriation without discrimination. The board must first of all, by gazetting, declare a certain sphere of land a settlement area, and the land within that area so defined then becomes subject to the operations of the board, and the duties that the Act prescribes fall upon the owners of the land within that area.

Mr. GRIESBACH: These provisions do not apply to land that is settled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They refer only to land that is not being settled. The fact that only a negligible percentage of land was under cultivation would not protect it from expropriation. If the owner is not using very much of the land now, he must show that he has facilities in sight with which to cultivate it in the near future. If he is a farmer, for instance, with some sons growing up, he will be dealt with differently from the speculator in the city who is merely withholding the land from cultivation for speculative purposes. The principle the board will follow is embodied in the Act. It would be manifestly impossible to prescribe hard and fast rules that would be applicable everywhere, and indeed, impossible to prescribe hard and fast rules that would be applicable anywhere, but the principle is embodied in the Bill, and it will be the duty of the board to live up to it.

I should have said this morning, in connection with the operations of the board, that the total investment of this country in this plan up to the 14th of June was $14,467,974. I should also have explained when giving the figures as to the number of horses and other animals sold, and the average price per horse, and so forth, that those figures were not by any means the totals for the provinces concerned.

Another feature of the Bill that will require some discussion is the class of men who are to come within its pale. Under the terms of the old Act the soldier of the armies of Great Britain or of any of the Dominions was entitled to the same rights as the soldier in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and the soldier in any of the armies of the Allies was entitled to equal rights, providing he was ordinarily resident in Canada. If in the army of Great Britain, or of the other Diminions, he did not need to be a resident of Canada; he was defined and included in the term "settler" just the same as the Canadian soldier. In this connection I want to explain that in the actual operation of the Act we have never yet got to the point of admitting any of the soldiers of the Imperial army or of the armies of the other Dominions, for the reason that the onrush of applications was always sufficient from our own soldiers to exhaust the capacity of the Board to take care of them, and we deemed it our duty first to take care of the soldiers of Canada, for the reason mainly that Canadian applications—almost eighty per cent of them had had experience of farming in Canada—came from men who were more likely to succeed in this country even than successful farmers out of the British army. As a consequence, the doors have never yet been opened to any other class of men except those ordinarily resident in Canada who served in the Canadian army or in the armies of the Allies. That is to say, we have dealt so far only with Canadian citizens, or citizens from the United States, let us say, who served in the Canadian army.

The definition of "settler" as it will be found in this Act if accepted by the Committee and the House will be virtually the same as under the old Act. There is some alteration, but that can better be discussed when we come to details. It is not, however, the purpose of the Board to admit at once to the privileges of the Act settlers from other countries in the armies of Great Britain or the Allies, and in admitting to the privileges of the Act soldiers of other armies who were not ordinarily resident in Canada before the war, the Bill gives the Board power to exact a larger percentage of cash price than is exacted from soldiers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. I think it will likely be the part of wisdom for the Board to exercise that power, because, however successful a man might have been in agriculture in another country, he will not, other things being equal, be as successful in Canada as a man who has been engaged in agriculture in this country, there is no back-to-the-land movement so good as the movement of the soldiers of the country back-to-the-land in Canada. That is the best back-to-the-land movement there can be in the world, and consequently we propose to push that to the fullest, and in admitting to the privileges of the Act other than the soldiers of this country we believe it will be the part of wisdom to lay down rather more strict provisions than are applicable to Canadian men.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Can we feel reasonably assured that the men who never went beyond Canada will come under this Act in the near future?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the Bill as now submitted the only men who did not go beyond Canada who will be admitted to the privileges of the Act are those who were injured in Canada, or whose injuries, previously sustained, were aggravated in Canada.

Let me emphasize in this connection, and this has particularly to do with the question raised by the hon. member for Ottawa this morning as to extending these or similar benefits to other than farmers, that the great primary object of this Bill is not to afford a gratuity or reward to the soldier. If that were its basic principle and its first purpose, it would inevitably follow that the same gratuity or reward, or one on equal scale, would have to be extended to all. The primary and great principle of this Bill is to secure settlers on the lands of this country—to secure settlement of our idle lands, and to make settlers of those who have proven themselves the backbone and stay of the nation in its trouble. We believe that we cannot better fortify this country against the waves of unrest and discontent that now assail us, as all the rest of the world, than by making the greatest possible proportion of the soldiers of our country settlers upon our land. Of course, every class of citizen is necessary to constitute the national life, but the class of citizen that counts the most in the determination of the stability of a country against such forces as I mentioned a moment ago is undoubtedly the basic class—the agricultural class. That class is the mainstay of the nation. So the purpose of this Bill is a national one primarily. Its purpose is to strengthen the fibre of this country by building into the basic industrial structure of the best blood and bones of our nation.

I stated at the opening that we were giving assistance at a scale more liberal than had ever been undertaken by any institution looking to financial profit, and that is essential. We believe that we shall in the main be protected against loss, first of all by the advantages that we give these men, leaving them free to discharge their obligations and make a living for their families untrammelled by the many burdens which the ordinary settler has to carry. That, we think, is our first security against loss. We believe that the system of supervision that we shall exercise will be the second; and the character of the men, as selected by our qualification boards will be the third,—the last but not the least. Nevertheless, with all these precautions we are certain to have some loss. It would be entirely chimerical to imagine that we can venture without some loss upon this field of activity, into which I think no other nation has ever yet entered, at all events on the scale which we now have in view. Indeed, no other country has ever yet attempted to do the work that is being undertaken by the board in the way of provision of chattels, stock, and equipment. So far as I know, this is distinctly a new venture not launched upon in any other country that conducts, either through the state or otherwise, enterprises of a similar character. As I say, it would be futile to hope that we can save ourselves from loss altogether, but it is a matter of encouragement to find, looking over the whole class of men who have come in and are now settlers by virtue of our law, that there are very few, indeed, who are not adapting themselves to their environment and who are not actually cultivating the land in the most promising manner. Of those who might be said to be not altogether promising—they are not many—most if not all came in and settled under the 1917 Act before any system of selection whatever was in force. The men had the right under that Act to go in and take homesteads, and once they took their homesteads they could come and get loans. Some of those are not succeeding, but so far even that proportion is not large. We find, however, much better results where the men have been first of all selected, their experience inquired into, and all their qualifications ascertained. When that is done we find a much less percentage of loss—indeed, very little, if any, prospect of loss—among those so settled, Consequently this Bill, which aims at still further protecting the soldier against imposition than the various methods I have outlined would do; which aims at the extension of our work beyond even the successes that have been so far achieved; which aims, in a word, at making this one of the greatest settlement schemes in the world, I commend to the committee. This Bill, having those great objects in view, I commend to the best consideration of the committee and of Parliament.

Mr. PEDLOW: Will this Bill be applicable to returned nursing sisters who have served overseas with the military forces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The purpose of the Bill is settlement and the only women who come within its provisions are widows of fallen soldiers. They are included because it was felt, first, that they had a special claim, and secondly, because very frequently widows of soldiers have boys growing up who can render material assistance and make the proposition one of actual settlement. The ordinary nurse, I am afraid, could not come within that promising class, and I do not think that returned nurses should, in their own interests, be encouraged to make settlement on land their occupation in life.

Mr. PEDLOW: But suppose a nursing sister gets married and wishes to settle on land. Would she not be qualified?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. We are not helping men who marry nurses. We are helping returned soldiers.

Mr. PEDLOW: "Settler" is defined as a person who at any time during the war "has been therein engaged on active service in a military force." Does not that definition include nursing sisters?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps under a strict legal interpretation it might. But as a matter of right, the soldier is not entitled to anything. It is all in the discretion of the board, and the policy of the board is definitely not to include women.

Mr. PEDLOW: I ask the question because I have already had an application from a nursing sister who is desirous to have a homestead, and that matter, I understand, is under the consideration of the department at present.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I do not propose to include women.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In view of returns made by commanding officers, has the minister any idea of the average number of soldiers who intend settling on land?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I said this morning, the number of applications is 17,450, up to the 14th of June. In this connection, it must be remembered that the Act has really been in operation only since about March. The chairman of the board is very loath to give anything in the way of an estimate, but if he were compelled to give one he would say that the prospects are that under the Bill we shall settle between 30,000 and 50,000 Canadian soldiers.

Mr. CAHILL: Is there a maximum price for land, and is the soldier permitted to buy improved land where he may find it at a proper price?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is permitted to buy improved land but no maximum price has been fixed, because, for example, in British Columbia, the proper method of farming in certain districts might be to own five or ten acres of improved property which might be all he could afford to venture upon with the assistance the board provides, and it might be at a considerable figure per acre. So that no object could be served in fixing a maximum per acre.

Mr. CAHILL: Suppose a soldier gets a quarter-section in Saskatchewan. He borrows money at five per cent and secures equipment. In the event of his desiring to dispose of his rights what will be his position?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the Order in Council he cannot sell without the consent of the board and this condition will continue if this Bill passes. I may say that a similar provision obtains in Australia, and it is manifestly necessary. We cannot permit a man to come in under the Bill and immediately sell to some one else who may at once desert the land. We have the supervision of each settlement, and the purpose of the board is to make the settler and not somebody else a success as a farmer.

Mr. CAHILL: What will the board do if one returned soldier is willing to assume another soldier's obligations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would all depend on the maximum advantage. We are not going to let any man sell unless we are assured that he is likely to fail and that it is in his interests to sell. In a word, the talisman in every case is the interest of the soldier.

Mr. MANION: What line of co-operation is being pursued at present between, say, the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia, or any provinces which are not distinctly prairie provinces, and the Soldier Settlement Board, in the way of getting settlers on their lands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill provides, as the Order in Council provided, that we may make arrangements with the provinces for utilization of provincial Crown lands. We have adopted the policy not to interest ourselves in provincial Crown lands unless they have been brought to such a stage as to clearance, etc., as to be reasonably fit for a man to make a living on it immediately. In other words, these lands must be on a level with ordinary homestead land as regards sustaining a family; and from the point of view of roads, schools, accessibility to railways, etc., they must be of such a character that it would be desirable to encourage settlement on them.

We do not intend to take provincial Crown lands and do the work of the provinces on these lands. We have enough to do with regard to our own lands. It is for the province to place the land in that position, and then, if they will permit that land to be handled by the board, we are ready to make any fair rate with them.

Mr. MANION: The reason I asked that question is that I noticed in regard to the details given by the minister in his very able exposition of this exceedingly large scheme, that out of all the soldiers who have so far settled on the land, numbering 11,518, 7,812, or roughly two-thirds, have been granted lands in the Prairie Provinces. I have no objection to settlers going to the three Prairie Provinces. It would naturally be to the advantage of Canada that these three Prairie Provinces should be settled and developed, but it is a source of regret to men from Northern Ontario, particularly, and probably from some of the other provinces, such as British Columbia and Quebec, which have large areas of bush land, to see that this scheme gives them so little benefit. In saying this I do not mean to imply that there is any discrimination, but we cannot lose sight of the fact that the bush lands will derive very little of the benefits that are to accrue from the carrying out of this project. For instance, in Northern Ontario there are thousands of acres of good land—bush land, I admit—throughout the clay belt. There is an area extending a thousand miles from Winnipeg to north of Ottawa in Northern Ontario through which three lines of railway run. These three lines of railway pass through a territory which is practically unproductive in traffic except mineral. Those pioneers who have settled in the district of Cochrane, Cobalt and in my own district at the head of the Lakes, have made a very fine success of the land which they have taken up. I happened, by a coincidence, to get a letter to-day from a farmer in my riding about another matter, and I think it is worth while to put part of it on Hansard, because it illustrates the capabilities of that country. The writer of this letter says:

> I am in my sixty-fifth year and while I have done nothing astounding yet I have been a useful citizen and the pioneer of this settlement. I started in 1893 with thirteen acres under cultivation, a team and wagon paid for, $1,000 of debt, and a large family of small children. With frugality, sobriety and steady application, I have a few thousands to spare after making ample provision for the maintenance of my wife and myself during our lifetime; so I have no complaint.

Here is a settler who went into that country as a pioneer twenty-six years ago and made good. There are hundreds of other farmers in that district who can make an equally good showing and the reason I am taking up the time of the committee is that I would like to see some scheme worked out by the board, the minister and the provinces, such as the province of Ontario and the other provinces to which this argument applies, whereby they would get a portion of these lands settled up by these returned soldiers because a better class of citizens could not be found.

Mr. ARTHURS: I would like to call the attention of the minister to a case of a number of soldiers who went overseas from Northern Ontario. They were locatees and had started work on their farms. They are in doubt as to whether they are entitled to receive assistance from the board. I would like the minister to make it clear whether any advance can be made to these men who have come back to their old farms which they are clearing. Can they get an advance, such as is made to other returned soldiers who are taking up land, or in case they do not ask for an advance, can they take advantage of those cheap prices for machinery, harness, etc? Provided a man does not ask for anything in the way of a loan, is there any provision whereby he can take advantage of the other privileges?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am just a little doubtful whether a man on provincial crown lands, that he does not own, can come under the law now. I do not think he can become a settler under the Act and be entitled to an advance for machinery, etc. But under this statute we will be enabled to make arrangements with the provinces whereby we will be able to do that. We want to do it. I do not see why a man who is located on provincial crown lands, if he has something that he can make a living on, should be denied one iota of assistance given to the man who located on Dominion crown lands. There should be no discrimination in that regard provided of course the province is ready to do for us what we can do for ourselves in regard to Dominion lands; that is to say, give us the land as security. In the case of the provincial crown lands such as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has just described, and of which I know there are considerable areas, we hope to make an arrangement with the provinces whereby they will place this land at our disposal for soldier settlement, the board to supply the money needed to purchase stock and equipment just the same as if the soldier were settling on Dominion land with the provision that if the soldier makes good and keeps the land it is all over and the province has no interest in it; nor has the Dominion. That is the purpose that the provinces have in mind in dealing with these lands; they want the lands settled, but they do not want anything out of them. In the event of the soldier not succeeding and the lands reverting to the board, then it would seem a fair arrangement that the board should hold the land only for what was then against it and that after that the province should take the land. That might be worked out. If there is to be given to the province a supervision as to the amount advanced in the first place, accepting the approval of the province to it, and then if the soldier abandons the land, we can give the province the option of repurchase at the amount against the land. That would be, it seems to me, a fair arrangement as to provincial Crown lands. If the provinces will enter into an arrangement of that kind there should be no difficulty in our going ahead with it.

Mr. ARTHURS: How will it be where the soldier already has title?

[Mr. Arthurs,]

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the soldier has title the matter is all right now. He can come in at once and get $2,500 on his land, $2,000 on his chattels, and $1,000 for improvements just the same as the others provided he passes the qualification board and subject to the qualifications the same as other people.

Mr. M. CLARK: If I may be permitted, I should like to express to the committee my own feeling of great appreciation of the lucid explanation the minister has given to the scheme and the strong, further evidence he has afforded to us of the tremendous zeal with which he does an almost incalculable amount of public service. I should like, coupled with that expression of opinion, to voice the hope that this scheme will meet with the generous success which such zeal ought to obtain. I say that being as fully alive as I think the average farmer who has been a settler in the West for eighteen years may be to the difficulties of the scheme, I should be less than human in sympathy if I elaborated those difficulties to the minister because I know that he is well aware of them even by this time in the chronology of the launching of this effort. The amount of public money that will be laid out in the long run, supposing a forecast of the board is at all accurate, it may be readily calculated, will be between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000.

Well, that is a large sum of money. I am bound to say that, listening to the minister, I thought that every possible human safeguard that could be devised had been devised. I think that those responsible for the scheme have gone into it with the utmost care, but it would not be right, perhaps, if some member of the Committee didn't put himself on record as seeing what the difficulties of the scheme are. From 30,000 to 50,000 returned soldiers settled upon the land would, I am sure, to every member of this Committee, be a most desirable thing to bring about, but having regard to the psychology of those soldiers, one cannot help having very grave doubts about the retaining of them on the land. I have had a little personal difficulty with some returned soldiers myself, and there has been considerable difficulty in retaining some who have had the chance of going on the land under much more favourable conditions than are offered under this scheme.

I am glad the minister made it clear to the Committee that this is a scheme for the benefit of Canada; it is not primarily, I take it, a scheme for the benefit of the returned soldier. If it were represented as such then one would feel that there was great cogency and force in the question which was put by my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) this morning, as to what we are going to do with the soldiers who do not get the benefit of going on to a half-section of land with a seven or eight thousand dollar debt. My hon. friend has not homesteaded in the West—at least I do not think so. I have. Therefore I probably view the benefits conferred upon the soldier under this scheme in a very different light, or from a very different angle, than from that of my hon. friend, and any other hon. gentleman in this House who does not know what the difficulties of settling and bringing a farm to success are, even with the great advantages of western Canada today. I say these things not with a view to offering any opposition to the scheme whatsoever, I wish it the most hearty and ample success. I think that probably the Board and the Government will find, and successive governments which have this scheme to administer will find, that the greatest success will be attained in the handling of the two or three classes to whom the minister referred this morning. There are some men, I understand, going in for agricultural training; there are boys going in for training. That is a splendid guarantee in the first place that these men or boys will get enough knowledge of farming to be judges themselves of whether they are fitted to take up farming occupations and likely to succeed in them; and it is a splendid guarantee in the second place that if they do take up the occupation they will have attained the knowledge and the experience, and the training, which gives some reasonable prospect of success.

Among other difficulties attending the scheme—a scheme of unprecedented magnitude—will be found the fact that what we buy for the men going on the land at the present time in the way of cattle, and horses I very much fear will be bought at values which are not likely to be maintained in the course of a few years. I cannot myself, Mr. Chairman, I wish I could on personal grounds, look forward with any confidence to agricultural prices along these lines being maintained in the course of the coming years at the level at which they are now. That, of course, will put the soldier in the position of a man who, in so far as he has means, has invested in cattle or horses, has made a bad investment. It will be different, however, with the land. We may look forward to land still appreciating in western Canada, and especially we may look forward to that if the success which this scheme deserves is in any fair measure obtained and we have these men settling on the land.

Now I have only one or two further observations to make, and one I am rather frightened to make in the presence of my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie). He chided me the other day with the fact that all roads lead to Rome with me—in other words, I cannot speak in this House without talking on the tariff. Well, I will try to put the matter as broadly as I can and not wound my hon. friend's susceptibilities; but I do want to point out very seriously to both sides of this House that a primary and fundamental condition to the success of this scheme is to make farming a profitable occupation. I think the Committee will agree with me in that broad proposition. If farming cannot be made, in the years that are ahead of Canada, a reasonably profitable occupation, then we are launching a huge scheme, at the instance of the Government, which is foredoomed to failure, and we are committing almost a crime against the men whom we send farming. I put it so strongly because I am so sure of my ground. I would like to impress that upon this Committee because I want to go a little further and say, that having settled as a farmer in Western Canada 18 years ago, and being in touch with other farmers of all classes out there, farming was a purely paying occupation before the war. It is a great question if you can raise wheat for 65 cents a bushel as a paying proposition. I very much question if my hon. friend from Victoria, Alta. (Mr. W. H. White), who knows farming conditions in the West probably as well as any member in this House, won't agree with me in that matter.

4 p.m. He resembles myself in having endeavoured for years in the most honest and hardworking way to make farming pay, and he and I have had talks over this proposition in private. We are getting splendid prices for cattle just now. My farm put out steers last fall, two-year old steers, which brought $125 a head. But since I came to Canada, from the same farm three-year old steers have gone out for $36 a head. Just imagine a man bringing a calf into the world——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: —living with it for three and a half years, and then selling it for the magnificent sum of $36.

Mr. BUREAU: Twelve dollars a year.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Just think of it: And that has actually happened to me since I came to Canada. Now I do not want to branch out on this subject or I shall be making another Budget speech and possibly a more practical one than I delivered last week. I do not want to go any further with this. Indeed, in speaking to the minister I am pretty well convinced I am speaking to a convert. He is a minister who comes from Western Canada, I have talked to him in private over the tariff and he is one who some years ago moved a resolution favouring a reduction in the duties on certain implements. But though he is himself in a measure converted on this question, I need not tell him, he knows too well, the stony ground he is operating on in Council; and I want him to bring the same ability, the same strength of character, and the same determination to bear upon that ground (in pointing out my final consideration) that he does to his general work in the political life of this country. Along that line I wish him also success, and I point out the only line on which his scheme can be made a success.

I want to close by once more saying that I wish the minister's scheme a most generous amount of success. It will cost a lot of money, and it requires some imagination to see what are the benefits which will compensate for the expenditure of that money. If we can succeed in settling any fair proportion, say 30,000 to 50,000, of the gallant men who with the rest of our Allies defended the world,—if we can succeed in settling those men upon the lands of this fair Dominion, what a foundation we are laying for a citizenship, what traditions of world service and national service we are building up for future generations to emulate. While it is easy to calculate the money that this scheme may cost, it is impossible for the human mind to calculate or to describe what benefits will accrue to Canada if we can embody these human elements,—the grandest in the world today, and the grandest that the world has ever produced—in the manhood which is to make the Canada of the future.

Mr. CAHILL: Could the minister tell us approximately what amount of land is owned by the Dominion Government in the area set apart and considered fit for soldiers' settlement? And another question while I am on my feet: Is it the custom of the department to pay cash for the land which they purchase before selling it to the soldiers?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to the first question, I have not at present an estimate of the amount of land within the 15-mile area that is fit for soldier settlement.

Mr. CAHILL: Is that being inspected?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I think, though, that Mr. Roland of the board is able to give an estimate after inspection by himself, but I am satisfied that the acreage is not sufficient to take care of the number of men we have settled already. In this connection, let me say that although this plan has been in operation virtually only since March last, the Dominion of Canada has, up to the present time, actually settled more men upon the land than have all the other Dominions of the Empire and Great Britain together by, I think, approximately 50 per cent.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the consideration for the land paid in cash?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it is always paid for in cash.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the board invite holders of land in Western Canada to offer their land to the board for sale?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, we invite offers for sale from everywhere. The number of sales that have been put through in Nova Scotia and in all the other provinces can be given. But where land is settled, as in the southern portion of Ontario, you cannot do very much more in the way of soldier settlement. We do not discriminate at all between the provinces; the soldier can go just where he likes, and the advantages of the scheme are applicable everywhere.

Mr. COOPER: The hon. minister has emphasized that this is a national undertaking and not especially for returned soldiers. Would he define what soldiers are entitled to the benefits of this Bill? There are a large number of men who proceeded as far as Bermuda. Are they to be considered overseas men? A large number proceeded to Siberia, which cannot be defined as the theatre of war. There seems to me to be a great discrimination against many good men who have served in Canada—men who have been retained in Canada for no other reason than their own efficiency. The greater benefits of this Bill, as of other legislation pertaining to soldiers, will go to the class of soldiers that deserve least of their country. I refer in particular to those men who were forced to do their duty by the Military Service Act. Some 4,000 of these men have served in Siberia; some 20,000 or 30,000 of them have not gone any farther than England. Many thousands of men volunteered in Canada and gave excellent service, but, through no fault of their own, they were prevented from going overseas. If this is to be a national undertaking, I say that these men are entitled to consideration. Furthermore, I notice that section 4, paragraph 3, provides that the widow of any person who died on active service, and who but for his death might be a settler as now defined, etc—. Now, does that not preclude the widow of a soldier who died on duty in Canada from benefiting?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He might have been on active service in Canada.

Mr. COOPER: Previous to June 22 last year the only men serving in Canada, except C.E.F. units, were the militia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman's question has taken several phases. First of all, the board has so far confined, and will by this Act confine, the benefits to members of the Expeditionary Force who have gone out of Canada. That is the definition appearing at the top of p. 3 of the Bill—"who have gone out of Canada and are members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force on active service." It is quite true that a great many deserving men did not go out of Canada. It is also still more true that the main purpose of the Bill is land settlement. But in arriving at the main purpose of the Bill, and keeping that ever in mind, it is only right and proper that the most deserving at all events should be treated first, and, generally speaking, those that have the first and primary claim to the best treatment are those who have gone overseas. That is not always so, but it is as broad and fair a line as can be drawn. While it is true that many men were retained here because they were efficient, if you admit a man to these benefits, simply because he is a good man, then you would have to admit civilians as well, because a great many Canadians who did not go overseas are not to be blamed.

It is no reflection on them that they did not, but those who have the greatest call upon the country are those who did; consequently, that is the class to which we first bring the benefits of the Act. But if a man incurs a disability while on active service, or if a disability which he previously had is aggravated, he becomes entitled to the benefits of the Act. Undoubtedly if a man dies after enlistment in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, he incurs disability; therefore, his widow comes under the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. COOPER: Prior to June 22 of last year, the forces in Canada were the active militia; they were not part of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If her husband would not have been entitled to the benefits of the Act, she cannot take advantage of its provisions, but if her husband dies on active service, she becomes entitled to the benefits of the Act.

Mr. MAHARG: The minister has said that the most deserving shall receive the first consideration; and I think he is perfectly right in that. It seems to me that there are none more deserving than those who have been wounded and are detained in hospitals for months, or even years—men who will eventually be able to take up land and work it successfully. I have in mind the case of a boy who went overseas, was seriously wounded, and has been in hospital for some time. He is a farmer's son and understands farming thoroughly; in close proximity to his father's farm there is land which it is expected the board will soon throw open for entry. The boy has had several operations with a view to making him capble of earning a livelihood in his former occupation. Some provision should be made under which boys in that position may have land retained for them for a reasonable length of time, provided they can pass the board. As the Bill now stands, they cannot secure land until they are discharged, but by the time they are discharged this land may have been taken up by others who may be just as deserving, or may not. These boys should not be prevented from securing land which, in a great many cases, they might be able to obtain, if it was reserved for them, in close proximity to land owned by their friends or relatives. Possibly the minister will let this clause stand until he has had time to give this suggestion consideration. Another point which I should like to mention is this: The Bill gives to the widow of the soldier who has been killed overseas the right to secure this assistance. In all fairness, that assistance should be extended also to the mother of the boy who, having been her only support, has been killed overseas.

Mr. P. R. McGIBBON: I suggest that the minister add a clause to the Bill to provide that nursing sisters shall, so far as the benefit to be derived from this legislation is concerned, be placed on an equal footing with the returned soldier. We are giving women the vote; they are satisfactorily filling many public positions. These nurses risked their lives overseas and no doubt saved the lives of many soldiers, and I think they should not be left out of this Bill.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Would not the readiest way to do that be for the nursing sister to marry the soldier?

Mr. P. R. McGIBBON: I have no objection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Replying to the hon. member (Mr. Maharg), I may say that, generally speaking, it would be impossible to deal with those who, by reason of disability, are not discharged, because it is not possible to tell whether, having regard to the condition they may be in after their discharge, they should be encouraged to take up farming as an occupation. Consequently, the door should not be opened widely to that class. But it is not impossible to provide that where the qualifications are favourably passed upon, such a man, though not discharged, might have the right to reservation of land in his name; and I will defer the clause with a view to considering some such provision. The hon. member also referred to the case of the mother whose sole surviving son was killed in the war. If the main object of this Bill were to help the afflicted relatives of soldiers, certainly the mother should be included; but if the mother's only support was killed I do not see how she could be a settler. Certainly she is deserving, she is in the first class of all, and if she has other sons growing up she might be in a position to benefit by this scheme. But if she is alone—and the hon. member presumes that there is nobody to help her—it is not kindness to her to ask her to become a settler; I scarcely think, therefore, that it would be well to admit that class. As to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. P. R. McGibbon), the argument that I have just used would apply. I am inclined to think that, speaking in a legal sense, nursing sisters are included in the provisions of the Bill. But it is not the policy of the board to extend to them the benefits of the Act, because not being widows of deceased soldiers with children growing up, these nurses, it is very strongly presumed, would be better doing something else than trying to become pioneer settlers.

Mr. MAHARG: Could not a mother whose only son had been killed at the front at least be given the benefit of the free grant mentioned in section 15?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The widow of the soldier is entitled to the benefits of the Act, including the free grant, first, because there is presumption of her having other help, and, secondly, and perhaps the more important reason, because under the Dominion Lands Act, widows, if they have others dependent upon them, have the right of taking out homestead entries, and in 1917 Parliament extended the soldier settlement rights to widows.

In view of these two considerations I include them here, but neither of these considerations are present in the case of the mother, and I am afraid if we extended the Act to that most deserving class of all, the mother of the fallen soldier, we would have to extend it to the sister who was dependent on the fallen brother, and to the aunt who was dependent on him. It would be very hard for us to stop if we went any distance beyond where we are now.

Mr. ARTHURS: Just a word regarding the widow of the man who died Overseas. I think this clause should be extended to include the widow of the man who has from any cause died since he served Overseas. She would not be included as the clause is now drawn.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might be justified if he died as a result of service, but I do not think it could be justified otherwise. I will take a note, however, of that class.

Mr. ARTHURS: Apparently the intention was to make that class eligible.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a lengthy and very important Bill, but I hope that the very full explanation we have received from the minister will help us through with it. I think it is a pity that the Government did not, once for all, decide what their policy was to be with regard to assistance and recognition of the services of the returned soldier. It is well understood that it is the intention of the Government to give some form of recognition to the services of every soldier who has been Overseas and acquitted himself with credit to his country, and is now back here expecting to engage in his former occupation or to take up some other legitimate form of employment. While I have no definite information on that point, it is the general belief that the Government intends to take cognizance of their services and reward them in some way or other. If that is the policy of the Government it is a pity that it was not settled, once for all, whether it was to be assistance in the way of farming, assistance in the way of business, or in some other way, and then the returned soldier would have had the opportunity of choosing which of the different offers put forward by the Government he would take. That course would have avoided dissatisfaction and perhaps jealousies among the returned soldiers, for it may well be argued that one class of returned soldiers have been given a better opportunity and shown greater consideration than the rest.

Here we have one of the schemes which the Government has adopted—the giving of assistance to those going on the land. We can view the policy put forward by the Government in this Bill from two standpoints. It is either a colonization policy entirely, or it is a policy of assistance to the returned soldier. As a colonization policy, I say at once to the minister that it is an impossible one; it is far too expensive and precarious for the Canadian people to carry out. That is all I shall say from the colonization standpoint. We must try and get people on the land, if colonization is our object, at much less expense than this proposal involves.

Considered as a policy of assistance to the returned soldier, we have to consider very carefully whether we can satisfy the returned soldiers who will not be admitted to the privileges of this Act with the proportionate assistance they will be looking for. That I think is a proposition which the Government will have to consider very carefully indeed. In the scheme before us we propose to assist the returned soldier to the extent of an advance in some cases of $8,000, and in the majority of cases of $7,500. That is a very large amount of money, when we consider that possibly fifty thousand men in this country will take advantage of it. If they do, that will mean a vast amount of money advanced by the Canadian people. If the soldier-farmer succeeds and is able to return this money to the country, we may survive it, but my hon. friend from Red Deer who has had eighteen years of experience of farming in the West, who is a careful, industrious, intelligent and capable man in every respect, tells us that he found it as much as he could do to make ends meet when he was cultivating the land in the far West. Now that should be a warning to us that we shall have some failures on our hands in connection with this scheme. However, it has been decided upon by the Government, and personally I am not going to take any decided stand one way or the other, except that I hope it will succeed. I must say again, however, to the minister that as a colonization scheme it is a bad one; it is too expensive. If it is intended as assistance to the returned soldier, we must bear in mind that the Government must give assistance in like proportion to our other soldiers who were engaged in the war. To my mind, it is a question whether or not it would be better to agree upon a set amount of money to be given to each soldier as a recognition of his services, and then let him fall back on his own resources and use his own initiative and ability in working his way in the world. Perhaps that would be the better way. After all, it is not well to have too many strings on people and to have them tied down too closely to Government assistance. It is good for them that they should have a free hand and be thrown very largely upon their own resources. That has been the experience of our forefathers in every part of Canada. When they came here they had to hew out homes for themselves out of the great forests with no assistance of any kind; they had neither railroads nor steamboats nor anything else, and yet they made a success of life.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman mentioned a grant of so much money to each soldier. If that scheme were adopted, how much money would he suggest should be paid to each soldier?

Mr. McKENZIE: I have not sufficiently considered the question, but I did see one suggestion that came before the legislature of Alberta or Saskatchewan where it was put forward that a grant of $2,000 should be made. I am not saying whether that is too much or too little, but that is the only amount I have seen mentioned. Even if we gave them $2,000, I think in the end that would prove a less onerous burden for the Canadian people than the scheme that is now before the House. However, I have not figured it out and I am only pointing out to the minister the fact that he may encounter a difficult problem in fixing a standard of $8,000 in the way of assistance to some soldiers and not the same amount to others. I make the suggestion that the minister might consider whether or not it would be better for the country to give a certain amount as an absolute gratuity to returned soldiers and say: Go your way, do the best you can and God be with you. Make a home for yourself in this free country. That is another way of looking at the matter and I merely throw out the suggestion. I hope that the scheme will be satisfactory and that this country will to a very great extent be developed by the setling down of these good men on the land. I trust we shall be able to get through with this Bill without very much criticism, as I believe it has been very fully explained by the Minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should explain that in Clause 3 on page 3, in the definition of "settler" the limitation in the 13th line contained in the words "and has been otherwise than dishonourably discharged," etc., appertains to all three classes.

Mr. ANDREWS: For over a year now, associated with some of my comrades, I have considered the Land Settlement Scheme very closely, and I have no hesitation in saying to-day that after a most careful consideration of the whole matter I think this is absolutely the best land scheme in the world. I have lived in the West, not eighteen but thirty years, and I think that if a man cannot afford to pay the present prices of land in the West the country is no good. Now I know that the country is good, and I know that the men are good, and therefore the success of the scheme is assured. A friend of mine from Winnipeg, who looks after the interests of the selection board and who has been in the land business for something like thirty years, told me that over 90 per cent of the men who had already availed themselves of the scheme were practical farmers, of good descent. Altogether I congratulate the Government most heartily on the move.

Mr. PECK: Were those who were under sentence at the end of the war and were pardoned in the general amnesty be regarded as dishonourably discharged?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really cannot answer that question. In the old Act we had "honourably discharged" but we found in operation that some soldiers did not get anything that could be called an honourable discharge, although there was such a thing as being released from the army under dishonourable circumstances. We therefore changed it to these words "otherwise than dishonourably discharged."

Mr. GRIESBACH: What is his position when discharged at the termination of his sentence?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: That, I think, would be a dishonourable discharge.

Mr. GRIESBACH: No. Having served his sentence he is discharged in the ordintry way, if his sentence does not provide for his dismissal. He is not dishonourably discharged merely because he has served a sentence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When a man applies, his name goes automatically to the Militia Department and they are asked if he comes in under these classes. They decide whether he has been otherwise than dishonourably discharged.

Mr. PEDLOW: Adverting to subsection (s) of section 2, it seems to me that one of the most deserving classes of those who have gone overseas is the nursing sister. I am sure every hon. member who is a soldier will bear me out when I say that they have conducted themselves in the war with honour to themselves and this country. They gave unstinted service in the cause of the Empire, sacrificed the comforts of home, and left pleasant, congenial surroundings to take a strenuous part in the war and share in its hardships, discomforts and terror. I think that the minister would be justified, in view of this fact, in allowing the nursing sisters at least to qualify for a part of the considerations that are provided in this Act and to homestead, to the extent of what is called a soldier's grant of land. Having made an application of this nature, I think the department has already ruled in effect that nursing sisters are entitled to this consideration. I would not be positive, but I think I have a letter on file to that effect. I made application on behalf of a nursing sister who is still overseas, having been there four and a half years. I asked that her father be allowed to make a homestead entry for her and the reply I received states distinctly, I am morally certain, that under the law her father could not make the application for her and that she would have to wait until her return. I think this is as reasonable as the claim made by the hon. member for Maple Creek on behalf of widows and particularly those whose only sons had been killed overseas. I think it is equally reasonable and should merit particular consideration before the Committee passes this section of the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Widows are, of course, specifically included. They are included in the 1917 Act and have the right to soldier entry, but every one—nursing sisters and all —must be passed by the qualification boards as fit settlers before they come in for the benefits of the Act.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understood the minister to say before that they were not entitled to these benefits.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say they were not entitled. I think even in this Act they are still included in the term "settler," but the practice has been not to admit them to the benefits of the Act for the reason that they cannot qualify for the rough and strenuous duties of settlers. Even in the case of widows the very greatest difficulties are encountered. Frequently they are very anxious to enter upon the land and it is hard to refuse them, but it is only one in a large number that should be encouraged to go upon the land, and that may succeed if she attempted to do so. There is another grave difficulty in the case of women. A woman may shortly marry and we find as a fact that they do More widows than one who came under the Act and got all its benefits married soldiers. In each of these cases there was one family with double benefits.

Mr. PEDLOW: That is quite right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but I think it is much better to distribute the help which the State is able to give and which is going to be heavy enough, we all admit. I rather believe in a fair system of distribution than doubling in this manner. If such a woman's husband died and he left her an estate she might marry another soldier and double up again.

Mr. PEDLOW: There is nothing more wrong in a nursing sister marrying a soldier and having two grants of land than there would be in a family having five sons each obtaining a grant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member must surely perceive that where you have one soldier married you have only one settler. The purpose of the Act is to encourage settlement on the land, and where you have four sons you have four potential families and four distinct settlers. There is all the difference in the world between that and the proposition of the hon. member.

Mr. PEDLOW: The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. White) suggests that this is one example of collective bargaining which the Government might very well endorse.

Mr. BLAKE: Will members of the Royal Air Force, especially those who did not get away from Canada, come under this Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: All those who got away although they were members of the British Royal Air Force were included, but those who did not get away from Canada are just in the same position as others who did not get away: They are not included.

Mr. BLAKE: I think that is a matter that should be given consideration. A lot of men are kept in Canada not because they wanted to be but because they could not help themselves. Their hearts were just as right as those of the boys who went over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That applies to the hon. member himself.

Mr. BLAKE: They should have the same right. They have lost their time, and their business is wrecked. If they are qualified and prepared to go on the land, they should be given the same consideration as those who did go over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They did lose some time, but they were not really taken from their business in the same sense as the men who went overseas. In the order of dealing with these men, the most deserving class must be taken first. Those who find it most difficult to rehabilitate themselves are usually the most deserving class.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section be adopted?

Mr. MAHARG: I thought I heard the minister say that he was prepared to let this stand?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that stands.

On section 3—Soldier Settlement Board continued:

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the minister might tell us what demarcation there is between his own department in dealing with the returned soldier and the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Department deals with disabled soldiers. This has to do with land settlement and the qualifications of soldiers for it.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—officers, clerks and employees:

Mr. PEDLOW: What salaries will be paid to these officials?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The chairman receives $6,000 per year at present. Each of the two other commissioners, Major Ashton, a returned soldier, and Mr. Maber, receive $5,000 each. These are the salaries of the board. The other officers are appointed at salaries approved by the Civil Service Commission. Our advisory councils and qualification boards, to whose earnest and competent efforts whatever good there is in our organization is largely due, give their services free. They were composed of the very highest class of citizens in every place where they were appointed—men who were busy with their own occupations and who made a very substantial sacrifice to do this work. In Winnipeg Mr. Cross is chairman, Mr. Robert McKay, of Allan, Killem and McKay, who has been associated with the work from the beginning, is one member of the board and the third is Colonel Grassie. In Regina, Mr. Stiles, Mr. Gibbins and Dr. Mahan are members of the board. There are similar men in Alberta, and they have performed very valuable services to the returned men in the devotion they have shown to this work. Later on, for them and for the qualification boards, we adopted the system of recompensing them for each day of actual work—not the days going and coming—at the rate of $10 per day. At my special request the hon. member for Westminster District (Mr. Stacey), who is himself a settler and pioneer in British Columbia, went to that province for the purpose of assisting returned men, explaining to them how to come in under the Act, and helping them in every way in his power and he did so with great ability and very evident and satisfactory results.

Mr. PEDLOW: I noticed that earlier in the explanation of the Bill the minister stated that the representative of the Ontario Department of Agriculture in each section of the province would assist the Government in this work. Will the Government have to pay for that assistance, and if so, how much?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has been no arrangement made to pay these men anything. The duty that falls upon them is very light for the reason that Ontario is very largely settled. These men are the ones to whom the soldier should apply, and if it is a clear case that he is a qualified man and has a proper experience, that ends it; he is accepted as qualified. If there is any doubt about it at all he has to go to the qualification board.

[Mr. Pedlow.]

Mr. PEDLOW: On the recommendation of the Ontario officer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. But, we have made no arrangement to pay them and we have not paid them anything.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—minister may reserve and transfer lands to board:

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the title to this land remain in the Government or is the title vested in the purchaser?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The title is vested in the board immediately the Governor in Council passes an order turning the land over to the board. That applies to the Dominion lands which have been reserved for soldiers' settlement. As soon as the Order in Council turns the land over to the board, the title is in the board and the board can sell it. As regards private lands purchased, the title is taken by the board in fee simple and the board has a form of agreement which is invariably used. They simply sell by agreement of sale. That is a method that has been used much more in Western Canada than Eastern Canada but it is applicable everywhere. That is the only way we can take care of these obligations because if the method that is more customary in Eastern Canada of putting the title and the mortgage together the expense of making good the title and discharging the mortgage later would be so great that it would impose a burden on the buyer. We have endeavoured to keep our legal costs down to the minimum. We have a scale which I revised, that, I think, is the least the work can be done for, but instead of employing legal firms or legal men in each of the districts, we have a separate legal branch in each of the provinces in charge of a salaried man. We pay all expenses in connection with the loans, we do not charge the soldier anything and we are doing that by establishing in each of the provinces, attached to the board, a legal man.

Mr. McKENZIE: If a soldier goes to a certain place, say in Manitoba, and selects a farm and the board approves of the price, the board, in its own name, makes an agreement of sale with the purchaser?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will both documents be of general record in the province?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, we record our titles just the same as the title of any purchaser although under our Act we do not have to.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What kind of title does the soldier get?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He gets an agreement of sale. His interest in the land is equitable only.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: He does not get an absolute deed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He does not get an absolute deed, and the agreement of sale is cancellable merely upon notice. No expense at all is involved.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Is the valuation placed upon this land by the appraisers sent out by the Government, final ?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is final in this sense that the valuation of our officers is the valuation upon which we rely; that is to say the amount we will permit to be advanced against that land depends upon that valuation.

On section 8—compulsory purchase:

Mr. STACEY: I wish to offer a slight amendment to clause 8, or rather I suggest it to the minister in the hope that it will be acceptable. But before doing so, I would like to make a few general observations regarding the way in which this proposition actually works out from the standpoint of the soldier as an applicant. It was my privilege to spend some two months on the mainland in British Columbia endeavouring to do what I could for the returned man in his effort to find a home upon the land, and having had some experience in the city of Vancouver during the last few months, I have no hesitation whatever in most heartily congratulating the Government and the minister upon the comprehensive, complete, and in the main, thoroughly satisfactory character of the scheme which has been placed before the country. I want also to congratulate the minister upon the staff which is to be found in the city of Vancouver, and I presume a similar staff in the matter of efficiency has been provided in every other office throughout the country. I mention the Vancouver staff because I know of it, and know something of its character and efficiency. Not only do I refer to the officials, but also to the men who comprise the qualification committee and the advisory board. In the city of Vancouver there are three of the best known loan men in the province of British Columbia, who volunteered their services. I do not suppose we could have bought those services; the men are too busy, their time is too valuable, and they are otherwise engaged from morning to night; but as a contribution by themselves towards this work they were willing to help and do it gratuitously. This service was very highly appreciated by the board in Vancouver, and I am sure is likewise appreciated by this House, and I presume similar conditions obtain with regard to other centres.

The question may arise in some men's minds: Who are going back to the land? We of course looked for men who had come from the farm to return, but in addition we found that there was a considerable number of men from offices, even some men from the professions, who desired to settle upon the land and for various reasons, now consider, they do not further desire the confinement of an office. They seek and long for, a settled life; they want to be doing what they believe is worth while. They appreciate the national slogan of production as the cry for the coming generation, and wish to make their contribution towards the development of this great country. We did find, however, that there are in the province, and I presume the same may obtain in other provinces, several misconceptions as to the character and the nature of the scheme outlined. We found in some parts of British Columbia men here and there with the idea that the Government was buying on a large scale, that it was purchasing great areas of land. Consequently, we had offers from individuals and corporations of land that was in their opinion, most admirably suited for the returned soldiers. Some men seemed to think they had land that was especially suitable for the returned men, although to the most of us the question would naturally occur why it had not been offered and accepted for a similar purpose prior to the introduction of this scheme.

Now I want to speak of a matter which the minister did not mention but which is one of the practical outcroppings of the entire proposition. We have received very hearty co-operation from various organized bodies, from municipalities, and from private citizens, and indeed from real estate firms, along these lines. A man returned wished to engage in a certain kind of farming. We knew the country and would say to him: "Go out to a certain place. Go to Mr. Smith and he will show you everything in that district which is available." There was nothing in it for Mr. Smith, he did that work in the interests of the men concerned; and thus we were able to facilitate the search of the applicant for land without any material expense.

I made reference to real estate agents. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that in this country, and I do not speak from the standpoint of any one province, there are real estate men, and real estate men, and there is a vast difference between them. In the latter class the manhood still dominates, the adjective is smaller than the man. We did receive very material assistance from a great number of real estate offices and many of the men in those offices have given their time and their services in order to secure settlers upon the land. I regret to say, however, that in a few cases it was necessary to discontinue operations with certain men who seemed to possess the spirit of the age to such an extent that they deemed it was up to them to get all they could, not simply out of the Government—but they seemed to think it was their chance to "do" the soldier and it was our business according to the best information we could secure, and to the extent of our ability to safeguard the interest of the returned man who was seeking a home upon the land.

The question has been raised as to the character of the land upon which these men went. I do not want any one to think that in every case the returned men are settling upon entirely new land. That is not the case, Sir. In some instances they are buying unimproved land, but more generally in the province of British Columbia they are purchasing improved land. It may be argued that this does not really conduce to an increased amount of production, but the reason for that, Sir, is this: In many sections of that province you will find a large number of farms and ranches held by elderly men. The explanation of that is that his boys have gone overseas and will not return.

He has a farm on his hands, he is too old to work, and he says: "I will sell it." In many cases he offers his farm for sale at a cheap price to the returned man, and he himself steps aside and gives him the advantage of his years of toil. That is one reason, Sir, why in many cases they have bought improved property. I could cite instance after instance where that has actually taken place; the elderly father who is left on the farm is not able to carry on, and consequently his land is sold. Often it is subdivided into two, three, four, or more small holdings, and that means the neuclei of so many more families. As a result we have a large percentage of returned men upon the improved lands of British Columbia. I am speaking now of the southern part of the province, where the majority of the settlers are locating. There are some who choose the pioneering life, but unless a man makes that choice we do not encourage or even go so far as to suggest it to him. Most of the men want their homes reasonably near centres, with all the advantages of social and business life that can be obtained in the older sections of the country. The result is that we are seeking more land in the southern part of the province.

Clause 8, as I understand it, looks towards compulsory purchase, and my amendment is along this line, Sir, that I would have the clause go a step further. I would therefore submit for the consideration of the minister and the committee the following amendment to clause 8, which would then read as follows:

> The Board may, for the execution of any of the purposes of this Act, acquire by way of compulsory purchase, in the manner provided by Part III of this Act, such agricultural land as it may deem necessary from:
>
> (a) All persons, firms, and corporations in any part of Canada;
> (b) The Indian superintendent for the province of British Columbia.

I note in the Indian Act of 1906 a provision for the appointment of an Indian superintendent for the province of British Columbia. If that appointment has not been made, a change in the wording of my amendment I presume would be necessary. But I wish to call the attention of the Committee to two or three very important facts. In the province of British Columbia we have a large area of land held as Indian reserve land. A year ago I called the attention of the House to this matter, and again last spring. My attention has been directed to the same matter very frequently during the past two months, and I would not be performing what I believe to be my duty and taking the right course unless I gave some additional facts regarding this very acute situation in that province.

I presume that these Indian reserves were granted years ago on the principle that the Indian was the ward of the Government, that he was to be taken care of by the Government, that he was not in a position to look after himself; and that therefore a wide sweep of land should be given to him on which he could hunt and fish. In the course of time the Indian population has decreased, the hunting in the sections of the country to which I refer is altogether a thing of the past, and the result is that in many parts of southern British Columbia we have large areas of some of the finest land utterly waste. I could cite many cases to support this statement. I have in mind a block of 800 acres of the finest land in one section of the province, occupied, I understand, by three small Indian families, who make their living mainly by selling wood. At this juncture of the nation's history it is almost a national calamity so much of the best land in our province should thus lie waste. We pride ourselves on doing justice to the Indian. I am the last man in this House to suggest that anything but the fullest measure of justice should be meted out to him. But in doing justice to the Indian, let us not do an injustice to the white man or to the country. I have in mind another case where, adjacent to a city in British Columbia, there are some thousands of acres of choice land bordering right on the city limits, impeding most seriously the development of that city and the adjacent country. I might enumerate many other cases. Suffice it to say that in the southern part of the province it is a most serious problem,—in fact, in some places it is an almost intolerable situation, and the citizens virtually demand that the Indian be placed, in this regard, upon the same footing as the white man. In other words, that he have a good chance, and, if anything, a little better chance than the white man, but that he be not allowed to hold thousands of acres of the finest land without any pretense whatever of its being used for purposes of production.

Now, Sir, my object in introducing this amendment is simply that the same provision which applies to the purchase of speculators' land be made applicable to certain Indian Reserves, and that where it can be shown that there is thus a large area of land unused, and that in all human probability it will remain unused, that the department be required to sell that land. I do not think as a matter of fact that the provisions of the amendment I suggest may ever have to be used, but if the clause is there, and it is known that we can use it, it will facilitate the purchase of such property. For this and other reasons, which I might enumerate but do not wish to take up the time of the House at the present juncture, I respectfully urge upon the minister his considering the adoption of my amendment for the benefit of returned soldiers settling in the province of British Columbia. It simply means that whatever land may be deemed necessary by the board may be purchased not only from all persons, firms, and corporations in any part of Canada, but —with special reference to British Columbia —from the Indian superintendent for the province or other officer who has the power of acting as vendor.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the minister answers that question, the Indian Land Act itself provides for the methods of procedure by which we deal with Indian lands, and I think it would be rather dangerous to adopt another method in this Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From the statutory standpoint I agree with the leader of the Opposition, that if such action were taken, it should be taken by an amendment of the Indian Act.

We have already prepared amendments to the Indian Act which will make applicable all the necessary provisions of this Act applying to returned soldiers who are Indians and which will make the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs take the place of the Soldier's Settlement Board in the administration of that phase of the Act.

The point raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Stacey) is one of the most important that the committee has to consider; it was referred to some weeks ago by the member for Selkirk (Mr. Hay). When the Bill was under consideration providing for the expropriation of small portions of land on Indian reserves for public purposes, it was urged that we should not deal with Indian Reserve lands on the same principles as those upon which we dealt with private lands. It is a matter for very serious consideration indeed, whether, in view of our negotiations and settlements with the Indians in this country, which proceeded in the main, on the assumption that they were a separate nation, and that the agreements were entered into by Canada on the one hand and by the various tribes and separate peoples on the other, we ought to invade the sanctity of the treaties made and settlements arranged, for the purpose of taking their lands in order that they might be used not by the State, but by private persons. I cannot say that I have made up my mind that that argument is irresistible; I really am not disposed to think it is. It is very questionable, though, what might result if we did take the stand urged by the member for Fraser Valley. Undoubtedly it would result in dissension, and perhaps in the issue being carried beyond the bounds of this country for settlement. No doubt, whatever settlement Canada should arrive at would, in the end, be accepted as final; I do not suggest that any disposition to interfere would originate from without. But we have regarded these people as our wards, and we have made treaties and settlements with them; therefore it is desirable, if possible, to avoid anything in the nature of dissension, or anything in the nature of a charge against us of infidelity. Consequently, for the present session, I have decided not to ask Parliament for power to expropriate lands in Indian Reserves for this purpose. We are now engaged in an endeavour to secure valid surrenders of these unused lands in reserves. We have officers engaged in an examination and appraisal of lands in Indian reserves in order that such are not being used and should be used for farming may be surrendered to the Crown to be used for soldier settlement. We have attained considerable success so far; with one or two exceptions, the various tribes have not been unreasonable, and if we continue this policy we are likely to succeed better than we would if we now took statutory power to expropriate. I rather think that the attitude of the various tribes will be more favourable if we proceed along the path that we have now ventured upon and try to get surrenders in every case. If the Indians should become recalcitrant, or if there should be anything in the nature of mere obstinacy as against their own interests and the interests of the State, we might consider at a later session the advisability of taking expropriatory power, to be applicable in such cases For the present, I commend to the Committee the advisablity of leaving out anything in the way of power to expropriate Indian lands, and of allowing the board to deal with the subject by employing the more conciliatory method of procuring surrender of the reserves.

Mr. STACEY: I have no thought whatever of suggesting anything which would apply to Canada as a whole. I note that provision is made in the Indian Act for action in the various provinces with regard to specific phases of legislation. I do want to impress upon the Committee and upon the minister that if there is one thing in the mind of the average citizen or returned soldier of British Columbia that is the cause of great unrest and discontent, it is the patent fact that much of the choicest land in the entire province is absolutely unavailable for use, and in all human probability never will be productive unless there is some radical change in the policy. Personally I do not feel disposed to give very much attention to the argument that because we have always done something, we must always continue to do it. We have recognized the right of these people in the past; we have given them their opportunity. If their population is decreasing and the hunting is gone, why can we not go to these people and say: Let us make other arrangements; we will buy this land from you and give you a suitable place in which to live. We need not talk to the Indian about compulsory purchase, but steps should be taken to secure this land. We have the report of a commission regarding certain reserves which says that a certain amount of this land may revert to the Crown. But that amount is a very small percentage of the whole. I repeat that in British Columbia the Indian reserve question is a vital issue and is one of our grave troubles; and I ask the minister and the Government to make, at the earliest possible day, such provision as is necessary for the securing of a portion of these areas for settlement and production in order that that part of the country may develop more rapidly than it has developed in the past.

