Its prime objective is the same, namely to give the province of Quebec new sources of income to finance the Olympic Games deficit. The explanations already given also apply to this bill.

FORM REFORM ACT

MEASURE TO CONTROL GOVERNMENTAL FORMS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-422, an act for the control of forms in the public service.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this bill is appropriate today, in light of the government's announcement of its program of restraint last night. The purpose of this bill is to afford some degree of control over an even-growing variety of governmental forms. The bill applies to the multitude of governmental forms, questionnaires and the like, inflicted upon the citizens of our country, and also to internal documents. To the very substantial number of average Canadians affected by the bill, this is my small way of saying "Have a merry Christmas and a happy New Year".

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AND SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

MEASURES RESPECTING CERTAIN PAYMENTS THEREUNDER

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-81, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act with respect to the escalation of certain payments thereunder.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to hold up the business of the House with a procedural argument today, but I think that perhaps we might proceed with this bill on the basis of its being without any prejudice to raising the procedural argument when we return after the Christmas recess. The doubt I will entertain, if I might briefly forewarn the Chair, when it comes to dealing with the procedural matter after the Christmas recess has to do with this particular matter having already been dealt with in a bill passed at this session of the House. Since I will be alleging that the matter has already been decided in this same session, the manner in which the government is proceeding now is rather doubtful.

● (1210)

If the Chair and the government goes along with my presenting a procedural argument after the recess, I will be referring to May's Parliamentary Practice, eighteenth edition, pages 362, 363, 364, 376, 378, 379, 480 and 481, as well as to the Interpretation Act.

Mr. Speaker: I think there are two reasons for deferring the point in that it concerns the repetition of a decision of this House. In any case, it may be that the argument which might be raised has been somewhat anticipated by the Chair. It may very well be that that argument is more relevant to second reading than it is to first reading. In any case, it would seem advantageous for all sides that the argument should be referred to at some time later than today. Therefore, with the concurrence of all hon. members, this proceeding will be a matter of forewarning and we will give the bill first reading today.

Is it the pleasure of the House that the minister shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CERTIFICATE OF IDENTITY—STATISTICS 1960-1974

Question No. 1,895—Mr. Rodriguez: (Supplementary)

1. In each year 1960 to date, how many applications for certificates of Canadian identity were (a) received by the Passport Office (b) refused on security grounds or for reasons not disclosed to the applicant "for reasons of public interest"?

2. For the same years, how many such certificates were granted?

3. For the same years, how many applications for Canadian citizenship were (a) granted (b) rejected on security grounds or for reasons that were not disclosed to the applicant "for reasons of public interest"?

4. For the same years, how many individuals were (a) refused entry to Canada (b) deported on grounds for reasons of national security?

5. For the same years, how many individuals were served certificates designating them as risks to national security?

6. For the same years, how many applications for landed immigrant status were refused for reasons of national security?

7. For the same years, how many individuals seeking to enter Canada as refugees were refused entry for reasons of national security?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned, the following is the asnwer: 1, 2 and 3. See Hansard 199, Page 8883, November 5, 1975.

4. (a) In immigration legislation there is no way to refuse entry to a person seeking to come into Canada other than through the report—inquiry—order of deportation process. In cases where persons realize they will be subject to an inquiry and possible deportation they may be allowed, should they so request, to withdraw their application thereby obviating the stigma that is attached to such an order. Although such instances may be loosely referred to as refused entry this has no basis in law and statistics in such cases are not maintained. (b) Deported on grounds for reasons of national security: 1960, none; 1961, none; 1962, none; 1963, none; 1964, none; 1965, none; 1966, 2; 1967, none; 1968, none; 1969, none; 1970, none; 1971, none; 1972, 1; 1973, none; 1974, none.

5. In accordance with the provisions of Section 21 of the Immigration Appeal Board Act, the following are the number of Certificates prepared for the Immigration Appeal Board since its inception in 1966 concerning individuals considered to be risks to Canada's national security: 1966, none; 1967, none; 1968, 2; 1969, none; 1970, 4; 1971, 6; 1972, 5; 1973, 8; 1974, 4.

6. Statistics not maintained prior to 1967. 1967, 996; 1968, 471; 1969, 198; 1970, 314; 1971, 333; 1972, 141; 1973, 89; 1974, 217.

7. Statistics concerning refugees refused entry to Canada for reasons of national security are not maintained.

2. For each of the projects carried out in the Constituency what is the (a) name (b) amount granted (c) year the project was initiated (d) year it was completed?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): In so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned: 1. Government of Canada policy requires that financial records be retained for a period of only six years. However, the scheduling for retirement and destruction of obsolete records frequently results in some of them being available for a little over the six-year period. In this instance, the available records will permit a reply in respect of a seven-year period, the details being as follows: (c) 1968-69, $72,393; (d) 1970-71, $135,529; (e) 1971-72, $143,615; (f) 1972-73, $324,967; (g) 1973-74, $123,007; (h) 1974-75, $82,926; (i) 1975-76 to September 30, 1975, $39,602.

PUBLIC SERVICE—BASIS OF EMPLOYMENT

Question No. 3,345—Mr. Coates:

1. For the years 1975-76, how many persons employed by the Public Service are on (a) a full-time (b) a full-time but non-permanent (c) a part-time or seasonal basis?

2. In each case, what were the figures for (a) 1970-71 (b) 1971-72 (c) 1972-73 (d) 1974-75?

3. In each case and, for the same years, what was the total payment in salaries and wages?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): 1. The information we have does not contain any data on temporary employees employed for less than 6 months. On June 30, 1975, the following were subject to the Public Service Employment Act: (a) 24,000 full-time permanent employees; (b) 16,814 full-time temporary (more than 6 months) employees; (c) 7,327 part-time or seasonal temporary (more than 6 months) employees.

2. According to the Public Service Commission Annual Report, the following were subject to the Public Service Employment Act: (a) On December 31, 1971: 197,260 full-time permanent employees; 10,533 full-time temporary (more than 6 months) employees; 8,695 part-time temporary (more than 6 months) or seasonal employees. (b) On December 31, 1972: 207,769 full-time permanent employees; 15,495 full-time temporary (more than 6 months) employees; 7,492 part-time temporary (more than 6 months) or seasonal employees. (c) On December 31, 1973: 222,550 full-time permanent employees; 15,944 full-time temporary (more than 6 months) employees; 6,808 part-time temporary (more than 6 months) or seasonal employees. 3. It is not possible to give the total amounts paid in salaries and wages for these categories from 1971-1974.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

LEGISLATION TO BE DEALT WITH BEFORE CHRISTMAS RECESS

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps at this juncture it might be advantageous if I asked the government House leader his intentions with respect to the business of the House today and perhaps somewhat into the future.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions amongst the House leaders about the conclusion of the business before the House pending an adjournment motion being accepted. Perhaps I could begin by saying that the government will require, before the adjournment, the disposition of three bills which are now before the House: Bill C-69, Bill C-77 and Bill C-52. All these measures must come into effect before the end of the year. Therefore, this is the basis upon which we are planning.

Bill C-69 is now at report stage. I believe there is some hope that we might complete the report stage today. At any rate, I think we should be working in that direction. However, before calling Bill C-69, for one consideration alone apart from any other, that is, the desirability of getting as many bills as possible to the other place so that they can be disposed of before we adjourn, I am calling the report stage of Bill C-77 as the first order of business today. It may be there will be a disposition, also, to give third reading if the debate is not prolonged. I would then call Bill C-69. If we do complete report stage today on Bill C-69, there is, I hope, a unanimous disposition to sit tomorrow to complete all business. These are all very tentative plans at the moment, but I thought it would be useful to have these various possibilities before the House at this time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In the event that the disposition to sit tomorrow is generally accepted, would it be the intention of the government to adopt Friday hours for tomorrow?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If, indeed, it does seem useful to meet tomorrow to avoid coming back next week, the motion I would put forward would be for Friday hours with the exception of private members' business.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader has reported faithfully on the discussions which have taken place. I suggest that if we were to have further discussions later, we could well work things out. That, of course, remains to be seen. My main reason for rising at this point, however, is to indicate to the House, as I think I should, that when Bill C-52 is called there is one major point of order I shall be raising with respect to some of the proposed report stage amendments.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, once again we are aware of the urgency, for the House to adopt as soon as possible a procedure establishing a schedule of its business for a whole year.

There are certain things I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker; I felt that all members agree with this suggestion, but nothing is done. There are certain things with which we totally disagree, and still the House takes actions. At least we should be informed in advance of the procedures used for the matters on which we have total agreement, and I think it is normal to wonder about the length of sessions and the adjournment dates to enable families to get together, particularly at Christmas. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have quite a large family and I would like to see them. It is the only opportunity I have during the year and I think it is the same with the others too.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore fully agree that we should sit tomorrow to avoid travelling uselessly. And if we can adjourn tomorrow night, I shall have the impression that I have contributed to give all my colleagues the opportunity to go back home and do things that are very personal during the days which precede Christmas. I dare say everybody understands.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT AND CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

AUTHORIZATION FOR CMHC TO MAKE INTEREST REDUCTION GRANTS, CASH GRANTS, ETC., TO ENCOURAGE HOUSE CONSTRUCTION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-77, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview) moved:

That Bill C-77, an act to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be amended in clause 1 by striking out lines 4 to 6 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) the rentals to be charged by the owner of the rental housing project shall be established by the corporation and that in so establishing and reviewing such rentals the corporation shall have regard for the probable family income of the lessees of each family housing unit;"

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendment I have moved on behalf of our party is very important and crucial in order to help solve the serious housing crisis we have in Canada today. I am sure all of us would agree that the serious housing problem is really in three areas: supply, interest rates, and price. The solution the minister has adopted with regard to these problems is through the Assisted Home Ownership Program by the use of subsidies. He hopes to solve the problems of high interest rates and price by giving subsidies to a certain group in the country so that they may be better able to buy homes. May I point out to the minister and to members of the House that the subsidy approach to AHOP will not solve the serious housing problems we have today; it will not solve the problem of supply, interest rates or price, and in fact will be of very little significance with regard to these three main problems.

The reason it will not help the problem of supply is that the land is in the control of the builders and developers who may release it at at a time appropriate to them when they can make the highest possible profit. With respect to interest rates, the minister and the president of CMHC have told us that there will be no decline in interest rates in 1976. Probably the prevailing rate of 12 per cent will apply through 1976 and will afford no protection or help to people who buy homes. With regard to price, we have seen a significant increase in the price of homes right across the country. In the city of Toronto the average retail price of a home is now $69,600, and the average price across the country has increased from approximately $41,000 to $45,000.

We do not believe that the subsidy approach to AHOP will solve the difficult problems we have. In fact, if you look at the housing situation in Ontario and consider the $500 first home owner grant that the minister provided up to the end of October to assist purchasers, and the $1,500 grant given by the government of Ontario to stimulate house purchases, you will find in any serious study that the total grant of $2,000 just increases the price of homes in Ontario by that amount. The best evidence we have is the limits the minister released as proposed under the AHOP program. This year, in Toronto, the rate was $43,000. The new rate that the minister proposes is $47,000, an increase of 9 per cent. I could go across the country using the minister's table to show that the price with regard to AHOP purchases must be increased so that the program can be of advantage. In Montreal, the price has to be increased from $29,000 to $31,500. In Ottawa-Hull, the price has to be increased from $35,000 to $38,000. In Winnipeg, from $33,000 to $35,600; in Lethbridge from $28,000 to $31,000; in Prince George, from $37,000 to $39,000; and in Yellowknife, from $39,500 to $43,500.

In other words, for the minister to make the AHOP program work under his subsidies, the price limits have to be raised in various regions across the country. I do not think that proposal attacks the high prices that we have. We in the New Democratic Party say that the problem of housing has to be attacked in three main areas. First, with regard to the cost of land; second, with regard to high interest rates; and third, an increase in public housing. We see no evidence that the minister is acting to bring down the high cost of land. In fact, if anything, the price of land will increase in the coming year. I have already said that the prevailing interest rate of 12 per cent will obtain during 1976. If you were to follow HUDAC, the interest rate would go to 12¾ per cent or 13 per cent, which would afford no help to the average person.

I have said that the third objective is to increase public housing. The minister has travelled through Europe and has seen the great strides they have made in public housing. I have done the same. In the early part of this year I was in Sweden. I spoke to the chief government architect, who told me of the serious problem they had and the approach they took. That was to tremendously increase public housing, and they now have sufficient. I saw some buildings with three and four vacant apartments, which contrasts to the low vacancy rate we have across this country. I am sure the parliamentary secretary and the minister will agree that the vacancy rate is 1.2 per cent, so this is a very serious problem.

This indicates the necessity of increasing the amount of public housing. I have pointed out to the minister that in the CMHC budget of 1972 the allocation to public housing was 37.3 per cent, and in 1974 it dropped to 19.2 per cent. This indicates that the minister had downgraded public housing in the total housing picture. He has promised me that there will be a significant increase in the 1976-77 budget for CMHC. Mr. Speaker, I have no faith in this government increasing the allocation with regard to public housing. After hearing the speech on restraint last night that put the burden on the ordinary and poor people in this country, I am sure that when the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) presents his budget to the government they will apply the same type of restraint which they indicated last night and there will be very little change in the moneys allocated to public housing.

This is why we in the New Democratic Party want action with regard to public housing. This is why we have brought forward this amendment to help people in respect of public housing. I should like to read the amendment, Mr. Speaker, and indicate the essential part of it. It reads:

(a) the rentals to be charged by the owner of the rental housing project shall be established by the corporation and that in so establishing and reviewing such rentals the corporation shall have regard for the probable family income of the lessees of each family housing unit.

With regard to the minister's approach on private limited dividend housing, he has made a major shift in philosophy. Prior to Bill C-77, the formula for rents of private limited dividend housing took into account the family income of the tenants. The minister has now completely abandoned that principle and has left it to the developer and builder to determine; he has completely ignored the family income of the tenants. The minister and CMHC have had a particular experience with regard to determining rents in public housing projects and public limited dividend projects. It is the government that determines the rents. Two factors determine rents in such projects: cost and, more importantly, the tenant's family income. It is possible, by using this method, to work out a tenant's rent quickly and efficiently.

What has the minister done, Mr. Speaker? He has abandoned this approach to private limited dividend housing and will depend on the builder to determine rents. He is telling the builder, in so many words, to ignore totally the family income of tenants in a project, saying that the cost to the builder shall determine rent and family income is to be ignored. I cannot understand why the minister took this approach. I suppose he feels he must do it to stimulate private limited dividend housing. But should this be done by giving builders and developers subsidies and letting them determine rents on the basis of cost?

This is a tremendous price to pay for increasing the number of housing units in this country. We ought to build public limited dividend housing with controls vested in CMHC. The corporation should determine rents on the basis of cost and family income. Our amendment, if passed, would do just that. I hope that the minister, in the spirit of Christmas generosity—

Mr. Broadbent: No hope.

Mr. Gilbert: —will admit that his approach is mistaken. I hope he will say to builders and developers, "Our approach in this field is to be the same as the approach we took in the field of public housing, and in computing rents you must consider costs and the tenant's family income." As it is, the minister is being generous to builders. Unit subsidies have been increased from $900 to $1,200. The time-span on agreements has been limited. I believe Bill C-77 mentions 15-year agreements, but the minister said in committee that on average they will run for ten years. Some limited dividend builders have been helped with 8 per cent mortgages and other means.

The minister has been generous to builders but apparently has ignored the needs of tenants. He met tenant association representatives in Toronto, assured them he will consider their difficulties and examine the kinds of rent increases owners are imposing on private limited dividend units, but so far he has not acted. You can say one thing about the minister: he is kind-hearted.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: But kindness alone is not enough. The minister must acquire, and use, a certain toughness when dealing with builders and developers. That is the advice the NDP gives the minister.

Mr. Orlikow: He will not listen.

Mr. Gilbert: If he yields to the builders and developers, costs will remain high, homes expensive, interest rates high and Canadians, especially the young, will be saddled with $40,000 or $50,000 mortgages repayable in 25 or 35 years at $400 or $500 a month. I do not think for a moment the minister wants this situation to continue.

I ask the minister to treat private limited dividend housing as he treats public housing. His approach to both types of housing should be the same. If it is, he can expect the support of the people of this country and the co-operation of tenants in his efforts to solve our serious rental difficulties. The minister asked provincial ministers of housing to impose rent controls and, by and large, most provinces complied. If the minister opposes our amendment and allows the bill to pass as printed, the owners of private limited dividend housing will determine rent on the basis of cost. You can be sure that rents will go sky high.

In addition, the rents of such new units to be built will not come under provincial rent controls. That is why we brought forward this amendment. We suggest that the minister should, for the sake of fairness, uniformity and consistency in the field of limited dividend rental housing, allow Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to exercise control and use cost and family income as factors in determining rents. I hope members of this House, especially members from Toronto, will support this amendment.

Mr. Broadbent: Especially the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. Gilbert: Yes. The minister represents a constituency suffering a serious housing shortage. Probably there are more public rental units in his constituency than in any other constituency in Toronto. I hope the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will persuade the Minister of Finance to lend support to our efforts to end the rip-off by builders and developers of low income people. I ask all hon. members to support the amendment.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). I think he knows that our budget will provide for much increased public housing, non-profit housing and co-operative housing this year as a result of the private assisted rental program. I was rather hoping that builders were listening to his speech because he made the program sound so good that it would encourage more builders to rush into the scheme instead of building apartments. I know the hon. member raised this matter in committee; we discussed it in committee because it concerns us all.

The object of the bill is to get more low rental accommodation on the market. The test involves the rental agreement with CMHC and the developers which is entered into to make certain rents are kept down. In this way, people with limited income can be assisted. I point out that the income test remains separate from the agreement. Indeed, the program is to be implemented on a regional and municipal basis, and we hope that municipalities will especially designate a number of these units for public housing tenants who may live in the projects and take advantage of subsidies which we share with our provincial partners. I am referring to rental supplements which will assist these people. We did not want to continue a type of ghettoization which is not attractive. At the same time, we want to encourage construction which will bring low rental accommodation onto the market. The test, of course, is the agreement whereby rents will be kept low.

If there is a further social need we will, of course, look after it with various programs which have been, and will be, increased in all provinces. We do not intend to slow construction; indeed, we want to accelerate construction of low rental accommodation. That is the object of the bill and that is why, I am afraid, we must oppose the hon. member's amendment although we realize his deep concern.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add only a few remarks on the amendment before us. I consider it very commendable in itself because it is aimed at protecting the rights of heads of families to housing at a price in line with the family income.

However, I would like to add that there are two considerations to keep in mind when it comes to housing. Of course, it would be desirable that each head of family in this country own his house. In the present economic context I consider it is less and less possible for a number of heads of families to reach that objective.

In the circumstances it is perfectly normal that some owners build housing units and rent them to make a certain profit. I witnessed unfortunate situations sometimes where tenants have no respect for the property in which they live—but I suppose those are exceptions. When those people neglect to take normal care of the property it deteriorates and that necessitates costly repairs by the owner which brings him to ask for higher rents.

I think there is a whole education to be done in that respect in this country and I am convinced that there are still possibilities of an agreement between owners and tenants, that they do not look upon one another as opponents but, on the contrary, as people living in a common environment and both doing their best to earn an honest living.

I think that the proposed amendment is intended more particularly to protect the tenant against certain abuses that may have occured in the past, that may reoccur in the future. The amendment suggests precisely that the lending institution be there as a judge to safeguard the rights of the tenant with respect to the rent being related to the family income.

Mr. Speaker, with the restrictions that were announced yesterday by the head of the government I think we are going to witness situations and difficulties with respect to housing, relationships between owners and tenants. I fear a lot a deterioration of the situation in that regard. However, I think that the minister understood the merits of the amendment. My suggestion is to follow very closely the recommendations and the actions of the corporation's officials concerning the rights of occupants, without neglecting the rights of the owners.

I submit the minister has very heavy responsibilities because he must, so to speak, compromise between those who have to live in rental accommodation and those who own the building and must make it a healthy and acceptable environment in our present society, while deriving certain profits from it.

I believe one of the major factors for the serious owner tenant problems is the tremendous cost builders are facing, the excessive interest rates. That pervasive factor also has an impact on inflation. Mr. Speaker, we have been making this point a number of times in this House because we believe this is a most serious matter. I hope some day the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) and his cabinet colleagues will introduce some legislation that will put a stop to ever rising interest rates, so that the government and private projects may cost less. This would tend to improve the current social environment.

Although I would have a lot to say on this, I have no wish to make extended remarks because this legislation must pass as soon as possible. However, we must act within reason.

As far as I am concerned, I am therefore inclined to support the amendment although it should include a provision to protect the rights of owners.

But anyway, it must be accepted as it is, and I am ready to support it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it being ten minutes to one o'clock, and it being known that there are a number of members involved in luncheon engagements, and so on, I wonder if the House would agree to defer the taking of this vote and have it taken at the same time that we take the deferred votes with regard to Bill C-69.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) on a point of order.

Mr. Boulanger: I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) should be more explicit. The point or order is that the vote should be taken at the same time as some other vote. At what time? This was not absolutely clear.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I deliberately refrained from specifying a time because that might produce an argument. I thought there could be consultation through the usual channels to decide when to call in the members. There are already two deferred votes with regard to Bill C-69. There might be another. If we refrained from taking this recorded vote now, I think we could come to an agreement to take all of them at the same time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If I understand correctly, the taking of this vote will be deferred until the deferred votes on the motions related to Bill C-69 are taken later this day or tomorrow. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am a little bit concerned about the indefiniteness. May I ask through you, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is able to say whether we should do it at the time suggested by Your Honour in your last remarks or, in any event, no later than three o'clock this afternoon? Is that agreeable?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the House agrees to that, we will agree.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, we agree to doing this exactly as suggested by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it finally agreed that the vote on the motion of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) on Bill C-77 stands deferred until the vote is taken on the report stage, the deferred votes on motions to Bill C-69, but no later than three o'clock this afternoon?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure this meets the wishes of all of us. I merely suggest that if we are still debating Bill C-69 at the point when the members are called in, we take all the recorded votes that have been deferred up to that time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 12.52 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed, from Thursday, December 18, consideration of Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, before we were interrupted last night for the evening performance which has since been variously described as a "con game" or a "shell game", I was dealing with the clause in the Unemployment Insurance Act amendments having to do with alteration of the bench mark. I would be happier to accept the arguments put forward by government spokesmen in this connection if the government had made certain changes in the act designed to make it more truly an insurance plan.

I should like to put on record the results of an analysis showing how payments were disbursed in 1974. It really turns out to be a gigantic transfer system from one part of the country to another. Benefit payouts in 1974 amounted to approximately $2,100 million—if costs of administration are added, the total figure comes to approximately $2,300 million. Approximately $1,600 million was raised by employee-employer deductions, leaving some $700 million to be drawn from the federal treasury. This works out, on the basis of an even tax adjustment, to approximately $30 million for every million people.

Some comparisons showing the extent to which each province benefited are interesting. Newfoundland contributed something like $50 million in employee-employer premiums, and received $114 million in benefit payments to its unemployed. New Brunswick paid approximately $55 million, and received $105 million by way of benefits. Quebec's share amounted to approximately $580 million in payments, while its citizens received $740 million in benefits. Ontario costs to employers and employees are estimated at $900 million; its citizens received $600 million in benefit pay-outs. Relative to their population, the three prairie provinces fared the worst. Manitoba contributed approximately $100 million, and received $50 million in return; Saskatchewan contributed something like $70 million, and received $46 million or so in return; Alberta fared the worst per population, contributing somewhere in the neighbourhood of $170 million and receiving $66 million. I estimate that in British Columbia the amounts paid and the amounts received were approximately the same.

An interesting article appeared in the Globe and Mail of December 11 under the heading "Regional unemployment disparities remain at surprisingly constant levels". This study, by Arthur Donner and Fred Lazar, showed that unemployment figures in the various parts of Canada have varied remarkably little over the years, unemployment being persistently low on the prairies and high in the Atlantic provinces. The authors ascribe this state of affairs to two main reasons. The first is that in Quebec and the maritime region there is a high rate of job transfer. They suggest that if regional job turnover differences were eliminated, the unemployment rates in the three high unemployment regions would be relatively lower, ranging anywhere from zero to 20 per cent above Ontario's rate. Further according to the authors of this article it is probable that the highly seasonal nature of employment and job opportunities in the three areas of high unemployment are the cause of this situation.

In my view, this calls attention to a weakness in the plan. A seasonal worker employed for 20 weeks of the year is often as well off financially as one who works for 50 weeks of the year. The present unemployment insurance system is deficient inasmuch as it fails to take into account a worker's total earnings for the year. It also fails to take account of the situation in the prairie provinces, for example, where large numbers of the population are self-employed and contribute heavily to the fund through the general tax structure without the possibility of benefiting directly since self-employed people cannot claim unemployment insurance.

The survey may also indicate that administrators in rural communities are able to keep off the rolls many would-be recipients by strict use of the regulations. Indeed, it might fairly be said that many workers in rural areas have little chance of drawing benefits under the regulations the commission is presently following. The people affected are very often casual workers. These people are usually in the lower income brackets, working at jobs which, by and large, others do not want—for example, the farm housewife who goes to cook at logging or construction camps. She would be ruled out under the residence rule. She must pay unemployment insurance but has little or no chance of ever obtaining benefits; and, of course, she must contribute to the general tax structure.

I also ask whether the enormous transfer of funds from one area of the country to another to maintain the unemployed is the best method of using our money power. Certainly, if a worker lives in a high unemployment area he is likely to be able to obtain, if he wishes, enough money from short-time work to tide him over the year. It is not hard to obtain work at the average weekly wage in various parts of the country at some time of the year, even if a person has to move out of his home area. For workers who wish to take advantage of this, it seems that there are many built-in disadvantages to moving from an area of relatively high unemployment to an area where the work would be less seasonal and steadier.

The introduction of increased employee-employer deductions, with the raising of the benchmark, might be an improvement if true insurance principles were followed. But these few amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act are not likely to be very effective. I suggest that we have to take a look at the eight to 16 weeks' employment provision and at whether it is not too generous. If a person is only able to work eight weeks a year, surely he needs assistance other than unemployment insurance. There must be some serious impediment to his finding a job.

In addition, there should be more supervision of seasonal workers in the sense that some effort is made to assess their total working hours and income. It is well known that many companies carry the so-called black book, whereby workers can bank hours and these are taken up when they are laid off in the wintertime. More recognition must also be given the lower paid workers who contribute to unemployment insurance week in and week out and who are never unemployed, so therefore never make use of the system. They still pay their premiums and taxes. Many of these people harbour a great feeling of disillusionment because they feel they are victims of the system. I think the system would be more acceptable and workable if those who are unemployed were given either a bonus or paid lower premiums.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I debated with myself whether I should say anything on this particular amendment before the House, but after listening to the announcements made yesterday and last night I decided it was only appropriate that I make a few remarks. There are two matters that occurred to me arising from the events of yesterday, and they have direct relevance to the bill before the House. I am glad this bill has been examined as thoroughly as it has for the last five days, which permitted the announcements of last night and yesterday afternoon to be made. It tends to put things into proper perspective as far as the members of this party and many people in the country are concerned. This is why I am glad the bill is under scrutiny at this moment.

The two events that occurred yesterday rather intrigued me. The first was the announcement in the afternoon of the surtax by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). One of the fascinating things about the announcement was that for a person earning $35,000 a year with two children, the surtax would amount to $10. That is the kind of restraint I like to see. I really enjoy it because it is an illustration of the problem we are facing. Then we had the announcement last night.

I should like to say something about the comments that floated across the House in regard to this clause. We were told by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that we have to remove the disincentives from the Unemployment Insurance Act, and perhaps, in effect, this is what the minister has done. But I am always amazed at this business of disincentives and incentives. Why is it that we can take $10 surtax from someone earning $35,000 a year, but cannot take more because we do not want to kill his incentive to work, whereas when you give a hand-out to the poor people it is called a disincentive to work. I do not understand that sort of concept.

Mr. Anderson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, it is bad enough that we have to listen to nonsense when he is speaking on a bill, but when the hon. member has strayed 100 per cent from it, I think the House is entitled to get back to the bill.

Mr. Rodriguez: If the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) would give as much time to making a speech on the bill, we in the House would appreciate it. Clause 22, which we are trying to amend, changes the benchmark beyond which the government will pick up any deficits in the unemployment insurance fund. We refuse to accept this clause as being relevant at this time. When the act was brought into being in 1971, the benchmark was set at 4 per cent. At that time the minister's predecessor argued that the benchmark ought to be 4 per cent because that was a high enough rate of unemployment and would always act as an incentive to the government to keep the unemployment rate down. That sounded like a very plausible argument at the time, that it was an incentive for the government to keep unemployment below 4 per cent. Now we are to have a disincentive.

Obviously, that figure has not incited the government to do anything to bring down unemployment. How callous is a government that sets out to fight inflation by creating unemployment, by telling the people of Canada that the government would like to keep the unemployment rate below 4 per cent in order to keep the rate down? It did not work then, so the government is proposing to change the benchmark to the average of the previous eight years' unemployment rate. In January, 1976 this will mean an effective rate of 5.6 per cent. If the present rate of unemployment goes up, by 1977 it will be 6 per cent.

What, exactly, is the government doing? It is escaping responsibility that it ought to face. It is redefining unemployment. Each time the government had to go to general revenue for money, it held up its policies to examination by the taxpayers of Canada. It will now escape this responsibility. Nothing the government has done since 1971 indicates to us that it is prepared to come to grips with unemployment. In the committee we were told that 894,000 people collect unemployment insurance. That is a scandalous record for a government which from 1968 to the present time has enjoyed a majority. It just answers for the mistakes it has made and its faulty decisions in running this country. Now it wants to redefine the whole issue of unemployment and therefore escape its responsibility. That is the primary reason we are opposing this.

By redefining the rate of unemployment, the government, in effect, is saying that the employers and employees will have to pick up what normally the government would have paid out of the general revenue of this country which was collected on a progressive income tax basis. The present system, of course, is nothing but a regressive form of taxation. It means that those who are working and the small employers will have to pick up the deficit in the fund. In effect, the government is making these people pay for its mistakes and its bad policies of the past. Who are the people who will have to pay? As you may know, Mr. Speaker, the Unemployment Insurance Commission only insures up to a maximum of $8,500. So in effect because most of the working people in this country earn below that figure they are the ones who will pick up the bulk of the deficit which the government is shifting to their shoulders.

I mentioned earlier the restraint being shown by this government and how it has chosen to fight inflation. We have been told by the government that it has chosen to fight inflation, and we have been given examples. The first example is how tough it intends to be with the high income earners, the $35,000-a year boys. Then we were told about the elimination of the dependency rate in this act. Then there is the matter of family allowances. Last night we heard what they are doing about that. The government is removing the indexing of family allowances. So, while they are patting themselves on the back for having improved the social programs, on the other hand another minister says that they have been too generous and therefore this will have to be cut off because of the fact the programs have been improved. This is the kind of double-talk that creates cynicism among the workers of the country. The policy of the government seems to be that it must make an example of the working people and carry on the fight on their backs. The move to change the benchmark is another example.

Let us look at another example of how we are to fight inflation in this House. We are told that members of parliament will not have an increase in wages, but that does not include the tax-free allowance. It might have been better had this applied to the tax-free allowance because the government would have received 40 per cent from that. This "now you see it, now you don't" policy amounts to nothing more than an attempt to fight inflation on the backs of the poor people by telling them that they must economize in the cause of the fight against inflation while at the same time the government makes no attempt to improve its policies. There is no attempt to establish a full employment policy. While the government to the south is considering a full employment policy, this government does not try to come to grips with it.

We are told we must produce more, as if we do not have the capability to produce more. We are operating on only 80 per cent or 82 per cent of our productive capacity. We have 18 per cent of our productive capacity lying idle in terms of 700,000 people unemployed. Surely, with the expertise and experience the government has, it should not be too difficult for it to improve productivity in this country and bring down inflation. The government, however, will not do that. That is not its purpose.

We in this party are not the only ones who oppose the change in the benchmark. The Canadian Labour Congress has opposed the increase in the benchmark for a very good reason. Again, it is the low income earners who will bear the burden. The result of the increase in the premiums will be something in the order of 35 per cent to 40 per cent. These increases will be borne by the bulk of the working class people in this country who earn $8,500. Those who have incomes above that, those earning $20,000, $30,000, and so on, will get away with the maximum which will be the same as anyone with an income of $8,500 will have to pay in respect of unemployment insurance premiums. This is very unfair. There is nothing progressive about it.

At least under the old system we could hold the government accountable for the hundreds of millions of dollars transferred from general revenue to the unemployment insurance fund to make up the deficit. Even the progressive items in this bill are not to become effective immediately. They will become effective somewhere in the future. Even those things which are advantageous to the working class people will become a reality on January 1, 1976, but this regressive clause is to become effective on January 1, 1976. If I had my way, we would remain here until January 1, 1976, in order to prevent this clause going through, because it is not fair when we consider the actions of the government over the past and in the last few days in respect of justice concerning any programs.

We on this side of the House in this party, as I have said, are not the only ones who oppose the change in the benchmark. I pointed out that the Canadian Labour Congress opposes it because it is a hidden tax which increases the premiums of the working people between 35 per cent and 40 per cent, while the wealthy get away with a 10 per cent surtax. This is a travesty of justice. The Canadian Council on Social Development also opposes this. That council is much closer to the problems of the working poor than is anyone in this House.

This government has not attempted to do anything about the elimination of regional disparity in this country, the same disparity the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred to in 1968 when he said there were two things the government would do. The Prime Minister said that the government would create national unity and would eliminate regional disparities. We are no closer to national unity, and nothing has been done about regional disparity. In my area the unemployment rate is 10 per cent. In the riding to the west, Algoma, it is 20 per cent. We have not seen any policy that is directed toward creating more employment in areas such as northern Ontario, the Atlantic provinces and the northern parts of some of the other provinces.

It is interesting to note that all the government can do is throw out terminal programs such as LIP and OFY at the first signs of trouble. The first programs they cut are LIP and OFY, so everyone pats them on the back and they say they always knew the programs were a rip-off.

Here we see a direct attempt to distract the attention of the Canadian people from the real problem, which is, of course, that this government has not attempted to establish any program to create employment. That is why we have such a drain on unemployment insurance. We have said the contrary, that the Unemployment Insurance Act has been an incentive for persons to improve their status in the work force. It has given them flexibility and mobility and it has been a way of making employers improve the working conditions in their plants. It has forced them to improve wage rates and it has been an incentive, in many instances, to improve working conditions and the rate of pay in this country.

What do we find the minister is doing in this bill? We say it is a regressive move because, as I have said before, it avoids facing the issue fairly and squarely. Every year the unemployment rate will be redefined and they will shift more and more of the cost on to the working poor. That is dishonest. At least the other way around they have to come to the committee studying the estimates and justify why they are transferring so many hundreds of millions of dollars. That way they are put under the scrutiny of the public, of the press and of members of parliament. They could not stand the heat of that kind of scrutiny, so they cooked up this little scheme, probably hatched by their nabobs to get them off the hook, off the griddle. All they have to do is, poof, one amendment, thus redefining the whole issue of what full employment is in this country. But they cannot do that. The problem will not go away. You have to have a pretty big rug to hide things under.

The fact of the matter is that certainly the economy will suffer when there are over 894,000 people unemployed and 700,000 of them collecting unemployment insurance. To me one of the greatest travesties that this House has seen in a long time is to have so many people living off the unemployment insurance fund. To accuse people of ripping off unemployment insurance is to avoid facing the facts. The fact of the matter is that they have embarked on a program which will only exacerbate unemployment in this country rather than create employment.

It seems to me that we have said the poor will be picking up the cost. Certainly the working poor will be picking up the cost, but the poor have no way of passing on that cost because now, with the Anti-Inflation Board in place, a worker is limited with respect to the percentage increase he can have. The employer, on the other hand, if his premiums are increased as a result of a clause in this bill, has a way of getting it back. He can increase the cost of his product. Of course, the Anti-Inflation Board gives him the possibility to do that because it permits the pass-through cost, so he can increase the cost of his product and of course he will. Any entrepreneur will do that. That is why we say that the workers are locked in. They have a government which is prepared to block them from passing on their expenses, but on the other hand employers are quite free to pass on any increased cost to the customers, to the consumers and to the workers. We oppose this clause. We consider it to be retrograde.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Peters: That is the question. This clause of the bill is very important. It takes me back a number of years to the time when we previously discussed the Unemployment Insurance Act and the attitude of the Liberal party regarding their contribution as a government to unemployment. I can remember sitting on a committee together with the Hon. Paul Martin who kept insisting that the Liberal government of the day had always provided money when unemployment became the responsibility of the government.

At that time, the Conservatives were in government and they were resisting the idea of the government putting any money into unemployment insurance. It is interesting to note that the Conservative party continues to feel that way, and so do the Liberal party members, who have always said they were willing to make a contribution when unemployment rose above the normal insurable level.

When the Hon. Paul Martin made clear the stand of his party with regard to unemployment, he said he would go to his office and come back with the exact information. On his return, he informed us about the contribution that had been made by his party on two occasions. We learned it amounted to less than $400,000. If you remember, the talk at that time was that we were heading into a major recession in 1959-1961, but yet that was the contribution which he indicated had been in keeping with the Liberal party's philosophy.

I am of the opinion that the workers of this country can only be guaranteed an insurance program up to a point. I want to note that the exercise we were put through yesterday on the matter of constraints was not at the request of the workers of this country, but because the government wants to handle a totally different problem. In doing that, they will find there will be a fall-out, no matter how big or small it is, which will result in unemployment in this country. When the government takes action which results in unemployment, the worker cannot be guaranteed an insurance against that type of unemployment.

Initially, when we spoke about the level at which the government should put in some money to cover the action they are taking, we spoke about 2 per cent as being the normally expected unemployment rate. The next time the Unemployment Insurance Act was before us, 4 per cent was considered as the normal unemployment rate. Now they have got it up to 5.6 per cent. I suggest that if we look ahead another ten years we might find a 10 per cent, 11 per cent or 12 per cent unemployment rate considered as normal. If that is to be the normal rate, then it seems to me that the workers might as well stop making any attempt to obtain an insurance program against unemployment.

There will come a time, if it has not already arrived, when the workers will not be able to pay the premium and we will find ourselves in exactly the same position as the farmers who are asked to pay insurance to protect themselves against loss of income, crops or against other disasters. They have arrived at a point at which it is not to their advantage to pay the premium because it is too high and because the return will be too small on it. For the working people to insure themselves against unemployment, which we consider to be normally 5 per cent, is a heavy load to be carrying because it applies in the main to people who are making less than $8,500 a year. They will take advantage of it, and they are paying too high a price in the middle.

Surely everyone agrees that if the government takes action which results in producing unemployment, the government should be responsible. We should be responsible collectively. We cannot expect the worker to make the premium payments when we are proposing, in effect, a solution to another problem altogether. That does not seem to be the kind of insurance workers should be asked to carry.

I am sure some hon. members will say that the worker is not being asked to carry it all; part of the cost is being paid by the employer. Anyone who says that knows nothing about the negotiations which take place between an employer and his employee. When an employee talks to his boss about wages, the whole cost factor of his labour is taken into consideration. If he does not benefit in one way, he may benefit in another. However, if an employee does not enjoy fringe benefits, some of which are considered to be unemployment insurance compensation, vacation pay and other benefits, he may receive benefits by way of wages. In any case, it is a worker's wage package we are talking about, not a cost to an employer or to the government. The government has said it will give up its responsibility for situations it creates and we are going to have a sliding scale, so that it will continue to go up and the government will not have to worry about it.

Along with the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), I was happy to see the government share in the responsibility for unemployment. Perhaps other hon. members were not. Not only does the worker carry the unemployed by way of his contributions, but over a certain level the government has to carry its responsibility. I believe the rate should have stayed at 2 per cent, but it became 4 per cent. The government cannot stand the heat of unemployment at 4 per cent. It now wants to raise the rate to something over 5 per cent and this winter it may well reach a rate of 6 per cent for which the Unemployment Insurance Act is supposed to be responsible.

Premiums will be so high that there will be a violent revolution on the part of the employed against carrying that insurance rate for the unemployed. It is very hard for an individual who is paying high unemployment insurance premiums to realize that, but for the grace of God, it may be him drawing the benefits, and I am sure he often fails to see the relationship. It seems to me that all hon. members should be concerned that we are taking away the responsibility of the government for providing full employment or employment at as high a rate as it is possible to maintain.

What the government did yesterday was create a situation whereby it will carry on most of the fight against inflation on the backs of the poor, and where changes have been made in this legislation those changes will be detrimental to the poor element in our employment structure. It will apply to the lower income group, and it has been said it will apply to only 5 per cent or 10 per cent of the labour force. It will, and no matter what the level will be, the people at the lower end of the scale will be least able to take any loss.

This government has had a chequered record with regard to unemployment insurance. Much contradictory philosophy has gone into the thinking of the Liberal party since unemployment insurance was initially a request by J. S. Woodsworth in exchange for his support in keeping the King government in power 40 years ago. The thinking of the government has been as tortured since that period of time as it has been in any other philosophical field of which I can think.

If the government wants to get rid of unemployment insurance, it should at least allow workers some time to study another kind of program which will supply them with income support which will be sufficient. There are many workers in this country who would totally change the program, but this government wants to operate the plan and wants to make the changes it is making. The minister can talk about the role of the government in relation to the Canada Pension Plan, to old age pensions and to provincial assistance in such things as medicare, supplementary benefits and other social aspects, but as long as the government wants to relate these things together in its social structure it must assume some responsibility for making contributions when actions it takes in other fields are detrimental to the employment picture in the nation.

Those hon. members who really want to see an unemployment insurance program continue should consider very carefully allowing the government to make the change it is contemplating in the benchmark, and taking away from the government the responsibility of coming as close as it believes possible to providing full employment and assuming responsibility above that amount. Ten years ago 2 per cent was bad, and 4 per cent in 1971 was considered a national responsibility. Anything up to 5.2 per cent presently appears to be satisfactory to this minister. By spring, that rate will probably be 6 per cent. I believe the government has a responsibility. I think, by this amendment, the government would be exercising that responsibility by reinstating the 4 per cent ceiling, which I would consider to be at least double an acceptable figure in a country with our resources if it were operated by a government which provided good economic leadership.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on this motion and on motions Nos. 18, 19 and 20 stands deferred.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There was an order earlier that we take certain recorded votes not later than three o'clock. Since it is now eight minutes to three, perhaps we could call in the members for the three recorded votes on this bill and also for the recorded vote on the report stage amendment to Bill C-77.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I believe that is the agreement which was reached. However, I point out that I have another motion on the order paper, and in light of what has occurred with respect to other motions dealing with senior citizens and those who were on the extended benefit period with respect to the 75 per cent payment, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to delete motion No. 21 standing in my name.

● (1450)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) be allowed to withdraw motion No. 21 standing in his name?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 21 (Mr. Alexander) withdrawn.

● (1540)

Mr. Speaker: The question is on motion No. 22 in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this motion has neither been put nor debated.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be amended in clause 38 by deleting subclause (2) at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) Subsections 1(2), 9(1) and 9(2) and Sections 4, 5, 10, 13, 14, 19, 22, 31 and 36 shall come into force on the first day of January, 1976."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will give the members on the other side a Christmas present. I shall not speak for long on this particular amendment. I believe it is necessary to point out the phoniness of this bill. If there is anything that is cynical in respect of this bill it has to be this particular clause 38.

Mr. Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council rises on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member but there has been a discussion among party leaders and I believe there is agreement that we should dispense with private members' business if we should reach it, so as to dispose of this motion in respect of Bill C-69.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This is agreeable, Mr. Speaker. The private members' motion for debate today stands in the name of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), who has very kindly consented to allow it to stand.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We were prepared to reach this agreement at four o'clock, Mr. Speaker, so we will agree to it now.

Mr. Speaker: It is of course in the interest of this House, in knowing how to react to this debate, to have this information at this time rather than at four o'clock. Is it therefore agreed and so ordered that private members' business will be dispensed with on this date?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that nothing is more cynical than clause 38. Clause 38(2) clearly defines those clauses of the legislation which will come into effect on January 1, 1976. What are those clauses? They are clauses 1(2), 10, 22 and 31. These are the clauses which eliminate the 65-year olds from coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act, and which change the bench mark that in effect re-defines what the government considers to be full employment.

What we are attempting in this amendment is to include also in that effective date of January 1, 1976, those clauses which add some manner of progressiveness to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The first of those is the extension of the qualifying period. We are in agreement with that. We feel that in respect of those who have been sick, or in some way disabled, this is a progressive clause which would extend the qualifying period so that they could go back two years to the time before they were so disabled or so taken sick. There was even a private member's bill from this side of the House in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt which would extend the qualifying period. So we admit this is a progressive move and feel that surely it should come into effect on January 1, 1976.

The other clause which we feel should come into effect on January 1, 1976, is the clause in respect of voluntary termination of a claim, which we believe is a progressive step. As we know there is no provision in the act for voluntary termination of a claim. It seems to me that clause 14 would provide this kind of a progressive move. It is a move that is long overdue. It should have been included in the act when it was brought in in 1971.

We also feel that clause 31 is a progressive move and that this clause should be included in the provisions of clause 38(2). This clause, which would provide for the payment of expenses of anyone appearing before the umpire, we believe is long overdue. Indeed we found out during the committee hearings that there were 40,000 appeals to the board of referees. In that same period only 400 appeals were made to the umpire. In other words one per cent of the appeals to the referees ended up as appeals to the umpire.

Certainly there must be a reason for such a low number of appeals going to the umpire. We suspect what the reason is. The minister has promised that a study is under way of the appeal procedures. One reason we do not think this section has been working to the advantage of the claimants is the fact that many of the claimants must travel long distances in order to appear before the umpire. We think that has been a disincentive to claimants. Therefore we believe clause 31 is a progressive step since it will provide for payment of expenses of those claimants who must travel some distance in order to appear before the umpire.

What do we find in clause 38? The cynicism is paramount. We find that the regressive steps which eliminate the 65-year olds from unemployment insurance, and which change the bench mark the government is prepared to make effective January 1, 1976.

When we asked the minister the reason why these other progressive steps could not be made effective the same date, January 1, 1976, he gave a phony answer. The minister said that these adjustments cannot be put into effect because it is administratively difficult. What is administratively difficult about paying the expenses of the claimants who appear before the umpire? It should not be difficult administratively to do this, with all the computers that are available to the government. The Unemployment Insurance Commission uses a computer very extensively. As a matter of fact the officials use it so extensively that when there is a problem concerning claimants the answer is that it was the computer which made the mistake. The government also has available to it the highly paid nabobs in the administration.

An hon. Member: What is a nabob?

Mr. Rodriguez: A nabob is someone hired by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to give the government advice. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) says they are one step above a mandarin. Perhaps they are baby mandarins.

With all these high paid mandarins, nabobs, and flunkeys in the Unemployment Insurance Commission they cannot tell us that they cannot come up with a plan to get around the administrative hang-ups to make the progressive aspects of the minister's proposals effective on the same day on which the negative aspects will become effective. I suppose this would tax their brains, but I suspect that it will not tax their abilities.

I suspect that it is a deliberate attempt by the minister to say, "Look how tough I am". Look how tough he is with those who are collecting unemployment insurance and how tough he is with the poor, when we know that 70 per cent of those collecting unemployment insurance earn under $6,000! He is a pretty big and a pretty tough man when it comes to dealing with the little people, but when it comes to taking on the big guys making $35,000 a year, all he wants from them is a surtax of $10. When it comes to taking on those who receive family allowances, he takes off indexing of family allowances. I suppose that very shortly the government will want a means test for those who collect family allowances. See how tough they are with the little people. When it comes to the big ones, they curl up and start purring like a big tabby cat. That is the way it works.

The minister says it is administratively difficult to put clause 31 into effect, the clause under which travel and other expenses are paid for those who wish to appear before the umpire. He says it would be administratively difficult to terminate a claim voluntarily. It would not be difficult because we know full well that, if it is administratively easy to let the claim run on, they must have a process of knowing when a person establishes a claim which is continued. They have the computer set up; they know exactly when the claim is terminated so that a person who applies beyond that date is ineligible for unemployment insurance benefits. If they can set up a computer which tells them that a person who has collected maternity or sickness benefits after 29 weeks has terminated his or her claim, surely it should not be difficult for the government and this department to set up a computerized system which, on notification from the UIC in writing or by telephone, would immediately halt that claim.

I believe that a claimant should always have had the right to terminate the claim once he returned to work. But the government took that step in 1971. It was a discriminatory move, and now the minister leaves the change for some time in the future.

For us to accept this bill in the House at this point is very difficult because this is a regressive measure. We will not be serving the taxpayers and the people of Canada properly if we accept it under the present conditions.

The other clause which we think should become effective on January 1, 1976, is the extension of the qualifying period. Surely it should not be difficult to set up a system qualifying a person who has been jail, or on compensation, or who has been collecting a disability pension beyond one year. It should be possible to pick out his file and pick out the 104 weeks and see what earnings he has had within the 104 weeks. They are doing it now. They must have the latest separation certificate and they must look over the previous 52 weeks. It must be just as difficult administratively to look back at 52 weeks as it is to look back at 104 weeks. For them to say it is not, is just bullroar. I think the nabobs told them that that is one thing they do not want to put into effect now because of an ulterior motive, which is to build up the minister to look as if he were the greatest inflation fighter since Buckley. That is what they have attempted to do. They have tried to build him up as the greatest inflation fighter. It is easy to be a great inflation fighter when you are dealing with the little people, but when he is dealing with the big guys he pulls in his claws.

Mr. Korchinski: Let us have your Christmas present now.

Mr. Rodriguez: Never fear, you will get it. We look to the minister as if he were Santa Claus, but in fact he is nothing but a big Scrooge. He gave them a Christmas present. What is the Christmas present he has given them? He has informed the 65 year olds that they will not be covered after January 1. What has he told people on family allowances who are poor and may be unemployed? He has told them that they will not get the indexing. He is giving them a New Year's present. Boy, he sure can hand out presents! In effect, he tells them that they will get these things, effective on January 1, 1976, but not the beneficial clauses. That is the quarrel we have with him.

Even at this stage of the game we are prepared to move an amendment which would include these beneficial clauses. All the minister has to do is to rise and say he is prepared to move for their inclusion in the bill and to let them come into effect on January 1, 1976. I would be the first one to sit down if he were prepared to stand up and say that he is prepared to include the beneficial items in this bill.

There is no one in the House who would like to go home for Christmas more than I do. I would certainly like to go home tomorrow because I have five small children at home. But in no way can I in good conscience let the minister get away with this subterfuge. All he has to do now is to rise in his place—but he is not interested in doing that because he wants to chat with that chatterbox from the Maritimes. He is not prepared to bring in those beneficial clauses. I know that members on the other side are concerned about that. I am sure that they come from parts of the country much like mine where people have problems with unemployment insurance when they cannot voluntarily suspend their claims or extend the qualifying period. I am also sure they have problems with claimants who want to appeal to the umpire but cannot afford the travel expenses to reach the place where the umpire is holding court. We are remiss if we are not prepared to insist that the minister include the beneficial clauses in the bill.

We have tried to examine this bill as closely as possible, and we have made our concrete and positive proposals in committee and at report stage. Now we have come to the last clause in the bill, which is the crunch. We appeal to the minister to include these particular beneficial clauses in the bill so that at least the edge will be taken off the negative clauses in the bill. I can say no more than to call on the minister to do that, and to give the House some assurance that these measures will be brought in on January 1, 1976. He owes it to the people of Canada because the government, in effect, has been the cause of high unemployment in the country. Surely he should be the one to rise in the House to say that at least the beneficial and progressive items in the bill will come into effect on January 1, 1976.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it has been a long debate with a great deal of repetition, and I have gained great respect for the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), his vehemence, and his articulate ability to convey his point of view. In the words of, I think, Carlyle, the hon. member is someone who is often in error but never in doubt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: With regard to timing, the Bill C-69 provision which will become effective with Royal Assent is the insurability of LIP and LEAP individual sponsors, which is Clause 38(3).

Mr. Rodriguez: You are cutting that out.

Mr. Andras: No, we are not cutting out LIP. The hon. member for Nickel Belt is partly correct with regard to some of the clauses which will become effective—I want to be precise about this—on January 1 or January 4. There is still some problem about those two or three days because some of these affect the benefit cycle. The hon. member is correct about the increase in the period of disqualification, the dependency rate, the repeal of coverage of persons 65 years of age, and the repeal of the advance pay.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

The voluntary termination of claims, however, will be effective on the same date, either January 1 or January 4. The new financing threshold will be in effect then. There are quite a few of what I call housekeeping amendments. One could choose which are beneficial and which will take effect then.

I wish to make reference to an amendment to the act which was contained in Bill C-16, that is, the flexibility in the payment of maternity benefits. It will be effective on February 1. I say to the hon. member that there is no plot in this; it simply is a problem of computer programming. That bill was given Royal Assent on July 30, and the computer programming, procedures, guidelines, and staff training were not completed in time to make that effective before February 1. I regret that, but that is the problem.

The flexibility in the payment of sickness benefits, which is by proclamation, and the extension of the qualifying period, the 104 weeks, are going to take computer re-programming. We cannot authorize the commission to expend what is some money involved in that until Royal Assent, and I am not trying to bamboozle the hon. member. It is a practical problem. The officials think it may take a few months to do that. I can only say that I will be watching very closely and pressing them to bring this into effect as quickly as possible. Those are the facts as we see them now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Call in the members.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs) moved that Bill C-77, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND VARIOUS STATUTES TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN PENSION CONTRIBUTIONS, BENEFITS, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-52, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

Mr. Speaker: Earlier in the day the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) gave notice of a point of order to raise a question of procedure on this matter. I should, however, first put the motion. The motion under consideration will be motion No. 1 in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien).

Mr. Chrétien moves:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-52, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, be amended by adding after line 11 at page 2 the following new Clause:

"2.1 The definition "salary" in subsection 2(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"salary" means

(b) as applied to the regular force or the Force, the pay or pay and allowances, as the case may be, applicable in the case of that person as determined under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act;" ".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my point of order, as I indicated earlier today, has to do with the procedural acceptability of several if not all of the report stage amendments. I hesitated for a moment because I thought the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) was raising a point of order as to whether we proceed with this now or tomorrow.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have made the kind of progress I had hoped we would have made by today. I also feel reasonably confident that we can complete our work tomorrow. I therefore suggest that we defer any further consideration of Bill C-52 and third reading of Bill C-69 until tomorrow. I therefore move, seconded by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury):

That the House shall sit on Saturday, December 20, 1975;

And that, for the purposes of Standing Orders 2, 6 and 15, that sitting shall be deemed to be a Friday, except no private members business shall be taken up.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has had some indication that a point of procedure will be raised. Perhaps it is the desire of hon. members that we call it five o'clock and begin consideration of that tomorrow, or is there a disposition to discuss that point of order so that the Chair might consider a decision in the interval?

Is it agreed that we call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: At the moment we have no order under consideration. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 4:35 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LACK OF CONSULTATION ON FREEZING OF MEMBERS' SALARIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the impression given by the Prime Minister that the government was asking Members of Parliament to accept a freeze on their remuneration for 1976, whereas in fact the bill as introduced would permit an increase in members' tax-free expense allowances during 1976, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House deplores the absence of consultation with opposition parties which has traditionally preceded changes in the remuneration of members of parliament, and that this House further regrets the duplicity and/or the stupidity of the government in embarrassing all members of parliament outside the Liberal caucus by pretending the members' remuneration was to be frozen for 1976.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED RECALCULATION OF TAX TABLE RELATED TO IMPOSITION OF TEN PER CENT SURTAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that that motion did not call for a change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What do you have in mind?

Mr. Broadbent: You will hear later in the question period.

Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning the fact that there appear to be serious errors in the surtax table which was tabled in the House two days ago, errors which, if not corrected, would leave the public with a false impression.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I wish hon. members would listen. For example, using the 1976 tax calculation table, for a man earning $35,000 with normal tax deductions, the surtax would actually be 35 cents instead of the $10 as indicated in the table.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Finance be required to have the table in question recalculated on the basis of tax rates applicable in the 1976 taxation year, and that he be required to present these figures to the general public so that it will have an accurate idea of the burden which the government is asking upper income earners to bear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

URBAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF PARTY GIVEN BY DEPARTMENT FOR WILLIAM TERON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cossitt: Hon. members will like this one. I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning a reportedly disgraceful party given by the Ministry of Urban Affairs on Monday, December 15 for Mr. William Teron to commemorate his recent promotion and paid for by the taxpayers of Canada.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty):

That the Prime Minister order an immediate investigation into the expenditures of public funds on Monday, December 15, 1975 by the Department of Urban Affairs for a party held at the government owned Lasalle Academy Building, Sussex Drive, in or about the vicinity of the office of William Teron, commemorating Mr. Teron's recent promotion, and particularly that the investigation include all details of damage to the wall, damage to the furniture and the fact that the office staff walked off the job the following—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to read my motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member, as any hon. member, would want to respect those provisions of the rule which indicate that the motion ought to be sufficiently explained to understand its emergency nature, but that it ought not to get into debate, and I wonder if the hon. member would conclude his motion.

Mr. Cossitt: I am on the final sentence of it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: If the trained seals opposite would shut up for once, I might be able to finish.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1110)

Mr. Cossitt:

Finally, the investigation includes whether or not the office staff walked off the job the following day because of conditions requiring a cleaning staff to take 24 hours to remove such things as vomit from the floor and other evidence of a riotous nature—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Its that cheap whisky.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSAL THAT MEMBERS' SALARIES AND TAX-FREE ALLOWANCES BE FROZEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43 that will finish the job. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to substitute for Bill C-81 a bill to freeze the total income of members of parliament including both indemnities and the tax-free allowance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REASON FOR GIVING IMPRESSION MEMBERS' REMUNERATION FROZEN WHEN TAX-FREE ALLOWANCE INCREASED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for either the Prime Minister or the government House leader. Has either one any explanation to give members of opposition parties in this House following the impression given to the public that our remuneration was to be frozen in 1976 and then introducing the bill which permits our taxfree allowances to be increased? This puts members of opposition parties at least in a false position as far as the public is concerned. Have they any explanation to offer with respect to this stupidity or duplicity?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my statement made very clear that it was the salaries which we were freezing. If hon. members want their remuneration or the expense allowance to be frozen they just have to make a motion.

An hon. Member: They just did.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You guys turned it down.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this synthetic indignation smacks of hypocrisy to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If the opposition parties, any of them, want to achieve this result, they just have to move an amendment when the bill gets into the House. We will then see if the really hypocritical type of question asked by the Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The same old arrogant Pierre.

An hon. Member: Merry Christmas!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. So far, for what is almost a once in a lifetime Saturday sitting, we are not off to a very good start. It would appear that we are getting into debate. I know this is a subject which all hon. members will look forward to debating when the bill is before the House. I do not want to restrict questioning on the subject as it is a very important one, but neither do I want to permit a debate to take place at this time. I wonder if we ought not to guard carefully the questions and answers and stay away from debate. The hon. Leader of the Opposition on a supplementary.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is the hypocrisy of the Prime Minister to which I am objecting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASON FOR FAILURE TO CONSULT OPPOSITION BEFORE INTRODUCING BILL FREEZING MEMBERS' SALARIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question. Now, having at least an implicit assurance that an amendment to follow through on the impression the Prime Minister gave the public would be accepted by the government if it is put forward by the opposition, I should like to ask the government House leader why he saw fit to proceed with a bill like this completely ignoring the long standing tradition of consultation with opposition parties before any change is made which might have prevented such a piece of stupidity taking place?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the government did not feel it could discuss with the opposition parties this particular measure, as it would have been necessary to reveal the whole of the government's program of cuts—

An. hon. Member: Rubbish!

Mr. Sharp: —because this particular measure for restricting increases, or doing away with the increases of salaries, was related to other measures the government was proposing.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Not at all.

Mr. Sharp: It was not done for any reason to do with not wanting to consult members of the other parties. As the Prime Minister said, they are free to move amendments which can reduce expenditures, although they cannot move amendments to increase expenditures. The Prime Minister indicated that we would consider favourably recommendations of that kind.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE LIBERAL CAUCUS NOT GIVEN PRIOR NOTICE OF SURTAX OR EXPENDITURE CUTS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering what the government House leader said about the difficulties of revelation, will he assure the House that, contrary to reports in the media, the Liberal caucus last Wednesday was not given notice of ways and means motions and other documents relating to the surtax or other parts of the government plan prior to their introduction in the House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I can give that assurance. The government is careful, with ways and means motions of that kind, to see that its program is kept within the knowledge of the cabinet only. We observe that both in caucus and elsewhere. Indeed, special circumstances arose at the opening that day. We only made available the copy of the minister's notice after two o'clock, indeed, at 2.30. I assure the hon. gentleman that every precaution was taken. We asked the caucus for recommendations in the cutting of government expenditure but did not reveal our own program.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the faulty aspects of this phony program of cuts, would the minister chastise his caucus at the first available opportunity for its lack of imagination, and will the government House leader agree to table documents which will detail the complete package of loopholes and omissions relating to the salary cuts and surtax? Will he table the full package of all the omissions and other things the government neglected to tell the House?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF A MEANS TEST FOR FAMILY ALLOWANCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Is the government considering introducing the means test for family allowances?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker. I stated on television on several occasions that if some families with very low incomes suffered as a result of the freeze on family allowances, federal programs could provide some aid. Yesterday, in Quebec, Premier Bourassa announced that families with very low incomes may receive an additional amount, half of which would be paid by the federal government. Unfortunately, Mr. Bourassa forgot to mention it to the Quebecers.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will be generous and assume the minister did not hear the question. I shall repeat it. Is the government considering, in the new year, introducing an amendment to the family allowance legislation which will provide a means test for recipients?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE FAMILY ALLOWANCE SCHEME WILL REMAIN UNIVERSAL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure the House that the family allowance scheme in Canada will remain a universal scheme?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the government plans for the moment are only to suspend family allowance increases for a year as a result of the budget cuts, the reason being, as I explained to the House, that these allowances went up from $7 in 1973 to $22. Nobody, I think, can say that we did not make considerable progress in that respect during the past three years.

● (1120)

INQUIRY WHETHER ESTABLISHMENT OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME WILL BE DELAYED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the austerity program announced by the right hon. Prime Minister, can the minister tell the House whether that program will delay the introduction of a bill to adopt a guaranteed annual income, as he led us to believe some time ago?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe so. A meeting of the welfare ministers will be held early in February as well as others, I hope, during the year. That project is still under discussion. Well before the austerity program was announced, I stated that we would have to wait for two to three years, because of economic circumstances, before implementing such a program. I hope that sometime next year we can reach an agreement with the provinces on the guaranteed income formula to be adopted across the country; subsequently, a bill will be introduced to Parliament, although I do not know exactly when; at this point, I can give no exact date, but I trust the government will be in a position to introduce a bill eventually, according to the schedule I announced some months ago.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): In view of the reply of the minister that negotiations are still going on, can the minister tell the House whether the Quebec government seems to be willing to go along with such an annual guaranteed income plan, and whether the Quebec authorities are willing to share its cost—as well as tell the population, as the President of the Treasury Board so aptly put it a while ago?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, all through these discussions the Quebec government has given evidence of a very great sense of co-operation, as did the governments of other provinces. I have no cause to believe that the discussions that have begun will be interrupted or prejudiced in any way. I even believe we will reach an agreement next year. Such agreement will contain a clause which has already been foreseen and accepted by all provinces to the effect that in the future they will have to recognize unequivocally the federal government's contribution to social programs.

REASON PRIME MINISTER SAID MEMBERS' PAY FREEZE SUPPORTED BY LIBERAL CAUCUS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the right hon. gentleman's admonition the other night for a collective effort by all of us, why did the Prime Minister think it necessary to say, in his television speech, that the parliamentarians' pay freeze was a decision of the government supported by the Liberal caucus when he knows very well that all MP's, whether they are in support of the government or not, must share the responsibility of this decision?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did have the privilege of consulting the Liberal caucus. I was not invited to the Conservative caucus, but I do not know what I would—

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I might add that the question of a cut was in the wind. It had been leaked in some way that the government was considering it. I must say that the only advice I got from some members of the Tory party was not to proceed with it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give notice of a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members on both sides of the House will have to understand that I at least have to hear a preliminary indication of the question of privilege in order to decide whether I should take it now or at twelve o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question of privilege at twelve o'clock with respect to the statement just made by the Prime Minister as it relates to one made previously to me by the government House leader.

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS ON JUDGMENT OF QUEBEC COURT—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he intends to repudiate the unprecedented and reprehensible attack on the Quebec Superior Court by his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who referred to a decision of that court in a case involving an alleged monopoly by sugar companies as "disgraceful". Does the right hon. gentleman intend to repudiate that statement or does he hold the view that he and his colleagues are above the courts, thereby undermining the whole essence of the rule of law?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, following the hon. member's remarks, I want to say that I have full confidence in Canadian justice. It was an extremely important case. I think we had an excellent case. Perhaps we did not have a good judge, but that does not prevent me from having excellent reasons to see to justice.

Immediately after the judgment was rendered, I spoke with the Minister of Justice and asked him to see that officials consider the opportunity to file an appeal.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Does the Minister of Justice hold to the view just expressed in the House by his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that this judge was somewhat less than competent in rendering this decision and, if he does, what action does he intend to take? Or does he intend, as a responsible Minister of Justice, to repudiate the unprecedented and reprehensible slur on the courts of Quebec by his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): The judge in question was obviously acting in accordance with his duties and authority as a judge, and in accordance with the law as he saw it. We are considering the judgment in the case very carefully to determine whether an appeal should be made or not, and a decision will be taken on the best advice we can receive.

Mr. McGrath: My final question is to the Minister of Justice who has the responsibility for upholding the dignity of the courts in addition to his other duties. The question is the same as the one I put to the Prime Minister. Does he intend to repudiate the statement made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, reported in the press today, in which he said with reference to the decision of the Quebec Superior Court on the sugar case: "It is a complete shock to me and I find it a complete disgrace." Does the minister intend to repudiate that statement?

Mr. Basford: I have just said the judge was acting in accordance with what he perceived the law to be and I intend to go no further.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES AT BOWATER'S MILL IN NOVA SCOTIA—ALLEGED DENIAL OF BENEFITS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It arises from the fact that some 116 men employed as "spares" at the Bowater's Mersey Mill in Liverpool, Nova Scotia have been without income for 50 days, are without job security, do not belong to any union and are, unfortunately, unable to obtain any alternative form of employment, have been denied unemployment insurance benefits to date. Has the minister had time to look into this matter which I brought to his attention this week and will he arrange to provide unemployment benefits or jobs to these unfortunate Canadians who are desperately in need of assistance at this time?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I appreciate the action of the hon. member in drawing this matter to my attention yesterday or the day before. I have initiated a complete analysis and review of the decision made by the Commission but I am not yet in a position to know whether the decision was correct or not. However, I will undertake to telephone the hon. member just as soon as I have a report, possibly this afternoon.

COMBINES

ALLEGED SUGAR MONOPOLY—REASON MINISTER FINDS JUDGMENT OF COURT UNACCEPTABLE

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked by the hon. member for St. John's East and it is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since the minister feels himself free to attack the unimpeded operation of the judicial system, will he explain to the House the basis of the government's case against the three sugar combines under the Combines Investigation Act and why, in his opinion, the judgment of the court is unacceptable to him?

● (1130)

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The conclusions drawn by the hon. member have nothing to do with my statement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO COST OF EXTRA SITTING DAYS

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the President of the Privy Council.

Since employees of the House of Commons and particularly those of the Printing Bureau get double pay, could the President of the Privy Council say how much a supplementary sitting day as today costs?

[English]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will take the matter up with the President of the Treasury Board, who will no doubt reply to the hon. member at a later date.

PROPOSED SUBSTITUTION OF MEASURE FOR BILL C-81 TO FREEZE TOTAL REMUNERATION OF MEMBERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. In order to save time when we come back in January in seeking to amend a bill that is drawn in rather complicated terms, would the government consider in the recess producing a bill in substitution for Bill C-81 that will impose a freeze on our total income, bearing in mind that the minister knows that that was our position before the freeze was announced and that we would be willing to give unanimous consent to the procedural aspect of such a substitution?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, that would not be our intention. When there were rumours circulating that the government might bring in a measure of this kind, it was quite clear that it would not receive the unanimous support of all members. I had representations from the Conservative side and from our own side protesting against any curtailment of escalation. The government made its decision, as has been announced, to stop the escalation on salaries, not on expenses, which are in a different category. We will continue with that measure, Mr. Speaker, but if there are amendments proposed and they get majority support the government will accept that decision.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question either to the government House leader or the Prime Minister. In view of the assurance given to the Leader of the Opposition this morning that consideration would be given to an amendment covering the whole works, would it not be simpler for the government to put that into the bill, or is the Prime Minister's willingness to consider an amendment only a prelude to turning it down?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add much to what the House leader has said, I think in a very correct fashion. I am surprised that the hon. member who asked the question is proposing only a freeze. Why does he not consider a rollback?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I give notice of a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I pointed out at the beginning of the question period, difficulty always arises if we debate a subject that is already before the House in another form.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

EFFECT OF CHANGE IN FAMILY ALLOWANCE AND MANPOWER TRAINING GRANTS ON CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN COSTS—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question really covers two departments, the Department of Finance and the Department of National Health and Welfare, so perhaps I should put it to the Prime Minister. In view of the expression of opinion by the Canadian Council on Social Development that the program announced the night before last is "a crass act of political expediency and a betrayal of government promises not to fight inflation on the backs of the poor", may I ask the Prime Minister whether or not the government has made any estimate of the increased cost to the federal and provincial governments under the Canada assistance plan of its failure to continue the indexing of family allowances and manpower training grants, which account for more than two-thirds of the proposed reductions in expenditure this year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we knew when we were bringing in this series of cuts that the cynics and small minds would always say "we wanted you to cut, but not so and so". Over the past two days we have been having from the opposition, and I must say from a lot of the media, the expression of exactly what I predicted would happen—"If only the government had cut other things elsewhere, we would have supported them". I have very little respect, Mr. Speaker, for that kind of attitude.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is obvious that the Prime Minister is unwilling to answer the question. I am trying to determine whether he is also unable to answer the question, which is as follows. Inasmuch as the substantial reduction of $250 million in payments to dependent children and families, which the government has cut from this year's estimates, will increase Canada assistance plan payments under social assistence programs in the various provinces as well as increase transfer payments, I ask the Prime Minister whether he can inform the House what amount of additional revenue will have to be expended through these two programs to compensate for this short fall.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member's question is proving what we established all along, that most of the federal government's expenditures are on services and goods to people. If we are asked to cut them back, it means there will be less goods and services for the people.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My question is simply this. When will the government indicate to the House the amount of additional expenditure required under the Canada assistance plan and by way of transfer payments or adjustment grants involving more than half the provinces of this country in order to ensure the adequacy of social assistance to dependent families and children?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to give an answer to the hon. member; he should know for the simple reason that social security levels—

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Then if you do not know, you are irresponsible.

Mr. Lalonde: You asked a question, so shut up and you will get an answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: —are determined by the provinces. The federal government shares 50 per cent of the cost and we shall assume 50 per cent of any increase the provinces will decide to grant needy Canadians, whether or not those people have dependent children.

TRANSPORT

REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES ON EAST COAST SERVICES—EFFECT ON PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY SERVICE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want to address a question to the Minister of Transport and to ask for clarification of the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board regarding cuts in government expenditure. In regard to the reduction of $5 million expenditure on the operation of the east coast, gulf and coastal services announced, can the minister say how these savings are to be achieved; and in particular, can he say how the ferry services linking Prince Edward Island and the mainland will be affected?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the specific figures, which will be proposed in due course, but I can indicate that the saving will result from the reduction in the very large subsidy payments that would otherwise be incurred due to an increase in certain of the rates for ferry services. The exact increase will be indicated in due course.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I take it the reply given by the minister to a written question by me quite recently in which it is stated that at present there are no plans to alter this tariff structure, referring to ferry rates, is no longer valid?

Mr. Lang: That is right.

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED INCREASE IN RATES—POSSIBLE VIOLATION OF ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question arises from a Canadian Press announcement yesterday by the Postmaster General. Would he explain to the House how he can raise postage rates on first-class letters from the present eight cents to ten cents or 11 cents, which amounts to an increase of 25 per cent or more, and still comply with the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it will be up to the Anti-Inflation Board to determine whether a 2-cent increase on an 8-cent stamp is inflationary. I would imagine it would also want to take into consideration the increased cost of operating the post office, other than wages, which fortunately is being offset by increased productivity, which is at an all-time high incidentally now in the post office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: It will also want to take into consideration the fact that the rate for first-class mail in West Germany is 23 cents; in Holland it is 18 cents, and in Great Britain it is 16 cents.

An hon. Member: We are not in West Germany.

Mr. Mackasey: If ours goes from eight cents to ten cents it will be in accordance with an announcement I made last July in the House of Commons.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, the press release quotes the Postmaster General as saying that rates should increase once the post office has recovered its efficiency. Should not the rates be reduced with increased efficiency?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: This one has got to be good.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, this was one of my favourite members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: His questions are usually quite intelligent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: That one is very intelligent.

Mr. Mackasey: There are exceptions, periodically.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is perfectly right, in that the increased efficiency is making it possible for the post office to run at a lesser expense, taking into consideration the high rate of inflation in this country which we have been able to compensate for as well as the increased pay package.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: And if anyone can figure that out he is a better man than I.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You lost us about halfway through.

FISHERIES

SALMON ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM—EFFECT OF REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announced cutbacks in fisheries expenditures, would the Minister of Fisheries advise the House what effect this will have on the salmon enhancement program in British Columbia, and whether that salmon enhancement program will in fact have to be curtailed because of the guidelines?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member sees the estimates following their publication he will realize that fisheries was still given high priority by my colleagues. As far as the enhancement program is concerned, we will continue it even if I have to sell the furniture in my office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: That's a start.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL PARKS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—SUGGESTED MORATORIUM ON IMPOSITION OF FEE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who is a bit peripatetic this morning. Has he received a deluge of representations from the people of Prince Edward Island, the government and legislature of that province protesting the imposition of a $2 fee for those seeking the beaches of Prince Edward Island through entry into the PEI National Park, and will he recognize the reasonableness of these representations by placing a moratorium on such fee imposition and costly expenditures on toll gates?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this is a question that has arisen on many previous occasions. Basically, the position is that the national park in Prince Edward Island is one of our national parks and part of our national system. It is very difficult to say we are not going to charge a fee for Prince Edward Island but will for Fundy and Kejimkujik. It is part of our national system and we feel it is equitable that the users should be contributing a minimum of 18 per cent, which is what it amounts to, of the operating costs of our national parks.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, considering that in the week to come the people of British Columbia will be celebrating both Christmas and the transfer of power to the newly elected government, will the Minister of the Environment undertake to indicate to his British Columbia counterpart or the appropriate minister, as soon as he or she is appointed, his willingness to proceed with the signing of the implementation agreement affecting the Okanagan Basin water board study recommendations?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I will look at the hon. member's suggestion very carefully.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PULP AND PAPER WORKERS' STRIKE—POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS BY MINISTER IN VIEW OF DECISION ON IRVING SETTLEMENT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in view of the decision of the Anti-Inflation Board in turning back the settlement by Irving Pulp and Paper in the Canadian Paperworkers' Union, and in view of the fact the Minister of Labour has stated in this House that he hoped the industry would settle along the lines of the Irving settlement, is the minister planning to make representations to the Anti-Inflation Board on behalf of the Canadian Paperworkers' Union just as the Postmaster General said he was prepared to do for the inside postal workers?

[Mr. Crouse.]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the premise upon which the hon. member bases his question is not correct. I at no time recommended that the settlement be along the lines of the Irving settlement.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I have checked everywhere in my remarks at all meetings and I believe the hon. member will find I have not done so at any time.

An hon. Member: You gave the impression.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): What I did say was that once the Anti-Inflation Board had ruled in respect of the Irving settlement I hoped this might be a further breakthrough in a conclusion of this strike that has affected so many people so harshly, particularly in view of those groups presently still out. That is still my hope.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would answer the latter part of my question. Is he prepared to make representations to the Anti-Inflation Board on behalf of the Canadian Paperworkers' Union?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it would be appropriate for me to do so. I would advise the House and the hon. member that the head of the union has contacted me by telegram and I will be meeting with him next week.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE STAFF WILL BE RECRUITED FROM WITHIN CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the proposed increase in the size of the Anti-Inflation Board staff, and in view of the recent cutbacks in certain government programs, with the proposed reduction in the civil service, will the Minister of Finance reassure the House that as many as possible of those members will be recruited for this Anti-Inflation Board from within the present civil service?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly the case. Up to the present time the great majority of the staff of the Anti-Inflation Board has been seconded from other government of Canada positions.

GRAIN

ALLEGED ILLEGAL STORAGE OF BUCKWHEAT FROM UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, last week in the House the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby asked the Minister of Agriculture about reports that buckwheat is being stored illegally in Canada for the United States for export to Japan, I believe. On Tuesday of this week the Minister of Agriculture sent a letter to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby confirming that U.S. buckwheat was being stored illegally in elevators in Manitoba and had referred this information to the Minister of Transport and also the Canadian Grain Commission. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has had time to take action as a result of this information, and will he inform us what action he has taken, if any?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had a report from the Canadian Grain Commission.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL STORAGE OF BUCKWHEAT FROM UNITED STATES—ADEQUACY OF INSPECTION SERVICE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): The Minister of Agriculture, in his letter to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has said that this type of activity had taken place in the past. I should like to ask the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board whether or not he is satisfied that the Canadian Grain Commission has adequate means at its disposal for policing the illegal importation and storage of grain in this country from the United States.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that any system can be perfect and detect every illegality. I have no reason to doubt that generally there is an adequate inspection system, but I will certainly look at it again in the context of the allegations that have been made.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF STEEL COMPLEX IN CAPE BRETON—AVAILABILITY OF FEDERAL FUNDING

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. But before putting it, may I commend him for his visit to Cape Breton Island this week and for making himself aware of the uncertain future and uncertain conditions of the steel and coal industries. I should like to ask him if, on behalf of the government, he could advise the House whether any federal funding could be made available to the province of Nova Scotia with reference to establishing a new steel complex on Cape Breton Island.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly not in a position at the moment to give the hon. member a precise answer, since he knows that no concrete proposal has been presented either to the federal government or to my department regarding the establishment of a steel plant in the province of Nova Scotia. We must therefore wait for such a proposal before determining whether we shall have to participate financially or otherwise in that project and, if so, in what way.

[English]

Mr. Muir: I must agree with the hon. gentleman when he says that Mr. Regan is not very concrete in anything. May I ask the minister if he would confer with the President of the Privy Council who, as Acting Prime Minister some months ago, advised me that there would be federal funding if a project of this nature were to be undertaken.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the first remark of my hon. colleague concerning the decisions which will be made by the premier of Nova Scotia. But I am willing to reiterate that I can in no way at this moment determine whether federal funds will be put into such a project, and to what extent. There probably will be, but I must stress that until now there is no concrete proposal for the establishment of such a steel plant. We certainly will have to wait for that proposal to be able to indicate the degree of participation by the federal government.

URBAN AFFAIRS

TORONTO HARBOUR-FRONT PARK—SUGGESTED DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF PROGRAM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, because it was the government House leader who so ceremoniously introduced the now trouble-plagued election goody, the $30 million Harbour-front Park to the people of Toronto on the eve of the 1972 federal election, I would like to pose my question to him. In view of the past management failures, rising costs, and very little to show for it, and because we would all like the restraint program to improve by reducing wasteful expenditures, would the government consider taking steps to wind down this project completely, at least for a period of time, in order to reduce the continuing increase in government spending?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we are looking at economies in all directions. I would like to say, however, that I believe that the decision of the federal government to acquire the property along the harbour front, will, in times to come, be recognized as one of the most forward looking steps taken by the federal government.

Mr. Jelinek: In view of the minister's answer, could he advise the House when this so-called park is estimated to be completed? I believe that the people of Toronto are not quite ready to have this costly park at this time. What will the final cost of this project be to the unsuspecting taxpayer?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I have said, we have been effecting economies in a number of directions and this is one where immediate expenditures in this area have been effected. The point that I think that the hon. member is overlooking is that in time to come the people of Toronto will have access to their harbour front which is now destroyed by commercial development of a kind that is not suitable for a modern city.

OLYMPIC GAMES

INQUIRY WHETHER QUEBEC ASKED FOR FEDERAL HELP WITH FINANCING

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board who is not in the House this morning. Here he comes.

My question is related to the financing of the Olympic Games. We are at the end of the year and the 1976 Olympic Games are coming. Considering that the minister responsible told us not so long ago that Quebec made no request to try and find a solution to alleviate the deficit of the Olympic Games and considering that, not more than ten days ago, the Quebec premier confirmed to the press that there were still negotiations with Ottawa, I would like to ask the minister whether he is aware of the negotiations, whether Quebec requested some help to try to balance the deficit of the Olympic Games and whether the federal government made a new decision on this subject.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member that I am much more often in the House than he is, that I look after the affairs of the nation rather than boost the election campaign of a candidate, and that I am not very good at "packing" conventions.

To answer the hon. member's question, I have not received any official request from anybody.

Mr. La Salle: This is not a very satisfying answer to my question.

If I felt like giving the run around to someone, I would like to be able to do it as well as the minister now, and I say it again. The minister is fooling a lot this morning, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES ON SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I should like to ask him if he could tell the House how the cuts in spending in the Indian affairs program announced by the government on Thursday can be absorbed by his department without affecting the most essential of social programs for the native people under his department?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have looked very carefully at the nature of the cuts and we have done our utmost to made certain that they will not have a sharp impact in the area referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Oberle: Since his department only maintains social programs for the native people, has the minister considered cuts in the staff of his department in addition to those already recommended by the Treasury Board and has he considered eliminating some of the already obsolete decisions in his department in order to absorb this cut?

Mr. Buchanan: This is one area where we have had a diminution in staff over the years, and we expect we will continue to have it in Indian Affairs.

REDUCTION IN FEDERAL SHARE OF COST OF CROP INSURANCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO OFFSET

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In light of the $10 million reduction in the federal share of crop insurance, will the farmers and the provinces be expected to cover this reduction?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in our cuts we are expecting everybody to bear some share of the sacrifice. I think the hon. member's question should certainly throw the light on the attitude taken by some of his colleagues that the government cuts are phony.

Mr. Whittaker: Since this is a reduction by one third in the federal government's share, does the Prime Minister expect that crop insurance can survive this blow? Would it not have been better to first reduce the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture in the areas of professional and special services and utilities, and materials and supplies, which totalled $9.4 million and $12.8 million respectively in the 1975-76 estimates, since the former too often causes morale problems—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Whittaker: —and the latter too often proves to be unnecessary?

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCEMENT OF SURTAX ON PERSONAL INCOMES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the question period I gave notice of a question of privilege with respect to a matter which had arisen. Quite frankly, I was surprised that I had to give notice; I thought the government House leader (Mr. Sharp) would want to give notice of the question of privilege to protect himself, in view of the conflict in his answer with the one given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The question arose from a media report in the Montreal Gazette in which it is stated:

> The announcement of the 10 per cent surtax on taxable personal incomes in excess of $30,000 was to have been made at 8 p.m. last night—

That is, December 18.

> —simultaneous with the release of anti-inflation regulations and government spending cuts.
> The informants say, however, that the tax plan—discussed in advance at a meeting of Liberal caucus by members of the cabinet—spread at the Christmas party and the government became nervous about a possible charge of a budget leak.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I asked the minister a very serious question which related not only to the surtax but to the other parts of the government's plan. The minister assured me—and, I suppose, every hon. member of the House—that every precaution was taken. He went on to say that the caucus was asked for recommendations with regard to the cutting of government expenditures. However, then he said that the program was not revealed. In answer to a question by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) the Prime Minister then said he had the privilege of consulting the Liberal caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Moreover, on the program which has now become known in Canada as "As the Stomach Turns", the Prime Minister, when he appeared on television, said that the government, with the support of the Liberal caucus, will ask parliament with respect to the salary increases. I raise this question of privilege seriously. If the intention of the government was originally—and these were stories which we heard in the halls of this place—to announce its total package by eight o'clock, it appears from what has been said in the media and elsewhere, and now by the Prime Minister, that there was some consultation with the Liberal caucus with respect to part of the program, even the matter of parliamentary salaries, and as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said, there was not even the courtesy of the usual consultations with the leaders of the other parties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This becomes extremely important not only to the merits of this matter but also to a document I have in my hand. This document is a list of unanswered questions from October to November, 1975, which have been evaded by the government. My question of privilege is this: if some members of parliament have been given advance notice of a government program which is akin to a taxation program in any part thereof, then the privileges of this House have been breached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In view of the conflicting answers, as I believe I heard those answers, I think it is important from the point of view of the operation of this house, the integrity of the government and, indeed, the integrity of the whole program that we have an explanation from one or other of those gentlemen who have apparently come into conflict with themselves as to exactly what happened at that Liberal caucus, an assurance that this program was not leaked, and an apology to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will not deal with the various points made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) with regard to salaries and expenditure cuts. I will deal with what is my specific responsibility as Minister of Finance, the taxation measure. I did not see the report in the Gazette of, I take it, this morning that the taxation measure had been discussed with the Liberal caucus. I can say that this is a false report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): At no time was the surtax measure discussed either with the Liberal caucus or with any person outside the cabinet or outside my own department beyond the normal way in which a taxation measure is prepared within the government and submitted to cabinet. I think there is more than ample evidence of that fact in that there was not even a suggestion in all of the speculation leading up to the announcement on Thursday that that particular surtax measure was forthcoming. That is another false report in the Montreal Gazette, I think equivalent to the one to which my predecessor was submitted earlier this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could deal with the other half of the question, since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) indicated that there has been no consultation on one aspect of our announcements. I repeat what I said earlier and what the hon. member quoted, that we did consult the Liberal caucus about the possibility of cutting expenditures in all areas; that a proposition was put to me—in writing, as a matter of fact—by some Liberals that we should consider cutting our own salaries; that the matter was raised by other Liberals in the caucus; and that it was discussed in various ways, as the House leader said, with varying degrees of opinion. That consultation did take place.

What I said in my announcement in the evening was correct, therefore, that it was our assessment that we had the support of the caucus. I think the overwhelming support the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) received from this side when he made the announcement that night indicated that the caucus was indeed with him. I see in this no question of privilege or no breach of trust. We on this side do believe in consulting the caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: But then, after having heard a very free and frank discussion in caucus, we returned to cabinet, assessed the mood of our caucus, learned from it ways of wisdom, and made our decisions.

● (1210)

Mr. Trudeau: I might add one word, that I find it passing strange that on the one hand it seems to be an offence for us for having consulted caucus therefore and having broken some kind of secret whereas on the other hand the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was blaming us for not consulting them before. This is to me—

An hon. Member: That is the point.

Mr. Trudeau: That is the point, yes. We cannot be wrong in consulting our caucus, receiving opinion from all sides as I did, Mr. Speaker—as we did have representation from both sides on what should be done.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): What sophistry!

Mr. Trudeau: There is no sophistry involved in this. Members of the Tory party came over and spoke to me and suggested various—

An hon. Member: Cuts.

Mr. Trudeau: —cuts which should or should not be made. This contradictory approach on the other side proves my earlier assessment of them, that their whole attitude in this has been cynical, petty and false.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to dispute in any way the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I accept it as a member of the House. I am happy to receive assurances in that regard. What I rise for, Mr. Speaker, follows from the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I asked the government House leader why they had not followed the usual tradition in this House of consulting opposition parties when making changes with regard to salaries, emoluments or arrangements concerning members, and he said that this was impossible because it would have involved disclosure of the whole program. Now it appears that there has been disclosure of the whole program. I am not going back on what the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Stanfield: There has been consultation with the members of the Liberal caucus about—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Why not?

Mr. Stanfield: Why not? I do not object—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This whole subject, of course, is one that is very emotionally charged. However, there seems to be no need to interfere with the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I am very anxious to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I have not the slightest objection to the Prime Minister consulting members of his caucus—

Mr. Trudeau: Baker does.

Mr. Stanfield: —on the matter of salaries of members—

Mr. Trudeau: But Baker does.

Mr. Stanfield: —but I have the greatest objection to the Prime Minister consulting the members of caucus, and then his House leader rising in this House and refusing to comply with the usual condition of consulting members of the opposition about the same matter. I say there is not the slightest shadow of excuse for the conduct of the government House Leader on this matter. I say his failure to consult, in the usual tradition, with regard to changes in members' salaries and emoluments has probably contributed to the mess in which he has placed his own members and all the rest of us. It is a gross breach of courtesy, without the slightest excuse at all.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege and the question of consultation with specific reference to the issue of salaries of members of parliament and the possibility of a cut or curtailment of future increases being taken on the part of the government, I can say on behalf of our party that there were such informal consultations with the chief government whip and the House leader acting on behalf of the New Democratic Party. At that time we made it clear that we would strongly favour the curtailment of the increase. If I may say so, we took no steps to say anything publicly at that time. It would have been, perhaps, an opportunity to indulge in some false bravado. We had no intention of raising the matter had it not been today in the House of Commons. We indicated to the government that we would fully support such a move, as is consistent with the position we took just about a year ago in this House.

I should like to conclude by saying that I personally resent the kind of shot taken by the Prime Minister (Mr.

Trudeau) at our own House leader for not calling for a reduction. I find that offensive both in terms of its implication for that member to whom it was directed and, indeed, to members of my party which, as the Prime Minister knows, opposed the increase—

Mr. Trudeau: Some of them.

Mr. Broadbent: —when it was brought foward a year ago and indicated a few days ago in private consultations before the government's move—and we said nothing about it—that we would support the government in the action it was going to take on the anti-inflation measure with regard to the salaries of members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There has already been rather extensive discussion on this point. While I would never be in the position of refusing any member the right to make a contribution to a question of privilege, it would, however, appear to have been rather adequately discussed. I think all hon. members realize this is perhaps a very serious grievance and a complaint about lack of courtesy, as it were, as described by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). That is the complaint. It is not for me, or for the House at this time, to judge the merits on one side or other of that argument. The fact is that that is a very accurate description of the nature of the complaint.

There has been an assurance by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) vis-à-vis one portion of the program which related to a taxation measure. That would be the only area in which a potential question of privilege could have been involved by any disclosure. That assurance has been given and has been accepted. In any case, it is a long-standing tradition of this House that it would be accepted, having been given in such explicit terms.

Consultation as it relates to the balance of the program would not, in my opinion, constitute a question of privilege. It has been described in other terms, which is a matter for disagreement and discussion and debate, but it does not constitute a question of privilege. Perhaps we might get on to other points.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, this is a separate question of privilege. I had to wait until today because it refers to an exchange which took place between me and the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday as reported at page 10192 of Hansard. Mr. Speaker, while we may not be able to oblige ministers to reply to questions put to them—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, if I am not mistaken, is referring to an exchange which took place yesterday. It was not at that time raised or referred to by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) nor, to my knowledge, do I have any notice of his intention to raise it today. In the circumstances, I do not see, procedurally, how we can receive a question of privilege at this time on an exchange which took place yesterday.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) on a question of privilege.

MR. MACDONALD (EGMONT)—GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCEMENT OF SURTAX ON PERSONAL INCOMES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, this is a new question of privilege which has just arisen as a result of the remarks of the Leader of the New Democratic Party because it concerns a previous statement by the government House leader as well as a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In the considerable exchange that took place both in the question period and following the question of privilege raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), both the government House leader and the Prime Minister indicated the nature of the situation with respect to consultation with the government caucus and the revealing of that information prior to its announcement here on Thursday night.

It has now transpired that in fact there were consultations with other parties in this House, apart from the party represented by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. I think this, in a sense, presents us with two reasons why the rights and privileges of members have been affronted. First, the government House leader and the Prime Minister spoke falsely when they stated that there was no consultation beyond their own caucus regardless of what the nature of the consultation might have been within their own caucus. I think that, at least, is deserving of an explanation and an apology to this House and particularly to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and all members of this party.

Second, inasmuch as there has been a long-standing tradition of this nature, it would seem that either the government House leader or the Prime Minister or the cabinet have altered the normal rules of consultation which have existed in this House since this House has been operating with political parties. I think there has been considerable departure, particularly with something so sensitive and basic as the indemnities of members, and this deserves a full, accurate and honest explanation.

● (1220)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Do other hon. members wish to contribute to this question of privilege?

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is now apparent that the Minister (Mr. Trudeau) needed to consult a number of members of the House of Commons on this serious question of the forgoing of increases in salaries. My question of privilege would give the Prime Minister an opportunity to apologize to the House for calling some members cynics and hypocrites. Throughout the question period the Prime Minister deliberately tried to discredit members of the opposition and led the House to believe that only the Liberal caucus—and then, apparently, the NDP caucus as well—were in favour of forgoing pay increases scheduled for January 1, 1976. The position of the official opposition is well known and was articulated on October 30 when my colleague from Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) raised the matter in this House under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) is adding further comments to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). Essentially, the question is very similar to the one which was previously discussed and decided. There is a new element, relating to remarks made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), but the point is the same. A complaint about lack of consultation may be a matter of grievance or involve courtesy and tradition but it does not in any case constitute a question of privilege.

Further, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River says that his alleged question of privilege will provide the opportunity for an apology to be made, presumably for calling members of the opposition cynics and hypocrites. There is nothing unparliamentary about that language. It is a matter of disagreement. If I were to take steps to purge all the discussions in this House of language of that sort, it would become a dull place indeed. Perhaps, having heard enough on that non-question of privilege, we may consider the question of privilege to be raised by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) and, afterwards, other points of order.

MR. DANSON—REMARKS OF MR. COSSITT

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to the subject raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) under Standing Order 43, which reflects on my conduct relating to my responsibilities in my ministry. The hon. member made false, exaggerated and untrue accusations based on a newspaper report of a reception held in my ministry earlier this week. I hoped the hon. member would follow with a question on this matter later in the question period. To my surprise, he did not. I sent him a note, but no question was raised.

Mr. Cossitt: Because I did not get the chance.

Mr. Danson: I resent that very much. Further, I resent Standing Order 43 being used to make these accusations when the hon. member has not the courage to follow with a question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: I further resent implications and innuendoes affecting dedicated, hard working public servants in this government who work for this country and held a reception for the acting secretary of the ministry, which I attended. Actually, when I saw the newspaper report the next day I thought perhaps I had left a good party too early.

The suggestion the hon. member made was totally false. His suggestions are untrue. The reception was conducted in a part of the building still undergoing renovation. That is why people were not working there the next day. They were working elsewhere. The acting secretary of the ministry and President of CMHC had moved to less spacious quarters downstairs, which they are putting to effective use. Everyone was out of the building by 9.05. Most had left by 8.10. I checked the guard's records in this respect. The only vomit I am aware of was that which I felt in my own gut when I heard the hon. member's remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling, as is customary, on the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) to contribute to the question of privilege, I confirm that during the question period the hon. member for Leeds tried to seek the floor. Regrettably, other hon. members were also seeking the floor.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, speaking to the matter raised by the minister, I received his note, as he said, which suggested that if I were to ask a question he would reply. As you said, sir, I attempted to seek the floor but, as you said also, many others also tried to seek the floor. If I had been successful in being recognized, I doubt if the minister would have been able to reply, as on a number of occasions during the question period he was absent from his seat.

When I raised this matter Your Honour suggested that perhaps it was not a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. But the minister indicated that he made some investigation, which shows that at least he thought it was a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I respectfully suggest I had every right to raise this matter, for the following reasons: first, as the minister suggested, there were reports in the local newspaper on this matter. Those, in themselves, would not be sufficient reason for raising the matter. I discussed the matter with several reputable members of the press gallery—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: I resent, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Merry Christmas to you, too.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Evidently, there are other aspects of this procedural binge which must be dealt with before we finish. If hon. members would be quiet, perhaps we could come to the end of it.

Mr. Cossitt: I resent hon. members opposite indicating, apparently, that they consider the members of the press gallery to be disreputable.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You said the words.

Mr. Cossitt: I raised the matter because I understand press photographers went to the premises and were refused entrance. They were there in their desire to take what they considered to be pictures of a messy situation. It has been admitted by the minister that public funds were used to finance this party. It was done by his ministry. I do not by any means, as the minister suggests, accuse him personally or reflect in any way on him. I sympathize with the minister because I realize it is difficult for him to keep up with the wheeling and dealing of, Mr. Teron, who has far more connections at 24 Sussex Drive than he has.

An hon. Member: You are sick.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the House will forgive me if I take the responsibility for judging that there have been sufficient contributions from both sides of the House on this essentially non-question of privilege.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, may I speak for a moment, as the hon. member referred to a senior official? I do not know exactly what the hon. member said, but I believe the hon. member referred several times to Mr. Teron. I suggest that accusations have been made which are absolutely false. I resent them, as they are totally unjustified.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I ask both hon. members to co-operate and bring this matter to a conclusion. There is simply no machinery whereby we can permit, under the guise of a so-called question of privilege, the kind of accusations and counter-accusations which have been made. This is a matter of debate and discussion at some other time.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It arises out of the reply to my question in the House today by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), which question in turn arose from what I consider to be the reprehensible conduct of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. My point of order is prompted by an unprecedented attack on the Quebec Superior Court and one of its judges by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs arising out of a judgment with which he does not agree.

I may say that I consider this to be a very important matter, one of considerable substance in terms of the rules and practices of this House. I intend to show Your Honour that there has, in fact, been a very serious breach of the rules of this House. My colleague, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), a distinguished member of the bar and a former attorney general of the province of New Brunswick, will be setting out to Your Honour the learned authorities on this question which I hope will assist the Chair in coming to a conclusion on this very serious matter.

I may say that when I was contacted by the same Canadian Press reporter yesterday to give my views on the decision of the court in acquitting the three sugar companies, my reply to the member of the press was, "Of course, I cannot reflect on a decision of the court. It would be most improper for me to do so."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The minister made his comments outside the House, and this led to my question. However, I intend to show that in reply to my question today he breached the rules inside the House by referring to the judge who made the decision as, "He may have been a very poor judge."

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Justice Kenneth MacKay of the Quebec Court of Queen's Bench is a federal judge appointed by the governor in council under the jurisdiction and responsibility of the Attorney General of Canada, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), who has to take the ultimate responsibility in this regard. My point of order is based on the well-known practice, tradition and, indeed, rule of this House that members of this place may not attack the integrity of the Queen, the Governor General or members of the judiciary of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: That well-known practice is based upon very sound principles. It is based upon the very foundation of our country, the British North America Act, which sets out the division of powers within the federal state that is Canada. It sets out the division of powers within the federal jurisdiction and the powers of the sovereign, their advisers, the Parliament of Canada and the courts of Canada. That is precisely why we may not criticize, in this House, any single part of that constitutional authority which, of course, is the Government of Canada.

I submit that if anybody should be criticized in this regard, the minister should have, more properly, directed his criticism at his own department for failing to prove its case in court. If there is anything disgraceful or reprehensible in this regard, I submit it is the conduct of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to make a ruling on this point of order. If you find that I do have a valid point of order, it would logically follow that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would be obliged to withdraw the slur he made on the Superior Court of Quebec and one of its judges.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I can well understand the frustration of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). I differ in one respect from my hon. friend who has just spoken. I thought the decision was one that would indeed frustrate the minister. I have been following this case, which has been going on for four years. The problem is that part of the case was a part of public life in this country for many years before that. Therefore, the frustration of the minister is understandable. Perhaps if he had been able to refer to the decision and not to Mr. Justice MacKay himself, he would have been well within the rules.

I happen to believe that one of the healthier occurrences in Canada lately is that the present Chief Justice of Canada has opened the courts. Decisions are subject to a good deal of comment and debate. Previously, we used to bow before the sacred cow. I suppose I was as guilty of that as anyone else. However, the present Chief Justice has indeed favoured the opening up of comment and criticism on decisions. Beauchesne's fourth edition, at page 128, citation 152(4) is very, very clear. I quote:

> All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attack and censure, have always been considered unparliamentary—

Perhaps the minister will want to withdraw his comment about the person of Mister Justice MacKay and confine his frustration to the decision of that esteemed gentleman.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). However, I wish to say that the comments of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) have failed to impress me. I think he would have had a brilliant career on the stage because he is perfect in the part of the offended virgin. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I did not mean to attack a Superior Court justice personally and that I did not do so. If I have given that impression, I am sorry and I apologize. I resent the fact that the hon. member for St. John's East is trying to give to my remarks an interpretation which was not intended. I did say and I repeat that the judgment which was passed yesterday in the case of sugar surprises me, disappoints me and even dismays me. I fully trust the judiciary, as I said in answer to the hon. member's question during the question period. He should have paid attention to my reply. At no time did I try to cast aspersion on the judiciary. It is precisely because I have confidence in it that I spoke to my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). Therefore I hope that, following consultations with his officials, he will appeal the decision.

[English]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene very briefly. I am delighted to note that the House is overwhelmed with the spirit of Christmas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), Beauchesne is quite clear in both citation 149(j) and 152(4) that the type of remarks that are deemed to be unparliamentary, as the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) has indicated, are those that cast reflections upon the conduct of judges, or a personal attack or censure. My colleague made it clear that that was not what he was engaged in. He indicated clearly that it was not the type of remark he was intending to make. I would, therefore, suggest that pursuant to citations 149(j) and 152(4) there is not, in view of the remarks of my colleague, any point of order. I indicated that I did not want to go any further, and I refused in the question period to go any further with the questions of the hon. member for St. John's East because, as I indicated, in my view the judge in this particular case was acting in the course of his duties. It is a matter which may or may not be appealed upon the advice and decision of myself and departmental officials, and I do not think it would be proper for me to go further.

● (1240)

Mr. McGrath: On the point of order—

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has raised a point of order. It has been supplemented by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). I could not be quite as generous as the Minister of Justice in interpreting the circumstances, namely, that there probably never was any disorder in the first place. Fortunately, perhaps, for the Chair that point now becomes academic. If, in fact, a disorder did occur in the remarks of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in giving an answer to the hon. member for St. John's East today, and it may have been very close to that, if it did not in fact constitute it—that is a matter for interpretation—that disorder can only be remedied in the way it has been, and that is by the minister doing what he did, which was to give a clear indication that if he had created that impression in the initial instance, it was not his intention to do so and he apologises for it.

The minister's intention was to express his displeasure or discomfort with the decision, not with the judge. I, certainly, am satisfied that this was the intent of the minister's explanation. His intention was to apologise if he had cast aspersions on the judge in any way, and to withdraw. I accept that, and draw the discussion on the point of order to a close.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, during the question period, because of an answer the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave to me, I indicated that I wished to raise a point of order. However, since the Prime Minister has left and since my hon. friend from Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) referred to the Prime Minister's answer in terms which were appropriate, I shall let it go and simply express the hope that perhaps before the day is out we shall all wish each other a Merry Christmas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: On a point of order, I would ask whether you, Mr. Speaker, could use some of your great wisdom and insight to tell us what happened to the much-vaunted Christmas spirit. I hope that somehow in this House today we can find peace and good will and prepare for a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. I hope the new year will be happier. If you can find where that Christmas cheer went over there, I would appreciate it.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, mine is a slightly different point of order. It relates to the question I put in the House today dealing with the publishing industry and the fact that by January 1 some publishing industries will be closing, with a large number of jobs and $1.5 million lost. I simply want to put forward the point of order that because there is need for a statement—this being the last day, and that is why we asked for it, and the question period being the time we can ask questions—I ask the government House leader, do we have to put up, in the publishing industry, too, with both a stacked committee on broadcasting and non-answers in the House, because these industries must make decisions and the government must somehow give them some direction before January 1?

Miss Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I should like to clear up this matter in the hon. member's mind. I think the business of the House was brought out on Wednesday of this week, and Bill C-58, as the hon. member knows, states the date as to when it takes effect, as he sat in the committee. It will be coming up again after Christmas, so I think everyone is aware, as well as all the publishing companies, when it takes effect. Unfortunately, the minister was here until the last ten minutes of the question period and I had just happened to step out for a minute. It is very unfortunate that we didn't hear the question, but I think the information is already known.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I want to point out that the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), with his usual wisdom, raised a point of order in such a manner that it permitted the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), who feels very deeply about his responsibilities to the consumers of this country, to clarify his precise wording in order that his statements are quite acceptable. This, I think, is in the true spirit of the House, as it should be.

I would, therefore, suggest to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt)—I know I have the support of the House leader of the opposition who represents so many civil servants in this country—that there is another tradition. Civil servants are not in a position to protect themselves in the House of Commons, and maybe the hon. member for Leeds discussed a party which I did not attend and to which I was not invited—I do not usually remember, the day after, what happens at these parties; I would not be a very good witness—but I would suggest that in using the phrase "wheeling and dealing" he might possibly have been carried away a little bit.

In raising my point of order I am wondering whether the hon. member would not mind modifying that, unless he is prepared to make such a statement outside the House where both he and the public servants would have an equal opportunity to prove before the courts whether or not there is wheeling and dealing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I am talking now on behalf of all public servants who, I think, provide the best public service in the world, in spite of criticism. I was wondering whether possibly the hon. member for Leeds might, in the same spirit, wish to take advantage of my point of order to soften or to clarify what he means by "wheeling and dealing".

Mr. Cossitt: I had not expected that this matter would be raised again. However, there are just one or two comments I should make in reply to the minister. First of all, he has said that civil servants cannot defend themselves against statements made in this House. This would imply that a member ot the opposition has no right to question the actions of a public servant in the House. I would point out that the minister of the department is here and is quite capable of replying, as the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) did in this particular case. With regard to the expression "wheeling and dealing", the minister suggests that I make the statement outside the House. I just did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: It is a matter of what one means by "wheeling and dealing". You could say, "a very fast moving individual". He certainly moved very fast up the ladder in the public service.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have reopened, under the guise of a point of order, what is essentially not a point of order. The matter seems to have been more than adequately dealt with and perhaps we ought now to get on.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT

On the order:

That, when the House adjourns after Bill C-75, an act to increase the rate of return on government annuity contracts, to increase their flexibility and to discontinue future sales thereof, has received the royal assent, it shall stand adjourned until Monday, January 26, 1976, provided always that, if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultations with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That in the event of Mr. Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker or the Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in his stead for the purposes of this order.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this motion stand. I would also ask that it be made an order of the House that we call motions later this day after we have disposed of other business, so that I can move this motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed, and so ordered.

● (1250)

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions I have risen to ask about the delay in answering question 69. I hesitate to do so again, but it is now within 10 to 15 days of the approach of its third calendar year on the order paper, and I therefore feel I have a legitimate point of order in asking how a question can remain on the order paper for three calendar years. Indeed, by the time the House reconvenes in January it will be well into its third year.

The question asks for some simple, basic facts: firstly, the number of trips taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at public expense since the election of October 30, 1972; the number of these trips that involved personal holidays; the number of these trips that involved going to Liberal party gatherings. Every day we can look across the House and see in the gallery a host of people from the Prime Minister's office, so it is obvious he has a big staff. If some of them would go back to his office and do some work, then we might get an answer to some questions.

An hon. Member: You are sick.

Mr. Cossitt: Every time I raise this point of order, Mr. Speaker, members opposite start yelling, "You are sick".

The trouble is that if they heard the answer they would be sick, and I suspect that the people of Canada would be sick, as well, at what is going on. I do not think it is proper, when a member rises on a legitimate point of order concerning a written question, that all he should get is this kind of garbage from the government side.

I suggest, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that there can only be three reasons why this question is not being answered. One is that the staff of the Prime Minister's office does not do any work. The second possibility is that the answer would be embarrassing. Perhaps the third reason is that the answer would be scandalous. Perhaps the reason the government is not answering this question comprises all three.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a similar point of order. May I say that I do not abuse, in the House, the privilege of asking the government questions. On July 17 of this year I placed on the order paper a very simple question asking what services of the Department of Public Works were applied to a minor contract in Ottawa, whether there were outside consultants employed, who they were and what was the cost. Would it be fair to ask the parliamentary secretary today whether he intends to answer this question or procure an answer, and then the answer will be forthcoming?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention to furnish replies to all questions standing on the order paper prior to adjournment or prorogation of this session.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In calling motions I overlooked a motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), which will stand. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, might I suggest—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to restore some element of amiability to these proceedings. Might I suggest that we could all do with an extra four minutes for lunch, and that we now call it one o'clock?

[Mr. Cossitt.]

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in initiating the third reading debate on this important if, in our view, bad bill in respect of changes to the unemployment insurance regulations, let me say at the outset that the first task of the government on unemployment insurance is to deal with the problem of unemployment in the country.

If we had a situation in which there was virtually full employment, to say the obvious we would be in need of almost no unemployment insurance. I cannot at this stage overlook what I feel is an obligation to say something briefly about the failure of the government on the general question of unemployment in the country and the problem which has led to the major change in the legislation on the government's part, to which I will come in a minute. It is this kind of change the government has brought in that we reject most categorically.

Since this act was previously amended in 1971 we have had persistently high and increasing levels of unemployment. In no year since 1971, in Canada, has unemployment fallen below 5 per cent, and in most years it has been well in excess of that figure. This year it is running at about 7.5 per cent, and according to the most recent OECD report and a report by the Conference Board, a group of independent economists in Canada, unemployment during next year is going to be well in excess of 7 per cent.

When we consider the net effect of the programs brought into the House on Thursday night by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), we can see they virtually guarantee we will have increasing unemployment in our country during the next 12 months. We have been told about cuts in the Department of Agriculture, in the Department of Fisheries, in Finance and our railway system. We have been told about cuts in virtually every department which has a direct or indirect effect on the employment prospects of the ordinary Canadian. What I should like to have seen was a refreshing bit of candour on the part of the government.

Mr. Stanfield: Even if it is Christmas, that is too much to expect.

Mr. Broadbent: I believe the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) expresses some dismay at that prospect, but perhaps because it is the Christmas season I tend to be a little more optimistic than normal. I should like to see the government do what has been done in the United States, in the United Kingdom and in most democracies where those governments have come out with a basic financial structure; that is, they table their employment forecasts. This government refuses to do this. I have no doubt that the reason in the particular case the government refuses is that, in turn, it would have to show that the kind of cuts it has brought to parliament will increase unemployment in every part of Canada—Atlantic Canada, the prairies, the west coast and in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

In terms of employment, this government has one of the worst records in existence. I say with care—because I do not know for certain, but this can be checked—that if you took a period for the last half-dozen years and compared the record of industrialized countries not pre-industrialized countries, you would find that this government has the worst record in providing work opportunities for the population than any country in the industrialized western world.

Yes, as the former leader of our party has just said, this government is even going to cut back on Manpower retraining programs. This government has a thoroughly reprehensible record. There was not one item in the package the government brought in on Thursday to suggest a specific program to stimulate employment. The package contained some good and a lot of bad. Many of the good parts were accepted by this party and even suggested earlier. Others have been pointed out as being bad and should have been eliminated some time ago. However, the across-the-board cutback on expenditures, meaning good programs as well as bad, means we will have more unemployment in Canada in 1976 than would otherwise have been the case.

One of the reasons the government brought the present bill before parliament was that they had discovered there was a constant increase in the amount required by the public treasury to pay into the unemployment insurance scheme. The reason there has been a constant increase, to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, has been the persistent and increasing high levels of unemployment.

What did the government do? Faced with this serious problem of increasing pay-outs which were generated by their own mismanagement of the economy, what they did in the case of unemployment insurance is precisely what they did in their budget cuts of Thursday night—they put the burden of paying the increased cost on the average and low income Canadians. They said that the ordinary people are being unemployed more frequently in Canada, so let them pay for their own misery. That is the full effect of the major amendment that is introduced in this bill, and it is for that overriding reason, as well as a couple of others which I will mention in a minute, that the NDP is opposed to this bill.

