

IMAGE EVALUATION TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences
Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

1.5 2.8 2.5
1.8 2.2
2.0 2.2
2.5 2.5
2.8 2.8
3.2 3.2
3.6 3.6
4.0 4.0
4.5 4.5

CIHM/ICMH
Microfiche Series.

CIHM/ICMH Collection de microfiches.

Canadian Institute for Historical Microreproductions / Institut canadien de microreproductions historiques

1.5 2.8 2.5
1.8 2.2
2.0 2.2
2.5 2.5
2.8 2.8
3.2 3.2
3.6 3.6
4.0 4.0
4.5 4.5

© 1984

Technical and Bibliographic Notes/Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming, are checked below.

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

- Coloured covers/
Couverture de couleur
- Covers damaged/
Couverture endommagée
- Covers restored and/or laminated/
Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée
- Cover title missing/
Le titre de couverture manque
- Coloured maps/
Cartes géographiques en couleur
- Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black)/ Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)
- Coloured plates and/or illustrations/
Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur
- Bound with other material/
Relié avec d'autres documents
- Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin/
La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distorsion le long de la marge intérieure
- Blank leaves added during restoration may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming/Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.
- Additional comments:/
Commentaires supplémentaires: Pagination as follows : p. 153-166.

- Coloured pages/
Pages de couleur
- Pages damaged/
Pages endommagées
- Pages restored and/or laminated/
Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées
- Pages discoloured, stained or foxed/
Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées
- Pages detached/Pages détachées
- Showthrough/
Transparence
- Quality of print varies/Qualité inégale de l'impression
- Includes supplementary material/
Comprend du matériel supplémentaire
- Only edition available/
Seule édition disponible
- Pages wholly or partially obscured by errata slips, tissues, etc., have been refilmed to ensure the best possible image/
Les pages totalement ou partiellement obscurcies par un feuillet d'errata, une pelure, etc., ont été filmées à nouveau de façon à obtenir la meilleure image possible.

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked below/
Ce document est filmé au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

10X	14X	18X	22X	26X	30X
<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
12X	16X	20X	24X	28X	32X

The copy filmed here has been reproduced thanks to the generosity of:

University of British Columbia Library

The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol \rightarrow (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol ∇ (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

University of British Columbia Library

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants apparaîtra sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole \rightarrow signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole ∇ signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

Founders of Canadian Banking

The Hon. Wm. Allan, Merchant and Banker

Adam Shortt, D.C.L., Ottawa, Ont.

A CLOSE observer of net results has contributed the observation that the English had employed the Irish to conquer India for the benefit of the Scotch. In view of the early ascendancy gained by the Scotch in commercial and executive political affairs in the Canadas, a somewhat similar observation might be made as to net results here, although the instrumentalities may not have been quite the same.

The subject of this sketch is but a typical example of a successful Scot in the earlier days of Upper Canada.

William Allan was not a U. E. Loyalist. He was born in Scotland in 1770. Young Allan appears to have been in touch with some of his successful fellow countrymen who had settled in Montreal. At any rate we find him leaving for that city in 1787, in his seventeenth year. There he entered, as a junior clerk, the establishment of Forsyth, Richardson & Co., where he received a thorough business training and an ideal introduction into the larger phases of Canadian mercantile and financial life. There too, he established connections which were very serviceable to him in later enterprises. His natural qualities admirably fitted him to profit from his exceptional opportunities. He had too much of the national canniness to be either notably brilliant in public life or over-speculative in business ventures. He was, however, sufficiently alert and enterprising to perceive advantageous opportunities and to take prompt advantage of them, as also to follow up promising leads with exceptional industry and perseverance.