Mr. CAHILL: Do I understand the hon. member to say that we should take this land by compulsion from the Indian?

Mr. STACEY: I ask that the provisions which apply to land held by speculators apply also to Indian reserve lands. Here is a man who has 500 acres; he is holding it until some of us will go round him and improve the value of the land so that he may grow rich out of our efforts and our labour. That man should be compelled either to work his land or sell it, hence clause (a) of the section. Then, here is an Indian reserve of 500 acres with only a few Indians on it, perhaps none at all, but some band has a legal claim upon it. My point is that similar steps should be taken with respect to this land. The band should have the benefit of any financial advantage resulting from the sale of the land; the proceeds might be invested for them and they would then be in the receipt of an annual income that would be of much greater benefit to them than the mere possession of those lands which they held uncultivated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The steps the hon. gentleman proposes we should take before going to the length of expropriation are now being taken in British Columbia, though not as widely as we purpose taking them very shortly. We are going to make most energetic efforts to reduce to the minimum uncultivated Dominion lands there, and if we fail after exhausting all our efforts I shall be very glad if the hon. member will bring the matter up for the consideration of Parliament next session. I may do so myself.

Mr. STACEY: With that explanation I beg leave to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. CAHILL: I trust the Dominion Government will consider very seriously before breaking their treaty engagements with the Indians. Simply because we have the power to do so, by reason of being in greater numbers, is no reason why we should break a treaty. The Indians have rights that should be respected in this country. If we respect anything we should respect our word to the Indian or to anybody else. The fact that the lands of the Indians happen to have enhanced in value by reason of white settlement is no reason why the Indians should be compelled to give up their land. There is no justification for the hon. member or the Government deciding what is best for the Indians. The Indian may very likely not be interested in the money he may get out of the land, and if he wants to keep his land I do not think this or any other Government should take it away from him. There is plenty of land in Canada for the white man for many centuries to come without taking away from the Indian forcibly land he holds more dear perhaps than my hon. friend holds the dollars we would get out of it.

Mr. STACEY: The hon. member neither understands the situation in British Columbia, nor my remarks.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—school lands:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a very important clause which I should have referred to in my opening remarks. We cannot, of course, take school lands and sell them. We have to sell school lands in accordance with the Dominion Lands Act by auction sale. The returned soldiers are very much interested in these school lands. Of course, they have a chance to buy at these auction sales. We do not feel that we should interfere with our administration of that trust, except with the consent of the provinces, and therefore we devised this means of arriving at the valuation by joint boards, each board to be composed of one representative of the Dominion and one representative of the province concerned. If these two report in favour of a certain valuation, the Soldier Settlement Board will have the option of taking the land at that valuation for returned soldier purposes.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—free soldier grants:

Mr. COOPER: I understand it will not be possible under this clause for a soldier who already owns a homestead to take up land under this scheme. Is that so?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no. Owning a homestead does not prevent it at all, but if the soldier owns a homestead he can also get a soldier grant; that would make 320 acres of free land in all. On the other hand, if the soldier has the soldier grant he is still entitled to a homestead. We say that in the case of a man who is entitled to a soldier entry and exercises his right, we cannot also undertake to assist him by way of purchasing land. We decided that the better distribution would be to deal with him as a soldier entrant, and we advance him the money accordingly, but we do not deal with him in the capacity of a buyer of private land from the board. Of course, the board has power in a special case to allow him to buy a small amount of land.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—conditions of sale and conveyance of lands by board to settlers:

Mr. CAHILL: Would the minister explain paragraph (b)? Does that mean there has to be an exact price for the land?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is taken word for word, I think, from the Order in Council of February 11, and the reason for it is this: If we buy a quarter-section we know what we are paying for it, and we can easily decide what to sell it at, but suppose we purchase five hundred acres in a block owned by one man; three or four soldiers want that land. Then paragraph (b) applies, its purpose being to direct the board to sell each and every parcel of the five hundred acres, or five thousand, as the case may be, at its proportionate price of the whole purchase price, not based on acreage, but based on value. That is the way it is expressed, and I think correctly expressed. I understand that it is not the intention of the board to buy any parcels of land of that kind unless it has already been selected by the soldier.

Mr. CAHILL: That is quite right.

Mr. McKENZIE: Suppose that alongside a piece of land owned by the Government there are some thousands of acres owned by a land company, and a soldier selects 100 acres or 200 acres of that company land and tells the board that he can buy it at such a price. Suppose this price is very much higher than the average price at which the Government could buy all that company land. Would it not be better for the Government to try and acquire all that land at a lower price than to permit it to be taken over in small parcels?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and that is just the purpose of this section. As a matter of practice we do not purchase blocks of this kind unless we have the soldiers in sight ready to purchase the land from us. In a word, we are not taking chances; we are limiting the chances altogether, I think.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Government should take steps to see that a higher price is not paid by taking land over in small parcels.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes. Very frequently we save considerable money by purchasing it in block. Ten per cent is the minimum required. The maximum allowed against the land is $4,500. That is subject to very special exceptions in the case of married men of more than ordinary qualifications, who have had successful farming experience in Canada.

Mr. CAHILL: The Board is to exercise its discretion in collecting the annual payments. There are to be twenty-five annual payments, or there may be fewer in the event of default. What is the provision in this respect?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Board has full discretion as to what it shall do in event of default. As it deems fit, it can either overlook default or cancel upon default. Everything will depend on the circumstances of the case. As a rule, of course, default will be discouraged because we do not want soldiers to get the idea that the obligation is not to be discharged.

Mr. CAHILL: Would it not be better not to demand payment on principal for the first year or two while the settler, particularly in wild land, is breaking up and improving his land?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Every effort will of course be made to overcome difficulties. But where the land is such that payment cannot be made the Board will have power to grant an extension of time. In the generality of cases, however, we expect them to commence payments at once, the only exception being in regard to the loan for stock and implements, in which case we wait two years.

Mr. COPP: They do not pay interest the first two years?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not on stock and implements. They do on the land.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would ask the permission of the Committee to return to section 14, in connection with which I should like to ask the minister a question on two points.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well.

Mr. PEDLOW: I notice a clause in reference to placing settlers with farmers for instruction in farming, and another providing for the payment of subsistence allowances to settlers, for themselves and their dependents, while such settlers are in receipt of instructional training. The minister dealt with this matter in a general way this morning. Has the Board received specific instructions as to the disbursements that will be made in these cases, and the considerations that will be allowed the farmers? What allowances will be made for the subsistence of settlers and their families?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Provision was made in this respect early in April. The amount allowed when a man is taking instruction in the three months' course provided in all colleges is $10 per month if he is without dependents. If he has a wife it is $35, and for each child $6, with a maximum of $25 for children. If he is a widower with a child or children, $10 for each child.

Mr. PEDLOW: That is in addition to the free instruction and board?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. If he is a married man employed with a farmer he gets $20 and $6 for each child, with a maximum of $25.

Mr. REDMAN: Has the minister considered the advisability of charging a rate of interest to settlers, other than members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or those who served in the Imperial and Allied Armies, who were ordinarily resident in Canada, which would be commensurate with the expenditures involved? I think it is evident that, in order to meet the demands of Canadian soldiers, between two and three hundred million dollars would be required.

and while we will not be disposed to be critical if we lose money on account of our own soldiers, I think we should take such steps as are necessary to insure that, in the case of settlers out of the Imperial Army or the armies of our Allies, that we shall have a fair chance of getting back the money advanced. We should also take some further precaution, by way of demanding a greater deposit on the purchase price, such an increased deposit as shall be equal to the lack of experience which will be found among this class of settler. The soldiers of this country will always feel that they are, to a degree, responsible for the money which is advanced to them, and I do not think it would be fair to our Canadian soldiers to include in this scheme a sort of immigration policy for European people in the carrying out of which, considerable money might be lost.

Mr. MAHARG: Did I understand the minister to say that the payment on land will commence the first year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MAHARG: Is not that a mistake? It will be rather hard for men, especially when they take up new land, to make payments the first year. In fact, it will be almost impossible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The money is payable the first year and the amount is small because it is spread over twenty-five years more or less. No doubt there will be cases in which men starting on new prairie land will not be able, although making a living from the first, to make payments the first year or two. Ample power is provided in these cases to carry men on. But we do not want to encourage that and we should not make it a general rule that nothing should be repayable the first year or two, because many men are buying cultivated land and there is no reason why they should not pay the first year. We therefore make the agreement the same in each case and leave its application to the particular circumstances of the individual applicant who seeks an extension.

Mr. MAHARG: It would be wise, I think, to differentiate between men purchasing improved lands and those who are buying lands in the raw state. I know from personal experience that nothing takes the "ginger" out of a fellow—if I may put it that way—so much as being pressed for initial payments overdue, and an exception might easily be made in the case of a man on soldier grant land. It would not be a difficult matter to give him an additional year the same as in regard to his stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no doubt that in the practical working out of the scheme most of the men on soldier grant land will have to be carried for the first year, and we have ample powers to do so. These loans on soldier grant land were made before I took charge of the department. The Bill was passed previous to that, and the law laid down. That being the case I did not feel free to alter it in that regard, particularly as the board had full power to extend the time. I therefore decided to leave that as it is to the operation of the board. In answer to the hon. member for Calgary, we have considered the matter of taking extra precautions with regard to overseas men. Parliament established the principle of equality in the Act of 1917, and I felt that if we were going to admit British soldiers to the benefits of the Act we should not impose extra burdens upon them. It may be that we should exercise greater precaution in their selection and take necessary precautions against loss, and for that reason this Bill is drawn to enable us to demand a higher rate down, up to 25 per cent. I purpose to insist upon that in the case of members of the British Army.

I do not think there should be any complaint because that will have the result of sifting out the more doubtful cases. If 25 per cent is paid down and other precautions are exercised it will be a practical assurance against any loss further than what loss there may be in the higher rate on money that is prevalent over and above what it will be later on; but as time goes on there is every reason to believe that that difference will be eliminated. It cannot be possible that on Dominion debentures the interest will be much longer 5 per cent.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the minister feel that with this clause in the Act stating the exact terms of the agreement, the board will have power to make an agreement containing the condition that there shall be no cash payment for the first or second year on account of principal; so that people will not be put in default where, in the opinion of the board, they cannot possibly meet the payment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not that power and personally I would not have that power. The soldier knows what he is confronting.

I think it is better to have him know that he must commence paying back at once. If it is not his fault, and he is doing his duty, his time will be extended, but he must understand that he must do his duty and take care of his obligations. I want them all to understand that and n t merely some of them. I know there will be a class to be treated differently from the rest because their land is not immediately productive in the sense that lands of others are but the agreements will all have to be the same.

Mr. STACEY: The committee will be pleased to know that in the Vancouver office we had cases of men who had mapped out their course for the next few years and who were able to show to the satisfaction of the board exactly how, where, and from what sources they expected to raise the revenue that would be required to meet their obligations. They had gone to the trouble of preparing a statement to convince the board that they could meet their obligations even from the first year. The men are not regardless of the fact that they must pay their obligations even from the very first and those who are entering upon highly improved land fully expect to begin paying at the end of the first year.

Mr. MAHARG: You are asking these men to sign something that it is physically impossible to carry out. Men on new land cannot make their payment the first year. The men are being asked to undertake to do something that the board knows it is physically impossible to do.

On section 17—(1) calculation of price by board; (2) improvements to be considered:

Mr. PEDLOW: In regard to subsection 2 of clause 17, is it the intention of the board to make improvements to land they are holding?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the board has full power to do it but we do not do so as a matter of practice. We have never launched upon that yet. I doubt if we ever will because it involves the buying of land before we have a purchaser for it and we want to avoid that. We might have to do so if we were buying a block of land; we might get it much more cheaply by taking it all. Subsection 2 of section 17 contemplates that possibility and provides accordingly.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the nature of the improvements that you contemplate making?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: If we bought a block of land there might be some portion of it that we would have to clear to enable a man to commence farming at once.

Sir HERBERT AMES: While in Australia I found something of that kind in connection with the Victoria Government's scheme for providing land for settlement. They would take over a block of land and improve it by constructing roads, drainage, fences and even houses before they would even undertake to sell it. I would like to ask the minister if there is any intention on the part of the Government to take areas and make them fit for settlement before they are opened up?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, that is not the policy we adopt. If that is done in Australia it is done under the Governments of the States and not under the Federal Government and the same principle should apply here. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has recently done that as a private enterprise and in the case of soldiers settlement the Canadian Pacific has made arrangements with us whereby it discounts its list price to the extent of 20 per cent on land sold to any settler approved under this Act. That is an immense advantage in dealing with all Canadian Pacific lands. That is an arrangement which has been recently made.

On section 18—sales of stock and equipment:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like this to stand at the request of the War Veterans' Association. They have asked for a rearrangement of subsection 2 to enable the board to loan more than the maximum on the chattels, taking it from the other loan and getting double the sum on chattels so that the board may give up to $4,000 on a stock loan, their idea being to allow the cattle industry to be engaged in by many soldiers who desire to do so. I wish to give further consideration to that before the clause passes.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 2—resale upon default:

Mr. CAHILL: In the event of a soldier abandoning his land, what will the process be?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The board would then cancel the sale and the land would revest in the board free from all claim whatsoever on the part of the soldier. Then the board would have the power to settle another soldier upon that land taking over the obligations that the man left, but if the board places anybody except a soldier on the land it can only do so with the approval of the minister and the Governor in Council.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the board have to get the full price of the land from another soldier?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They could only sell to some one other than a soldier with the approval of the minister, and they can only sell for anything less than what they have against the land after a full recital of the circumstances by the board and the approval of the Governor in Council. They cannot lose anything on the land except by the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. CAHILL: What action do you contemplate against the soldier who has abandoned that land?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is liable for it, but a judgment against one who abandons land under these circumstances, will, I am afraid, not be of much value.

Mr. CAHILL: You may keep the liability?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We may keep the liability on the books.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not very familiar with some of the decisions in the courts in the West that have been going further in recognizing equities than we have been in the Eastern provinces. That is where a man enters upon land and pays a certain amount of money for it, and fails, I have read some western decisions in which it is still held that the man was entitled to anything that he has forfeited. That is to say where the land was worth $2,000 and he had paid $1,500, and was unable to pay the balance and had to abandon the land, I notice that the courts, not dealing with the Crown, but in cases involving private individuals, have given some recognition to the rights of the settler, although he was not able to carry out the agreement to the full extent. I do not know whether the Minister is familiar with these cases or not; possibly the circumstances are different when the man is dealing with the Crown. In this Bill, I observe, the absolute right is taken away.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The decisions to which my hon. friend refers are of comparatively recent years and do go a long way in the nature of recognizing the equity of redemption and even the payment the man has made, upon cancellation. They have no relevance now because sub-section 3 wipes them off and declares finally in statutory form that there is no equity in redemption, and there is no right of claim upon the moneys paid. That being done, of course, the courts are quite powerless to enter and pronounce against the authority of Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: I quite understand that, but my position is as to whether the minister recognizes the fairness of the principles laid down by these decisions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The King can do no wrong.

Mr. PEDLOW: Suppose a returned soldier took up a section of land under this Bill and carried it for, say, five, or eight, or ten years, and then died. Would his widow have an equity in the property?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is it provided for in the Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all provided for. His estate has the same right in respect to that land as the man himself possessed. All it has to do is to comply with the requirements, and it will be given the same right and protection.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—advances for the discharge of encumbrances.

Mr. COOPER: Under this Bill, a man that owns his farm, but has an encumbrance against it of more than $2,500, cannot take advantage of this legislation. Would it not be possible for the minister to reconsider that provision?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The War Veterans Association have pressed upon me a reconsideration of this clause in the direction suggested by my hon. friend. It will be recalled that I stated that as regards the man who owned his land and merely wanted an advance for the purpose of wiping off encumbrances, we did not feel we ought to do the same as in the case of a man who was purchasing the land to become a settler, because in the latter instance we are adding a new settler, whereas in the former, we are merely exercising the functions of a loan company—we are not doing anything for settlement at all. We do not want to get into that field any more than we can avoid, so we adopted the maximum of $2,500 which was fixed by the 1917 Act s related to the man who owns his land. We say: "We will lend you up to that amount and we will lend you for improvements and for stock, but we will not lend you on your land alone beyond the $2,500 fixed by the 1917 Act merely for the purpose of clearing off encumbrances—that is loan company work." So the man who owns his land can get advances up to $5,500, but only to the extent of $2,500 on the land as then valued. I think that is a fair division to make; in my opinion we ought not to go any further.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MAHARG: Mr. Chairman, we were discussing the point as to whether a larger amount than $2,500 should be advanced to pay off a previous loan. I think it is very desirable that this amount should be increased. While the minister states that the primary intention of the Act is to create new settlers, yet I think it is just as essential to retain the old settlers—in fact, possibly it is just a little more essential. Had we been able to retain all the settlers that went on the land in the past, we would be in a much different position to-day. A number of these men went overseas with loans against their land, and, during their absence at the front their farms have been more or less neglected in a great many cases. The loan companies are pressing for repayment, and the men are unable to meet the companies' demands. The conditions of these repayments are rather burdensome, the interest almost invariably being 8 per cent, and in some cases even 9 per cent, I am given to understand. I do not think the minister could do better for those men than to increase this advance sufficiently to wipe off encumbrances. It might be increased up to $3,500, or just as high as the loan to be advanced to the soldier who is purchasing his land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The argument, or course, is very strong on behalf of those men who have been compelled to let their interest get into arrear because of their being overseas; but the dangers are very great, because it would mean that we are using for loan company work money that might be used to get settlers. I would be prepared to let the clause stand so that I might give a little more consideration to the possibility of extending it somewhat. I do not think it would be at all the part of wisdom, though, to put those men on the same level with the men who are actually being placed on the land by the board.

Mr. MAHARG: In all sincerity I think that these men are entitled to even greater consideration. Those are the men who made the sacrifice in the first place. They left their farms at the mercy of other people in hundreds of cases, and, to my mind, they should get first consideration.

Section stands.

On section 27—Forfeiture by settler of title to land when he is in default.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to have that clause amended, to better express its purpose. Amended it will read as follows:

Notwithstanding anything in the Dominion Lands Act or in any other Act, in the event of a settler who is holding any Dominion land on which a charge has been imposed, constituted or created by or under this or the former Act (hereinafter referred to as "charged land") being in default with respect to the terms or conditions of any agreement of sale, mortgage or other document executed or made with or to the board, the minister, upon request made by the board, may declare the right, title and interest of the settler to or in such charged land to be forfeited, whereupon (and also in the event of the right, title or interest of the settler to or in such charged land becoming forfeited for default in performance of settlement conditions or for any other reason apart from the provisions of this section) the minister may declare the said right, title or interest of such settler, and also the right, title or interest of His Majesy to or in such charged land, to be vested in the Board, and it may thereafter, subject to the provisions of section twenty-one of this Act, in order to recoup itself for the amount owing by such settler and charged upon such land, sell, lease, exchange or otherwise dispose of such land to a settler, or, with the approval of the minister, to any other person; but if any surplus is realized beyond the amount required to recoup the board as aforesaid such surplus shall be paid by the board to the Department of the Interior for the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 28—No sale to any settler who obtained soldier grant, advance on his own land, or owns an average farm.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I desire to have this clause amended by inserting after the word "not" in the second line the following words: "Unless the minister upon the recommendation of the Board, shall approve."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 30—All agreements between Board and settler under twenty-one years are valid.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is not that a serious departure from common law principles?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and throughout the Bill there are very many important departures from common law principles; there have to be. This is a task we have assumed for the benefit of the whole Dominion, consequently we must assert for ourselves rights that, ordinarily, are provincial rights, but which we are in a position to assert because the lands become our own. In this regard it is, of course, necessary to obtain a real obligation on the part of the men with whom we are going to deal, and we cannot refuse to deal with a returned soldier because he happens to be under twenty-one years of age; consequently we have to make him liable.

Section agreed to.

On section 33—Unless Board consents, land, stock, etc., held and unpaid in full by settler to be exempt from operation of ordinary laws.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the meaning of that? Unless the Government has a bill of sale of the stock in the possession of the man who takes advantage of this Act, and that bill of sale is registered, it is hardly fair that his property should not be subject to his debts, the same as any one else's property. I gather that the Government holds a lien on such property which has priority over any other?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a fact. But it is not proposed to put the general public in a position to impose upon that man obligations which may result in his being sold out and in the whole purpose of the Act, which is to make that man a settler, defeated. By this Act we give notice to the public that these special precautions are thrown round that settler; the public must deal with him accordingly. The section says:

> Notwithstanding any law, whether statute or otherwise, in force in any province,—
>
> (a) which authorizes or requires the registration, recording or filing of deeds, mortgages, certificates of judgments, attachments, bills of sale or other documents which effect title to, or evidence the existence of liens or charges upon, property, real, personal or other; or,
>
> (b) which authorizes the levy upon, or sale under attachment, execution or other process, or the expropriation or seizure of, property, real, personal or other;
>
> unless the board shall otherwise consent in writing the lands of, or sold by the board to, a settler, and the live stock and equipment of, or sold by the board to, a settler and the increase of any such live stock, and the board's and the settler's respective interests in such lands, live stock and equipment, shall, for so long as any part of the sale price, or the amount of any advance made with respect to any such property, or any interest, or any amount charged upon such property or any thereof in favour of the board, remains unpaid to the board, be exempt from and not within the operation of such laws.

That is to say, no man can sell the property of that settler, which we provided him with, under execution.

Mr. McKENZIE: When a private individual lends money and takes as security therefor a bill of sale on the goods and chattels of the person to whom he makes the loan, that bill of sale is registered; the same should be true in the case of loans made by the Government. The merchants of Saskatchewan and Manitoba will not read this Act, and when they see one of these settlers with a fine farm and good stock and equipment they may be willing to extend to him a credit of two or three hundred dollars; but when they come to look for their money they find that they cannot touch his property. When the Government undertake to lend money on security they should comply with the provincial law in that respect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We cannot adopt that policy, because in some of the provinces there is no provision for registration. These animals that we are providing the settler with are our own, and they still remain our own after they are sold to the settler. There is no provision for registration in Manitoba. If A sells to B in Manitoba certain goods and takes what is known there as a lien note for them, he does not have to register that lien note. Any one dealing with B as to these goods must look up the chain of title; that obligation is on him. In our case we are adopting the policy of identifying our animals so that any one can see that they are the property of the board; and that will be a warning to all concerned. It is manifest that we should not start this man out and then permit others who may be shrewder than he is to defeat the whole purpose of the Bill by selling him enough goods, or in some way getting his obligation, taking execution. The Government must see this man through from beginning to end.

Mr. McKENZIE: If in Manitoba there is no registration of bills of sale, that is another matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is registration of bills of sale, but we do not take any bill of sale; the animals are ours.

Mr. McKENZIE: But the title is vested in the farmer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, in the board.

Mr. McKENZIE: Well, the possession is in the farmer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: In our province the presumption of ownership goes with possession; but before you go too far with the presumption you look up the registry of deeds, and if there is nothing on file there in regard to the property concerned, you have a right to suppose that it is the property of the person who holds it in possession. In Nova Scotia you cannot be safe in following any other course unless there is some agreement to the contrary. There is a pernicious system with respect to the sale of pianos, organs and that sort of thing which is creating havoc in our province because of the fact that the paper which is taken by way of security is not put on file; but apart from that, everything has to be dealt with under the Bill of Sale Act.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: It may be a good thing for the Government to put a man on 100 or 150 acres of land, well stocked and equipped, and to protect him so that he can defy the public, but it seems to me that it does not tend to improve the moral standing of the man who goes on the land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are simply protecting the goods we sell; any other goods are liable. If we did not protect our own goods the case would be hopeless, for we are carrying this scheme out in every part of Canada.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: The protection is confined exclusively to the goods furnished by the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is confined to our goods.

Mr. MORPHY: What security does the minister take in respect to the ownership exercised by the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I said a moment ago, we do not take any security.

We purchase the goods and sell them to these men, and we have a system of stamping them in such a way that any one on investigation can see they are ours. What we hold out to the whole country is this warning that every man in the district will know who is a soldier settler. It will not be very long until they get to know that as regards that soldier settler a special law exists, and they must take care in dealing with him not to rely for security on goods to that soldier by the Government. I do not think there will be any difficulty; there has not been so far, and this has been in effect since the 11th of February, and has worked very well.

Mr. MORPHY: Is there any section in the Bill dealing with stamping?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, but that is the practice.

Mr. PEDLOW: I believe this will create a dangerous situation for the mercantile and professional interests. Any person wishing to do business with a soldier settler would take it for granted that his security was gilt-edged, because there would be nothing on record in the registry office to show to the contrary, and I do not know by what means they would trace up the settler's standing. I fail to see any reason why the Government should not register the documents which affect the title to the property. Why should it not be placed on record in the registry office in the various provinces? I think that would be in the interest of the settler as well, because if there is any doubt in the mind of the general public as to his general stability or title to the property it would affect the settler prejudicially. I certainly think it would be in the interest both of the settler and of the mercantile and professional interests to have some system of registration whereby the exact title could be ascertained by those desiring to know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that the hon. member ought to take special pains to see that no merchant is under any apprehension in that regard, because the board is absolutely determined that it is not going to undertake these obligations as trustee for the public, and expose the settler to exhibiting the Government's goods as the basis of the credit to him. The board has received ample warning in this regard. There is evidence abundant that myriads of people were simply hanging by the wayside waiting for this scheme to come into operation, expecting that they would be the real beneficiaries thereby. Why, we have cases, and more than one, of agents who have sold a cream separator to a soldier with one cow, and these things will continue unless we take some special precautions. What is the difficulty about a merchant knowing? It is not hard for him to find out, if he is dealing with a soldier settler, that he cannot rely for his security on the goods the Government provides. If the man is reliable he can give him credit if he wishes, but he had better not rely for his security on the goods that we supply to that man. There is no difficulty about them knowing the law in that regard, and if they do not know it, they had better inquire and find out. In my judgment, the whole plan would be doomed to inevitable failure on any other basis whatsoever.

Mr PEDLOW: I fail to realize that by showing the man's standing you would be creating a basis for credit. I think it would have just the reverse effect; it would protect the general public. It would also be protecting the Government's interest. I do not see why the Government should make laws to govern private individuals, and not live up to those laws themselves, as in this case. I think the Government should live up to the law just the same as any individual in the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We intend to live up to it.

Mr. PEDLOW: But you are making one law for yourselves and another for individuals.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the farm and all that is on it be subject to municipal assessment?

Mr MEIGHEN: Yes, the settler's interest in all these things will be subject to assessment.

Mr. McKENZIE: I mean the land as well as the personal property. The title remains in the Government, and under the common law the property, being the King's property, would not be subject to assessment. Is there any arrangement by which that property shall be subject to assessment although it is the property of the Crown?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not creating any new law in that regard. Crown property of course, is not subject to taxation. It has been held, however, that in the case of a homestead, for example, although that is Crown property, the homesteader's right is assessable and taxable, and we think that ordinary law applicable here will be quite sufficient.

Section agreed to.

On section 34—while any sum on advances unpaid all properties of settlers to remain as security and his interests therein cannot be alienated.

Mr. BUREAU: Is the patent issued, in case of Government lands, before the whole indebtedness of the settler is paid off?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The patent does not issue until the obligation is paid; that is in the case of Government lands, what we call Dominion lands. But in the case of lands acquired by the board for sale, the patent, of course, is already issued, and the title following that patent rests with the board until the board is paid.

Mr. BUREAU: Including the amount due on chattels?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, because as will appear by a subsequent section, all the obligations of the settler, no matter from what source arising, are made a charge upon the land, so that the Government holds the land for all.

Mr. FULTON: It is possible for a soldier settler, I suppose, who may have some money of his own to purchase horses or cattle which would belong to him and on which the Government would have no charge. How is the public to know in dealing with that settler which animals belong to the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They can find out, of course, upon inquiry from the board if they do not rely upon the settler. In addition, we adopt the practice of stamping the goods sold.

Mr. FULTON: The animals, too?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, by branding.

Mr. MORPHY: I think the word "charged" in line 37, of page 16, should be "charge."

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the draftsman intended was "against his interest in any property subject to lien," or "against his interest in any property charged." I think it should be the way it is.

Mr. MORPHY: Then the comma should be after the word "lien" instead of where it is?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think not.

Section agreed to.

On section 39—Owner to file return with district superintendent within 30 days as per from C:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move to amend section 39 so that it shall read:

Within thirty days after the last gazetting of the establishment of a settlement area each owner of a block the whole or any part whereof is situate within the settlement area, shall file with the District Superintendent of the Board having jurisdiction over the district within which such settlement area is situate, a return in Form C in the Schedule to this Act naming the prices at which he is willing to sell the block and each parcel thereof to the board. He shall give such other information with respect to such block as the board may from time to time prescribe or require.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 40—Statement of all liens, etc., on land to be furnished to board by person interested:

Mr. MORPHY: This section says that every person who has any estate or interest in any land to be compulsorily purchased, "or who represents or is the husband of any such person," and so on. Why should it be limited to the husband?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This clause is taken verbatim from the Expropriation Act, and I thought it better to keep the exact words of that Act. The only reason why this anl many other clauses from that Act are incorporated in this is that the Soldiers' Settlement Act may be complete in itself in order that it may be used as a single document. Otherwise we would simply say "the provisions of the Expropriation Act shall apply."

Mr. MORPHY: Is it necessary that it shall be restricted to the husband?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It puts an obligation upon the husband of the owner. It does not say "the wife of the owner" because the owner in that case being a male can do it himself. This requirement arises from the practice of the husband looking after the wife's business. The section was taken entirely from the Expropriation Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 41—The board may purchase land compulsorily:

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the process for ascertaining the amount that should be paid in the case of the compulsory taking of land?

Mr. MEIGHEN: By the provisions of this Act the first step is the expropriation. The board decides that certain land must be taken and a mere notification gazetted takes the land. Then they proceed under the ordinary provisions of the Expropriation Act to determine what shall be paid for the land.

Mr. McKENZIE: Section 41 does not mention the Expropriation Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, we do not mention the Expropriation Act anywhere, we simply transfer the sections in that Act on this subject into this Bill. The Exchequer Court decides values under the Expropriation Act. That court can constitute judges in the several courts of the provinces as Exchequer Court Judges for the purposes of the Act, and the valuations are fixed by the judges so constituted.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Will the board under this Act acquire Canadian Pacific Railway lands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. They are just the same as any other. I stated this afternoon that the Canadian Pacific had made an arrangement whereby they will sell land to the board for the purposes of this Act at 20 per cent off their list prices. Their established prices are well known to the country and 20 per cent makes a very large difference.

Mr. LANG: When the board has acquired the Canadian Pacific lands will those lands then become liable to taxation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They would not if the board held them because the board represents His Majesty, and at common law His Majesty cannot be taxed. But the board does not acquire them until it sells them. The board acquires the land on the application of a settler, and immediately the land is sold and becomes liable to taxation.

Sir HERERT AMES: Does the board find the land or the settler first?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The board finds the settler first. As soon as the prospective settler selects the land, the board sends out one of its inspectors and if the price is found to be right the board buys the land and the sale to the settler is carried on simultaneously.

Mr. HAY: In case land now liable for taxation is taken over by the board and is not sold, that land will be no longer liable for taxation and hardship will be inflicted on the municipality.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be if the board kept the land, but the board does not do that. The board will turn it over to the settler.

Mr. HAY: This land cannot be sold at a tax sale as can other land in the western provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the interest of the board could not be taken under tax sale. But we realize the necessity of not undermining the municipality. That is going to be the policy of the board and it will be to their interest to see that the settler's taxes are paid.

Mr. HAY: Does this mean that only the interest that the settler has in the land is taxable, or the whole property?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The individual himself is liable for the entire taxes that he is assessed for by the municipality. The land is merely the security. The security which the municipality will have in respect to the settler will just be the settler's interest in the land, the same as its security now is limited to the homesteader's interest in his land. All homestead land that a man enters for is taxed but the municipality cannot sell it. The municipality, however, can say: You do not get the title to that land until you pay your taxes. It is a similar law which we apply here. They cannot sell the land which is owned by the board but they can tax the settler's interest and retain it, and the settler cannot get his title until his taxes are paid.

On section 42—when board may establish or declare a block of land a settlement area:

On motion of Mr. Meighen the word "forty" in line ten was stricken out and the word "forty-one" substituted therefor.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 46—payment of compensation costs:

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is just as in the Expropriation Act. Any claims against land the Board takes becomes a claim against the moneys that the board has taken.

Section agreed to.

On section 48—resistance to peaceful possession:

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a very important procedure. I have not had time to read the Bill through, so I ask: What is the procedure to dispossess a man? I think it would create a great deal of hardship to turn a man and his family out on the road if they had no place to go.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If resistance is offered, of course the hardship would apply because the order of the Exchequer court for possession would empower the sheriff to deliver possession to the board. Naturally hardship could be imposed upon a man in that way, but if he has been paid for his land it would be no great hardship to give it up. Subclauses 1 and 2 are taken verbatim from the Expropriation Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is not what I mean. I understand it is proposed that the moment a plan is filed and notice given that title to the land vests in the board, the proceedings described in this section may take place. Yet, the owner may not accept the money, he may want to go to the Exchequer court, and it takes two or three years before the matter is finally settled. In the meantime, there may be an application for a warrant to put the board in possession of the land. That is where the hardship comes in. If a man takes the money for the land he ought to give up the title, but he may be entitled to say that the amount offered is not enough, that the case is in the Exchequer court and that he will not give up possession until it is finally disposed of. Is there any provision for notice to the party in possession of the application being made before the Exchequer court?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The party, under this Act, always has full notice before the expropriation proceedings are taken and when the attempt is made to purchase the land. They try to come to a friendly arrangement as to the price. If that proves impossible notice of expropriation is given and the filing of the plan follows. I have no doubt it will be possible for the board to act harshly in obtaining the title, but the board is not going to do so. At the same time, the board cannot be delayed, out of mere obstinacy, in obtaining possession of the land for the settler. This is not a new law at all; it has been the law for many years and this is the way that possession has been taken in hundreds of thousands of cases of appropriation under such circumstances.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it is the common practice to give notice. There is nothing better established in British law than that you cannot make an order against a man in the court without giving him notice. The Supreme Court of Canada have held over and over again that a man cannot be bound by any proceedings which take place in court of which he has had no notice. The court may grant an order but the man should have notice before the order is granted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This very section provides for notice.

Mr. McKENZIE: I told my hon. friend that I had not had time to read it and I was asking him what the effect would be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That notice is provided for.

Mr. PEDLOW: What good purpose does the minister hope to serve by taking land from one settler to give to another settler who wants, or fancies, the land that some particular settler has located on when there is so much unsettled land in the country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have answered that question several times. There is no intention on the part of the board to do that. In fact, the principle is clearly embodied in this Act that the board is not to take land that is being used, it is to take land which is not being reasonably used. There is some advantage to the country in handing land over to somebody who will use it as against the man who will not use it and who holds it for speculative purposes.

Mr. PEDLOW: I assumed from the discussion that has just taken place between the minister and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that you intended to dispossess some man, put him on the roadside and instal some one else in his place.

Section agreed to.

On section 49—inspection and survey of and entry upon lands:

Mr. MORPHY: I draw the minister's attention to the fact that whereas in subsection 2 of section 49 the qualification:

> —duly licensed or empowered to act as a surveyor for any province of Canada—is required, there seems to be no definition of the qualifications of an engineer. The danger I see is that a non-qualified person may be deputed to make a survey as an engineer, and may make it improperly.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 49 is taken from the Expropriation Act, and I do not like to burden the ordinary expropriation machinery if I can help it. I think the original Act would have been better drafted if some qualification had been put after "engineer," but there is one very great advantage in following another Act, even though that Act may not be drafted in the very best way, namely, the advantage of following the procedure, and so forth. I do not suppose we would lose any of that by defining the term "engineer." The board is not going to employ a person who is not an engineer.

Section agreed to.

On section 59—power of board to estimate land apart from buildings and to vary amount as to balance due:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I desire to propose two amendments to this clause. The way it reads now the board is empowered to take any amount not exceeding $1,000 away from the stock loan and add it to improvements. The amendment I propose is to enable the board to take away from the improvements loan and add it to the stock loan. The amendment will therefore empower the board to vary the provisions of section 18 in that regard and:

> (ii) To vary the provisions of section sixteen to nineteen inclusively, of this Act, so that live stock and equipment to a value not exceeding three thousand dollars may be sold to a settler, but so that the total amount of balance of price and advances remaining unpaid by the settler as the result of the exercise by the board of any of its powers under this Act shall not exceed seven thousand five hundred dollars.

The Bill will then provide that $1,000 may be taken off stock and added to the amount available for improvements, or the stock loan may be raised $1,000 and made $3,000, so long as the total does not exceed $7,500. I think that will be clear to the committee. That is to meet the strong representations made by the war veterans that we were not adequately providing for stock farming, especially in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I also desire to amend subsection (1) by adding the following subclause (c):

> In all cases of sales of orchard or fruit lands, to apply the provisions of section 18 of this Act, with such other provisions thereof as may depend upon or have relation to those of said section, as if for the words "live stock or equipment" or "live stock and equipment acquired under authority of this Act" or words to the same effect in said section or in any of said sections appearing, there were substituted the words "fruit trees, already planted or growing on any land sold by the board to the settler,"—

That is to say, providing for the substitution of fruit trees already planted or growing on any land sold by the board to the settler.

—and, for any purpose of this Act, to estimate the value of the trees and shrubs already planted or growing on any land being sold by the board to the settler apart from the value of such land.

I submit that the better course would be to have this amendment as proposed printed in Hansard, and to let the clause stand, so that the members of the committee may see the clause in the morning as it will appear in its amended form, and we can deal with it when we are in committee again on the Bill. It makes a very substantial amendment to section 59.

Amendments stand.

Section stands.

On section 61—No fee or commission on any sale to board:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a very important clause. It provides that:

(1) No person, firm or corporation shall be entitled to charge or to collect as against or from any other person, firm or corporation any fee or commission or advance of price for services rendered in the sale of any land made to the board, whether for the finding or introducing of a buyer or otherwise.

(2) No person, firm or corporation shall pay to any other person, firm or corporation any such fee or commission or advance of price for any such services.

(3) The board may require of any person, firm or corporation from whom it purchases land, or who is in any manner interested therein, the execution of an affidavit in Form E in the Schedule to this Act.

The affidavit contains a declaration that no commission whatever is paid in connection with the transaction. It must not be inferred because this clause is inserted that the business of a commission land agent is wrongful, or criminal, or any less legitimate than any other business. But the fact is that owing to its being the Government that is purchasing and dealing with these lands, the necessity for shutting out even access to fraud is so great that we deem it best to prohibit commissions altogether. In fact, we do not know any other way of doing it. The Government when purchasing land in a locality does not know every individual resident there, and it is very difficult for the Government, as for a private individual, to guard itself against being imposed on in this way. Consequently we provide that no commission shall be charged on any sale of land to the board.

On section 64—Repeal of 1917, c. 21, and continuance in office of employees.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the minister continue these employees in office or not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are continued in office. When this Act takes effect they are officers operating under this Act instead of under the old Act, that is all.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many officers are there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are 470 altogether. I think that is a very small number when we consider the vast operations of the Board. Besides those engaged on soldiers' settlement work, there are in the Department of the Interior, 2,956 officers. In the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment there is a staff of almost 4,000. So, having in mind the vast extent of the administrative responsibilities, the staff of the Soldier Settlement Board is not at all large.

Mr. COPP: Is it necessary to increase the staff for the purposes of this Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act of itself will not increase the staff, but the business is increasing all along, and we shall have to increase the staff in the future.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 131, for the promotion of technical education in Canada—Hon. J. A. Calder—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this Bill was last under consideration by the Committee we had adopted clause 1, short title, and were discussing clause 2, definition.

Mr. McKENZIE: It seems to me, upon a reading of paragraph (c) of section 2, that all the words after the word "province" are superfluous; the rest seems to be explanatory.

Mr. CALDER: The point is very well taken; the additional words are really of an explanatory character, and the section would be complete without them. However, I think no harm will be done by leaving the words there, as they give an indication of the character and purpose of the work to be carried on.

Mr. BUREAU: I suppose it is the intention of the Government to pass paragraph (c) of this section, notwithstanding the protests that were made the other day and the reasons that were adduced to show that this was an encroachment upon provincial rights?

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—not to apply to any province which has not approved of Act:

Mr. CALDER: The purpose of this section will be served if we strike out the words "approved its provisions and," so that the section will read:

This Act shall not apply to any province until the Government thereof has by order in council signified its desire to take advantage thereof.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—amounts payable:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: In subsection 2, what "census" is referred to?—the federal census that is taken every ten years? Or would that include also the interim census taken from time to time in the western provinces?

Mr. CALDER: It is the last federal census taken in any province. A quinquennial census is taken in the three Prairie Provinces, of which that part of the country would get the advantage under this Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why is the census taken more frequently in the Western Provinces?

Mr. CALDER: The per capita grants payable to those provinces are based upon population, and as the population was growing very rapidly it was thought that it would not be fair to base the per capita grants upon a census taken every ten years. I understand that a similar provision with regard to the census is in the Highways measure and in the Agricultural Instruction Act.

Mr. BUREAU: May I suggest that the word "decennial" be inserted between the words "last" and "federal" in line 24 of page 2. I understand that the reason given for the quinquennial census is on account of the amount paid to the provinces per capita. Now the western provinces are increasing in population much faster than the eastern provinces, and it would not be right to apportion this money to the western provinces every five years and to the eastern provinces only once in ten years, for this reason: The western provinces are essentially agricultural, while the eastern provinces are essentially industrial, and it is in connection with industry that technical education is mainly required. It was admitted by practically every one who spoke on the Budget, and I think the House will agree, that it is in the eastern provinces that the greatest industrial development is taking place. Therefore, the development of technical education in the East will require more money than in the West. I think it would only be fair, therefore, that this grant should be apportioned on the basis of the last decennial census, which was taken in 1910, until a new census is taken throughout the Dominion.

Mr. CALDER: I admit at once that there is a great deal in the contention of my hon. friend. The older provinces, which are more highly industrialized than the western provinces, are, I think, entitled to an advantage in this respect, and if it is the wish of the Committee that the word "decennial" be inserted, I am quite agreeable to the change being made. On looking up the Agricultural Instruction Act I find that the expression used there is the "last decennial census" and not the "last federal census."

Mr. BUREAU: I would therefore move that the word "decennial" be inserted between the words "last" and "federal" in line 24 of page 2.

Mr. MAHARG: What is the idea of making that change?

Mr. BUREAU: In the West the census is taken every five years. Therefore, the basis of apportionment of the money will be changed every five years for the West, while only every ten years for the East. The change I have suggested will make the basis uniform. If this was a grant to agriculture I would say that we should do just the reverse, but as it is a grant to technical education, which is concerned with industrial education more than anything else. I think the East ought to stand on a par with the West.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. COPP: I would draw the minister's attention to subsection 2 of this section providing for the apportionment of the money between the several provinces in proportion to population. When this matter was under consideration before, it was pointed out very distinctly that the minister was following along the lines of the Agricultural Instruction Act. That Act provides for a minimum allowance to each province before the grant is apportioned on the per capita basis. I am in receipt of a communication from the Board of Technical Education in New Brunswick pointing out that it is very important that a minimum allowance should be provided for the smaller provinces as a foundation on which to work. Otherwise, the basis of apportionment would be very unfair to the provinces with a small population. On the per capita basis Prince Edward Island, for instance, would receive only $8,000 out of this grant, and New Brunswick only $30,000, which is a very small amount with which to accomplish much in the line of technical education, either by establishing a technical school, or combining technical education with the ordinary school work. In technical schools, such as we hope to see established under this grant, there is always a certain amount of overhead expenses for instructors, preparatory work, and so forth, and I submit that it would be unfair to the provinces with a small population not to provide a minimum allowance before distributing the grant according to population. On behalf, therefore, of my own province,—and I know I shall have the sympathy of every hon. member from the Maritime Provinces who takes an interest in technical education —I would urge the minister to see if he cannot provide for a minimum amount being allotted to each province as was done under the Agricultural Instruction Act. The minimum there, I think, was $20,000. The smaller provinces have been struggling along valiantly in extending their educational facilities, and it is a very heavy burden, particularly in regard to technical education. I trust, therefore, my suggestion will have the favourable consideration of the Government.

Mr. McISAAC: I think it will readily be appreciated by hon. gentlemen that if this grant were apportioned strictly on a per capita basis the provinces with a small population would be handicapped and subjected to injustice. Under the Agricultural Instruction Act there was a flat rate in the first place, and afterwards the balance of the money was apportioned on a per capita basis.

The larger provinces do not suffer to any extent by having this flat rate apportioned in the beginning, because the amount thus paid out is only a small proportion of the entire grant, and with their large populations they are at an advantage in any event. But the smaller provinces with small populations suffer a great disadvantage if the grant is apportioned on a purely per capita basis, for they would receive a very small portion of it by reason of the meagreness of their population. I sincerely trust that the minister will see his way clear to adopt the same method in distributing this grant as was followed in the case of the agricultural grant. My own province, is the smallest in the Dominion, with a small population, but according to area, I am pleased to say, it is the most thickly populated of all the provinces. Besides its smallness it has this further handicap: There are provinces that had small territories but were enabled to enlarge them from the lands that lay around. but in our case, unfortunately, we cannot hope for any addition of that kind, because we are an island. Therefore, I hope the minister will so arrange it that a portion of the grant will in the first place be given equally to all provinces, after which the balance will be distributed according to population. That will be an advantage to the smaller provinces while it cannot prejudice the case of the larger provinces, because those with a population of a million or two or more, will be in an advantageous position in any case.

Mr. McKENZIE: When this clause was up before, I urged upon the minister as strongly as I could to adopt the principle followed in the Agricultural Aid Act and also in the proposed division of the road money. I have before me the resolution in connection with aid to highways and it says:

> Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that for the purpose of constructing and improving highways in Canada, the Governor in Council may authorize the payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada of the sum of twenty million dollars during the period of five years from the first day of April, 1919; which sum shall be allotted and paid as follows: (a) eighty thousand dollars each year to the Government of each province, and (b) the remainder of such sum to the Governments of the respective provinces, in proportion to the populations of the said provinces respectively, as determined by the latest Federal census of each province;

That has been the method adopted in connection with the Agricultural Instruction Act, and it is the method proposed to be adopted in connection with highways. I tried to impress upon the minister that the same principle should apply in connection with this vote which is very much along the same line. The first is an aid to agriculture, the second an aid to highways, and this is an aid to technical education. If the principle is sound in the first two it should be followed in the third. It is even more important that it should be adopted in this case. However small a province may be, it must have the proper equipment, the proper professor, throughly conversant with the subject, and must pay an adequate salary. In these respects a small province will require exactly the same kind of equipment as the larger provinces. I see no reason why the minister should depart from the precedent established in the other two Acts, when the circumstances are so closely allied, and I do hope he will consider this matter.

Mr. CALDER: Since the Bill was last before the committee two points were raised,—this one, and the question as to whether or not the moneys expended by municipalities should be taken into consideration in the payment of grants. I had intended to refer those two questions to Council, but I have not had an opportunity to do so. Personally I am inclined to the view that the Bill should be amended in the direction suggested. The question of a special amount to be paid to all the provinces will be a matter for consideration; and I would move that subsection 2 of section 4 be allowed to stand. When the Bill is next before the House the matter can be again considered when I hope to be able to make propositions to the House.

Section stands.

On section 6—Terms upon which payments will be made.

Mr. PEDLOW: Section 6 says that the payment of grants shall be made subject to certain terms and conditions. It mentions the first day of July, 1919, and section 5, subsection 2, in regard to the determination of grants payable to provinces annually, mentions the first day of April.

Mr. CALDER: It should be July in both cases. A point was raised in the general discussion the other day in regard to subsection (e) of this section:

> The minister shall be the sole judge of all questions and differences that may arise under this Act or under any agreement made in pursuance of this Act.

[M. McKenzie.]

So far as I am concerned that provision can be struck out. An agreement has to be entered into between the province and the Federal Government, and I have no doubt that the agreement itself will provide for the settlement of any differences of opinion. I therefore move that subsection (e) be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BUREAU: Subsection (b) provides that no portion of any grant shall be used in whole or in part in meeting any liability or expenditure incurred prior to the first of July, 1919.

Mr. CALDER: That is, for lands, buildings, furnishings or equipments.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not omit the date? Twenty-five per cent of the annual grant payable to any province will be applied for acquiring land, erecting, extending or improving buildings, etc. Some provinces that may have begun the development of technical education may necessarily have had to go into debt before the first of July, 1919, and perhaps the date might be eliminated. I know that in certain cases heavy liabilities have been incurred by local governments and other bodies for the purpose of promoting technical education.

Mr. CALDER: The Bill is based upon the need for expansion in technical education work From one end of Canada to the other there has been a lack of provision necessary for work of this kind. The Bill assumes that whatever liabilities have been incurred up to date have been provided for, and these grants are to be used for new work. If we depart from that principle and begin to take care of liabilities heretofore created, I am afraid a good deal of the money which we are providing in the way of grants will never be used for new purposes. We are most desirous, on account of the general lack of facilities of this kind in Canada, that any moneys provided by the Federal Government shall be used for entirely new expenditures, and not to defray old liabilities.

Mr. McKENZIE: In regard to subsection (f), I think if there is to be an agreement there may be a conflict between this clause as it stands and the agreement that may be entered into. The clause reads:

> (f) Every province receiving a grant shall furnish the minister with such evidence as he may resuire, to show that the grants paid hereunder are expended for technical education as provided by this Act.

I think it would be sufficient to say that every province receiving a grant shall furnish the minister with such evidence as he may require to show that the grants paid are expended for the purposes agreed upon.

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: All the words after "for" can be struck out and the words "the purpose agreed upon" inserted after the word "expended."

Mr. CALDER: The section as amended will read:

As provided for in the agreement with such province. Each province receiving a grant shall furnish such evidence as may be required to show that the grants paid hereunder are used for technical education as provided for in the agreement with such province.

Mr. BUREAU: The agreement under this Act?

Mr. CALDER: It is not one agreement. There may be a slightly different agreement with each province.

Mr. BUREAU: That covers it.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Appointment of staff:

Mr. BUREAU: Has the minister any idea of the staff that will be required to carry out the provisions of this Act?

Mr. CALDER: I have not gone into that matter myself. This Bill was prepared by the Labour Department and the information required in its framing has been gathered by them. I would think that not more than one, or possibly two men would be sufficient for the purpose because the Labour Department, in carrying out this Act, will be merely an advisory and not an administrative department. I think it will be a distinct advantage to have one or two technical experts who can advise the minister as to the agreements and who can help the various provinces in unifying and harmonising the work. I think that one first-class man would probably be sufficient.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like to ask the minister if it would be possible for him to reconsider a certain feature of this Bill. If he would do so it would eliminate all the expense that is possible under section 7. If the words in subsection (c) of section 2, " approved by agreement between the minister and the Government of any province as being necessary or desirable " were eliminated, the provinces that have the machinery already in operation would be able to administer the fund covered by this Act without any expense to the country at all. I think that we might depend upon the educational departments of the various provinces to handle the money to the best possible advantage and to the satisfaction of the department an the country. I am in entire accord with the principle of the Bill in providing a fund for technical education. Immediately the armistice was signed the United States Government passed an appropriation of $100,000,000 for this special purpose. They realised the necessity of getting busy at once with the education of their mechanics, artisans and the members of various trades in that country up to the very highest stage possible. We are travelling along the same line. We cannot get busy too soon with this class of work and we cannot give too much aid to it. I would suggest, in order that as much money as possible may be conserved, and as we have confidence in the educational departments of the various provinces, that the administration of this fund be left entirely with the provinces.

Mr. CALDER: The honourable gentleman was apparently not in his place when this question was raised by the honourable member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). If these moneys are to be granted without some measure or supervision by the federal authorities I think I am quite safe in saying that the Government is prepared to drop or withdraw it. The Government has come to the conclusion, after very full and serious consideration, that if grants such as these are to be given to the provinces there must be some supervision and control. We had a very full discussion of the point the last time the Bill was before the House, and the clause has been before the Committee this evening also, when the honourable gentleman (Mr. Pedlow), apparently was not in his place. The clause was carried. I do not think we can raise the question again at this time. I had no knowlege that $100,000,000 had been voted by the Congress of the United States for these purposes. There is a proposition before Congress whereby a sum of between $90,000,000 and $100,000,000, covering a period of years, shall be used, if the proposition is carried, for a campaign of Americanizing the foreign-born in the United States. The only similar law I know of is the Smith-Hughes law, passed in 1917, under which Congress provides for a grant to the several states, but they have very elaborate machinery in connection with that law for the supervision and control of the expenditures. Notwithstanding the fact that the various state authorities in the different states have full jurisdiction over the technical education, under the Smith-Hughes law by which grants similar to these are made by the federal authorities in the United States, they provide for the measure of control and supervision to which I have referred. I feel quite certain that the technical education board that has been established under the law of the United States will render very valuable service to all the states of the Union that take advantage of the law. I am in hopes that the department of Labour here can secure the services of at least one, and possibly two first-class experts, and that these experts, in travelling throughout Canada and holding conferences with the men who are engaged in this work, will be able to render valuable services in this direction.

Mr. PEDLOW: The press despatch from which I have quoted merely made the statement that that sum had been granted by the United States Government for that purpose; it gave none of the details of the working out of the proposition. If the minister wishes I can produce the press despatch in question.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I think we ought to avoid as much as possible building up a technical education department at Ottawa, because it really is not necessary. When this Bill passes and the provinces undertake the work, there will be a technical education branch in each province and it would be a mistake for us to create a department here with such inspectors, clerks, and officers as are named in the Bill, at vast expense when it appears to be unnecessary. I do not think such a thing is required in the case of the grant that is given for the purposes of agriculture. The work to be done at Ottawa should be very small indeed—simply to pay over the money. The whole responsibility resting upon the local administration, it will be for them to show that they are expending that money according to agreement. I hope the minister does not intend to establish an expensive department in Ottawa to watch the provinces in the administration of this grant.