As a number of members know, the present act requires that the general revenue funds be used to pay for all unemployment insurance payments beyond the 4 per cent level of unemployment. What the government has done is to amend that and say that instead of the 4 per cent benchmark serving as the point at which the public treasury picks up the cost, they will have a floating average based on the average unemployment for the previous eight years. What this will mean during the coming year is, for example, that instead of the payments being for unemployment beyond the 4 per cent level paid out of general revenue, which comes from corporation taxes and from the income of people who pay taxes into the general revenue scheme, the excess beyond the new benchmark level, which will be in the neighbourhood of 5 per cent to 6 per cent, will be paid for out of the increased premiums paid by the people who contribute to the unemployment insurance scheme, namely, the ordinary workers, the very set of people on whom the government has also just imposed a set of wage controls.

What does this mean in dollars and cents? There are no precise estimates. We have had various ones. The minister responsible for the bill has given a figure of $500 million. The Financial Post has provided another estimate of some $800 million. I do not care which figure is the precise one. The case is that we are going to have additional revenue demands imposed on workers in Canada to the extent of $500 million to $800 million in 1976, demands on people whose incomes in the main are below $8,500 because the legislation provides a ceiling of $8,500 beyond which you do not contribute in proportion to your income. It means that ordinary workers, the majority of whom in below the $8,500 category live at or below the poverty level, will have to pay the cost increase brought in by the government which, I say, is in the range of $500 million to $800 million.

If the bill had not been amended, as it is now being amended, that additional load would be borne by corporation taxes and taxes from the income of Canadians at all levels. What this means, in straightforward economic terms, is that average and low income people are having a disguised tax put on them and the people who are above them in income position will get a reciprocal benefit. For that reason, we find that this piece of legislation is extremely regressive. It goes against the principle of sharing responsibility for financial costs in the community in an equitable fashion, and indeed goes against one of the other arguments introduced at the committee stage by the former minister responsible for this act, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), when he said that by having a 4 per cent ceiling or benchmark at which point Treasury Board would have to pick up the total cost of unemployment insurance, we would have a major incentive built into law which would cause the government to keep unemployment down below the 4 per cent level.

By removing that 4 per cent benchmark and substituting a floating average, we remove that incentive. Given the nature of the present government, it is probably of no great consequence because it did not act as a real incentive with them in the first place. Ever since the present UIC legislation was passed in 1971, as I indicated, unemployment had constantly gone up. At no period did it fall below the 5 per cent level. For those two reasons, both in terms of the fairness of burden in the financing of the unemployment insurance scheme, which my party believes in the main should be a public responsibility because the public policy in our country, as well as in other countries, is the main determinant of unemployment levels, and because the government is backtracking completely on this and putting the burden of financing unemployment insurance on the ordinary working people themselves, we reject this bill.

We reject it, also, because it removes whatever little incentive there was in the act by having a 4 per cent benchmark at which point the government would have had to pay all increased costs. The floating average means that there will be no real prospect of the government accepting some level of unemployment in our society beyond which we should not permit conditions to get worse.

The other two aspects of this legislation to which we have objected, and on which our party as well as the official opposition have proposed amendments, is the removal of all persons, once they reach the age of 65, from the benefits of the unemployment insurance scheme. Quite apart from the fact that the savings to the scheme by this removal are minimal in dollars and cents, I think it is in principle a wrong and unacceptable idea. The fact is that the majority of people in our country, according to a study which was prepared a few weeks ago for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), who are at the pensionable age live in poverty. That means the millions of senior citizens who live in poverty and who want to continue to work, not because they have a profound desire to continue doing the kind of work that they are doing, but they want to do so because they have to get the income in order to eke out an existence in Canada, will be deprived of unemployment insurance benefits.

We say it is wrong to say to a man or a woman in our country who is 65 years old and who is compelled to work because of the inadequacy of a private pension or the inadequacy of a public pension, "Thou shalt not work because, in effect, thou shalt not get unemployment insurance benefits if you do work". We in this party cannot understand why the government should have brought in such an amendment to the law. As I say, it saves a pittance in terms of the cost of the scheme, and in terms of what it is saying to our senior citizens with any sense of equity or fairness, it is totally unacceptable.

The third consideration which is of particular importance to members of our party is the removal of the special benefits which accrue to working Canadians who are at the lowest level of the income scale, benefits which enabled them to receive up to 75 per cent of their average income while unemployed. We think it is scandalous, at a time when we have high levels of inflation, to remove this benefit. What we had in the act before the government brought in this amendment was a provision which said that a small number of workers—let us remember that this is a very small category, the working poor—would receive up to 75 per cent of what they earned during periods of unemployment, which meant for most, I suspect, no more than $60 or so per week. They will no longer receive that. They must receive the same level of benefit as the rest of the work force in Canada which is better off. Any party which has any concern for the poor people of Canada, and in this instance the working poor, should not have brought in this kind of amendment. For this reason we cannot accept a bill which contains this kind of provision.

In concluding my comments, this bill symbolizes for us this government's attitude toward ordinary people since it formed its majority in July, 1974. I am not going to trot out, again, all the promises upon which the government has reneged. That has been done in previous debates by the official opposition and by members of my party. All the things the government claimed it would do for ordinary Canadians in the July election of 1974 have totally gone out the window. The package of proposals which was brought in on Thursday night shows a heartless sense of reality and a heartless sense of perspective on Canadian society. The government produced a restraint program which affected virtually every sector of our country and every type of occupation and brought in amendments to family allowances which removed the escalator clauses.

This will mean that the poverty of poor people will be worse in 1976. It means the burden will be transferred to the municipalities and the provinces, who will have to make this up in increased welfare payments because the federal government has neglected its responsibility. This unemployment insurance bill should not be seen as an isolated matter in a package of programs which was otherwise disposed to do something for the average and the poor in this country. Quite the contrary, it is fully consistent with the heartless, indifferent and callous attitude toward ordinary people that we have seen from this government and from this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) since July, 1974.

I hope after the new year, when hon. members on the government side go back to their constituencies and hear the responses from their communities to the cut-backs the government has announced, they will come back with a new attitude. However, I suspect their attitude will not change and that only through the efforts of the opposition in this House in the weeks and months ahead might we be able down the road to have a change in attitude on the part of the government.

When the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues, who were basically the same ones we have now, received their majority in 1968, we saw how indifferent the Liberal party could be when it had a substantial majority. It behaved somewhat differently during the minority government. But it is now back to its lofty and arrogant self and the problems of ordinary people are going out the window. Unfortunately, that is likely to remain the situation until the next election, and when the next election comes I will remind the government of what happened in 1972. My hunch is that the change in 1978, or whenever the election comes, will be more substantial than it was in 1972.

Mr. Gillies: There will be no NDP members left.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): In connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act, Mr. Speaker, the Department of Manpower and Immigration published in 1973 a booklet dealing with the new approach of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and its aim which, as summarized in the first pages, was to provide an income on a temporary basis to every insured person who is unemployed and to help him or her to rejoin the labour market. It was a summary of good intentions. And further, it even added: ... its awareness of the problems resulting from emergency payments. It referred to possible emergency payments. If all normal corrective measures proved worthless, a cheque could be issued within 24 hours. It could even be issued within 8 hours through manual processing, and within 4 hours by the head of the district office who is empowered to sign cheques on an emergency basis. Such cheques were not issued very often. The fact that the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act is lacking in many respects was fully demonstrated in a press release dated October 27, 1975 on Bill C-69, which has been introduced for second reading in the House. In the first area which will be amended, reference is made to the elimination of iniquities and complexities in the current legislation. The definition of the word iniquity in the dictionary is somewhat short, but quite clear:

INIQUITY: Lack of justice.

So, the government was aware at that time of the many cases of injustice in the administration of the act and regulations.

● (1430)

I am surprised to note that the minister who realizes the cases of extreme injustice resulting from such a complicated legislation has provided as only improvement some amendments on a few important matters, I agree, but which are far from enough. It must be kept in mind that there are still in Bill C-69 provisions which can be considered as cases of extreme injustice. For example, the abolition of benefits, that is making persons of 65 ineligible is an extreme injustice.

The procedures to be followed by individuals who have to quiet their job because of illness have not been amended so as to prevent the petty annoyances of officials about medical certificates. Nevertheless, it is while ill that a person without income needs attention and understanding. Medical certificates will still have to go from the local to the main offices for control purposes, while the person who is ill and without income will have to wait weeks and months before receiving benefits delayed by red tape. These, Mr. Speaker, are cases of extreme injustice that would not occur if this legislation is not amended.

I could give many examples to prove inconsistencies in the administration of the act and regulations concerning the delays of benefit payments in case of illness. One person had to go to a hospital 100 miles away from home; the family physician's certificate is not enough, the specialist who treated the patient must submit a certificate or still the patient has to be examined by an independent doctor chosen by the Commission. Very often, the latter does not want to give such a certificate; he waits for the specialist's file. Add to that the delays caused by the postal strike and other strikes in the public service, and we have an idea of the situation of a sick person without income who has to wait for benefits that do not come.

Bill C-69 provides that in case of illness, a person who has paid enough contributions may renew an application for claim. However, these amendments will again involve a great deal of red tape.

The moment an act states that benefits become payable when someone has to quit work because of illness, if we really want to do away with the flagrant injustices which have already been noted, the act must be ridden of red tape formalities which prevent payment in most cases, the few needless calculations of ten weeks' insurable employemnt during the twenty weeks immediately preceding the thirtieth week. All such formalities should be dropped when it comes to maternity benefits; we ought to remember that the date of birth is never definite and that IUC officials should never render decisions resting on probabilities.

As for ineligibility after four consecutive weeks during which benefits are not payable for every insignificant reason imaginable—I have in mind sections 33(3) and 36(3) of the act—I stress that such excessive injustice penalizes even the applicant who has managed to find temporary work. But that is nonsense. The fact is that we did not refer to that and Bill C-69 does not account for that complexity, that excessive injustice. As I said, for all sorts of reasons, including the four weeks' ineligibility, the claim year is back to square one and the claimant cannot apply for benefits. Nothing has been corrected in Bill C-69. Here is a relevant example which highlights the stupidities inherent in the system.

The commission advises a claimant on January 14, 1974 that a disentitlement period set from November 18, 1973 to January 5, 1974 is terminated. However, by another letter dated February 7, 1974, he is again advised that since his disentitlement period was in effect during the re-established benefit and extended benefit periods, his benefit period is terminated. Even if the commission recognizes that benefits are now available, there is no benefit payable since January 6, 1974. It is easy to see the trick. The disentitlement period is made to last till the re-established benefit period, and then the claimant is advised that he is not entitled to payments according to sections 33(3) and 36(3) of the act.

This is an example of sadism, and there are many like that, whose authors are the technocrats who have elaborated the act in complicity with the public servants who seem to enjoy enforcing it.

Last spring, a group of 123 workers from the Moto-Ski plant, today transformed and headed by Bombardier Transport Ltd, who had been laid off temporarily, were called back to work by plant management. They worked for four or five weeks, then, having been laid off again, made new claims for unemployment insurance. Not one of them was considered eligible. The workers were punished for having agreed to work four weeks for their former employer. Still, nothing had been changed in the act in that regard.

The same thing applies in the case of farmers who are paid a subsidy for keeping their animals. That makes no sense: subsidies are no income. The farmers have animals they cannot sell, the government subsidizes them for the winter. The employees of the commission then say the farmer gets an income, saying the subsidies represent 50 per cent of their income, and reduce the unemployment insurance proportionately or pay no insurance at all. But no changes are made in Bill C-69 in this regard. Yet, we are asked to pass it gaily, happy about it. That is impossible. If the bill is passed by the majority, aware of that or not, it is not fault of mine. But as far as I am concerned, I say Bill C-69 does not include the changes or improvements required by the act of 1971. That is why I am opposed to passing this bill which is not acceptable in its present form.

In this regard, I have another example of stupidity in the application of the act and its rules. A claimant submits his request at the end of November 1972. After four weeks, he gets insurance with the usual delay. In July 1973, he is advised that he is not longer eligible. In August, he is offered a job at Cowansville, but he lives at Notre-Dame, in Témiscouata, some distance away from Cowansville. On September 17, an inspector has him sign a statement, as always to the advantage of the commission.

During this time, the claimant goes out of his way to find a job. Finally, he gets a job in a sawmill in Notre-Dame. He lived in a community located seven or eight miles farther. He moves his family from St-Elzéar to Notre-Dame since at long last he has a permanent job. The UIC, through the inquirer and other administrative complexities, insists that the amounts deemed to be overpaid be reimbursed.

Finally, a hearing is arranged before the umpire for December 31, 1973. The five issues are considered and have to do with availability at certain periods, job refusal, false declarations, which was defined in the issues involved. The five decisions were rescinded to the advantage of the claimant.

On February 7, the Commission is in contact with the officials who supervise the computer, in order to determine when this period of misery will end for the worker, who has been compelled to request welfare assistance when the officials of the commission devise every possible way to end his payments.

Fortunately that worker is no longer unemployed. He found a job himself after personally looking for one, without the help of the officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission or the Manpower Centre. They complicated things for him as much as they could. That guy has a family, with all the troubles, and of course he does not have much money, but he managed to find a job which allows him to survive for the moment.

The sections I would like to deal with and about which I still had phone calls this morning, are sections 172 and 173 of the regulations concerning holiday credits. For many years, labour representatives have been making representations to the departments to remove those sections which cause prejudice to those who are unemployed because their work is finished. It is obvious that the technocrats who drafted the bill took the cessation of remuneration rather than the cessation of employment as the basis for the claimant's right. This proves once again that most regulations are based on monetary restrictions. These regulations include all the amounts that can be remitted to an employee on severance.

In 1974, after the administrative reorganization of a snowmobile plant in our area, the firm I alluded to a few moments ago, the 11 foremen who had been employed in this plant from five to ten years received severance pay in addition to their holiday credits. It is obvious that the commission employees who go strictly by regulations extended the waiting period as long as the amounts received at the cessation of employment were not spent.

Some people in the group could become eligible only three months after the termination of their working period. Nevertheless their severance pay was based on the services previously rendered during a period from five to ten years.

This is the type of excessive inequity which is not corrected at all by Bill C-69. Another amendment that could have bad if not revolting effects: the three weeks extension of qualifying period for resignation or refusal of employment. It is proposed to establish the six weeks qualifying period. Obviously it is mentioned in the bill that it is applicable to those who leave their employment without valid reason.

If the implementation procedure were restricted to that group of unstable workers, I should not be against it. However, as I know the usual procedure, I can foresee that things will not happen this way. If a certificate of termination of employment bears the mention "resignation or misconduct", I am sure that a number of civil servants will be pleased to put the file aside for more than two months without pay, two weeks of qualifying period, six weeks of inadmissibility and then, if the claimant is still unemployed, he may have to wait another month or five weeks before receiving any benefits.

I have in hand a copy of a decision made by an umpire following many instances of unemployed workers and their union agent. I think I should quote the ruling of the umpire. Misconduct cannot be presumed, it must be proven and the burden of the proof falls on the board. The sole mention by the employer that there was a violation of some rules or order, like many late arrivals, is not enough. The violation must be substantiated. The sole mention by the employer that the claimant encouraged other employees to go on strike is not enough without any proof of what the employee said or did. Also, we could certainly say that the sole statement by the employer that the claimant is part of a group of employees that caused some damage is not enough without any proof of the extent of the damages.

As the umpire does not have to know whether the strike was legal or illegal, the fact reported above is a normal incident in a labour dispute and does not imply any form of misconduct on the claimant's part. Misconduct has to be personal and there must be conclusive evidence of it. It cannot be inferred from any association with a group.

The board of referees had no valid reason to infer that a regulation had been violated without being aware of the contents or the mere existence of such regulation, and much less to conclude that there had been misconduct without any proof of personal misconduct.

Of course, the appeal was upheld on April 9, 1974.

Here is another case of voluntary termination considered without any justification by the officers of the UIC as a refusal of employment. Here is what the umpire mentioned in his ruling:

> First, in my opinion, the claimant did not leave work without justification since the file states that working conditions did not meet the requirements of provincial legislation. If the fact that the employer did not meet the requirements of the legislation is no justification to leave one's employment, I wonder what a justification should be. In my opinion, it is the most valid justification possible since it is none of the claimant's doing, and it only relates to the employer.
> The one week gap between refusal and acceptance of employment should not be sustained as a reason to disqualify the claimant. Employment was accepted before the notice of disqualification was sent out. A citizen has a right to change his mind. To think differently in this case would be displaying legalism, which runs contrary to the spirit of a social legislation.
> The appeal is obviously upheld on April 9, 1974.

I quoted two instances which show that the umpire does not necessarily share the opinions of the officers of the commission and the members of the board of referees. But the serious problem meanwhile in that respect is that the unemployed worker at the end of the line or in some centre, the poor worker has no income. He waits until all formalities have been complied with and his claim reaches the umpire. He sometimes manages to get some social assistance benefits, but it is quite difficult.

I showed in both instances that the umpire does not always share the opinions of the commission's officers and the members of the board of referees, following the decisions of the umpire in Quebec on November 8, 1973 and in Chandler on July 25, 1973. That did not happen in Kamouraska but it happened in other areas of the province.

I would also like to refer to what happened following a decision made by members of the board of referees in Winnipeg, Manitoba, on May 20, 1975, concerning the availability of a claimant from Kamouraska who now works in the Northwest Territories. Following a claim for benefit in due form, the employees of the commission and the members of the board of referees seemed to agree that that person was disintitled because she was previously working in an area that had great possibilities of employment and she had moved in an area where job opportunities were nearly inexistant.

Following various communications and irrefutable proof of the availability of the claimant the commission amended the decisions made previously and benefit payments were authorized for 10 weeks. However, that claimant had filled weekly reports for 22 weeks of unemployment. Something rather funny happened—but to the advantage of the claimant—the computer made payments for 22 weeks, which was followed by a claim by the commission, and in the meantime after looking that claimant found a job. As a result the commission dropped the claim.

This shows the complications of the act and the regulations that are a cause of lengthy delays when it comes to solving a benefit payment problem.

In this case, one must conclude that the rationale of the computer was more logical than that of the officials since the payment was made according to the unemployment reports submitted by the claimant. It will be noticed that I pointed out a lot of difficulties in various sectors in Canada to show the bad results of a far too complicated legislation whose purpose should be to help Canadians in general facing unemployment.

This does not mean that in Kamouraska we are immune from complications generated by a legislation which needs to be revised, and Bill C-69 is far from containing adequate improvements. That is why I am against it. Adoption of this legislation should be postponed and we should take time to study it along with all the difficulties contained in the act of 1971. If there are no sufficient improvements, once again the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) will be obliged to write in his releases that the loopholes and the complexities of the act have not been eliminated. Bill C-69 involves amendments to the period of disqualification up to six weeks for claimants who leave their jobs voluntarily. I have referred to that point previously. I know what is going to happen because generally the commission officials listen mostly to the employer's story. If we are not there to help the applicant either go to the board of referees or seek another solution, they make their decision according to the employer's statement. There are many reasons to fire an employee: when the employer wishes to cut back on his staff, he finds several reasons. He may wish to dismiss workers who are expecting a reasonable salary and hire new ones whom he can pay less. This practice is frequent in businesses which have trouble meeting their obligations under the present economic conditions.

Let us pause and reflect: unemployment is not only a word; for tens of thousands of families it is a daily reality; for them unemployment means: no holidays, no leisure, no new clothes, eating the same thing all week, bills piling up. That is what unemployment means. Now, I find it strange that a good many people do not seem to stop and look into the resulting difficulties.

To the government, and the newspapers, the unemployed person is a statistical datum, a percentage, an administrative problem. They talk about unemployment the same way they do about weather. It must be true, because we are about to pass a bill which has not been adequately amended. Today, many workers are in danger of becoming unemployed. The worker who had been employed for 20 or 25 years by Canadian Vickers Ltd. was not spared when that firm shut down. Like the worker who had been employed for 15 years in the shipbuilding yards in Lauzon or the worker who had been employed on the work sites of the Alcan company, he has been the victim of automation. Unemployment affects a very high percentage of Canadians. Students need work in summer time because they must help their families; in the same situation are those who have just graduated from school and who join the labour foce, and do not find any job in their specialties; the worker laid off as a result of the closing of his plant; the skilled worker replaced by a machine as a result of automation; the head of the family who works 4 or 5 months out of 12 in construction; the man from 45 to 55 years of age who cannot find a job because he is too old, etc. The list would be quite long. We are told that we have a responsible government but for us under the circumstances, a responsible government is the one which is free to intervene effectively in the development and management of the economy for the common good. This cannot be unless the party in power is free from any financial limitation of private interests under the system of a truly responsible government. Political parties must at all times be completely subject to the rule of democratic control. What government can state that it is as sensitive to the appeals of the anonymous unemployed as to those of the president of such or such an industrial group?

It is not much fun to be unemployed! The unemployed often wonders who is responsible for unemployment. He knows that his former employer, the government and the politicians have something to do with it, but for the worker aged 35 or 40 who completed only Grade 7, economics and politics remain two great mysteries. He is aware of their outward manifestations, that is price increases, housing, food, taxes, finance bills to be paid, elections, the old parties, projects never completed, patronage. All that makes him sick because no one really cares about him or his problems. He sees that we live in a society where only money, profits and dollars count. However, every citizen, whoever he may be, has an absolute and basic right to work and his earnings allow man to acquire his independence, which is essential to the status of free man and to the very existence of a democratic system.

Every citizen, whoever he may be, has a right to a guaranteed annual minimum income, whether he gets it through his work or through the state, if he does not work because of a surplus of manpower or because he suffers from a social, mental or physical handicap. He needs this income and, under present circumstances, with the complications that arise because the act has not been sufficiently modified, the victims of unemployment will continue to meet the constant difficulties caused by this overly complex legislation.

In our superstructured societies, economists are given virtually absolute infallibility. To some extent, they are considered the popes of capitalism. They dominate government services. They serve on boards, commissions or agencies. Since the beginning of the industrial era in North America and since the beginning of the quiet revolution in Quebec, they have gained favour with the governments: they are listened to. They enunciate dogmas which greatly influence our social environment, but only a few people take the trouble to closely examine these dogmas and even fewer people dare question them.

However, in the face of the enormous problems created recently by inflation and unemployment, experts begin to wonder. Do economists deserve their reputation of infallibility? Are their dogmas consistent with the facts? It would be in order to discuss some of their theories.

According to one of their dogmas, there would be a relationship between wages and unemployment. Economists with a reputation of soundness suggest that if unemployment rises, pay increase claims will come down. This is contradicted by the facts. Labour unions are not blind. They ask for pay increases as prices rise, and that unending price-wage spiral is hindering productivity increases. Therefore, profits decrease, business declines, some industries close down, and others speedily convert to automation, increasing unemployment.

Unemployment is a good example. Quebec and Ottawa naturally want to fight unemployment, but they have to use public works as expressways, subways, airports and other projects.

But to really fight inflation, governments should forget for a while the rather questionable dogmas of their appointed economists, and in all humility consider steps to develop new infrastructures, to give full employment to the greatest possible number of Canadians. Clearly, economic theories prevalent in the heroic times of frontier development are outdated in our highly urbanized society. We must now reason within the context of an entirely new social structure. On the whole, present dogmas are false. We must therefore consider the situation anew, look at the actual facts and change the act, so that a real incentive is given to Canadians, the greater number of whom are very well inclined.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the House owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) for the very constructive way he has dealt with the problems that are imperative in this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): As we proceed toward a Christmas adjournment, we ought not to forget that this bill puts a heavier burden on many people in the community, such as the elderly and those who would otherwise benefit by the extended benefits, and the change in the benchmark that has occurred by this piece of legislation. These people who are afflicted by this legislation are also the beneficiaries of what can only be termed a breach of trust by this government in terms of providing employment opportunities for Canadians.

● (1500)

Neither should we forget that the program which was announced the other day, ineffective as it is, will do nothing in terms of the psychology which would permit the government, if it chose to exert any leadership, to show leadership to investors in the business community and to others, and give them some hope.

We have before us a piece of legislation which has been debated fully in the House. Parts of it are acceptable to the party to which I belong. Other parts are not. In order to facilitate progress with this matter I would comment to the House the excellent contribution made by my hon. friend from Hamilton West, and ask the government if it is now ready to bring this matter on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the House that we have been able to curtail the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: I shall not try to make the remarks he had intended to make but I will say it was very odd to listen to the last speaker. He damns the government and then, I presume, intends to vote for the bill before us.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Wait and see.

Mr. Peters: I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) who this afternoon made the case I might have wanted to make in terms of the effects of the bill upon the poorer people of the country. As one who comes from a rural area he is well aware that the abuses which are alleged by members of the Conservative party and members of the Liberal party do not exist, in our experience. The penalties now proposed will hurt the unemployed, those who are seeking work and are unable to find it. Almost all the changes which are to come into effect when this measure is proclaimed will affect such individuals adversely. On the other hand, the sections which might give them some advantage are not being proclaimed at this time.

The adverse effects of this legislation will be added to those of the government's anti-inflation program, the burden of which falls largely on the backs of the poor. We are asking them to carry such a heavy share of the restrictions called for in these programs that it is a disgrace to the country. If we do not provide employment for many of those who are presently unemployed, we shall be placing a very heavy weight on the municipalities and on the provinces which will become responsible for their welfare. It is true, as the minister says, that the government will pay 50 per cent of that bill. Big deal! What he does not say is that rather than provide employment he is now asking the provinces and municipalities to pay 50 per cent in order that assistance to these people might be forthcoming. The changes now proposed will bring no comfort to many who will find themselves unemployed as a result of government action. It will be a black Christmas for them.

I hope the cabinet will give serious consideration to the whole question of unemployment in the new year, rather than taking the line that, as unemployment becomes worse, the workers should be allowed to carry more and more of the burden. Unless it does, the government will find it has established a class of people who will be united very strongly against it and also, probably, against parliament. These people may, in effect, do something about the situation, and it might not be to the advantage of the country in general. We are certainly creating an atmosphere for that type of action, and from my knowledge of the working people of this country they will only take it for so long.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is that the bill be now read the third time and do pass. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the Motion (Mr. Andras) which was agreed to or the following division:

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND VARIOUS STATUTES TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN PENSION, CONTRIBUTIONS, BENEFITS, ETC.

The House resumed, from Friday, December 19, consideration of Bill C-52, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, and of Motion No. 1 (Mr. Chrétien).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, I feel there is a point of order that should be raised in respect of several, indeed almost all, of the nine report stage amendments that have been put down with respect to Bill C-52. Lest my friends around the House get the notion that, because I refer to nine report stage amendments, I am going to make nine speeches on procedure, let me assure them that I am going to condense them all into one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is wonderful what the Christmas spirit will do. One does hesitate at this stage of a session to raise a procedural argument, but rules are rules and it seems to me they should be observed.

I have in mind a rule that is frequently quoted and applied when members of the opposition seek to do what these amendments aim to do today. I hope, therefore, that the same strict application of the rule that is applied to opposition members of the House will be applied today to the government. The rule I have in mind stems from the rule of relevancy and, in particular, it gets down to this, that when there is before the House a bill that amends an act, it is clearly established that amendments to that amending bill must be relevant to the bill, must deal with matters that are in the bill. In other words, if one tries to put into an amending bill a clause that will have the effect of going behind the bill to the act itself, a clause that in effect tries to amend the act in particulars that are not before us, such amendments are out of order.

If I may go through the nine motions at one time, may I point out that motion No. 1 in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) seeks to amend section 2 of the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but may I save him and the House some time by indicating that on examination of the nine motions which propose to amend the amending bill at this stage, only motion No. 3 would appear to have some claim to validity. It would appear that the remaining motions are directed to the statute. That is subject to arguments in their defence, but I only want to caution the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that he should not spend a great deal of time developing that argument. That is the initial reaction of the Chair. I may be persuaded otherwise by representatives of those who put forward the amendments, but basically we must start from the premise that eight out of the nine amendments appear to go beyond the amending bill and directly to the statute, which would offend a principle that is well established and that has been alluded to by the hon. member. The question is, where do we go from here?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe I still have the floor. I welcome the comment that you have just made. It will greatly shorten my remarks because I have come to precisely the same conclusion, namely, that possibly a case can be made for motion No. 3, but I see no possibility of a case being made for the other eight motions.

It did strike me that it would be useful to put on the record very quickly what they do. As I say, motion No. 1 seems to amend section 2 of the Public Service Superannuation Act which is not before us. Motion No. 2 is consequential upon motion No. 1, and if motion No. 1 falls, so would motion No. 2.

Motion No. 3 seeks to add something to an amending clause which is in the amending bill, which calls for a Governor General's recommendation, and we now have that, so it would seem to be all right.

Motion No. 4 seeks to amend section 31(1) of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, whereas that subsection of section 31 is not before us.

Motion No. 5 likewise seeks to amend section 31(1) of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, but only section 36 is before us at that point.

Motions Nos. 6, 7 and 8 all attempt to amend the Members of Parliament Retirement Allowances Act, and I suggest that these motions are doubly offensive to the rules in that they go beyond what is before us in the amending bill, and they would also involve an expenditure of money, and I see no Governor General's recommendation attached to these motions.

Motion No. 9 seeks to amend section 4 of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, but only section 6 of that act is before us.

May I emphasize that in all these cases it is not just that an attempt is being made to amend a section of the act that is not before us, it is not just a numbers game, but rather that in all cases the motions introduce something that is new in susbstance to what is before us in the amending bill. Therefore it seems to me that if the rules are to be observed, the initial comment that you have made should stand, that although a case could be made for motion No. 3, a case cannot be made for the other eight. With respect to some of them—and at this point I am refraining from any points of substance—it seems to me they are desirable amendments and the House might be willing to give consent to waive the rule about notice. But of course when we come to those that involve an extra expenditure of money, without there being a Governor General's recommendation, I do not see how the House could waive that rule, not even by leave.

May I point out that in the special joint committee to which Bill C-52 was referred all of these amendments were proposed by the parliamentary secretary. I am sorry, those which are now proposed by the President of the Treasury Board were proposed by his parliamentary secretary, and on some points he argued that they did not involve the expenditure of money. At any rate, now that they are recommendations of the Governor General, my concern is to have it established that it is not possible to correct one abuse by another.

If these amendments offend against the ruling that we cannot go behind the bill to the act, surely it is not possible, just because hon. members are on the government side, to get around that by putting down the recommendation of the Governor General. This, it seems to me, is an important rule. It was applied to at least one of the report stage amendments in the bill we have just been considering with respect to unemployment insurence. I think it should apply here. The House may find some way to get around these things, but surely the case is clear. I support the view Your Honour has taken that all but No. 3 should be ruled out of order, it being up to the House to decide where we go from here.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the government is not disposed to quarrel particularly with the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or to question the judgment Your Honour has tentatively put forward, namely, that all except the third one of these motions would be out of order on one ground or another—those proposed by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) on the ground of irrelevancy, and those proposed by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) on other grounds. I do hope, however, that it would be possible that an explanation be given to the House of the purpose of these amendments so that we could seek leave of the House to proceed with those motions, which otherwise would be out of order on the ground of irrelevancy, by unanimous consent.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with respect to the relevancy of these particular amendments. I agree with his argument and that of Your Honour. I wish to indicate to the government House leader that the suggestion the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made with respect to the ability of this House to deal with these matters is acceptable to us.

I am not sure what Your Honour will have to say with respect to an explanation of some motions and some clauses about to be ruled out of order. I am not sure of that, but in order to expedite the matter, we do support the argument which the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg North Centre made. It was made clearly in committee and the precedents for it are well established. If we can find a way to accommodate the government House leader's desire to have an explanation of the clauses about to be ruled out of order, I welcome that, but it is not necessary.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer some explanations with respect to the motions before us in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien).

The first motion is required to clarify the definition of "salary", as a result of questions raised in a recent case in the Federal Court. The new definition does not affect the special types of payment to which the court decision applied, as such payments are no longer being made. The new definition and the related regulation making power are proposed simply for clarification purposes to confirm its present application in other regards.

As has been indicated, motion No. 2 is required as a result of the amendment proposed in the new clause 2(1). It is consequential.

Motion No. 3 inserts a new subclause (3), which will extend benefit coverage under the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Government Employees Compensation Act, and the Aeronautics Act to the members of the staff of the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade. The former subclause (3) is re-numbered (4), and a consequential amendment is made to include reference to the centre.

With regard to motion No. 4, the new subclauses (1) and (2) are proposed in order to extend coverage under the Supplementary Death Benefit Plan to certain members of the reserve force of the armed forces of Canada in the category described, a number of whom are serving in the Middle East. Under that plan life insurance coverage equal to the salary of the participant is provided.

Motion No. 5 again is consequential to the previous amendment, an extension of supplementary death benefit coverage to members of the reserve force proposed in clause 45. These members currently are protected by a death benefit of two months' pay under regulations made under the National Defence Act. This amendment will not increase the cost to the government in that respect.

The last motion I should like to comment on is motion No. 9. This motion inserts a new clause 104 and re-numbers the present clauses 104, 105, and 106 as 105, 106, and 107.

The new clause 104 is proposed to permit the Governor in Council or the Treasury Board, as the clause provides, to resolve the anomalous situation whereby many longservice employees whom the government wishes to retain can lose prospective pension benefits if they remain employed after years such as 1975. This loss occurs because the level of such employees' basic pensions on retirement in 1976 or later will not be enough to bring them up to the level of the indexed pensions which they would have been receiving following retirement in December, 1975, with basic pensions which would be increased by 11.3 per cent in January of 1976.

The joint parliamentary committee reviewed this problem, and while it was not empowered to make a specific recommendation, it discussed at some length an approach whereby any such employee would be given a guarantee against a lower ultimate pension level if he or she remained in employment one year or less after he or she passed the peak of the pension build-up. Treasury Board approval for extension of the guarantee into the second and later years was contemplated under that approach.

While the government initially was inclined to favour that approach, it was decided to require approval of the guarantee by the Governor in Council or Treasury Board, as appropriate for the first as well as for the second and subsequent years. The retention of the present inducement to retire in the majority of cases will facilitate the government's objective in restricting the growth of the Public Service and reduce the number of cases in which employees might otherwise have had to be laid off.

With these explanations, I hope that the purpose of the motions in the name of the President of the Treasury Board will be clear to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I understand very well the explanations given a moment ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and it is not the first time since I came to this House that we are faced with such a problem.

I also understood that the President of the Privy Council had considered suggestions made to find a way to amend the rules to allow some amendments to bills, provided the House agrees.

We have been asked, Mr. Speaker, to give a few explanations about the motions. As far as Motion No. 6 is concerned, as all hon. members know, there are two retirement pension plans for Members of Parliament and senators.

In 1970, hon. members had been given a time limit to decide which plan to adhere to, either the established one or the new one. Since a number of members have not chosen yet, this amendment proposes to extend in a way the permission given in 1970 to allow a member to choose the new plan while he is still a member of this House.

The other amendments are added to that one to allow officials to administer the program as suggested in motion No. 7.

Those are the only explanations I can give on the matter because, after all, reading the act governing members of Parliament pension plan is all one needs to understand. No special provisions are added. It is simply recognition of a legislation for all members of Parliament who wish to benefit from it.

● (1550)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The situation seems to be rather clear, and motion No. 3 is not in any procedural difficulty.

In respect of motions Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5 and 9, notwithstanding that they are accompanied by a Royal recommendation these motions appear to go beyond the amending bill and attempt to get at the statute which the present bill seeks to amend. Clearly, they could not be dealt with at this time, or for that matter at any time, I suggest, without the consent of the House.

Finally, motions Nos. 6, 7 and 8 in the name of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert)— —motions Nos. 6, 7 and 8 in the name of the hon. member for Bellechasse cause some problems. First, they propose the spending of money and the unanimous consent of the House is not enough to overcome the difficulty. Moreover, those motions seek to amend the act itself and not Bill C-52.

Yet there is no such recommendation from His Excellency, and motions Nos. 6, 7 and 8 involve an expense of money. Then, they require not only the unanimous consent of this House but also the recommendation from His Excellency.

In the absence of this recommendation, it is therefore impossible to put those motions now.

[Mr. Francis.]

[English]

First of all, motion No. 3 does not require the consent of the House, and motions Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5 and 9 can only be dealt with at this time with the consent of the House. I might ask now, does the House consent to deal with those motions which are before it in those numbers at the present time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I do not withhold consent, but I should like to enter a caveat with the House leader that this has happened four or five times during this parliament. The other day a bill was brought in that was out of order; now with the government's knowledge these items are out of order. It seems to me that if it were not for the foresight the other day of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre again today, this House would have had a situation perpetrated upon it that many of us are not capable of discerning ourselves.

An hon. Member: Particularly the cabinet.

Mr. Peters: My colleague says even the cabinet. I presume there are members of cabinet who do know this today, but did not know it the other day.

I suggest that the day may come when no one can bring these circumstances to Your Honour's attention. It seems to me we have members of a very sloppy civil service addressing themselves to this problem, or else they are trying to take advantage of or abuse their responsibility to parliament.

While I am prepared to give consent, I certainly hope that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) will see that this does not happen again. It happened with supply, and it happened with this bill with the knowledge of some of the privy councillors. As a member of parliament I expect our civil servants to be more responsible and know what they are doing. If they do know what they are doing then it looks as if they are trying to put something over on somebody. That is not their role and not their responsibility.

Your Honour should not be put in the position of having to make decisions which affect the government and the operation of parliament very seriously and of having to rule on these matters which should not arise at all. That they have arisen in the last several weeks on a number of occasions indicates neglect at some level. We have appreciated Your Honour's indulgence and decisions in these matters, but I think the President of the Privy Council should have his fingers rapped for not having made sure that the civil service did not present things that were not covered by the Royal recommendation, and that other matters are not in order. I will give consent this time, but I think everybody is being put upon by the civil servants when they prepare this kind of legislation.

Mr. Speaker: May I say again that motions Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5 and 9 can only be dealt with upon the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent that those motions be put forward at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt motion No. 1 moved by Mr. Chrétien?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order—it is not the pleasantest point of order to raise and I raise it with the greatest respect for the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board. This bill is a very important, heavy in some aspects, and a very contentious matter. The bill is in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) but he did not speak on it at second reading, he did not appear once before the special joint committee, and he is not here today.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As I say, I have great respect for the job that the hon. member for Ottawa West did, but surely the President of the Treasury Board ought to be here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In any case, the question before the House at this time is on motion No. 1 standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The question is therefore on motion No. 2.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the President of Treasury Board) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-52, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, be amended in Clause 21 by striking out line 31 at page 17 and substituting the following therefor:

"have received during that absence;

(b.2) deeming, for the purposes of the definition "salary" in subsection 2(1), the amount in respect of allowances, special remuneration, payment for overtime or other compensation or annual gratuity, if any, that is to be or to have been included in the basic rate of pay of a person;".

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Motion No. 3 is also in the name of Mr. Chrétien. May I presume that hon. members have before them the text of the motion and that they are familiar with it because it is rather lengthy and complicated. Is it necessary to read the details of the motion or shall I dispense?

Mr. Forrestall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief observation. Perhaps Your Honour had better put motion No. 3. I wanted to speak briefly on motion No. 3 and I do not know whether you have put it or not.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the President of Treasury Board) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-52, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, be amended in Clause 28 by striking out lines 43 to 50 at page 22 and lines 1 to 4 at page 23 and substituting the following therefor:

"service of Canada.

(3) the Governor in Council may add to Part II of Schedule A to the Public Service Superannuation Act the members of the staff of the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade—Le Centre Parlementaire pour les Affaires éstrangères et le Commerce extérieur (hereinafter called "the Centre") and forthwith upon the addition thereof

(a) the Centre shall be deemed to be a Public Service Corporation for the purposes of section 25 of the Public Service Superannuation Act;

(b) the Government Employees Compensation Act shall apply to the members of the staff of the Centre and, for the purposes of that Act, such persons shall be deemed to be employees in the service of Her Majesty; and

(c) for the purposes of any regulation made pursuant to section 7 of the Aeronautics Act, the members of the staff of the Centre shall be deemed to be employees in the public service of Canada.

(4) The Governor in Council may, by regulation, provide that the service of an employee of the Institute, the Society or the Centre in respect of which contributions have been made in anticipation of the addition to Part II of Schedule A to the Public Service Superannuation Act of the Institute, the Society or the Centre may, to such extent, at such level of remuneration and subject to such conditions as the regulations may prescribe, be counted by that employee as pensionable service for the purposes of Part I of that Act. " .

● (1600)

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I speak briefly on motion No. 3? It incorporates the parliamentary centre as a public service corporation. Members of this House and of the other place have used the services of the centre for the last eight or ten years. I want to pay tribute to the centre, and motion No. 3 recognizes the wonderful service it has rendered to members of both Houses.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt motion No. 3?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The question is now on motion No. 4. May I again be assured that hon. members have before them the text of the motion and are familiar with its terms.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the President of Treasury Board) moved:

Motion No. 4.

105. Section 6 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:"

(b) renumbering present Clauses 105 and 106 at page 78 as Clauses 106 and 107, respectively.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say a few words on motion No. 9? I realize that there has been no response to my point of order of a few minutes ago. Although the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) is still absent, I hope he will be available before this debate is over.

This proposed amendment, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Francis) suggested, seeks to resolve an anomaly which has developed recently. I agree that it needs to be resolved. This motion does it, but in a way extremely beneficial to retiring public servants at the top of the salary ladder.

This situation has arisen because some public servants near the top of the salary scale realized one year ago, last December in fact, that if they retired in December and took their pension, their pension would be escalated in January by more than 10 per cent and, in this way, they would begin drawing a higher pension than would have been available to them if they had worked until January or February. Some of those public servants not only retired in December in order to obtain higher pensions than would have been available if they had retired in January or February, but they obtained contracts to work for the government while on pension. That seems to me to be an abuse, but it happened in a number of cases.

The proposal being made in motion No. 9—and it is up to the Governor in Council to determine whether this practice is to be carried through—is this: if a person in his retiring year could have obtained a higher pension by retiring the previous December, he is to get the higher pension. In other words, the person retiring in March or April, 1976, will get a higher pension than he otherwise could obtain in March or April, 1976; he will get it by virtue of the application of this rule. As I say, this came about because of the things I described, which happened about one year ago.

I hear a comment which is probably not on Hansard. I do not intend to put names on the record.

Word of what happened has got around and there is now a great deal of interest in it, not only on the part of senior public servants, the $50,000 or $60,000 a year fellows, the nabobs we heard mentioned in the last few days, but on the part of those at the lower levels. I have received communications from letter carriers and employees at that level, who realize that if this provision goes through they can get, in February or March, 1976, a pension 11.3 per cent greater than they would otherwise get. But for this bill, the pension they would get in the spring would be just a few cents higher than the one they could get by retiring in December; but, because they could get the 11.3 escalation if they had retired in December, they are to get that escalation. Therefore they hope that this measure will go through. In some cases the amount of money is not large, but it means something to them. I am sure this is not being done for them. It is being done for those at the top, who I think have abused the situation.

I notice that the government is somewhat aware of this, because in another bill which I will not mention since it caused some trouble this morning, there is a clause to put a ceiling, in 1976, of $2,400 on the increase in any pension that a person may receive. Imagine that! Lots of people in this country will never see a $2,400 pension, but we are saying that no pension of any retired civil servant shall increase in 1976 more than $2,400. I mention this to suggest that if we are to put this principle into effect in this bill, there ought to be a ceiling.

There is another defence for it which I am prepared to advance, and my defence will let me accept it. It is this: in recent years the escalation of salaries has been so great that the use of the six-year average for calculating public service pensions has become out of date. I tried, in committee, to argue in support of the three-year average; the President of the Treasury Board was not there to argue the point, but my argument was not adopted. This measure will make it up for the little people. It provides that in the next year or two they will be paid better pensions than would be available to them under the six-year average rule.

It seems to me that we should have attempted to block what some highly paid public servants did last December. Instead, we are regularizing it, and producing conditions which will be particularly beneficial for those in upper income levels.

In my view, rather than adopting the present device, we ought to have examined more thoroughly the entire question of the six-year average relating to pensions. As the parliamentary secretary suggested, whether or not this device will apply in certain years will depend on the Governor in Council. When we add this provision to some of the other things contained in Bill C-52, perhaps hon. members will understand the views which my party and I hold on the bill as a whole. When we come to a problem like this, instead of dealing with its root and providing a solution which is best for everybody, this government solves it mainly for the benefit of those at the top.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I noted that the parliamentary secretary was about to rise, and I wanted to make sure he did not close the debate, as he seems to be representing the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien). When he speaks I hope he can clarify something. I understand from what the parliamentary secretary said that in no case will passage of this measure result in a public servant's receiving a higher pension than he would have received if he had retired before the end of the fiscal year and obtained an escalation. That was not clear when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke. Perhaps, unintentionally, he left the impression that this measure would confer some favour on public servants. It is my impression that the favour has already been conferred on them. As a result they have a substantial inducement to retire in order to protect the benefit that has been conferred on them. The purpose of this amendment will not be to confer a greater benefit but to ensure they do not lose this benefit by continuing to work. I would just like that assurance.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) has been in and out of the House for most of the day. I know he regrets he is not here at this time. He asked me to take responsibility for this bill at the second reading and committee stage.

I am happy to make some comments which I hope will answer the points that have been made. First, with regard to the point made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), he is quite right in his interpretation. The bill would not permit any pension to be escalated beyond the maximum of two calculations.

A person on whose behalf the government chose to exercise discretion would be allowed to continue into the new year, retire on the normal retirement date, and then calculate two sums. One is the amount which would be his or hers in the normal course of events and, two, the amount he or she would have received had he or she retired on December 31 and taken the 11.3 per cent escalation. In no case could he receive more than the greater of those two. I think that answers the point of the Leader of the Opposition.

I wish now to deal with the points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The hon. member has been interested in pensions for some time in this House. He has been among those who pressed most vigorously for full escalation according to the cost of living.

One of the anomalies that has developed in the course of the period of time we have been facing inflation is a very serious discrepancy in the December 31 retirement date as against those who could work up to 11 months later and receive less. If the inflation continues long enough it will wreck any pension plan that has been devised. If the inflation continues and we have something like 11.3 per cent escalation every year, the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act will be under a very serious strain in terms of the money at its disposal and the obligations on the fund that has been created.

The review of the pension legislation by the committee was very extensive. We had technical witnesses and representations from outside organizations. There was no attempt to curtail discussion. Members present may not have liked the answers they received, but I believe they will concede we at least tried to answer their points.

In looking at the operation of the pension fund, two points must be considered. The first is a very much enlarged liability as a result of the escalation provisions; second, an increase in income as a result of the greater amount of interest which is credited each year with the average yields which have risen under the formula applied by the government. It is impossible to predict what the ultimate outcome will be. The increase in yields started at 4 per cent and is currently in the area of 7 per cent. This has provided a measure of protection within the financial arrangements that exist.

There is no question that this House and subsequent governments will have to look at the very serious problem of what happens to the operation of an unlimited escalation formula without any cap on it whatsoever. It is my hope and belief that, with the adoption of this amendment, the government will develop a policy for subsequent years which would be able to indicate who can expect, on request, to continue beyond the normal date of escalation.

No civil servant is losing anything by the adoption of this formula. The rights which they have now for December 31 retirement are still there. Those who have planned their retirement will no doubt make the plans they have anticipated over a period of time. The operation of this amendment attempts to bring some degree of rationality in a number of cases in respect of the very anomalous situations that have developed whereby a civil servant will get a greater pension by retiring prematurely on December 31.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask one facetious question with regard to the retirement of members of parliament. Can the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Francis) assure us that from now on elections will be held in December, as the retirement fund of some members may not be as high in January, February, or later? The terms the parliamentary secretary has outlined will not likely apply to the members of parliament pension retirement fund, but the effect would be the same as for the escalator clause which, in effect would be applicable.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, no doubt minority governments will take heed of the advice offered by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one comment. The Royal recommendation suggests that this act is intended to provide equality of status for males and females under the Public Service Superannuation Act. I suggest that this takes one step in the direction of providing equality. I would not like the moment to go by unrecorded that this was a full equalization between the males and females.

The step it does take is worth remarking. It makes equality of the contributions to the superannuation fund by male and female employees of the public service. The one area where it does not provide equality for males and females is the survivor aspect. If, for example, the survivor who is not the contributor should be drawing 50 per cent remarries, she loses her superannuation. This does not provide full equality. The fact should be recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 9 (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

Mr. Sharp (for Mr. Chrétien) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I simply would like to take this opportunity to draw the attention of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) on the requests contained in the amendments I have proposed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has simply to wait till the motion on third reading of the bill is put.

[English]

When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Sharp (for Mr. Chrétien) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, I simply want to draw the attention of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) on the nature of the amendments I moved. Since there are two points subject to revision and that cannot be done by a member of the House, it must absolutely come from the government's side. I would like to request from the President of the Privy Council that he bring these questions to the attention of his colleagues in the cabinet, when amendments to the acts we have discussed in the light of Bill C-52 will be presented again, and that the considerations I offered to the House be taken into account.

● (1620)

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I wish to make a few brief comments, Mr. Speaker, on Bill C-52 at third reading. I must say I thought the observation by the parliamentary secretary, that this matter had been before the House and before the appropriate committee for a sufficient length of time to warrant an assumption that the appropriate attention had been given to it, was scarcely well founded. This bill could very well have been before us for the last eight to ten months. Indeed it should have been in front of us so that the attention that the complexity of the clauses demands could have been given to it.

As we have made clear, both in committee and on second reading, the bill is deficient in a wide number of areas. I do not want hon. members to leave this Chamber believing we have done wonders for those who fall within the ambit of the act. We have not. The act is still full of anomalies and examples of discrimination; the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) has just called attention to one of them.

While we welcome the move on the part of the government to clear up some of the anomalies, particularly those as between the sexes, we feel constrained to point out that all the anomalies have not been cleared up by a long shot. I might mention the concern felt by my hon. friend from Edmonton West with respect to the so-called gold-digger clause. A woman spends 20 years living with a man, leaves him because she finds he is with someone else—it may be for only three years—and then discovers she has lost benefits to which she had been entitled. This is only one of 23 areas which have been identified by members of the New Democratic Party and by members of the Official Opposition on second reading and, particularly, in committee. They require the attention of the government in the immediate future.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Ongoing consideration.

Mr. Forrestall: That is the phrase. They require ongoing consideration. Time and time again we put forward serious amendments in areas where action should have been taken a long time ago. But we were under the hammer, subject to the firm direction of the parliamentary secretary that there would be no amendments imported into the bill which did not fall within the narrow recommendation which accompanied it.

I suggest the recommendation was deliberately made narrow in order to preclude an attempt by members to secure necessary changes in a number of areas. For example, there is the question of the benefits which accrue to widows and so forth. Then again, there is the so-called 85 rule with respect to members of the Canadian Armed Forces. This is an anomaly which should not be permitted to continue. Yet it does. We discussed some 30 amendments. The government put forward 21 or 22 amendments. They have gone a long way toward clearing up some of the anomalies with respect to pensions.

I do not intend to discuss in detail the areas which need further examination, or to identify them. I will simply say to the parliamentary secretary that we compliment him on the way in which he has handled this bill, and we recognize that the restrictions imposed on members of this chamber in terms of their ability to correct some of the ongoing hardships affecting the people concerned are not his doing but that of his minister.

I echo the comments made with respect to the absence of the minister, and close by indicating that passage of this bill does not mean that members of this House are in any way satisfied that we have done an honourable or a good thing for our superannuates in the Public Service of Canada, because we have not. I trust this feeling is shared by members on both sides of the Chamber. The least which would be acceptable to us this afternoon would be an indication from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) that he intends to look into the anomalies and conflicts which continue to exist, causing downright hardship in some cases. We welcome the amendments to the degree that they do effect certain changes in the act, but we would have welcomed an indication from the minister himself as to the government's intentions, particularly in the light of the restraint program and the attitude taken by himself and his colleagues toward spending programs over the next two or three years.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which has presented my colleagues and me with a certain amount of difficulty, and I trust this will be understood by those who are familiar with what is in it. There are some things in it which are not only good but have a quality of urgency about them.

Perhaps the most urgent item is the provision under the heading "Equality of Status" which appears several times in the bill. I think it is a misnomer; it is almost a joke, because all it provides is equality at death. The so-called equality between male and female contributors is just that. The bill provides that a female public servant at death will leave the same survivor benefits as a male public servant. That is hardly the kind of equality International Women's Year is all about.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Better than nothing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) says it is better than nothing and she is perfectly right. But I hope that for some of us death is still so far off that we shall see equality of status in life, not just equality at the point of death.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This bill gives a female public servant the right to leave survivor benefits equal to those a male public servant can leave. From here on, female public servants will be paying for that right by contributing the same rate of premiums into the fund as a male public servant does. I said there was some urgency about this provision. This is because only those public servants who are in the public service, on strength, when this bill becomes law will be covered by it.

● (1630)

In other words, if a female public servant retired in Ottawa yesterday before the bill becomes law, she would not be covered. It would therefore be unfortunate if this bill were delayed in a way that would interfere with the rights of some who might be contemplating retirement, or who might be in a position where they have to retire very soon. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, that could have been avoided. All that was needed was to put in a bill a clause providing that, with respect to this so-called equality of status, there would be retroactivity to a certain date. This can still be done. The bill can still be rewritten and corrected in many ways to cover this point. As I say, that is one provision of the bill that has a certain element of urgency as well as being right, and we strongly support that part of the bill.

There are a number of provisions in the bill that have the effect of straightening out certain anomalies. These apply not only to the Public Service Superannuation Act but also to the acts affecting members of the Canadian armed forces, members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and all the other branches and agencies with pensions under the aegis of the federal government. We welcome them, Mr. Speaker. There are not many of them that have a sense of urgency that might apply to the instance of equality of status at death, but at any rate they are welcome improvements.

The bill contains as well some matters that my colleagues and I do not like. As other speakers have said, the bill is also grossly deficient in some of the provisions it should contain. We therefore feel that, as a total package, the bill is unacceptable. It has been before us since February 17 of this year, which is the day it had first reading. There have been many weeks and months in which to deal with it, but no, it was not given second reading until a few weeks ago. We then had to deal with it in the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations under pressure, because of the time element in regard to the one point I made, and perhaps in regard to one or two others.

In view of the request that has been made so often for other much needed improvements in public service superannuation, I think this has been a shabby way to treat us. I still think, with all the respect I have for the job done by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Francis), that the issues that were raised in committee were of such substance that we had the right to have the attendance of the President of the Treasury Board.

I want to say a few words about some of the points that are not dealt with in the bill that I think should be, the absence of which makes the bill unacceptable to us. I shall then speak about some of the matters in the bill which also make the bill unacceptable to us.

Allusions have been made to some of the matters I have in mind. I have already referred to the so-called equality of status in the bill, which is only equality to death. We feel that if there is going to be equality between men and women, their pensions ought to be equal. If a husband and wife live and work together and between them build up a certain pension right, what is there that is just about a law that provides a full pension so long as the man lives, but if he dies his widow gets only 50 per cent? If the woman dies first, the man who survives gets the full 100 per cent pension.

If the government is going to mouth this phrase about equality of status, we think it should go all the way and provide for equal pensions to the partners of a marriage where either one of them is employed in the public service. We raised this matter in the special joint committee, but of course we got the answer that it was beyond the terms of the Governor General's recommendation and could not be proceeded with for that reason. We were also told that it would be very costly. I recognize that, Mr. Speaker, but there are lots of things that are very costly which we can do in this place because we think they are right. I suggest that the phrase "equality of status" is a good phrase but that we really should put it into effect.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I do not accuse the government of any misleading language in the actual clauses of the bill. The title "equality of status" is there, but when it comes to the terms of the bill, what is meant is equality between male and female contributors, not equality between man and wife, between men and women in general terms. We regret very much that the government has not seen fit to move in the direction of equality of status in real terms so far as men and women are concerned, and this failure makes the bill very unacceptable to us. It may be that the contribution rate would have had to go up, and that instead of a 100 per cent pension in either case the pension would have had to be 90 per cent if either husband or wife survived. But why not have the same percentage—whatever it is—whichever partner survives?

When we lost out on that point or got nowhere with it, and when we received no answers other than the three I have already mentioned—that it exceeded the governor general's recommendation, that it was very costly, and that the government just was not prepared to do this at this time—we then tried to argue that if we could not get a 100 per cent pension or the same pension for man and wife, at least the survivor's pension ought to be something better than 50 per cent. After all, survivors of members of parliament who qualify for a pension get a pension equal to 60 per cent of members pensions. Why do we hold it at 50 per cent for the widows of public servants? This again was said to be beyond the terms of the Governor General's recommendation, and beyond the capacity of the fund at its present level, so therefore we got nowhere with that either. I do not fault the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board for not being able to deal with this in full. After all, it is a matter of government policy. But it was this sort of thing that I feel should have resulted in the presence of the President of the Treasury Board, and he should be here today to speak for the government on the matter.

Since I am talking of equality of status, and about widows in one capacity or another, may I move on to the point already mentioned by the hon. members for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) and Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), a point that has frequently been raised in the House and in committee by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I refer to widows of public servants, or others that come under this bill, who married a public servant or pensioner after he had retired. Back in the old days when retirement was much later there may have been something to this prohibition, but it does not seem sensible today that a woman who can be the widow of a man after a marriage of 20 or 25 years—there are such cases—gets no pension because she married him after he left the public service, or the RCMP or armed forces. We think that is out of date and that this should be corrected.

I may tell the House that one of the delegations which appeared before us was the Federal Superannuates National Association, represented by Mr. Fred Whitehouse of Victoria, who is its national secretary treasurer. He told us in plain language in the committee that he and those who were with him at an interview with the President of the Treasury Board were quite hopeful that there was going to be an amendment on this score.

I had other reasons for thinking it was going to happen and that we were going to get an amendment to provide for pensions to widows in such cases with some reasonable restriction. I do not ask that, if such a marriage lasted only six months or a year; a lot depends on the ages of the respective spouses, but certainly, and I am sure my friends who are on the committee will confirm this, the view of Mr. Whitehouse was specifically, from his talk with the President of the Treasury Board, that there would be an amendment on this score. Perhaps others have had the same letter that I had from Mr. Whitehouse asking how we made out on that. Unfortunately I have had to write him a disappointing letter. That was only one of so many disappointing letters I have had to write during my years of experience here, to the effect that the government had said no.

An hon. Member: You belong to the wrong party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sure that my friend and members of his party have to write many letters of the same sort.

In any event, it was unfair that Mr. Whitehouse was treated in this way, as well as the committee, by being given the impression that something was going to happen and then it not happening.

I get the impression that whatever items there may have been along this line, the restraint program got in their way. It got in the way of the prisoner of war legislation we hoped to get from the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), and it has got in the way of those provisions which we asked for in the joint committee on this bill. I still think it is most unfair. As I say, there are instances in which the first marriage lasted only a few years, but where the second marriage lasted many years, during which the second wife raised the children or carried out responsibilities that were greater than those of the first marriage, yet no pension is allowed under that rule. I think this bill is unacceptable in that it does not provide for a change in that respect.

There are those three things regarding wives, widows, or women that we think should have been acted on but were not, and to us this makes it an unacceptable piece of legislation to amend superannuation acts that we are being asked to push through, particularly without touching on these matters.

One of the reasons I say it is so unsatisfactory is that these things take a long time in coming. We will not get another such bill six months or a year from now. It will be way down the road, and the next time there will be some other anomalies that have to be straightened out, so we will not get action on these points then.

Another issue we raised in the committee, and again got the answer that it was too costly, could not be done and was not in the Governor General's recommendation, is the base that is used for calculating pensions under the Public Service Superannuation Act, or the pensions of other superannuation acts, namely, that the pension is calculated on the basis of 2 per cent per year of service times the average salary in the six best years.

Back in the so-called normal times, if ever there were normal times, the last six years of a public servant's employment could be at a level of salary that did not change greatly, but in the past six years we have had public servants whose salaries have doubled in that period. So when you ask these public servants to take a pension based on 30 or 35 years; in other words, 60 per cent or 70 per cent of their six best years, you are asking them to take a considerable cut from what they have been receiving recently because of the escalation in salaries in the last six years.

We felt, therefore, that the time had come to cut down that six-year period. Some of us in the committee proposed it be cut to four years or three years or two years, or even to one year; various shorter periods. We proposed that, but we could not even get the matter discussed.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board took the proper position for him to take as a parliamentary secretary, namely, it was not in the act and it would cost so much that it could not be done. That is why the minister should have been there. I think there will be many public servants, members of the armed forces, the RCMP and others who will find it very disappointing that this parliament has again dealt with a bill to amend superannuation acts but has not dealt with this issue.

I move on, Sir, to the issue of the time at which pensions can escalate. We are talking now of an annual escalation which, for example, in January, 1976, will be 11.3 per cent based on the rise in the cost of living over one 12-month period as against another. The fact is that this is attainable only for retired persons who are 60 years of age or over.

That is all right for the public servant whose age for normal retirement is that or older, but we have employees of the RCMP and the Canadian Armed Forces who are not permitted to work until age 60. They work on contracts under which they are required at age 48 or 50—in there somewhere—to go out on pension, and there is no escalation to deal with the increase in the cost of living until they reach age 60.

Some of us have been arguing for a long time that this should be changed. I have raised it with the President of the Treasury Board, with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), and with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), each of whom has referred it to the other. It is still an issue that ought to be dealt with but is not dealt with in this bill.

Again we had before us at the joint committee a delegation of the Canadian Armed Forces Long-Service Pensioners Association. The representatives presented their case and certainly left with the same impression that Mr. Whitehouse left with concerning the other issue, namely, that something was going to be done. I certainly got the impression that something was going to be done. It might not be an escalation available at the point of retirement at 48 or 50 years of age, but it might be at age 55 or somewhere in there. However, when the parliamentary secretary came back from such discussions as he had, there was no change.

There is another issue we have been kicking around in this House ever since 1969, ever since escalation came in; once again it is not there. I was extremely disappointed. I have mentioned the fact that we had these two delegations before us, the Federal Superannuates National Association and the Canadian Forces Long-Service Pensioners Association.

We also received a letter from the dominion secretary of the Royal Canadian Legion pressing the three points about which I have been speaking. The first is the one I just mentioned, namely, that escalation should start the first year after retirement; the second, that pensions payable to widows ought to be higher than the present 50 per cent; and third, that the denial of a pension to a widow if she married a serviceman or employee after he went on pension is most unfair.

What is the point of this committee work? Do we just go there and get the message from on high that this is the bill and nothing is to be changed except what the government wants to change? We have committees, and we have delegations appearing before the committees and the cases are made. Members go along with them. I could not even get a motion passed that the steering committee meet to consider some way to bring our recommendations back to the House. It was argued that we could not do it, that all we could do was to report the bill. But I pleaded that at least we meet to try to find some ways to let the House know of the various things that we in the committee wanted to do. We could not even get a motion like that passed.

I could add other things. I will mention just one of them quickly in passing, the problem that faces public servants who were in the armed forces and who want to buy back for pension purposes their service in the armed forces. That is available to them, but in most cases it is so costly that it might as well not be there.

So here is a bill that fails on many points to meet the needs of persons who are working for the public service or persons who are on pension, and I think it is a most disappointing business. In effect it is shabby treatment for us to be told that we have to rush this bill through because of one or two elements of time urgency, but we cannot do such things as to meet the problems of widows and meet the need of retired service persons and retired Royal Canadian Mounted Police for escalation of their pensions in accordance with the cost of living.

On top of all the things that are in the bill that are wrong, and on top of the things that are not in the bill that should be there, there are things that some of us, especially in my party, do not like. This is a bill of 106 clauses, which means there are a lot of things in it—in fact not only is the bill so long but the title is so long that Your Honour finds it difficult to read every time you put the motion—but tucked in there, as has happened on a number of occasions, is a substantial improvement in the pensions of members of parliament. I say that on other occasions this has happened, this tucking our pensions into an omnibus bill, and I regret it very much. Frequently we have been in the spot where we were presented with a bill that was good but which contained something that we did not like, and we were faced with the problem of whether we should vote for the bill because of some good things in it or whether we should vote against the bill because we did not like the wrong things that were in it.

We think that in these times of restraint, after we have had a terrific increase in our indemnities and in our tax-free allowances, to be making provision now for an increase in our pensions down the road of 33⅓ per cent is a little too much. I know the plausible argument that all this bill is doing is relating our pensions to our present pay scale of $24,000 instead of the $18,000 that is specified in the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. But one has to couple with that the fact that there is already in our pension plan a formula that is tremendously beneficial which provides for 3½ per cent per year for the first ten years, 3 per cent per year for the next ten years, and 2 per cent for the next five years, in other words, in 25 years, 75 per cent of our six best years average. In the public service it is only 2 per cent per year. It takes 35 years to reach 70 per cent; a public servant can never reach 75 per cent. As a formula it is far too generous and I suggest we are going too far to add to the generous formula by relating that formula to a higher salary so that we will get higher pensions down the road.

May I point out that the last time we dealt with the members of parliament pension bill, we put a figure in there. The $18,000 was the maximum salary to which our pensions could be related. But now we are taking out that figure and we are saying that our pension is related to whatever our salary is. So if the freeze for 1976 comes to an end, and in 1977 and 1978 our pay starts going up again, our potential pensions will keep on going up.

I submit that at this time when restraint is the motto, when we are supposed to be giving some leadership, we should not be doing this, and in my party we are opposed to taking this step and we shall be saying so by our vote on this bill.

An hon. Member: But you will take the money.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am not planning to take any pension money. I am not planning to retire. I am sure that will please the hon. member.

This morning during the question period I refrained from pressing a point of order of which I had given notice. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was surprised that I asked only for a freeze on the total amount of members of parliament pay, that I had not asked for a roll back. He knows very well that last December, January, February, March and April I did my best to prevent that increase from coming into effect, and if he is not aware of it let him ask his friend, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), who is aware of where I stood on it. I say to him now that I think that that act of members of parliament in raising their own salaries to the extent that this was done has had a tremendous effect on the inflationary psychology in this country. I am not arguing that it is the only element, but I am arguing that part of the problem the government is having to cope with today is created because of that, and because of the tremendously higher salaries that were provided for public servants.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in the middle of his speech. He still has some time left. However, we face a technical problem in that earlier this day the House made an order that later this day it would revert to motions for the purpose of dealing with the motion standing in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). At that time it was not simply the consent of the House that later in the day consent would be sought to revert to motions, but it was an actual order that we would revert to motions later this day. Technically later this day stops in two minutes. Therefore, if we are to obey our own order we must either interrupt the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and revert to motions, or fail to see the clock. I did not want to be in the position to do either one, but I did want to say to hon. members that either we revert to motions at this time or we understand that, in failing to see the clock in a moment or two, we are not in any way prejudicing the previous order. Is that understood and agreed?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think there is general understanding that we keep our eyes away from the clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Stop the clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad you heard those of us who said "stop the clock" and that you did not hear my friend who said "stop Stanley".

An hon. Member: You made your point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall only be a few minutes longer. I am answering the point the Prime Minister made this morning. I think that what we did with respect to indemnities, what has been done with respect to top civil service salaries, $50,000 and $60,000 salaries and big pensions for them, has all contributed to the inflationary psychology which has created or aggravated the problem which we have today. I do not think we should add to it by the action of improving our pensions further at this time. Therefore, because we do not like what is being done with respect to members' pensions, because we want to protest against that as strongly as we can, because we do not like the failure of the bill that is now before us to deal with the issues that a number of us have raised, because we feel this whole operation has been a shabby one and is very disappointing, we shall vote against the third reading of this bill.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I want to say just a word, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) has already expressed the disappointment of my party that a good many things were not dealt with in this bill. However, let me just say a word about the retirement features, without provoking a debate, I hope, at this stage.

● (1700)

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) opposes the escalation figure, and I cannot agree with him in this respect. For one thing, the continued escalation based upon actual salaries and emoluments is realistic. I think a freezing at $18,000 per year is not right. I think, too, that if this freezing at $18,000 were to continue, we would very soon get into an anomalous situation parallel to the situation of the public servants, with whom the bill has dealt in part. We would very quickly get into a situation where it would become financially disadvantageous for a member of parliament to continue to serve as a member of parliament, rather than to retire and receive the benefit of the cost of living escalation which is built into the retirement pension. I think this is indisputable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: There may very well be faults in the pension which exists for members of parliament. It may be too generous in a number of respects, but I suggest if it is too generous this relates to the period after which one could qualify or the age at which one can qualify, and if there is going to be a re-examination of the pension those are two areas which should be examined rather than trying to freeze the rate of emolument upon which the pension is calculated for those, perhaps, of long service.

I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that two wrongs do not make a right. I suggest to him that he is tackling reform of members' pensions at the wrong time. The escalation of the salary range upon which the pension is calculated is right. But I would be all in favour of another look at the period of qualification and the age of qualification because it seems to me that if there are faults in our pension system—and there may be—it is in those areas. I suggest that if the House were to adopt the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre today, we would quickly get into, among other things, injustices and anomalies with regard to members of parliament who retire, and we are going to build into our parliamentary retirement system an inducement and an encouragement for members of parliament to retire rather than serve their country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Before calling in the members, which I am required to do by the Standing Orders, I again want to reiterate that we do have a matter of business to deal with for which there is some compulsion, and perhaps it might be more orderly first to deal with the adjournment motion which is here now and then call in the members for the recorded division on the measure before us.

I am perfectly prepared to call in the members and proceed with the recorded division first, and then deal with the other matter. However, we are extending somewhat beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment doing it that way. I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, could we not now have an understanding or a House order that the hours of sitting today be extended until we have concluded the motion which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) will present and until we have made the trip to the other place? It seems to me that the time to take this vote is now. Then, after hon. members are here, we can have the other motion.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am agreeable to that. There is, however, one difficulty, and that is while we have every reason to believe that the Senate will deal expeditiously with the bills which have been approved by the House today, it is possible that that will not be the case. In that case, perhaps after we have reached our decision on the adjournment motion, it might be more appropriate for me to move that we re-assemble for Royal Assent at the call of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: That, however, has to do with the terms of the adjournment motion. The only question now is whether we take the recorded vote and then deal with the terms of the adjournment motion, or do it the other way around.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: May I take it that the consensus of the House is to deal with the adjournment motion first?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when I shouted "now", I meant that we should take the vote now and then deal with the adjournment motion.

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Could we have a five-minute bell only?

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That, when the House adjourns after Bill C-75, an act to increase the rate of return on government annuity contracts, to increase their flexibility and to discontinue future sales thereof, has received the Royal Assent, it shall stand adjourned until Monday, January 26, 1976, provided always that, if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultations with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Mr. Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker or the Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in his stead for the purposes of this order.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: It should be noted that, pursuant to the terms of the motion, we must deal with the adjournment of the House for this day. Perhaps honourable members might be prepared to agree that, since it is possible that Royal Assent may occur later this day, or, if not, because of unexpected circumstances, on Monday or Tuesday, the sitting of the House shall now be suspended until the call of the bells, which shall call the House for the specific purpose only of receiving Royal Assent and that, thereafter, the adjournment motion, the terms of which have been pronounced and passed by the House, will be operative. Is that understood and agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore, the sitting of the House stands suspended until the call of the bells.

May I now deal with the second most important matter. It will be my pleasure to receive honourable members, staff, and members of the press gallery for a small libation, to send them on their way with the proper Christmas spirit, which has never been absent from this Chamber for very long.

At 5.28 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

The House resumed at 8.18 p.m.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF RESTRICTIONS ON NEWS MEDIA IN REPORTING MILLHAVEN INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the natural enthusiasm which members are expressing in meeting here for the first time, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 with regard to a matter of urgent and pressing importance.

My motion deals with the terms and conditions being imposed on the news media by Miss Inger Hansen in respect of their reporting of the inquiry which Miss Hansen is currently holding into an incident last November at the Millhaven penitentiary and the fact that this House should demand an explanation of what appears on the surface to be a very dangerous practice.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean):

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs inquire into the restrictions placed on the news media by Miss Inger Hansen in regard to the inquiry into certain events at Millhaven penitentiary and report to the House whether this interference with the right of the news media to report freely and fully upon a public inquiry is justified in the circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: A motion can only be presented pursuant to Standing Order 43 with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT RUSSIA ADHERE TO PROVISIONS OF HELSINKI AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise pursuant to provisions of Standing Order 43. During International Women's Year a number of women's associations drew the attention of Canadians and of people elsewhere in the world to the existence of certain women political prisoners in the U.S.S.R. These women have been sentenced under certain articles of the Ukranian Criminal Code which clearly conflict with the constitution of the U.S.S.R. and the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Canadian government urge the government of the Soviet Union to adhere to the human rights provisions spelled out in the Helsinki agreement and that Canada take the initiative in raising this question at the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker: The motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF CLOSURE OF BASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion relates to a special secret study being made in reference to the closure of certain military armed services bases, in particular Calgary, where land, armoured, infantry and services forces includes 2,300 officers and men and 480 civilians.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre):

That before any Canadian base is closed, particularly Calgary, the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so as the facts and reasons for the review are all disclosed openly in the committee so the public is made aware of the real reasons for such closures and for the purpose of avoiding any discrimination against any part of the country.

Mr. Speaker: The motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED STUDY OF POSSIBILITY OF REDUCING INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request unanimous consent of the House to present an important and urgent motion.

Because the ravages of inflation constantly reduce the real purchasing power of Canadians, because the low-wage earners, the poor, the underprivileged are forced to borrow money at high interest rates to solve their problems and make ends meet, and also because interests rates are really too high in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House study, at the very first opportunity, the possibility of lowering interest rates in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion cannot be put without unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

REQUEST FOR STATIONING OF AIR-SEA RESCUE AIRCRAFT IN EASTERN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to present before the House a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that there is no air-sea rescue unit in Newfoundland, the last unit having been removed to Nova Scotia in 1964, and in light of the most recent tragedy in which two fishermen were lost on the east coast of Newfoundland, underlining the need for such an air-sea rescue unit in our province, and because of the critical time involved in having rescue operations carried out from Nova Scotia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That the Minister of National Defence be directed to have air-sea rescue aircraft stationed in eastern Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker: The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PREVENTION OF INCREASE IN MEMBERS' TAX-FREE ALLOWANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43. The urgent and pressing necessity is the fact that it is desirable to clear up a point of uncertainty. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman):

That this House calls on the government to indicate forthwith its readiness to move or accept an amendment to Bill C-81 to prevent any increase at this time in the tax-free allowances as well as the salaries of Members of Parliament, Senators and cabinet ministers.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF CANADIAN POSITION ON EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION OVER MARINE RESOURCES TO 200 MILES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a motion under Standing Order 43. A task force report of the trilateral commission on ocean management warns of the danger of nations deciding not to wait for the end of the global treaty-making process and resorting instead to arrangements amongst themselves, thereby destroying the intent of the conference.

● (1410)

Since Canada has been negotiating and signing agreements with several nations on fisheries management, contrary to the advice of the commission, and since continuing pessimism is being expressed by an increasing number of countries as to the achievement of an international agreement on a 200-mile economic zone, many of those countries taking unilateral action, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs make a statement on motions forthwith expressing Canada's position at the Law of the Sea conference in March, particularly to relate its plan if, indeed, as is obvious to the government itself, no international agreement will be reached.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED DELAY IN FREEZE ON ISSUANCE OF LICENCES TO LOBSTER FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the growing controversy concerning the equity and practicality of the temporary freeze on the issuance of new licences for lobster fishermen and vessels, which has resulted in telegrams of protest from at least one cabinet minister from Nova Scotia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the Minister of State for Fisheries refrain from any further action in this respect until this House can be assured that there has been more meaningful input and consultation from those affected in the fishing industry than is presently the case, at least in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION BY ANTI-INFLATION BOARD OF PROPOSED INCREASE IN AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE PREMIUMS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43 which concerns the problem of inflation in British Columbia. In view of the recent announcement of the government of British Columbia that it intends to increase automobile insurance premiums in the province by as much as 100 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Leggatt: I wish the Socreds on my right would calm down—in view of the increasing unease throughout the country due to the government's inability to get signed agreements from provincial governments on their anti-inflation guidelines and in view of the interference in teacher bargaining, a provincial matter, in Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the Anti-Inflation Board immediately investigate the premium increase in British Columbia in terms of its consistency with the federal government guidelines, and that the federal government immediately make representations to the government of British Columbia to roll back these unnecessary and exorbitant increases until they line up with the government's guidelines.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion cannot be presented without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED CALLING OF ELECTION TO PERMIT DECISION ON ECONOMIC POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of recent statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in regard to the new society replacing the free market system on which the foundation of this very institution rests. As the Prime Minister, who today is visiting the Republic of Cuba and possibly brushing up on the Communist system, stated on several occasions that the traditional free market system in this country is not working as it should and that he intends, as Prime Minister, to alter it with yet further government intervention, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to advise forthwith His Excellency the Governor General to dissolve this House of Commons for the purpose of allowing the electorate of this nation to decide its basic economic and moral future.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such motion cannot be presented without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—NUMBER OF PROVINCES SIGNING AGREEMENTS—POSSIBLE RECONVENING OF MINISTERIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister? As the Prime Minister is busy looking for the other new society and the Minister of Finance is absent—I do not know where he is today—I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister questions about the real and rather messy world of inflation.

Mr. Nystrom: That's the old society.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House how many provinces have now signed agreements for the administration of the controls program?

Mr. Andre: Fourteen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, so far, one agreement has been signed—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Drury: —namely, with the province of Ontario. Authorization of the Governor in Council is being sought to add to that number, particularly in relation to the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that only one province has signed and there is mention of three or possibly four more which may be prepared to sign, is the government prepared to reconvene the conference of first ministers, as the Prime Minister indicated might be done, in order to assure something like prompt nation-wide and uniform action?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be necessary to reconvene the meeting of first ministers. Progress is being made in signing these agreements. We do not have any hostility from the provinces. We anticipate co-operation from them all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE BUDGET

POSSIBLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): If this is what the government considers to be progress, there is no need to wonder why they need a three year program to perhaps even get started. In view of the statement by the Economic Council of Canada that measures contained in the last budget are expected to result in a faster rate of price increase and a slower rate of growth, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House when we may expect a budget so that members on both sides of this House can come to grips with the realities and problems of today rather than just being left with the Prime Minister's future "schlock"?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity of discussing with the House leaders the possibility that the annual review of the Economic Council of Canada, to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred, might be referred to either a standing committee of this House or a joint committee for discussion. I agree with him that some of the comments are worthy of a good deal more attention than they have received.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT IN VIEW OF UNITED STATES STUDY—POSSIBILITY OF MEETING WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Since one of the purposes of the anti-inflation program is to ensure our competitive position in world trade, when will the Acting Prime Minister be making a statement on the auto pact in view of the study recently completed by the United States International Trade Commission on this subject?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member, I have seen the press reports. The study itself has not yet been released. Therefore, we are unable to comment upon its contents.

Mr. Kempling: In view of the fact that our trade deficit in automotive trade under the auto pact will be in excess of $1 billion this fiscal year and our automotive parts trade deficit will be more than $2 billion, will the Acting Prime Minister advise when the study group on the auto pact within the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be meeting with their counterparts in the United States?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that would be an appropriate vehicle for such discussions. I think the discussion should take place between the two governments at the ministerial or secretarial level. May I point out to the hon. member that the report that appeared in the paper does criticize the pact as being very advantageous to Canada.

Mr. Kempling: Can the Acting Prime Minister advise whether the American government has requested a joint meeting to study the auto pact? If not, will the Canadian government initiate a meeting on this trade agreement, bearing in mind that President Ford agreed to a joint trade study on December 4?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have not had any request recently from the United States government for such a meeting. We ourselves have suggested this and would welcome one.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE APPLICATION OF FEDERAL POLLUTION CONTROL STANDARDS TO SYNCRUDE PROJECT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the new Minister of the Environment. I congratulate him on his appointment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: That is the good part of the story. In his touching television address to the people of Canada on Monday, the Prime Minister referred to the fact that a lot of buck-passing had taken place on the issue of pollution control. Is the new Minister of the Environment going to put an end to his own government's buck-passing on pollution control in the Syncrude project and insist that the federal government's pollution control standards be applied to the Syncrude project as a condition for further federal participation in it?

● (1420)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do intend to fight pollution everywhere and even here, within the House.

I also wish to thank the hon. member for his congratulations, as well as all hon. members of the opposition and government members who congratulated me also. It is extremely nice of them. However, I do know that those niceties will be followed by less pleasant things and that is to be expected. Such are the rules of the game.

As for the very specific questions which we referred to, I think that within a few days, if I may be granted the time to go over the documents which were handed to me, I shall be able to inform the House on the question which is now being raised.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: I will remain optimistic for a few days, anyway, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware, and, if not, would he check into the matter and confirm the point, that because of the refusal of the federal government to apply its own pollution control standards, in particular to the use of the latest pollution abatement equipment, some 280 long tons of sulphur will be poured each day into the atmosphere, affecting the entire Athabasca River system and persisting as far away as Saskatchewan? I am referring to the Syncrude project.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think the first suggestion I made was the right one. I will check into that matter and give an answer, maybe tomorrow.

REQUEST FOR LIST OF AREAS IN WHICH RADIO-ACTIVE WASTE DEPOSITED—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF DANGERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I should like to ask the minister a further question arising from the disclosure of a potentially serious radio-active waste problem in the Port Hope region. Would he provide the House with a list of other areas in Canada where such wastes are deposited and inform the House whether, following the discovery at Port Hope, his own department has investigated the potential danger at these other sites?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I had a meeting this morning with the deputy minister of the department and this is one point he raised, that we should take a very serious look at what is going on in Port Hope as far as nuclear waste is concerned. I hope I shall soon be in a position to give a full report on all the points to which the hon. member has referred.

PORT HOPE—ACTION TO RELIEVE CONCERN OF CITIZENS ABOUT RADON GAS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it relates to the Port Hope situation.

An hon. Member: Here he is, fresh from the Ontario Liberal meeting!

Mr. Lawrence: It sounded more like a Tory meeting after what they were saying about you guys.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Since the problem in Port Hope relates to a federal government agency I should like to ask the minister what steps the government is taking, other than the setting up of an information office, to relieve the concern felt by the citizens of Port Hope with regard not only to the radon gas but to health hazards caused by radio-activity generally? Would the minister tell us, also, what the government is doing to relieve their concern about the generally poor image of their town in the eyes of the rest of the country?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We have tried to move with the utmost despatch and urgency and to deal with this question in a thorough way. We have been co-operating with the Ontario department of health and I think the degree of co-operation between the two governments has been outstanding. I think we have been able to pursue the investigation in a thorough way. We have not sought to deal with the question through press releases, but on an individual basis through those particular properties which have been identified. In addition to the storefront office the hon. member has mentioned, we have set up a mobile service for the purpose of monitoring the various places where there is perhaps some suspicion of the presence of radio-active waste.

PORT HOPE—RESPONSIBILITY FOR CASE OF SOIL REMOVAL—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING A MEDICAL CLINIC IN AREA

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Two questions specifically, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell me whether the government is undertaking to underwrite the costs pertaining to soil and fill removal, including the cost of the new ventilation system in that separate school in Port Hope? Secondly, has the government any plans to set up any type of medical clinic so that anyone in the area who feels they may have been affected by this material can go and get a clean bill of health?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as to the first point about underwriting the cost, Eldorado itself has been active in making alterations to certain properties. It is doing so without prejudice as to where the ultimate responsibility for these costs lie; the important point is to get on with the job rather than to argue about who should pay for it at this time.

As to the second point, the question of a clinic, I think that is a constructive suggestion, and one that I personally would like to discuss with the minister of health in the Ontario government, where I think perhaps the major facilities are available.

REQUEST TO CONSIDER REOPENING OF MONT-JOLI OFFICE

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Considering the many telegrams I received lately from citizens of Mont-Joli and considering also that they are strongly opposed to the closing of the customs office in Mont-Joli, could the minister tell the House whether he has any intention of reopening that office?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I also received many telegrams and the hon. member for Matane made representations to me on that subject. I therefore had to examine the telegrams and my decision is now made: No, Mont-Joli will be closed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF AID TO CUBA IN VIEW OF INVOLVEMENT IN ANGOLAN WAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Bearing in mind Canada's extensive aid to Cuba in the form of CIDA grants and EDC financing of well over $100 million, would the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether he anticipates that the Prime Minister, while in Cuba, will protest that country's involvement in the unfortunate Angolan war, and will he indicate while in Cuba that there will be a withdrawal of future aid if Cuba persists in becoming involved in wars in foreign countries?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister's visit to Cuba gives the leader of the government of Canada an opportunity to express personally to the Prime Minister of Cuba Canada's policy, which is opposed to foreign intervention by anyone in Angola, including that country. I think there will be an opportunity at this time, an opportunity that some people on the hon. member's side would deny the Prime Minister, of having a face to face encounter.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I will direct to the Acting Prime Minister. As only last week the Export Development Corporation announced that they had approved $285 million of new funds for certain countries, including Cuba, and as the specific agreements are still being negotiated, would the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether the government is considering instructing the EDC management that they should extend no such financing to Cuba so long as they participate with troops in a foreign war in which they have no involvement?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that where there are differences of view between peoples and governments normal commercial and aid relations should not be continued.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Stevens: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Again in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will direct my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of CIDA not only having extended millions of dollars in aid to Cuba but even having an outstanding $10 million line of credit available to that country at 3 per cent interest, would the Acting Prime Minister state whether the government is considering withdrawing this line of credit so long as Cuba persists in continuing its present international involvement?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. The attitude of the Canadian government on this question is very clear. There are many countries in the world with whose policies we do not agree. We do not think it is in the interests of world peace, world development, the improvement of the lot of poor people throughout the world, when we do have these differences, to withdraw either our commercial relations or our aid.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—GOVERNMENT INCENTIVES TO COMPANIES TO INCREASE RESERVES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the rather dismal picture which the minister painted for the businessmen of the United States who gathered at Pittsburgh last week regarding Canada's dwindling oil and gas reserves, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House just what additional development incentives the government is prepared to offer to the petroleum industry to try to greatly increase these vitally needed reserves?

● (1430)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased right now to make an extensive answer to that question by reciting the many incentives we have provided to the industry. Let me just make one or two points. Very recently we increased the price of natural gas and assured that the incremental price for exports would go to the industry. We changed the income tax regulations about a year ago, and these changes become effective on January 1 of this year regarding resource allowances. I think these moves, particularly the increase in the price of gas which has occurred, and which may occur this year, will provide a very substantial cash flow for the Canadian industry to be applied to the exploration and development of our northern resources. I trust, and I have told the industry I expect them to use that increased cash flow for exploration and development in Canada.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as it is the opinion of the oil and gas industry in Canada that what the government is at present doing is not nearly enough to induce sufficient new development to bring our gas and oil reserves up to the amount that will be required in the future, will this minister and the government take another look at his program with the realization that the important people in the oil and gas industry are not going to react in any way close to the way the government hopes?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman has been following recent events he will have seen the change that had taken place in respect of drilling rig movement and activity in Canada. I think clearly the tide is coming in now in respect of drilling activity in Canada. I might also say that I hope to be introducing into the House of Commons in the very near future a new set of oil and gas regulations which I think will remove some of the uncertainties that exist in respect of exploration and development in the north.

PENITENTIARIES

MILLHAVEN—RESTRICTIONS ON REPORTING PROCEEDINGS OF INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General relating to the inquiry now being held into an incident at the Millhaven penitentiary last November. Is the minister aware of the very severe restrictions being placed by Miss Inger Hansen on the reporting of the proceedings of the inquiry and the subsequent report by Miss Hansen? Is he satisfied that these limitations should be placed on this inquiry, and under what authority is Miss Hansen acting in so inhibiting this inquiry that ought to be held in public?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, Miss Hansen is operating under the Inquiries Act. Generally, these inquiries into penitentiary disturbances are held in camera. I think this is one of the first occasions on which the press in being permitted to attend. In admitting the press, she placed a condition on them that they must not reveal the names of the witnesses because that would jeopardize the safety of both the staff and the inmates of the penitentiary if this information were revealed.

STRIKE OF PULP AND PAPER WORKERS—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID IN SETTLING

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when the Anti-Inflation Board made a ruling in respect of the pulp and paper strike it intruded into the management-labour negotiations in Ontario. Will the Minister of Labour now discuss with the reluctant minister of labour for Ontario a method of bringing both the employers and representatives of the CPW back to the bargaining table in order that a reasonable settlement can be arrived at and the desperate financial situation facing the pulp and paper, one industry, communities of northern Ontario be resolved?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that the latest information I have from both direct and indirect sources is that some of the parties involved have indicated they are back at the bargaining table this week.

AIR TRANSPORT

LAKER AIRWAYS—JUSTIFICATION FOR SUSPENSION IN VIEW OF WITHDRAWAL OF REGULATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Transport advise the House of the rationale of the Air Transport Committee of the CRTC in the matter of Laker Airways being suspended for 14 days for an offence committed some two or three years ago on the basis of information supplied and computed by a Canadian company transmitted through Laker Airways, and does he think the same type of treatment should apply to any Canadian air carrier caught in the same circumstances abroad?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt at all that the same kind of treatment would apply to any Canadian carrier caught in circumstances like that in Canada because the concern of the Air Transport Committee was very much with the falseness of the information supplied rather than with the specific regulation in respect of which the information was sought. Fisrtly, the party in question had to take responsibility for supplying of the information, and accordingly the CTC suspended permission to take on passengers for a period of one month. I reviewed the exact sentence and exercised a prerogative, cutting that period down to two weeks.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in arriving at that decision, did the minister take into account the rather nonsensical basis of the regulation, since the matter has now been withdrawn and the regulation does not provide any benefit to the Canadian people or the air industry?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has missed the point of my remark which related to the very serious nature of the action on the part of Laker Airways in its failure to supply correct information, and supplying, through the responsibility it had, false information to the Air Transport Committee, a matter which is very serious indeed to the whole regulation of activities whether in the air or elsewhere.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES RATHER THAN SOCIAL SECURITY MEASURES

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister.

In the present fight against inflation, can the minister assure the House and the Canadian people that the government will concentrate its effort on cutting expenses at the administrative level, for instance within the Crown or other corporations which are under its authority, like the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation, rather than in its social programs?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is quite aware of the priorities of the government. We have said we are not going to put the burden of controlling inflation on the backs of the poor or the under-privileged of this country. He knows that is our position, that we are opposed to this. We will also try to do everything we can about waste wherever this can be done, whether it is in government or in Crown corporations. I do not think, however, that we should in any way jeopardize the commercial prospects of our Crown corporations.

Mr. Wagner: More precisely, Mr. Speaker, will the government undertake not to fight inflation on the backs of the elderly people and those with young families in Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and the best evidence of that is the very large increases in family allowances that were made recently by this government without, I might say, the measure of support we should have had from the other side.

TORONTO—LACK OF SERVICE AT AEROQUAY RESTAURANT

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that on December 31 passengers were refused service at the Aeroquay Restaurant at Toronto at 7 p.m. because the staff was decorating the empty restaurant for a New Year's eve party to be held later in the evening, will the Minister of Transport consider making the airport restaurant concessions conditional upon providing service to the travelling public?

Mr. James A. As it is now over six months since we have amended the Judges Act, which among other things set up the appeal court in the province of Newfoundland, I would ask the minister when we can expect appointments to that appeal court to be completed since the whole system of justice is being held up in Newfoundland pending these ministerial appointments?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, one appointment has been made since I have been the Minister of Justice which has completed the appointments to the trial division of the courts in Newfoundland. I have had on my desk, under active consideration, an appointment to the court of appeal and I would hope to make an appointment soon.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED DELETION OF PROVISION CONCERNING EPILEPSY—DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister considering bringing in a bill immediately for the purpose of deleting Section 5(a)(iv) of the Immigration Act, which at present enforces a mediaeval attitude toward persons afflicted with epilepsy?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions I have indicated my own distaste for the wording of the act as currently administered, and I am sure that this is shared by all members of the House. I have also indicated that the Immigration Act is in the process of significant and large revision. In the meantime we are continuing to issue minister's permits to people with epilepsy. I think that section of the act will be removed when the Immigration Act is revised, hopefully during this year.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. Has the minister asked the Government House Leader for a priority position for his major bill amending the Immigration Act? At present it is charitable to refer to its progress as glacier-like. When does the minister expect it to be passed into law? What is his target date?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, there is a contradiction in the hon. member's comment and others in which it has been said that we were trying to rush this and proceed too quickly. I think we are finding a happy balance; we have made a very considerable effort to get the views of Canadians during this past year. We did commit ourselves not to proceed with the development of policy until the report of the joint committee of the House and Senate was tabled. That was tabled in November. We are proceeding now with despatch, but I do not think we will be placing the bill before the House of Commons within the next short time. Indeed, it is a very significant change we are looking at now and I would anticipate passage of the bill during this year.

SUGGESTED EARLY DELETION OF PROVISION CONCERNING EPILEPSY

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. In view of the minister's stated opinion that a new Immigration Act will be brought forward this year, obviously time is needed for the passage of that bill, and in view of the former representations made by myself and other members of this House that speedy passage be given to the deletion of section 5 concerning the restrictions relative to epilepsy, would the minister give us an undertaking that in this session he will bring in an amendment so that this part of the bill could be passed and people given landed immigrant status rather than the weak position in which they find themselves under minister's permits.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am very sympathetic to the suggestion. I would point out, however, that there are many anachronisms in the Act of which we are all aware. This one, of course, has had some very understandable attention by the country because of recent events. We are looking into specific cases with a full understanding of the wording of the outmoded Act and are handling them now on minister's permits. I cannot honestly feel people are being inhibited, particularly with the assurance of myself and the government that that section will be deleted. I have to say there are many other inequities in this Act which I believe deserve equal attention. I would really prefer to wrap it all up in the broader amendments which the hon. member and others are helping me develop.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED QUESTIONING OF FOUR CANADIANS BY RUSSIAN AGENTS IN CUBA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question and hopefully a short supplementary for the Acting Prime Minister. I should like to ask him why the Government of Canada made no protest in respect of the four Canadians who made a forced landing in Cuba where they were held in custody, allegedly by Russian KGB agents, on December 30. I should like to ask him if the Prime Minister is discussing this matter with Prime Minister Fidel Castro.

[Translation]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this matter was put before the government right after the pilot's return and a department officer immediately contacted him and asked him what difficulties and conditions he had to face.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, is it government policy to take no specific action at a time when Canadian citizens are held in a foreign country and questioned by Russian KGB agents? Also, would the policy be similar if Canadians were found in another country and were questioned by members of the Central Intelligence Agency.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REASON FOR CLOSING OF BASES—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF COMMITTEE STUDY BEFORE BASES CLOSED

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question concerning the phasing out and closing of certain armed forces bases, particularly in the city of Calgary, where 2,800 men are stationed and where 480 civilians are working. The replacement of these facilities would probably involve something in the order of $150 million to $250 million. Why is that being reviewed and what is the purpose of a closure or phase-out in that part of the country.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Well, Mr. Speaker, the rationalization of our infrastructure is proceeding, as I indicated several weeks ago in the House when I made the announcement of the other decisions concerning national defence, but there have been no specific decisions on bases and no base closures have been decided at this time, including Calgary.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, will the minister undertake to assure the House and the country that before any decisions are made concerning these armed forces bases, the matter will be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that the facts will be before the public and so that we may be sure there is not discrimination.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance.

FISHERIES

ALLEGATION SIGNING MULTILATERAL AGREEMENTS ON MARINE RESOURCE MANAGEMENT THREAT TO SUCCESS OF LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fisheries in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that a task force report to a trilateral commission, of which Canada is a participant, warns against multilateral arrangements by governments as a threat to the success of the conference, and in view of the fact that Canada has signed fisheries management negotiations with several countries contrary to the advice of the report, would the minister indicate whether or not this action is being taken because it now is obvious that international agreement will not be reached in New York? If not, what is the position Canada will be taking?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the advice the hon. member refers to, but certainly the example set by Canada that negotiated bilateral agreement should precede extension of jurisdiction is a very wise course. This is amply demonstrated by those countries which are now imitating us. Certainly nothing we are doing would pre-judge in any way the outcome of the New York meeting. We are getting ready for all eventualities.

Oral Questions

ARRANGEMENTS WITH FRANCE CONCERNING EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION OVER MARINE RESOURCES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that more nations are declaring unilateral action and it has come out of the colloquium that Sri Lanka and Kenya expressed a desire that enabling legislation be produced to declare unilateral action, would the minister indicate in the arrangements with the various countries concerning fishing agreements what is the position with regard to France, particularly concerning St. Pierre-Miquelon which can cause problems in respect of declaring a 200-mile limit.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, the wisdom of the Canadian government is shown by the fact that enabling legislation has existed since 1971. It is only a matter of an order in council and a 60-day delay for jurisdiction to be extended. So, that course is already covered. As for the relations with France, in the case of extension of jurisdiction there is already a treaty with France covering what our fisheries relations would be. The boundaries matter is obviously more complicated.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE MEASURES TO PREVENT INCREASE IN COST OF OIL USED BY ATLANTIC PROVINCES TO GENERATE ELECTRICITY

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the heads of the three provincially-owned generating systems in the Atlantic provinces and the energy advisor to the Prince Edward Island government all agreed at a meeting held last week that rising oil prices and the reduction or elimination of the federal oil import subsidy would likely result in a doubling of existing power rates by 1980 in the Atlantic provinces, I would like to ask the minister what initiative his department intends to take to stave off what can only be considered as a crisis with many side consequences for that region of Canada.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows we have taken considerable steps to phase in the price of oil and natural gas in Canada, particularly oil as far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned. We have cushioned the consumers of oil in the Atlantic provinces by compensation.

Another point I wish to make is that we have been very active in trying to assist the Atlantic provinces develop their own electric power generating capacity without relying on oil, and of course I refer to the Le Preau installation in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. Hogan: I listened intently to the minister's answer, but surely the minister realizes that if electricity from oil fired thermal stations, which cost about 18 mills per kilowatt hour now, is going to double by 1980, and that is based on a conservative projected oil cost of $12.19 per barrel for oil—

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hogan: —then a rethinking on the subsidy matter is now needed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO PREVENT POLLUTION FROM SUNKEN "IRVING WHALE"—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the new Minister of the Environment. I welcome the minister to this new position, and perhaps in light of the fact that earlier he served in the transport portfolio, he may be aware in more detail of the particular question I am about to ask. It is with respect to the continuing pollution danger of the Irving Whale, which was inspected not too long ago by one of the ships of the new minister's department. Comments have been made that that inspection was primarily a public relations effort and that there is continuing danger and some seepage from the Irving Whale. In view of the danger both to the marine ecology and to the tourist and fisheries industries of Prince Edward Island, I wonder whether the minister will make a statement indicating what final steps will be taken to prevent any massive danger or future deterioration of the hull of the Irving Whale.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the only thing I know about the Irving Whale is what I learned from the Ministry of Transport, that it was more dangerous to try to lift the Irving Whale than to leave her there. Perhaps there have been some developments since that time, and I would be happy to hear from either my department or the Department of Transport if this opinion has changed.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact that during the past year attempts have been made to examine, by use of a submersible, the actual condition of the Irving Whale and that there has been no statement or actual scientific material tabled with respect to the comparative dangers either of removing her or of taking other action to prevent her deterioration and pollution of the environment, could the minister indicate that there will be some full and frank disclosures of the several issues which are involved so that the people of Prince Edward Island may be relieved of the anxiety they have with respect to this problem?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): There have been some studies made on this, and there have been people travelling around the world trying to learn the expertise of other countries. The answer is the one I gave, that it is more dangerous to remove the ship than to leave her there. Perhaps I can check if there are any new developments, and I will answer more fully to the hon. member.

POST OFFICE

LOSS OF MAIL BAGS CONTAINING OLYMPIC LOTTERY STUBS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EFFORTS TO LOCATE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Can the minister tell the House whether the Post Office has yet located the five bags of mail, including one bag of registered mail, with 53 winning Olympic lottery stubs in it which went astray en route from Guelph to Montreal last September 29?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Not as yet, Mr. Speaker. In the meantime we are making sure nobody claims the winning tickets.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I wish to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister which relates to the musings of the Prime Minister about a more controlled society in the future.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether the Prime Minister's new society will be run by the same people the Post Office—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Pembina.

AGRICULTURE

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF PROGRAM FOR COW-CALF PRODUCERS

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the minister promised a program for cow-calf producers months ago, would the minister make a commitment to the House as to when he will be coming forward with a program for this distressed industry?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question before the House recessed at Christmas.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTED FEDERAL AID IN FINANCING

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, particularly as leader of the Quebec Liberal caucus.

Last weekend, an in camera meeting was held in Montreal during which 250 members of the general council of the Liberal party from Quebec unanimously adopted a resolution urging Mr. Bourassa to ask financial support for the Olympic Games. Considering that the Quebec premier is asking his federal colleagues to support his proposition, I wish to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he will take the opportunity of the first meeting of the Liberal caucus to urge his colleagues, ministers as well as members of parliament, to support the Quebec premier's proposition?

JURISDICTION TO DEAL WITH PROVINCIAL CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. I hope his answer will shed some light on the question of the jurisdiction of the Anti-Inflation Board over the provinces and their agencies. In particular I ask whether the AIB is expected, as was previously announced, to follow the general provisions of the Income Tax Act, and whether we can expect therefore that the Board will be authorized to deal with provincial Crown corporations in a way different from that of ordinary provincial agencies.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to be asking for a legal opinion. I should like at least to read the exact terms of the question.

POSSIBILITY OF NEW DAIRY POLICY BEFORE APRIL 8—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. Given the fact that dairy farmers are receiving less now than they were 18 months ago, which would suggest that they need more production, and given the fact that the minister is saying they are over producing, can we expect from the minister a dairy policy prior to April 8, a sane and sensible dairy policy which would give dairy farmers a reasonable return on their investment?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, they are not getting less for their production, as the hon. member says. They are getting the same amount of money I said I would give them last year. They are producing more than is economically feasible when there is no market. That is a waste of time and energy.

Mr. Ellis: Surely in a world which is short of food over production in any form of food is necessary.

Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act

POSSIBLE FREEDOM TO SELL SURPLUS DAIRY PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture to the dairy producers of Canada they should cut back production because of increasing surpluses of milk products, and in view of carrying costs of surplus products to the industry and the Canadian taxpayer, would the minister be prepared to give entrepreneurs of the condemned free enterprise system the go ahead and the co-operation required to promote the sale of the products surplus to the requirements of Canadians?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the total world supply of skim milk powder at the present time there is 1,600,000 tons of surplus skim milk powder. The free market is there for entrepreneurs. If they want to advertise all the products they have, they can do that. There is no control to stop them from doing that. If the hon. member wants to know, the entrepreneurs in the dairy industry are yelling just as loudly as the dairy farmers for me to stop imports from all over the world coming into Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: In view of the fact that orders for hundreds of thousands of pounds of dairy products are available throughout the world, would the minister state whether the government will be taking any action to facilitate the sale and movement of surplus food products, and if so, what?

Mr. Whelan: There is only a market for a certain amount of this product in the world. We have tried every way to put it into food aid, and when hon. members suggest that the starving world could consume this food, that is utter nonsense. If they want to investigate they will find out that the world distribution system cannot distribute it even if there was a need for it, and we cannot find that need at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: And the whole skim milk powder world is doing the same thing with the same products. They all have surplus, including the European Community, New Zealand, Australia, and several other countries as well.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

TABLING OF COMMISSION'S REPORT RESPECTING NOVA SCOTIA

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the government House leader is prepared at this time to indicate the nature of the business of the House for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there have been some of the usual discussions amongst House leaders and I think we are more or less agreed upon this program. For the present week, we should like to consider and dispose of the following motions: completion of Bill C-78, the Halifax Relief Commission; Bill C-41, western grain stabilization, which is at third reading; and Bill C-71, amendments to the Criminal Code: we would also like to complete second reading of Bill C-20, second reading amendments to the Citizenship Act. If we have any time, after disposing of those items we would take Bill S-10, Senate amendments to the Feeds Act.

For the following week, I should like to indicate what our intentions are because I know hon. members are concerned about more contentious pieces of legislation. I am not quite sure in what order, but we would call at least two bills, Bill C-58 and Bill C-81 relating to the escalation of MP's salaries. I have also indicated to the House leaders that if they wish to discuss the economic situation, or any related matters, we would be prepared to set aside a day or so for an allotted day, if that is the desire of the opposition.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on that latter point, we would wait until the corpus delicti returns. I should like to ask if the government House leader has confirmed that at the moment it is not the intention of the government, in the foreseeable future, to have a new session of parliament with a new throne speech debate, and the government intends to proceed according to the guidelines laid down in September, 1974, with regard to the program now on the order paper and other legislation which it might have in mind.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government has tentatively decided that it would probably be very difficult to find a place before the summer adjournment for a speech from the throne debate. Moreover, a number of items of the present session remain to be dealt with, and a number of others are fairly closely related. The government might be disposed to review this decision if we make very rapid progress with what remains on the order paper at the present time. However, the House leader for the official opposition has expressed our present intentions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this does not present an opportunity to discuss the matter, but I should like it to be clear that I have already indicated our objection to the government's plan to carry on this session indefinitely. We think that the time has come for a new throne speech, a new debate and a new testing of the confidence of the House. We hope that this session will not be continued longer than is necessary in order to deal with the items already on the order paper.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I express the hope that the day that is being suggested for discussion of economic matters might be a government day, and that the minister will not just stand and say, that the government is willing that we use one of our days. One other question, Mr. Speaker: when are we going to see the bill implementing the unanimous decision of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs regarding Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would forbear any comments on the other remarks of the hon. member, and would simply say the government has not made a decision on the final part of his question.

CRIMINAL CODE

PETITION FOR RESTRICTING AVAILABILITY OF FIREARMS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 7,486 high school students of the city of Ottawa and area, in which they point out that there have been recent incidents in Canadian high schools in which firearms were used to wound and kill students and staff, that the learning atmosphere in classrooms has deteriorated, and that students and staff have the right to an educational environment which is free from fear. They therefore petition that this House enact legislation as soon as possible restricting the availability of firearms.

SOVIET FISH CATCH

Question No. 2,986—Mr. Jones:

1. What has been the quantity of fish caught by Russian trawlers within the 200 mile limit off Canada's eastern coast for each year 1970 to 1975?

2. What steps have been or will be taken to assure that Russian and other foreign fishing trawlers will be prevented from fishing within the 200 mile limit off Canadian coasts?

3. What steps have been taken to limit the catch of Russian and other foreign fishing trawlers to a quantity to be set and determined by Canadian officials?

4. What steps have been taken to assure that Canada does not operate give away programmes to Russia but makes Russia pay the full world rate with a large payment in gold?

5. Has consideration been given in negotiating with Russia to use the sale of wheat as a bargaining point to secure the import of Russian oil at a rate below current Arab demands?

6. (a) How much money does Canada have on loan to Russia (i) what is the interest rate (ii) what are the terms (iii) for what purpose (b) what are the details of other terms and conditions of the various loans?

7. How much money does Canada have in loan from Russia and what are the terms and conditions?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Environment, Industry, Trade and Commerce and Finance as follows: 1. Using data supplied by the Soviet Union to the Internation Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries (ICNAF) on catches made within the Commission area, Canadian scientists estimate that Soviet catches within 200 miles of Canada's coast have been: 1970, 510,000 metric tons; 1971, 559,000 metric tons; 1972, 580,000 metric tons; 1973, 853,000 metric tons; 1974, 745,000 metric tons; 1975 to end of May, 227,000 metric tons.

2. Canada intends to control foreign fishing within the 200 mile limit along the Canadian coast, but not to prevent all such fishing. At the Law of the Sea Conference, Canada is endeavouring to negotiate an international accord which will give Canada responsibility for the management and conservation of the fish stocks of a 200 mile "economic zone," and which will allow Canadian fishermen to fish to their maximum capacity within conservation limits set by Canada. Foreign fishing vessels would then be allowed to fish, under terms and conditions established by the Canadian Government, within the zone for stocks surplus to Canada's needs.

3. Soviet vessels are not permitted to fish within Canada's territorial seas and fishing zones, except for a small area of the territorial sea off the west coast, under the terms of a bilateral treaty whereby the U.S.S.R. have agreed to abstain from fishing in an area of the high seas of special importance to Canadian fishermen. On the Atlantic coast, "phasing out" and reciprocal agreements permit six other nations to fish in parts of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and parts of the outer nine miles of the territorial sea, under strict limits regarding the effort that may be employed. Beyond the territorial sea and fishing zones, the Canadian Government, at present, has no authority to control the activities of foreign fishing fleets, however, within the framework of ICNAF, quotas and other conservation measures are negotiated annually to provide for conservation of the stocks. Canada is not satisfied with the measures taken by ICNAF or with the adherence by some nations to agreed regulations. At a special meeting of ICNAF held in Montreal in September, Canada was successful in obtaining a 40 per cent reduction in foreign fishing effort for groundfish off the Canadian coast, and in having the Total Allowable catches for certain depleted stocks reduced to quantities that will allow rebuilding to higher sustainable levels.

4 and 5. The Soviet Union pays for Canadian exports in internationally accepted means of payment (fully convertible currencies) with prices determined by individual buyers and sellers at internationally competitive levels. None of our other trading partners are asked to make payment in gold and we have no reason to single out the USSR and prevent them from using the normal commercial means of payments. In any event, now that the price of gold is allowed to fluctuate according to international supply and demand it is not necessarily a more riskless form of payment than convertible currencies.

RIDEAU CENTRE PROJECT

Question No. 3,111—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. What did the government pay in land assembly costs, by item, for the Rideau Centre Project?

2. (a) Who owns what parcels of land that are part of the Rideau Centre Project (b) what is the current market value of all such land?

3. How much is CP Hotels paying for the land?

4. What are the total costs, by item, for the Rideau Centre including commercial, office, transportation, utilities and land costs?

5. What prices will prospective tenants pay for using the proposed Rideau Street Mall area and will ownership of Rideau Street remain with the government?

6. Is Eatons of Canada being considered for location in the Rideau Centre Project and, if so (a) for what reason (b) what occupancy prices and financial arrangements are there between Eatons and the government?

7. Which new arterial roads will be needed with the closing of Rideau Street and at what cost?

8. Is the basis of the Rideau Centre Project acceptance of the proposed Region's southern growth satellite area?

9. Will the Rideau Centre Project have any residential units as part of its development and, if so (a) how many, what type, etc. (b) what are the reasons for such inclusion or exclusion?

10. Will there be sufficient open space in the Rideau Centre Project and, if so, how much?

11. Is one million square feet of office space needed in the Rideau Centre Project and, if so (a) for what reason (b) does this substantially increase the density of downtown Ottawa?

12. What is the optimum density of downtown Ottawa according to project planners?

13. Was public involvement in planning the Rideau Centre started a few years ago at the Project's beginning and, if not, for what reason?

14. What is public involvement in the Project meant to accomplish?

15. (a) Which groups will benefit and in what way from the Rideau Centre Project (b) which groups will not?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. In addition to original Crown lands by right of conquest, the cost of the federal lands in the federal development area approximates $3,045,000.

NOTE: Boundaries of the federal development area are Rideau Street, Colonel By Drive, Mackenzie King Bridge, Nicholas Street, Besserer Street and Freiman Street. The extent of a larger redevelopment area depends on interest shown by the private sector, the City of Ottawa and the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton.

2. (a) Land is now owned in federal development area by: National Capital Commission, 4.42 acres; Dept. of Public Works, 1.63 acres; Dept. of Indian and Northern Affairs, 4.50 acres; City of Ottawa, 1.07 acres. (b) Current market value of federal lands in the federal development area is estimated at $25-30 million.