When he had served his apprenticeship with the parent firm of Forsyth, Richardson & Co., he made his first venture into the outside business world, establishing a connection with another member of the numerous Forsyth family, George Forsyth to wit, a merchant at Niagara. Recognizing the possibilities of trade and other economic ventures at the new seat of Government at York, Allan parted with Forsyth, on friendly terms, and established himself at York, in partnership with another young Scot, Alexander Wood, also destined to play an important part in the economic and other affairs of the province. This partnership, however, did not last long, each one setting up for himself at York. For a number of years Allan conducted a steadily-developing business on his own responsibility. He was for a time, from about 1812 to 1822, in partnership with his brother-in-law, John W. Gamble, one of the numerous family of Dr. John Gamble, a prominent Scotch loyalist coming to Upper Canada by way of New York State and the St. John river in New Brunswick. Like the Hon. John McGill, Dr. Gamble was attracted to the Upper Province through his former associations with Simcoe and the Queen's Rangers, with which he served in the capacity of assistant surgeon. Allan married his daughter, Leah Tyrer. Other marriages of the numerous Gamble family at York did much to give color to the term "Family Compact" as applied to the York group of political and economic associates.

Allan's personal character and sound methods of conducting his business naturally inspired confidence, in a situation where much was fluid and uncertain. He soon gained an extended reputation for strict business integrity, his word being as good as his bond and both scrupulously observed. The certainty with which he could be relied upon to fulfil a contract or to discharge a public duty naturally attracted those responsible for the conduct of the executive government. In this field it was not necessary for him to do more than meet opportunity half way. He therefore soon enjoyed a position of much influence in executive quarters. The same was true, as we have seen, of that other Scot, John McGill, and these with a few others, came to be recognized as having the ear of several of the early governors and administrators. They were therefore the objects of special attack on the part of an equally pronounced English group, including such restless political innovators as John Mills Jackson, Judge Thorpe, Sheriff Willcocks, Surveyor General Wyatt, and others, who, in the period before the War of 1812, proved thorns in the sides of peaceful rulers. Naturally Mr. Allan and his friends saw no occasion for radical innovation, for when one's own circumstances are fairly satisfactory, why encourage changes which may break up the established order of things, to which one has so conveniently adjusted one's personal interests? Moreover, Mr. Allan in particular, as unlike in this respect as others the group referred to, had a great antipathy to mere publicity. Although much interested and, indeed, much engaged in public affairs, he rarely took any prominent part in general public meetings and never sought the suffrages of his fellow citizens for public honors. On one occasion a rumor had been circulated that he was a possible candidate for a seat in the Assembly, and this suggestion had even found an echo in the general section of the Official Gazette. Allan at once complained to the Executive of the action of the editor in inserting this statement, maintaining that such announcement was a serious injury to his personal character and financial interests. In the end the editor humbly apologized for his indiscretion.

When Allan transferred his interests to York he did not wait for the growth of the capital to increase the value of his investments. He was one of the minority who led in the development which was to insure the prosperity of the capital. Shortly after his coming, the best wharf on the water front, known as "the merchants' wharf," with a commodious warehouse erected thereon, was provided by the foresight and enterprise of William Allan. This wharf and warehouse were constructed at the foot of Frederick Street, and thus determined for a considerable time the chief business centre of the town. Commercially this centre was the four corners of King and Frederick Streets. The occupants of the other corners were D'Arcy Boulton, John Baldwin, and Allan's former partner, Alexander Wood. At Allan's wharf alone, for a very considerable period, could the larger vessels from the lake ports find sufficient water to land safely. There, too, they found sufficient accommodation for their goods, and there they took on the cargoes of exportable produce from the gradually growing centre of "Little York."

Under these circumstances, what more natural than that Mr. Allan, eminently reliable and efficient as he had already proved himself to be, should be appointed by the Executive Government to fill the position of Collector of Customs and to provide suitable accommodation for a Customs House? He was also available as Inspector of products for export. His appointment as Collector of Customs Duties and Inspector of pot and pearl ashes and flour was made on the 25th and was gazetted on the 29th August, 1801. Moreover, who so suitable as Mr. Allan to handle the incoming and outgoing mails, and to insure the safe custody, collection, and distribution of letters and other postal matter? So Mr. Allan was appointed chief of the York Post Office, under the title of Deputy Post Master, an imperial appointment under the Deputy in Chief, at Quebec, of the British Post Master General. But the Post Office, centrally located, of course, at