Mr. CALDER: No, it is not necessary to do that; but it seems to me it is very necessary, if grants are to be paid to, and agreements entered into with the several provinces that the minister who is responsible for that work should have at hand a man upon whose judgment he can very largely rely. Neither the minister nor the officials in his department, as at present constituted, are necessarily qualified in the field of technical education which is a specialized business, and unless the minister has some person at hand who can advise him in all these matters he will be more or less at sea. If I remember correctly, when provision was made for grants to agricultural education, one of the first things the Government did was to secure the services of Mr. C. C. James, who was recognized as one of the best agricultural educationists in Canada; and from what personal knowledge I have of his work in our own province Mr. C. C. James in consultation with the provincial officers rendered very valuable service. I cannot see myself any necessity for the building up of a large staff. I think all the minister will require will be at least one man, and possibly two, of the class that I have referred to, because they will have no administrative duties at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister, I am sure, will appreciate the very strong conscientious objections that were made by some members on this side against any encroachment upon the scope of provincial jurisdiction, particularly in the matter of education which is left entirely to the provinces, in which views I fully concur. At the same time I do not object to what the Government is doing, because we started out along those lines when the Laurier Government was in power. That Government appointed a commission to investigate the question of technical education, and the present legislation, although very late, is the fruit of that inquiry. Therefore, I cannot say that it should not go into effect. But I must respect the opinions of hon. gentlemen who are opposed to any incursions into the jurisdiction of the provinces in this connection. I would suppose that the terms of subsection (c) of section 2 provides for the relation that will exist between the department at Ottawa which will have charge of the expenditure and the provincial authorities, because there has to be an agreement and the former will have full authority to make such an agreement as it may deem ample to safeguard the expenditures proposed to be made. That will be the federal government's only duty and its obligation will be to see that the provinces live up to the agreement entered into. My own view is that the agreement in question should contain all the powers which the provinces should have and therefore I do not really think that sections 7 and 8, particularly the latter, are necessary at all. Then section 8, if the Chairman will permit me to refer to it before we enter upon its consideration, gives the Dominion Government power to the extent virtually of taking full control of technical education in the provinces. As to whatever part of section 8 may be agreed to by mutual consent, for example between the Government here and the Ontario Government, and put in writing, I have nothing to say, but I do not wish to invest this Government with power in regard to education which the constitution of the country does not contemplate and which should not be granted.

Mr. MORPHY: What meaning does the minister put upon the word "survey" in section 8?

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. gentleman that clause 7 is the one the committee is at present considering.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would draw attention to the fact that it cannot be altogether necessary for the Federal Government to have supervision over this fund. The expenditure contemplated under this Bill is small compared with other grants that are appropriated year by year for the several provinces under the provisions of the British North America Act without any such supervision. For instance, I find Chapter 41 of this Act provides for advances to the Government of the Northwest Territories to the amount of $250,000 annually, and it does not involve any supervision, but merely the paying over of the money. Then I find Chapter 42 to be an Act to provide for voting an annual grant to the province of Prince Edward Island amounting to $100,000. I presume that is also paid over from year to year, under the Act which made Prince Edward Island a member of Confederation, without any particular supervision. A small amount such as the Bill contemplates might very well be paid over from year to year to the various provinces and confidence placed in them to dispose of it to the best advantage. I am sure that in the case of Ontario the provincial Minister of Education will take care that the federal grant is expended in the wisest possible manner.

I speak on this subject because I have some intimate knowledge of the efforts made by the town of Renfrew at the present time to establish a technical school there in connection with the collegiate institute. They purpose spending $150,000 on this item alone, and the schools there—both the collegiate institute and the school for technical education—will be built and maintained by the municipality of the town, notwithstanding the fact that fifty-five per cent of the pupils come from outside the municipality. Now, I am glad, as I said this evening, that the Government has taken a hand in this work and is endeavouring to assist the municipalities in their laudable efforts to meet the situation in the best possible manner. The municipality of the town of Renfrew has assurance from the provincial Government of assistance towards this object, and I have no doubt that there will be additional assistance rendered them after the passing of this Bill.

Mr. CALDER: The section on its face looks as though a very elaborate machine was to be established. I would suggest that the words "experts and clerks" be struck out. The clause will then read:

> Such officers and employees as may be required for carrying out the provisions of this Act, shall be appointed under the provisions of The Civil Service Act, 1918.

Mr. EDWARDS: The provisions under which the subsidies to the various provinces have been granted seem to me entirely different from the voting of money by this Parliament as proposed in this Bill. Under the British North America Act the provinces were limited in the means whereby they could raise revenue, and that is stated briefly as one of the reasons, perhaps the main reason, why an annual subsidy was granted to the provinces and handed over to them to do with as they saw fit. I cannot see where there is any possibility under this Act of encroaching on the rights which the provinces have in educational matters under the British North America Act.

Mr. PEDLOW: I had not that in mind. My argument was directed to the means for conserving moneys for the purposes for which they have been voted.

Mr. EDWARDS: But it has been mentioned by some other hon. gentleman, I believe. I cannot see where there is any possibility of encroaching on the rights of the provinces. In the first place, whatever money is voted by this Act to the various provinces is safe-guarded by an agreement between this Government and the provinces. So that there could not be any encroachment on the domain of the provinces without the consent of the provinces themselves, and I do not anticipate that any province would for a moment consent to having the rights that were granted to it under the British North America Act infringed upon. But for another reason I, as a member of this House, would very strongly object to the moneys set forth in this Act being voted without this Parliament having something to say in regard to the manner in which those moneys should be expended. Some hon. gentlemen seem to think that it is all right for us simply to hand the money over to the provinces and say good-bye to it, leaving the distribution of it entirely to the provinces. I, as one of the members of this House, object to voting money in that way. I say that if we vote money for technical education, or for the improvement of roads, we as the people who are voting that money have a right to some little say as to the manner in which that money is to be expended. It seems to me that is the only logical position for us to take as members of Parliament voting away the people's money. While my hon. friend has said that it would be perfectly safe to hand the money over to the educational department, inasmuch as this is money voted for technical education, undoubtedly in any agreement entered into between this Government and the Government of the province of Ontario or the Government of the province of Quebec, those provincial Governments will call in those to advise them who are best able to do so, that is those who are administering the educational affairs of those provinces. That, I think, we may take for granted. Take into consideration also the fact that there must be an agreement entered into between the provincial Governments and this Government, and I do not see where there is any encroachment upon the rights of the provinces in educational matters.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Conference, surveys and investigations.

Mr. CALDER: I would suggest that that section be allowed to stand, Mr. Chairman. Personally I am inclined to the view that if work of this character is to be carried on it should be by a distinct agreement with the provinces, and I think it would be far better to leave that to be dealt with in the agreement. But I do not wish to drop the section until I have had an opportunity of discussing the matter with the Minister of Labour, who will likely be here in a day or two.

Section stands.

On section 9—Balances unexpected to be carried forward, but not more than 25 per cent of grant without consent of minister.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before I forget what the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has said, I must remind him that when we are giving moneys to the provinces we are not giving it to strangers, to some body who has no right to it. Of course, if you were dealing with moneys that came to the treasury at Ottawa, and were paying them out to people who had no right to them, except as we were giving the moneys to them, that might be a different thing. But there is only one people. The people of Ontario are the people of that province just as much for educational matters as they are for paying revenue at the customs house, and it is their own money just as much as it is our money. The British North America Act, in effect, says that the control of education is entirely in the province; therefore by implication any moneys voted for education shall come under provincial machinery. So we are not, to my mind, at all destroying any right under the British North America Act by the Act which we are now passing, even if we do pay over to the Government of Ontario every cent they are getting and say to them: This is part of your own money; we might have kept it from you, but now we are giving it to you; it goes into the machinery of education for the province, and you have control of it.

There is nothing unconstitutional or improper about that. But while I do not object to our exercising some control over these matters, we must not go too far when we are advancing money for purposes which are purely provincial.

Mr. EDWARDS: We might use the same argument in respect to every dollar that we vote in this House. We might say: This is the money of the people, and they have a right to it. But, as a matter of fact, they have not the right to it until we vote it. This is not the first occasion upon which we have voted money for educational purposes.

Mr. BUREAU: We did it in 1913.

Mr. EDWARDS: We voted money for educational purposes when we passed the Bill to aid agricultural instruction. What is that but education?

Mr. McKENZIE: But there is to be dual jurisdiction here.

Mr. EDWARDS: Quite so, just as we have dual jurisdiction in respect of the moneys which we voted for agricultural purposes. It is quite true that the money belongs to the people, but the responsibility for voting that money devolves upon us, and we have a right to follow that responsibility up and say how that money shall be expended.

AID TO PROVINCES FOR HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION.

House again in Committee on a certain proposed resolution to provide for the construction and improvement of highways in Canada—Hon. Mr. Reid—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution may be found in the Votes and Proceedings of February 20.

Mr. MAHARG: I made reference to this matter during the course of the debate on the Address. In Western Canada we are more in need of railroads at this time than of highways. Highways would be all very well if we were supplied with railroads in proportion to the mileage in the other parts of Canada, but we are not. It has been shown before the Railway Committee during this session that people out there are drawing their grain anywhere from twenty-five to fifty or sixty miles over very crude roads; the distances are so great that it is practically impossible to provide improved roads in all cases. The highways proposed to be constructed under this Bill will be automobile roads; they will not be so constructed that settlers can use them for transporting their grain and other products. They will link up the larger centres; they will not contribute to the convenience of those who have to team their heavy products long distances. For that reason I am strongly opposed to the adoption of this resolution.

Some method should be found of treating the long stretches of clay belts in the western country with a view to improving transportation facilities. For a distance of forty, fifty or sixty miles you will find a stretch of country which is pure clay and where no sand or gravel is obtainable. Before any elaborate scheme is launched some experiment should be made with a view to seeing whether some kind of treatment cannot be applied to these clay belts with a view to increasing highway facilities, because the building of roads with gravel in those sections would cost very much more than would similar roads in other parts of the country. We have been endeavouring during this session to persuade the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) to extend our railroads in the Western country. He has been very good in many ways, but if he has several million dollars to contribute to our province for the improvement of our transportation facilities, that money would be much better spent in the extension of railroads into the districts which are not now adequately served. Scores of settlements are in that position, and it would be wise, at least for the time being, to vote this money for purposes which would be more beneficial to us in the West than the building of these highways would be.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is right in saying that the West is entitled to more railroads than it has, but I say to him here what I have said to him privately: That the Canadian National Railway Company are constructing all the railways in the West that they can possibly go ahead with during the present year, having regard to labour conditions and to the number of ties that can be obtained for the purpose. So that if we proceed with the construction of highways, that will not interfere in any way with the construction of railways in the West. The Canadian Pacific are also constructing lines in the West; perhaps they should be doing more than they are doing —as to that, I do not know.

In Eastern Canada, I believe, there is nothing that the people require more than good highways, but I do not agree with the hon. member that the same are not required in the West. Certainly there is nothing more important to the farmer of Eastern Canada than good highways, and I do not think it is fair for hon. members from the West to oppose this great improvement. As a member of this House and as a member of the Government I am prepared to do everything I can to bring population to the West and to provide the West with railways and good roads, and when we are doing that, I think it is unfair for my hon. friend to put forward every effort against good highways for Eastern Canada. The hon. member has said that these roads in Eastern Canada are really for automobiles. Let me tell him that the great majority of the automobiles in operation in the eastern provinces of Canada are owned by farmers, and I am glad to see them using them to bring their products to market where they can get a good price. The great cry of the farmer of Eastern Canada is for good roads. I am sure that any man who has seen the good roads in the neighbouring Republic would hold up his hands for good roads in Canada.

As I said when introducing this Bill, these highways will also provide employment for the returned soldiers. Perhaps at the present time there may not be so great a demand for employment by the returned soldiers; they perhaps do not wish to go into employment immediately upon their return home; but the time is coming when employment will have to be provided, and I think it is the duty of the Government to provide employment in the way of good roads and other works of benefit to the country. Where we have had good roads constructed in Canada you will see the farmers using them to take their products to the market. They are also used for distributing the freight amongst the small towns. Good roads have been found to be of such great benefit in the neighbouring Republic that the federal government of the United States has voted this year $800,000,000 for good roads, and the local governments are all spending large amounts on the construction of good roads in the rural districts. In my opinion it is to the advantage of Canada that we should proceed with this Bill. My hon. friend is anxious that we should do everything we can to advance the Northwest. Surely, he has some little consideration for the needs of the eastern provinces.

Mr. MAHARG: I am delighted to know that the great difficulty the minister has been up against in the past has been removed. Now, apparently, his difficulty is to get ties and labour. Well, if he will promise me that he will build railroads in western Canada as fast as we can produce the necessary ties and labour I will withdraw all my objections to this Highways Bill right here and now. But things must have changed within the last month or so, for it was less than a month ago that we interviewed the minister in connection with the delay in laying the steel on the Hudson Bay railway, and he informed us then that he did not know where the money was to come from. I am delighted to know that that difficulty has been overcome, and that his only difficulty now is to get ties and labour to do the grading.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member will remember that at that time he stated that there would be no trouble in getting ties for the Hudson Bay railway. I understood from the president of the Canadian National Railways a few days ago, that though he was willing to give contracts for ties, they had not got a tie up to the present time, and from what he told me I do not believe he will be able to get ties to proceed with the work this season. I stated then what I state now. The president of the Canadian National Railways told me that they could not get enough of the kind of labour they required to build more than some 350 miles of new railway and some 350 miles which has to be re-built, and I have yet to find any man from the West either in this House or out of it who has shown me where labour can be got to carry out more than the programme mapped out. At all events until this amount of work has been done, I think I will take the word of the president of the Canadian National Railways, which is to the effect I have mentioned.

Mr. TOBIN: Did I understand the minister to say that he could not go on with the building of railways on account of a shortage of ties—that the president of the Canadian National Railways told him he could not get ties?

Mr. J. D. REID: I was talking of building railways in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan. I said that he could not get ties for the Hudson Bay railway up in that district.

Mr. TOBIN: I am glad the minister has mentioned that, because different large lumbermen of that part of the country from which I come understand there is a sort of combine or trust in connection with the Canadian National Railways, and that only a favoured few can get a contract for ties; that it is a case of wheels within wheels, in fact. I do not know if the minister knows about it, but I think he should inform himself on that point. I know concerns with half a million ties to sell who approached the Government, but could do no business with them. At the same time I understand that only a few days ago agents were going around other parts of the country buying ties for the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. J. D. REID: There has been no trouble in getting ties in Eastern Canada. The hon. member knows it would not be possible to buy ties in Quebec or Ontario and take them to Alberta or Saskatchewan because the freight would be too high. The ties are therefore secured in those districts. I have no doubt you could get ties in Western Canada in winter, but at present it would not be possible.

Mr. GREEN: There is a West other than Middle West. If the Middle West wants railways, the Far West wants wagon roads and highways. British Columbia is just as much in need of highways as the Middle West is in need of railways. I am not particularly enamoured of the method in which the money provided under this resolution is to be expended. For myself, I would prefer to see the Government build a national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. BUREAU: That is quite an undertaking.

Mr. GREEN: It would be a large undertaking, it is true, but a great part of that highway is already built, and all that would be needed would be connecting links. In that way, the Government would not only furnish the money but would have control of the expenditure. The people as a whole are furnishing the money, and this Government is responsible for its expenditure. I will not say that if I cannot get the Government to see eye to eye with me as to the method in which to deal with this matter, I am going to oppose the resolution, because I believe that the Government are perfectly right in undertaking to furnish a large sum of money for the building of highways in Canada, East and West. I trust that the Bill itself will contain a provision for the Government to undertake the building of that highway themselves under their own officials and with the money of the people.

Mr. M. CLARKE: How much money does the minister propose to spend?

Mr. REID: The Bill will ask for an amount not exceeding $20,000,000 in five years.

Mr. M. CLARK: Where is the money to come from? Has the minister any idea? You heard the Budget statement of the Finance Minister, Mr. Chairman. It is all well enough for my friend from British Columbia (Mr. Green) to talk in favour of a road from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If one had a sufficient lack of sense of responsibility he might propose a road from here to Mars. But where is the money to come from? There is nothing that both sides of the House will have to attend to more carefully in the next few years than the practice of economy in regard to public funds. That is possibly more urgent than the tariff, although the tariff is probably in a sense more important, because if the people have to contribute money directly they will look more closely to the spending of it. It is because the Government gets money by indirect means that it does not care what schemes it proposes for the spending of it. We have been told that there is a Middle West and a Far West, and that there is an East. Well, there is also a British North America Act which has to do with the manner in which laws are carried out in Canada. I speak subject to correction by legal gentlemen and others who have a longer acquaintance with public life in Canada, but I understand that highways are a matter that is relegated to the provinces under the British North America Act, which is the constitution of the country. Is that so?

Mr. BUREAU: It is so.

Mr. M. CLARK: My opinion is confirmed by lawyers of repute. If that is the case, in the face of the statement of the Minister of Finance given to this country last week, and the fact that we are going around hawking for the pence of the proletariat to carry on the ordinary expenses of the country, is this a time when the Dominion Government should do work which by the British North America Act is defined as being within the purview of the provinces? I would like the minister to tell me where he expects to get this money from.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I do not care to speak on this subject from a provincial standpoint and will not inquire from the minister where he is going to get the money from. I am sorry to disagree with my friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I do not believe that in the interests of Canada as a nation, money can be better spent by the federal government than for the building of good roads. There is a howl from one end of the country to the other about the high cost of living, and in the name of High Heaven, how will you bring it down unless you increase production? We are voting tremendous sums of money to get the returned men back on the land, and nothing could be more admirable. Every responsible man in the country is exercising his brains to find out how best to get people back on the land, and the only way in which you can accomplish this end—and I speak from an experience of a life time on the land—is to make conditions on the land and in the country better and more congenial. Now, how can you better do this than by building good roads? I am satisfied to hand the money to the provinces, and I have confidence in the provincial governments, whether Liberal or Conservative, to believe that they will expend it legitimately and honestly. If we had a good system of public highways in the country surrounding the great cities of Montreal and Toronto, it would reduce the cost of living more than anything else. With good roads, the farmer could travel forty miles to a city and take his vegetables, fruit, or any other produce to market and, indeed, right to the doors of people. Would that not represent a great economy? We would not hear so much then about middlemen and profiteers. When this matter was under discussion on a previous occasion it seemed that the East was pulling against the West, or both ends pulling against the middle, so to speak. We want railroads in the west and hope to see them built, but I say that we require good highways in order to induce young men to go on to the farms to remain there and help increase production.

Mr. ROBB: This resolution involves something more than the expenditure of money by this Government. It compels an expenditure by the provinces.

The resolution provides that the minister will contribute forty per cent of the expenditure. He allows $80,000 to each of the provinces. So that before the province of Prince Edward Island can get a cent of this money, they must spend $120,000. I am not rising to oppose good roads. I come from a province where we have made good progress in good roads. In one particular locality in my province for perhaps a distance of 100 miles east, south and west, there are good roads leading up to the Montreal highway. But to get into Montreal they must cross the Indian reserve of Caughnawaga, which reserve is under the supervision of this Government. The Government will not allow the province to construct that road, nor will they do it themselves, and we are in this position that there are eight miles required to be constructed to link up with the city of Montreal over which the produce of the farm can be carried, but as the Government have not built these eight miles of road, we are deprived of going into the city with heavy loads. Before this Government start in to dictate to the provinces how much they should spend upon roads they should put their own house in order and make their own roads. I would like a statement from the minister as to that. This has been put up to the department. Do they propose to build that road through the Caughnawaga reserve and connect it with the provincial road? We are not merely planning about good roads in my province; we are building our good roads, and we have already a good system of building roads, probably a little bit better than will be dictated by the Government.

Mr. M. CLARK: Is it not a fact that the province of Quebec has not only good roads but is in a very sound financial position?

Mr. ROBB: I did not want to count that in too far or to introduce comparisons of that kind.

Mr. M. CLARK: I want to show that it is possible to get good roads and still follow the constitution of the country.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend may be, and I think is, quite right. However, I rose particularly to inquire about the position of smaller provinces like Prince Edward Island, in regard to the $120,000 that they will have to contribute before they get anything; and also what the policy of the Government is in regard to the roads for which they are responsible across Indian reserves.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am sorry I cannot answer the hon. member in reference to the road across the Indian reserves that he mentioned. I never heard of it before, and I know nothing about it. The hon. member will have to wait until the minister is up with his Estimates and ask him the question. If I knew what the trouble was I would be very glad to answer the question. In reference to Prince Edward Island and the smaller provinces, it was felt that they should get more in proportion than the larger provinces and for that reason it was decided that we should divide the amount equally, granting $80,000 to the several provinces and then the balance according to the last federal census. If they accept the money for good roads, they must pay 60 per cent and this Government will pay 40 per cent towards construction.

Mr. ROBB: In order to get the first $80,000 they will have to put up $120,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend (Mr. M. Clark) put a very pertinent question when he asked: "Where is the money to come from?" I am sure that question impressed very strongly indeed the hon. gentleman from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), because he stated that if the Minister of Railways and Canals would only give him a promise that he would meet his aspirations in regard to railway building in the west he would withdraw all his objections in regard to the proposed vote for highways. He apparently was not concerned with the question as to where the money was to come from. That did not occur to him. "Give us more money than you are already giving us for railways" said the hon. member for Maple Creek "and I will not say anything whatever in opposition to the money that you vote for highways. Neither will I lie awake at nights wondering where the money is to come from." In the distribution of this money, as has been pointed out, the provinces, in order to get the 40 per cent, will have to contribute 60 per cent. If this does not appear to be a good bargain to the province of Prince Edward Island, that province can say: "No, we will not accept this money, we will go ahead and build our own highways as we have been building them, we will not be a party to this scheme and we will not consent to putting up 60 per cent in order to get 40 per cent." If the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta consider that the bargain is a poor one then Saskatchewan and Alberta can say: "No, we will not agree with the terms proposed, we will not agree to put up 60 per cent in order to get the 40 per cent that this Government offers to our province." Oh, but you say, while that is true and each province may refuse to enter into the agreement, this money is the money of the whole country and if Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan or Alberta does not feel like accepting this proposition for themselves, they do not want to see Ontario, British Columbia or Quebec get any money along these lines. Why not? We have spent millions and hundreds of millions of dollars in building railways, canals and public works here and there from the Atlantic to the Pacific. And what was the justification? The general benefit of Canada. That is what it was done for. The railway built in Prince Edward Island does not benefit directly the people of Ontario, but the money that was voted for that railway was expended for the general benefit of Canada. While it benefited Prince Edward Island, it was indirectly a benefit to Ontario as well. I would like the members of this committee to consider this question from that standpoint. Is it not worth while for this Government to spend a certain amount in Ontario, in British Columbia and in those provinces which are willing to meet the conditions laid down here and to carry out their various desires of having good roads? If these provinces are willing to meet those conditions and to put up 60 per cent, is it not in the interest of Canada that the money should be spent in that way? It seems to me that that is a point well worth considering. I speak for the province of Ontario. Hon. members should not lose sight of the fact that while the West is a very important part of our country, considerably more than half of the population of this country is in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. They should not lose sight of the fact that while the West is a very great agricultural or farming country, as yet it has not reached the status of either Ontario or Quebec in agricultural production. The farmers and the residents generally of the older provinces have a very strong claim on this Government to assist them in providing those roads which will act as feeders for the big lines of railways. It is not only the farming community that are interested in good roads. I venture to say that the people of the cities and towns are just as much interested,—at this time when the cost of food products is high, a little more so,—than are the people living in the country districts. Because if you have a system of roads extending for a distance of twenty or twenty-five miles from a city or town it means that in these days of automobiles the products of the farm are brought into that city or town which would never reach it over bad roads, employing wagons as they used to be employed years ago. In expending this money I think the system that should be followed is for the Dominion Government, acting with the governments of the different provinces, to decide upon a standard road; at present one kind of road is required for one province, or part of a province, and a different standard for another part. Let the engineers or the men appointed by, we will say the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec, meet with engineers appointed by the Federal Government, decide upon the kind of road to be built and take the building of that road out of politics entirely by advertising the building of certain sections of that road—five or ten miles, as the case may be—and call for tenders for the work. That is the way these roads should be built, and that will remove these works entirely from the hands of the politicians. I would like to get the opinions of hon. gentlemen on the point I raised a little while ago, because I am perfectly sincere in bringing it forward. Even suppose a province decides it will not accept the terms imposed in this Bill, would it not be worth while, looking at the matter from the standpoint of the general interest of the country to vote money to those provinces which would conform to the requirements of the Act and be willing to put up their sixty per cent.

Mr. FULTON: I would like to endorse what the member for West Kootenay (Mr. Green) has said as to the feelings of the people of British Columbia on this matter; I am satisfied they will all be in favour of the Bill. Some years ago a very strong case was made out by the Provincial Government for better terms for British Columbia, and I believe the argument prepared at that time was advanced on the floor of this House. One of the reasons for claiming better terms for British Columbia was the great cost of building roads in that province. It is quite true, as the member for Red Deer says, that highways come primarily under the jurisdiction of the province, but it does not seem to me that that is any reason why, if the Dominion Government offers to expend money on highways, its offer should not be carried out. I believe it would be of great benefit to the country in general if an expenditure of moneys for this purpose were made at the present time. I must say for the information of the committee that when negotiations were going on between the Crown colony of British Columbia and the Dominion Government in 1868 for the union of that province with the rest of Canada, the three delegates who were sent to act for British Columbia—one of whom, Dr. Helmcken, is still living—were instructed to ask not only for a railway as one of the terms of union, but also for a highway through and connecting the province with, I think, Fort Garry. The latter project was dropped, but the railway was built. Another reason why I think British Columbia is entitled to some expenditure by the Federal Government on its roads and highways is this: When the Canadian Pacific railway was constructed, it was built under an agreement between the federal authorities and the Provincial Government. The section of railway between Savona and Port Moody was built by the Dominion Government, not by the Canadian Pacific Company. In that strip some forty or fifty miles of the Yale-Cariboo wagon road, a provincial work, were taken up by the railway and destroyed, so we lost that much of the road. When the Canadian Northern railway was built we lost another stretch of forty miles of the Yale-Cariboo road, so that in all some eighty or ninety miles of wagon road have been destroyed by the construction of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern railway, which latter system has now been taken over by the Dominion. I think the fact of our having lost such a large mileage of wagon road entitles us to some assistance from the Dominion Government in reconstructing this road, or in building other highways, in the province.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I also desire to speak in favour of this resolution. I am glad the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Green) has called the attention of the member from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) to the fact that there is such a thing as the Great West and also that all the members from the West are not opposed to this resolution. As a matter of fact all the representatives from British Columbia will state without hesitation that they are in favour of some assistance being given towards good roads. It seems to me that this is a national question. Good roads are national assets; they are works of national utility, and they are certainly national attractions. I think every asistance should be given towards the construction of railways in the Prairie Provinces where they are required, but at the same time if the present resolution is killed and the legislation founded upon it is not passed, I do not believe any railways will be constructed in those provinces that otherwise would not have been built.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The construction of highways and the question of granting aid from the federal exchequer for that purpose has been a live issue in Parliament for a considerable number of years. Of late, the war has monopolized the attention of the people of Canada to such an extent that little with respect to good roads has been heard. I do not regard the system of highways, for the construction of which an agitation has existed for some years past, as provincial in its character.

I believe we have reached a condition in this country when the stage of development upon which we have entered necessitates a national system of highways. There is no question but that the automobile has revolutionized our system of transportation, and the fact that the Federal Government proposes to assist the provincial governments to a very substantial degree in carrying out this work indicates that the highways of this country can no longer be considered as solely, or chiefly, a means of transportation for the people in the rural districts, but that it is of equal importance to those who live in cities and towns. I believe that such a policy as this is of very great importance in order to link up the different provinces, because by improved means of transportation we will be enabled to see more of our country than we would under other conditions. I believe it is a great handicap to Canada that so few of the people living in certain sections have not had the privilege of visiting other sections from which they are separated by a great distance. I think if we knew each other better there would be less provincialism, we would develop a more truly national spirit. Then we would not hear so much about the conflicting interests of the East and the West, but we would consider that we were developing this country for the people of Canada. I am satisfied that nothing will conduce more to bringing about that desirable condition of affairs than the building of a system of highways such as is contemplated by these resolutions. I do not intend to go into the details of the scheme at all. It is not intended to force the matter upon any province, but to assist those provinces which care to avail themselves of the scheme. While in some of the newer provinces it may be thought that owing to the great extent of sparsely settled territory at the present time they might not reap the same advantages that they would if thickly settled, I would advise them not to lose sight of the fact that the means of communication at the present time in those unsettled districts is largely the railways. We all know that there is no hesitancy on the part of the older provinces to assist in every possible manner to open up and develop the newer provinces by the building of railways, and after those railways will come the building of highways.

As I stated, the automobile has so revolutionized the means of communication that we are not in a position at present to know what are the possibilities for the future. What we considered a few years ago to be permanent highways can no longer be so considered, and a different system of road building must be adopted to meet climatic and traffic conditions. Even in Great Britain and in the United States some of what were considered to be the best permanent highways have not proved equal to the strain put upon them by heavy tractors, and regulations will have to be adopted in that respect. During the war the railways were taxed to the utmost in transporting munitions of war and other materials, and many of the automobile firms,—for instance, in the United States in the vicinity of Detroit,—found that their only means of delivering their goods was under their own power. And they sent their motor lorries to the seaboard through Ontario and the Eastern states, with the result that the roads were practically destroyed—macadam roads which were formerly considered to be suitable roads for these countries. I believe that only cement roads will be found satisfactory under modern traffic conditions. I do not believe that macadam roads are suitable for automobile traffic; it seems to me to be throwing money away to build such roads; and I am glad to see that the Government are reserving to themselves the right to approve the system of roads to be built.

I do not think it would be advisable to rush into this undertaking on a very extensive scale under present conditions. I do not agree with those who say that it is necessary to enter upon road building with a view to providing labour for the returned soldier. I believe there is abundance of labour not only for the returned soldier but for every man who is willing to work. This country was never so much in need of labour as it is at the present time; but I regret to say that there is a disposition on the part of many people to shirk work as much as they possibly can. The passing of these resolutions is not going to plunge this country into an enormous expenditure during this year or next year, but some latitude will be afforded the Government to enter upon the initial stages of what I believe to be a matter of great national importance.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: If the arguments used in favour of this resolution were carried to their logical conclusion, there are no local or provincial works which ought not to be undertaken by this Government. My friend who has just taken his seat (Mr.

Sutherland) says that at this period of our history good roads have become a national undertaking. The same argument is used in favour of technical education. As a matter of fact, everything which tends to the progress of any province is to the national advantage. But there is the British North America Act, which determines the works which should be undertaken by this Government, and the works which are under provincial jurisdiction, and if there is a work which has been left entirely to the control of the provinces it is the highways. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) says that the system of taxation which has been granted to the provinces does not permit of a sufficient amount of money for the provinces to carry on their works, and that that is the reason why a special subsidy is given by the Federal Government. Well, Mr. Chairman, I submit that if the subsidy is not sufficient it ought to be increased in order that the provinces should be left with that control which has been given to them by our constitution. Let us increase the subsidy if we can afford to do so—because the question of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has not been answered: Where will you get the money from? But it would be preferable to give an additional grant of money to the provinces and leave them in full control of those provincial works which have been given to them by the British North America Act.

There is another question. Some of the provinces have adopted the policy of building good roads, and they have made sacrifices for that purpose. In the province from which I come we are proud of the roads which have been built during the last few years. The municipalities have borrowed large amounts of money from the provincial Government, and they are paying annually large sums for interest and to provide sinking fund to pay back the principal within forty years. The farmers in most instances have earned the money themselves, the arrangement has worked very well, and at the present time the main platform of the Gouin Government,— which has been returned to power to-night with what seems to be a big majority—is the continuation of that policy of good roads, absolutely independent of any money which this Government might give to the province.

Well, is it fair that people who have already paid money for the improvement of their own roads should be called upon to contribute to the taxation which will be necessary in order to raise money for the building of roads in other provinces? I ask this question in all sincerity. This Government, according to the resolution, is to have control over the quality and the standard of the roads which are to be built. Suppose that quality or standard does not coincide with the quality or standard which has been adopted by the province of Quebec and that that province refuses to change its plans, would it be fair that the people of the province of Quebec should be required to contribute money for the construction of works in other provinces which ought to be carried out by the people of those provinces? Why not leave to the provinces those rights, powers and responsibilities which have been given to them or imposed upon them by the British North America Act? Again I say that if the Government has money available for the purpose of assisting the provinces to carry on their own local works, let them give the money to the provinces by way of increased subsidies. I protest against the interference of the Government in local works; if they interfere with matters of education or of highways, they may do so in connection with other matters which are purely local and provincial.

Mr. McISAAC: It is quite plain that this is not an undertaking on the part of the Federal Government to build roads in the provinces; it is a contribution from the Federal Treasury to assist the Provincial Governments in the building and improvement of highways. Whatever amount may be spent, the treasury of each province will be obliged to furnish sixty per cent and the Federal Government will aid them to the extent of providing the remaining forty per cent of the cost. It has been hinted that the intention is to build a great trunk highway across the continent for automobile traffic, and so on. Well, if that were true—but it is not—certainly my province could not participate, because there would be a missing link in the highway owing to the fact that there is quite a stretch of water between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada. So that, so far as my province is concerned, such a proposal would have no advantageous effect.

An hon. MEMBER: How about a tunnel?

Mr. McISAAC: Well, a tunnel is not a highway.

Mr. BUREAU: You have a ferry.

Mr. McISAAC: We have a ferry, but even with the ferry we could not have a continuous highway from ocean to ocean.

An hon. MEMBER: You could use aeroplanes.

Mr. McISAAC: Well, that would not be a highway either; that would be flying in the air. The Government of the province from which I come are satisfied to enter into an arrangement with the Federal Government under which, as is provided in this proposition, they shall receive forty per cent of this money to spend upon their highways and upon the improvement of their roads. They wish to improve the trunk roads leading to important centres; they desire to build or improve roads reaching the villages and towns, so that the farmers may have the advantage of good roads over which to haul their products. Certainly this is a proper and laudable arrangement in the matter of road-making. I am quite prepared to support this resolution in order that the province from which I come may have the benefit of obtaining, from the Federal Government, that percentage of the expenditure upon roads which the Federal Government are prepared to grant.

Mr. CAHILL: What kind of agreement does the minister expect to make with the provinces? I want to know, for instance, whether a township in my constituency, provided they can get a grant from the Provincial Government for the construction or improvements of roads, say, in the back sections of the country, can participate in this grant.

Mr. J. D. REID: I cannot tell the hon. member whether any particular township would benefit from this legislation; it will be up to the provinces to suggest what kind of roads they want and where they wish to lay them out. The suggestion referred to by the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. McIsaac) that it is the intention to build a highway from ocean to ocean is, of course, out of the question; there never was any such intention on the part of the Dominion Government. If this Bill passes, representatives from the provinces will be called together and asked to produce plans showing what roads they intend to construct, and an agreement will be entered into under which the Dominion Government will pay forty per cent of the amount expended. It might not be advisable that a straight road be built through a province at a cost of $10,000 a mile; the province might want to build cheaper roads with a view to getting greater benefit from the expenditure. But if Ontario decided to build roads costing $10,000 a mile, it would be for the province and the Dominion Government to agree on the location, and we would pay forty per cent of the cost. As to the province of Quebec, I do not think there will be any difficulty in agreeing with the Provincial Government as to where this money should be expended. The Provincial Governments are to expend the money, but we want inspectors to see that the roads are built in accordance with the specifications set out in the agreement between the Minister of Railways and the Government of the province.

The object of this Bill is to provide good roads and to give better transportation facilities. In my opinion good roads will benefit the rural population more than any other class of the community. It will benefit the city dwellers, of course, by bringing the rural population into closer contact with them. Any one who has travelled throughout the United States and seen their good roads must have realized what a great benefit they were to the people of that country. The Government at Washington stands in the same position to the state legislature as we do to the provincial governments in regard to highways, but nevertheless, the federal government at Washington is aiding very largely in the construction and improvement of highways throughout the country, for the reason, first, that the construction of roads throughout the country involves such a tremendous cost, and second as they are considered to be for the general advantage of the country, it is felt that the central government should assist. That is the way I look at this matter; I believe it will be of great advantage to the Dominion as a whole to have these roads constructed at the earliest possible date.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the objection to this Government simply handing this money over to the provinces on the understanding that they get their per capita share in proportion to what they spend?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is exactly what we are doing. All we ask is that the work shall be carried out in accordance with the agreement that we make. Money is being granted to the provinces for other purposes, and an agreement is made in every case. Surely there should be no objection to our seeing that the money is properly expended. We are not asking to have anything to do with the construction of the road, or the making of contracts or anything of that kind; that is all left to the local government.

Mr. PROULX: When speaking on the Budget I urged the Government to go on with this project which I strongly approve. I believe that nothing is more likely to induce people to go back to the land and to stay on the land than good roads. Some hon. members object to this legislation on constitutional grounds. I might say to my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) that some of these roads are becoming interprovincial in character, and I do not see why this Government cannot assist in its construction of highways on the ground that it is for the general advantage of Canada just as much as it has assisted in the past, by way of subsidy, in the building of railroads in the provinces on the same grounds. In sections of the country traffic which was formerly carried by the railways is now carried over the highways by motor trucks, especially in districts close to market centres. So the construction of highways, as my hon. friend from Peterborough has said, will be of benefit not only to the farmers but to city dwellers as well, because they will be brought into closer contact with the producers. In this way good roads may be a factor in reducing the cost of living, and of getting the products of the farm to the consumer in a more satisfactory way. A few years ago this Government voted money and provided for its distribution to the provinces to aid in promoting agriculture. Now good roads are connected with agriculture, and I see no more objection to giving money to the provinces to help in the building of roads than to help in the promoting of agriculture. Only to-night we passed a Bill respecting technical education. We may say that technical education is a provincial matter, but nevertheless this Government intends to spend large sums of money to encourage technical education throughout the country. So I can see no objection on constitutional grounds to the voting of this money providing this Government is reasonable with the provinces, and does not impose conditions which they would not care to accept. The Government can very well trust the provinces. I would impose as one condition that the provinces must spend some money. That, I see, has been provided for; the provinces have to spend at least 60 per cent to get the other 40 per cent. I do not think that this money should be spent only on main trunk roads. The province of Ontario, for instance, is building a road from the eastern limit of the province to the western, to be called a provincial road. It will have two branches, one from Ottawa to Prescott, and the other from Niagara to Toronto or Hamilton. Another road which I think should be subsidized is the road from Ottawa to Montreal, which is an interprovincial road. I think that all roads connecting important towns should come under this grant, and then the money would be more conveniently distributed and a larger proportion of the population would benefit. However, we shall have an opportunity to discuss the details when the Bill is in Committee, so I will now only say that I approve of the principle of spending this $20,000,000 on highways within five years. I should like to ask the minister if he intends to distribute this $20,000,000 at the rate of $4,000,000 a year or more?

Mr. J. D. REID: The money will be distributed as fast as the provinces construct the roads.

Mr. ARGUE: Will the provinces have the privilege of locating these roads where they choose?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is a matter for agreement. The provinces will prepare their plans for the roads, and I do not anticipate any difficulty between the provinces and the Dominion over the location. What the Dominion Government is concerned about is seeing that the money is expended in accordance with the agreement made. All that we ask is that the contract be carried out and the road built, whether it is to cost $2,000 or $5,000 or $10,000, in accordance with the specifications. There might be a disagreement in the matter of the location of roads but as the provinces will have a better idea as to the best course to adopt in this respect, no doubt in nine cases out of ten their suggestions will be acted upon.

Mr. ARGUE: Will the provinces have the privilege of using this money in districts other than those along the main highway? Or is the money provided for the main highway only?

Mr. J. D. REID: An agreement must be entered into between the provincial government and the Dominion Government. I take it that the hon. member's question is: Will the Dominion Government dictate as to where the roads shall be? No; neither will the provincial government dictate.

There must be a mutual agreement or no money will be spent.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I sincerely trust that the minister will be able to carry his Bill through. To me it seems absolutely absurd that in this age it should be at all necessary for men to advocate the cause of good roads in Canada. We know that practically speaking we have no good roads. In Ontario we have very few first-class roads, and it seems to me that arguments in support of the building of good roads are altogether superfluous. The Ontario Government during the last seven or eight years has spent between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 on highways, and during the last session of the legislature a grant of some $5,000,000 went through. I was almost going to say that to-day they have no roads into the fringe of the northern country, and unless they get some assistance from the Dominion Government it will be a long time before that northern country will be opened up. The people in the southern parts of Ontario adjacent to the United States realize yearly the drawback from which we suffer in comparison with the States of the Union, in the matter of roads. Good roads bring tourists to the country, and money is left in the train of all tourists. By cultivating a tourists traffic you cultivate one of the greatest sources of a revenue a country can possibly have. I appreciate the objections that are made from the East and the West, but I think that those objections ought to be surmounted. We should be able to reconcile ourselves to the novelty of getting money for nothing, and especially for a purpose of this kind. I see no reason why objections cannot be overcome. In Ontario we need the money badly, expecially in the northern part of the province. If we cannot get more assistance than the provincial government can afford, it will be many years before the northern part of the province will be in such a state as to offer inducements to people to settle and remain there. Good roads, efficient mail service, and rural telephones are three of the great essentials to keep people on the farms.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Will the hon. member favour the Dominion Government spending money for rural telephones?

The CHAIRMAN: That question is out of order.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am not discussing that principle. I am dealing with the expenditure of money on roads, which I say are a great asset to the country, and I hope the Bill will go through. I think it was a mistake, when a similar Bill was introduced into the House years ago, that it did not go through. If it had passed we would have been in a better financial position to-day.

Mr. BUREAU: What is meant by "main highways?" The question was asked by an hon. gentleman on the other side whether the money will be used on the main highway, and the minister said, no. The minister was then asked about some apprehended danger that the location of the road would be dictated by the Federal Government and he said it would not, nor would the local government dictate where the road should be constructed; he said it would be a matter of agreement. This is at once a matter for consolation and fear. If no one is going to determine where the road is to be there will be nothing to quarrel about, but we may be left without a road at all. What does the minister mean by "main highway?"

Mr. J. D. REID: The local governments, most of which have highways departments, have divided roads into three classes. One class comprises roads that run to market towns. These are kept up by the municipalities and carry a little more than the traffic created by the farmers along the road. The second class of roads radiate from local markets or shipping points and carry a considerable accumulation of traffic, such roads as those leading into Ottawa or Montreal, for instance. Then there are the main highways between important cities and towns and other terminal points. A road between Montreal and Toronto would be a main highway. In some of the new provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, for instance, a city or town might not want to see all the money spent in building one main road through the centre of the province. In Saskatchewan there are large market centres where there must be market roads, and they would likely want to divide up their money on these several roads, while Ontario might want to run a main road from Montreal to Toronto. But the Dominion and Provincial Governments will have to agree as to where it would be best to lay out roads. After it is decided where the roads will be built the Dominion Government will authorize the provinces to expend the money, we reserving the right to have our inspectors see the work carried out in accordance with the specifications and the contract awarded, for which of course public tenders will be called.

Mr. MORPHY: Assuming that there has been correspondence with the Provincial Governments, what stand do they take in regard to receiving the money, and what governments can the minister speak of with certainty?

Mr. J. D. REID: The representatives of several governments have been here consulting with me and some of them took this position: We want to divide this money up among the principal roads leading into these different centres, but we do not want to expend our money in running these roads right through.

Mr. MORPHY: What governments?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have had representatives from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, and Ontario, and some of the western provinces—I think, Manitoba, British Columbia and Alberta.

Mr. MORPHY: Are they favourable to the scheme?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, every one of them is urging it forward and looking for these highways.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the Dominion Government insisting on one, if not two, roads being built across the province of British Columbia and in the Lake Superior district?

Mr. J. D. REID: The provincial government are building roads in new Ontario from Port Arthur east. A lot of this money would go into that if they wished to expend it in that way. The roads that they are constructing in new Ontario are doing a great deal of good, and the Ontario government want to spend all the money they can in opening up new Ontario and extending roads on up through that territory towards Port Arthur. It is a new country and it is very costly to build roads up there.

Mr. NICKLE: I do not know that I can add anything to this discussion but I would not want the vote to be taken without expressing the view of the district from which I come which is that there is virtue in this legislation. Practically the roads that exist in the county of Frontenac, the city of Kingston and the adjacent counties, were built for vehicular traffic and are not sufficiently well built to stand the stress and strain of the highpowered car, and certainly are not useful for early spring or late autumn traffic. A year or two ago it was my privilege to go around lake Ontario by motor and I could not help noticing the very advantageous condition that existed in New York state. From the time you leave Ontario at Prescott or Brockville until you again get into Ontario at Niagara Falls the roads in the main are as smooth as a table, and in whichever direction traffic is moving you are impressed by the tremendous loads that are taken to market by motor as compared with the small loads that are hauled in our part of the country. Not only that, but the whole of the New York state is alive with tourist traffic, to a certain extent, going from the province of Ontario and the country that lies north of the American border. But the moment you get into Ontario the bad roads are a deterrent, and as you go along there is one cause of complaint to the American tourists and that is that the roads are not suitable for tourist traffic. Every one tells you the same story: "This is the last time I am coming to Ontario until you give us better roads." They admit our scenery is good, they admit there is much that we have to offer to bring them into Canada, but they are indisposed to risk their cars in going over our roads which are unsuitable for them. There is another change that has taken place. Practically every farmer, if he does not now own a motor car is aspiring to, and to get the best use from it he wants to be able to use it in early spring and late fall. That is practically impossible if something further cannot be done to improve our roads. I know that Ontario has spent the province's money and that municipalities have contributed largely, but there is not sufficient money, unless outside aid is given, to link up the improved roads that have been built. I hope this House will see its way to give support to this appropriation so that we may have continued progress in this direction.

Mr MAHARG: The hon. member says "unless outside aid is given." Where do you expect the money to come from unless you borrow it, for which the people of Ontario will have to pay?

Mr. J. D. REID: I expect we will get the money where we got the money for building the railways in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. M. CLARK: Building railways is a Dominion work, whereas, according to what we hear from lawyers, this is a provincial work.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not understand that railways are wholly a Dominion concern. There are railways being built by the provinces themselves and by corporations that are incorporated by the provincial legislatures. Therefore, the building of railways is not entirely under Dominion jurisdiction. We are giving aid to the provinces in connection with other matters which are entirely under their jurisdiction. In the matter of education we are giving them aid, and we are also keeping partial control. We are asking that we be allowed to supervise the expenditures in order to see that the money is spent in accordance with the money voted by Parliament. That is all that we are doing in this case.

Mr. MAHARG: The minister says that we are building railways. If I am informed rightly the provinces which are building these railways own their own natural resources.

Mr. DAVIDSON: How much money does the minister propose spending this year?

Mr. J. D. REID: That would depend entirely on what the provinces would be willing to spend. If the provinces say they are willing to proceed with highways and to press them forward, of course, we would have to pay 40 per cent of what they would expend. If they do not wish to proceed with the construction, we would not have to pay any of the money.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Has the minister an actual understanding with any one of the provinces that they are willing to embark upon an expenditure on the basis of the Dominion contributing 40 per cent and the province 60 per cent, particularly with the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Provincial Government of Nova Scotia are anxious that we proceed with this Bill, and the information they give me is that they are willing to put up the 60 per cent and to accept the 40 per cent given by the Dominion of Canada and proceed with the construction of highways.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister is going to bring in a Bill on this resolution, I understand?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: The resolution states that $80,000 is to be apportioned to each of the provinces. That will be $720,000 per annum. That will be $3,600,000 in the course of five years, and in addition $400,000 is to be distributed among the provinces according to population. This amount of $80,000, if I understand rightly, will have to be expended within five years to give the provinces the right to the benefit of it. If one province fails to disburse the required amount, or to construct roads to the extent of 60 per cent of the amount of the $80,000, what will be done with the remainder of the money? Supposing the province of Quebec does not construct $400,000 worth of roads in order to make up the 60 per cent, what will happen? It would have to construct $600,000 worth of roads in order to get $400,000.

What will be done with the excess if say only $200,000 out of $300,000 of the Federal Government's money is expended, and how will that balance be apportioned? If I understand the facts rightly, the accounts will be closed at the end of five years and in the case of any province which has not complied with the requirements its share of the federal grant will remain unexpended. Now, will this balance be apportioned among the other provinces or will it go back to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Mr. J. D. REID: The honourable member is supposing something which, I think, will never occur. The representatives of the different provincial governments have been in Ottawa conferring with the Minister of Railways, and from the discussion I have had with them they are all anxious for the construction of good roads. Their desire is to improve the existing roads and construct new highways—

Mr. BUREAU: Does the minister admit that what I have said is possible?

Mr. J. D. REID: —and, therefore, in my opinion, the money will be all used: I think I can say that because I have discussed the matter with the representatives of practically all the provinces. Of course, if any province does not accept the grant it would still remain in the Consolidated Revenue Fund, but that is a point in the Bill which has not been provided for. When the Bill comes up for second reading I will consider the suggestion which my honourable friend has made. I would much prefer that the provinces go ahead with the construction of good roads because in my opinion nothing will be more advantageous to them. The amount proposed to be voted is not very large, but I have not the slightest doubt but that every province will avail itself of the proportion to which it will be entitled under this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUREAU: Honourable gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear," to the sentiment that it is advantageous for every province to have good roads, and I do not want to be represented as being opposed to that policy. I am in favour of good roads, the people of the province from which I come already enjoy them, and have made sacrifices to secure them. Let me give the minister to understand that the twenty-mile stretch of road from Three Rivers to Shawinigan Falls, and the eight-mile stretch to Grand Mère were roads built jointly by the provincial government, the municipalities, and the manufacturers interested. We are enjoying to-day good roads that cost between $400,000 and $450,000, towards the cost of which contributions were made in the following ratio: $200,000 by the provincial government, $100,000 by the city of Three Rivers, Shawinigan Falls and Grand Mere, and $100,000 by different large industries. Hon. gentlemen opposite who think we need good roads ought to make themselves acquainted with what we are doing in the province of Quebec. The minister says he has not thought of the point which I raised and that it is not likely to occur. Nevertheless, it is possible, and if we are going to embark on the expenditure of $20,000,000 for good roads, would it not be better to allow those provinces who are enterprising and willing enough to expend their money for this purpose to enjoy the benefit of any balance which may remain unexpended by reason of the lack of progressiveness on the part of some other province? I think there should be a provision in the Bill to that effect.

Mr. CALDER: I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that the provincial governments have made arrangements for the present year and it is possible the estimates they have put through will be in such shape that they will not be able to take advantage of legislation which will not be passed and made effective until some time in July. If the money is not used this year it will doubtless be taken advantage of in the year following.

Mr. BUREAU: That is all very well, but at the end of five years some of this money may be unexpended and it should be taken advantage of by those provinces which show themselves enterprising and progressive. That is what I want to provide for.

Mr. STEVENS: We will give it to Quebec.

[M. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. gentleman has no cause to laugh at Quebec which is far ahead of British Columbia, or any other province, in the matter of good roads. I can drive my hon. friend all through the province of Quebec on as good a road as he can show me anywhere either in the neighbouring Republic or in British Columbia. If this legislation were to be based on aggressiveness and enterprise in the matter of good roads, the hon. gentleman can depend upon it we would wear the feather in our cap.

The resolution sets forth that the expenditure must be forty per cent of the amount which, "in the opinion of the minister, is actually necessary and reasonable in the cost of construction or improvement of such highway." In such a matter it is not the opinion of the minister that I, as a member of Parliament would like to have, but the figures and vouchers of the Provincial Governments. What I would suggest is that the actual cost of the road be determined by engineers and by provincial vouchers showing that the money has actually been paid out, and I will move an amendment to that effect when the Bill is introduced.

Mr. CAHILL: I hate to detain the House at this late hour but my constituents are very much interested in good roads, and have asked me to ascertain from the Government whether they can or cannot get any part of this money for the improvement of the existing roads, or the construction of new highways, and that I have been endeavouring to do. I asked the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) with respect to it, and I must say that I am somewhat at a loss to know whether my constituency was going to benefit by the expenditure of this money or not. When the resolution was before the committee on a previous occasion the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) made a definite statement that no portion of it would be spent except on main highways to leading centres. Now the Minister of Railways says it will be a matter of agreement between the Provincial Governments and the Dominion authority. The people in my constituency apparently seem to realize more than some hon. gentlemen do that they must be responsible for their share of this money, and that any constituencies that fail to receive any portion of it will be helping to build roads in other localities. The people in my constituency are building roads and want to continue to do so, but they do not feel that they are in a position to put their hands in their pockets and contribute money for the building of roads in British Columbia while they still need roads in Pontiac county. If this money were to be expended on any road to which the provincial government would give a grant so that the back townships would also profit by it, as well as the main highways, I would not be so strongly opposed to it. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) talks of automobiles and tourists, but I want to tell him that there are hundreds and thousands of farmers in this country that have not got any kind of tourist road to travel on and are struggling to build roads to their market towns. They are anxious to get money for this purpose, but they are not keen on the question of devoting money voted by this Parliament for the construction of highways in the interests of automobile tourists at the sacrifice of their own roads. I must say I am strongly opposed to so much paternalism on the part of this Government towards the provinces. First, they started with aid for agriculture—with a string attached to it; then aid for technical education—with a string attached to it; next the housebuilding programme—with a string attached to it; and now we have this road-building scheme—also with a string attached. If the provinces want this money, why not give it as a subsidy? The very same people that elect representatives to the provincial legislature also elect the representatives in this House.