3. CP Hotels are expected to lease their site at market rates as one part of a comprehensive plan.

4. Total costs are not known at this time. The Rideau Centre Planning Team is in the process of assembling such cost estimates.

5. Current commercial rental rates will apply to prospective tenants. Rideau Street, now a regional road under the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, is expected to be transferred to the City of Ottawa and will not be subject to federal intervention.

6. Yes. (a) A major department store is considered to be essential to any strong regional commercial centre such as Rideau Centre. (b) An agreement is currently being negotiated between DPW and Eaton's for the construction of commercial space and some office accommodation to be built on land leased from the federal government.

7. A short section of Waller Street will need improvement as an arterial road. Costs are subject to continuing negotiations referred to under part 4 above.

8. No.

9. (a) None on the federal land portion. Rehabilitation of some Lower Town West and Sandy Hill residential areas is within the total development area. (b) Residential construction is not considered the best land use for federal lands, although the hotel represents a form of residential use. The City of Ottawa has identified adjacent residential sites.

10. Yes. Approximately 3 acres of federal land will be open space in keeping with a strong orientation to pedestrian attraction.

11. Yes. (a) Office space is needed to meet DPW accommodation forecasts. The Rideau Centre location of federal offices will help correct the imbalance between the downtown area south and south-west of Parliament Hill and the east side of the Rideau Canal. (b) No.

12. Clarification is required to answer this question.

13. Citizens representing property owners, tenants and business groups have been informed and have had membership on the Planning Team for over two years. There has been direct public representation through the Federation of Citizens Associations since May, 1975.

14. Public involvement is intended to provide information and a better understanding of the proposals, together with the opportunity for citizen critique and input from private sector interests and the community at large.

15. (a) Canadians generally will benefit through creation of an exemplary urban environment for the National Capital in a location adjacent to Parliament Hill. Rideau Centre will benefit both the City of Ottawa and the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton as well as the whole National Capital Region by reversing the relative decline of the Rideau sector of the Core Area through an increase in the assessment base and additional business revenues. Rideau Centre will reinforce the urban heritage value of the Byward Market-Sussex Drive area and support the objectives of heritage groups. Rideau Centre can become a useful example for citizen and planning groups elsewhere in Canada through its planning process and its design product, as the result of federal-municipal-citizen joint participation. (b) It is difficult to determine any groups that will be affected adversely by the development.

SALT WATER FISHING REGULATIONS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA, 1975

Question No. 3,139—Mr. Brisco:

Did the government forward the Salt Water Fishing Regulations for British Columbia for 1975 to the British Columbia Department of Recreation and Conservation for publication in provincial fishing regulations and, if so, on what date?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): No. The Salt Water Fishing Regulations, both commercial and sport, and any regulations pertaining to salmon sports fishing in B.C., wherever conducted, are administered by the Federal Government, and are summarized for easy reference by the public in publications issued each spring by the Fisheries and Marine Service of the Department of the Environment in Vancouver.

(iii) The figures for the English Services Division and the French Services Division do not include the budgets for the CBC's English and French television and radio stations in the administratively distinct Ottawa Area, where English and French production are approximately the same.

2. (a) and (b) English Services Division: 1973, 4,786; 1974, 4,970. French Services Division: 1973, 3,306; 1974, 3,495. Ottawa Area: 1973, 484; 1974, 510. CBC employment records have not been maintained in a manner which would enable the corporation to extract readily and without an inordinate amount of time, work and cost, information about the mother tongue and language proficiencies of its employees. In addition, since the corporation's records do not necessarily contain the requested information, the final answer would not be complete.

COST OF NEW BANK OF CANADA BUILDING

Question No. 3,229—Mr. Coates:

1. What is the total estimated cost of the new Bank of Canada Building on Wellington Street?

2. What is the estimated cost of (a) site acquisition (b) architectural design (c) mechanical and electrical engineering services (d) foundation and structure (e) landscaping and interior design, including the connecting link with the existing Bank Building?

3. What are the names of the firms who have been awarded contracts in Part 2 (b) (c) (d) and (e)?

4. (a) What was the purchase price of the site (b) from whom was it purchased (c) how was the decision reached as to the cost of the property?

5. What is the estimated (a) annual operating cost of the Building (b) total amount of useable floor space?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): 1. The plans for the additions to the Bank of Canada building on Wellington Street in Ottawa were approved by the Bank's Board in January 1972. The additions were designed to preserve the existing building and to permit the consolidation in one complex of all the Ottawa operations of the Bank, including those now housed in the Bank's King Edward Avenue building and in a number of temporary locations. The first and major phase of the work is now nearly ready for occupancy. When completed the additions will consist of below-grade space (three floors in most parts) for the entire area bounded by Wellington, Bank, Sparks and Kent Streets except for that part already occupied by the basement of the existing building, two twelve-storey towers flanking the existing building, and a garden court and bridges connecting the three buildings. The additional area will include 30,000 square feet gross of prime vault space, 246,000 square feet gross of other space below grade (to be occupied in due course by up to 300 persons engaged for the most part in high-security work), 13,000 square feet of garden court, 5,000 square feet of connecting bridges, 436,000 square feet gross of other enclosed space on and above grade, and some 60,000 square feet of open space on grade level. The additions will contain about 11.2 million cubic feet. The total cost of constructing the additions (exclusive of site purchase, architectural costs, landscaping, and interior partitions, furniture and furnishings and special-purpose built-in equipment) is currently estimated to be $45 million. Of this amount $29.5 million has been contracted for at fixed price contracts as a result of tenders, with a further $14.9 million contracted for on the basis of a guaranteed upset price with 75 percent of any savings being for the benefit of the Bank. The current estimate of $45 million compares with the estimate of $36 million released by the Board of the Bank in October 1971, the difference being due to the extent of about one-half to subsequent additions to the work planned and one-half to higher costs than originally anticipated. The land and buildings surrounded by Wellington, Bank, Sparks and Kent Streets were purchased by the Bank of Canada in ten transactions from 1936 to 1964. The area involved is 114,550 square feet. In the case of each individual purchase the price was negotiated following independent professional appraisal. The existing head-office building of the Bank, which was built in 1937/38, is being preserved but it will require some exterior changes and extensive interior renovation and modification to integrate it with the new buildings. The cost of architectural services, including structural, mechanical and electrical designs, for the additions is estimated to be $2.7 million. The architects are the associated firms of Marani, Rounthwaite & Dick, and Erickson & Associates, and they engaged and paid the consulting firms of C.D. Carruthers & Wallace, Ardec Consulting Engineers, and Brais, Frigon, Hanley & Assoc. Ltd. for structural, mechanical and electrical design services. The cost of services of other outside consultants involved in the construction and inspections of the building is estimated to be $400,000; this amount includes the services of van der Meulen & Associates, landscape architects. The prime contractors to date have been V.K. Mason Construction Ltd. for excavation work and Ellis-Don Ltd. for the construction. The contract with Mason Construction Ltd. was let in December 1971, and with Ellis-Don Ltd. for work on the sub-structure in June 1972 and for work on the superstructure in May 1973 and in December 1975. Landscaping costs for the Bank's own project are estimated to be $685,000. The Bank is in addition sharing with the Department of Public Works and the City of Ottawa the cost of developing the Sparks Street Mall between Bank Street and Kent Street. The interior partitions, furniture and furnishings, and special-purpose built-in equipment for the additions, including six pollution-free incinerators for burning soiled and worn bank notes, cancelled coupons and cancelled bonds, and a highly specialized system for vault and building security, are estimated to cost $6 million. The interior design is by the associated architectural firms of Marani, Rounthwaite & Dick, and Erickson & Associates.

2, 3 and 4. See answer to question 1.

5. (a) No estimate is provided of the "annual operating cost" of the finished complex, in part because of the problem of knowing what expenses to include. The operating costs of the complex will be higher than for a typical office building of similar size because of its high security requirements. Because of the type of construction the maximum heating and cooling loads of the above-grade additions will exceed those of a conventional office building, but the reverse will be the case for the considerable proportion of the total working area that is below grade. The heating and cooling systems have been designed to provide greater than average flexibility of operation and the annual energy consumption of the entire complex is not expected by the designers to differ appreciably from that of a conventional building large enough to provide comparable facilities for the Bank's staff and operations. (b) See answer to question 1.

2. How much control does the Health of Animals Branch have over their employees' overtime in the Meat Inspection Division?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. 1972-73, $1,438,000; 1973-74, $1,690,000; 1974-75, $2,571,000.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: 1 and 2. 4. Does the Canada Council circulate the book in Canada or abroad?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: 1. A collection of fiction by Andreas Schroeder entitled "The Late Man" (and not "The Last Man") has been submitted twice to the Canada Council.

2. The Canada Council does not have this information. No control is exercised over the material published in Council subsidized reviews. In the case of anthologies, assessors consider the overall quality of the project but not each item.

CBC EMPLOYEES IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Question No. 3,489—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the number of personnel that CBC has in foreign countries?

2. How many are receiving housing or apartment subsidies and, in each case (a) what is the total amount of rent (b) what amount of (i) rent is paid by the employee (ii) the subsidy is paid by CBC?

3. Is a rent subsidy paid to employees and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. 28.

2. 27. (a), (b), (i), (ii): (See following chart).

3. Yes. Full-time CBC employees abroad are on a foreign-allowance system based on the allowance paid to certain categories of employees of the Department of External Affairs. The CBC employee is charged the amount of rent he or she would normally pay in metropolitan Ottawa and the CBC pays the difference. Since it would be more expensive for the CBC to pay for the moving of employees furniture to foreign locations, in almost all cases, furnished accommodation is rented.

NOTE: Several of the above items reflect on the one hand, the difference between accommodation for a married and single employee in so far as the "own share" formula is concerned and, on the other hand the increase in actual rents over the past four years whereby single accommodation is now as expensive as family accommodation acquired under the terms of a much earlier lease.

SHIPPING OF GRAIN BY SEA

Question No. 3,509—Mr. Forrestall:

Is the government aware of the cost in 1974 of shipping by sea Canadian grain to other countries, and (a) if so, what was it (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): In so far as the Canadian Wheat Board is concerned export sales of wheat, oats and barley are sold on either an instore terminal position or FOB basis at all Canadian seaboard positions. Ocean freight costs therefore are borne by the purchaser and the cost in 1974 of shipping such grain by sea to other countries is not known.

IMPORT QUOTAS ON CLOTHING FROM HONG KONG, TAIWAN AND UNITED STATES

Question No. 3,521—Mr. Brisco:

1. What import quotas in terms of volume of goods have been established on clothing from (a) Hong Kong (b) Taiwan (c) USA?

2. Is it to the advantage of Canadian importers to have clothing manufactured in Hong Kong or Taiwan imported directly into Canada and (a) if so, for what reason (b) if not, for what reason?

3. Is there a greater advantage to Canadian importers to have such goods imported into the USA and then into Canada and (a) if so, for what reason (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. A global import quota of 1,416,690 dozen men's and boys' shirts with tailored collars, priced under $30 per dozen for wovens and $33 per dozen for knitted, is in effect from November 30, 1974 to November 29, 1975. This quota is divided into 11 "country reserves" totalling 950,925 dozen shirts, utilizable only by the exporting countries holding these reserves, and an "open portion" of 465,765 dozen shirts, utilizable by any country, including those which hold "country reserves". (a) Hong Kong's reserve is 205,125 dozen shirts. (b) Taiwan's reserve is 137,188 dozen shirts. (c) USA has no reserve. As well, Hong Kong maintains an export authorization system limiting its exports to Canada of trousers, slacks and shorts, woven of cotton, polyester, and polyester/cotton to 404,815 dozen pairs from October 1, 1975 to September 30, 1976. Similarly, Taiwan has undertaken to restrain its exports to Canada of trousers, slacks and shorts of all genders, all fibres, woven or knitted, at 958,000 dozen pairs during calendar year 1975.

2. For customs purposes the country of origin is determined by the percentage of value added. An article of clothing, the major part of which has country X value added, will be treated as an export from that country regardless of the country from which it has finally been exported from. There are no significant advantages to shipping goods via a third country with the possible exception of savings on transportation.

3. Refer to answer to question number two.

3. Were all delegates in attendance throughout the Conference and, if not (a) what were the variations in attendance (b) what were the itineraries or activities of those not in full attendance?

Question No. 3,551—Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre):

Is the Canadian Transport Commission responsible for establishing the rates charged by the Northern Transportation Company Limited and, if so, what procedures are used by CTC in order to establish such rates?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: We are not responsible for establishing rates charged by the Northern Transportation Company Limited. However, some categories of tariffs of tolls which are charged by a carrier are subject to approval by the Commission pursuant to Part III of the Transport Act.

SUBSIDIES TO FERRIES

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: Wood Islands-Caribou Service: (a) 1974, $2,399,993; 1975, $3,457,465. (b) 1974, $2,400,000; 1975, $3,456,440. (c) 1974, $2,400,000; 1975, $2,600,000. Souris, P.E.I.—Magdalen Islands, Que. 1. How much money has been given to Canada World Youth by CIDA in the past two years?

2. How much money has been given to Canada World Youth by the Department of External Affairs and through what programmes during the past four years?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned: 1. April 1, 1974—March 31, 1975, $2,800,000; April 1, 1975—to date, $2,500,000.

2. The Department of External Affairs has not given money to Canada World Youth during the past four years.

DEFENCE EXPORT SALES

Question No. 3,561—Mr. Fairweather:

1. What is the (a) per capita value (b) gross value of sale of arms and arms components by Canada?

2. Does Canada rank sixth in the world in value of arms sales?

3. Is the Canadian Commercial Corporation the government agency which negotiates the sale of arms?

4. Is consideration being given by the United Nations to an international agency for monitoring the sale of arms?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Supply and Services and External Affairs as follows: 1. (a) $12.25 (1974) (Canadian population taken as 22.9M). (b) Defence export sales by Canada in 1974 amounted to 280.5M. This figure was compiled on a contract basis (prime and sub-contracts) and includes applied research and development, pre-production, production, licence agreements and technical assistance, installation (other than construction) and repair, overhaul and modification. "Off-the-shelf" general procurement, construction, fuels and lubricants, basic raw materials, and services (such as rentals and transportation) have been excluded. Defence equipment sold by Canada has for the most part been items having a high technological content and includes such items as aircraft, aircraft engines and spares, airframe and engine components and spares, flight simulators, reconnaissance drones and spares, navigation and communication equipment and spares, avionics, marine valves, sonar equipment, ammunition and components, and vehicle parts and spares.

2. The precise ranking of the value of military equipment sales by any country varies depending on the source of statistics used to arrive at the ranking. There are considerable variations in statistics emanating from different sources depending on the definitions and methods of compilation used, and uniformity and reliability is difficult to assess. The ranking of countries also changes from year to year. The four acknowledged world leaders in defence export sales are US, USSR, France and Britain. Several orders of magnitude below these countries is a group of countries consisting of Canada, Sweden, Italy, Czechoslovakia and China (PRC) whose estimated annual defence export sales over the last 10 years would rank them somewhere in the range of fifth to ninth depending on the year concerned.

3. The Canadian Commercial Corporation has not been delegated responsibility by the Government to negotiate the sale of arms to overseas governments. However, from time to time, the Corporation does receive requests for such requirements from foreign governments and their agencies all of which are subject to the export control regulations of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is to be noted that any such sales are strictly on a government-to-government basis and that the Corporation does not deal with any private firms or overseas commercial trading organizations.

4. At present, there is no resolution before the United Nations for an international agency to monitor the sale of arms. In 1965-66 Denmark, Iceland, Malta and Norway sponsored a draft resolution to ascertain the position of governments concerning a proposal to register trade in arms with the Secretary-General. Canada supported this resolution but it was defeated, primarily at the instigation of many developing countries. This proposal was revived by Denmark in 1968 but the opposition was such that it was withdrawn prior to a vote. In 1968, the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, in his statement to the Twenty-third U.N. General Assembly, drew attention to the suffering caused by traffic in conventional arms. In 1971, the Secretary-General of the U.N. commissioned a report on the "Economic and Social Consequences of the Arms Race and of Military Expenditures", which report was subsequently presented to the Twenty-sixth Session of the General Assembly as Document A/C.1/L.593. It was passed and was subsequently incorporated in Resolution 2831 (XXVI) which in summary was a resolution to keep a watching brief on specified consequences of the arms race. To date, unfortunately, all efforts to give substantive monitoring support to this resolution, through an arms register under U.N. auspices, have been opposed by a majority of member states.

2. For 1974, what was the average length of films produced by the private sector for departments and what was the cost of such productions?

3. How many of the films produced by the National Film Board in 1973 and 1974 had production costs in the range of (a) $1,000 to $5,000 (b) $5,000 to $12,000 (c) $12,000 to $20,000 (d) $20,000 to $50,000 (e) $50,000 to $100,000 (f) $100,000 to $250,000 (g) $250,000 to $500,000 (h) over $500,000 and, in each case, how many were government sponsored?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows: 1. For 1974 average length of a sponsored film was 24 minutes and average cost was $53,025.

2. For 1974 the average length of film produced by the private sector for departments was 17 minutes and the average cost per film was $13,065.

3. Number of films produced by the National Film Board in 1973-74 and 1974-75 in each of the following cost ranges and number government sponsored:

	Total	Government Sponsored

HABITAT CONFERENCE COSTS

Question No. 3,574—Mr. Beatty:

1. What are the projected direct costs to the (a) taxpayer of Canada for the federal contribution (b) taxpayer of British Columbia for the provincial contribution (c) ratepayer of Vancouver for the municipal contribution to the Habitat conference and, in each case, what are the component parts of the total costs?

2. What will be the total contribution by the taxpayer to be paid through the United Nations and its agencies for the Habitat conference and what are the component parts of such contribution?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. (a) The estimated direct cost of the Habitat Conference to the federal government is $14 million of which $9.2 million are required to meet host nation commitments and $4.8 million to prepare for Canada's participation in the Conference. Expenditures on the Conference have been incurred since fiscal year 1972-73 and will be completed in fiscal year 1976-77. (b) and (c) The estimated direct cost of the Conference to the Province of British Columbia and the City of Vancouver are not known and are not within the federal jurisdiction since, at this point in time, there are no formal cost-sharing arrangements.

2. Appropriations for Habitat in the Regular Budget of the United Nations total U.S. $2.77 million. Since Canada is assessed 3.18 per cent of this regular budget, the indirect cost to Canada will be U.S. $88,086. In addition to the allocation from the U.N. Regular Budget, Habitat is receiving grants from the United Nations Fund for the Environment, totalling U.S. $3 million, to support the full participation of developing countries in the Conference. Because the Fund for the Environment is a voluntary fund, it is not possible to identify a proportion of this payment which might be called Canadian. Some notion, however, might be gained from the facts that the current target for the Fund is $110 million, of which about $45 million has been already received, including $1 million from Canada.

"HERCULES" CRANE

Question No. 3,587—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What has been the total expenditure to date on the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Hercules crane at the Port of Montreal?

2. What is the Department of Transport's best estimate of the percentage of time in the past 24 months that this specialty crane was employed on giving assistance to the operations of the (a) Port of Montreal (b) Seaway Authority?

3. Is there any arrangement by which recompense is made for the use on other than Seaway Authority business of this crane and, if so (a) what is the arrangement (b) with whom was it made?

4. What is the likelihood of the government locating, in the near future, such a facility in the Port of Halifax-Dartmouth?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway advises as follows: 1. $3,387,314.00. In 1959, it was deemed essential that the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority acquire some form of floating equipment to lift the heavy lock gates for their maintenance and repair. The Hercules was designed and built for the authority, primarily as a gate lifter, in order to ensure minimum delays in case of breakdown. Through arrangements with the National Harbours Board, it was agreed that the crane would be available to the Port of Montreal for the loading and unloading of extra-heavy material.

2. The records of The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority indicate that the crane was used for 1578 hours during the past 24 months, divided as follows: (a) 37 per cent. (b) 37 per cent.

3. Users pay charges for services performed by the crane in accordance with the schedule of charges in St. Lawrence Seaway Authority by-law No. 4.

The National Harbours Board advises as follows:

4. The National Harbours Board has no plans to procure or build a floating crane at the Port of Halifax-Darmouth. Similar satisfactory service has been provided in the past by the private sector.

BUDGETARY REDUCTIONS IN SALMON PROGRAMME

Question No. 3,589—Mr. Reynolds:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,170, will the Minister of the Environment explain (a) where the $4 million in cuts in the salmon enhancement programme will take place and what effect this will have on the overall programme (b) what additional resources are being eliminated from the fleet operations that add up to $3.4 million (c) what areas will not get flood mapping done in the amount of $1 million?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): With reference to the answer given to Question No. 3,170: (a) Cuts were made to British Columbia salmon enhancement program with the result that some site feasibility studies and the development of some operational plans will be delayed. (b) The $3.4 million represents additional resources which were being requested for 1975-76 and subsequent years to provide for increased levels of utilization of Fisheries and Marine vessels engaged in fisheries management and research activities, and oceanographic and hydrographic surveys. (c) Flood mapping is a shared-cost, federal-provincial $20 million program over a 4-5 year period. The budgetary reduction of $1 million has resulted in a slower start of the program for fiscal year 1975-76. This slower start should not result in a less comprehensive program.

CMHC—GRANVILLE ISLAND PROJECT

Question No. 3,591—Mr. Reynolds:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,170, could the Minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation advise what effect the $2 million cutback will have on the Granville Island project and if this money will be made up out of the Habitat budget?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: It is expected that the $2 million cutback for the Granville Island project will not have a major effect apart from a possible minor delay in its ultimate completion date. Funds for this project are separate from those for Habitat '76.

CUTBACK OF $4 MILLION FOR STAFFING OF TWO MEDIUM SECURITY INSTITUTIONS

Question No. 3,595—Mr. Reynolds:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,170, can the Solicitor General advise (a) what effect the cutback in $4 million for staffing of two medium security institutions will have on the institutions (b) are these institutions presently opened or, if they are planned to be opened, will the cutback in staff have any effect on their construction?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): (a) None because construction has been deferred to a later date. (b) When construction of these two institutions is undertaken, funds required for staffing will be requested from Parliament.

NOTE: For the purposes of this Question, the two institutions referred to are: Medium Security Institution—Edmonton, Alberta; Medium Security Institution—Winnipeg, Manitoba.

POST OFFICE—KLEINBURG, ONTARIO

Question No. 3,600—Mr. Stevens:

1. Has the government any immediate plans to (a) build (b) rent a post office facility in Kleinburg, Ontario and, if so, on what date will tenders be called?

2. Has the government a site in mind for the new postal facility and, if so, in what location?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): 1. The Department of Public Works, on behalf of Canada Post Office, leases 802 rentable square feet on Islington Avenue in Kleinburg, Ontario. The lease entered into, effective April 1, 1974 expires on March 31, 1976 and contains an option to renew on the same terms and conditions until March 31, 1977. The Department of Public Works has been requested by Post Office officials to tentatively schedule expanded postal accommodation in Kleinburg, Ontario during the 1977/78 fiscal year. Major considerations in providing this accommodation in that fiscal year will be the priority allocation within the Post Office National Facilities Plan and the availability of funds. Planning for the expanded accommodation is in the very early stages of development. Various alternatives will be studied to determine how the space will be provided and we are not in a position to establish a definite tender call date for either Crown construct or rental proposals at such an early stage of project development.

2. The need for a site or its location have not been determined as the solution to the provision of the expanded accommodation has yet to be identified.

Question No. 3,687—Mr. Brewin:

1. Has the Treasury Board approved the allocation of funds for the construction and operation of a zoo in the Meach Creek Valley area in conjunction with the Quebec government (Société d'aménagement de l'Outaouais) as proposed by a tentative agreement between the National Capital Commission and the Société and, if so, what steps, if any, have been taken to proceed with the construction or operation of the zoo apart from the expropriation by the Quebec authorities of 47 properties in the area?

5. What share of the capital costs of construction and operating expenses of the zoo is to be born by the government or anyone on its behalf?

6. Have feasibility studies been prepared in respect to the operation of the zoo and, if so (a) by whom (b) are they available to the public or to the owners of the expropriated properties?

7. In the light of frequent undertakings by the government to reduce its expenditures and to observe restraint in government spending, has the Meach Valley Creek Zoo project been reviewed or is it proposed to review the project in the light of the present inflationary crises?

8. Is it proposed, in the light of Part 7, to review the project with a view to cancellation and the restoring of the expropriated land to the owners?

Order Paper Questions

9. What is the reason for delay in making offers to the owners whose properties were expropriated in April, 1975 with a view to the settlement to claims for compensation?

10. Will the government review together with the National Capital Commission and the Government of Quebec, the advisability and financial soundness of the whole project having in mind experience in respect to the new zoo in the Toronto area where there was a gross over-estimate of attendance and consequently in operating revenues from the zoo leading to the assumption by the Metro Corporation of Toronto of a $7.5 million deficit through the loss in operating the zoo and paying for its debts?

11. How many acres of farm land suitable for agriculture have been expropriated for the purpose of the construction of the zoo?

12. Have offers recently been made for the renting back to the original owners of their properties at rentals approximately twice as large as the carrying charges for properties that were expropriated and, if so, on what basis?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): In so far as the National Capital Commission is concerned: 1. No. However, subject to the availability of funds from approved budgets, the Cabinet has approved participation to the extent of half of the estimated $7.5 million involved in the first phase of zoo development.

2. $8,218,000, as estimated in 1971 by an Outaouais Development Corporation study.

3. No. An N.C.C. study in 1973 proposed a less elaborate initial phase to cost $7.5 million, including land acquisition. N.C.C. has not reviewed construction costs since 1973.

4 and 5. No formal agreement has been made. The government of Quebec and the federal government have reached agreement in principle to share equally the cost of developing and managing the first phase of a wildlife park for Canadian animal species.

6. Yes. (a) Outaouais Development Corporation and N.C.C. (b) The Somer Report prepared by the Outaouais Development Corporation may be consulted at their offices. The N.C.C. report is an internal working paper but may be viewed at the Commission's library.

7. The project has been reviewed and any projected expenditure has been postponed for at least one year.

8. No.

9. This expropriation falls within the jurisdiction of the Quebec government acting through the Outaouais Development Corporation.

10. The government and the N.C.C. does not anticipate such a review as the projects are in no way similar in concept, size, capital expenditures or operating costs.

11. Approximately 900 acres.

12. Detailed expropriation arrangements fall within the competence of the Outaouais Development Corporation.

ELECTRIC FURNACES

Question No. 3,709—Mr. Reynolds:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,940, did the Department of Supply and Services award a contract valued at $303,414 to Atlas Steels Company, a division of Rio Algom Mines Limited, Welland, Ontario for the modification of one of the Company's electric furnaces and, if so (a) on whose initiative was the project suggested (b) for what reason was Rio Algom Mines selected?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): (a) The project was suggested at the initiative of the Mines Branch of Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. (b) Rio Algom Mines was selected on the basis that it submitted the lowest price for the modifications and six weeks operation of the furnace.

CEMENT—MIRABEL AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 3,712—Mr. Reynolds:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,967, was a contract awarded by the Department of Supply and Services (a) on May 9, 1974 to Saint Lawrence Cement Company, Montreal, Quebec for 110,000 tons of cement at a cost of $35.62 per ton (b) on May 31, 1974 to Canada Cement Lafarge Ltd., Montreal, Quebec for 35,380 tons of cement at a cost of $34.00 per ton destined for the Mirabel Airport construction site?

2. In each case, was cement to be used for construction in 1974?

3. What is the justification for cost differential on the cement delivered to the same destination?

4. For what reason was it stated in the answer that Canada Cement Lafarge did not provide a firm price for the delivery of cement during 1975, when the year in question was 1974?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. (a) Yes, except that date of award of contract was April 23, 1974 as stated in part 1 to the answer to question 1,967. (b) Yes, except that date of award of contract was May 15, 1974 and the unit price was $34.07 per ton, FOB Mirabel airport site.

2. The contract awarded to St. Lawrence Cement Co. covered the supply of cement for the period April 23, 1974 to April 22, 1975 for the construction of cargo aprons which was to start in May, 1974 and be completed in 1975. Approximately 90,000 tons of cement was the estimated requirement for 1974, and 20,000 tons for 1975. The contract awarded to Canada Cement Lafarge Ltd. was for the supply of cement during the period May 15, 1974 to May 14, 1975 for the runway construction project.

3. Cost differential was the result of the province of Quebec transportation tariff. Both firms quoted a price of $29.91 per ton, FOB plant. The transportation tariff for St. Lawrence Cement was $5.71 per ton and for Canada Cement Lafarge $4.61 per ton.

4. As stated at the answer to part 2 above, the requirement for cement was for the construction of cargo aprons during a period of twelve months, from April 23, 1974. The cement requirement was estimated at 90,000 tons in 1974 and 20,000 tons in 1975. As stated in the answer to parts 4 and 5 of question 1,967, Canada Cement Lafarge would not quote on the 1974 portion of the cement requirement for the cargo aprons because their 1974 production capacity was already committed. Therefore, they only tendered on the deliveries to be made in 1975.

FISHING TRAWLER

Question No. 3,713—Mr. Reynolds:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,985, at the time of purchase, how old was the fishing trawler Gulf Guard obtained through the Department of Supply and Services under CIDA's authorization?

2. Did the Department consider purchasing a similar vessel with like dimensions from a shipbuilder?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Eight and a half years.

2. CIDA put a limit of $250,000 for the purchase and conversion of a vessel. Since the estimated cost of a new vessel was $1,250,000, it was not considered practical to approach shipbuilders for this requirement.

TOBOGGANS

Question No. 3,714—Mr. Reynolds:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,986, what are the special features of the $215.00 toboggan supplied to the Department of National Defence through DSS that justified (a) the expenditure per tobaggan (b) quantity ordered by DSS?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): (a) See reply to question 3,611 (Dec. 12/75 Hansard page 9970). (b) Justification of quantity purchased is based on requirement and quantity as determined and requisitioned by the Department of National Defence in support of Winter Training Exercises conducted by that department.

CANADIAN PATENTS AND DEVELOPMENTS LIMITED—CONTRACT

Question No. 3,716—Mr. Reynolds:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,004, did the Department of Supply and Services provide for a contract expenditure of $542,000 on behalf of Canadian Patents and Developments Limited during the period April to December 1974-75 and, if so (a) what are the details (b) what was the necessity of such expenditure?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Further investigation indicates that the contract for $542,000 with Gunther Mele Ltd. was negotiated on behalf of the Department of Supply and Services and not on behalf of the Canadian Patents and Developments Ltd. This error occurred as a result of a miscoding of the customer code in the computer system. The details of the contract are shown on the news release below.

OTTAWA, June 27, 1974: The Honourable Jean-Pierre Goyer, Minister of Supply and Services, announced today the award of a contract valued at $541,500 to Gunther Mele Limited of Brantford, Ont.

The contract calls for the supply of .5 million Olympic coin cases in conjunction with the Department of Supply and Services' coin-packaging project. The cases, designed to hold four coins each, will be delivered at a rate of 30,000 per week to the Canadian Printing Bureau in Hull, starting in August 1974.

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES—INVENTORY

Question No. 3,718—Mr. Reynolds:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,022, what was the cost of interest charged on investment in the inventory of Department of Supply and Services stocks during 1973-74?

2. With what frequency are phased deliveries and direct shipments from factories made to user departments?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. $237,000. The rate changed quarterly and ranged from 6-3/8 per cent to 7-3/16 per cent during 1973/74. The value of the inventory during the period varied between $5.4 million and $7.5 million. Interest is paid on inventory less accounts payable.

2. DSS records are not maintained in a manner which reflects the frequency of phased and direct shipments. DSS records do indicate, however, that a total of 2,371 direct shipments from contractors to customer departments valued at $4,326,000 were arranged during 1973/74 which represented 16.5 per cent of total sales of stocked items during that fiscal year. The percentage of phased deliveries contained in these direct shipments is not known; however, scheduled deliveries are often arranged to meet relocation schedules and project schedules as specified by user departments.

AIRCRAFT "NEAR MISSES"

Question No. 3,777—Mr. Cossitt:

Have any "near misses" between aircraft occurred in air space controlled by the Department of Transport Air Traffic Controllers since January 1, 1974 and, if so, in each case (a) on what date (b) at what location (c) what aircraft were involved (d) what was the result of the investigation, if any?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The expression "near miss" has no official meaning in Air Traffic Services lexicon. Some states have attempted to define a "near miss" as a loss of separation between aircraft where the separation was reduced to less than 1,000 feet. However, in Transport Canada we speak of "Air Traffic Services irregularities", or "losses of separation" and they fall into two categories: critical and technical. The critical case could involve a loss of separation where one or both pilots in command took avoiding action, or there was no time to take such action, but the pilots concerned would have instinctively taken such action had there been time. A technical case is one where a loss of separation was reported but no avoiding action was considered necessary by pilots or controllers, but a report was filed. All losses of separation are investigated by a fact-finding board consisting of controller operations analysts from another unit and aviation safety officers. Findings and recommendations are made directly to the Director, Air Traffic Services, and the Director General, Civil Aeronautics whose offices ensure that appropriate corrective action is taken. The following critical losses of separation occurred in airspace controlled by Canada Air Traffic Controllers since January 1, 1974: (a) March 20, 1974. (b) Edmonton Industrial Airport. (c) CF-FUS, PA28 and Timeair 37/DHC6. (a) October 8, 1974. (b) 25 miles northwest of Moncton. (c) KLM flight 644, B747 and Capital International Airways flight 4902C, DC8. (a) November 3, 1974. (b) Vancouver International Airport. (c) Pacific Western flight 415, B737 and Air Canada flight 283, DC9. (a) June 11, 1975. (b) Toronto International Airport. (c) CF-VPK, Aztec and Eastern Airlines flight 308, B727. (a) August 6, 1975. (b) 15 miles northwest of Saskatoon. (c) Air Canada flight 290, DC9 and Viking 11, a Canadian Armed Forces CT14 (Tutor). (a) August 8, 1975. (b) Sydney, Nova Scotia. (c) CF-GHL, DC3 and N7242R, BE35. (d) Following each such incident, the circumstances were thoroughly investigated by an Air Traffic Services Fact Finding Board, and appropriate recommendations were actioned, designed to prevent reoccurrence.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—RENOVATION TO ROOM 428N, CENTRE BLOCK

Question No. 3,799—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Department of External Affairs make any arrangements to renovate Room 428-N of the Centre Block since August 8, 1974 and, if so (a) with whom (b) what are the names and job designations of all persons in the Department who made such arrangements (c) what is the name and job designation of the most senior official of the Department who authorized such arrangements (d) what are the reasons that the Department requested such arrangements (e) on what date was such a request made (f) what are the names and job designations of all employees of the Department who now work in Room 428-N or who will be posted to such location (g) did the Department pay for renovations to the office and for equipment placed therein (h) at what cost?

2. Does the Department have a policy of moving employees into the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings and, if so (a) for what reason is such space required over and above the Lester B. Pearson Building (b) is it the policy of the Department to take over offices normally occupied by those engaged in the political process, such as Members of Parliaments, provided that such permission can be obtained?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes. (a) The Department of Public Works and the Sergeant-at-Arms in the House of Commons. (b) Jacques S. Roy, Senior Departmental Assistant to the Minister. (c) Jacques S. Roy, Senior Departmental Assistant to the Minister, was the most senior official who authorized the arrangements. (d) The purpose was to provide office space for Mr. J. S. Roy, by subdividing room 428-N. Previously, the office had been occupied by one secretary and presently it is occupied by Mr. Roy and two secretaries. The partition was requested in order to alleviate the problems of noise and overcrowding in a room shared by three persons. (e) November 13, 1975. (f) Mr. Jacques S. Roy, Senior Departmental Assistant to the Minister, Mlle Francine Normandin, ST-SEC-1, Mlle Francine Cyr, ST-SEC-2. (g) The Department did not pay for renovations to the office, but it did pay for the installation of telephones. (h) The cost of telephone installation was $275.

2. The Department does not have a general policy of moving employees into the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings. However, it has on occasion located one officer in the Centre Block, for the following reason: (a) When Parliament is in session, the Minister is primarily located at the House of Commons, while the Department is based at the Lester B. Pearson Building. In view of this, it is preferable for more efficient communication between the Minister and the Department to have one of its officers located at the Centre Block of the House of Commons. (b) It is not the Department's policy to take over offices normally occupied by Members of Parliament. Room 428-N was already occupied by one person working for the SSEA; now it is occupied by three persons working for the SSEA.

MR. JAMES SKAKIE

Question No. 3,808—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Is James Skakie, a Canadian citizen, in jail in Mexico and, if so (a) when was he arrested (b) how long did he remain in jail before sentence?

2. In December 1974, was his family informed that he would be released upon payment of $4,800 and, if so, was this sum deposited with the Canadian Embassy in Mexico City?

3. Did the Canadian Ambassador advise his family that he would be released in October, 1975?

4. Has he been released?

5. Has his family been informed that unless they pay an additional $2,500 he will be held for another year?

6. Will the Minister of External Affairs make appropriate representations for the immediate release of Mr. Skakie without further payments?

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. James Skakie, a Canadian citizen, was arrested in Mexico on October 14, 1973. In September, 1974, he was sentenced. Under Mexican law, the courts have up to one year from the date of arrest to pronounce sentence, during which time an investigation and trial take place. It is normal for a trial to last from three to ten months.

2. In September, 1974, Mr. Skakie was approached by a private Mexican citizen calling himself Mayor Pena who offered to effect his release for a payment of $4,800. Mr. Skakie informed his family by telephone of this offer. He was strongly advised by the Canadian Embassy not to turn over any money to anyone promising fast release by obviously extra-legal means. Mr. Skakie's lawyer was at this time appealing his sentence through normal legal channels. No sum of $4,800 was ever deposited by the family with the Canadian Embassy.

3. In a letter dated May 15, 1975, to Mr. Morton Shulman, who was enquiring on behalf of the Skakie family, the Canadian Ambassador stated that the Mexican judicial system allows a detainee to be released on grounds of good behaviour after he has served two-thirds of his sentence; accordingly, Mr. Skakie would be eligible for release in October, 1975. It should be noted that release after serving two-thirds of a sentence is not automatic.

4. Mr. Skakie has not been released. He has applied for release on good behaviour and the Mexican authorities are at present considering his application. The Embassy was informed by the Mexican authorities that, owing to a considerable backlog of cases, a decision on reduction of Mr. Skakie's sentence would be delayed.

5. On September 5, 1975, the Embassy was informed by Mr. Skakie's lawyer that an appeal to a higher court had been successful and a bail of $2,500 had been set. If Mr. Skakie agreed to pay this bail, he would be relased from prison and deported, the bail becoming, in effect, a fine. This is a legal concession sometimes granted to foreign prisoners. This information was passed on to the family by the Department of External Affairs. Mr. Skakie was confident, however, that his application for reduction of sentence would be successful and that he would soon be released. He therefore decided not to post the bail. When Mr. Skakie was last contacted by an officer of the Embassy, he was still confident that his application would be successful.

6. The Department of External Affairs and the Canadian Embassy in Mexico have been following this case very closely, and have frequently made representations to the Mexican authorities to ensure that Mr. Skakie obtain his full rights under Mexican law. As Mr. Skakie has been legally tried and sentenced, and as there is no evidence of discrimination against Mr. Skakie, there are no grounds for making representations requesting his immediate release. The Embassy will, however, continue to follow the case and assist Mr. Skakie to effect his release by normal judicial means.

TDA FELLOWSHIP PROGRAM

Question No. 3,809—Mr. Marshall:

1. Has the Department of Transport communicated details of the Development Agency Fellowship Programme for post-graduate studies relating to transportation which offers $4,650 individual awards plus tuition fees to post-graduate students across Canada?

2. Is information available for prospective applicants from Memorial University in Newfoundland and, if so, on what date was the information sent to the University?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Transport Canada advises as follows: 1. The Transportation Development Agency administers the TDA Fellowship Program on behalf of Transport Canada.

2. Due to the Post Office strike the annoucements, posters, booklets, and application forms were sent out by Bankers Dispatch Corporation during the week of November 10. These were sent to Deans of Graduate Studies at 49 Canadian Universities and Colleges. An envelope containing 10 posters, 5 booklets and 5 application forms was sent to Dr. F. A. Aldrich, Dean, Faculty of Graduate Studies, on November 11th, BDC Waybill M614017.

MR. GARRY B. PETTITT

Question No. 3,817—Mr. Brisco:

1. Has Mr. Garry B. Pettitt, SIN No. 451-287-304 ever been charged with a criminal offence and, if so, was forgery one of the charges?

2. Has Mr. Pettitt ever been convicted of a criminal offence?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Information contained in criminal record files is exchanged among authorized law enforcement agencies under authority of the Identification of Criminals Act. Publication of such information beyond these limits could not be made while under protection from criminal or civil liability. To do so could be construed as an invasion of an individual's privacy. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is not in a position to reveal publicly the existence or otherwise of records of criminal charges.

MIRABEL AIRPORT—INTERNATIONAL AIR CARRIERS

Question No. 3,818—Mr. Jelinek:

1. Which of the international air carriers certified to operate in Canada will be based at Mirabel Airport?

2. Which of the airlines have been forced by the government to establish their bases at Mirabel Airport against their wishes?

3. Has the Department of Transport, or any other department, received any communication from the International Air Transport Association on behalf of foreign air carriers who object to being forced to establish their bases at Mirabel Airport?

4. What is the estimated cost of converting facilities at Mirabel and Dorval Airports to accommodate the use of French and English as languages of communication in air traffic control?

5. Will the Minister of Transport provide copies of communications from IATA and/or ICAO containing their opinions of the government's plans to implement French as a language of use in air traffic control at Quebec airports particularly at Mirabel and Dorval Airports?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Aer Lingus, Aeroflot, Aero Mexico, Air Canada, Air France, Alitalia, British Airways, CP Air, Ceskoslovenske Aero, El Al (Israel), Iberia, KLM, Lufthansa, Olympic, Sabena, SAS, Swissair, TAP (Portugal).

2. International carriers were informed in November, 1973 that international operations would all be transferred to Mirabel; there is no record of protest against the move from Dorval.

3. No communications from International Air Transport Association have been received but direct communication from KLM requested assurance of domestic inter-connections.

4. No decision has been made to accommodate the use of French and English as languages in air traffic control at Mirabel and Dorval Airports. The decision will depend upon the successful completion of simulator studies which are being planned to start early in 1976.

5. No communications have been received from IATA and/or ICAO.

IMPLEMENTATION OF FRENCH AS A LANGUAGE OF USE IN COMMUNICATIONS AT AIRPORTS

Question No. 3,819—Mr. Jelinek:

1. Has the Minister of Transport had discussions with the (a) International Civil Aviation Organization (b) International Air Transport Association with respect to the implementation of French as a language of use in air-to-ground and ground-to-air communications at airports in Quebec and (i) if so, in each case, what was their position (ii) if not, for what reason were such discussions not initiated by the government?

2. Were discussions initiated with either ICAO or IATA, or both, with regard to the use of French as a language of communication in air traffic control at Quebec airports, by any department other than DOT and, if so, what were the results?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) and (b) No. (i) Not applicable. (ii) The ICAO position is clearly stated in Annex 10, Section 5.2 Radiotelephony Procedures—Language to be used. 5.2.1.1.1 Recommendation—In general, the air-ground radio-telephony communications should be conducted in the language normally used by the station on the ground. 5.2.1.1.2 Recommendation—Pending the development and adoption of a more suitable form of speech for universal use in aeronautical radiotelephony communications, the English language should be used as such and should be available, on request from any aircraft station unable to comply with 5.2.1.1.1, at all stations on the ground serving designated airports and routes used by international air services. The IATA is an association of international air carriers which concerns itself primarily with economic factors in international aviation and it is not customary or practical for States to consult with such organizations in matters such as operational safety standards which are adequately served by ICAO.

2. Transport Canada is not aware of any discussions by any department with, IATA or ICAO, on the use of French as a language in air-ground communications.

2. Does the document indicate that it is government policy to prohibit Anglophones who are bilingual from working within what have been classified as "Units Working in French" and, if so, for what reason?

3. Are steps being taken to end this discrimination and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) to (d) No such circular is known to have been issued during or around October, 1975 within Transport Canada.

HALIFAX RELIEF COMMISSION ACT

MEASURE TO REPEAL ACT AND TO AUTHORIZE CONTINUATION OF PENSIONS PAID BY COMMISSION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-78, to repeal an act respecting the Halifax Relief Commission and to authorize the continuation of pensions, grants or allowances paid by the Halifax Relief Commission, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a speech.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member is anxious to get on with the debate, but perhaps we could put the third reading motion first. When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this bill required little discussion at the second reading stage on Friday, December 12. It was dealt with expeditiously in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, to which it was referred and in which it was discussed on Tuesday, December 16. Likewise, I believe it will be dealt with in a few minutes this afternoon.

Mr. Stanfield: Don't be too sure, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is one point which I raised at the second reading stage on December 12 which was dealt with in committee and concerning which I want the position to be very clear. This bill relates to the payment of pensions to persons who are still living as survivors of the Halifax explosion of 1917. Originally, some 1,600 or 1,700 persons were killed in that explosion and some 10,000 were injured. Over the years a good deal of money has been paid out in pensions, but according to the last report, the number still alive and drawing pensions is now down to 65.

When we debated this bill at second reading I expressed concern as to whether the Canadian Pension Commission, which will administer these pensions, from now on, would be a body authorized merely to pay out the pensions in amounts already determined or whether that commission would have authority to escalate pensions in accordance with the rise in the cost of living. I wanted to know whether it would have authority to deal with any new applications on the part of survivors, if there should be such new applications. During my speech on Friday, December 12, 1975, I asked these questions, as noted on page 9985 of Hansard. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Trudel) rather disturbed me with what he said. He noted that I had asked my question, that there had been similar questions put by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), and then he said, as noted on page 9986:

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was particularly concerned about that point—

He was referring to the point concerning pension payments being escalated because of the rise in the cost of living. He went on to say:

—although the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants would also like to see the matter of pensions reviewed. I am wondering if this bill would permit such a review, or the inclusion of new people who are still suffering and are seeking some consideration. From my reading of the bill I am not aware of such possibilities. However, this point can best be raised in committee.

I am more or less satisfied with what was said in committee a few days later, and I shall quote the evidence given before the committee in a moment. But I feel that the questions I raised in this House should not rest with the negative statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. As I said, the committee dealt with this matter on Tuesday, December 16. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants referred to the questions which both he and I had asked. He was answered by Mr. Allan O. Solomon, chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission, the body which will administer these pensions in the future. Mr. Solomon said, as reported on page 79:14 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs:

Mr. Chairman, we have—or we will have—from the Halifax Relief Commission the formulas which they have been using, and which they established some years ago. I would anticipate that we would use those formulas as a starter and from there, depending again on how much money there is available for the purpose, we would eventually try to evolve a formula which we feel would be fair to all concerned, and try to relate as much as possible to the disability pensions which we pay for similar types of cases on the war disabled.

Then the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants asked this supplementary question:

Would the pensioners, Mr. Chairman, be then on a similar footing as say somebody who had suffered severe injury in the trenches in the first world war?

Mr. Solomon replied:

They are not on a similar footing financially now, and it is hard to say of course in advance if they would become on a similar footing later. But certainly we would hope to bring them as close together as we possibly can.

The answer given by the chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission is reassuring, and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance said more or less the same thing, but in different words, when the matter was before the committee. The issue, as we all know, is important. There are now not more than 65 persons drawing these pensions. Some of us are in touch with some of these persons. On December 12 I mentioned a boy, four years old, who was blinded in the Halifax explosion of 1917 and who has been blind for 58 or more years. He is now approximately 62 years old. This man's pension has been increased a bit during the years, but has not kept pace with the rise in the cost of living; nor has it kept pace with what has happened to war disability pensions.

I think we all agree that those who suffered from the Halifax explosion of 1917 were, in effect, in the front line of World War I and that they should be treated that way. I know that veterans' organizations in this country feel that way, and Mr. Solomon and the other members of the Canadian Pension Commission feel that way as well.

I am not asking that there be an announcement in the House that these pensions will increase by a certain percentage, or what have you. However, I would like the matter to be clear. Since the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance is here and has not yet spoken at the third reading stage, he can speak now and I hope he will make it clear that under this legislation the Canadian Pension Commission has the authority that Mr. Solomon said to the committee he believes the commission has.

As I pointed out when I spoke on December 12, I do not think it is good enough for us to make the Canadian Pension Commission a bookkeeping agency that merely carries on what has been decided, because it is a dynamic situation; there are these 65 people still alive and there could be situations in which survivors with dependants might be making new applications for pensions. I want the Canadian Pension Commission to have the same authority to consider new applications and to review the levels of pensions arising from the Halifax explosion that it has with respect to war disability pensions generally.

I am sure I speak for all who are interested in this matter, interested because some come from that area or interested because some of us actually remember at least the news of that terrible explosion in 1917. We applaud the decision to find some other means than now exist for carrying on this work. We think the decision to have the Canadian Pension Commission handle the matter is wise and we support it. We also approve of the provision in the legislation that says that when the job is all done, when there are no more survivors and no more pensions to be paid out, any money left over is to go back to Halifax for further rehabilitative work in areas of Halifax that were affected by the explosion.

I do not want to suggest that I am older than members of this House think I am, but for those of us who remember that catastrophic event it is interesting to know that this work of humanitarian mercy has gone on over these many years. We are glad to know that it will be carried on as long as it is necessary. However, we hope the word will get out to those who are survivors that if they have a case for a higher level of pension than they are now receiving, the Canadian Pension Commission will have authority to deal with their claims.

I am sure all of us in the House are ready to support this bill and give it third reading. However, I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance will in fact welcome the opportunity I am giving him to correct the statement he made on second reading, and make clear that under the legislation the Canadian Pension Commission will have the authority that Mr. Solomon seemed to think it would have once Bill C-78 has been passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I join the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who voiced some concern about the answer I gave in the month of December last at the time he was asking questions. I did say that those questions could certainly be answered in committee. As he indicated himself, Mr. Solomon who appeared before the committee at that time answered as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said he did. At that time, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) was asking the same questions, and I think that he too had the same concerns. He was concerned, hoping that people who had really suffered and who were suffering or who had an aggravation of the injuries they had sustained at the time of the explosion or after could turn to the Halifax Relief Commission and ask for a revision of their case to get some increase in their pensions.

I think Mr. Solomon answered very well, and quite clearly. Contrary perhaps to the doubts I had expressed in this House he voiced an opinion that was clear and specific, and that must be noted, as the hon. member did.

As to the distribution of the amounts of money that could remain after all the pensions will be paid out, there is clear agreement, the legislation is quite clear about that. There is no doubt that the funds will be well used to improve the city of Halifax or the surroundings where the explosion took place.

The hon. member also pointed out something about the new distribution of the funds. I think that happened in the past, and we were always interested in relieving the people who were referred to us. However, I do not think I left the impression that there had been changes in that respect. I think that Mr. Solomon was quite clear, that his interpretation is still the same, that the people of the Canadian Pension Commission are becoming administrators, that there had been no change of policy in the government position but only new administrators. I agree with the interpretation the hon. member kindly gave of the remarks made by Mr. Solomon, and I think that all members want at least relief for those who suffer, even if the number is restricted. I think that the sufferings of those people are much greater than what one imagines, and I ask for the sympathy of all members of this House.

[English]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize two or three points to supplement what was said at second reading stage by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), what was said in committee, and what was said in the House this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In my judgment, the Pension Commission should interpret clause 2(3) generously. That is the clause the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been discussing. I assume it gives the Pension Commission power to pay pensions to applicants for the first time and to adjust the level of existing pensions.

A great deal of time has gone by since the catastrophe in 1917. With the passage of time, cost of living increases and other factors, it is imperative that those responsible for administering these pensions review their level urgently and frequently. In addition, the Pension Commission must be prepared to receive sympathetically new applications and, indeed, applications which the Halifax Relief Commission may have turned down, because nobody is beyond mistake. I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of the Pension Commission approaching with an open mind applications which may come before it. It must not approach an application on the basis that it had been dealt with already by the Halifax Relief Commission on some day gone by.

In the interests of those who suffered from the explosion, or believe they did, it is important that they not only be dealt with fairly but believe they are being dealt with fairly. It is my hope that the Pension Commission will review the level of existing pensions urgently and frequently and will approach new applications with an open mind, including any that may have been rejected earlier by the Halifax Relief Commission.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said he would be pleased to suggest ways of disposing of any money which might be left over after the needs of pensioners, or potential pensioners, had been looked after. I wish to emphasize that the aim should be not to have anything left over, and I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would agree with me. The aim should be to see that the money which was set aside for the purpose is used in its entirety to help those who suffered in the Halifax explosion. I hope the Pension Commission will not worry about having money left over, in terms of helping the part of the city which was damaged, desirable though that might be. I repeat, without apology, that the Pension Commission should approach its task on the basis that the money should be made available to those who suffered as a result of that catastrophe in 1917.

I should like to emphasize, too, that the Pension Commission should take special measures to ensure that there is adequate liaison in the Halifax area to serve the needs of the pensioners and those who may for one reason or another feel it desirable to make application to the commission under the bill before us. It is important that these men and women receive adequate service and that there be satisfactory liaison arrangements on the spot. Indeed, I would go so far as to say that the Pension Commission should associate with itself, in the discharge of these responsibilities, some well informed person from the Halifax area, not for the purpose of continuing to ensure that the commission continue to apply the same principles and follow the same practice as the Halifax Relief Commission—this might not be desirable in every case—but, rather, for the purpose of making certain that the commission and those dealing with applications are fully familiar with the local circumstances affecting cases.

I shall not keep the House any longer. I am prepared to have the bill passed on third reading on the basis that the commission will be fully authorized to increase existing pensions or to grant new pensions where it sees fit. As I resume my seat, I mention again the importance of the Pension Commission adopting the attitude that this money is for the benefit of those injured in the explosion of 1917, and I hope the commission will not worry about trying to leave money over for some other purpose, desirable though that other purpose might be.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE STABILIZATION OF NET PROCEEDS FROM THE PRODUCTION AND SALE OF WESTERN GRAIN

The House resumed, from Friday, December 12, 1975, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-41, respecting the stabilization of net proceeds from the production and sale of western grain and to amend certain statutes in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate in this third reading debate following some of my colleagues, notably the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), who also made a proposal, and the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton) who made another proposal. This proposal was put forward by the members of our party in the hope that the government might, even at this point, reconsider its position. If they must go through with the bill in its present form, unacceptable though it is, they might within a year draft amendments or, if necessary, redraft the bill in such a way as to meet the requirements of those for whom it is intended. At the same time, it could be presented in such a way as to be understandable to the producers themselves.

The legislation before us embodies many shortcomings. Some of these were pointed out in the course of previous debates. I have just mentioned one of them: nobody understands it. It provides for payments to producers despite the fact that they might not need payments in a particular year. In fact, payments might be a disadvantage to them because they might find themselves in a higher income tax bracket. Conversely, payments are not made in years when they are really needed. Payments to those who qualify are made a year late, and that is not when they need the money; they need the money during times of depressed prices, low sales, or while the effects of natural hazards are being felt.

To remedy a few of these shortcomings, I should like to put before the House what I consider to be a proposal which should be considered. It would meet many of the objections I have noted with regard both to this bill and to the previous bill, the original Bill C-71, which was stillborn. The bill before us looks as though it might be born, but it will require immediate surgery; it will require blood transfusions and it will certainly require a lot of attention. The proposal I am about to put forward is one which I believe should be carefully considered and one which will be placed before my constituents and all others who care to participate in a discussion of this nature. I hope it will be picked up by other members of our agricultural caucus and perhaps amended or changed to suit local requirements, and thereafter will become part of a Conservative plank in our agricultural platform in years to come.

What I am proposing is a cash assurance program. Everything seems to have a short form nowadays, and if hon. members wish, they can simplify that title by calling it CAP. I think this proposal will, in time, perhaps eliminate the need for several programs now in existence. For example, my proposal would incorporate the cash advance and crop insurance programs. The scheme could be expanded so that not only grain but cattle sales and sales of other agricultural products could be included, whether in western Canada or any other part of Canada. Although initially we included only grain sales in the three prairie provinces, my proposal could be worked out in such a way as to include other areas of Canada once the rough spots have been ironed out.

My proposal would also provide an annuity for those who may not qualify for any payment. This would overcome another objection. Any producer participating in the scheme whose income exceeded the maximum would, under the proposal of the minister, not qualify for any payment. My proposal would be this: rather than the 2 per cent suggested by the minister, the annual contribution by any producer initially would be 3 per cent at least; it could be even more. Since the government is willing to pay $2 for every $1 paid by the producer, I would adopt this principle so that the government pays double the producers' amount into the fund. Indeed, contributions could be increased. Taking into account the fact that at the present time the government is proposing a 2 per cent levy on all grain sales, and that any producer with crop insurance coverage pays a premium of 4 per cent to 5 per cent of his total grain receipts, this really amounts to 7 per cent in premium.

My suggestion would be that the producer should pay 3 per cent. Since the government contributes 6 per cent, this would mean a combined premium of 9 per cent of total grain sales. At the present time, crop insurance premiums are approximately 10 per cent of total coverage. Since the government pays half the premium, this means the producer is paying roughly 5 per cent. Thus, producers would have no hesitation in paying up to 5 per cent, or whatever percentage was required, so long as they received money when they required it, that they did not receive payments when their incomes were high, and that each individual producer was considered, on merit or amount of production, and they would have an annuity if not receiving other benefits.

A look at the table of rates of premium for crop insurance discloses that the premiums, as a percentage of total coverage, drop as the number of farmers participating increases. Starting from about 1971, the premiums were roughly 15 per cent of total coverage. They went down to 13 per cent, stayed there for a little while and then dropped to 12. For 1975-76, they are down to about 10 per cent of total coverage. This represents an involvement of 93,000 farmers from 46,000 in 1971.

My proposal would be universal, because every farmer would have to contribute. At the present time, some would back away from this because there is a maximum and they would have nothing to show for their contributions when they retire. All they are being asked to do is to put money into the fund, which is a bottomless well, but my proposal takes into account producers who might reap no benefit over their years of operation. I have set, arbitrarily, the maximum amount of assurance at $30,000. This could be adjusted and is a matter for further consideration, but for the sake of my argument this afternoon I have set it at $30,000. If production increases, this maximum could be increased to $35,000 or $40,000.

The averaging rate would be the average income of the previous five years. As soon as a producer has taken off his harvest, he can proceed in the same way as under the cash advance legislation, go to the fund and withdraw the whole of his five-year average, or 90 per cent of it or 80 per cent. The only restriction I impose is that the withdrawal should be in denominations of 10, to make the calculation easier. The advance could be repaid at the same rate as the percentage taken out. In other words, assuming a producer's five-year average was $10,000, if he withdrew only $5,000 the repayment on any sale he makes would be at the rate of 50 per cent. If he withdrew only $2,000, his repayment rate would be 20 per cent of total crop sales. If he made a $200 sale of grain, 20 per cent of the amount would be deducted, plus the 3 per cent premium or whatever rate was established as repayment for that particular year.

This proposal would provide farmers, or producers, with the necessary cash, which is why I call it a cash assurance program. A farmer who knows his production for a particular year, and therefore his cash requirements—which can be calculated very readily—can go to the fund at a time when he needs money, rather than wait a year before his receipts can be calculated, and then perhaps receive a payment the following year when he may have a bumper crop or sales have boomed. Under my proposal for cash assurance, the producers could have cash when they required it.

During periods of low income there would be a forgiveness provision. This would be calculated the following year, since one would not know one's total receipts for the year beforehand. The amount of forgiveness would be at the rate of 9 per cent. We have the 3 per cent that the farmer contributes during the year if his cash receipts are low, and we have the 6 per cent that the government is prepared to contribute, and this is the two for one basis that the government is proposing. In other words, if a farmer's five-year average was $10,000, the forgiveness for that year would be at the rate of 9 per cent, or $900. If sales were $9,100 for that particular year, there would be a $900 payment made to him. If, for example, his sales were $9,800 and his five-year average was $10,000, his forgiveness for that one year would only be $200. In other words, this would not be a flat, across the board payment, but would depend upon the amount of the sales in the particular year.

Let me give another example. If the five-year average was $10,000, and the producer's sales were only $5,000, the amount required to bring his income up to the five-year average would be another $5,000, so his forgiveness would be $900. Therefore, the amount that would be carried forward would be in the form of a loan in the amount of $4,100.

This fund would be a loan scheme and an assistance scheme at the same time. It would also include annuity features to the benefit of those farmers making contributions but not benefitting. For example, the $4,100 would be carried forward following the end of the crop year, with a further six-month period of grace within which it could be repaid. If the amount had not been fully repaid, then interest charges would be added at the rate of perhaps 10 per cent, or perhaps the rate of interest for the average bond or the rate at which the government is borrowing its money.

All we will be doing is setting up a fund from which the farmers, the producers, can get money when they need it. In this way, they would not be taking out money each year and investing it in some other area, perhaps making more money in that way, while the government is searching out other sources of money supply. The producers would have a responsibility under this fund. They would have to pay a penalty of perhaps 10 per cent in respect of any unpaid advances. If, at the end of the year, a producer had quit farming or had retired without repaying the entire amount of the advances, an additional penalty or charge of 1.5 per cent per month could be added. In other words, there would be this inducement to the producer to make payments into the fund. This would be particularly true if a producer left farming and was no longer making sales from which advances could be taken, because there would be this penalty or charge of 1.5 per cent per month on the unpaid balance. These charges could be made until the entire amount of the advance had been repaid.

The scheme would also contain a provision for complete repayment in one lump sum. For example, if a producer had $4,100 lying around, not being used, he could pay off the entire advance without having the repayment related directly to 20 per cent or 50 per cent of his sales. Let us assume there are some people who have incomes which average over $30,000, or whatever the amount might be per year. They would not be eligible for advance payments or loans from this fund. After a five-year period during which a producer had not received an advance or a loan, it would become obvious that he was not a burden on the fund: he would be making contributions all the time, and in this event his contributions would automatically be reduced.

Perhaps after five years without an advance being made to the producer, his premium rate could drop to 15 per cent or perhaps 12 per cent. The producer would continue to pay the premium, but this adjustment or refund could be made by way of a cheque. After five years, or perhaps eight years, the premium rate could drop from 15 per cent to perhaps 12 per cent, and so on. In other words, the premium rate would continue to go down. I think all crop insurance schemes have a premium reduction feature built into them, and perhaps the people who operate those schemes could be of assistance to us in this regard. We could take advantage of their knowledge and experience as to the best way of repaying these benefits to the contributor. Obviously there will be some producers who will not draw benefits or take advantage of the scheme because their annual income is better than the five-year average. Perhaps they will just prefer not to take the cash assurance payment. There will be some people whose income will be lower than the average but they will manage to get by without the advances. These producers should be granted something similar to a bond status. Since the plan would be universal, all producers would be making contributions. This could be extended to apply to all farm sales, including grain, potatoes, cattle, fruits and other agricultural produce.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

It goes without saying that all producer sales must be recorded in a production book, including farm to farm sales. It would be absolutely essential to have a complete accounting. Since there would be many who would not take advantage of the benefits, there would be a build-up of funds. Many of these people might feel they were getting nothing for the contributions they were making to the fund. These people, under this scheme, would be making contributions on which interest would be paid. This would be an advantage to those who left the money in. Upon retirement, or perhaps after ten years of contribution, these people would be able to withdraw their equity in the fund. This would obviously be an incentive even to those who had never taken advantage of the scheme.

In the initial stages, everyone would be asked to make contributions in order to build up the fund. I am sure every farmer would be prepared to make such contributions in order to assist his fellow farmer, knowing full well that there may come a time when he will need assistance. This is just like the situation with crop insurance; a farmer may insure for year after year and never be required to draw on the plan. Perhaps he drops his crop insurance, and the next year experiences a crop failure. I am sure producers would have no hesitation in making contributions to such a scheme. This would be particularly true if they knew their funds were increasing in value through the payment of interest. They would have the advantage of being able to withdraw their equity after a period of time, increased by the amount of interest paid perhaps based on the average government bond rate.

I suggest my plan takes into account the complaints we often hear from people who say they derive no benefit from such schemes. In summary, let me recite some of the advantages of this scheme. We could eliminate the need for crop insurance and have participation by everyone. There has always been hesitancy on the part of some to participate in crop insurance plans. I am sure there would not be the same hesitancy on the part of producers to contribute to this type of plan.

● (1600)

Second, there would be universal participation, which could eliminate the need for crop insurance and for cash advances because cash advances and the crop insurance idea would be incorporated. Third, the plan could be expanded to include grains, cattle and other products, and all farmers in Canada. Fourth, it would provide at least an average income to each farmer every year: in other words, there would be stability of income. It would be for the producer to determine whether or not to participate if his average was below the five-year average; the onus would be on him. This would eliminate, at a time when disaster strikes, the need for petitions to be submitted to the government and the government finding itself in the awkward position of treating these people as if they were an underprivileged group asking for a hand-out.

Fifth, there would be an incentive to produce and carry on good farming economics, because as sales increase even over the five-year average, so does the average income increase. There would be an incentive for the farmer to produce over and above his five-year average and not wait for a forgiveness, because if his sales are over the five-year average, his next year's average and eligibility would increase. Sixth, no premiums would be collected during low-income periods. I am suggesting that there be this forgiveness amount which I have already calculated. At a time when money is needed, the producer should not be asked to pay premiums. The difference is that under the proposal of the government, at a time when there is most need, an additional half per cent is added. That is an absolutely backward step.

Seventh—and this is a very important point—each producer would know precisely how to calculate his five-year average using total sales during this period, including farm to farm sales. Even to this date, despite all the studies carried out; most members of the House still are unable to figure out the formula. All that would need to be done under this proposal would be to tabulate the total sales over the past five years and work out the average. This would make it possible for people to learn what they might expect. Eighth, if no assurance payment is taken, premiums would be reduced. In other words, there would be an incentive not to take any money, because the premiums would be lower. Ninth, it does not pay producers to increase revenue during periods of high income and then have to repay the money in the form of income tax, at higher income tax rates. Producers would have a forgiveness provision and assured income during depressed periods, all economic factors considered.

What will happen under the government's proposal is that if the producers have a bad year, according to the way the minister has figured it out now, the calculation will be made a year later, and if in the meantime they make large sales and received payments, all the money will go back to the government in the form of income tax at higher rates. In my proposal there is an attempt to avoid this. Tenth, to those who do not benefit directly, this proposal assures a return on equity while the producers would be involved in a plan which would help others in need in the industry.

In other words, under the proposal I am putting forward if, for one reason or another, because of regulations, the fact that they do not wish to participate or because their sales continually increase because of good management, good luck or what have you, they do not need to take any funds out, then they should be paid not only their equity because it was used to finance others, but should be paid at the bond rate or at some other figure that would be reasonably close to the bond rate for that period.

I have set forward what I believe is a proposal which takes into account the majority of the objections heard by members of the committee when they travelled to western Canada. I think the plan is considerably simplified. It eliminates the need for two other different schemes. It takes into account the objections of those who felt there was no advantage to them. I think that this proposal, if it is not acceptable to the government at this time, should be placed on the record for the benefit of those who may wish to consider it. There may be those who would wish to amend it. Unlike the minister, I would be only too glad to receive suggestions concerning improvements.

I believe I have covered the majority of the objections which have been presented to date. I believe there is a need for some sort of cash assurance program, but I certainly do not believe it should be the type of proposal the minister has put forward. The proposal of the minister is confusing and at times would place the farmer in a dilemma. It will not meet the requirements of the western producer. I hope my proposal will be given consideration. I hope that in the months to come the farm groups will consider it, and prior to the next election we may put it forward in a polished and refined form if the minister does not accept these changes now.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few moments of the time of the House to register the reason I cannot support this bill. The bill might have been of some value had it been oriented differently and had got to the nub of the problem, which is how to stabilize the individual farmer's income at a time when he needs it. This stabilization bill does not recognize that the western grain industry is made up of some 200,000 farmers or managers. It treats them as if they were one incorporated whole.

This bill would waste a great deal of money that could be used in a better way. This type of bill would be more suitable if the industry were dominated by two or three large corporations or production units, as is the case in respect of the automobile industry. However, this is not the case. The agricultural industry is made of many individual units. I think this is the weakest part of the bill. It will not meet the needs of the producers for a very long time and certainly will be subject to change.

Furthermore, taking in the six main grains and oilseeds upon which the pay-out is based and the premiums deducted really assumes that all farmers in the grain growing areas of the prairies have the same farming practices. Of course, this is not so. There are very large farms, but with a great deal of difference in productivity one from the other, this diversification, in the long run, makes for a very good agricultural industry, which is much better than any of the monolithic structures such as those of the U.S.S.R. The bill does not recognize the great difference between the individual farmers concerned.

As one who comes from a parkland area, I must say that the mechanics of the pay-out will tend to discriminate against those who farm and live in the parkland areas of the various provinces. The reason for this is quite obvious. The production of wheat there is not as great, compared with the production of coarse grains, barley, oats and oilseeds, as it is in southern Saskatchewan, parts of southern Manitoba, and Alberta. Yet the condition which will trigger the pay-out will largely be set by the situation with regard to wheat, because wheat accounts for something like 70 per cent of the total grains income covered by this bill. Because the plan makes no allowance for the fact that while wheat is the dominant grain involved, individual producers of oilseeds and coarse grains, particularly in the parkland areas, could find their incomes reduced, but if the wheat income remained high, there would be no pay-out whatsoever.

This stabilization bill is an attempt to correlate and consolidate the many different plans which have been introduced in the last 25 or 30 years to provide a measure of stabilization to the grain industry. For instance, PFAA dates back to 1939 or 1940. I think, on the whole, that program was reasonably successful for its time, and I still think that elements of PFAA should have remained on the legislative books, because I found it was especially effective in helping very small producers. While many of these small producers may, in a sense, be social problems, they are very necessary in adding to the sum total of farming; but they are not likely to take advantage of this program. PFAA did help the very small producer who never got around to buying crop insurance and who was not a good enough manager to take care of things as well as he should. He found that PFAA was very useful to him.

Acreage payments were quite effective in many ways. They did not come automatically every year; therefore, they did not have built into them the system which the stabilization bill will have—an increase in the saleability of land. In other words, the capital cost will eventually reflect the amount of money paid out under this plan. The assistance on storage of grain which costs, relatively, a lot of money and which it was alleged made the grain handling companies storers of grain rather than sellers, contributed a good deal of money which presumably assisted farmers. It cost the federal treasury a fair amount of money. Presumably, some or most of it eventually benefited farmers because it at least took the grain off their hands; and as most grain handling companies belonged to the farmers, most farmers should have benefited in the long run.

This grain stabilization program will not be a very effective method of providing much money where it is needed. According to some research on the effect this bill would have had on the plan had it been in effect over the last 20 years, it would have given to the farm industry an average of some $50 million per year, whereas under various programs, various governments have already paid out an average of over $70 million per year. So grain stabilization, which is supposed to improve all the earlier plans, will in fact contribute less money than was paid out under them.

Of course, the dollar value in years to come will be greater, but that will only be because of the inflation factor. In addition, this $50 million payment assumes that everyone is in the plan. There are many things wrong with the plan and a large number of producers will not find it in their interests to participate in it. Quite likely it will be much less than the equivalent of the $50 million which I mentioned. It is more likely that about one-half to two-thirds of that amount will be paid out. Unless and until a stabilization plan is introduced which will deal with the problems of individual producers and will allow them to draw on the program when they need to, that is, when their economic conditions are such as to warrant pay-outs, it will be of no great value. In the future perhaps this plan could be expanded for the individual producer in some manner; only then will it become a useful tool to aid producers in distress.

During the early 1950s, when atomic bombs were being made, we heard a great deal from the Americans about more bang for the buck, which meant they wanted to make atomic bombs in the cheapest way possible. This type of program will mean a lot of bucks for a small bang, because it does not single out the needs of the individual producer and separate him from the mass. For those producers who want to opt out, the government is obviously not making it very easy. I am told they will have to write to the Canada Grains Commission in Winnipeg. At a meeting in Regina a week or two ago, that is what an official from the minister's department said. However, there will be no soliciting and no reminding individuals that if they wish to opt out, they have the right, and they will not be told who they should contact. This is typical of the sleight of hand of government departments and some governments.

Each producer will have to make up his own mind whether he should stay in the plan. Frankly, for the older producer who may be retiring in another ten years or so, there does not seem to be much advantage in staying in the plan. There is no provision for recovery of premiums at death, or retirement from farming, although I believe there would be a benefit for two years after ceasing farming, or a producer could sell. However, it will be a very nebulous thing to sell his land because of the relatively small amount of value it will carry. If there were a better provision for recovery of premiums at death or upon retirement, this bill might be more acceptable. In particular, I wish to direct the attention of the House to the fact that producers must make their own decisions.

The minister has failed, in this legislation, to provide a reasonable solution to the problem, because he has insisted that a global plan is the only plan which can be introduced, when in fact it must be related to the needs of the individual farmer before it will reach its greatest value to the grain industry. We have crop insurance which is based on the individual. Why not introduce a plan that would allow the individual farmer to capitalize on the program and use it to best advantage when he needs it, rather than give him a large amount of money? That might often fall in the best year he ever had, and then he would have to give it back to the government through income tax. I would predict that this plan, tied to the global plan as opposed to the individual plan, will return, through income tax, a large portion of the money paid out. I think we must consider, first of all, what is best for the individual and what it will take to bring him through a tough economic period.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us for third reading is one that we have dealt with in this House, off and on, for the past six years. As a new member in 1968, it was one of the first pieces of legislation that I dealt with, and I believe in 1969 or 1970 we had first reading of the old stabilization bill. We all know the history of that bill, Mr. Speaker. It was opposed by every farm organization, wheat pool, the Federation of Agriculture and the Farmers' Union, as well as by this party and the Conservative party. As a result, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board was forced to withdraw it. Now we have the daughter of that bill, in different form. I think this one is better than the old bill because it recognizes a few of the deficiencies in the old bill, but still there are some things which need to be improved, and in this third reading debate I want to point out a couple of them.

For years this party has said that in this country we need a universal farm stabilization bill to cover all commodities. For years, too, the farmer has faced the problem of fluctuating income. He never knows what he will receive for his crop when he plants in the spring, or what he will receive for a hog when it matures. I think it is our responsibility, as parliamentarians, along with provincial legislators, to devise a scheme whereby the ups and downs in the market pattern are smoothed out for the producer, so that he will know at the beginning of the year what income he is likely to receive. From growing up on a farm, and through my experience in representing a rural riding, I know the farmer would produce a lot more food than he is at present if he could be assured of the price he would receive.

Mr. Speaker, I was shocked by a comment made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) today, to the effect that there is too much dairy production in this country, too much skimmed milk, and that the world cannot use any more. If we have the capacity to produce, it should be an objective of the Department of External Affairs and our foreign aid programs to encourage farmers to produce as much food as possible can, to help feed the hungry of the world as well as a lot of people in this country. A few months ago a report on poor children pointed out that many in this country are not receiving adequate nutrition.

When we talk about the stabilization of farm income in this country, we should also talk about a food policy. I am very concerned that in 10 or 15 years, unless we start a national plan to maximize production, build storage capacity and a delivery system, we may face a shortage of food in this country. The Minister of Agriculture has said that he does not like to see eggs go rotten, or a surplus of powdered milk, but we could not deliver them to Bangladesh or other countries which need them. That is a sad commentary on a society that can produce tons and tons of surplus food but cannot deliver it to areas of the world where people are dying of malnutrition, and cannot even deliver it to the children of this country who are suffering from malnutrition because there is not adequate milk or food in the school system.

We talk about stabilization of farm income in this country and say it is a worthy objective, but the only way we will get it is through a program that will guarantee the farmer a stable price for his produce. There are many examples of farmers who would like to produce hogs, for example, or to expand or diversify, but they dare not because prices are depressed or because of the uncertainty of the market. They cannot afford to make a huge initial capital investment under these circumstances. Your Honour is aware of many of these problems, coming, as you do, from a riding in the centre of the huge farm belt in southwestern Ontario.

As parliamentarians, we should be able to provide farmers with the same security as other people in this country. The worker has the trade unions to bargain for him, he has unemployment insurance plans, and so on. The business community has all kinds of guarantees. The Conservative party gets upset when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) makes a revelation that any idiot knows is true, that the free market no longer exists. We all know that there are many kinds of support for the business community. There ought to be adequate support for the farm population as well. This party has spoken of farm income stabilization, marketing boards, maximizing production, more adequate world aid programs, food banks, and so on. I believe this bill takes only a small step in that direction. There are many principles that should be incorporated in an adequate farm income stabilization program.

Since this Minister of Agriculture took office there has been no sign of a long-term agricultural policy for the country. There have been only ad hoc measures. There has been no concerted effort, and no indication of the direction the minister intends to take us. We get bits and pieces of various programs, but no long-term program. When the bill was introduced, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board called it a significant step. In a paper issued by his office in September, 1974, he said he had four general objectives for the plan. I should like to go over them and point out some of the deficiencies in the bill.

The minister said that he wanted to protect grain producers in designated areas from uncertainty and variation of return due to temporary market fluctuations. Such an objective is honourable. The minister is talking about this plan as an income insurance plan. He is going to average cash flow for farmers for any particular year over the previous five years. It is an honourable objective, but I am afraid the plan does not live up to it. The way payments are made out of the plan can affect a lot of farmers in this country. The plan is based on aggregate income. This means that if the aggregate income applying to growers of the six grades of grain falls below the previous five-year average, there will be a pay-out to all participants in the plan. That sounds good. But what is to happen to rapeseed growers if the bottom falls out of the rapeseed market? I suggest that if the bottom of the rapeseed market falls out, even though the price of wheat may go up, or the price of the other five commodities remains stable or goes up, the rapeseed producer will not receive a pay-out even though his income may decline drastically. That will be the effect of applying the average. You take into account the price of all grains. Wheat is the dominant grain, and the price of wheat may go up or down. But the rapeseed market may decline and the rapeseed grower will not get a pay-out from the plan. That is unfair.

The plan lacks flexibility. Farmers in Yorkton-Melville whose income declines because they have produced a lower grade of wheat, or because the market price for their wheat has gone down, will not get compensation if the average price for the other grains remains high. Of course, the converse is also true. Suppose world rapeseed prices are buoyant but wheat prices are coming down. If the average price, taken over the previous five years, of all grains produced under the plan falls below the five-year average, there will be a pay-out not just to wheat producers but to producers of other commodities including producers of rapeseed. That shows the type of logic behind the plan.

Let me draw an analogy which may help to explain some of the serious questions concerning this plan. Let us suppose unemployment insurance worked the same way. We would look at the total income of all working people of this country and, after taking into account increases in the cost of living and other factors such as the inflation rate, if it were found that the income of workers in Canada had fallen below that of the previous five-year average, the unemployment insurance fund would make payments. It would not make it just to the unemployed, but to all Canadian workers, including high school teachers, clerks, factory workers, and so on. The payment would be made to all, no matter if they were employed or unemployed. It would be made even to members of parliament if they were to pay unemployment insurance, which they do not. But the point is this: all those who had contributed to the plan would receive a payment from the plan. Payment would be based on the amount paid in.

Another section of the bill says that payments from the stabilization plan are to be proportionate to the amount you contribute. As I say, if this were true for unemployment insurance, the worker who had been unemployed for a good part of the year would receive little help, because his contributions were small, whereas the man who had been employed all year would receive a large pay-out from the fund. Clearly, this bill is inconsistent with other stabilization plans enacted in this country.

What would happen if the medicare scheme were applied on the same basis? Take the man who needs expensive, open-heart surgery and runs up huge medical bills. At the end of the year he would only be partially compensated by the plan because his payments in had been low, whereas, say the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) who goes into hospital for treatment of a hanging toenail—

Mr. Benjamin: Ten hanging toenails.

Mr. Nystrom: —or ten hanging toenails, as the hon. member says, he can get his condition corrected and the payment out under the plan would more than cover it, while it would not nearly cover open-heart surgery. That is the type of plan being foisted on the farmers of the prairie region. Or, suppose automobile insurance was applied that way. I have not had an accident for a long time, fortunately, but let us say I receive compensation and there is a pay-out from the automobile insurance plan in Saskatchewan. I get it from somebody, say. But the driver who may have written off his car, been involved in court cases and had to compensate somebody else for bodily injury, would receive only a small pittance as a pay-out from the automobile insurance plan of Saskatchewan, if that plan worked as this plan will. That is the philosophy behind this plan.

As I said previously, the bottom may fall out of the rapeseed market and the income of rapeseed growers of my riding may fall. But at the same time the price of the other grains mentioned in the bill may stay high. Because the plan considers the aggregate price of all six grains, rapeseed producers will not get a pay-out even though they have suffered. That is not fair. What would happen if we operated medicare, unemployment insurance, automobile insurance and the educational system in accordance with the philosophy contained in this bill?

Incomes across the prairies fluctuate. Your are talking not just about one province; you are talking about Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Peace River country of British Columbia. You will see many fluctuations in types of crops and soil and the application of various cost factors. In one part of the prairies you may see bumper crops and in another part poor crops. The people of southwestern Saskatchewan may enjoy bumper crops and high prices, but there could be a crop failure in some other area and the bottom may fall out of the price for the grains grown there. It would happen, under this plan, that not only those losing money would get a pay-out; those raking it in would also get it. It is the plan's lack of flexibility to which I object.

I submit that with some additional cost—and perhaps a few administrative headaches—the plan could be made flexible. It could be one which all farmers would be happy to join. This would encourage farmers to produce food not only for this country but for all the people of the world. But this plan does not work that way. Under it, payments out will be based on the amount of money you have put in.

Some members of the Conservative party are worried about our Prime Minister's gallop toward socialism. My goodness, if this is the type of philosophy the government is putting forward, it is anything but progressive. It is not the philosophy under which we send our kids to school. It is not the amount of money you can afford to put into the school system which determines if your kids are to be sent to school. I have just returned from a visit to South America and learned that the money in your pocket dictates the quality of medical attention you receive. Really, that is the philosophy of this bill. It should not be. Pay-out should not be based on what the farmer has contributed to the plan. If a farmer is experiencing difficulty, he should receive a pay-out from the plan in the same way as an unemployed worker receives unemployment insurance. This plan ought to operate as other so-called universal plans in this country operate. A plan like that would be progressive and would help this country's farmers.

On September 4 the minister said that the second objective of the stabilization plan would be to ensure that growth and development of the grain sector was consistent with the basic market forces and that the grain sector developed in a manner consistent with competitive advantage in world open markets. There the minister was talking about open market forces. He was talking about things which are really not relevant to the need for food production today. He was talking about the laissez-faire system, the market system of the world—

Mr. Benjamin: Which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says does not work.

Mr. Nystrom: —which the Prime Minister, as the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) says is not working. It has not worked for a long time. Any who do not know this are either naive, or a much more descriptive adjective could be applied to them. This is a time when we should be talking about an international grains agreement, when the countries of the world should establish long-term agreements regarding world food banks, providing food aid and working out a food distribution system. Yet this government has sponsored many plans in this country which militate against that type of philosophy. I need only mention the two-price system for wheat. I do not think the minister has to be too worried about this being a plan that will be consistent with world open market forces.

The minister says, in the same paper, that the third objective is that the plan will be complementary to the development of the livestock industry. Again, I do not see the relevancy of this. If the parliamentary secretary speaks, perhaps he could comment on this matter as well. We see in this country the failure of a lot of people who produce livestock. When times are good, they get together and have a marketing board for their commodity so that there can be more stable production of livestock in this country. The last objective he comments on is that the plan will be based on a set of principles consistent with general objectives for agriculture which could be applied to other commodity groups. As I have already stated, I do not see that general plan coming from across the way. I do not see the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, or the Minister of Agriculture coming up with a general set of objectives as to what Canadian agriculture should be involved in. What are their plans?

I have talked about some things I would like to see in the world in the eighties and nineties, the world before us, in terms of maximization of food production, a world delivery system and a world food bank. We in this country can produce food. We can work with countries that have money in order to produce food to better the human condition of us all. I would like to know the objectives of this government. How does this plan fit into the long-term objectives of the Canadian government?

Another concern about the plan is that it leaves out of the computation of the costs of production a number of items that are very important. I notice it leaves out the interest a farmer must pay on his machinery, equipment and buildings that are necessary for the production of grain. As anyone who has visited a grain farm knows, this is a major cost of producing grain. It leaves out the 2 per cent levy, the maximum of $500 the farmer will pay to help finance the plan we are dealing with today. It also leaves out depreciation on machinery, equipment and buildings. These are very important factors in producing a bushel of grain, cultivating an acre so that it is ready to produce grain.

I received in my office this morning confirmation of what we think is an important factor left out of the formulation we are dealing with today. I received from the minister of agriculture of my province a letter containing the latest statistics in Saskatchewan. It sets out how much it is expected to cost to produce a bushel of grain. I would like to spend a few minutes looking at the actual cost of producing a bushel of grain in Saskatchewan. These statistics were compiled by the department of agriculture in Saskatchewan. This is done on an annual basis from the sources they have, such as farm organizations, Statistics Canada and other reliable sources. This is the type of work we should be looking at.

According to the statistics, the average cost of producing grain on an acre of land in Saskatchewan, in 1975, will be $57.10. I want to deal with the specific components of that. It is important that it be put on the record. The cost summary per acre of grain is as follows. Cash costs and seed, and most of these items are specifically included in the cost of production, will be a factor in the bill. There are others I will deal with later that are not. The average cost of building repairs per acre of land is 45 cents. This includes the grain bins and the other buildings a farmer must maintain. With regard to machinery and equipment, fuel and oil costs $1.25 per acre. As everyone knows, the price of fuel in this country will escalate rather than go down in the years to come. Repairs, tools and hardware cost an average $3.65 per acre of grain.

As the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre pointed out, we hear every week, especially in the spring and during harvest, about farmers having difficulty getting machinery repaired by dealers. Parts must be ordered from great distances. This adds to the farmer's cost of putting in a crop, having summer fallow or taking off the crop at the end of the year. Custom work hired averages 55 cents. Crop expenses, less seed, averages $3.85 per acre. This includes such things as sprays and other necessities. The cost of purchased seed is 90 cents per acre. Home grown seed is $2.50 per acre. Taxes, landlord costs and overheads average $2.95 per acre. When you total the cash costs and seed, you get $16.10 per grain acre.

We then go to depreciation. That is not a part of the formula in this bill for calculating production costs. In Saskatchewan, in 1975, depreciation of buildings, and improvements, was 80 cents per acre on an average farm. Depreciation on machinery and equipment is $6.30 per acre. This adds up to $7.10 depreciation per grain acre in Saskatchewan. I made a calculation. Depreciation on those items alone, which are legitimate production items, works out to 12 per cent of the total cost per grain acre. That 12 per cent is not included in the production costs as defined by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board.

I move to the next item that the farmer has to pay—interest. Interest on land, in 1975, was $14.40 per grain acre in Saskatchewan. It is legitimately argued that this should not be a part of the cost of production. I accept the argument made by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, even though I know some people do not. Interest on buildings, and improvements, in 1975, is 70 cents per grain acre. That is a legitimate cost of production to be calculated under this act. Interest on machinery and equipment averages $3.80 per grain acre. That, too, is part of the legitimate cost of production. Total interest, therefore, on buildings, and improvements, machinery and equipment is $4.50 per grain acre. That is 8 per cent of the total cost of producing an acre of grain. That makes 20 per cent of the total cost per grain acre that is not included in the cost of production. It is a very relevant factor when calculating the pay-out to the producer if there is to be a pay-out from the plan. It is important in determining that a pay-out will be triggered. Hired labour averages 70 cents per grain acre, and unpaid family labour is 60 cents. An operator costs $13.70. The total labour cost is $15 per grain acre. The total cost to produce an acre of grain in Saskatchewan is $57.10, 20 per cent of which is not covered under this bill.

There is another factor that was not a factor in Saskatchewan in 1975. I refer to the 2 per cent levy that will be charged to producers when this bill comes into effect. Therefore, an additional 1 per cent or 2 per cent must be added to the cost per grain acre. This was not included in the cost of production figures. It can be safely said that 21, 22 or 23 per cent of the cost to the farmer for producing an acre of grain will not be included in the computation under the bill we are dealing with today. If the bill included some of these costs, it would be more acceptable to grain farmers in western Canada as well as to opposition members. I am sure that privately it would be more acceptable to many members on the government side. It would certainly expedite passage of the legislation through the House of Commons so that it could become law in this country.

I could go on at length talking about why depreciation of these items and interest on them should be calculated and should be part of this bill, but I think hon. members get the general idea from the comments I have made and the statistics I have read into the record. There are many other things which concern me and farmers in my area about the bill, but I am hopeful that the minister will take a serious look at the arguments which we in the opposition and members of farm organizations have put up and will not exhibit a stubborn streak when analysing the arguments we have made. Because we in the opposition, I assure you, Mr. Speaker, are speaking in the best interests of the farmers. We are not being political. We are not being partisan. We are being nice guys; we are doing our work and we are doing it hard: we are putting forward constructive criticisms.

The minister, with a nice smile, is acknowledging that we always do this. I want to say to the minister that I hope he will do that in a sincere way, because if he does not, this bill will fail and it will be another black mark upon the conscience of the government vis-à-vis the farmers. I have said for so long that the farmer is the greatest gambler in the world. He gambles on the weather; he gambles on world grain prices. But why in the devil should he gamble on the Liberal party? They can change that if they would, to a certain small degree, take into account the suggestions which we and the farm organizations have made. If this bill does not work as it should, they should not hesitate to come back and put down amendments. If they do not do that, the act will not work; and if they do not have the co-operation of the farmers, the legislation will not work.

The objective must be to stabilize farm income at an adequate return upon which a farmer and his family can live and enjoy all the good things in life that the average Canadian has had for a long time without worrying about his income. At the same time, we should encourage the farmer to produce more food so that the people of this country and the people of the world can be fed, and so the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) and others are able to devise a plan whereby we can deliver that food, deliver the goodness we can produce in this country into the mouths, the bellies of those who need it, from one corner of this world to the other. If we do that, we as Canadians will have made one small contribution to the betterment of mankind.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

WESTERN GRAINS STABILIZATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE STABILIZATION OF NET PROCEEDS FROM THE PRODUCTION AND SALE OF WESTERN GRAIN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-41, respecting the stabilization of net proceeds from the production and sale of western grain and to amend certain statutes in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill for a few moments on behalf of the wheat growers I represent in central Alberta, I want the minister to recognize that they are not overenthusiastic about this bill. In fact, I think they are as unhappy as I am about this legislation because of the fact that the minister did have an opportunity and plenty of time in which to bring in legislation which would have been of benefit to the prairie grain producer. Perhaps this bill will go down in history as "the lost opportunity" of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang). Surely the hon. gentleman has had enough association with the grain producers, along with his hon. friends from Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) and Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac), to have brought in legislation which could really have served a useful purpose.

I cannot understand why the minister is not prepared to listen to suggestions or to make changes which could be of benefit and serve the producers. After all, when this legislation is put in place, as I presume it will be with the support of the Liberal party, it is going to be very difficult to alter it in any way. While it is true the producers are vitally concerned about the effects of this legislation, we must also recognize that every taxpayer in Canada is interested in it, because for every dollar the producer pays, the taxpayers of Canada are putting up two dollars. I am sure that if it were not for this carrot the minister is dangling before the eyes of the grain producers, the bill would be entirely unacceptable to them.

At the present time, when producers are receiving a fair price for their investment, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board comes along and says, "We shall take away a portion of that money and put it away for you." In other words, he is acting just like a big daddy does toward his sons or daughters, saying, in other words "We do not trust you with your own money; we shall take care of it for you."

Let me assure hon. members that these people who have used their initiative and their ability to work long and hard hours, the people who have the resilience and the dedication to continue to produce crops in western Canada, have far more to offer than many of those who have been elected to the House of Commons.

I am very sorry at this time to be part of a system which is only doing a small percentage of that which is our responsibility. I feel this bill is only going a very small way toward doing what is required for the benefit of all the people of Canada, and especially the grain producers. It makes me sad when my constituents feel, because I have been elected to the House of Commons, that I am a member of the government rather than a member of the opposition, particularly when the minister will not listen to the proposals we make in an effort to make the legislation run smoothly for the benefit of everyone.

I have a comment here from a small paper in one of the finest wheat growing areas in Western Canada, Three Hills. It is as good as Saskatchewan; I do not say it is better, but it is just as good. Some of the farmers at this meeting wanted to know how the government's contribution to the program was to be raised. They also wanted to know what the chances were for a plebiscite. Other information sought included an explanation of the way in which costs of production would be calculated, and whether funds would be reimbursed when a farmer retired. These are questions which are of the utmost importance to these producers. If some type of explanation had been provided by the minister in answer to these questions, the program would have been far more acceptable. It is apparent from talking to farmers throughout the constituency that they are not greatly interested in this bill. If you want to talk about the subject, you have to raise it yourself. They are not concerned about it because they know that it is not going to do the job for them.

Had the minister communicated with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to a greater extent and tied Bill C-41 with the crop insurance program, I am sure the producers would have taken a careful look at it. Let me impress upon you, Mr. Speaker, that the crop insurance commissions in western Canada are vitally concerned at this point in time about this bill and what it will do to their program. The Minister of Agriculture, both in the House and in committee, expressed with glee the fact that there was increasing participation on the part of the producers of western Canada. Now that the austerity program of the government has been implemented, it has been suggested that cutbacks will be made in the government's support of the crop insurance program. Thus, I believe the crop insurance commissions should be concerned that this will be a deterrent to the participation of producers in the crop insurance program. There may be hard times ahead for the crop insurance commissions and for those who rely on crop insurance, and this will not be in the best interests of western Canadian producers.

Another point that should be made is that if grain prices drop over a period of six, seven or eight years, the pay-out at the end will be very minimal. After an extended period of low grain prices there will be no help of any substantial nature for the producers. I should like to put on record what one farmer said at a meeting. He was critical about the five-year average basis for triggering payments and suggested that it would negate any substantial benefits from the program if grain markets were depressed for a long period. He also was concerned that the program might cause a degree of instability in that farmers might react by abandoning their own methods of income stabilization.

I can understand that, Mr. Speaker, in view of the complexity of this bill. Both the hon. member for Qu'Apelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) expressed the fear of farmers in their areas that they might feel their incomes will be protected whereas in fact they will not. As both hon. members pointed out, if the scheme were operated on an individual basis, each producer would know exactly what he could expect from the program. At present, he has no way of knowing. If producers think they are being protected and they find out they are not, the situation for many producers of grain in western Canada will be chaotic.

This is why I feel the minister has short-changed the producers of this country. For example, certain regions of the country may not have had a crop for a number of successive years and the farmers' incomes may have dwindled due to circumstances beyond their control, say climatic conditions or other reasons. They would have received no income from their production. Under the present program no provision is made for such producers. They will not be provided with that which will keep them in business.

The problems of the western grain producers are becoming ever larger and more complex, and adequate programs of one form or another must be put in place for them. They should, on an individual basis, be able to put money away in the good years, tax free, and withdraw it during periods of low production, and at lower cost. There are so many ways that the program could have been made to work and be of benefit to the producers. Nevertheless, the minister is adamant: he is not going to change any provisions in the legislation. He has been very difficult to deal with all the way through passage of this bill, whether at second reading stage, in committee or at report stage. In fact, in committee he changed his position. He first said that crop insurance payments would not be included in the agreements, but had to reverse himself on advice from his departmental officials.

We are dealing not only with legislation that will not do the job it should, but with legislation that will supersede existing legislation and will hinder the enactment of legislation that could be put in place in years ahead. It makes one very sad to realize that the grain growers of western Canada are being shortchanged, which is what is happening at the present time.

I hope the hon. member for Assiniboia, when he rises to speak on this bill, as I presume he will, will try to prove why the government is unwilling to bring in a program that will support crop insurance. Had the Minister of Agriculture accepted our suggestions when he brought in the crop insurance bill, we would not need to pass this legislation today. It is because of this lack of imagination on the part of the Minister of Agriculture that we are dealing with this stabilization bill. I go on record, Mr. Speaker, as saying that it is also because of the lack of imagination on the part of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board that we are dealing with this legislation down the road. There is no way the legislation can fulfil the purpose slated for it or be satisfactory to the grain producers. As a result, it will not get the support that is required to make legislation like this work.

Another of the shorfalls of the legislation is that it will mean a further increase in bureaucracy. This has been a sore point for me. Right from the start I felt that any program like this should be initiated and administered by the crop insurance commissions of the three prairie provinces and the Peace River bloc in British Columbia. There is absolutely no reason in the world why the program could not be administered by the headquarters of the three prairie administrations, instead of Ottawa. If this government had wanted to give a certain degree of authority to another part of Canada, this would have been a prime area to do so, as well as a wonderful opportunity for the three prairie crop insurance commissions. But no, the minister refuses to do this; apparently he wants the legislation to be under his thumb.

Perhaps the reason is, and I can think of no other, that the minister wants to build his own empire. There is absolutely no room in the political arena for any individual member of parliament, minister of the cabinet, or anybody else, to build an empire, because the minute you start doing that, the administrative efficiency deteriorates and the government does not then operate for the benefit of the people. We are here with the challenge to bring in good legislation which will be for the benefit of those we have to serve. I am sorry to say that is not the case in respect of this legislation. I want the people that I represent to know that I am unhappy with this bill because I know that at some time in the future we will have to deal with this matter again. There are too many inadequacies in this measure for it to serve any useful purpose.

As I pointed out to hon. members this afternoon, there are many people in their senior years in the agricultural industry who will never take advantage of this legislation because some time in the near future they intend to retire. Most of them will never participate in this bill, short of there being a disastrous drop in either production or the price in future years. Soon after they retire there is no longer any way in which they can benefit from the premiums they will have paid. For that reason alone I think this is bad legislation.

I am sorry this House has been unable to bring forward a better piece of legislation. That being the case, I should hope that in the not too distant future we will deal with this matter again, as I am sure we will, because the producers will demand that the inequities in this bill either be reconciled or corrected with future legislation.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member seeking the floor to participate in the debate?

Mr. Goodale: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Towers.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should point out that this can only be done, as the hon. member has already spoken, with unanimous consent.

Mr. Goodale: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken on third reading. Is there no right to reply?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to reply, he can only speak at this stage with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Benjamin: You have already spoken.

Mr. Goodale: Just for my own information, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would clarify the ruling so that I will understand your position. Perhaps, my being a new member, you would explain the situation to me. I have not participated in the debate at third reading stage, and I would appreciate it if you would clarify the ruling.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member takes the trouble of looking at Beauchesne's fourth edition, he will find that the right to reply only applies to a substantive motion.

An hon. Member: That is not the rule in question.

Mr. Goodale: I have not spoken on third reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thought the hon. member said he had spoken on third reading.

Mr. Goodale: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am very sorry. I will recognize the hon. member. I had him on my list as having spoken.

Mr. Goodale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the list to which you have referred is one where time ran out before everyone on it had been given the opportunity to take part in the debate before the recess. At that time my name did not come forward and I did not have the opportunity to speak during the debate. I thank you for recognizing me at this time.

I must say, as I begin this afternoon, that I have been interested to hear the comments by members of the official opposition party as well as those by members of the NDP regarding the legislation before us. To a certain extent I regret, not the substantive comments they have had to make about some of the problems they see in the future in respect of grain farm income, but the pessimistic and rather gloomy tenor and tone of what they had to say. I do not share that pessimism. I believe very sincerely that this particular moment is an historic one, historic for this parliament and for the government of Canada because of the nature of the bill we are dealing with now and, most importantly, it is historic for the grain producers and the economy of western Canada. We are now nearing what I hope will be final approval in the House of Commons and, hopefully, soon approval in the other place as well, for Bill C-41 respecting the Western Grain Stabilization Act. I say "hopefully" with some optimism, as I sense in the House this afternoon a willingness to give this measure third reading in a fairly short period of time.

Recently, grain producers in western Canada have gone again on record in a very clear and categorical way with their wishes in this respect. I think it is important to take account of this. Farmers have, once again, made it abundantly clear in the past few weeks that they support this legislation, that they want it and want it as soon as possible. I hope this expression of opinion will carry some weight with all hon. members of this House. I should first like to refer to a press report which appeared in the Thursday, December 19, edition of the Regina Leader-Post under the headline, "Pool Supports Bill". I should like to quote part of that report, for the information of hon. members, as it appears in the Regina Leader-Post as follows:

The board of directors of Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has called on all members of parliament to facilitate passage of the federal government's grains stabilization bill. The pool directors are concerned that provisions of the plan be passed into law as soon as possible.

The directors stated that ample time and opportunity has been provided for all interested parties wishing to suggest amendments to the stabilization bill. "Saskatchewan Wheat Pool notes that the House of Commons standing committee on agriculture held a series of hearings throughout the prairie region this past summer in which opinions of farm people were heard and proposed amendments discussed.

In addition, various farm organizations and individuals have advanced their views on the subject in briefs and other representations," the directors said.

The article goes on at some length. That is a very important expression of opinion which I hope will find some favour in the House as we consider this measure. I would also like to quote from a newspaper article that appeared recently in the Manitoba Co-Operator under the date January 15, 1976. This is a very important farm newspaper published in the province of Manitoba. Under the headline, "Farm Bureau Urges Income Stabilization", the article reads:

The representatives of the bureau also endorsed a resolution which called for a recommendation to go to the federal government that the western grains income stabilization bill, known as Bill C-41, be adopted at an early date and certainly prior to the completion of the current session of parliament. The bill is in its third reading at the present time. The meeting directed that letters urging the passage of this legislation be sent to Mr. Lang, agriculture minister Eugene Whelan, and the leaders of the opposition parties and all members of parliament from Manitoba.

Finally, I should like to put on record sentiments expressed recently at a very important annual meeting of farm organizations in western Canada. I am referring to the Western Agricultural Conference which involves members of the Unifarm from Alberta, members of the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture, the Manitoba Farm Bureau and United Grain Growers. As a result of their annual meeting held recently in the west, this organization at this conference forwarded a message to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board which reads as follows:

Western Agricultural Conference members meeting in Regina January 15 adopted the following policy:

"That the grains stabilization legislation be adopted at an early date and certainly prior to the completion of the current session of parliament."

As I say, that message was from Alberta Unifarm, the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture, the Manitoba Farm Bureau and United Grain Growers. I must say I found that expression of opinion from a very broad cross-section of the grains industry in western Canada to be persuasive, and I hope other members of this House will find the same kind of import in those words from these various groups in the west. These words are really a repetition of the full support for Bill C-41 which came through very clearly in our committee work on the legislation. I think, for example, of the very detailed, thoughtful and thorough brief presented to us by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture when our Standing Committee on Agriculture met in Edmonton on June 16, 1975. The CFA put forward a careful and reasoned analysis of this bill. They discussed several specific recommendations for changes, many of which, I hasten to point out, we have been able to accommodate already in the amending processes which have gone on prior to this moment. On this important matter of farmers' support for Bill C-41, I wish to refer hon. members to the manner in which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture began its important presentation to the standing committee. It began with this paragraph, and once again I think it is important to put these words on the record:

● (1720)

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture supports the passage of this legislation. The federation believes it is decidedly in the interest of the prairie grain industry and the prairie and Canadian economy to have a stabilization plan of this nature.

That is how the CFA began its presentation. I think it is important to note the words the CFA used in concluding that presentation to the Standing committee. Once again I am quoting from the brief presented to us on June 16 in Edmonton:

Finally, but very importantly, we recommend the plan enter into force for the year 1975. Our members have made their wishes on this very clear, emphasizing the value they place on this legislation.

Unfortunately, we have already passed the deadline of 1975, but certainly the purport of their recommendation is that this is a good bill which should be approved by the House at as early a date as possible. I find that an important expression of opinion, coming as it does from one of Canada's most broadly based representative and producer-oriented organizations. This obvious producer-based support for Bill C-41 was a consistent theme throughout our committee work. As brief after brief came forward from farm organizations, there were a number of suggestions for changes or amendments to the legislation, but the context in which those recommendations were put forward was always the same: it was a context of support for the bill.

As I say, many suggestions for strengthening the bill were presented by many groups. Many of these ideas have already been incorporated in the amendments. It might be useful, in a summary way, to review what some of those amendments have been. For example, we have expanded the voluntary nature of the plan to ensure that new producers who begin operations some time down the road may also have full opportunity to exercise their option, if they so choose, using their own good judgment about their farm operations; to be out of the plan if that is their judgment. The voluntary nature of the plan has been expanded.

We have removed the previous limits on the participation of multiple-unit farms. We have referred the matter of interest rates and the maximum level of gross receipts to the producer advisory group that is set up under the legislation. We have undertaken conscientiously to examine the matter of regionalization about which we have heard today and earlier in our discussions of this legislation.

At the report stage, in addition to a series of amendments proposed by the minister designed to simplify somewhat the mathematics involved in the bill, we accepted amendments which made specific our desire to include in the plan about 90 per cent of eligible grain sale proceeds and to require a full report to parliament at the end of the first three-year period of operation. These have been major amendments despite the comments we have heard from some in this House who would suggest that they are rather minor. They are amendments which were largely suggested to us by farm organizations which presented representations to us in our committee hearings.

We have dealt with them in response largely to these producer representations. They represent, I suggest, a sensitive responsiveness to the proposals made by the farmers and farm groups, individuals and groups which, as I said earlier, have repeatedly come forward to make suggestions for improvement, always in the context of supporting this bill and seeking to make the bill better. That much good work indeed has been done.

I should like to address a few remarks in relation to some of the comments we heard today, and on the occasion before Christmas when we had a chance to discuss this legislation at third reading stage, about the matter of individualizing the plan or the question of regionalization. First, I wish to deal with the matter of individualization. We have heard what amounted to two widely different approaches to this particular question, one expressed by members of the New Democratic Party and the other expressed by members of the Conservative party.

They are expressed in similar terms in that they each use the word "individualization", but I think members of those two parties would readily agree that the approaches they are suggesting are radically different. First of all, the NDP approach, which as I assessed it received some support from the spokesman for the National Farmers Union who appeared before us, and by some provincial governments in western Canada, notably Saskatchewan and Manitoba, in principle amounts not to a grain income stabilization program or a commodity stabilization plan in any way, but really to what is more properly described as a guaranteed income scheme which has, as I view the situation, three rather undesirable attachments to it. First of all, it would be my expectation that the NDP proposal for individualization would serve to eliminate what are real and legitimate differences between good and bad farming judgment and good and bad farming practices. I do not think one would find very many farmers in western Canada who would want those legitimate differences between one farmer and the next eliminated by a government plan.

Second, the NDP proposal could possibly, and I would suggest quite likely, distort or provide artificial insulation against real and inescapable production and marketing signals which producers should be able to see and hear. I think hon. members opposite would agree that was one of the most important concerns voiced by the Palliser Wheat Growers Association when that association presented its brief to us at our hearings in Regina. They did not want the plan to be artificial or distorted, or to get us away from the real world in which we live.

[Mr. Goodale.]

Finally, one of the objections I think farmers generally would have to the proposal for individualization put forward by the NDP is that it seems to me that kind of a concept inevitably would lead to greater interference in, and control over, the individual producer's operating decisions. That would be an undesirable result, and I think an almost inevitable result of the proposal they are making. I think it is an unwanted result. It certainly is unwanted from the perspective of grain producers.

Now I should like to turn to the proposal put forward by the members of the Conservative party. As I begin, I want to thank them for the conscientious way in which they have approached this question. I refer particularly to the proposal of my hon. friend from Moose Jaw who I think has done a great deal of work on this idea. Unfortunately, I cannot agree with his proposal, for reasons which I hope he will agree are substantive and reasonable.

First of all, having taken a serious look at his particular idea and the mathematics of it, and having gone through some calculations based upon what he had to say, it is my judgment that the proposal he has made would serve to reduce the level of federal contributions and commitments to the stabilization program. It would reduce the level of over-all protection for the grains industry and individual producers. Indeed, it would make the plan less effective in total. That can be seen only by going through the full set of calculations and working out what his proposal would amount to, or what his party's proposal would amount to, compared to the proposal of the government.

The mathematical calculations are rather long and detailed, but when you come to the final line and compare the value of the government's plan, on the one hand, with the value of the alternate proposal on the other, the figures are very clear. In the long run, the net protection for the grains industry or for individual producers would be substantially less under the proposal put forward by my hon. friend from Moose Jaw on behalf of the Conservative party. So, clearly, this business of individualization is not an unmixed blessing. It may be simpler to explain if you can put it in those terms, but it does not lead simply to a better plan for western farmers.

On the matter of regionalization, as opposed to individualization, I think I can deal with that matter very simply once again by referring to a specific recommendation on this point made to the government and to parliament by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture when that organization appeared before us. On page 3 of their brief they recommend that we provide for intensive study of the regionalization option and the legislation for its adoption if this should prove desirable.

They were not suggesting that we march forward immediately with regionalization, but that we look at it seriously, recognizing that it too may not be an unmixed blessing, and that we study the question very carefully before going forward with it. It may well have some merits, and hon. members have discussed those potential merits in the House on many occasions, but CFA suggested that we look at it carefully, analyse the pros and cons, see if it can be feasibly and reasonably done, and then, if that proves to be the case, that some time later down the road we go ahead with it. That is a reasonable recommendation, and indeed before the standing committee the minister made it clear that that kind of examination of the question would be undertaken.

We have heard a great deal in this House today and on previous occasions about the cost of the administration which will be involved in handling the western grain stabilization plan. This could be of some concern because we have heard a great deal about thousands of bureaucrats descending upon the west, interviewing farmers, causing them a great deal of extra fuss and bother, and about extra costs mounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars every year going down the drain in the administration of this plan. Those have been the stories and the rumours, and they may be entertaining, or in some circles politically popular, but they are simply not factual; they are not true. In the first year or two of the program naturally some extra expenses will be involved in the start up process, and some extra costs may be incurred in the survey work which will have to be done at the outset, but once the plan is in place and functioning it will be interesting to look at the facts and to see what the presently projected administrative figures turn out to be in reality.

The estimate at the present moment is that the permanent administration of the western grain stabilization plan will involve some 12 to 15 people. It is planned that they will be located in a rather small office of the western grain stabilization administration located in the Canadian Grain Commission building in Winnipeg. A total cost of something in the range of $300,000 per year on an ongoing basis is likely to be required for the administration of that office and of the plan.

Some argue, as we heard earlier today in the discussion by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), that the crop insurance programs would be a more desirable mechanism for the administration of a plan of this kind. It has been suggested that that would be a cheaper and more effective way to administer an income stability program. If the matter were that simple I think we might be inclined to follow the suggestion of my hon. friend and of crop insurance boards elsewhere in the country, but the facts simply do not support the case.

It is interesting to consider some of the specific figures. I refer to the figures for 1975-76 and the cost of administering crop insurance programs in the three prairie provinces. The important figure to consider is the projected administrative cost per insured farmer for the year 1975-76. First, for the province of Alberta it is estimated that the administration costs will work out to be something very close for $80 per insured farmer. For the province of Manitoba it is estimated that the administration costs per insured farmer for 1975-76 will work out to something in excess of $80 per insured farmer. In Saskatchewan the comparable figure is something in the range of $65 per insured farmer.

When we consider the administration of the western grain stabilization plan and include all the feasible costs which could be involved, and based upon certain assumptions about participation levels in the plan, it works out that the projected cost per insured farmer under the western grain stabilization plan is something in the range of $11 or $12 per insured farmer. That is $11 or $12 compared with $65 for crop insurance in Saskatchewan and with approximately $80 for crop insurance in Manitoba and Alberta.