Mr. Allan's store at the corner of Frederick and King Streets, was naturally the most convenient place at which to make application for marriage licences, that foundation for the courage necessary to tackle primitive nature and compel it to yield a home; the most convenient place, likewise, for application for licences to produce or sell spirituous liquor, that other solace for many another entrant on the wilderness. Thus it came about, very naturally indeed, that Mr. Allan combined in his own person and on his own premises quite a list of public offices. These were obviously discharged with honesty and efficiency, because we find practically no complaint against him on these grounds. Such complaints as arose were due to his success and the confidence reposed in him by the Executive Government. Thus did William Allan, like several of his fellow countrymen, find himself by force of circumstances a prominent member of the famous "Family Compact," the foundations of which were so successfully laid by Governor Simcoe, and the superstructure so successfully erected by its own members to be the political dwelling place and social centre of his successors. It is true that, although Mr. Allan held so many of the early public offices at York, his direct pecuniary returns from them were for a number of years very modest; indeed altogether inadequate to the time and attention required by them. It is also to be observed that most of these positions had been given up to others by the time they came to be of much pecuniary advantage. The Customs and Postal positions were resigned in 1828. The fact, however, that he held these offices, and the satisfactory manner in which he discharged them, naturally redounded to his personal credit and gained him economic advantages in other directions, especially in his general commercial business and later in certain government contracts.

Like a number of other Scotchmen in the earlier days of Montreal and York, though having strong religious sentiments, he was not of unalterable sectarian attachment. Hence, in the absence of any provision for a Presbyterian establishment, Allan, after the manner of his brother Scot John Strachan, accepted the constitutional provisions made for a Protestant church, and made the best of them. At a meeting to raise funds for St. James Church at York, on January 8th, 1803, the Hon. Chief Justice Elmsley being in the chair, Messrs. William Allan and D. Cameron were appointed treasurers for the fund, which meant that the

How citizens for
 had been circulated
 in the Assembly,
 in the general
 complained to inserting this was a ser-
 nial interests.
 indiscretion.
 he did not value of his
 in the de-
 of the capital.
 water front,
 odious ware-
 ight and en-ouse were thus deters centre of ur corners
 f the other nd Allan's
 arf alone,
 ssels from here, too, ods, and ce from an that already ecutive ns and e? He
 t. His irector 25th who ing tri-was
 of he nat

greater part of the work of collecting subscriptions, paying the contractors, workmen, etc., fell upon them. Their advertisements for men, materials, etc., are found in the papers of the day. When, under the administration of Archdeacon Strachan, the church was repaired and extended in 1818, Mr. Allan was still chief custodian of the funds. Although refusing to become a candidate at elections, he sometimes officiated as returning officer, the first occasion being apparently in 1801. He acted also in 1804, and was again returning officer at the celebrated election of 1806, which resulted in the return of Judge Thorpe, who succeeded his radical friend Weeks, killed in a duel arising from the personal animosities incident to the political controversies of the day.

He took an active interest in the organization of the militia, where we first find him in the public notices as Captain of the Town Company of York. At the outbreak of the American War he held the rank of Major, and, under instructions from General Brock, led a detachment of the York Volunteers to the head of the Lake, July, 1812. This force was with Brock at the battle of Queenston Heights. He was at York also when the capital was taken by Dearborn and Chauncey and, as Major Allan, signed, with Lt.-Col. Chewett, the articles of capitulation, on the 22nd April, 1813. He was afterwards raised to the rank of Colonel.

In 1804 he was one of the commissioners appointed under Statute for the construction of the Lake Shore Road from York, running to the head of Burlington Bay. Being personally interested as a merchant in improving the highways of the district, we find him taking a prominent part in the opening of Yonge Street to the north, in 1801. For a number of years Yonge Street entered the town of York via the Rosedale ravine, and the Don Valley. Even within the town limits Yonge Street was not originally an important thoroughfare. As first laid out it did not extend below King Street, having no access to the water front. The intervening land between King Street and the water was owned by Wm. Allan, R. Ferguson, and J. Macaulay. To reach the water, traffic coming down Yonge Street passed along King to Toronto Street, and down it to the Bay. An arrangement was made by which the above parties allowed Yonge Street to be opened through their properties, on condition of receiving in exchange that portion of Toronto Street between King and the water front. In 1805 they petitioned that this arrangement shoul

of Tocorn
chas
Gen
The Str
siv
and
of kn

si

co

n

H

Y

should be completed by the transfer to them of that section of Toronto Street.