I have no doubt that they elect just as honest men to the local legislatures as they do to the Federal House, and these men can be trusted to spend the money in the provinces. If the Dominion Government has a surplus of funds and feel that the provinces are entitled to some of the surplus, let it make grants to the provinces outright, the money to be used on roads or on technical education and other things. They are just as capable of looking after the expenditure as is the Dominion Government. So, Mr. Chairman, if the minister will not withdraw his Bill, I say to him: Give this money to the provinces without any strings on it, to be spent on a certain pro rata basis. Then I do not think there would be so much objection to the Bill. But I am afraid there will be great objection to it by members representing constituencies where they need roads, but will not be able to benefit by these grants, particularly in the rural districts. The city districts,—where you are going to run a road between Montreal and Toronto—might naturally favour the proposal, I do not doubt they will; in fact, I think some hon. members on both sides of the House expect the road to run through their constituencies. But when you talk of the provinces getting "found" money from the Dominion Government, it is no such thing. The people of Canada must supply this money, and the unfortunate part of it is, as my hon. friend from Red Deer would say, in the method of collecting it the Government collects two or three dollars from the tax payer for the one dollar that gets into the Treasury. Leave the roads to the provinces. We are quite satisfied in Quebec to build our own roads, and we are doing the work to-day. My hon. friend says that he cannot get on any good roads outside the province of Ontario. If he will build good roads to the borders of my province, he will get on good roads when he passes the provincial boundary. The Prairie Provinces have a fair system of dirt roads that apparently suits them very well. British Columbia may need higher priced roads, and if they do they have the material to build them. But we know that the only people interested in these grants are those who think they are getting free money in some constituency through which roads could be arranged to be built.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I do not often inflict my utterances upon this House, and a good many of the hon. gentlemen who are so vociferously shouting "carried", evidently with the intention to prevent me from speaking, are the same gentlemen to whom I have listened with a great deal of tedium on various occasions, and I expect to do so again. I think this debate has been exceedingly illuminating, but there is a good deal of mental darkness still prevailing upon the subject. I hear one member stating that he is supporting this resolution because he is in favour of a transcontinental highway. Thereupon the minister says that it is not the purpose of the Government to build a transcontinental highway, that the kind of roads to be built are interurban and country roads. Then another gentleman says that he favours the proposition because he wants the same kind of roads that exist in the United States. Everybody knows that the roads of the United States are built by the state legislatures and are permanent roads. I would like to ask the minister if that is the kind of road he proposes to have built with the money which is provided for by this Bill?

Mr. J. D. REID: In each case we would have to take the matter up with the Provincial Government and find out exactly what their proposition is. Some of the provinces might prefer spending the money on macadamized roads and distributing it over a longer distance, while other provinces, for instance, the province of Ontario, as I stated, might want to build permanent roads similar to those in New York state, which would cost probably from $8,000 to $10,000 a mile. Or they might say they would expend part of the money that way and part in macadamized roads, and we might agree to that. Probably in the Prairie Provinces they would not want to spend the money, I would take it for granted, on a road right through each province at probably from $8,000 to $10,000 a mile, they would want a different kind of road entirely from that desired by the Ontario Government. So it would all depend on the proposition put up by the Provincial Governments as to whether it would be a macadamized or a concrete road or some other kind of road. In the West, there must be many roads required, and they could not possibly be expected to spend the money on very expensive roads; whereas in Ontario we would probably build roads of a more permanent character than those in the West.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am very much indebted to the hon. minister for his courtesy in answering my question, but with all deference to him I am inclined to the opinion that he is quite as much in the dark about this matter as the other members of the House; and with all deference again, it seems to me before we embark on so vast a scheme we ought not to have such misty ideas, but we ought to have a clear-cut, definite policy. However, I am going to ask for some information in another direction. I would like to know if the minister has any information as to the systems of roadbuilding employed by the different provincial governments who would have the expending of the money provided for by this Bill?

Mr. J. D. REID: Several of the provinces have commissions for the construction of roads, and they engage the very best men they can get—men who are experts on the subject of road building. The work is carried on in that way in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec. I do not know whether they have such a commission in the province of Nova Scotia in which the constituency of the hon. member (Mr. Davidson) is situated. I believe this is going to be a very important matter for the rural population, and they are insisting on good roads. In the province of Ontario about 109,000 automobile licenses were issued last year, and over half of those were issued to the rural districts. In the province of Saskatchewan there were practically 40,000 licenses taken out, the next largest number, and they would be almost entirely rural I should say. I merely mention that to show the growth of motor traffic with the farmers. There is not a large city to-day but its market is crowded with motors from the country, and they come from very long distances.

A few years ago the farmers of my own constituency had to ship everything by rail; since motor cars have come into common use, they marketed their goods in Ottawa, and even in Montreal. Moreover the farmers can go to the large centres during nine months of the year instead of during only five or six. Good roads are a benefit to the rural population in that the services of physicians are made more available to the people; where the roads are bad, perhaps impassable, even where telephones are available a doctor may find it impossible to answer a call, or at least to answer it promptly.

Mr. M. CLARK: Should any intelligent elector take the trouble, which I very much doubt, to pursue the windings of this debate I am perfectly certain that he will find himself in a state of mind akin to that which the member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) has described as his. If we are to vote on this thing I think we should vote intelligently. Now, what are the propositions of a concrete nature that have been put before us in support of this resolution? The minister mentioned the providing of work for returned soldiers, and in the next breath he expressed very great doubt whether any soldiers would want the work. Well, that does not seem to be a very sound basis upon which to build a case for the expenditure of $20,000,000. I want to point out to the minister and to the Government that the further they go along the line of spending money upon what is non-productive work, the further they will produce people who want that non-productive work, and the more people they take out of the work of production the more they will put the cost of living up in this country. That is one of the objects which has been mentioned by the minister himself. The member for West Kootenay (Mr. Green) talked of building a transcontinental highway. I cannot think that he was serious. What would $20,000,000 do towards the building of such a highway if it were all expended upon that one proposition? It would scarcely touch the scheme. So we may dismiss that; I assume that not a cent of this would go towards the building of a transcontinental highway, even if the money were voted now.

Then, the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) with truly democratic instinct, puts up the case of the American tourist as a reason why the highly-taxed people of this country should be enthusiastic over this road scheme. Well, I should like to see the road leading into his constituency from the United States come as rapidly as possible to the excellence of the State roads—though eight millions of people with a larger territory to build roads upon can hardly be expected to equal the work of 110,000,000 upon a smaller territory, especially in view of the fact that we are strained by the expenditures of a war in which we entered three years before the United States did. But the point I want to put to this Committee is, if we are going to spend this money upon the building of roads connecting the United States with Canada, then we cannot spend it on a national highway.

Then, my hon. friend (Mr. Sexsmith) says that the scheme is really to help the farmers to get their stuff to market around the little local towns and so reduce the cost of living. What a very confiding Committee we shall be if we vote for this scheme put forward along these various lines or supported by these various arguments. If the minister is really serious in his intentions to press this scheme, I hope that when he speaks again, if he intends to speak again, he will tell us what he really wants this money for. Is he in favour of a national highway, and is any of this money to go to that? We have a right to know, because one of the gentlemen sitting behind him evidently has that in his mind. Or is he in favour of the highly-taxed citizens of this country looking particularly after the needs of American tourists? If that is what is in the minister's mind; if that is what is behind this proposal, then I should like to know, and my farmers would like to know it. If it is to give work to the returned soldiers—to which, incidentally, returned soldiers will not go, according to the minister—then I should also like that reason to give to my electors. If it is to help the farmers and to reduce the cost of living, then I should be in the position of my friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill); I should, with all modesty, want to know how much of it is actually going to the constituency of Red Deer. I must say that I do not like to complain of the minister's statements, but it is no wonder they were hazy if he had in mind the various explanations which have been given by other supporters of the scheme; because it would pass the combined eloquence and clarity of Demosthenes and Cicero to combine and reconcile these schemes—and nobody will charge the minister with being in the same class as Demosthenes and Cicero.

Mr. J. D. REID: I stated that for several reasons I wanted this Bill to be passed this session. One was to provide work for returned soldiers; I believe that if this scheme is put through it will provide work during the next two or three or four years for very many of our men who have returned from the front, and for whom we might not be able to find other employment. I believe that nothing will reduce the cost of living more than the passing of this Bill and the building up of good roads throughout Canada. If you have good roads, men are encouraged to go on the farm and immigration is encouraged; and if you can get more people on the farm and thereby increase production, you certainly reduce the cost of living. I believe that the building of good roads increases the value of the rural properties through which they run; nothing will add more to the comfort of the rural population than good roads. One of the greatest benefits resulting to the rural population from the building of good roads is that of their being able to get a physician at any time; this would not be possible now in the spring and fall in cases where the roads were very bad. As to the question of tourists, I do not suggest that this money be spent entirely upon the building of roads for the accommodation of tourist traffic, but I do say that if, in addition to the advantages that I have mentioned, we can, by encouraging good roads, increase the tourist traffic throughout our country, we are doing something which is of very great value. I have here a statement which will indicate the value of tourist traffic in other countries which have good roads.

The amount annually expended by tourists is estimated as follows: France, $500,000,000; Switzerland, $150,000,000; Italy, $100,000,000; Maine, $40,000,000; Americans in England, $25,000,000; Americans abroad, $350,000,000. Hon. members need only go to any of our summer resorts in Ontario, or any other province, and see the Americans there, to form some idea of the amount of money that is expended by American tourists in our country. They will then come to the conclusion that the tourist traffic is certainly of some advantage, and I believe of very great advantage to Canada, and nothing but good roads will bring tourists in large numbers.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Governor of Maine stated last year that the revenue from the tourist trade for that state was five times greater than its lumber revenue had ever been.

Mr. DAVIDSON: What steps have the Government already taken in the direction of good roads? I believe that some expenditure is now being made by the Dominion Government, looking towards the improvement of highways.

Mr. J. D. REID: The only thing we have done is this: We have appointed Mr. Campbell, who has had a great deal of experience in the construction of highways, as commissioner. He has a small staff, and is trying to get an organization together to look after the matter of specifications. He is also studying the localities in which he thinks the roads should be constructed. A small vote of $25,000 was passed by the House this session, and it is out of this vote that this work is being done. I cannot expend anything under this Bill until it becomes law.

Mr. DAVIDSON: In what department does Mr. Campbell work?

Mr. J. D. REID: He is in the Department of Railways and Canals. We have expended only a portion of the $25,000 vote.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is it not true that the Mines Department is working along this line?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, the only expenditure they are making is in connection with the inspection of mining areas in the different provinces.

Mr. J. F. REID: I have listened very patiently to this discussion on the national highway project, but as yet I am unable to understand whether it is to be a national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific or a system of local roads throughout the provinces. If the minister would take us into his confidence, and tell us that it was to be a national highway I would be opposed to it, I cannot see how such a road is going to reduce the cost of living. I am of the opinion that if you want to reduce the cost of living it would be much better to spend this amount of money in railway branch lines, especially in the West, where we have thousands of farmers living forty and fifty and sixty miles beyond the national railway system, raising wheat and paying forty-five and fifty cents per bushel for hauling it to the railway. The minister must know that this condition cannot exist when prices come down to normal, and if those farmers living up there stop producing wheat when the price drops, naturally the amount of wheat produced will be diminished. I think it would be much better to drop this project of a national highway for the meantime, and construct branch lines of railway to the settlers who are now living fifty and sixty and seventy miles beyond the railway. Our returned soldiers are going in there to-day by the thousands, as far as eighty miles back from the railway. Are we not going to help them to get their products to market? It matters not to us, I think, whether our friends, the Yanks to the South, have good roads or not. They have 110,000,000 people to build their roads. Can Canada with only 8,000,000 people be expected to have roads equally as good as those on the other side? I think not. Not only does the production of wheat make more wheat products, but there are also the by-products to consider, which are used in the feeding of hogs and cattle, and all this helps to reduce the cost of living. I would ask the minister to consider this matter seriously and withdraw the Bill for the present, until he can lay down a definite policy and tell us just exactly what this scheme is to be. I am sorry, but if this comes to a vote I shall be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am desirous of speaking at some length on this resolution, and inasmuch as it is now rather late and we have done a full day's work, I would ask the minister if he would consent to have the committee rise and report progress. Other hon. members whose opinions I am sure would be valued by this committee are also desirous of participating in this debate, and they would be able to be in their places to-morrow and contribute to the discussion.

Mr. J. D. REID: I asked the committee to pass this resolution to-night so that I could get the Bill printed. My hon. friend will have an opportunity of speaking on the second reading of the Bill and again at the committee stage, when he will have the Bill before him. I should like the resolution to go through to-night if the committee are agreeable.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think that this discussion, while, perhaps, not as definite as it might have been, and while many different opinions have been expressed as to just what the resolution means, has on the whole been enlightening, and might with profit be continued. The very fact that there seems to be such a difference of opinion would lead me to believe that. I should like very much to discuss this resolution at this stage, but at this hour of the night I do not wish to inflict a long speech on the House.

Mr. COPP: It is cooler now than it will be to-morrow.

Mr. EDWARDS: The suggestion made by the hon. member (Mr. Copp) that it is cooler now is apt. We are just in the proper mood now for legislating on this matter. We are in a receptive frame of mind and are ready for the speech which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davidson) wishes to give us. We are accustomed to late hours and this is an opportune time for the hon. member for Annapolis to follow up the questions he has been hurling at us by the speech which he is anxious to deliver and which I am sure will be quite illuminating. The questions which the hon. member has asked are extremely interesting and give evidence of his possession of quite a fund of information which the Committee is now prepared to receive. I would strongly oppose the suggestion that the Committee should rise and report progress because this is an eminently favourable opportunity for us to get the information which we need in order to help us make progress. Will the hon. member for Annapolis now get up and favour us with some information from that vast fund of knowledge which he possesses, coming as he does from the Maritime Provinces? They do not need good roads there, but nevertheless he has a remarkable interest in the whole subject and is evidently desirous of doing the right thing. I for one am prepared to sit here at least another hour and listen to the information which I know he has bottled up in his brain and is extremely anxious to give to the Committee.

Mr. CALDER: Notwithstanding the pressing invitation of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) I am inclined to agree to the suggestion that the Committee report progress, in view of the lateness of the hour. If the hon. member for Annapolis desires further discussion of the subject he will have ample opportunity on the second reading of the Bill. On the second reading hon. members may thoroughly discuss the principles of the Bill, the details of which can be minutely considered in Committee. I think the proposal of the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) therefore, at this stage, after a long day, is a very reasonable one. It must be borne in mind that some of us must get back to work at 11 o'clock, and that we shall have to stay at it until twelve o'clock at night, repeating the same thing the day following, and the day after that. If we are to get the work of the session done we must all look upon a situation of this kind in a reasonable way, and in order to expedite the work I suggest that unless there is some grave reason to the contrary the proposal of the Minister of Railways be carried out and we be allowed to go home.

Mr. DAVIDSON: May I be allowed to say a few words? If I were in the habit of speaking as frequently as the hon. member for Frontenac I could take a chance with my audience. The hon. gentleman who has so kindly referred to the enjoyment which he anticipates from my speech frequently addresses the House. Sometimes I have been driven to the painful necessity of using strenuous efforts to keep a quorum while certain speeches are being made, and I can understand the position of one who does not frequently speak if he were to attempt to occupy very much of the time of the Committee at this hour of the night on a question of this kind. It is rather unusual for me to speak in this House and I am anxious to select a time when the hon. gentleman is not obsessed with any great desire for his downy couch and when he can give undivided attention to the affairs of State and matters of first importance. This is a very important subject. It has not to do with some little appointment to the Kingston penitentiary or any trivial matter of that kind. It has not to do with the vexed provincial question of national schools. It is of supreme importance whether we shall embark on a brand new policy in this country and I think the whole question should be seriously considered. If the minister insists, I shall of course, as I have done before, bow with all deference to his wishes and proceed to-night, in my exhausted condition, with the remarks which I intend to make. Looking upon the jaded faces opposite me, I am sure that hon. members will be in a better condition to hear me at a more seasonable time. If it is thought necessary I will speak to-night, but I would very much prefer to speak to-morrow.

Mr. EDWARDS: I thought, when the hon. member rose, that he was about to give us of the store of information which I know he has in abundance. Possibly I have spoken more frequently than the member for Annapolis and in that respect the House has less to forgive him than me. The hon. member has referred to one or two matters which have nothing to do with this Bill, and since he has wandered afield I presume I may follow him. I have heard the hon. member give some reasons why he is opposed to this Bill. It is not because he does not believe in good roads.

Mr. DAVIDSON: How does the hon. member know I am opposed to the Bill? I have not expressed an opinion on the matter.

Mr. EDWARDS: If the member has not expressed an opinion he has had an opportunity of doing so, and his whole attitude has been one of opposition. He has expressed himself outside the Chamber, and if he will be as candid in the Chamber as out of it he will say that his reason for opposing the Bill is that he objects to placing money in the hands of the people of Nova Scotia, who, he has said, will use it absolutely for political purposes. If $40 out of $100 is handed to the Government of Nova Scotia, that government, in his opinion, is composed of such a lot of black legs that it will use the money absolutely for political purposes.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. gentleman is misquoting me entirely I never made any such statement and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member did not say "blacklegs", and I withdraw the statement to that extent, but he has come as close to it as he could by inference without using that particular word. If that is his reason for opposing this Biill in the House, as it has been his expressed and only reason out of the House, why is he not candid enough to admit it? He does not, because he knows that an argument of that kind will not appeal to the committee. I repeat that he has frequently outside of the Chamber, used as an argument against the Government voting the money towards the improvement of highways, the alleged fact that if it is placed in the hands of the Government in Nova Scotia, those who are in control of provincial affairs there will use it for party purposes. The hon. member (Mr. J. F. Reid) raises the question about building railroads to farmers 50 or 60 miles away. It is all right, from his point of view, to take the money of the country to build a steel road for farmers to get produce to market, but it is absolutely illogical from his standpoint to take the money to build a highway for the same purpose.

Why is it that every member for Saskatchewan approves of spending millions of dollars to build the Hudson Bay railway? Is it for the benefit of Canada? It is for the benefit of the farmers of Saskatchewan and Northern Saskatchewan at that. It is all right from their standpoint to build thousands of miles of railway across the continent for the benefit of 500,000 farmers in Saskatchewan, but where you have a population of 2,500,000 in Ontario you must not spend a cent down here to improve roads. There is nothing consistent in these hon. gentlemen at all. They never ask the question:"Where are you going to get the money?"—when it comes to a question of building the Hudson Bay or some other railway in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, or Alberta. The people who have raised most of the money to build these railways in the West can go on raising most of the money to build railways out there and these gentlemen do not lose any sleep over where the money is to come from, but when it is a case of developing the agricultural districts of Old Canada, which has been the source of supply for building up Western Canada, they object. That is not a far-sighted way of looking at the situation. Throughout Ontario the building of highways is the greatest issue that you can bring before the people, and they have a right to come to this Government and ask them to contribute towards the building of these highways.

Mr. MAHARG: The money to build the Hudson Bay railway has been in the treasury for years and years, and it was obtained from the proceeds of the land sold in Saskatchewan.

Mr J. F. REID: The hon. member for Frontenac talks about the members from Saskatchewan taking the money out of the country to build a railway. Does the hon. member not know that Saskatchewan is inside the Dominion of Canada and that we are not taking money out of the country? He tells this Committee what Ontario has done for the West. More lands were given away in Western Canada by the Dominion Government than would have built all the railways in the West. I would like to ask the hon. member for Frontenac about the canals which have been built in Ontario by the Dominion Government—and which do not bring any revenue to the federal treasury—not for the benefit of the people of Canada, but for the benefit of the people of Ontario. There is one close to this city built absolutely for pleasure for the use of the people of Ontario, and, I presume, built by all the people of Canada. He complains about the roads of Ontario needing such an amount of money, and yet he tells us that they have the largest population of any province. They have been building roads in Ontario for sixty or seventy-five years. Why does the hon. member for Frontenac not follow the example of the province of Quebec? Let him go down there and learn how to build roads, or better still, get a man from Quebec to tell them how to build roads in Ontario, especially in the constituency of Frontenac? If the hon. gentleman will visit the West we will give him a spin in an automobile on our own mud roads, and when he gets out he will say he has been over one of the smoothest roads that he ever rode over.

Mr. DAVIDSON: If the hon. member for Frontenac had waited for the remarks that I had intended to make it would have not have been necessary for him to violate the conduct of a gentleman in attempting to disclose in a public discussion confidential matters. The fact that the hon. gentleman interfered with my argument, by rehearsing a portion of it, seems an added reason why I should be allowed to continue my remarks and perhaps speak in a more logical manner at another sitting of the committee. If the hon. gentleman had let me alone I would have been able to present very many more reasons for my opposition. But I submit that the one reason that in my judgment the Government of Nova Scotia would not expend the money that this Government propose to give them wisely, but that they would waste the money, is a cogent and tangible reason and a reason which I might have no hesitancy in expressing to this committee. Since the hon. gentleman has referred to remarks which were made to him in a confidential way, I might perhaps be allowed to refer to remarks which were made by him in a public way in reference to this very resolution. When the resolution was last before the House the hon. member for Frontenac stated clearly that he only proposed to support a resolution of this kind upon the understanding that permanent roads and nothing but permanent roads were to be built. Am I correct in stating that?

Mr. EDWARDS: No, you are not.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The error in this respect must be due to the occult way in which my honourable friend speaks or to my limited powers of interpretation.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is the latter.

Mr. DAVIDSON: No doubt it is. I hope my honourable friend will regard this as a public question and permit me to enjoy the same liberty of opinion I have always conceded him, although I happen to disagree with him upon this question, and not cherish any little feeling against an old friend simply because he differs with him on a public question. Do I understand the minister refuses to allow the committee to rise?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is only a resolution that we are discussing, and I would like the committee to agree to-night to let the resolution go through so that the Bill could be introduced. Then we can discuss it when it comes up again. Of course, if this were the last opportunity, I would certainly not think of the resolution going through to-night. There is a great difference of opinion in the House and I realize that very many of the members are sincere in their opposition to the resolution. It is a very important one. If the honourable member for Annapolis will agree to the resolution going through so that the Bill can be printed, we can consider the matter again in committee and I will bring it up at an earlier time in the day so that we can have time to discuss it. The session is now nearing a close, and for that reason I am afraid that if we let the matter go over this evening and not have the Bill printed it will create much further delay. I would, therefore, appeal to hon. gentlemen to allow the resolution to pass.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I have no desire at all to occupy unduly the attention of the House. As to private members sitting up till one o'clock in the morning, it is not a very serious matter to happen occasionally, but I do feel for the ministers who have grave problems to consider, and that in a serious spirit. It has been rumoured that there are fresh disturbances in Winnipeg to-day and I am sure the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, (Mr. Calder) who comes from the West, appreciates the gravity of the situation. For my part I should be anxious to permit the ministers to retire and get some rest so that they could turn their attention early to-morrow to these matters. I do think, however, that before we can accede to the request of the Minister of Railways we should have an expression from him as to a serious purpose to print this Bill and to carry this legislation at the present session. Members are all anxious for the session to terminate within a reasonable period from the present. The printing of Bills costs money; but money does not seem to matter to a government like this. The matter of a $300,000,000 deficit does not seem to give a great deal of care to its supporters; I am afraid it will give a great deal of care to the country before we are very much older. We are continually getting fresh demands and you cannot pay a $300,000,000 deficit without money. Let me repeat, the printing of Bills costs money and I think before we undertake the printing of this Bill we should have a serious declaration either from the minister in charge or his chief henchman for this evening, the Minister of Colonization and Immigration, that there is a purpose to go on with this legislation this session and to carry the Bill through. If that be the serious purpose of the Government we from the West are not the men to use obstruction; we do not need to, we always think we advance arguments. The majority in this House must rule and if the majority want this money spent whether they know where it is going to come from or not, their view must prevail. But we should have an assertion from the minister that the Government intends to go on with this legislation and carry it through this session.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. DAVIDSON: There is another reason, which I have not yet advanced, why I think the committee should rise at this stage, if the minister will pardon me. There are some members on this side who usually support the Government, who would be very unwilling to withhold their support from the Government on any occasion, and I flatter myself I am one of them. If the resolution is put through to-night with the present light that we have, even after listening to the luminous address of the hon. member from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), we are inclined to think we have not sufficient information to vote intelligently upon so vast and so involved a scheme. I think there are other members of this House in the same position as myself in that regard. If we had time to consider this matter to think it out more definitely and study it more closely, and perhaps confer with the minister as to the details, we might be i na position where it would not be necessary to withhold our support. As it stands now, I think I am speaking for others as well as myself when I say that is the position. For that reason it would seem to me very desirable that the committee should be allowed to rise. This is the first time I have ever asked the indulgence of the Government in a matter of this kind, and it may very likely be the last. It will certainly give me a great deal of gratification if the minister could meet my wishes in this regard.

1 a.m.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question.

Mr. TRAHAN: I move that the committee rise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: I declare the motion lost.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I wish to say in reference to this matter that, like other gentlemen who have spoken on this side, I am heartily in accord with the principle of good roads. I do not think there can be any doubt on that point. Hon. gentlemen participating in this debate have indicated that they thought they had clinched the matter when, as if with a flourish of trumpets, they have said: "I stand for good roads." Everybody is in favour of good roads, just as everybody is in favour of liberty; but merely making the assertion that we are in favour of good roads does not necessarily prove that on this occasion we are doing right in supporting the proposal of the Government. There are a great many provincial matters which are good, a great many provincial matters which are important. Everybody will admit that the public school is a fine institution in this country, everybody will admit that the hospital is a good thing, everybody will admit that the rural telephone is a good thing, but because they are good things it does not necessarily follow that this Government should engage in the furtherance of them by the expenditure of federal moneys. Now as hon. gentlemen opposite have said, the functions of the Federal Parliament and the functions of the provincial parliaments are very clearly defined by the British North America Act under which we work. Under that Act certain duties are assigned to the Federal Parliament, and certain other, and quite distinct, duties are assigned to the provinces. I say at this juncture we might well ask ourselves if we have so abundantly and efficiently discharged the obligations and the duties impressed upon us under the constitution as to say that we have an entirely free hand to perform the duties of some other body? No federal government entrusted with office in Canada was ever confronted with such serious obligations, such vast expenditures for purely federal purposes as is the Government that is at the present time in power. As a matter of fact the various provincial governments in Canada to-day are not particularly burdened with responsibilities and expenditures. The war has put no very great additional burdens upon those governments. They have gone along pretty much in the same old fashion, pursuing the even tenor of their way, but by reason of this war we have had tremendous burdens imposed upon us as federal representatives, and tremendous obligations have in consequence been assumed by the Federal Government. Therefore I say it seems to me that it is a most extraordinary thing for us at this particular juncture, when purely federal duties are pressing so hard upon us, to fly to other duties which do not properly belong to us. The provinces, as has been well said by other speakers, are abundantly able to discharge their own duties. The great province of Quebec has embarked on an ambitious scheme of roadbuilding, and its representatives in this Chamber are not coming to the Dominion Government with supplicating hands, asking us for aid; they say that their province is able to discharge the duties which properly belong to it under the provisions of the British North America Act. It is true that various members representing constituencies in the province of Ontario have made very pressing appeals for generosity, for harmony, and for a display of public spirit on the part of this Government in order that the provincial government may be assisted.

I commend them for looking after the interests of their provincial Government, but I have to remind them that while the Federal Government is incurring an enormous indebtedness, the provincial Government of Ontario has lots of money—I believe last year it had a surplus of about $2,000,000. Yet members representing Ontario constituencies come to us and say, "We cannot discharge the burdens which are placed upon us by our constitution, and we must ask you, the overburdened Federal Government, to come along and help discharge our purely local and provincial expenditures." That is not reasonable.

I think that in the press of his very many important public duties—and I suppose no member of the present Government is harder worked than the present Minister of Railways and Canals,—the hon. minister has not had time to study the road question as exhaustively as we might expect a minister in charge of so important a measure to have done. If he had, I think he would have been able to answer me a little more fully when I questioned him as to what the Federal Government was already doing in reference to this question. I wish to tell the hon. minister that one of the Departments of this Government is to-day engaged in a very important work in connection with road building—I refer to the Mines Department. That department has a staff of officials who to-day are at work on this very important question, and they are working along systematic and scientific lines. That department is presided over by an expert in road building, and he has several assistant engineers. During the summer months he sends those engineers out to various parts of the Dominion to study road making conditions; specimens of soil and of road materials are sent to him, and experiments in all kinds of road making are undertaken, with, I believe, very useful results.

The other day I had the pleasure of discussing with one of these officials his own work and that of his department, and I was impressed with the tremendous seriousness of this question. As a matter of fact he informed me that as far as he could discover there was very little knowledge of road building in this Dominion, and that the several provinces were not yet equipped with sufficient engineering and experimental knowledge to warrant large expenditures. That officer's idea was that the work of the Federal Government in connection with roads should be a work adapted to the general good of Canada. To-day it is not the business of the Federal Government to engage in the industry of agriculture under the terms of our British North America Act; but it is a very proper work for the Federal Government to establish experimental farms in various parts of the country. In those farms scientific experiments are carried on, the results of which are beneficial to all parts of the Dominion, and in that way agriculture is helped. I want the same thing to be followed out in reference to roads. I think that the Federal Government might very properly engage in experimental road making. I am speaking in agreement with the views given me by the officer to whom I have just referred, when I say, that that department could use a much greater amount of money than it now has at its disposal. I believe the proper way for us to approach this question is for the Federal Government to build up a scientific department in road making, to gather together a body of engineers, and through their operations to be in a position, whenever a municipality or a province wants information in reference to this very important matter, to be able to give it to them, and to furnish them with competent and skilled help to make expenditures on road building.

But to-day there is not enough information and scientific knowledge on this question to warrant the expenditure of the exceedingly large sums of money which it is proposed to spend at this time of financial stringency. I venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is not one single province that has yet successfully grappled with the problem of road making. For years the various provinces have tinkered with this question. They have not gone at it in the right way. They decided that a certain road was needed and would cost a certain amount of money, and then they proceeded to get the money and to expend it without any previous experimental research, with the result that the expenditure in many cases has been lost. I do not think the province of Nova Scotia has suffered any more in this particular than the other provinces, but members of the present Government in Nova Scotia would be the first to admit that in the past road construction has largely been a failure, and that to-day they are groping in the dark on this question, and if this Government forces the Government of Nova Scotia into the expenditure of large sums of money on road building, it will be spent in a hurry and practically thrown away.

I want to read to the House just a short paragraph from the Eastern Chronicle, a paper published in New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, in reference to some of the operations in connection with road building in that province. This is the paragraph:

> There is one of two things wrong with the supposedly permanent culverts that have been placed along the highways of this country—either the design is bad, or the work of installation was not properly done. That the costly work is more or less a failure is easily apparent to one travelling the roads. In places they have given way, have been thrown up by the frost and are now a danger to travel rather than the maximum of safety they were originally designed to be. This will be a matter of deep regret to the county representatives who were responsible for the installation of these intended improvements, and who placed their faith in the engineer who prepared his plans, and the contractor who had the performance of the job. It looks very much as if the design of these culverts was really at fault.

The province of Nova Scotia borrowed a very large sum of money in good faith, and they yielded to the cry of immediate action in the construction of good roads. They put these culverts down without knowing how, without the proper staff to ensure the work being properly done. That is the long and short of it. The result is that that immense expenditure is worse than a total loss, because the roads in which those culverts were placed have been made dangerous.

Mr. COPP: Is the hon. member referring to Nova Scotia generally, or just to certain counties?

Mr. DAVIDSON: The paragraph I read had reference to a particular road in Nova Scotia, from my observation I may say that the condition described in the county of Pictou is characteristic of the various other parts of the province. The people of Nova Scotia want good roads; there is no doubt of that. It is needless to point out the merits of good roads; everybody realizes that they are necessary. But the question is, will the scheme that is now under consideration lead to the production of good roads in this country? In my judgment, it is doubtful whether it will. I believe—and I have the opinion of a very able expert to support my conclusion—that if this thing is carried through it will simply mean that huge sums of money will be passed on to the various provinces, which will thereupon engage in wild schemes of road-making and in two or three years there will be nothing whatever to show for all this expenditure. I agree with what the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said the other evening when he spoke in favour of permanent roads. But it would be idle for us to borrow $20,- 000,000 and spend it in such a manner that in the future the only thing we shall have to remind us of the expenditure will be the necessity of our paying the indebtedness so incurred. Let us deal with this thing in a sane manner; let us continue the operations that have been started, go on with the work that has been begun, and wait until the provinces are in a better position to work intelligently upon the roads; then place the federal machinery at the disposal of the various provinces in order that they may build well. It is absolutely absurd for us to embark at this time upon such a scheme as this. I point out again the inadvisability of our trying to invade the jurisdiction of the provinces. The provinces do not want us to do so; we are trying as it were, to cast the mote out of their eye when there is the beam of heavy obligation in our own. In view of the heavy obligations under which we are staggering at the present time, it is very silly for us to go around the country looking for people whom we may help out.

This measure, Mr. Chairman, is one which requires all the united wisdom of the members of this House; I do not know of any measure that would require more careful scrutiny. It is an absolutely new departure; the Federal Government has never built roads in this country. No scientific investigation has been made by the Government; they are not in possession of any data on the subject; they are not able to give the House any information of a definite character, yet they are embarking upon a scheme involving the expenditure of millions of dollars. If this thing goes through, every part of the country will be after the Federal Government to expend money on roads; we shall be in for a tremendous expenditure. This, therefore, is an inopportune time to try to force a measure of this kind through Parliament. The proper thing to do would have been to bring the Bill forward at an earlier period in the session and to refer it to a special committee of the House for study, analysis and criticism. When we had to deal with the consolidation of the Railway Act a special committee was appointed and sat for days considering the various clauses of that proposed Act. Railway problems were not new to us; yet we spent weeks in the committee giving very careful consideration to the details of this Railway Act. Now it is proposed, at the eleventh hour, a few days before prorogation, to embark upon an entirely new scheme, a scheme of which we are entirely ignorant; and it is proposed to rush it through. An hon. gentleman asks the Government to allow the matter to stand until another day; that the vote be not taken at this time, but this request is refused by the minister, for reasons which no doubt he appreciates, but which I cannot for the life of me understand. There are many other things I wish to say on this subject; is the minister still obdurate?

Mr. J. D. REID: I would be glad to do anything I could for the hon. member, but we have lost a good deal of time on this resolution, which is now before us for the third time. I make one more appeal to hon. gentlemen to let the resolution go through so that I may get the Bill printed. We will then have the second reading, when there will be opportunity for discussion; and it may be further discussed in committee. Of course, if the hon. member wishes to finish his remarks, I will give consideration to his suggestions. I realize that this is one of the most important measures that ever came before this House, but it has passed this Parliament twice before, and it is well known to hon. members and to the people. The member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) wants to know whether we are going on with this Bill. I am asking that it be passed; then we may consider whether it, with other Bills, shall be gone on with during the present session. But I am not going to drop it in this way. I am as anxious as any member of the House is that the session be brought to a close at the earliest possible day, and if we do not get this resolution through to-night it will be the first Order of the Day to-morrow. If we pass the resolution to-night, we shall save a day and members will get home that much earlier. That is the reason why I ask that the resolution go through. There are a lot of other Bills on the Order Paper. In previous sessions Bills have been dropped in order that the session might be brought to a close. I am willing to do anything to facilitate the work of the session, but if the resolution is not adopted to-night I will ask the House to take it up to-morrow and to discuss it to-morrow and from day to day to see if we cannot have the resolution passed so that the Bill may be introduced.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The minister is wrong when he says that this Bill has passed the House twice before. In fact, I believe that it never passed this House before.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Highways Bill, I mean.

Mr. DAVIDSON: That Bill was entirely different from this one and involved an entirely different principle. It is one of the principles of responsible government that the Government which collects the taxes shall be responsible for the expenditure of the money so collected. That was the principle involved in the Highways Bills, which was passed by this House and killed in the Senate.

That is not the principle embodied in this legislation. I do not want to be churlish in this matter. My only reason for opposing this resolution is in order that all the members of this House may appreciate its importance and significance. If the minister would consent to have this Bill sent to a special committee to be considered carefully, as I believe it should be considered, I would have no objection to the resolution being allowed to pass.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will bring the matter before Council, and we will decide whether it will be better to refer the Bill to a special committee at this late stage of the session or submit it to the House. That is a matter I should not like to decide offhand myself, but I shall certainly bring the matter before the Government and let my hon. friend know. I really think it would save time and shorten the session if this resolution were allowed to pass and we could get the Bill printed and on the Order Paper, and a copy of it in the hands of every member.

Mr. M. CLARK: I regret if I appear to have wasted the time of the House unnecessarily. I addressed what I thought was a courteous request to my hon. friend, and if it embarrassed him, I am sorry indeed; I did not mean it that way. I regret also that the minister should have used something which appeared very, very like a threat, and addressed particularly to myself. He assured me in somewhat strong language that if this resolution does not pass to-night it will be the first thing to-morrow. That will not incommode me. This House has been four months in session and I have not missed a Parliamentary day, and if my hon. friend wants me to stay here with him four months longer, and his constitution holds out, I will stay with him. I would remind him that on one occasion when we were sitting opposite to one another we had a two weeks' sitting without any intermission whatever. I regret that he should have thrown out what appeared to be very, very like a threat. I repeat what I said before, that if it should be the wish of the majority to enact this legislation I have no objection; it would not be any use if I had. I desire majorities to rule. I have expressed the wish that we had been given a clear explanation of what it is the Government wants to do in the way of road building.

This has not been an idle day in Parliament. We had a very long Bill brought in by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) this morning, a lucid exposition of the Bill greatly facilitated its passage, and it went through all its sixty-four clauses in committee. We had also a Bill with a great many clauses in connection with technical education. I must say, if the minister is inclined to threaten, that we would have got further ahead if he had told us exactly where he stands in regard to this national highway proposition and the other proposals. If he had told us exactly what the legislation is meant to effect, he would have helped me sooner to have ceased talking, and would have helped to let the resolution pass so far as I was concerned.

Mr. J. D. REID: The last thing in the world I would wish to use is a threat, and if my remarks could be construed in any way as a threat, I would certainly wish to withdraw them and apologize to the House. I realize that there is a great opposition to this legislation in the House. This is the third time I have tried to get this resolution through.

Mr. M. CLARK: On the two previous occasions I have not opened my mouth.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Nor did I make any statement.

Mr. J. D. REID: What I felt about it was this: If I am not to get the resolution through to-night, I would rather take it up first thing to-morrow and let the whole House decide whether we were to go on with it. I did not feel that I was asking anything unreasonable to let the resolution pass so that the Bill could be printed. I did not wish to threaten in any way, but I wished to get this Bill printed. We have a lot of other Bills on the Order Paper, and as far as I am concerned I will do everything I can to try and bring the session to a close, even if it should be necessary to drop this or some other Bills; but the Government must decide whether it shall be proceeded with or not.

Mr. EDWARDS: I considered the intimation of the minister that if this resolution did not pass to-night it would be the first order of business to-morrow, not as a threat, but as a promise which was due to certain members of this House who do not agree with the position of the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Annapolis, but desire this resolution to go through. While I am on my feet I should like to make one observation regarding the argument advanced by the hon. member for Annapolis with respect to the British North America Act and the infringement on provincial rights. Before this resolution came up he gave his consent to the passing of the Bill respecting technical education, and if there is any argument in regard to the invasion of provincial rights that can be used against this resolution it can be applied with equal force to the Bill on technical education involving an expenditure of $10,000,000, to which the hon. member has given his consent.

Mr. DAVIDSON: In order to set myself straight, let me say that I have no inconsistency in this matter. I was opposed to the principle of the Bill on technical education, and if a vote had been taken on it I would have been compelled to vote against it for exactly the same reason that I am opposed to this resolution.

Mr. MAHARG: If it is the will of the minister that a vote should be taken on this resolution to-night I shall have to take up a little of the time of the Committee, because I have not said a word on the principle involved. I have said that this is an inopportune time for the legislation to come before the House. This legislation is entirely wrong in principle It is an infringement of the rights of the provinces, and unless they have changed their minds I do not think they are a unit in accepting it. The last Highway Bill was killed for almost exactly the same reason. If we are going to hold a string on this grant—and we are holding a string on it—I can tell the minister that Saskatchewan, at all events, is absolutely opposed to the Dominion Government handing over moneys with a string attached. If the minister insists on a vote to-night, I shall have to take up a little time. As the minister does not care to answer, I take it for granted that he intends that a vote shall be taken to-night. In the first place, the emphatic statement of the minister that the Dominion Government would hold a string on the grant is surely sufficient reason for any member of this House opposing it. The minister says to the provinces: "We are prepared to give you this money, but we are going to say just exactly where you are going to build this road and the kind of material you shall use in building it. We are going to keep an absolute string on the grant." For that is what the minister's statement meant. It is all very well to say that it will be a matter of agreement, but that does not work. The Dominion Government will hold a string on this money continuously. I say the principle is absolutely wrong.

The Technical Education Bill has no such string on it. It says the money must be spent for technical education but does not stipulate that one or two colleges must be built or that this or the other subject must be taught. It is simply provided for technical education. But this Bill says you must build the road where this Government will be satisfied with it, and the Government must be satisfied with the construction and the material. It has an absolutely binding string on it from start to finish.

Mr. BUREAU: The matter of cost is in the opinion of the minister, too.

Mr. MAHARG: I did not know that, but that makes it so much worse. It seems to me most unreasonable to ask the provincial governments to accept this regulation, and I do not think that many of them will do so. Let the minister give us the information he has secured from the governments as to what they will do. If he is prepared to tell me that the government of my province will allow the Dominion Government to have complete control in the matter I shall immediately withdraw my objection, for that is the provincial government's business, and his assurance to that effect will relieve me of responsibility. But in the absence of that, and speaking, as I think I am, for the people of my province, I am opposed to the methods proposed. This was the attitude of the people of my province some years ago and I do not think they have altered their opinions much in this respect. We believe in provincial autonomy and although we were not accorded the fullest measure of it, still we got a fair degree of autonomy and are anxious to retain it and if possible have it extended. To permit the Dominion Government to interfere with the internal affairs of a province is entirely wrong. We have heard a good deal about the United States methods. I am not familiar with many states, but I am fairly well acquainted with the good roads scheme in Michigan, as I have a brother there who is connected with municipal works. There the state hands the money to the county and an arrangement is entered into between them. The county lays down the plan of the road and the Federal Government has nothing whatever to do with the work. If this Government is prepared to hand the money to the provinces and let them and the municipalities work out their own salvation I will withdraw my objection now and when the Bill comes before the Committee. Otherwise, I shall have to oppose it in Committee as strenuously as possible. I am not opposed to good roads, but I want the Provincial Government and the people of the province to say where those roads shall be built. In our own province they get away as far as they can from roads as such. They only undertake now large contracts, such as heavy fills or bridges. A member of the Government was Minister of Highways there for several years, and he will tell you they have been getting away from that system as much as possible. It was a continual source of trouble, getting the minister into difficulties through no fault of his own. This is a re-introduction of the system in an intensified form. It is entirely unwarranted and should not be supported. There are other matters I would like to touch upon and I should like to say a word or two to our British Columbia friends, but as the hour is late I will refrain from further remarks.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Hon. Mr. REID thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 152 founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Calder the House adjourned at 1.40 a.m.

Tuesday, June 24, 1919.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

REPORT OF PENSIONS COMMITTEE.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) laid on the table of the House the report of the Special Committee appointed to consider the question of pensions, pension regulations and all matters pertaining thereto, and moved that the said report, with the evidence appended thereto, and a suitable index to be prepared by the clerk of the committee thereof, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

[Mr. Maharg.]

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. BELAND: Is this the final report?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT.

RESIGNATION OF DIRECTOR OF MEDICAL SERVICES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I beg to lay upon the table of the House copy of a letter from Colonel F. McKelvey Bell to myself dated June 6, 1919; copy of a letter from the same gentleman to Sir James Lougheed, Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, dated June 5; copy of a letter from Sir James Lougheed to myself dated June 17, all with respect to the resignation of Colonel McKelvey Bell and to the incidents which led up to that resignation.

MILITARY SERVICE BRANCH.

LETTER FROM MR. JUSTICE DUFF CONCERNING MR. S. L. DALE HARRIS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I lay upon the Table a copy of a letter dated the 6th of June from the Hon. Mr. Justice Duff in which he calls attention to a passage in the report of the Director of the Military Service Branch, Department of Justice, referring to and reflecting on the work of Mr. S. L. Dale Harris, one of the officers attached to the Central Appeal office. The purport of Mr. Justice Duff's communication is to convey to me and to have made public his warm appreciation of the work which Mr. Harris performed as Central Public Representative in connection with the Military Service Act.

NEW FREIGHT RATES ON AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): I desire to ask a question with regard to the reduction of freight rates on agricultural implements to the western provinces. The manager of a plant in my constituency who applied for the new rates received the following telegram from the Traffic Manager of the Canadian National Railways:

Montreal, Que., June 17th, 1919.

La Compagnie Desjardines, Lte.,
St. Andre de Kam., Que.

Your wire date. New rates on agricultural implements as referred to in your telegram will not become effective earlier than September first.

S. C. Tiffin.

As the farming implements, if they are to be any value to the farmers this year or to the manufacturers who sell them, will have to be bought and sold before the 1st of September, I desire to know whether the agreement between the Government and the railway companies is as indicated by this telegram.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): I suggest that the hon. member bring the matter up when the Bill embodying the tariff changes is before the Committee of the House. I was not quite able to follow him in the question that he put; I think, however, that a reply would have to cover a good deal of ground.

THE VACANT POSITION OF COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I hope I shall not be indiscreet if I ask the Prime Minister whether, on account of the death of the late Commissioner of Customs, Mr. McDougald, it is the intention of the Government, in the appointment of a successor, to recognize the principle of promotion?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no doubt there will be promotion within the service, but I have not been able to give careful consideration to the selection.

THE WINNIPEG STRIKE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): I notice in the press this morning that the Government have separated themselves from any further efforts towards conciliation and settlement in Winnipeg. Is that a fact? Have all negotiations been cut off as between the Department of Labour, for instance, and the leaders of the strike at Winnipeg?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not observed the report to which my hon. friend has called my attention. So far as I am aware, nothing of the kind has been determined.

CIVIL SERVICE RECLASSIFICATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): May I ask the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. A. K. Maclean) if there is any report accompanying the volume which he has laid upon the table of the House and which is supposed to contain the classification of the various positions in the Civil Service, or if that report is the only thing which will be handed to the members to enable them to form an opinion upon the changes which are being made?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: The report of the classification already laid upon the table of the House comprises substantially all the information that will be given to hon. members. There is, however, a report from the so-called efficiency experts to the Civil Service Commission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir SAM HUGHES: "So-called" is the proper word to use.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not mean to reflect upon the experts by so designating them, as I have a very high appreciation of their work. There is a report from the experts to the Civil Service Commission, which report deals with the general principles involved in their method of classification, and which, I think, will be submitted to the House in a few days by the Civil Service Commission. I might say that I hope, to-morrow some time, to lay upon the table of the House copies of the classification in French. I also hope, tomorrow some time, if I have an opportunity, to move the second reading of the Civil Service Bill, and if not, then the following day. At present it is my intention to ask the House to appoint a special committee to whom this Bill will be referred. I mention that so that hon. members may have an opportunity of considering the Bill in the meanwhile.

Mr. BUREAU: Will that report to the commission be laid upon the table of the House and copies printed for the use of members? I do not want to pass any remarks or to give my reasons now, because this is not the time; but I do say that no intelligent man can understand all of the 700 page volume which has been deposited upon the Table. It is a catalogue with the most curious and unintelligible classifications for certain positions that I have ever seen.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot promise my hon. friend that that report will be laid upon the table of the House before the second reading of the Bill is moved.

I think my hon. friend is in error in supposing that there is something very strange and unfathomable about this classification. It is a very simple matter.

Mr. BUREAU: It is too simple as it stands.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It does not pretend to set up a single new position in the public service of the country. I hope my hon. friend will change his mind, because I trust to get the Bill and the classification through Parliament in a few hours, as there is no reason why it should be delayed at any length.

Sir SAM HUGHES: As regards selecting a committee to consider this Bill—I do not know if this is the proper time to put the question or not—is it the minister's intention to hand-pick the committee, or is he going to pick the committee from hon. gentlemen interested on both sides?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Some one will have to pick the committee and I should be glad to have the assistance of my hon. friend in regard to the matter.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The minister will not get me.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall do the best I can to select a representative committee.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would like some good fighting men on it.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine), Bill No. 148, to amend the Canada Shipping Act (transfers and mortgages of ships) was read a second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—transfers, mortgages, or transfers of mortgages of ships to be subject to approval:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there anything new in the law, or is the old law being re-enacted?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: When the resolution was before the committee, I explained that the object of this Bill is simply to put into effect two Orders in Council, one passed on March 9, 1915, and the other on October 9, 1917. These Orders in Council, when the Peace Treaty is signed, would, so I am informed, become invalid, and the object of this Bill is to have similar legislation to that passed by the Imperial Government in 1915, entitled The British Ships Transfer Restriction Act, which is valid for three years after the declaration of peace. That same clause is in the Bill now before the committee. It is necessary to have such a law in order that, if any owner of a ship wished to have a transfer of registry or a transfer of mortgage, he would have to apply to the Minister of Marine to get it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can the minister give a concrete case?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In the case of a ship built in Montreal, from which city the hon. member and I come, if the owner wished to have American or French registry, in the past he would merely have to go to the registrar of the court of Montreal to obtain it. Now he will have to apply to the Minister of Marine.

Mr. PARDEE: Is this absolutely necessary? In our part of the country, where vessel transfers are quite frequently made, every bill of sale or mortgage has to be drawn there, sent to Ottawa, submitted to the department and receive approval before we can do business at all. Is not that a policy of centralization? You have your collector of customs, who is the registrar of shipping in the port of Sarnia. Why can he not receive instructions so that we may, as in the old days, take a bill of sale or mortgage to him, or have a transfer approved by him and entered in the registry of shipping and kept in that port? I think that shipping registrars in the different ports could be instructed to carry out the regulations just as the department would here. It would save time and considerable expense, not to mention a great deal of correspondence. One of the rules of the department is that no mortgage may be drawn except upon the specific form furnished under the Shipping Act, and with extended periods of payment for the mortgage it is an absolute impossibility to put the terms of repayment in the form furnished. It has to be changed and typewritten forms must be used, and at the present time the department absolutely refuses to accept any form except that furnished. I cannot understand the reason for this. The matter might be simplified if the registrar of shipping in the port were allowed to carry on the work.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Orders in Council passed on the 9th of March, 1915, and the 9th of October, 1917, respectively, under the War Measures Act of 1914, were absolutely necessary in order that Canada might conserve and control her own shipping. England in her wisdom—and she is a good example in the matter of shipping and shipping laws—saw fit to pass what is known as the Transfer Restriction Act. It was passed in 1915, to be operative for three years after the war, in order that Great Britain may be assured that none of her shipping would get into foreign hands. That Act enables her to conserve her own tonnage. Canada is simply seeking to do what the United Kingdom has done, and it would be very unfortunate for this country, with so much ship construction in progress now, if we did not pass this law. There is a remarkable shortage of shipping. Canada not being able to export one-quarter of the freight offering, and if we allow these Orders in Council to lapse and do not pass this Bill it will simply mean that we shall have no control whatever over our shipping. A man could go to a registrar and ask for the registry of any country he liked, and it would be given without question. Under the provisions of the Bill a foreign company applying for the registry or transfer of a ship will have to come to Ottawa and make application to the minister, so that we can investigate the bona fides of the applicant and decide as to the advisability of giving the transfer. We cannot have these rights granted through the registrar of the port, and if this Bill does not pass we shall revert to the position in which we were before the war, and transfers of ships will be made just the same as transfers of land.

Mr. PARDEE: The registrar is an officer of the department. Can he not be given instructions?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My department will have no instructions to give him unless this Bill is passed.

Mr. DUFF: I have no doubt the minister is right in regard to some of the ships about which he speaks, notably steel ships. But if this Bill goes through without amendments or a satisfactory guarantee a great many of the wooden shipyards in the country will have to close up business. The minister says this Act is in accordance with a similar law passed in the United Kingdom. Conditions in Canada are quite different from those that obtain in Great Britain, where there is enough business for themselves to keep their yards busy all the time. Most of the wooden ships being built in Canada are for sale and not intended for use in Canadian trade. In fact, for a number of years past the majority of wooden ships built in the provinces have had to go outside of Canada to obtain business. The minister is optimistic in the matter of what ships can do in Canadian trade. Well, I am not so optimistic and from my experience I know that we cannot expect sufficient business for a great many of our wooden ships. I would remind the minister that even his own marine had to go outside of Canada for business, and, indeed, was able to secure better trade outside. The provisions of this Bill will work a hardship on the shipowners in Canada, especially in the Maritime Provinces. A great many vessels are sold in foreign ports. A ship may go to Brazil or France, and an offer may be made the captain, who then telegraphs his owners. Sometimes such offers are made in the British West Indies, and if a sale is to be hoped for the owners must be in a position to telegraph immediately whether the offer can be accepted. If an owner is under the necessity of communicating first with Ottawa—and large bodies move very slowly, this being certainly the case sometimes in the Marine Department, which takes a great deal of time to consider these matters—there will be no sale. We should encourage the selling of vessels outside of Canada if we expect to keep our shipyards busy. A great many men in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick when the war broke out and when Mr. Lloyd George made an appeal for ships, invested money in new shipyards, although some of them were already interested in old concerns. So far we have not received any returns on our capital, and if this Bill is made law and we are to be handicapped with unnecessary delays our business will be seriously prejudiced, for we shall certainly find it, to say the least, extremely difficult to effect sales with the United States or France if we have to apply to the Minister of Marine for permission to sell. In the past few years we have had some business with foreigners, although I should not use the word "foreigners" in connection with our Allies, France and the United States. Gentlemen from those two countries would give certain specifications for ships they required and prices would be fixed before even the keel was laid. Now, how can we shipbuilders in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick under this Act enter into a contract with French or American capitalists when we do not know whether the minister will allow us to transfer a ship after she is built? I would urge on the minister my apprehension that if this Bill goes through without the guarantees, the shipbuilders of the Maritime Provinces will be driven out of business.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I may say to the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) that I cannot agree with his argument that this will drive the wooden shipbuilders of the Maritime Provinces out of business; quite the contrary. The Government is just as anxious as is the hon. member for Lunenburg that all ships that can be built in Canada under our allied register, either wooden or steel, should be built here. There is no delay in the Department of Marine and Fisheries. All these requests are dealt with very speedily. If there was any blame it would rest on the shoulders of the minister, and I can assure the hon. member that I despatch such matters very quickly after ascertaining who the owners are. He mentioned the case of a wooden shipbuilder in the Maritime Provinces who got an order from France and who could not make the sale because he would be in doubt as to whether he could get registry or not until the ship was built. That is entirely contrary to the facts. Quite frequently men come to see me—there is one waiting for me now—to know if he can get register before he completes the deal. If an American shipbuilder, or any of our Allies, want ships built in Canada, they will be told that when the necessary very simple questions have been asked and answered, they can immediately get their registry. I am sure that in such times as we are now going through, my hon. friend from Lunenburg will recognize the necessity, in the interests of Canada, of the Government retaining control over shipping for at least three years after the war. Otherwise, we do not know what tonnage, either wooden or steel, which is being built in Canada, will slip out of our control. I cannot agree with the hon. member when he says that we have to go outside of Canada to get trade. The fact is quite the contrary. As I said a moment ago, we could commence to move the products of the farm and of most of our industries, if we had all of our forty-five new ships in commission to-day. It would be an unwise policy for the Government to allow any of our ships, either wooden or steel, that are being constructed now, to pass under foreign control, or possibly into the hands of our enemies. This is merely a precautionary measure; it does not mean delay at all. Last year the number of transfers allowed on the application of both Allies and neutrals, was twelve, and the number of ships that applied for transfer of registry was 138. The hon. member will see that we have already handled quite a number of transfers, and no one has complained about delay. I appreciated the fact that these matters must be dealt with speedily when they come before my department. No mortgage can be transferred or registry given unless the minister himself personally approves, and I can assure my hon. friend that I shall approve of these applications very speedily when they come before me.