Those figures are pretty important, and I think they show that the administration of this plan is likely to be substantially less costly than the crop insurance programs now in place. It is interesting to note as well that all administrative charges for the western grain stabilization plan are not borne by the fund established under the legislation, but rather by the general treasury or the general revenues of Canada, by the taxpaying population of the entire country. It will not be borne by the specific goal oriented contributions made by government and by individual producers to the stabilization fund.

Finally I wish to deal with a matter which has been raised in the course of this debate, and I think it is important. It has to do with the complexity and detail involved in this legislation. It has been suggested that it is too long, detailed, and complicated. To begin with, what we are dealing with is a long, detailed, and complicated problem. It is a problem which goes back to the very beginnings of western Canada. We are all familiar with that cyclical pattern of grain incomes—up one year and down the next—which shakes the western grain industry to its very boots.

Our problem is not a simple one. It is a fundamental challenge which has faced the grain industry and successive governments of various political stripes in this country over the years. It is not a simple problem to solve in just a few words or with a simple plan. It is a complicated problem requiring a detailed and, I suggest, complex approach.

It has been suggested that the earlier bill which came forward some four or five years ago was simpler than this one. This suggestion refers to the old bill, C-244, but I hope hon. members will also remember in comparing that bill with this bill that the older bill was a compulsory plan. Producers and other people suggested that this plan should be voluntary. We have made it essentially voluntary, but by doing that we have necessarily added some complexity to the legislation.

It had been argued that Bill C-244 of four or five years ago was defective because it was on a gross basis and not on a net cash basis. That argument was accepted by the government, and the bill has been improved. It is a stronger bill because it now takes into consideration the cost of production. It is based on the net cash position of farmers, and because it is improved in that respect it has also necessarily become more complex. Good features which improve legislation also, unfortunately, add to its complexity. That is a fact which is inescapable.

Also important is that despite the defect which some hon. members see, and despite the fact that the legislation is complex, there is also a very important advantage in that because everything affecting the calculations is in the bill. It is all spelled out in detail for farmers, parliamentarians, and everyone in the country to see. Nobody can change those calculations. Nobody can change the rules without coming back to parliament to do so. I have heard hon. members opposite complain rather bitterly about the fact that government tends to do so many things by regulation and by orders in council. Well, this is one measure where that is not so because everything affecting the calculations is specifically spelled out in the law itself.

I do not deny that this bill is complex. I quite agree with hon. members that it is a long and detailed bill. However, if it is complex I suggest to hon. members on all sides of the House that that necessarily places an important burden on each one of us, not necessarily to go out and sell the bill if we are not inclined to do that, but at least to go out and explain it factually and rationally to producers in our respective constituencies across western Canada so that they, at least, can have the facts and the basic information before them, and so that they then can make a rational judgment for themselves about the grain stabilization plan. We on the government side ask hon. members to carry out that responsibility. We do not ask them to go out and promote the bill if that is not deemed to be in their political interest, but at least to go out and explain the facts rationally and fairly so that producers will have a full and fair opportunity to exercise their judgment under the legislation.

Hon. members might ask how is that to be done, how we suggest they explain the legislation. I think it could be done in a number of ways, and just for the information of the House I should like to tick off a few of those which hon. members might find interesting.

This is one of the ways in which that particular effort of explanation and information was carried out in the constituency of Assiniboia. Hon. members will recall that the bill was introduced on December 4, 1974. Ten or 12 meetings were then conducted across the Assiniboia constituency. Farmers and the public were invited to discuss the legislation in its initial form in January, 1975. Then there was a province-wide open line radio program on CBC where the same general discussion was invited on the bill as presented to parliament in its original form. Following that, across the length and breadth of Assiniboia and other constituencies, because media patterns happen to overlap, there were at least seven detailed articles in weekly newspapers telling in a fair and unbiased way what the stabilization plan was all about.

Then there was a series of news releases and press reports advertising the hearings of the Standing Committee on Agriculture to be conducted across Canada. I have heard hon. members complain that nobody knew about these hearings, that they were secret and that farmers were not given a chance to appear. But those hearings were advertised in all the weekly newspapers in Assiniboia constituency. I did a head count on one occasion, and most of the people in attendance at our hearing in Regina, in the middle of the hearing week in western Canada, were from Assiniboia.

Advertisements were placed in the weekly newspapers and paid for by the member of parliament telling of the specific calculations that would be made available to individual farmers who wanted to know what the plan would mean to them. That information was given publicly to members of parliament by the minister when he appeared before the standing committee. He extended a blanket invitation to anyone who wanted to know what the plan would mean to them. All they had to do was send in their gross grain receipt figures to an address in Regina and the information would be provided to them. That was advertised across the southern part of Saskatchewan, which I have the honour to represent.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in the early part of October, 1975, there were 12 more meetings in four days. Once again farmers were invited to attend and hear about the bill, to make comments and ask questions before final consideration in this House. Full details of the legislation were provided, a slide show was offered and leaflets were available for farmers to take home and study. There was also a question and answer period. Every corner of the constituency of Assiniboia was covered. It might be useful to mention the places involved—Avonlea, Mossbank, Gravelbourg, Glentworth, Rockglen, Assiniboia, Bengough, Radville, Milestone, Torquay, Sedley, and Weyburn.

After that there was final open line show in November on the largest privately owned radio station in Saskatchewan where western farmers were given the opportunity of discussing the legislation.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a responsibility on members to make sure that the bill is understood. I do not ask members opposite to sell the bill if they do not think it is in their political interests to do so. I think they have an obligation, however, and the government and farmers of this country can ask them to live up to that obligation, to provide producers in their area with the same kind of factual information that was provided in at least one constituency in Saskatchewan.

I see my time is coming to an end, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want to belabour the point any further. We have had a good discussion. I hope the sense of optimism that I expressed earlier will not be misplaced as we come to what I hope will be the conclusion of this important and interesting debate on Bill C-41.

I want to share with the House the experience I have had with this legislation over the past year in the west. Two points are crystal clear as result of the effort at explanation, consultation, and discussion with farmers. First of all there is a broad base, a genuine support for this bill among western grain farmers, and secondly the legislation is far better known and understood by farmers than hon. members opposite would have us believe.

I think it is important to keep in mind the context in which the bill has come forward, not a context of ad hocery or piecemeal changes, but a context of important and ongoing upgrading of the grain industry in western Canada under the leadership of this particular minister for the past four or five years. It is a record of accomplishment. All members associated with the minister, particularly members on the government side, can be very pleased to acknowledge and support that record. One of the main pillars of it is the Western Grain Stabilization Act. I am sure it will stand in the history of this country as a tribute to the foresight and accomplishment of the present minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board for his work on behalf of the western grains industry.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I do not intervene very often in debates dealing with western rural problems. Because I represent an urban riding in southwestern Ontario some members opposite may feel that I should not intervene in this debate or that I do not know what I am talking about. The main reason why I decided to intervene briefly is because there are so many questions in my mind about how fair and equitable this bill will be to the prairie grain producer.

Another reason why I am intervening briefly is that in my constituency of Brant two major industries are heavily dependent on the prosperity of western grain growers. I refer to Massey-Ferguson and White farm equipment. During the five years that I have been a member of this House I have tried to convience the urban industrial workers in my riding who are employed by those two industries that their welfare and their future are inextricably tied to the well-being and prosperity of the western grain growers. I am not speaking specifically on behalf of the western grain grower; there are others in the House, certainly in my own party, much more capable of doing so. However, I do wish to draw the attention of the House to the link between the prosperity of the prairies and prosperity in central Canada with respect to farming and the farm implement industry.

There are many questions in my own mind, and because of them I think there should be more discussion in this chamber before the bill is given third reading. I am quite sure a lot of farmers on the prairies would like to see more debate on the bill. My party agrees with the bill in principle and I believe the Progressive Conservative party agrees in principle as well. It is the nitty gritty, the specifics of certain clauses in the bill that give the trouble.

It has taken many years to bring in this piece of legislation to stabilize prices for grain production income. Because it has taken so long I see no reason why we should not go a little further, in the hope that the minister responsible for the Wheat Board may make some last minute alterations to make the bill even more effective. That is why I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

● (1750)

That Bill C-41 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for the purpose of reconsidering clauses 8, 9, 10 and 11 thereof.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take perhaps two minutes to reply to the suggestion of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn). My parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), has dealt with the various points of substance made in relation to the stabilization bill before the House. I only note that the hon. member reinforces the impression of his party's continued obstruction to passage of this bill into law. That obstruction has been a mark of the NDP for many years, and the obstruction is not deserved. It is unfortunate that the NDP has brought forward once again an apparently delaying motion. I hope the House will deal with the motion with dispatch and, indeed, dispatch it.

It is strange that the small band of NDP members from the prairies have not made it clear to the hon. member for Brant that there is now a virtually unanimous voice from farm organizations on the prairies asking that this bill be passed, and specifically noting the obstruction of the opposition and asking that it end so that this bill may become law.

Mr. Peters: We know all about the Palliser business.

Mr. Lang: This piece of legislation is a form of income protection for the farmers of western Canada and will rank as a key part of a whole range of agricultural policies. Over the years I predict it will prove its value time and again. I will await the evidence of history and will take the opportunity to record for the people of the west, on every occasion I can, the kind of opposition shown by certain members from the west to the bill. I will do this in time as benefits to farmers become apparent.

This opposition is something hon. members will not be allowed to forget. It is sad to see members representing western regions allowing their political instincts to dominate them. They believe that anything that is good for the farmer will, in the end, redound to the benefit of the government and they are therefore taking the negative approach of opposing the legislation or obstructing it throughout its consideration. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, Western Agricultural Conference, the membership of the Manitoba Farm Bureau, Unifarm people of Alberta, and United Grain Growers, among others, have voiced support for the bill, want it passed, and have asked specifically for opposition obstruction to end.

I therefore ask that we now put the question on whether there is to be further delay, and then pass the bill and allow it to go to the Senate to become law. I predict that hon. members opposite one day will have to admit that it is a monument of protection for the grain farmer of western Canada and one of the foremost measures members of western Canada in this House have ever had an opportunity to support. Instead of supporting it, hon. members opposite have been obstructing. That is to be regretted.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Take two minutes, as Otto did.

Mr. Benjamin: I will take two minutes now, and the rest after eight o'clock. I will use the first two minutes in reminding the minister in charge of the Wheat Board that he had better not talk about obstruction and delay. I remind the minister that this legislation, which he considers earth shaking, was presented for first reading on December 4, 1974. Announcing the legislation the minister proclaimed it as the greatest thing since sliced bread. It was to have top priority on the government's agenda. But when did the bill come forward for second reading?

Mr. Nystrom: When?

Mr. Benjamin: On April 28. For almost five months the bill was on the order paper at the bottom of the government's priority list. Then, after second reading was finished, the agricultural committee held its hearings. If my memory serves me correctly, the hearings were completed in the latter part of June. The House sat all July but did not deal with the committee's report at the report stage. Actually the bill was not called. It was not called until long after the House reconvened on September 30.

Because of government incompetence in handling the business of the House and the minister's difficulty in persuading cabinet colleagues and backbenchers to provide additional tens of millions of dollars for the western grain producer, this bill is still before the House instead of having been completed some time ago.

I remind the minister that over half the time wasted since this bill was introduced at first reading can be attributed to the government's incompetence in handling the agenda of the House, and recesses. The government decided, it was more important that members of parliament should go on holiday in August and September than deal with this legislation. May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave this chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, hon. members now in the Chamber are such nice fellows that I will continue my remarks in a mild vein until the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) return. In view of the remarks they were making before six o'clock, I hope they get here. They are not the type who fire their guns and then run. I am confident they will be here before my time is up. I hope they do not return just two minutes before I complete my remarks as that would not give me time to say all I want to say to their faces.

I will dwell on some items to convince members opposite to persuade the minister in charge of the wheat board to send this bill back to committee where some fundamental changes can be made in order that this will be a real grain income stabilization program.

As a minimum, the legislation would have to be amended to allow the grain producer to show as a cost of production what farmers all across Canada are allowed to show on their income tax returns under the present federal agricultural stabilization legislation for other farm products. Costs of production legally and properly determined by provincial governments, universities, and experts who compile farm production costs all include farm costs that are excluded from this legislation.

The minister in charge of the wheat board and the hon. member for Assiniboia complain about this bill not being passed quickly. I do not know how they can complain when items that are included in other legislation brought in by a Liberal government are excluded from this bill. I find that passing strange. I hope members opposite will persuade the minister to send the bill back to committee in order that clause 8 may be amended to allow the appropriate costs of production to be included.

There are several things wrong with the legislation. No bill is perfect no matter what government of what political stripe introduces it. It is, of course, the duty of opposition members as well as of organizations and individuals outside government to persuade it to make changes which they feel necessary in light of their experience and knowledge. There has been a great deal of difficulty trying to do that with this bill.

I remind hon. members that while the grain stabilization bill is supposed to take into account costs of production, it leaves out certain areas. Statistics compiled within the past few days show that farm costs have risen as well as farm prices. According to these statistics, farm costs have risen in excess of farm prices. Therefore a grain stabilization bill based on costs of production that leave out some of these increased costs is unfair to farmers.

In 1975, including the period of time when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) were telling us to show restraint and stating that they were going to control prices and incomes, farm costs rose in a manner that in fact negated what seemed to be the good price grain producers were getting for wheat, oats, barley, rye, flax and rapeseed.

The cost of farm fuels increased 20 per cent in 1975 over 1974. Tools, hardware and repairs increased by 20 per cent and hired custom work increased by 20 per cent. Fertilizer went up in price between 25 and 50 per cent in 1975 over 1974, and chemical and sprays increased from 15 to 22 per cent.

Interest charges are specifically excluded from the legislation. Any businessman or farmer of any other product under the Agricultural Marketing Act can show interest charges on machinery, equipment, and buildings as a legitimate cost of production. However, that item is excluded from the grain stabilization bill. Farmers in the rural part of my constituency of Regina-Lake Centre pay from $500 to $3,000 a year in interest charges on farm machinery, equipment, and buildings. That is not included as a legitimate cost of production in this legislation. The minister in charge of the wheat board complains that the opposition is obstructing and delaying this bill. If you were raising any other kind of farm product, then under any other stabilization bill those charges would be considered a legitimate cost of production. Yet they are not included in the legislation before us. The minister in charge of the wheat board, the hon. member for Assiniboia, and the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) were all here during the debate but none of them have answered that question yet.

The minister in charge of the wheat board should be very happy that my hon. friend should have introduced the amendment to third reading which would allow him to speak again and answer that question. In the event, he has refused to answer during the 14 months since the bill was presented for first reading. He refuses to answer because he cannot answer.

Here is another item. When you buy an insurance policy to insure farm buildings or anything else, the cost of that insurance is a legitimate cost of production. Nevertheless, it is excluded under the terms of the bill before us. The minister, the hon. member for Assiniboia, and the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley have yet to deal with that question. There is a further item—depreciation of farm equipment, farm buildings, and farm machinery. This is an important matter for anyone engaged in farming, primary production or business, yet it is excluded as a legitimate cost of production under the bill we are now considering.

In any year when there is a pay-out under this grain stabilization bill, that pay-out is based on the net tax flow after deduction for the cost of production. If you exclude interest charges, depreciation, and premiums on the stabilization plan you put a fair hole in the credit a grain producer should receive for his cost of production. I should like to ask any hon. member on the government side who comes from a constituency with some farmers in it, in Ontario, Quebec or the Atlantic provinces, to tell me the answer to this question: how come these things form part of the cost of production in your province but are excluded in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or the Peace River district of British Columbia?

I want to be perfectly honest with the government members tonight. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) moved the third reading amendment not only because he felt legitimate concern about what this bill contains but because we wanted the minister or the hon. member for Assiniboia to have an opportunity to tell us about the items which had been left out. They have yet to do it.

An hon. Member: They did it during the report stage.

Mr. Benjamin: They did not. In fact the hon. member for Assiniboia was so stupid as to claim that the premiums paid under the stabilization bill would be counted. Then he had to get up and admit he was wrong. The hon. member for Assiniboia can read the written remarks of the minister in charge of the wheat board, but that does not mean he is right. Now that that hon. member is back in the Chamber I should like to deal with some of the remarks he made. He said the bill is historic. I will agree with that. He says farm organizations say they want the bill passed. That is correct.

Let us go into the things the hon. member said. The bill is historic in the sense that it will complete the total perversion of the whole principle of income stabilization. This being the case I suppose it will go down in history. The hon. member said farm organizations want the bill. I agreed that this was true, but there are a few other things the hon. member forgot to tell the House and I want to help him complete his speech.

He attended meetings of farm organizations, as I did, and he found out in hotel rooms and lobbies, and on the floor at those meetings, that the farm representatives threw up their hands in sheer despair and said, "Let us get this bill passed because it is better than nothing; it is an improvement over what we had in 1971, which was awful; let us get the bill passed and try to change it later on." I do not blame them for taking that attitude based on the bitter experience of farm organizations over the decades. It was just sheer desperation. The hon. member forgot to let the House know about that. He conveniently forgot to tell us that those same farm organizations which said they wanted the bill passed also said it was not the kind of bill they would like to see, the kind of bill they ought to have. That is exactly what we are trying to do in the New Democratic Party and, to be fair, that is exactly what members of the official opposition are trying to do—make this the piece of legislation the farmers deserve to have.

I wish to mention also some points which were touched on by the minister and by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I was present at the meetings of the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture and I heard the minister in charge of the wheat board make his speech. He even nodded to me while I was there. Dealing with criticism of this bill on the ground that it rewards fortune and penalizes misfortune, he chose to put it in another manner—the hon. member for Assiniboia dealt with this before supper—saying they were trying to design legislation which would reward good management rather than good luck.

I am amused by Liberals who talk about good management, about the farmer who pulled himself up by his own bootstraps. Among farmers I know, not only in my riding but other parts of the prairies, when it comes to good management one of the first criteria they use is to disregard the advice of the minister. About three years ago the minister went on the air in Western Canada advising farmers not to put more acreage into Durum. One good friend of mine listened to the farm broadcast at noon, then went out directly with his tractor and put another 40 acres under Durum. He has been doing it every year since and, by golly, the final payment on Durum this year is $2.03 a bushel. He was doing exactly the opposite of what the minister in charge of the wheat board advocated. That was good management.

The hon. member for Assiniboia talked about marketing signals, I think was the phrase. I do not know whether he is playing the grain futures or speculating on the stock exchange, but he talked about marketing signals and good management versus these proposals put forward by the Conservatives and the NDP to have the grain stabilization program put on an individual basis. He said that would create artificial distortions, whatever the heck that means.

The hon. member for Assiniboia claimed that under the program of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board the farmer can watch the marketing signals and have good management, whereas the proposals of the official opposition and the NDP would provide artificial distortions. Well, Madam Speaker, let me examine what the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board says about good decisions.

Mr. Stanfield: Are you associating with us?

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, isn't it awful. Let me tell my friend, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), that this is one occasion where we are as one, which makes us both feel uncomfortable when we think of a lot of other things. But on this bill we are as one, a rare occasion indeed. It shows that even the Conservatives can agree with the NDP and vice-versa; it might never happen again and probably will not. If this makes me sound like some kind of free enterpriser I apologize, and if it makes them sound like socialists I welcome it.

The hon. member for Assiniboia, the mouthpiece for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, repeated several times what the minister said about good decisions.

Mr. Peters: He had to. The minister wrote his speech.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes. He repeated what the minister said about what to grow and about what is going to happen in the market place. The hon. member for Assiniboia will likely be followed as soon as I sit down by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley, who will also give me the gears about good decisions in the market place and good decisions regarding what to grow. But a farmer friend of mine grows Durum every time the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board tells him not to, and he has made an extra buck a bushel on the final payment to doing so.

Following the asinine assertion of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, the hon. member for Assiniboia then requires that same farmer to make good decisions and to look at the signals that he gets, not about the market but about the weather. If one were to follow the logic of the minister and the hon. member for Assiniboia, not only can farmers predict what the market will be and what the price will be over the next year but, dammit, they should be able to predict whether or not they will get enough rain! Not only should farmers be able to predict the weather but there should not be any drought, or too many grasshoppers, coyotes, Russian thistles, gophers or Liberals, and they should be able to make good management decisions as to how many acres of each kind of grain to grow.

It is just as difficult for the best grain producer in western Canada to make an intelligent management decision about marketing and prices as it is about the weather. Which brings me to a very sensitive subject, this whole business of the market and whether or not it is working. We have all heard a great deal about this in the last two or three weeks, and I hope my hon. friends opposite appreciate the fact that the NDP has not had much to say about that. We have been saying ever since 1932 that the market system has not been working. Then we had this terrible insult to our intelligence when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) confirmed in a speech he made what we have been saying for 40 years.

To ask that farmers make good management decisions in the market place—in the market system, to quote the Prime Minister—contrasts with what the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and the hon. member for Assiniboia say. There has to be some kind of contradiction there. My problem is that I do not want either the Prime Minister or the other two hon. gentlemen as my friends in that argument, but it does illustrate what nonsense the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and the hon. member for Assiniboia tried to put over on this House before supper time.

Let me return, Madam Speaker, to an issue that the minister raised just before six o'clock, and I will use up my last few minutes on it. The minister talked about obstruction and complained that the New Democratic Party had moved a third reading amendment. For all I know the official opposition will move another, and God bless them if they do because this legislation needs to go back to committee for amendment. Not only are the grain producers involved but taxpayers all across Canada, with a minimum government contribution of $200 million.

This bill was given first reading on December 4, 1974. The minister has complained about obstruction and about how the opposition were delaying the grain stabilization bill, but it was not called for second reading until April 28 or 29. April 29 was my birthday, but anyway some four and a half, almost five months, had elapsed since first reading. I remind the House that it first sat on September 30, 1974, and some two months and one week went by before first reading on December 4. Another four and a half months went by between first reading and second reading on April 28. Yet the minister in charge of the wheat board says the opposition is to blame for obstructing the bill. Incidentally, Madam Speaker, do you know how many days were spent on this bill between December 4 and May 6, when second reading was completed? In that period of close to six months only nine sitting days were spent on the grain stabilization bill.

The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board has threatened the opposition that he will travel all across western Canada saying how we have obstructed this bill. I hope he does, Madam Speaker, and I hope he comes into my riding of Regina-Lake Centre. I will meet him in Raymore, Nokomis, Lanigan, or any place else if he wants to talk about obstruction. If nine days spent on the bill between December 4 and May 6 is obstruction, I am a monkey's uncle.

Let me go a little further, Madam Speaker. The bill was finally sent to committee on May 6, being reported back on July 17, and the House of Commons met for another 12 days after that date. Was Bill C-41 called for debate? No way, Madam Speaker. In fact Bill C-41 was at the bottom of the government House leader's priority list, and I will call as my witnesses the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). In fact I will even call the government House leader as my witness.

The House continued to sit until the end of July when the government thought it was more important for MP's to have time off than to debate the grain stabilization bill which the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is claiming we are obstructing. Those poor members of parliament had to have all August and September off, and we returned here on October 14. Wasn't that nice for members of parliament to have ten weeks vacation?

This minister in charge of the wheat board says the opposition is obstructing this grain stabilization bill. If this measure had such high priority as claimed by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, why did we not proceed with it sooner? The minister might get away with that idea in Cabinet or in this House of Commons but he did not say that out in western Canada. At no time did he have the nerve to claim the opposition was obstructing the bill when he was out there. If he had tried that out in Saskatchewan they would have run him out of town—they are still going to a little later anyway. He did not try that nonsense out west because the farmers out there know better. If there are any backbenchers on the Liberal side from other than the three prairie provinces who think otherwise then they should check the records of Hansard. Let us stop any more of this kind of nonsense from the minister in charge of the wheat board who talks about the opposition delaying and so forth.

The committee had finished with this legislation on July 17. It was bad enough that the government did not do a damned thing with the bill for the next 14 days, but then the government did not call the bill at report stage until November 27. The members returned and sat on October 14, yet the minister in charge of the wheat board is suggesting that somebody is delaying the bill. I would like to know who is delaying the bill. I think it is his colleagues who are delaying it because even some of them feel that this bill is not worth whatever is required to blow it up.

Third reading of this bill was not called until December 11 and we had only two days of debate at that time. Would hon. members opposite call two days obstruction? I would ask any one of those members opposite whether two days' debate prior to Christmas could be called obstruction. The minister in charge of the wheat board said before supper that we were obstructing the bill. Here we are, 14 months since first reading of this bill, and there have been exactly 14 days counting today that we in this House have been debating the measure, and I am not through today yet. We have had 14 days out of 14 months, yet that idiot from the Canadian Wheat Board tries to tell us we are obstructing this bill.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, if I am out of order or in contempt, that is exactly what I intended.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Apologize.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member confine his remarks to the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: All right, Madam Speaker, since this bill personifies the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board I will consider that I am talking about the bill whenever I mention his name. In any event, let us put an end to this nonsense about obstructing the bill.

Let me turn now to a couple of items mentioned by that hon. member for Assiniboia who has such a convenient memory. He talked about farm organizations supporting and demanding that this legislation be passed, as suggested by that hon. member who took part in meetings of the committee on agriculture along with members of the Conservative party and the NDP, including the five meetings in western Canada. He knows full well that when asked about the passage of this legislation the answers of those representatives were invariably that the bill is better than nothing, it is an improvement over the situation in 1971, so let us get something passed and try to improve it later.

When that hon. member talks about the farm organizations wanting this legislation passed he should remember those facts. Quite frankly I am disappointed, unhappy, and even a little bit angry about the attitude of these farm organizations, and probably these words will not make me very popular with them, but that is a tough cookie. I can only say that those organizations gave up. I was going to say they caved in, but they did give up in their fight and I am very sad that these organizations in their anxiety to get some kind of income stabilization should ask that this legislation be passed. I am saddened that they gave tacit, if not implicit approval to this measure which will give most of the money to the rich and the least to the poor grain producers. Even my best friends in the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the Saskatchewan Farmers' Organization do not want legislation that will operate in this way. Whenever any parliament, any government or any political party passes legislation, holding it up as the ideal and final things for the farmer, you can be sure that is nothing more than misrepresentation and lying.

This legislation provides that when there is a pay-out from the funds the grain producers who have contributed the most will receive the largest pay-outs. I would ask my hon. friends opposite if they think that is the moral thing. I would ask the hon. member for Assiniboia, the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley, and the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board if this is the kind of legislation they consider to be fair and decent.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) pointed out today that if you applied the methodology of this legislation to the medicare program you get the same size or a larger payment for a hangnail operation by an expensive doctor as for the person who had open heart surgery. This would also apply in the same way to unemployment insurance. If I worked full time and had been contributing to unemployment insurance all along then I would get the largest pay-out from the fund. Is that logical, civil, or even moral?

In my opening remarks I suggested that this legislation was immoral in principle. It is certainly immoral in principle and is unworkable in practice. If this is what you Liberals want, God bless you, you are welcome to it. I do not intend to stand or sit here and listen to the minister in charge of the wheat board, the hon. member for Assiniboia, or anybody else talk about obstruction and delay by members of the opposition.

I recognize that there are at least three members on the government side who are committed to the bill because they believe in it. All I ask them to accept is the fact that members of the opposition oppose this bill because they believe it is bad legislation. The minister in charge of the wheat board talked about political opportunism. I recognize and admire the abilities of the minister and I respect him for his beliefs. He is committed to this bill and is working on its behalf. I do not object to that. Rather, I respect him for his belief and his determination. I only ask that he in turn respect the beliefs of members in the opposition. We have moved an amendment on third reading and we intend to move two more, or even three if necessary.

An hon. Member: Obstruction!

Mr. Benjamin: I invite the hon. member who shouts obstruction to take part in the debate. I will sic the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) after him, and then he and others on that side can sit and bleed all over the floor. Madam Speaker, any legislation that gives money to the well-to-do and deprives those who are not well-to-do has to be fundamentally wrong.

● (2040)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has now expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): There is not agreement. The hon. member cannot continue.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I shall be very brief in my remarks, but I could not let the remarks of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) go unchallenged. Before supper he said that this is an historic piece of legislation. There is no question about that. History records the good and the bad. It remains to be seen whether this piece of legislation is good or bad.

On this side of the House we realize that a number of farm organizations recently have been calling for the passage of this legislation. As Conservatives we are in favour of stabilization, but we are in favour of an individual program as are the organizations and individuals who gave evidence at the committee hearings as the agricultural committee travelled across western Canada.

The minister suggested that the members of the opposition have been instrumental in delaying this piece of legislation.

An hon. Member: Balderdash.

Mr. Neil: The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) recited in some detail the dates on which the legislation was presented to the House at its various stages. He indicated it was first presented to the House on December 4, 1974, over a year ago. It did not see the light of day again for second reading until April 28, 1975. It did not come up for third reading until December 11 of 1975, more than a year after it was first presented. Surely no one can say the members of the opposition parties have been instrumental in delaying this piece of legislation because it is the government alone which decides when and if a particular piece of legislation will be brought before us for consideration.

We, as opposition members, have a responsibility to see that the legislation presented before parliament is good legislation. We have attempted to do this not only at second reading but in committee and at third reading. During the hearings of the committee we presented alternatives to the government. We have done the same thing at third reading, but unfortunately the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board has not seen fit to accept the proposals we have put to him.

During the recess I had occasion to travel through my constituency and speak to a good many farmers. Without exception these farmers feel that a proper and adequate stabilization program should be an individual program. It would take very little work, I suggest, for the government to bring in changes to this bill which would make it a bill that would benefit individuals, and make pay-outs to individuals based on their net income rather than based on the total net income of the Canadian Wheat Board.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

I said a moment ago it is the responsibility of the opposition to attempt to improve legislation. We gave the government the opportunity to do so both in committee and at the third reading stage. The government did not choose to accept our suggestions. The government now has another opportunity to make amendments to this bill so that it will be more workable and more satisfactory for the producers of western Canada. That opportunity is now, by referring the bill back to the committee for reconsideration. On this basis the members of this party are prepared to support the motion of the NDP.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I rise for one reason, Madam Speaker, which is that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) had some pretty harsh words to say in this House against the members of the opposition because the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) moved an amendment, and he said that we were deliberately filibustering the bill which is before us today. I had no intention of getting on my feet again but I must take a few moments to refute that statement.

This bill has been before the House, including today, on only 14 different days. If one checks back through the record one will find that some of those 14 days were not spent in their entirety in debate on this bill. I think it is unfair that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board should make accusations like he did and have them go unanswered.

Members of the opposition believe this is a very important bill for western farmers. It affects tens of thousands of families in the west, as well as many thousands of other people who depend on the production of food. If we cannot have 14 days of debate on this bill, I ask when can we have 14 days of debate in this House? Those 14 days include second reading, the report stage, and now the third reading stage. If we cannot have 14 days of debate on this bill, I ask what is wrong with our parliamentary democracy?

There were many amendments moved in respect of this bill. There were amendments brought in by the minister. Some time was spent on consideration of those amendments. We did not complain about that. I wish to register my objection to the statements the minister made between ten minutes to six and six o'clock this evening. I want to put very clearly on the record the facts, and show that the minister was not too anxious to expedite this bill through the House.

Bill C-41 was given first reading on December 4, 1974. Second reading was not called until April 28, 1975. That was almost five months later. The minister was not in an extreme hurry to get the bill through the House. There was not any obstruction then. We wanted the bill called. Opposition members asked the minister to call the bill. It was not called. It was not urgent in the view of this minister or of the government house leader. How the devil can he have the nerve to stand up in the House today and criticize us for moving one amendment, an amendment moved with sincerity by an hon. member who is concerned about this bill and the effect it will have on western farmers and, in the case of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), on people in his riding who manufacture farm machinery?

This bill was debated for nine days or parts thereof at second reading stage. It was sent to the committee May 6, 1975, and reported back to the House July 17, 1975. It was not called for report stage until November 27 despite the fact it was reported back here on July 17. We are looking at about four or five months before this bill was called by the government. How can the minister legitimately level a charge at us for delaying the bill? I would like him to say that in my riding. I invite him to my constituency to debate that issue any time, anywhere—at his choosing—or on any open line show in the province of Saskatchewan.

I am replying directly to the points made by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Report stage debate took place and only lasted two days. That is not excessive. I have been in this House seven and a half years, and I have seen many report stage amendment debates lasting longer than two days on business much less significant than the bill with which we are dealing in the House today. It may have a drastic effect on the farmers of western Canada.

The minister did not see fit to have his House leader call this bill for third reading until December 11. At that time we spent only two days debating the bill. Let us not forget it was reported back to the House on July 17 and took that long before we were able to deal with it at third reading. Parliament sat until about December 20, just before Christmas. I know this bill was a low priority and sat at the bottom of the priority list on more than one occasion. I know this from talking to our house leader who has conversations with the government house leader. Now it is back again. This is the fourteenth day, and if the government is interested in expediting the passage of this bill the minister should not make statements which are totally untrue and unfair. If he wishes to do that, why the devil is he not in the House to hear some of our replies?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I had no intention of getting up and speaking again in this House tonight, but when a minister makes a statement like the one he made it has to be replied to so that people can see the facts as they are, and so they will realize it is not a filibuster by the opposition but that it is opposition members who are genuinely trying to get answers from a government and from a minister who does not really care.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, the only pleasant part of this debate is seeing you in the chair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: The parliamentary secretary to the minister in charge of the wheat board brought attention to a fact we have been focusing on throughout the extended period of the debate on this bill, and that is the cost of administration. He related that to crop insurance costs in the separate provinces, and I would venture to say that if he stays in this House of Commons long enough he will see the day when he will eat the words which he used this afternoon—that this program will only cost $11 or $12 per farm.

I remember the debate we had in this House when a former minister of finance started the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. At that time it was stated that it would cost approximately $10 million. I think it is now up to the $40 million or $50 million bracket. So it goes with government bureaucracy, and I think those costs can be related to the cost of the administration of this bill. Then certainly there will be a closing of the gap between the costs of these two programs. I suggest that this $11 or $12 cost per farm will increase drastically over the next two to five years.

In discussing this with crop insurance representatives I find that they are ready and willing to undertake the administration of this program. If we are interested in trying to save the government money, and as a result the taxpayers of Canada, then it seems logical that this program definitely should be operated by the crop insurance commissions because they have their head offices in the three prairie provinces. In addition, in each of these provinces there are district offices established. I do not know just how many district offices there are in the province of Saskatchewan, but I know that in the province of Alberta there are 52 district offices. It seems to me that whatever governmental proceedings have to take place could take place and be controlled out of those offices.

Further, in view of the fact that in a great many cases elevator agents collect for the crop insurance program, so could these same government agencies collect for the stabilization bill, which has to be done. However, there is one significant difference—the crop insurance commissions pay those elevator agents for collecting those fees, but there is no provision in this bill for any payment whatsoever to the elevator agents.

I think that it will not be too far into the future when elevator agents will ask to be reimbursed for this extra work, and rightly so. I think they should be. There is a certain amount of responsibility associated with the collection of this money, especially when public funds are being dealt with. If the government really wants to be fair and wants to operate the plan the way the majority of the producers would like to have it operated, then I am satisfied this is the way this program should be administered, instead of setting up another head office. This would do away with much confusion, and it would help a great deal in communication between the two bodies. As the crop insurance inspectors go out into the country they could do the same work as the inspectors under the grain stabilization plan. There will be a duplication of effort and cost, and for what purpose? It is just so one man, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, can control his empire in western Canada. I do not find that acceptable. I have not from the start, and I wish we could have had some support from the other side of the House in breaking this down.

Let us act in a sensible manner in order that this program can be put in place so that it will do justice to the producers of western Canada and, as a result, to every taxpayer in Canada. After all, taxpayers do have a part in this. They contribute a portion to this program.

I feel that the minister has been unfair. He is not acting wisely. Before this bill becomes law I hope he will give it a second thought, and give the crop insurance commissions the authority to administer the bill. Then certainly I for one would be much happier than I am at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this bill tonight because of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) this afternoon. I heard my colleagues and members of the official opposition speak of their surprise at the unfairness of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in the remarks he made this afternoon. Madam Speaker, I am surprised that anybody is surprised about that. He has been making these same kinds of remarks on the same subject for the past four or five years. It is his pet position.

● (2100)

I appreciated the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) this afternoon. I consider him to be a very competent young member—misguided, but competent. For a long time I thought that the Minister of Transport wrote his speeches but I have come to the conclusion that it probably works the other way. And I would advise the Minister of Transport to use the speeches that somebody else prepares for him because he does not add to his stature at all by the remarks he made this afternoon.

This is an important piece of legislation, Madam Speaker. It is important for us to look at the question of stabilizing the price of grain, and for the minister to criticize members who feel there should be a different way of providing that stabilization seems to me to be arrogant—a Prussian like attitude. It is not in keeping with the objects of a minister who avows that his interest is in providing a reasonable living for the farmers.

I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Assiniboia; incidentally I think he should be the minister in charge of the wheat board if it is to be separated from the Department of Agriculture. This is probably one occasion when I would support the idea of a second minister in a department. Agricultural stabilization certainly does not belong with Transport; it should come under the Department of Agriculture. There would be some merit in having the hon. member for Assiniboia handle this particular legislation. I say that because his remarks showed his knowledge of the vast detail in this bill, and his understanding that there probably can be a difference of opinion as to how the legislation will apply, and why there is a philosophical difference amongst members on how stabilization should be operated.

In moving the amendment today to refer this bill back to committee for further study my colleagues are talking about two separate things. One is a disagreement that we have in relation to the cost of production figures which are allowed under the bill. They do not allow a number of inputs that are in the agricultural stabilization bill which was introduced last year by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). They do not allow interest or premiums paid out through the grain stabilization bill, nor do they allow for the normal depreciation that is considered as part of the normal cost of production.

Those members on the government side who are on the agricultural committee would be well advised to remember the discussion we had last year on marketing legislation covering various foods and the allowances made for input costs of eggs as opposed to milk. In each case a different formula was being used, and in fact the formula is different from one province to another in many cases.

What we are suggesting is that the formula is spelled out in such detail that it would take a mathematician to understand it. I should like to know where the hon. member for Assiniboia got these three people who were going out to advise the farmers who phoned in with questions how much they would be allowed under certain circumstances after they knew their net proceeds of the previous year. I do not think you would get that kind of answer from the income tax people who were involved in the cost factors that go into the net return versus the gross return and the allowable costs in those returns. I think it would be very difficult to take the figures and tables in this bill and relate them to specific cases.

If we agreed with the first proposition that everything is spelled out and that they are correct, the hon. member for Assiniboia would still have difficulty applying that argument to the second proposition we referred back to the committee. That proposition is that the individual decision will be made in terms of clauses 9, 10 and 11 which take the western area and put it into one area, and which say that under certain circumstances everybody in that area is going to get a payment.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) made the point that if this applied in any other universal program where it involved those who were in need and those who were not, there would be considerable complaint from those with less left wing tendencies than from some of us because of the unfairness of the program. It was pointed out that if you had a year in which the criteria were met and the pay-out was made on a broad basis covering a large number of areas—and it is a fact that areas in western Canada have not consistently produced the same ratio of crops as has another area, either in grades or quantities—you would find some people who had a bumper crop being paid out according to their contribution in the same manner as those who had very bad crops for several years. Even if the latter were in a majority and had made little contribution to the program, their benefits coming out of it would be small.

I know that is difficult to understand, Madam Speaker, and I know the farmers are having difficulty understanding it because nobody could be that stupid—except the Minister of Transport. No one else could be that stupid. They would know, because they would talk to the farmers, that crops failures through weather, pestilence, loss of markets or any other consideration that a farmer faces, do not happen uniformly over the three prairie provinces. They do not happen uniformly in one prairie province. I do not come from the prairie provinces but I dare say in each there are at least five zones with totally different weather conditions, different growth, different production abilities, and a number of other factors about which I know nothing.

I know that different factors must be considered, that farmers can get more for Durum wheat than for some other kinds, and that people in the Palliser triangle grow No. 1

Northern which is as good as or even better than any wheat grown on the prairies. I know this, and I do not come from the prairies; but the Minister of Transport does not know it, obviously, since he has not provided for this legislation to be applied in different zones.

We are not only asking for the legislation to be applied in zones; we want it applied on an individual basis. We are concerned about the farmers. As for the minister, he has been in his ivory law tower teaching law to people in Saskatchewan. In Saskatchewan they must have produced some lousy lawyers. If he is as bad at law as he is at agriculture, he must be a really bad lawyer. I feel sorry for the people he taught at university.

Every western member who is the least bit honest will admit that there have been crop disasters, but the crop failure has often affected people in one half of a township and not in the other half. Sometimes in one half of a township hail will totally destroy a crop, but the crop in the other part of the township will be unaffected. That is how the good Lord works. He does not always hail out an entire township. But the Minister of Transport thinks that if there is hail in western Canada, it will hail all across the three prairie provinces and that there will be a total disaster in the entire area. He does not realize that it could hail in one half of a township, or in Assiniboia, and not hail at all in an adjacent riding—perhaps because the people of Assiniboia voted differently in the past. But political considerations do not influence the Lord overmuch. When there is a natural disaster, there is no easy way to decide boundaries.

In the committee we suggested boundaries on an individual basis. The minister said no. We suggested township boundaries. The minister said no. Then we suggested that there should be zones within the provinces. Again he said no. In the end we suggested boundaries involving at least the five areas under Wheat Board jurisdiction, which will include the three prairie provinces, part of British Columbia, and part of Ontario, which should be given consideration. But the minister said no, the area of jurisdiction had to be all prairie provinces as one unit.

I suggest that the hon. member for Assiniboia must have spent an awfully long time in school, or somewhere else, because if he had talked to farmers instead of lecturing them he would have discovered that there is a need to break down jurisdictional areas into small parcels if you are to make reasonable and economical payments. As the bill now stands, if the entire crop of the Palliser area is destroyed, say, or there is no market for No. 1 Northern and the whole area suffers a net loss, the result could be large payments to people who had a large income and small payments to people who made a small income.

We have been considering stabilization for some time. Ever since coming here the minister has tried to sell the idea of stabilization, but he knows little about it. His officials know little about it, too. When the committee late last year discussed the agricultural stabilization legislation, it suggested a number of changes. Actually I proposed one motion. We suggested that grains now coming under Canadian Wheat Board jurisdiction should be included as named commodities under the agricultural stabilization bill. We could treat such grains in the same way as we are to treat eight or nine, I think, other commodities. Doing it this way would mean that we should consider the production of each individual farmer; individual loss of income would be readily discernible, on the basis of which we could make a payment with the help of a subsidy from the federal government.

Obviously the minister relies on the long-term cycles affecting the production of cereal grains. In the near future we can expect reasonably good crops. Really, we need only worry about price on the international and domestic markets, so that the minister is not anticipating a pay-out in the immediate future. Actually if this program had been in force for some time, the last sizable pay-out would have taken place in 1962. True, grain prices were depressed that year, but production costs were not as high as at present. This program could be in existence for some time before conditions arise leading to a pay-out.

More than any other minister, the Minister of Transport has built up his own civil service. It is not our civil service, Mr. Speaker; it is his. He reminds me of Jimmy Gardiner, when Jimmy Gardiner was still a household word. Mr. Gardiner built up an empire including inspectors of diseased sheep and inspectors of just about everything else. I mention the sheep, because he was caught on that matter. The people working for him did not work for the government. They were order in council appointees.

How many civil servants will administer this program? The hon. member for Assiniboia suggested that it will be a few. The program will not involve large administrative costs. That may be so, because the Minister of Transport already has working for him a whole lot of order in council appointees. I am sure he will use the people of the grains group, of the transport study group, of the grains council, and PFAA appointees. All these are the minister's Liberal appointees, part of his machine.

We do not expect it will change anything. However, I disagree with the hon. member for Assiniboia who said it will not cost the farmers or the people of Canada. Jimmy Gardiner's machine cost the farmers a great deal. It could not always be calculated. Even though you could not add it all up, it cost a lot. There is no question about that. It would be interesting to hear from some of the old farmers how much it cost them.

These new appointments, even though they are supposed to work for no pay, will cost the farmers a lot. They are so-called dollar a year men. I read Peter Newman's book about a dollar a year man. I would like to go to the right fishing club. I would not mind working for a dollar a year because the expense accounts are so good. Even though the salaries of these men are very low, the expenses are high.

If the government continues to pass this kind of stupid legislation, there will not be any Liberal members from Saskatchewan.

I was interested in hearing the Minister of Transport talk about his new friends in Unifarm. That is a right wing organization. There is no doubt about that. However, I am not sure they are right enough for the Minister of Transport. I am sure there will be a lot of progressives in that organization who will not be influenced.

I am aware that the minister spoke to that organization. He was the guest speaker. They probably were polite. Farm people usually are. If you appear to be totally out of the ball park, they just smile and say, poor boy. They do not push it any farther. However, I am sure they did not buy.

This raises another interesting point. We filibustered on the original grain stabilization bill long enough for the courts to get into the act and stop the minister from cheating. That filibuster saved the farmers many millions of dollars. I think an accurate guess would be $400 million to $500 million was saved by killing the original bill. Right away that year we saved them over $100 million. What the people thought about that stabilization bill was certainly reflected in the election at that time. Some farmers were so mad that they took the government to court. I believe the matter was settled out of court. It was certainly dropped.

The government was cheating by not making the $15 million payment the law said it had to make. The minister wanted to get that through right away. He introduced retroactive legislation to cover the illegality. We held it up by filibustering. We make no apology. We filibustered until the court was able to make a decision. When the minister knew what the court's decision was going to be, the bill was withdrawn and there was no more talk about it.

I am sure that almost everyone in this House supports income stabilization. However, it must be an honest stabilization. We want it to be related to the costs of production. I agree that it will involve quotas and the government having to sell what is produced. It will involve producing as much as possible on the acreage that is allowed. The farmer will agree to do that in the most efficient manner at the lowest cost. He has already agreed to it with regard to a number of other commodities under the stabilization act.

This is a new field. One type of agriculture is being separated from the other areas of agriculture and is being placed under the Department of Transport. The former Minister of Transport should not be offended because this is really not part of the transport field. It is just that the minister responsible for the wheat board now happens to be Minister of Transport.

Mr. Benjamin: I wish Marchand had the wheat board.

Mr. Peters: We would rather that anybody else had it instead of having the wheat board follow one minister around. In many ways it is fortunate that there are only three Liberals elected in that province. As I said before, I would rather the wheat board were handled by an associated minister than traipsing around on somebody's caboose where it is being bumped around in a way that it does not deserve.

We are all interested in stabilizing agriculture, but it must be done fairly. It must be the kind of program the individual farmer can afford. It should be related to a number of other programs that we now have, one of which is the agricultural products stabilization board. It has a set of criteria that has worked satisfactorily for the past 20 years. It has its ups and downs but it works relatively well. There are many commodities that producers would like under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I believe it could apply to grains produced in the prairie provinces as it now applies to wheat produced in Ontario.

There is nothing wrong with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) having some responsibility for wheat. However, I do not understand why he is not supposed to have anything to do with western wheat.

Production costs differ in various parts of the prairies. Input costs, wheather conditions, soil conditions and production costs per acre differ. There should be an allowance for those differences. That is being taken into consideration in the farm crop insurance programs in which the provinces are involved.

Part of this program is a bastardization of the agricultural products marketing legislation and the crop insurance program. It is neither fish nor fowl in terms of insurance or marketing legislation. Before the farmers start making large demands on this program we must be sure that it is the type of program they can live with and is one that will bring some form of income stabilization to western Canada over a long period of time. Any other type of program is only for the political ego of the minister who introduced it.

The minister has not particularly tried to sell this program. There are very few farmers in favour of it and very few opposed to it. They are not opposed for a very simple reason. Initially the minister allowed them to check out of the program. If they go back into the program they can check out for the second time, but not get into it on any additional occasion. They can really check out of the program twice. For this reason no one is particularly opposed to it. However, we are going to spend money on it. I do not care how much money we shall spend on administration. I do not care how much money the minister will require to provide staff in the various agencies under his control to administer this scheme.

Whatever the costs of administration may be, the country as a whole has an interest in this program. Even if no farmers decide to participate there will still be the cost of administration, and I think hon. members would be very foolish to pass a piece of legislation which farmers do not desire to be passed. I have received no letters in the past two years either in support of this program or against it. Hon. members may suggest that I get no letters on the subject because I do not come from Western Canada. May I say, though that I got hundreds of letters about the previous piece of legislation, Bill C-171, in opposition to that particular measure.

It is important that legislation should be either opposed or supported by those it will affect, and there is no evidence of any support for or opposition to this legislation. Thus it seems to me we have failed to provide legislation which will achieve any reasonable result in terms of ensuring a guaranteed income for western farmers.

Western farmers are not particularly interested in insuring against disaster this year. They are not interested because they have already had a good crop. They have had a series of good crops. They have been able to buy new machines, including heavy machinery which enables them to cut down labour costs. They will be paying for those machines for the next eight or ten years, and so long as they receive a reasonable price for their grain and can grow a reasonable grade they will not be complaining very much.

I believe the minister now responsible for the wheat board had a personal interest in this legislation which is not in keeping with the opinion expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Assiniboia who believes sincerely though incorrectly, that this type of legislation is good for the farmers in his area. I suggest that if it is good for the farmers in his area where they are farming light land and grow very good crops in good years, though in other years they may well encounter difficulties, they might find that the same program will not apply in northern Saskatchewan. If he knows this he should consider referring the bill back to the committee to give members a chance to consider regionalization for a second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, while we are dealing tonight with western grain, more particularly with western wheat, we are dealing with an export commodity, a commodity which is traded internationally on a global basis.

I believe there is something happening out there in the world of which the government is not aware. For the first time in the history of the grain trade all the components are in the system on a world-wide basis. China and Russia are now regular purchasers. Every country has apparently made a decision not to allow its people to starve. So, for the first time, all the components are in the system on a world-wide basis.

Surely before we get into a complicated scheme such as this which is before us tonight, we should have answers to some simple questions. For instance, I have tried to find out from the government how much it costs to produce a bushel of wheat and I cannot get an answer. The government has no figures showing how one deals with the cost of land. I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) talk about the great record of achievement of the present minister in charge of the wheat board. Look at the government's own figures. According to the Wheat Review we find that the peak export year for Canadian wheat and wheat flour was 1962-63 when the figure was 594 million bushels. In 1972-73, ten years later, we exported 575 million bushels. This year, up until January 14, exports of wheat and Durum combined amounted to 216.1 million bushels. If everything goes well for the balance of the crop year exports of wheat and wheat flour may reach 450 million bushels, which is a far cry from the almost 600 million bushels we exported back in 1962-63.

What about our competitors? What about our great neighbour to the south? Exports of wheat and feed grain from the United States are constantly rising while Canadian exports are declining. Here are some figures. In 1963-64, a good year for Canada, we exported 15 million metric tons. In 1972-73 we exported 15.6 million metric tons. In 1974-75 the figure was 11.2 million metric tons and the projection for next year is 13 million metric tons. Compare these figures with those of our chief competitor, the United States—23 million metric tons in 1963-64, 31.8 million in 72-73, and 28 million in 1974-75. The projection for next year is 36.5 million metric tons.

What is the world import situation? In the year 1963-64, total imports amounted to 57.4 million metric tons. For the present year they are estimated to be 75.8 million metric tons. Trade in wheat and wheat flour is continuously increasing, yet our exports are likely to be far below the figure of 1963-64.

There is no question that if this bill passes Canada will be subsidizing wheat production in Western Canada. The hon. member for Assiniboia, appearing before the Senate Committee on Agriculture on December 16, had this to say:

> MR. GOODALE: For last year, just to put a figure on it, had the plan been in place—and this involves some presumptions about participation, crop volumes, prices and this sort of thing—the federal payment into the stabilization fund would have been something in the order of $90 million.

It is obvious to me that if Canada continues to follow the route of stabilization subsidy programs it will lead to an ever-increasing border limitation problem with the United States and the European Economic Community. What we need are long term contracts such as our competitors are entering into with Poland, Russia, and Japan—three and five year contracts. Maybe we should be devoting more attention to setting up a national food bank in this country. I suggest we should spend a little more on market promotion.

It bothers me that this year Canada is going to end up with about a $5 billion trade deficit. Grain exports from this country alone bring in some $3 billion of foreign exchange, and the government wants to tamper with this. I close by saying that with this bill I think we are walking down an unknown road.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief remarks in support of the main motion to give the bill third reading and at the same time to oppose the amendment for a six months' hoist.

Mr. Benjamin: No, it is not that. Read the amendment.

Mr. McIsaac: Well, referral back to committee is the same difference, be it four months or six months.

Mr. Benjamin: It would only take one day to do it.

Mr. McIsaac: It is another delay and obstruction move on the part of my hon. friends opposite. I can only conclude that my hon. friends opposite in the NDP have not been reading their mail that well lately. They cannot use the mail strike as an excuse this time. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool board of directors had a meeting just prior to the House adjourning for Christmas and urged that all of us collectively as MPs get on with the job of passing this legislation and putting it into place by January 1, 1976.

Mr. Benjamin: We will buy that.

Mr. McIsaac: Again earlier this month the Manitoba Farm Bureau—I am not talking of the Palliser wheat group mentioned by some hon. members opposite but the Western Agricultural Conference and the groups that they represent, a very broad representative group of grain producers—sent a telegram to the government, the minister, and to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), and I suspect hon. members of the NDP as well, urging members of parliament to get busy and pass this legislation.

I do not mind at all giving my hon. friends opposite all the time they require to debate this legislation. Over the years I have been listening to the same old arguments being put forward by my hon. friend from Regina-Lake Centre, the very same arguments he used when he was an organizer in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Benjamin: It seems they were successful anyway.

Mr. McIsaac: I would have expected from him more up-to-date arguments, such as those just put forward by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton). His suggestions were at least new and looked to the future. In moving this amendment this evening I think members of the NDP really wanted another chance to villify the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. That has really been the gist of their speeches so far. They have put forward no reason for deferring the legislation by referring it back to committee. They continue to heap abuse upon the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. I do not blame the NDP for finding some excuse for getting up and talking about farm policy because they really do not have a farm policy other than to villify and to criticize the minister. That has been their policy for some time, and again they are making the same old speeches.

It has been interesting to listen to some of the arguments that have been put forward. Some good arguments have been made and they have not all been a waste of time. Some good valid objections have been put forward as well as some very invalid objections. In general we have had a long, protracted debate since the bill was brought in, but the debate has been productive.

This bill, or a version of it, has been before the House and western farmers for almost five years, yet we still hear members opposite saying that perhaps we would move more slowly, that perhaps we should reconsider it. But again, no real alternative as to whom else we should consult and where else we should inquire has been put forward.

In all the time we have debated the bill and this whole concept of stabilization it took the official opposition, the Conservative party opposite, until December 11, 1975, before it came forward with any sort of concrete counter proposal to this concept of grain stabilization. On that date a definite suggestion was put forward by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), supported by other speakers from that party.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, some real concerns have been raised and I think resolved in this debate. I think we have improved the legislation. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) said he had not had any mail about this subject for the last two years. Although it is good for Canada that current grain prices are high and markets are good, perhaps part of the difficulty felt by all members of the House in trying to have a comprehensive debate on this issue is that the farmers do not really want to think about the day when grain markets and prices are not as good as they are today. But in the meantime I think they do want this House of Commons to proceed with putting in place some kind of fund or program to cushion the day—if and when it comes; we all hope it will not even though the course of history indicates it is likely to—when things are not so rosy.

The opposition did not like this particular plan. It seems to me that all we heard in the early stages of this debate was that we need a plan but not this one. We talked to farm groups and all were careful to support the principle of stabilization without specifically criticizing what was wrong with this plan, and more particularly without any firm proposal of their own being made until just before Christmas when, after some four or five years, the Conservative party put forward a kind of individual plan. If I had a criticism to make of it, their plan is a great deal more complicated than the one in this bill, and one criticism of this bill has been that its terms are too complicated and detailed.

The NDP—and I give them credit for this—did put forward an alternative, albeit a fairly simple one and a very expensive one. They suggested a fully guaranteed income for all farmers, whether they be grain farmers or some other kind of farmer, whether the farmers needed or deserved it, whether they were good producers, tried hard or made good judgments, or otherwise.

The fact of the matter is that if they had talked to producers in the prairie region, certainly to the grain growers, they would have discovered that even the supporters of the NDP do not want this kind of plan. They may be socialists in other respects and for other reasons, but they do not want the kind of plan that will bonus everyone regardless of whether they do a good job or a poor job of farming. Such a proposal for solving the problems of the grain farmer would not get support.

I do not suggest that the plan embodied in Bill C-41 is perfect. I suspect we will be considering amendments to it once the plan is in operation. But we do need the plan in place. I suggest that opposition delays in the past year have cost the western grain producers millions of dollars because the fund was not in place and building itself up toward the day when that particular plan was in operation.

Mr. Peters: Your own minister delayed the bill, and you know it.

Mr. McIsaac: I want to deal with some of the points that have been put forward in this debate. Who wants it? I think we have settled that particular question. All political parties and farm groups are almost unanimous that we do need an income plan of this kind. Although people have expressed concern and criticized this particular bill and some of its complexities, at least they are all there, written into the legislation. It is all there written in, and is not subject to the vagaries of orders in council or changes in that respect.

● (2150)

The program does not provide for pay-outs to the larger grain producers. Some implication was expressed by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) about the 2 per cent for everybody which would be taken out, but the larger producers would not get larger payments because there is that limit to 2 per cent of sales up to a value of $25,000. It may be, of course, that the limit should be raised, but it certainly will not let someone with $100,000 in sales draw out large payments.

Mr. Benjamin: That is a minor detail.

Mr. McIsaac: I do not think it is a minor detail, but it is rather ridiculous to compare this to the unemployment insurance program, medicare, or anything else of that kind.

I have one criticism of the legislation in that it excludes the feed grain producer who chooses to feed his grain to his own livestock. If a barley producer markets his grain to another feed lot, sells it to a feed mill or to the Canadian Wheat Board for export or shipment to eastern Canada and hauls it to the elevator for that reason, he can contribute to the plan and be a part of it, and thereby draw benefits. On the other hand, if that feed grain producer feeds his own livestock he is not able to participate. It seems to me this is an omission in this legislation.

The theory is, of course, that such a producer will be able to benefit from livestock stabilization programs. That might be the fact, but I do not see that we should deny him the right to be a participant in this particular program, because he is a grain producer just the same as the other chap who grows barley and sells it to the Canadian Wheat Board.

I am satisfied that before very long we will again have to bring in some amendments to this legislation, particularly after it gets into operation and we hear from the producers themselves. I think it was the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) who spoke earlier in the debate about the delays in getting this bill into place. It is not to the credit of members opposite that this legislation is going forward at all. They have stalled and played games for many months in spite of the recitations of dates and so on that we have heard from members here tonight.

Nothing has been said about the many amendments and changes we were able to implement in response to some criticisms opposite and some suggestions both in the committee and at the report stage here in the House.

One other point that keeps coming back into the debate from hon. members of the NDP and the Conservative opposition relates to the number of people who will be employed to handle this legislation. That is a nonsense argument and is not borne out by the facts. Indeed time will demonstrate that this is one of the more phoney arguments they have put forward.

Another suggestion I have heard put forward by members opposite is that this program will destroy the crop insurance program, or somehow jeopardize crop insurance.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. McIsaac: I certainly can check back through the speeches, as I am sure the hon. member could, to find out who made that suggestion. In no way will this program jeopardize the crop insurance program. This program is complementary to the crop insurance program.

Any comparisons made between this program in Bill C-41 and the PFAA are not valid either, because this program will hopefully do a better and better job than the PFAA. This program is not in any way comparable to PFAA.

This brings me to the one point raised by hon. members opposite about what we do about the differences in regions. That is a good and valid question. The proposal put forward by the Conservatives would really mean that we are going to ask the government to set up individual retirement plans or bank accounts for individual producers. I find that surprising coming from the Conservative party. Surely there are enough provisions in other programs and in income tax provisions for the farmers to go ahead and make their own plans in that regard. Really this proposal put forward by the Conservative party as a counter proposal to this legislation would see the government setting up individual funds for each of these grain producers. If the producer did not use the fund during his life time he could then sort of retire on it.

On the one hand hon. members in the opposition do not want the government to spend more money, but on the other hand they say we should set up these little retirement funds. I do not think this plan will stand up in any way. Their proposal has no way of triggering payments in order to do the job intended to be done by Bill C-41, that is, stabilizing over-all grain income whenever that income is low.

This is one more of a number of proposals and policies which have been implemented by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. I could talk about setting up the grains group. I do not know why members opposite are particularly critical about that, because this certainly set up people in several departments to look into and highlight the grain industry, with the many good results that have come from that. I could also refer to the good job in sales that is being done by the Wheat Board. The national feed grains policy has provided a major improvement in the disorderly marketing situation we had before.

I would agree that no such scheme as we are debating here tonight in Bill C-41 is going to replace good marketing or good marketing practices. Nor is it going to replace good farm practices or good farm management practices. In this respect I certainly agree with earlier remarks of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. The best kind of plan is one that involves a minimum of government intervention and government interference, and leaves the operations of the farmers to their own choices. I think this plan does that and I urge all hon. members to support it, and to reject the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion and I think we have found general agreement to defer the vote on this matter to the first item of business under government orders tomorrow.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There certainly has been an agreement to defer the vote, Mr. Speaker, but my understanding of the agreement was that it would be taken tomorrow in the evening. I think there was a general agreement that the vote could be taken at eight o'clock tomorrow evening if we get that far.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has stated the agreement as I understood it, namely, that if the vote were called this evening it would not be taken now but deferred until tomorrow evening, not tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is not as it was communicated to me here by my colleague, but if that is to be the agreement of the House it is acceptable to me.

● (2200)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think it would be easier is we had agreement in respect of time. Would eight o'clock be the time selected by hon. members?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I understood very clearly from my colleagues that it was to be tomorrow afternoon and I would hesitate to agree otherwise. Perhaps we had better go ahead in the circumstances.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since there seems to have been some breakdown in the communications, as I never heard anything other than that it would be tomorrow evening, could we not defer the vote until tomorrow evening but let the exact time tomorrow evening be decided by consultation tomorrow?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that certainly is not the advice I have. Tomorrow afternoon was certainly the intent on this side and I would not feel free to depart from that.

Mr. Peters: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would hope hon. members would come to some agreement. Once we have proceeded to put the question to arrive at a decision, then we cannot see the clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I understand that there is some legitimate difficulty on the other side of the House with regard to a vote at any other time tomorrow except the time mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I think it would be agreeable to all of us if the vote were deferred until the first item of government business on Wednesday. I understand that is agreeable to my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is agreeable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The suggestion seems to be that the deferred division on Bill C-41 be postponed until the calling of the first order of government business on Wednesday. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being agreed, it is so ordered that the said vote will be taken and members called in at that time at the calling of the first order of government business on Wednesday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I just ask if the acting House leader would like to confirm the business for the House tomorrow afternoon. I believe it will be Bill C-71.

Mr. Blais: I can confirm, Mr. Speaker, that Bill C-71 is to be the first order of business tomorrow afternoon.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY SERVICE—REQUEST FOR REPORT OF LABOUR-MANAGEMENT COMMITTEE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the question I wish to raise this evening, and I want to thank the hon. members for giving me some assistance in raising it as the first item, has to do with the continuing concern we in Prince Edward Island and I believe the people in Newfoundland have about the problems with regard to the main transportation link with the mainland, the ferry system.

As hon. members will recall, the last time there was a disruption in the ferry service because of the situation on the railroad in August, 1973, some members on all sides sought assurance from the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport that the absolutely catastrophic tie-up of the ferry systems of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland would be dealt with in the time of peace, so-called, between the resolution of that strike and the entering into of new collective bargaining arrangements two years or more hence. At that time I received an undertaking which appears on the record of Hansard at pages 6142 and 6143 of August, 1973. At that time the minister said:

... I can answer the hon. member right now by saying yes, we could correct that situation assuredly so that it would never happen again.

He went on to suggest that the solution should be found elsewhere than in compulsory arbitration. Certainly that is a solution with which I would agree, and I am sure many hon. members on all sides would.

Since that time I have carried on a rather lengthy correspondence with provincial and federal ministers, but particularly with the federal minister of transport. My colleague, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), on December 3 as reported at page 9685 of Hansard, asked the following written question:

Has any agreement been reached or any arrangement made whereby continuous ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the Mainland can be guaranteed, even when labour contracts are being negotiated?

I was somewhat shocked at the answer of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), which was as follows:

No agreement has been reached nor has any arrangement been made whereby continuous ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the Mainland can be guaranteed at all times, especially during the ice season and during labour disputes.

Obviously with respect to weather conditions or ice certainly I am not one who believes that the Minister of Transport, regardless of what his powers might be, has reached the area of control of ice conditions or has passed beyond human bounds into the supernatural. We know only too well that these are conditions which so far no technology or political know how has overcome. However, with respect to the question of labour disputes, either present or future, I was mightily disturbed to find that the minister had neither arrived at any kind of solution or agreement with the key parties involved, nor did he seem to be aware of the fact that there has been considerable correspondence with his predecessor, or that in fact his predecessor had established a special committee and that the committee, which is known as the Marine East co-ordinating committee, had held a series of meetings.

Unfortunately these meetings were without a great deal of success, and this is the reason for my pursuing the matter tonight. As a matter of fact, on December 8 as reported at page 9795 of Hansard I indicated in a supplementary to the Minister of Transport that there was the Marine East co-ordinating committee which had been announced by his predecessor, now the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand), a year ago July, and that the committee was to meet in the months of January, May and September and effect continuing communication on potential labour disputes which might result in the termination of a service which vitally affects the economic interests of Prince Edward Island. I asked specifically whether that committee was still operating and when it might be making a report. The Minister of Transport indicated on December 8 that he had not had a report but that he would look into it. Unfortunately to date the minister has not reported either to this House or to me, and I am still in the dark, as are the people of Prince Edward Island.

This comes against the background of a situation where we know we are into the negotiation of new contracts. I understand the negotiations have not produced any positive results. In light of what has been a continuing series of labour problems, one cannot be as optimistic as one might otherwise hope to be. When we project the possibility of a crisis situation sometime in the next few months, perhaps during a critical period affecting the economic interests of at least one or two provinces of this country, it is critical that now, well in advance of the time when we reach a crisis situation, the ministries responsible—particularly the Ministry of Transport which has a prime responsibility—should have worked out some kind of solution.

Shortly after the situation in August, 1973, I produced one proposal. I will not take the time of the House to go into detail on that proposal, but it was one possible alternative, a double penalty alternative which in effect would have provided a penalty against both union and management, but would not have penalised the public interest and the people of Prince Edward Island.

I direct the attention of the parliamentary secretary to that proposal. I have had no definitive reply from his department or from officials in the Department of Labour. I have had some kind of preliminary reaction from some unions about the proposal, but that is the extent to which there has been any serious examination of that as an alternative. There have been other suggestions. There has been the suggestion of establishing a Crown corporation, which I really do not think would get us much beyond the present dilemma.

Of course it is known to members of the House that the government of Prince Edward Island, realizing the seriousness of the situation, has had in the courts since late 1973 a legal action against the Government of Canada with respect to its own responsibility to maintain continuous transportation to and from Prince Edward Island, even during times of labour disputes.

I think it is high time, therefore, that the minister or his parliamentary secretary indicated to the House exactly what kind of work is being done, and when we can be assured that we are not going to face, for the third time in a decade, the kind of damaging situation that will affect the income, the prospects, and the operation of the social and economic fabric of Prince Edward Island. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary could give us some of that assurance this evening.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to respond to my hon. friend again this evening. I have had that opportunity on other occasions at this point in the proceedings, and I am always very interested in the arguments he presents and impressed by the way he puts them to the government and the House.

I can assure the hon. member, as other hon. members on this side of the House have done on other occasions, that the government is very concerned with the matter of the substantial losses incurred by people who are innocent bystanders to labour-management disputes and the situations which arise in the course of industrial relations that deprive innocent people of some kind of service which causes them inconvenience at the least and probably much more than that.

I should like to help my hon. friend by providing some background and updating on the work of the Marine East co-ordinating committee.

When the hon. member first asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to state what was being done to ensure continuous ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland with regard to disruptions caused by winter ice conditions and labour disputes, I am afraid the wording may have become a bit confused. I am glad that has been straightened out now and that we are not particularly talking about "acts of God" in the insurance sense of the phrase, but really about losses or disruption caused by labour disputes.

With regard to this particular matter of disruptions due to industrial disputes, the original reply by the minister recognized the fact that ferry service employees enjoyed the right to strike and the government would not want to interfere with that right if such action could be avoided.

The hon. member has drawn attention to the existence of the Marine East co-ordinating committee and appears to be under the impression that this group was set up to eliminate strikes in the ferry service. We only wish—and I speak in a general sense—that that could be true in an easy fashion. The committee in question was set up in an effort to reduce the likelihood of strikes developing, and represents an earnest attempt of management and labour to maintain a relationship which would permit them to identify problem areas in advance and nip potential disputes in the bud.

The existence of this committee, with sub-committees in the various ships and terminals, has provided a useful sounding board and has enabled management and labour to defuse several potentially explosive situations. Nevertheless, despite the success of the co-ordinating committee so far in the maintenance of good management labour relations, it must be recognized that this has not eliminated the possibility of strikes in the ferry services, and the government would be reluctant to interfere with that particular right.

SOCIAL SECURITY—FAMILY ALLOWANCE—REASON FOR FAILURE TO FOLLOW PAYMENT METHOD ADOPTED IN FRANCE

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, one can read at page 10193 of Hansard for December 19, the Friday before the Christmas recess, that I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) if he had considered the system of family allowance payments in France where only those persons below a certain income level are eligible to receive payments, and for what reason would such a system not be introduced in Canada? The minister gave me a short reply referring to the attitude of the opposition.

We are presently, Mr. Speaker, spending some $2 billion a year on family allowances, and 60 per cent of that amount goes to families with incomes over $12,000.

Well over three million families in Canada receive family allowances, including nearly 900,000 families in the province of Quebec. About 40 per cent have only one child, but the figures go all the way up to some 2,000 families which have ten or more children.

A couple with two children earning a taxable income of $10,000 pay over $2,000 in federal taxes. For similar families with taxable incomes of $20,000 and $30,000, the figures are approximately $5,000 and $9,000 respectively. Those three families receive an after tax benefit on their family allowances of approximately $360, $330, and $300 respectively.

Family allowance payments are equivalent to about a quarter of total personal income tax; so that if, for example, payments were restricted to only half the number of families which presently receive them, that is, those with lower incomes, personal taxes could be reduced by about 12 per cent across the board or by such other ways as would give greater relief to those in lower tax brackets.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare tells us that 20 per cent of families receive less than 6 per cent of family income, whereas the highest one-fifth receive about 40 per cent of family income. With these figures in mind we should be very reluctant to remove the indexing of family allowances. Proportionately, the poor are still getting poorer while the rich are getting richer.

We all like to see universal payments. However, in the case of old age pensions the supplement is based on income. It is therefore not illogical to suggest that family allowance payments should be based on need. This is the way it works in France.

The proposals of the minister concerning income security and adequate minimum incomes are based on need. Thus, while one can argue administrative ease in universal payments, there are many examples where the desirable principle of universality is laid aside for economic necessity.

It is a retrograde step in the over-all program of income redistribution to remove the indexing of family allowances. Why not take this opportunity to revise the entire scheme, maintaining indexing, eliminating payments to those who do not need them and, at the same time, either make compensatory tax reductions or reduce the budgetary deficit?

Answering my question on December 19, the minister referred to the attitude of the opposition. Today, with majority government, unanimity is not essential. The present thinking of the government, which is looking for spending cuts, should be redirected toward the program of family allowances. I should like the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or his representative in the House tonight, the parliamentary secretary, to expand on the short answer given to me on December 19.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member, my colleague, for raising this question in the House on this occasion. We are dealing with one of the costliest programs of the government. The family allowance program, in which Canadian taxpayers are involved in the redistribution of about $2 billion, absorbs nearly 6 per cent of the total federal budget. So it is not unreasonable that questions from my side of the House, or the opposition side, should be raised about the value of this program and its benefits.

Let me say at the outset that the government is firmly Committed to the program as presently constituted. Between 1968 and 1972, years when I was first a member of parliament, the government put forward a proposal for public consideration which would have involved, in effect, putting a ceiling on family allowances so that families with more than $15,000 annual income would not receive payments. I remind hon. members that the proposal was not well received in the country when it was discussed in an active and lively public debate. People with family incomes of $15,000 were quick to point out that they were not well-to-do, and that for them the family allowance was a considerable benefit.

Remember, the family allowance concept recognizes the fact of dependency, the fact that having children involves extra expense. It recognizes the fact that those expenses usually come at a time in life when a family is newly formed. In most cases the couple has been recently married and must meet considerable expenses in setting up the household and launching on life together. Canadians feel that consideration ought to be given to this.

That discussion resulted in a proposal which was adopted and which goes a long way to meeting the position taken by my colleague. That was the proposal that family allowances be subjected to income tax at the full rates. The effect of that taxation is that approximately $600 million of the $2 billion paid is recaptured by the federal treasury in the form of income tax. It can be seen that a policy that costs $2 billion ends up having a net cost of $1,400 million.

At this time the government is not contemplating going any further and taking back any more of the family allowance than it does through the income tax system for those families with higher incomes. But I would like to put this question to the hon. member and those who feel we should go further. What really is the difference between taking back more of the family allowance than we do and reducing the exemption or deduction which we give families under the income tax system in respect of children? The act gives a child deduction. That again recognizes the fact of dependency. I think one can make the same defence of the deduction for children as one can of the family allowance.

PENITENTIARIES—MILLHAVEN—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON GASSING AND BEATING OF INMATES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on November 21, 1975, I raised the question of the government's policy with respect to an investigation of an incident at Millhaven Penitentiary relating to certain inmates located in the solitary confinement section of that institution. This incident related to alleged gassing and beating of inmates.

At the same time I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) whether or not public hearings were contemplated with respect to the situation at Millhaven and in other penitentiaries across Canada. The Solicitor General indicated that an investigation was contemplated by the Penitentiary Correctional Ombudsman, and in fact that person is now conducting hearings relating to the Millhaven incidents.

The investigation now taking place only serves to highlight the government's lack of any consistent policy with respect to prison reform, particurlarly concerning solitary confinement practices and facilities in federal penitentiaries across the country. The attitude of the government and the Solicitor General in this area, as in many others, is simply to approach each incident with the well-known local brush fire approach to penal reform rather than coming to grips with the fundamental root causes of the problem.

In the first report of the Correctional Ombudsman in July, 1974, Miss Hansen asked for a special study of the use of dissociation in federal prisons, complaining that solitary confinement as a punishment is both cruel and unevenly applied across the country. Recently, Mr. Justice D. V. Heald of the Federal Court of Canada in a judgment described the use of solitary confinement at the British Columbia Penitentiary as cruel and unusual punishment, contrary to the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Why does the Solicitor General therefore not immediately declare the government's intentions with respect to prison reform? If the government is sincerely interested in reform, why does it delay in having the fullest possible public inquiry into the conditions in the federal penal institutions? Is it the government's intention to introduce legislation concerning this matter? Is it not reasonable to ensure that the fullest possible representations on this topic are received?

I note that there is apparently evidence before the Hansen investigation that attempts to form prisoner's committees to voice prisoner's concerns and recommendations for improvement and reform were met by the transfer of committee members to other institutions and the placing of others in solitary confinement.

In conclusion, the Solicitor General owes it to the House and the country to give us a clear and unequivocal statement on these issues, to table the report on solitary confinement, to reply to the Federal Court judgment respecting penitentiary conditions in solitary confinement, and to let us know whether the government has any plans in the area of prison reform to avoid further or more serious incidents than that experienced at Millhaven on November 3 last.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, before addressing myself to the original question asked in the House on November 21 last, may I make some brief comments.

The concern of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has been expressed in this House and across the land on numerous occasions. He is interested in prison reform, reform in the nature of establishing penitentiaries of a much smaller size designed to hold between 100 and 150 inmates, instead of 450. The Solicitor General has been trying to establish such institutions so that there might be closer contact, closer supervision, and better means of rehabilitating prisoners, The hon. member mentioned committees of prisoners in penitentiaries. I have met some of these committees in company with the Solicitor General, and as long as they conduct themselves in a meaningful manner their views are listened to and referred to the proper authorities for action.

With respect to the specific incident the hon. member mentioned as occurring on November 3, 1975, this incident happened at the Millhaven institution when tear gas was used to pacify some rebellious and noisy inmates in one area of the dissociation ranges. I might say that many of those who are in these dissociation ranges are there for their own protection, though others are there for disciplinary purposes.

The incident was reported to the Commissioner of Penitentiaries and an administrative inquiry was convened. On November 4, 1975, the correctional officer at the time of the incident was suspended from duty pending the completion of the administrative inquiry. This senior officer was reinstated on duty on November 13, 1975. Disciplinary charges have been laid against him, heard at the institutional level, and referred to the regional director's office for decision. This administrative inquiry revealed facts which were not known on November 3 and 4, 1975. In the light of these new facts, the Solicitor General has requested the correctional investigator, Miss Inger Hansen, to undertake an inquiry into the new facts. This inquiry commenced on January 19 last.

The terms of reference of the inquiry are as follows:

1. The events leading up to the use of gas and force in the cell range G-1 and the environment control area of Millhaven institution on November 3, 1975, as well as the events following the said use of gas and force, and whether the directives, instruction and standing orders which pertain to the use of gas and force were followed.

2. Make suggestions with a view to improving the directives, instructions, and standing orders which pertain to the use of gas and force, and/or the way in which such directives, instructions, and standing orders are used.

I am not at present in a position to give the House a full report of the occurrence. That will have to wait until Miss Hansen completes her report. However, I can say that as a result of these incidents some 70 inmates who were in dissociation at the Millhaven institution have been transferred to the Regional Reception Centre, (Ontario), the Collins Bay institution or the Joyceville institution so as to allow the institutional authority to free some correctional officers to maintain the normal activities and programs of the institution since some correctional officers had withdrawn their services on an overtime basis.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF QUESTIONING OF FOUR CANADIANS BY RUSSIAN AGENTS IN CUBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity arising from information given the House by the government yesterday which appears contrary to the facts concerning the holding in custody and questioning of four Canadian citizens by allegedly Russian KGB agents after they made a forced landing by air in Cuba on December 30. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That in view of the statements by pilot Robert Carter that his group received no assistance from the Department of External Affairs while held in Cuba and that he was not contacted immediately on their return to Canada by Canadian officials, the House requests a full investigation and statement on the facts of this matter by the Secretary of State for External Affairs; and further, the House instructs the Prime Minister during his current stay in Havana to make representations to Prime Minister Castro in regard to this unwarranted and unlawful holding of Canadian citizens on Cuban soil by Russian KGB agents and that he advise Mr. Castro that Canada is not prepared to tolerate further incidents of this kind.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a case of urgent and pressing necessity. As Canadian National Railways has embarked on a program of reducing services to passengers even though no new rail transportation policy has been established by parliament, which cut-backs result in the lay-off of workers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That this House deplore such actions by the CNR and call on the Minister of Transport to instruct the railway companies that they are to improve and encourage passenger rail service until such time as parliament has instructed them differently.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing importance.

Considering that the use of the metric system is quickly progressing in our country, considering also that Canadian consumers must be protected against possible commercial abuses by some monopolies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House consider without delay the steps to be taken to avoid price increases as a result of a decreased quantity of the product delivered to the consumer.

SUGGESTED MAINTENANCE OF SUPER CONTINENTAL PASSENGER SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is in regard to the recently announced intention of Canadian National Railways to suspend its Super Continental passenger service across Canada for economic reasons. I suggest to this House that this matter should not be decided solely in terms of economic considerations. As transcontinental rail service was one of the foundation stones of Confederation for the west, and remains so today for many western Canadians; and considering that most developed countries are today expanding and improving their passenger rail services as a relatively inexpensive, energy conserving mode of travel, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Transport take the necessary steps to ensure that the Super Continental passenger service be maintained and that the CNR be instructed to direct its efforts to the expansion and improvement of passenger rail service for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

I cannot imagine anyone saying no. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF FREEZE OF MEDICAL RESEARCH TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of inflation, the freeze of the medical research budget is resulting in the cancellation of many good research projects and the loss of many research jobs. In the long run, it will result in much increased health costs in this country. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

Since the Olympic Games represent in the international area an activity whose prestige will be shared by the whole of Canada; and since the so-called federal programs related to Olympic stamps and coins are not a financial participation by the federal government but financing directly provided by the individuals of every province, including Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—NUMBER OF PROVINCES SIGNING AGREEMENTS AND POSSIBLE DEADLINE FOR SIGNING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance who yesterday I thought was looking for the new society but found he had only gone as far as Toronto,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: where he said to the Canadian Club "The prices and incomes control program itself is now well launched." As it is well over three months since the Prime Minister launched this program in the presence of the first ministers and as only one provincial government has now signed an agreement with the government of Canada, I presume the minister now has some concrete information to back up his statement. I am sure he will want to share this information with the House. How many provinces are ready or near ready to sign?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate that within the fairly near future five more provinces will be in a position to sign agreements under Section 4 Subsection 3 of the law. In the case of the province of British Columbia, we recognize that, because of the very recent change in government, it would be unreasonable to expect them to maintain the same timetable as the others. With regard to Saskatchewan, Alberta and Quebec, we will be looking for an early decision on their part. Happily there will be a meeting of finance ministers next week. I will be pressing upon the remaining provinces the desirability of bringing to a conclusion the rather extensive discussions that have been going on with regard to the agreement.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the Minister of Finance consider the program well launched with three or four provinces apparently expressing substantial reservation about signing? I assume that participation by all provinces is essential to the success of the program in view of the way it has been set up. Is the minister prepared to state a deadline by which he expects all provinces to be in on the program either administering their own aspect of it or turning it over to the federal authority, the Anti-Inflation Board?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think that issuing an ultimatum to the provinces in that way would not be the best method of getting continued co-operation. Certainly, that is not the course of action I would take in this regard. The hon. gentleman referred to substantial reservations. I do not find them substantial. A number of provinces have sought to negotiate special conditions in consideration of their coming into the program. We said to them that we feel all provinces should come in on a substantially equal basis.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—EFFORT TO OBTAIN SUPPORT OF VARIOUS GROUPS FOR PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): My supplementary arises from the minister's statement that the program was well launched, and the impression in the minds of some of us that there is substantial resistance to the program still in certain sectors of the economy. Could the minister tell us what he is doing, or what he is advising the Prime Minister to do, to bring the various groups of this country together and continue to sell the program? Is this being left to the officials of the Anti-Inflation Board? I ask these questions particularly in view of the emphasis the Minister of Finance placed in his speech yesterday on the limited recognition here in Canada of the substantial interdependence which exists between the various groups making up our economy.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Both I and my colleagues will be continuing discussions with the major interest groups in the economy of Canada. Indeed, I would anticipate in the next four or five months a very extensive absence from the House as I meet these various groups throughout the country and have an opportunity of putting the government's viewpoint.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—NATURE OF SPECIAL CONDITIONS REQUESTED BY PROVINCES AS PREREQUISITE OF JOINING PROGRAM

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Presuming that one of the objectives is near-unanimity on the rules, regulations and conditions across the country, would the minister be good enough to indicate the nature of some of the special conditions he has just mentioned? Do these have any reference at all to the time limits suggested by the provinces involved or request that the federal government put a set time limit on the control program? How does the time frame fit into the presence of near-unanimity, or the lack of it, across the country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I think it is fair to say that that has not been the issue. I might add that it would be unfair to individual provinces to make public the cases they have been putting, but I would refer the hon. gentleman to the statement on television last night by the minister of finance of Saskatchewan in which he indicated the special circumstances he was seeking to have recognized.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I cannot conceive why it would be unfair to let the people of this country know the conditions which each of the provinces are seeking. If any other hon. members know, I would be glad to hear from them. In any event, I would ask the minister whether some of these conditions involve special requirements having regard to professional fees and, if so, which provinces have made such a request and what type of professional fees are concerned?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, who was once a provincial minister, used to know that the provinces were very jealous of the positions taken up by their individual governments. He might like to address himself to his friends in Alberta, for example, and ask them whether they would like to have placed on public record the objections they are bringing forward.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: I am asking you!

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—POSSIBILITY OF ACHIEVING PRICE PARITY THIS YEAR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Since one of the perfectly legitimate objections the United States government has to the operation of the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement has been the complete failure of the Canadian government, after ten years, to obtain price parity for identical products on both sides of the border, resulting in a situation in which Canadian consumers can pay up to $500 more than Americans for the same car, I should like to ask the minister whether the government is now prepared to assure the people of Canada primarily, as well as the Americans, that price parity will be achieved in automobile products this year.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member talks about the reaction of the U.S. government I am not sure whether he is referring to statements which were alluded to yesterday in press reports. I would point out that in fact the view expressed yesterday was not that of the United States government—I wish to make that clear. Nor have I seen the formal report; merely press stories on it. As to the question of whether we can guarantee parity in the current year I would not, for obvious reasons, wish to make that kind of commitment; I am not satisfied I would be able to carry it out. However, I can assure the hon. member and the House that we are working toward parity, and this will clearly be one of the matters we shall be discussing not only with United States interests, that is, in terms of government interests, but also with representatives of the automobile industry here in Canada as well, during the meetings now going on in connection with the auto pact.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since not only this minister but his two predecessors made the same kind of general statement, I should like to pick up one point in what the minister said. The minister said he was not sure that he can carry out a commitment this year to achieve price parity. Given the federal government's control over tariffs and over tax policy, why is it not possible for the government to use these weapons with the automotive companies in Canada in order to achieve price parity?

Mr. Jamieson: For the simple reason, Mr. Speaker, that to use those in isolation might put in jeopardy the whole concept of the auto pact. Surely, the approach must be the one that we are undertaking now, which is to make a thorough assessment of the effects on both sides of the border and to aim toward what I have already stated to be my objective. Hon. members have said that it has been the objective for many years, but the fact is that we are getting closer to parity and I hope we can continue to narrow the gap. Nevertheless, I want to know from the companies in specific terms why the gap exists, and it is for that reason that I am initiating talks with them.

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN PERMITTED LEVEL OF PRODUCTION IN CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would urge the minister to make that appropriate move toward the United States. So far as Canadian workers are concerned, is the government now proposing to the United States that one of the changes that should be made in the pact is to guarantee to Canadian producers the right to produce in dollar value North American automobiles and parts, on an annual basis averaged over two or three years, to the actual level of consumption of cars and parts, that Canadians actually consume?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will not feel that I am evading his question, but I am not going to disclose in public what our negotiating stance is going to be in specific terms. If the hon. member is talking about our getting full value in terms of Canadian participation in the auto pact, the answer is yes and I am pursuing that aggressively on behalf of the government. But I do not think any benefit would be served here by talking in specific terms about what we are going to say to the Americans.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO PROTECT CONSUMERS WHEN METRIC SYSTEM INTRODUCED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I intended to put my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but, in his absence, I shall address it to the Minister of Justice.

As the conversion to the metric system naturally entails certain problems which are of concern to consumers, and as I have been advised that companies which control the sale of sugar in our country are about to sell it in metric quantities but at the same price as the former weights, can the minister tell the House whether questions have been put to him in this regard, what those questions were, and what steps he intends to take to remedy the situation and ensure that consumers are treated fairly?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the particular transactions that the hon. member mentions have not been brought to my attention. I would ask him to do so and I will happily take them up with my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and determine whether they are in breach of the packaging and labelling act, which provides that weights and measures may be shown in the metric system. I encourage him, if he thinks that consumers are not being treated properly under the law, to bring such cases to my attention.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the question I have just put, and because the same problem will eventually arise with regard to the distribution of oil in Canada, will the minister take appropriate steps to protect the consumer, and ensure that advantage is not taken of metrification to increase the price of oil while delivering it in smaller quantities?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member may know, there are a number of steps being taken at the moment, and I say quite frankly, in some instances consumer groups feel these are inadequate; in other words, perhaps our position that consumers should be educated but that they should be responsible for determining whether they are getting fair value, does not go far enough. I am in sympathy to some degree with that point of view, and we are looking for techniques and methods whereby we may be able to reinforce the educational program. As the hon. member will also appreciate, it is very difficult to know how one might undertake what I might describe as policing action in terms of every gas pump and retail outlet in the country. It is a difficult problem but I am sympathetic with the basic premise of the question and we are looking at it to see what we can do.

HOUSING

REASON FOR FAILURE TO ADOPT NATIONAL WARRANTY SCHEME—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to let us know what has happened regarding the much promised national housing warranty scheme which I understand has been dropped after the government had discussed it and after promising it for three years?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly we have a great deal more to be concerned about because of the large number of houses that are being built.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: I must indicate that this government works well with the private sector setting targets and meeting them together in the housing market.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: With particular reference to the warranty scheme the hon. member has raised, I must express disappointment and failure on my part, for which I take full responsibility. I had hoped there would be a national scheme, involving all interested groups, and independent in nature. Progress had been made at the last meeting but this did fall through and I am sorry for that. Having said that, I will be pleased to see a high standard of provincial programs in place and will continue to work with all elements of the housing industry and at every level of government to make certain Canadians are protected, and that there are satisfactory standards set across the country which meet the regulations. Certainly, this will apply in so far as any housing in which CMHC is involved, which is about 40 per cent of housing in Canada today.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, is the minister stating that there is a jurisdictional problem between the federal and provincial governments? If this is the case, surely something can be worked out between the two in order that the consumer will be protected? There have been many cases of shoddy and rotten houses being built and we were looking for this warranty to protect the consumer.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, sure there is a question of jurisdiction, but that is not the only problem. I thought we had resolved the jurisdictional problem at the last meeting I had with the provincial housing ministers, but other elements came into this. The consistency of the provinces was not apparent at the last meeting. Certainly I share the hon. member's view that we must have adequate standards and we are working toward those standards. They may vary somewhat as between provinces, but we will have standards that apply to CMHC housing in which we are involved and which will perhaps set a pattern. I hope to see uniform standards very quickly across the country. Rather than waiting and continuing to try to get a national scheme going, I felt we should assist in getting provincial schemes started and we will continue to co-operate with them in this regard, especially in those provinces where assistance is needed.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON GROWTH IN MONEY SUPPLY AND INTEREST RATES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind that the money supply in Canada has gone from about $30 billion in 1970 to $72 billion in late 1975, and keeping in mind that in 1974 the average rate of increase in the money supply was 18 per cent, is the Minister of Finance satisfied that the new monetary policies announced in the white paper have allowed the government to reach a trend in the growth rate at the present time? What direction is this trend taking and what is the minister's anticipation in respect of that trend?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I share with the governor of the Bank of Canada the intention that the money supply should grow at the rate of the real growth of the economy, and in addition plays some part, but not all, in the price increases we are experiencing during the current year. The figures in most recent months have, of course, been subject to an aberration because of the effect of the postal strike. There was indeed a substantial increase during that six week period. There has been a reduction in that figure again and our hope would be that we could very shortly get within the guidelines the governor set, which would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of 10 per cent to 13 per cent.

● (1430)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on the question of the monetary policies within the government's anti-inflation program, and bearing in mind that short term interest rates seem to be firming up in that the industry is forecasting an increase of about one half of one per cent in the next few weeks in mortgage rates on homes, would the minister advise whether it is still the government's policy to maintain a very high interest rate through the bank rate and thereby attract that much more money from the United States.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the conditions are somewhat different in Canada and the United States. We do expect there will be a differential for the time being between the two markets. I just comment that it seems to us that the relatively higher interest rate, the level that is prevalent at the present time, is a necessary concomitant of a reduction in the money supply.

EFFECT OF LONG-TERM DEBT ON THE ECONOMY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the heavy inflow of money through provincial borrowings and short-term money due to our high interest rate, does the minister feel that this assumption of so much long-range debt will be detrimental to the Canadian economy in the next year or so.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a rather complex question but I think I would have to say at the present time, in light of the drop off of our merchandise exports because of the economic conditions in our principal markets, that for the time being at least the success of Canadian borrowers in placing issues abroad has been of assistance in dealing with the balance of payments deficit. I would have to concede that we should watch with particular care lest the value of the Canadian dollar go to a level where it could represent economic problems for us in a broader and longer sense.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE INTEGRATION OF DOUGLAS INTO AIRCRAFT MANUFACTURING COMPLEX

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I know he would not wish to disclose negotiations as he pointed out to hon. members opposite, but considering that over 1,000 employees of the Douglas Aircraft Company have been laid off, forecasting perhaps the ultimate closing of that great plant, could the minister say whether he is integrating Douglas into the complex of the aircraft manufacturing industries he has already assembled which I think would be a very far-sighted act on his part.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member and the House know that some involvement by McDonnell Douglas in a so-called revamped aerospace industry is one of the proposals that has been put forward. It is not by any means the only one. Unfortunately, as of this moment a restructuring along those lines would not be of significant benefit to the employees concerned because the problem arises from the lack of sales of commercial aircraft around the world. However, I can inform the hon. member I have notified my office today to arrange a meeting with the union concerned at the McDonnell Douglas plant and also I will be meeting with officials of the McDonnell Douglas plant sometime within the next fortnight.

ALLEGED POLICY ANNOUNCEMENT BY BOARD MEMBER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: Bring back the Avro Arrow.

Mr. Nystrom: I have a question which does not concern aircraft. In view of the fact that Jack Biddell, a member of the Anti-Inflation Board, announced that construction companies with more than five employees will probably be brought under the program, that rules regarding profits will have to be modified and that there are political considerations to dividend restriction, can the minister say what right board members have to make political and policy announcements. Is it because the minister is afraid to do so in the House?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. As many people who know him recognize, Mr. Biddell is like the other members of the board, a particularly strong personality. He, of course, may have these views. To the extent they do not coincide with government policy, he is expressing his own views.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING TRIBUNAL TO HEAR APPEALS FROM BOARD DECISIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that some 17 or more collective agreements have now been interfered with by the board and an appeals tribunal has not been established and therefore the unions do not have a right of appeal, I should like to ask the minister when the appeal tribunal will be established and whether or not he will direct the board to refer those agreements to the administrator so that he can make a ruling.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is suggesting a course of action which is not provided for by the law.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

RATE INCREASES BY NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which I believe will be the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the rate increases of the Northern Canada Power Commission in the Northwest Territories and proposed for the Yukon territory which exceed by four times the government price guidelines recently announced, is it the intention of the department to set up a public inquiry under the Inquiries Act with power to inquire into the whole operations of Northern Canada Power Commission and in particular the reasons for these exhorbitant rate increases to power users in an already high cost area.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I shall convey the question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY OF PROGRAM TO YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance with regard to the program in respect of which he hoped to obtain the agreement of the provincial governments. Are the governments of the Yukon territory and the Northwest Territories to be treated de facto as separate governments for the purposes of this program and, if so, does he anticipate obtaining agreement with those two areas of Canada and those two governments in order to involve them in the program so that the Anti-Inflation Review Board might have some jurisdiction over companies of the nature I have just mentioned.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the law passed by parliament provides for agreements between the federal government and the provinces. As he knows, the two territories are not provinces. With retard to both the public and the private sector of course the Anti-Inflation Board has jurisdiction.

Mr. Nielsen: I have one final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that it is government policy to give heed to the provisions of the Interpretation Act which regards the Yukon territory and the Northwest Territories as provinces, will he not be seeking this kind of agreement under this program as he does with regard to federal-provincial agreements? Will he not be doing this with the territories in the same way he does with the provinces?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman is making an unsound assumption.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF POLICY OF CONTROL OF EAST COAST LOBSTER FISHERY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State (Fisheries). On December 30, 1975 the minister announced his intention to tighten controls on the east coast lobster fishery. He stated that by January 20, 1976 a minority of licence holders will receive notification that their lobster fishing privileges have been called into question.

In view of the controversy created by this announcement, is it the minister's intention to make a statement on this matter in the House, or will he convene a special meeting of the Fisheries and Forestry Committee in order to explain the yardstick to be used by his officials when determining those who will be permitted to continue lobster fishing in Canada.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, both suggestions have merit. On the other hand, I would hope that those who discuss this matter would look very carefully at the communiqué and that those concerned will read carefully the letters they receive and realize that there is a procedure for appeal if they have not been treated fairly. There is a committee to hear their appeals. I have said very clearly that this policy will be applied in the most flexible way possible. But there is one basic fact, and that is we are trying to preserve the stocks of lobster for those whose livelihood depends on fishing and not for those who are involved in other professions and other types of industrial work.

Mr. Crouse: I thank the minister for that reply. Of the 20,000 odd people now participating in the Atlantic coast fishery, would the minister indicate how many people he hopes to drop from the lobster licensing rolls? Will lobster fishermen who, when the season is closed, for example, work on off-shore scallop draggers or in the west coast fishery, be affected and how will this program affect the young men desirous of engaging in lobster fisheries?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly no intention to penalize those who are involved in other forms of fisheries. On the contrary, it is our intention to preserve the pool of lobsters for the professional fishermen.

With regard to the second point, it is my hope that a good, sound management policy will make it eventually possible to allow for licences to be issued to young people willing to enter the fishery profession if we manage that stock properly.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Will he assure the House that in areas where the lobster fishing season is short and it is impossible, by the nature of the circumstances, for fishermen engaged only in the lobster fishing operation to make a living thereby, that a person who takes the initiative and is self-employed in another occupation during the remaining ten months of the year will not be penalized thereby?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have tried to make it plain—and I am certainly happy to repeat what I have said because I know that this policy is a difficult one to implement—that in no way am I trying to remove from the fishery those who are part-time lumbermen or part-time farmers and who have to do other things for a living. We are concentrating this initial limitation on those who are fully employed in other fields of endeavour besides the fishery.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY OF PROGRAM TO MUNICIPAL PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSIONS

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Will he indicate whether in his opinion the anti-inflation guidelines should apply to the price or rate increases proposed by municipally operated agencies across the country, such as the Scarborough Public Utilities Commission which has recently announced a substantial rate increase of 21.7 per cent effective January 1, 1976?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to consult more fully on the agreement entered into with the province of Ontario in this respect. In general terms, it is expected that the guidelines will apply to all such public bodies but that the responsibility for the enforcement of many of them will rest either with a regulatory tribunal in the province or with the provincial government. In the event of that monitoring indicating a situation which would require action by the administrator, it might, under some circumstances, be appropriate to have a reference from the provincial government to the administrator.

TRANSPORT

RESPONSIBILITY FOR REDUCTION OF TRANSCONTINENTAL RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE—DATE OF POLICY ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Since the government appears at least to be determined to put an end to any meaningful transcontinental rail passenger service, can the minister inform the House if the respective railways, that is CNR and CPR, had any input into the decision to reduce the service, or has the decision been solely that of the Minister of Transport and his department?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say at this stage that the hon. member's suggestion is quite incorrect, that the government is determined to put an end to a meaningful transcontinental rail service. I hope to be making a statement to the House quite soon in order to give an indication of government policy in this regard. It is our view that we must put an end to the practice of having bad train services and that where a train service is to continue in this country it should be good.

Mr. Murta: I should like to ask the minister two questions in my final supplementary. First, will he indicate to the House when he is prepared to make that announcement and, second, does the minister not feel that reducing the service alone with no improvement, or virtually no improvement, will ultimately spell the end of rail passenger service in Canada, which is in effect what the government is doing at present?

Mr. Lang: I should like to confirm to the hon. member, as I told him a few moments ago, that I hope to make a statement in the House on Thursday. He will see then that in fact we believe there is a way to maintain good passenger train service in Canada.

POSSIBLE REVIEW OF DECISION IN IRVING PULP AND PAPER CASE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, has the government given any consideration to overruling the decision of the Anti-Inflation Board to rollback the wage settlement negotiated between the Irving interests and the pulp and paper workers in New Brunswick? Does the government review these decisions and will it consider this matter?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can respond to that question. The answer to the first part of the question is that no, we would not propose to rollback the board's decision in this regard. Of course, we pay very close attention to each of the board's decisions.

URBAN AFFAIRS

TORONTO HARBOURFRONT PARK—DATE OF COMPLETION—AMOUNT OF COSTS INCURRED AND COST OF COMPLETION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my questions is for the Acting Prime Minister. Over one month ago, late last year, in reply to a question in this House regarding the stagnant Harbourfront Park in Toronto the minister stated "we have been looking at economies in all directions". Because of the fact that the 1972 election goody is well into its fourth year of preparation and is undoubtedly incurring substantial administrative and other carrying costs, can the Acting Prime Minister advise the House whether or not the government has found the direction it is looking for, and is he prepared to advise the people of Toronto as to when this project is expected to be completed?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I missed the question. If I got its import, the full intent of the question is when the project is to be completed. Certainly, there is no deadline for its completion.

An hon. Member: When is the next election?

Mr. Danson: Hon. members opposite have a very peculiar idea of what this project is all about. If they would like to see the report, it will be made public this Friday and presented by the Harbourfront Council to the three levels of government involved. It will give them a better idea of what is to take place. It will be presented on Friday at the City Hall in Toronto at six o'clock. If the hon. member would like to come, I should like to invite him at this time.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister of State for Urban Affairs for his reply, although it was the Acting Prime Minister who started this project. I have one short supplementary for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Is he in a position to advise the House as to what the administrative and other carrying costs have been during the last four years, and can he in fact assure the House that the final cost will not exceed the original estimate of $30 million?

Mr. Danson: I would be pleased to get the cost figure for the hon. member. I cannot give him an assurance on the actual acquisition cost because due to inflation it will be somewhat higher than expected, but not nearly as high as figures which have been estimated in the press. As a matter of fact, I have had some confirming information this morning which is rather gratifying that acquisition costs have not accelerated as much as they might have been expected to do.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN TAXATION OF MINING COMPANIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the new government in British Columbia has announced its intention to reduce its royalties and super royalties to the mining industry, has any offer been made yet by the federal Minister of Finance to the new government in British Columbia that he is willing to respond by ending the double taxation set up in the Turner budget of 1974?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker the present law is that enacted by parliament earlier this year, and of course it would be quite inappropriate for me to propose a tax change of that kind outside the budget framework.

● (1450)

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of what the minister has just said about the legislation will he indicate, as he did to the people of Toronto the other day, if he is calling a budget for May, 1976 whether he intends to deal with the subject in the budget so that people who plan to invest in the resource industry in Canada can have some indication that if the provinces reduce taxes the federal government would be prepared to match the provinces?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should anticipate the content of the budget in any way at this time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR EXAMINATION OF PROPOSED INCREASE IN COMMUTER RATES

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister give consideration to referring to the Anti-Inflation Board and the Canadian Transport Commission the proposed Canadian National rate increase on the Montreal-St. Lambert-St. Hilaire and on the Montreal-Portal Heights-Deux Montagnes routes, which became effective February 1 this year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have given a general instruction to the Canadian Transport Commission to examine rates over which it has some jurisdiction in order to assist the Anti-Inflation Board in its work. I will take note of the hon. member's suggestion regarding these rates and see if they are being examined by the CTC.

RESEARCH

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF FREEZE ON FUNDS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In light of the very sharp reaction of the executive director of the Science Council of Canada and the president of the National Research Council who have indicated that the proposed freeze or cutbacks in scientific research will have profound and long lasting effects upon scientific research in Canada, is the government reconsidering the freeze and cutbacks announced by the President of the Treasury Board in December?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government does not intend to review the decisions that have been made this year. We will watch developments and if in subsequent years it appears that an adjustment would be desirable a decision will be made at that time. I think it is an indication of the seriousness of the government's effort to cut expenditures. It does run counter to a great deal of propaganda to the effect that the government is making phony cuts.

EFFECT OF FREEZE ON MEDICAL RESEARCH PROJECTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware of the statements made by medical researchers from virtually every medical college in Canada that the cutbacks or freeze in funding for medical work for this year will mean not only a cutback in projects for the coming year but abandonment and permanent cutbacks on medical research teams that have been assembled with a great deal of effort over the past dozen years? Is there anything the minister can tell the research community about how to avoid the tremendous difficulties that they have predicted?

Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. I wonder whether the silence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare means that he was not listening. Could I repeat my question? May I ask the minister whether—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS WITH POSTMASTERS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the 8,000 postmasters in Canada have been without a contract since October 6 last year, and in view of the fact that the Canadian Postmasters' Association put its modified position before the government over three months ago, when will the government make its proposals available to the association and when will negotiations be resumed?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure they ever broke off, but I will get more detailed information for the hon. member before tomorrow.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is a supplementary for the Postmaster General. In light of the fact that the minister has indicated to the press that the morale of the postal service is at an all time high, and in light of the fact that there is severe depression among postmasters in Canada over their existing salaries which are below those of junior officials may I ask when the government is going to address itself to this very serious problem?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I would imagine negotiations would be a lot easier if hon. members such as the one who just spoke did not resort to political expediency to muddy the waters.

Mr. Brisco: A final supplementary. I should like to refer the minister to his statement to this House in Hansard of December 3. In view of that statement, the minister might be prepared to change the answer he just gave.

RESEARCH

POSSIBLE DEPENDENCE ON OTHER COUNTRIES FOR RESEARCH INFORMATION IN VIEW OF BUDGET CUTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Acting Prime Minister is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North dealing with the freeze on the research budget. In view of the fact that this freeze will result in the downgrading of research programs in this country, could the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether it is now government policy that this country depend largely on other countries for research information since we are not doing any research of our own?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I make reference to a question I asked on December 17 in regard to megavitamin therapy and orthomolecular psychiatry and how far the government study that the minister had previously acknowledged had progressed. The minister responded that the investigation had not been completed and later said that he could not give a firm date for completion. Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, without confirming the precise nature of the matters the hon. member is referring to, when I spoke on second reading of Bill C-69 I indicated further amendments would flow from the comprehensive review that has been undertaken. I anticipate that would be within the next few months.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ESTABLISHMENT OF TV STATION IN RIMOUSKI

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I want to put a question to the Minister of Communications.

Following the answer I received from the Secretary of State on November 1, 1974, in which he mentioned that there was a plan for the establishment of a French television station in Rimouski which would be equipped to produce programs, could the minister tell the House what has been done in that regard?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): In the absence of the Secretary of State, I think I can confirm that there is indeed a project for the establishment of a second television station in the Rimouski area, that negotiations are now taking place and I am confident these negotiations will result in the not too distant future in the opening of the second French station the residents of that region want.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF VANTOUR REPORT ON SEGREGATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON DECISION OF MR. JUSTICE HEALDS ON SOLITARY CONFINEMENT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. Last evening in the adjournment motion the minister was asked about the special report that he is holding concerning solitary confinement requested in 1974 by Inger Hansen, the correctional ombudsman. I should like to ask the minister whether it is his intention to table this study and if he intends to use it as part of the reforms promised in the second omnibus bill.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, immediately after the correctional investigator tabled her report last year and suggested that we set up an inquiry on segregation, we did so. We appointed a Mr. Vantour who immediately started his studies and gave his first report in December. That report is now being translated and printed and will be made public in February. We will use that as the basis for changing our segregation policy.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think I have the word now, Mr. Speaker. Last night the Solicitor General was also asked about his reply to Mr. Justice Healds' decision respecting the use of solitary confinement. Will the Solicitor General reply to that judgment, make a formal statement, or will his actions involve changes in legislative terms?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, we decided not to appeal the judgment of Mr. Justice Healds of the federal court whose remarks were related to segregation at B.C. penitentiary and not at other prisons. We are going to use the Vantour report, to which I referred in my previous answer, to bring about changes in segregation generally in the penitentiary service. That report will be public.

CANADA PENSION PLAN—PROCESSING TIME FOR APPLICATIONS FOR DISABILITY PENSIONS

Question No. 3,586—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the average processing time for applications for disability pensions under the Canada Pension Plan?

2. Does the time involved reflect an improvement over the figure given as two and one half months in the answer to Question No. 1,545 and, if not, for what reason?

3. Does the Canada Pension Plan have in place procedures by which it can identify seriously ill applicants for the purpose of giving these individuals accelerated processing prior to imminent death and, if not, for what reason?

4. Is the Minister of National Health and Welfare satisfied that the processing of applications for disability pensions is done within a reasonable time frame, especially for those applicants with serious disabilities threatening imminent death?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Fifty five days.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is satisfied that the processing of applications for disability pensions is done within a reasonable period of time; however, ways of reducing this processing time further, through improved efficiency, are under consideration. It should also be noted that when a disability determination is not completed at the time of death of the contributor, processing of the application continues and any resulting benefit is paid to the estate. In addition, upon death, applications for survivors' benefits are immediately processed and benefits paid to the survivors of the deceased.

COMPETITION FOR POSTMASTER, BARRÉ, P.Q.

Question No. 3,667—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. What (a) is the number (b) are the names (c) are the addresses of those who participated in competition 75-PO-QUE-E-OC-83, Postmaster for Barré, Quebec, which closed on June 30, 1975?

2. Did all application forms reach the Post Office Department before June 30, 1975?

3. Which applicant was chosen and at what hourly salary?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. There were two persons who participated in Competition 75 PO-QUE-E-OC-83, Postmaster, Barré, P.Q.

2. The Applications for Employment forms were dated June 18, and June 28, 1975. Both were received before June 30, 1975.

3. The selected candidate was Mrs. Jeanne d'Arc St-Pierre. Her appointment was effective September 20, 1975 and her salary is $101.40 per week based on a 39-hour work week. The name of the other candidate cannot be disclosed in this instance as it would be contrary to Section 25 of the Public Service Employment Regulations which reads as follows:

The name of a person who is a candidate for a position, unless his name is on the eligible list established for that position, and the information and material supplied by or on behalf of the candidate, unless the candidate is appointed to the position, shall not be disclosed, without the consent of the candidate, to any person who is not directly involved in the process of selection for appointment to the position.

COMPETITION FOR POSTMASTER, ST-LUC DE VINCENNES, P.Q.

Question No. 3,676—Mr. Matte:

1. What are the (a) names (b) addresses of those who participated in competition 75-PO-QUE-(E)-OC-163, Postmaster for St-Luc de Vincennes, Quebec, in the Constituency of Champlain, which closed on December 1, 1975?

2. Did all application forms reach the Post Office Department before December 1, 1975 in spite of the recent postal strike?

3. What is the name of the successful applicant and what is the amount of weekly salary?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1 and 2. There were four applications received in Competition 75-PO-QUE-E-OC-163, Postmaster, St-Luc de Vincennes, P.Q. Two applications were received in the Vincennes Post Office before December 1, 1975. The two other applications were inadvertently sent to the Public Service Commission at Ottawa. The Zone Manager on learning of this error on December 1, arranged the following day to have the two persons concerned complete new application forms. By December 3, the Zone Postmaster had obtained these two applications.

3. The selected person was Mr. G. E. Massicotte. His salary is $76.95 a week based on a 32½ hour work week. The names of the other candidates cannot be disclosed as this would be contrary to Section 25 of the Public Service Employment Regulations which reads as follows:

The name of a person who is a candidate for a position, unless his name is on the eligible list established for that position, and the information and material supplied by or on behalf of the candidate, unless the candidate is appointed to the position, shall not be disclosed, without the consent of the candidate, to any person who is not directly involved in the process of selection for appointment to the position.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO POLITICAL PARTIES

Question No. 3,681—Mr. Jones:

1. What amount of money was obtained by each of the recognized political parties under the provisions of the Election Expenses Act in 1974 and 1975?