For a long time Mr. Allan's home was at the southeast corner of Frederick and Front Streets. He afterwards purchased the park lot, originally obtained by the Surveyor-General, D. W. Smith, in 1794, and known as Moss Park. There he built a fine residence on the west side of Sherbourne Street, where he lived at the time of his death. This extensive property, lying between those of the Hon. John McGill and S. P. Jarvis, blocked, until 1833 at least, the extension of Queen Street beyond Yonge to the east. The city park known as Allan Gardens constituted a portion of this estate.

The larger merchants in the earlier days of the country simplified exchange conditions by conducting all manner of commercial business, wholesale and retail, within their own management. They also dealt in all forms of exportable produce as well as those suitable for domestic trade. Those who, like Allan, had extensive connections with the more important Montreal houses, such as the McGills, Forsyth-Richardson, the Gillespies, etc., acted as agents and forwarders between these houses and the local traders in the other centers springing up in the west. They also conducted most of the business afterwards taken over by the banks, in the negotiation of bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other early forms of commercial paper, and a number of them also issued their own private notes or bons. At the time of the struggle with France, owing to the uncertainties of trade with the northern powers of Europe, the British Government was offering bounties to British North America on the production of timber and the growth of hemp. The Hon. James Baby was a commissioner for the purchase of hemp in the Western District; and we find that when hemp was delivered to him, in 1813, he paid for it by drafts on William Allan at York. Allan was himself a commissioner under the Act of 1804 and would be paid in bills of exchange on London, which he might sell at a premium in Montreal, or he might receive cash or army bills through the military chest at York. Owing to his intimate connection with Forsyth, Richardson & Co., a very considerable portion of the exchange business at York and the western portions of the province fell into Allan's hands. Moreover, he was for a number of years treasurer of the Home District. It appears also from the reminiscences of Mr. Dupuy, the first accountant of the Bank of Montreal, that Mr. Allan acted for a time as agent for the Bank in York.

In the early days of the Province most of its commercial business centred at Kingston, but the greater part of the Government business, and consequently a growing part of the commercial and exchange business as well, centred at York. The introduction of the Army Bills, themselves suggested by the local circulation of traders' bons, familiarized the people of Upper Canada with a very convenient, far-reaching, and perfectly safe paper money. Their gradual redemption and disappearance after the war left a gap in the circulating medium, difficult to fill. Moreover, the withdrawal of the Army Bills, after the war, coincided with the reaction in business following the subsidence of the speculative fever which invariably accompanies the first two or three years of peace. It appeared to many that the recurrence of commercial stringency was very largely due to the withdrawal of an abundant circulating medium. Hence the proposals for the establishment of public banks met with considerable popular favor. In this connection, there emerged a rivalry of interests between Kingston and York as to which should be the provincial banking centre. Kingston, however, was first in the field, in 1817, with its petition for a legislative bank charter. This was dated 20th January, and was presented to the Legislature early in 1817. Afterwards a petition for a bank at York, dated 17th March, 1817, was presented by John Strachan, Alex. Wood and others. In response to the Kingston petition an Act was duly passed chartering the Bank of Upper Canada. It was, however, reserved for the consideration of the Home Government. But the decision of the Home Government was delayed so long that, though it was ultimately sanctioned, the announcement did not arrive within the time limit prescribed. The charter was therefore forfeited for non-user, but would require, as the Lieutenant-Governor stated, only the form of re-enactment to render it available.

While the fate of the bill was in doubt, a number of the promoters of the bank at Kingston had become impatient at the delay. Hence, following the example of Montreal, they organized at Kingston, in 1818, a private bank under the name of the "Bank of Upper Canada," hoping for a charter later. This institution, however, lacking in financial strength and being badly managed, was unprepared to meet the commercial reaction which followed, and was forced to suspend.