Mr. DUFF: The explanation given by the minister is fairly satisfactory. So long as there is no delay I can assure him that it will be satisfactory to the wooden shipbuilders but they must have immediate action and they must know before they build the ships whether they can sell them or not. I was in the United States about a month ago and I had previously been in correspondence with a gentleman in Boston who has a large amount of money that he wishes to invest in Nova Scotia ships. He would be willing to put $50,000 into ships built in Nova Scotia, as an investment. This was before I knew anything about this Bill and I told him there would be no trouble in arranging it because in the past people in the United States have had shares in Nova Scotia ships. The shares were owned by British subjects but the British subjects gave a mortgage in the name of the American citizen. When I discussed this matter with that gentleman he told me that he had $50,000 to put in ships in Nova Scotia and I told him there was no reason why it could not be done in the usual manner. If this Bill goes through, and if I understand the Bill correctly, Canada will lose that money. If I am right in my interpretation of the Bill this gentleman cannot invest this money in Canadian shipping because we would not be able to give him a mortgage for the money that he invests. Am I right in that?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. gentleman will be able to give him the necessary transfer of mortgage. There is no difficulty about that. You will have to apply to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to get his authority to give a transfer of the mortgage but there will be no delay or difficulty about the issuing of the mortgage. I am just as anxious as any hon. member to increase shipbuilding in Canada, altogether apart from what the Government is doing, and we will render every assistance to promote that object. But I am sure that hon. members will recognize that there is absolute necessity of Canada controlling her shipping tonnage and she can only do that by asking people in these various countries to apply to the minister for a transfer of the mortgage or register.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: My principal objection to the Bill is that it is an unnecessary interference with business, without accomplishing any good object. If the minister says that he is going to give his consent to all applications the Bill is no good. He has now pledged himself to the House that if any Canadian citizen wants to sell his ship to an American he will give his consent and the citizen will have a free hand to do it. Then, what is the use of the Bill? If it is to be of no use and if the minister is going to give his consent under all circumstances, it seems to me to be an interference with business and to have no good purpose. It always takes time to get the consent of the minister, and very often difficulties arise. Why should we put on the statute-book a law which will be of no service to anybody? As far as the control of shipping is concerned, the minister is not now exercising control over Canadian ships. Canadian ships are used freely in the trade of the world without any interference on the part of the minister. The fact that they are under Canadian registry does not seem to help Canada in so far as getting freight carried is concerned because the Canadian shipowner can carry freight from the river Platte to Great Britain or from the river Platte to France, or anywhere else and nobody interferes. Unless the minister intends to go farther and say that no Canadian ship can sail outside of Canada without the consent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries or of the minister, I do not see that any good purpose will be served by creating this obstacle to business. The minister knows that he is not controlling freight at the present time; yet, it does not make very much difference because if a ship is afloat and seeking business, it is immaterial to it what flag it sails under. It makes a good deal of difference in times of war but in times of peace the American shipowner is just as willing to accept Canadian business as American business provided the Canadian business is better. Unless the minister intends to go another step further I do not see the need for putting this law on the statute-book.

Mr. FIELDING: Possibly it would help the situation if the minister would give a clear explanation of the circumstances under which approval would be given and the circumstances under which approval would be refused. If the only object is to prevent our building ships and selling them to our alien enemies, if there are to be any such in the future, I am sure we should all sympathize with it. But, I come from a section of the province of Nova Scotia where there has been quite a revival of the shipbuilding industry, as my hon. friend (Mr. Duff) has described. There is very great activity, there has been quite an improvement of the situation in a business way and otherwise, but there is a fear now that the orders which have come there during war time may not continue. The view is expressed that we should encourage this industry by every means possible. If the minister could give us a definition of the class of application which he would accept and the class of application which he would be obliged to refuse it might help a good deal, because in the case of orders for new ships, at all events, they could point to the conditions as defined by the minister in the House and that would have some weight. I entirely agree with what my hon. friend from Lunenburg said as to the desirability of encouraging wooden shipbuilding in the lower provinces which has proved to be a very valuable industry in the last three or four years, and if we cannot help it along, we, at all events, should do nothing to obstruct it.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will be very glad to give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) the information he has asked for, but before doing so I wish to state my position more clearly than possibly I have so far done in answer to the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. J. H. Sinclair). While I said I would give authority to a citizen of the United States or to a citizen of France who wanted to get a transfer of mortgage or a transfer of registry for a wooden ship, I would not do so without making the necessary inquiries and satisfying myself as to who the people were that were applying for such transfer, but the necessary inquiries would be made by wire and speedily. There has not been any delay in these matters since I have been Minister of Marine, and I do not see that any occasion for delay will arise in the present case.

In answer to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's I am pleased that he has asked me to put the case in the way he did, and for his benefit I will state two concrete instances. Suppose citizens of our ally France asked for a transfer of registry or a transfer of mortgage. If the people making the application were subjects of that country it would be granted immediately. On the other hand, the necessity of not taking these applications for what they purport to be without inquiry is illustrated by a case which occurred some months ago. One of the neutral countries applied for registry, but upon investigation we found that the vessel was intended to engage in enemy trade in the interest of an enemy country. The fact, however, that application had been made to the Minister of Marine to get registry enabled us to prevent that ship, which was built in a Canadian yard and under Canadian registry, from passing into alien enemy hands. That is the principal object of this Bill, to see that none of our wooden or steel ships get into the hands of our enemies, and secondly to conserve our Canadian tonnage as much as we possibly can. Now here is a case which might possibly arise, although I do not say that it would: Take one of the ships that have been built by the Imperial Munitions Board and which that board may possibly want to sell to the United States or France. If we were very short of vessels, we might say: "No, we want to buy that ship ourselves." This Bill affords us the opportunity of looking first after our own interests and keeping our tonnage out of enemy hands.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am very glad that we have now ascertained exactly what this legislation means, and if that be the minister's object I think, personally, he had better drop this Bill. He says that he does not want a Canadian ship to pass into the hands of an enemy, and I understand we are to have the Peace Treaty signed within a few days. Does the minister come before this Committee with the definite policy that after that Treaty is signed we are not going to do any business with those who have been our enemies in the late war, but that we are going to put obstacles in the way of business being done? Is that what my hon. friend means?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the hon. member will allow me—.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: The question is one which can be answered in the affirmative or the negative. If the minister does not care to answer it I will assume that is what he means.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will answer the hon. gentleman as soon as he is finished.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: If that is my hon. friend's attitude then it may be necessary to explain to him that it means he is going to do everything in the way of preventing the payment of any of the enemy indemnities by means of sea freight, because the only way in which the indemnities we are insisting upon the enemy paying can be paid, is in goods, and so far as those goods come across the sea they must come in ships. If the whole object of this legislation is to enable the minister to prevent our putting shipping facilities in the way of what he is pleased to still term enemy countries, then the economic effect will be to put obstacles in the way of paying these indemnities. That will be the meaning of his policy, that will be how it will work out in our future relationships with those countries. I have no particular use for our alien enemies, but the fact is that under the Peace Treaty we have particular use for the indemnities which we demand they shall pay. Those indemnities can only be paid in goods. Those goods can only be brought in ships; and the minister comes before the House with a Bill to perpetuate the powers given in war time by an Order in Council. That was very proper while we were at war, but now that we shall shortly be at peace the minister proposes to perpetuate the powers given under that Order in Council to the thwarting of our re-establishing of trade conditions, which means the thwarting of the payment of indemnities.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Michael Clark), as we all know, is not only a very loyal Englishman but a good Canadian as well. Nevertheless, he has apparently overlooked what I stated in my opening remarks, that the Old Country—the country from which he comes and which very seldom errs, particularly in shipping matters, because it has had the experience of hundreds of years, has passed a Bill similar to the one we are considering declaring that it will hold control of the transfer of mortgages and of registries until three years after peace has been signed. Surely Canada cannot go very far astray in following the example of the United Kingdom in that respect?

But that is only part of my answer to the hon. gentleman. I am more concerned about the interests of our own country. To-day we are short of shipping, and I have no hesitation in saying to the committee that if I received an application at the present time from Germany, or Austria, or Hungary, for a transfer of mortgage or a transfer of registry, I would say "no." I do not know what our answer might be a year or two years from now, but in view of the feelings which we entertain towards those countries, and the existing shortage of Canadian tonnage, I would be derelict in my duty if I allowed such transfer of shipping tonnage under Canadian registry which is so badly needed by the Canadian people, and I would deem myself unfit to be a minister of the Crown. Under the circumstances I am quite sure that no member of the committee desires that should be done. For my part I am anxious to safeguard as far as possible the interests of Canada. This Bill does not contain a single restriction that is calculated to injure Canada; every word and every sentence in it is intended to promote the best interests of the Dominion. In the explanations so far given I covered the ground sufficiently; I merely desire to say briefly that we desire the necessary authority to deal with the construction of ships in Canada, both steel and wood, during the reconstruction period which we estimate will last for a period of three years. When that time has elapsed shipping will of course be open just as it formerly was. As it is, I will place no barrier in the way of securing a justifiable transfer of registry or mortgage; the Department of Marine will act as speedily as it can in the matter, but I certainly will make no promise that at this time, and in view of the terrible war we have recently gone through, I will be willing to give a transfer of mortgage or registry to any of our enemies.

Mr. FIELDING: Might we reasonably assume—leaving out of the question the so-called enemies, and possibly after Friday next they will possibly be no longer classed in that category—that in the case of applications from the United States or any neutral government—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There will be no trouble at all.

Mr. FIELDING: There will be no objection?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: None at all.

Mr. FIELDING: Then that removes to some extent the objection to this legislation. If the operation of the Bill was intended to be permanent I would entirely agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Michael Clark), but it is limited to three years and the policy which has been deemed proper in war time may be tolerated for a few months after the war. It is only that limitation that would make the Bill justifiable at all.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: If the minister would agree to confine the operation of the Bill to alien enemy countries no objection could be entertained to it at all, but for my part I see very serious objection to the legislation in its present form as being likely to hamper business. Let us say that a case occurs, such as the hon. member from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) referred to, where an outside capitalist, from the United States or some other country, wishes to contract with Canadian builders for the construction of a ship. The agent of that capitalist arrives in Canada, but he is not going to deal merely with one firm, he makes approaches to all the firms that are open for business. All of them will be hampered because they cannot foretell what will happen in the course of the negotiations. Men want to know where they stand, particularly in the making of a contract. They cannot say: "We will build this ship for you and give you a good title to it at a certain date," unless they know where they stand. If there are half a dozen firms negotiating with the same party the minister will have a lot of trouble on his hands and he will not be able to satisfy anybody. That is my principal objection to the Bill. If the minister could see his way clear to confine the Bill altogether to alien enemy countries, I think all our opposition to it would be withdrawn. The minister says that it does not hamper business; but it does. The penalty is severe—a $5,000 fine and five years imprisonment. I would ask the minister if he could not amend his Bill to make it apply to the nations he refers to.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have dealt with dozens and dozens of cases such as the hon. member for Antigonish has mentioned. I can only say again, that if any man or any number of men want to transfer to any allied or neutral countries, they can do so by telegraphing to my department. I would simply wire back and say, "We will give you registry for the United States, France, Norway or Italy,"—as the case might be —"provided, of course, that the company is not going to be foreign controlled." There will be no hampering of business, because we have been all through this for years and have not had the slightest difficulty at all. I can assure hon. members that there will be no delay and no restriction of trade, and undoubtedly it is a wise piece of legislation to put through at this time for the reasons I have already given.

Mr. DUFF: I understood the minister to say, in reply to the hon. member for Antigonish, that he would give permission for the transfer if the ship was not to be controlled by a foreign company. If a man in the United States or France buys a ship, he will control it.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I should have said if the ship is to be under alien enemy control.

Mr. DUFF: Of course, this would not apply to the Dominion of Newfoundland?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. DUFF: But while we are discussing this Bill I might call the minister's attention to the fact that we have had a great deal of difficulty in the last three or four years in getting vessels transferred from the Maritime Provinces to Newfoundland. We have had to get the consent of the department, and in some cases have had to submit to a great deal of delay and inconvenience both in the selling of new as well as of old ships. I remember a particular case last September; a fishing schooner went into St. John's, Newfoundland, and the captain had an offer for her. He telegraphed to the owner—by the way, he was a good friend of the Government—and this gentleman came to me and asked if I would telegraph to Ottawa for permission to transfer the ship. It took me three weeks to get the transfer arranged. At first the department absolutely refused to grant permission If this occurred in the case of new vessels we would not be able to do any business. But if the minister will give us his word that there will be no trouble, and that immediately on receipt of a telegram from anybody in Canada the matter will be looked into and permission given or not given, I think there is not much harm in the Bill.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In answer to my hon. friend, I have a letter of thanks and appreciation from the late Colonial Secretary of Newfoundland, Mr. Squires. He came to Ottawa on the morning train to see me about the transfer of a large number of wooden ships from Canadian to Newfoundland registry, and he was able to return by the afternoon train. I not only gave him, between trains, the transfers he wanted, but I also had the pleasure of having him to lunch. When he returned to Newfoundland I got the thanks of his Government for the speedy way in which I had handled the matter. The Colonial Secretary told the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he expected to be in Ottawa several days; instead of that he was only in the city three hours. That is the policy we have followed in the past, and that is the policy we intend to follow in the future

12 noon.

Mr. DUFF: How does the matter stand with regard to the transfer of ships to Newfoundland registry; do we still have to apply to the department?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: There will be no trouble?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No trouble at all.

Mr. M. CLARK: I have one or two words to say to the hon. minister. He carefully avoided any explanation of how he proposed to get the goods from those enemy nations who have to pay war indemnities, and he seemed to lay down a policy which, from my point of view, is utterly bad on two grounds. My hon friend referred to me as an Englishman. Well, I have a great deal of admiration for England. I do not know the particulars of the British measure, but I would like to give my hon. friend and the Government a piece of advice, and that is to imitate England when she does good things, and not when she does bad things. I have not unlimited confidence in the Government that is ruling England at the present moment. Neither, as far as I can see, have a large number of constituencies in which by-elections have taken place. There is a certain species of lower animal, known as the mimetic species, that have the power of imitating other objects, animate or inanimate, to save themselves from their enemies. I sometimes feel that this is a mimetic Government. If ever we attack a proposal, it is supposed to be sufficiently defended when we are told that it comes from England or from the United States. That is not quite a good thing to an Englishman who has just a little Scotch blood in him. I do not want to elaborate this point too far, but I am going to deal with the points my hon. friend raised. He seemed to think it was a sufficient defence to his Bill to say that it came from England. Two years ago daylight saving was defended on exactly the same grounds, and this Parliament carried a measure giving it effect without discussion almost. This year this same Parliament voted against it by two to one. Why? Not because it was English or American, but because they tried it and found it bad. So much for my hon. friend's English precedent. I will go into his English precedent a little further in a moment.

I view this legislation not only with suspicion and distrust, but with hostility, on two grounds. In the first place, I do not think that we can afford, in Canada of all places in the world, to be forever at war with the peoples whom we have fought and beaten. My hon. friend says that I am an Englishman. When a boy in England, after a bout of fisticuffs outside a public house, I have seen the victor help the fallen man to his feet, take him inside, and stand him a drink. That is what we mean when we speak of an Englishman. When he has his spite out he forgets it, if those with whom he has fought will allow him to do so. I say it would be a most unfortunate thing if this Government, after the war is over, is to perpetuate feelings of international hatred and jealously—the very feelings out of which war arises. I argued in this House on the Military Service Act that the only ground on which I would defend conscription was that we were adopting it to kill conscription. The only ground on which I could defend war was that we were at war to end war. And if we are ever to indulge the sentiments of international hatred and suspicion, then it is because those sentiments are forced upon us. So much for that side of the question.

Economically, this legislation is bad from my point of view. My hon. friend utterly failed to touch the point that I raised with regard to how we are going to convey goods from enemy countries if we pursue a policy through our Marine and Fisheries Department of restricting our traffic with those countries.

I hope that my hon. friend gets the point. I wonder how far he would restrict his trade with those countries? Let us suppose that peace was signed. My hon. friend is a business man; I do not know what class of goods he handles—at least, I have no right to mention it here. But suppose that in his capacity as the head of a business firm he is hard pressed to make his business go. I hope that he will never be in those circumstances, but it is a fact that we are all anxious, in the short time between the cradle and the grave, to do all the business that we can; let us get rid of any cant and humbug in this connection. Suppose that during the three year-period of the reconstruction of shipping operations with what were enemy countries, my hon. friend's firm was offered a large order by a reputable concern in any one of the enemy countries, at a time when we were trying to forget the war and to reconstruct our country and our business. I would like my hon. friend to tell me whether he would say: Oh, we were at war with the Germans a year ago; I really could not fill this order. Would he take that attitude? If every business man in Canada did his business in that way, what would be the result? But I am very suspicious of my hon. friend. I know what kind of business man he is; I do not think he would put upon himself, even for the three years, a commercial self-denying ordinance of that kind. If he would not, then commercially his Bill is bad, because he has himself avowed that its object is to reconstruct commercial intercourse with those who were our enemies.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not know whether the hon. member is aware that I am no longer active in business; rightly or wrongly I am devoting all my time and attention to the public position that I now occupy. The people who are carrying on the business that I formerly managed will have to decide the question raised by my hon. friend. What is before us now is this Bill and the question whether it is in the best interests of Canada. I have gone into it fully and have nothing more to add on the subject. I am sure that the committee is satisfied that there is no restriction of trade about it; on the contrary, it is designed to promote and facilitate the shipping of Canada and to see that it is in proper hands. If a year or two from now any of our present enemies made application for a transfer of registry or of mortgage, I would bring the matter before the Government for decision. This Bill does not absolutely shut out such a transfer; it will be for the Governor in Council to decide questions of that kind.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister heard on a previous occasion the member for South Cape Breton and Richmond (Mr. Butts) and myself discussing the question of the return of ships and shipping that had been commandeered for the purposes of the war. We pointed out that many of these ships had not been returned and that the circumstances revealed in connection with their detention did not seem to be altogether creditable to those concerned. Have these ships been returned to their former contracts or pre-war charters? If not, is the Government assisting the companies, and those who are immediately concerned, to get these ships back? Quite a number of ships were under contract in the early days of the war with the Nova Scotia Steel Company, and with the Dominion Coal Company for the carrying of coal to the ports on the St. Lawrence. They had contracts for terms of five, ten or fifteen years at what were regarded as good rates, but at rates which were low compared with those to which we have become accustomed during the war. These ships were put into the service of the British Government at high rates, and, naturally enough, the owners are anxious to continue them in that service as long as possible. But those who had them under contract are anxious to get them back at once, because without them their business is crippled, and the business of the people who are interested in the products of these large companies is seriously affected. If the Government can do anything to expedite the return of these ships to their former charters and contracts, it should be done as speedily as possible.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am, perhaps, somewhat more familiar with recent aspects of the subject referred to by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) than is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), because that subject has had the attention of myself and of other Canadian ministers on the other side of the ocean on many occasions during the last five or six months. I do not intend to speak very fully upon it at the moment, because negotiations have been proceeding and representations have been made quite recently; in fact, before coming to the House this morning I drafted a communication on the subject which will go forward to-day. I think that if the member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) was aware of some of the communications that have passed and of some of the representations that have been made, he would not be inclined to regard the Government of Canada as purely a mimetic government. As a matter of fact, we have taken very strong issue with authorities on the other side of the ocean as to certain aspects of the course which has been pursued. It is not desirable that I should speak more fully on this aspect of the question than in the words I have just used. The leader of the Opposition can be assured that no effort that could properly be made has been wanting and that the representations which have been addressed not only to the British Ministry of shipping, but also to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, have not been lacking either in vigour or in firmness.

Mr. FIELDING: I would like to supplement what the leader of the Opposition has said, though I take it for granted, as the Prime Minister has told us, that every effort is being made to deal with the situation. The importance of this matter to various interests can hardly be overestimated. It is of great importance to the coal interests of Nova Scotia; and that is a far-reaching interest that affects not only the coal companies, but also the employment of a large army of men. It affects also the interests of the Government of Nova Scotia.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It affects the revenue of the province.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes. It affects largely the interests of the city of Montreal as concerning the St. Lawrence coal trade. Unless these ships are released from their engagements by the British Government and placed at the disposal of the coal trade, I am afraid that we shall have difficulty in supplying the city and port of Montreal and the neighbouring sections of the St. Lawrence with the coal upon which they rely for their industrial enterprises. From every point of view the matter is one of very great importance, and I am very glad to receive the assurance of the Prime Minister that the Government have been doing and will do everything they can with a view to securing the return of these ships.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I may say to the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) that in view of pending negotiations I shall consider the advisability of making a somewhat fuller statement to the House than I have made this morning.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I know that the Prime Minister and his colleagues who have been overseas recently have done everything possible to get these ships in order that they may be put into the coal trade again. When I was overseas last summer, by making many, many visits to the Minister of Shipping, I was able to get free the ships "Turret Court" and "Turret Cape," but of course, they were under Canadian registry. When ships are not under Canadian registry, we have not the authority to deal with them as effectively as if they were, but I am fully aware of the serious lack of tonnage to bring coal to Montreal, and with the Prime Minister, I shall be very glad to lend whatever aid I can.

Mr. BUTTS: Were not all those ships that were commandeered, if not under Canadian registry, under Canadian charter?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I cannot say positively. They were not all under Canadian registry, but they were, so far as I know, under Canadian charter, and really they ought to be returned to Canada. It is a shame that they have not been, but as the Prime Minister has stated, he will take every step possible to get them back as soon as he can.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—forfeiture on owner ceasing to be a British subject, or becoming a foreign controlled company.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the minister regard this clause as necessary? It reads:

> Where, after the passing of this Act, any person who is the owner or mortgagee of a British ship registered in Canada ceases to be a British subject or becomes a foreign controlled company, that ship, or, in the case of a mortgagee of a ship, the interest of the mortgagee, shall be subject to forfeiture.

That is going pretty far. Supposing a Canadian moves to the United States and becomes a citizen of that republic, he forfeits the ship he happens to own. Is this forfeiture absolute, or is there a way of escaping it? I was struck with the severity of the clause, and I want to hear from the minister why he thinks it is necessary.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: As the hon. member will notice, that is already covered by Part 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—duration of Act:

Mr. FIELDING: May I call attention to the wording of this clause? It may be sufficient; it may not. Before the Royal Assent can be given to this Bill, in all probability, peace will be reached by means of the treaty, although it may not have been proclaimed. The present war is referred to in this Bill, but by the time this Bill is receiving the Royal Assent, there may be no present war. It is enough to call the attention of the draughtsmen to the matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should hardly think the suggestion of the hon. member would affect the matter, for this reason, that peace cannot be proclaimed until three of the Allied nations shall have ratified the treaty. Therefore, it is, I think, perfectly clear that we should still be technically in a state of war for some weeks and probably months after this Bill will have received the Royal Assent.

Mr. FIELDING: The Prime Minister is counting on an early prorogation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will, in all cases, the peace treaties have to be ratified by the various Parliaments?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is a matter of domestic concern within each country. As regards the United Kingdom, the Prime Minister has given an undertaking that the peace treaties shall be submitted to the British Parliament before ratification, and we intend to pursue the same course here with respect to all the treaties. We shall have them laid before Parliament in order that they may be considered by Parliament before we shall authorize ratification on the part of Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not know if I made myself very clear. I understand the peace treaties will be signed by the plenipotentiaries, and as regards Canada, we are bound by the signatures of the Prime Minister of Great Britain and his colleagues who attend the Peace Conference. Then the treaties will, as a matter of course, be sent to the various Dominions, Canada included, and be considered by Parliament, not for the purpose of ratification, if I understand well, but simply for the purpose of passing judgment on the treaty.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The ratification is an executive act. Parliament would not ratify the treaty; Parliament might be concerned in the passing of legislation which the Peace Treaty would render necessary. I do not think it is the intention of any Government within the British Empire to ratify any Peace Treaty as an executive act without first consulting Parliament and giving Parliament an opportunity to express its opinion thereon.

Mr. DUFF: As peace will be concluded in a month or two, I would move that this clause be changed to read:

> This Act shall continue in operation for three years.

Cutting out the words " during the present war " and " after the conclusion of peace." It will make only a difference of a month or so.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is three years from the date on which the Bill receives the Royal Assent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand the object of the Bill, but will it affect only alien enemy ownership of ships, or all foreign owners, whether belonging to a friendly power or to an enemy power.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: All foreign ownership.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand some friendly powers are going to organize a line of steamers between Canada and Rumania.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Every one, whether belonging to an enemy country or to a friendly country, has to apply to the Minister of Marine.

Bill reported, and amendments concurred in.

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue) moved the third reading of Bill No. 53 (from the Senate), to amend the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, before this Bill receives its third reading I would like to call the attention of the House to certain features of it with which I dealt on a former occasion and which I feel are not thoroughly understood. If they were, I do not think the Bill would have reached its present stage in the form in which it is now before us. I would direct attention to the clauses relating to registration and license fees in the Bill as amended, and which will hit retail druggists severely, and to subsection 2 of section 2 which, as amended, reads:

> For the purposes of this Act the proprietor of a proprietary or patent medicine shall be deemed to be the manufacturer thereof.

That means that in a great many cases retail druggists will legally be manufacturers of the medicines which they sell but which may have been manufactured by one of the wholesale patent medicine manufacturing firms. Under section 3 every manufacturer, who will be a retail druggist according to the previous section, shall, before offering any medicine for sale, procure from the minister a numbered certificate of registration for each proprietary or patent medicine he proposes to offer for sale. He will have to pay $2 for each certificate, and another section imposes a license fee of $1 for each preparation that is sold. Large wholesale manufacturing firms will simply pay $2 for each article they manufacture, which will mean practically nothing to them, while the retail druggists will have to pay the same registration fee for each article which in a great many cases they will not manufacture, and an annual license fee of $1 for each preparation sold. In order to satisfy myself of the fact that it will bear heavily on retail druggists, I made inquiries of a number of druggists, who gave me information that confirms my contention that it will. One druggist tells me that 17 preparations of his will come under this Act. He will have to pay, therefore, registration fees amounting to $34 and annual license fees amounting to $17. Another druggist sells four preparations, and another fifteen. The latter has just started in a new business and he informs me that if he carries the line of goods he had in his last business he will sell thirty-five preparations, which will mean $70 in registration fees and $35 in license fees. Another druggist has ten preparations and another six. From a city druggist I get the information that city druggists will have to pay in the way of license fees an average of from $5 or $10 up to $60 or $100 per annum. I am sure it is not the intention of the Act to impose these fees on retail druggists who after all are receiving the minor profits in the patent medicine business. I regret the Bill is worded as it is, but I believe it is not yet too late to make the necessary change, and I hope the minister will take the matter further into consideration and modify the Bill so as to relieve retail druggists of these heavy costs. It may be said that $10 or $20 is not much, but it is a great deal in these days. The reason for imposing these fees is, of course, to defray in some measure for the cost of administration, but I think the men who should pay for the cost of the administration of the Act are the large manufacturers. The great burden of the cost should be imposed on them because they can best bear it. If the Bill passes as it is, in a year or two it will fall into the same condition as the last Patent Medicine Bill and become a mere dead letter, incapable of being properly enforced owing to the opposition and dissatisfaction among retail druggists throughout the country. It is far better to have a law which can be strictly enforced than one which will meet with determined opposition all round. I trust the minister will give this matter his earnest consideration before the Bill finally passes.

Mr. SPEAKER: In submitting this motion, the minister exercised his right to speak. Under our rules a reply is not permitted, but owing to the peculiar circumstances of the case, I presume the House will give unanimous consent for the minister to make reply.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before my hon. friend replies, I would like to draw attention to a resolution passed by an association of ladies in the West in which is denounced the use of alcohol in certain preparations. I wonder if my hon. friend will take action in regard to the resolution passed by this association? As he accepted the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Beland) concerning the use of opiates in drugs, will he permit to be sold in future what remains in stock, in the various drug stores, of drugs that may be poisonous in that they contain opiates? I refer to preparations for the use of babies. Surely my hon. friend should prevent the sale of such drugs that may be in stock.

Mr A. K. MACLEAN: Immediately this Act goes into force, the further sale of these prohibited drugs will be prevented, and the loss will fall upon those druggists who have them in stock. I shall be glad to take into consideration the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Steele) and if I find that an amendment is necessary I can overtake the Bill in the Senate. The matter he suggests was discussed very fully by the committee who were of opinion that you could not differentiate between the small manufacturer and large manufacturer of patent medicines. Many local druggists sell very largely their own patent medicines, and if they want to avoid payment of the tax all they need to do is print upon the bottle or wrapper the formula showing the ingredients of the medicine.

I do not think it would be fair to say that the large manufacturer of patent medicines must pay a tax different from that imposed on the small manufacturer of perhaps similar medicines. I am doubtful whether there should be any such thing permitted as the patenting of drugs at all. I hope we will reach the time when everybody who discovers a medicine of value will be very glad to reveal the formula to the world. I am rather inclined to have very little sympathy with anybody who is engaged in the patent medicine business.

Mr. FOURNIER: I agree with the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele). When this Bill was presented to the House I drew the attention of the minister to that feature of it. The druggist pays two dollars and then one dollar for a license. Practically every druggist gets out fifteen or twenty of his own preparations, and that would mean a payment of sixty dollars or perhaps more. My hon. friend says that he has no sympathy with anybody who wants to have a medicine patented. If he consults the records of the patent office he will see that there are practically no medicines patented; there is only registration. In regard to that, I might remind him that Jenner died a poor man although he was the originator of vaccination. Physicians did not employ it at first, but now they do. What stimulus is offered to a physician who invents a cure and gives it to the world for nothing? He will deprive himself of a living.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No respectable man would keep secret a medical discovery which would cure any one.

Mr. FOURNIER: The enforcement of this Bill would have prevented the use of antitoxin and such preparations as that, which at first were kept secret.

Mr. MANION: I have studied something of the history of medicine, and I do not know of any remedy that is a cure for anything that was ever discovered by a physician anywhere that was kept secret, with the exception of Salvarsan, a cure for syphilis, which was discovered by Elrich. He kept it secret and patented it.

Mr. FOURNIER: Then, we are spending time for nothing. Drug therapy seems to have become a lost art. Doctor Huxley said of young students: They work to pass, and outraged science gets her revenge. If my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce consults the records of malpractice in the United States he will find that the cases are in the following proportions: Physicians 60, druggists 10, and patent medicine manufacturers 4. Therefore, I must ask the minister to give more consideration to the druggist's part of this matter. If he had accepted my suggestion the other day he would have wiped out the patent medicines that are absolutely no good. He has given no protection to the public and in this connection I know what I am talking about.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not answer my hon. friend's question correctly. I remember reading a resolution this morning from some ladies' organization—at Regina, I think—objecting to the use of alcohol in medicine. Possibly they did not go that far because it is impossible to compound medicines without alcohol. I think that probably the gist of the resolution was that we should prohibit an excess of alcohol in drugs without sufficient medication. Medicine might be so compounded that the liquid would be potable and could be used as an ordinary alcoholic beverage. The Bill provides that the advisory committee can prohibit the sale of any drug containing alcohol that is not sufficiently medicated. I shall discuss the point raised by my hon. friend behind me during the day personally or privately.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What penalty is provided for breaking the law in the case of drugs containing opium?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a general penalty clause.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: When this Bill was up at first I asked the minister if he could give us any information as to the cost of administering the Act. I would like to know if he has any further information.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are not in committee; this is on the motion for the third reading of the Bill and I would suggest that there should be some attention paid to the rule that only one speech is permitted from each hon. member.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am unable to give my hon. friend (Mr. P. McGibbon) that information now.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Order for the second reading of Bill No. 105 to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (Containers):

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, the House went into Committee on the following resolutions, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend The Canada Grain Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1912, and therein to provide,—

1. That in lieu of the provisions of section 102 of the said Act, it be enacted that there shall be a board to be known as the Board of Grain Appeal, to consist of three members who must be expert and experienced in the inspection of grain to be appointed by the Governor in Council;

2. That

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

(a) each member shall hold office for ten years, but may be removed for cause, and shall retire upon reaching the age of seventy years;

(b) a member upon expiration of his term of office, if under seventy years of age, shall be eligible for reappointment;

(c) one of such members shall be appointed by the Governor in Council as Chairman of the Board; two members shall be a quorum;

(d) the salaries of the members shall be such as are fixed by the Governor in Council;

(e) the fees to be charged by the Board of Grain Appeal shall be set by the said board on or before the first day of September in each year, and shall be approved by the Governor in Council.

(f) the members of the said board shall devote the whole of their time to their duties under the Act and shall not accept or hold any other office or employment.

(g) no member or officer shall, directly or indirectly, hold any interest in any corporation subject to this Act, nor directly or indirectly deal in or be financially interested in grain or hold any interest in any grain elevator or warehouse or in any partnership, corporation or business engaged in the grain trade or in the transportation or storage of grain;

(h) the members and such officers as may be directed shall before acting take and subscribe an oath of office in prescribed form.

(i) the said board shall hear all appeals from the decisions of the Chief Inspector on samples of grain, as provided in section 101, and perform such other duties as are prescribed by the Governor in Council by regulation or otherwise;

(j) the offices of the said board shall be in such place as the Governor in Council may direct, but for the purpose of better considering any particular appeal, the board or any of its members duly appointed in any special case by the said board may hold sittings at any other place in the division.

3. That in lieu of the provisions of subsection seven of section ninety-five of the said Act, it be enacted that in the month of August in each year, stock shall be taken of the quantity of each grade of grain in the terminal elevators; if a surplus in any grade of grain is found in excess of one-half of one per cent of the gross amount of the grain received in the elevator during the crop year, such excess surplus shall be sold annually by the Board of Grain Commissioners and the proceeds thereof paid to the said board. Such proceeds shall be applied towards cost of the administration of The Canada Grain Act in such manner as the minister may determine on the approval of the Governor in Council.

4. That the provisions of section 101 be amended so as to provide that appeals from the decisions of the Chief Inspector, on samples of grain respecting which the grading is in dispute, shall be to the Board of Grain Appeal.

5. That in lieu of the provisions of section 103 it be enacted that the Board of Grain Appeal may make by-laws for the better carrying out of the business of the Grain Survey Board of any district in the Division, and for the establishment of a schedule of fees for survey services.

6. That the provisions of section 104 be amended so as to provide that a survey board with offices in Calgary shall be established and appointed for the district of Calgary, and that the provisions of section 101 ("Grain Survey Board" being substituted for the "Board of Appeal") and 103, as amended, shall apply to such survey board.

7. That sections 101, 102, 103, and 104 as proposed to be enacted, shall come into force from such date as may be prescribed by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

8. That the provisions of section 119 be amended to provide,—

(a) that all licenses, issued under the Canada Grain Act shall expire on the 31st August in each year;

(b) that the Board of Grain Commissioners shall fix the amount of bonds to be given by the different persons specified in said section and by primary grain dealers; and license, control and regulate the trimming of all grain at Fort William and Port Arthur;

(c) that the said board, in its discretion, may accept security of persons, firms or corporations to whatever amount and in whatever form shall be deemed necessary by them in lieu of bonds;

(d) that any person who engages in any business for which a license is required under the said Act, without first obtaining such license shall be guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty of not less than five hundred dollars and not exceeding two thousand dollars and costs, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or to both fine and imprisonment.

9. That the provisions of section 120 be amended to provide that the board shall have all the powers of a commissioner appointed under the provisions of Part I of the Inquiries Act, chapter one hundred and four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906.

10. That the provisions of section 137 be amended to provide that every warehouseman of a terminal elevator shall be required on or before the 15th day of August of each year to file with the board the table or schedule of rates as specified in said section.

11. That a provision be added to section 151 to provide that the railway company shall on allotment of any site for new elevators and on transfer of any lease notify the board, stating the location and to whom allotted or transferred, and shall furnish the board on or before the 1st of October of each year with a list of all elevators and warehouses on its lines.

12. That a provision be added to section 160 to provide that notwithstanding the provisions of subsection four of this section, the owner, possessor or holder of a cash purchase ticket shall not be deprived of his right to payment or redemption as against the warehousemen or his surety for payment of same, if he should not avail himself of the provisions of subsection four.

13. That in lieu of the provisions of subsection three of section 166, it be enacted that except as in this part mentioned or except as otherwise provided by order or regulation of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada with the approval of the Governor in Council, no receipt or certificates shall contain language anywise limiting or modifying the legal liability of the person issuing same nor shall any of the parties thereto enter into any agreement whatever, other than that provided for in the aforesaid warehouse receipt. The entering into any such agreement shall be deemed an offence and the agreement shall be void.

14. That the provisions of section 197 be amended to provide that the applicant or his agent duly appointed in writing shall furnish to the railway agent the name and post office address of the applicant, and the section, township and range on which the grain was grown; and by adding the provision that no agent employee, owner or operator of any elevator company or of any grain company or of any person licensed under this Act shall either directly or indirectly act as agent within the meaning of this section.

15. That section 201 be amended by adding the provision that any such notice shall be made out in duplicate, one copy of which shall be open to the public at any time, being kept on file by the agent, and the other being posted up in a conspicuous place in the waiting room or in the place of business of the person in charge of the car order book, which notices shall be available to all persons for a period of not less than sixty days from the time said cars were awarded.

16. That a provision be added to section 215 to provide that no person, firm of corporation, licensed as a grain commission merchant, shall directly or indirectly buy for their own account any grain consigned to them for sale on commission.

17. That a provision be addel to section 219 that the proceeds or balances of all such carload lots shall only be applied in settlement of each specific transaction.

18. That Primary Grain Dealer shall mean any person, firm or corporation which contracts with the producer to purchase or handle grain for commerce in any manner for which a license (other than a license for a primary grain dealer) is not required under the provisions of The Canada Grain Act.

19. That it be enacted as section 219A of the said Act that,—

(a) no person, firm or corporation shall carry on the business of primary grain dealer without first having obtained a license so to do from the board and entered into bond, with sufficient sureties, for such amount and in such form as is approved by the board;

(b) the annual fee for such license shall be five dollars;

(c) it shall be the duty of every primary grain dealer to make all contracts in writing in duplicate in form H of the schedule to this proposed Act, said duplicates to be signed by both parties thereto, one of said duplicates to be delivered to the producer; and to properly account for and settle in full for contracts entered into.

20. That section 220 be amended to provide that all provisions of this part relating to commission merchants shall, so far as applicable, apply to licenses issued to track buyers and primary grain dealers.

21. That it be enacted as section 227A of the said Act that the delivery of grain to any warehouseman of a country, terminal, public or other elevator for storage, although it be mingled with that of other grain, and the shipping as removing of grain from its original place of storage in any of the elevators aforesaid, shall be deemed a bailment and not a sale.

22. That a provision be added to section 244 that if any corporation is convicted of an offence under this section, every officer of such corporation who knowingly had any part or share in the commission of such offence, shall also be personally liable to the said penalties, and in default of payment to imprisonment for not less than one month or more than one year.

23. That the penalty prescribed by section 245 be amended to provide for a penalty of not less than twenty-five dollars for the first offence, a penalty of not less than two hundred and fifty dollars or two months in jail for a second offence, and to a penalty of not less than five hundred dollars or three months in jail for a third offence.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill proposed to be founded upon these resolutions will contain perhaps two important amendments. The balance are not of such importance. The principal features are those providing for the establishment of a board of appeal in Western Canada in substitution for the board of surveys, as I think it is now called. That is the body which hears appeals from the inspectors of grain in the western provinces. Very strong representations have been made to the Government by western interests to establish this board of appeal, particularly the producing interest. This is not a measure absolutely free from doubt as to the advisability of the creation of the board and I am quite content that Parliament shall have every latitude possible in reaching a proper conclusion in regard to it. It is proposed that the board should consist of three members and that they shall not engage in any other business than the hearing of appeals from the inspections of the various grain inspectors of the grain producing provinces.

The other important feature of the Bill is that which provides for a limitation of what is called the "overages" in connection with the terminal elevators. Section 2 of the Bill will provide:

That in the month of August in each year, stock shall be taken of the quantity of each grade of grain in the terminal elevators; if a surplus in any grade of grain is found in excess of one half of one per cent of the gross amount of the grain received in the elevator during the crop year, such excess surplus shall be sold annually by the Board of Grain Commissioners and the proceeds thereof paid to the said Board. Such proceeds shall be applied towards cost of the administration of The Canada Grain Act in such manner as the minister may determine on the approval of the Governor in Council.

The Bill will propose that the proceeds of the overages shall go to the Grain Board for the purpose of meeting the cost of administration of the Canada Grain Act. I am not absolutely wedded to that proposal; it may be sounder in principle that these revenues shall go to the Consolidated Revenue Fund account, but there is a great deal to be said in favour of it.

The Bill will also provide that any surplus in excess of one-half of one per cent of the gross amount of the grain shall be sold annually. There will be doubtless a variation of opinion whether or not this is a proper average. It has been represented to me by some, that one-quarter of one per cent is a proper average. Others say one-half; while still another class suggests that the proportion should be midway between one-quarter and one-half. It is perhaps difficult to determine what is the proper percentage because the producing interest, that is the farmers in the West, object to the establishment of a cash tariff for elevators. The elevators in the past have counted upon deriving practically the greater portion of their remuneration for elevator services from the overages which they receive.

Mr. MAHARG: Did I understand the minister to say that the producers object to a cash basis for overages?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I said that I understand the producing interests of the West are opposed to the absolute elimination of overages, and the substitution of a cash tariff for elevator services. That is my impression. There was a delegation of representative men from the West before me, perhaps two months ago, and I put that question to them, and was told very emphatically that the farmers do not at present care for the idea of a cash tariff. I may be wrong in that view.

Mr. MAHARG: I think it is just the reverse; the farmers want each tariff to pay for itself. They want to know what each tariff costs them. They do not want any of the tariffs to be mixed up with overages, or anything of that kind; in their opinion, each tariff should stand on its own basis.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot hear my hon. friend very distinctly, and perhaps we misunderstand each other. I am merely stating my view that the wheat growers in the West do not want the absolute elimination of any overages at the elevators, and would not be sympathetic towards a purely cash tariff for elevator services. That is my view and I do not think I am wrong in it. If that view is correct it is very difficult to determine what should be the exact percentage of overages which should be left with the elevator company. I might say that during the past year an audit was made of the overages obtained or secured by the different terminal elevators of Canada during a period of five years at the instance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the report disclosing the results was laid upon the table some considerable time ago. I assume that the facts therein stated are known to hon. gentlemen, and therefore I need not go into any of the details of the report.

Other provisions might more profitably be dealt with when the Bill has been printed and probably it would be better to defer consideration of every question and every principle involved until after the passage of the resolution. We are providing also for more severe penalties against persons who engage in the handling of grain in any manner without having first received a license. Hon. gentlemen from the West will know that in recent years some dealers having a track-buying license have engaged in the grain commission business without having furnished the Board of Grain Commissioners with a bond, and after purchasing grain have failed to pay the persons from whom they made the purchase. We are endeavouring to prescribe severer penalties for such violations of the Act. I do not think I need trouble the committee with an explanation of other sections of the Bill, because ample opportunity will be given hon. gentlemen to discuss many matters relating to the grain business upon the second reading of the Bill. Several members earlier in the session had resolutions on the Order Paper involving a discussion of matters relating to the grain industry, but they were not reached and I promised the hon. gentlemen referred to that upon the second reading of the Bill there would be the widest latitude to discuss everything that relates to the grain business in the West.

Mr. MANION: When the Bill comes up for the second reading it will be still later in the session, and I personally would not like to take up time by any extended remarks upon this question. I would prefer to speak now upon the resolution, unless the minister is absolutely opposed to it, because the later we get in the session the more impatient of discussion the House becomes. I do not think it will tend to shorten matters to postpone the discussion until the second reading, although I have personally no intention of putting myself on record twice.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at one o'clock we were dealing with the resolutions to amend the Canada Grain Act, Chapter 27 of the Statutes of 1912. Mr. Manion had the floor.

Mr. MANION (resuming): Mr. Chairman, I regret at this late date to take up any length of time in a discussion of this kind, but this legislation has been held over for a couple of sessions and unfortunately it now comes so late in the session that it is necessary, if one speaks at all, to speak at this time. The reason I am interested in this Grain Act is due to the fact that in the handling of the wheat crop of Canada, Fort William and Port Arthur are a very important link in the chain. Before I discuss the details of the question, I am going to put on Hansard a few figures to show the importance of the wheat trade of this country, figures which took a good deal of time to compile, and which I think would be of interest to those hon. members who have not given any attention to our wheat trade.

The wheat production of the world for the average year of the five year period, 1911 to 1915, was 3,850,000,000 bushels. The United States was the highest producer with 787,000,000 bushels, then follows Russia with 653,000,000 bushels, British India with 361,000,000 bushels, France with 272,000,000 bushels, Canada with 245,000,000 bushels, Austria-Hungary with 221,000,000 bushels, Italy with 183,000,000 bushels, the Argentine with 161,000,000 bushels, Germany with 152,000,000 bushels, Spain with 125,000,000 bushels, and Australia with 94,000,000 bushels. I have taken those countries because they are the most important wheat producing countries of the world They are named in their order for the average year. It may be well to call the attention of the House to the fact that France, a little country with an area about the size of Manitoba, produced more in the average of that five years than Canada. It might give a lesson to us as to the production of wheat.

The total value of the field crops in Canada in 1917 was $1,144,000,000. Of that wheat represented 35 per cent, or $453,000,000. In the year 1908 the wheat crop of Canada was 112,000,000 bushels of a value of $91,000,000, or 81 cents a bushel, but prices vary from year to year, showing that the value of the crop depends upon the amount of wheat produced in the world, and, therefore, the demand for it. Coming down to 1917 our wheat crop was 233,000,000 bushels with a value of $453,000,000, or nearly $2 a bushel, showing that at that time, due to the war and the shortage of shipping, wheat had more than doubled in value.

Canada's export of wheat in 1874—I am just going over these figures very briefly to place them on Hansard—was 6,500,000 bushels; from 1874 to 1896 it varied from 2,000,000 bushels to nearly 10,000,000 bushels; but in 1916 we exported 157,000,000 bushels, and in 1917, 189,000,000 bushels.

Now, Sir, to get to the question before the House. I would like to explain to those hon. members who have not had any occasion to look into the wheat question at all the handling of the wheat crop from the farmer to England. The farmer produces the wheat and takes it to the loading platform or to the country elevator, where, perhaps, he sells it to a track buyer or to the country merchant. If he sells it, of course, he loses all interest in that wheat, further than delivering it to the track buyer or to the country elevator; but if he keeps it he retains his interest and handles it through a commission merchant. About 50 per cent of the wheat of the West is sold outright by the farmer to the track buyer or to the country elevator so that 50 p.c. of the wheat of the West is of interest not to the farmer, but to the wheat merchant, the elevator company, and the other buyers of wheat. After the wheat leaves the country elevator it starts on its journey to the head of the lakes, Fort William or Port Arthur. The train stops forty minutes at Winnipeg, long enough for a sample to be taken, and the sample is inspected and the grade of the wheat given from that sample. Then the wheat goes to the head of the lakes and from there is shipped to England, 65 per cent going via United States ports.

In regard to an appeal board, which is the point I am speaking of in these resolutions, I am going to deal with it as briefly as I can. I have discussed the matter with grain merchants, farmers, the representatives of farmers' organizations, and with all those who deal in the wheat of this country, and they all agree that an appeal board is badly needed at the present time. In the past when a farmer was not satisfied with the grade given to his wheat at Winnipeg he asked for an appeal, and that appeal was put before the survey board at Winnipeg, which was made up of a number of wheat merchants, at their head being Mr. Searls, who is also at the head of the Inspection Department at Winnipeg. So, in a sense, the same man who made the original inspection of the wheat judged his own work and decided whether the wheat deserved a higher grade or not. The price of that resurvey or appeal was $3; whereas in Minneapolis, where they have an appeal board such as the hon. minister is suggesting by these resolutions, they only charged up to 1918, $1, and they have 40,000 to 60,000 appeals per annum there.

The only question in dispute in regard to the appeal board is its location; that is, as to whether it goes to Winnipeg or to the head of the lakes, and that is the question that I wish to particularly touch upon. On June 11, this resolution was introduced by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and at that time it read: "That the offices of the said board shall be in the city of Fort William, Ontario." That continued on the Order Paper for some ten days, and then, on June 21, it was changed to read: "The offices of the said board shall be in such place as the Governor in Council may direct."

The reason I believe that originally Fort William was named as the proper place for the appeal board was that the Department of Trade and Commerce had received from their advisors, that is the Board of Grain Commissioners who supervise the handling of the grain crop, the advice that the proper place for the location of that board was at Fort William. Besides the fact that it so appeared on the Order Paper, the other reason why I state that is because I happen to have a copy on my file of the original alterations to be made in the Grain Act, which I got some months ago, and at that time Fort William was named as the proper place to locate the appeal board.

Now, I wish to place upon Hansard very briefly the reasons why I believe from a broad Canadian standpoint—not from a localized Fort William standpoint—that the offices should be at the head of the Lakes. I would not advocate this if I thought it were not the right place of location, for the reason that if the offices were placed at the head of the Lakes for a year, and that was found to be unsatisfactory, it would be only a matter of a year, or less, perhaps, before the location would be changed, so that the condition of my constituency would be worse than it was in the first place. Therefore I am going to give a number of good reasons why I think this appeal board should be located at the head of the Lakes.

In the first place, Winnipeg as a grain centre is an exchange only; it neither mills, nor ships, nor stores wheat, that being done at the head of the Lakes. When we speak of the wheat handling market of the world, we usually think of Chicago, which has 80 elevators with a capacity of 55,000,000 bushels. Minneapolis, which is the greatest milling centre in the world, has 59 elevators with a capacity of 53,000,000 bushels, only two million bushels less than Chicago. Whereas Port Arthur and Fort William have 32 elevators with a capacity of 52,000,000 bushels, practically the same capacity as the 80 elevators in Chicago, or the 59 elevators in Minneapolis. I might mention in passing that the elevators at the head of the Lakes are the most modern and best type and have a much greater percentage of fireproof construction than the American.

Sixty to ninety per cent of the wheat of Western Canada passes through the elevators at the head of the Lakes. In 1915 280,000,000 bushels out of 360,000,000 bushels, or 79 per cent, passed through those elevators.

The second reason is that very often the original sample is not satisfactory to the farmer or to the other owner of the wheat, because as I stated before, not only is the farmer interested, but the owner of the wheat in the shape of the country elevator man and the grain merchant. He may desire a fresh sample to be taken. As the train only stays forty minutes at Winnipeg, the fresh sample has to be taken at the head of the Lakes. That sample has to be sent to Winnipeg to be put before the appeal board, and that means that the car could not be emptied into the elevator, and therefore would have to stand on the track, and there would be demurrage charges and loss of time in respect of the equipment in these resampling cases.

The third reason is this. Supposing a boat was loading with wheat at the head of the Lakes from one of the elevators, samples of the wheat are continually being taken from the spout, and if the sampler decides that the wheat is not up to the grade called for he shuts off that spout, and that dispute has to be settled before the boat resumes loading, or they have to change the bin until they get a satisfactory sample, or the boat might have to go to another elevator. But there is also the possibility that the ship might be held up for some hours, even for some days, if the sample was to go to Winnipeg. However, that difficulty might be overcome by letting the boat load under dispute and settle the question at the unloading point. But at times the boat might be delayed, but if the Appeal Board was at the head of the Lakes the matter could be settled in half an hour and the boat go on loading. I understand from grain merchants in Duluth that that is the system there; because the Appeal Board at Minneapolis is divided into two groups, one at the loading point, Duluth, and the other at the elevator centre, Minneapolis. Delays of equipment, either of boats or of cars, at a busy season is a matter seriously affecting the wheat dealers of the West, because the great rush is on between October and December to get the wheat crop out. Therefore, if these cars or boats are delayed, it means injury to the wheat dealers of the West.

A fourth reason is that many cars are marked " Too full to sample." In the case of oats, all the cars are too full to sample; they are sampled and inspected at the head of the Lakes. But of the wheat a fair percentage of the cars, I understand, are marked " Too full to sample," and they pass on and the original sample is taken at the head of the Lakes. The argument for the placing of this Board of Appeal at Winnipeg is that the original sample would be used. But the farmers are not going to permit a condition to exist under which the system in force in the United States in that regard is better than the system followed in this country. I understand that they are going to demand the privilege of asking for a new sample if they so choose. The placing of the Board of Appeal at Winnipeg might result in some advantage so far as the use of original sample is concerned, but it must be remembered that a freight car takes three or four days to pass from Winnipeg to the head of the Lakes, and that the sample would cover the distance in twelve or fifteen hours by express, arriving at the head of the Lakes in advance of the original car of grain and in time to permit examination and the settlement of the appeal before the grain would be ready to be emptied into the elevator, and in re-samples, Fort William has all the advantage of the argument.