2. In each case, what was the total amount of money deducted from taxable incomes in 1974 and 1975?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Chief Electoral Officer and the Department of National Revenue as follows: 1. Pursuant to section 13.4 of the Canada Elections Act, the chief agent of a registered political party is required to transmit to the Chief Electoral Officer, in respect of each fiscal period of the party, a return of the party's receipts, such return to be transmitted within six months after the end of the fiscal period to which the return relates. Currently, there is only one party which falls within that period and has submitted a return. However, pursuant to section 230.1 of the Income Tax Act, registered agents of a registered party must submit to the Minister of National Revenue a return covering all contributions received by the registered party in the applicable calendar year. Further, in accordance with the aforementioned section of the Income Tax Act, the Minister is required to forward a report to the Chief Electoral Officer containing statistics comprising total contributions shown on the returns received from the registered agents pursuant to the foregoing. In a report to the Chief Electoral Officer dated October 31, 1975, the Minister reported the following contributions received by registered parties in the period August 1, 1974 (effective date of the Election Expenses Act) to December 31, 1974:

	Contributions Received
Progressive Conservative Party of Canada	$ 725,853.64
New Democratic Party	1,431,267.82
Liberal Party of Canada	1,059,427.16
The Social Credit Party of Canada	1,914,253.70
Marxist-Leninist Party of Canada	—
Communist Party of Canada	—

Since the returns to the Minister of National Revenue are on a calendar year basis, the 1975 report has not been received.

2. To date, the total amount deducted from federal tax payable on T1 returns (Individuals) for political contributions in 1974 is $1,246,000. It is not possible to give a breakdown, by party, of this amount since the allocation is not given on the T1 return. Information for 1975 and for T2 returns (Corporations) is not available.

ELIGIBILITY OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL TO ENTER PUBLIC SERVICE COMPETITIONS

Question No. 3,702—Mr. Forrestall:

Is a member of the Canadian Armed Forces stationed outside the Atlantic Provinces eligible to enter closed competitions offered by the Public Service but restricted to residents of the Atlantic Provinces and, if so, under what circumstances?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: No. A member of the Canadian Armed Forces would be eligible to compete in closed competitions restricted to parts of the Public Service in the Atlantic Provinces only if he or she were stationed within the geographical and organizational limits prescribed in the area of competition.

ELIGIBILITY OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL TO ENTER PUBLIC SERVICE COMPETITIONS

Question No. 3,703—Mr. Forrestall:

Will the government permit members of the Canadian Armed Forces born in the Atlantic Provinces but not stationed there, eligibility to enter closed competitions offered by the Public Service but restricted to residents of the Atlantic Provinces and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: No. The commission is restrained by the provisions of section 13 of the Public Service Employment Act to the consideration of a prospective candidate's place of residence rather than his or her place of birth. Where the area of competition, determined for a particular closed competition, prescribes that candidates must reside within stated geographical limits, only those candidates residing within those limits are eligible for appointment.

1. Has the government any plans to introduce door to door mail delivery service in Steinbach, Manitoba?

2. Has a survey been taken by post office officials as to whether door to door mail delivery service is desired by residents of Steinbach and, if so, what were the results of the survey?

3. Does Steinbach presently qualify for door to door mail delivery and, if not, what criteria are not met at the present time?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. No.

2. No.

3. Not known—Survey to determine status of Steinbach is planned for the spring of 1976.

STAFF OF ANTI-INFLATION COMMISSION

Question No. 3,791—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What are the (a) names (b) positions (c) salaries of persons on the Anti-inflation Board earning more than $20,000 per annum?

2. In what departments were they employed before going to the Anti-inflation Board?

3. What was their salary in their previous positions?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am advised by the Anti-Inflation Board as follows: 1, 2 and 3. As of December 12, 1975, there were approximately 300 persons assisting the commission to set up operations. All but 35 of these people were borrowed temporarily from a number of government departments who paid their salaries and retained their files. The balance were administrative support personnel. Since the enactment of the Anti-Inflation Bill staffing is being carried on in accordance with the Public Service Employment Regulations.

CRIMINAL CODE, CROWN LIABILITY ACT, IMMIGRATION ACT, PAROLE ACT

JURISDICTION GIVEN TO CANADIAN COURTS TO TRY PERSONS FOR CERTAIN OFFENCES COMMITTED OUTSIDE CANADA

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-71, to amend the Criminal Code and to make related amendments to the Crown Liability Act, the Immigration Act and the Parole Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Basford moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I address the House briefly at the third reading stage of Bill C-71 and recommend the adoption of this bill on third reading. As hon. members know, the bill went to the committee. It incorporates a number of desirable changes in the Criminal Code, but it will be impossible for me at third reading to discuss all those changes which were examined so carefully by the committee. As hon. members know, the bill was first introduced on July 17 last. During the fall session of parliament, before Christmas, it received careful study in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and was reported back to the House just before Christmas. I am most grateful for the work done by the members of the Justice and legal affairs committee and grateful for the assistance they have given me with this bill.

This afternoon I shall mention only four aspects of Bill C-71, namely, provisions relating to juries and courts of appeal, those relating to amendments to the Bail Reform Act, amendments relating to organized crime and amendments relating to drinking drivers. Once these amendments are proclaimed and become law, it will no longer be possible for a court composed of a judge and jury to have its verdict of acquittal reversed and a conviction substituted by an appellate tribunal. The jury system has throughout the years, and for generations, proven to be a system that produces justice which is both understood and accepted in our society. If hon. members accept what is proposed in this bill, the law will be clear and in future a person who chooses trial by jury can only be convicted by a jury.

While the particular case which brought this issue to a head involved the prosecution of Dr. Morgentaler for a violation of the abortion provisions of the Criminal Code, the fundamental principle involved in the amendment sweeps beyond the controversy that swirls about those provisions of the Criminal Code relating to abortion.

Second, I want to touch on the subject of bail. With respect to the bail reform legislation which was enacted in 1972, the legislation reflects amendments which are considered desirable in the light of experience since 1972. Since becoming Minister of Justice, I find, after talking to lawyers, including defence lawyers, citizens, judges, prosecutors and police officers, that much concern has been expressed that people who are dangerous to society are obtaining bail too easily. Over and over, in criticizing the criminal justice system, people say to me, "Mr. Basford, we agree with the underlying principle of the Bail Reform Act, but it is being abused and taken advantage of."

The amendments which are incorporated in this legislation are badly needed and have general acceptance and endorsement both at the federal and provincial levels. The law must also seek to protect society as well as the accused, and it seems not unreasonable to me to require that certain types of accused should have to convince the magistrate that they should be released on bail. It seems not unreasonable to me that certain classes of accused persons should have the onus put on them to show that they should be released. Pursuant to the amendments now before the House, those on whom the onus would fall would include, first, those who while out on bail commit another offence under the Criminal Code; second, those who violate the bail provisions upon which they are out; third, non-residents of Canada; fourth, those charged with murder; and fifth, those trafficking in or importing narcotics or conspiring to traffick in or import narcotics. It seems self- evident that society at large is entitled to the assurance that those five groups will not be granted bail without first having to convince a magistrate or judge that they should be granted bail.

The general rule under the Bail Reform Act remains. It is, I think, a good principle. It remains the rule for all other accused persons, that is, for those who have been arrested. If an accused has been arrested, he should be released unless the Crown satisfies the magistrate that detention is necessary to ensure that the accused will appear at his trial, and that it is necessary for the safety or protection of the public: this may include consideration of any substantial likehood that he will commit a second criminal offence. That is to say, all classes of accused other than the ones mentioned will be released under the provisions of the Bail Reform Act of 1972 unless the Crown can show that there is a likehood that they will not appear for trial after they have been released, and that detention is necessary in the interests of the protection and safety of the public, which includes the likelihood that they will commit a second offence and therefore should not be released.

My concern in moving the amendments in Bill C-71 and the further amendments I moved in committee was to ensure the protection of the public against the likelihood that the accused would commit another offence while out on bail. As hon. members know, however, we in this House can write all the laws we want, but if they are not argued by police or by Crown counsel and are not properly applied by magistrates, they will not effectively protect the public interest in accordance with the principles that underlie the legislation. These amendments, when proclaimed, will give to police officers and to prosecutors a proper legislative basis upon which to argue the granting of bail. Obviously, if they cannot meet that test provided in the legislation, the accused should be out on bail.

Any tightening of the bail provisions may mean that more accused are in custody awaiting trial, although the objective of these new provisions is to protect the public from such persons while awaiting their trial. It is essential, in the interest of justice, that everything possible be done to speed up the process between the time of arrest and trial, and not only to speed up that process, in the interest of those who are ultimately found to be innocent, but also to avoid some of the game-playing that goes on in court by professional criminals and their advisers. Of course, the more delay between the time of arrest and the time of either declaration of innocence or conviction, adds to the immense cost to the taxpayer and to the cost of the whole administration of the criminal justice system. Therefore, it is essential that at the federal level, parliament, and the local levels, positive steps be taken to ensure that the process between arrest and acquittal or conviction is as effective and speedy as possible. Bill C-71 contains some provisions that will assist in that regard.

The measures relating to summary conviction trial, the elimination of grand juries in all provinces except Nova Scotia, the provisions relating to absconding offenders during preliminary hearing or trial, the changing of the eight-day rule on adjournment, and the provisions relating to loss of jurisdiction are some measures that are no longer required for the protection of the accused before the courts.

Obviously, this is only an initial step in the much larger process of reducing the time between arrest and trial and of improving the whole process of the criminal justice system. I am looking at steps within my department, in terms of reorganization, by which it can be more effective toward this end. I am discussing, examining and exploring with members of the federal Law Reform Commission what they can do in terms of recommendations to speed up the process between arrest and trial. At the moment, I am quietly talking with provincial attorneys general because, of course, much of the question of administration of justice is clearly within their jurisdiction. We are discussing ways in which we can work together to accomplish this end. I have pointed out the provisions in Bill C-71 which I think are important with regard to changes to the Bail Reform Act to overcome what I view as very legitimate criticisms of the original legislation which has been open to abuse and taken advantage of.

I want to address myself briefly to the question of organized crime. As hon. members know, the activities of organized crime in some parts of this country have come very dramatically to light and public attention by reason of the provincial commission of inquiry into organized crime in the province of Quebec. One of the problems in this connection is the ease with which the procedures of crime, including organized crime, may be hidden and diverted from the law enforcement process through laundering devices.

Hon. members will appreciate that in the area of commercial fraud, more and more sophistication is being brought to bear. With a view to counter-attacking in that field, Bill C-71 provides an amendment by which it will be possible to deal with what is generally known as laundering of moneys acquired by unlawful conduct. The essence of the proposed amendment strikes at criminal activity on a national and international scale. Under current law, it is an offence to be in possession of property obtained illegally whether in Canada or elsewhere. Under the proposed amendment, it will also be an offence to be in possession of proceeds of any property obtained by an offence committed either in Canada or elsewhere. For example, stocks and bonds might be converted into forms of property and passed through various companies which appear to be legitimate but are actually controlled by organized crime, thus hiding from detection. The amendment would allow those proceeds, or fruits of organized crime to fall within the ambit of the Criminal Code and the ambit of our law enforcement officers.

The amendment relating to organized crime is, as hon. members know, under these provisions. The growing international nature of criminal activity has prompted a new provision of the Criminal Code whereby it is made an offence to conspire in Canada to commit an offence out of Canada, and to make it an offence to conspire out of Canada to commit an offence in Canada. Regarding the first case, Canada should take a stand against those who use Canada as a planning base for criminal activities. An example of the first situation would be where directors of a company incorporated in Canada conspire in Canada to fleece members of the public or investors in another country, bringing great disrepute upon legitimate Canadian investment dealers and investment promotion.

The second case is aimed at deterring people who may or may not be Canadian citizens and who plan criminal activities in another country for actual execution in Canada. An example of the second case is where persons abroad conspire to commit in Canada acts of violence whether or not such acts are criminal in the country where the conspiracy takes place. For example, a group of terrorists could conspire outside Canada to commit acts of terrorism within Canada.

In relation to organized crime, I mention just in passing the measures relating to the obliteration of serial numbers which assist law enforcement officers in relation to some international aspects of car thieves, and measures relating to making this an offence. I am paraphrasing the legislation. This bill makes it an offence knowingly to use stolen or fraudulently obtained credit cards which, again, are a device of national and international crime.

The fourth point I want to raise with regard to Bill C-71 relates to drinking and driving. As hon. members are aware, parliament in 1969 adopted the breathalyzer test and made it an offence for a person to have in his system .08 per cent of alcohol while driving. The legislation also provided that where a peace officer had reasonable grounds to believe that someone was impaired, he could require him to submit to a breathalyzer test. If the person refused, the refusal in itself constituted an offence. The new amendments are designed to enable law enforcement authorities more readily to identify persons who because of their alcoholic condition should not be on the road.

It should be borne in mind that roadside screening does not in itself establish guilt or innocence, but is merely an aid to indicate whether or not a driver should be required to submit himself to a breathalyzer test. The roadside screening test can only be applied when a peace officer has reasonable cause to suspect that the driver has alcohol in his body. I believe that the awful carnage precipitated by drinking and driving on our streets and highways, partly because of drinking drivers, is in itself justification for what these amendments propose. One need only be reminded of the facts to recognize the seriousness of the situation. In 1974, 6,000 deaths occurred on our highways, and 230,000 injuries. The amount of $1.3 billion was lost because of these deaths, $1 billion were lost as a result of absence from work associated with traffic accidents, and medical bills amounted to $250 million.

It is often impossible to say how many of these deaths and injuries are directly related to drinking drivers, but we do know that the proportion is high. It seems to me, therefore, that this alarming and awful carnage which is reflected almost daily in headlines in our newspapers is in itself justification for what these amendments propose as a means of providing law enforcement agencies across the country with a proper and legal basis to run roadside screening tests to deter those who drive an automobile after having taken alcohol.

I am sure hon. members will recognize the areas I have touched upon today as areas of serious concern to law-abiding citizens everywhere. The bill before us contains a number of other amendments which have been discussed both in this House and in committee. I emphasize that all the amendments are designed to improve the present law in one way or another. Some are purely technical in nature. Others—and these are the ones which I trust will be particularly welcomed by professionals and laymen alike—will contribute to the protection and control of individual as well as organized criminals.

In closing, I wish to thank the members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for their work in carefully examining this bill in committee. I commend the measure to the House and hope it will pass in an orderly way so that its provisions may be proclaimed and this country may have the advantage of the improvements it contains.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my first words this afternoon must be to congratulate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) for exercising a very important ministerial discretion in the Morgentaler case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: As a result, Dr. Morgentaler will have the right to a new trial. I think the minister would be the first to agree that the suggestions made to him with reference to this matter, particularly in reference to the right of appeal after the accused had been acquitted by a jury, came from a very distinguished lawyer in this House, a former prime minister, my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I am very happy that the new Minister of Justice has sufficient flexibility of mind to enable him to accept the suggestion made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert and, of course, by other members of the House who joined with him. Once again, I congratulate the Minister of Justice. I hope that in exercising the kind of discretion he exercised the other day, he will bear in mind another matter which is before him now, the Latta case, concerning a member of my own profession, a distinguished scholar, a professor at Queen's University who was convicted in the city of Edmonton by judge and jury of the very serious charge of murder.

I wish to refer to this matter for a few moments before we consider some of the changes in the Criminal Code, because it is relevant to what I have in mind. One of the greatest problems related to appeals in serious criminal cases is that unless there has been a mistake in law by the judge in instructing a jury, or unless—this is very rare—the decision of the jury is so perverse that this in itself becomes a question of law, it is seldom if ever that a court of appeal will upset a verdict.

I mention this having regard to the seriousness of the case and many submissions which are now being made, in the hope that the Minister of Justice, having made use of an unusual procedure in granting Mr. Morgentaler a new trial, will not be deterred from exercising the same kind of ministerial discretion on other occasions when the need arises. It may be that he will be subject to some criticism. It may be suggested that if he were to do the same thing twice in one year, or twice during his tenure of office, he would be following a new kind of practice. But I maintain that these are unique cases, cases which call for the kind of assessment which has been made by the Minister of Justice.

I wish now, on third reading of this bill, to put forward a few facts in relation to the increase in crime. I hope that the Minister of Justice, who inherited this legislation from the former minister of justice—hon. members will recall that when he first took on the job he talked about bringing laws before parliament to control the ever-increasing crime rate—did not leave the impression, and I am sure he would not do so, with the public at large that Bill C-71 is the instrument he had in mind to bring about these necessary amendments to the law to stamp out organized crime and reverse the present tendency of the crime rate to increase.

I want to put a few facts on the record having to do with the increase in crime, and I wish the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) were here while I do so. In 1974-75 the murder rate in Canada went up by 18.8 per cent. Breaking and entering increased from 48,625 in 1974 to 54,982 in 1975, that is, a rise of 11.3 per cent—something like inflation. Consider the increase which has taken place in the crime of robbery with violence. We have heard a lot of talk about legislation to control the possession of handguns and other firearms. It is like Alice in Wonderland: jam yesterday, jam tomorrow, but never jam today. The present Minister of Justice can be distinguished from the former minister and the one before that. He is one Minister of Justice who did practice law. He has had some experience at the bar as defence counsel. I do not know whether he ever prosecuted or not, but he is one Minister of Justice who isn't all theory.

In 1974 there were 1,214 robberies with violence and firearms, and in 1975, 2,106. That is an increase in crimes of robbery with firearms and guns of 70.9 per cent in one year. Crime is on the increase.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Kidnapping is one of the worst types of crime society is facing today. People who are in responsible positions and getting a salary like the former minister of finance, of $200,000 a year, are always in danger of their children being kidnapped when they leave school or go to the park, or their wives being kidnapped for purposes of extortion. Not long ago I raised the case in the House of a girl who was kidnapped, put into the trunk of a car and kept there for nine or ten hours while the car was put in the garage. She was very lucky to survive. Across the line a very important case concerning Patty Hearst is commencing with the picking of the jury. Kidnapping and extortion are the worst type of crime; they are a plague and a blight on people who cannot defend themselves. Kidnappings increased in 1974 by 40.1 per cent, so I hope something will be done to provide in our law a deterrent to this crime. Before leaving that subject, every person in public life is in danger of having members of his family kidnapped, and so are others who are not able to defend themselves as we may be able to. With regard to rape convictions, there were 348 in 1974, an increase of only 4.3 per cent. Crimes of rape, kidnapping, robbery with firearms, breaking and entering and homicide are all on the increase.

My good friend the Minister of Justice dealt with bail reform, which he would be the first to admit the former minister of justice introduced. I think all practising lawyers realize that bail should be the right of every citizen, but it is a right that has to be used with some caution. As the minister said today, there are many cases in big cities of a person out on bail committing the same kind of crime with which he had been charged, perhaps in a different place and under different circumstances, and he does so several times before the first offense is brought to trial. I am glad that that hole in the bucket has been plugged.

I want to bring to the attention of the House something that happened over the Christmas recess. I was telephoned by some newspaper people in connection with a case in the city of Hamilton. It had to do with the law we passed regarding wiretapping. I had some reservations about putting so many "ifs" and "buts" into that law. Although it is very easy to criticize it, it is far easier to see the weaknesses of a law once it is in operation.

I understand that certain police officers obtained authorization through the Crown attorney, under the act, to obtain an order to wiretap a telephone conversation. I believe that the chief or the deputy chief of the city—I do not know his name, since I was called on the telephone—discovered that one of his chief officers was involved in syndicated crime. When the Crown attorney attempted to put in the record of the telephone conversation as evidence, the defence, and properly so—I will not bother to read the section of the Code—objected to it on the ground that they had not obtained authorization regarding the other party to the conversation who was talking to the police officer, and so the evidence was ruled inadmissible.

As a result, a very responsible and highly placed public official, one who administers the law of this country in that city, had the telephone conversation been put in as evidence would have been connected with some syndicated crime, yet he walks the streets today an innocent man. I have had similar experiences, as I know have the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and other lawyers, where you can successfully defend a man on some technical ground of this nature. The law must be administered fairly and squarely.

My point is this, Mr. Speaker. All of us are for reform. We all want to see the best system of justice. None of us wants to read about the sort of thing raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—solitary confinement in jails and poor conditions in our penitentiaries. We want to better those conditions. But at the same time, particularly at this period in our society, we must weigh very carefully the reforms we do bring in. Such reforms might have been beneficial a few years ago, but today, with the new kind of criminal mind and syndicated crime, we must not allow some pretty dangerous people to go free so that they can plague society with the kind of behaviour to which all of us who are trying to be law-abiding citizens object.

When the minister took office he said—I do not think I am misquoting him—that he would bring in laws, which he would ask parliament to pass, that would control crime. I have already indicated the percentage growth of crime in one year. I realize the minister inherited this bill, but I hope he has other measures in mind for controlling crime, particularly kidnapping which is on the increase, and extortion which is a horrible crime.

I should like to refer to one thing the minister said when he was before the committee. I think he was advised by the president of the Canadian Bar Association so he would not be saying anything that was incorrect. Several members of the Canadian Bar criminal law section gave evidence before the committee and I want to put on record what the president said about the Canadian Bar. Although I think we should always get direction from the Canadian Bar and the Bar Associations, and without being at all critical in saying this, often the presidents of those associations have a civil law or corporate law practice and are not experienced in the rules of evidence and the terms and provisions of the Criminal Code.

I think the impression was left that the president of the Canadian Bar Association endorsed the changes that were made, but the head of the criminal section of that association had this to say at page 26 of committee report No. 32 for December 4, 1975:

> There was some comment in one of the issues of a house journal of the Canadian Bar Association which indicated to me as a reader, and I believe to my colleagues, that the president of the Canadian Bar Association was basically in favour of Bill C-71. The then president was Mr. Somerville. Certainly it is our position that he did not speak for us. We were not consulted. We do not think that he consulted the criminal justice subsection of the Canadian Bar Association, particularly in view of the resolutions which were later published in the same organ but in a later issue. We feel that there is no excuse or no reason to believe that the practising members of the bar, the criminal bar, who belong to the Canadian Bar Association feel any differently than we do about these amendments.

He criticizes some amendments that I will deal with right now. What I wanted to point out was that the criminal section of the Canadian Bar Association did not endorse some of the changes that have been made. What are some of the changes that have been made? I have dealt previously with some of these, so I can do so now quite briefly.

I endorse the change in reference to corroboration under the rape section. I would go even further than that in respect of the right of defence counsel to cross examine the complainant regarding her past sexual experience with others or the person named in the complaint. As the new amendment is worded, the judge can grant leave if he finds it is material to the defence of the accused. I think that is good, but I would issue this caution, a caution I have often repeated: rape is one of the easiest charges to lay and it is sometimes one of the most difficult to defend. The whole thing hinges basically on the question of consent. I have pointed out very carefully during any discussions about this subject that even a prostitute can be raped. This involves basically the question of consent.

The removal of the right to cross examination is good, because often the complainant is treated more like the accused and it is very difficult for a female to give evidence under those circumstances. On the other hand, I hope the courts will consider very carefully these exceptions. There may be cases where this is necessary, because a conviction under the rape section is a very serious thing and carries a penalty of life imprisonment, depending on the circumstances. In endorsing that amendment, that is a caution I would put forward.

Let me go into something else for a moment. This has reference to the breathalyzer test. There is not a member of parliament nor a member of the legislature, whatever his political views may be, who would not agree with the Minister of Justice and many other speakers who have said that alcohol and gasoline just do not mix, or that the incidence of accidents in the cities, particularly those with heavy traffic, increases proportionately to the amount of alcohol consumed.

On the other hand, one has to exercise a little caution when changing the law in respect of liquor. I guess I am being pretty brave with my political life when I say this because I may receive some criticism as all the publicity has been in favour of the use of the breathalyzer. But we must remember that it is certainly against our common law when we change the concept of a person being innocent until being proven guilty. The breathalyzer is a good thing, but once you have been forced to take a breathalyzer test you have to go on the stand in your own defence. You may be totally innocent but belong to the Civil Rights Committee of Canada and refuse to take a breathalyzer test, and in that event you are guilty. The first offence may involve a fine, but on a second conviction you will go to jail, and on a third conviction you are liable to imprisonment for three months.

Like many others, I have asked the Minister of Justice why he has included this mandatory sentence. I asked the Minister of Justice, in respect of violence with the use of firearms, why he did not also include a mandatory jail term of a number of years in the penitentiary. Surely there should be some such penalty for extortion and kidnapping. The minister has said that he has never believed in a system with that kind of jurisprudence, even in criminal cases, because he has felt this should be left to the discretion of the criminal judge in sentencing. Let me go very quickly to the point I am trying to make. Surely if we are to have a mandatory sentence in respect of a second conviction for refusing to take a breathalyzer test, we should have a mandatory prison sentence for people convicted of going into banks and kidnapping children and wives for the purpose of extortion. That seems only logical.

Let me say something about the sale and consumption of liquor in this country. I suppose it is true to say that many of us have been called to many bars. Let me point out the hypocrisy of many governments, and I am not referring particularly to this government. In 1974 the federal government took in, through excise duty and customs tariffs on liquor, $278,140,199.83. In 1975 the people were much more dry and much more thirsty, and the federal government obtained revenue from the sale of liquor amounting to $310,915,395, an increase of about 11.8 per cent. I do not have similar figures in respect of provincial revenues, but I have read articles that would indicate the provinces take in about the same amount.

One only has to go to the embassies in this country to find out how much tax is being charged on a bottle of liquor. I understand the embassies pay $2 or $2.25 for a bottle of liquor for which I pay $7.85 at the liquor store—when I go, which is not that often.

An hon. Member: And that's not very good rye.

Mr. Woolliams: Someone points out that that is pretty cheap stuff. The point I want to make is that governments are getting millions of dollars a year from the sale and consumption of alcohol in one form or another. The provinces have jurisdiction over various cocktail lounges and all sorts of outlets. All the provinces and the federal government have to do is sit back and wait for the revenue to roll in.

All the police in this country have to do is sit and wait for people to come out of these bars or to leave their country clubs after playing golf some afternoon. I do not know where we would find all the jails to hold all these people if every one of them was given a breathalyzer test. One only has to drink two average drinks of two ounces or one and a half ounces to come within the limit. What I am suggesting is that there is a great deal of hypocrisy on the part of governments of this country, because the more the people drink the more revenue governments obtain, yet the same governments have almost adopted a policy of prohibition in respect of drinking offences. There has to be some balance.

The thing I do not like about this new section is that it says the peace officer must have a reasonable suspicion before requiring an individual to take a breathalyzer test. In the criminal law as it stood, the peace officer had to have reasonable and probable grounds for such belief. An officer could not just stop anyone that he felt should take a breathalyzer test. The hypocrisy lies in the fact that the peace officer must now only have a reasonable suspicion. So road blocks can be set up and there is no difficulty. If one does not take a breathalyzer test, one pays a fine on the first occasion and on the second and third occasions one goes to jail for a period of up to two years. I think that is correct; yes, it is imprisonment for not more than two years.

If it is right to lay down those penalties, then it is right to have mandatory, minimum penalties for people who commit rape, armed robbery with violence, or use firearms. We cannot have it only one way. A great deal of advertising and promotion has been going on day after day and week after week on television. I know severe steps must be taken to stop the mixture of gasoline and of alcohol, and we are dealing with that. However, when we deal with the law, the law must be practical and, above all, it must be just. It can be just only if it is just in respect of all offences. Why should we pick out merely that one? There is not even a minimum sentence, under certain circumstances, for criminal negligence of manslaughter. Those are the things which concern me.

There is one other point I should like to make. The new law is quite flexible. Appeals from summary convictions are called trials de novo. A trial by summary conviction means that the person is charged with a lesser offence. The Crown may charge a person with an indictable offence, which involves a more severe penalty than summary conviction. If a person is convicted on summary conviction, the appeal is from the provincial judge, formerly the magistrate, to the district court, and all the evidence may be presented again. The whole matter is reviewed in the form of a brand new trial. In fact, witnesses may be called, at the appeal to the district court, who had not been called previously.

I suppose there has been some abuse of that practice, because lawyers sometimes would have a trial run before a provincial judge and then go to the district court. There is something I wish to point out which I know the minister and hon. members who have practised law understand. In the provincial courts, judges have to sit all morning. Anyone who attends these courts will realize how many cases a judge hears in a day. The judge does not have time to weigh all the pros and cons. There is, of course, the safeguard that in exceptional cases the whole thing can be reviewed by the district court. In some cases the magistrate merely says, on the basis that the Crown witnesses and policemen are honest, that he finds the accused guilty. That is a finding of fact and there is no appeal unless there is a rehearing and a re-evaluation of the witnesses.

That is the weakness of our system. A judge who is a friend of mine, in many cases takes the position that wherever the plaintiff's evidence differs from that of the defendant, he accepts the evidence of the plaintiff. Then the court of appeal is in the position of having to say it is sorry, but the judge has clearly decided the facts and the appeal is on those facts. The court of appeal points out that the judge did not believe the evidence on one side but he believed the evidence on the other side. We got this half a loaf from the minister. We are all happy that he repented. He said the law would be left similar to what it is, but that there will be an application to a district court to direct whether or not there shall be a new trial.

There is only one flaw in that. Knowing judges as I do—many of them are good friends of mine and I hope they remain so—they are liable to say that they do not want all the hard work involved, and very often will not exercise the discretion. It will become a very rare discretion, if ever it is used. I am not at all happy with that amendment, but it is better than no loaf. We can only hope that the rules in respect of that kind of discretion will be made by judicial law.

Having said that, our party accepts the changes in the Code. I have pointed out some weaknesses. Some of the weaknesses I have pointed out are my own ideas. On the whole it is good legislation. My last word to the minister is that if he has a package with which he thinks he can cut out or reduce crime, I wish he would bring it forward, because he inherited this from the former minister and he must have a package somewhere which he can bring in. He said he would bring in legislation to look after crime. I would hope, when he is thinking about that, we might have the same kind of royal commission or inquiry they have had in the province of Quebec to find out where all the crime lies. Had we not had that inquiry in the province of Quebec we would never have known about all the bad meat. Why, in the name of justice, the Liberal federal government challenged the legislation, the authority and the jurisdiction is beyond my comprehension, because that opened a can of worms. I am glad they held the inquiry. We have been begging for the same thing on a federal basis.

I am glad to see the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) here, because he has a good point. The other evening I watched a psychiatrist on television who said that the human mind at a certain age is exposed to violence day after day and hour after hour. He said this will affect the mind and some people will resort to violence. I understand that Miss Judy LaMarsh is conducting a very important inquiry in the province of Ontario. I hope the federal government will follow suit and have a similar inquiry across the nation to find out what effect this has on the children. This psychiatrist went further than I would. Had I said that, I would have been accused of being a redneck or something similar. The psychiatrist said that the exposure of youth in the drug stores to pornography hour after hour and week after week may be the reason that the number of rape cases is so high. He went that far. I do not know if that is right, but I do say we should set up an inquiry to find out what some of the experts in these fields feel about this problem. Maybe if we had those facts, the people who draft the legislation under the direction of the minister would be able to bring in some laws to clean up society.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise, first of all, to congratulate the minister on a very sensitive, compassionate and sensible judicial decision in the Morgentaler case. I want to start off by giving the minister a pat on the back so that he will be in a better position in respect of some of the other remarks I shall make.

I think we should speak for a while in the House about the things that are not contained in the bill. I know the answer the minister will give is that we should wait. As the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) said, it is jam tomorrow. The minister will say that this omnibus bill will solve all our problems. I have been here since 1972, and I and all members are waiting to see what kind of approach the government will take to crime. We must talk in this House from time to time about the causes of crime. After listening to the hon. member for Calgary North, I must say I am sometimes confused in respect of some of his comments about crime, but I want to give him credit for what I believe to be a very progressive statement he made on second reading of this bill. We may disagree from time to time about the right approach in terms of penalties, but I think the causes of crime he outlined in Hansard on November 18 should be repeated in this House because I think he covered one of the real problems which we are not attacking. This is what he said:

> —I have felt for years that we must get at the breeding grounds of crime. What are those breeding grounds? Crime breeds in cesspools of injustice. Wherever there is injustice, crime will breed. It breeds in the urban slums or in the fast-growing cities of Canada. Urban poverty makes people the victims, not the masters, of their environment. A bad environment becomes the hereditary property of succeeding generations. When I travel to various areas of this city, I see children who are forced to play on concrete and cement without necessary parks which are large enough to be playgrounds. The situation is worse here than it is in Calgary. These children are brought up in conditions which foster crime.

That is a very progressive statement on the subject of crime. If we are to deal with the causes, we must not only examine where criminals come from but we must examine who they are. I would suggest that if anyone goes to our maximum security institutions where we find the worst offenders, those people about whom we cannot do anything, it will be found that the average prisoner there has an education of about grade 6. These people have been rejected, first by their families, then by their school and then by their peers. So they isolate themselves into a tiny group. That group is consistently made up of people with a strong ego and high intelligence, people who are anti-social and quite often with a learning disability. Also, quite often they are mentally ill. One could ask how they became mentally ill, whether our institutions have made them that way or whether they were that way before.

What I do not see in the bill, and what I am hoping the minister will attend to perhaps in the next bill, are the M'Naghten rules. I hope he will take another look at the question of whether we are applying a proper standard in terms of those who are mentally ill and are committing crimes, because I can tell you that in the maximum security institution in my riding a great many of those people should be in maximum security in a mental hospital and not in a penal institution which is not able to provide any help for them. I am not suggesting they should be released; I am suggesting that many of those who have damaged psyches should be under treatment and should not be placed in solitary confinement, and they should not be released until we are satisfied that they have recovered.

There are people in those institutions with paranoid delusions about the people who put them there, about the defence and prosecuting lawyers and about the judges. They are ill and they can be dangerous if released. What I am saying is that we should take another look at the M'Naghten rules. We should get back to the question of whether anti-social behaviour is the result of mental aberration and whether it should be treated, or considered a crime and punished. I look forward to a reassessment of that question.

I am disappointed at the fact that when the minister came to the question of organized crime, he did not mention the co-ordinated law enforcement unit in British Columbia which I think should be given some credit. John Hogarth and his group in British Columbia have really done an excellent job, and I am pleased to see that the new government in B.C. is carrying on the program of co-operation at all levels to get to the top of the drug rings and to move up in the scale of people we arrest, because up to now we continue simply to catch the small fry, which does not really solve any of these criminal problems.

One of the things that is not in the bill, and it concerns me a great deal—I know it concerned the hon. member for Calgary North on second reading—is the question of publicity during a trial and the effect that such publicity can have on an individual. When I was defending people while practicing law, I knew that the fact that the name of the man who was charged appeared in the newspaper was as good as a conviction, because the penalty for a person who is brought into total disgrace in his community through being charged with an offence and having his name published can often be worse than the conviction itself.

We had this tragedy in Ottawa not too long ago when a person charged with a sexual offence committed suicide because of the nature of the alleged offence and the terrific embarrassment to him and his family. We in the profession often are so closed in in our own little world and are so closed in in the game of the adversary system in the courts that we sometimes forget the human realities of the people whom we represent and we forget the effect on them.

I say that that is a violation of the presumption of innocence to a very serious extent because, although I do not disagree with the public's right to know, what I say is that the public's right to know is not necessarily the instant that the charge is laid. So long as the information reaches the public, the principle of freedom of speech and the principle of the open court system is not eroded.

I am pleased to see the minister paying such close attention to the debate, and I hope he will take another look at the matter of the right of the public to be informed and when it should be informed. The refusal to publish the proceedings of preliminary hearings can be very useful both from the point of view of the defence and the prosecution. When you are defending someone who is charged with an offence—let us assume that he is charged with a sallacious offence such as indecent assault on a young person—surely letting the public know who this person in their midst is after conviction is soon enough. Doing so beforehand is tantamount to sentencing that person to purgatory for the rest of his life. Sometimes the press is most insensitive in its anxiety to see that all the information is released. People from the press are sometimes terribly insensitive regarding the right of the individual to some privacy in a serious situation.

Another area that we should consider, in terms of publicity, is the effect not merely on juries but on the whole public of violent and sallacious reporting such as we get in some of our worst magazines. I am not referring to the major dailies, which tend to be a little more responsible, but I look with sadness at some of the publications we see on our local newsstands which use crime in a most exploitive way and which pander to the worst emotions in the population. That could clearly affect the judgment of a jury picked for a trial in such a case. So I am asking that the minister give serious consideration to redesigning the rules concerning publicity around the courts, particularly with regard to charges that are laid.

I want to say a word or two about the individual in our society who, either through brain damage or bad environment—no matter how it happened—is incapable of feeling any remorse for his crime or compassion for the victims of his crime. It seems to me that if we are going to make any progress in terms of reducing the incidence of horror and crime in this country, we will have to identify the psychotic, dangerous personality much earlier. That does not mean to suggest that punitive action should be taken earlier. It simply means that an assessment should be made such as we do for those with learning disabilities and other problems in schools. Let us try to identify someone who is acting in an anti-social way in the early days of his school life, and see whether some assistance can be brought to the community to prevent the kind of dangerous and violent activity which occurs. Admittedly, there are very few such people, but there are enough to make our society feel suspicious that we are under attack by criminals.

The right answer for those who are worried about a break-in of their house, or a mugging, is not to get a dog, lock the door and buy a gun; the right answer is total community response to the problem of crime, the community working co-operatively toward a solution. I have talked in this House many times about the proliferation of guns and the fact that it is not a solution to crime. Not only does it not solve crime, but it does not provide any protection to the individual. Anyone coming to your house to break in will probably bring a gun along for protection if he thinks you have one. In fact, at the moment the chances of being robbed are greater if it is known that you have a gun, because that is one of the things most people in the business of breaking and entering are seeking.

I am concerned about some of the things that are not in this bill, Mr. Speaker. The law reform commission's study on local enforcement in the Toronto area should be looked at. Statistics on declining crime in that project area showed that through community involvement, instead of throwing everybody into jail or charging them, the number of family disputes and minor crimes has dropped. Our police must be part of the community and not be isolated in cars. I should like to see the policeman back on the beat, knowing everybody in his community so that a rapport or relationship could develop and he could prevent crime before it occured.

Our emphasis continues to be on increasing penalties after the crime occurs. We should move into the area of prevention through the local police officer anticipating the problems in his area. He can only do that if he knows the people and develops a personal, friendly relationship with those for whom he is responsible. There is no point in giving the policeman the responsibility for enforcement of traffic regulations in the whole city of Vancouver when he should be maintaining law and order and preventing crime in an area known to him and where he is known to the people who live there.

I should like to say a word or two about the bill itself, Mr. Speaker. This party supports it. We think some of the provisions are progessive and some of the drafting of the bail reform provisions is excellent. One provision on which I have not heard too much comment is begging while armed. This has been a major problem in the Vancouver area, I do not know about other areas, and the minister is to be congratulated for responding to the problem.

I have some reservations about the changes in the impaired driving provisions. In a sense, mandatory penalties are an erosion of judicial discretion. Perhaps those judges who have complained from time to time about the mandatory sentencing provisions should look at the way they co-ordinate sentences. Our of the reasons for mandatory sentencing in Canada is that the public is obviously dissatisfied with the penalties imposed by the courts. If we could better co-ordinate sentences and the reasons for sentencing, perhaps we would not need a mandatory sentencing provision. Quite often in a case where there is real merit, where a mandatory sentence should not be imposed, the courts have no discretion and as a result there is severe injustice.

I am not upset about the increase in mandatory penalties in view of the epidemic of driving offences in the country. I think a lot of people have reservations about the roadside screening provision, however. That is clearly a departure from the normal responsibility of the police officer to have both reasonable and probable grounds to conduct an investigation. I sympathize with the minister on this. It is a massive problem in Canada and I believe we will need more roadside screening in order to reduce the present carnage on the highways. I should like to see the minister use his influence with cabinet to apply to accident prevention the huge liquor profits and taxes that accrue to both the federal and provincial governments.

I should like to say something else about liquor, Mr. Speaker. In cases of motor manslaughter, where the driver had too much to drink, it is sometimes difficult to get a conviction. Some members of the jury may be saying, "There, but for the grace of God, go I". There is considerable sympathy for the accused. Sometimes members of the public get upset about acquittals in cases of criminal negligence. They do not understand that in this country we are all guilty of drinking liquor. It is a problem to judge how much liquor one can drink and then whether one should drive.

An hon. Member: It is a terrible habit.

Mr. Leggatt: It is a terrible habit and we should all give it up.

An hon. Member: If I were a Liberal, I would give it up.

Mr. Leggatt: Especially at $7.80 a quart as the hon. member for Calgary North suggested. But, Mr. Speaker, because it is such a culturally acceptable activity it is difficult for the Crown to get a conviction in a liquor offence. If you have 12 drinkers on a jury, you have a job on your hands. I think we should take note of the fact that we are heavy drinkers in this country. The hon. member for Calgary North suggested that in his area the country clubs were being screened and that police waited outside to catch people going home after a pleasant evening. That has been going on in the beer parlours in my riding for a long time. The police have been pretty thorough in picking up drinkers, but I am a little tired of beer parlour operators allowing people to stagger out of their premises and into a car, to be immediately picked up.

Surely there is some responsibility on the part of those who sell liquor to be careful about how much people have had to drink. Surely they should cut them off before it is too late. There have been instances where people have been helped out of a hotel, got into a car and then were arrested when they left the parking lot. I think those who operate hotels had better accept more responsibility in terms of preventing carnage on the highways.

I am delighted with the provision on theft under $200 which will now become a summary conviction offence. This is long overdue. People involved in shoplifting or offences of a minor nature formerly had a record of an indictable offence and this affected their future when applying for a job with a major corporation or the civil service. Shoplifting has been a widespread epidemic and the discretion to make it a summary conviction offence is useful. Actually, in some circumstances kleptomaniacs who may have engaged in stealing could be granted a conditional discharge where appropriate.

Mr. Baldwin: Where is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) (Rosedale))? The hon. member has exactly described the fiscal policies of the government.

Mr. Leggatt: In this country it is unlikely that you can obtain much that is worth while for $200 or less. The increased penalty in the cruelty to animals provisions is also worth while, although I do not know why there is a maximum sentence of two years. Cases involving great cruelty to animals could warrant a more severe penalty. I congratulate the government for introducing discretionary powers for taking an animal from its owner because he has been cruel. This provision is particularly useful in cases involving people without the resources to look after animals.

I shall now talk about the rape provisions of the bill. From a legal point of view, these changes are substantial and useful. So far, the Criminal Code has been male oriented and our approach to rape has also been male oriented. I can give hon. members examples of what I mean. I remember a case involving two young lads who were charged with rape. I defended them. They had picked up a girl hitchhiker. I have no sympathy at all for any judge who says to a girl like that, "Why were you hitchhiking?" In that case I think she had a perfect right to hitchhike. Males hitchhike. Why should she be placed in a special category? Why should she be different, merely because she is a female, and not be on the highways? Why should she not be there? The implication of the judge's comment was that she was out there looking for trouble. In that case my clients were acquitted, but for other reasons.

Mrs. Holt: You should not defend the guilty.

An hon. Member: But they got off.

Mr. Leggatt: That is right. I must say that I had every sympathy for the poor girl. We saw in court a display of male chauvinism which I think was quite wrong. Second, I am glad to see a stop being put to the sort of salacious snickering one sees in rape cases. In the past, the previous conduct of the complainant has been examined and the defence in such cases has inquired if she is a person of good repute, and so on. I take some responsibility for what happened in the case. It was my job to cross-examine the poor young lady, but I was as discreet and reasonable as I could be in that cross-examination.

An hon. Member: If that was the law, how dreadful.

Mr. Leggatt: Just a minute, Simma—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Will the hon. member please address the Chair?

Mr. Leggatt: I am trying to explain to my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), that those engaged in defence work have the responsibility to defend their clients to the best of their ability. The point is that the law was wrong.

An hon. Member: You should not have done it.

Mr. Leggatt: The law was wrong, and I congratulate the minister for recognizing that the law was wrong. At the same time, everyone in this country is presumed innocent until proven guilty, and those engaged in defence work must do their best for their clients. The resources of the Crown are immense. It has the police, all the facilities of the law and all the resources of the state. The defendant has just his lawyer to look after him. We should not say to defence lawyers, "You should not use all the tools available to you." I merely say that the minister has introduced a useful change in the law. Frankly, there is no reason why a female's sexual history should be raised in court. I wonder if the bill goes far enough in changing the rape laws. I suppose we shall have to wait and see.

I now turn to the bail provisions. I think the draftsmanship is excellent. The amendment does not offend anyone's sense of civil liberties and does not negate the principle of presumption of innocence. The onus provision is just about right for dealing with the kinds of problems we face with regard to bail. I have some reservations about the summary conviction appeal provisions, and the abandonment of the trial de novo can make appeals more complicated. The profession was concerned in the past because many people lost their appeals on technicalities. We are still concerned about technicalities and want to see the rights of the accused protected.

When I began my remarks I congratulated the minister for his sensitive and good legal approach to the Morgentaler case, which involves the erosion of the power of juries, and erosion resulting directly from the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in that case. I still prefer the judgment of 12 people to the judgment of one man. I particularly trust the judgment of 12 people on questions of fact. Their judgment is based on common, everyday experience. They live the same kind of life as their peer group or the accused may live. I trust people who drink in a beer parlour to find out what happened in a beer parlour.

It was a sad day for the majority of Canadians when the time-honoured system of the jury was eroded by the appellate court decision. Certainly it was a sad day for the majority in the legal profession. Bear in mind that those who serve on juries serve at great sacrifice to themselves. They find the work difficult and taxing. If we allow courts of appeal to impose their verdicts on the verdicts of juries, the morale of all jurors will be destroyed. Why take a couple of weeks trying a murder trial, if the court of appeal will not think you smart enough to determine the facts of the case and impose its judgment on the judgment of the jury? I congratulate the minister for adopting exactly the wording of my private member's bill with respect to appeals. I am glad to see the stature of juries restored. However, although there is much good in the bill, there are also weaknesses in it.

I support the call of the hon. member for Calgary North for a commission to look into violence and pornography in society. I am not sure whether the hon. member outlined or suggested terms of reference for the commission. We must recognize that the medium is the message and is massaging the people, as McLuhan said. For example, consider how remarkably similar were the killings that took place at Brampton and the killings that took place in Ottawa recently.

Many crimes of violence depicted on television are duplicated in the community by some poor, sick soul who was inspired by what he saw to do some vicious, antisocial, criminal act. We should also study the effects of pornography. The rape rate is down this year, so that I am not sure if the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North hold true. But we should study the effects of pornography and see if it dulls the senses. We should not wait for the Ontario commission to report, as there are many other urban areas in Canada. I urge the minister to give serious consideration to setting up a proper inquiry into the effects of violence as depicted on television, on radio and in the newspapers, and the effects of pornography as depicted by those three media. Particularly, let us look at the movie industry which is depicting hard-core pornography and has been for some time.

We must again look at the people in our institutions and ask ourselves what effect our laws will have on them and why they were sent there in the first place. The public's first reaction to violent crime is either to urge that the criminal be hanged, or that we lock him up and throw away the key. We should not ignore these options, because they are valid options at which we should look, but we must think about prevention. These are not preventive measures at all. We must get back to the question of the kind of society we live in. We live in a highly competitive society, a dog-eat-dog society. Sometimes the dog at the end bites the ankle of the one in front. If you are going to do anything about the causes of crime, you have to make this a more humane place in which to live. You have to bring the community together, but not in a dog-eat-dog, free enterprise system.

Mr. Francis Fox (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Madam Speaker, Bill C-71 now before us contains a series of amendments to the Criminal Code which constitute the first stage, but a very important one, of the government legislative program. The purpose of this program is, in fact, to assure in Canadian society the maintenance of the physical security climate needed for the individual and social development of Canadians. Bill C-71 includes several amendments to the Criminal Code, amendments that have not held the attention of the media until now despite their significance. Some of these concern organized crime, such as the one that makes it illegal to use for legal purposes funds obtained in an illegal manner, as well as the one that makes illegal any conspiracy in Canada to commit offences abroad.

Also to be noted are substantial changes when it comes to bail, particularly in cases of murder charges, relapse into crime or drug trafficking. These changes, Madam Speaker, are meant to ensure greater protection against those who infringe on the basic social contract by attacking the basic right to physical security of any individual living in society.

Though they may not deal with the problem of organized crime, other amendments are nevertheless aimed at improving protection of the civic right to physical integrity. Thus, very stiff penalties will be imposed for impaired driving. I hope that those penalties will be noted, that they will receive wide publicity to reduce the number of impaired driving cases. The corporal as well as material damages specifically described with the support of statistics by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), damages caused by people who have had too much to drink and insist on driving, are really excessive. I hope, Madam Speaker, that these penalties will lead to the consideration of the seriousness of this antisocial behaviour.

Finally, some amendments will protect the rights of the victim. The victim of a rape will no longer have to submit, except with the judge's authorization and in camera, to a thorough cross-examination of her background which often seemed to make her an accused rather than a victim.

Finally, the Criminal Code is amended to make sure that an acquittal by a jury can no longer be changed in a verdict of guilty by an appeal court. Indeed, I should like to mention in passing in this regard that it is obvious that when courts of appeal, whether the Quebec Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court of Canada, have in fact reversed the decision of a jury, they have been acting under an existing provision of the Criminal Code and have been in fact entitled to judge the case in question in view of the situation of the law at that time. It was up to Canadian Parliament to amend the Criminal Code. The situation at that time no longer corresponded to the needs of today's Canadian society.

I would like to come back briefly, Madam Speaker, on two or three aspects of the bill, namely the laundering of illegally obtained funds, bail provisions and drunken driving. First, let us consider the laundering of money obtained through crime: it is a well known fact—and several cases of this nature have been brought to light during the sittings of the CECO and other investigations into organized crime in Canada as well as in the United States—that organized crime is making an increasing use of illegally obtained funds, for instance, money obtained by prostitution networks, by trafficking of narcotics and drugs, by rings of motor vehicle thieves, and by something which is well known in certain areas of the south shore and Montreal, namely the protection industry. It is a well known fact that these illegally obtained funds are used to launch honest business ventures.

Under section 312 of the Criminal Code it is an offence to have in your possession an illegally obtained property. Under the amendment proposed in the House today, in future not only will the possession of illegally obtained funds be subject to prosecution under the Criminal Code, but also these funds can now be followed to their ultimate destination. This means for instance that if organized crime starts a business venture with funds obtained through the sale of stolen bonds, these funds will now be subject to the law.

The amendment goes further, and I believe it should be pointed out. It even forbids the use in Canada for legal purposes of funds obtained through underworld operations abroad. These are therefore important amendments, particularly in respect of organized crime when criminals try to lay out their illegal gains to advantage by buying commercial firms and operating legal activities.

I consider, Madam Speaker, that this is an extremely important development in Canadian jurisprudence. This is an additional tool we are giving to police forces, investigators and governments at both levels, provincial and federal, in Canada, and which will allow better control over the underworld and the mafia's sprawling operations and activities.

As to the bail, Madam Speaker, I would like to talk about it for a few moments. If there is an aspect which retains the attention of the public, it is very often indeed that of bail. Mass media do emphasize cases of people charged with an offence and who are let out on bail. We hear of it every day.

Madam Speaker, I think it is with good reason that many such cases are given prominence, particularly when the individuals released on bail commit an offence while out on parole.

In order to ensure better protection for society, Bill C-71 proposes thorough amendments to the Criminal Code as regards bail in certain specific cases.

At this moment, any person charged with a criminal offence must be let out on bail, unless the Crown attorney shows to the satisfaction of the court that the public interest requires he be imprisoned until his trial.

Bill C-71 establishes four exceptions to this principle. In these specific cases, it will be the responsibility of the defendant to show the court why he should be free pending his trial. This is therefore a reversal of the burden of proof which is very important and which should provide the public with additional protection without, however, depriving the defendant of his right to avail himself of the principles in which we all believe and, more particularly, of the principle of presumption of innocence.

In four very specific cases, it is the defendant rather than the Crown who will have to assume the burden of proof. It is the defendant who will have to prove that he is not a public danger and, secondly, that it is to be expected that he will appear before the court at the moment determined for his trial. First, when someone is charged with having committed a criminal offence while on bail, he will have to reverse the burden of proof himself. A citizen of a country other than Canada will have to do the same.

In both latter cases we are dealing with amendments which were brought forward to the committee by the Minister of Justice himself (Mr. Basford). They concern charges of murder, of conspiracy to commit murder or of drug and narcotic importation or, once again, conspiracy and traffic or drug and narcotic importation.

It goes without saying that very often, particularly in the case of drug trafficking, the criminals are freed on bail and shortly after return to the street to continue this traffic of drugs which has proved so disastrous for Canadian youths in particular.

Evidently, as I have said, this does not in any manner affect the principle of our criminal law which presumes any person is innocent until proven guilty. There are nevertheless cases when, for public protection, it is necessary to ensure the presence of the accused in court. We then have to be much stricter and the present Minister of Justice as well as the Crown had no hesitation in adopting a harder line and being very strict towards the accused.

In those cases, as I have already pointed out, it will no longer be incumbent on the Crown, and this bears repeating, to prove why the accused should be held in custody until his trial, but instead, it will be up to the accused to prove why he should be free, to the satisfaction of the judge. The burden will be that much heavier.

Madam Speaker, it should also be noted in passing that the government intends to impose considerably more severe sanctions for drunken driving. Once again, inebriety at the wheel, which plagues our society, is a practice that leads, all in all, to tragedies, as well for the driver as for innocent victims, because of a lack of control or because the wheel was not taken over by someone else when too much alcohol was consumed.

Madam Speaker, I should also like to note how interesting it is that a good part of the population should be aware of the penalties now provided for by the Criminal Code for drunken driving, as a result of having been accused of driving while intoxicated, according to the rate of alcohol stipulated in the Criminal Code.

For a first offence, the maximum penalty is therefore increased. At this time, the law provides for a minimum fine of $500, or three months in prison, to a maximum fine of $2,000 or six months in prison.

For a second or third offence, there are minimum prison sentences, the judge not even having the option to impose a fine. He must sentence the person convicted to a period of detention, while for a second offence the maximum sentence is raised from three months detention to one year. And in the case of any subsequent offence, the maximum sentence is increased from one year to two years imprisonment.

Now, this clearly indicates, Madam Speaker, the interest taken by the drafters of this bill in this serious problem, and their decision in conscience to try to put an end to these abuses and emphasize the seriousness of such an act. Those are some of the amendments contained in this legislation. As I said earlier in my remarks, Madam Speaker, this is a first stage which will soon be completed by the peace and security program which the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General of Canada, I hope, will launch in the near future.

[Mr. Fox.]

A society which is concerned with the interests of citizens must favour the establishment of a social system which meets the aspirations of its members. Daily facts demonstrate that society must take the necessary measures to isolate those who refuse to abide by the rules and that as long as it is required by public interest.

The Criminal Code is one of the instruments which allow us to settle some situations. We must always remember that that instrument of social control is used when rules are not respected. Moreover it cannot in itself contribute to reducing the derogation rate and the solution in many cases rests with other human disciplines and government programs which ensure to all Canadians a rather high minimum level in the education field and the opportunity to develop themselves and to realize their own destiny.

[English]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I just wish to make a few comments. I hope you will permit me to make them, although they are not all tied closely to the bill. I have looked for an occasion to say these things for some time. I am saying them in a personal way and expressing a personal point of view. I do not intend to launch into a wide ranging discussion of crime or the Criminal Code. I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments of my hon. friend from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams); the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), and others. They were very interesting remarks of a constructive nature dealing with the causes of crime and other matters.

It seems to me that generally there is no simple approach to the question of maintaining law and order. Certainly we cannot cope with this problem by thinking simply in terms of detection and punishment. But there is no point in pretending—I am sure none of us does—that it is simply a matter of reorganizing the community, that if we had the proper spirit and took the proper precautionary measures in advance there would be no crime to contend with afterwards.

I suspect we have to attack crime on many fronts. For example, there is a vast difference between highly organized crime on the one hand and the kind of crime which reflects slum conditions, poverty, and so on. I would myself welcome the kind of inquiry which many speakers inside the House have called for, an inquiry into the causes of crime, an inquiry into the effects of violence on television, among other things. As I say, I suspect we have to attack the problem on many fronts, and although many of us have hobby horses we like to ride, none of them, perhaps, would take us very far by themselves.

My hon. friend from Calgary North attacked the idea of minimal and mandatory sentences in connection with breathalyzer convictions. I agree with him 100 per cent. I cannot understand why the government would sponsor minimal or mandatory sentences in connection with something like this. Generally, I express disapproval of the whole idea of a minimum sentence, so what I am going to say with regard to breathalyzer tests is in no way derogatory to or divergent from the view expressed by my hon. friend. However, I will make one point with regard to breathalyzer tests and related matters such as the mandatory requirement to wear seat belts and the attitude some people seem to take that it is a requirement which somehow infringes their personal liberty.

Their attitude seems to be that it is somehow an infringement of personal liberty for parliament to pass a bill requiring a person to wear a seat belt or to take a breathalyzer test. Madam Speaker, I am almost a fascist when it comes to the carnage on our highways. I am prepared to take a very tough position and support very tough legislation with regard to the carnage which takes place on our roads.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I have no God-given right to drive a car on a highway; that is a privilege granted me by the province or state. Any legislature or the Parliament of Canada has a perfect right, indeed a duty, to impose safeguards and precautions upon me while I am driving on the highway. I am not the only one who drives on the highway; others do, too. I have no God-given right, either, even if I were alone on the highway, to drive in any way I please or to do any damage to myself or the car.

I simply say as fervently as I can that I believe our legislatures and this parliament have a heavy obligation to improve safety on our highways and to cut down carnage. I do not want to be intolerant, but I have very little time for anybody who argues that they have a right to refuse to take a breathalyzer test if stopped on the highway and asked to do so, that somehow this is an infringement of peronal liberties. If people want to drive a car on the highway, then they have to be prepared to accept and comply with measures considered by legislatures and by parliament to be necessary. I have no right to drive a car without using a seat belt if the legislature of my province or if the Parliament of Canada, if it were within the jurisdiction of parliament, require me to do so. As I say, Madam Speaker, my rights are not being infringed; I am exercising a privilege.

In view of the amount of carnage being done by people on the highway, when I was in provincial politics and premier of a province I felt that we should take very tough positions to reduce the damage taking place on our highways. I do not intend to stay in public life very long, and this is one reason I have seized upon this opportunity this afternoon to express as strongly as I can my deep personal conviction that some people, at least, seem to be confusing a privilege to drive on the highway, a privilege granted by the state, with some God-given fundamental right that never existed.

I hope that parliamentarians and legislators will pursue this course of being tough with people who violate the laws and rules governing the conduct of motor vehicles on the highway. I think we have taken far too lax a view of the consequence of things like speeding and careless driving. I want to tell the minister that I will give him my full support for being as tough as he wants to be toward people driving while impaired and toward imposing reasonable methods of picking these people up—and if it happens to be me, that is too bad.

That, Madam Speaker, is what I wanted to say this afternoon. Let us not confuse ancient and fundamental liberties with driving on the highway, which is a privilege granted by a province or the state.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CONDITIONS AND PROVISIONS GOVERNING CITIZENSHIP

The House resumed from Wednesday, December 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Faulkner that Bill C-20, respecting citizenship, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to address myself to some elements of Bill C-20 and to my concerns with regard to this bill. Although I can see some advantages flowing from it, there are also some very serious concerns. My principal concerns relate to qualifications for citizenship, qualifications that are deemed to be of a very serious nature. It is a very solemn undertaking indeed to accept not only the benefits of citizenship but the responsibilities that must inevitably accompany the privilege of being a Canadian.

This bill would permit a person to qualify for citizenship on the basis of allowing every day spent in Canada to qualify as a half day prior to being registered as a person lawfully in Canada. I think that is a gross error. Certainly, with my knowledge of the facile way that people can move across the border between Canada and the United States, this has to be an error. With my knowledge of the sloppy manner in which some people have been admitted to Canada, it is an error.

I recall a young lady who, as a part-time employee of customs and immigration, made a suggestion to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in 1974 to the effect that people coming to Canada through various border crossing points, claiming they were landed immigrants, should be able to provide some form of official identification issued by the ministry. This identification should take the form perhaps of a plasticized identification card giving a description of the person to whom it was issued, together with a recent photograph. We are asked to provide that sort of thing when we apply for a passport. Indeed, every member of the House of Commons has this kind of identification.

This very valid suggestion was passed to the minister and accepted by him, but like so many other suggestions that are made to some ministers, that was the last we heard of it, even though the minister himself endorsed this very concept in writing. As it stands now, we have no idea how long a person has been in Canada prior to the period when they begin to qualify for citizenship on the basis of a full day in Canada equalling a full day in their application for citizenship.

This brings me to the next provision in clause 5, that for every day during which the applicant was resident in Canada after his lawful admission in Canada he shall be deemed to have accumulated one day of residence. That is for a period of three years, Madam Speaker. According to the bill, he shall be conversant with at least one of the official languages. He should have a knowledge of Canada, and not only a knowledge of Canada but an understanding of Canada. I submit it is one thing to have a knowledge of Canada, and another thing to have an understanding of Canada and the manner in which this country, our people and our governments operate.

● (1700)

On the basis of my experience with citizenship judges, I must say that some have demonstrated a lack of knowledge of the very basic concerns of Canadians. This is often brought to light at the time these people make application for citizenship. I know there are those in this House and in this country who feel a person after three years should qualify for citizenship. I also know in my own riding, where I have a very wonderful cross-section of people of various ethnic origins, that the value they place on Canadian citizenship, something they have worked for and earned, is much in excess of the token three years that this bill provides. I almost get the feeling that this is sort of a citizenship for sale or bargain day agreement. Let us make it easy, open the borders and allow them to pour in!

I do not think for one minute that a person has to express any bias or that there should be any implication of being labelled a bigot or a racist when you suggest that the regulation remain as it is with a five-year qualification for citizenship. Certainly we have those who have never adapted to Canadian citizenship or to Canada. I suggest to hon. members that three years is indeed a very brief time in order to reap the rewards of Canadian citizenship, and that five years is a much more acceptable standard and one that is easily appreciated and understood by a cross-section of Canada's ethnic groups.

There are certain provisions for the loss of citizenship, and certain provisions for those who may have lost their citizenship to regain that valuable status. With reference to clause 7, I wonder just who is going to advise the person who has reached the age of 28 years that it is now time to apply for that status for which he should have applied earlier. What happens to the fellow who has not been informed? Are we looking at some broad-brush advertising scheme to be conducted once a year by Manpower and Immigration just to assure that this man or woman is fully aware of the regulation?

It is bad enough for most of us to try to keep track of all the regulations from day to day, without this kind of nonsense being inserted in the bill. I cannot really see the merit or the value of it. I think provisions for Canadians are well covered in other areas of the bill and I see no need for this particular provision.

Thank heavens, however, that the minister in his wisdom has decided that those women who were British subjects prior to 1947 can now, on application to the minister, obtain a certificate. There are no more outspoken people in the matter of their right to vote and their Canadian citizenship than those British who by virtue of previous legislation were, quite frankly, denied their right to vote. Of course, it is easy to say that they never applied for citizenship, but in every other context they have considered themselves to be Canadians. They have considered themselves to be proud Canadians and British subjects who have contributed to the economy of this country by paying taxes and in every other way doing their jobs. I am relieved at least that clause 3 of this bill will make this provision, particularly for women, who are the most outspoken of those who are very proud to be Canadian citizens. I suggest it will be incumbent upon the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to give this part the widest possible publication.

It will be incumbent upon members of parliament to let their constituents know precisely the facts of this particular provision so these people can apply. Many times these British subjects have spoken to me, saying that if that be the case and they cannot vote without having applied for Canadian citizenship, they surely will not vote. In some respects that is an unfortunate attitude, but in other ways, in view of the contribution these people have made to the community, I cannot really blame them.

When we get to the question of examination for citizenship, then, Madam Speaker, the weaknesses of the system are becoming in fact more apparent. One of my concerns is that there is lack of uniformity by citizenship judges in dealing with applicants. This lack of uniformity, leaving it up to the individual citizenship judge, is going to be very seriously compounded by the three-year provision.

Not too long ago I listened to the complaints of several applicants for citizenship who appeared before a judge in my riding. Can you imagine the question being put, to somebody from Iran applying for Canadian citizenship, who had examined, studied and learned to speak one of our official languages and tried to become part of the fabric of Canada, having resided here for the qualifying period in excess of five years: "What can you tell me about white faces?" If he had asked me, I would not have been able to provide the answer, as I am sure very few members in this House could.

This judge asked: "What can you tell me about white faces", and that is the way he put the question. If he had said: "Can you tell me about white faces", I might have said: "You are talking about cattle, or Herefords." I could tell him something about Hereford cattle. But what in the world could we expect a man from Iran to know about white faces? I am sure the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) would have been hard pressed to figure out what that judge was talking about, and he should know if anyone should.

Another applicant was asked to talk about the pre-Cambrian shield. I think that is very important to the student of geology, or possibly to the student of geography, but just how relevant is it to a requirement for citizenship in Canada? These are only two of several examinations where applicants for citizenship have really, in effect, been put down by the examining judge. That is why I ask, if these people are having difficulty in five years in responding to the questions of this judge to whom I referred—and how many other citizenship judges across Canada are asking similar questions—how many problems are they going to find generated by the three-year provision? Are we going to have a different style of questioning? Is it to be primarily textbook questioning, or are we really going to determine that these people truly sense what is Canadian and have some knowledge about what is Canada?

● (1710)

Madam Speaker, I simply cannot accept the basic premise or idea that citizenship is for sale at bargain prices and for bargain requirements. I am also concerned about the requirements for citizenship and the discretionary power to the governor in council or the minister with reference to refugees. We are indeed fortunate in Canada that we live in a democracy and that to all intents and purposes, save and except for the ever-increasing, burgeoning government legislation, we are as free as we are and do not live in a police state. When a minister has the discretionary power to examine the applications of refugees or those who claim refugee status, it is so easy for a minister to say he really cannot conceive how that person should feel he or she can be a refugee from such a fine country as Poland, or such a fine country as Hungary or any other iron curtain country. I know whereof I speak, Madam Speaker.

I know, Madam Speaker, that very shortly I will be making an appeal to the minister. May I say, also, that I have made a recommendation to the minister that you should have a cabinet post. Perhaps my message will get through to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I think there would probably be unanimous consent if the question could be put to a vote.

To continue, very shortly I expect I will be approaching the Minister of Manpower and Immigration with reference to the problem of persons who claim refugee status. I am sure this same problem has been confronted by more than one member of parliament. I really do not think that, as Canadians, we have fully grasped the total loss of freedom there is in the police type of state that exists behind the iron curtain and the satellite countries. I do not think we understand the situation in respect of a woman who reaches age 65. Such a woman is old long before her time, she is bent and torn and is no longer of any value to the state. She is a person who must be clothed, kept warm and fed.

We do not seem to understand that these are the people who are granted exit visas to visit Canada and the United States or any other country in the free world. However, in the case of an attempt to obtain an exit visa for some young, productive worker, whether male or female, then a different connotation is put on the application. I would ask members to observe the manner in which persons from behind the iron curtain are handed their visas when they line up to receive them. If they are being granted a visa to visit one of the western countries, they find that when their visa is being presented to them it is thrown to the floor so that the applicant must bend down to pick it up.

If I, as a Canadian, report to the police in Budapest or at some other place while I am entering or leaving as an alien, that is different. Then my visa or passport is handed to me. If I should be a worker contributing to the economy of that particular country, and should apply for a visa to leave that country, even for a short visit to relatives in another country, then my application is treated with a great deal of disdain and there is a great deal of discouragement.

How many young people from the iron curtain countries do we see in Canada as visitors? The answer is, damned few. When such a visitor wishes to stay, what assistance are we prepared to give? When such a person must return to his or her country, what consideration is truly given to the application to remain in Canada? Do we believe that these people have no problems when they return to the police state behind the iron curtain and that they will be accepted with open arms? If we do, how very naive we are.

It is not my intention to protract the debate on this citizenship bill, because there are some advantages for some people. I realize the government is anxious to see it pass. However, I must protest strongly the bargain rates for citizenship and join many Canadians of all ethnic origins who say they want to work for their citizenship, that they are prepared to work for it and do not mind the five years. They feel that is a short enough period in which to gain the values and the benefits and respond to the requirements of being a Canadian. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to address you on this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Before recognizing the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), I should like to advise the House of the questions to be raised tonight during the adjournment debate.

CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CONDITIONS AND PROVISIONS GOVERNING CITIZENSHIP

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Faulkner that Bill C-20, respecting citizenship, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Citizenship

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I am naturally quite pleased to take part in this debate since for several years I have had the honour of introducing in the House some bills dealing with amendments to the Citizenship Act. I was therefore happy when the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) introduced Bill C-20 dealing with amendments demanded for a long time by the members as well by various groups other than French or English in Canada, unfortunately called ethnic groups. Indeed, it is a well-known fact that I dislike that term; I prefer the term "future new Canadians" or "prospective new Canadians." There is in this legislation, and I refer to clause 5, a clause I am very much interested in, since for some four years I have called for such changes, asking the government to reduce from five to three years the required period to hold permanent residence in Canada before getting or applying for Canadian citizenship. I wish to thank my colleagues and the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) for having listened to my arguments and now to submit them for study to the House and committees in order to enact the new Canadian citizenship legislation. Canadians who had been accepted—I should rather refer to them as future new Canadians—to become landed immigrants will certainly be extremely happy, as soon as this legislation is passed, to send their application to become Canadian citizens after three instead of five years.

I could never really understand why in a country where communications are so fast, where it is so easy for everyone to have a full knowledge of our institutions, why then, one had to wait for more than five years to become a Canadian citizen. I submit Madam Speaker, that a three year waiting period is quite sufficient for those who have decided to get a Canadian citizenship.

And I am glad that we will soon have this new designation. I am very careful and I regret that my friend the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is not here now. In fact, when I talk about British citizen and Commonwealth citizen I know that this matter interests him very much and that he always listens very carefully. I wish to tell him through the chair that I am glad that soon in our Canadian passports, if this citizenship legislation is passed, we will replace the words "a Canadian citizen is a British subject" by "a Canadian citizen is a member of the Commonwealth". I think that it will enhance our Commonwealth status to have in our passports the words "Member of the Commonwealth" rather than "British citizen" with all due respect to those who in another country are called British citizens. It is something I wish to emphasize.

Of course, I would have been glad had this government found advisable, at clauses 40 and 2 concerning oaths of allegiance, to follow the Canadian constitutional trend and change the oath of allegiance. For those who could be very sensitive and nervous I repeat that I can live with this bill, that I will accept it as it is but I wish to say to this House that I would prefer that all new citizens take an oath of allegiance to Canadian institutions which, once again, could be helpful to those who now refuse to take the Canadian citizenship because they think they are taking an oath of allegiance to the head of another country when everybody knows that the Queen, who is the Queen of England, is also the Queen of Canada. But I hope that some day, some of my colleagues opposite wherever they are sitting at that time, when I will be older, will themselves propose that change. However, I wished to say that I would have preferred to see that change in the new Citizenship Act.

[The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin).]

Madam Speaker, I wish to make some further comments. I think it was time for this legislation to provide equality of rights for men and women. This is so elementary, so logical that I do not see any reason why I should waste the valuable time of this House trying to show how these amendments to the Citizenship Act are justified.

Of course, I am also pleased that soon our youth—

● (1720)

[English]

—those for whom under the bill the age of majority is reduced from 21 to 18, the age of federal enfranchisement.

[Translation]

Of course, Madam Speaker, it was logical I think that our young Canadians now be able to exercize their right to vote at the age of 18, that they enjoy such freedom and that, even if their parents decide otherwise, they have the privilege of asking for Canadian citizenship.

I therefore congratulate the minister for his wisdom and for listening to us—but there again I do not want to get involved in any partisanship. Representations were made by both sides of this House. However, I must say that since I have been interested in this matter for many years, I made such representations to different ministers and when I was Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State, I had even advocated making such changes, to which the minister had agreed. I now realize that this government is determined to increase these means to provide our citizens with further services, which I will explain, Madam Speaker, since it is important that our friends in the press—

[English]

These people are the ones who will give great publicity to this new immigration law or citizenship law or any new laws at great length, so that Canadians will learn about these changes.

[Translation]

Here is one of those changes, Madam Speaker. The minister has allowed the citizenship bureaus to remain open evenings and Saturdays. Unfortunately, the fact is not well known, but I hope the new aspiring Canadian citizens, who are excellent workers, and who often hesitate to take three days off of their precious time to go and apply for citizenship, can thus be better served, for in many cases, the employers refuse to give them a day off to file their application for citizenship, another to appear before the citizenship judge and still another to take the oath of allegiance required to become a Canadian citizen. Facilities will be provided for by the government at its offices in Toronto and Montreal and, I hope, in Vancouver and elsewhere in due course, where there is need for them. Naturally, during a time of austerity, offices should not be opened everywhere, and new aspiring citizens should take advantage of the great number of services already available to them.

I should also like to echo what my hon. colleague across the way, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) said when he spoke of the sensitivity with which the citizenship judges should deal with the applicants.

[English]

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) spoke about the question put by a citizenship judge to a man from Iran: "what do you know about white faces?". I also know a judge who had the temerity, if I may put it that way, to ask a future new Canadian of Italian origin, "what would you do if Canada ever declared war on Italy?" I do not think such a question should ever be asked because it is unfair. We know that the man would probably answer that he would fight for Canada, but I think it is the most unfair question one could put to a future Canadian citizen because never, in my recollection, has any judge ever asked of the hundreds of thousands of excellent British citizens who came from Great Britain what they would do if Canada ever declared war on Great Britain. So I believe that if such a question is never asked of a British citizen it should not be asked of citizens of other countries of origin.

This is a very sensitive matter. This was an English speaking judge in Quebec, and it happened recently. I am speaking in English, but in case I do not say exactly what I want to say it is because I am talking about "la sensibilité" and I do not know how to translate that word.

[Translation]

But I hope that judges will have that necessary compassion when examining witnesses. And since many of my colleagues wish to speak on this subject, I would like to conclude by asking whether the government would not accept amendments in committee on such a possibility. I had requested it and I make a further request today in this House. For a number of years now I have been making representations concerning very old citizens who speak neither English nor French, but whose children are Canadian citizens or applied for and were granted citizenship many years ago. These elder citizens live in a so-called ghetto, without any pejorative connotation. Being quite old they cannot speak either English or French, since they came to Canada at the request of their children now enjoying an adequate economic status allowing them to come to Canada to spend here the latter part of their lives. I wonder if it would not come within the scope of the policy of compassion which the government should apply at all times when dealing human beings if it were to give the Court of citizenship the power to grant citizenship almost automatically to parents and grand-parents of Canadian citizens, even though they may not speak English or French or have a very precise knowledge of Canada. Anyway, when I see questions put to new citizens, I always wonder how many Canadian-born citizens could pass such an examination, and what would be their marks. I am not referring here to members in this House, because I know that members from all sides, whether Social Credit, NDP, Progressive Conservative or Liberal, would pass the exam. But still I wonder if, from time to time, we would not hesitate before providing the answers to all the questions that are put to potential citizens.

It is a question of allowing latitude to the judges. I know that the great majority of them do have the sensitivity needed, this ability to recognize that Canadian citizenship must not be granted to whomever wants it without at least having confirmation that the applicant does intend to be an excellent Canadian. But it is always good to let those who are entrusted with its final administration, our officials whom I congratulate because I see them at work in the various offices, improve on the process. There is always room for improvement as much in the case of members of Parliament and, naturally, high officials as for lower echelon officials but I congratulate them because generally speaking they carry out their work with excellence and sincerity. Then there remains the question of allowing some latitude to judges. They could best exercice this their latitude if they were allowed to grant citizenship to people at a certain age, perhaps 70, but I would favor 65. Citizenship would be granted to those people who often have been in Canada for 15, 20 years and who will die without ever having the opportunity to learn French or English. Needless to say that I join my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay-West in the wishes he made.

● (1730)

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be very brief with my remarks respecting Bill C-20, as I know there are one or two others who would like to speak before six o'clock.

I am in favour of this bill in general principle as indeed I believe are most members. I like the idea of the waiting period for citizenship being reduced from five years to three years. This move is long overdue and I welcome it.

The age of majority will be reduced from 21 years to 18 years. This is a logical step because the age of majority for Canadian citizens in all provinces I believe, and certainly federally, is 18 years.

Men and women are finally to be treated equally. It was a sad commentary on the old Citizenship Act that they were not. Now, for example, children born abroad will derive citizenship from either parent. At the present time a child acquires Canadian citizenship only if the father is Canadian.

Another example is that all applicants for Canadian citizenship will be required to meet the three year residence qualification without regard to marital connection with a citizen. Under the present act only one year of residence is required for the alien wife of a Canadian citizen. The act is certainly bringing into reality in law what has been the actual practice and I am happy about those changes.

British subjects will no longer be exempt from the requirement to be examined by a citizenship judge or to attend a citizenship ceremony. I happen to be only half Canadian as my father was born in England. In my constituency there are a lot of persons of Anglo-Saxon background who are touchy about the fact that some of their traditional so-called rights are being infringed upon. I say frankly, openly, and honestly that I do not know why we should continue giving any special exemption to immigrants from the United Kingdom when those same rights are not given to immigrants from other countries. I am prepared to meet criticism from people of Anglo-Saxon origin in my constituency, and I think this bill is fair to all ethnic groups entering the country.

The removal of the discrimination against women is certainly in line with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. This has been long in coming but I am happy that it has finally arrived in Bill C-20.

The reduction in the eligibility age makes sense since the voting age is now 18. Some people have argued that this provision should have been introduced under the Elections Act. That is a moot point which I will not belabour. In effect this changes things after the fact and this argument has been made previously.

The period of residence required prior to application for citizenship is another important change. It seems obvious that the present five year wait was an arbitrary decision, as indeed is the proposed three year wait. I do not know how we would arrive at the correct figure, whether it be one year, two, three, four, or five, but certainly the reduction is a step in the right direction.

The five year period was probably imposed because very often the wives of immigrants who stayed home to raise their families did not get out into the work force, or out of the home, and so found it difficult to pick up the language. I do not think this should be an obstacle. In cases that I am familiar with, the wives do try their best to communicate, particularly those from eastern Europe or the Mediterranean countries from where most of our immigrants now come. If their children are learning English or French and their husbands are speaking English or French, I do not think they should be held back.

I should like to deal briefly with the powers of the minister. The new act will take many of the burdens off the minister's back, such as the direct responsibility for granting citizenship. However, as my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), stated, under clause 18 of the bill the governor in council may still intervene in the granting of citizenship in cases where a person is thought to be a threat to Canada or "contrary to the public order in Canada". The declaration by the governor in council will be conclusive. I suppose under these circumstances we must have some final authority which can decide whether a person should be granted citizenship. It seems somewhat of an anomaly, however, that on the one hand the bill purportedly takes away final authority from the minister for granting citizenship but leaves the door open for the governor in council to deny it. This point should be given further consideration. Last spring I was involved in fighting to have a certain undesirable individual deported from this country but he is still residing in Montreal. I still think that there should be a right of appeal, which should extend even beyond the final analysis of the governor in council.

● (1740)

Clause 5(1)(b)(i) is vague and needs clarifying. It reads:

for every day during which he—

He being the person who is a prospective citizen here on a minister's permit.

—was resident in Canada before his lawful admission to Canada for permanent residence he shall be deemed to have accumulated one-half day of residence.

[Mr. Blackburn.]

In other words, someone here on a ministerial permit for one year can count six months towards his or her three years requirement for citizenship. The justification for this escapes me. When this bill was debated earlier the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), to justify clause 5(1)(b)(i), mentioned an example. He said that say a woman aged 62 comes to Canada as a tourist and then decides to stay. It could take years for her to obtain landed status, but those years would, by way of clause 5(1)(b)(i), not be wasted. I submit that such a justification discriminates against those who are not yet in Canada.

If somebody comes over to visit a relative, say, on a three-months visitor's visa, and has it extended to six months, nine months, 12 months—they go up to as much as 15 months, even two years—that visitor can apply time in Canada toward the three year residency requirement. People can short cut the waiting period that way. Why should not people waiting in their home country be entitled to time for waiting? I suggest that the present provision would encourage people to try to enter this country by the back door approach, as it were. I think the minister should explain this provision fully. As I say, it discriminates against those who are not yet in Canada. That is an important point.

People who are prepared to wait in Germany, Italy, the United Kingdom, or states in Africa and go through regular channels are being penalized. They must wait the full time. On the other hand, those who come in as visitors and remain on a visitor's visa for three months, six months or one year are entitled to have their days in this country included in the waiting period. The logic of that provision escapes me.

I will not take much more time. Generally speaking, I am in favour of the bill. Let me make one more point and then I will sit down. Clause 33 of the bill has been referred to, and it reads in part:

Real and personal property of every description may be taken, acquired, held and disposed of by a person who is not a Canadian citizen in the same manner in all respects as by a Canadian citizen . . .

Obviously this clause does nothing to alleviate the concerns of some provinces, especially Maritime provinces, with regard to foreign ownership of land. The problem is that if provinces act on their own to curtail non-citizen land ownership, will they not be in conflict with this federal law? The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) said in the House on May 21, 1975, that very interesting legal interpretations and court cases could arise whereby non-citizens challenge provincial laws, using federal statutes to back up their case. As other hon. members have said, it will be interesting to see how the minister deals with this question. I hope the minister will clarify the points I raised.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, I am deeply concerned that this bill, which includes provisions for the equal treatment of men and women in the matter of citizenship, has been delayed before the House for such a long time. We have heard members of the opposition give their endorsement to many major provisions of the bill, including those which provide for the equal treatment of men and women. Nevertheless while the bill remains before the House those very provisions which have been applauded cannot be put into practice. I had personally hoped that this bill would be passed during 1975, International Women's Year, the year in which Canada, with other United Nations member countries, undertook to encourage equal treatment, equal opportunity, and equal responsibilities for women and men in all aspects of our society. This bill is central to the provision of equality for women in Canada.

The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women was tabled in 1970. It included the following recommendation regarding the Canadian Citizenship Act:

> ... that sections 4 and 5 of the Canadian Citizenship Act be amended to provide that a child born outside Canada is a natural-born Canadian if either of his parents is a Canadian citizen.

Clause 3(1)(b) of Bill C-20 implements that recommendation. It says that a person is a citizen if:

> ... he was born outside Canada after the coming into force of this act and at the time of birth one of his parents, other than a parent who adopted him, was a citizen;

There has been some debate about whether this provision should be retroactive to cover those children who have been affected by the present Canadian Citizenship Act which does not include this provision. However, it is felt that there are real dangers in granting citizenship retroactively. I am happy to say that the advisory council on the status of women agrees with Bill C-20's treatment of this point. Two other of the royal commission's recommendations were:

> ... that either citizen-parent may apply for the naturalized citizenship of a minor child ... that, in the case of joint adoption, the child may be granted Canadian citizenship if either of the adopting parents is a Canadian citizen.

Bill C-20 also implements these recommendations. Clause 5(2) provides that:

> The minister shall grant citizenship to any person who, not being a citizen, has been lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence and is the minor child of a citizen if an application for citizenship is made to the minister by a person authorized by regulation to make the application on behalf of the child.

This will in many cases cover the problem mentioned earlier stemming from the fact that the bill is not retroactive. As long as the child is living in Canada a Canadian mother will be able to obtain citizenship for a child born before this bill becomes law.

Another recommendation of the royal commission reads:

> ... that the Canadian Citizenship Act be amended so that there is no difference between the requirements for the acquisition of Canadian citizenship by an alien husband and an alien wife of a Canadian citizen.

With the passage of this bill this discrimination will disappear entirely. There will be no claim to citizenship through marriage for either spouse. Spouses of either sex will have to fulfil the ordinary residence requirements.

Finally, the royal commission recommended:

> ... that the Canadian Citizenship Act be amended to provide for the automatic resumption of Canadian citizenship by women who lost it because they married aliens before January 1, 1947.

The bill before the House provides in clause 10(2) for the automatic resumption of citizenship for such women, on writen notice being given to the minister that they elect to be a citizen. The bill does not make this resumption retroactive since it was considered that, to do so, could have an adverse effect upon those women for whom the automatic conferring of Canadian citizenship without their knowledge could create difficulties.

The bill now before the House includes the provision that a woman who lost Canadian citizenship by marrying an alien before January 1, 1947, can now apply for and receive citizenship immediately as a matter of right, simply on giving notice to the minister. In this way women affected by the pre-1947 law can receive citizenship automatically but it will not be retroactively conferred on them without their knowledge. This bill then, Madam Speaker, deals with five substantial and central recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. In fact with the passage of this bill one of the major obstacles to equal treatment of women and men under federal law will be removed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sharp: Madam Speaker, I think there is general disposition to adjourn the House for the day. There are events going on elsewhere which prevent the presence in the House of certain ministers who might otherwise be disposed to take their legislation. I would like to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As I indicated to the government house leader when he said he might be making this request, there is a point I should like to raise. There is at least one item under Government Orders that does not require the presence of any minister who is not here. I refer to the item listed as government business No. 27, namely, the resumption of the adjourned debate on my motion calling for the approval of the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. That was adjourned on a vote by the government side on December 11. It is on the order paper. Why can today's sitting not go on and this item be called?

Adjournment

Mr. Sharp: Madam Speaker, I did consider this possibility, but do not feel that I should call it on this occasion. I would like to say to the hon. member that the government has paid a good deal of attention to the comments made by the hon. member who has made this suggestion, and, to other members of the House. It still has under consideration the question of legislation. If I may say so to my hon. friend, I do not think a resumption of the debate tonight would have any particular effect upon the government's decision. The matter is considered very urgent and is being considered by the government. I would not want the hon. member to think that the resumption of the debate would really speed the decision by the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, this matter has been under consideration by the government since last June 12, over seven months. If the consideration is being expedited at all, it is because of what has been said on the floor of the House. I suggest it would be a good idea for the House to stay in session tonight and for the government to hear the views of hon. members on this report which calls for pensions for Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war.

Mr. McKinley: On the point of order, Madam Speaker, we agreed to go along with the government's request to suspend the sitting this evening, partly because of events that will be taking place in February which involve this party. We will want a little time off. For that reason we agreed the government should have some time off this evening for a special event.

Mr. Fairweather: Madam Speaker, there is a great deal of mystery about this. I personally resent the fact that apparently only ministers are to pay tribute to the Hon. Walter Gordon, a gentleman patriot well named by Dennis Smith who wrote a most interesting book. It is the seventieth birthday of the Hon. Walter Gordon. Many of us would like to be in Toronto to pay tribute to him, but apparently it is reserved to ministers.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The motion is as follows: moved by Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Marchand (Langelier):

That this House do now adjourn.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

On motion of Mr. Sharp, the House adjourned at 5:57 p.m.

PROPOSED WARNING TO NATIONS TO CEASE FISHING WITHIN TWELVE MILE LIMIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recurrence of the foreign dragger epidemic on the west coast of Newfoundland, presently in a widespread fashion, prompts the need for immediate action by Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House orders that the government issue warnings to those nations frequenting our coast of Canada's intolerance toward the persistence of those nations in fishing within our 12 mile limit, destroying gear and depleting fish resources.

That this House calls on the government, at its cabinet meeting tomorrow morning, to consider the unanimous recommendation of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs regarding pensions for Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war, and to report to the House tomorrow afternoon when the proposed legislation will be introduced.

In view of the large scale protest from the Quebec dairy cooperatives against the federal government's decisions affecting the dairy industry and considering that they will probably reduce the milk producers' income for this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House take whatever measures are necessary to correct immediately a situation which may discourage milk producers and avoid that this industry be beset with the same serious problems it has known over the last few years.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion cannot be put without unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ALLEGED STUDIES OF RADIOACTIVITY IN PORT HOPE AREA IN 1951 AND 1953—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I must say to you at the outset that I resent the fact that the Minister of National Defence, who I know is in this building, is not in his seat because I gave him notice that I would be asking a question of him. My question could be addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources but he is not here. I will have to put it to the Acting Prime Minister. As I say, notice of this was given to the Minister of National Defence. Considering the degree of attention which, over the past 18 months, has been focused on the dangers arising from the disposal of radioactive wastes, can the Acting Prime Minister advise the House whether the Department of National Defence has any information regarding radiation levels in the Port Hope area specifically? I am referring particularly to reports that studies were conducted by armed forces personnel in 1951 and 1953 about this matter.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that the Minister of National Defence will be here and that you will permit him to take notice of this question and answer it if he does arrive. Otherwise, I will have to take notice and answer tomorrow.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—DATE OF ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL TRIBUNAL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising from the decision of the Anti-Inflation Board on the agreement between Irving Pulp and Paper and its employees. Since this company has continued to pay its employees a 23.8 per cent increase instead of the 14 per cent recommended by the Board upon the legal ground that the ruling by the Board has not been considered by the appeal body, I should like to ask the minister when the government intends to establish the appeal tribunal for which provision is made in the legislation.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): We intend to establish such a body within a short period of time. I would point out to the hon. member that the appeal is from an order of the Administrator rather than from a decision of the Anti-Inflation Board. I would expect that within a short period the Board will be announcing its conclusions with respect to the actions of Irving, particularly whether or not a reference will be made to the Administrator for further action.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REASON FOR DELAY IN REFERRING BOARD RULING IN IRVING CASE TO ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): My understanding is that the Board has in fact made a decision on this matter and has notified the company accordingly. I should like to ask the minister why this ruling by the Board has not yet been referred to the Administrator.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): That, of course, is a matter for decision by the Board which has been given these responsibilities under the law. The Board will have to exercise its judgment as to the manner in which it proceeds in referring the matter to the Administrator.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary on the whole question of the appeal procedure. Since an appeal to the appeal tribunal, when established, can be made only after the issue has been dealt with by the Administrator, and since the only reason the AIB or cabinet would refer a case to the Administrator in the first place is in the unlikely event of a company choosing to pay its employees more than the AIB recommends, as, for instance, in the Irving case, would the minister not agree that from the point of view of employees in Canada the appeal procedure set up by the government under the legislation is really a sham?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. gentleman is advancing a new argument, one which he did not raise in the course of the debate, but I would say it is not correct. The Board will, of course, have to reach a conclusion as to how it will proceed whenever it comes to its attention that one of its judgments is being violated. Once it does act by referring a matter to the Administrator the Administrator's order may be appealed in accordance with the law.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, there is an appeal procedure laid down. If the hon. gentleman would read the bill—if he had read it when it was before the House—he might be better informed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman referred to me and suggested I read the bill. I might ask him how one can appeal to an appeal tribunal which the government has not set up.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RADIATION LEVELS IN PORT HOPE AREA—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION IN VIEW OF STUDIES IN 1951 AND 1953

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence, as hon. members know. May I point out to him that on the basis of the 24-hour clock he is a quarter of an hour behind? Referring to reports that studies of radiation levels were conducted by armed forces personnel in 1951 and 1953, and considering the degree of attention that has been focussed over the past 18 months in the public sphere as well as in this House on the dangers arising from the disposal of radioactive wastes, can the minister advise the House whether his department has any information regarding radiation levels in the Port Hope area?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that back in 1951 and 1953 the armed forces carried out a survey of radiation levels in the Port Hope area, but these were done at that time to test military equipment, not at the request of Port Hope or Eldorado officials.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, that is not an answer to any question that I asked the minister. I will repeat my question, if I may, or rephrase it for the minister. I am saying that over the last 18 months there has been a lot of publicity about this danger. Obviously, information has been in the hands of the minister or his department, so why do we not have that information, and what is that information today?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, as far as the armed forces are concerned they have not been involved in the radiation question in Port Hope in recent years. The article which started this discussion, and which appeared in the newspaper this morning, referred to these exercises in 1951 and 1953, but they are not related to the current situation at all. As I have said, they were related to our training and testing of equipment. A report was made at the time which referred to military equipment, not to the danger or the hazard in that area.

Mr. Lawrence: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Again I have to be specific with the minister. Is this information classified, and if it is, why is it classified and why cannot we have it? What were the readings of the radiation levels?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to look at the report. I have not seen it but I will look at it, and the parts that are not classified can certainly be released to the public.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the minister is doing that, would he also launch an inquiry into this mad, packrat, lunatic obsession with secrecy and advise the House under what conditions documents are classified and who has the right to classify them, unless that particular information is in turn classified?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO UNIFORMITY OF PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF GASOLINE—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION IN TAX

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Finance.

Last night, during the national news on television, a substantial increase in the price of gasoline was said to be forthcoming within a few weeks. They even talked about $1 or $1.25 a gallon. Is the minister aware of this forthcoming increase and can he tell us whether it will affect Canada from coast to coast, with the assent of the federal government? Will the price be uniform across Canada after this increase? Also, will the anti-inflation controls allow that increase in the price of a gallon of gasoline?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I have understood the announcement clearly, the $1 a gallon price was only a prediction, a possible price during 1976, perhaps after the month of July. Naturally, discussions will be held previously with the provincial governments about the appropriate level of the oil price in Canada. At the moment, I do not think there will be an increase anywhere in Canada.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, considering that gas is far from being a food item, but that it is almost as important because the whole population needs it, is the minister fully aware of gas prices, when more than 40¢ in various taxes are included in the price of one gallon of gas, that 19¢ go to the federal government, 19¢ to the provincial government—in Quebec at least—and that in some provinces I think this amounts to 20¢; in order to protect the consumer, does the minister proposes to urge the government to reduce the federal tax and ask the provinces to do likewise so that consumers be protected against any increase in gas prices?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the debate of last June, he will remember that we proposed higher gas taxes to protect other petroleum products, particularly heating oil in Quebec. I do not now expect lower federal taxes on gasoline. I would be very surprised if the provincial levy were to be reduced.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

STATUS OF MITCHELL BRONFMAN—POSSIBILITY WRONG INFORMATION SENT TO UNITED STATES OFFICERS CONCERNING MR. BRONFMAN

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. It concerns the status of Mitchell Bronfman of Montreal and is asked with the consent of Mr. Bronfman and, I believe, his counsel. Is the Solicitor General prepared to suggest that Mr. Bronfman has violated any federal law, and has he taken any steps to ascertain whether the information on Mr. Bronfman is out of date or inaccurate since it was first compiled?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge Mr. Bronfman has done nothing illegal. I would have to consult with the RCMP in respect of the matter in which he was questioned as a witness to find if anything is new.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, has the Solicitor General been fully apprised by the RCMP about circumstances under which Mr. Bronfman was persuaded, at least apparently so to this point, not to institute legal proceedings against certain RCMP personnel for defamation of character or other related grievances resulting from information transmitted by RCMP officers to American intelligence officers?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not hear the beginning of the supplementary question because my listening device broke.

Mr. MacKay: May I repeat the question, Mr. Speaker. Has the Solicitor General been fully acquainted or apprised by the RCMP about circumstances under which Mr. Bronfman was persuaded, at least apparently so to this point, not to institute legal proceedings against certain RCMP personnel for defamation of character or other related grievances resulting from information transmitted by RCMP officers to American intelligence officers?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I do not recall being briefed about that point, although I was briefed by the RCMP on other matters relating to Mr. Bronfman.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BREACH OF CONTRACT ACTION BY CAE INDUSTRIES—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL FILE DEFENCE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the CAE Industries Limited and CAE Aircraft Limited of Montreal and Winnipeg have filed a statement of claim in the Federal Court of Canada, the trial division, against the federal government for breach of a contract in not providing 700,000 man hours of direct labour per annum to the CAE Aircraft plant in Winnipeg, as committed by the MOT in 1969, will the minister now inform the House whether the government has filed in the registry of the Federal Court of Canada in Ottawa a defence to this statement of claim?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not been advised on this lawsuit but I will, of course, inquire into it to determine whether we have filed a defence.

BREACH OF CONTRACT ACTION BY CAE INDUSTRIES—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL SETTLE OR COMPLY WITH CONTRACT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Will he inform the House whether his department or the Department of Supply and Services is making any effort to find the 700,000 man hours of work for the CAE in Winnipeg, or will this matter just be settled in the courts?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would want to check into the present status of that issue before responding to the hon. member.

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO DREDGING CONTRACTS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Transport advise the House what his departmental plans are for maintenance dredging contracts for the coming year, and when can we expect a report to the House on how he plans to process new dredging bids?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of how to solve some of our problems in respect of dredging is under serious consideration at the present time. I would expect to be able to make some proposals to my colleagues before very long, and then be able to announce a decision. At a time when we are still considering various alternatives, and have to decide between them, I would hesitate to predict when an announcement may be made.

Mr. Paproski: Does the minister have any bids on his table now to process?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we are not at the present time actively calling bids until we have solved some of the questions we have asked about the bidding procedures.

ENERGY

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—DATE OF COMPLETION OF AGREEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It might have been more appropriately directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs but he was last seen on a camel disappearing into the desert somewhere.

An hon. Member: He is on the road to Damascus.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the minister whether the Government of Canada and the Government of Korea have completed negotiation of an agreement to sell a nuclear power generator to that country.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that a safeguards agreement has been concluded between the two governments. I expect the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make a statement when he returns to the House and table the document in the House.

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—POSSIBILITY OF REOPENING AGREEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary on the same subject, Mr. Speaker. Have the minister or a representative of the Government of Canada been able to persuade the Government of Argentina to reopen the contract between Canada and Argentina not with regard to safeguards but with regard to the price? Has there been a firm agreement to reopen it or is the Government of Canada still trying to persuade Argentina to reopen it?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can report progress on this important matter. The Chairman of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the President and other members of Canadian government agencies are in Argentina at the present time sitting down with their opposite numbers at CNEA for the purpose of renegotiating the commercial terms of that agreement.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, can the minister say that the Government of Argentina has agreed to reopen it or is it just that they have agreed to meet Canadian representatives over a cup of tea or something of that sort?

Mr. Gillespie: No, Mr. Speaker. They have given a clear indication that they are prepared to sit down and renegotiate the terms of that agreement.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

JURISDICTION TO DEAL WITH PROVINCIAL CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It is a follow-up to a question I asked the President of the Privy Council a couple of days ago about which he wanted some legal interpretation. It deals with the Anti-Inflation Board's jurisdiction over provincial Crown corporations. Would the minister be in a position today to advise the House whether the Anti-Inflation Board would have jurisdiction over provincial Crown corporations, particularly corporations such as ICBC, which corporation has increased its rate by 150 per cent?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at this point, before the government has entered into an agreement with the government of British Columbia, I am advised there would be no jurisdiction under the law against a provincial Crown corporation. As the hon. member will have noticed from the Ontario agreement, that government, and indeed other provincial governments, have taken the position that certain of these Crown corporations should be exempt from the provisions and should be subject to the direct responsibility of the provincial government itself. In effect, the ICBC in respect of its rate increase will have to be governed by the manner in which British Columbia accedes to the anti-inflation law.

Mr. Oberle: It seems to me that it does not specifically deal with provincial Crown corporations. Can the minister spell out whether his department has received an invitation from the province of British Columbia to deal with the matter of ICBC in isolation until such time as another agreement is discussed?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): To repeat the comment to the hon. gentleman, a provincial Crown agency is not covered under the provisions of the law which apply to private corporations, therefore there has been no request from British Columbia that we deal with it separately, apart from the whole issue.

RATE INCREASES BY NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION BY BOARD

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Notwithstanding the apparent absence of agreement between the federal government and the government of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories in this respect, and in view of Northern Canada Power Commission's increase in rates in the Northwest Territories recently last December of 22 per cent in the Yukon and over 40 per cent by April, will the minister see to it that the proposed increases of Northern Canada Power Commission are placed before the Anti-Inflation Review Board?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I am confident that the board will have already focused on this, but as a result of the question I will make doubly sure that they pay attention to it.

BOARD'S INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO INDIVIDUAL COMPLAINTS OF PRICE INCREASES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Over the last couple of months I have relayed over 100 complaints about price increases from my constituents to the Anti-Inflation Board. I now have further complaints in my possession concerning increased prices in food, transportation, bank services and diapers. In view of the fact that over the last three weeks further increases have been taking place, such as the increase by Shoppers' Drug Mart in my riding in the cost of Baby Scott regular diapers—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, will he put it.

Mr. Rodriguez: My question to the minister is: Does the Anti-Inflation Board intend to take any steps to deal with individual complaints, specifically those to which I have been referring, and, if so, when can we expect to see some evidence of this?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): As I have indicated, the board, of course, will have to determine the best way to carry out its mandate. Information of the kind the hon. gentleman has brought to the board's attention cannot help but be helpful to it in carrying out its mandate, and I hope he will continue referring these matters. Obviously, some of the increases at least will be by firms which are not subject to legal sanctions, but there may indeed be other patterns on which the board will be arriving at early conclusions.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact that the anti-inflation program has been absolutely useless in controlling price increases and indeed that the board chairman, Mr. Pepin, has said that consumers may not see any moderation in price increases for a full year, is the government now prepared to amend its anti-inflation program to include selective price increases?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Sir.

POSSIBILITY OF OVER-ALL POLICY STATEMENT OR ANNOUNCEMENT CONCERNING SEAWAY TOLLS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Now that the minister has had a chance over several months to review the situation in the Department of Transport, will he be making an over-all statement on government policy concerning all phases of transport or will he be making piecemeal statements from time to time concerning the various aspects of transport? I am particularly concerned about whether he will be making any announcement in the future concerning the Seaway tolls?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I anticipate making specific statements in relation to particular areas rather than waiting until all decisions have been reached and a broader statement can be made. Of course, broader statements will be appropriate at the time, for instance, of the introduction of major changes in the National Transportation Act, but I can assure the hon. member that I would not want to see us waste time which could be used on improving the system until such time as a broader statement can be put before the House and debated here.

Mr. Korchinski: The minister did not make any reference to the question I raised with regard to Seaway tolls. If he intends to make any statement with regard to that matter, will he hear representations prior to making any announcement in that regard?

Mr. Lang: I have been hearing representations on that subject for quite a long time and will continue to receive them. A decision may well be taken on that subject after further deliberation by the government, but of course an announcement in that regard will be made after the decision is taken.

INQUIRY AS TO CONSULTATION PRIOR TO REDUCTION IN RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE—POSSIBILITY OF OPPORTUNITY FOR DEBATE

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the statement he will make tomorrow concerning the cut-back in rail service in Canada, did the minister consult the city administration in Edmonton, the CNR management or the labour unions in that city to determine, before the policy is announced, the serious adverse effect such a cut-back in rail service would have on Edmonton, which is a major CNR western terminal?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought the hon. member might have checked my response to questions yesterday from which it is clear that I do not accept the word "cut-back" as an adequate description of anything I propose to talk about tomorrow because it is a very important question of improving as well as rationalizing rail service. We have had extensive consultations throughout the country, as will become apparent tomorrow. This is the first step in the process and a great deal of consultation will take place before decisions in regard to different areas are made.

Mr. Roche: I want to ask the minister if he is planning any legislation with regard to changes in rail service in Canada which would give members of parliament an opportunity to debate how a proposed or anticipated cut in rail service could be reconciled with Liberal compaign promises in 1974 to increase rail transportation service as a basic Canadian response to the energy crisis.

Mr. Lang: Again the hon. member is anticipating. He would be much better off making his comment after he sees the direction in which we propose to go. He will see indeed that we have a firm commitment to the rail service and to a better rail service in the country, not to the continuation of a lot of bad service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

USE OF CONFIDENTIAL DOCUMENTS IN COURT CASES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. I put the same question to him before the recess and it is in reference to the Pilkington glass case in which the Lord Chief Justice condemned as disgraceful the practice of using information from income tax forms and other confidential information which individuals and corporations are forced to file. What course has the Minister of Justice taken since I raised this question and what report has he to make to the House now?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): As I indicated to the hon. member before the Christmas recess, I have instructed my officials that in any audit matters auditors from the Department of National Revenue were not to be used in order to avoid any possible confusion on the part of the taxpayers or persons being audited. That instruction has been carried out. In addition, some action is being taken against the Crown as a result of that action and because of the very peculiar nature of the lawsuit, I have, on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada, retained the services of J. J. Robinette, Q.C. in Toronto.

Mr. Woolliams: I take it that the Minister of Justice has given some instructions regarding a course of action against those who use such information either directly or indirectly in contravention of the law of Canada. Is it his instruction that necessary legal steps be taken to bring these people to task?

Mr. Basford: Of course, it has always been the law that income tax information was not to be used by anyone for any purposes other than the administration of the Income Tax Act. That has been the instruction and it continues to be so. What I was indicating was that we have instructed that any inquiry or investigation by auditors from the Department of National Revenue not be used for other purposes than auditing under the Income Tax Act to avoid any possible confusion by people that the information was being obtained under the provisions of the Income Tax Act or some other statute.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister has now admitted that this is a wrong practice on the part of whoever is using this information, whether they be government auditors, government officials or whether the information is obtained through leaks from the Department of National Revenue to other people and other departments. What recourse is there in law against people breaking the law in Canada when they hide behind the Attorney General of Canada?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has read far too much into my answer. There is no indication—and I want to make this very clear—of any wrongdoing by public servants in this matter at all. I have taken some steps to ensure in the future that there is no confusion among taxpayers or those being audited as to the legislation under which they are being audited.

FISHERIES BUILDING, CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR EARLY COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. In light of the very seriously high unemployment rate on Cape Breton Island, would the minister use his good office in conjunction with the other departments concerned to expedite the commencement of the new federal fisheries building now planned and the major renovations to the present federal building, both of which have been on the drawing boards for a long time? In this way we might at least get some short term employment.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to consider again our priority list.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REASON DR. MORGENTALER GRANTED NEW TRIAL

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

Can the minister give the House the reasons that led him to request a new trial for Dr. Morgentaler? Does the minister not fear that by so doing he is creating a precedent in Canada in that he is allowing his department to act as a substitute for our courts of law?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the reasons upon which I acted are set out in the statement I made last Thursday, and I will be happy to supply the hon. member with a copy if he wishes or table one in the House. Briefly paraphrasing, they are a result of the decision of the court of appeal of the province of Quebec last Tuesday, which indicated that the law of necessity is a recognized defence in law, and that there was in the second trial sufficient evidence to go to a jury. On the submission of counsel for Dr. Morgentaler, I felt there was similar evidence available for the first trial and that a new trial should be ordered. Second, I felt that parliament was soon to pass—as it did yesterday—Bill C-71, which limits the right of a court of appeal on application by the Crown to either order a new trial or deny the appeal, and that the one man who had caused parliament to act in this way should receive the benefit of that provision. Those essentially were my two reasons, and they were set out in my statement of last Thursday.

In so far as the second part of the question of the hon. member is concerned, I think he is not quite correctly interpreting the law. Section 617 of the Criminal Code makes it very clear that the federal Minister of Justice has the authority and the right in special cases, upon inquiry, to order a new trial in any case which fits within the section. This is not a precedent. That is a section which has been used on a considerable number of occasions throughout the history of the criminal law.

PERFORMING ARTS

REASON FOR CANCELLATION OF FESTIVAL CANADA

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Would the minister please advise what possessed him to advise his colleagues that Festival Canada, a very important national function, be cancelled? Specifically, could the minister not find $200,000 in some other aspect of his budget which would have allowed this program to continue? Would the minister undertake to prevail upon his colleagues to reconsider this decision?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Government spending, Walter.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot take that sort of representation seriously. The hon. member was one of the most outspoken of those on the other side who were insisting the government cut back expenditures. We start cutting expenditures, and now he wants them reinstated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Would the minister advise the House what criterion is being used by the government with respect to programs of this nature? Is it a consistent rationale, aside from something cosmetic? I ask that question because of the cut with respect to Festival Canada and the cut in the program under the National Capital Commission with respect to lighting on the canal in this city. I think the priorities of this government are just dreadful.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, I am sure the hon. member realizes that sort of question ought to be put to the minister when his estimates are before the standing committee.

SOCIAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When the minister introduced the spouses legislation, the House will recall that he had some concern about employables and unemployables, and that it was his intention to introduce legislation this year. I think it is called guaranteed annual income. In the meantime, though, we have government cutbacks in the fight against inflation. I should like to ask the minister, what is his plan now in this regard? Does he intend to proceed with this legislation or, because of government cutbacks in the fight against inflation, will this matter be held in abeyance?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall having told the House that legislation on the matter would be introduced this year. However, I did say, and I repeat it here, that negotiations with the provinces are continuing; I trust an agreement will be reached with them in coming months after which, if agreement is reached, appropriate legislation would be introduced; but, I doubt that it could be this year.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: Am I to understand from the answer to that question that notwithstanding the government's program of cutting back, in this particular instance the minister will be proceeding with this legislation this year?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker. I said, and very clearly, that my purpose is to reach an agreement with the provinces sometime this year, but that there was no question of introducing such legislation during the current session or this year. I do hope, however, that next year, in the next financial year, it will be possible to introduce appropriate legislation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENTS REGARDING AID TO OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the House leader that there are many countries in the world with whose policies we do not agree, we do not think it is in the interests of world peace, world development and the improvement of the lot of poor people throughout the world, when we have these differences, to cease commercial relations or aid. I should like to compare that statement with the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs of July 23, 1975, when he said:

> Mr. Speaker, with reference to the nuclear explosion, following the explosion our government suspended all its aid programs with India with the exception of food and agriculture. That situation continues at the present time. The nuclear co-operation has been suspended and aid, with the exception of food and agriculture, is also under suspension.

INCREASE IN AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE PREMIUMS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—POSSIBILITY OF INVESTIGATION BY BOARD

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, but he has disappeared. I will direct it to the government House leader in his absence.

In view of the statement this week by Mr. Byron Straight of the ICBC of British Columbia that the rates being charged there are higher than necessary—and this man is the consulting actuary to that firm—and in view of the public intervention of the AIB in the teacher negotiations in Ontario before an agreement was entered into, would the minister advise the House if the AIB, although not being requested by the province of British Columbia, is in fact now investigating ICBC rates, which have risen by 300 per cent while people's wages have been controlled and frozen? Would the minister advise if any investigation is now taking place with regard to those rates?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the AIB is investigating at the present time. As to the position with relation to the ICBC, I thought the minister set forth the position very clearly.

● (1450)

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question concerns the inflationary psychology which clearly results from the rate increase in British Columbia. Will the minister advise the House if it is clear that the AIB has investigated not only the higher rates but the effect which the increase in auto rates will have on inflationary psychology in British Columbia?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the AIB is following our discussions here closely and will note the comments of the hon. member.

RESTORATION OF RAIL SERVICE TO GLENWOOD AND HILL SPRING—REASON FOR DELAY

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On November 7, 18 and 21, I asked the minister questions regarding the restoration of rail service to Glenwood and Hill Spring, and the minister replied in part on one occasion that the CTC had a part to play in the matter, a bridge was under repair, and that the CTC, CPR and the Minister of Transport were all looking for one another. Will the minister inform the House whether or not he plans to do anything about this serious situation?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister share with this House and the people of Canada the thrust of the secret discussion he had in Toronto with a select group of business leaders from that city, which meeting we understand was arranged by the Canadian Manufacturers Association after the Prime Minister's remarks on December 28 last?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that on many occasions I, as I am sure he does, meet with my constituents and with different groups of people who are representative of many interests in the community. It was not a secret meeting, but it was a private meeting.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, no matter whether the meeting was secret or private, would the minister explain why those who attended the meeting were instructed not to talk to the media about the discussions? Also, did the minister convey to them explanations not covered by the Prime Minister in his "Parable of the Candles" address to the Canadian Club?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EFFECT ON INFLATION OF ACQUISITION BY BANK OF CANADA OF SUBSTANTIAL PART OF NEW BOND ISSUE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Finance. As he is absent may I defer it until tomorrow, unless the Acting Prime Minister wishes to answer.

I note that the minister has returned. May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker? Was there consultation between officials of the Bank of Canada and the minister prior to the bank's agreeing to acquire a minimum of 275 million of the new issue of government of Canada bonds for $550 million on February 1, 1976; and, if so, would he not agree that the government and the bank are expanding the money supply in order to meet the borrowing requirements of the government, which can only further fuel the fires of inflation in this country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is a measure of consultation of course between the bank officials and those of my department with regard to the issues of securities from time to time in respect of which the bank is the government of Canada's agent. Of course, very often the bank itself buys some part of the issue on its own account. The judgment of the governor at this stage, in this particular situation, is that the participation in that issue will not defeat the general objective he has of reducing the rate of the growth of the money supply.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION CONCERNING PENSIONS FOR PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the disappointment, discouragement and dismay of this country's veterans, particularly prisoners of war, at this government's lack of action in introducing legislation based on the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, a feeling which the minister shares, can the minister say what action he will take tomorrow in cabinet, what stand he will take if he is turned down again, and if there is any hope in the near future of seeing this legislation introduced? When he answers, I ask the minister to refrain from using the phrase "The matter is under consideration and there will be an announcement in due course."