In the meantime, the efforts to obtain a chartered bank continued, and, when the Home Government was found to be favorable, on petition of the Kingston merchants and others, a new bill was introduced. A little later a petition from the people of York, headed by Wm. Allan and others, was presented. Then by a few strokes of clever political manipulation, in which the artistic hand of Attorney-General J. B. Robinson was conspicuous, with the activities of Archdeacon Strachan in the background, the people of Kingston were juggled out of their charter for the Bank of Upper Canada. On amendments proposed by the Legislative Council, the names of the Kingston promoters were removed from the Bill and those of the York petitioners substituted. The location of the bank was also changed from Kingston to "the seat of government," and, most important of all, the Government itself was made the chief financial partner in the institution, although not having the management of it. The Council then tossed to the petitioners of Kingston a local substitute bill bearing the name of that town only. Although the substituted Kingston charter was the one assented to by the Governor, while the captured one was reserved, yet the prevailing commercial depression coupled with unfortunate developments in connection with the private bank already established, effectively prevented Kingston from taking advantage of even its local act before it expired for non-user, 1st January, 1821. The Kingston charter having lapsed and the captured charter for the Bank of Upper Canada being in limbo, a movement, originating in Prince Edward County in 1821, was begun for the establishment of a Provincial Bank, in the hope, apparently, of uniting the rival interests of the province. The petition, on reference to a committee of the Assembly, resulted in the framing of a bill for the Provincial Bank of Upper Canada. This bill was passed through its various stages with little opposition, and was duly sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor at the close of the session, 14th April, 1821. It provided for the establishment of a branch of this bank at Kingston on certain conditions. To the general astonishment, however, during the recess, the captured charter for the Bank of Upper Canada was sanctioned by the Home Government; hence the Provincial Bank Act was not taken up.

Owing to the stringency of the financial conditions of the time, the York group found even more difficulty in raising the minimum paid-up capital for launching their bank, than did the Kingston merchants. This difficulty was not altogether removed by the amendment of their charter reducing ociation

of its commerter part of the wing part of l, centred at mselves sugfamiliarized venient, fareir gradual t a gap in
; the with-d with the
he speculst two or he recure to the ence the
with con-merged p which wever,
egislad was rds a
was In
ssed
re-
But
ng nt
er s

the capital stock from £200,000 to £100,000, and the minimum to be raised by the private stockholders to £5,000, the like amount to be paid in by the government. In the end they appear to have got together about £3,000, and with the aid of the Military Chest and the contribution of the government brought the bank into operation in July, 1822. His active promotion of the new bank, his Montreal connections, and personal financial experience and personal integrity, naturally led to the selection of Mr. Allan as the first President of the Bank of Upper Canada, a position which he occupied until 1835, when he retired at his own request. The other directors were the Hon. John McGill, Rev. Dr. Strachan, T. Ridout, C. Widmer, Jas. Crooks, Wm. Proudfoot, Hon. J. H. Dunn, H. J. Boulton, Hon. Jas. Baby, Geo. Munro, Geo. Ridout, Hon. Geo. Crookshank, and the Hon. D. Cameron. More than one half of the number of directors belonged to the Scotch group at York, while nearly all of them were either then or later members of the "Family Compact." These facts will account for the exceptional animosity with which the ultra-radicals of the Mackenzie group assailed the Bank, in season and out of season, as the great bulwark of the official Tory element in the government of the province. The efficiency and commercial integrity of the management of the Bank were not directly called in question, while its financial success was not only admitted but emphasized as one of the chief grounds of attack. In point of fact, Mr. Allan was probably the least interested in the political and party controversies of the day, while the Cashier or General Manager, Thos. Ridout, was actually associated with the more constitutional wing of the reform or responsible government party. Allan and his fellow directors strenuously denied that the business policy of the bank was influenced by political considerations. Wealthy radicals, like Cawthra and the Baldwins, had as little difficulty in getting good treatment from the bank as well-to-do members of the Compact itself. At the same time, it must be observed that the majority of the men of wealth at York, or in the provincial centres to which the agencies of the bank were afterwards extended, were mainly of a conservative type, financially at least. Hence the services of the bank were undoubtedly employed very much more to the advantage of the conservative than of the radical element in the province.