A fifth reason is that at the head of the Lakes the grain is transshipped from car to elevator and then back to car, or from car to elevator and then to boat; whereas sampling is the only thing done at Winnipeg. At the head of the Lakes the wheat is weighed, cleaned, stored, transshipped and finally inspected and hospitalized; that is, the hospital elevators sometimes deal with it to take care of diseased and unclean wheat.

A sixth reason is the fact that under the Grain Act of 1912 the Grain Commission is established at Fort William, and the Appeal Board should logically be at the same place.

A seventh reason is that the Grain Commission have advised that Fort William should be the headquarters of this Appeal Board.

An eighth reason is this: The matter has been taken up with leading railway officials of the West, and many of them have given me their opinion verbally that it would be more advantageous to have this Appeal Board at the head of the lakes. I am going to take the liberty of reading a few words from a letter written by one of these officials. The letter is a personal one and I shall not give the name of the writer, but I shall be glad to give it to the minister privately if he wishes me to do so. This gentleman, who is one of the well known railway men of the West, says:

> My personal opinion of the matter, from a transportation standpoint, is that railway equipment will not suffer as much delay if the Board of Appeal is located at the head of the lakes as it would if it was located at an inland point.

I have another letter from a railway man which expresses somewhat the same view, although not quite so strongly.

I have also a number of letters from farmers' organizations expressing their views on this subject. Possibly some of the representatives of farmers in this House may not agree with the view which I am advancing; but many representatives of farmers' organizations have gone on record as favouring the location of this Appeal Board at the head of the Lakes. I am going to read just a few words from one or two of these letters.

This is from the United Farmers of Alberta, Ardrossan, which I quote, from a letter dated June 10, addressed to their member in this House:

> We, therefore, point out to you the following points, which we want you to impress on Parliament to the best of your ability when the matter is brought up:
>
> 1. That the farmers have the right to call for new sample.
>
> 2. That the Board of Appeals should be located at the head of the Lakes to save delays to equipment and demurrage charges, which finally will be assessed to the farmer.

I have another letter from the United Farmers of Alberta, Cheadle, dated June 10, addressed to the secretray-treasurer of the Fort William Grain Exchange, who sent them a circular setting forth the facts in connection with this matter. It says:

> I wish to state that this local received your letter all O.K. and that the members were quite in favour with the points brought up that the farmers should have the right to call for new sample, and that the Board of Appeals should be at the head of the Lakes instead of at Winnipeg if it will save demurrage or delay to the return of the cars. I am also writing our member asking him to keep this in mind.

Here is another from the United Farmers of Alberta, Tealholme, dated June 4th:

> We are also writing our representative in the House of Commons by this mail to make use of all his influence in providing a Board of Appeal for the western farmer at the head of the Lakes.

I have also on my file here—I shall read only a few words from each—letters from a number of prominent grain dealers in Western Canada dealing with exactly the same point. The first is from the N. M. Paterson Grain Company, signed by Mr. Paterson himself. This is a firm which has 67 country elevators throughout Western Canada, and which is member of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange and of the Fort William and Port Arthur Grain Exchange. Mr. Paterson says:

> My own experience has been that the delay to cars held up for survey or final inspection, is in most cases in excess of eight days.
>
> With the Appeal Board, the proposition is simply that this board be located at Fort William. A dispute arising as to the grade, simply means that as the grain is in Fort Wiliam, under load either for eastern shipment or has arrived from the west, a sample can be drawn and the grade definitely decided in the matter of half an hour, thus releasing the rolling stock and facilitating business in the way it should be done.
>
> If this Appeal Board is not located at Fort William, the value of it is lost as the condition then, will be no different from the present survey and all the work of having this arrangement put in effect will have been for nothing.

The next one is from Davidson and Smith, another large firm of grain dealers in the West. They say, among other things:

> However, apart from the above, we honestly believe Fort William is the only logical point for an Appeal Board. Compare for instance the United States—every grain shipping centre there has its own Appeal Board: Kansas City, Chicago, Minneapolis, Duluth, New York City, each has its own Board of Appeal located within their limits. This would go to show that the Appeal Board is usually located where the grain is actually handled and where the members of such board can obtain independent samples and have full supervision over the grain in dispute.

They close by saying:

> Our firm would greatly appreciate anything you could do to have the Appeal Board established at Fort William, yet in urging this, we would again mention that our Principal Office is at Winnipeg, and our only reason, therefore, is a desire to preserve the effect we hope for in the establishment of such a board. Fort William is the logical point; it is the point, where the grain is actually handled; it is the point where the grain can be sampled, re-inspected and appealed without any unnecessary delay.

I have another letter from the Dwyer Elevator Company also members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange and of the Fort William and Port Arthur Grain Exchange in which they very strongly advance the same argument; also a letter from the Bole Grain Company, in which they say:

Concerning the Board of Appeals. The location of this body in Fort Wiliam is really one of the most important features of its usefulness. If the chief reason for its existence is policy, probably other places of larger population would have stronger claims, but you are too well acquainted with the objects of this board to require your attention to be drawn to the fact that its usefulness depends absolutely on the speed and accuracy with which they can do their work. It would be obviously impossible to get as satisfactory a despatch if the board is located away from where the grain is actually handled.

In closing they say:

In conclusion, you can readily see that the usefulness of the Board of Appeals depends entirely upon its being located where the grain is actually handled.

I have read these extracts from letters of farmers, grain merchants, and transportation officials in order to show that they strongly favour the placing of this Board of Appeal at the head of the lakes. I am arguing in favour of this step purely from a standpoint of utility, and not at all because of purely local reasons. Of course, living in Fort William, I would desire to see the board there anyway, but I submit these arguments from the broader standpoint and because it would appear that the most useful place for the board would be at the head of the lakes. I wish to quote one or two statements from a book written by Mr. Piper, of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. Mr. Piper is one of the prominent officials, if not the head, of the Empire Elevator Company of Winnipeg. They have an elevator in Fort William, but they are not members of the Fort William Grain Exchange. In this book, which is entitled "The Grain Trade of Western Canada," he says a few things which are apropos. He says:

Fort William-Port Arthur is a real terminal, as here lines of commerce converge, lake and rail meet, and bulk is broken. Here is grain tarnsferred from train to boat or train to train. It is a natural transfer point. The grain here has a value, for here, for the first time, it is in a commercial position for consumption or immediate forwarding to final point of marketing.

Then he says, on pages 127 and 128, of his book:

These qualities cannot be transferred from Fort William simply by building elevators elsewhere.

Then a little later on he says:

Fort William is a natural market. Because of the geography of our country and the resulting locations of our principal trade routes, the natural point of delivery for purchasing and selling grain is Fort William-Port Arthur.

Therefore, we find the peculiar situation and the only one in the world where a large public market—referring to Winnipeg.

—for dealing in grain is situated 400 miles away from the elevators or warehouses where the grain itself is stored for delivery.

Fort William and Port Arthur terminal elevators receipts are accepted by banks as best possible security.

I have concluded all I wish to say and I simply hope I have made it more or less clear to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that when this question is finally settled—as I believe it is his intention now to leave this matter to the Governor in Council—he will take these statements into consideration and not allow Winnipeg, unless it can prove that it is the better spot, to surpass Fort William's interest and the country's interest generally in the location of the Board of Appeal.

Mr. STEVENS: My only possible excuse for addressing the committee on this occasion in regard to this resolution is that on at least six former occasions I endeavoured to bring before the House certain facts on a resolution and each time I was asked by the minister to let it stand. While I shall not go into the matter in as much detail as I had intended, nevertheless, I think, in considering this resolution, there are certain facts of which the committee should be seized. The only point in the resolution to which I wish to draw the attention of the committee is contained in clause 3, which says:

"If a surplus amount of the grain received in the elevator is found in excess of one-half of one per cent of the gross amount of the grain received in the elevator during the crop year, such excess surplus shall be sold annually"—

And so forth. This clause is supposed to deal with one of the most flagrant abuses of the Canada Grain Act and one of the most pernicious practices indulged in by the terminal elevators at the head of the Lakes, but it does not deal with that abuse at all. To permit the one-half of one per cent amounts to legalizing overages in terminal elevators instead of making them absolutely and entirely illegal. In order that I may make my explanation and remarks as brief as possible, let me say this: that these overages are simply quantities of grain which are improperly and illegally docked or deducted from shipments of grain sent to the terminal elevators, and while not in every case does it come out of the exact shipments of the farmer, yet in the long run, the practice really means that the pioneer shipper, the farmer in the country, is the one who suffers. As a matter of fact, I might draw the attention of the committee—and they can readily figure this out for themselves—to this significant fact that by allowing one-half of one per cent, the quantity mentioned in the Bill, you are allowing elevators, such as the Canadian Pacific Elevator D, to take on an average of several years, an overage of $100,000 a year, the Eastern elevator, $110,000 a year, the Empire elevator, $160,000 a year, the Fort William elevator, $110,000 a year; the Grain Growers' elevator, $110,000 a year, the Western elevator, $125,000 a year. These figures, I have computed from an average of a number of years. Some years there would be more, other years less. I shall give some actual examples in a moment of the nature of this abuse.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member. It is necessary, in order to permit the joint conference between the Commons and the Senate to take place upon the Railway Bill, that the committeee now rise and report progress.

Mr. STEVENS: I should just like to say to the minister that this is the seventh time I have been prevented from discussing this matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In a few moments, the hon. member will be able to resume. It is not my fault that I had to interrupt.

The committee rose and reported progress to take up procedure as to a conference with the Senate.

CONFERENCE WITH THE SENATE.

ON AMENDMENT TO RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION BILL.

Mr. SPEAKER: The time appointed for the conference of the two Houses to consider certain amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 19, (Letter A of the Senate) to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, having arrived, the clerk will read the names of the members.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP, M.A., K.C., Clerk of the House, then read the names of the managers of the conference, as follows:

Messieurs Bristol, Bureau, Cahill, Calder, Henders, Lemieux, Mowat, Reid (Grenville), Rowell, Sinclair (Antigonish and Guysborough), and Tweedie.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to ancient practice, which has come down to us from the British Parliament, it has been the custom to suspend the sitting of the House during the proceedings of the conference, but I should like to point out that this practice originated when time was not of such value as it is at present, and when the business of the country was conducted in a much more leisurely fashion. No useful purpose would appear to be served by suspending the sitting of this House while the conference is in progress, and I am, of course, within the judgment of the House, but I submit that it would be better for us to start on a new road and to establish a practice of our own, which would permit business to be carried on while such a conference is taking place.

Mr. ROBB: I suppose it is well understood that this will not create a precedent for future years.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is just what it would do.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it is very desirable that this House do create a precedent that public business be not suspended merely owing to the fact that a conference upon a public Bill is necessary between hon. gentlemen representing this House and hon. gentlemen representing the Senate. Mr. Speaker has made it perfectly clear that he desires to establish a new precedent, and I think the reasons he gave for that are well founded, and I hope the House will accept them.

Mr. BUREAU: The reasons may be well founded, but there are also certain objections. Supposing a member appointed to take part in this conference is interested in the resolution which is before the House. He must do either one of two things: He must either abstain from attending the conference, or abandon the work which he is doing in the House. The rule was not based, as seems to be the impression, upon the fact that Parliament had plenty of time and that time was not as precious in those days as it is now. My opinion is that it was to guard against such a case as I have mentioned. An hon. member appointed to the conference might be put in a position where he is discussing some matter in this House, and where his absence from the House might prejudice him, and where his absence from the conference might also prejudice him. He would then be in a most embarrassing position. It happens that to-day the matter does not present itself in that light, but I think my hon. friend, the chief whip of the Opposition (Mr. Robb), is right when he says that we ought not to create a precedent because to-day it happens that no member who is on the committee takes any special interest or has any special duties to perform in what is going on in the House this afternoon. Let this pass to-day, but let it not be a precedent. I do not think the reasons put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce could stand. We are asked to pass upon this on the spur of the moment and I would not like to pronounce myself in regard to changing a standing rule of the House without going into the matter very fully. For to-day, I have no objection.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like to point out to my hon. friend that the reason he assigns against establishing a precedent, namely, the undesirability of preventing hon. members of the conference committee from attending to public duties, does not hold good because at present the practice is to allow committees of the House to sit while the House is in session.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not the same thing. This is an extraordinary proceeding. Two or three sessions have passed without such a conference as this being held.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The theory upon which the House adjourned on the occasion of such a conference was that both bodies of Parliament were together in conference, although, as a matter of fact, represented by members of each body. If hon. members are of the opinion it should be declared that it will not be regarded as a precedent, there would be no objection.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps I should point out to the House that I made my previous statement in the belief that it would be the part of wisdom to establish a new practice to obtain in the future, and, I might add, my information is that it is the intention to carry out this course in another place. In my previous statement I was submitting the matter to the judgment of the House, and if hon. gentlemen who have objected persist in their objection there will be no alternative for me but to be bound by the rule and declare the sitting suspended.

Mr. BUREAU: I did not object to the course being taken to-day, and I desire to be clearly understood. The matter under discussion seems to require the presence of members who are on the committee, but there may be other occasions when the same circumstances will not exist. I do not object to the House going on sitting while the conference is on, but hereafter if the House continues sitting while members are away important matters may be discussed here and those who are absent will be unable to consider them. It might therefore be necessary in future, in order to allow certain members to take part in discussion before the House, to adjourn while a conference is on. Some of the leaders of the parties might be interested in a discussion at the time. What I object to is having this established a precedent. I do not suppose that any injury will be occasioned if we go on now, but we should not take this fact, that we are sitting while the conference is on, as constituting a precedent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it to be the judgment of the House that we shall proceed with the business of the House and that our present action is not to be construed as a precedent. The motion is that I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee again on resolution No. 31 on the Order Paper.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT.

The House resumed in Committee on resolution to amend the Canada Grain Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1912, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. HENDERS: Mr. Chairman, I am directly interested in this resolution. I would like to have an opportunity on the second reading of the Bill to present my views on this matter to the Committee.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member will have ample opportunity on the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. STEVENS: May I resume the remarks which I was about to make when I was interrupted? I was at the point of giving to the members a few figures to show the enormous amount involved in these annual overages. In the last eight years upwards of $10,000,000 worth of grain has been illegally appropriated by the public elevators at the head of the Lake. I shall give to the Committee some figures in connection with these overages. I have the figures of all the elevators but I shall not give them all. What examples I give will apply largely to the other elevators. In regard to the Consolidated Elevator Company, the total cost of their property was $607,000 in round numbers. They had capital stock outstanding on August 31, 1917, of $628,000, upon which only $191,000 was paid. The rest of this was made up by stock dividends of $437,200. Broadly speaking, many of the terminal elevators at the head of the Lake have been paid for almost entirely out of overages and screenings illegally taken from shippers. They, the Consolidated Elevator, issued bonds which were redeemed by stock dividends of $258,000. The elevator value was increased by $60,000 by a book entry and the real estate increased by $61,900 by book entry and ten years' tax exemption granted by the generous city my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) represents, capitalized at $37,000 or a total of $160,000. To cover this credit of book entries they issued stock dividend of $159,600. This concern covered all this enormous surplus, which from year to year added to the capital of the company, out of overages. The Empire Elevator Company's situation is similar. They have a capital stock of a million preferred and a million common, and bonds of $375,000, practically all redeemed. These bonds were guaranteed by some other elevator companies. The cost of plant, however, represented in this $2,375,000 of capital and bonds is only $559,000. This elevator company I think was combined with the Thunder Bay Elevator Company, which had a stock of 5,000 shares preferred and 5,000 shares common. The stock outstanding in September, 1910, was $168,000, and stock dividends used in redeeming bonds amounted to $198,000. Then they sold out to the Thunder Bay Terminal Elevator Company for $775,000 in stock, the new company assuming $200,000 bonds. I want to call attention to some of the earnings. The combined earnings in 1912-13, amounted to $357,500. I am giving these figures in round numbers.

1913-14..	424,900
1914-15..	134,700
1915-16..	474,400
1916-17..	546,100

Now I ask the committee's particular attention to this: The comparison of the earnings of this plant is on a basis of one million bushels capacity for which is allowed operating capital of $50,000 per million bushels capacity, giving the following figures:

1912-13..	28.50 per cent.
1913-14..	33.88 " "
1914-15..	10.75 " "
1915-16..	37.82 " "
1916-17..	43.54 " "

Average earnings, 30.80 per cent.

Now take, for instance, the grain growers' elevator operated by the Grain Growers' Grain Company, and I am just citing these figures to show how this pernicious practice has even dragged into line a company which virtually organized to do away with this practice. In other words, early in the organization of the grain growers, my hon. friend, the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) found that there was an injustice being done to the farmers. He himself, I remember on one occasion, drove up with a load of grain to an elevator and was docked, I think something like two or three per cent, for some unknown reason. This roused his ire and others had similar experiences, so they organized the company. The company without any question desired to rectify these abuses, but once they got into the swim of things we find that they have been guilty of the same practices as the other elevators. The United Grain Growers' Company show overages in value for instance, as follows, I am giving the dollars:

1912-13..	$ 72,000
1913-14..	33,000
1914-15..	54,000
1915-16..	94,000
1916-17..	132,000

The figures for the last two years I have not under my hand, but I understand they were along the line of the increasing ratio.

Now just a few figures regarding the earnings of this company. These earnings are all based upon the capital basis which has been applied to all these cases by a committee of expert auditors who investigated the matter. They allowed the elevators $50,000 for each million bushels capacity. The Grain Growers' Company rent the elevator, I think, from the Canadian Pacific for which they paid the company, if I remember rightly, $68,000. Anyway, they paid a rental equal to about six per cent on the capitalized value of the elevator. Now omitting screenings and overages this company earned in those five years an average of 7.73 per cent, which is a very reasonable and fair earning. Adding the screenings, but excluding the overages, they earned 11.81 per cent on the average of five years. Including the screenings and overages, the earnings were 18.85 per cent. The point in all these figures that I have given is the abnormal earnings of all these elevators because of the screenings and the overages which they illegally take from the farmer. And why do I say "illegally?" Because in the Grain Act, I think in clause 126, you will find it clearly set forth that wherever dockages are made for screenings the elevator company shall account to the shipper, the owner, or the farmer for them. Now, as a matter of practice, it was found by the auditors who investigated all these companies that they never did notify the shippers of these screenings or dockages except when it was demanded of them, and they knew nothing about what the overages would amount to until they weighed up at the end of the year and then made the discovery, and of course they did not know to whom they belonged. These overages occur largely out of dockages made in the way I have mentioned.

Now, I want to draw the attention of the committee to the returns secured by the Grain Growers' Company—I give their figures as a sample, and I have others as well—on the capital invested.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the name of that elevator?

Mr. STEVENS: The Grain Growers' Grain Company, I think they call it now the United Grain Growers. I am under the impression that it is Canadian Pacific Railway elevator No. D. Now the company in 1916-17 earned a total of something like $446,000. The operations of the elevator yielded $238,000; screenings, $51,000; overages, $156,900, The expenses were operating and management, $136,000; depreciation, $29,000; and rent, $68,000 Deduct $234,000 expenses from the earnings of $446,000 and we have a net result of $212,000. Now it must be remembered that the working capital estimated by the experts as being needed for this elevator was $100,000. Of course, the Grain Growers' Company may say this is not a sample of their general business, but in all these calculations the same operating capital has been allowed by the experts, which in this case gives earnings of something like 211 per cent. In connection with its operations this company, in common with all other companies, sold grain on option before the overages actually occurred. In other words, they anticipated that overages would occur and they sold, or dealt in grain stored in their elevators.

Mr. CRERAR: Will the hon. gentleman state what proof he has of that statement?

Mr. STEVENS: I have an audited statement in my hand which was laid on the Table a couple of months ago, and which I had an awful time getting from the minister who has charge of this Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think so.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I had to dodge about quite a bit before I got it, but I thank the minister for his courteous treatment of me in the long run. I find that this company lost in options in the year 1916-17 the sum of $24,055. This amount, of course, is added to the expenses and deducted from the earnings leaving something like a profit of 187 per cent on the operation of that elevator. This is not an abnormal profit for elevators. This is the profit which all the other elevators shared in and it was not peculiar to the Grain Growers' elevator. For instance, we have the Port Arthur Elevator Company which has overages of $185,000, $51,000, $50,369, $112,716, and in the year 1916-17 overages to the amount of $388,000.

Now, what I want to get through the minister's head is this: He is putting in the Bill one-half of one per cent of the amount of grain handled through these elevators as a cure for these abuses. My point is that not only should we prevent these elevators from carrying on these abuses and keeping these overages, but that every dollar taken out of overages for the last five years contrary to the Grain Act should be paid back into the treasury of Canada either for distribution to the proper owners or, if that is impossible, to be used for the public welfare.

Mr. MAHARG: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. STEVENS: One at a time.

Mr. MAHARG: What would you do in the case of a shortage?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend advances an argument, which is the only argument that is presented from time to time: What would you do in regard to a shortage? As a matter of fact, shortages occur only in very few cases and are deducted from the total overage. I have not the "red" figures, as they call them, but the allowance for shortage is mighty small. The point is this: the large elevator could so operate as not to create either a surplus or a shortage. It may be that we have to make some small allowance for that; but what I am complaining of is that one-half of one per cent will virtually perpetuate the abuses which have been continuing for the last seven or eight years, and it is altogether too much. If you allow anything at all, one-tenth of one per cent would cover it very easily, or more than cover it. I ask the minister, therefore, that before he insists upon the quantity fixed in the Bill going through he should put some good actuary to work on these figures and let him figure the percentage. Any good accountant would come within a few bushels of what is necessary to protect these companies against the possible shortage which, by the way, rarely occurs.

Now I wish to point out this: Another practice carried on by all the elevators—I won't say all of them, but by a good many of them—at the head of the lakes is this, they pay their officials a bonus on the amount of overages created in these elevators from year to year. I do not like to use strong language but after studying the matter with the utmost care I see nothing for it but to say that the bonus is given for the dishonest handling of the grain in these elevators. There is no man who studies this case carefully but must be convinced that these overages are abnormal, that they are unreasonable, and they are utterly unfair to the shipper. And when I find one company paying six officials an average salary of $7,000 a year—some get a little more, and some a little less—or a total of $40,000 in salaries and bonuses, that is altogether out of proportion to the business of the elevator. This practice is a pernicious practice. It has been indulged in for a very considerable time and we, as a Parliament, owe it to the shipper, to the farmer, and to the dealers of the country that it should be stopped absolutely. Had I had the privilege of moving a resolution which has been on the Order paper ever since the session opened and to which I endeavoured to speak half a dozen times, I had intended to move that these elevators should pay back to the owners, or pay over to the exchequer of the country, the amount of overages accumulated during the last four or five years. I am not going to delay the House with any further lengthy remarks in connection with this subject, because the session has now reached so late a period that I would not be justified in doing so. I have merely cited a few figures from the report of this special committee of auditors. The Government has this report in its possession and it would take very little effort to work out what is necessary to cover any possible shortage. Certainly, to make the figure one-half of one per cent is simply perpetuating the abuse which has been carried on for a number of years, instead of making that abuse illegal. If I had my way I would make it a very serious offence to retain any overages, and also do everything possible to reduce the overages which have occurred, as they have occurred during the past few years.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman stated that the dividends paid by this company, I have forgotten to whom—were apparently seven per cent, but on many transactions they had a percentage of 211 per cent on capital invested. Do the hon. gentleman's figures show what became of that surplus? Who got that very large amount?

Mr. STEVENS: I presume that went into the general fund of the company, I could not tell the hon. gentleman that.

I might explain, Mr. Chairman, that these figures are the figures of a special committee of auditors appointed by this Government, under an Order in Council, to investigate all the terminal elevators at the head of the Lakes. Now that my hon. friend has reminded me of it, I might say that a proposition has been before this country for years that the Government should take over and operate these elevators. It has been a subject of comment not only regarding these elevators, but with respect to privately owned elevators that they have been used during the past few years to increase the cost of living. Now regarding what my hon. friend says, all the elevators referred to have been computing their earnings, and so forth, on a systematic basis. They have allowed for each elevator a working capital of $50,000 per million bushels capacity, which is considered by them after careful investigation to be ample. Now in the case of nearly every elevator I find in analyzing these figures that the elevators have either paid the whole, or a very large proportion of the total cost of their plant out of these earnings extending over a period of from seven to eight years. In the case referred to by my hon. friend, and which I dealt with a moment ago, the Grain Growers Company, they operate in a very large way all over the country and have many different branches, but the operation of an elevator is quite a simple process to figure out. They rent an elevator and pay $68,000 for it. The commission of expert auditors allowed them $50,000 per million bushels capacity, as they do in every other case, or a total, I think, of $100,000 working capital upon which, of course, interest is allowable, but the earnings of the elevator, taking out your expenses—rental and so forth—and leaving them with a working capital of $100,000 was, as I have said, 187 per cent after deducting the lossses on options on the market, and of 211 per cent without these losses.

Mr. CRERAR: The subject that is under discussion this afternoon is one of very great interest to the country—in fact, this is applicable to anything that has to do with the handling of the grain of Western Canada. I followed with a good deal of interest the remarks of my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion). I think he raised no objection to the amendments to the Grain Act, which are now under the consideration of the committee, excepting the point that the Board of Grain Appeals should be located in the city of Fort William. It may be of interest to members of the House, who are not, perhaps, closely familiar with the methods of handling our grain, to give a word of explanation as to what is really intended by the amendment to the Act providing for a grain appeal board. Our grain handling system in Canada is, I think, without exception, the best method of handling grain that can be found anywhere in the world. The foundation upon which it is largely built is our grain inspection system, whereby

4 p.m. the grain, as it comes from the farmer's hands, is inspected, classified accordingly, and sold abroad on the inspection certificates of the chief grain inspector. Now the chief grain inspector is located in the city of Winnipeg and all the members of his staff are there. There are subsidiary branches at Fort William and Port Arthur at the head of the Lakes, and in Calgary, Moosejaw, and, I believe, in Saskatoon. The inspection system as we have it to-day depends almost entirely on the eye test of the inspector. Provision is made for taking a sample of grain from a car that is shipped, in such a way as to ensure that it will be a fair average sample of the car. That sample is taken to the inspection department, passed upon by the inspection officials, and the grade given to it, and that grade governs. It has happened in the past that deficiencies or defects occasionally arose in that system, and to further improve it the proposal has been introduced into these amendments to the Act providing that a Board of Grain Appeals shall be formed to which there may be an appeal taken from the decision of the chief grain inspector in respect to the particular grade that may be given any car of grain. This has worked out very successfully in Minneapolis, and I am free to say that our farmers in Western Canada have asked pretty insistently for this for several years back.

Now the point my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) makes is that this Grain Appeal Board should be located in the city of Fort William. My contention is that it should be located in the city of Winnipeg for the reason that the sample upon which the inspection is first made is taken either in Winnipeg or before the car reaches that point. Here the sample is passed upon by the chief inspector or his officials in Winnipeg, and consequently if there is to be any value in a Board of Grain Appeals that board should be located at the point where the inspection is made. It is not intended that fresh samples shall be drawn from cars, otherwise there is no need for an appeal board. The very intention and purpose of this legislation is that there shall be an appeal from the judgment of the chief grain inspector, or his officials, upon any particular sample of grain that a farmer or dealer might wish to have referred to the Grain Appeal Board. Consequently, that being the case, the Grain Appeal Board should be located where the sample is first secured and where it is readily available.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman knows that in Minneapolis the Board of Appeal have provided for a fresh sample. He objects, at least I take it from his remarks that he does, that a fresh sample is not necessary in Canada. Is that the hon. gentleman's contention?

Mr. CRERAR: I was just coming to that point. There may be an occasional case where it is necessary to secure a new sample from the car. In such cases I will admit the hon. gentleman has a valid argument for locating the Board of Grain Appeals at Fort William, but I say that such cases will be very rare. I believe that in Minneapolis in actual experience, and in Duluth also, that has proven to be so.

We will probably further improve our existing system by providing for duplicate sampling of cars, which obtains now in the Minneapolis market. Outside of this, the hon. gentleman from Fort William had very little criticism to offer of the amendments that are proposed by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I wish now to say a word or two as to the observations of my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) who has, I am very glad to say, suddenly developed an alarming interest in, and friendship for, the prairie farmer. The hon. gentleman has not always exhibited that interest in the welfare of the prairie farmer, and naturally I am delighted to see such a manifestation on his part.

His criticism was directed mainly against what he called overages in terminal elevators, and concerning which there is a provision in the amendments proposed by the hon. minister. I regret that, perhaps for lack of time, the hon. member from Vancouver did not stated the facts altogether correctly to the Committee. I at once acquit him, let me say, of any desire to intentionally mislead the Committee; but his study of the question, Mr. Chairman, has been very elementary indeed, and he has simply picked out of a report here and there a few facts upon which he bases general conclusions that are entirely misleading.

Terminal elevators are warehouses, and, consequently, are supposed only to store grain for shippers and customers. But every man, Mr. Chairman, who knows anything at all about the handling of grain knows this fact, that you cannot operate a terminal elevator or a country elevator or for that matter any other elevator, where grain is handled in bulk, and have your outturn correspond identically with what you put into the elevator. That is an absolute impossibility. The Grain Act provides, and very properly so, that the owners of terminal elevators shall be responsible, as warehousemen, for every bushel of grain that is put into them. They have got to account for it. Not only that, but the provision is so strict, Mr. Chairman, that under regulations of the Board of Grain Commissioners for every car of grain unloaded into a terminal elevator there is issued what is called a terminal elevator warehouse receipt. That receipt is registered in the registry office of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and when so many bushels of any particular grade of grain are shipped out of the elevator, warehouse receipts corresponding to that amount have to be surrendered to the registry office of the Board of Grain Commissioners in order that they may keep accurate and absolute tab on the proceedings.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Stevens) made the statement that these overages have been illegally taken. I would just point out for the information of the Committee, that those overages have been taken with the knowledge and approval and consent of the Board of Grain Commissioners, the body created under this Grain Act to especially regulate the handling of grain in this country. If illegal why has the Board permitted it? I will tell you in a moment why they did it. Consequently when the hon. member for Vancouver leaves the impression on this Committee—as I think he did this afternoon;—or, at any rate, it was the only inference that could be drawn from his remarks,—that there has been a condition of affairs in Fort William approximating robbery, he is leaving an impression that is altogether contrary to the facts.

I stated a moment ago that it is impossible to operate an elevator, whether at Fort William, in the country, or anywhere else, and have your out-turn correspond exactly with what you put in. That is a well-known fact. I have stated also that the owner of a terminal elevator warehousing grain is responsible for every bushel of grain that goes into that elevator. Not only so but he is responsible for every bushel of grain of a particular grade that goes into the elevator. In other words, if I, as a terminal warehouse man, put 100,000 bushels of No. 1 Northern grain in my bins and if the inspection has been any way lax, the inspection department has for example allowed more moisture in the grain than should be permitted for No. 1 Northern, and the grain goes out of condition, I nevertheless am responsible to the Board of Grain Commissioners for 100,000 bushels of No. 1 Northern, and in that event I have to go into the open market and buy the grain necessary to make up the deficiency. Those are facts that were not stated by the hon. member for Vancouver in presenting his so-called facts, and in order to get an impartial survey of the situation they should be stated.

Now, how do the overages arise? Naturally, when the superintendent of an elevator is conscious of the fact that his elevator is short on any grade at the end of the season, or it is short on the total amount of grain put in, and his company has to go into the market to buy that grain to make up the deficiency, he uses every precaution to insure that his elevator comes out right. When discussing this matter with the Board of Grain Commissioners years ago I stated to them, "You guarantee me against loss from shortages in my elevator, and you can have every bushel of surplus. But as long as the elevator warehouseman is placed in the position that he must make good every bushel of shortage that occurs in his elevator, then you cannot justly take away from him the right to participate in any surplus there may be." And that principle, Mr. Chairman, is recognized in the whole administration of the Grain Act, not only in the operation of elevators in the country but everywhere else.

Indeed, it is a comparatively easy matter to secure a surplus in an elevator if your handling is large. The hon. gentleman—I do not know what his motive was—directed particular attention to the Grain Growers' elevator in Fort William. I may say that in one season when the crop was large we handled 28,000,000 bushels of grain through that elevator, and the amount of profit—to which the hon. gentleman has referred, I was going to say, pathetically, or at least in a tone of voice that indicated his extreme interest in the matter—amounted to only a fraction of one cent per bushel on the stuff handled. The rather harrowing inference that the hon. member threw out in his remarks, that the making of this profit added to the cost of living, appeared to me to be ridiculous, and would appear ridiculous to the hon. gentleman himself if he gave the matter a little thought.

I commend the step that is taken by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce in the amendment which he has brought down; and it may be that the existing system is not an ideal one. My own view is that the Government should frankly guarantee the elevators against shortages, place them upon such a basis that their remuneration shall be confined to the cash tariff that they charge, and then appropriate the surplus. But that throws the risk of shortage in the elevator upon the Board of Grain Commissioners, and that is a risk that they very naturally do not wish to assume. Moreover, if these surpluses are entirely taken from the elevators, unquestionably it would mean an advance in the handling charge from three-quarters of a cent a bushel to at least 1½ cents a bushel. In no grain handling centre in North America are the rates for the handling of grain through terminal elevators as low as they are in Port Arthur and Fort William.

As to the question of screenings, I regret that the member for Vancouver did not state the facts clearly. It is true that screenings come from the cleaning of grain, but there is a regulation of the Board of Grain Commissioners that where more than 3 per cent of screenings is cleaned from a farmer's car, the grain merchant handling the screenings has to make a separate return to the farmer for the value of them. Only in cases where the percentage of screenings taken from the car is under 3 per cent is no return made.

Mr. MORPHY: Is there any regulation in the Grain Act respecting surplus of grain which corresponds to that with regard to screenings which go back to the farmer?

Mr. CRERAR: There is no such provision, because in my judgment, and, I am sure, in the judgment of the Grain Commissioners, it would be impossible to work out any regulation that would permit that. A small allowance per car is made for loss in unloading—an allowance of 30 pounds per car for invisible shrinkage—and a portion, at any rate, of any surplus the elevator secures comes from that source. But a separate return is made for screenings where the screening is over 3 per cent, and in that case a charge is made to the shipper for cleaning the grain. The tariff for receiving grain in the elevator, unloading it, elevating it, binning it, and shipping it out again if shipped within fifteen days, is three-quarters of a cent per bushel. In cases where a separate return is made for screenings an additional cleaning charge is made, but where no separate return is made for screenings—that is, where the screenings are under three per cent—no charge for cleaning is made. In other words, the elevator operator takes the screenings as his pay for cleaning the grain; and that practice has prevailed all down through the years. I quite appreciate the fact that there is possibility of an abuse growing up in this regard. But if the Government is not prepared, through the Board of Grain Commissioners, to assume the responsibility for any shortage that may arise in these elevators, then in my judgment the minister is taking entirely the correct course in permitting the elevator to retain a small portion of any surplus that may arise.

Mr. KEEFER: With regard to the question where the Board of Appeal should be located, I cannot agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) that because the first inspection takes place at Winnipeg, and because that is where the chief inspector resides, the Board of Appeal should be located there. As a matter of fact, the chief inspector used to be at the head of the Lakes and should be there now; he should not have been taken away to Winnipeg. The business is all done at the head of the lakes. It passes through Winnipeg, and if there is any dispute about the quality of the grain a new sample should be taken. The car is only a short time in Winnipeg, and the sample may be defectively drawn; the only procedure that is fair to the farmer is to resample. But the cars stand on sidings at Port Arthur and Fort William, and there is delay incidental to that rolling stock. If the minister will consult the convenience of the railroad people and of the public generally he can come to only one conclusion, and that is that the Board of Appeal—as the Board of Grain Commissioners did recommend—ought to be at the head of the Lakes; that it ought to be at Fort William. I may tell the minister that when Port Arthur and Fort William unite on a thing, it must be right.

Then, there is the question of overages. The minister is to be congratulated for cutting down these overages to at least one-half of one per cent. I was hoping, to use a vulgar phrase, that he would "go the whole hog." If a return to the elevator company of three quarters of a cent a bushel is not sufficient to provide for any falling off of the grain, increase that amount, but let us be fair and square with the Grain Act, which makes it absolutely illegal for terminal elevator people to deal in wheat. Yet, by virtue of the method which we have been pursuing, we have, in an indirect way, been giving the elevator people the right to take at least 3 per cent of the carload, clean it over again, and get that much to the good.

Mr. CRERAR: If the practice is illegal, why has it been permitted by the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. KEEFER: I do not say that it is illegal; if it was illegal, it would have been stopped; but it is contrary to the underlying principle of the Grain Act. It has been held by some judicial twist of some person to be legal, but it is contrary to the underlying principle, namely, that those terminal elevators should not speculate in wheat.

Mr. CRERAR: They do not.

Mr. KEEFER: They should handle the grain from the shipper and send it on its way to the market. What is going to be the effect if you abolish this overage and dockage? These terminal elevators, with the exception of three or four, will go out of business, and they will all become private elevators. They will all at once begin to deal in wheat as they ought to be doing, as many private elevator companies are doing there, buying wheat from sample and grading it as they can and selling to a mill as they do at the place where the wheat finally reaches in England. That would be a benefit to the farmer, who will get more for his wheat when a sample market is established. The grain can be worked together, and perhaps a better price can be obtained, and he will not lose his dockage of 3 per cent. Private elevator men would buy the whole carload and they would be all competing one against another, so that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) would have the principle he has advocated so strongly for, namely, free trade.

The question of screenings has been a continuous source of trouble at the head of the lakes. If the screenings are to go 3 per cent up, to the owner of the elevator, there is an interest there that should not exist. If the elevator owner is paid simply the price he ought to be paid for cleaning the wheat a great deal of controversy will be removed and possibly a desire to get ahead of somebody else.

Mr. ROBB: When the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce brought in his resolution this morning I could not but think that he was introducing this proposed legislation under duress, having in mind the statement made during the Budget debate by an hon. member from the West, that they had put the gun up to the Minister of Finance and compelled him to create three new government positions. We gather now, from the debate, that there are two interested parties; we have, first, Fort William and Port Arthur, which apparently are united in a campaign to open this new office in the twin cities. They are doing that upon instructions from their Board of Trade, because I hold under my hand—and I suppose every hon. gentleman has a copy—a circular letter put out in May by the members of the Fort William and Port Arthur Grain Exchange urging the passing of this legislation. The Committee will note that no person has as yet made any real complaint against the present system of the Board of Appeal. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has given his blessing to the idea of this new board, but he has made no real complaint against the present system of appeals. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), if I understood him aright, stated that the Board of Appeal was constituted by certain members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. If that were correct, it would not be an ideal system, but my hon. friend is apparently wrong in his information. Article 102 of the Manitoba Grain Act provides that the Survey Board shall consist of twelve members, six of whom shall be appointed by the Board of Trade of Winnipeg, two by the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Manitoba, two by the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan, and two by the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Alberta, so that one-half of the members of the Grain Board are appointed by the Ministers of Agriculture of the three provinces which are particularly interested in grain. If there be anything wrong with those six gentlemen, if they have not the proper qualifications, then the remedy should be with the Ministers of Agriculture of the several provinces. My hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River advances an argument in favour of locating at Fort William and Port Arthur, because he says that the milling is all done there, and that there is no milling at Winnipeg. As a matter of fact, there is a larger milling capacity at Winnipeg and St. Boniface,

I think, three times the capacity that there is at Fort William, where there is only one moderately-sized flour mill, the Ogilvy flour mill.

Mr. MANION: There are two statements which the hon. member made in which he misquoted me, and I know he has no intention of doing so. He said that I stated that the present Appeal Board—really it is a survey board—is comprised of members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. I did not mention the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. I said that the appeal was put before the Survey Board at Winnipeg, which was made up of a number of Winnipeg merchants, at their head being Mr. Searls. In the second place, I did not say there was no milling at Winnipeg. I simply said that, as regards handling shipping and milling grain, there were better facilities at the head of the Lakes than at Winnipeg.

Mr. ROBB: The inference is that the hon. gentleman tried to create the idea that the Survey Board was comprised of Winnipeg Grain Exchange men. As I was proceeding to say, there are large mills at Winnipeg. There is a large mill at St. Boniface, a large mill at Keewatin and a large mill at Kenora. I am not going to enter into an argument as to whether this board should be at Winnipeg or Fort William. My contention is that it is an unnecessary expense, that it is creating three jobs for some people. I do not know who are making applications for these jobs, but I should like to point out that it is contended that these three gentlemen should be expert grain men. That was the contention when the members of the Board of Grain Commissioners were appointed, but who were appointed by the Government of which Sir Robert Borden was the Prime Minister? The Government appointed Mr. Staples, a very good fellow. Everybody who sat in this House with Mr. Staples liked him very well, but he was an ardent politician; he played the game fair and played it for all it was worth. He never pretended to have any expert knowledge of grain except that he was a good farmer. Then they appointed Mr. Leslie Boyd, another good chap. He was a lawyer of the city of Montreal; he was President of the Conservative Association, and, I think, once or twice he was a candidate for the Conservative party. Those were the qualifications of these expert grain men. Having that in mind, I wonder who is going to be appointed this time. Will it be an expert grain man? Will it be a man who is experienced in law or in theology? I do not know.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill will provide that he will be an expert in regard to grain.

Mr. ROBB: Will he be an expert in law or theology or grain? If the Government are not satisfied, if there is complaint against the present system of the Appeal Board, that is to say, six members appointed by the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, the handlers of the grain and six members appointed by the Ministers of Agriculture of the three Prairie Provinces.

Would it not do to appoint this grain commission as appeal board? They have not very much to do and no one will accuse them of being overworked. We are told they are expert grain men, and as their offices are in Fort William that will satisfy gentlemen there and add no more expense to the country. I am opposed to the resolution because it is imposing an unnecessary burden on the people. There is a suspicion that the real intention is to gratify the ambitions of Fort William, on the one hand, and on the other to create good fat jobs for friends.

Mr. MAHARG: Let me assure my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) that the people who are asking for this are not holding a gun at anybody's head. They have been trying to get this thing done for the last five or six years. The people who produce the grain that furnishes the business for all these elevators are the ones with whom this idea originated, and not the people of Fort William, Port Arthur or Winnipeg, or the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. The president of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange was sitting in the gallery this morning and I had a long talk with him. They are not asking for the board, and may have even told the minister that perhaps it is unnecessary. So that it is not the grain interests that are seeking this. As a matter of fact, they would probably get along better without it. The people that are asking for it are the producers of grain, in order that they may get a fair deal in the grading of their grain. The grain will have to carry the expense. If a car is appealed, the appeal is charged against that car, whether it belongs to the farmer or to the grain dealer. The revenues of the country will not therefore be taxed to pay for these charges, and the business in this respect will be self-sustaining. There can therefore be no objection on the score of charges.

Mr. ROBB: Suppose the inspection is so satisfactory that there are no appeals, who pays?

Mr. MAHARG: Well, that is why we are asking for this board. The difficulty is that the present board is entirely too cumbersome. There are twelve men, who the hon. member for Vancouver said were Winnipeg Exchange men. They are Winnipeg Exchange men, and they are the only men who could effectively deal with the business. It would be inadvisable to appoint any man to come from outside of Winnipeg, because you would have to pay a special salary to him, and he would have to be there all the time. The only way in which the business can be conducted is to have members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange who are accustomed to dealing in grain. These men have to be got together and as they are all busy men attending to their own affairs it is hardly fair to ask them to leave their business at a time when minutes may mean thousands of dollars to them, and where it is important to sell grain at the proper time. A man may have brought 50,000 or 100,000 bushels of grain the day before and have to dispose of it within a certain time, and time means a good deal in these circumstances. Another circumstance in connection with the matter is the fact that men do not like dealing with grain that may belong perhaps to their fellow members. There may come before them samples from friends or even their own grain and they do not like the embarrassment this causes. We want an absolutely independent board that will have no interest in any one car of grain that comes before them, men who will not be permitted to deal in grain or handle it in any way privately. It will be for the board to make such charges as will render the work self-sustaining. I visited Minneapolis on different occasions and the system there worked perfectly, and we appealed to the Government years ago for the establishment of a similar board at Winnipeg. As to the location of the board the consensus of opinion favours Winnipeg. We have our own farmers' organizations in the three western prairie provinces and they have been looking after the affairs of those provinces in all these matters, and they also have their own two companies, which are the largest initial grain handling companies in the world. The Saskatchewan company is only a few years old but it handles 25 per cent of the entire grain produced in Saskatchewan. They have been able successfully to handle their own business on a fairly favourable basis and we believe that we have men who understand the grain business as thoroughly as those in any of the other companies. I have no particular interest in Winnipeg, except that we have commission officers in Winnipeg and have our terminal elevator. I am not speaking on behalf of Winnipeg, or Fort William, or Port Arthur. We have far more interest in Port Arthur than anywhere else, we have a million dollars there where we have not ten in Winnipeg in so far as real estate is concerned. If we were considering our interests in so far as property is concerned we should speak of Fort William or Port Arthur, where we have our investments. But we are not looking at it in that way. We have studied the system throughout and have considered the system in Minneapolis as well and we have come to this conclusion, without a dissenting voice, we also claim that the men who produce the article which is going to be inspected and who pay for the charges should at least have some say as to where the operation shall take place. Primarily they are the only people interested and it is only reasonable that they should study their own interests and make recommendations as to where the board should be located. The managers of our companies who are not shareholders, at least so far as the Saskatchewan company is concerned, have no hesitation in saying that the board should be at Winnipeg where all the inspection is done. We are given to understand that sample markets will be established in Winnipeg and that being the case, samples will be taken outside of Winnipeg, just as is done in Minneapolis. Samples will be forwarded to Winnipeg by express in most cases, and the inspection can be done; and in case it is necessary to re-sample, if it cannot be caught at Winnipeg it can be caught at Fort William. There is an erroneous impression that where an appeal is called for it is necessary to re-sample the car. That is not the case. It simply means a disagreement with the man who has inspected that particular sample of grain, and the sample will go to the Board of Appeal.

Mr. MANION: In Minneapolis could not the farmer ask for a re-sample, and is that not what you advocate in Canada?

Mr. MAHARG: Any farmer can ask for a re-sample of a car if he wishes, but that has not been the case very often in Minneapolis, where they have two sampling bureaus. They have one which is maintained by the government and one by the trade itself, and they check up one with the other. We are asking now for duplicate sampling at Winnipeg to obviate as much as possible the re-sampling of cars. Altogether, we are perfectly satisfied in our own minds that Winnipeg is the logical place for the Board of Appeals to be constituted.

I do not think I need touch upon that any farther because I think it should be patent to every one that the producers of the grain who furnish everything in connection with the elevators should at least have their interests considered. There is one other point in connection with overages that I want to touch upon. The committee wants to bear in mind that the terminal operators have absolutely nothing to do, one way or the other, with the weighing of the grain. The Dominion Government weigh the grain into the elevators, weigh the grain out of the elevators, inspect the grain into the elevators and inspect the grain out of the elevators. The terminal operator has absolutely no responsibility as to the weighing or grading of the grain. If the Government do not take sufficient dockage on the grain, it is their fault and not that of the terminal operator. He has to go by instructions laid down by the Government both as to grade and dockage. There might be the inference that probably the Government are not careful enough in their weighing. I would not make that assertion at all because I think the Government are as careful as they can be and I do not hesitate to say that it would be absolutely impossible to bring an elevator out even. In an operation covering 300 elevators, we have never yet been able to bring an elevator out even. We will have one with a big overage and another, a few miles away, with just as big a shortage.

The hon. gentleman said that he understood that these operators were paid a bonus according to their overage. I hate to take up the time of the committee but I hate to let that go unchallenged. It is only in connection with our country elevators that this bonus is allowed. We have not been operating our terminals long enough to establish a precedent or to form a basis for future action because we only got this system in operation last season and it has been in existence for too short a time to enable us to come to a definite conclusion. This season we will be in an entirely different position. With regard to the bonus we have established there are five or six different points that count favourably or unfavourably to the operator. Accuracy of weight is one and that is the only point that I shall deal with. Accuracy of weight counts twenty points. If a man has got 100 bushels of an overage and another man has got 100 bushels of a shortage, they are both dealt with exactly in the same way in so far as the amount of the bonus is concerned. The man who gets 100 bushels of an overage does not gain one iota on the man who is 100 bushels short. I might say that we have discharged men for having large overages. While we have not discharged one for shortage where we have discharged two for overages. That is not the basis we adopt. We adopt the basis of actual, square dealing. The same thing applies exactly to the grading of the grain; we desire to secure accuracy in grading. The man who gains grades does not gain one cent by way of bonus over the man who loses grades. They are dealt with in exactly the same way on principle so that in so far as our country elevators are concerned the statement of the hon. gentleman is absolutely erroneous. That is not the basis that we follow at all.

Mr. ALLAN: What do you bonus them for?

Mr. MAHARG: That is a question that we may differ upon. We thought it would be a good thing to bonus these men to promote efficiency. We bonus them for efficiency and what we base our bonus on principally is accuracy. The number of complaints from individuals that an operator is doing business with would be one of the things that would be taken into consideration. Another point is the giving of satisfaction generally to the community as a whole but the whole thing hinges on efficiency all the way through and no man gains on account of gaining on his grades or having overages. The man who gains on his grades or has overages is dealt with exactly the same as the man who has a shortage or the man who loses grades.

I do not think I had better take up any more time in dealing with that point; I think it has been fairly well covered. But there is one other point. One hon. member used the expression "in the interest of the public." I do not know what he meant, the public who are interested directly in the operation of these elevators are the producers of the grain. If a large overage is taken, it is just that much taken from the producers of the grain. They are the people who are directly interested in it. I do not think a fraction of one per cent per bushel would affect the consumer very much and, while I am on that point, I may say for the benefit of the minister, that I fully agree with him in fixing the amount of the overage that the elevators shall retain. I would go a little further and adopt the recommendation of our company, which is one of the largest handling companies, that the over-age be not more than one quarter of one per cent. We originated these companies to regulate the grain business. Because the company of the hon. member for Marquette made large profits, that is nothing for which you can censure them or us. They are in that business and if they did not take the grain out of the screenings and get all they could out of it, for their shareholders, they would be derelict in their duty. They would not have done their duty if they had done differently. That is where a large per cent of your overages come from. If the hon. gentleman had gone to the trouble of looking up the returns of the Canadian Pacific elevators, where they do not reclean their screenings, he would have found that they have no overages. Am I right in that?

Mr. CRERAR: In one year they had a very large shortage.

Mr. MAHARG: In the case of the Canadian Pacific, where they do not scalp their screenings, as they call it, they have had a shortage and in no year have they had very much of an overage. The fact that the Grain Growers' Grain Company produced an overage is something for which they surely could not be condemned, because they were in it for their shareholders, whose business it is they are largely occupied in doing, and which they were in duty bound to do. They recleaned their screenings and that is where their overages largely come from. If you want to turn your screenings over to other companies with a certain percentage of the farmer's grain in it, those other companies will get the advantage of it. By the way, most of the companies mentioned by my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) were not public terminal elevator companies at all.

Mr. MANION: I did not deal with the elevator companies.

Mr. MAHARG: But you read communications from some of the elevator companies.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I beg your pardon; I thought you were speaking of overages.

Mr. MAHARG: I think I am correct in stating that two out of three of these companies are not public terminal elevator companies, that they are conducting private terminal elevators and it is impossible to know if private terminal elevators have an overage, as they are not asked to register.

Mr. MANION: I did not discuss the overage question at all. I was speaking of the Appeal Board and presenting the argument of the elevators that the Appeal Board should be at the head of the lakes.

Mr. MAHARG: Quite so. But I want to make it clear that these are private elevator concerns that you quoted from except one. Now, I want to go a little bit farther and point out that even if you are only going to allow them one-quarter of one per cent you will not accomplish your end there for the reason that that one-quarter of one per cent will not exist.

I know just about what the elevator companies will do. If they get $19, $20, $25 or $30 a ton for screenings, they are not going to go to the trouble to scalp those screenings to get the grain out of it in order to turn it over to the public funds. Make no mistake about that; they can control it on the inside so that when it comes to fixing one-quarter of one per cent the Government will not accomplish what it expects to.

Mr. ROBB: This is a question on which I want to get some information. I am not sure whether I understood my hon. friend to argue that the only people interested in the overages were the producers. Is that right?

Mr. MAHARG: Yes, they are primarily the people interested in the overages.

Mr. ROBB: Well, suppose that an elevator takes in 100,000 bushels of wheat and ships it east to a flour mill in Ontario and the flour mill is 5,000 bushels short. Is that in the interest of the producer or the miller?

Mr. MAHARG: As I said a minute ago the Government weighs the wheat in and weighs it out. The operator of the elevator has nothing at all to do with the weighing in or weighing out of the wheat—or the grading of it. That is a government matter purely and simply. They have their men there all the time and there is no scale that is allowed to be dumped without their inspectors seeing it.

Mr. ROBB: I know that, but who is interested in the shortage, the producer or the miller?

Mr. MAHARG: The terminal elevator will have to make up that shortage. As the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) said, in the case of every car of grain that goes into the elevator a warehouse receipt is issued for the number of bushels according to the grade the inspector says they shall be, and if the terminal elevator operator at the end of the season has not sufficient grain to fully meet the requirements of these certificates, then he has got to go on the market and purchase grain to make up the shortage. So that in the case spoken of the elevator man would be the one to make good the 5,000 bushels shortage.