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to comply with the last part of the hon. member's request. I remind my colleague opposite that the government has been considerate and generous in heeding the many requests of veterans and the advice of CPC. There are increases of 24 per cent coming under CPC, and 17 per cent under WVA, plus other benefits. Many other items have been passed in the past year, too numerous to mention at this time. Probably, in a couple of weeks I will be able to bring a message for hon.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN PASSENGER SERVICE BETWEEN WINNIPEG AND CHURCHILL

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As rail passenger travel between Winnipeg and Churchill can now be classed as a national disaster, will the minister not guarantee that passenger service on this line will be upgraded so that people who have no alternate means of transport can travel in a comfortable and secure manner?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this important question will be under consideration in the matter to be indicated by me tomorrow.

HEALTH

ALLEGED DANGER IN USE OF ARTIFICIAL FOOD COLOURING RED 2—ACTION TO PROTECT CONSUMERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the concern which has developed about the artificial food colouring known as Red 2, which appears to be a health hazard and is being banned in the United States, can the minister state what steps his department is taking regarding Red 2 in order to protect the health of Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my department has considered very seriously the U.S. government's decision on the so-called Red Dye No. 2. We are consulting the members of the European Economic Community on this matter as well as the U.S. scientific authorities. I am advised by my department that it is not deemed appropriate for the moment to take any steps in this respect, and we are not in agreement with the decision taken by the U.S. authorities in this respect.

EVIDENCE CODE

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATIONS OF LAW REFORM COMMISSION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-423, to codify the law of evidence.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to implement the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission in its final report on evidence. The bill is an integral reproduction of the commission's draft, and I acknowledge freely that I have used their draft in every respect but one. In that case I felt that the commission had gone too far, and I would have excluded evidence of the victim's character in sexual cases for purposes of disposition. I wanted to bring this bill before the House before the retirement of Mr. Justice Hartt, because I believe this House owes it to Mr. Justice Hartt to adopt at least one of the 14 reports made by the commission in the form of legislation before he retires.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH LANGUAGE RADIO AND TELEVISION SERVICES

Question No. 3,806—Mr. Bawden:

1. Does the government have any plans for the expansion of French language radio and television services in the Province of Alberta between now and 1980 and, if so, how much will such expansion cost?

2. What areas of the Province will be covered by the expanded facilities and in which centers will transmission facilities be located?

3. How many French language persons are to be served by the expanded facilities?

[Mr. Lang.]

4. What expansion of English services are to be supplied by radio and television in the Province of Quebec during the same period?

5. How much will such expansion cost?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The CBC has plans for the extension of French-language radio and television services in Alberta under the Accelerated Coverage Plan. Estimated costs for each project are made public as soon as a hearing is scheduled by the CRTC.

2. All areas with 500 or more people now unserved in the appropriate official language are included in the ACP. The ACP is a large, complex and highly integrated five-year undertaking involving more than 300 locations and 600 engineering projects. Names of the locations and the nature of the service to be provided are made public step by step, as applications for licences are made to the CRTC.

3. Approximately 9,500 French-speaking people in Alberta will receive CBC French radio service and 7,300 will receive CBC French television service.

4. See reply to part 2.

5. See second sentence of reply to part 1.

*DREE—REASON FOR REDUCED BUDGET

Question No. 3,527—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

Does the decline, since 1972, in the budget for DREE as a percentage of total government expenditures represent a reduced commitment to, or a lower Cabinet priority for, the goal of reducing regional disparities in Canada and, if not, what is the reason for the decline?

[English]

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is "no". The percentage of the total federal budget devoted to DREE is naturally influenced by spending increases in other areas. The most important example of such an increase is, of course, the recent program to cushion consumers from the effects of high international oil prices. However, there have also been substantial rises in spending in other areas such as equalization payments to the provinces and various health and welfare measures. I am sure the hon. member will agree that these are important expenditures.

Mr. Blais: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

MEDICAL CARE ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-68, an act to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish today to move second reading of Bill C-68. In doing so I would like to ask the House to consider first of all the recent development and accomplishments of the Canadian health care delivery system.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I think it fair to say that Canadians enjoy one of the best health care systems in the world. Federal-provincial programs have been in effect since 1958 for hospital care and since 1968 for Medical Care. These programs are based on the principles that they should be available to all residents; that they should be comprehensive; that they be publicly administered; and that the benefits be portable from one province to the other in the case of interprovincial migration and during periods of temporary absence anywhere in the world.

As a result of these programs, virtually the whole population of Canada is at present insured against the costs of necessary hospital and medical care. The federal contributions for these plans come from general revenue. Sources of provincial contributions vary from province to province. The coverage offered is total, in that there is no upper limit to the insured services which may be received as long as they are medically required.

Generally, no payment is required from the patient at the time of service. In addition to these basic medical and hospital care programs that are cost-shared by the federal and provincial governments, the provinces have added other services on an individual priority basis such as home care, dental care for children, ambulance service, prescriptions for older people and so on. The nature of these complementary services varies from one province to another.

The national programs ensure that comprehensive services are available to everyone, but they would be totally ineffective without the natural ability, dedication and excellent training of the men and women who provide these services. I am speaking of the general practitioner, the paediatrician, the obstetrician, other types of specialists, the nurses, and the many other health professionals working in the health field.

What have we accomplished as a result of these health programs? It is difficult sometimes to measure the impact of a major public program because methods for measuring the success or failure are generally not precise. Various mortality rates may be cited although improvements in these rates do not depend solely upon the adequacy of health care. There have been some dramatic improvements in certain indicators. Our maternal mortality rate dropped from 27 per 100,000 live births in 1968 to 11 in 1973, which is now one of the very lowest in the world. During the same period, our infant mortality rate dropped from 20.8 per 1,000 live births to 15.5, by-passing the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and France in ranking.

In 1973 infant mortality in Canada was 14 per cent lower than in the United States while in 1968, it was only slightly lower. We believe that these marked changes, of which we are very proud, are not unrelated to the considerable improvement in both physical and financial access to necessary care which resulted when our medical care program was added to the pre-existing hospital insurance program.

When one hears about people in some other countries where there is no universal health insurance, being faced with the prospect of losing their homes and their life savings through even one episode of serious illness, we can certainly appreciate how lucky Canadians are in comparison with others. The Canadian health insurance programs are a very important part of our social security system. Being universal, they cover virtually all eligible residents of Canada—regardless of age, income, previous health, employment status or place of residence within Canada. Coverage is not subject to interruption during periods of lay-off, unemployment, or retirement, a feature of particular importance to the self-employed and seasonally employed residents of rural areas.

The hospital insurance program certainly solved the acute financial problems that were being experienced by many of our hospitals in the late fifties, and this contributed to a marked improvement in the quality of hospital care, thanks to more stable and rational financing. Despite predictions that the advent of medicare would provoke a mass exodus of physicians to other countries; that immigration of foreign physicians would diminish; and that medicine would cease to be attractive as a career—the number of doctors has in fact dramatically increased since 1968, the year in which the program was implemented. Indeed, this growth rate has been much higher than the growth rate of the population as a whole. This resulted from the attraction of more stable and higher incomes for physicians made possible by medicare; a rapid increase in training facilities; and, until recently, a continuing high rate of immigration.

In 1968 the doctor-population ratio was 1:769. By 1974 this ratio had become 1 doctor to 586 inhabitants. This surpassed the ratio of 1:650 that the 1964 Royal Commission on Health Services had set as a goal for 1991. In fact, at the moment, there is concern among some people—including doctors themselves—that we might be heading towards a surplus of doctors. In fact, we may have reached or surpassed that point already in some specialties. Governments themselves have become concerned about the rate of growth in the number of doctors and measures have been taken to restrict immigration. There are still several problems concerning the distribution of physicians and specialists across Canada. Still, medicare did contribute to improve the distribution of physicians by making it possible to practice in locations where there were enough people but where residents were too poor to support a physician.

[English]

Despite the high quality of health services available to most Canadians through our two major national health insurance programs, we have not yet resolved the problem of the rising costs of health services and of these programs in particular, which consume such a large part of the health care dollar.

While total health expenditures in Canada declined as a percentage of our GNP from 7.3 per cent in 1971 to 6.9 per cent in 1973, during the last fiscal year hospital costs rose by 25 per cent over the level of the preceding year. It is expected that a further increase of almost 20 per cent will occur during the current fiscal year, and medicare costs are expected to rise by about 16 per cent over the last fiscal year. Quite obviously we must take such steps as are necessary to prevent these programs becoming more expensive than we can afford, to ensure that Canadians can continue to benefit from them.

This pre-occupation with the escalation of health care costs is not new and goes back at least to late in 1970 when the national medicare program had not yet been implemented in all parts of the country. At that time both levels of government were concerned about the escalation of the costs of health insurance, that is, the escalation of the combined cost of hospital insurance and medicare. The federal government therefore proposed to the provinces that it explore with them alternative cost-sharing arrangements. These arrangements would be aimed at the development of lower cost alternatives to the high cost services insured under the national health insurance programs.

The essence of this proposal was to make more flexible the ground rules for federal cost-sharing in provincial health insurance plans and to cap the open-endedness of the program. Under this proposal the national standards of insured services would be retained, while making it possible for the provinces to spend federal funds on alternative lower cost services.

After nearly two and one-half years of discussion and negotiation, a federal offer on health financing was placed before the provincial governments at the federal-provincial conference of finance and health ministers in May, 1973. However, in September, 1974, the provinces formally rejected the proposal. They indicated that they would prefer arrangements that would increase federal financial participation in alternative lower cost services in return for a provincial commitment to restrain the growth of high-cost services presently supported by both levels of government. Accordingly, at the federal-provincial conference of health ministers held on January 14-15, 1975, I indicated my willingness to explore the possibility suggested by the provinces for a broader interpretation of existing federal health insurance legislation to permit additional cost-sharing. The ministers directed their officials to investigate the proposal at the official level and submit their recommendations by the fall of 1975. Subsequently, in his budget speech of June 23, 1975, the former minister of finance made it clear that the commitment of the federal government to share the costs of encouraging the development of less expensive health care services still stands.

When the former minister of finance brought down the budget on June 23, 1975, he emphasized the serious economic conditions facing our country, and announced a number of measures which the government believed were necessary to strengthen the Canadian economy. Two of these measures affect our national health insurance programs. One involved the giving of notice under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act of the federal government's intention to terminate the existing agreements with effect from July 15, 1980.

While the current negotiations approved by the conference of ministers of health in January, 1975, were intented to foster improvements in the short run, there was nonetheless a general understanding amongst the ministers that the proposed broad interpretation of the federal legislation would not enable us to accommodate all of the lower cost alternatives that might be suggested by the provinces, and that another examination of the need to change the federal legislation would likely be required. In the light of this, the notice to terminate the existing agreements under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was a logical step.

The other budgetary measure was the establishment of ceilings on the rate of growth of the federal per capital medicare contributions to the provinces. The necessary amendments to the Medical Care Act were then submitted in Bill C-68, which received first reading on July 8, 1975.

The ceilings would have permitted the per capital contributions to the provinces to grow by 13 per cent in 1976-77; 10.5 per cent in 1977-78; and 8.5 per cent in each year thereafter. The proposed ceilings would still have permitted increase in the federal contributions to the provinces of approximately 14.5 per cent in 1967-77; 12 per cent in 1977-78; and 10 per cent in each subsequent year, when allowance is made for the estimated population growth rate of 1.5 per cent per year. The purpose of these ceilings was to provide for more effective cost control. The federal government's view was that the ceilings were realistic. Not only were they in excess of the average increase in recent years, but also the rate of growth of the doctor supply, which had been the major factor causing the rise in medical care costs, was expected to decline.

The provincial governments and the Canadian and provincial medical associations nonetheless objected, some of them strongly, to the ceilings. The provincial views were highlighted at the special meeting of provincial health ministers in Victoria last summer. As a result of these reactions, I personally met with representatives from the Canadian Medical Association, and subsequently made a cross-Canada tour to meet with all the provincial health ministers. In these meetings we discussed the implications of the proposed ceilings and the need for them in the current economic context. We also reviewed the progress which had been made since January, 1975, in the negotiations on new lower cost alternatives. There was general agreement on the need to rationalize the present system. This rationalization would include the extension of insurance coverage to new lower cost services and also tighter control over the number of beds, physicians, immigration of physicians, and hence global expenditures. During these meetings the federal and provincial governments came to understand and appreciate the other's position.

It is in light of these useful consultations that I intend to propose in committee three modifications to Bill C-68. The first is to remove from the bill any reference to a specific ceilling for the years after 1977-78. Thus the bill would establish ceilings for only two years, 1976-77 and 1977-78, rather than indefinitely into the future. The bill would give the federal government authority to set ceilings for subsequent years, in accordance with an appropriate formula to be developed in the meantime, after consulting with the provincial governments. We believe this change will meet a concern, frequently expressed by the provinces and the medical profession, that it was difficult to predict accurately what might be an appropriate ceiling that far in the future.

The second change is a mechanism to ensure that any increases in the federal medicare contributions for new lower cost insured services to rationalize and improve the system would go only to those provinces providing the new services under the medical care program.

Specifically, the modification to Bill C-68 provides for a separate national per capita for each class of new insured service, if and when such classes are added. The need for this change lies in the fact that, under existing legislation, the medicare contribution to each province is dependent in part on the level of a single national per capita cost figure for all medicare services. Thus, as some provinces established new services and included the costs in the total medicare bill, the single national per capital cost would rise. The other provinces would therefore receive increases in their per capita medicare contributions. This would occur even if these other provinces had not established the new services themselves, or had established them under the Canada Assistance Plan and were thus already collecting federal payments under that plan. Separate national per capitas for each new class of insured service would solve this problem, for they would be used to calculate the federal medicare contribution only for those provinces providing the new services under the Medical Care Act. Thus the provinces providing the new insured services would receive the full federal contribution payable in respect of the services.

The third change is to provide a 36 month exemption from ceilings for new insured services from the date on which they are prescribed as an insured service under the Medical Care Act. The original bill provided for an exemption for only the first year, when costs of such services may not be very high. New low cost programs generally require at least two or three years of growth to build up sufficiently to meet all the needs which would otherwise have to be met by acute treatment facilities. It is only after this stage that their cost growth should be brought in line with the much slower rate appropriate to the more mature, existing services.

It might be suggested that Bill C-68 with the proposed amendments is no longer necessary on the basis that the anti-inflation program is now in operation. I continue to believe, however, that there are definite advantages in introducing ceilings on the allowable rate of increase of costs under the medical care program. The ceilings will provide an incentive to exercise appropriate cost control over medicare costs, for example, by encouraging prudent use by both providers and recipients of services, and by introducing lower cost alternatives to high cost services, wherever feasible.

Certainly in my meetings across Canada I received a clear indication that the provincial governments were committed to rationalizing the health system and controlling costs. They are willing to introduce low cost alternatives on a cost sharing basis and in return commit themselves to reduce the rate of escalation of high cost services. The retention of the ceiling concept will provide the provinces with an additional incentive to meet their suggested targets, for example, in the area of physician supply. It will also provide the federal government with the necessary safety valve vis-à-vis program costs if the provinces fail to meet their commitments. There is no doubt that if new insured services are to be included in the national program, both levels of government will want them to be as effective and efficient as possible.

The principles of Bill C-68, and of the amendments, that it will propose in committee are therefore consistent with the objectives of the anti-inflation program. However, it is believed that the more flexible approach taken towards the ceiling levels in the years after 1977-78 will be more acceptable to all concerned, because these ceilings can be established later in the light of more current information about the rate of inflation and other factors.

[Translation]

There are several ways of controlling health costs, which are currently being explored. One is to make the health care system more efficient, and this we intend to do in co-operation with the provinces. Another measure, the necessity for which emerged clearly in the working document "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians", is to strengthen preventive efforts and to encourage people to assume more responsibility for maintaining and improving their own health.

Greater emphasis will be placed on reducing health hazards in the environment and on increasing health awareness among the Canadian population. Individuals, particularly those in high risk groups, will be encouraged to exercise, to smoke and drink less, to eat more wisely, and to pay more attention to accident prevention. The pay-off in improved health and well-being and the savings in health care costs could be tremendous. We have initiated a broad health awareness campaign to urge people to take more responsibility for their personal lifestyles and for their environment. Furthermore, air and water pollution, and environmental contaminants, can affect us all and the government intends to intensify efforts for their control.

Some provincial spokesmen—and indeed some hon. members opposite—have expressed alarm over the federal government's decision that costs in the health field must be contained. To help put their fears to rest, I would like to demonstrate one way whereby we could save hundreds of millions of dollars if the provincial governments, under whose responsibility this matter lies, could decide to act in a determined fashion. I am referring to the case of traffic accidents which, after heart disease, is the second most important cause of early death. In 1971, such accidents cost us 250,000 years of potential life. Human factors are blamed for 80 per cent of traffic deaths, including driving while impaired, speeding, carelessness and failure to use seat belts. This is not to mention the number of injuries on the road which totalled 223,777 in 1973 and the tremendous costs of related medical and hospital care.

The costs of traffic accidents in Canada reach well over $2 billion a year including costs of hospital care and treatment for accident victims who require over 2 million days of hospitalization. Hospitalization is estimated to cost the country at least $200 million a year and medical care costs amount to approximately another $100 million. The price tag is increased by legal expenses, public liability, property damage, loss of time from work and the costs of permanent disability.

Australia has implemented seat belt legislation over the past three years and, in the first full year of enforcement had a reduction of 25 per cent in fatal motor vehicle accidents. Similarly, France reported recently that its new compulsory seat belt legislation saved 1,200 lives in 1974.

The Nova Scotia Legislature in December 1974 approved such new safety measures which set an excellent precedent in Canada, although this legislation has yet to be proclaimed. It would be a great step forward in health promotion if Nova Scotia's lead in this matter were brought to a speedy and successful conclusion.

Another step in the right direction was taken when the Legislative Assembly in Ontario recently passed a provincial government bill which has made the use of seat belts mandatory since January 1 of this year. It is expected this move will mean a substantial saving in injuries, lives and health costs. A further encouraging development was the recent announcement by the Minister of Transport of Quebec that the provincial government intended to introduce legislation which would make the use of seat belts mandatory by next summer. This would be accompanied by selective reductions in speed limits on certain roads which are considered particularly dangerous. Other measures include a program of mechanical inspection of motor vehicles, tire inspection, new methods of police surveillance of roads, and review of the system of demerit points for impaired driving. I hope that the other provinces will soon follow the initiatives of Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia.

The federal and provincial governments agreed in 1974, to undertake a five-year program aimed at reducing the fatal motor vehicle accident rate by 15 per cent. The federal government, through the Ministry of Transport, and several provinces are co-operating in a three-month public education program this winter to encourage the use of seat belts as a coast to coast lifesaving habit.

Industrial safety in Canada is sadly inadequate. In 1974, 1,415 workers were killed on the job. The average for each of the past 10 years has been 1,076. One out of 20 workers had a disabling injury in 1974—a total of over 473,000 injuries. Think what these figures mean in terms of lost production, in human suffering, in social allowances, in medical and hospital care. Industrial accidents were recently estimated to cost the United States $32.4 billion annually. Canadian losses are doubtless as high in relation to our smaller population—perhaps in the neighbourhood of $3 billion a year. Can we really afford it?

Industry could do a great deal more to reduce deaths, injuries and the health costs related to industrial accidents. An interesting new program is being provided by St. John Ambulance with the most appropriate name of LIFE—Learn Industrial First Aid Effectively. It employs a multimedia course at no cost to the employee and all training is on an in-plant basis. Studies have shown that employees not trained in first-aid had an accident rate double that of their trained counterparts of the same age, sex, job and company. First-aid training in industry has another advantage: a worker can use that skill at home. A recent study shows that off-the-job injuries resulting in one or more days' absence from work, occur six times more frequently than on-the-job injuries; and fatalities are 10 times higher. This study included automobile accident. Under the LIFE program, training costs are tax deductible, a fact that many people do not realize, and I would strongly urge industry to implement first aid training programs to improve our industrial safety record.

Another major measure to reduce costs is to make the health care delivery system more efficient. For example, a number of lower cost alternative methods of providing health care offer the potential to produce substantial savings.

In January, 1975 as I have already mentioned, I made a special offer to the provinces in relation to sharing in lower cost alternatives but negotiations were suspended after the announcements in the June budget. I am pleased to report that the provinces are now ready to resume our negotiations and, of course, I am delighted with this development. I expect that there will be meetings of deputy ministers and of ministers of health in the near future to continue our negotiations. The federal government remains willing to extend sharing to some of the lower cost alternatives in exchange for a provincial commitment that high cost services will be controlled and de-emphasized. The lower cost alternatives being considered include less expensive types of institutional care, services provided in the home and various types of ambulatory care centres. Diversifying our methods of care can reduce the dependence on high-cost services.

The intention of the federal government is to work with the provincial governments and the health professionals to maintain and improve the system of health care so carefully built up in Canada over the past twenty years, and to ensure its continued viability by keeping the costs within the limits this country can afford. This is an objective worthy of the support of all Canadians, individuals and governments. Each one of us can contribute to the health of this country through our individual efforts to prevent illness and accidents and our prudent use of health care services. Governments must, with imagination and courage, respond to the challenge of finding ways of operating the system more efficiently.

To sum up, there is under the federal proposals, every reason why it will be possible to keep on improving the quality of the Canadian health care system. Some have stated that the proposed restraints will destroy the national health insurance programs. That, of course, is ridiculous, that is demagoguery. We are imposing realistic ceilings on the allowable rate of increase for medical care cost sharing. In addition we have given five-years notice of our intention to terminate and replace, I repeat replace, existing agreements under the hospital insurance plan. The federal government has made clear its willingness to provide more flexibility and more dollars rather than less to help improve the efficiency and effectiveness of our health care system.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me emphasize that the government is committed to a general, fundamental review of health financing arrangements. The amendments to Bill C-68 will facilitate the general review and will make it possible to proceed more rapidly with the rationalization of the system by the introduction of lower cost services, as the review progresses.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore move second reading of Bill C-68, subject to the amendments I have described.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

[English]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just concluded what I thought was a rather long and boring speech, so I hope the House will forgive me if I am charged with the same thing. The minister talked for a long time about many things related directly or indirectly to the health field, including references to his "new perspectives" book, health standards in this country being great compared with other countries and a number of other things. However, I am afraid in his discussion he failed to make a good case in support of the bill now before the House.

I think it is fair to say that most of us in this House who are taxpayers, or who are here representing taxpayers, will agree that government should take some kind of action to keep health costs down to a satisfactory level. But when government at the federal level is dealing with the provinces and discussing legal and binding federal-provincial agreements, any changes in those agreements should be made through the process of negotiation with the provinces. When there are these kinds of agreements, bilateral negotiations should be the order of the day. Instead we have had what amounts to a unilateral, arbitrary withdrawal from a commitment made to the provinces, which was against the will of the provinces in the first place.

When we are examining health costs, we should examine carefully where the costs have been increasing most rapidly. When we do that, we find that it certainly has not been in the area of medical care. Increasing costs, rather, have been very much on the institutional side of health costs. This bill does not come even slightly to grips with that matter.

The minister made a reference to "Perspectives on Health", a book which he brought forward in this House a year or so ago, which suggested that health costs can be reduced by changing people's life styles, by encouraging people to do fewer of the things which are destructive to their health, and I do not think anyone will argue about that. If people follow that advice, in the long-term the cost of health services will fall. Yet, paradoxically, the minister's statement runs contrary to what he has been doing these past few weeks. I am referring to the freeze of the Medical Council research budget, now frozen at last year's level. Considering that the cost of medical research went up 18 per cent this past year, freezing the budget at last year's level is the same as effectively reducing it by 18 per cent.

Figures put forward by experts in the field indicate that every dollar spent on medical research today brings a saving of $20 in health costs ten years down the road. Although the minister talks of reducing costs down the road, he is doing something which will increase costs substantially in ten years. He is reducing the medical research budget, and has never presented any logical explanation for doing so.

The present Liberal government which, unfortunately, is governing this country, has a long history of confronting various groups, whether they be provinces, professional groups, labour unions, business or private citizens. This bill represents once again a provocative confrontation with provinces and with professional groups involved in providing medical service to Canadians. The government's present attitude in this regard is shameful. This bill represents unilateral action on the part of the federal government. It is arbitrary and has been brought forward without meaningful consultation with the provinces. Indeed, it indicates a lack of concern for the opinions of provinces in matters concerning federal-provincial agreements.

The bill proposes to limit the federal government's participation in medicare to 13 per cent next year, 10.5 per cent the following year, and 8 per cent in subsequent years. The minister said he will propose amendments in committee. Since he has not provided me with a written copy of any amendment I must rely on what I heard him say today. Today he said there will be negotiations. Perhaps that is the wrong word. There will be consultations with the provinces; but the federal government still has authority to set the ceilings.

The minister may give the appearance of backing down a little on the matter of ceilings, but I submit that he is not backing down at all. He is simply trying to take the heat off himself by saying that the government will consult with the provinces. Yet the government, as I say, still wants authority to set ceilings. Provinces will need to examine carefully the meaning of "consultation". Provinces must be careful when dealing with the federal government, as we know what it means by consultation. When the government speaks of consultation, one must not confuse such consultation with meaningful negotiation. In the past, consultation has often been a process whereby the provinces or others were simply notified of the government's decision. Therefore I am not relieved to hear what the minister has to say with regard to proposed amendments because I believe that essentially this process will not change anything in the bill. I think he will continue on his merry way, as he originally planned.

Before exposing many other inadequacies of the bill, it would be useful to review the reaction of the provinces to the bill, which was introduced shortly after the June 23, 1975, budget. I have before me copies of communications sent by the provincial health ministers. Their reactions to the minister's proposal range from bewilderment to indignation.

Clearly the provinces were unanimous in disapproving of the government's action. For example, after the budget speech was delivered in this House in June, 1975, the Ontario minister immediately called for a health ministers' conference. The conference was held in Victoria on August 18 and 19, 1975. At the conclusion of the meeting provincial opposition to this bill was virtually unanimous. The major objection expressed was that the bill represented unilateral federal government action, and that it was arbitrary. The health ministers at that time agreed to demand a meeting with the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in the hope of finding common ground on this matter as between the federal and provincial governments. They hoped the federal government might be persuaded to be more flexible.

Meeting later, the provincial premiers declared that, because of Bill C-68 and the federal government's intention to terminate the existing hospital insurance in five years, the issue of cost-sharing had become their first priority in federal-provincial negotiations and discussions.

In a telegram sent to the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Manitoba minister of health said:

> Your government's decision to proceed with major changes on a unilateral basis is a serious disappointment to our province and, I assume, to most others . . . Not only does the decision represent an apparent breach of our earlier understanding (in January) but also, and more importantly, it suggests that your government has every intention of implementing legislative changes which will cause the primary financial responsibility for the future reform of health care and for the maintenance of existing service standards to be borne by the provincial governments and their taxpayers . . . It is obvious that such a decision would represent a significant threat to our national health standards—standards based on a system which the federal government itself initiated.

The Quebec minister of social affairs in his telegram to the federal minister of June 25, 1975, said:

> First of all, I deplore the unilateral ceiling put on medical insurance by the federal government without warning . . . One must make the distinction between an economic measure favouring the Quebec taxpayer and an economic measure destined to benefit nothing but the federal treasury—the statement by (your) government belongs to this second category.

At the Victoria conference, on August 18, 1975, the Prince Edward Island minister of health said:

> The implementation of Bill C-68 would have a very serious effect on the level of health care services in P.E.I. . . . Our resources are severely strained to meet the rising cost with federal contributions under the present arrangement.

The Nova Scotia minister of public health said this to the Victoria conference:

> I share a good deal of the concern of my colleagues from other provinces on the announcements made by the Honourable John Turner . . .

That same minister, in a letter to myself, dated July 18, said:

> In summary, we regret that the government used the budget speech to advise the provinces of the limitations . . .

I submit that when the minister speaks about consultation with regard to the amendments he is proposing, we can assume that he will announce either in this House or perhaps in the press what the new limits are to be after two years.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he will do it in his election campaign.

Mr. Yewchuk: Or perhaps he will do it in an election campaign.

The Ontario minister of health put the matter in these terms:

> . . . if I have ever seen any example of unilateral decision-making without consultation with the provinces, that is it. We have been negotiating patiently for four years with the federal government to get a means of sharing health care costs that would allow the provinces to use their own discretion and to set their own priorities, instead of sharing on only those most costly services, the hospital and the physician. In the face of that, without any further consultation, they unilaterally set guidelines. They started the plan; it has got out of control. They have unilaterally limited the amount they will put into it. I don't know how we'll live within it.

The comments I have read are a fair sample of provincial thinking. I will not read all the communications in front of me, because I know others want time to speak. I also have responses from the medical people affected by this measure, particularly the Canadian Medical Association.

● (1620)

Before I go into that, let me just touch a little on the idea that this move by the federal government is in some way going to encourage the provinces to take greater care to reduce health costs. That concept or idea put forward by the minister is nothing less than ridiculous. The fact is that the provinces are now carrying half the cost load of medicare costs. Indeed, if these costs, rising as they are, are a great motivation to the federal government to try to keep them down, I cannot see how the minister can be justified in saying that there is no motivation for the provinces to keep the costs down. The motivation is the same. The provinces must get the money from the taxpayer and foot the bill as well.

We cannot accept as legitimate the minister's claim that this kind of cap, as he called it, will provide greater motivation to the provinces. I feel they are already sufficiently motivated in view of the fact they are now paying half the cost.

The Canadian Medical Association dealt even more harshly with this bill. I suppose that is because they are very directly affected by the outcome of it. On July 10, 1975, the Canadian Medical Association declared, and I quote:

> The budget controls will produce definite health hazards for Canada's health care delivery system. The government of Canada's budget controls will have the effect of restricting the availability of health care . . . in effect, rationing needed medical care, unless additional funds are provided by the provinces or the public. This action could endanger the quality of medical services available to Canadians.

The Canadian Medical Association also pointed out the arbitrariness of the percentages in this bill. The minister says that the percentages which were set are higher than the increases have been in the past few years. Perhaps this is true. However, I think it is worth pointing out at this time that over the past few years the medical associations were asked to exercise voluntary restraint in the interest of keeping down these costs. They have indeed been doing that.

The increases per capita of medical care costs in Canada from 1971 to 1972 averaged 6.9 per cent. That was the increase in medical costs, 6.9 per cent. At the same time the average increase per capita of the gross national product at market price was 12.8 per cent. Furthermore, the consumer price index for the same period rose at 7.9 per cent annually, and the average weekly wages and salaries in the industrial sector rose in the area of 8.5 per cent annually. This clearly shows that the increases in the per capita medicare costs have been lower than in any of the other areas I have mentioned.

I think we can fairly say that reasonable restraint has been practised by the medical profession in this area. Since no one else has been showing significant restraint, perhaps they feel the time has come that they should do some catching up. However, this is where the minister takes out his sledgehammer and uses it on the heads of the medical profession in order to prevent any notion of catching up which they feel justified about doing. The Research Director of the Canadian Medical Association, Dr. J. Brandejs, on August 15, 1975, pointed out that while the budgetary ceilings may be realistic, they are arbitrary. Grounds existed, he said, for concern centring on both the immutability of the guidelines and the low social value they seem to put on Canadian physicians.

From the point of view of regional interests, they voice great concern over their inability to improve local standards of health care. They maintain that the ceilings will forestall future developments which certain provinces have been planning at this time, particularly in areas where low economic conditions exist.

When this measure was first introduced in the budget last June, the national press was not very quick to appreciate the significance of this aspect of it. They concentrated more on the gasoline tax and the over-all inadequacy of that document. But as a result of the health ministers' conference in Victoria the media began to realize just how serious an impact this legislation will have on co-operative federalism and the health care delivery system. As an example of the kind of statements made by editors on this subject I quote from the August 13, 1975, edition of The Commonwealth:

> The health ministers' conference must expose the spending ceilings for the Alice-in-Wonderland unreality they represent. How does the number 13 per cent relate to economic and health conditions for the year 1976-77, for example? Who knows? Who can tell? The minister knows, but the minister is not talking.

This again points out the arbitrariness of these programs. The August 19, 1975, edition of the London Free Press contained the following, and I quote:

> Unilateral actions like this are damaging to federalism and should be avoided . . . Provincial governments are justifiably annoyed that they were not consulted prior to Mr. Turner's decision.

One might have added this was particularly the case because it was the federal government which had imposed this program on the provinces in the first place. That is the saddest part of all. This program was shoved down the throats of the provinces in spite of their screams of agony and despair. They did not want it, yet it was done. The federal government is now taking the first step in opting out of this program. I am sure this is only the first step. It will not stop with this bill. If the government does intend to stop, I would like it to say so in this House.

What are the implications of Bill C-68? I have already touched on a lot of them. Historically, as the leader of my party pointed out, Bill C-68 is just one more case of the Liberal government going before the provinces, making a deal, and then a few weeks later or a few months later taking some action unilaterally which amounts to a doublecross.

At the federal-provincial conference of July 1965 the then Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, announced a federal government resolution to provide financial support for provincially administered medicare plans. He asserted his government's intention to share 50 per cent of the cost of medical services if the provinces were able to meet his four basic principles of eligibility: comprehensive, universality, public administration, and portability.

It was not until the fiscal year 1970 that all the provinces were brought under the medical care umbrella. In the meantime a great deal of pressure was brought to bear against the federal proposal by provincial governments and medical and professional associations. While the then minister of national health and welfare, currently the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), confidently estimated that the net cost of the scheme to the two levels of government would be $80 million, Ontario Treasurer Charles S. Macnaughton, speaking to the federal-provincial meeting of finance ministers in November, 1968, said,—it turned out to be a prophecy—and I quote:

> What guarantee have we that in a few years from now, the federal government will not dump the full responsibility for this program on the provinces, and close off or limit its contributions after it has obliged the provinces to embark on its slippery slope?

That has proven to be exactly what is happening. I hope that if the minister has any conscience at all he feels very guilty about this state of affairs created by his party.

In those early years of the medicare concept, opposition to the federal government's proposal came from two camps and centred on two quite different principles. The provinces contended that the Medical Care Act represented federal encroachment upon an area of exclusively provincial jurisdiction; that provincial priorities were being distorted by the availability of federal dollars; that the program was untimely and uncalled for, given existing health care systems and other considerations, and that under the scheme the provinces had very little control over administrative costs, procedures, or priorities. On the other hand, the Canadian Medical Association strenuously questioned the principle of government interference with a professional body. As it turned out, both groups knew what they were talking about.

In the mid-sixties, no fewer than seven task force committees were established to study the escalating cost of health care. Appearing on the second page of their summary report is the flat statement that there were many examples of cases where economies could be achieved without in any way diminishing the quality of health care. The report itemized three pages of examples which it characterized as "just a few". It concluded with the noteworthy sum of 337 recommendations. When this report was published, a federal-provincial committee was established to scrutinize the financial operation of the Canadian health care system. This committee was entrusted with an ongoing consultative role in an attempt to revamp the financial end of the system.

More recently still, the Department of National Health and Welfare published a document entitled "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians". In this document the minister and his staff introduce a new typology to cover the health field concept: human biology, environment, life style, and health care. They described this new approach as "a unified whole which permits everyone to see the importance of all factors".

My purpose in making this brief rundown of studies and statements on health care reform is to contrast them explicitly with the content and, what is more, the intent of Bill C-68. The government had more than 300 recommendations at its disposal yet it chose to ignore all of them, opting instead, for budgetary ceilings. Mr. Speaker, the real reason for the introduction of the "health field concept" by the Department of National Health and Welfare was to advance the premise that improvements in life style and environment are as conducive to good health as is medicine. Yet the government has not applied this powerful notion even marginally to the question in hand.

The third major finding of the 1969 task force report acknowledged that effective and efficient health care delivery demands co-ordinated government planning. Yet the government now unilaterally imposes budgetary ceilings thereby threatening the continued vitality of the federal-provincial consultative process. In short, however much as we might criticize the content of Bill C-68, the most distasteful part of the whole business is the fact that legislation of this sort was introduced at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: Consider also the arbitrariness of this bill. If it is passed the ceilings specified within its clauses will become statutory. Although one of the basic principles of responsible government is that parliament cannot bind its successors, political realists take it for granted that reversal of procedures previously undertaken is a long and arduous process. Since health care ceilings will for all practical purposes be unalterable, the question must be raised: what if they are simply too low? What if the desired standards of health care just cannot be maintained within the restrictions of the bill? The figures seem to have been pulled out of a hat; they are unaccompanied by any explanation as to how they were derived.

In other words, by putting these ceilings into the bill the government will ensure that, as long as inflation continues and medical costs continue to increase at an accelerated rate, the taxpayer will inevitably suffer either in terms of increased provincial taxes or in terms of reduced health services. In brief, the ceilings are wrong because (1) there is no immediate reason to believe they are appropriate, and (2) there is no flexibility to them despite the lengthy time span in which it is contemplated they will be enforced.

Another way of expressing this difficulty is to say that the gross federal expenditures on health care for all ensuring years in an inflationary era will depend solely on growth expenditures for 1975-76. That is, since ceilings are calculated as a percentage increase in expenditures from year to year, and since the percentage increase for any given year will be dependent on the absolute expenditure of the previous year, gross expenditures for 1975-76 become all important. And since expenditures for 1975-76 are a quantity which is still not completely known, the government can as yet have no idea what impact the budgetary ceilings will have in the long run.

However, extrapolating from national medical care expenditures in 1974-75,—expenditures which amounted to $1.37 billion—we can calculate the consequences if outlays should increase marginally, as projected, or markedly. We know that if final medical care expenditures in 1975 were to increase by a marginal 3 per cent to $1.41 billion they could rise to no more than $2.54 billion by 1980. Were expenditures to increase by a quite conceivable 15 per cent in 1975—the minister said 16 per cent—they could, on the other hand, stand at $2.86 billion by 1980, a third of a billion dollars more. It is worth nothing that the increase projected by the government, at 6.5 per cent, can itself be described as a marginal one.

Confronted with a situation such that a difference in expenditures of $.17 billion in 1975 could result in a difference of $.32 billion in capital outlay in 1980, the provinces would be foolish not to attempt to hand the federal government the largest medical care bill possible in the base year. Instead of lowering health care costs, Bill C-68 will actually raise them.

To sum up, it is quite impossible to forecast accurately what is going to happen to medical care in Canada in the light of the changes suggested in Bill C-68. Because the long term shape of health care services in Canada is dependent on so many usually conflicting variables, and facts are not easily quantified, it is nothing but frivolous to seek to predict the future of this field in blind confidence. Nevertheless that is exactly what the government has done in introducing Bill C-68.

Spokesmen for the government will no doubt argue that the imposition of ceilings on federal contributions will not impose undue strain on provincial coffers and will not result in any significant reduction in health services. Let us suppose for the sake of argument that all goes according to plan—that the guidelines encourage provincial restraint and constitute a positive input into the plan's budget forecasting. Because doctors' fees make up a large part of medicare's budget this state of affairs will come about only if the cost of doctors' services does not rise above the budgetary ceilings. But if the cost of those services does rise above the ceilings the government is in fact imposing wage controls on a single identifiable professional group. I know this has altered somewhat with the anti-inflation program. which has placed some limits on all professional incomes, but when the anti-inflation program was introduced the bill was to be in effect for three years. That is a temporary measure, but Bill C-68 is not temporary, it is permanent.

It still remains to be seen whether indeed the anti-inflation program will be temporary; if we listen to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which he made a while ago we might conclude that the program will not be temporary at all. The fact is that Bill C-68 places permanent wage controls on the incomes of professional groups that provide medical services to the people of Canada, which seems to me to be rather discriminatory against one specific professional group.

Few would disagree with the view that the federal government, because it is responsible for the over-all scrutiny of the economy, must have the power to control its own budget. To a certain extent it is true that the open-endedness of the financial aspect of medicare is such that the central government cannot monitor its expenditures on a year to year basis. However, the statistics of the matter offer some rather valuable insights into the urgency of these arguments.

The former finance minister, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner), maintained that health care costs have risen almost 20 per cent over the last fiscal year. The hon. member was correct in his figure of 20 per cent no doubt, but what he neglected to mention was that the great bulk of this increase was the direct result of escalating expenditures, not in medical but in hospital care. In fact the figures demonstrate quite clearly that in the last two years for which statistics are complete, 1972-73 and 1973-74, the increase in medical costs has been only 9.2 and 7.2 per cent respectively. In 1971 the figure was 6.9 per cent per year, as I have already mentioned. Furthermore, the figures show very plainly that since the time when the medical care system matured, the costs to the federal government have not been increasing at a rate greater than national income.

So why did the central government arbitrarily decide to establish spending ceilings on a program which has not demonstrated the run-away cost increases of other federally sponsored projects? The answer probably lies in the fact that between 70 and 80 per cent of the total cost of medical care consists of salaries and wages. During a period of inflation and rapid wage escalation such as we have been experiencing, a 20 per cent increase in wages would result in a 14 to 16 per cent increase in total budgetary outlay. By imposing these ceilings the federal government hoped to ensure that it would not have to pay medical costs which are a direct result of its inability to control inflation.

More disturbing than federal deviousness are the prospects for increased taxes and decreased services. Granted that expenditures may appear to be under control, there are signs that a rapid upturn in the capital outlay required to maintain health standards is imminent. For example, Ontario physicians received and increase of only 4 per cent in their fee schedule in 1974 and recently were asking for 20 per cent in 1975. In addition, many provinces maintain that they need a catching up period in order to raise their regional standards to national levels. Either event occurring could cause a marked increase in medical care expenditures, and under the stimulus of Bill C-68 both are likely to occur at least in 1975-76 before the limits go into effect.

So while the federal government has introduced these ceilings avowedly in order to encourage economies in medical care, the bill does not even ensure economies. Nothing in the act actually stops the provinces from improving their health care services, and nothing actually stops physicians, after the expiry of the Anti-Inflation Act, from demanding heftier salaries. All the bill does ensure is that, if either of these events should occur, it is the provinces which will have to pick up the additional costs, either in the form of increased premium rates or in depleted provincial revenues, perhaps at the sacrifice of other provincial programs. Thus the analogy to be drawn is not one of the government slapping the hand that reaches into the taxpayer's pocket, but another, that if there is a need to pay for increased medical costs it is the provinces or the doctors who must do the reaching.

Should costs rise above and beyond the cost-sharing limitations, any one of the following three situations may develop: first, provincial revenues will be drained and other programs or priorities will have to be deflected in order to meet the increased costs; second, where applicable, as in British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and the Yukon, premiums will have to be increased in order to offset greater provincial medical expenditures; or third, if the provinces cannot meet the budgetary restraints, medical services will have to be reduced.

In other words, if medical costs increase at a greater rate than that allowed by the 1975 budgetary ceilings, then the provinces will be forced to seek those very solutions that the current Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), the then minister of health and welfare, foresaw as undesirable in his introduction to the task force report of 1969.

Equally bad are the implications for co-operative federalism. In Canada there is no constitutional mechanism or provision for the practice of cost sharing. Likewise, the federal government has no constitutional grounds for entering the health field. Both are the result of convention and the ongoing evolution of Canadian federalism. The practice of cost sharing has ensured the maintenance of national standards, while the very principle of co-operative federalism is undoubtedly one of the most distinguishing features of our nation. But the government's five year notice of its withdrawal from the present hospital insurance plan and the imposition of ceilings on contributions to medical insurance threaten both of these principles and practices.

Although it is impossible to gauge precisely the impact of Bill C-68 on our system of federalism, indications of the drift of events are already evident. The unilateral nature of this measure has outraged the provinces. Their immediate reaction was to call for the instant cessation of all cost sharing consultation with the federal government.

If the government's ploy in introducing this legislation was to "bring the provinces back to the bargaining table", as those same provinces have since suggested was the case, it is now clear that this ploy was completely misconceived. Ontario has demanded a 17 point tax transfer from the federal government in exchange for opting out of medicare. The former minister of finance, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton, flatly rejected this offer, but should Ontario continue to press and eventually succeed in opting out, it would mean that the principle and practice of a national system of prepaid medical insurance would be completely thwarted. Furthermore, such an event occurring could set a disastrous precedent in the field of federal equalization.

Finally, if increased costs do occur it would be the have-not provinces which would be the first to be obliged to reduce their medical care services. In areas where the physician-to-population ratio is already low, this reduction would coincide with a marked downturn in the level of health care and would exacerbate regional disparities which we all want to try to correct.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, if the minister has been listening to what I have been saying—

An hon. Member: He has not.

Mr. Yewchuk: I doubt that he has, because he has been chatting away to the member sitting behind him for most of the time, which I think is very bad. I listened carefully to his remarks when he spoke.

Mr. Lalonde: There is no problem; I can listen to both of you.

Mr. Yewchuk: It seems the minister has many talents—he can talk and listen at the same time. However, had he been listening I am sure he would have realized that this bill is indeed ill-conceived and should be withdrawn. If he is serious about co-operative federalism he should sit down at the negotiating table with the provinces and try to resolve this difficulty in a friendly, positive and bilateral way.

● (1650)

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Madam Speaker, I should like to say regretfully at the outset that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) was not listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), and that is unfortunate because that hon. member has made one of the finest speeches on the subject of medicare I have heard anywhere, here in the House of Commons or outside.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: His speech was an extremely thoughtful and competent approach to this very serious problem, and I repeat that I thought it most particularly unfortunate that a minister, who again trotted out a speech before the House that he had delivered prior to last June, had not apparently been listening. That hon. minister's speech was full of rather banal suggestions about what the provinces should be doing to curb accidents on the highway. He went on at great length in that way, making a speech he had presented to the House before, yet he sat there without listening when the official spokesman for the opposition delivered his thoughtful and serious approach to this subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Unfortunately the minister paid not one bit of attention while that official spokesman for the opposition did such a fine job.

Mr. Lalonde: You should withdraw that.

Mr. Broadbent: That is unfortunate, Madam Speaker, and it shows something of the attitude of the minister who ignored the official spokesman of the Conservative party just as he has ignored, during the past year, the provincial health ministers of every province.

Mr. Lalonde: Do you want to sit down and allow me to repeat the hon. member's speech? If the hon. member is patient enough I can do it.

Mr. Broadbent: We can all read Hansard.

Mr. Lalonde: Not that way. Sit down and I will do it now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, it is a rare occasion on which I quote a Liberal.

Mr. Lalonde: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. Let me remind the hon. member that he was one of the members who came and disturbed me at my seat when I was trying to listen to the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Even for the Minister of National Health and Welfare that is reaching. I will tell the House what I asked the minister. I was getting something he said straight. I did not want to get it wrong. I will tell the House what I asked him. I asked him what his forecast was for the increase in medicare for the next year and he said he did not know. He said he thought it might be such and such. By a strange coincidence he then said he thought the increase in the cost of medicare for the next year might be somewhere between 14 and 15 per cent. By some strange coincidence he said in his own speech that it is expected to be 14.5 per cent. It is a strange fact that his forecast should be midway between what he has indicated—

Mr. Lalonde: I rise on the same point of order, Madam Speaker. The hon. member claims I was not listening to what the other hon. member was saying. I have said I listened, very attentively, and as a matter of fact I find it strange that this hon. member had to come over here to ask me whether I had said something in my speech, because he was having an argument with one of his colleagues about whether I might have said something or not and he wanted to check it. He certainly was not paying very much attention to what I was saying when I was speaking for the government. I think the hon. member had better watch it; he is living in a glass house.

Mr. Broadbent: Again, Madam Speaker, even for the minister he is reaching. Of course I was listening. I went over there to talk to him about a point he had made as I wanted to get it precise. That could hardly be the case if we were not listening. How could we raise a question about what he said had we not been listening? He is not going to get off that easily.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The point I am making is that we just heard a first rate speech, and I hope the minister reads it. I simply do not believe that he could repeat it because he was talking during the entire speech. In addition, the same minister for the past year has treated the provincial health ministers of this country of every party in the same way he treats members of this House. This minister said he promised those ministers a year ago that he would meet with them. He said he would get together with them to work out, on a mutually agreeable basis, methods of curbing unnecessary increases in the cost of medicare, and I stress the phrase "unnecessary costs". He did not do any such thing.

The former minister of finance brought in a budget last June arbitrarily setting spending limits on the part of the federal government for the next three years. Not since that time has the Minister of National Health and Welfare sat down with the provincial ministers to work out any mutually agreeable methods of curbing increased medicare costs, and that is particularly important in a federal country like ours, certainly in respect of an essential service like medicare. The whole approach should be one of mutual acceptability rather than arbitrary imposition by the federal government, but the latter is exactly what we have received from this minister.

Let me quote from a member of the other place. I would not normally be inclined to quote such an individual because he also happens to be a Liberal. However, I think Senator David Croll summed up this bill perhaps more succinctly than anyone else when he said, after it was announced:

> It is wrong in concept; it is divisive in practice and in my opinion it is wrong, wrong, wrong, a thousand times wrong—

I think Senator David Croll was right on in that pithy statement of his.

At the beginning of the minister's comments he referred to some amendments he was going to introduce when this bill reaches the committee stage. The only one that has a substantial element to it is the suggestion that the provision now in the bill, which provides a 10 per cent ceiling on federal government contributions to medicare costs for the years 1978 and 1979, is to be removed. The minister rather magnanimously said the government was arbitrarily going to take that part out, and that he is going to negotiate with the provinces.

The minister says he is going to consult with the provinces. He says he is going to consult with the provincial ministers in order to get a new formula, with a solid commitment on the federal level of ceilings. We know how good his promises in this field have been in the past. I am sure that not only the people in this House but in all the provincial legislatures will accept that with skepticism.

The other reason for skepticism in this regard is that the odds are about 20 to 1 we are going to have a federal election in 1978. I think perhaps it is something a little more than coincidence that the government is going to leave these arbitrary ceilings off for the next two years. Then I am sure that during the next election campaign the government will announce in a truly generous way some kind of medicare program of which we will be reasonably sure for at least one year.

Mr. Fairweather: Like their new railway policy.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, just like the railway policy, as the hon. member says. The political party opposite that governs us displays the most political cynicism in the history of this country. I for one am totally convinced that this is the only reason this kind of an amendment will be introduced at the committee stage.

One might ask why we are opposed. I am not going to repeat a lot of the points that have been so ably made by the Conservative spokesman but I do intend to repeat several, and add a couple of others. First let me point out one thing that I think distinguishes us from the Conservative party. Right from the outset of the government's anti-inflation program members of the NDP have said there are certain aspects of government spending that ought not to be cut. We have said it is irresponsible politics in Canada to suggest that across the board cuts in government spending are desirable.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said on various occasions in the House of Commons, civilization costs money. One essential aspect of civilization in Canada in 1975 surely is the provision of fully adequate medical and hospital services for Canadians in whatever part of the country they may live. Therefore, we reject this kind of categorical and arbitrary imposition of ceilings on medicare spending—14.5 per cent in the period 1976-77 and 12 per cent in 1977-78. We resent it because although it is not certain it will occur there is at least a very real possibility that necessary medical spending in those years will exceed those limits.

● (1700)

The New Democratic Party for one says that if it costs money to provide needed medical services we should spend the money and cut back in other less essential areas. That is an overriding concern and an overriding commitment of the New Democratic Party. We believe this country must allocate whatever funds are necessary to achieve and maintain fully adequate health services from one coast to the other.

Second, we believe that medical services, as with services in certain other essential areas, should be provided on a federal-provincial cost-sharing basis. We believe that, because to us it is essential with such programs to ensure that the poorest parts of Canada have health services just as good and at just as high a level as the richest parts of Canada. That is the reason why the federal cost-sharing approach to medical services is absolutely essential.

Beyond these basic points, what else should be said at this time? I shall not do what the minister himself did, which was simply to rehash a speech made a year ago. I wish to deal with two, three or four essential aspects of the cost of medical services and point out for the House, and indirectly for the people of the country, that we believe an approach to spending in medical services will involve some short-run increases in expenditures which, in the long run, will provide a healthier people but also in the long run a reduction in real cost to the economy.

We will suggest some rearrangement of medical spending that could provide real benefits in terms of financial requirements at both the federal and provincial levels. First of all, it is our view that it makes sense to increase medical spending at all levels in Canada in the preventive medical field.

For us it makes neither human nor economic sense to let a man work in conditions where he is confronted, for example, with asbestos fibres which he inhales, and as a result of this contracts cancer which means that then he must go through the cruel and certainly painful and costly surgical operation which results. In such a case at that stage in the man's life we try to deal with cancer when, as an alternative, as a country, we could have been spending more money to establish community clinics in parts of our country where such work is undertaken. In this way we could have developed cures that would be less costly and more humane. We should of course eventually remove the pollution from the air which is the very cause of this kind of cancer.

I repeat that to deal with that kind of a situation now, an increase in expenditures would be involved. We say that, but we think it is a necessary increase in expenditures the long run benefits of which would result in lower medical care costs over-all because it would eliminate costly surgery down the road and would of course produce a healthier working population.

There is, for example, in the minister's own province very imaginative and constructive use of community clinics. I had drawn to my attention not long ago a good example of the result of the opening of community clinics in the minister's province in the town of St. Gabriel de Brandon, southeast of Montreal. A community clinic was set up in this area.

Children who had been swimming in that community had been repeatedly going to doctors because of a kind of skin infection. They had been treated over and over again every three months or so. This had been going on in many sequences of three-month periods. Because this clinic had been set up with authority to carry on investigative work in the medical field it was discovered that because of the condition of the water supply the children had become infected.

Because the clinic had authority to take corrective action the company responsible was obligated to stop polluting the water. In this way the recurrence of the infection was stopped and further costs for medical services were eliminated. The point is a rather obvious but important one. Because of the existence of a community clinic in the town of St. Gabriel de Brandon the long-run cost for medical services was actually reduced because it was possible to get at the source of the medical problem and head it off before it recurred. Surely this is imaginative and positive spending. I repeat that it involves some increases now for real financial and human gains down the road.

Another suggestion we make is that we can get away from spending so much money on general hospitals. There could be a curtailment of the large expenditures we now have in respect of general hospitals which, according to the latest figures I have, involve an expenditure of about $200 a day per bed. The cost probably has increased somewhat since the figures I have were released.

Alternative facilities which would be fully adequate for most of the present hospitalization requirements could be built. These could be operated at a cost of somewhere between $42 and $52 per bed per day. The point once again is that if we were to achieve this it would not mean an over-all cut-back in spending for medical purposes, but in fact would mean an increase for the purpose of building these alternative facilities. The net result, however, not this year or next year but a few years down the road, would be a substantial reduction in the over-all cost of hospitalization.

Once again the obvious point to me, although it apparently is not obvious to the government or necessarily to the people of Canada, is that a cut-back in expenditures now does not mean that there will be necessarily a long-range saving in economic terms to the community. It is just the opposite; if you do not spend on what is needed now, with careful selection of increased spending in certain areas such as alternative hospital facilities, substantial long range savings can be achieved.

Another area of spending which will involve real savings down the road in terms of economic cost and in terms of human lives is in the medical research field. The hon. member for Athabasca very ably documented the case for increasing spending on medical research, not cutting it back as the government is shamelessly doing at this time.

Another illustration of real savings is in the paramedical field. Instead of relying so heavily on the use of general practitioners, a lot of work should be done in all provinces, including those with NDP governments, on extending the use of paramedical personnel into areas which are currently the exclusive domain of general practitioners, who are both much more costly to train and more costly to maintain in terms of incomes than are paramedical personnel with less training.

Another way of ultimately saving in medical expenses that the government could have taken within federal jurisdiction, either on its own or in co-operation with the provinces, is in the pharmacare area. By moving decisively into pharmacare, into controlling the drug industry in Canada, either by setting up a competitive national company to produce the necessary drugs or by some other indirect means of controlling the prices of drugs, the government could take decisive steps which would result in long range savings in the drug area.

Finally, on the whole general question of savings in medicare costs I want to emphasize the point that has already been made, that by putting arbitrary ceilings on the federal government's contributions, especially for the next two years, no saving can really be achieved in the economy of Canada in terms of medicare costs. All that will be saved is in the federal share of the total cost to the public. The costs will be paid but they will be paid for by the provinces, fully half of which are not in a good position to pay them. That is not a sensible approach to cost saving that the minister is taking.

If the minister really wanted to achieve savings, he should have fulfilled his obligation and worked out with the provinces, on a mutually agreeable basis, definite approaches to very specific programs that could lead to short run and long range cuts in costs. I repeat that the best place where the minister could go to find out what should be done in terms of specifics would be the provinces themselves. As he knows, the Science Council of Canada has pointed out that the province of Saskatchewan, for example, has the best record in the country of controlling costs for medicare services, and not only Saskatchewan but other provinces are just as concerned as the federal government about saving money.

I would remind the minister that this is a cost sharing program. The federal government has no more profound an interest in saving in terms of medicare expenditures than do the provinces, but the provinces which are directly involved in providing the service also know where cuts should be made in order to save.

I remind the minister of his own commitment. If he is really interested in cutting back unnecessary spending, and if he would like to find out where new expenditures could be made that will lead to long range savings in medicare costs, he can go to no better a source in this country than the provincial ministers of health.

I want to say why we as a party are so concerned about this approach. It is because the inevitable result of the passage of this bill, assuming that the costs go beyond the ceilings permitted in the legislation for the federal government to pay its share, will be that the poorer parts of our country will certainly suffer in terms of medicare expenditures. They will suffer in a number of ways; either abhorrent deterrent fees will be increased, or a cut back in medical services will be introduced, or property taxes will be increased, or sales taxes will be increased in those provinces to make up for the money that the federal government should be paying for those programs.

We are so deeply opposed to what the government is doing because one of the few areas of real concern to the people of Canada to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated he might be committed in 1968 was regional inequality, to dealing with it, hopefully reducing it and ultimately removing it, but the inevitable result of this program is to increase inequalities between regions in Canada. We say that health service is the wrong field to do that.

A Canadian should be able to take health services for granted. Whether he lives in Vancouver, in a wealthy province such as B.C., or in St. John's in a poor province, he should feel fully confident as a Canadian that he will have equally available to him the best medical services in this country. What this bill does—I do not care what the minister says—is to make that possibility more remote. What it will almost certainly mean is that the poorer provinces will do two things: they will have to cut back on the services that are necessary, and simultaneously they will have to increase taxes paid by their citizens.

We think that that kind of action is totally abhorrent at this point in Canadian history both because health care is an area of service where we should have a uniformly high standard right across Canada and because it increases the general sense and feeling of inequality in our country at a time when a feeling of national unity across our land is so essential to the whole nation.

If there is any way in which we will get a profound sense of unity it will be because of the subjective feelings of Canadians in all parts of the land that there really is equality in terms of their life expectations. Our party thinks on this issue that the Liberal government is clearly moving in the wrong direction and that instead of increasing the sense of equality and the sense of well-being, founded in part on the notion of universal health standards, it is taking us a step backward.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, I wish to take a few minutes to answer the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

When I looked at this bill a few minutes ago, I wondered what the minister would say concerning this four-page bill amending the Medical Care Act to limit the annual increase in the per capita cost of insured services granted pursuant to medical care insurance plans. It deals with the limitation of costs for 1976-77 and for 1977-78. I thought that it was only an anti-inflation bill to limit the cost of all health services. But, after its presentation by the minister, I realized that this bill that seemed small had many surprises in store. After the committee stage the subject matter will probably be much more heavy.

Of course, the minister started by giving glory to his party and mentioned all the good things the Liberal party did in the field of social services. But he had to go back to 1958 to realize that the federal-provincial hospitalization plan dated from that time. It is in 1958 that these federal-provincial agreements were made concerning hospitalization services, while we obtained, I think, partial medical care only in 1968. A federal-provincial agreement was then planned concerning the hospitalization program. Medical care was supposed to be included in that project, but we had to wait 10 years before it was granted to taxpayers.

According to the minister, all hospitalization costs are paid. I agree with him on that point. But at what price? I think that we shall have to study the matter carefully at the committee stage and get some bills from the provinces to know what is the cost of hospitalization in each of them. In the province of Quebec, as I come from that province, a hospital bed costs $90 a day, which, I think is an astronomical figure considering the services given. One may praise our services and when the minister said earlier that we had the best hospital care plan in the world, I think he forgot on purpose to add that our services were not the best in the world.

● (1720)

In my opinion, the present weakness of our hospital care system is that services offered are not consistent with the cost assumed by taxpayers. No matter how much we criticize the services provided in the past, today's services can in no way be compared to those offered 25 years ago, Madam Speaker. We have the worst hospital services ever provided as far as admission is concerned. Nowadays, before being admitted to hospital, you must wait a couple of months. However, we are told that we offer wonderful services to everybody.

An hon. Member: Everybody is sick.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I have known some people who were to undergo serious heart operations and had to wait for three months before being admitted to hospital. And then they come and praise our services! It often happens that people die before being admitted, and in this particular case, the woman did die.

I must say I am quite knowledgeable in this area, since I have been providing an ambulance service for forty years. I know all the hospitals in the province of Quebec, since I go as far as Montreal, Quebec City, Chicoutimi and many other places. Let no one come and tell me that it costs a lot of money. I quite agree, and everyone knows that the cost is high, but the services provided fail to match the cost. Perhaps they will say this is due to inflation. I suggest it is rather due to lack of control, defective administration, rejection of responsibilities, the same as in all other endeavours. With this public ownership system, no one is ever responsible. The only responsibility is to get the highest wages possible and provide the least services in return. This is the only responsibility involved.

I think this should be discussed in committee.

I am very pleased that this bill is to be referred to the committee where we can discuss it and try to make amendments.

We seem to be talking only about restrictions and spending cuts in this bill. I would rather have a bill which would ensure people the services they want and are entitled to since they are paying for them. It is no use saying they are free, that hospital care does not cost anything. Workers know better. They can tell by the deductions on their pay cheque stubs that those services are not free. We are paying twice the value of the services we get today.

The Minister said he intended to keep increases down to 10, 12 and 13 per cent during 1976-77. I hope he does reach that goal but I am afraid he will limit only his payments to the provinces. Maybe those payments will be kept down, but the federal government after collecting all the taxes. as it is doing now, will return whatever it feels like. The decision will be the governement's, be it maybe 8, 10 or 12 per cent.

Let us not forget that the provinces are responsible for hospital services and will still have to pay the difference. If the tax rate is 20 or 25 per cent, the federal government will have no part in it, but the provinces will have to make up the difference in order to provide adequate service. As always, the government will pocket the money and the provinces will have to foot the bill.

The meaning of the 12 per cent limit must be fully grasped. In committee as in this House, we are happy to hear of spending limitations, but the understanding with the provinces must be honoured. If that understanding cannot be honoured, then we must do what is needed, we must give the provinces back their taxing rights in order that they administer medicare themselves. This way they will not have to keep on begging the federal government to pay this or that, an expensive process because with duplication of departments we pay double costs. We have to pay double price for the administration. If that is the majority's will, let us honour the agreements. And above all, there must be agreement between the parties involved. Because it is getting to be a one-way proposition. The federal government submits proposals to the provinces, but before they can be discussed with the provinces they introduce legislation. And so with majority government rule the provinces are faced with the choice of either accepting or having nothing. That is the kind of consultation we get from this government.

I submit the provinces are responsible for the citizen's health. They should tell the federal government what to do, instead of the latter imposing its will upon them. The minister boasts of our health care. He says it is better than the American and the British systems. He refers to decreasing infant mortality rate, that has been at the 1.5 per cent level these last years. But he forgets to mention that the birth rate also is now down to 1.4 per cent. In Canada, the figure is 14 per 1,000, and in French Canada, 12 per 1,000 of population. It seems that we are always the winners in one way or the other. With 12 per 1,000, there cannot be more babies who die than are born. We cannot boast too much about it and it is better not to mention it at all, especially to those of us who come from the province of Quebec, because we are a little ashamed of it. In the province of Quebec, we will soon be replaced by the Chinese and the Japanese. Anyway, with such a birth rate, we cannot do more here, I quite agree with my friends on the other side, we are doing our best.

The minister mentioned the increased number of physicians. In the last few years, the number of doctors has increased but I want to point out to the minister that this increase was not due to the number of students coming out of university but to immigration. We have to import doctors because our students cannot enter university, since the key is in the hands of the college of physicians. Today, there is a shortage of doctors. The minister said earlier that he was worried about a surplus of physicians, when actually there is a shortage. In the province of Quebec, we need 2,000 more doctors and yet our students are kept out of university. That is why we have to bring in immigrants, so that we may receive medical care from foreigners. I do not mind it, personally, I have nothing against them, but I would much rather see our French-Canadian students enter university freely. This is the one area in the province of Quebec where the situation is most dramatic.

A while ago the minister said: In the past, in 1968, there was one doctor for every 769 inhabitants, and today, there is one doctor for every 586 Canadians. I wonder where he gets those figures? In our areas with 6,000 people, we have two general practitioners. It is not surprising that a patient who needs to see a doctor must wait one or two weeks. But these doctors do their best. They are alone for 6,000 people. How can they do their job satisfactorily? The minister said earlier: There is some fear that there are too many doctors. I do not know whether he got that fear from the College of Physicians and Surgeons, but I think that they are afraid that there will be too many doctors because this would affect their salary. However, a greater number of doctors would be much more useful to the population. In my area, I can assure you that we could easily use four doctors instead of two and that they would earn a good living of $60,000 a year. But no, we are stuck. That is the problem. People say: That happens in the country, in rural areas; all the surgeons and specialists stay in the few large centres that we have in Quebec. I can see that the figures are distorted because they include all the specialists in the large centres. But if we consider only the doctors who serve the population, we can see that we need 2,000 more doctors in Quebec. Each year, I have seen with my own eyes students who dreamt of a medical career. They had grades of 90 and 92 per cent, but were rejected. Why? I do not dare speculate here. But let us see. It is the worst closed shop ever. In our areas where 92 per cent of the population is French-Canadian, we are treated by foreign doctors because our own people have not been able to enter this closed shop.

I believe that we must point this out. The College of Physicians and Surgeons seems to think that we are ignoramuses. That we cannot realize what is going on. The whole population has been aware of it for a long time and people know why they cannot see a doctor when necessary. This is why I was surprised to hear a while ago the minister say that there will probably be too many doctors in a few years. No.

I merely say to the minister: Do not be afraid, open the door, open the universities, and if you do not have enough universities, open the CEGEPs which are standing idle, which are half-empty, and start medical classes in there. That is a solution.

Let nobody tell me that we lack facilities. When in our areas CEGEPs and composite schools are half-empty and will be only one-third full within five years, let nobody tell me that we spend too many millions. Colleges with 30 or 35 classrooms are closed down and they are handed over for a nominal price to the municipalities. Don't you think this is too much? That is administration. That is why I said earlier that what is wrong is overadministration and bad administration. We let the technocrats do as they please. And all they think about is to be overpaid for soft jobs, and then everything is fine. And as elected members of Parliament, we have nothing to say, we must obey the orders of technocrats. It requires less effort on its part if it lets all those technocrats do as they please and stays put. It only has to sign at the bottom of the letter but the real responsible people are still members of Parliament. And I think we fail in our duty by creating here through technocrats an irresponsible administration because members on the government side shirk their responsibilities, they pass them on to technocrats. It is true, some of your friends told me, they complained about that. There is a revolution in Quebec to have members of Parliament resume their jobs, their positions. Indeed, 250 Liberals in Quebec sat so the member of Parliament would resume his functions.

We travel through our ridings and know their needs street by street, parish by parish. And who comes up to manage all that, a technocrat who lives in Quebec City or Montreal who never understood what it was all about. And a legislation is prepared to try to improve health in Canada as in the province of Quebec, which is going to be discussed for a while. At present, everything is probably done, all the arrangements are probably made at the technocratic level, and that is going to be presented to the committee. Vote for, vote against, period. The majority is there. Amendments like that we can pass, and the more we do the worse the hospital service will be.

Now, to comfort us at the end, the minister tells us about the fund freeze in medical research. If there is something I am interested in it is medical research. I heard about the freeze, when all searchers live like beggars. Yet we need searchers. Indeed, I was speaking to two or three doctors who told me we would need three times more medical research here in Canada, and the funds for medical research just got frozen. What fear there is to give a little million dollars to try and find something new in medicine. And the funds are frozen for this year. Everything that is urgent gets frozen and all sorts of increases for insignificant things are allowed.

Finally, the minister tells us that he will undertake a fight. I noticed that when this bill is considered reforms or amendments will be examined with respect to the use of tobacco. I think it is time to do it, and the use of alcohol and drugs should also be added. I remember that, those past years, grants have been given to tobacco growers. How things change. A few years ago, Parliament voted grants for tobacco growers. Now, it is to be grants to control the use of tobacco. It has to be done, as it is in the case of alcohol, drugs and road safety. For weeks now, we have heard about seat belts; people think it is the answer to all problems. Of course, it is not.

The first problem to solve is, I think, the control of alcoholism, because one must not forget that 80 per cent of traffic accidents, and I have seen pretty bad one, are related to overdrinking. See what is happening: instead of talking about alcohol, or taking drastic measures, we talk about seat belts. I will tell you something, when a man is drunk, whether his seat belt is fastened or not, he will die in his car. Mind you, even if he is wearing his seat belt, he will die in his car. But this man who had too much to drink—and this can happen to anybody—should have been warned against driving.

Let us see now what goes on. Go and watch people leaving night clubs and beer parlors late at night: 50 per cent of the drivers cannot walk straight and get behind the wheel, and no policeman is watching. There should be a policeman to tell them: "My friend, you are too drunk, you cannot drive in your condition, better leave your car and walk home." That should be the first thing to do. But you never see a policeman as people come out of night clubs and beer parlors. Why? Because that would be bad for the provincial liquor business. You have to realize that the provincial liquor business, the provincial Liquor Corporation, has to make money. So this chap is allowed to kill himself. You know that he is drunk, but you let him drive his car and, with this new reform, instead of being warned against driving, he will be fastened to his seat. He is going to be tied to his seat. As long as he has fastened his seat belt, he will have the right to go and kill himself. But if he has not, he will lose his insurance. If he gets killed without his seat belt, his insurance will not pay. That is the inconsistency in the reforms proposed.

We must absolutely stop talking about the seat belt. First of all, I do not believe in it, because I say that in 50 per cent of the cases, the seat belt may save your life, but in the other 50 per cent, it may be the cause of your death. It is strange, but we have not heard of such cases often. If a car is dumped into a river, and if its passengers all have their seat belts fastened, they will all die like rats. In 50 per cent of collisions, the air pressure causes passengers to be propelled out of the car. If they stay inside, however, the fire will start and they will be trapped inside. I say: let us begin at the beginning. Everybody admits that 80 per cent of car accidents are caused by alcohol. Let us make a legislation that will prevent that. As for high speed, it does not depend only on drivers, Madam Speaker. Car manufacturers are allowed to build racing cars that can do 150 miles an hour. Why is that, when the speed limit is 70, even on our super highways. These cars should be locked at 70 miles an hour. Why allow car manufacturers to make racing cars that can do 150 miles an hour, when such speed is illegal? So, nobody would expect to travel at such speed. It is better to cure the problem at the root instead of trying to alleviate it. But in the end, people try to explain away accidents. They say: he was killed for such and such reason probably because he did not have a safety belt which was probably not true. The thing is to take due precautions beforehand. Safety should start when a car is built. We should impose our conditions on the manufacturers. I submit this would be much more worthwhile than the minor reforms the minister proposed this afternoon.

Now, he referred to sports and sports promotion. I do not know exactly if the minister only wants to promote sports on the international level, as far as international competitions are concerned, but I urge him once again to think about our local and regional athletes. This is where he should start, at the beginning. How hard it is to get a few dollars for our local athletes! And even then, programs would still be needed so that our young people may improve their performance.

But no; grants will be given in every sphere related to international competition, but never will city or municipal projects be accepted to help train local and regional athletes.

I do hope this matter of athletics will be discussed by the committee, so that help may be given to athletes from the bottom up, to encourage our own athletes, those who compete here, at home, in our province or elsewhere in Canada, before they go competing abroad.

I believe, Madam Speaker, I have already pointed this out to the hon. members in this House. I do hope this bill will not deal merely with the question of reducing costs, but also with the question of the services to the public, so that people will get better services, live in greater security in our area, and above all, live in a state of health that can be improved through the hospital centres that Canada like the province of Quebec can afford, considering the high cost of all such services. We pay enough taxes to have top quality hospital services, as the minister mentioned in his speech. But because of poor administration, a lack of supervision on the part of the departments, we live in the difficult conditions I have just described. I do hope this bill will improve the situation to some extent.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate on Bill C-68. This afternoon the minister extolled the virtues of the health care program in Canada, describing it as among the best in the world. I do not dispute this. However, the same program is now in peril of losing its excellence and faces considerable downgrading to the detriment of the health of citizens from one end of Canada to the other. The tool the government is using to accomplish this is the bill now before us. If the measure is passed as introduced it will seriously undermine the quality of health care throughout our country.

I am not questioning the need to try to reduce costs and control spending especially now when restraint should be the number one priority if we ever hope to make any progress in containing the fires of inflation. What I am questioning is the absence of any prior consultation with the provinces in an effort to achieve economies in health care. It was done unilaterally by the federal government contrary to the recommendations of a 1969 task force report which recommended that consultation should take place between federal and provincial governments before any monetary changes in the program were considered.

To my mind, Madam Speaker, when one partner is not aware of what the other partner intends to do it cannot help but sow the seeds of confrontation. And confrontation is what the federal government is facing today as a result of its unilateral action. I feel sure this situation could have been avoided had the federal government chosen to embark on prior consultation with the provinces in an effort to resolve this problem in a businesslike and amicable way as between equal partners.

A further recommendation in the 1969 task force report on the cost of health services in Canada stated that ways must be found to restrain the growth of cost increases through better operation of the health structure now in existence. I have no quarrel with that recommendation. It is my opinion that whether in the running of a business, a factory, or a home there will always be found, if one tries hard enough, ways to reduce costs and overhead expenses by eliminating waste, unnecessary frills and so on, without necessarily reducing the quality of service in the business field or the quality of life in the home. This is also true of a number of government programs presently in existence. Many of these should be eliminated entirely. Others in connection with which prudent spending of the taxpayer's dollars is only faintly evident or non-existent should be drastically curtailed.

On the other hand, there are programs which are commendable and from which the taxpayer receives his money's worth. Such a program is the medicare program, and that is why it is baffling to me to understand the government's decision to establish arbitrarily spending ceilings in relation to a scheme which has not demonstrated runaway cost increases to the extent other federally-sponsored projects have done.

Government spokesmen have maintained that health costs have risen by almost 20 per cent over the past year. I do not quarrel with this figure, but what the government fails to mention is that almost all the increase referred to is the direct result of escalating expenditures in hospitals, and not medical care generally. In the fiscal years 1972-73 and 1973-74 the increase in medical costs amounted only to 9.2 per cent and 7.2 per cent respectively; costs to the federal government have not been increasing at a greater rate than the national income.

Again, I ask why the central government has arbitrarily placed spending ceilings on a program which has not demonstrated the runaway cost increases of other federally sponsored programs? The answer lies in the fact that between 70 and 80 per cent of the total cost of medical care arises from salaries and wages. During a period of inflation such as we are now experiencing this means that an increase in wages of 20 per cent will result in an increase in total budgetary outlay of 14 per cent to 16 per cent. By imposing ceilings the federal government is ensuring that it will not have to pay medical expenses arising from its inability to control inflation.

Bill C-68, if passed, will limit the federal cost-sharing contribution to medicare to an increase of 13 per cent in 1976-77, 10.5 per cent in 1977-78, and a figure thereafter to be determined in a way not yet established. There is no question in my mind that the imposition of these ceilings will markedly affect the health care delivery system. The federal government insists that if costs should rise above these figures it will be the responsibility of each province to pick up the tab for the difference. Consequently three situations could potentially arise: (1) provincial revenues would be drained, and other programs or priorities would have to be deferred indefinitely to meet the increased costs; (2) where applicable, that is, in British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario, and the Yukon Territory, premiums most likely would have to be increased in order to offset high provincial expenditures; (3) if the provinces cannot meet the extra costs, medical services will have to be reduced.

Therefore, while Bill C-68 basically follows the recommendation of the 1969 task force concerning the need to face the situation caused by rising health costs, should the government's exercise in clairvoyance fail to justify itself, Canadians will be faced with two alternatives—reduced health care services or increased taxes, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. McKinley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker I wonder whether the acting house leader on the government side could confirm that we shall be discussing this legislation tomorrow and, possibly, on Friday.

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Madam Speaker.

At 6.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PROPOSED EXPRESSION OF DISAPPROVAL OF STATEMENTS MADE BY PRIME MINISTER IN CUBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43 to seek leave to propose a motion arising out of remarks attributed to the Prime Minister in Cuba yesterday which are in many ways reminiscent of the 1967 incident involving President de Gaulle's "Vive Quebec Libre". I would move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley:

With reference to yesterday's declarations and outbursts of "Viva" by the Prime Minister in Cuba, the House considers these, especially at a time when Cuba is heavily involved militarily in the Angolan civil war, a deplorable, degrading and disgusting incident which will undoubtedly and unfortunately be construed by world opinion as indicating Canada's support for dictatorial socialism, and, finally, the House dissociates itself from all recent utterances of the Prime Minister indicating disapproval of the free enterprise system.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put in the absence of unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OLYMPIC GAMES

PROVISION OF FACILITIES FOR SPECTATORS AND ATHLETES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. It is prompted by today's report that the Olympic Games stadium will not provide for flush toilets for some 70,000 spectators or proper changing facilities for some 10,000 athletes. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That the Minister of the Environment be requested to impose standards under the Clean Air Act and the new Environmental Contaminants Act which forbids, in section 2, "spilling, leaking, spraying, pouring, emitting, emptying, throwing or dumping of dangerous substances into the environment" and that the Minister of National Health and Welfare be requested to provide curtains for those athletes changing in their cars so that proper standards of modesty can be maintained and, third, that in view of past disappointments and future uncertainties in the construction of the Olympic site the Minister of Public Works obtain assurances for the House that the Games Committee will provide 70,000 one-holers rather than one 70,000-holer.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF DANGER OF MERCURY POISONING IN NORTHWEST QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that a report from Environment Canada has clearly shown that an industry in the Matagami and Lebel-sur-Quevillon area is a major source of mercury pollution and considering that such a source is liable to cause serious diseases among all individuals contaminated by mercury, I move, seconded by the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs investigate the dangers of mercury poisoning on the spot in Northwestern Quebec and report to this House on the means to be taken to protect the people of Northwestern Quebec from the serious danger of mercury poisoning.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is no unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

SUGGESTED EARLY IMPLEMENTATION OF PROCEDURE FOR APPEALS FROM BOARD DECISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity with regard to which I request prompt action on the part of the House. Recognizing the fact that the government's delay in instituting the Anti-Inflation Board appeals procedure has prolonged the strike in the Canadian paper industry, particularly by surrounding the critical Irving decision with an atmosphere of uncertainty and an aura of injustice, and noting the statement made by the Minister of Finance, as reported in the press, that the anti-inflation legislation may have to be amended to permit direct appeals from decisions of the Board, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond:

● (1410)

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to introduce immediately amendments to the anti-inflation legislation guaranteeing the prompt establishment of a just, non-arbitrary and equitable appeals procedure from Anti-Inflation Board decisions.

Mr. Speaker: According to the terms of Standing Order 43 such a motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House.

REQUEST FOR STRICT CONTROL OF IMPORTATION OF COLOUR TELEVISION SETS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House; I am sure that no hon. member can disagree with such a motion.

Considering that almost half of the colour TV sets sold in Canada, that is 46 per cent, are manufactured outside Canada, mostly in Japan and in the United States, and that the importation of such colour TV sets is detrimental to Canada and Quebec manufacturers and workers; and considering also that the Fleetwood company, the only colour TV manufacturer in Quebec, just said that it has to dismiss 150 employees, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House immediately take the required steps to exercise stricter control over U.S. and Asian importations in order to give greater protection to Canada and, particularly Quebec workers, where the unemployment rate is rising alarmingly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, it requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO STIMULATE INVESTMENT IN INDUSTRIAL PLANT—EFFECT OF LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising out of the very recent statement made by the chairman of the Economic Council. I quote him as follows:

Because of the relatively low level of business investment in recent years, however, our industrial capacity is insufficient to meet increased demand without aggravating inflationary pressures.

I should like to ask the minister whether he would indicate, in very brief and general terms, what steps he proposes to take to stimulate investment in industrial plant, in view of those comments and particularly in view of the unsettlement created by the Prime Minister's comments on the new society, or does he intend to leave this whole subject to the Minister of National Defence?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this question is obviously of such broad purport and requires such an extensive reply that it seems to me hardly one that can be effectively dealt with during the question period.

Mr. Stanfield: There might be some question whether the minister could effectively deal with it at any time. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he believes that the current level of the Canadian dollar, with its disturbing effects on Canadian exports, will encourage investment in industrial plant in Canada.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I did respond to the hon. member for Dauphin on this question two days ago. The current level of the Canadian dollar I do not think in itself will have a deterrent effect. We will, of course, have to monitor very closely movements of the Canadian dollar. If the current confidence of foreign investors in Canada continues, there will, of course, be upward pressure on the dollar and at that time we will have to consider what policy to adopt.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to stop fooling around. Does the hon. gentleman accept that investment in industrial plant in Canada in recent years has been inadequate, as indicated by the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, and if so, why does he not do something about it? What possible excuse can he have for waiting for spring, as he has indicated, for a budget?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman should recognize, after his experience in the House, that it makes far more sense to deal with questions of this kind, particularly involving fiscal changes, within the context of a budget. I am sorry that the reasons I have given for postponing a budget right at this moment do not appeal to the hon. gentleman, but I think they are sensible.

POSSIBILITY OF MEASURES TO CURB CONSUMER SPENDING—PROPOSAL OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL TO STIMULATE CONSUMER SPENDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of recent statements by the Minister of Public Works concerning excessive consumer spending, does the minister propose to take steps to curb consumer spending in Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): That is a question, of course, Mr. Speaker, along with others that would have to be considered in the framework of a general budgetary statement.

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Speaker, in view of the recommendations of the chairman of the Economic Council that personal income taxes be reduced to stimulate consumer spending in order to reduce unemployment, is the minister prepared to indicate which view he shares, that of the Minister of Public Works or that of the Economic Council?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should remind the hon. gentleman that the long standing practice in the parliamentary system has been to deal with fiscal statements and changes in fiscal policy within the context of the budget, and I would propose to adhere to that practice.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

EMISSION LEVELS AT SYNCRUDE—POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF FEDERAL STANDARDS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I received a letter yesterday in reply to questions I put to the Minister of the Environment concerning environmental controls in respect of the Syncrude project, in which the minister stated at one point that his department intends to use the "best practicable technology". Since the minister's own departmental study in 1974 on the Syncrude project indicated that it was possible to reduce the level of emission of sulphur dioxide to 40 long tons per day, why has this department permitted the project to proceed with levels of emission which will reach up to 287 long tons a day?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the first responsibility in that field lies, of course, with the government of Alberta. We have made some studies and my department believes it is possible to reduce the amount of sulphur dioxide emission from 287 long tons a day to 40 long tons a day. That being possible, the government is pressing the companies to use this new technology in order to obtain this reduction.

Mr. Broadbent: In the minister's letter to me he has indicated that the government has entered into an agreement with the government of Alberta that will permit "levels of emission up to the level of 287 long tons". What the minister is now saying, if I understand him well, is that this might not be the case, and that it is possible to get a level of control which is more rigorous than this, a level this government wants. What I want to do is get this minister, who is responsible for the environment in Canada, to make a commitment that it is the objective of this government, which holds an equity in the Syncrude project and is on the management committee, to insist on this standard as a condition to further federal participation.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that I will insist on having this present emission reduced. While it is true that we hold equity in the Syncrude project it is a small percentage, I think about 15 per cent, but even without a majority of the shares we intend to exercise pressure on these companies to do this.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to be as precise as possible on this matter. I would ask the minister whether the government is going to insist that the project comply with these possibilities indicated in the department's own study of 1974? Is the government going to insist that these practicable levels, a phrase which the minister used in his letter to me, are to be complied with in Syncrude as a condition to continued future federal government participation?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, we are going to advise the department of energy, as we have already done, in respect of this matter, as Syncrude does not come under my jurisdiction. I think what the hon. member suggests is something the department of energy is ready to do. I am sure the minister can answer for that department. As far as I am concerned, I am going to continue to advise, as in the past, that the Syncrude project should comply with these new standards.

REQUEST FOR ACTION AGAINST ORGANIZED CRIME

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice.

Considering that Quebec's commission against organized crime is, in the eyes of the people, a dismal farce whose only contribution has been to release the names of members of the underworld and murderers, can the minister tell us whether or not federal justice will step in, as some of those known criminals are let loose in the city of Montreal and no one seems to do anything about it while decent citizens are left at their mercy? Will federal authorities eventually intervene in the commission's activities?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the inquiry that has been held in Quebec has exposed a number of people, some of whom have been charged under federal or provincial statutes. I think the commission has been getting results. If there is evidence in the hands of the crown attorneys of the province of Quebec, I am confident that that evidence would be used to bring charges against persons in respect of whom they have evidence.

QUEBEC CRIME PROBE—GOVERNMENT ACTION IF COMMISSION DECLARED UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question: Since the Supreme Court is expected to rule within two days on the validity or that invalidity of the commission against organized crime, is the minister still prepared to put forward a bill to the House, should the Supreme Court of Canada declare the commission against organized crime invalid? Has the minister drafted legislation to face this eventuality?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have for some time indicated that should the intervention of the Supreme Court of Canada indicate that the Quebec crime inquiry is not constitutional I would be prepared to introduce legislation to clothe such provincial inquiries with constitutionality.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION CONCERNING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether my question is exactly supplementary but in any event I think it is complementary. It is directed to the Minister of Justice who has given a new vision to his department since taking over.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the uncertainty in all parts of our country concerning the lack of enforcement of capital punishment, which under the law is still in partial effect, I should like to ask the minister whether at the earliest possible date and certainly within the next two or three weeks he will see that a measure is brought before the House to determine once and for all the question of the imposition of capital punishment.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Well, Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General and I, on behalf of the government, indicated we would be bringing in a number of measures including the one referred to by the right hon. gentleman and we hope to do that as soon as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. These package pieces of legislation of course will not cover the situation. I am asking for assurance that the question of capital punishment will not be included in a mass of other amendments, but will be placed before the House by itself so that the House can determine this question with certainty and clarity.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, we have indicated we would be introducing a measure to deal with the question of capital punishment. Until the actual legislation is introduced I do not think I could go any further than I have today.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON LIMITATION OF RIGHT TO STRIKE

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Labour. I wonder whether the minister would indicate to the House if the government has changed its policy in the area of industrial disputes in favour of free collective bargaining as opposed to a policy of limitation of right to strike in so-called essential services or with respect to trade unions that possibly are so strong they can make unfair demands on employers. Has that policy been changed or is it the same policy as indicated by the Prime Minister prior to Christmas?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure that I fully understand the question put by the hon. member, but at any rate let me say that our policy with respect to free collective bargaining is the same as it has always been. What we are endeavouring to do, however, is to arrive at better techniques through consultation with management and labour on an active basis through the mechanism of the tripartite council, the Canada Labour Relations Council.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I wonder if I may ask the Minister of Labour if this policy has not been changed whether the Minister of Transport was expressing government policy when he indicated that he supported the elimination of the strike weapon in cases where unions are able to make excessive wage demands on employers, and that such measures should not only apply to so-called essential services, or is the government reviewing the whole question of the right to strike and, if so, can we expect legislation in this area in the near future?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the government, through its participation on the tripartite council is reviewing the whole area of the free collective bargaining process to try to eliminate the more adversarial elements as a means of arriving at industrial peace and this certainly includes trying to find a better technique to resolve labour stoppages in the public sector.

TRADE

PROPOSED INFORMATION PROGRAM TO MAINTAIN MARKETS IN UNITED STATES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has he been made aware and has he studied the recently issued report of our Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs which states the following:

Canada must set up an improved information program in the United States, or risk jeopardizing its trade with the United States market.

Has the minister examined that report and, if so, does he or his department intend to take steps to overcome this serious deficiency in promoting trade with our most important customer?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the report in full but I have been briefed by the chairman and the senators concerned. I am inclined to agree very much that we must step up our efforts to make the Canadian position, and Canada, generally better known in the United States. I think the hon. member will agree that I could not act more rapidly. The new minister of commerce will be sworn in on Monday. My request to him to see me will be filled as soon as he is sworn in. The new United States ambassador to Canada is being received, I believe, on the 17th of next month and I have an appointment with him on the 18th. These are the two immediate steps I will be taking in that connection and there will be many more.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REASONS FOR REGULATIONS CONCERNING BLUE TONGUE—POSSIBLE DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question relating to the livestock disease known as blue tongue and I wish to address it to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the very irresponsible lead editorial in the January issue of American Hereford Journal concerning Canada's new health of animals requirement for double testing for the blue tongue disease in imported cattle, and notwithstanding the need and validity of this new Canadian regulation for the protection of Canada's global trade relations in cattle, beef and sheep, would the minister consider making a formal statement giving the essential facts and reasons for Canada's revised policy regarding blue tongue?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it should be said here that Canada is free of this disease, both in the cattle population and the sheep population, and it is most important that we keep that record. I understand today that the U.S. secretary of state for agriculture has informed cattlemen in his country that he would do the same thing to protect his cattle industry if it was in the position in which the Canadian cattle industry finds itself.

Mr. Hargrave: In view of the likelihood of imminent public reaction in the United States demanding retaliatory action calling for similar testing procedures on Canadian cattle and possibly other border state actions, would the minister not feel it would be appropriate to further discuss this matter with U.S. Secretary Butz in view of the very real possibility that U.S. action could very well damage and impair the recent return to normal cattle trading practice between our two countries following the abolition of the quotas?

● (1430)

Mr. Whelan: We are very concerned about any action which may be taken by the United States, but we have had discussions with U.S. department of agriculture officials. They are fully informed about our concern with respect to our livestock being free from this disease, and we will be discussing it further with them to make sure people in their country who are concerned about this disease are fully informed and understand our position. When I was in the United States we did discuss blue tongue. The largest cattle population is in the state of Texas, and they are having difficulty in the state of Texas trying to control this disease. The only way to control it is to eradicate it. We have had to eradicate several herds imported from the United States in recent months because of blue tongue disease.

LIMITATION OF CATCHES ON WEST COAST—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fisheries), his parliamentary secretary or the acting minister.

Mr. Hees: Just anybody who will answer.

Mr. Anderson: This House recognizes the success of the minister in cutting down the catch by foreign long distance fishing fleets on the east coast of Canada. My question is, have there been any recent discussions or negotiations, or will any take place, regarding a limitation of catches on the west coast of Canada? This is of particular importance at this time due to the presence of East German trawlers off the west coast during the current herring season, and many people on the west coast fear that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Anderson: May I just finish, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Hees: Give us the third paragraph and the finale.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, it would be a very long answer if I were to describe all the negotiations which have taken place. However, certainly our negotiations with the Japanese and the Americans on the protection of halibut were successful. The East German fleet which was off the west coast has moved out. We made strong representations, and they moved away from the Canadian area. In addition, we now have on an ad referendum basis an agreement which has been negotiated with Poland, the details of which will be released in the weeks to come. This agreement will indicate that the situation with the Polish fishery on the west coast will come under a joint agreement, and Canada will protect its fisheries.

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that, as I informed him, some 25 per cent to 28 per cent of the labour force of 44,000 now in industrial Cape Breton is currently unemployed, and that the premier of Nova Scotia called a special meeting on January 19 to be followed by another meeting on February 9, at which the minister had a representative present, I should like to ask the minister if he would inform the House what projects or financial involvement may be forthcoming from the federal government to help alleviate this crisis situation in the short term and medium term development for the Cape Breton area.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the distressingly high unemployment rate in Cape Breton, and I am also aware that it may increase for a number of reasons. The programs of the department can help and are helping to alleviate this. We are going to bring to bear the whole range of manpower programs. Additional job creation, funding and training has already been discussed. As the hon. member pointed out, there was a meeting at which federal, provincial and other people attended, and there will be further meetings. I think in the longer term the answer must be more in the line of industrial development, which is outside the direct scope of my department, and meetings are taking place in Ottawa with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and my officials particularly to develop plans and to discuss further with the provincial authorities on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: One supplementary, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, if I only have one supplementary question, I will turn to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, because I want to follow up that vague reference. A representative of DREE attended the January 19 meeting and will attend the February 9 meeting. Is he going to announce what the department will consider doing, not for the long-term problem in connection with the steel industry, but for the short and medium term emergency infrastructure expenditures which will put people to work? There is $1 million in unemployment insurance going into that area every month. They are not getting jobs there, and they are not getting the active manpower policies which are needed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, just briefly, I know that the minister and department officials are working with the province of Nova Scotia to re-examine some of the ongoing agreements there to try to alleviate the problems raised by the hon. member, so I presume that by that time they will have some concrete suggestions to put forward.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN SPRUCE BUDWORM CONTROL PROGRAM IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment, of which I gave him notice. In view of the critical situation in New Brunswick forests because of infestation of spruce budworm, will Canada share with New Brunswick and private industry in funding a spray control program for 1976? Will the minister agree to continue research into a control program which does not involve the spray control program?

So that I will not have a supplementary question, has the minister seen a telegram from the premier of New Brunswick indicating that it is urgent that the decision Canada makes be made very rapidly so that lead time can be put in place?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first I will answer the last part of the question. I have not seen the telegram. I do not think it was addressed to me. With regard to the spruce budworm, if the question is limited to the research we should do, we are ready to do that, and we have been doing it for quite a length of time.

As far as money is concerned, I have no money in my budget, and I am told by Mr. Hanusiak or Mr. Boudreau, who is the minister of natural resources, that it would cost about $7.5 million more than New Brunswick can afford. I am trying to reach an agreement with DREE in order to redirect some resources in the present agreement or in the forestry sub-agreement with New Brunswick in order to take care of at least part of what is required. However, I cannot promise we can reach this $7 million. This would be quite difficult.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION TO REFUSE CERTAIN PROJECTS

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, to whom I gave advance notice of my question.

Since the Local Initiatives Program will be terminated in June 1976 and since a large proportion of the people of the constituency of Hochelaga is unemployed, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to change that decision of the federal government in order to meet the essential needs of constituencies like Hochelaga, knowing that the suppression of such projects will further disadvantage a constituency like the one I represent?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as indicated by the President of the Treasury Board in December, there is a reduction in the allocation for local initiatives for the fiscal year 1976-77, although there is a remaining commitment for $100 million for a program of a very similar nature in job creation. While we have not worked out the details, it will be our intention to direct even more stringently that fund and those fundings to areas of high unemployment. This will probably result in a reduction of allocations to other constituencies where that is not so serious a problem. I think Hochelaga will probably fall within the range of those constituencies which will receive attention.

AGRICULTURE

CHEESE—GOVERNMENT INTENTION WITH REGARD TO IMPORTS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture, and it relates to the existing surpluses of industrial milk. In light of the fact that a significant portion of this surplus could be used in the Canadian cheese processing industry, if that industry were operating in a satisfactory economic climate, I ask the minister if it is still government policy to permit imports of foreign cheese to at least double over the next few years.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon. member, there are many cheese factories, and one not too far from his constituency, which increased production by 22 per cent this year for the fiscal dairy year, and this is on the increase. Many other cheese factories are doing that. We have said we are reconsidering the amount of cheese that will be allowed to be brought into Canada by permit. A decision has not been made on that problem at this time.

● (1440)

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, may I hope the increase is 44 per cent next year. As a final supplementary may I ask the minister, to at least ease the short term problem of the industrial milk crisis, if he can assure the House now that imports of foreign cheese for this year will not be allowed to increase over the levels that existed for foreign cheese imports last year?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the level of imported foreign cheese to Canada last year was 50 million pounds and that was agreed to by the Canadian dairy producers and the Canadian dairy processors. I can say that the surplus of milk production in Canada today exceeds that amount by about 5 per cent which, is 26 per cent above what it was last year at this time.

Mr. Jarvis: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could guarantee to us now that imports this year will not exceed the 50 million pounds figure? I quite agree with his answer as far as it went but now could he answer my question about this year?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member had more optimism. I said I was going to try to lower that figure and we are still working on it.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SPRUCE BUDWORM—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN CONTROL PROGRAM IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is a supplementary one to the Minister of the Environment who suggested when he answered the hon. member for Fundy-Royal that he was going to ask for a reallocation of DREE funds. Did he mean that funds already allocated to New Brunswick under agreement would have to be redirected to fill the needs of the budworm spraying operation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): That is what I meant, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McCain: A supplementary question. In view of the vast economic importance of the lumber industry to eastern Canada, does it not seem only proper that the Minister of the Environment and the government of Canada should share this cost not only with New Brunswick but with other provinces as well which are just coming into the critical period of budworm infestation?

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, right on, sure! This is a problem which definitely falls under provincial jurisdiction. We are ready to help but we are not ready to assume responsibility for the spruce budworms. Budworms belong to provincial jurisdiction. I think the hon. member is right. If we do something we will need to have a national policy on this and that means we have to pay. Most of the forests are affected and Quebec has more forests than New Brunswick affected by the—

Mr. Nielsen: There are more worms in Quebec.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We will have to pay all provinces which are afflicted by this insect infestation.

PUBLIC WORKS

THE CEDING OF BOIS DE COULONGES TO QUEBEC GOVERNMENT—POSSIBILITY OF CONDITIONS IN TRANSFER ACT

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Contrary to the allegations made by the Quebec Minister of Cultural Affairs, as reported by the Canadian press on Wednesday, January 28, 1976, that the federal government has traditionally refused to surrender the land it owns in Quebec, could the Minister of Public Works confirm that around mid-January 1976, the federal government surrendered to Quebec, without financial compensation and on a voluntary basis, the site known in Quebec City as Bois de Coulonges, where previously stood the residence of the lieutenant-governor of the province which burnt in 1964? Can he also tell the House whether conditions regarding the occupation of the site were included in the transfer act?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that the transfer of the land was made in mid-January as described. I shall also say that there was no transfer condition regarding the residence of the lieutenant-governor at Bois de Coulonges.

ENERGY

PROPOSED SITE FOR ELDORADO NUCLEAR PLANT—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO MUNICIPALITY TO CONDUCT ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It has come to my attention that Burwash, a community in the riding of Nickel Belt, is being considered as one of four possible locations for an Eldorado nuclear chemical plant of twice the capacity of Port Hope. In view of recent events in Port Hope which have raised the question of the impact nuclear plants on residents in the area, can the minister assure the House that funds will be provided to area municipalities where the plant will be located so that independent environmental studies can be undertaken and that all studies done will be made public? Secondly, can the minister assure the House that adequate public hearings will be held in the area to allow local citizens an input into the final decision?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give a complete answer to the hon. member. I know there has been a task force formed and something like a dozen different sites have been looked at throughout Ontario and other parts of Canada. Many municipalities have requested that the new refining facility be put in their municipality. Environmental testing and economic factors are also under consideration. I will certainly make these representations to Eldorado and make sure that the community to which the hon. member refers is consulted in respect of the site selection.

OLYMPIC GAMES

INQUIRY WHETHER MONTREAL ASKED FOR ASSISTANCE OF ARMED FORCES—RESPONSIBILITY FOR PAYMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

[Mr. Joyal.]

Is he in a position to tell this House whether the Quebec government or the city of Montreal have requested from the federal government the Canadian Armed Forces services for the duration of the Olympic Games in Montreal? If so, how many troops would be affected?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be directed to the Minister of National Defence.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): In this case, Mr. Speaker, I shall put a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. I hope you will allow me to repeat my question.

I would like the minister to tell this House whether the municipal government of Montreal or the Quebec government have filed a request to the Department of National Defence to obtain the Armed Forces services during the Olympic Games that will take place in Montreal in 1976? If so, how many men will be dispatched for this purpose?

[English]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, extensive discussions have taken place. As I announced before, there will be approximately 10,500 members of the Canadian armed forces assisting at the Olympic games next summer. About 5,000 or 5,500 of those will be directly involved in security. About 2,500 will be working with COJO and another 2,500 will be providing support to the other members of the inside group.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister replied in the affirmative, could he tell the House whether it will be a federal contribution or whether the Quebec government will have to take charge of the expenditure?

[English]

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the regular salary or pay and allowances will be paid by the federal government but the out of pocket costs or additional costs may be paid for by others. I do not think there has been complete negotiation on the out of pocket costs. It appears to us now that National Defence will have a cost of approximately $24 million above the regular pay and allowances.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH TEACHERS

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. As federally paid teachers are paid much less than provincially paid teachers could the minister tell the House at what stage negotiations are now and whether there is any chance of a catch-up?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I believe that negotiations have resumed on the matter and I hope we will reach an agreement very soon.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE ASSISTANCE TO SERVICE STATION OPERATORS TO REPLACE PUMPS IF PRICE OF GASOLINE EXCEEDS ONE DOLLAR

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that hundreds of thousands of service station operators in Canada are collecting taxes for the federal government through the 10 per cent tax, and in view of the fact that the press at least indicates that the cost is going to go to a dollar a gallon or more, is the federal government or the ministry prepared to assist these service station operators to replace their gas pumps which only read 99.9 cents at the moment and will have to be geared to read a dollar or a dollar plus.

Hon. Donald Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I would doubt it, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST GLENWOOD CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BE INFORMED OF ACTION TO RESTORE MOVEMEMT OF GRAIN

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. There is to be a meeting of the chamber of commerce in Glenwood tonight to discuss methods that might be taken to restore grain transportation. Will the minister assure the House that he will contact the Chamber of Commerce in Glenwood before their meeting tonight with a statement of his intentions?

● (1450)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to let the Chamber of Commerce know of our intentions. The intention to use trucks to relieve the congestion of elevators isolated by the bridge being out developed additional congestion in some of the neighbouring elevators. Accordingly, we have again viewed the condition of the bridge in question. I have now written to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company asking them to repair the bridge. I hope they can take further action in this regard.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBILITY OF MOVING ADDITIONAL TROOPS TO GERMANY FOR MANOEUVRES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. Several weeks ago the Chief of Defence Staff stated that he planned to deploy for exercises the 1,100 troops that our mechanized brigade group in Germany needs to bring it up to fighting strength. Has the minister approved or has he any knowledge of any projected exercise to determine if we can find and move 1,100 troops to Germany as part of such an exercise?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, since returning to Ottawa, I have not had discussions with the Chief of Staff on that subject.

Mr. McKinnon: Can the minister assure us that he has sufficient troops earmarked for this role to ensure that the exercise, or the operation, could be carried out during the time of the Olympic Games, for example?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I am certain that if the Chief of Staff planned that troop movement, he clearly has sufficient troops. He is very familiar with the requirement for the Olympic Games.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF STATEMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER IN CUBA

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the difficulty of various cabinet ministers to explain away other recent statements of the Prime Minister, can the Acting Prime Minister explain the reasons for the statement or outburst of the Prime Minister, namely "viva Cuba, viva Castro", alleged to have been made by the Prime Minister in Cuba yesterday?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best answer I can give is that of one of the more astute observers here, Mr. Geoffrey Stevens who said in his column yesterday "these words are apt to cause Mr. Trudeau some concern". However, he went on "but that would be unfortunate because the words were both expected and innocent".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPORTS

GOVERNMENT INTENTION WITH REGARD TO AID FOR AMATEUR HOCKEY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact the minister is well known for his intervention in professional sport in this country, can he advise this House whether he is prepared to share his concern with the financially ailing junior hockey teams in particular and amateur hockey in general as they tend to be far more Canadian and have a much stronger impact on our youth than the CFL, for example.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I often meet with representatives of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association and Hockey Canada. Meetings are held regularly and very frequently and I must say relations are excellent. In fact, there is no serious problem in abeyance between the department and the CAHA at the present time. We are working amicably and towards common objectives.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—DATE OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT AND TABLING OF SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs whom I would like to welcome back from a very hazardous journey.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I congratulate him for overnight giving foreign policy a completely new image—option number four I guess. Will the minister indicate when he will be making a statement in the House on the subject of the agreement with South Korea relating to safeguards of CANDU because, in his absence, it was indicated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that he would be doing this as well as tabling the agreement. Will the minister advise when we may expect this so that those of us who are interested will be sure to be here to not miss anything.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his welcome which I appreciate very much. I am more confortably seated here than I was on the occasion to which my hon. friend referred. I intend to table tomorrow the agreement on nuclear co-operation between Canada and the Republic of Korea which was signed in Seoul on Monday of this week and possibly make a short statement so that members may ask questions if they wish.

FOOD PRICES

REPORT ON FOOD PRICES IN THE NORTH—POSSIBLE IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is with respect to the report of the Food Prices Review Board on northern food prices which was tabled just before the Christmas recess. Have any of the recommendations of the report been adopted, in particular that which had to do with further investigation into the reason for the high cost of foods in Canada's north?

[Mr. Jelinek.]

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I had notes on the subject but, unfortunately, I have just sent them back to my office. I thought I would not be asked any questions before the end of the question period. I shall answer the hon. member tomorrow.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONTINUING CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Before putting my question, may I join in welcoming the minister back to the House. While having his camel ride and meditating, did he give consideration to reporting to the House on the continuing Conference on International Economic Co-operation, of which he is co-chairman, and specifically will he indicate what policies will be presented by the Canadian officials on the two commissions, energy and development, to which Canada has been named?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will consider reporting to the House on developments to date on the Conference on International Economic Co-operation which was held in Paris just before Christmas and the meeting of the co-chairman of the conference and co-chairmen of the commissions which was held in Paris on Monday and Tuesday of this week, if that would be useful. I will attempt to make a brief report to the House, possibly one day next week, and give hon. members an opportunity, if they wish, to ask some questions. It would be difficult at this stage to project in full the policies that the government will put forward at the two commissions mentioned, but these are under consideration and preparation.

POSSIBILITY OF DEBATE ON SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of his statement a few moments ago that he intends to table tomorrow the agreement with South Korea for the sale of a nuclear reactor to that country, because of the far-reaching implications of such an agreement, particularly in the present world situation, is he prepared to introduce at the same time or within the next few days a motion before the House in order that this matter may be discussed and debated and so that the members of this House may have an opportunity of expressing their views with regard to this transaction?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we will see how we get along tomorrow. It may be that the agreement itself and the explanations will make a further debate unnecessary.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask the government House leader the intentions of the government with regard to the business for the balance of this week and next week.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to continue the debate which is now taking place on Bill C-68, the amendments to the Medical Care Act. If we can make enough progress on Bill C-68 within the next day or so, this will be followed by Bill C-72, on human rights.

● (1500)

As I indicated earlier in the week, it would be our intention to call next week, subject to any last minute developments, Bill C-58 and Bill C-81. Those were the items we had in contemplation. I should add that I hope there will be an opportunity, also, of disposing of the amendments made by the Senate to Bill S-10. I do not suppose that will take very long.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Perhaps I might ask the hon. gentleman another question. I note there is nothing on the order paper with respect to statements made by the Prime Minister dealing with a new concept of labour relations, and I wonder whether it is the intention of the government to bring forward this session a bill with respect to those plans which the Prime Minister indicated in a speech are in existence at this time. If it is not the minister's intention to do so in the course of the present session, may I ask whether the government has determined irrevocably that there will not be an end to this session, a Speech from the Throne and a new session of parliament within, perhaps, a month or so, when one might consider this legislation?

Mr. Sharp: When I was discussing this matter with the House leaders last week, I indicated the bills we had in mind bringing forward if this session were to continue, say, until June 30. The particular legislation to which the hon. member referred was not on that list. If, however, a decision were made—I do not think this is likely—to begin a new session with a Speech from the Throne in the near future, we would then, of course, be looking at a much more comprehensive program and one which might conceivably include that kind of legislation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader whether the cabinet, at its meeting today, approved a bill to implement the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs having to do with pensions for Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war, and is he in a position to tell us now when such a bill will be introduced?

Mr. Sharp: That item was not on the agenda today, but I listened to what my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs said, that he thought he would have something to say about the matter within a couple of weeks.

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Speaker: The next item under routine proceedings would be statements by ministers. It has been made clear that a statement of some importance is to be made today by the Minister of Transport, and since this would be followed by questions I wonder whether hon. members would not agree that we ought to conclude routine proceedings before reverting to statements by ministers in order to accomplish this?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

OCEAN DUMPING CONTROL ACT

Question No. 3,810—Mr. Marshall:

1. Which nations have applied for permits under the Ocean Dumping Control Act for (a) general dumping (b) dredging (c) incineration at sea (d) disposal of vessels (e) disposal on ice and, in each case, what are the details of such applications?

2. In what manner does Canada control and prevent the dumping of wastes?

3. Have logistic reports been prepared and, if so, what are the details of such reports?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): 1. To date, there have been no applications for permits under the Ocean Dumping Control Act which originated outside Canada.

2. The requirement to possess a permit, prior to dumping substances at sea, is the primary control mechanism under the Ocean Dumping Control Act. The statute specifies that a comprehensive list of factors be taken into account before such permits are granted. Enforcement is carried out by inspectors who have been appointed under the act.

3. The Ocean Dumping Control Act and Regulations came into force on December 13, 1975, and thus far, there has been insufficient activity to warrant preparation of any logistic reports.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that question 3,141 be made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise to draw attention once again to question 69 which was placed on the order paper nearly three calendar years ago, namely, on September 30, 1974. It is a simple question asking for straightforward facts, namely, how many trips the Prime Minister has taken at public expense since October 30, 1972, and, of that total, how many have been trips to political gatherings or for the purposes of private pleasure.

No matter how many times this question is raised, there is never any response from the government or any indication of what has been holding up an answer for almost three years. Every day in the gallery there is a horde of people from the Prime Minister's office who have time to sit up there. I suggest, therefore, that they should have time to go back to their offices and complete the answers to questions asked by members of the House of Commons, so that the people of Canada might have some idea of the facts in relation to matters about which members of the opposition ask.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: May I conclude by saying this: now, perhaps more than ever, it is important we know something about the Prime Minister's trips as he has obviously become a fellow traveller whom we should be questioning.

TRANSPORTATION

POLICY STATEMENT ON RAIL PASSENGER SERVICES

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, transportation for people is vitally important in Canada and we believe that Canadians themselves ought to be able to choose the method of travel which suits their own needs from among safe, sound systems. Since transportation is so important a matter for Canadians, we cannot waste our resources on unused, inefficient or duplicated systems.

We have operated extensive rail passenger services in Canada. However, they have been allowed to deteriorate so that Canadians no longer have a fair incentive to use them. This was in no way due to any fault on the part of those who operate the trains, but to a combination of management and government policies which could only produce losses and worsening service. It is my intention today to change that policy as far as the government is concerned and to outline an approach which will provide better service but in a narrower range of areas.

We are very conscious of the impact of these changes, both positive and negative, upon communities and upon the men and women who run our passenger trains. I have begun a process of consultation with their leaders. I plan to continue, and I hope, with the assistance of members of parliament, to consult with the workers and people to be directly affected, to ensure that we understand their views. Where adjustments are necessary, we plan to ensure that they are made with as much sense and sensitivity as possible. I expect, in particular, to develop plans to avoid hardship to workers affected by changes in service.