Once the bank was established, the President and Directors naturally sought to make it the custodian of the provincial fu

woul
and p incia
not the four ceed
cial
For Ba ne
dr
of ne
ti ce
m q

cial funds and the agency through which government exchange would be negotiated, and to have its bank notes received and paid out in the collection and disbursement of the provincial revenue. Here, however, we come upon one of those not infrequent instances in which the consolidated unity of the executive government as popularly represented, was found to be sadly wanting. The Hon. J. H. Dunn had succeeded the Hon. John McGill as Receiver-General or Provincial Treasurer, and had entered into arrangements with Forsyth, Richardson & Co., and thus, indirectly, with the Bank of Montreal, to act as his agents in holding his balances, negotiating his bills, making payments in response to his drafts and furnishing what specie or other acceptable media of exchange was necessary to meet his local wants. When necessary, also, these agents would furnish advances in anticipation of provincial revenue. In this connection he accepted and paid out Bank of Montreal notes, in lieu of metallic currency, as more convenient to handle and of unquestionable security.

It appears from Mr. Allan's correspondence with the Lieutenant-Governor that it was understood, among the promoters of the Bank of Upper Canada at least, that, the government itself being the largest shareholder in the bank, the bank would have the privilege of handling the business of the government. However, the Receiver-General, Mr. Dunn, had bluntly informed Mr. Allan and his Board that he did not propose to change his financial agency, unless directed by the Home Government. Should, however, the Bank of Upper Canada, of which he himself was a director, demonstrate its financial soundness, as had the Bank of Montreal, he would not object to receiving their notes for provincial dues, nor would he object to selling to them his bills of exchange at as favourable rates as could be obtained elsewhere. This firm stand by the Provincial Treasurer, the Bank of Upper Canada was unable to alter. There were other departments of the government, however, which handled a good deal of money, and most of these were secured as customers.

Once firmly established, the management of the Bank of Upper Canada strenuously objected to the chartering of any other bank in the province. Their chief argument was based on the danger which the granting of another charter would introduce, of filling the country with local banks in every district, thus introducing the American system of many small banks constantly liable to failure owing to inadequate funds and inefficient or dishonest management. And indeed it was obvious enough that many parts of the adjoining states were suffering from this evil. The long drawn out series of post-mortems over the unburied skeleton of the late "Pretended Bank of Upper Canada" at Kingston, and the repeated though apparently only half-hearted efforts of the Legislature to lay the ghost of that institution, conveniently served the friends of the Bank of Upper Canada for a number of years with a warning example as to the probable consequences of establishing another bank in the neighbourhood of Kingston, whence the new projects usually emanated. With the recurrence of provincial prosperity, however, in the later 20's the merchants of Kingston, backed by others in the eastern districts of the province, persisted in reviving their claims for a bank. On several occasions their bill had passed the Assembly only to be thrown out by the dominance of "the Compact" forces in the Council. The obviously growing need for additional banking accommodation at last forced the Bank of Upper Canada itself to apply for an increase of its capital stock, together with a renewal of its charter. But the Assembly blocked the Upper Canada bill so long as the Council blocked the Kingston bill. Ultimately a compromise was arrived at and both bills were allowed to pass, despite the strenuous opposition of Mackenzie, whose political power was then at its height. Mackenzie, however, carried the war into Africa. He went to London in 1832 and for a time gained the ear of the Colonial Office. Among other objects in view he sought to have the bank acts disallowed. This he nearly accomplished, as the authorities of the British Treasury were at the time in a reforming mood on the subject of banking, domestic and colonial. As a condition of passing the Upper Canada bank bills they required the introduction of a number of new conditions. Most of these were ultimately adopted in one form or another, but some of them were quite inapplicable to Canadian conditions at that time, while others were virtually secured by more suitable methods. This bolt from the blue brought about an immediate union of the rival banking interests. Remonstrances and protests flowed in from every quarter, public and private. One of the most extensive and closely reasoned documents which Mr. Allan, as President of the Bank of Upper Canada, ever issued, was sent to the Home Government, July, 1833, through the Lieutenant-Governor. Incidentally it pictured the ruin which must fall upon the commercial interests of the eastern portion of the Province should the charter of the new Bank of the Midland District, at Kingston, be disallowed; and the almost equal ruin which threatened the western districts should the Bank of Upper Canada be unable to extend its capital. The number and vigour of the remonstrances sent in had their effect, and the bank bills were not disallowed.