Mr. MORPHY: If this Bill has done nothing else, in my opinion it has shown the great necessity for some new method of handling the grain trade. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) took occasion to say before concluding his remarks that this was largely a matter of interest to those directly connected with the grain trade. I am not interested except as a citizen of Canada, and I have been rather painfully struck with the disclosures which have been made here to-day in regard to the handling of the grain as it affects the farmer or the producer. The hon member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has given figures extending over a series of years, taken from official documents, and has made the point that out of the farmers of the West for the years he mentioned tens of millions of dollars have been, as he said, illegally taken by these elevator companies and grain growers elevator companies, which have been defended here so warmly to-day by the members for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) and Marquette (Mr. Crerar). I was very much struck with the fact that although both these members have sidestepped as to the gravamen of the charge made by the hon. gentleman from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) neither of them have attempted to deny the figures that he placed upon the records of this House, or the charge that by the principle upon which these elevators operate in dealing with the farmers millions of dollars which 5 p.m. belong to the farmer have been taken from him. I think it was a case where, if possible, a good defence ought to have been made in the interests of the members of this House who are connected with elevators or elevator companies, but so far the impression created by the hon. member for Vancouver is still on my mind. What I deduce from the debate is that the farmers, after three per cent of their screenings is taken from them, get the rest back. I asked the hon. member for Marquette if it were so why they did not get the wheat back. It appears they give the farmer back the refuse but they do not give him the solid stuff; and thus tens of millions of dollars are gathered up and garnered in by the elevator companies at the expense of the farmers who sell grain to them.

Mr. CRERAR: The gentleman is quite wrong in the position he is taking. With respect to the surplus screenings over three per cent there is a definite return made to the farmer for the value they can be sold at in the open market. The screenings under three per cent are taken in lieu of a cleaning charge by the elevator. If the value of these screenings were returned to the farmer the elevator company would simply have to add an additional half a cent per bushel for the cleaning of the grain.

Mr. MORPHY: I was proceeding to say that this peculiar fact stands out: the point was clearly made by the member for Maple Creek that if a farmer sends a surplus of 500 bushels he gets no credit for it in the shape of good grain. Although it belongs to the farmer it is absorbed by the elevator company. That has not been explained in this House, and it seems to me that some explanation should be forthcoming. As I take it, if the farmer is short in his weight he loses. The elevator company docks him for that shortage unless it is clearly attributable to some defect in the car. If the farmer is short in his weight I am informed by one who knows that he is charged for that in some of the elevators. Whereas, if there is a surplus the elevator company gets the benefit of it. Therefore the farmer loses in both ways; he loses when he is short and he loses when he is long. I do not see how this can be reconciled, and it strikes me that it is time some legislation was passed to deal with this matter. I am not in favour of the Bill as I see it. I think the principle of the Bill is right, but when I see this in par. 3:

> If a surplus in any grade of grain is found in excess of one-half of one per cent of the gross amount of the grain received in the elevator during the crop year, such excess surplus shall be sold annually by the Board of Grain Commissioners and the proceeds thereof paid to the said board. Such proceeds shall be applied towards cost of the administration of The Canada Grain Act in such manner as the minister may determine on the approval of the Governor in Council.

I am disappointed. I am informed when Farmer A sends a carload of grain into the market through the elevator channels it is ear-marked; the elevator operators know that it is his grain. If he is 500 bushels long by mistake, I do not think the Government has any right to the money as an overage in connection with the transaction. There cannot be $10,000 000 worth of overages in these grain elevators unless the operators know where it originates, especially when it is shipped in carload lots, for the wheat is ear-marked, it is tabbed, it belongs to Farmer A or to Farmer B, and I do not think that the Government or the elevator companies have any right to the over plus that is sent in through mistake.

I did expect a better defence from those interested in elevators in reply to the allegations of the member for Vancouver. It may be of no direct interest to many hon. members by reason of their not being connected with the trade; but if his allegations are true, they shock the moral conscience of every man professing to be dealing fairly and squarely. I ask those interested in the elevators: Where has that $10,000,000 gone, where are the surpluses shown in the elevators of the companies mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver, companies with profits of 211 per cent? They only paid the farmer-shareholder seven per cent. What has become of the rest? It seems to me that that question ought to be answered. Let us have statements from the hon. gentlemen, let us have the truth, so that we may see whether the high cost of living is related to the wheat taken from the farmers which the elevator companies did not pay for.

Mr. MAHARG: I am not interested in the surpluses or dividends of the other terminal elevator companies. In so far as we are concerned, we have not made any. We only handled a small amount through our terminal elevator last year—not enough to base any figures on.

Mr. MORPHY: How about the other companies that have?

Mr. MAHARG: I cannot speak for those other companies.

Mr. MORPHY: Yes, you can.

Mr. MAHARG: No. What I said was that our company was brought into existence as a regulator; that is the position we take. For the information of the hon. gentleman,—and probably there are present some of the older members who were in the House at the time,—but if the late Sir Richard Cartwright was here he could tell all about the fight that the farmers put up against the terminal elevators ten, twelve or fifteen years ago. We have been scrapping those elevators from their inception. We had to fight the whole elevator interests of the North American continent, and three or four of our farmers who had never been off the land had to come here to Ottawa and scrap with them. We asked the Government to take over the entire system of terminal elevators, but the late Laurier Government could not see their way clear to do so; they thought control by a commission would be the proper way. We eventually induced the late Conservative Government to start a programme of Government owned elevators to regulate the other elevators.

One of the speakers on this side of the House said, "Why not let the Grain Commission perform the service that you ask this appeal board to perform?" The Grain Commissioners are not expert grain men, they are an administrative body, and I venture to say that not one of them would pose as a grader of grain.

Some hon. members appear to have been terribly shocked at what has been disclosed here to-day. I can tell them something that will give them a still greater shock. When Mr. C. C. Cassel came along on one occasion unexpectedly and locked up all the elevator bins, he found that several hundred thousand bushels of low grade grain had mysteriously disappeared, but Nos. 1, 2 and 3 grades showed a corresponding increase. That is what we have been up against all the time, and we would have been tickled to death if the Government had taken over those elevators and operated them. But we had to build our elevators in order that we might arrive at a proper basis for dockage, overages, screenings, and the like, and since our elevators have been in operation we have reduced the amount of screenings reclaimed from 5 to 3 per cent. We wanted the Grain Commissioners to reduce it to 2 per cent, but the elevator operators said, "No. If you reduce it below that you will have to give us an additional charge."

The Canadian Grain Commission fixes all the charges of the terminal elevators for elevating, cleaning, drying, or whatever it may be—all those charges are regulated by the Grain Commissioners, so that in a measure the charges are controlled. But it is the overages where the shoe pinches, and that is what we are endeavouring to get the Government to regulate.

Mr. MORPHY: Can the hon. gentleman suggest any way by which the honest farmer can get his share of the overages that have been stored up by the elevator companies?

Mr. MAHARG: Yes, but I am afraid that the method of operation would be so cumbersome that there would be nothing left. The only way that could be done would be at the end of the year to take the overages in any one elevator, keep track of the different grain that came in from the farmers to that elevator, and then rebate to them proportionately their amount of the overages.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is usually the grain dealer's wheat that goes into the elevators?

Mr. MAHARG: About 50 per cent of it on the average is grain that belongs to the elevator companies; that is, grain the title of which has left the hands of the farmer either at the local elevator or on the track. So that really the grain trade owns about 50 per cent of the grain that reaches the terminal elevators.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I thought it was 85 per cent.

Mr. MAHARG: No. It is 85 per cent on the other side of the line. That is the way it works with our elevator company, and I imagine it would probably work similarly with the others. The hon. member for Perth North (Mr. Morphy) spoke of farmers shipping long or short. For his information, I might say that there is absolutely no such thing as a farmer being either long or short on his wheat when it goes into the elevator.

Mr. MORPHY: Is not that affected by the dockage that the grain man takes without consulting the farmer?

Mr. MAHARG: That is at the initial point. If the committee is not wearying I shall be very glad to give this information. That leads me to another point. You are referring to the grain of the farmers that may have been sold at the other end, are you?

Mr. MORPHY: No. I am referring to the fact that the farmer is skinned all the way along the line wherever his grain is handled.

Mr. MAHARG: I am inclined to agree with you that that was so until we got our own elevators. We are trying to regulate that.

Mr. KEEFER: Are not your own companies making money?

Mr. MAHARG: Certainly. Nobody is trying to hide the fact that they are. What are they in business for? No company could carry on at all if they did not make some money. It is so elementary that it is patent to every one. But the money we do make is made out of ourselves—out of handling the grain of our own shareholders.

Mr. KEEFER: Do you not take other people's grain besides the grain of your shareholders?

Mr. MAHARG: The percentage of grain from outsiders would probably not amount to more than 5 or 10 per cent. We have in the neighbourhood of from possibly 50 to 200 shareholders at each elevator, so we have practically all the people in the country interested with us, and if we do make profits it is from our own farmer friends, we take it out of ourselves. Even when we go into commercial business we are held down so that we can only sell to our own members.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. member allow me another question?

Mr. MAHARG: I want to answer your other question first. I do not wish to say that you are not familiar with the grain business, but I want to put you right.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to kindly address the Chair.

Mr. MAHARG: All right, Mr. Chairman. I am hurrying along as much as I can, I want to inform hon. members and answer their questions. Your question was that the farmer is being docked too heavily out of his grain at the initial elevator. That is the only place where he can be docked. Any grain he ships himself goes to the elevators and is inspected by the Government inspectors, so that it is only in the case of grain at the initial point that the farmer is affected. That was exactly the position the farmers were in before we came down to Ottawa fifteen years or more ago to get the Canada Grain Act—probably longer than that. The Grain Combine was one of the greatest combines in existence. The farmers were absolutely at their mercy. The railway companies refused to take a bushel of grain from any source only through the elevators of the Combine. We had no protection. They graded the grain as they liked, they docked it as they liked, and they paid what price they liked. There were absolutely no restrictions, and we were at their mercy. Consequently we came to Ottawa and interviewed the right hon. the late Sir Richard Cartwright, and got what was then known as the Manitoba Grain Act, and what is now known as the Canada Grain Act. We have been working on that Grain Act for years, but it has not reached perfection yet. We are trying to add something to it to-day, and we will have something more to add to it later, if we do not get it this season, in order that we may perfect it as nearly as possible. We will keep trying until we do.

We were entirely at the mercy of the elevator company, but now the farmer has protection under the Canada Grain Act—that is, if he understands his business and takes the necessary precautions. Under the present regulations of the Board of Grain Commissioners the elevators all have to retain samples of grain that the farmer sells to them. The elevator company has to furnish a small tin box; the farmer furnishes a lock and retains the key, and out of every load of grain that he brings in he can compel the elevator operator to extract a fair sample and puts it in this box; this may be done whether the farmer is selling the grain or simply having it stored. If the farmer, having delivered his carload of grain or whatever the quantity may be, is not satisfied with the dockage that the elevator man has taken from him, he may, if he is selling the grain to the elevator take a sample which is satisfactory to himself and to the operator of the elevator; that sample is sent by mail to the Winnipeg inspection office, and there is graded. The inspector at Winnipeg sets the dockage on that sample of grain, and that is the dockage that the elevator company has to set if they have purchased the grain from the farmer. I am not saying that the farmer never loses, but that is the machinery with which he may protect himself in every case, if he wishes to take advantage of it.

Mr. MORPHY: May I ask the hon. gentleman to step away from his own company and to explain these tremendous profits of 211 per cent made by other companies? Apparently there is no one here now to defend those companies. Some hon. gentleman who might do so were here, but they have left the Chamber.

Mr. MAHARG: I will explain, as well as I can, how these elevator companies secure these overages. As I stated, the Government weighs the grain in and weighs it out, and fixes the dockage of grain that is to be taken. If they say the grain is to be cleaned to a certain grade, it must be cleaned to that grade. If there is only a small per cent of screenings in it, they are not expected to clean the grain at all. This is one way in which they could possibly come out a little ahead; if there is only a small percentage of dirt in the grain the elevator companies are not obliged to clean it.

Mr. McMASTER: Does some profit come to them because they do not have to clean it?

Mr. MAHARG: Yes, if there is a small quantity of small wheat or other matter in that grain they might stand to gain on that account.

Mr. McMASTER: How?

Mr. MAHARG: Because of not having to clean the grain. If the grain showed only a small amount of dockage it is possible that there is where a fair proportion of the overage comes in.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is a Liverpool Grain Exchange rule, not a regulation under the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. MAHARG: It is a rule of the inspector, who is the king so far as concerns the determination of the grade, the dockages, and the like. He is czar, so to speak, also, in regard to the moisture content of the grain.

The Government may not always hold the elevatotr people down to the letter in respect to the amount of dockage that goes out in grain. If the grade is No. 1 Northern and the board permits a certain amount of dockage over and above what really should go out, then the elevator company stands to gain. But the chief source of overage is that mentioned by the member for Marquette. The Grain Board allow thirty pounds a car on wheat for invisible shrinkage; I think the rate is the same on oats, and a little more or flax. Flax, by the way, is something that you never have an overage on. If, therefore, you handle from ten to twenty million bushels of grain and get an allowance of half a bushel on each car, ten pounds or more of this may be saved to you, here you might have from ten thousand to twenty thousand bushels, which is another source of revenue.

Another thing which contributes is what we call the scalping of the grain. The elevator people have large cleaners and when they take in 150,000, or 200,000 bushels of grain a day that grain must be cleaned up very rapidly, because in order to do business successfully the workhouse must be kept clear. More or less grain always goes over in these screenings. I have on many occasions watched this operation for hours, and I know that a little grain always goes over in the screenings. These screenings are recleaned with what they call scalping machines and the grain which goes over is thus taken out. The amount of grain that goes over may be almost unnoticeable, but out of 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 bushels of grain you may get 30,000 or 40,000 bushels and hardly see these sprinklings of grain at all as they come over. I have seen these scalpers work; they may run twenty-four hours a day for ten or twelve months, and they may bring out quite a quantity of grain. It is possible, therefore, that there is a considerable overage on that account.

There is another source of overage in respect of which no accusation of any kind can be made against the elevator people, and that is in connection with mixed grain. A car may be graded mixed grain; it may be oats with ten or twenty per cent of wheat in it. All that wheat may be cleaned out, and a certain percentage of overage will be received from this source. There are a half a dozen or more ways in which a tremendous overage can be made up when there is a big turnover. Many of the elevators turn over twenty-five or thirty million bushels.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman attribute the making of the 211 per cent profit to overages?

Mr. MAHARG: The member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) dissected those profits and said, I think, that out of the handling there was something like seven per cent——

Mr. MORPHY: A seven per cent dividend, but 211 per cent profit.

Mr. MAHARG: I think he said that out of the actual handling of the grain—that is, the charges received for handling—the dividend amounted to something like seven per cent; the other dividends came from overages and screenings. There has been a tremendous revenue from screenings during the last few years. Screenings have been worth as much as $30 a ton; in fact, certain kinds of screenings are worth more than the grain itself. If you are sufficiently adept in separating yellow mustard from the grain, the yellow mustard is a more valuable product than the grain itself. I do not know where the yellow mustard goes, but I know that they pay more for it than they do for the grain; so that that is another source of revenue. If immense profits are piled up, there is a dozen sources from which these profits may come and which it is almost impossible to cut off. What we have been trying to get at is to have every operation in connection with the elevator paying for itself so that the thing will stand on its own feet. If this was the case they would not have to say: If you cut down our screenings, you will have to let us make a higher charge for handling the grain.

That is what we want to do. If it costs one-half cent to put the grain through the elevator, we want to know that, and we want to have an account of every operation of the elevator. If there are drying charges, we want to know what they cost. Our elevator is constructed as a regulator, so that we may know exactly the cost of handling the grain. We hope to get that from the Government elevators, but we have not been perfectly satisfied, and we have put in our own elevator and we are putting a hospital elevator alongside of it. I will give an illustration to show what it means to have one's own elevator. We were handling grain for our shippers at the terminal elevator; we had one car of wheat sent down to us last fall, and our salesman on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange offered that car for sale. He was not satisfied with the price that he was offered for it, as he did not consider it to be anything like what he should have received. While we have not the machinery in our large handling elevator to handle this grain continuously, yet we took in this one particular car of grain as this was such a glaring case of unfairness, and our operator decided that he would handle this car through our elevator, which was not built for that purpose, but which by working slowly and interfering with our other work, could handle it. To put the matter short, the net difference between the price offered for that car and the price received for it, after we had separated and sorted it for that farmer, was a litle over $600. One can readily understand, therefore, why I say that we are constructing this elevator as a regulator.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 153, to amend the Canada Grain Act, founded upon this resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT.

PROPOSED PERMANENT FORCE OF 10,000 MEN.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 137, to amend the Militia Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Explain.

Major-General MEWBURN: One of the amendments is in connection with section 24 of the Militia Act which reads:

> There shall continue to be a permanent force which shall consist of such permanently embodied corps, not exceeding five thousand men, enrolled for continuous service, as are, from time to time, authorized by the Governor in Council.

The proposed amendment is that the word "five" be struck out and the word "ten" be substituted therefor, so as to provide that the permanent force shall consist of such permanently embodied corps, not exceeding 10,000, as are, from time to time, authorized by the Governor in Council. The permanent corps to-day consists of an establishment of 5,000 of all ranks, and it has been felt that authority should be granted to increase that force as circumstances may require. It is not the intention to increase up to that number at present, but it may be necessary in the near future to add to the present permanent force in a reasonable way as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What does the minister call a reasonable way?

Major-General MEWBURN: I should say in the neighbourhood of 7,000 men at present. I do not know that it may not possibly be advisable to add to the force a small flying corps. At the same time, it is not considered advisable to embody permanently a flying corps of any size. Probably one squadron would be sufficient, which could be utilized for defensive purposes if required, and which would be very valuable in connection with some of our commercial industries. It has also been considered advisable, in fact, I have recommended that one cavalry regiment be added to the two that exist at present, namely, the Royal Canadian Dragoons and the Strathcona Horse. I would strongly urge and recommend the addition of another cavalry regiment, the Fort Garry Horse at Winnipeg. It may be considered advisable to add one infantry battalion to the permanent force, but as yet no definite decision has been reached. This leaves it to the Governor in Council to determine as to increasing the force up to 10,000, if required, and I would not urge it at present unless an emergency arose.

Another amendment is in connection with section 53, subsection 2 which provides that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, fix the sums to be paid to privates in the permanent corps, having regard to length of service, good conduct and efficiency. It is proposed that the following words be struck out:

> but the ordinary pay shall not exceed the amounts following, that is to say:
>
> For privates, per diem, 75 cents.
>
> For buglers under 18 years of age, per diem, 40 cents.

Section 54 of the Militia Act reads:

> When on active service, during the period of annual drill and training, and when otherwise on duty, the pay and allowances of officers and men of the Active Militia, other than the Permanent Force, shall be,
>
> (a) for officers, warrant officers and non-commissioned officers, such rates as may be prescribed;
>
> (b) for privates, at the rate of 50 cents per diem, which rate may be increased, as prescribed, up to a maximum of one dollar per diem:
> (c) an allowance of a dollar per diem, or such other rate as is prescribed, to each officer and man for every horse actually and necessarily used by him.

It is proposed, by striking out subsections (a), (b) and (c) and substituting the words "at such rates as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council" to leave to the Governor in Council the fixing of the pay for active militia that may be called out for active service. It is quite clear that we cannot maintain troops at these old rates, and some additional amount must be granted for them. The pay of the Mounted Police has been increased, and we shall have to meet that in order to fill up the ranks of the permanent corps. If any further explanation is required, I shall be very glad to give it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How is the permanent corps to be distributed?

Major-General MEWBURN: I think it will be absolutely necessary to have a small force in every military district in Canada, the infantry being distributed pro rata amongst the military districts, together with the mounted units and the artillery. At the present time there are the Royal Canadian Dragoons, Lord Strathcona's Horse, Royal Canadian Horse Artillery, Royal Canadian Garrison Artillery, Royal Canadian Engineers, The Royal Canadian Regiment, and the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, which has been added to it, Canadian Permanent Army Service Corps, Canadian Permanent Army Medical Corps, Canadian Permanent Ordnance Corps, Canadian Permanent Army Veterinary Corps, Canadian Permanent Army Pay Corps, making up an establishment of 5,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What proportion will be cavalry, infantry and artillery?

Major-General MEWBURN: The strength of the Royal Canadian Dragoons is only 20 officers and 359 other ranks. That of the Strathcona Horse is practically the same. If we have the Fort Garry Horse, it will be practically the same. The Princess Patricia's is the only infantry regiment added.

Mr. ANDREW R. McMASTER (Brome): Earlier in the session when the Estimates of the Militia Department were before the House I took the opportunity to congratulate the minister upon his refusal to adopt any scheme for a permanent military establishment in Canada until the peace situation had cleared up. My disappointment therefore is very great when I see to-day that we are celebrating the imminent signing of peace by proposing to pass an Act increasing by 100 per cent the permanent land military forces of this country. It does seem to me that this matter might have been left in abeyance until we and the rest of the world could see what hope of peace and disarmament the situation holds out to humanity. The great enemy who for half a century has threatened European civilization has declared his impotence by signing a peace imposing severe and drastic conditions upon him. Under these circumstances, is it wise, is it reasonable, when the country is overwhelmed with debt as it is, to increase the permanent forces of Canada? I do not believe it is. I had hoped that my country, after the splendid record which it established overseas in fighting, would be in the forefront of disarmament and progress towards peace. Why should we increase our military forces by 100 per cent? The war is over; peace is to be signed, and there is no necessity for this action. When we had a small permanent force we were able, through the courage and enthusiasm of the manhood of this country, to raise an army of nearly a half million men, and if war does threaten us again, which God forbid, surely we can rely on the same admirable qualities and heroic attributes in our race as we did before. As regards the raising of pay, I think that is only proper; but I do wish to express my profound disappointment at the step which the minister is about to take. If it is not too late I would ask him to let this matter stand for the present at least.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): I was not aware that the hon. member for Brome had intended to speak on this matter, but he has so adequately expressed the very ideas that have been running in my mind since this Bill was introduced into the House that it becomes unnecessary for me to say very much. Before the war, I had viewed with considerable dissatisfaction, if not with some alarm, the steady increase in our military estimates, and had hoped that the time would soon arrive when there would be a stay in them. Unfortunately the war broke out and our military estimates went forward by leaps and bounds. Thousands became millions. I was one of those who believed in the prosecution of the war, so far at least as Canada was concerned, if necessary until the last man and the last dollar, to use the popular expression, had been utilized. But I had undoubtedly hoped that when the war was over there would be a retrenchment in these military expenditures. As a member of the Pensions Committee I cannot say I view with alarm, but certainly I view with some concern, the very large amount we shall annually have to expend to meet the righteous and legitimate claims of those who have made sacrifices in the war for us, and it did come to me as a shock when the minister introduced this Bill asking for leave to increase the permanent force to 10,000 men. It is all very well to say that this merely "asks for leave" to increase the force to that number. I do not think that there are many men in this House who will come to any other conclusion than that if this leave is obtained it will not be very many years before we shall have a permanent force of 10,000 men, with all the concomitant expenditures such a force will entail. I have not that full information that I should like to have to enable me to reach an unshakable conclusion, but from what I understand at the present time I do not view sympathetically the request of the minister as contained in this Bill. The League of Nations is held out to us as an institution that will prevent wars in the future. It is quite true that by section 12, I think, of the Covenant—if it is to be incorporated in the peace terms we must necessarily adopt its principles—we shall assume certain responsibilities with the rest of the world. But if this war has demonstrated one thing more than another, it has clearly demonstrated the fact that the hero is to be found practically under every jacket, and that when there is a national crisis men may always be called upon to respond in defence of the ideals they hold and in defence of their native land. This war has not been won by the permanent forces of the world. It has been won to a very great extent by the volunteer forces of the British Empire, and it seems to me wholly unnecessary that at this time, with the burden of debt that we are going to be called upon to assume, and in view of the urgent necessity that exists for the best efforts of every available man to increase production, we should take from the national life 5,000 able-bodied men and impose on the country the burden of maintaining a possible permanent force of 10,000. I quite agree with the minister—and when the Bill gets into Committee I intend to direct a few remarks to that aspect of the subject—that something better must be done for the permanent force whatever its size. But I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without expressing my deep regret that the Government found it necessary to introduce this Bill asking for leave to increase the permaneent force to 10,000.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I desire very briefly to associate myself with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) in protesting against this increase in our military forces at this time. Only last week we read in the public press that the United States Congress had rejected a similar proposition of the Secretary for War and reduced his estimates for the permanent forces by one-half. In view of this, surely it ill becomes us in Canada to increase our permanent forces by 100 per cent. I have no objection whatever to passing what estimates the minister requires for voluntary training, but I do object at this time to doubling up our permanent military forces.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

Major-General MEWBURN: I quite appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Brome and I certainly was quite clear in the statement I made when the Estimates were up. I have no great desire to increase the forces but circumstances have arisen throughout the whole country which seem to indicate an absolute necessity that Canada should have some force available for the preservation of law and order in this country.

Provision is made for 10,000 men, but the force that we propose to have immediately is a relatively very small number when you consider the length and breadth of the Dominion of Canada. It is not the intention of the Government to increase the force at the present time to anything like the maximum number to be provided for. I do not think the force is increased at the present time any more than is absolutely necessary and probably by not more than a couple of thousand all told. I am as anxious as any hon. member to keep down the expenditure, and I think my conduct has proven that that is my desire. If the signing of the Peace Treaty were going to bring peace and good will all over the world we would all be delighted. In the United States, although I am quite aware that there was an attempt to reduce the expenditure, there were people who thought they should have a permanent standing army of 500,000 . The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) says that the permanent force did not win this war, but I would like to know what he would say in regard to the " contemptible " little British army that took the field in the early stages of the war in 1914. If it had not been for the permanent force of Great Britain I do not know but that the results of the war might have been different. In addition to that, a permanent force is absolutely necessary for the preservation of law and order in every country. I regret to have to say that I am confirmed in that belief by events that have been happening all over the world; the troubles arising to the south of us and the troubles that are arising in different parts of Canada. Judging by many letters I have had from all parts of Canada, it would appear as if in some cases people are getting stampeded. I have even been told that the Government are negligent in that they have not a permanent standing army of at least 100,000 men in Canada. I received a letter from Winnipeg urging that the Government should have a permanent force that can deal with the situation there. The stand I take in connection with all these troubles is, I think, the right one. The militia is not organized at the present time, and we hope to get it rehabilitated. A committee is working now with the idea of incorporating into the militia members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and I am not now speaking of the permanent corps. I take the stand that in any municipality where there is trouble and where the militia have to be called out in aid of the civil power for the preservation of law and order, every citizen of Canada has the duty to perform to the State and he should link up with the militia and do his duty. I explained to the House what took place in Winnipeg, how the militia units were filled up by the good citizens of Winnipeg commanded by commissioned and non-commissioned officers, all being enrolled temporarily for the emergency. The same thing has taken place in other parts of Canada—in the west, at Toronto, Hamilton and different points.

I do not feel pessimistic about the future but I think that without any doubt I would be negligent in my duty as Minister of Militia if I did not propose that we should have some force that would be available for the preservation of law and order in the country. Taking into consideration the great extent of territory of Canada, I do not think it is an unreasonable request to ask Parliament for a mandate to increase the force to 10,000 and leave it to the Governor in Council to determine as to when that force should be increased.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand that before the war we had a small permanent force and that law and order throughout the country were well preserved. Now we have over 300 000 well trained men ready to take their place in the ranks at any time in defence of their country. I do not see that the country should be asked to pay for a larger force than that which we had before the war.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I would suppose in this case that the pay and expenses in connection with these 10,000 men would have to be voted by Parliament before the force was raised; consequently, Parliament at all times has in its control the power to regulate the number of men in this permanent force. We are, this session, voting a certain amount for a permanent force which has nothing to do with the war appropriation. The minister can only engage a sufficient number of units to use up that money and before he can increase the force he must again ask for a grant and for the consent of Parliament; he cannot go beyond the number of men for which Parliament grants the money. By this legislation the maximum will be fixed at 10,000 men, but Parliament year after year has to ratify every act of the Government in connection therewith.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of attention to what the minister has said and I have noted his explanation that this increase of 100 per cent to our permanent force is due not to apprehension of outside danger but to the fear of domestic trouble. To my mind that is a sad explanation. What the minister has said shows the intention of the department. I say to this House that force is no remedy; that it is not necessary that the Canadian people should be overawed by an increase of 100 per cent in our military establishment. As was pointed out by my hon. friend from Restigouche (Mr. Michaud) we have hundreds of thousands of men who have shown their loyalty to Canada, trained soldiers, to-day in the country. Therefore, I say that this increase in the permanent force is not necessary. Is it the fact that the minister thinks that he cannot depend on these men? Surely not. I say to the minister, as I say to this Government: Trust the people; the heart of the Canadian people is as sound as our No. 1 Hard Manitoba wheat. There is no necessity for this. If there is unrest and discontent in the country, an attempt to overawe the discontented by a 100 per cent increase in our military establishment is decidedly not the proper procedure. Trust the people I say to the Government. I would urge upon them what I have already urged from my seat in this House—summon the leaders of organized labour and the leaders of the organized employers to a joint council as has been done in the Old Country. Do not wave the red flag in the face of these discontented people by increasing by 100 per cent your military establishment and telling them that we need 10,000 men to keep order in Canada. When the Northwest Mounted Police was only 600 strong it kept order in the country half the size of Europe. It is not the size of your military establishment, it is not the number of your soldiers; it is the ready obedience which the people give to constituted authority that is necessary.

I would ask the minister to reconsider this matter and if he is not prepared to do so I will take it upon myself to move the rejection of section 1. I therefore move the rejection of the clause.

The CHAIRMAN: A motion for the rejection of the clause would not be in order. There is already a motion before the committee that the clause do carry. The hon. gentleman can vote against it.

Mr. McMASTER: I will express my view by voting against the clause.

Mr. MORPHY: I apprehend that the minister in putting forward this Bill has good reasons for so doing. The fact that he has stated that from the West and other parts of Canada the requests which have come to him have led him to put forward the Bill is a factor that should be considered. The country is large and the number of men in proportion to the extent of the country is small. If one could rely on the opinion expressed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Nickle) that with the League of Nations war would be at an end, there might be some reason for considering the necessity of the force contemplated by the minister, but in my opinion the League of Nations is too young yet for any country in the world to bank upon its efficacy to prevent war. There might be to-morrow or the day after a sudden upheaval which would throw the world again into war. The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Michaud) says that we have 100,000 men who have come through the war, but I do not think it is a very charitable proposal that we should send these men back again immediately to fight the battles of the country, whether domestic or foreign. The League of Nations is having its own troubles. We realize every day that Japan is uneasy, that there may be an attack on the integrity of China, that Korea is in a condition of unrest and that a conflict may break out any day. Surely we must all reflect upon the condition of things that existed before the last war. Men derided the idea that there would be a war and it was scoffed and laughed at in many quarters; it was not taken seriously. At this time I rather resent the attitude of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) who, I think, descended just a little below his usual level when he uttered the sentiments to which he gave expression. It seemed to me to be something like pandering to politics, pandering to the working classes of the country and inciting the workingman, in so far as he could do it, against the organized, executive force of the government of the country. It seemed to me that he uttered a plain invitation or incitement to the disruption of the country's affairs. Goodness knows that the unrest to-day in Canada is not necessarily a sufficient warrant for the Bill that is before the House, but it is a factor, and I do not think it is fair for the hon. member for Brome to rely upon the statement which he does rely upon that this force is for that specific purpose. The minister does not put it forward in that way, and I do not think it is fair that any member of the House should so represent it. Canada is populated by a very widely diversified people. We have sections on the Pacific coast, on the Atlantic coast, and all over, where a force may be necessary any moment to defend the best interests of the country. Belgium with her small force of 170,000 at the beginning of the war kept the Germans back for eighteen days and helped to win the war. We must not denude ourselves of a military force in this country. When the League of Nations is formed and peace is settled and the day comes when this force can be otherwise utilized or done away with, then will be the time to take action to that end.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 146 (from the Senate) for the relief of Herbert John Lawrence.—Mr. Ross.

Bill No. 145 (from the Senate) to change the name of the Alberta-Saskatchewan Life Insurance Company to "The Commercial Life Assurance Company of Canada."—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 137 to amend the Militia Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the Committee rose at six o'clock clause 1 was under consideration. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. NICKLE: Before clause 1 is voted on, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two in reply to the Minister of Militia's answer to my argument. If I understood him correctly, he endeavoured to argue that because Great Britain sent an expeditionary force of 100,000 men to France, therefore there was justification for Canada having a permanent force of 10,000 men. In 1914 the British Expeditionary Force was probably the finest-trained and best-equipped force in the world, and without doubt the part it played in the early stages of the war was most important in giving the Allies an opportunity of preparing for the subsequent warfare. But I fail to follow the logic of the minister in his argument,—if that was his endeavour—that because Great Britain maintained a permanent army of 100,000 men before the great war, that is a justification for Canada hereafter having a permanent force of 10,000 men. Great Britain has for more than a century been the policeman of the world. She has colonies in all parts of the world and protectorates in the Seven Seas. England to a great extent, if not altogether, finds it essential for the maintenance of the British Empire that there should be available at all times a disciplined force that can be sent, as occasion may require, to any part of the world.

I do not believe that the time has arrived when Canada, as a part of the British Empire, feels it incumbent to assume any part of the policing of the world, except in so far as our obligations under the Treaty of Peace, which embraces the League of Nations, may necessitate such duty. I am quite prepared to admit that probably by being a signatory to the Treaty of Peace Canada will assume obligations that will place her among the nations of the world—obligations that may, in time to come, necessitate our sending troops to any part of the world for the maintenance of the status quo of things in general. But I have greater hopes for the League of Nations than that we are immediately going to be required to maintain peace by the use of arms. There is no great mystical power in the term "League of Nations," and probably the covenant between the signatories to the Peace Treaty will, to a very great extent, depend for its true fulfilment upon the spirit in which it is entered into and the spirit manifested in the keeping of that League.

But I want again to reiterate what I said to the House this afternoon, that with the financial obligations Canada has to face in the near future, I do not think this is the time for us to assume what would probably be an obligation of $7,500,000 for years to come. If we add 5,000 men to our permanent force, at $1,000 per man for maintenance, that will represent $5,000,000 a year, and by the time you add to that the equipment and the additional remuneration that must be paid to the higher ranks, to say nothing of the other expenses incident to such an organization, I do not think I am outside the figure when I say that Canada's bill for the maintenance of her permanent force will amount, not to $7,500,000, but to $15,000,000 a year. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I am against the power that is asked for. I regret exceedingly that the minister has brought in the Bill, and as I am now inclined, I am sorry to say, I cannot support it.

Major-General MEWBURN: In reply to the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), what made me refer to the permanent corps was that in his remarks the hon. gentleman, I think I am correct in saying, made the statement that the permanent forces did not win the war. I quite concur in that, but I do say that if it had not been for the standing or permanent army of Great Britain in 1914, which held the line between Mons and the Marne, I do not know where we would have been; and I think everybody will admit that in the early stages of the war the small permanent corps of Canada, which were called out immediately, made a record for themselves that will never be forgotten. That is what I had reference to as far as the permanent corps is concerned. I do not agree with my hon. friend's remarks as regards the necessity of having the permanent corps increased. All I am asking in this Bill is to give power to the Governor in Council to increase the permanent corps to such number, not exceeding 10,000 men, as they may determine. The hon. member well knows that the permanent corps cannot be increased until proper Estimates have been brought down and passed for their allowance and upkeep. But I do not think Canada to-day can afford to be without a trained force of moderate size to meet any eventualities that may occur. I am a great believer in the maxim that it is better to be sure than sorry, and I think it is very poor policy to be penny wise and pound foolish. I felt it incumbent upon me to advise the Government that the permanent force should be increased in a small way, but at the present time not up to 10,000 men. I think, however, there should be provision in the statute that the force may be increased up to that point if the necessity arises. I think I have explained all the other matters referred to by my hon. friend, and I do not feel it necessary to continue the argument.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I would just like to point out in connection with this Bill an experience I had when in Winnipeg about ten days ago. I had an interview with General Ketchen, who is in charge of Military District No. 10, as to the troubles in Winnipeg. I asked him in reference to the military strength that might be available there should the conditions prove more serious. I discussed the matter with him and suggested that inasmuch as there were thousands of demobilized troops he would have no difficulty in securing all the men he might require. On the contrary, he said, he had extreme difficulty, that these men did not manifest any willingness to organize again,—they had been demobilized, were sick of the job, and did not wish to participate in military service again immediately. As a result an appeal was made to the citizens of Winnipeg, and some thousands of the business men organized and were sworn in to the militia. They repaired to the various barracks and went through the necessary drills, and performed all manner of menial work, during which time, they were, of course, obliged to absent themselves from business. I am prompted to make these remarks because of a statement by one of the hon. members on the other side of the House that we had a very large militia force in the country which would always be available.

I join with the hon. gentleman in paying tribute to the fine character of these men, and I concur in his remark about the stability of the Canadian people. But we are facing a condition, not a theory, and in view of the experience that the people of Winnipeg have had within the last few weeks, and of the advisability of providing for the taking of proper steps should similar incidents occur in any other part of the country, I am a strong believer in the idea that there ought to be a permanent force. The minister does not propose that the permanent force shall consist of 10,000 men; the Government is simply being given power to have a permanent force up to that number. I think that is only fair. The Government is charged with the responsibility of protecting the people and of preserving peace throughout the country. Our country is three or four thousand miles long, and if trouble should break out in two or three places at the same time the Government would be blamed, and properly so, if it had not taken precautions to deal with such a situation. After what has been said, I have no doubt that the Government will certainly not increase the force beyond what is reasonably necessary. Hon. members should bear in mind the heterogeneous nature of the population in the far western country, especially in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Hundreds of thousands of these people do not understand our constitution, many thousands of them are not even familiar with our language; and until they are assimilated with our own people it would be wise to have a very considerable permanent force. Until the present unrest subsides—and it exists throughout the country to a much greater extent than members who have not been in their constituencies lately would dream of—the Government should be on the alert to meet any possible emergency that may arise.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot quite agree with the views expressed by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Richardson); nor am I by any means convinced of the wisdom of increasing our permanent military establishment by 100 per cent. If we look at the matter from the point of view of establishing the basis of a military organization to meet such an emergency as this country was called upon to meet in 1914, what we accomplished at that time clearly shows that we do not need any addition to the forces now. In other words, with a permanent force of 5,000 prior to 1914, we had the skeleton of an organization upon which, in a short time, we built up an army of 500,000—and the most efficient army that was engaged in the great war. Consequently, it does not appeal to me as necessary that for this purpose we should make provision to enlarge our permanent military establishment.

The only other consideration that could lead us to view favourably the suggestion contained in this Bill is the maintenance of law and order at home. I have faith in the law-abiding qualities of the Canadian people; I dislike even to contemplate an increase in the permanent military establishment to 10,000 with a view to maintaining law and order in this country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) has stated that the citizens of Winnipeg, where there has been grave unrest for the past six or seven weeks, took upon themselves the obligation of maintaining law and order there. If it should be necessary in other parts of the country—all hon. gentlemen, I am sure, devoutly hope that it will not—to maintain law and order, the same means could be found as have been found in Winnipeg. I am profoundly convinced that the maintenance of law and order and the bringing of happiness to the people lies not so much in creating armed forces as it does in endeavouring to strike at the causes which lead to unrest. The creation of this force will mean an additional annual outlay, as the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has pointed out, of from $5,000,000 to $7,500,000 a year. Having regard to the present state of our finances and to the revenue which this country has to raise, is it desirable to undertake the additional expenditure involved in this proposal? It does not commend itself to my judgment. I hope that the Government will direct all the attention it possibly can to removing the causes of the unrest which exists in the country today; that is the best possible remedy for present conditions and the most efficacious means of bringing back harmony and happiness to the Canadian people. I believe that the vast majority of the foreign element of our population—and by this I mean the elements in our population which are of European foreign extraction—are law-abiding. I doubt if any country in the world with so large a percentage of alien population has come through the war as successfully, from the point of view of the absence of internal disorder, as Canada has. That being the case, let us appeal to the good that is in our citizens rather than to the establishment of large armed forces to overawe them.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I congratulate the minister on the step that he has taken. I cannot agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar), for I know of no country which has so much to defend and so little to defend it as Canada has. Suppose we had a permanent force of 10,000 for the whole of Canada; that would be two and a half men for every mile of our four thousand miles of border. Surely an army of such a size and so disposed would not be very successful in the trenches against an ordinary enemy. But while we are not contemplating any trouble of that kind, it is only a matter of ordinary precaution that we should take out a certain amount of insurance in this connection—for I look upon this provision as a kind of insurance policy, and a very moderate one, indeed. Had the minister proposed the stablishment of a permanent force up to 25,000 men, a great many people would have held up both hands for it. Ten thousand men is the very minimum for a permanent force in this country. I do not know what our responsibilities will be under the League of Nations. Force will be used if the League of Nations is to amount to anything; even the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) will admit that. The League of Nations is not going to bring about peace in the world simply by a fiat. It has not been able to do away with the trouble in Russia, though representatives of twenty or thirty of the nations of the world are assembled over there and are controlling many millions of men. Notwithstanding all this, Russia is still seething with revolt, bloodshed and destruction, and what applies to Russia applies to many other European countries. Not more than six or eight weeks ago it was announced in big head-lines in the press that the United States proposed, if necessary, to establish a permanent force of 500,000 men. Our force of 10,000 as compared with the force of 500,000 men to the south would be a very limited one, indeed. I trust the Committee will sustain the minister in no uncertain way if a vote is called for on this question, because it is a matter of serious consequence to the people of Canada. If, as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has just said, there are causes for unrest in Canada, I do not think we are going to multiply them by having a kind of respectable police force. Even Toronto "the good," has never been able to abolish its police force, and I do not believe it will in our time.

Mr. SHEARD: Do not reflect on Toronto, please.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: There is a certain irresponsible element in the best of cities, and a police force is required. Even the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) will acknowledge that that is an ordinary statement of fact that cannot be gainsaid. If that be the case in the most Christian cities of the world, surely it is not too much to say that 10,000 men for the whole Dominion of Canada—and it is not proposed to increase the force to that number at the present time—will be too great a force for Canada to embark on a little later on. I trust the minister will be very heartily supported.

Mr. ROBB: Does the hon. member (Mr. Cockshutt) know that the United States Congress rejected their war proposition?

Mr. EDWARDS: Can the minister say what is the attitude of the United States now as regards a permanent force for that country as compared with its permanent force before the war? Can the minister also state the attitude of Great Britain in that regard?

Major-General MEWBURN: The United States Secretary of State for War, and the War Council, determined that they were to have a standing army of 500,000 men, and I am not so clear that the Bill was rejected in its entirety. The chief dispute was in connection with the air force there, and I presume that is to be cut down. I have not seen any accurate figures, but 500,000 was the estimate. For years the United States had a National Guard throughout the States. They contemplated in some way changing that National Guard, and they felt that, with their draft law as they had it on their statute book they could get men in a hurry in case of war outside of the country, but their difficulty was in providing trained officers and instructors. While there was some talk of reducing that force below the 500,000, they intended to keep a very strong standing army and to increase very largely their personnel of officers. As regards Great Britain, a committee has been working for some time on the post bellum army of Great Britain, and I do not think any definite decision has yet been arrived at as to what the standing army will be, and I do not think one will be reached until after they get through with the difficulty on the continent, but I understand it will be considerably increased.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the minister the figures of the United States permanent army before the war?

[Mr. Cockshutt.]

Major-General MEWBURN: Possibly a little over 100,000.

Mr. ROBB: The information I have here from a New York newspaper is that the United States War Department asked for 500,000 men and Congress has cut that down to 300,000.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: The minister's proposition has my hearty endorsement. When a minister comes to this House at a time like this and asks for the privilege of fortifying himself, the least this House can do is to give him that privilege. I do not think we should ask the men who have come back to Canada after four years at the front, to go out and risk their lives again in defence of this country unless we are going to pay them adequately. There is something coming to those men. Many of them came back without any occupation to return to and many of them would like to enter military life as a profession. This country owes them something, and it can pay part of that by enlarging the permanent corps and giving a number of returned officers and men employment. We have all heard for many years past suggestions made like those of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). We know the result of them in the past; those arguments are not new, and they are as fallacious as they are old. If you want to be in a position to keep order and to enforce law in any country, you must have the necessary force. In this country, which is 4,000 miles in width, it is no use saying that you are going to enforce law and order unless you have something behind you. The minister is to be congratulated in bringing down this Bill, and the Committee should support him.

Mr. M. CLARK: This is a very serious matter. I find myself very much embarrassed by it. I am embarrassed on grounds of my relationship with and my opinion of the minister. I hold the opinion that he has been a most excellent minister and that he has brought to the discharge of his duties a combination of energy and courtesy which have been a very great national possession in the very serious time through which we have recently passed. I feel that so much that I am almost sure he would not have proposed this, however strongly he might have felt in favour of it, unless he had had very strong reasons to bear upon his mind. At the same time, the proposition is serious, and it is also somewhat peculiar.

I had occasion, at an earlier period of the day, to remind the House that I for one, defended in most unmistakable terms the Military Service Act on the ground that we were fighting militarism. There was no phrase so common on the lips of the statesmen of the Allies as the phrase "We are fighting militarism, and militarism must die." Was that all a dream? Did we not mean it? If we were fighting militarism, it seems rather a peculiar thing—

Mr. GRIESBACH: I would ask the hon. member to define the meaning of the word "militarism."

Mr. M. CLARK: There are some things that, in the matter of definition, afford a field in which a child can baffle a philosopher. There are some things so simple that it is impossible to define them, but if my hon. friend wants to know what I think is militarism, it is the tendency of a State to remain in that stage of human society which is characterized by warlike operations. It is the state, philosophers would tell him, which is opposed to the industrial state. I should speak much longer than I intended to on this question, if I am to have many questions like this addressed to me. If my hon. friend had spent as much time reading Herbert Spencer as I have, he would have learned that, in the opinion of that distinguished philosopher, human society passes, in the case of any given section of it, from the stage of primitive barbarism through a period of militarism into a state of industrialism.

Mr. GRIESBACH: Free trade later on.

Mr. M. CLARK: Free trade and militarism are sworn foes, and therefore, I am a sworn foe of militarism. In a state of perfect industrialism, we should, of course, have free trade. It is elementary that every country would then produce a superabundance of the things it was most calculated to produce and that the different countries would exchange their surpluses with one another.

I was saying, when I was tempted to go into this argumentative alleyway, that we fought militarism in this war. We understood that we were putting down militarism. Everybody said so. Then we fought the war under a delusion, if we are going in for militarism in this country. There is another peculiar aspect of this matter. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has just come from the Paris conference, at which the various statesmen recognized that militarism was a bad thing. There was militarism, if it was ever seen in the world, in Germany, and the statesmen at that conference have recognized it as so bad a thing that they have taken what many people regard as tremendously severe steps to cure Germany of it. Surrounded as she is by land, her existence threatened on the land as much as ever that of Britain, an island, could be by sea, she has had her standing army reduced to almost infinitesimal proportions. Surely there is food for thought in the fact that in this democratic country of Canada, at a time when we are destroying militarism in all the old autocratic countries in Europe with the apparent consent of the peoples of those countries, we should be increasing that very thing on this continent, where under the Monroe doctrine we thought we should never have to interfere in the wars of the world, and where at one time Canada's participation in such a war as that through which we have just passed would not have been thought of by any serious-minded person?

I have not had the good fortune to listen to the whole of this debate, but I gather that the reason for which we are being asked to increase the permanent military forces by one hundred per cent has been given as the unrest that prevails in the country. Well, in regard to that unrest, I should like to say that I personally have no apologies to offer for being a Canadian, in view of what has happened in Winnipeg, for this reason: That there probably never was in the history of the world a strike of such dimensions in a limited area, in which the peace-loving instincts of the people have preserved order in a manner so creditable to a whole country. I want to say, and I think that every Canadian will agree with me, that if that strike could happily be settled in the near or immediate future, instead of giving this country a black eye the way in which it has been conducted and the peace kept will be the best advertisement that Canada has ever received as a country to which peace-loving men may come to live without fear of being unduly molested in the pursuit of their daily avocations. So far from the unrest being an argument for increasing the military forces, the unrest in Winnipeg is exactly the other way. We have had the most acute state of feeling as between two sections of the community there. I do not want to go into the merits of the case, but I say that what has happened in Winnipeg does not in any case afford very strong evidence that this is a country which needs a great body of soldiers to keep its people in order, even in times of great industrial division and strife. Now, if there is to be a vote on this matter—I understand my hon. friend from Marquette has spoken, and I am sorry I did not hear what he said—I think I shall be almost constrained, although our party is so small on the cross benches, to vote with my leader. If anything could prevent me from doing so it would be a very firm assurance from the minister that this is a very temporary matter. And even that assurance would not carry me very far, because militarism is like strife at the beginning, it is like the letting out of water; once you enter upon this business—and if my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Greisbach) or any one else doubts this, I would recommend to him a study of Cobden, not on free trade but on armaments—once you enter upon this business you create an appetite for it on the part of a certain class of the community, and it grows in spite of the best intentions of governments and their individual members. I cannot think that the step is a wise one. I do not think it is needed; I do not think that it is necessary to double the standing army in Canada; for I have supreme confidence in the common sense and sanity of the Canadian people. We have heard again and again the definition of Liberalism as "trust in the people, qualified by prudence." If that be a correct definition of Liberalism I think I am still a Liberal, and I think that prudence would take the form of keeping our standing army at its present figure. The opposite definition is that of Toryism, which I think is dead in the world to-day except for a very few specimens left in the Unionist party. Toryism has been defined as "distrust of the people qualified by fear." Well, we have not much to be afraid of in a country which at a moment's notice raised four or five hundred thousand of the best soldiers that were ever seen on the face of the earth—men who would go through anything and go anywhere. We did that almost at a moment's notice in this country, and I do think that we should cast fears to the wind and be guided by reasonable prudence. We should have in mind the enormous financial demands of the country, and the splendid history of Canada throughout its whole record as a peace-loving country, and should rightly consider the special record in Winnipeg to which I have referred and the way our people have kept the peace there in spite of temptation to go the contrary road. As I have said, if this question is put to the vote I shall stay with my leader unless he votes for it.

Mr. GRIESBACH: I should like to give the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) a definition of militarism which I fancy has been prepared by lexicographers who have read Spencer, and which I think it is desirable should be more or less accepted if the discussion is going to proceed along the line which it has taken. Militarism is defined as a condition that prevails in a country which makes it the chief object of the state to prepare and wage war. If that definition of militarism is accepted it follows that Germany was given over to militarism.

But does it follow that if we raise our permanent police force from 5,000 to 10,000 men we are thereby going in for militarism to the ruin of our immortal souls? Following all great world conflicts there is necessarily a period of local and international unrest. It has always been, and I fancy it always will be, so; and while I quite agree with those who suggest that we should go to the sources of the unrest and deal with them, which I hope will be done, it is very desirable—and I think it will be a strong antidote to some portion of the unrest—if the Government of the country is able to guarantee protection to law-abiding people. That is the position in which I would put the government of this country: That those who do obey the law and desire to be law-abiding shall be protected, at all events against those who are not law-abiding.

The permanent corps played a very important part in preparing for the last war, and it is always bound to play an important part in our military preparations. No commander in the field, no man of any rank, could have qualified as he did in the Canadian army, had it not been for the instruction he received at the hands of the permanent corps. The hon. member for Red Deer pointed out how, in a moment, we raised an army. As a matter of fact, we raised, in six weeks, 33,000 men to proceed overseas, but six months passed before they got into the field. That fact should be known. If any hon. gentleman who is satisfied with the condition of affairs in which we stood in 1914, he is easily satisfied and he is distinctly a gentleman who did not place himself in a position to suffer for lack of preparation as some of us did. By reason of lack of training, lack of preparation, lack of equipment, lack of everything that we required, it cost this country a great deal more than it need have cost to put our army in the field. In our army, particularly in the American army, and in any army where there is no adequate preparation, the casualties must be higher. You must pay the price in life and money for your failure to make adequate provision for war which is almost inevitable. It may interest the Committee to have its attention drawn to these facts in the history of our own country. We have had a chance to go to war almost every fifteen years since this country began. There was 1914, 1900, 1885, 1870, 1866 —the Fenian raid,—1837, 1812-15, and the American Revolutionary War. Will anybody say that the history of the past will not repeat itself?

As far as the city of Winnipeg is concerned, the people of that city have conducted themselves in a highly creditable manner, but it ought not to be forgotten that it is probably, to some extent, due, in addition to the splendid character of the Canadian people, to the fact that there were under arms in that city a thousand cavalry and several thousand infantry. That seems to me to afford a somewhat better explanation of the good order that has been maintained in the city of Winnipeg than to say that it is due to the kindly disposition of the people of Winnipeg, excellent people as they are. I shall support this Bill.

Mr. D'ANJOU (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken, I think it is my duty to express my opinion upon this Bill.

I represent a county which is known for its anti-militarist principles, I am myself an out-and-out anti-militarist and I must immediately state that it is with the greatest pleasure I shall vote against this Bill and that I will vote as often as the opportunity to do so is offered me. This is not the proper time to attempt introducing militarism in Canada after the Canadian people, for the past four years, being asked to go and fight overseas in order to destroy Prussian militarism; it is not the proper time to establish a military caste in Canada, to create positions, not for the men who have fought, probably, for young officers, who sported themselves in this country during four years, being paid at the rate of $10 per diem.

Mr. Chairman, as several members have already stated in this House, the League of Nations has been formed and it is almost a certainty that we shall not have any more wars in the future. Besides, according to the hon. Minister of Militia, this Bill has been introduced to increase our establishment, not for the protection of our borders, but especially to restore peace in the country, to put down strikes and face all other troubles that might arise.

Mr. Chairman, I was anxious to declare that I am absolutely opposed to this Bill, without any reservation whatever, and that it will be with pleasure, I repeat it, that I shall give my vote against this measure.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I think it is a very ill-chosen time to double this country's military forces. As the member for Red Dear (Mr. Clark) has just stated, we have a perfect trust in the people and we believe that the best police we can have to maintain order among the people is their own good sense and their love of peace.

A moment ago the hon. member for Edmonton (M. Griesbach) said that an increase of the police force of the country was desired by doubling the number—

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (translation): of the militia.