When the major elements of our transportation policy were announced in June of last year, we stated that Canadians must have an efficient transportation system providing a high degree of accessibility and equity of treatment for all users. Transportation must also support national and regional, social and economic objectives. The new transportation policy recognizes that areas exist where services are well developed and utilized. These services should be operated on a commercially viable basis and fares should be set through the efficient forces of competition and the marketplace. In other areas where services are required for social or developmental purposes but cannot achieve commercial viability, the government is prepared to provide leadership and assistance to develop the best possible level of efficiency.

We also emphasize throughout the new transportation policy that Canadians require the use of highway, rail, marine and air services to provide the best level of services at the lowest total cost, and that these modes of transportation must work together in the roles for which they are best suited. This policy has resulted from extensive consultations with the provinces, industry and labour. It recognizes regional differences and provides a framework in which positive action can be developed to move the commerce of the nation and provide for business and leisure travel.

As our research has progressed over the past year and we have considered the needs and costs of transportation, it has become clear that we cannot afford unnecessary duplication of facilities. This is particularly true at this time of financial restraint. We have also found that bus, air and rail, while they do compete, have distinct markets in which they have special advantages. It is our intention, as we further develop passenger policies, that each mode of transport be given the opportunity to develop these markets. This will provide Canadians with access to acceptable levels of service at the least total cost. Where a subsidy is required in support of regional and national goals, the most economically efficient mode will be used, and the impact of that subsidy on other modes of transport will be considered.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are not pleased with the railway passenger system as it currently exists. Losses amounted to $167 million in 1974 and they are increasing: they may amount to $400 million by 1980 if changes are not made. We are not alone in the world in this respect. Governments in almost every industrialized nation are wrestling with similar problems of mounting losses. Canada now has more miles of rail passenger services per capita than any other major nation. Many of our services meet high international standards in terms of amenities, speeds and fares. Revenues cover about one-third of the total costs of providing the services. Subsidies provided by the Canadian public are proportionately higher for passenger trains than they are for other forms of transportation.

● (1510)

The primary reason for this situation is that other forms of transportation, primarily the automobile, have proven more attractive to the public. The impression grew that passenger trains were obsolete and this in turn affected growth and the evolution and development of new equipment and techniques. We are left with a system designed for an earlier Canada.

Consider these examples, Mr. Speaker. About 20 per cent of the services operated carry 10 passengers or less on the average, 55 per cent less 47, or a bus load, and only 35 per cent more than 100. Over the year, only one-third of the seats offered are sold. At daily peak periods, about one-third of the fleet is actually in operation. There are over 2,000 miles of routes where CN and CP duplicate services, and duplicate terminals in many major cities. On transcontinental routes, more subsidy is currently being paid for fist-class services than for basic coach transportation.

One course of action recommended by some is the total elimination of rail passenger services and therefore the losses currently incurred. We believe, however, that rail service can fill a real need at a reasonable cost and that only if the service is desirable and efficient will we be able to test the real and future place for it among Canadians. We believe we can develop a better rail system, thereby avoiding some demands for highways and airports and the use of transportation systems that are less efficient in their use of energy and land.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are potentially three major roles for passenger trains, roles that can be filled at reasonable subsidy levels, provided services are improved and operated efficiently and economically. First are short to medium-distance services between major cities where rail offers the potential of trip times somewhere between those of automobiles, buses and aircraft; second are commuting trips in and about major cities for the movement of large numbers of people; and third are long distance trips across the breadth of the country where trains might provide a higher level of basic service than buses. Rail services should also be continued in those remote areas of our country where no reasonable transportation alternatives exist. These roles recognize the ability of trains to carry large numbers of people, to require minimum amounts of new land and, if well patronized and efficiently operated, to make good use of energy. Procedures are being established to determine the public's interest in improving these services.

However, Mr. Speaker, on some routes in Canada passenger trains do not serve the public well. In our view, bus and air transportation can often provide the public with better quality and more frequent services at lower cost. It is the government's intention to encourage the development of these services to replace passenger trains on routes where trains are poorly suited to the market or poorly patronized.

It is our intention to work toward an economically and socially justified national network of rail services. We propose that a basic network of intercity, transcontinental and commuter services, co-ordinated with air and bus service where possible, be implemented. This will provide Canadians with an opportunity to respond to improved services and for us to understand the nature and degree of this response.

Our work is also progressing on the project to upgrade service in the Windsor-Quebec corridor. This comparatively high volume market appears to have the potential for supporting a better service. Our understanding of the costs and markets has been significantly improved since the announcement of this project, and we have begun discussions with the provinces and the carriers on the potential improvements and the phasing of changes so that safety, speed, comfort, service and costs can all be developed to meet demand. We plan, if possible, to begin upgrading the service in the near future and, depending on negotiations, to announce shortly full details of a plan that will see new equipment operating at higher standards by 1979.

The rail passenger program we are proposing is an open consultative process which my statement today formally launches. We propose active consultations with the provincial governments in the planning of regionally-based passenger services, with labour representatives to ensure the best use of the valuable human resources involved, with industry, with the railroads, with other carriers and with the public at large. The government is asking the Canadian Transport Commission to hold hearings within the framework established by these policies and guidelines to determine public interests and concerns. To implement this phase of the program, Mr. Speaker, I will be tabling directives for the guidance of the Canadian Transport Commission. In parallel, Transport Canada will itself consult with carriers, labour, provinces and others concerning their areas of interest and concern. This work will form the basis for plans for the introduction of an improved basic network of rail services in Canada. As service improvements are implemented and subsidy per passenger decreased, the government is prepared to increase its subsidy from 80 per cent of losses to 100 per cent of losses provided that efficiency in management and operations can be demonstrated.

The purpose of this program, Mr. Speaker, is to create a transport system that supports economic and social goals on both national and regional levels. We will now expect Canadian National, Canadian Pacific and others to make management decisions to improve services. We also see these carriers making joint use of terminals and reservation systems, making schedules more sensitive to the regional markets, developing systems to change holiday and weekend demand so that most of the carriers' equipment is used on a continuing basis rather than on the few peak days per year, co-ordinating schedules between air, bus and rail to remove long stopovers, developing the demonstration project to evaluate advanced rail technology, furthering research in necessary roadbed improvements, and embarking on innovative passenger service marketing.

Through this approach we are giving the railways an opportunity to develop rail passenger services to serve markets willing to use and pay for the services. They will be asked to develop a system, with our assistance, that will better serve people who wish to use rail, and remove services that are unnecessary. Their challenge is to improve service and operations by joint action where necessary, but under normal rail management. If the attractiveness and efficiency of service is not improved rapidly, we will have to consider another organization to provide rail passenger service in Canada.

In outlining this program, Mr. Speaker, we have presented a part of our passenger program. We announced last year that, starting in 1977, $100 million will be spent over five years in the purchase of rail commuter equipment. These two programs are integral parts of a series of initiatives that are being developed to assure that a total passenger policy meets our national and regional goals.

It is our intention to pursue improvements in the attractiveness, efficiency and economy of passenger trains in roles for which they are well suited and can be well patronized. In roles where passenger trains are poorly suited to the market or poorly patronized, our intention is to encourage other modes to replace them. In this manner we plan to improve transportation for Canadians and to control the deficits that are growing beyond acceptable levels. I emphasize that in doing this we seek the advice and the cooperation of the public, carriers, labour and the provinces.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should now like to table the following: a directive for the guidance of the Canadian Transport Commission on rail passenger services; a report on "Canadian Passenger Rail Services"; a report on "Technology and Productivity in Passenger Transportation"; and a paper on "A Canadian Rail Passenger Program".

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be as brief as the minsiter was, but the whole question of rail passenger transportation can take up a good deal of time in the House of Commons. Before I start, may I commend the minister—perhaps this is the only time I will commend him this afternoon—for giving us adequate notice of his statement; I think all opposition parties appreciate that.

In alluding to the statement made by the minister and the build-up that has taken place in the press over the past few weeks about a major statement on rail line policy, I think we can say, firstly, that the statement just read by the minister is a flop. In my opinion, the government certainly has attempted to gloss over, in this statement, its real aims and objectives. I think this statement is significant for what it does not say, rather than for what it does say.

The government apparently has accepted the status quo as the basis for its rationale behind the whole program. I think that is unacceptable and wrong at the present time. Obviously, the government does not intend to improve train service generally in Canada, according to the statement. There is nothing specific about buying equipment other than the $100 million promised last year which is to be spread over a five-year period, and there is nothing specific in the minister's statement about investment on capital. That is also significant.

Perhaps we can draw some parallel with the airlines. I do not think many people in this country want to fly on 25-year-old aircraft which do not have proper scheduling. The parallel could be drawn in respect of passenger rail service, and the minister has not addressed himself to this specific question. His statement in general will only heighten fears in respect of the intended demise of rail passenger services in this country.

I should like to back up my statement, and statements by many people in the country, as far as fears are concerned by reading briefly from a copy of a cabinet document that was issued in Ottawa. This is a confidential document that went to cabinet. I think it reveals more clearly the minister's thinking than does the minister's statement. Quite a bit of what the minister said in his statement is in this document, but he left out some rather important specifics. I would challenge the minister by suggesting that some of these specifics indicate what the CTC, in effect, is going to do.

This document says, in respect of the rationalization concept, that the government intends to propose a concept of three main elements, one being a western network of through services comprising a single main route between Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, with connecting services as necessary; an improved central network between Quebec and Windsor, including connecting services; and an Atlantic network of through services comprising a single main route east from Montreal, with connecting services as necessary. The document goes on to state:

> It is proposed to work toward this revitalized basic network over a period of approximately three years which would allow for a series of public hearings before the CTC and provide time for implementation of the basic network and connecting services following hearing conclusions.

This certainly shows that at least the cabinet, if not the government, has made up its mind as to what it intends to do as far as rail passengers are concerned. This so-called revitalization, in the opinion of a lot of people, should be called destruction. The minister did not mention two of the things that people will be very concerned about. I read again from the policy document, which states:

> —given the potential of the Quebec-Windsor corridor and decisions to improve rail passenger services there, the western and maritime regions may express concern that central Canada is to be benefited preferentially—

I think that may be an understatement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murta: The other point that I think bears mentioning is the following statement in this document:

> —there are 96,000 railway union members with 12,000-15,000 man-years in passenger rail services. Although a carefully staged and implemented plan of revitalization can be devised which would affect a relatively small number of jobs—possibly under 1,000—employees will be concerned about the revitalized network and the effect on their positions.

That is also an understatement. In speaking with people in the railway business, I find them talking in terms of many thousands of people who will be either directly, or certainly indirectly, affected. The statement continues:

> The most likely result of following this guideline will be the selection of the present CNR lines between Montreal-Toronto and Sudbury and of the CPR line from Sudbury to Vancouver.

The statement goes on to say, as the minister has mentioned, that the Quebec-Windsor corridor will come up for analysis and that city pairs may be considered such as Toronto-Windsor, Quebec-Montreal and Ottawa-Toronto.

In recommendations in this statement we find the following:

—the replacement of present CNR and CPR transcontinental and maritime services by single route services—

The minister never mentioned that. If he does not intend such a move in that direction, I wish he would say so. The statement continues:

These services to involve the reduction or elimination of sleeper cars unless at full cost recovery rates and/or the use of railway hotels to the extent feasible to minimize the sleeper car problem—

This is ridiculous, and the minister and MOT officials should know it.

Mr. Fairweather: Are they going to put wheels under the hotels?

Mr. Murta: What is indicated is that ultimately, if we are going to travel on the railways, we will certainly be staying at railway hotels. Running through the document is a direct indication that the government has made up its mind to downgrade rail passenger services, and that downgrading appears to be a psychological expression of the kind of thinking at the present time in the Ministry of Transport.

As I said before, the minister's statement is significant in what it did not say, rather than what it said. I am not going to deal with all the election promises made, but the minister in charge of the Wheat Board probably campaigned with some of these same election promises. On June 18, 1974, in Cornwall, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced that the Liberal government, if re-elected, would take over all national passenger services operated by Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway. The Prime Minister talked about forming a corporation and a piggyback service on our transcontinental line. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the government had no intention whatsoever of implementing these kinds of proposals. These were strictly political window-dressing to seduce voters at the time of the last election.

I know my time is limited, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to mention the kind of thinking that takes place in the Ministry of Transport. We in this country are apparently to have airports coming out of our ears. We spent $1.45 billion on the airport at Mirabel. Although the Pickering airport was scrapped, or has been postponed, it was going to cost us another $400 million. The Malton terminal 2 building cost us $42 million in 1973 and a parking extension cost us $125 million. We have all this, yet the department is not putting any money into existing facilities in order to fix up rail passenger services in this country.

STOL is a perfect example of the kind of blind-headed philosophy the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the government have at the present time. It is running at a deficit, and would have been running at a much larger deficit were it not for the fact that civil servants have been instructed to use this facility between Ottawa and Montreal.

The minister mentioned the user pay concept this afternoon, and I suggest we will hear a lot more about this concept in the future. The minister, his deputies and officials in MOT should know that there is no form of transportation, no matter what it is, that operates on a strictly user pay concept, and to single out railways and railway passenger service is a red herring. To do that in this case is totally unrealistic and I do not believe the Canadian public will swallow it.

It is interesting to note, when we talk about psychology, that maybe one of the reasons behind this rather blind-sided policy is the fact that in the past two or three years there have been over 40 studies carried out on all aspects of rail passenger service. In 1970 there was a CTC study of intercity passenger transportation which concluded that it was possible to upgrade the Montreal-Toronto rail route so as to provide a good, three-hour rail service between the two cities. In 1972 an MOT and railways study recommended the nationalization of all maritime rail passenger services. The study supposedly forecast annual savings of up to $8 million. In 1973 there was a study which indicated that through the use of LRC-type trains it would be possible to provide a one hour and fifteen minute service between Montreal and Ottawa, and that the service could possibly make a profit.

The studies continued until the last one, in October, 1975. At that time three new studies were started by MOT. One heading is, "What is equity service for bus, rail and air?" That study was by the MOT task force. Another study was headed, "Passenger transportation work program". That was conducted by MOT's passenger core group. Another was, "Possible improvements to rail passenger services in the corridor". That, too, was carried out by MOT's policy, planning and major projects group with the participation of CNR and CPR. The list goes on and on. The government continually has put its rail passenger transportation policies in some desk or on some shelf in the minister's office, in the deputy minister's office or somewhere in the Ministry of Transport.

In conclusion, I should like to say that in my opinion the government will regret the day it made this kind of a decision, for two reasons. First, there is the energy aspect and, second, there is the pollution aspect. Neither the minister nor anyone else can deny that the most efficient use of energy is for a reasonable, efficient and comfortable train system in this country. As we move into the latter part of the 1970s and the early 1980s, pollution will become more of a problem. I predict that within ten years we will come to the House of Commons and ask for a revitalized railway program something similar to the program which the Americans have at the present time. At that time, such a program will cost us hundreds of millions of dollars and we will have wasted much time, talent and energy.

I would hope the Canadian people would react somewhat violently to the proposals of the minister. In my opinion, the government has made the decision to cut down rail passenger service and will ask the CTC to ratify that decision through some kind of democratic process such as the minister described. This certainly will not be acceptable to this party.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, after many statements and announcements made over many months by this minister, his predecessor and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in and out of and during election campaigns, and since there has been a build-up of expectation in the minds of the Canadian people that today we would hear an announcement of specific and solid policy whether we like it or not, that we would hear a decision had been made and specific action would be taken, we have today's statement. Instead of an announcement of specific and solid policy, we received from the same people who brought us the anti-inflation program—after they had given themselves a salary increase of $4,000 or $6,000—a transportation statement that does not meet the expectations I have mentioned. It repeats what we have heard dozens of times before. It is based on assumptions and conclusions that are false or, at best, misleading.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) mentioned—and I repeat it—that on June 7, 1974, the Prime Minister said that wage and price controls were too simplistic, too disastrous, in economic and social terms, to consider. On June 18, the Liberal party promised a revitalized intercity passenger rail service for Canada. They promised measures to encourage and facilitate Canadian design and production of quality intercity passenger service vehicles, systems, equipment and machinery. They promised a Canadian passenger transport corporation whose first priority would be to work on the introduction of high-speed passenger rail service in Canada. They even promised excursion trains across the country.

However, today the minister announces, in effect, the curtailment of rail passenger service. In spite of all the platitudes and phrases in that statement, in effect that is what he is announcing. What is at question no longer is the integrity of the minister, the Prime Minister or the government but, rather, their fitness to govern and their ability to cope with a modern economy with a modern transportation system.

The former minister described transportation in this country as a mess. He said that competition does not work. We are still in the same mess, and the same competition does not work. Today I am reminded of the stories—and they are accurate—that are told about old Bob Edwards when he ran the Calgary Eye-Opener. When Bob Edwards ran that newspaper he carried on a running battle with the CPR. Every time there was a CPR wreck, he put a photograph of the wreck on the front page of the paper.

When R. B. Bennett, who was legal counsel for the Canadian Pacific Railway, became leader of the Conservative party, Bob Edwards published a front page picture of R. B. Bennett in the Calgary Eye-Opener with the caption underneath "Another CPR wreck". Now, I would suggest to the media, they should publish a photograph of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on the front page of the newspapers across this country and call it "Another CPR wreck".

The minister, on the first page of his statement, made a major concession about what members of this House and members of the public have been saying for years: he said that the railways have been allowed to deteriorate so that Canadians no longer have a fair incentive to use them. That is true. Then he said:

> This was in no way due to any default on the part of those who actually operate the trains but to a combination of management and government policies which could only produce losses and worsening service.

Nowhere in this statement does the minister propose to correct those services. In no way does he propose to change the policies which he admits produced losses and worsening of service. Now that we have the confession on page one, the Minister of Transport goes on to say:

> These services should be operated on a commercially viable basis, and fares should be set through the efficient forces of competition and the marketplace.

Mr. Speaker, that is what got us into this mess in the first place. One has only to look at a newpaper article in the Financial Post of January 17, where the minister is reported as saying: "That the user should pay is the key". If that is true, we not only kiss the railways goodbye but I ask the minister whether he is now saying that the users of Air Canada, CPR and the other airlines in this country will pick up the $600 million deficit, which will be the case for 1974-75, for the provision of air transportation services by the Government of Canada.

Is he also saying that the users of buses, which the government and the experts in the minister's department claim are paying their own way, will now be required to pay their own way? For example, there was a deficit last year of $1.2 billion, in terms of the revenue received and cost paid for the highway system in this country. So if the users are to pay, the minister has more bad news for many people.

● (1540)

Is the minister saying that the St. Lawrence Seaway deficit will be picked up by the users only? Is he saying that the tens of million of dollars in deficits in the operation of our harbours and ports will now be picked up entirely by the users? Mr. Speaker, if you think there was a mess before under the former minister of transport, can you visualize what is coming?

The minister's statement perpetuates the old problems. Successive governments, in preparing our transportation policy, have refused to take into account Canada's geography, its climate and the location of its people. This government continues to refuse to recognize these factors in transportation, which is an essential public service which everyone has to use. This service can no longer be operated under nineteenth century concepts of profitability, commercial viability and competition. That has gone out of style and out of existence; it is irrelevant and obsolete. Talk to the people of countries in Europe, talk to the Japanese, the Australians, and now even the Americans with their beginnings of a new railway transportation system: the are now admitting what European countries admitted 30 years ago, namely, that competition and profitability in the provision of an essential public service have no place in a decent society which needs transportation services to meet the needs of the population.

If what the minister says about competition, commercial viability and that only the user shall pay, is logical, then it would be equally logical to have two competing sewer systems and two competing water lines running under our streets; it would be logical to have two competing telephone systems and power lines. The principles of competition and commercial viability were thrown out of the window 100 years ago, but this economic transportation dinosaur still clutches onto this nineteenth century concept. While he was riding around in his executive jet at the taxpayers' expense between here and Saskatoon, while Joe Citizen pays $250 to fly between Regina, Saskatoon and Ottawa, he and his experts dreamed up today's announcement.

As I mentioned, the minister complained about the subsidy of $167 million for railroads which could amount to $400 million by 1980. There was no mention of an elitist attitude and the cause of it, on the part of the government, with regard to the $600 million we will have to fork over to keep our airlines flying. No mention was made by the minister of the nonsense, the inefficiencies and the economic system of flying DC-8s and DC-9s between Calgary and Edmonton, Montreal and Ottawa, and Montreal and Toronto. It is stupid and wasteful, and in the long run it is not time saving. From downtown Ottawa to downtown Montreal, I submit, it is as fast, if not faster, to travel by rail than to fly, and the ratio of energy consumption should be sufficient to convince even the minister and the government that rail transportation must receive priority and transportation by bus and airlines should be integrated into a central transportation service. Surely the minister should decide on such a system, in the name of energy savings, pollution protection, convenience and safety.

If you consider the energy use ratio in trips from one to 500 miles, with 1 as the ratio for trains, it is 2.2 for the Dash 7, which can only carry 10 or 11 deputy ministers, and 5 for a DC-9. That should be sufficient ground in itself for the government to give priority to rail transportation and to integrate bus services, city transit services and airline services into the central part of our transportation system, namely, the railroads.

The minister says that the subsidies provided by Canadian are proportionately higher for passenger trains than for other forms of transportation. That is a lie.

An hon. Member: Shame.

An hon. Member: It's a shame you should use that term.

Mr. Benjamin: The minister recognizes the ability of trains to carry greater numbers of people, requiring minimum amounts of land. I should like to remind the House of the 93,000 acres of land taken over by the government for Mirabel. People in the Toronto area are away ahead of the minister. They said "No" to the 17,000 or 18,000 acres of land for Pickering, and they made it very plain.

While the minister admits that from the point of view of the use of land, the rail system is best, he continues to advocate policies requiring the curtailment of rail services, and in fact considers that "little dumps" like Edmonton and Saskatoon should not have a transcontinental rail service. "Who do the people of Saskatoon think they are, that they should have a transcontinental rail service?"—that is what the minister and his experts think.

The minister's announcement means nothing more than the perpetuation of what we have had for decades. It means policies which will continue to discriminate against Canadians because of where they happen to live. I want to conclude by saying that since transportation is a public service and a public utility which everyone has to use, it should be—as is the case in dozens of countries of all political stripes—publicly owned, controlled and operated.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

That service, under public control and ownership, should integrate all modes of transportation; but we submit that it must have as its first priority the provision of service, and it should provide maximum access to people all over the country as a matter of right, and not a privilege.

We consider that all other modes of transportation must be integrated with, and ancillary to, the essential ingredient in our transportation system, namely, the railways. Unless and until this or any other government of Canada does that, we will continue to have an inefficient transportation system. The announcement made by the minister today has provided no assurance that anything will be changed. To the contrary, it will increase the amount of terror in the minds and hearts of the people of Canada in terms of what is in store for them regarding the provision of transportation and what it will cost them.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the statement of the minister, but still with very much scepticism because if everything that has been said in the speeches made here these last ten years on the question of improving our transportation had materialized, Canada would have the best transport system in the world. I have a very good memory of the famous statements of the former Minister of Transport, who wanted to renovate everything and who in fact has not renovated anything at all. The best evidence is that he is now in charge of another department, namely environment. I hope that in his new department he would have people clean all the stations which have been boarded up as a result of mismanagement and which are falling apart while people talk about renovation.

Today the minister tells us: We are going to have regional studies. But who will be in charge? The minister says nothing about that. Will he still send groups of technocrats from big cities to study, for instance, the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean region so that they can impose their conditions? Mr. Speaker, if such are the wishes of the minister, he should forget about these studies. If he really wishes to be serious, he should come and talk to the people of the area, and organize meetings and discussions on the best way to renovate our transport systems. The approach then would be realistic as it would mean talking with local people, residents and railway employees. I submit that this would be the first step in dealing with the service the minister recommends. But if on the other hand he still relies on a kind of ever burgeoning bureaucracy while maintenance staff decreases proportionally, then the minister is once more going to miss the boat—

An hon. Member: The train!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): —and there will not be any serious change. Like all his other predecessors, he wants to suppress some lines of passenger trains. Passengers are always victimized, as if they were not part of the railway service, so entitled to get services as taxpayers. We have nothing against freight service. Freight is a very profitable activity in our area. But for 15 years now we have been told that our passenger service was going to end and our people are very upset by this eventuality.

It is my opinion that with serious surveys, it is possible to prove that a passenger service, not the one that we have now, which is completely obsolete, but a really efficient one will attract a great deal of customers, because I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that I have been travelling by train for these last 15 years.

We hear people who after their second or third trip by train say on their arrival: "They had me once, but never ever again." Well, this means that service or safety is deficient. We noted again this winter a lack of safety and I will return to the matter later. The minister has stated once more that he will close some lines. Perhaps some of them ought to be cancelled. However, in areas where it is the only reliable means of transport available, closing those lines should be out of question. The withdrawal of sleeping cars has also been mentioned. The minister is trying to justify himself because for years now I found that the railway company was merely interested in its hotel system. It would then be easier to fill those hotels set up throughout Canada and worth umpteen million dollars. It is likely that they were beginning to empty, so trains would stop there and passengers would have to stay overnight in hotels and be fed. He may be right on this account if he wants to save these hotels.

Now, we are wondering about offices. I live in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area. A few years ago, you may recall that the servocentre campaign was launched. One was created in Jonquière and another in Saint-Félicien. Now, they want to close the latter and maintain the former, which was built, it has to be said, at the cost of millions of dollars, while I always stressed that Jonquière was not the proper site for a servocentre. The central junction should have been Chibougamau, the Dolbeau junction. The Jonquière junction was at Chambord. But the officials in Montreal have never been able to understand that. Never. Today, they realize, after spending a great deal of money that the Saint-Félicien servocentre is not longer any good. After three, four or five years, it is no longer any good. They are looking towards Jonquière to build some extensions. After having bought warehouses which are no longer used, they have to rent them to the City of Jonquière to get rid of them, and it is impossible to come back to the central point. I call the minister's attention to this problem so that when he will commission studies in our area his research workers will geographically locate the central point of the area. They will find that will reduce expenses first of all and then improve the services. The railway will then be able to tell the population that they provide good services, and not services like the ones we have had those last few years and again this winter.

This winter, Mr. Speaker, passengers from Chambord have travelled aboard a non heated train at temperatures of 40 below zero. The train had to go to Montreal without any heat because there is no more service in Chambord. Previously there was some storage, repairs could be done, there was a garage, but there is nothing of that today. They have to go to Montreal to have a pump repaired. So all passengers had to wrap themselves up in blankets on their way to Montreal. That happened three or four times, that I know of. It happens again and again, and nobody wants to correct it. Engines stay outdoors during winter because there is no garage. There are garages, yes, three beautiful garages, but they are closed. They are not heated. Engines are covered with ice. Then they start for Montreal. They use hammers to break the ice. They they start for Montreal. One engineer told me recently: To go up to Chibougamau, we use five engines, and we come back with one or two, because the others are all broken. There are no maintenance men left. The service no longer works. These things must be known, but nobody talks about them. How can you expect improvements?

Moreover, those who might speak up cannot do so because they stand to lose their jobs; and so it goes. Does anyone believe the people who took the train this winter will do so again next winter? Never, no, never! Yet, that run could so easily be improved. Unfortunately, it takes 12, 18 and even 20 hours to get to Montreal when, with a normal train, it could easily be done in six. I would even say, very easily; every engineer says so.

So, what is the problem? At every turn, you see a little inspector of 24 or 25, fresh out of school, coming to impose new rules upon old employees who know ten times as much as he does. To my mind, someone will have to start using his brains and put an end to the game of the small bureaucrat. The government will have to come out of its lethargy, quit putting its trust in those people and try to appoint people who are serious enough to be capable of giving the services needed by the people.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, because I would not like to be too long, all we want is good service. One would believe that government officials, especially those of the railway company, have forgotten above all that the railroad is paid by taxpayers and that in return they have to provide the necessary services to the population. This is all forgotten. In my opinion, the word "service" has been forgotten. It is far away from their minds.

When you think of services, you have to think of prices. To rent a regular small bed, it now costs $17. I cannot see a journeyman going to Montreal who can afford the luxury of a bed which costs $34 return, apart from his ticket. Prices must therefore be in line with services. Finally, safety must be provided. The passenger must feel safe. There should not be any events, like those we experienced last winter. However, I talked about it before the House, but nothin was changed. We have the oldest cars of the area, and they blame people for not taking the train.

But I can very well understand why a person who has taken the train once won't do it again.

Therefore I ask the minister to have his officials examine this matter, in order to provide people with modern travelling carriages and later to appoint responsible people, local people, to advise him. Local officials will be able to help him if he wishes to do a good job. On the other hand if he only wishes to follow the path of the former ministers who have preceded him, we must expect the same disappointments we are experiencing now.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for having the courage to ouline his policy for us and we are awaiting the results.

Transportation

● (1600)

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a very frank question to the Minister of Transport. What has happened to the very fine proposals made by the Prime Minister and members of the government during the election campaign with regard to railway transportation services? May I very pointedly ask the minister whether the position he outlined in very general terms this afternoon is worthy of any more credence and can be relied upon any more than the apparently ill-considered proposals made by his leader during the election campaign?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I did indicate in the course of the statement this afternoon that it was part of many aspects of transportation announcements including, for instance, one on the demonstration project which will be forthcoming later, and the one with regard to commuters which was made earlier. I regret that hon. members opposite have been misled by the comments of their colleagues, and missed the point of this announcement to revitalize rail passenger service in Canada in a very fundamental way which changes the downgraded approach which the 80 per cent subsidy led to in the railway system. Going toward a system where we are prepared to pay the full costs of an operating system will tend to assure those innovations and investment of capital which are necessary if railway systems in Canada are to survive with passengers.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, since the minister's statement was as free of specifics in transportation as was the statement of the Minister of the Environment earlier today free of specifics in environmental matters, with reference to the point the minister just made I would ask if the government is saying it will pay up to 100 per cent subsidy for passenger travel, as opposed to 80 per cent. If he is talking about a lot of passenger service, that would mean a lot, but as I am sure the minister would agree that if he was talking about the railway service from Oshawa to Toronto and abandoning everything else, it would mean absolutely nothing. That is where the House seems to rest today. Could the minister indicate precisely what the government has in mind? Does it intend to apply the principle, which sounds good, to all passenger service across Canada, to passenger service between major centres or intra-urban passenger transportation?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we have wanted, of course, to allow for the kinds of examination and consultation which can go on through CTC procedures. Hon. members opposite would certainly have criticized if we had today laid before the House a blueprint of exactly which lines were to stay and which ones were to go, without that process of consultation. Given that limitation, the statement has indicated quite clearly our view that there is a place for a transcontinental service which is a very important, basic network part of the system.

Mr. Broadbent: With 100 per cent subsidy?

Mr. Lang: Yes, with 100 per cent subsidy. There should be tributaries to it and many of those may well be rail, although in some cases it will be found better to have bus links rather than rail links from certain parts of the country leading into that system. It indicates that we believe in intercity rail transportation between major pairs of cities, in addition, that is, to the transcontinental service, and that we also believe that in regard to remote areas there are places where these services have to be maintained. That is the broad picture. Short of actually drawing a map of our own view of how that will look, that is as precise as we can be.

In each of those cases, what we are talking about is a revitalized rail system, marketed well, properly capitalized, running efficiently and well, which will attract back those passengers who, when they are there, provide the only way the rail system can be really economic in terms of energy. Not empty trains, but full trains, are economic in terms of energy.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a comment and ask a question of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we have had excessive comment. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would just ask his question.

Mr. Murta: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will refrain from comment. Whether the subsidy is 80 per cent or 100 per cent, does the minister not agree that there will not be any benefit unless there is a guarantee or incentive for the railways to modernize their equipment? The present 80 per cent subsidy has not worked, and I suggest the 100 per cent subsidy will not work either. That is the first question. If I may ask a second question, then I will sit down and that will be my limited contribution.

It takes between three and five years lead time, with regard to rolling stock for railways, from when it is ordered until it is received. If we are to have modernization of the rail passenger service in Canada before the end of the seventies, the equipment must be ordered now. May I ask the minister why there was no mention in his statement of the modernization of existing equipment for the existing system?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there was the indication that we will expect the railways, with the 100 per cent subsidy, to go in for the proper kind of equipment. We will expect those orders to be placed progressively now. There is already a broad outline of the kind of basic system it will be, without the final detail in regard to all the miles involved. I believe that we can devise a system, and the statement indicates our view that the 100 per cent subsidy will be connected to an incentive to management and an assurance of proper management techniques.

I would draw to the attention of the hon. member the very important distinction between a basic 100 per cent subsidy which is properly paid and the situation where the railways do not lose some additional money of their own, as it were, on every bit of loss—which is the current system—which leads them to want to minimize losses but very often this is done by minimizing services. That is what we want to remove in the new, revitalized system.

Mr. Beatty: May I ask the minister the implications of today's statement with regard to the possible reinstatement of railway passenger service on the six lines of railway in southwestern Ontario on which passenger service was discontinued some five years ago by the CTC?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very pertinent aspect of our new view of rail passenger travel that we see that the proven use of those services between city pairs, when those services are properly organized and properly put in place, may well lead to the reintroduction of services between city pairs where that service does not now exist.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of the fact that there is a large Canadian National terminal in my riding which employs 600 or 700 people. There is considerable concern about the possible negative effect on employment at that terminal. Could I have an assurance from the minister that the ramifications of the program he has announced will not result in a loss of jobs? My second question arises from the statement of the hon. member for Lisgar, that the possibility of discontinuance of the transcontinental service by the CNR is a real possibility. Will that service continue? Can the minister make that comment as well, for the sake of those employed by the railroad in my constituency?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give precise indications of what the results of the deliberations of the Canadian Transport Commission will be with regard to which particular services will best provide passenger travel across this nation from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast. What I can say, however, is that this is in no way to be thought of as a point of time in which railway service in total in Canada will diminish. On the contrary, in western Canada in particular there is a vast increase in freight projected to move across our railways. Therefore, there is a corresponding need for people to fill jobs in the railway service.

Of course, a change in passenger service to freight service does have implications for jobs and adjustment, and has some real difficulties. I indicated in my statement a real concern about that matter. In my meeting with union leaders yesterday, I indicated I will want to be following that up, with the particular question of who might be affected, well in advance of the actual decisions, so we can attempt to make sure the adjustment is as easy as possible.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister whether there have been full discussions with the railways about this statement, and whether they are in general agreement with the policy outlined today.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we had a discussion with the railway presidents yesterday just after my meeting with the union leaders. I leave it to them to indicate their reaction to it.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister whether he is aware of the hatchet job he is doing on the city of Edmonton by removing transcontinental passenger service from the fifth largest city in Canada, without any consultation with the city administration in order to learn of the crippling effect this policy will have on a community built up on rail service for decades. Second, there is the chaotic effect on Jasper which last year was visited by 27,000 tourists who got there by rail.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I really wish the hon. member would not give credence to that kind of possibility at this stage, in view of the fact that the very process we have started is consultation, particularly through the CTC hearings, and the consideration that will then be given by the CTC to this whole question of what is the real requirement for passenger service and what alternatives there are to best provide service to the various parts of this country.

Mr. Roche: Is the minister saying that in this process of consultation he is opening up, through the CTC, the question that if the protest from Edmonton and Western Canada is strong enough against cancellation of passenger service, the policy he announced today will be rescinded or cut back?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, what should be observed is that we will surely want a reasoned analysis of the genuine needs of people for services and the way those needs can be served with no undue waste of money, which, after all, is very important since we can use it so effectively in other ways for Canadians, rather than waste it. We may yet see a spine of service, with tributaries to it, as being far more effective and giving the service to people that is required without having a complete duplication of service in all regions of the country. This is exactly what is proposed to be studied.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Transport arises out of the fact there are now three main lines going into Atlantic Canada. Does the government directive to the Canadian Transport Commission mean that one or more of these three lines will, in effect, be lost?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is likely that one, with tributary services, will be the end result of this process.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, even as we are here today in the House of Commons the CNR is taking steps to cause hardships with regard to its passenger service on the Supercontinental. For example, the dining car between Capreol and Winnipeg has been removed; sleeping cars have been removed; the price of a sandwich has been raised to 90 cents. Can the minister assure us that he will forthwith inform the CNR that they are not to embark upon any of these inconveniences to passengers which discourage them from using that service?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is not ordinarily my practice or intention to interfere with the day to day management and operation of that Crown corporation or, indeed, any others under my responsibility. Hon. members should appreciate the very high cost of some of these services which are being provided. Just as with first-class, higher income air travellers, so, too, with the higher income first-class rail travel there is a real question. I ask it: Why should the people of Canada generally pay such significant amounts for the travel amenities of these people when others travelling coach-class, and certainly by bus, pay their own way?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to limit the questioning unduly. I have been attempting to see every member who wants to ask a question and restricting him to one question unless a supplementary seems necessary. It seems that all parties would be adequately represented and most desires met if we were to conclude the questioning by recognizing the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington, the hon. member for Kootenay West, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of a condition that has existed for many years in rail passenger service between the capital city of Ottawa and Toronto. I have raised this question in the House twice in the past three years. The CNR has been running their train from Toronto to Brockville and renting trackage from the CPR from Brockville to Ottawa, although the shortest distance between the capital and Toronto is by way of the Smiths Falls subdivision to Napanee and west on the main line. Will the minister look into the great waste of money and inefficiency that is occasioned thereby, so that under his new policy the publicly-owned line will be used between here and Toronto by way of Smiths Falls and Napanee? That would preclude having to rent trackage from CPR.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to request an explanation about that on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the fact that the Minister of Transport may indeed have some difficulty keeping in his mind the various tracks and services throughout Canada. Bearing that in mind, I draw to the attention of the minister his statement that he would like to maintain service to remote areas. Is the minister prepared to provide service to remote areas where it is no longer being maintained and where there has been an erosion of service, such as the Kettle Valley line which in 1950 had passenger service, regular dining car service, sleeping service, then went to Budd car service and, finally, to cattle car service?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it certainly is consistent with this policy to examine remote areas which are not now served, as well as those where service exists and where, in line with the policy, it should be retained or when no other adequate alternative is available.

Mr. Speaker: Before concluding the questioning, I overlooked the fact that two government members had been standing. There is certainly no intention to preclude government members from questioning in these kinds of periods. I was looking to my right and perhaps was not aware that the hon. member for St. Boniface and the hon. member for Laprairie were attempting to ask questions. It is only fair that they be included in the questioning before it concludes.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, as you are probably aware, the reason I am concerned and would like to ask a question is that there are many railroad employees in my constituency, in the CN shop, the Symington yard and elsewhere. I should like to ask the minister whether he can assure us that the number of railroad employees will not diminish while the studies are taking place; in other words, that no action will be taken until the study has been completed?

Mr. Lang: I cannot say there might not be any changes on a day to day, operational basis, but certainly the intention behind the policy statement is that the actual services now being provided should be continued until the studies are completed and a decision taken by the CTC. I might say, also, that I was very conscious of the interest of the hon. member for St. Boniface and also of the hon. member for London East—members who are I know are in close contact with those who work on the railroad—when I indicated in my statement that I hoped to have the assistance of members of parliament in seeing that the needs of employees of the railroads are considered.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, the minister referred in his statement to further discussions with the provinces. I would draw his attention to the fact that around Montreal we have an entire network of rail facilities which are conceivably available for urban rapid transit purposes. As the minister is aware, the province has been waiting for an announcement, some sort of federal direction, before acting itself and making a move toward the utilization of these facilities.

Can the minister tell the House whether he anticipates in the immediate future entering into discussions with the Province of Quebec with a view to making arrangements for their utilization of these existing facilities so as to provide the transit facilities which are desperately needed by large numbers of people living off the island of Montreal who are affected each morning by having to wait as long as three or four hours because of congestion on a vehicular bridge? Can the minister tell us today whether he and the province of Quebec will soon be discussing this matter?

Mr. Lang: In general terms we have of course, been taking the position that initiative and interest in commuter services around major cities is a matter for basic leadership from the municipalities and provinces involved. However, as the hon. member has indicated, because of the possible use of particular rail lines which are under national jurisdiction, we would always be glad to have discussions of the kind he has suggested.

I would, in fact, have taken part in a discussion with the Quebec minister of transport in which the topics would have included the Montreal transportation question. That was scheduled for the 27th of this month but weather conditions prevented us getting together. That meeting will be rescheduled and we shall certainly be looking at questions of that kind.

Mr. Wenman: Will the mode of consultation include public hearings and reference to legislation or motions to the House of Commons and its committees? What did the minister mean when he described passenger service as a system designed for an earlier time? Since British Columbia entered confederation on the basis of a national dream, does the minister consider confederation a system designed for an earlier time?

Mr. Lang: I have said that I expect passenger service to continue to the Pacific coast from the rest of Canada. Also, in answer to an early question I indicated there would be a vast increase in freight traffic to the coast from the western region of the country. So the continuation of the national dream is assured. What I had in mind was that the nature and use of our rail system really reflected a previous period and had not gone through the necessary updating so as to offer the kind of service which might make it a useful one throughout Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the reference the minister made in his statement to his willingness to consult with the representatives of labour, and in view of the fact that changes are almost bound to result in relocation, lay-offs, early retirement, and so on, will the minister include in his studies a personal concern with the pension plans of the railways? In particular, will he study, as soon as the government gets it, the report which will be coming from Dr. Noel Hall concerning all aspects of the pension plans of all the railroads in Canada?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I would be glad to look at the pension plans so far as they relate to the changes which are involved in this particular policy. I do not think I should attempt to overtake the other ways in which examination is being made in a general sense, just because they are indirectly involved here. I should add, partly in answer to the preceding question, that consultation and hearings will take place in the process of examining this question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Roche: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in questioning the Minister of Transport on this policy, I asked him, as reported on page 10376 of Hansard, whether he had consulted the city administration of Edmonton with regard to the serious adverse effect the policy would have on that city. In part of his response, the hon. gentleman said:

We have had extensive consultations throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, ten minutes ago I spoke to the officials of the city administration of Edmonton concerned with intergovernmental affairs, and they advise me there have been no consultations with Edmonton concerning this policy. I wish to protest the misleading answer given me yesterday by the Minister of Transport. Knowing the minister, I am sure it was not his intention to mislead, but I raise the question on a point of order now because that incident calls into question the sincerity of the government when it states again that there will be consultation and that implementation of the policy may eventually be influenced by the response from the public as well as by the city of Edmonton, labour, management and the CNR—everybody involved in Edmonton. I want it to be clear that if I, as a member of parliament, encourage a considered response to be given to the government through the consultative process, the government will accept this in a serious and responsible manner.

Mr. Lang: It is obvious even from the words read by the hon. member that his rather petty point has no basis. His question yesterday contained many different elements and I was not responding directly to the part about the city of Edmonton. I know that the former mayor of that city was not contacted by the hon. member. The consultations were held very widely over a broad range of time with many people in many different areas.

MEDICAL CARE ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, January 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-68, an act to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, just before the House adjourned yesterday I had remarked that, should the government's clairvoyance regarding Bill C-68 fail to justify itself, Canadians would be faced with one of two alternatives—reduced health care services or increased taxes. In other words, if medical costs increase at a higher rate than that contemplated by the 1975-76 budgetary ceilings, the provinces will be forced to seek the very solutions which the federal government deemed undesirable in 1969.

There is no question that the unilateral action of the federal government has outraged the provinces. Their immediate reaction was to care for a cessation of consultation in connection with all cost-sharing programs of the federal government. If the government's ploy in introducing this legislation was to bring the provinces back to the bargaining table, as has been suggested, it is now clear that this ploy was completely misdirected.

● (1630)

Accompanying the unilateral approach to decision-making is the entire issue of arbitrariness. If Bill C-68 is passed, the ceilings established in the bill will become statutory. While one of the primary principles of responsible government is that parliament cannot bind its successor, political realists realize that reversal of decisions previously made is usually a long and difficult task. What will happen if the ceilings on spending are too low? What if the desired standards for health care simply cannot be maintained, given the bill's restrictions? It appears the figures have been pulled out of a hat; no explanation or investigation accompanied these figures. In short, the ceilings can be criticized because there is no indication that the percentage delimiters are appropriate and also because there is no room for flexibility. The government has made open-ended provision for ceilings and, should they be incorrect, there is little room for compensation.

Last year, national medical care expenditures ran at $1.37 billion. Expenditures for this year cannot yet be realized, but obviously three possibilities exist: outlay could increase marginally, or as projected, or quite markedly. Since what happens financially in this year will dictate federal contributions for the years to come, one again can only speculate what could happen even if the provinces' budgetary outlay stayed inside the guidelines.

The government has made the argument that the imposition of ceilings on the federal contribution to medicare will not cause undue strain on provincial coffers, will not result in reduced health care services, and that the guidelines could encourage provincial restraint and provide a positive input into planned budgetary forecasting. This could only occur if the price of physicians' services likewise did not rise above the budgetary ceilings. In turn, if physicians' services do not rise above the ceilings, then the government has, in fact, imposed an effective wage control on a single, identifiable professional group. It is not difficult to see the blatant, discriminatory nature of such a move.

Another point which can be raised deals with doctors' salaries and taxes. The government has decried the increased costs of health care. We have seen that in the medical care field this documentation is basically without foundation. However, even if one was to concede that medical expenses should be curbed, it must be remembered that the federal government receives a substantial return on its capital outlay for medicare in the form of physicians' taxes.

In 1972, the average taxable income of physicians in Canada was $41,105. By inflating this figure by the increase in medical expenses we could speculate that doctors are earning approximately $50,000 per annum. From the last figures available in 1973, there were 36,095 physicians in Canada. National gross physicians' incomes can therefore be estimated at roughly $1.17 billion. Given the present tax structure, each doctor in Canada would pay approximately $9,600 in federal taxes, equalling $346.5 million in total tax payment to the federal treasury, or 51 per cent of the total federal payments to the provinces for medical care in 1974. In this light, the government's complaint of budgetary strain due to costs of medicare becomes increasingly hollow.

There is no question that the reasons for imposing ceilings on medical costs are fairly flimsy. It is not possible to forecast accurately what is going to happen to medical care in Canada in view of the changes suggested in Bill C-68. This point has been mentioned before and should be emphasized again. Since the long-term condition of health services in Canada is dependent on so many countervailing variables and non-quantifiable exigencies, it is increasingly difficult to predict the future of this field without blind confidence. However, this is exactly what the government has done in introducing Bill C-68.

In conclusion, the government has given itself a narrow and restrictive course to follow in the years ahead. It certainly cannot claim to be prophetic, yet the minister and his colleagues have committed themselves to an empirical approach to health care financing, thereby severely limiting their ability to deal with problems in the unforeseen or unforeseeable future.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join this debate today on the medicare budget, Bill C-68, not only as a physician and pharmacist but also as a fellow citizen concerned with the effectiveness and efficiencies of national spending. I think it is important to start by looking at our medical care system. First, the previous system. Until recent years Canada shared with the world a traditional system of health care even then one of the best. People lived a simpler life and only when definitely ill and unable to carry on went for help to a health professional, usually a physician or medical doctor. Hospital remained a last resort.

[Mr. Mitges.]

As with any system, there were advantages and disadvantages. They paid the doctor directly on a professional fee for service basis, similarly the hospital. There developed a proud system of responsibility and mutual respect. Eventually private insurance schemes became available but the same basic sense of values continued. Administration was still simple and privately financed. Undoubtedly, some inequities did exist, inequities between rich and poor, between those with serious illness and those fortunate enough to remain healthy. Some people probably hesitated to seek care when they needed it.

However, in my own experience, people were looked after as well as possible, within the limitations of the time, the state of the art and science. Generally, no one in need was turned away and unpaid debts were absorbed by doctors and hospitals. The so-called Robin Hood system was accepted—take more from the rich to cover the poor. Medicine was not only a respected profession but "the noble profession". Ironically, medicine in the old days seemed to enjoy more respect while having less capability to help the ill. However, with changing social values in recent years, even with increasing general affluence and more ability to pay, such a traditional system came under increasing criticism and increasing public aversion to anything resembling charity.

Next, the present system. The concept of comprehensive prepaid plans grew stronger, beyond the limits of private plans, and public pressure led to more and more government involvement. In spite of concerns in both the public and private sector, we seemed to become more and more involved in open-ended plans as well. Undoubtedly these were politically popular during the existing affluent times when they started. As well, they probably represented an easier type of plan to administer.

Deterrent fees have been considered and even tried. I personally find many people, including doctors, feel they are still worth a try. However, many others feel that not only do they not work but they are unjust, with the wrong people deterred from seeking help—the needy, the old, the poor, the submissive. Our open-ended plan was founded on the honour system, on values presumed to exist, unlikely to lead to overuse or misuse. Now, with mounting costs, we wonder if our trust was misplaced.

People have not been trained to restrain their use of the system. In fact, they have been encouraged in recent years to increase their use of it in the name of good, modern, scientific medicine, especially preventive aspects such as regular physical examinations and cancer tests. We probably have been sensitive to mutual criticism at the thought of suggesting less use of health services, including both sides in the doctor-patient relationship. In an expanding economy, an affluent society with constantly rising expectations is not likely to accept limits on services gladly.

However, times have changed, the economy has slowed and pressure has developed against government size and spending. In June, 1975, the Minister of Finance introduced certain major spending restraints, the first seen in many years and the first of many to come, probably. In the medical field it involved two areas: hospital care, including diagnostic services, and medicare, which includes mainly doctors' services in both the office and on house calls, plus administrative expenses for both.

Over the next three years increases in the federal contribution to medicare were to be scaled down annually to 14 per cent, 12.5 per cent and 10 per cent calculated to cover a decreasing inflation rate and a 1.5 per cent rate of population increase. It was not stated how this would affect doctors' fees and total incomes, a matter of subsequent concern to doctors and, surprisingly, also to provincial governments which had also been expressing alarm over growing health and welfare budgets.

Until the anti-inflation program came along doctors were also concerned that they would be the only Canadians under income restraints and therefore the victims of discrimination. Now they are concerned, like everyone else, about income guidelines, but also whether the discrimination will remain after the anti-inflation program ceases.

Still, how would a medicare bill like C-68 relate to a general restraint bill like C-73 in the meantime? The medical profession also points out that theirs is one of the few professions with a publicly-standardized fee schedule more readily subject to controls. Ontario doctors, for example, have been held and have agreed to an average 5 per cent increase in their fees over the last five years, including increased costs of practice, while inflation has been increasing at 10 per cent. An annual 10 per cent increase in fees over the next three years over and above the percentage increase in costs of medical practice according to the guidelines might then be seen as acceptable as long as this limit were applied consistently to other Canadians, and as long as increased costs were exempted as is to be the case for other businesses.

However, doctors incomes also depend on how many patients they see in a year, as well as their level of individual fees. Should a limit be put on their total income and, either way, how does one distinguish between true productivity, which is to be encouraged, as against unnecessary, expensive overservicing, which is to be discouraged? Personally, I believe only the profession itself is capable of making the distinction, and even then only with great difficulty.

Many factors can legitimately and sometimes temporarily increase the annual volume of a doctor's practice beyond his control: the natural growth of his practice, especially for a doctor just getting established, or one changing location, loss of a partner, or an increase of illness in the community—and he should not be penalized for this. If he is, his patients and the community can also suffer. Fair treatment is also more conducive to a valuable profession such as a doctor managing an expensive social system well.

A surtax on total income might cut costs and might even discourage misuse of the health system, but is the price worth it in terms of lost productivity and a demoralized profession? By the way, it is also important that income equitability exist with the medical profession, that is, between geographical areas like provinces and between specialists and GPs.

Let me say a word about health care spending. The fast-growing Canadian health and welfare bill is now taking about one-third of all government spending. The federal budget for this department will be around $10 billion, and the Ontario budget around $3 billion for 1976, in proportion to population. At present, the federal government is committed to pay half the cost of whatever hospital and medical expenses the provinces incur.

At three federal-provincial conferences between 1971 and 1973, Ottawa offered the provinces a formula under which they would receive a per capita lump sum every year tied to increases in the gross national product rather than to increases in health costs, but the provinces rejected it each time, convinced that they would lose if they accepted it.

The federal Minister of National Health and Welfare Minister (Mr. Lalonde) has announced, in principle, extending federal support to some lower cost health services beyond those covered at present, but which ones have not yet been announced. The changes are expected to slow the rate of increase in health costs. These other services, presumably less expensive, are to conform to existing legislation,—the Medical Care Act, and the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. Alternatives to acute hospital care, such as nursing homes, home care and ambulatory services will be considered, but provinces will first be expected to give a firm commitment on their plans in the hospital and medical fields over the next few years.

Support for dental and drug care programs is not considered possible at this time, and because of the magnitude of any such programs they would have to be considered separately as the economy improves. Such an agreement should meet the demands of most provincial governments which have been complaining about the present health plan as too rigid financially, which prevents funds from being used efficiently. In addition, cost-saving efforts must go beyond medical bills and place more emphasis on prevention, on environment and behavioural risks such as automobile accidents, physical neglect and occupational risks as outlined in the ministry's "New Perspectives on Health for Canadians".

However, on the professional scene, hospital costs are increasing faster than medical costs, that is, those in the doctor's office or on house calls. Ontario health minister Frank Miller complains that hundreds of hospital beds are now empty, but hospital boards and doctors are not keen to use them for older chronic patients, perhaps due to long-standing patterns of practice. Average hospital budgets in Ontario were up 15 per cent for 1975, nearly twice the rate allowed under provincial ceilings. In return, Mr. Miller is threatening to close some hospitals and decrease the power of hospital boards. An average hospital bed costs up to $20,000 per year to operate but, ironically, closing a ward saves only $8,500 per bed per year.

The original 1974 Ontario hospital budget was $1.1 billion but reached $1.4 billion, while compulsory 2 per cent cuts saved only $21 million. Total Ontario hospital spending was predicted to reach $1.6 billion in 1975, even without additional staff and services. The total Ontario health bill will increase from $2.5 billion in 1974-75 to $3 billion in 1975-76. Mr. Miller warned that if it continued to rise at current rates, the province would be bankrupt in ten years.

On the other hand, the Canadian Medical Association claimed that doctors needed a 14 per cent increase to boost their salaries by 10 per cent in 1975. Dr. Bette Stephenson, former president of the Canadian Medical Association and now an Ontario politician, said that this would still only give doctors two-thirds of the predicted income increase for the average Canadian. Under OHIP, Ontario doctors were granted only a 7.75 per cent increase in 1974 and a 4 per cent increase in 1975. She said that although government figures show Canada's doctors are the highest paid profession, at $68,000 in annual payments, costs of practice ranging from 40 per cent to 75 per cent, and income tax near 50 per cent, reduce that amount to a disposable income of $26,000. Costs of practice, as well as nursing and hospital staff salaries, have increased sharply in the meantime.

Regardless of these figures, the profession of medicine—in spite of reports emerging from Ontario—seems willing to conform with the anti-inflation program as long as other Canadians do also. They have difficulty understanding the new medicare bill on budget restraints, partly because they are not clear how it affects doctors' incomes and other items of expenditure, and partly because they are not clear how it is affected by the anti-inflation guidelines for doctors' incomes.

● (1650)

Canadian Medical Association officials seem most reasonable in their negotiations and admit to a satisfactory working relationship with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. They acquitted themselves well in recent parliamentary committee meetings. Co-operation and optimism are certainly the order of the day in this relationship. The Toronto Globe and Mail, in its lead editorial on January 16, 1975, made the following comments under the title "Philosophies of Health":

> Costs and political philosophies. These are the basis of the conflicts which divide provinces and provinces, as well as provinces and the federal government, on matters concerning health services for Canadians.
> Medicare as it was established by Ottawa has proved enormously costly, without being flexible enough to provide some services that are needed or to put the accent on prevention rather than care.
> Mr. Lalonde has agreed in principle to extend federal support to some other services, and a committee will work on the problem in the next several months.
>
> It will be an advance if more health can be preserved or recovered at less cost. The cost of medical and hospital care, under the present formula, is increasing so rapidly that it is jeopardizing provincial budgets.
>
> At no time, but particularly in a time of inflation, should Canada be advancing upon costly, universal, open-ended plans. What public money there is should be devoted to meeting the needs of those who cannot provide for themselves.
>
> The other difficulty with universal plans for a country as disparate as Canada is that they are too inflexible to meet regional ones.

[Mr. Philbrook.]

The editorial also points out differences of opinions between the provinces. Wealthy ones like Ontario and Quebec want only a larger share of personal income tax revenues. In contrast, the maritimes, Saskatchewan and British Columbia want more universal, shared-cost programs, for example, prescription drugs and dental care. Shared plans are seen adversely by some as interfering with the local setting of priorities; by others, beneficially as providing badly needed funds. In other words, some can afford to be independent and some cannot. Each approaches the same problem from his own vested interests. Fair enough, but it does not square exactly with national unity. Furthermore, it says a province like Alberta, currently flush with money, may not mind expensive programs like modern hospitals thrust on them by Ottawa while, ironically, the formerly reigning province of Ontario is now feeling the pinch and might prefer the cheaper chronic beds or home care programs. In light of these complexities, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have apparently promised not to impose any more universal programs on the provinces; hopefully, not even on the country.

The government has already run into trouble by suggesting what it believes is a generally reasonable, over-all limit on the rate of increase of medicare and has served statutory notice of a desire to renegotiate the hospital plan. The Globe and Mail editorial, even with the wisdom of hindsight, raises more questions than answers. In its retrograde, conservative way it suggests the return of a different plan for every province, a welfare-type plan for the needy, which is usually regarded these days as cold charity, and the accompanying expensive and fragmented system of private plans for all others. As Eliza Doolittle would say: "Not bloody likely".

Now I should like to say a word on the immigration of foreign doctors. Another aspect raised has been restrictions on the immigration of doctors to Canada, but not only for reasons of saving money; there are other concerns. One reason is to try to supply doctors to rural and remote areas of the country where they are in short supply. Another pressure is to permit more places in the medical schools for the children of existing Canadians. The immigration aspects are federal, the others provincial, but apparently the move has the support of all federal and provincial ministers involved.

The Ontario health minister proposed the action based on a full brief which he presented at the January, 1975, federal-provincial health ministers' conference in Ottawa. In 1973, 1,170 doctors immigrated to Canada, almost as many as the 1,326 who graduated from Canadian medical schools, while many well qualified Canadian students were turned away. Most foreign doctors, like immigrants in general, come to Ontario; but Ontario, at a ratio of one doctor per 585 people, is already well staffed compared to the World Health Organization recommendation of one per 650. The recent increase in doctors in Canada seems to be related to the introduction of medicare.

It is proposed that foreign doctors be treated like other immigrants, that they be barred unless they have a job waiting for them here or unless they commit themselves to part of the country where they are needed. Mr. Miller proposed that the flow to Ontario needs to be stemmed.

Each province should be able to declare whether it needs certain types of doctors, or any doctors at all, with federal immigration officials acting accordingly. Only Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and the Northwest Territories have recently been below recommended levels of doctors. A profession like medicine is otherwise self-regulating. Regulations have recently been tightened so that other immigrants would be needed regardless of educational qualifications. Only doctors and university teachers were exempted. No new legislation will be required for further tightening.

Now may I say a word about the doctor's actual situation. Canadian doctors claim that increases in medical fee schedules in recent years have not kept up to other factors such as the rate of inflation, other peoples' salary increases and the costs of new, expensive medical procedures. They also feel that official statistics and press reports have overstated their true average take-home pay by eliminating incomes under $30,000 per year, whereas many full-time, regular practitioners actually do make less than $30,000. The proportion of Canada's GNP spent on medical services in Canada has apparently declined from 1.3 per cent in 1971-72 to 1.1 per cent in the 1975-76 forecasts. However, the hospital insurance contribution has increased at an annual rate of 18 per cent during the comparable four-year period, partly due to higher wage awards for hospital staff.

Health care costs have also been increased by increased utilization or patient demand for services, some of which may well be unnecessary and represent a potential area for cost reductions. Canada, after all, is one of the healthiest countries in the world. Doctors are busy enough, without doing unnecessary work. When they receive adequate fees they can take better care of both their patients and themselves. The health care system then works better and neither the doctors nor health budgets become exhausted.

I have some more figures on the situation of doctors, but in view of the time I shall leave it at this for the present. The government has proposed a number of amendments. The first is that the exact ceilings are to be set for two years only. Second, there will be provision for increases for new, important classes of services. Third, there will be a three-year exemption from the ceiling for new insured services. I think these are all very worth-while amendments which deserve the support of all of us.

It being six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude my remarks at this point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five o'clock.

Mr. Philbrook: I am sorry; five o'clock.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

REMOVAL OF MINISTER'S RIGHT TO APPEAL DECISIONS OF REVIEW COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North) moved that Bill C-265, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is quite a while since I first introduced this bill in the House. At the time I introduced it, I introduced a companion bill relating to the right of participants who had applied for disability pensions under the Canada Pension Plan to secure assistance of a legal nature in presenting their case, in view of the fact that the government was appearing before the commissions that were set up, represented by legal officers from the federal government. The minister agreed to the concept contained in the bill relating to legal assistance for applicants, and I was therefore able to withdraw that bill which was incorporated in government legislation.

This particular bill relates to the fact that the minister has available to him certain powers to appeal decisions that have been handed down by boards established under the legislation, and it was then my opinion, and it continues to be so, that the minister should not have this right, in view of the fact that the legislation calls for the establishment of certain committees under government legislation and that their decisions should be firm and final when they find in favour of an applicant.

Section 85(1) of the Canada Pension Plan provides:

> An applicant or beneficiary or the minister, if dissatisfied by a decision of a review committee under section 84, may with the leave of the chairman of the Pension Appeals Board, appeal from the decision of a review committee to the Pension Appeals Board within 90 days from the day the decision is communicated to him or within such longer period as the Pension Appeals Board upon application made to it within those 90 days may allow.

The objective of this bill is to eliminate that portion of the section which reads "or the minister". In other words, the minister from this moment on, if the bill is adopted by the House, would no longer have the right to appeal. I think it would be appropriate to explain to the House the basis on which I initiated this bill, because it is very significant so far as I am concerned; it is as significant today as it was at the time I first introduced the bill.

Short of war, there is nothing more dehumanizing than big government in action. It is everywhere. It reveals itself in many forms. Businessmen call it red tape. Statistics Canada has been its chief instrument in the production of red tape. So long as it sticks to forms and statistics and commits the nation to computers, it is hard to fight, for all these acts are in the name of efficiency. Efficiency is constantly stressed in government circles but, unfortunately, is never produced. The system has become very sophisticated with its gadgetry, but is as inefficient today as it was in the horse and buggy days, and one only needs to refer to the new, computerized unemployment insurance scheme to know what I mean.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

But what outrages me and many others in this nation is that when an ordinary citizen becomes a victim of big government, that citizen and the members of his family are deprived of those things they have a right to receive. It becomes even more disgusting when it is discovered that big government has used a member of parliament, who happens to also be a minister of the Crown, as the instrument to achieve its objective.

Deverne MacDonald is a young man, 37 years of age, married, with three children. He resides in the small community of Westchester, Cumberland county, Nova Scotia. He was an employee of the CNR as a sectionman until uncontrollable diabetes forced him out of the labour force. The days ahead are bound to be very difficult for Deverne MacDonald and his family. Our social justice system is still not geared for such situations. The best evidence of this fact is that Mr. MacDonald and his family are trying to survive on $200 per month. That breaks down to $40 per month per individual.

Mr. MacDonald, when informed of the extent of his disability, applied for a Canada Pension Plan disability pension. His application was rejected. That fact does not surprise me. In order to qualify for this particular pension you must have one foot in the grave and the other on a banana peel. Mr. MacDonald applied for this pension in January, 1971, and was informed of the rejection of his application in December, 1971. Mr. MacDonald appealed that decision. It was heard by what is known as the review committee. In May, 1972, this committee found in Mr. MacDonald's favour. After 18 months it appeared that he would secure some additional assistance. But that was not to be his fate. No less a personage than the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), then minister of national health and welfare, appealed the decision of the review committee to another body, the Pension Appeals Board.

The review committee is composed of three persons, one appointed by the minister, the second by the applicant—in this case, Mr. MacDonald—and the third by the two appointed members. The third person acts as chairman. But their decision did not satisfy the minister. He may say he took this action on behalf of his department. But the minister, not his department, took the action, and if he had so deemed it, the action would not have been taken.

On investigation I learned that the favourable decision of May, 1972, would either be confirmed or rejected in either April or June, 1973. That means 2½ years after the man who was disabled first made application for a disability pension. It will probably be 2½ years from the time Mr. MacDonald made application for a disability pension, because he needed it then, to the date when a decision will be rendered on the minister's appeal. Who will render the decision? The Pension Appeals Board is composed of four judges who render a service through this board when they are not involved in their own court responsibilities. The judges are located in different parts of the country: one is from British Columbia, the second from the prairies, and two are from the province of Quebec. The board requires the attendance of three of the four judges. The board also has a registrar. The judges and the registrar will probably hold the hearing in Truro, Nova Scotia.

Along with the board will come a battery of lawyers and doctors, probably from Ottawa. Just imagine the expense involved in making a determination, initiated by the minister, as to whether an individual who is disabled as far as his doctors are concerned is disabled in the minds of a group of bureaucrats and judges pulled across Canada into Nova Scotia to make a decision whether to allow this particular individual to have a pension or not to have a pension. Mr. MacDonald, a man who has tried to live and to maintain his family on $200 per month has to leave Westchester, go to Truro, walk into a courtroom and face this battery of lawyers, doctors and judges because a minister in this House determined that he should not have something which an appointee on a board, whom the minister appointed, said he should. That is the situation.

What happened? The objective of the minister was to take away the right of this particular individual to have a pension to which the review committee said he was entitled. That is a pretty sad situation, and it is happening over and over again. I remember at the time this case came up, Donald MacInnis, who at that time was a member of parliament, informed me that there were two similar situations in his constituency. During the 1972 election campaign he had to take time out to go before that hearing because the two individuals in his constituency could not afford lawyers and had to go there by themselves to be cross-examined by federal government-paid lawyers and before the group of judges who had been paid to go there. No doubt they were getting a mighty good fee on top of that for sitting. What happened in both those cases? One of them was a man who had three heart attacks, and his appeal was thrown out. In other words, he was disqualified from receiving the pension which an earlier committee had determined he should receive.

The fate of Mr. MacDonald was not any better than the fate of the individual in Mr. MacInnis's constituency, because in the case of Mr. MacDonald it was said that even if he did have uncontrollable diabetes, according to their decision he could not qualify for a pension under the disability section of the Canada Pension Plan. It is difficult enough for an individual in this country to maintain himself and keep himself employed when he is healthy, but when he is faced with a situation where he has a disability which is so severe that he cannot work, and a minister of the Crown overrules a board which the minister himself set up, which said he should have a pension, it is a pretty sad commentary on life in this nation today, and certainly on the government. That is why I call it big government, government which does not think, worry or care about the people in this nation.

I think it is in the best interests of this parliament and in the best interests of the minister to eliminate his right to appeal a decision of the review committee in those cases where a favourable decision is rendered by the review committee.

As a matter of fact, it is my belief that the bureaucrats in the department are using the minister's name in order to try to do something which the minister, if he knew the full facts of the matter, would not do in the first place. We would be doing the minister, and certainly every individual who contributes to the Canada Pension Plan, a favour if we eliminated this very iniquitous section of the act. Therefore, I hope hon. members will assist me in having this bill referred to committee, so that all members of parliament can examine it and determine if it is in the best interests of Canadians, generally speaking, to eliminate the minister's right in this particular way.

Big government is something we like to ignore. Sometimes we can. Deverne MacDonald and his family could not, and should not have had to face the fact of life they faced then and face today, unfortunately, because of a decision of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, this is a very technical point which is being proposed in Bill C-265 put forward by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), and just before getting into the details I should like to make one observation. In his comments about big government, I think the hon. member was indicating some of the derogatory points about big government, and I am sure we can all agree that, like anything which gets rather big, there are disadvantages built into the system. However, I think one of the advantages, or one of the interesting things to see, is that an item like this can come before the nation, and can be brought in great detail, about the individual circumstances of one particular person, Mr. Deverne MacDonald. I think it is a strong point for our system that Mr. MacDonald's problems can come before the parliament of this nation in this way. Although we have big government, there are still, hopefully, opportunities for matters of this kind to be discussed in this forum.

Bill C-265 proposes the deletion of the minister's prerogative to appeal a decision or a recommendation made by a tribunal. This is a fairly serious thing, and we must consider it very carefully because it is important that decisions on matters of this kind, made by tribunals of this sort which are only set up for the particular circumstances involved, do not create precedents which could have implications and serious consequences to many more people across the country. As the hon. member mentioned, the amendment is identical to that contained in an earlier bill sponsored by him and put before this House in 1973.

To put the implications in perspective, I think we must recall the origins and the historical development of the Canada Pension Plan, another creature of big government but, I think, a creature we are all rather happy to have. This is important in order for us to appreciate the complexities of the program itself. The Canada Pension Plan came into being in 1965. The enactment of the program was the culmination of a long series of legislation aimed at providing alternative forms of income security for old people in Canada. In fact, the subject of income assistance for the elderly had been a topic of parliamentary debate since the early days of this century, and silent witness to those debates can be found in the statutes.

It was recognized that in our complex society many aspects of everyday life can place an individual and his or her family in financial difficulties: for example, imperfect knowledge of labour markets, lack of education and adequate training, poor judgment, poor health, extraordinary events, and one could go on and on. In consequence, it was found that despite the enactment of the rather innovative old age security pension plan, a large proportion of Canada's old people were still having to rely on public assistance. As a result, a three-pronged approach to income security for the elderly was put into place. These included an enrichment of the universal old age security pension and a gradual lowering of the eligibility age for this particular pension to 65.

There was also the introduction of the comprehensive social insurance plan for retirement, disability and survivors, called the Canada Pension Plan, and the enactment of the guaranteed income supplement for the aged to provide minimum income support for those unable to participate in the plan and those retiring before benefits available under the Canada Pension Plan matured. In some provinces, including my own, there has been an additional supplement. In Ontario this is referred to as "the Gains" plan, which adds to those benefits provided federally so that there is a minimum income assured to all residents of the province when they reach the age of retirement.

An examination of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, 1964-65, and the white paper on the Canada Pension Plan, 1964, reveals the following information about the intended general trusts of the plan: to provide a contributory pension program for Canadian workers with as comprehensive coverage as practicable; to provide basic pensions that would still leave room for private pensions and for personal initiative; to provide reasonable minimum levels of income to retired persons at normal retirement ages, to persons who become disabled and to the survivors of people who die; to provide earnings-related benefits; to provide flat rate benefits in addition to earnings-related benefits to the disabled and to the survivors of contributors for whom flat rate old age security benefits were not available, so as to assist the lower income groups, and to ensure provision of pensions that are related to general earnings levels at the time of retirement and to the levels of prices during retirement.

Thus, the Canada Pension Plan was expected to provide a central means by which contributions would be collected from employers, employees and the self-employed so that the working population could insure themselves and their families against three of the most common contingencies resulting in long-term financial hardships, namely, death, disability and retirement. The foregoing clearly demonstrates the breadth and complexity of this legislation and one can speculate upon the administrative difficulties experienced in applying this ambitious program.

To ensure fair and equitable treatment for all applicants and beneficiaries alike within the complex legislative framework, the Canada Pension Plan provides for a three-level appeal system. This was referred to in part by the honourable member. I should just like to enunciate it again. First, an applicant or beneficiary who is dissatisfied with the initial decision as to entitlement or the amount of that entitlement may appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) for reconsideration of that decision. That is the first level of appeal.

[Mr. Martin.]

Second, should the minister decide to maintain the original decision, then the applicant or beneficiary may appeal the ministerial decision to a review committee. A review committee is a locally constituted body of three people, one chosen by the appellant, one by the minister, and the third, the chairman, selected by the other two members.

Third, if either party to a review committee appeal, that is to say, the minister or the applicant or beneficiary, is dissatisfied with a committee decision, then either may, with leave, appeal that decision to the Pension Appeals Board. I think this is the point in question, whether the employee should still have that privilege or not. The Pension Appeals Board is the final stage of the appeal process.

It is clear that there must be a level of appeal for the minister beyond the review committee stage, since that person is charged with the responsibility of applying the terms of the Canada Pension Plan in a fair and consistent manner to the more than seven million contributors subject to the plan. I think we must bear in mind at all times the figure of seven million people involved. This is because the implementation of a review committee decision—which committee is most often a group of lay people and has no judicial authority beyond that stated in the Canada Pension Plan—in a particular case could mean, in effect, that the law would be applied to an individual in a way different from the application of that law in all other similar circumstances.

That is the point I was referring to at the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, the importance of ensuring that a decision is not made by the appeal group that would then act as a precedent which would affect many other cases across the country. In these instances, a decision must then be taken whether the application is to be as the review committee believes it to be, or as the minister has been advised. Accordingly, the act provides for the Pension Appeals Board to act as a forum for the reaching of such a decision. At that level they can look at the situation and consider it in terms of its national implications.

Because of this function and because of the binding nature of its decisions, the Pension Appeals Board is made up of a chairman and vice-chairman who are judges of either the Federal Court of Canada or the superior court of a province, and members who are all judges of the Federal Court or of a superior district or county court of a province. For the convenience of applicants or beneficiaries who appeal at this level, the board is empowered to sit and hear appeals at any place or places in Canada. Further, although in many cases the evidence can well be submitted via a written brief or presentation, where the chairman feels the applicant should appear before the board for one reason or another, provision is made for payment of travelling and living expenses, including any loss of compensation, while attending.

Bill C-22, which received royal assent on November 27, 1974, and which came into force on January 1, 1975, contains a number of amendments to make the appeal system as flexible and accessible as possible. Those changes affecting the Pension Appeals Board include the following: payment of the legal expenses incurred by an applicant or beneficiary when the appeal against a review committee is launched by the minister; provision for a vice-chairman who, if the chairman is absent or incapacitated, has all the powers and duties of the chairman; an increase in the size of the board from a maximum of six to a maximum of ten, to permit regional panels; the authority for someone to appeal on behalf of an incapacitated person, and more flexibility in the time for, and the granting of, leave to appeal. I should note that, while most of these changes were before the House at the time the hon. member tabled his bill, they were not proclaimed in force until January 1, 1975.

In this context, I should like to note that the Canada Pension Plan administration receives between 140,000 and 160,000 applications for benefits a year. In September, 1975, some 687,000 Canada Pension Plan benefits were paid. Of those benefits, more than 400,000 were retirement benefits about 46,000 were disability pensions and nearly 109,000 were widows' or widowers' pensions. In spite of this volume of cases handled by the Canada Pension Plan administration, of the 11,000 denials for benefits in the fiscal year 1974-75 only 1,800 requests for reconsideration were brought to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the vast majority of these cases new information was brought forward. Consequently, in two-thirds, or 1,200, of these requests for review the minister decided in favour of the applicant or beneficiary.

Further, less than half of the remaining 600 appellants whose requests for reconsideration had been denied chose to pursue their case to the review committee stage. I am sure that all hon. members realize that this represents a very small proportion of the total volume of cases handled by the Canada Pension Plan administration on a yearly basis.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the very plausible case that the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) has made against Bill C-265, I still think that this House should lean over backwards, if it has to do that, and send this bill to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs so that it can be studied.

I was involved in the discussions and all the rest of the activity relating to the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan. I can confirm what the hon. member for Scarborough West has said about it. In fact, I welcome this opportunity to say again what a good plan it is. I shall have more to say about that in a moment. But surely even those of us who are friends and supporters of the Canada Pension Plan have the right to point out weaknesses if we feel there are any in it.

I need not review the whole course that the previous speaker outlined. May I emphasize the fact that the only way in which an applicant's case gets before a review committee is if that applicant feels he has been wronged. In no case does the minister or the department refer a case to a review committee. That happens only when an applicant for the pension feels that the bureaucracy has unfairly turned him down. It is something like going before an ombudsman. An applicant has the right, as we all know, to have a review committee established, and in certain cases the review committee does find in favour of the applicant.

Even after one has made the argument that the last speaker made about the need to have consistency of rulings because of the large numbers of cases involved, it makes a mockery of the right to go before a review committee if the minister then has the right to appeal the favourable decision of that committee and get the case thrown out.

If we need to have some concern about consistency of decisions, surely there can be some way to establish case law, or some way by regulation, to set limits surrounding these review committees. To repeat the words I have already used, it seems to make a mockery of the review committee structure if an applicant who gets a favourable decision is then turned down on the initiative of the minister. As I already said, it is like a person going before an ombudsman, asserting that the bureaucracy has done him wrong, getting the ombudsman to say that he is right, and then finding that Big Brother in the office of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has the right to take the matter one step further.

I realize that the applicant who has been turned down by the review committee has the same right, namely, to go to the Pension Appeals Board. However, what we are dealing with here is the case of the individual who feels that under the law he has the right to a pension for which he has paid. For him to feel that the cards are stacked against him in this way does lead to a feeling of grievance.

I am freely admitting a point made by the hon. member for Scarborough West, namely, that if you have a few hundred review committees coming up with different decisions there is going to be confusion as to what is right and what is wrong. However, that can surely be handled in some other way than this present arrangement which is built into the act and gives the Minister of National Health and Welfare the power to offset the favourable finding of a review committee.

I, too, welcome the fact that earlier in this session we passed an appropriate amendment to the Canada Pension Plan so that in this circumstance the applicant has his expenses paid. All told, however, I think the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), who brought in this bill, raises an important issue, one that concerns individuals, be they few in number. Because the case on its merit looks like one that is a real grievance, I hope the House will be willing to send this bill, or at least its subject matter, to the appropriate committee.

While I am on my feet there are a couple of other things I would like to say. I hope some day we can get behind this review committee procedure to the substance of the case to which the hon. member referred, namely, the restricted definition that applies to disability. The hon. member said that you need to have one foot in the grave and the other on a banana peel in order to qualify. I suggest it is just about that severe.

I suppose that most of us in our dealings with persons involved with Canada Pension Plan applications have many cases where individuals feel they are disabled. In fact we get individuals who are ruled as disabled so they cannot work by some other department of government, and then denied a pension under the Canada Pension Plan because under its definition they are not really disabled. There are people treated in that way.

I am sure the hon. member who is nodding his head agrees with me that that matter is also one that ought to be examined. That is one of the reasons why I should like to see the bill or its subject matter go to committee where we can discuss this aspect.

As I want to see this bill get to committee, I must not contribute to talking it out. I will just take another minute at most to say that with all the faults we may find with the Canada Pension Plan, as one who was involved in its original passing, I still think it is one of the best pension plans—apart from that for members of parliament, of course—available to the people of this country.

In these days when there are questions being asked about the security of many private pension plans and so on, it is good to know that for all Canadians there is old age security and for most Canadians there is the Canada Pension Plan. It should be still further enlarged. Some of the problems we have discussed should be resolved. Arrangements should soon be made for private plans that want to get incorporated into the Canada Pension Plan to have that right and privilege. The future old age security of our people generally will be much better if this plan, along with old age security, is still further enlarged.

I hope that if this bill goes to committee we can have some discussions along that line. As I say, I am prepared to admit the plausibility of the argument that has come from across the way, but I do not think that my hon. friend has set aside the case for this bill being referred to the standing committee. I hope that will be done before this hour ends.

● (1740)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-265 which is before us this afternoon proposes to deny the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) the ability to appeal to the Pension Appeals Board a decision of a review committee under the Canada Pension Plan.

Any applicant for benefits or a beneficiary under the Canada Pension Plan who is dissatisfied with a decision regarding the level of or eligibility for CPP benefits may appeal the decision through three separate appeal stages.

At the first level, those who wish to do so may make a request to the minister for reconsideration of a decision taken by the CPP administration. In the last fiscal year some 1,800 such requests were made and of these 1,200, or two thirds, were decided in favour of the appellants. Some 97 per cent of these requests involved the determination of disability. In such cases additional evidence or altered circumstances may be brought forward, and, consequently, influence the application of the legislation.

In the same period 274 persons availed themselves of the opportunity to pursue their appeal to the second level of appeal, that is, the review committee. This represents fewer than half of the 600 ministerial reconsiderations which had been denied.

I should like to mention here that each review committee consists of three members, all of whom are Canadian residents. One of these members is to be appointed by the applicant or beneficiary and one is to be appointed on behalf of the minister. These two members then jointly appoint a third board member to act as chairman. If the two members cannot agree on the choice of a chairman, the appointment of the chairman may be made by a judge of a superior, district or county court in the applicant or beneficiary's province of residence or, in the case of a non-resident, in the province in which the applicant or beneficiary's review committee member resides. The review committee hearing takes place in a location in Canada determined by the chairman with regard to the convenience of the applicant or beneficiary and the minister.

At the inception of the Canada Pension Plan the availability of this second level of appeal to a review committee was provided to avoid putting applicants and beneficiaries to the expense of a formal application to a court at the first stage of appealing the decision of the minister. Instead the appeal can be made to these locally constituted bodies. The accessibility of the appeal process was further broadened in the recent amendments made to the plan which came into effect on January 1, 1975. These provisions allow a third person to appeal a decision on behalf of an incapacitated applicant.

A decision of a review committee may be appealed to the Pension Appeals Board by the appellant or, again as recently amended, by someone acting on his or her behalf in certain circumstances. The opportunity to appeal a review committee decision to the Pension Appeals Board is also available to the minister. I should emphasize that an appeal by the minister is not necessarily presented in order to deny a benefit to a potential recipient. As an illustration, let us consider the case of two claimants—a legal and a common-law spouse—for survivors' benefits in respect of one contributor. Where a review committee decision awards the benefit to one survivor this effectively excludes the second surviving spouse both from the benefit and, more important, from an appeal of the decision itself. In this and similar circumstances the ministerial appeal to the Pension Appeals Board represents the interests of third parties affected by review committee rulings.

Beyond the implications of review committee decisions for parties affected by the specific case, the broader picture of equity and uniformity of legislative application between applicants and beneficiaries in similar circumstances is crucial.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when he was speaking a few minutes ago, suggested that this consistency or uniformity of rulings could perhaps be achieved in some other way. I would point out that the members of the review committee are not judges, they are not—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They are human beings.

Mr. Foster: They are not people trained to handle judicial decisions of that type, so the first time a matter really comes before judges is when it goes to the Pension Appeals Board; that is the first time you have a body which is studying cases right across the country, so this is the advantage, at this level, of getting uniform decisions and a consistency in the rulings made.

The Canada Pension Plan is a complex piece of legislation, since it provides such a broad range of intended benefits. The program covers virtually the entire Canadian labour force outside of Quebec, and provides income security for contributors and their families. Obviously every possible individual circumstance cannot be anticipated and covered in the legislation, or its regulations, nor for the sake of flexibility should this be attempted. However, in providing for the discretionary application of legislative provisions, and appeals thereto, the possibility is ever present that a given interpretation of the legislation, which had been applied acceptably and uniformly, may be altered, reversed, or even completely disregarded in an isolated case of appeal to a review committee. In the interests of so many past, present, and future applicants or beneficiaries in similar circumstances, it is essential that such conflicting interpretations of the legislation be referred to a higher judicial body capable of rendering an informed and authoritative decision. The Pension Appeals Board, made up as it is of judges, provides such a forum.

It cannot be expected that an individual appellant will take upon him or herself the onus of establishing criteria by which to ensure the fair disposition of Canada Pension Plan benefit cases in general. This responsibility falls to the minister. If we conclude, and I believe we must, that such a judicial forum is essential to the proper administration of the Act, then by denying the minister access to the Pension Appeals Board I can only conclude that the hon. member is suggesting that such applications for judicial rulings must be made by the minister directly to a federal court.

In all of this the House can be assured that the position of the individual in such appeals is given much consideration and every effort is made to ensure that the applicant or beneficiary is not placed at a disadvantage. To this end a series of legislative amendments was implemented effective January 1, 1975, to improve the plan's appeal system. The first, to which I referred earlier, extends full rights of appeal to representatives of applicants or beneficiaries who are unable to act on their own behalf. A second amendment provides that in cases of ministerial appeal to the Pension Appeals Board, the affected applicant or beneficiary, or his representative, may be paid their legal expenses, thus ensuring their ability to be represented by counsel at such an appeal. Also, provision was made for the membership of the Pension Appeals Board to be expanded in order that cases might be heard more expeditiously and the position of the affected individuals not be prejudiced by lengthy delays.

With these amendments, difficulties to clients arising our of ministerial appeals have been ameliorated. In conclusion, it is important to retain the authorization in the legislation for ministerial appeals in order to ensure the continued effective administration of the Canada Pension Plan legislation.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, we only have a few minutes left and I do not wish to take up much time because I had hoped we would be able to vote on this measure and have it sent to committee. However, I hope in vain; it appears to be the intention of government members to talk it out.

● (1750)

I commend the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) on the fight he has been waging in this regard for a period of years. I also listened intently to the Liberal member who spoke prior to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); I am sorry but I do not have his constituency.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Scarborough West.

Mr. Muir: It would appear he was well briefed by the department to present a very good defence because he smothered us with statistics, as did the most recent speaker on the other side, my good friend, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster). However, they did not deal with the human aspect, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said.

The last member who spoke cast a reflection on the review board when he said it was only made up of individuals, not judges. What makes a judge know more than an individual who sits on a board and who has a medical report in front of him? In fact I have a decision of a review board in front of me here in which they say it is apparent from the medical evidence submitted by the family doctor, supported by the Department of Veterans Affairs medical board as well as a consultant specialist of the Department of National Health and Welfare, Canada Pension Plan, that the appellant had a physical disability which was most severe, prolonged, and so on and so forth. Despite that, the decision was appealed by the minister to the Pension Appeals Board and the appellant was out in the cold.

The time element is important in these cases, as the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North mentioned. I know another man who made his original application on August 25, 1971, and by gosh, on June 4, 1972, they were able to come back and tell him that his application could not be approved. In the meantime he was sick in bed, could not work, and his family was suffering. He was told he could appeal under section 83, so in July, shortly after his first rejection, he appealed to have the matter reconsidered. All of the evidence submitted with the application was carefully reviewed, but in September, 1972, he was advised that he was unsuccessful.

This man then appealed to the review committee and it was not until June 26, 1973, that that appeal was heard. The committee decided that the man was disabled, having in their possession all of the medical reports it was possible to obtain. However, that decision was appealed by the minister.

As the hon. member who originated the bill has said, why is it that we get high priced help, ship all these judges across from British Columbia to Nova Scotia, pay them big salaries and so on, and bring the full power and force of the federal government to bear in crushing the application of some coal miner or steelworker? I refer to these two categories of workers, in particular because I would like to refer hon. members to the case of one gentleman, now deceased, who made an application and sent in all his medical reports, including reports from the Victoria General Hospital, reports of specialists and so on. His application was rejected. He then appealed and was sent to a heart specialist nominated by the government, as well as another specialist. He was rejected there. Then the review committee approved his appeal, the government appealed, and he was turned down. Three weeks after the decision was brought down this man was in his grave following a heart attack. This is the sort of thing that is happening, Mr. Speaker.

A few years ago some questions were asked by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North about the number of decisions of the Pension Appeals Board which were favourable to appellants to that date. The total was 47. There were 24 in Canada and 23 in Quebec. I did wonder why the question was answered in that form; I thought Quebec was part of Canada and I hope it will remain so. There were 136 unfavourable decisions; 37 in Canada and 99 in Quebec.

I appeal to hon. members of the Liberal party on this matter. They must hear of a lot of cases of the sort I have described, or if not a lot certainly a number, and they must be faced with the same problem in their constituencies. If they will not agree to vote on this matter today may I suggest they bring it up in caucus, talk to the minister about it, and try to get this right of appeal by the minister eliminated altogether. I think it is really tantamount to turning down an applicant for unemployment insurance. If an applicant goes to the board of referees which approves the application, then if the minister of manpower followed the same procedure as here he would have the right to appeal the decision and cut off the applicant from unemployment insurance payments.

It is hard to understand why someone has to be dragged before all this procedure. There is the original application by the appellant, the appeal itself, then the review committee proceeding and so on. Not everyone is as gregarious as hon. members opposite, and a quiet man or woman who is a little nervous at seeing all these judges backed up by lawyers is put at a great disadvantage.

I have another case here which I regret I do not have time to refer to, but in its decision a board said the man was absolutely disabled as a result of all the medical evidence they had at hand. However, with this great power the minister appealed the decision against one lonely little Canadian.

The hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) made much ado about isn't it wonderful that we can bring up individual cases in the House of Commons. What the hell is so wonderful about that, Mr. Speaker? That is what the House of Commons is for. We do not have enough time for that sort of thing. The House of Commons is for the commoner and there is no big deal about being able to raise the question of a person being persecuted by big government.

In conclusion let me say to hon. members—I must not say ladies and gentlemen because that is not permissible—that if they are unlucky enough to get carcinoma they will have no problem, so let them think about that.

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to talk this bill out but because I think there are some facts that should be drawn to the attention of hon. members on the other side. The average time taken by the appeal procedure for a decision in disability cases is 55 days. I should also like to draw to the attention of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), whom I congratualte on his initiative in introducing a number of bills that will fine tune and refine the appeal procedure under the Canada Pension Plan, that what we are dealing with here is a quasi-judicial body. He mentioned the problem of the board's travelling all across Canada to hear an appeal. By its very nature it is a tribunal that goes to the place where the applicant lives for the hearing—in the case of the hon. member, Nova Scotia—instead of having an applicant go before the Federal Court and have him travel all the way to Ottawa at great expense. That is one of the features of a quasi-judicial body.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Muir: You did a great job of talking it out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for private members' business has now expired, and I leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

MEDICAL CARE ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-68, an act to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, allow me to say that I am quite pleased to take part in this debate. I know that the legislation now under consideration is quite important, as indicated in the preface of a report entitled "A New Perspective" and signed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) who states the following:

> Good health is the bedrock on which social progress is built. A nation of healthy people can do those things that make life worthwhile, and as the level of health increases, so does the potential for happiness.

Since we are considering a bill amending the Medical Care Act, I have taken the liberty of quoting this paragraph clearly showing the importance of this legislation.

Like many other members, I have a lot of material on this matter. I do not intend to quote it word by word in this House, because, on the one hand, I have already read the minister's speech relating a long history of this legislation dealing with medical care and shared costs between the federal government and the provinces. He referred also to the efforts made by the government for several years. I also checked the fine speech delivered by my colleague from Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), the opposition critic, who has tried in a fine manner to make the government aware of the weaknesses of the measure. Since other members have made speeches in this House, I retain a series of figures, analysis, all explaining the situation as it is. That is why I shall abstain from quoting all these statistics, although they are very serious and worthwhile, since they have already been recorded in this House.

As far as I am concerned, Madam Speaker, this legislation poses a substantial problem, in the sense that it affects in a very direct, very particular and very precise way, negotiations that must take place between the provinces and the federal government.

Last June, the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) announced that the government intended to reduce its participation in the cost of medical services. In this way, the federal government, in our opinion—and I think that Canadians agree—realized that the government, after forcing the provinces to participate in the medicare program a few years ago had decided by a legislation that the provinces which would not participate would lose millions. So, these provinces were naturally forced to "embark" on a program for which some of them were not ready yet. I must therefore say that there was a lack of consultation. Last June, the Minister of Finance, on behalf of his government, reversed his policy and announced that the government would eventually retire from that program, in view of the increases. We certainly are in an inflationary context, but we do not accept forcing those people to pay for medical care. They have all sorts of handicaps, and they absolutely need our protection.

The government has gone ahead without any preliminary consultations with the provinces, and this bears repeating since after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) had made his statement and taken his decision, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) felt obliged to tour Canada to meet the provincial ministers. Of course, the minister says he has met with the provincial ministers and discussed it with them. We are not denying that, but we know perfectly well that this has not been done prior to the decision being taken by the government, and each time we wonder why.

It is not the first time the provinces are not consulted appropriately. That is why I feel this is a basic problem. I would like to have a federalism of participation. We have a federalism where some provinces are complaining about this lack of consultations. Of course, some hon. members will say I am exaggerating. Yesterday my colleague from Athabasca quoted some statements by provincial ministers; that is the undeniable proof that several provinces are not satisfied and claiming better consultations.

For instance, I must say the situation was the same when there was talk of anti-inflationary measures, and again when the matter of taxing our natural resources was discussed, and more recently, when there was talk of setting up a federal park in the province of Quebec. It seems that consultations were sadly lacking. I have a feeling, Madam Speaker, that you will bring me back to the subject at hand, but those are as many examples I want to mention to stress the fact that the lack of consultation is not something new; the time has come to remind the government of the importance of those consultations and the participation of the provinces. That is why I gave examples which, once again, taking into account the declarations of provincial ministers, prove that there is not enough consultation. And then people wonder why the provinces are disatisfied, why the government is becoming less popular, why it is losing some of its credibility at the present time.

And so, we, on this side of the House, believe that it is important that we should protect the quality of our health services; we also believe thoses services are necessary for those who need them; I wonder to what extent the government takes that into consideration when it speaks of dollars? The paragraph I read at the beginning is marvellous. It was signed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare; if that wonderful thought serves as a source of inspiration, one dares hope that the government will spare no effort to ensure essential cares to the Canadians who need them. We are told that there will be cuts especially in expected increases. Even a government member this afternoon was giving us the evidence that there would be increases. We do know that there will be some more, and it is sure that if the government lowers its contribution the poorest levels of the society, the poorest provinces will suffer more than the richest provinces. So, by foreseeing this unacceptable injustice to these Canadians, we are naturally and necessarily justified to oppose the passing of a piece of legislation which does not meet the needs of that just society promised in 1968.

In view of this dissatisfaction, of this refusal by the provinces of a possible agreement, the minister concluded that something had to be done, because the negotiations did not end the way he wished. Is it possible to talk about a viable federalism as long as the provinces will not be able to find a certain security? I do not think so. So, we believe in these negotiations. We favour a federalism of participation as well as a certain de-centralization. And we believe that Canadians are ever more inclined to reject that centralizing federalism.

I know that those words may seem harsh to some hon. members in this House but it is important that the public know that the government is asking us to pass a law which is not acceptable to the provinces and therefore to Canadians in all parts of the country. We believe it is our job and our responsibility to tell the government that we refuse to play the role they expect us to play and that we would rather assume our responsibilities which demand that we respect the provinces. Now this bill shows in practically every clause a disregard for provincial wishes; it does not square with the objective which a minister of health should set for himself or the government fulfill for all Canadians.

Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to quote statistics again. They have been mentioned. I simply wish to talk about this aspect of funding which is as always the battlefield, and about the lack of meaningful negotiation between the provinces and the federal government. It is not the first time, as I have said before. It is unfortunate and alarming, and the government can wonder why there are so many objections and why it is now impossible to maintain a certain credibility; it is because they are far from meeting the solutions and recommendations put forward by the provinces. And we believe that the provinces have something to say in this particular field, because they always had important decisions to make as regards health care.

Nevertheless, it is the federal government which, some years ago, felt most generous when it agreed to pay 50 per cent without restrictions. But today, these medical costs are always increasing for all sorts of reasons, but not necessarily because of the provinces, and the same thing happens in every field, Madam Speaker. The federal government makes a decision—without negotiating, I repeat—and informs the provinces in advance. Once the decision is made, the provinces are consulted and put before the fait accompli. The government is in the habit of putting the provinces in a strait-jacket. After, they negotiate. In my opinion, this is fair.

That attitude on the part of the government vis-à-vis the provinces is sheer confrontation. It can only bring major problems. So, Madam Speaker, I think that the role of the opposition which sees in this legislation a lack of respect toward the provinces as well as an impossibility to achieve the objective that the minister set for himself in a particular brochure, necessarily forces him not only to inform the members of this House that this bill is unacceptable but that Canadians must know that we are trying today on their behalf to ask the government not to pass this bill until the ten provinces find valid reasons to accept it.

I think it would be indecent for a government to pass this bill without having the assurance of provincial participation. Madam Speaker, those are the few remarks I wanted to make in asking the members of this House to grasp the importance of respecting the provinces, to understand their arguments and allow them with the federal government to prepare a legislation that will offer possibilities of meeting objectives. It is important that this government supplement the efforts the provinces are making and become a coordinator of those efforts, taking into account the objectives of the provinces, instead of centralizing. That is the problem as it stands now. As often as legislation such as this is presented to us without the assurance of consultation and respect for the provinces, I think we have that role to play, that responsibility to ask the government to change its attitude, and I say to this government that the time has come for it to change its attitude and be mcuh more open to those negotiations.

Having said that, we would gladly support bills that are in accordance with the objectives the minister speaks about on paper but which cannot be met because of the approach he displays before this House.

Madam Speaker, I hope amendments will be brought in at the committee stage, that negotiations with the provinces will be respected and that this legislation will not be pushed further in this House until the ten provincial ministers of health agree with the minister sponsoring this legislation that is unacceptable to us at this point.

[Mr. La Salle.]

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, in introducing this bill the minister in fact, although he may seem to make some small concessions, proposes in a very fundamental way to implement changes in the method by which medical insurance costs have been paid for many years. The minister proposes that the cost of the programs, which substantially has been shared 50-50 by the federal and provincial governments, will now be handled in such a way that the percentage paid by the federal government in the coming years will be less, and probably substantially less than the 50 per cent which has been paid up until now.

In beginning his speech the minister had some very complimentary things to say about our system of health care and the way in which it is paid for. I think he has every right to be complimentary, particularly when we compare our system of paying for medical services and hospital services with the way in which such services are paid for in the United States.

Recently during the Christmas season a senior public servant, in the employment of the federal government, with his family visited a large city in the United States. One of his children became sick and had to be admitted to hospital. The family was told that the child would not be admitted to the hospital until they had first deposited a cheque in the amount of $1,500 with the hospital in order to take care of possible and probable hospital costs. It is a long time since any Canadian citizen had to face that kind of situation in this country, and we can thank the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who instituted the hospital insurance plan in Saskatchewan when he was premier, and the federal Conservative government which extended that plan to all the provinces in Canada, and also the federal Liberal government which, taking the example of the province of Saskatchewan, began a medical insurance plan paid for by the federal and provincial governments.

What the minister is proposing is what he first proposed in 1973, that is, that 50 per cent of the cost of medical insurance paid for by the federal government would no longer be paid but rather that on a declining scale the amount paid by the federal government would be capped, that a limit would be put on the increase paid by the federal government of 14 per cent in 1976-1977, of 10 per cent 1977-1978, and of a smaller amount, to be negotiated with the provinces, for future years.

No only do I disagree with the limit which the minister has put on for the next two years, I have a great deal of skepticism about the supposed negotiations and discussions which the government and the minister will have with the provinces. My skepticism is based not on supposition but on experience.

From the day on which the minister announced the limits on the amounts the federal government would pay every provincial government, all ten provincial governments, whether they be Liberal, Conservative or NDP—and I am certain the present Social Credit government of British Columbia will join the other nine provincial governments—objected, first of all to the federal government refusing to pay 50 per cent of the cost as it has until now and, secondly, to the federal government deciding unilaterally that it would reduce the percentage which it paid.

Let us remember that many of the provinces did not want to become involved in a universal government sponsored, government operated medical insurance plan. If my memory serves me correctly, the province of Ontario with its Conservative government was the last province to join the medical insurance plan. They did not want to join that plan because they believed that the former voluntary plan was adequate and that all that a government should do is to pay the premiums for those people who cannot afford to be covered under the voluntary plans. So they did not join the medical insurance plan until the opposition parties started to point out to the electors of Ontario that they were losing hundreds of millions of dollars by not joining the plan. As a result, Ontario under a Conservative government was brought kicking and screaming into the national medical insurance plan organized and operated by the government.

The Government of Canada having persuaded, enticed, and browbeaten the provincial governments to come into the medical insurance plan, is now telling them that it is no longer prepared to pay for 50 per cent of the cost, that there is a limit on what it will pay next year, and that the ceiling will be lowered further in the years after that. That is a strange way for the federal government to act.

For almost 18 months the provincial governments have been trying to persuade the federal government and the minister to sit down with them and discuss what is wrong with the present plan and what could be done to limit the increases which are taking place. One would think, to listen to the minister and the government, that it is only the federal government that is concerned about the increase in the costs of medical insurance, and the next bill we will be discussing, I suppose, will be increasing the costs of hospital insurance. The provinces are just as concerned as is the federal government. Indeed I think it would be fair to say that the provinces are more concerned than the federal government because they do not have the ability which Ottawa has to raise money through taxes. What will happen?

Mr. Abbott: They should cut some costs.

Mr. Orlikow: They sure cannot learn how to cut costs by looking at the federal government. There is no provincial government in Canada which has had any increase in the number of civil servants and in the number of programs that the federal government has—not Liberal, not Conservative, not NDP. I am prepared to debate that and to prove that to the hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) any time he wants.

The provinces have been trying to discuss this question with the federal government for almost 18 months. There have been innumerable meetings of provincial health ministers and senior officials of health departments with officials of the federal Department of National Health and Welfare. On a number of occasions the minister promised to meet with the provincial health ministers before he proceeded with this bill. But there has not been a meeting between the minister and the provincial health ministers since last January. Why was the minister afraid to meet provincial health ministers collectively? Why did he go on a junket across this country to meet the provincial health ministers individually? Did he think that he could do better with them separately than he could meeting them all together? That must be the reason, because he has not met them once collectively in the last 12 months.

Why is the minister bringing this bill forward now? Only a few months ago the minister was saying to certain provincial health ministers that he did not think he could go ahead with this legislation. Indeed I am told that to one health minister he said that if that health minister would support seat belt legislation he would drop this whole bill. Why is he going ahead, and particularly why is he going ahead now when we have the anti-inflation program? After all, we are in a period of restraint, so says the minister. The hon. member for Mississauga also indicated this.

Certainly the provinces are all on a crash course of restraint. They have put the freeze on increases in the field of education, in the field of welfare, and in the field of health costs. We know that they are closing up hospitals, as was stated by a Liberal member earlier this afternoon. The province of Ontario is closing up hospitals, so hospital costs are not going to go up. Hospital workers—I am talking about ward aides, attendants, and practical nurses, have had their wages frozen. So far as I know, all the provinces have indicated that they will join in the anti-inflation program. Therefore wages can only go up by 10 per cent and the other costs will also be pretty sharply restricted.

• (2030)

Why does the minister say that he needs legislation which will freeze the increase in the cost the federal government will pay in 1976-77 to 14 per cent, and in the year after to something less than that? There is only one place where the cost can go up so markedly that the minister would have to freeze the increase to be paid by the federal government. The only place where the increase can be so sharp that the federal government has to place a limit is in medical fees. If hon. members consider what is happening to medical fees they will see why the minister has to invoke this 14 per cent limit.

In my province of Manitoba, which has an NDP government and a premier who believes in an incomes policy, who has accepted the guidelines and the 10 per cent limit on wage increases, and who is getting a great deal of—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: Just listen. If the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) will just keep his mouth shut for a couple of minutes, he will get the point I am trying to make, and I hope he will agree with the premier of Manitoba.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I do.

Mr. Orlikow: All right, wait a minute or two. The premier of Manitoba takes the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) seriously. The premier of Manitoba and the provincial minister of health, who represents the same area as the hon. member for St. Boniface take the Government of Canada seriously.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, on a point of order I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) the fact that the provincial minister of health in the province of Manitoba only represents one sixth of my constituency.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): This is not a point of order but a matter for debate.

Mr. Orlikow: The premier of Manitoba and the minister of health in Manitoba have taken the Government of Canada seriously. They believe in an incomes policy. They believe in a limit on the increase in income which any person should be able to receive. They believe the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) meant business when he said that people at the bottom of the income ladder should not receive an increase in wages of more than $750, and that people at the top of the income bracket should not receive an increase in income of more than $2,400. So in negotiating the new fee schedule with the Manitoba Medical Association they are insisting that no doctor be permitted to receive an increase of more than $2,400 in the coming year.

What has happened? Lo and behold, that great Canadian, the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board, was in Winnipeg last weekend, and he did the premier of Manitoba a great favour. He really helped him in his desire to follow the spirit and the intent of the legislation brought in by the federal government. The chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board gave an interview in Winnipeg in which he said that the guidelines did not mean that no doctor could receive more than $2,400 individually. They only meant that all the doctors in Manitoba, including the interns and people on staff, could have an average increase of not more than $2,400. That means that some surgeon may receive an increase of $7,000 or $10,000. But that suits the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), and I am sure that suits the hon. member for St. Boniface.

The precise point of this legislation is to guarantee that, while doctors may receive as much as they can earn with no restrictions, the federal government will not have to pay, and that the provincial governments will have to pay the full shot, which they can ill afford, or else the provincial governments will have to cut the standard of service which has been provided up until now.

I do not blame doctors. They are human like anyone else, and they tend to think of their own interest just as any other group thinks of its interests. However, let us keep in mind that there is no group in Canadian society earning more than doctors earn.

I do not question the fact that doctors work hard. I do not say they are earning too much, but we have to keep relative values in mind. Let me put on the record the comparison between what doctors earn and the average income in this country. These are figures which we obtained from the taxation statistics of Revenue Canada, and I will give figures for the last four years for which there are statistics. That is the period from 1970 to 1973.

In 1970 the average gross income of doctors—and I know doctors have expenses, but we can still make a rough judgment of how doctors are doing from these figures—was $34,700. In that year income of all categories was $6,400.

In 1971 the average income of doctors was $39,500. The average income for all categories in that year was $7,200.

In 1972 the average income of doctors was $41,100, and for all people, $7,700.

In 1973 the average income of doctors was $42,700, and for all categories $8,600.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: The backbenchers on the Liberal side of the House are interjecting as usual, and I do not mind that. I invite them to get up and express their own views, but they will not do that. We know from experience that they just yelp like coyotes or—

An hon. Member: Wolves.

Mr. Orlikow: No, they are not like wolves; they are not even in the wolf class. This bill has two purposes. One is to let the doctors continue to earn as much as they can, and the other is to get Ottawa off the hook.

The minister says we have one of the best systems of health care in the world. That may be true, but the fact is that Ottawa now pays only 50 per cent of the programs which it has unilaterally approved. The federal government does not pay for mental health care, public health programs, capital cost in the building of hospitals, and a host of other items.

Most of the provinces have inaugurated or plan to begin programs which are different from those which are now offered. They are programs which, if we can go on the experience of other countries, will probably be cheaper than the kinds of programs which Ottawa now funds such as expensive intensive care hospitals. Some of the provinces have gone into home care, or they are thinking of going into home care. Some have gone into dental care, optometric services, physiotherapy, and pharmacare. All these programs they have begun or are planning to begin, and they have to assume on the basis of what the federal government has said that they will have to fund them themselves.

By recognizing only approved costs for medical and hospital programs for cost sharing, Ottawa has encouraged the utilization of high cost services. I could go into detail with examples which I have personally come across where Ottawa funds very expensive services at the rate of 50 per cent and will not pay for cheaper, alternate costs which have not been approved in advance. Any province which has gone into alternative programs, or wants to go into such programs, will have to find all the money itself. In doing that it would probably lose federal financial contributions which it is now getting, even if the alternative programs were to reduce the costs of hospital and medical expenses.

● (2040)

The provinces have proposed alternatives to the present 50 per cent cost-sharing. They proposed that the federal government agree to cost-share on the 50-50 basis the total cost of provincial health expenses on a capital basis, or continue the present arrangements but expand them to include payment by the federal government of 50 per cent of the cost of mental and tuberculosis hospitals.

In 1974 the provinces agreed to accept the federal government's financing proposals and to undertake a joint analysis to try to define more precisely those concerns which they had voiced in previous discussions with the minister and with the government. Their study showed that most provinces would experience a very serious shortfall in revenues under the GNP escalator plan compared to the present arrangement, even with the so-called risk sharing modifications which the minister suggested when he first brought forward these proposals.

Their study also showed that the "thrust funds" proposed by the minister would be barely adequate to cover the shortfall in some provinces, and far from sufficient to offset losses experienced in other provinces. The study provided for the first time a reasonably accurate summation of the probable future cost of existing provincial programs and of committed new programs which are cost sharable at the present time.

Most provinces in recent years have committed themselves to improve services and to bring about greater efficiencies through the introduction of new programs—despite the fact that these efforts were not supported by any cost-sharing assistance from the federal government. Now they realize they cannot afford to consider let alone accept a new financing formula which would give them even less assistance than they are receiving at present.

According to the joint provincial study the ten provinces are now spending a total of over $1.2 billion a year in respect of health programs for which there is no federal cost-sharing at the present time. They claim that by 1978-79 these expenditures will increase to almost $2 billion annually. In addition commitments have been made to spend over $800 million on new non-sharable programs between now and 1978-79.

Many provinces have come to the point where their options are becoming more and more limited. Already many are finding it necessary to impose stringent budgetary restraint to the detriment of existing operations in order to free funds for essential new programs so as to reduce costs in the long run. They will not be able to maintain this situation if their health needs are to continue to be well served.

They feel, and I believe that the federal government has a clear responsibility to see to it, that all Canadians are guaranteed continuing high health standards regardless of the region in which they live. They have argued that this responsibility requires that the Government of Canada make certain that its financial support for health programming takes into account the varying fiscal capacities of the provincial governments which must provide this health care.

It is precisely those provinces in the have-not areas which will be hit the hardest by the minister's proposal for reduction in the contribution made by the federal government.

Mr. Abbott: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising to ask a question, or on a point of order?

Mr. Abbott: I should like to ask a question, if the hon. member will permit.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Would the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) permit a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: Madam Speaker, the hon. member suggests that the government has an obligation to provide the highest possible standard of medical care. Would he say that such medical care should be provided with its rapidly escalating cost even if it should bankrupt the provinces and the nation, or does he draw any line whatever in his extravagant suggestion?

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member was not listening to what I said. I suggest he read Hansard tomorrow. That is precisely what I was saying when he interrupted to ask his question. The provinces, particularly the have-not provinces, are finding it increasingly difficult to meet the cost of health insurance and hospital insurance. They have now a greater stake in trying to limit the increasing costs than has the federal government. They are less able to meet their expenses than the federal government. They are the deliverers of health services, not the federal government.

Each province has its own plan; it deals with the medical profession, with individual doctors and it deals with the hospitals. The provinces know best in what ways increasing costs can be limited. What they are complaining about is that the federal government, without discussion, without a meeting between the health ministers of the provinces and the federal minister since January of 1975, decided the amount of the increase. The federal government is saying to the provinces, "You can do one of two things. We are not going to permit an increase of more than 14 per cent and if your costs go up more than that you have two choices—cut the standard of service, or increase your own contribution."

I say that the provinces do not need a lecture from the hon. member for Mississauga. They do not need a lecture from the federal minister. They know all that better than we do, and they are just as interested or more interested in doing something about the increasing costs. They are trying. What they are saying to the federal government and the minister is, "Let's sit down together and work out how we can reduce the cost."

Mr. Abbott: Is Ontario cutting costs?

Mr. Orlikow: I suggest that if the hon. Liberal member for Mississauga thinks the Conservative government of Ontario is not doing a good job that he stand up here, or somewhere else, and make a speech in his own time about what it should do.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Otherwise go back to sleep.

Medical Care Act

Mr. Orlikow: The ten ministers of health, including Conservatives and the NDP, met in Ottawa on January 14 and 15, 1975, in connection with this particular proposal. They came to the following conclusions, which I should like to put on the record:

First, that each province should receive no less federal financial support than it would have received for the funding of health insurance programs under current arrangements;

Second, that new financing arrangements must allow the provinces flexibility to pursue programs in accordance with their own particular priorities;

Third, that new arrangements must allow for equitable cost-sharing of both the "start-up" and continuing operating costs of new programs, as well as changes within existing programs, and Fourth, that new arrangements should relate to health goals and objectives and should provide encouragement to new provincial programs which offer alternatives to high cost services. Examples of such alternatives include home care, geriatric services, community, health services and ambulatory care.

● (2050)

They added:

—the provincial governments do not believe that current problems can be dealt with through arrangements which would impose an arbitrary and unrealistic limit on the federal government's future financial involvement in major national health programs. Proposals for that kind of financing system, with a number of minor variations, have been discussed for over four years, and they have been formally and finally rejected by the provinces.