The predictions of Mr. Allan and his friends as to the number of applications which would follow the breaking of the monopoly of the Bank of Upper Canada, were quite fulfilled. Indeed, the impatience of certain would-be bankers to get their institutions into operation led to the formation of a number of private banks, professedly on the British Joint Stock principle. One of these was the Agricultural Bank, promoted by a couple of Englishmen, Messrs. Truscott and Green. In 1835 a sharp conflict developed between this institution, which had enjoyed considerable success, and the Bank of Upper Canada. The latter at first endeavoured to ignore its existence and refused to accept its notes; but the Agricultural Bank readily accepted the notes of the Bank of Upper Canada, and, contrary to an agreement between the chartered banks, used these notes to supply itself with specie, thus avoiding the trouble and expense of importation. The Bank of Upper Canada resolved to retaliate. It bought up the notes of the Agricultural Bank and presented them for payment in considerable quantities, much to the financial embarrassment of the latter, which complained loudly to the Governor of a deliberate attempt on the part of the government bank to destroy its rival. Its promoters actively assisted Mackenzie in his efforts to discredit the Bank of Upper Canada and its management. Every publicity was given to the details of the bank war. This unpleasant notoriety, and the personal attacks incident to the controversy, seem to have determined Mr. Allan, already engaged in the development of another financial enterprise, to resign from the presidency of the Bank of Upper Canada. This he accordingly did in 1835. The close of Mr. Allan's career as head of the Bank of Upper Canada was marked by a special tribute of esteem on the part of the directors and shareholders of the Bank, who, in July, 1836, presented him with an address accompanied by a handsome service of plate.

The other financial enterprise which had occupied his attention since 1832, was the establishment of the first important insurance company in Upper Canada, The British American Life and Fire Insurance Company, which came into operation under provincial charter in June 1833. Many of the most successful men of business in York, regardless of their political connections, were associated with Mr. Allan in this enterprise, of which he was the first Governor or President. In the latter part of 1835 Mr. Allan, with the co-operation of the Board of Trade of Toronto, supported by resolutions passed at public meetings, brought to the attention of the Home Government the desirability of permitting the import of British goods into Upper Canada through the ports of the United States. In time this was duly realized.

The occasion of Mr. Allan's becoming a member of the Executive Council and thus acquiring the title of Honourable, is one of considerable historical importance. In 1836 the British Government, hoping to appease the growing clamour for an Executive Council having the confidence of the general public, nominated to Lieutenant-Governor Head three new members of the Council, Messrs. J. H. Dunn, Robt. Baldwin, and John Rolph. All eyes were immediately turned upon these gentlemen to see what effect they would have on the administrative policy of the government. Governor Head, however, frankly announced to them that he would call upon them only when he found that he was in need of their advice. At that time there was no subject on which the governor considered himself less in need of advice than the executive policy of the administration. Obviously the only course for the new advisers was to resign, which they accordingly did. The Lieutenant-Governor then called to his Council a number of gentlemen of moderate views, namely, R. B. Sullivan, afterwards a prominent figure in the first responsible government cabinet under Lord Sydenham, William Allan, Aug. Baldwin, a relative of Robert Baldwin, and John Elmsley, son of the former Chief Justice. Needless to say the political duties of these gentlemen were light, and at no time thereafter did the Hon. Mr. Allan take a very active part in political affairs. Before the government of united Canada was organized he was over seventy years of age and had largely retired from public life. He was, however, associated with several of the new railroad enterprises which came to the front in the latter 40's and early 50's. His vigorous constitution carried him on to an extended old age, during which he was able to afford his friends, from personal knowledge and experience, interesting reminiscences of the whole history of Toronto from its very infancy. He died at the family residence, Moss Park, July 11th, 1853, in the eighty-third year of his age.

