PORTRY.

WE ARE ALL FOR THE GRAVE. BY J. CLEMENT.

" I'm bound for the grave !" said an aged man, With a feeble step and a hollow tone; In the battle of hife I've long kept the van My comrades have fallen-I'm fighting alon While yet he was speaking, an unseen dart
Was flung by the merciless archer, DRATH;
In pierced the old man through his resolute heart, And, I'm fighting alone!" was his latest breath

I'm bound for the grave!" said a noble youth, With a hectic flush on his burning cheek; While the wintry winds, that know no ruth, A chilly bed for his form bespeake.

When the blast had fled, and the laughing Sprin Her carpet of groon o'er the earth had spred The awestest flowers that Love could bring Distilled their balm o'er his low-laid head. " I'm bound for the grave!" said a feeble child,

With its infant dowe scarce melted away ; " I never shall feel youth's frenzy wild, I shall not live to be old and gray!". And its fever raged, and aside it turned, Its eve half closed, then died its light ; To the socket its candle had suddently burned, Like a young star quenched by a tear of night

"I'm bound for the grave!" said a lisping one Whose words were told in her angel smiles " I must haste away where a brighter sun She had eaught the song of their minstrels fair, And though unfledged were her spirit-wings, The Dove divine bore her gently there, Where now with the radiant ones she sings

" I'm bound for the grave, where I hasten to lie!" le the marching song of the old and young ; " I'm bound for the grave !" is Humanity's cry-With the heart-strings of life is the anthem rung. " Ho ! come to the grave !" is Death's dread call Since first on man fell the blight of sin; Your robes of life exchange for my pall, To the grave! to the grave! I must hurry you in!

Away the sea-bird flew More swiftly than the wave, And calmly rode amid the foam That yawa'd an opening grave.

And loud, loud did the tempest rear, The wild waves dashed on high, And still the sea-bird's snow-white Beamed through the troubled sky.

" Here do I dwell," (it seemed to stay :) "This is the home for me'
Designed by Rim who made the And measured out the sea.

And angry clouds are driven. A peaceful joy is given."

Up, then, then poor afficted soul, Adopt, the sea-bird's song ; To thee, o'erwhelmed and tempest-tost, Far better joya belong.

Steves, and one of two other members, spoke briefly against the Bill. They were of opinion that it would have a bad effect upon the country to allow grain to be consumed in distillation.

Mr. Boyd was of the same opinion. It would also have another effect. Distilleries would be started near the lines, and as it would be impossible to distinguish betwirt the home manufactured article and that imported, there would be a great deal of smuggling cloaked if the Bill should pass.

Mr. Hanington could never perceive the force of the reasoning that grain would be consumed in distilleries, if tolerated, which people might need for food. We import both liquor and bread stuffs, and if we consumed a portion of our own grain in distillation, we should of course have to import more bread stuffs and less liquor. The only argument he had heard against the Bill worthy of consideration was that it would increase the facilities for smuggling.