Mr. BUREAU (translation): Not of the militia, but of the military police. However, if the great conflict which took place, if the sacrifices the country made, if all the sacrifices of the allies have accomplished in order to establish and maintain democracy, to sustain liberty and set up a reign of universal peace are useless, it is also useless to say that, in a peaceful country like Canada, we shall gain anything in arming ten thousand men.

The stand taken by those who are opposing this increase for the time being is a wise one and, I think, the best means of ending the unrest now existing in the country would be to show the people that we have confidence in them. I do not think the words uttered by the hon. member for Edmonton very wise when, speaking about the Winnipeg strike and the general uneasiness caused by this large strike he says that if there was no blood shed, if there was relative calm—because in such times calmness must be considered relatively with the state of minds at the time—it is due to the fact that so many cavalrymen were ready to strike and that 9,000 men were under arms. Such words are not calculated to bring peace or harmony to the country. We must not lead Canadian citizens to believe that if, for one reason or another, we must to-day increase the military strength, it is because we feel no confidence in their patriotism and their loyalty and because we think that they do not know how to appreciate this precious gift of sovereignty they enjoy in Canada.

Therefore, and following the wise advice handed to us by the hon. member for Red Deer we must place our confidence with the people, knowing that the mass of people are wise enough to keep peace and harmony in the country and I shall oppose the Bill doubling the military strength of Canada.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Mr. Chairman, if I speak on this question at all it is because the two last speakers have addressed the Committee in French, and I desire to have this section of the House know something about their ideas and their opinions.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. H. A. Mackie) to translate what I say. If he has got any statement to make, let him make it.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I do not want to translate the hon. gentleman's observations. It is the first time he has used French in this House, although he is quite capable of expressing himself in English.

Mr. BUREAU: I beg to correct the hon. gentleman. This is not the first time I have used French in the House; I have done so repeatedly.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point of order raised by the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) is well taken. There is a rule which says that an hon. member cannot repeat either his own arguments or the arguments used by other hon. gentlemen.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I would be pleased to bow to the ruling of the Chair if I had expressed any of the sentiments that have been uttered this evening by the member for Three Rivers, but so far I have not repeated anything that he has said. I hope I shall be permitted to go at least as far as to repeat something that he did say. If I do rise to speak at all, Mr. Chairman, it is that I in the main agree with that hon. gentleman. I do not agree, however, that you should not increase the military force in Canada because there are military individuals in the city of Winnipeg who incited, by their presence, the civil population to acts such as have characterized the condition of things that exists in that city at the present time. The statement is not a correct statement of fact, because those who are in Winnipeg of a military tendency of mind are the men who have given every possible help in preserving quietness and order.

I would like the Prime Minister of Canada to give us some information on this subject. The speech from the Throne told us that the League of Nations was to keep peace on earth for all time to come. I expressed some doubt on that point when I spoke in the debate on the Address. If it is possible that there should be peace on earth owing to the creation of the League of Nations, then perhaps it is best that we should have only that number of men in Canada which is necessary for the purpose of keeping order, peace and quietness. On the other hand, if the League of Nations is not going to bring us to that state of happiness which has been forecasted in the speech from the Throne, I think it is quite right we should have the preparedness which has been spoken of by my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach) this evening. The unrest in Canada to-day is not due either to a lack of preparation, or to preparation, in military matters; it relates to the question of economics. The labour man in the Dominion has a grievance, and I am prepared to say that I believe his grievance is just and reasonable. Before any appeal was made to capital in this country there was an appeal made by the Mother Country, and subsequently an appeal made by this Dominion, to the labour classes of Canada, that they should make every sacrifice possible, and that they should work to the utmost of their capacity and power, for the purpose of winning the war, and for the purpose of doing away with tyranny, oppression, and dictatorship. There was unquestionably a promise made to the labour class in the Dominion that if they stuck to the ship and the ship reached port in safety, they would not only get a full reward for their sacrifice and loyalty to leadership but, as we were then fighting for principle and for democracy, they should have a full share in the erection of the destinies of Canada, and the profits that would follow, and in the benefits of democratic rule. In Winnipeg to-day you find unrest not by reason of any question of militarism, but owing to the fact that this Dominion is not bringing capital and labour closer together. In Winnipeg there are only a few industries and labour is endeavouring to wring from these industries the maximum of its demands. It seems to me therefore that the Dominion Government is remiss in bringing to bear the necessary pressure upon these large centres of industry so as to give an example to the balance of the people of Canada of what they should contribute for labour. Those are the reasons for unrest in the western provinces to-day, and I believe the Dominion Government has not done everything it should do to bring these people to a right frame of mind.

I do not believe that we are going to have peace on earth through the League of Nations, and I am quite satisfied we ought to increase our military force in Canada. I am quite satisfied the permanent force should be stronger than it is, so that if we are called upon in future to do the things we have been called upon to do in the past, we shall be better prepared than we have been in the past, and therefore I shall support the measure.

Mr. G. A. ALLAN (Winnipeg South): I have no fault to find with the reference made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Michael Clark) to the city of Winnipeg and the way in which the law-abiding citizens of that community have carried on since the commencement of the strike. But I do feel that one may just as well get down to what are the plain facts of the case incidental to the very serious conditions which have prevailed there now for some weeks, and briefly they are these. The law-abiding people of Winnipeg feel, and feel in the strongest possible way, that they are entitled under conditions such as prevail at the moment, and which have prevailed for some time past, to the protection of life and property by an adequate military force. It is all very well to say that if emergencies arise in other cities of the Dominion like the emergency which arose in Winnipeg some few weeks ago, the loyal citizens of each city in turn will rise to the occasion as those in Winnipeg have done, but is it reasonable, is it fair, is it desirable, if it is going to be recurrent in other cities—and it may be recurrent—that there should be such a condition as exists at the moment in that city, and that hundreds of citizens should be wearing khaki, and under arms and in barracks, and responsible for any extraordinary emergency which may spring into existence at any time—although my hope and expectation is that no such emergency will arise? I have a very large measure of the confidence, which has been expressed by the hon. member for Red Deer, but not such a full measure as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has expressed. I doubt very much whether the speech made to-night by the latter hon. gentleman would be satisfactory to his fellow-citizens, and those with whom he has mingled in business and in his daily life in the city of Winnipeg, or whether it would voice their sentiments. I very much doubt it. I believe it is not a fair or proper thing, it is not a normal but a wholly abnormal condition, that the lawyer, the doctor, the bank manager, and all those who are conducting ordinarily, when times are normal and when business is possible, the affairs of a population of 200,000 people should be in khaki and in barracks and ready for any emergency which might occur until this unfortunate condition of affairs in Winnipeg is brought to an end. Nobody believes more thoroughly than I do in the soundness of heart and the loyalty of the great big percentage of labour. I believe most thoroughly and absolutely in the great big percentage of labour in my own home city. I believe that the heart of Winnipeg and of the great majority of its population is loyal, sweet, and clean; but we have had a condition which came suddenly like a bolt from the blue and has created a situation which has affected not only those who are on strike but the entire population to their prejudice. Without wishing in any way to make an extreme statement, or to indulge in any quibbling, I say, and I say it advisedly, that the workers of a population of 200,000 people located at the junction of the Red River and the Assiniboine, have not been able to earn in their various avocations of life support for themselves and their families for a period now of over four weeks.

That may be recurrent in other cities of Canada—other cities of Canada, are, I take it, measurably and substantially in the same condition as Winnipeg was in when this strike occurred. I have the firmest belief that this unfortunate strike, which every man and woman in that city must and does deplore, will be brought to an end without, I believe, any serious loss of life or any serious rioting, and I think that will be due to just that spirit which was so aptly stated by the hon. member for Red Deer, and which was also stated, I think, much more as an idealist, by the member for Marquette. But the condition is wrong, absolutely wrong, and any one who suggests to me that there is any militarism in an enormous country extending from Cape Breton to Vancouver—

Mr. BUTTS: Do not say Cape Breton, now.

Mr. ALLAN: All right,—with a population scattered from the Maritime Provinces to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, to the Prairie Provinces and so to the province of British Columbia—that any one who suggests to me that a force of anything within the maximum which the hon. Minister of Militia has mentioned to-night savours of militarism—such a suggestion I cannot follow. To my mind it is only a force which is reasonable and adequate for our enormous territory and scattered population. We all deplore the present condition of unrest; we all feel we have to face it from day to day and overcome it; and we all believe that we can, having the force provided for by the Bill successfully deal with any emergency which may hereafter confront us. Therefore I shall vote for the Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I had expected that my hon. friend from Edmonton East (Mr. Mackie) would have made strange revelations about the speech delivered by my good friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau); but after this address to the committee this evening, I have yet to learn that the hon. member for Three Rivers has uttered any words in French which he could not repeat in English. As a matter of fact, I take exactly the same attitude as my hon. friend from Three Rivers. That hon. member—

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Is the hon. member for Maisonneuve at liberty to repeat anything that has been said by the hon. member for Three Rivers?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not repeating at all. I am stating, Mr. Chairman, that I am taking exactly the same attitude on this Bill as my hon. friend from Three Rivers. To show those of the committee who do not understand French that there is nothing sinister in the language used or in the attitude taken by my hon. friend from Three Rivers, it is this: The member for Three Rivers, the member for Maisonneuve, and many other members on both sides of the House, trust implicitly the common sense of the Canadian people. That is all that was embodied in the remarks made by the hon. member. I have for my hon. friend the Minister of Militia the highest regard, and I think I may oppose his measure without impairing that regard.

It seems to me that in the great economic crisis which one section of the country is passing through to-day, if the Government had shown some moral courage it would have accomplished much more than has been accomplished by the shots that were fired on the people of Winnipeg the other day. Remember, Mr. Chairman, I do not take sides with the strikers or against them; I am not familiar with the conditions. The press has been absolutely silent on the causes of this strike and on the attitude of the strikers. But I admire the spirit of the citizens of Winnipeg who decided that law and order should be maintained, and they have to a large degree succeeded in accomplishing their purpose. I wish to say, however, that there are other examples in other countries of economic troubles such as those we have at Winnipeg and in other centres of our Dominion, and in those countries the heads of the Government have thought it their duty to interfere personally. Let me give an example to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. Mr. Lloyd George, the Prime Minister of England, not more than a few weeks ago, was summoned from Paris—where the right hon. gentleman was—to attend a conference with the miners in England. On several occasions during the war, but certainly on two or three decisive occasions, Mr. Lloyd George, the Prime Minister of England, went to the strikers' homes and discussed with them their troubles, and won his point, whilst the miners and the strikers were also winning theirs. Through conciliation, through parleying, and through mutual trust the labour troubles, which were of great magnitude, were overcome by the great moral strength of Mr. Lloyd George.

Let me give another example to the right hon. gentleman. I was reading last night the latest book—and it is an admirable book, the life of M. Clemenceau, "The Old Tiger"—by M. Lecomte, one of the leading French writers. During M. Clemenceau's first tenure of office as Premier of France there were two great strikes, involving not one city but two or three departments.

The men were splendidly organized, and we know that Frenchmen are warm-blooded. There were some people who said, like my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach) —who served so gallantly during the war— that the only thing which would prevent trouble would be the calling out of the troops. M. Clemenceau resisted that proposal and himself went amongst the strikers and discussed with them their grievances, and settled both strikes. The writer says that it was due to his common sense, to his moral courage, and also to his great character, that on those two historic occasions he was able to curb the militaristic spirit which, even in France, was displaying itself against the labour element. I say to the right hon. gentleman,—and I say it with all due respect, because he knows that I have the highest regard for him—that even to-day it is not too late for him, the first citizen of Canada, to go to Winnipeg, and by means of conciliation to settle the strike there. Let it not be said that the Parliament of Canada on this first explosion in the West has answered by doubling our militia force, when I believe that the right hon. gentleman, having the whole nation at his back, could by speaking words of truth and wisdom bring the parties together.

The member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) spoke words of wisdom a moment ago when he said that you must strike at the root of the trouble; that you must not attempt to overcome these difficulties by force of arms. If the Government should to-morrow announce that they will introduce legislation providing for the nationalization of the cold storage establishments of this country, it would allay the bad feeling which prevails as against the monopolists. If the Government should to-morrow take steps to prevent some of these companies from corralling the money of the people to the extent of 72 per cent of profits on the necessaries of life, they would be taking steps to allay the bitter feelings which are spreading throughout the land. I agree with the member for Red Deer that it is regrettable that on the eve of the signing of the Peace Treaty it should become known that Canada is acting contrary to the decisions arrived at at Versailles. This war is the last war, this war was meant to end all wars in the future; and it is not by doubling the military forces of Canada that you will instil into the minds of coming generations a recognition of the fact that we are a British country; that we have no love for militaristic enterprises, that the affairs of the country should be run on a common sense, business basis.

I do not like, Mr. Chairman, certain expressions which were used by my gallant friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach). Speaking of the necessity of having a strong military force in Canada, he delved into history and said that every fifteen years we had " a chance " to go to war. I do not like that expression; it smacks of militarism. It would seem that my hon. friend is happy because this evening we are having the thin edge of the wedge—

Mr. GRIESBACH: When I said that every fifteen years we had a chance of going to war, I meant that those who went to war had a chance to go to war every fifteen years. I went because I believed it to be my duty to go.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend did not go alone; fortunately, he came back alive. I accept his explanation, but the whole tenor of his speech indicates that he is in favour of the establishment and maintenance of a strong military force in Canada. The member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) went a little further; he said that it was the intention to give employment to returned soldiers. Is it good policy to give soldiers who went to war to end all wars further employment as soldiers on their return? I am in favour of a moderately strong military force in Canada; I advocated not long ago the training of our young boys at college in case of an emergency in the future. But let us not have militarism in Canada at a time when there is a general desire to cut the frills of militarism; at a time when we must do away with waste in the Militia Department. I do not say that the minister is wasting money, but I do say that, having regard to the period of unrest through which we are passing, to the huge national debt which is staring us in the face, and to the economic problems which confront us in the West, this is not the time to weld such a costly weapon. Again I ask the minister to consider this matter seriously; I ask him not to excite the prejudices of labour at this particular juncture.

Mr. BUTTS: Mr. Chairman, it is an old saying that after the storm generally comes a calm; so I am going to try and be calm. I am going to support, in all fulness, the measure of the minister, on this particular principle: that down in my country, when strikes come on, the employer and the employee are generally able to get together and settle their difficulties. So that to my part of the country this is a matter of indifference. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company and the Dominion Coal Company met with their employees in the court house in Sydney last January, talked over the questions at issue in a sane and complacent manner, and arrived at a settlement of their difficulties. If you boisterous people in the West deserve to have a doubling of the military forces, why then, we will give it to you.

My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) does not seem to be as familiar with strike conditions as he is with military conditions. You talk of the big strikes of the world; did governments intervene? Who intervened in the case of the Homestead strike in the United States, perhaps the biggest strike that ever occurred there? Did the British Government interfere in the London dock strikes? Was it not Cardinal Manning who settled the London dock strikes when your great Gladstone was in power? Now you call upon the Prime Minister to go to the West. Have we not had strikes in this country? Did the then Prime Minister, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, go to Glace Bay a few years ago to settle the strike down there? Now, be reasonable in this matter. Gladstone did not settle the London dock strikes; neither did the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier settle the big Glace Bay strike, which lasted for months. We had to come to terms ourselves, and we did it, by a sanity peculiar to our own Cape Breton people.

To-day there is no dispute between capital and labour in that part of the country. The only dispute we have, I might in a friendly way remind the Government, is that they are not getting back our shipping. If in the western country you have difficulties of your own, do you know of any statute that you people who were in charge of the affairs of this country put on the statute book that would settle such disputes? Do you know of any law that you ever put upon the statute book that would allow any of your members of Government, or officials of your departments, to go out to Winnipeg and take conditions in your own hands and settle that strike? Is there anything? You were in power for fifteen years. This is the first dispute that has occurred since you left office. Have you provided for it? If you have not, then why do you quarrel?

Mr. MOWAT: This subject is so important, and I take and have for many years taken such an interest in it, that I should like to say a word or two. This is not a party question. In the capable hands of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), it seems to have been given a turn that was an appeal to those who are prejudiced against the defence of their country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MOWAT: The defence of the country is a matter which is absolutely divorced from party; it applies to both parties. I do not know the necessity for this increase in the permanent force, but I have a trust in the Minister of Militia (Major-General Mewburn), because I have noticed since I have been in this House, his sanity and his want of impetuosity in dealing with the affairs of his office. If he says that it is essential that power should be given to call up another 5,000 men, I am going to follow him. The Bill does not say that they must be called up; it simply gives the power. I have not heard the whole of the debate, but I was here this afternoon when the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), where the bromide comes from, was speaking.

Mr. BUREAU: Give him a dose, for Heaven's sake.

Mr. MOWAT: He made a speech, not in his usual jovial style; it was a serious speech coming from a pacifist. My hon. friend is a pacifist; he believes in always opposing anything which the men who really understand the affairs of the country and its defence are urging. He always wants to be a little behind hand, and he is only typical of a number of persons in the country. If the militia force at this time had been one hundred, and it was proposed to increase that to two hundred, we would have had the same protest from the hon. member. With that class of mind that causes trouble, this generally accounts for a very large increase in expenditure when we do have trouble, and generally brings us into a highly nervous state of excitement when the war comes on. Lord Jellicoe said that he was not prepared in the Jutland fight, the reason being that his flashlights were defective and his destroyers inadequate and insufficient. The reason for that was that the Parliament of Great Britain could not force itself to pass sufficient appropriations because of the constant bickerings of the pacifists in that country. When the war came on, the pacifist subsided; he knew he was wrong; he knew all his efforts had been rather to the discredit of his party and to the disadvantage of the country. But now that the war is over, we shall have them again, and every time that any measure is proposed for either the defence or the quietude of the country, we shall have the pacifist rising to protest.

I said I was disappointed that this Bill was necessary, and I am disappointed, because I do not believe in a permanent force. The permanent force in Canada should in my opinion, be abolished just as soon as possible, because as long as you have a permanent force, you have men taken from industry and put into a certain class, privileged men who are looked upon as the persons who will be called upon to engage in quelling industrial disputes and strikes. That begets for them the hatred of the labour class, and all that is improper and unfortunate. I would have no permanent force at all, and while I support this Bill because I believe in the information that the minister has in support of it, yet I hope that as soon as possible the permanent force will be dissolved and dissipated. We want to have in this country what I have advocated before on the floor of this House, namely, a universally trained militia. Then every man of from sixteen to twenty years of age will, with pleasure, after he gets accustomed to the work, take part in the annual training for the defence of his country. Then you have all the labour men, business men, aristocrats and democrats in the one common democratic army, so that you have at least 400,000 men, who are not wholly trained, but who, when the time comes, when the country calls, have learned at least their A, B, C of training. I do not believe in a permanent force, and I trust that we shall soon follow the example of our sister nations, the Commonwealth of Australia and the Dominion of New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, in having universal training for our young men instead of a permanent militia; that we shall follow Switzerland which, on the outbreak of war, was able to mobilize nearly 500,000 men fully equipped with artillery and all the latest guns, and was able—in that little republic, absolutely unwarlike and democratic—to keep from her borders the bloody fangs of her northern neighbour who would have liked to cross her territory in order to attack France. We must keep up with the State of New York which last year passed an Act for the universal training of her young men. We must keep up with the efforts of the United States' Congress at present which has before a committee the Bill of Senator Harry New providing for universal military training. If the United States pass this Universal Training Bill, and make all their citizens for a short period of their lives liable for military training, what will Canada have to say if she is behindhand and has simply to be an adjunct of her powerful neighbour in case of serious dispute? The very people who are going to take hold enthusiastically of a universal scheme when it comes in—and I am sure the minister will see in a very short time the necessity of such a scheme—will be my friends from Quebec, because they are the descendants of men who knew how to defend their country. Their ancestors were not military men, and when they came to this country they had no permanent force. But they trained themselves on their own farms under men who understood military matters, and the result was that although there were larger populations in Connecticut and Massachusetts the victory almost invariably rested with the men from Lower Canada. When I was a boy the best soldiers I knew were from Lower Canada, such men as Duchesnay, Hébert, Montizambert Pelletier and Labelle. And although there are some who for certain reasons do not now seem to be enthusiastic in military matters, I believe that if universal military training were established the most enthusiastic province would be Quebec. My hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) speaks about the training of young men in the schools, and I think you will find, if you look over the militia list, that the schools, seminaries and colleges in Quebec have been training to a greater extent than in any other province of Canada. That is the sort of thing I want to see in Canada, and I venture to say that there would be no feeling against proper military training if this were the case.

Mr. TOBIN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks—

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member begins his remarks, and in order that I shall not be obliged to call any other hon. member to order, I must remind the committee that the second reading of this Bill took place this afternoon when the principle of the Bill was adopted. We have been discussing the principle of the Bill since eight o'clock and the discussion has certainly not been in order. Whether or not it would have been in order on the second reading is a question I am not now called upon to decide and I would therefore ask any hon. member who has remarks to make to confine them to the clause under discussion.

Mr. TOBIN: Mr. Chairman, I will follow the rules as closely as I possibly can, but I must say that I am surprised that the Government should bring in a Bill at the present time having as its object the increasing of our standing military force by 5,000 men. The war is over and we have now entered upon the period of reconstruction. The country is faced with an expenditure this year of $620,000,000, and the total revenue that is in sight, after taxing everything that can possibly be taxed, is only $280,000,000, so that $340,000,000 more will have to be raised. The Minister of Finance will have to go before the country this coming fall and borrow this money. Whether he borrows the money in Canada or in the United States, he will have to find it, and in view of the figures which I have quoted, is it reasonable to embark on any undertaking that will create a further deficit? I for one would rather see the Government pay the returned men a bonus of $1,000 each. This would represent paying that sum to each of 300,000 to 500,000 men, a million dollars.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: One hundred million.

Mr. TOBIN: Well, one hundred million. I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend is wrong. Three hundred million dollars divided among 300,000 men would be $1,000 apiece.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would be $2 apiece.

Mr. TOBIN: I have the figures here, although I have not looked at them very closely. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the hon. minister that if you give a bonus to these men who have given their all in the service of the country you will do more to satisfy the people than if you increase the standing military forces of the country, for such a step would only tend to excite public indignation. The prime cause of public dissatisfaction at the present time is directly attributable to this Government, which, though allowing profiteers to make from seventy to one hundred per cent, and even as high as three hundred per cent, has helped to increase the cost of living. These soldiers who fought so nobly for the cause of the Empire are returning out of work and will find it exceedingly difficult indeed to live on the small wages which will be available unless some substantial assistance is given them. I have every respect for my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, but I would seriously urge on him the necessity of abandoning this Bill.

If he dropped this measure the country would commend him. In any event, the present is no time to increase expenditures unnecessarily when we are faced already with $600,000,000 for the current year. When we consider that a small country like Canada has a debt of $220 per capita it is high time that we should think of taking some sane steps to reduce the expenses of the country.

Mr. EDWARDS: Where does my hon. friend propose to get this billion dollars which he suggests that the Government should spend in the way of bonuses to the soldiers?

Mr. TOBIN: It would be easier to pay these men bonuses of $1,000 a piece than to increase the militia force by 5,000 or 6,000, which would mean an expenditure of five or six million dollars a year and which might increase to seven or eight or ten million, for you do not know where you will stop. If you give these men $1,000 or $2,000 apiece it will be finished forever and the people will be satisfied.

Mr. EDWARDS: If the proposition of the hon. member were carried out and you gave $2,000 apiece to each man, that would mean one billion dollars. If you gave them $1,000 apiece it would be five hundred million dollars. Has the hon. member calculated the interest on this sum?

Mr. TOBIN: I have my figures and will show them to you.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Rates of pay of permanent force to be fixed by Governor in Council instead of by statute:

Mr. NICKLE: Will the minister give an explanation of what the Government intends to do in this regard?

Major-General MEWBURN: I said this afternoon that my immediate concern is to recommend to the Governor in Council a very small increase in the permanent force. I made it very clear then that I did not intend to increase the force immediately to 10,000. With regard to the second subsection, we will have to increase the pay of the permanent force, and I have not determined the actual figures. For instance, in the Northwest Mounted Police the pay for a staff-sergeant per day is $3.25 including allowances; that of a warrant officer in the permanent forces is only $2.30, and the private in the permanent force, including field allowance receives $1.10. The constable receives, the first year, $2 a day.

My idea is that it might be put on the same scale as that upon which the Mounted Police now are. I had a letter from Calgary to-day, in which it is stated that the men of the permanent force are complaining that they cannot live on their pay and that it ought to be made equal to that of the Northwest Mounted Police. That is my recommendation to the Governor in Council.

Mr. NICKLE: Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with what the minister has said in relation to the necessity of something being done to increase the pay of the permanent force, if the men who are to be on that force are to be the class of men that the minister would desire to have. I come from a city which is the headquarters of Military District No. 3, and I should like very much to see the members of the new force of such a class as the minister would like them to be. To that end he will have to give some consideration to the question of the improvement of the barrack accommodation of the permanent force. The greater part of the life of these men is spent in barracks. Their remuneration is made up not only of the money that they receive, but of certain allowances, quarters and accommodation. The accommodation in Kingston for the use of the permanent force has been very poor, and I would like to urge upon the minister that he take some steps to secure some of the beautiful sites situated around Kingston for barrack purposes and that he turn over for commercial purposes the present barracks in the city. While I am on the subject of remuneration, let me say that I would like to see a new scale of pay adopted for the entire permanent force. New Zealand has taken up the whole question of the permanent force and has done away with a great many of the allowances and perquisites that have for so many years been considered necessary. I would like to see a scheme of remuneration adopted by which a definite amount for the services of officers and a definite amount for the services of the men would be paid in dollars and cents, that the public could measure and understand. I would also like to see such a change made in the permanent force as would abolish the system by which the superior ranks are entitled to the services of the rank and file in such occupations as cleaning furnaces, shovelling walks, waiting on table, and, in some cases looking after children. The civilian population resent that sort of thing. It is far from dignified, it has had an unfortunate effect on the rank and file, and it lends itself to abuse. I would like to urge upon the minister that he give consideration to this point. But, I want to urge especially upon him to see if something cannot be done to improve the quarters which for a century or so have been occupied by the permanent force at Kingston, because the present barracks are the successors of a certain establishment founded by Frontenac when he landed in what is now Kingston something over two centuries ago.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about what has been suggested by some of the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Nickle). If the Minister of Militia followed the suggestion of the hon. member and built new barracks in the city of Kingston on any one of the beautiful sites which, I confess, are numerous, he would be wasting money. There has been enough money wasted in Kingston by the Department of Public Works. We have at Barriefield a great many buildings which were erected, some of them even after the armistice was signed, and which are to-day absolutely useless. It is true that the barracks in Kingston are no better than a rathole. They have been a disgrace to the militia of Canada for as long as my memory can carry me. They should be torn down and thrown into the lake, there is no doubt in my mind as to that. If the city of Kingston had had any enterprise about it some years ago when the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) was Minister of Militia, it would have accepted the suggestion made by him, torn those buildings down and thrown them into the lake. But Kingston is proverbially slow when it comes to anything along progressive lines. The people there have been content to look at the old rotten barracks they have there, and pride themselves on the fact that the buildings were erected years and years ago by some person who was connected with the early history of the country. They would rather continue to look at the old rathole of a barracks which has an inscription on a stone over the arch than have it interfered with in any way, because that would be laying profane hands upon a sacred piece of history. What I would suggest as a counter proposal to what has been suggested by the hon. member for Kingston is this: You have at Barriefield Commons a number of buildings which have been erected at enormous cost to this country and which are useless. These buildings can be made useful for barracks purposes. You have not to go very far from where these buildings are to get solid rock. If you will merely place a wall under these buildings and then veneer them with brick, you will have good buildings at a minimum of cost and you will be relieved of the worry of knowing what to do with the buildings which you have there now, which have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars and which are absolutely useless at the present time. There is where your barracks ought to be. Get rid of the rathole barracks in Kingston just as quickly as you can.

Mr. NICKLE: The hon. member for Frontenac——

The CHAIRMAN: Order; I must interrupt this discussion. I am sorry, but it has nothing at all to do with the clause under discussion.

Mr. NICKLE: We are discussing the remuneration of the member of the Canadian Permanent Force and that remuneration is made up of housing accommodation, food and pecuniary compensation. Can we not discuss the entire situation?

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling is that housing accommodation of soldiers, and especially the construction of new barracks at Kingston, has absolutely nothing to do with the clause under discussion. My ruling is entirely in the hands of the committee.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understand that we are dealing with the pay of the permanent force, and that it is proposed that the pay shall be settled by Order in Council. I think that is a mistake.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Major-General MEWBURN: It is to be approved by the Governor in Council.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Yes; Parliament is not to fix the scale. I think the minister will be doing the wise thing if he puts down a scale for Parliament to adopt, because there will be constant friction and trouble with the Militia Department in regard to the question of pay if that is not done. If the scale is fixed by Parliament, every soldier who enlisted in the permanent force will know what his pay is and he will know that the Governor in Council has no power to change it. It will make him more contented and it will be more satisfactory all round. Under this system you may have a strike among the members of your permanent force, as we had in the Post Office Department, and to avoid anything of that kind I think it would be better that the minister should make the pay of the soldiers statutory. It formerly was statutory and that system worked very well. If the minister is prepared to say how much he intends to pay them, it would be better to put it in the Act and make it a part of the law of the land.

Major-General MEWBURN: There is a good deal in what my hon. friend says, but I think it is perfectly safe to leave the matter in the hands of the Governor in Council. Everybody will admit that the old statutory provision of 75 cents a day is entirely out of the question. I do not anticipate that there will be any particular increase this year, but provision will have to be made in the Estimates probably at another session. At the present time we are paying the men $1.10 per diem, the same as the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and I feel we will have to continue that, probably to the end of this year. I am endeavouring to get the rates paid in the United States, Great Britain, New Zealand and Australia. At present we do not anticipate that the pay will be increased beyond that of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police—the rates paid to the two forces will probably run together. I think the Committee can rest assured that the Governor in Council will not establish any very extravagant rates of pay, but merely what is essential to carry on the force in a satisfactory manner.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—rates of pay of active militia to be fixed by Governor in Council instead of by statute.

Major-General MEWBURN:: This is a provision similar to the one which has been already carried.

Mr ERNEST LAPOINTE: Does the minister intend to distribute the permanent force among the various military districts?

Major-General MEWBURN: Yes, most decidedly. We intend to distribute them among the various military districts in Canada, viz.: Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Montreal, Kingston, London, Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary, and Victoria, B.C. For instance, I hope that the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery and the Garrison Artillery will be partly distributed in the province of Quebec and partly at Halifax and Esquimalt, also some infantry regiments. Of the cavalry units one portion will be stationed in Toronto and another portion in St. Johns, Quebec. There will be another portion in Winnipeg, another in Calgary, and so on.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

On the motion of Major-General Mewburn for the third reading of the Bill:

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I suggest that the third reading be postponed to another day.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is perfectly competent for the minister to proceed if he chooses.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Is there any objection to the Bill being now read a third time?

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: We object to the third reading at this sitting.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Bill will be read a third time at the next sitting of the House.

INSURANCE ACT (1917) AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White the House went into Committee on Bill No. 54 (from the Senate) to amend the Insurance Act, 1917, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 116—"actuary" defined.

Mr. J. A. STEWART: This section as it appears in the Bill and as it passed the Senate, was found to operate harshly upon a number of societies that were being served by actuaries who were not able to measure up to the standard set out therein. When the Bill was before the Committee on Banking and Commerce the position of matters was explained by the member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier). There were originally four societies affected by the legislation as it appeared before the Senate —the Maccabees, the Artisans, the Canadian Order of Foresters, and I think the Alliance Nationale. I do not know whether there were any others, but these four at least were affected, and the section as it stood deprived them of the services of the actuaries who had been serving them for a number of years. It was intended by the amendment made by the Committee on Banking and Commerce to relieve the condition with respect to all these societies, but the section as it passed that committee failed to give relief in any instance except that of the Artisans. I would therefore suggest to the Minister of Finance that an amended section be adopted which would give the relief which I believe it was the intention of the Committee on Banking and Commerce to afford. I would therefore propose to strike out section 116 as amended by the Banking and Commerce Committee and substitute the following:

10 p.m.

116. The term "actuary" in this part means a Fellow of the Institute of Actuaries of Great Britain, the Faculty of Actuaries in Scotland, or the Actuarial Society of America; Provided, however, that an actuary who for a period of not less than five years preceding the date of the passing of this Act has been serving any fraternal benefit society transacting business in Canada on the said date as its actuary, and who has been in active practice as an actuary for a period of not less than twenty-five years prior to the said date, may, for the purposes of this Act, with the consent of the superintendent, be continued as the actuary of any fraternal benefit society by which at the said date he is employed as actuary.

The changes which this amendment would cover are principally the reduction of the period of service from thirty to twenty-five years; and, also, it would give to any actuary who has been serving a society doing business in Canada for five years, the right to continue to serve not only that society, but any other society that he is at present serving. That is an important change from the amendment made by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, for the reason that some societies are being served by actuaries of more than twenty-five years' experience who have not been serving them for five years, but who have been serving other societies doing business in Canada for a longer period than five years. It will be admitted that a service of twenty-five years is just as safe a guarantee of ability as a service of thirty years. If an actuary has not developed in twenty-five years the qualifications which would entitle him to be considered a satisfactory officer under the provisions of this Act, it is extremely unlikely that five years' additional service would make him any more efficient or trustworthy for the business that would devolve upon him under the Act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will be very glad to accept the amendment. It meets with the approval of the Superintendent of Insurance.

Mr. PEDLOW: Before you declare that amendment carried, Mr. Chairman, I wish to express approval of and to endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Stewart) in regard to it. There is also an additional reason for the amendment of this clause as it came to the Banking and Commerce Committee from the Senate, and that is the implied suggestion as the clause reads, that Canadians were not eligible for the position of actuary. Members of that Committee rather resented the form in which this clause was presented to them for their approval, and they wished to give expression to their feelings by amending the clause. It was contended at the time by those experienced in the matter that although there was no actuarial association at present in Canada, by making this amendment, possibly before very long an actuarial association would be formed, so that we would not give expression to the fact that Canadians were not eligible for a position of this kind.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Bill as amended reported.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved the third reading of the Bill. He said: Is there any objection to the third reading now?

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion must be by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. J. A. Stewart.]

THE CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Thomas White for the second reading of Bill 142, to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907:

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, this may be a somewhat contentious measure, and as some of us were here until two o'clock this morning, I would suggest to the hon. minister that we might now adjourn.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it is a little early to adjourn. We are very anxious to bring the session to an end—I think that is common ground on both sides—and possibly my hon. friend would be willing to take up the next Bill, No. 25.

Motion stands.

THE BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, Bill No. 143, to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Bill reported without amendment.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance), Bill No. 144, to amend The Income War Tax Act, 1917, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the chair.

On section 2—income.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I promised the committee, when the resolution preceding the Bill was under consideration, that I would increase the age limit of each child in respect of which the taxpayer is granted exemption of $200. To that end I move that the word "eighteen" be substituted for the word "sixteen" in the second line of paragraph (b), subsection 2 of this section.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This will be in addition to the statutory exemption?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McMASTER: I find it somewhat difficult to understand the meaning of paragraph (e). It reads:

(e) In determining the income no deduction shall be allowed in respect of personal and living expenses, and in cases in which personal and living expenses form part of the profit, gain or remuneration of the taxpayer, the same shall be assessed as income for the purposes of this Act.

It seems to me that there is a lack of clearness in the first part of that paragraph. It is quite evident that no one has the right to deduct his personal and living expenses from income before he declares it for the purposes of this Act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is just to make it clear that that deduction must not be made. All kinds of representations are put forward with a view to securing a reduction of the income assessment, and we want to make it perfectly clear that the full net income must be assessed. As to the second part of the paragraph, with reference to cases in which personal and living expenses form part of the profit, gain, or remuneration of the taxpayer, there are many who derive as a substantial part of their income the benefits of house or living expenses, and it would not be fair that these should not be taken into account.

Mr. McMASTER: Let us say that a Presbyterian minister gets $4,000 a year and his manse, would he be expected to pay income tax on the rental of the manse?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Unless he was specially exempted, I think that he would. But not very many Presbyterian ministers receive $4,000.

Mr. McMASTER: There are six, Mr. Chairman. A man does not have to pay income tax on the rental of his house when he lives in his own house?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. McMASTER: There is an anomaly there.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree with my hon. friend. The man who rents a house has to pay rental; the man who owns his house has the benefit of that ownership so far as income tax is concerned. That is something to which I shall give attention at the next session if possible. It raises a very difficult question, because allowance would have to be made on some basis for the capital invested in the house. All kinds of anomalies would arise in the administration of any such provision; that is one reason why, generally speaking, it is not in income taxation measures.

Mr. McMASTER: Suppose a commercial traveller gets $5,000 a year and hotel and personal expenses. Under paragraph (e) he should pay income tax on those living expenses, which are really part of his remuneration. I suggest that there should be something in the Act to indicate the way in which that should be collected.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to lay down regulations; we have to deal with individual cases as they occur. It has been brought to my attention by men who have certain living allowances that when they travel they are out of pocket; their allowances are not adequate, and they are put to other expense. Of course, they have the inconvenience of being away from home.

Mr. BUREAU: So have we.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I know, but a great deal is expected of us; we cannot put our services on a money basis. The department, in the case of commercial travellers, has not added anything to the income by reason of the living expenses allowed. Whether right or not, that is the policy we have adopted.

Mr. McMASTER: If I may interject, the living expenses of a traveller certainly come under this clause of the Bill.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They do, and this was intended to cover cases of which that is an example, but whether we would be able to add on the full amount they are allowed, I am unable to say in advance. We would have to take all the facts into consideration. A man might prove that he was out of pocket; that his expenses were much more than he was allowed, and you would have to deal with each case on its merits. My experience is that income tax assessment is by no means as exact a science as algebra.

Mr. McMASTER: May I make this suggestion with all respect to the minister?—that if he is going to go at this income tax in this empiric sort of way, taking merely cases as they arise, it will be a very long and unsatisfactory business. Some general principle should be laid down, say, that a commercial traveller should be assessed on say two-thirds of the living allowance given him. I quite understand that you cannot approximate it very closely, but you can get some idea, and the Government should have some regulation, so that the scrupulous man who charges himself with all the living allowance which he gets from his house and pays income tax upon it, should not be under a disadvantage as compared with the other man with a more elastic conscience who says: "Well, I get $50, or $100, or $250 a month as living allowance from my house, but after all I have to spend considerably more than that," and so does not return it at all. Unless the minister and his hard-working commissioner are prepared to take up the case of every single traveller who pays income tax, which procedure would cause an immense amount of work, it would be wise to lay down some general principle which would roughly deal with the situation.

Mr. MORPHY: I should like to call the attention of the minister to a complaint from the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and particularly from a large number of railway trainmen in the city of Stratford. They complain that, in case of an engineer, conductor, fireman and brakeman, they are forced, by virtue of their occupation, to take long runs, say to the city of Buffalo, where they are compelled to remain over, probably a whole day or more until the return train is made up They are all forced from their homes, and they have to stay at rather expensive hotels. These men are out of the class that one would call the wealthy class, and although they are men of small means, they are bound to pay a tax under the schedule that is laid down now. They complain that while they have to keep up their own homes in Stratford where they live, with all attendant expenses, they are practically compelled to keep up a home in a hotel while they are away for probably two days in the week, or even three. This amounts to a very severe penalty upon these men, because they do not really get the income that would become taxable if you allowed them anything for the extra expenses to which they are put. I have been asked to draw this matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance and I do so in the hope—because I appreciate that the same may be true of commercial travellers—that some equitable principle may be arrived at, if not now, at some time in the future, by which a deserving case of this kind will be exempted from a taxation which bears rather heavily under the circumstances.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We shall be glad to take under consideration what has been said and will see if some regulation can be made to meet the circumstances. A commercial traveller receives his railway fare and hotel bills, and his hotel bill might reasonably be added to his income unless something exceptional can be set up, and I do not at the moment know what could be so set up. With regard to engineers and conductors, my hon. friend will see at once the difficulty that would arise there, in the different standards of living. One man might go to an expensive hotel and another to a less expensive one, and it is exceedingly difficult to lay down a regulation to meet a case of that kind. The Commissioner of Taxation has not been able up to date to see his way clear to make any allowance. This discussion all goes to show the difficulty of administering with scrupulous fairness an income taxation measure, but notwithstanding that difficulty every effort should be made to carry out the law.

Mr. PEDLOW: I was just about to call attention to the same matter as has been referred to by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Morphy) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), but there is another aspect of the situation I should like the minister to bear in mind at the same time. There are commercial travellers who travel on a commission basis only, and those men will pay their living and travelling expenses out of their commissions, and they will be discriminated against if the basis for their taxation is on their income in that respect as against those who are paid on a salary and travelling expense basis. I know, as a matter of fact, that the latter are paid liberal money for expenses by the firms they do business for, and in very rare cases is it required of them to expend money beyond amounts allowed to them. But there are others besides commercial travellers. There are employees of the income tax department who are sent out to make investigations at different points, and who are given liberal allowances to cover their expenses. How does the minister treat them in regard to the matter? The question is broad; it covers many besides those who come under the heading of commercial travellers.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree with my hon. friend. The reason why we referred to commercial travellers was because it was an obvious case, because they do travel and are allowed expenses. The hon. member says precisely what I had in mind, namely, that it was very difficult to lay down rules, because as I pointed out, the expense allowances might really not be adequate. My experience has been that, whenever I have been travelling where I have had a certain allowance, I have been out of pocket, but others may be more fortunate.

Mr. PEDLOW: The minister should also bear in mind the case of the man who works on a commission basis and whose entire income will be rated for income tax purposes.

Mr. MORPHY: I should like to fix in the minister's mind the distinction between a railway man and a commercial traveller.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Their cases are entirely opposite.

Mr. MORPHY: The railwayman has to pay this expense out of his own pocket always.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understand we are at section 2, and I want to draw the attention of the minister to paragraph (f) which says:

> (f) Deficits or losses sustained in transactions entered into for profit but not connected with the chief business, trade, profession or occupation of the taxpayer shall not be deducted from income derived from the chief business, trade, profession or occupation of the taxpayer in determining his taxable income.

It will be very difficult to determine what the chief business of some firms is. I know a firm that is engaged in the investment business, lumber business and grocery business. I know their business very intimately, but it would be difficult for me to tell which is their chief business. I know another firm engaged in the shipping business and also in a machine shop business. I do not see much use in the word " chief." Why not eliminate it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the word "chief" is necessary to emphasize the intention. The difficulty we encounter is this: A man has an income from his occupation of say, $10,000, and he engages in stock speculation and loses two or three thousand dollars and desires to deduct that. We will not allow him to do so. If a firm engages in half a dozen different businesses and takes a flyer on the side, we will not allow them to set up any loss in respect of that. It is surprising how often the contention is set up that something should be allowed for losses on the side. The department will administer the section in the sense that "chief occupation" means the occupation which is actually and bona fide engaged in from day to day, and no deduction will be allowed for losses incurred in transactions. not connected therewith, such as stock transactions. Not long ago it was brought to my attention that a man who had a large income took it into his head that he could become a successful farmer. They say when a man does fancy farming he is an "agriculturist," as distinguished a "farmer" who does real farming and makes money. The "agriculturist" nearly always loses money, and we do not propose to let him set up any loss in this enterprise. We will assess him on his income. We do not desire to discourage him from going into farming, but do not think he should set up such losses against a substantial income he derives in the city.

Mr. BUREAU: I desire to call the minister's attention to a matter which it seems there is a general fear to touch upon. Members of Parliament pay a tax on $2,500, and I know of cases where members find a deficit in the personal budget when they return home. The living expenses in Ottawa take the whole of the indemnity and sometimes more, according to the length of the session. I know that this is a delicate matter, but I am not afraid to touch it. People ought to know that not only do we not receive anything for our services here, but that while we are here we have to pay a tax, for the pleasure of being here, on money that most of us do not receive any real benefit from. I think there ought to be an allowance for living expenses. It cannot be argued that there is a great saving in the individual home, for our families have to be provided for at home while we pay separate expenses here, and we are actually out of pocket in the final result. It is not right, and whatever the country may think of my statement I speak my mind about the matter. I think, that as a matter of principle, we ought not to be called upon to pay taxes on money that does not benefit us as a matter of fact, because we would not spend that much at home.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I should like very much to meet the views of my hon. friend because I realize that there is a great deal of justice in what he says. The sessional allowance is in the nature of an indemnity; it is not intended to be in the nature of income but to indemnify the member against his expenses in attending Parliament and also against demands that might be made upon him from day to day as a public man. When I had to do with assessments in Toronto I recall that the parliamentary allowance was looked upon as indemnity. I think one of the members of this House, the late Mr. Lancaster, brought the matter up—I am speaking now about municipal income assessment—and my recollection is that it was held by a county judge to be an indemnity and not a part of salary. On the other hand, I think it would be the view of the majority of members of Parliament that, notwithstanding the force of my hon. friend's contentions, at a time like this the public would not be likely to approve of members of Parliament escaping taxation upon their sessional indemnity. If the public could be made to realize all that is involved, they would not object so strongly, but it is almost impossible to make them realize it, and members will have to look upon this as one of the necessary sacrifices they make in connection with the public position. However, there is a great deal of weight in what my hon. friend puts forward.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want the indemnity to be exempt, but I think a certain amount should be allowed for living expenses.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That would give rise to difficulties also. The living expenses of one member would differ from those of another, and that is a matter that might be misunderstood by the public. The amount involved is not large, and I think that members on the whole would rather be assessed than not. But if there is any widespread opinion on the matter, I should like to have an expression of it.

Mr. BUREAU: There will not be. People are afraid to talk.

Mr. CAHILL: In the event of a speculator making, say $10,000 on a transaction, how will that be treated?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Gains or losses in transactions on the side are disregarded, because the losses usually offset the gains. I am told that in stock transactions ninety per cent are usually losses.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. McMASTER: Does not a man pay income tax on a successful stock transaction?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It works both ways. He pays on his dividend, of course. But if he takes a flyer and makes something, next week he might take another flyer and lose it.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: In subsection 5 on page 3, "dividends and shareholders' bonuses," the Act provides that dividends or bonuses paid to shareholders by a corporation on or after the first of January, 1917, shall be taxable as income. The Bank of Nova Scotia has a surplus twice as large as its capital. If they decided to distribute that surplus or any part of it at any time, it having been accumulated prior to 1917, would it be taxable against the shareholders?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will observe a date, the purpose of which is to give the Act a start. A reserve prior to the date mentioned, 1st January, 1917, is treated as capital, and if there was a distribution of that it would be regarded as capital distribution rather than income. If they have added to that reserve since and made a distribution, the dividend derived from that would be assessable.

On section 3, subsection (a)—Normal tax.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It has been drawn to our attention that there are some unmarried people who have dependent fathers or mothers, or both. Take the case of a young woman earning $1,600 a year and having to maintain an invalid father or mother.

We have thought it well to classify such a person with married persons, widows and widowers with dependent children. We exempt up to the extent of $2,000 married persons and widows or widowers having dependent children. We want to put into that class unmarried people who have a father or mother depending upon them for support. To accomplish that I beg to move that:

> The section—page 4, line 1, be amended by inserting after word "children" the words "and persons who are not supporting dependent brothers or sisters under the age of eighteen years or a dependent parent or parents."

I think that is just. It was drawn to my attention by some one.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I have been asked to draw the minister's attention to the case of unmarried women. Why should an unmarried woman have to pay a larger tax than a married woman? Take the case of two sisters, one of whom is unmarried. They both get the same income; we will say that it is $4,000 a year. The married one has her husband to support her and she has her $4,000 for pin or pocket money. The unmarried one has no husband to support her. She gets the same amount but she has to pay on $3,000, whereas the married one only has to pay on $2,000 simply because she is married. What is the reason of that? It is regarded as an inequality, a discrimination against the unmarried women, and some women have asked me to draw the matter to the attention of the minister. I am quite in sympathy with taxing the unmarried man, but I am not in favour of taxing the unmarried woman to a greater extent than the married woman.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The reason underlying the distinction is that married people are supposed to have greater responsibilities towards children and the upkeep of the home. That is the only reason I can give my hon. friend. There may be some anomalies in the administration of the Act, but the principle is sound.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The husband is responsible.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The wife may have to keep the house.

Mr. McMASTER: It is not so ordinarily. The husband may be a trial to the wife, but usually he is a means of financial gain, and it is ridiculous, as my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) so well pointed out, that Miss B. with an income of $3,000, let us say, has to pay on $2,000, while her sister, Mrs. C., with exactly the same income, and with a husband to rely upon, has to pay on only $1,000. That is an anomaly that the minister should correct. It is not reasonable, it is unjust, and the idea that the minister gives that children are to be supported, does not hold water. As a rule the husband maintains the family; the wife has, as a rule, the income for herself unless she wishes to join forces with her husband to live in a style more luxurious than they would be living in had the family to depend entirely upon the earnings of the husband. Under these conditions it is unjust to tax an unmarried woman more heavily than a married woman.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To give effect to what is suggested would mean that the unmarried woman with no responsibility would have to be exempt up to $2,000, whereas the man without responsibility is exempt to the amount of $1,000. I think that a woman without responsibility and having an income of $2,000 might very well be assessed. The real question is as to whether there should be one exemption only in the case of husband and wife.

Mr. McMASTER: I think there should.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is a good deal to be said for that, and it has been discussed pro and con. But we would not be justified in stating that a man should be exempt to the extent of $1,000 while a woman with no responsibility should be exempt up to $2,000, because a man usually has more responsibilities than a woman has.

Mr. McMASTER: Instead of bringing the unmarried woman's exemption up to $2,000 it might be proper to bring the married woman's exemption down to $1,000; or you might do what the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has been urging the Minister of Finance to do for some years—regard the husband's and wife's income as a joint income and give one exemption in relation to it. That would possibly do away with this difficulty, because the present situation is not fair, and, I think, rather works to the disadvantage of the revenue.

Mr. BUREAU: Let her marry.

Mr. McMASTER: The hon. member (Mr. Bureau) suggests: Let the girl marry. That may not be within the power of the young lady herself.

Mr. PEDLOW: Should that exemption not be extended to the case of unmarried persons having grandparents to support? There are many such cases.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I think grandparents ought to be put in.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have a good deal of sympathy with the grandparents. How would it do to add, after the word " parents," " grandparent or grandparents?"

Mr. McMASTER: Or make it " ascendants in the direct line."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Oh, no. I beg to move:

That the words " grandparent or grandparents " be added.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Mr. PEDLOW: Before taking up the next clause I would like to call attention to another class of people who are escaping taxation and I think it is unfortunate that they should do so.

There is a large class of people, more particularly in the large centres of Toronto and Montreal, employed as operators in garment factories. They are foreigners, and their incomes are very large. Those unacquainted with the business have no idea of the large sums these people earn from week to week, from month to month, and from year to year. They are a wandering class of people, and I am told by those who know, that their incomes range from $50 to $90 or $100 per week. I realize the difficulty in reaching that class, and therefore I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that the employers of these people collect from them a certain amount each week to be retained and paid over to the income tax department, making the employers responsible for the collection. I am morally certain it would secure a large addition to the revenue of the country if these people could be reached in any way.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We call for returns from the employer in all these cases where over $1,000 a year is paid in wages. I know that what my hon. friend says as to the amount these people receive is correct, or substantially so. The fact was incidentally drawn to my attention not very long ago that some of these garment makers made very high rates of pay. I do not say that they do not earn that pay, no doubt they do. They must be very expert, and earnings of $60 or $70 a week may not be out of the way, although they may appear large for the work that is done. At any rate we do get returns from all these merchant tailors and others.

Mr. PEDLOW: These people cannot be assessed under their yearly income, they work from day to day, and week to week, and they change around from place to place. In spite of that they are a class of people who earn very high remuneration for the work they do. If the department simply accepts the statement of the employers as to the yearly income it will not reach these people at all. You will have to get at them in another way, obtain returns of their weekly income, and see that their employers secure the taxes that these workers should be called upon to pay.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am glad to have the matter drawn to the attention of the Commissioner of Taxation.

I now wish to move an amendment, by inserting the following clause immediately before clause 4:

> 4. Section five of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:—
>
> "(i) Income derived from any pension granted to any member of His Majesty's military, naval or air forces for any disability suffered by the pensioner while serving in any of His Majesty's forces during the war that began in August, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, and the income derived from any pension granted to any dependent relative of any person who was killed or suffered any disability while serving in the said forces in the said war."

I think that meets the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) and concurred in by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux).

Amendment agreed to.

On section 5—books of account must be kept:

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain what kind of books he will require for the farming community?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman will observe that "adequate" books are called for.

Mr. BUREAU: That is pretty broad.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The provision has some flexibility and it is in the discretion of the minister whether he will call for books or not. It would seem to me impossible to require the farming community to keep books, although I think many farmers do so. I have pointed out some difficulties in assessing the farming community, but nevertheless we will have to do the best we can.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister told us that in a previous section which has been concurred in a penalty has been provided for not making the required return. Is it the purpose of the department to take any steps to deal with defaulters?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The amended provision will enable us to do so. Under the Act as it stands the only thing we can do is to summon the delinquent party before a magistrate, and that is not a very satisfactory way of dealing with the matter. I think the experience of governments in administering the income tax is that nothing brings payment so promptly as a penalty. That principle is observed in the case of municipal taxation; if you do not pay your taxes promptly a certain percentage is added. The income tax law being on the statute books we must enforce it, and there must be a penalty to enable the department to do so. It is very much better not to have such a law in operation if we do not assess in full. As far as we are concerned we are going to give the Act a very strict interpretation.

Mr. PEDLOW: If the department will grant a discount I think it will be more effective in securing prompt payment than a penalty. I have in mind the experience of the municipality of the town of Renfrew.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the city of Ottawa.

Mr. PEDLOW: The town of Renfrew gets on the specified date almost the entire amount of taxation due, by allowing discount for prompt payment.

Section agreed to.