Provincial administrations do not need an arithmetic ceiling on federal payments to guarantee that they will be responsible in program operations. The simple fact of federal-provincial fiscal imbalance ensures that it is more difficult for provinces to raise their share of any program costs than it is for the federal government to raise its share.

In any case, the federal government has a clear responsibility to share equitably in the costs of providing health care to all Canadians. This is the basic principle underlying the hospital insurance and medicare financing arrangements and it is a principle which must be maintained if high national service standards are to be preserved.

This principle, which was first enunciated by a Liberal federal government, is now being violated.

The province of Manitoba co-operated with the other provinces in the analysis of the problems of financing health care, and tried to define more precisely what many people have voiced in previous discussions with the federal government about the future of health care financing. Their studies showed that most provinces would experience a serious shortfall in revenues under the GNP escalator, which I already talked about and which they calculated. I have not seen any studies by the federal government to dispute the estimates. The $1,200 million which they will be spending next year on health care is not cost-shared by the federal government.

The provinces thought they were making some progress until the June, 1975, budget was introduced by the former minister of finance. A primary element of that budget was restraint. It was achieved to a large extent by the imposition of arbitrary, arithmetic limits on federal contributions toward medical care insurance starting in the 1976-77 year. The province of Manitoba called on the federal government to change this policy.

The Manitoba minister of health sent a telex message to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in which he said, and I quote:

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

These announcements came as a major surprise to me, and I assume that most other provincial health ministers experienced the same reaction. Only a few months ago, at a federal-provincial conference of health ministers in Ottawa, you indicated:

(1) That your government recognized provincial concerns about the inflexibility of existing health financing-arrangements;

(2) That you had agreed to abandon an equally rigid plan for imposing arbitrary federal expenditure limits, and

(3) That you were willing to explore with the provinces various alternatives for improving the cost effectiveness of our health programs within the context of a more flexible interpretation of existing federal legislation . . .

Your government's decision to proceed with major financing changes on a unilateral basis is a serious disappointment to our province and, I assume, to most others—all of whom, in good faith, have been devoting a great deal of staff, time and effort to the joint study of cost saving alternatives. Not only does the decision represent an apparent breach of our earlier understanding but also, and more importantly, it suggests that your government has every intention of implementing legislative changes which will cause the primary financial responsibility for the future reform of health care and for the maintenance of existing service standards to be borne by the provincial governments and their taxpayers. Given the recognized limits of provincial budgetary capacities, it is obvious that such a decision would represent a significant threat to our national health standards—standards based on a system which the federal government itself initiated.

That was sent on June 25, 1975. The federal minister replied on July 11. He said in part, and I quote:

When the deputy ministers report to us in the fall, as requested at the January meeting of health ministers, it would be my intention to propose that we move on to another stage in our negotiations in terms of considering what should replace the existing legislation.

Despite the minister's promise implicit in that telegram that there would be further meetings with the provincial ministers, there have been no such meetings until this time. I ask the minister why is this? Why did he chicken-out of a meeting with the provincial ministers?

When the provincial health ministers met in Victoria in August, 1975, the Manitoba minister of health and social development prepared a number of questions which he felt would have to be discussed before the provinces could agree to the proposal of the federal government. I am not going to put all of them on the record. Some, however, are very important, and not just to the government but to the people of the provinces. They will have to meet the shortfall which will be created by this unilateral decision of the federal government to put a ceiling on the increase which it will pay. Let me put on record—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt, but the hon. member's time has expired. He can continue only with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): There not being unanimous consent, the hon. member cannot continue.

Mr. Fernand Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I wish to use all the time allotted me to discuss a very important bill now before us. It must however be realized that this bill is closely related to the overall government program to curb inflation. I believe this should be stressed in this debate. Certainly there is no question of downgrading medical care, as has been suggested by opposition members. This is absolutely without foundation.

We must review the health program and find out how we can now reduce certain expenditures that are now becoming astronomical in the area of medical care and hospital care in Canada.

Opposition members do not seem to make serious efforts to closely scrutinize the need to reduce expenditures. We are now in an inflationary period and for the sake of this country's survival, strong measures must be taken to solve our main problem, inflation. It seems opposition members do not agree, they even urge us, as they have been doing every day and even today during the question period, they have been urging Treasury Board to increase expenditures, although we are now striving to reduce them. The bill now before us is aimed at reducing expenditures without however reducing the quality of medical care.

I wish to commend the minister for the discussions he has been conducting with the provinces for a number of years, and since he assumed responsibility for the portfolio of national health and welfare.

After a number of discussions, several in-depth studies have been made in various provinces and in the province of Quebec by the Nepveu-Castonguay commission. The conclusion is that our present system must be rationalized and made more efficient. We should put less emphasis on the more expensive services and concentrate on finding cheaper alternatives such as long term care clinics as well as ambulance services and look for a more integrated system in which all the components could ensure the level of required services at a reasonable price. This is exactly what the federal government is now trying to do.

It is looking for better efficiency in the provision of medical care services which Canadians need. It is also trying to set up standards in relation to some medical care services. Participaction represents a very important step in this field and applies to all Canadians. I think that the more we will be able to provide programs such as Participaction, the fewer medical care services will be needed in this country.

During the past five years and when the first agreement was reached with the provinces, it was agreed that the federal government would reserve the right to review some of the programs during a five year period. That is exactly what is happening today. We are now reviewing different programs and this did not come as a surprise to provincial governments since, on many occasions, the federal minister communicated with them. He also held many meetings and informed them that at the present time, expenditures seemed to become huge and it was therefore necessary to review this very important program which has nevertheless become very costly, not because one area or another faces excessive costs, but because, I think, even in this field, we are trying to live beyond our means.

What is important is to try and live within one's means. I hope that opposition members will allow the bill to get speedy passage so that in future we may apply more efficient and less costly formulas in this field, while we still enjoy the same quality in medical care services. It seems that in Canada the quality of medical care is much higher than that provided in other countries.

Therefore, in no way are we going to deprive Canadians of medical services, but we are trying to review a program as we do with many other programs in relation to cuts in expenditures that must take place within the federal government. Some alternatives are being sought to make medical services more radically available while reducing their cost and improving their efficiency.

In this regard, it is important to mention that according to the present forecast the cost reduction programs should allow us to save about $1 billion in a five year period. Now, I feel that we should have the unanimous approval of this House if we can assure the same quality of care and at the same time, in a five year period, save $1 billion. And I do not see why the members of the opposition talk so much about it and take the federal government to task for the agreements that it has already made with the provincial governments.

Up to a point, the provincial governments have been spoiled by the federal government, and they should now act on their own and take their own responsibilities in all areas, and not only as concerns health. Of course, the federal government has a very important responsibility, that of redistributing wealth throughout the country, and this bill aims at redistributing wealth to the most needy provinces.

As we know, the action announced by the federal government is now causing many misconceptions. The population should know that there is no question of depriving them of medical services and that the government only wants to increase the effectiveness of medical services and to take the necessary action to improve these services so that the population of Quebec and of the whole country can make fuller use of these services, but at a price somewhat more reasonable than at the present time since, if prices continue to escalate at the present rate, all the provinces and Quebec in particular will probably have to raise their taxes to compensate higher medical costs.

We can no longer hope for economic growth to go on at the spectacular rate that we have witnessed since the Second World War. We must therefore now find a better way to use our resources and reduce wasteful spending. In the field of hospital and medical services, there now is wasteful spending as costs have increased astronomically since the implementation of what we call medicare. We should take the necessary action for the provinces to realize that the federal big brother cannot always cover their deficits and provide them with financial means to allow them to say afterwards to the population that everything is the fault of the government.

Everyone should assume his own responsibilities and the provincial governments have very important responsibilities in this area. This is why the minister has tried during the years that he has been responsible for this department, to negotiate agreements which could likely slow down these overly steep price climbs. Unfortunately no agreement could be reached in some areas. This is why the federal government must show some leadership and institute legislation which, on certain points, willl make the provinces more aware of the fact that they are also responsible for the health of their citizens. They must contribute to their health as much as the federal government. At the federal-provincial health ministers conference last January a new method was proposed calling for stricter controls over the costliest services in exchange for federal involvement in other fields. The method proposed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) required from the federal more money than what the provinces are entitled to according to the existing agreements and would have given the provinces an additional subsidy to implement alternative care formulas at a lower cost.

These alternatives might have facilitated access to medical care and improved its efficiency. I shall take up any more of the time of this House but I think important for the opposition to study the problem not in a political way as they do now but in a rational way so that we can proceed as soon as possible with the passage of this bill for the welfare of the people of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I must say I was intrigued by the partisan remarks of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc). Before I proceed with what I have to say this evening on Bill C-68, let me assure the hon. member for Laurier that this party is trying to take a rational view of this bill, though little contained in the thrust of the bill is rational. The hon. member speaks about federal taxes that would have to be increased. I ask the hon. member, what can the provinces do but increase their taxes when the bill becomes law? They will have no other option.

I would also ask the hon. member to explain what he means when he says the provinces are being spoilt. Does not the hon. member know precisely what happened in 1965 when Mr. Pearson, the then prime minister, thrust this whole program upon the provinces? It was not until 1970 and 1971 that all of the provinces of Canada were finally brought under the cover of the federal medicare scheme. The hon. member says the provinces were spoilt but he should know better. I suggest that he examine the history of the federal medicare program and the manner in which the provinces were sucked into it.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, may I now address myself specifically to Bill C-68. We must first realize that once again we see a confrontation between the federal government and the provinces. It is the same kind of confrontation that we saw when we dealt with the mining legislation and mining taxation. It is the same kind of confrontation that we see going on with Bill C-58 which will inevitably mean a confrontation with the United States. It is the same kind of confrontation that has documented historically the actions of this particular government: there is no dialogue with the provinces and there is no consultation. The word is "negotiation", and brother, what experts they are.

Let us look at the increasing costs of medical care. I suggest the costs of medical care have not increased; it is the costs of institutional care and institutional structures that have increased. What could have been done about these costs, Mr. Speaker? Let us take a look at inflation, which has contributed to costs generally. Inflation has not contributed to the increased costs of medical care when one remembers the increase received by Ontario physicians last year. Is a 4 per cent increase inflationary?

What about the additional cost of building new hospitals, or extensions to existing facilities? There is a 12 per cent building materials tax which the government put into effect. This could have been removed, at least for the construction of hospitals and nursing homes, indeed for every kind of health care facility. But it was not. Then look at other costs, such as labour. Finally—I know this is a provincial responsibility—but what about the length of time it takes a province to decide whether or not to expand a facility or to build a hospital? At the present rate of inflation, if plans are laid before a government today, a year and a half later they get the O.K. and the cost has increased by perhaps $2 million. These costs are all reflected in provincial coffers. These are the kinds of costs we are talking about today, not the sort of costs referred to in the bill. This bill is incorrect in its basic assumption that the cost of medicare is the question we should address ourselves to; rather it is the cost of institutional care with which we should be concerned.

The government could have done something for the provinces through CMHC and preferential interest rates. That in itself might have been a plus and could have been of assistance to the provinces. In the field of medicine the minister has cut, or at least frozen—which means the same thing with today's rate of inflation—funds spent on medical research. The government has been spending large sums in other areas. It spent $500 million on one program and $200 million on another. Why, Mr. Speaker, $500 million is one third of the total federal medicare budget. The money could just as easily have been directed into this particular area instead of introducing this bill.

Why should the minister of health introduce Bill C-68? Why should he take the action he is taking with reference to medical research in Canada? Surely he and other people recognize that our researchers, when they get involved in a program, begin research work that may take three to five years, but when they are half way through the program, perhaps on the verge of an exciting development or discovery which will be to the benefit of mankind, and certainly to the benefit of Canadians, along comes the minister and chops them off at the bootstraps. Where do these people go? They go right across the line to the United States where they know they can get a dollar's pay for a dollar's work and where their services, their intelligence, and their skills will be recognized and appreciated. This is the brain drain all over again. We had it before, and it is starting again.

When I came into this House in 1974 I can recall very well the appeal to the minister from members on this side for two lousy million dollars for research. The minister kept the research community of Canada waiting at his door for month after month after month. The question was asked time after time where was this $2 million. Finally out of the goodness of his heart the minister found that $2 million. The way the government was spending money then I am sure it had $2 million in its hip pocket all along.

Let me refer again to the limitations of this bill. The provinces' view of this bill is already a matter of record. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) laid out precisely how the provinces feel about this bill. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) also told us what the provinces think. Are these members wrong, and are all the provinces wrong?

I think I should quote from the minister's publication "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians". At page 5 we find this stated by the minister:

> Good health is the bedrock on which social progress is built. A nation of healthy people can do those things that make life worthwhile, and as the level of health increases so does the potential for happiness.

That is simply a beautiful statement. Let us look at another statement by the then minister of national health and welfare made in this House in July, 1966, and perhaps the minister will remember his own words. He said:

> Health is not a privilege tied to the state of one's bank account.

I should like to add that health is not a privilege that should be tied to the bank account of the state. We should remember how cutbacks can eventually lead to problems as they exist at present in the United States. Not too long ago I was talking to a friend of mine whose husband fell ill while in Hawaii. He was an American citizen, a retired postmaster. He subsequently died while in hospital in Hawaii, and the hospital bill amounted to some $60,000. Thank heavens that this man was not a Canadian. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) touched briefly on this situation.

As the federal government changes the rules of the ball game and increases the cost load of the provinces we will see, insidiously creeping into the whole structure, the need and demand for private health care schemes, and we all know what follows this sort of thing. We can call it Blue Cross or whatever you will, but it results in fat premiums, escalating costs of medical care, and extremely escalating costs of institutional care.

Surely there is some sensible balance that can be struck. A good balance already exists, namely, the one that the federal government is inflicting upon the provinces. The minister refers to this balance in respect of the costs as a 50-50 split between the federal government and the provinces. Let me point out that it is not 50-50 at all.

The federal government is not paying the administration cost of provincial medicare schemes. The federal government is not paying a percentage of the para-medical care such as osteopathy in the province of British Columbia, physiotherapy in the province of Alberta, pharmacare in other provinces, and chiropractic care in Quebec. The federal government is not paying a share of any of those costs, yet the minister likes to tell the people that there is in existence a 50-50 proposition. I know better, and the minister knows better, and it is time that the people knew better. We all know that this is not a one-way street for the provinces.

Let me speak about the concerns expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North regarding accelerating costs of medical care. That hon. member has quoted fancy figures covering high earnings and high salaries of members of the medical profession. The information is not secret. In the province of British Columbia you can obtain a copy of the blue book which lays out very clearly the incomes of professionals.

Let me point out that when you think about the high income of physicians and the earning capacity of those men, let us say $300,000, you must remember that this is probably a group of five doctors in a clinic. That is likely the total earnings of that clinic, but it does not say anything about the cost of the blood laboratory, the x-ray laboratory, and the host of other services provided by that clinic. There is no mention of the high cost of these things when that hon. member talks about the high medical fees and the high earnings of medical doctors.

The hon. member has not referred to the overhead the physician has in his own office. The hon. member must think that nurses work for free, that drugs are free, that x-ray films are free, and that all the lab work done is done for nothing. Fortunately the public knows better than this. The hon. member is grossly unfair to the medical profession when he distorts the facts in that fashion. I hope the poor man never needs a doctor. I am almost a doctor and that is why I am qualified to speak on this bill.

I might refer to a couple of massive volumes called the Faulkes Report. There are some sound suggestions in that report which nearly gave members of the medical profession in British Columbia a minor hemorrhage. One message from that report came through loud and clear, and I am sure it is a message that was accepted by the medical profession of British Columbia and by members of other medical professions in other provinces who have taken the trouble to read it. That message related to the need for a broader scope and broader interpretation in respect of health care.

A committee of this House has spent some time considering the so-called battered child syndrome. Does this situation involve a provincial responsibility without any federal share in the cost of operating a central registry so that we know who these child abusers are and where these abuses are taking place? Is the federal government not responsible in some respects?

If the federal government is prepared to have its members of the standing committee listen to all this evidence with reference to the battered child syndrome, then it is or should be obvious that the federal government is about to work up the machinery and accept some responsibility, or at least take a federal posture with reference to this problem. It is a health cost. How will that be funded? Will some little bill be slipped into this House on a 50-50 basis to deal with the provinces, and then later on will the ball game be changed to the satisfaction of the federal government? Most likely.

● (2130)

The increased cost of medical care in remote areas is another matter which should be of concern. The provinces would like to address themselves to this problem. They would like to provide the services and some incentive to doctors to move into the remote areas, certainly into my riding and into the ridings of many other members. How will they do this when along comes the Minister of National Health and Welfare who changes the ball game, who changes the sharing agreements, loads the provinces with extra costs, increases the costs of the premium and the cost to the taxpayer while decreasing the quality of medical care, and decreasing the spending the provincial governments will have at their disposal for the development of new health care delivery systems?

Those are the problems that will be created by this bill. It will have a direct effect on the provinces. That direct effect will be felt by the taxpayer. The hon. member for Laurier expressed some concern for the taxpayer in federal terms but completely forgot about the provincial terms. I ask what this bill will do for the morale of the professionals?

There will very likely be an increase in the cost of the plan. There will very likely be a deterrent fee. This may represent an increase in the taxation. Certainly given the rate of inflation introduced and promoted so effectively by the government, the provinces will be forced into that situation. What will happen when the provinces become involved in that bind and sit down with the doctors to talk about the 4 per cent increase, or the 8 per cent increase, or the catch-up?

Many of the provinces this year are faced with doctors who need to catch up, who have had no increase for some considerable time. I can tell you now that the provincial purse strings will have to be tightened considerably, and that this will lead to acrimony and bitterness in the exchanges at the bargaining table between the health representatives and the provincial authorities. I know whereof I speak. I went through that route in 1968. I know all about it. Do not kid me that it will not happen.

Now, let us go back to the Munro task force report of 1969. In commenting on the rapidly increasing cost of health care the minister at that time said:

> The standards of health care now available can now be reduced . . .

That surely must be one of the most astounding statements I have heard in a long time. Environmental concerns are only now opening up new areas of health concern. The minister in 1969 said we were reducing our standards because everybody is healthy. Now all of a sudden we are in a new ball game of environmental diseases. We have to determine how to treat mercury poisoning. We do not have any experts in that field in Canada. All of a sudden we are in the ball game of the Port Hope radiation syndrome. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) does not know anything about that, or what he does know he is not telling. What about the cost of that particular fiasco; who will pay the shot? Is that part of the new formula under Bill C-68?

We might look at the study in Trail, my home town. This is a study on blood and hair taken from children and the smelter workers, and indeed from men and women in all walks of life. There have been 1,800 blood samples taken. This is a three-year study. It will be two years down the line before we can finish this study to determine the content in the blood and hair of heavy metals such as lead, zinc, copper, bismuth, and antimony. It will be two years before this can be finished but suddenly we discovered that some genius in the Department of National Health and Welfare had cancelled the program.

I must congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare—I hope he is listening to me—for responding in a very sensitive way and correcting that blunder so that that study can in fact be completed. I should like to thank him on behalf of the constituents of my riding, more particularly those who have given their blood, hair, sweat, and tears in the past two years.

These are new concerns, new diseases, and disorders which have been presented to us all of a sudden. We have these environmental disorders, diseases, and industrial problems. Can we agree with the minister when he says that health care services can now be reduced because we have reached the zenith? He also said in his second statement that taxes, premiums or deterrent fees can be raised even higher. That will now be inevitable.

I must say that in British Columbia, if not in any other province, the Social Credit government was adamant about not applying a deterrent fee. It felt it was inequitable, wrong and inappropriate. The New Democratic government, I am told, when asked about a deterrent fee responded in like terms. Neither party will accept the application of a deterrent fee.

How can the minister give people something, and then suddenly take it away? That will really be the net effect of this bill. It will not take medical care away from the people but it will either increase their tax contribution or they will have to pay a deterrent fee to their physician.

Who will it hit first? It will hit the sick people. Who are the sick people? They are the people in two classes, the pensioners and the poor, the very ones who can least afford a deterrent fee or increases in taxes. That is another reason why this bill is iniquitous. Surely again we can agree at least in part with the statement of the then minister in 1969 when he said:

> Ways must be found to restrain the growth of cost increases through better operation of the health service structure now in existence.

How true. So why did the minister not do it? There was task force after task force. There were seven which made 377 specific recommendations on how to improve the health care delivery system in Canada. What did the government do? The government did not look at one of them. It introduced a whole new formula, sucked in the provinces and chopped them off at the pass.

It bears repeating that the cost of health care facilities has experienced a dramatic rise. This is due to inflation. The cost to cover the expense of medicare has decreased, not the cost of hospitals but the cost of medical care. This cost has decreased in proprotion to the GNP over the last few fiscal years. Bearing that fact in mind, how does the minister rationalize his decision to introduce Bill C-68? It is what we call inductive reasoning.

● (2140)

I would suggest, finally, that if costs rise above the proposed cost sharing limits which the minister has introduced, there are three situations which could and probably will arise. One of them is the draining of provincial reserves and resources or provincial revenues, or conversely, as I have said, increased provincial taxes in order to meet the daily demands of health, not to mention the abandonment of new, innovative health schemes.

Another option, increased premiums, as I have said, increases costs for pensioners and those who can least afford it. Who is in a position to afford it? What will happen when we get into deterrent fees and increased premiums in the provinces? Labour will say to management that that is part of its bargaining. Labour will say it cannot afford to pay increased costs for medical care, and it will expect to add them to its extra benefits. Labour will bargain for that. That is more fuel with which to stoke the fires of inflation and to put down the poor and the pensioners.

This is a simple bill. It contains only three or four pages. It is relatively insignificant in size. All it does is say that the government will make some changes in percentages, but no one on the other side of the House has really bothered to give serious consideration to the net result in province after province. It will not be too bad for us in British Columbia, but what will it be like for those in the Maritimes?

Mr. Hogan: Right on.

Mr. Brisco: Once again we see the erosion of co-operative federalism. Brother, I do not think hon. members opposite know what those words mean. The government's five year notice for its withdrawal from the present hospital insurance plan threatens both these principles and practices. In the last ten years, as I said before, there have been seven task forces with 377 separate recommendations, and all of them have struck out. I wonder how much it cost for those seven task force reports.

I wonder what the cost was to the taxpayer, and I wonder where those task force reports are now. Who ordered them? Hon. members opposite ordered them. Where are they, and can they be produced? They are down in the archives confined to that limbo of dust, never to appear again. Why bother referring to a task force report? Why bother referring to 377 specific recommendations which could do something to cut the cost of health care and provide an efficient system, when all the government has to do is introduce a simple four page bill? It takes a hell of a lot less work, and the ball game is changed for the provinces. That is a pretty sweet deal.

By putting ceilings on these statutes which are on the books the government is ensuring that an inflation it helped generate will continue to escalate, medical costs will increase, and taxpayers will suffer. The desired standards for health care simply cannot be maintained because of the inherent restrictions within this bill. The government is making a guarantee that if inflation escalates, medical care will escalate, taxation will escalate, and the standard of medical care will diminish.

Finally, what will the provinces do this year? They will make darn sure they plump up to the best of their ability the medicare cheque because they know that the formula for the next five years is based on this year, and it is in their best interests to make this year look really good. That sure as hell does not do anything about inflation or for the cost of medical care.

Contrary to the idea of the hon. member for Laurier, this bill is not going to have an easy passage through the House or through the committee. All hon. members of the opposition will do their utmost to oblige the government to amend this bill and to come up with something which makes a darn sight more sense, costs the taxpayer less, and is more favourable to the provinces, and to see that there is no more confrontation on this bill, but some consultation and negotiation something which has been long overdue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, coming on at this stage of the debate on Bill C-68 one is likely to be considerably repetitious in terms of what has been said already. Nonetheless there are a few points which I think should be made, and they may be somewhat different from what we have already heard.

I should like initially to commend the critic on the opposition side, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), for the very fine and extensive summary he gave to the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Halliday: The only problem with his presentation was that it was so comprehensive and so intensive that it makes it difficult for the rest of us to follow.

An hon. Member: The government would not be able to follow it anyway.

Mr. Halliday: I should refer briefly to the presentation of the minister when he led off this debate on second reading. He was indeed leading off the debate on Bill C-68, as was intended, but as I listened to his presentation I got the impression he was talking about something other than medical care services. I will admit that there was a certain element in his presentation which dealt with medical services, but by and large his whole emphasis was on the excessive cost of health care.

He really did not take the trouble to explain to the House and to the people of Canada that in actual fact there has been a reduction in the rate of increase of medical care but a real escalation in the cost of health care. Perhaps not intentionally, but I think the minister is misleading people to think that there has been a real escalation in the cost of medical care, which is not true.

Be that as it may, the minister and the government are attempting to suggest that the need for this bill rests on the marked increase in the cost of health care. Because this is the allegation, and because other speakers who followed the minister chose to use the same sort of reasoning, I too—and I apologize—will branch off on this tangent of talking about health care as well as medical care.

When considering this problem one has to go back in history a little, because one cannot understand what is happening here if one does not consider what happened in the past. I should probably start off back in the days of Mackenzie King. I think we have to give him credit, or otherwise, for having initiated the approach to social services which we now have. One has to admit there are many good points about the social services we have, but there are problems. In retrospect one can say that probably one of the biggest problems we have is that Mr. King in his wisdom or otherwise decided, unfortunately, that he would bite off a segment of service rather than a segment of people. That is to say, he chose to lay the emphasis on one particular service people in Canada needed and to provide that on a universal basis, rather than establish which people in society needed that particular service.

I was glad to read the other day in Hansard that the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) saw fit to criticize our government a little bit, and to suggest that probably the time had come for us to consider whether the universality concept is valid in this day and age, or whether we should be more dynamic and try to make changes more appropriate to the times. In this case we have to live with this because Mackenzie King started it for us a good many years ago.

● (2150)

Next I should like to note that when we talk in terms of health care we are dealing with two different bills. We have the bill amending the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and we find that about 60 per cent to 70 per cent of all health care expenditures come under that act. It is unfortunate that so much stress in this debate is laid on expenditures which amount to only about 20 per cent of the health care dollar, namely, expenses under the Medical Care Act.

I think we should take a look at the fact that the government has served notice now that it will back off on both hospital insurance and diagnostic services over the next five years, and of course it will do something more immediate by way of Bill C-68 to cut back in the immediate future, beginning this year on payments under the Medical Care Act. One has to chastize the government considerably, not a little bit, for this sort of action, because if one looks back over the history one is impressed with the fact that back in 1967 and 1968 the government was warned that it would have difficulty in the future if it insisted on going along the path it was following.

I should like to read an excerpt from the record of the debates in the Ontario legislature on February 1, 1967, when the premier of Ontario at that time, Mr. Robarts, said the following:

> Medicare is a perfect example of the federal government introducing unilaterally a program which imposes heavy financial responsibilities on the provinces. It is a further example that these things must be done together and must be done jointly if the decision-making process is to have any meaning. Mr. Speaker, unilateral decision without consultation is no substitute for good federalism.

There is no doubt in my mind that what Mr. Robarts was saying about nine years ago is still true today, that we have the very same government adopting the same policy of ignoring federalism and going on its merry path in a unilateral direction with complete disregard for the rest of the country. One has to be impressed with this unilateral and arbitrary action on the part of the federal government at that time, and again now.

Since the minister announced the introduction of Bill C-68 we find the unique situation of ten provinces and ten medical associations in complete agreement with each other and in disagreement with the federal government. It strikes one as being a rather odd situation that the minister is unable to introduce a bill which would be satisfactory to at least some of the provinces and some of the medical associations.

One could go on to look at the historic past in order to set the stage for the present time. There is a rather interesting article which appeared as an editorial in the Toronto Telegram issue of November 18, 1967, relating to the Medical Care Act which was proposed at that time. The editorial referred to the comments of Mr. Macnaughton, the then treasurer for Ontario. I quote from the editorial as follows:

> Already about 95 per cent of Ontario people have some form of medical insurance coverage.
> As Mr. Macnaughton has pointed out, Ontario has other priorities. Under the proposed federal medicare program, however, the province will be taxed for this plan, whether it joins or not. The funds thus collected would be applied to medicare in the other provinces.
> This is regrettable. It means, simply, that if Ontario doesn't toe the line, it will be deprived of its share of the medicare costs.
>
> By pursuing medicare, Ottawa is forcing some provinces—including Ontario—to spend hundreds of millions on a program that is not wanted, not needed or required. At the same time, however, Ottawa will not permit the province to use this money for other essential programs such as housing, education and welfare.
> This kind of approach to a hard fiscal problem is difficult to understand, especially when its known that the federal Cabinet is divided on this issue. Mr. Sharp's appeal for belt-tightening and spending cutbacks is put into a difficult context by this attitude.
>
> How can there be confidence in the government, and in its ability to make important decisions affecting the nation, when the Cabinet is of two minds on medicare?

The editorial concludes:

> The faith of Canadians in the Government's capacity to govern has been shaken by its handling of medicare. If it cannot assume responsibility in fiscal matters, how can it in such vital fields as foreign affairs, defence, justice and trade?

We could read the same words now and agree that they apply equally well to this day and age in Ottawa. The same holds true that we still have a government which was so irresponsible as to introduce a plan against the wishes of the people of Canada back in 1967 and 1968, having forced the provinces to join. It is difficult to believe. One can cite other examples.

I should like to quote from an editorial in the Telegram issue of December 5, 1967, in which Mr. Macnaughton is quoted as saying the following:

> "The budget statement suggests a determination to pursue this costly measure of social security in the face of a recognized need for a cutback in government spending".
>
> He said this determination is "totally inconsistent with the federal government's concern for the inflationary pressures, which have been caused, in no small degree, by the growth in government expenditures."
> "I find it difficult to see how the federal government will be able to make an effective appeal for restraints on prices and costs by the private sector of the economy if it insists upon increasing the pressures from the public area", Mr. Macnaughton said.

Once again the same problem which existed eight years ago is with us today. Yet we wonder why we are having difficulty with the government and with this kind of legislation.

There is a very well publicised medical journal in Canada called Medical Post. I know the minister is familiar with it because not too long ago he wrote a letter to it. However, may I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and continue my comments tomorrow if this meets with your approval?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—POSSIBLE MEASURES TO PREVENT INCREASE IN COST OF OIL USED BY ATLANTIC PROVINCES TO GENERATE ELECTRICITY

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the facts of life so far as power production from Nova Scotia is concerned are that we have an oil based electrical system. In fact about 70 per cent of our thermal plants are fueled by oil, and the rest by coal. Many people ask why we do not use our coal for 70 per cent and oil for 30 per cent, but it is not that easy although it might appear so on the surface.

This week we were gladdened by the announcement that a new coal fired generating plant initially producing 150,000 kilowatts would be built in Cape Breton and brought into production by 1979. That is good news, even though it does not mean that the announcement of a new mine will be needed now to produce this power, but hopefully it will lead to the establishment of a new mine for the Nova Scotia thermal market by the early 1980's. Further we have reason to hope that an additional mine opening may be announced in early 1977—after the results of a new coal preparation and desulphurization plant are known.

Coal offers some short term relief for the province of Nova Scotia, but as the president of that province's power commission noted at the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council seminar on January 21 there is no certainty at the moment that more than 1,500,000 tons per year of new coal can be provided. Therefore it is unlikely, based on present available information, that Nova Scotia coal can take us beyond 1983 to 1984.

● (2200)

There is no time, Mr. Speaker, to go into the complex details of why we cannot project more coal for thermal power purposes in Nova Scotia other than the above figures because it relates to the price and availability of coal as against competitive fuel. The availability of Cape Breton coal is tied not only to the financing of future openings but also to the necessity of guaranteeing future coking coal requirements for a proposed new steel mill in Cape Breton.

What I am trying to say is that even with the interim help given to the province by using Cape Breton coal, and thus reducing to some extent our present dependency on foreign oil, for the next eight to ten years we will be still heavily dependent on oil.

In the rest of the country, with the exception of Alberta and possibly Saskatchewan, oil price increases have a very serious effect. They usually mean higher gasoline prices, additional home heating costs and, in the final analysis, higher prices for many of our manufactured goods and some of our service industries. But in the maritimes, and especially for Nova Scotia, they mean higher electricity prices. Nova Scotia is always harder hit because of its industrial capacity. Regions of it, like my own constituency with a large number of pensioners on relatively fixed incomes, are particularly burdened with home heating and power costs.

Last June the $1.50 per barrel increase for crude oil was a hard blow for us. If we are to be hit with another increase of $2 at the end of June it will be a catastrophe.

In answering the question of my concern regarding power costs in Nova Scotia and the Atlantic region that they could possibly be doubled from about 18 mills per kilowatt hour to 37 mills by 1980, and this was based on a conservative projected oil cost of $12.19 per barrel, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) replied by alluding to the help already given to the Atlantic region's power requirements by past subsidies and a repayable loan to the nuclear power station being built at Point Lepreau in New Brunswick. We are grateful for this help and for the recent indication of federal support for the development of the eastern Canadian power grid to improve the limited existing ties. The federal government has offered to pay 50 per cent of inter-regional transmission line construction costs. This is helpful, but it is insufficient given the size of the problem that we are going to face by 1980 as described by the speakers at the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council conference to which I have referred.

I suggested in the House on Monday that a rethinking of the subsidy arrangements had to be done immediately, and I am awaiting to hear from the minister's parliamentary secretary that this department and the federal cabinet are truly aware of the potential crisis facing us in a few short years. The minister and the cabinet have to realize that only four years ago the electrical power rates in Nova Scotia were about on a par with Ontario's; today they are double the national average, and could triple or quadruple that average by 1978 unless the federal government takes decisive action this year.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) on his concern regarding the oil price in the maritimes and the fact that a great deal of the power, especially in Nova Scotia, is generated from imported crude oil.

The government does not underestimate the effect of oil price levels on the price of electricity in the eastern provinces. This is why oil price cushioning was introduced to allow a period of transition and adjustment toward the world price of oil.

The hon. member's arithmetic on the effect of oil prices on electrical energy generation requires some clarification. The present cushioning on heavy fuel oil is slightly over $3 per a barrel. If this amount were eliminated immediately the resulting increase in oil fired generation costs would be about five mills per kilowatt hour. Estimation of price levels in 1980 involves many other factors which go well beyond the oil import subsidy and include considerations of rising capital costs and other operating costs, and of course the possible changes in the world price of oil.

As my minister has pointed out, the government has encouraged the development of nuclear generation at Point Lepreau and has offered to support regional electrical interconnections to give greater flexibility and lower real cost in the provision of future supplies of electricity. I might point out that this offer of half of the cost of the nuclear generating station and interprovincial interconnections has been available to the province for quite some time. The cable inter-connection between New Brunswick and P.E.I. is a current example of the application of this policy with the aid of federal grants and loans.

In the longer term, a key factor is a close degree of co-operation between electric utility and government organizations in the Atlantic region, and I am somewhat encouraged by the studies presently being undertaken jointly by Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

SPORTS—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO AID FOR AMATEUR HOCKEY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon during question period I attempted to find out from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) whether or not he shares his concern for amateur sport in this country as he did so effectively with his intervention in professional football in Canada, namely, the CFL. In my question I specifically referred to major junior hockey in particular and amateur hockey in general.

I had hoped that the minister would refer to the difficulties being encountered by many junior teams in different communities across this country, difficulties that they are encountering as a result of the delay and in some cases non-payment of development fees by the professional hockey leagues, specifically the World Hockey Association. I should not have been surprised when his answer was vague and uninformative.

I tried to be recognized to ask a more specific supplementary question of the minister, but for some reason Mr. Speaker saw fit not to allow me this common practice. Perhaps Mr. Speaker shares the same view as the minister in that professional teams rate more concern than our youth. That is certainly not the view that I take.

Be that as it may, the fact of the matter is that amateur sport falls under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Health and Welfare and, therefore, it would be only natural to assume that the minister in question would be interested in the well-being of the thousands of young hockey players in the junior leagues across the country.

In any case, what I wanted to find out this afternoon was whether the minister was aware that there exists a very strong possibility of some major junior hockey teams being in financial jeopardy primarily as a result of non-payment of development fees by the professional leagues.

The reason I raise this is because the federal government intervened in professional football. Under the circumstances I feel that it is time it should interfere in the case of these youngsters across this nation.

Allow me to remind the minister that in 1974 there in fact existed a contract between the CAHA and the NHL regarding development fees which amounted to nearly $2 million in that year alone. Such a contract has not been renewed; subsequently most payments have ceased and junior hockey is finding itself in serious financial trouble. There are 34 teams, for example, in the major Junior A league and one can check with most of them, whether it be Sault Ste. Marie, Peterborough, Flin-Flon or others, and one will see this problem. Let us remember, the participants are all Canadians, not like the CFL teams where most of the coaches, management, and players are Americans.

One would think that, if the minister is interested in physical fitness and sports at all, his interests would be geared to the thousands and thousands of youngsters across this country rather than a few hardened professionals. However, the more one looks at the minister's record in this regard the more one sees that the minister's concern is indeed very minimal if not non-existent.

You need only to look at the tragedy in Montreal as it relates to amateur athletes, not only from our own country but from around the world. What a disgrace and embarrassment for this nation to have a $1 billion Olympic Games and not be in a position to provide adequate facilities to the youngsters from around the world. One billion, yet there are no flush toilets, showers, or other adequate facilities! Yet the minister, as head of the Quebec Liberal caucus and as the one responsible for amateur athletics, sits here and not only does he allow the situation to develop but he is one of the main backers of the team of mismanagers in COJO in Montreal which has brought embarrassment and shame not only to the minister's own province but to the rest of Canada as well.

It seems to me that either the minister does not care enough about our youth who forfeit a great part of their teen-age years for the sake of physical excellence or, if I may borrow a term from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), he doesn't know his razzmatazz from a hole in the ground when it comes to physical fitness and sports in this country. This was evident from the fact that when he was pushing his football legislation before the House he had to hire special speech writers for thousands of dollars because he obviously had no knowledge of the subject matter himself.

In any case, the question is simply this: based on the fact that the minister saw fit to intervene in professional football, is he prepared to intervene today on behalf of tens of thousands of youngsters in amateur athletics?

I believe the time has come for the minister to show his concern, whether it be to ensure that development fee payments are made by professional teams and leagues or to ensure, in his capacity as Minister of Health, that proper and adequate sanitary facilities are provided at the Olympic Games in Montreal or, in general, to ensure that in any sport where professional and business oriented corporations draw on the talents of our youth—talents which were partially developed as a result of federal financing—the development payments will be funnelled back to the grass roots of the various physical fitness institutions and programs. I am not only referring now, in this last respect, to the NHL and the WHA having to make payments to draft juniors, but to other sports such as figure skating, for example. I am making this suggestion to the minister. We as taxpayers spend hundreds of thousands of dollars assisting in the development of these young athletes—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Jelinek: Perhaps I can ask for one or two seconds longer—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Your time has expired. You've had your seven minutes and now you want eight minutes.

Mr. Jelinek: Could I ask for unanimous consent?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): No. I am sorry.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Read the rules!

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) described his question as a simple one. Indeed it is a simple one and I am glad to have an opportunity to clear the air. Let me say at the outset that all the allegations he has made against the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and against the government of lack of concern are based on a misunderstanding of the situation.

I shall not attempt to defend Mr. Speaker against the allegations the hon. member made against him at the beginning of his remarks. I am sure the Speaker is well able to defend himself in the proper way. But I reject the statement he has made about the government.

First of all, we certainly favour financial support for amateur hockey by professional hockey. In fact we have intervened several times in the past, and if the hon. member knows anything about amateur sport, as he certainly should, he would be well aware of this. We are prepared to intervene, and we have intervened. We have proven our interest in the past.

Moreover, we are watching the situation very closely and we are well aware of what is going on. We are aware of the non-payments. We are aware of the allegations of delayed payments. We are acquainted with the status of those payments. The Canadian Amateur Hockey Association is very well aware of our interest and our support. They know perfectly well that they can come to us and ask the minister to intervene. But here are the facts: we understand from all the parties that the climate of negotiation and the relationship between the amateur organizations and the professional organizations are improving. They are approaching a resolution of their difficulties on their own and therefore we do not intend to take any action at this time.

As far as we know, it is the view of all the parties, professional and amateur, that we ought not to intervene at this time. For the hon. member to say there is a serious problem—which we concede there is—but that we ought to intervene to solve it, is just grandstanding. We are ready to intervene if any one of the parties asks us to do so, and we would be prepared to do so as we have in the past. So much for allegations of lack of interest.

The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley made a very interesting suggestion and I also want to react to it on behalf of the government. He pointed out there are amateur and professional associations in other sports—he referred to figure skating—that have a relationship whereby the professional sport benefits from the training and practice provided by the amateur sports. He is right, professional sports do benefit from the amateur sports. If any of them on either side are prepared to take the kind of initiatives that have been taken in the field of hockey, we would certainly be prepared to support them. But we are not going to jump in on top. We are watching and are prepared to be supportive, and we have proved our interest and preparedness to be supportive. But we have no intention of jumping in on top of the amateur associations without invitation or an expression of interest on their part.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.18 p.m.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF PROPOSAL TO CHANGE NAME OF OTTAWA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity arising from a request made by the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Peter Michael Pitfield, on behalf of the cabinet for a legal opinion from the law officers of the Crown on the question as to how the name of the capital city of Canada could be changed from Ottawa to the National Capital Region. In reply, the deputy attorney general stated that it could be done by cabinet issuing an order in council advising the Governor General to issue a proclamation to change the name of the seat of government to National Capital Region, whereupon the Governor General would issue the required proclamation in the name of the Queen under the Great Seal of Canada. Such proclamation, according to the advice given, would issue from the Governor General as representative of the Queen and not from the Queen personally. It was added, however, that it should issue in her name, as the Queen is referred to specifically in section 16 of the British North America Act, which provides that:

Until the Queen otherwise directs the Seat of the Government of Canada shall be Ottawa.

The fact that the legal opinion has been asked for as to whether action could be taken without parliament's approval reveals that the government is considering changing the name of the capital, a course that Canadians everywhere will resent, and furthermore reveals a flagrant contempt of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House condemn such action that would circumvent by cabinet the rights of the Mayor and Council and the people of the city of Ottawa, of parliament and the constitution of Canada, and that the said matter shall be placed before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for investigation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO DETERMINATION BY BOARD OF PERMISSIBLE WAGE INCREASE FOR RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question either to the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance arising out of a report that the railway unions yesterday rejected the wage offer and broke off negotiations and associated reports that the railway companies believe that their offer is the highest they can make under the government's wage controls. Has the Anti-Inflation Board in fact indicated to the parties to this very important dispute what increase it would permit?

● (1110)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not have specific information on any discussions between the board and the parties in that matter. I would comment that we have, of course, taken the position that the board should not enter directly as a participant in the collective bargaining. However, if the parties seek assistance in the process of arriving at a contract with regard to clarification on the application of the program, the board would do so. I would have to make a specific inquiry to see if anything of that kind has occurred up to this point.

POSSIBLE STATEMENT BY GOVERNMENT OF MAXIMUM WAGE INCREASE PERMITTED RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I again direct my supplementary to either of the two hon. gentlemen. In view of the fundamental importance of avoiding a fruitless and perhaps disastrous rail strike, is the government prepared to have the maximum increase it will permit under this control program determined in advance of the strike with adequate provision for both sides in the dispute to be heard because of the importance of this matter to the country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I really anticipated the question in the response I have just given. The board, in its November 7 statement set out the procedures it will follow in this regard. I share the concern of the Leader of the Opposition about the impact of the strike and the desirability, particularly if both sides to the discussion would find it of assistance, to have a clarification of the application of the anti-inflation program to their situation so that there would be no misunderstanding which could lead to any regrettable work stoppage.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that this question goes far beyond the interest of the parties involved in the dispute and in view of the fact the government's controls program obviously restricts the scope of collective bargaining, and it is pure hypocrisy for anybody on the government side to pretend that it does not, why is the government not prepared to take the initiative to determine and announce in advance of a possible strike the precise scope of the increase it will sanction rather than permit confusion to continue with the possibility of great danger being done to our country and its citizens?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that question has already been responded to several times in my answers. It is very clear that the board should not itself become the arbitrator in any collective bargaining dispute in Canada. If there is need for clarification about the application of the program, I repeat for the benefit of the Leader of the Opposition that under its well defined procedures the board will be quite prepared to assist the parties in this regard. That seems to be the most sensible means of conducting this program.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT VIEW OF ESSENTIAL NATURE OF RAIL SERVICE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the importance of rail transportation generally to the country, and its importance in preserving investor confidence and the confidence of the business community, and indeed our whole economy, are there any studies underway in advance of the situation with regard to the essential nature of rail transportation and the cost of even a short breakdown which would be imposed on the business community? What is the view of the government with regard to the essential nature of this service?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As the Minister of Finance has said, Mr. Speaker, the government would regret any breakdown in these negotiations and hopes that a settlement can be reached without any stoppage. However, I think it would be very unwise to indicate that we anticipate any breakdown.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

BOARD REFUSAL TO PERMIT TORONTO UNIVERSITY LIBRARY WORKERS WAGE INCREASE TO PERMITTED MINIMUM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the minister has stated that under the anti-inflation program persons earning less than $7,000 could be allowed increases that would bring their wages up to $3.50 an hour, or $7,280 a year, and in a recent decision the Anti-Inflation Board has turned down a settlement between the University of Toronto and the Canadian Union of Public Employees which would have given the university's lowest paid library workers an increase that would still have left them $355 below the figure permitted under the regulations, I should like to ask the minister how he explains this and reconciles it with the stated intention of the government.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to inquire to see whether the allegations put forward by the hon. member are accurate.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. If the allegations I have put forward are accurate, may I have assurance from the minister that he will support University of Toronto librarians in their efforts for an equitable and fair wage settlement.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, that surely is a good example of a quintessentially hypothetical question.

SUGGESTED INSTRUCTIONS TO BOARD TO APPLY MAXIMUM PERMITTED WAGE INCREASE EQUALLY TO ALL

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. While the board is ignoring guidelines for minimums, Mr. Pepin has told Manitoba doctors that the maximum $2,400 increase will be interpreted as applying not to individual doctors but to doctors as a group, including interns, residents and other salaried doctors as well as already highly-paid specialists. In view of the government's expressed desire to ensure equal treatment, will the minister instruct the board to apply the $2,400 maximum to all individuals.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, the board is provided for by the law and the regulations enacted. I think the hon. gentleman recognizes that any suggestion of instructions of that kind would be inappropriate.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO POSSIBILITY OF INFLUENCE OF ORGANIZED CRIME ON SUPREME COURT

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Justice.

This morning, the Journal de Montréal reported that the Supreme Court would refuse to rule on the crime probe case. As all those delays only increase the public's concern about the alleged influences brought to bear in the courts, would the minister agree that an immediate inquiry be conducted in the Supreme Court to ensure that the international and local mafia does not prevent certain hon. members from taking action?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the last part of the question I will not conduct such an inquiry because I am quite sure—I am positive—that the situation is not as the question might imply. I have not read the newspaper reports to which the hon. member refers, nor any pronouncement from the court on the subject, and I would not want to comment further until I have.

ALLEGEDLY CONFLICTING VIEWS OF MINISTERS ON ECONOMIC POLICY—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the apparent conflict between the Prime Minister's and the Minister of National Defence's perception of the free enterprise system will the Acting Prime Minister inform the House whose view represents government policy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Minister of National Defence spoke without a text.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He delivered it to the press.

Mr. Sharp: However, the Prime Minister speaks for the Government of Canada and my understanding is that the Minister of National Defence supports him.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid any further confusion over this issue will the House leader inform the House which members of the cabinet are new society ministers and which are old society ministers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INTEREST RATES AND POSSIBILITY OF SUBJECT BEING DISCUSSED WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I thank members for their warm welcome. I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Given that Jack Biddell of the Anti-Inflation Board has pointed out that the high cost of money is a major contributor to inflation in this country and that the key to containing inflation over the long haul is to lower interest rates, does the government intend to take any immediate action on this crucial matter and, as well, is the cabinet giving priority consideration to general economic advice from members of the Anti-Inflation Board?

● (1120)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government has frequently stated its policy of reducing the rate of growth of the money supply as one of the means of supporting the anti-inflation program, and therefore the proposal by Mr. Biddell made in a public statement that there should be a substantial growth of the money supply is one we would not accept. Perhaps Mr. Biddell stated in his remarks that this represented his opinion. I would have to say that his suggestion that the money supply be greatly inflated, concomitant with the ability to reduce interest rates, is not one that we would accept.

Miss MacDonald: I have a supplementary question on this general matter of interest rates. Because of the crucial importance of interest rates to the whole economy, would the minister say if the government policy on interest rates and subsequent discussion is to be on the agenda of the finance minister's conference next week?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not specifically, although this is the beginning of the year general review of economic and financial policies. Of course, the current level of interest rates reflects the restraint on the growth of the money supply and, in that sense, I am sure interest rates will be discussed in the context of the anti-inflation program.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—DATE OF DECISION TO CONSTRUCT—REASON FOR FAILURE TO GIVE FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO INTERVENORS IN HEARING

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In light of yesterday's publication of a study by the Science Council of Canada which concludes that in effect the current National Energy Board hearings and the Berger inquiry are a sham, will the minister confirm that a decision to go ahead with the construction of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline is already government policy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are hearings going on now before the Berger Commission on certain of the environmental factors and the effect upon the native peoples. The National Energy Board is also conducting hearings. Under the law the National Energy Board has to make a decision before the government can do so.

Mr. Neil: The Acting Prime Minister certainly has not answered my question, so I will pose a second one. Will the hon. gentleman explain why, in spite of the precedent set by the funding of groups presenting evidence to the Berger commission, no assistance of any kind has been forthcoming to public interest intervenors at the National Energy Board's hearings, some of whom have made substantial personal financial sacrifices to keep their intervention alive?

Mr. Sharp: I think this question has been answered on a number of occasions and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources dealt with the matter when it was before the committee.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DRAFT PIPELINE TREATY WITH UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the Canadian Press story out of Washington yesterday that Canada and the United States initialed a joint pipeline draft treaty yesterday, would the minister advise the House very briefly what this treaty covers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to interrupt the minister but I am concerned, however, that since the minister yesterday gave an indication of his intention to make a statement, his answer to this question might overlap. If they are on different subjects, the minister could go ahead and answer the question, but if they cover the same subject, then perhaps it would be best to await the minister's statement.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I propose to make a statement on a different subject later today. It is true that yesterday a joint pipeline treaty was initialled ad referendum between Canada and the United States. The text will be submitted to each government for approval. The main provisions of the treaty will provide for the delivery of hydrocarbons in transit through each country for delivery to the other, with certain provisions relating to throughput and non-discriminatory treatment. These are the principles which will be considered and, if they can finally be approved, I believe it will be a very important step ahead in our bilateral relations.

DRAFT PIPELINE TREATY WITH UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, will the minister give assurance that the details of the treaty will be referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works before the government makes a final decision?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have no objection at a certain point to have the treaty, if it is finally approved by both governments, considered by a standing committee.

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF AMBASSADOR TO CHILE TO PROTEST INHUMAN TREATMENT OF CITIZENS

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Last week, the New York Times published extracts of a book by former Chile Christian democratic President Eduardo Frei in which he denounces the violation of human rights by the facist regime of General Pinochet who, he says, is responsible for torture, political assassinations of his political opponents and repression of labour unions.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Considering the high and strong credibility of former President Frei who is universally known for his moderation and was one of the foremost statesmen in South America in the 60's and who was, by the way, himself opposed to the Allende government, and considering that similar disclosures have recently been made, in particular by Dr. Sheila Cassidy, a British physician, . . .

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, will he put it now?

Mr. Duclos: In view of those facts, will the minister advise the House whether Canada intends to remain silent and ignore the revolting behaviour of that military dictatorship or will make known in unequivocal terms its reprobation of those barbaric acts by recalling our ambassador from Santiago, if only on a short time basis?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not given any consideration to the possibility suggested by the hon. member, but Canada has made its position very clear on the question of human rights in Chile. We have made our position known on several occasions and in several ways, both directly to the government of Chile and at the United Nations. We have urged that human rights be respected in that country in accordance with the universal declaration on human rights, so there is no equivocation with respect to the position of the Government of Canada.

However, I believe our concern with respect to human rights in Chile has taken a much more concrete form than the expressions I mentioned. Since the coup d'état, Canada has played and continues to play a leading role in the resettlement of people from that country occasioned by the change in regime, and so far nearly 4,000 people have been authorized to come to Canada under our special immigration program. I believe that that is an extremely important aspect of our treatment of the question of human rights in Chile and ought to be borne in mind and related to the consequences which might occur to that important humanitarian program if we took action such as suggested by the hon. gentleman.

RESEARCH

EFFECT OF REDUCTIONS IN BUDGET—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. Dr. Schneider, the president of the National Research Council, made a statement to the effect that Canada will not be able to hold its own in the international market for new and improved manufactured products in a few years time because of the research cuts announced by the President of the Treasury Board, and there were similar statements by the executive director of the Science Council, which views are supported by most scientists in Canada. Would the minister indicate whether he is bringing these important views to the attention of his cabinet colleagues with a view to reinstating the cut proposed by the President of the Treasury Board?

● (1130)

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I think the President of the Treasury Board is fully aware of the consequences of the program of restraint being put forward by the government of Canada. There is no question about it, a program of restraint will lead to some diminution of efforts that might otherwise have been made. I think the hon. gentleman has perhaps strikingly overstated the views expressed by both Dr. Schneider and the chairman of the science council.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how I can overstate their views when I quoted exactly.

EFFECT OF REDUCTION IN BUDGET FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the directives which the chairman of the medical research council, Dr. Brown, has sent to the deans of medical colleges in which he goes into great detail about the very serious cuts to be made in medical research as a result of the announcement by the President of the Treasury Board, and in view of the unanimous feelings of the deans of medical colleges and medical researchers that those cuts will mean not only immediate but long term and indeed permanent damage to medical research in this country, will the minister discuss with the President of the Treasury Board the elimination of these proposals which amount to a mere $4 million? I am sure the minister would agree these cuts could be made in other services less important than medical research.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, of course it is a question I discussed at length with my colleagues during several weeks. The President of the Treasury Board is aware of the point of view of the hon. member. However, I will be glad to point out again to the President of the Treasury Board the opinion of the hon. member.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF SEPARATE BILL DEALING WITH CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General similar to one I asked prior to the recess and questions put yesterday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert to the Minister of Justice. When the Solicitor General brings forward the bill on capital punishment I should like to know whether it will stand alone, separate, apart and clearcut from any other matter contained in the Criminal Code or any other matter as far as criminal law is concerned?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there will be a separate bill dealing with capital punishment and the measures to replace capital punishment.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

CHANGING NAME OF OTTAWA—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO NON-STATUTORY PROCEDURES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister in connection with a motion I made a few moments ago. Has the cabinet directed the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Pitfield, to communicate with the Deputy Attorney General of Canada to ascertain his views respecting the non-statutory procedures available to change the name of the federal seat of government from Ottawa to the National Capital Region?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to inquire. I am not quite sure whether this is so or not. It would not of course, require the cabinet to instruct the Clerk of the Privy Council to make this inquiry. At any rate, I shall make inquiries.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question. Possibly the minister can tell the House whether there has been any discussion in connection with this matter and, in particular, as to the areas that were to be comprised within the new capital area. Was the government advised by the deputy minister in response to the request of Mr. Pitfield that there would be no need to define in a proclamation the precise boundaries of the capital region? The area should be identifiable since the boundaries of the National Capital Region are precisely defined in the schedule to the National Capital Act.

I should like to know the circumstances under which Mr. Pitfield made inquiries in connection with doing away with the city of Ottawa as the capital and the substitution of the national capital area of Canada. Why was this matter being considered and did this new capital area include any parts additional to the present capital area or the city of Ottawa? What actually happened that resulted in the request by the Clerk of the Privy Council to find out, behind the back of parliament, whether the government could change the name by order in council?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I said in my original answer I shall make inquiries about the circumstances under which this inquiry was directed.

An hon. Member: Pitfield doesn't tell you anything?

Mr. Sharp: I think the right hon. gentleman is reading a great deal into a question that could arise for various reasons. I really reject the general purport of his question which seems to be that the government would go behind parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly what I asked.

Mr. Sharp: Oh, no. This question is to the Deputy Attorney General and it is a question that might have been directed to him for many reasons. If any action like this were taken I am sure parliament would be aware of it.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EFFORTS TO ESTABLISH COW-CALF STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the cow-calf industry in Canada. This arises out of discussions the minister had with his provincial counterparts in December. Can the minister advise the House whether a federal-provincial cow-calf stabilization program is being developed and whether any progress has been made in efforts to shore up this badly shaken industry?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said several times in this House. A program will start on January 1, 1976 and terminate at the end of December, 1976, covering the calendar year for beef in Canada. I would say progress is being made in the discussions that are taking place.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that a great deal of damage has been done, going back as far as September, could the minister state whether consideration is being given to making this program retroactive in order to help those producers who have suffered serious damage as a result of depressed prices?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to make it retroactive because some provinces have programs under which payments have been made already. I read in a news release this morning that Ontario is paying out $22 million. Other provinces have different programs, so I do not know how we could make it retroactive and also make it work in a fair and equitable manner. I think that would be an utter impossibility. That was one of the tremendous obstacles we faced last fall when we tried to make a national plan. The minister of agriculture in the hon. member's province wants a national plan and so do I.

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister is addressing himself to the provinces that have had their own specific program other than the province of Alberta where 40 per cent or 50 per cent of the beef is produced. That province has not had a stabilization program. It has waited for the federal government to adopt its stabilization program consistent with the Agricultural Stabilization Act. We are part of Canada and I think the minister should recognize that.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF MATERIALS FOR HOME CANNING—POSSIBLE MONITORING OF QUALITY

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who, I hope, has resolved this year to keep the lid on just about everything. Can the minister comment on the advice given to prospective home canners in British Columbia by the outgoing provincial minister of consumer affairs in British Columbia who, as she was leaving her department, suggested that they, as individuals, should write the new minister of consumer affairs detailing their requirements as the only way of ensuring supplies? I would think that we have appointed ministers of consumer affairs, both provincially and federally, in order to make such action unnecessary. Has the minister taken steps, while there is still time, to monitor next summer's supply, and can he reassure the home canners of British Columbia?

[Mr. Sharp.]

● (1140)

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the latest information I received from the officials of my department was that two Canadian manufacturers have increased their production of canning jar lids. On the other hand, I am informed that two American companies which supply more particularly the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia have also stepped up production. Moreover, one importer in British Columbia has already found on the foreign market canning jar lids which he intends to import to meet the demand during the current year.

[English]

Mr. Johnston: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I have received numerous complaints concerning the quality of canning lids of Canadian manufacture which, in the absence of American imports, have been the only ones available in the west for some years. As this is a matter of interprovincial trade, has the federal minister taken steps to monitor the quality, and assist or advise manufacturers in this regard?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such complaints. If the hon. member wants to send them to me, I shall bring them to the attention of the officials of my department.

OLYMPIC GAMES

POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL AID IN FINANCING IF QUEBEC AGREES TO AMEND CONSTITUTION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board.

This week, in Montreal, the leader of the Parti national populaire stated, at a press conference, that negotiations would be held between the Quebec and Ottawa governments with a view to having Ottawa help contribute financially towards paying off the expected Olympic Games deficit, in exchange for which Quebec would agree not to put any major obstacles to the repatriation of the Canadian constitution. As this statement is all in all of great interest to the general public, for the information of that public, can the minister tell the House whether or not such proposals have been made by the parties concerned?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, obviously, the leader of that new party is not aware of what is going on.

PUBLIC WORKS

REASON FOR DELAY IN BUILDING PROGRAM FOR CANADIAN COASTGUARD COLLEGE IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Since the former minister of transport and the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced in 1973, with great hoopla and fanfare, a building program at what is left of the Canadian Coastguard College at Cape Breton, and since there is depression rate unemployment in that area of Cape Breton, will the minister investigate the situation, ascertain why construction has not gone ahead and expedite it, so that there may be at least short-term employment in the area?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as I told the hon. gentleman the other day, I will be glad to investigate the matter.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Muir: I will remember that, Mr. Speaker. Some other hon. members were allowed three supplementaries.

ENERGY

OIL—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO MECHANISM FOR SUBSIDIZING IMPORTED CRUDE

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The legislation creating the Energy Supplies Allocation Board called for this agency to cease operation and disappear in June, this year. As this would leave no mechanism for subsidizing imported crude, and therefore no mechanism for retaining a uniform price across Canada, will the minister indicate what plans the federal government has in mind to look after this matter?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have examined the legislation and I think there is a way whereby the compensation payments can continue to be paid through another device, and arrangements are being made to do just that within my department. As to the question of whether the government will bring back the bill for further consideration, that is to say, reactivate it, I think the government will very likely let the ESAB organization lapse on June 30.

Mr. Andre: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister give this House, or possibly the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, an opportunity to examine this new proposal for paying the subsidy, so that there may be some open discussion and examination of what the government has in mind? Possibly the minister could consider asking the committee to consider this matter.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think there will be plenty of opportunity for this when the main estimates come forward.

AGRICULTURE

MILK—PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF PROCESSING PLANT FOR CROCUS FOODS—REQUEST FOR REVIEW

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister or to the Minister of Agriculture? Has the government reviewed the offer concerning the $1 million DREE grant for the building of a milk and whey processing plant at Selkirk, Manitoba, for Crocus Foods, and considered whether the offer should be withdrawn in view of statements made by the Minister of Agriculture that milk producers in Canada must reduce production in view of present surpluses. If that review has not taken place, will the government give a commitment to review this offer, and not force Manitoba milk producers to pay for a plant of which they are not in favour? Nor have they had the opportunity to voice an opinion as to whether they are in favour of the plant.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member knows, this matter comes under another minister's department. We do review these matters together and we are concerned about overbuilding and overcapitalizing in this area. If there are too many facilities, it is a waste of money, and we want to make sure that does not happen, as I am sure the hon. member does. We want to be certain that the facilities we have in this country can be improved. We feel that there ought to be in Canada more facilities for the manufacture of certain types of specialty cheeses.

Mr. Epp: It is not a cheese plant, Eugene.

PUBLIC WORKS

POSSIBILITY OF SPECIAL UNDERTAKINGS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the crisis proportions of unemployment in the Cape Breton industrial area, and since a second emergency meeting to deal with the crisis is to be held on February 9, will the minister advise the House if he has received any request from other federal government departments or from the government of Nova Scotia to undertake special public works in this area?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not hear my question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He was not listening.

AGRICULTURE

CUT-OFF DATE FOR PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY ON CATTLE—ALLEGED LACK OF PUBLICITY FOR PROGRAM

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Is it still possible for cattlemen who sold steers and heifers between August 12, 1974 and August 11, 1975, to apply for the 48 cent per hundredweight assistance even at this late date; and, is there a cut-off date for such applications?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think it is still possible. We are concerned, as an awful lot of these people have not applied who should have applied. We know they are entitled to it; I think they can still get it. I mailed applications directly to farmers just yesterday.

Mr. Korchinski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the cattlemen's response to this program was very light, is it possible that the program was not adequately advertised? Is it intended to advertise the program, or, did cattlemen consider the program to be so niggardly that it was not considered it would help if it were advertised?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the reason could also be this: many farmers, if they had applied, might have been put in a higher income tax bracket. The program was advertised. Every provincial department of agriculture and every departmental office carried the forms. We publicized the program in a newsletter, but were criticized for carrying it in a newsletter. In what other way could the cattlemen be informed? I suppose the hon. member's constituency office could do a better job than it has been doing. Maybe the hon. member should return to his constituency every now and again.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE ASSESSMENT OF NEED FOR DEVELOPMENT CAPITAL AND METHOD OF RAISING IT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance concerns a comment by leading Wall Street financiers to the effect that Canada is its own worst enemy and Canadians cannot expect their Prime Minister to promote socialism while expecting lenders in the United States to lend Canadians money at low interest rates. My question is this: has the minister initiated a sound assessment of the development capital Canada will need in the next five years as well as the manner in which Canada proposes to raise it—where and how?

● (1150)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, I did not see the particular comment, but I suppose the best comment on the comment is that Canadian governments and Canadian corporations have enjoyed record success in raising funds on the Wall Street market and that, indeed, the current strong position of the Canadian dollar is related to the strength of Canadian issues in that market. So much for the Wall Street commentary quoted by the hon. gentleman. We have indeed been carrying out assessments of the additional capital needs which are likely to arise in the next five to ten years, as well as the sources of capital likely to be available. In my former capacity as minister of energy, mines and resources I had an opportunity of putting these on the record in considerable detail.

Mr. Crouse: My supplementary is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of the fact that deteriorating U.S.-Canadian relations is resulting in higher interest charges on loans made in the United States by provincial governments, is it the minister's intention to meet with his counterpart in the United States in the near future in order to alleviate the fears of our most important trading partner concerning the direction being taken toward socialism by this government?

URBAN AFFAIRS

HABITAT 76—ARRANGEMENTS FOR ACCOMMODATING NON-DELEGATES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It concerns housing for the 15,000 non-delegates who are expected to visit the United Nations Habitat Conference in Vancouver next May and June. In view of the fact that the federally-appointed Associate Commissioner General for Habitat said that it is the city's responsibility to find housing for the unofficial visitors, and in view of the fact that the Mayor of Vancouver has said it was quite clear from the beginning that the federal government is the host, I should like to ask the minister who is the host of this international conference and what steps does the federal government plan to take to avert a situation which would be a blot upon the conference, upon Canada and upon the city of Vancouver?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am delighted that the hon. member has indicated to me how many non-governmental people will be there. This is the first hard figure we have had as to their number and it may help us to plan a little better. Adequate plans are made for the people who will be coming to Vancouver, more advanced arrangements, perhaps, than have ever been made for a conference of this type in any other city in the world. Canada is certainly the host country. I am sure the people of Vancouver will be wonderful hosts to the conference and the people I have met from all parts of the world are very interested in visiting that city. I hope hospitality will be expressed by everybody in Vancouver.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: I should just like to say that the 15,000 figure was attributed to the federal government's Director-General, Mr. Keenleyside.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver-Quadra): May I ask what steps the federal government is planning to take in order to avert a problem which is clearly developing in this area?

Mr. Danson: We have a secretariat in Vancouver and, of course, in Ottawa, but mostly in Vancouver, working very closely with all officials there to make certain there is adequate accommodation and back-up because it is quite uncertain how many people will be there precisely—it could be 15,000, it could be 5,000. But we want to work closely with the City Council of Vancouver and discuss these arrangements with the Council so that we do have the necessary back-up and so that confusion may be avoided.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): A question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker. As the minister has accused business and labour leaders of reacting to the debate initiated by the Prime Minister on the free enterprise system in a manner which he described as "an empty polemic", may I ask the hon. gentleman how he expects labour and business to respond?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member said, it has never been a matter of debate on free enterprise. That is precisely why it was qualified of empty polemic and slogans. I therefore refer the hon. member to the text of my speech; he will then see exactly what I said.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCING MEASURE TO EXTEND JURISDICTION OVER MARINE RESOURCES TO 200 MILES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? It is prompted by the fact that at this moment there is a meeting taking place in the United States between a delegation from this Parliament and members of the U.S. Congress and that one of the subjects being discussed is the 200-mile limit. In view of the passage through the United States Senate this week of legislation declaring the intention of the United States to impose a 200-mile limit, making it, now, a resolution of both houses of the U.S. Legislature, may I ask the minister whether he intends to present a similar resolution to this House before the opening of the Law of the Sea Conference in New York, a move which would considerably strengthen the hand of the Canadian delegation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am following developments in the United States. As I understand it, the effective date of enforcement proposed in the U.S. legislation is the middle of 1977. Yet to be clarified is what happens when the joint effort is made between the Congress and the Senate to reconcile their legislative efforts. As far as Canada is concerned, we are not obliged to enact legislation in order to give effect to a 200-mile limit, as is the United States, because under present legislation all that is required is notice of 60 days to give effect to such a proposal. There is certainly a question mark in my mind as to whether there would be any advantage to Canada in moving at this point in the light of the projected date of effective enforcement of a 200-mile limit by the United States, the middle of 1977. I can assure the hon. member, however, that Canada, while it prefers the negotiative route, would act at any time in order to protect Canadian national interests.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DATE OF TABLING OF HALL REPORT ON RAILWAY PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? A very long time ago the minister said he hoped to table soon the report of Dr. Noel Hall, the Commissioner appointed to inquire into all aspects of railway pensions. The last time the hon. gentleman made a prediction he said it would be tabled before the end of January. Would the minister now tell the House when we can expect this report?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): As the hon. member knows, concern with regard to the availability of this report has been communicated to Dr. Hall. He is fully aware of the circumstances and I am satisfied he is doing his best to get it in as soon as possible. I cannot give the hon. member a precise date but as soon as I can I will inform the House.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

CHANGING NAME OF OTTAWA—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO NON-STATUTORY PROCEDURES

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, a while ago the right hon. member for Prince Albert asked some questions and I thought that before the end of the question period I might throw some light on the subject he raised. I am advised that the Deputy Attorney General some time ago gave a legal opinion to the former chairman of the National Capital Commission, Mr. Douglas Fullerton, for the purpose of the study Mr. Fullerton was conducting at the request of the government, a study which is the subject matter of a discussion before a committee of this House. It is clear that the capital can be named by the Queen of Canada pursuant to the BNA Act. This, I suspect, is something to which the right hon. gentleman is not adverse.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not to be.

● (1200)

Mr. Basford: The national capital region was established, of course pursuant to the National Capital Commission Act which was written and passed by parliament during the term of government of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the observations made by the Minister of Justice indicate his entire disregard for the facts. I ask him to produce the letter that was written to the Clerk of the Privy Council by the deputy minister of justice in which, as I recall it, he was asked to give his views as to whether a change in the capital's name of Ottawa can be brought about in a non-statutory manner. If he will produce that letter, the cat will be out of the bag.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, on a different point of order, in view of this little departure, and without any attempt, I assure Your Honour, to indicate to you how you should conduct the House, I know that the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys had an important supplementary and I wonder whether the House would agree to his putting that supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Part of the discretion I exercised with respect to the supplementary question of the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys had to do with the fact that he had the opportunity, and took advantage of it, at an earlier time this week to put a similar question. It is a matter of great concern to him and his constituency, but I know that the same or a similar question was put by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

It is possible that the Minister of Public Works, to whom the question was put, did not hear the question but I had no indication to that effect and was not able to allow either member, I thought in some order of consistency with previous rulings that I had made on supplementary questions, to pursue the matter further, since the answer given by the minister was that he would look into it and he had given that same answer earlier. I thought that it was a proper and consistent exercise of discretion to stop the matter there. However, if the minister has anything to add for either member at this point, perhaps he may have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like an explanation of why members of parliament do not have equal rights in this House. I have been a member here for 18 years. At no time, if Your Honour will check the record, have I ever abused the rules. I believe we all got here in the same way, even you, Mr. Speaker.

The question I wanted to raise was so important that the Premier of the province of Nova Scotia, at the request of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, convened a meeting in Sydney at which all parties were represented. The question that I raised today was not the same question that I raised earlier this week; it concerned another project altogether. Out of that meeting came ideas to try to get the federal government, the provincial government and Crown agencies to provide some type of employment in the area, even if only short-term, in view of the very serious situation.

Frankly, sir, with all due deference, I feel I have been discriminated against. If Your Honour checks the record you will find that rarely do I get an opportunity to be heard: once last week, once this week. I ask you to check the record going back a number of months. I have records indicating that I have risen 20, 25, 27 times, with no recognition. I wanted to raise a supplementary question, but no, I could not do so. Other hon. members get one, two, three supplementary questions. I just want an explanation as to why the discrimination against me and against Cape Breton, against my constituency and people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: I am being very frank, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members across the way can try to howl me down, as they do all the time. All I want is a little fairness. I think the question is so important that we should have some little opportunity to speak on behalf of our constituents. Please check the record and you will find that there are those who ask two, three and four questions in a week, while other members have difficulty asking one. It may be fair, I do not know, but I think we all got here the same way.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member raises a question of privilege in regard to his particular treatment at the hands of the Chair. I regret that he is evidently dissatisfied with it. He refers to having had an opportunity to ask a question last week. I would remind him that, obviously, that must have been an earlier opportunity this week, since the House only began to sit this week.

Mr. Muir: This week.

Mr. Speaker: That being the case, I think I was correct. I have checked my own records, and the hon. member has had two opportunities. Today I tried to make sure that every member of the opposition who had attempted to be recognized during the question period this week had an opportunity, and I think I accomplished that, probably to the detriment of some members, individually, to have an opportunity to ask a supplementary question.

The hon. member put a question to the minister and his answer was, as has been the case with many ministers on previous occasions, that he would look into the matter. The language used by the hon. member today was to ask for some short-term relief from the Minister of Public Works for the very severe unemployment situation that exists in the hon. member's constituency. The language was identical to the language that he used on Wednesday. The question may have been about a different project, but I hope he will understand that it is extremely difficult for the Chair, on hearing such identical language, to separate the two projects. Neither is there any way that I am able to conclude that there have been meetings about the matter, that the situation has been so severe, because there is no indication given in the question as to whether that kind of urgent matter has been the subject of a meeting with the provincial premier. There simply is no way the Chair can determine that.

In an attempt to be consistent, where ministers indicate that they will look into a matter and come back with a further answer, generally speaking I have not permitted a supplementary, because when the minister does come in with further information it is always the desire of the questioning member then to pursue the matter with supplementaries and run it to the ground. That is the practice that I have followed in the past and I was only being consistent, I thought, with the hon. member. I regret, as well, that the question, despite its importance to the area of Cape Breton, was not followed up or pursued; but, again, the Chair could have no control over that.

It is, of course, always a fact of life in this chamber that individual members get different treatment on different days. The Chair has to decide instantly whether a question should be followed by a supplementary or whether, in the interests of other members trying to get the floor, other people should be recognized and, again depending on their questions, whether there should be one supplementary or no supplementary. That is a fact of life with which we all have to live. Sometimes it makes people happy, sometimes it does not; but in every case the Chair has to do the best it can under the circumstances.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I seek the floor on a point of order that may well develop into, and may well be a question of privilege affecting Your Honour's privileges, and, through you, Mr. Speaker, the privileges of all members of the House. My point of order arises because of statements made last evening, during the adjournment proceedings, by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley. In his statements, the hon. member imputed motives relating to the exercise of Your Honour's functions and duties in this House. I am now advised that the hon. member is not present today; I would, therefore, seek Your Honour's permission to raise this particular point again on Monday, in order to permit the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley to be present when I again raise it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the parliamentary secretary would not want to appear to be putting himself in the position of being the judge, either of the remarks or of the intentions of the hon. member. However, I think the parliamentary secretary's point is well taken. I would ask Your Honour to hold this matter over until the first opportunity when the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley is in the House.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have heard the hon. member's point of order and it is perhaps an important one. The hon. member who has just raised a question of privilege concerning the problems in Cape Breton will at once realize that at least there has been some consistency, in that yesterday the hon. member just referred to was complaining rather bitterly that he was unable to ask a supplementary to a question on amateur sport. The hon. member has referred to the fact that some reference was made to the Chair in the adjournment debate last evening, and I would just as soon leave the matter over until the hon. member has had an opportunity of explaining his remarks.

● (1210)

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With due deference to your office, I wish to state that there was a difference of kind, as well as degree, in the question I directed to the Minister of Public Works, from the one asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys. I think the minister was temporarily sleeping. As a clergyman, I am used to putting people to sleep with sermons, but never with questions.

In view of the crisis situation with regard to unemployment in the Cape Breton industrial area, and as a second emergency meeting to deal with the crisis will be held on February 9—and this is terribly important to those who are suffering from unemployment—will the minister advise if he has had any requests from other federal government departments or the provincial government of Nova Scotia to produce some special public works for that area? That is a simple question.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Public Works, on a point of order.

Mr. Drury: I thought I was answering the question.

Mr. Speaker: We have been over this ground several times. There is some pressing urgency to this matter. I do not like to take a strong technical stand in the face of questions that have some substance. The fact is that the question period is long over. If the minister is to now give a reply, it has to be by way of a point of order.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I confess that I did not hear the question. The reason for not answering was not that I did not want to, but merely because I did not hear it. Having now heard it, I will be glad to make inquiries.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I had hoped the passage of time would have eliminated my point of order. It arises from a question I put to the Postmaster General on Tuesday of this week. The minister replied as reported at page 10348 of Hansard. I quote a few words from his answer:

—but I will get more detailed information for the hon. member before tomorrow.

I recognize that the Postmaster General has not been in the House since Tuesday, but I have been around and available to receive this more detailed information. Members on this side are probably resigned to not receiving proper answers from time to time. However, when detailed information is promised by a certain date and is not forthcoming by that date, it most certainly interferes with the function of the official opposition and members on this side of the House. That is the point of order I would raise. I protest most strongly to the Acting Prime Minister for allowing this sort of treatment by his cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It relates to the matter raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. The reason for my raising this matter is well known by the President of the Treasury Board; in fact, he introduced it.

There was a reference by this House, and a reference by the Senate, with regard to the whole question of the national capital. In view of that reference, the fact that the matter is before a committee of this House, and in view of the opinion sought in the question and in the motion under Standing Order 43, I believe that this House and the committee are entitled to an explanation by the President of the Treasury Board with regard to the policy and the government's dealing with the name of the national capital.

On this very fundamental and important matter, does the government, as a matter of policy, intend to follow the example of the Finkelman committee with respect to Bill C-52 and make a statement as to the government's intentions with regard to the national capital? More than that, the government House leader owes this House an explanation as to whether it is the policy of the government to permit this important matter to be determined by order in council rather than by action of this House, or perhaps both Houses of Parliament.

I believe this is a valid point of order. It relates to how the government intends to carry out its function with regard to the very important joint committee on the national capital.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have an opportunity before the committee to raise these questions. The government will be happy to co-operate in whatever way may be useful. The question was directed to me by the right hon. member for Prince Albert and I said I would inquire into the circumstances under which the opinion was sought. The Minister of Justice has added to the explanation. However, I would think that the committee would be the best place to pursue this matter.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. The hon. member's question was really dealt with in my opening statement to that committee when we spoke of the national capital region and the seat of government. As a matter of fact, I spent some time asking for responses from the committee on this whole question which is an exercise in semantics in many cases. We would welcome the opportunity to have this matter discussed by the committee, and the views of parliament presented to the government in the report.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MEASURE RESPECTING CANCELLATION OF CREDIT CARD PURCHASES

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-425, respecting the cancellation of credit card purchases.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, this bill will make it possible for dissatisfied consumers to take action against the issuer of a credit card for the recovery of money paid to a supplier for goods or services which are unsatisfactory and which have been paid for by credit card. The act would apply in respect of credit cards issued by federally-incorporated companies and banks for amounts over $50.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REFERENCE OF REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board) moved: That the document entitled "Report on the study of the accounts of Canada" be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

● (1220)

[English]

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the long-awaited study of the accounts of Canada tabled by the President of the Treasury Board. It was in May, 1973, that the Treasury Board secretariat first announced its intention to critically examine the concepts underlying the financial information system of the government through an interdepartmental steering committee. For many years the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and the Auditor General, in their respective reports have questioned certain financial practices as being inconsistent with the stated principles on which the government's accounts are kept.

It is refreshing, therefore, to see the initiative taken by Treasury Board, in response to the committee and the Auditor General, to examine "the purposes, principles and practices which should govern the form of the accounts of Canada" and to present constructive proposals for parliament's consideration so that the accounts of Canada reflect a fair, complete and accurate record of the Government of Canada's finances. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, as parliamentarians and as users of the accounts of Canada, we welcome this report if the proposals presented help us in our daily task to examine more meaningfully government expenditures and, indeed, help us to strengthen parliament's control over the public purse.

We welcome the referral of this study to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and will be pleased to report back to this House in due course on our deliberations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We agree to this motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CIDA CONTRIBUTIONS TO CUBA

Question No. 3,649—Mr. Herbert:

What contribution has been made by CIDA in each of the past five years to projects (a) in Cuba (b) having an impact on trade with Cuba?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned, the reply is as follows: (a) 1971-72, $.00; 1972-73, $5,400.00; 1973-74, $427,100.00; 1974-75, $451,800.00; 1975-76, $264,500.00 (as of December 31, 1975). (b) Our program of cooperation with Cuba includes several fields such as agriculture, cattle raising, health and medical equipment, electronics, engineering management training, pulp and paper industry, citrus fruit production and fishing. The activity of CIDA in all these sectors is often complementary to commercial activities between Canada and Cuba. In particular, CIDA is in the process of conducting a large training program for Cuban students in Canada which will not only contribute to their own advancement but also enable them to better understand the opportunities in the Canadian market and initiate them to the technology used in our country. However, CIDA does not undertake formal evaluations of the impact of these projects on commerce between Canada and Cuba.

REPORT ON ELECTRONIC DATA PROCESSING

Question No. 3,715—Mr. Reynolds:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,998, was the EDP Policy Project Report, dated November 30, 1971 on Electronic Data Processing in the government approved by the Treasury Board's Secretariat?

2. What is the number of (a) departments operating computers (b) departmental computer centres?

3. What is the total number of EDP personnel in the government?

4. What is the direct cost of the EDP Programme?

5. For the year 1971-72, what was the overall total of EDP expenditures?

6. For the year 1975-76, what is the estimated overall cost of EDP expenditures?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): 1. The EDP Policy Project Report, November 30, 1971, was prepared by the Treasury Board Secretariat and approved by the Treasury Board.

2. (a) Eighteen departments operate computers in 1975-76. (b) Of the number in (a) there are nine designated departmental computer centres.

3. The number of directly-related EDP personnel in the government for 1975-76 is estimated at 7,900: —425 managerial; 2,353 systems and programming; 2,445 data conversion; 1,242 data production; 1,435 others.

4. *The direct cost of departmental EDP activities for 1974-75 was $162,567,000.

5. *The direct cost of EDP expenditures for 1971-72 was $83,060,000.

6. *The direct cots of EDP expenditures for 1975-76 is estimated at $193 million.

*Direct EDP cost includes only the salaries of EDP staff, the cost of EDP equipment and supplies, and the direct purchase cost of EDP services obtained from non-government sources.

USE OF CHATEAU MONTEBELLO FOR LANGUAGE COURSES

Question No. 3,776—Mr. Cossitt:

On how many occasions has the Chateau Montebello been used by the government for total immersion French language sessions and, in each case (a) what were the dates and length of time (b) how many persons were involved (c) what was the total cost by (i) day (ii) entire session?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): The Public Service Commission sent me the following information:

[Miss Bégin.]

Course: French Immersion

			Chateau Montebello
Date 1975	Number of days	Number of students	Cost per day per group	Cost per session per group
April 21 to 24	3	7	140.00	420.00*
November 12 to 14	3	7	337.96	1,013.88
December 8 to 11	3	15	728.85	2,186.55

---

* The teaching unit paid $140 a day. It was agreed (and accepted by the seven students concerned) that costs exceeding this minimum would be paid by the students themselves. Following the recent federal government statements on austerity measures, the Public Service Commission has revised its guidelines on student excursions, and the use of first-class hotels is no longer permitted.

CANADIAN INVOLVEMENT IN ROSE BOWL PARADE IN PASADENA, CALIFORNIA

Question No. 3,868—Mr. Nystrom:

1. Did the Treasury Board approve the expenditure of funds in conjunction with Canadian involvement in the Rose Bowl Parade in Pasadena, California, January 1, 1976 and, if so (a) in what amount (b) on what date (c) for what purpose?

(a) $183,000 (b) May 1, 1975 (c) Canadian participation in a ten-day program in Southern California, commencing January 1, 1976, including participation in the Pasadena Tournament of Roses Parade, The Rose Bowl Pre-game Show, and the Disneyland Bicentennial Parade. This amount covers transportation, accommodation and living expenses for the RCMP Musical Ride, the all-Canadian Pipe Band, and a combination Brass Band from the R22eR and PPCLI.

2. External Affairs requested this as incremental funding from Treasury Board as part of the Canadian participation in the commemorations of the U.S.A. Bicentennial.

3. The inner workings of cabinet and cabinet committees are traditionally considered confidential matters.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SIGNING OF NUCLEAR CO-OPERATION AGREEMENTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that nuclear co-operation agreements have been signed with the governments of the Republic of Korea and the Republic or Argentina. I am tabling copies of the texts of these agreements. I should also like to table the background paper on nuclear safeguards and Canadian safeguards policy which may be of interest to hon. members, and also extracts from a document published by the International Atomic Energy Agency which outlines the safeguards procedures and inspection systems in place by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

The agreement with the Republic of Korea was signed, as I mentioned yesterday, at Seoul on January 26. I will allow the sale to the Republic of Korea of a CANDU power reactor produced by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to go forward. The attendant commercial and financial arrangements have already been concluded. The Republic of Korea, as hon. members are aware, is a developing country which is in the process of significant industrialization.

The economy of the Republic of Korea is basically sound. Its pattern of growth has been remarkable in recent years, but it has large power requirements over the coming periods which its indigenous fuel resources are not in a position to satisfy. As part of its efforts to generate sufficient energy for its programs of industrialization and development, the Republic of Korea has established a significant program of nuclear power generation. The acquisition of a CANDU power reactor is intended to supplement the country's nuclear power generation program. The Republic of Korea is already building a power reactor supplied from the United States and is contracting for one additional unit from that source.

The agreement with Argentina was signed in Buenos Aires today. It covers the sale of a CANDU reactor to the Argentine Republic and attendant technical co-operation pursuant to contracts which were concluded in 1974. Worldwide inflation since that time has created difficulties and the commercial terms of those latter contracts are currently being renegotiated.

Nuclear Co-operation Agreements

Argentina is an important Latin-American country which has had harmonious relations with its neighbours for over 100 years. It is a member of the International Atomic Energy Agency. It has had a successful nuclear development program for over 25 years and operates a number of reserach reactors as well as a heavy water moderated power reactor built with the co-operation of the Federal Republic of Germany.

The co-operation to be undertaken under these two agreements reflects the position announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1975 when he noted that Canada would continue to seek to make available to developing countries the benefits of the peaceful applications of nuclear energy, provided that adequate guarantees against the possible diversion of such co-operation to non-peaceful, explosive purposes were available. This is a position endorsed by other nuclear suppliers.

These agreements provide that identified nuclear exports, including nuclear technology in physical form, shall only be authorized on the basis of coverage by an intergovernmental guarantee: First, that the items supplied or items produced with these, including subsequent generations, will not be diverted to any non-peaceful or explosive purpose; second, that these guarantees are verified through inspection mechanisms of the International Atomic Energy Agency; third, that the retransfer of items supplied and items produced with these including subsequent generations of nuclear material only be done with the consent of the Government of Canada; fourth, that the enrichment and reprocessing of nuclear material supplied, or nuclear material produced with times supplied, only be done with the consent of the government of Canada; fifth, that IAEA safeguards and other mechanisms of bilateral verification for aspects of guarantees, where the IAEA system is not applicable, be in place for the life of the supplied item or for items susceptible to these guarantees produced from these items; and sixth, that adequate measures for the physical security of materials be in place to protect the supplied items from the threat of subnational diversion.

The safeguards commitments, including the application of the International Atomic Energy Agency inspection system, undertaken by the Republic of Korea and the Republic of Argentina represent juridical assurances of a high order which fully meet international standards and Canadian safeguards policy.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the question is whether these agreements for the sale of nuclear reactors and arrangements regarding nuclear co-operation are adequate. Our experience with India has shown the danger that technology can be used to develop techniques for the making of nuclear explosions or which have the potential at least for atomic or nuclear bombs. In view of the Indian experience, we in Canada, and the Government of Canada, have a special responsibility regarding the sale of nuclear reactors. I recognize the potential for contradiction inherent in the concept of non-proliferation, that is, that everybody will agree not to proliferate the use of nuclear bombs, and this sort of thing, and that in compensation the benefits of nuclear knowledge will be shared generally. I recognize the potential contradiction involved, therefore, in imposing severe limits upon the sale of nuclear reactors.

I recognize, also, the importance of sharing the benefits and the risks of a growing tendency to reject the concept of non-proliferation if countries without other sources of electricity and power are denied the benefits of this kind of reactor. But the risks of illicit proliferation such as, I am afraid, took place in India are so great, and the process of illicit proliferation constitutes such a menace to world peace, that I believe it is far better for us to take some time to get in place solid international safeguards for peace. Certainly, it is not good enough to claim that we are imposing the highest standard of safeguards in the world, if that should happen to be true, because the question with regard to either or both of these sales is: Does this sale by us constitute a serious risk in the total context, which includes what other countries are now doing or may be doing with the regard to the sale of plutonium recycling plants, for example? We must look at the total context.

It is said that France is prepared to sell a plutonium recycling plant. The minister made no reference to this in his statement about Korea, nor in connection with the Argentinian situation did he make any reference to the report that West Germany is prepared to make a very large package deal with Brazil. The assumption among many people is that this may lead to nuclear rivalry between Brazil and Argentina. This is part of the context in which Canada is entering into these agreements with Korea and Argentina.

There is only one reason why today a country like Korea, or any modest country, would want a recycling plant, and that is to develop fissionable material suitable for the development of bombs—because it is not economical in terms of the development of electrical power. So we can talk about our humanitarian desires, our desire to help Korea in peaceful development, and the same with Argentina, but is this so much our motivation in making these sales as our desire to make the sales?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is important that we have very strict agreements and a very strict understanding among all countries which are capable of exporting reactors or nuclear technology. I hope Canada and the other countries involved, of which there are only a relatively small number, develop such a strict agreement. It is now reported that some kind of agreement will be reached but it will be far from strict. I believe Canada should have been prepared to wait and to ask for a general moratorium, to set an example by demanding adequate safeguards to be provided by all the countries capable of exporting reactors or nuclear technology. I suggest this particularly in view of the unstable situation that exists in the part of Asia where Korea is located, and certainly the unstable conditions that exist within Argentina.

When you look at these agreements and safeguards that are negotiated, what do you find? I have not had an opportunity to examine them fully, because the minister sent us copies of these agreements only today at 10.30 a.m. I know he has a very high view of my intelligence, but my intelligence is not such as to allow me to analyse these complicated documents within that period of time. But it is a matter of such importance that I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, old parliamentarian that he is, that even from his government vantage point he could not regard this as a satisfactory method of discussing an arrangement of such vital importance to the world.

In the United States the government has to go to Congress before a deal is completed so that Congress has an opportunity to raise objections. That is the minimum which this government should be prepared to provide for this parliament. The way we are now proceeding is most unsatisfactory. In matters relating to something as basically important to this country and to the world as the sale of a nuclear reactor and the possible consequences of that sale, this government should be prepared to table in the House the agreement it proposes to make and give parliament a reasonable opportunity to study the proposals and to raise objections, at the very least.

Much of the technology that has been made available to Korea and to Argentina can be applied to non-peaceful purposes. We have no assurances and no indications that the sanctions will be adequate. What could Canada do if Argentina or Korea failed to live up to these obligations? The minister said there would be inspections under international arrangements. I have no reason to believe, from anything I knew before or from anything the minister has said today, that the quality and degree of inspection that can be provided by an international agency is at all adequate to prevent unfortunate consequences from developing. Certainly, the minister could not give us any assurances today. I have no reason to believe that international inspection arrangements are adequate today, or that the international agents will in fact be in a position to inspect all the aspects that are necessary.

I do not want to take too much time, but I do not apologize for the time I am taking because these matters are very important. I say that Canada's inspection and control in these two situations seems to be very limited. I say that the context as a whole is dangerous. I say that our government should be prepared to wait and to push for really adequate international arrangements before rushing into these sales. Also, I say it is unfortunate that so many exporting countries which have the technology are taking a commercial approach to the sale of nuclear reactors and nuclear technology. I am sorry to see my own country seeming to give such weight to the commercial aspects of these arrangements.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I do not ask the minister what the terms of the deal are with regard to financing and this sort of thing. It is too late to stop this. But I hope the government will give us an undertaking that there will be no further completed transactions of this sort until such transaction is tabled in the House, as is the case in our neighbouring country. I ask that we not be presented with a fait accompli; that we be given an opportunity to study what is being proposed—and, who knows, we might even be able to bring something to the attention of this government which could be useful to it.

● (1240)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, many thousands of Canadians will be saddened today by the announcement the minister has just made, especially coming from a minister for whom many Canadians have deep respect. When he was appointed to this high office many of us hoped he would pursue a foreign policy for Canada which would not be dominated by commercial considerations. The minister said in the statement he made a few moments ago that the signing of these agreements with Argentina and South Korea was in line with the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1975, to the effect that Canada would continue to make available to developing countries the benefits of nuclear energy, provided there were adequate guarantees against the possible diversion of such facilities to non-peaceful or explosive purposes.

Therefore, the whole question arises as to whether it is possible to have adequate guarantees and adequate safeguards. Just a few days ago an American nuclear scientist visiting Canada said there can be no adequate safeguards and that the only wise course to follow is to reduce the sale of nuclear reactors wherever the political situation is unstable and unpredictable. Certainly, the two countries with whom the government has just signed an agreement would come into the class of being both unstable and unpredictable.

The minister is placing his entire faith in the periodic inspections which will be made by the International Atomic Energy Agency, commonly known as IAEA. This organization has neither the power of enforcement nor the adequately trained staff to ensure adequate safeguards. The last report shows that the IAEA has 135 employees of whom less than 70 are nuclear scientists. In 1974 there were 562 nuclear plants in 33 countries, in 1975 there were 650 nuclear plants in 38 countries, and it is anticipated the figure will be well over 1,000 by 1980. How do less than 70 nuclear scientists possibly hope to carry on adequate inspection services in a situation like that?

The IAEA is doing its best; there is no doubt about that. They recently reported, however, that only 95 per cent of the plutonium extracted from the radium waste of reactors could be accounted for with accuracy. They hope, they say, in a number of years to get this up to 99 per cent. That may sound very comforting to some people, but let us consider the situation. It is estimated that in 1975 there were 17,000 pounds of plutonium produced. Now, 5 per cent of that is 850 pounds, from which could be made 55 nuclear bombs. Even when we get to 99 per cent of a certainty with respect to accounting for plutonium, that still leaves 170 pounds, which is enough to make 10 or 11 nuclear bombs.

The danger is not just the possibility of a nuclear war. One of the real dangers is that terrorist groups may get their hands on quantities of plutonium. Neither South Korea nor Argentina, in my opinion, can be considered stable in the present world situation. No one who was at the discussion at the United Nations a few months ago when the whole question of North Korea and South Korea was before the United Nations General Assembly would think for a moment, with the gathering troop concentrations on the border, that the possibility of an outbreak of war is extremely remote. It certainly is not. There could be war on that peninsula at almost any time. Argentina has had political instability for some time and there is a distinct possibility that the government there might be overthrown. What kind of government will take its place, a government for whom we have made it possible to produce plutonium and to make nuclear weapons?

The danger does not really lie in the nuclear reactor. The danger lies in the toxic waste from the reactor from which plutonium can be extracted. The only way to extract it is with an extraction plant or reprocessing plant, and both South Korea and Argentina have purchased reprocessing plants. It is significant that the United States and the United Kingdom have both refused to sell reprocessing plants to these countries, but they have been able to secure them from France.

When the minister was going to Korea some months ago, we asked him if he would ascertain from the President of South Korea why that country had obtained a reprocessing plant. When the minister came back he told us in the House that the President had assured him that the reprocessing plant was for scientific research. How naive can the minister be? The only possible purpose in having a reprocessing plant is to extract plutonium, and the only possible use for a toxic commodity like plutonium is to make bombs. Yet both of these countries have reprocessing plants, and we are selling them nuclear reactors. They already have other nuclear reactors but they are now going to get a CANDU reactor by virtue of this agreement.

I submit to the minister and to the House that there is a heavy burden upon the people of Canada with respect to what we are doing at this time. A little over 30 years ago, when the first atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima, the world was shocked and conscience-stricken about the new and terrible powers which were placed in the hands of mankind. If at that time the nations of the world had been able to restrict the spread of nuclear weapons, we might be able to sleep more easily. Instead, the nuclear club has spread at an alarming rate. An anthropologist visiting Canada just a few days ago said that, considering the pollution of the air, water and earth, and considering the proliferation of nuclear weapons, he could not see the survival of the human race beyond the year 2000. The fact is that the world is living on the edge of Armageddon. It may be that the contribution we have made to that situation up until now has been done unknowingly, but the step now being taken by the government is being taken deliberately and the government has a very heavy burden on its conscience.

The Canadian people will have to ask themselves whether they want to continue contributing to the possibility of a nuclear holocaust. Certainly, future generations will hold those of us who sit in this parliament responsible if we are plunged into a nuclear war ourselves, or any part of the world in the years which lie ahead.

In closing, I want to renew the plea I made to the minister yesterday. I have not changed my mind as a result of hearing the statement of the minister today. I do not think it is enough for a crucial decision like this to be made by the government and then members of parliament to be given a five-minute statement by the minister, two or three minutes of reply from each of the political parties, and that is all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I agree wholeheartedly with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who says that an international agreement of this importance ought to be submitted to parliament before it is signed. I know that traditionally the executive has always taken the position that it has the right to sign any international agreement, and then parliament at some time or other can move a motion of no confidence; but I refer the hon. gentleman to one of the patron saints of the Liberal party, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, who was prime minister of Canada, I think, longer than any other person in the history of this nation. On April 12, 1928, this is what he said in parliament:

> I submit that the day has passed when any government or executive should feel that they should take it upon themselves without the approval of parliament, to commit a country to obligations involving any considerable financial outlays or active undertakings. In all cases where obligations of such a character are being assumed internationally, parliament itself should be assured of having the full right of approving what is done before binding commitments are made. I would not confine parliamentary approval only to those matters which involve military sanctions and the like. I feel parliamentary approval should apply where there are involved matters of large expenditure or political considerations of a far-reaching character.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the government that there can be no international commitment of more far-reaching character than the signing of these two agreements with South Korea and Argentina and selling them a CANDU reactor. Both nations have in their possession reprocessing plants from which they can extract plutonium. The minister shakes his head, but I would be glad to hear from him about that in the question period.

I submit since the government has already signed the agreements, the very least the minister can do is to say that he will introduce a motion in the House asking the House to approve these two agreements. Members of parliament would then have an opportunity to express their opinion on the matter, and the government would have some idea of public reaction and could govern itself accordingly in the future. I hope that if there are any other agreements of this character—I trust there will not be—the government will submit the matter to parliament prior to signing them.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard the minister's statement on the two agreements signed with South Korea and Argentina concerning the sale of CANDU reactors. I am sure the minister was aware of the responsibilities he was taking in signing these agreements. I believe he has taken every precaution to make sure that these two countries merely want to take advantage of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

In his statement, the minister said that the Korean economy is basically sound and that its growth rate has been outstanding those last years. But its future needs for energy will be enormous and will not be satisfied by its own oil resources. We must always face facts. When a country which wants to develop itself and surge ahead has no other course than to ask for external aid, as Korea has asked Canada, I think it is reasonable to take all the necessary precautions. A few moments ago I have heard the leader of the opposition say that the emphasis was on the commerical aspect. In my opinion, we are perhaps taking the commercial aspect into account, as in any market consideration, but I think we must not forget the social aspect. We must not consider only the matter of explosives.

A few moments ago, an NDP speaker was mentioning the atomic danger. But the danger represented by atomic bombs exists across this country, Mr. Speaker, since Canada is full of nuclear devices.

There is still about the fear of atomic bombs. All major countries have the atomic bomb. If some countries want to use that modern energy, that energy by excellence which is atomic energy for pacific purposes, provided all possible precautions are taken, I think Canada is welcome to help those countries. As long as they stay within the pacific action they want to implant in their countries, well, modern explosive means have to be used for pacific purposes if the necessary safeguards are there.

I think the minister took the necessary precautions. Accidents might happen. The minister himself might have surprises. But who says who is going to govern tomorrow? In any country, even Canada, who says who is going to govern us tomorrow? I would not wish that we be governed even by the NDP tomorrow. But one cannot judge the good intentions of this government on future assumptions. I simply say that precautions were taken.

It is good trade business, of course, let us not hide that fact; it is a good thing for Canada to be dealing with those countries at the trade level to open other doors for us. If it does not, other countries will, others are ready to do so. I noted earlier that the United States have already begun building a nuclear reactor bought in the United States for Korea. I think Canada is no worse than others as long as we stay within the bounds of pacifism simply to bring a country more in line with modern methods and it is beneficial at the same time for our country because of trade balances. I think we must not close the doors but extent our trade possibilities to other countries, contrary to the practice of past years where we always limited ourselves to dealing with two or three countries. We always had a trade deficit. Naturally, the subject is touchy; we are talking about atomic energy, but if that energy is used properly as set forth in the agreements now signed between the minister and the countries involved it will bring only positive results.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have arrived at a critical moment. It is difficult at this point for the Chair to assess whether it is more desirable, in the eyes of hon. members, to take a few minutes and conclude the questioning now. There has been no questioning at all, but if there are only two or three questions we could take the opportunity to hear them now. The subject is a serious one, however, and there has been some indication already of a desire to question the minister. It would seem, at first blush, that the matter ought to be given fuller treatment at two o'clock than in attempting to do it at this hour.

Accordingly, it being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. We shall now proceed to a question period in which hon. members will question the Secretary of State for External Affairs on his statement. Unfortunately, the minister is not here, which puts the House in a difficult position. If hon. members do not mind, we shall wait for a few minutes until the minister arrives.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Here is the minister.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs relating to the assistance for Korea but not directly relating to the safeguards agreement? Can the minister inform the House, in general terms, of the financial arrangements for the transaction with Korea, approximately how much credit is being advanced by Canada to the Republic of Korea, the duration of the proposed loan and the rate of interest?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I shall do my best to supply some of the details asked for by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the financing of the reactor for the Republic of Korea. The total cost of the reactor is approximately $500 million, and I understand that Canadian government financing is in the amount of $300 million. I have no details beyond that except that the amount is repayable in 30 semi-annual instalments commencing not later than six months after commissioning, or October, 1982, whichever comes first. Interest terms are not generally made public because of the effect such information might have on future negotiating positions in other transactions. That is all the information I have on the financing aspect of the Republic of Korea's undertaking.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the people of this country will not be able to form an assessment of the prudence of the financial aspects of this deal because of some alleged effect upon our competitive position? What possible justification is there for refusing to disclose to members of this House the rate of interest so that the people of Canada can know to what extent, if any, they are subsidizing this transaction?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have given the justification for not disclosing the information. Frankly, I do not have the information at hand at the moment. I inquired about it, but the practice is not to reveal the terms of loans, for the reason given. I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition may follow the matter up with my colleague who is responsible, basically, for the financing aspects of the arrangement.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to accept the minister's suggestion and will do as he suggests, because I do not think secrecy would be acceptable either to parliament or to the people of Canada. Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs share my view that the situation—that is, the situation regarding the sale of nuclear reactors, nuclear technology and related matters—is going from bad to worse in the sense that West Germany has offered a big package to Brazil, and France seems to be prepared to sell recycling plants for the recovery of plutonium to various countries?

If the minister shares my concern in this regard, why was the Government of Canada not prepared to wait a bit before completing this transaction so that it could bring all possible pressure to bear on the five or six other countries, including Britain, West Germany, France, the United States and one or two others, to agree mutually on practices and safeguards which would result in a reasonable sharing of the benefits of nuclear technology and, at the same time, safeguard the world from the danger of a nuclear holocaust?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I share the concern of the Leader of the Opposition and the concern expressed by others who spoke earlier today. I assure the hon. member that the question of non-proliferation was a dominant consideration in the negotiations preceding the signing of these agreements. Certainly, I paid dominant and paramount attention to the safeguards aspects of these agreements, in the interests of non-proliferation.

The Leader of the Opposition asked why we would not consider a moratorium. We concluded that it would not be useful if Canada withheld its sale of these reactors at this stage in the expectation that this would bring pressure to bear on other suppliers, as it would not be a good course of action. Probably it would result in Canada's losing sales to other nuclear suppliers, and we would also lose whatever influence we are exercising—and I believe it is considerable—with other suppliers in upgrading the general level of international safeguards. That is why we do not agree with his proposal for a moratorium. We believe it would not have any visible, obvious effect in this situation. It might even have a negative effect.

• (1410)

The Leader of the Opposition talked about reprocessing plants. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands spoke of both the Republic of Korea and the Republic of Argentina as being in possession of reprocessing plants. That is not true, and I am gratified to be able to tell the House that in the course of negotiations with the Republic of Korea the government of that country advised us it had cancelled its order for a reprocessing plant from France. So it has no way in which to complete the fuel cycle. Likewise, there is no reprocessing plant of military or commercial significance in existence in Argentina. There is, as I understand it, a small laboratory model of a reprocessing plant.

When the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands conjures up visions of all these pounds of plutonium, I can tell him they are not to be found either in the Republic of Korea or in Argentina. These large amounts are to be found in the industrialized countries of the world. I do not share his view, or that of other hon. members, that we ought to deny to the developing countries of the world an opportunity to share in this new technology.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I think we ought to conduct a debate on the level of fact, and what I have just said represents the fact with respect to processing plants.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Before putting some questions to the minister, I wonder whether I might, for his own protection, draw attention to the text of his statement this morning? On page four, in the fourth line or so—he might check it in Hansard—he spoke of "co-operation for non-peaceful explosive purposes". I feel sure he must have meant "non-peaceful or explosive purposes".

As to the statement the minister has just made, let me say this: when I commented this morning to the effect that both Argentina and South Korea either possessed or were in the process of possessing reprocessing plants, I noticed that the minister was shaking his head. Now he tells us definitely that they do not have reprocessing plants. Well, Mr. Speaker, a report from London by Peter Calamai at the time of the International Energy Conference last summer definitely stated that the information coming out of that conference was to the effect that Argentina had obtained a reprocessing plant from France, and that South Korea was in the process of obtaining one, also from France. The minister says today that Korea has cancelled the order. May I ask him now whether there is any provision in the agreement that in the event of South Korea changing its mind and securing a reprocessing plant, the agreement will automatically be suspended?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not in the agreement. What is in the agreement—and it is a main provision—is that Canada is entitled to a hold on the reprocessing of any spent fuel, and we have indicated to the Republic of Korea that we would not at the present time be prepared to give consent for the reprocessing of any such spent fuel. Of course, that requirement within the agreement is to some extent inoperative because of the decision taken by Korea to cancel its order for a reprocessing plant from France. We think that is a positive element in the situation. I am satisfied, also, that the United States shares our view that nuclear technology ought to be made available to developing countries such as the Republic of Korea for peaceful purposes only, and I am satisfied that the United States will work diligently to secure that objective also.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I do not think the United States comes into the picture. The deal is between Canada and South Korea. The minister cannot give any assurance that South Korea, which was negotiating the purchase of a reprocessing plant, will not later obtain one. His answer, as I understand it, was that Canada would have control over any plutonium which may be produced from the waste material from the CANDU reactor. I should like to ask how that control will be exercised. Does Canada propose to repatriate the plutonium? In what way would control be exercised over the recycling of the waste?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. gentleman is right in stating we have not required that the spent fuel be returned to Canada. We did consider that course seriously, but we abandoned it for two reasons: first, because of the environmental implications for Canada and, second, because it would not add significantly to the non-proliferation objective we were seeking. The inspection system to be carried out by the International Atomic Energy Agency is intended to detect the diversion of materials to non-agreed purposes. That is the purpose of the inspection system, one which relies on instrumentation as well as on personnel. That is the way we look after the point the hon. gentleman has raised.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that IAEA itself does not undertake to account for anything beyond 95 per cent of the plutonium extracted, it seems to me that the minister is leaning upon a very slender reed. Mr. Speaker, I have one final question. The minister's statement today, together with the discussion that has taken place, seems to underline the need for a much wider discussion with respect to this important subject. Hon. members generally may be satisfied that the alleged safeguards will guarantee the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, but I am not satisfied that the two countries to whom we are selling these reactors constitute stable and reliable areas but, rather, are countries to which we ought not to be sending nuclear plants which ultimately could be used for the production of nuclear bombs.

Is the minister now prepared to consider the suggestion I made in the House yesterday, that he himself introduce a motion in the House in order for the House to have an opportunity to discuss this matter fully? I cannot believe that the government considers this matter of so little importance that the few moments we have had to discuss it today are sufficient for dealing with such a far-reaching subject that could have serious consequences not only for ourselves but the whole of mankind.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the importance that the hon. member attaches to this question, but I would remind him that we did discuss this question fully in parliament a few months ago, at which time the same arguments were put forward. We also had a very full discussion of the question in the standing committee on external affairs a month or so ago. The subject, in itself, has been very fully aired. However, I will consider the suggestion of the hon. member as to whether there is some way that further parliamentary examination could be made, not only of the agreements but also of the background material, which I think will prove useful for all of us in understanding the nature of the problem and what steps are being taken to apply safeguards. I will consider the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, was the question of the protection of the environment considered, and does this agreement cover the storage and disposal of nuclear waste materials from the environmental point of view, be it in Canada or in the countries gaining the nuclear reactors? Secondly, are these agreements similar to the agreement Canada is currently seeking with India subsequent to its nuclear explosion, in regard to Canadian aid to that country?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the safety features of a nuclear reactor when it is in operation will, of course, be controlled by the host country and will be its responsibility. In Argentina, where already a power reactor supplied by Germany is in operation, and in Korea where one is under construction, supplied by the United States, the question of safety is basically a matter for their concern. To my knowledge, there is nothing in this agreement that would impose environmental regulations upon the recipient country. We are presently in negotiation with India in regard to safeguards for the uncompleted reactor there, but these negotiations have not yet been completed. Obviously, the negotiations are directed toward increasing the safeguards for that particular project.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary to each of my two questions? Is the minister saying that when Canada exports a reactor it feels no obligation in regard to the fact that the reactor will add to the world pollution problem? We share a responsibility for the disposal of nuclear waste from that reactor. At least we have a responsibility to see that it will be adequately handled. Does the minister know the method that will be used to handle this waste disposal, or is it to be handled by the country concerned? This is of major concern to the world. Just as we are calling for a moratorium on the profileration aspects, there should be a similar moratorium regarding environmental control. Would the minister not agree with that statement?

My second supplementary question is this: Does the minister really expect any success with his negociations with India, in view of the fact that India has now started an external aid program greater than the $100 million with which we provide India by way of foreign aid? Bear in mind that $100 million is a small amount relative to a $2.5 billion expenditure. Is there any hope for the sanctions? This relates to the broader question of whether there is any real sanction at all, once we have allowed reactors to leave Canada, so far as controlling them is concerned. What sanctions are available other than foreign aid which has proven ineffective?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we have suspended our nuclear co-operation with India. That was a painful choice for Canada as well as for India. Because of our mutual desire to get out of the situation created by that painful cessation of nuclear co-operation we are now negotiating with India. Although we have not yet succeeded, we are still working on it. I have issued instructions to our negotiating team to resume negotiations in Indian in the month of February, and we will then know whether we will succeed. If we fail, the government will then be faced with a very serious situation. But I hope we will not fail.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, would the minister advise the House whether there was an attempt in our negotiations with South Korea to put in the contract a force majeure provision so that, in the event that there was a violation of any of the commitments that have been given in these matters either by Argentina or South Korea, the Government of Canada would have the power, at least legally, to go into those countries and remove any of the fissionable material that may have been stored there, or remove any of the equipment that had been sold? Was there any attempt to have such a clause provided in the contract and, if so, what was the the reaction of South Korea, and why did it not accept such provision?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a provision in the contract or agreement—I would have to look at it again—providing for the return of any material, including the reactor, in the event of any violations. But there are practical obstacles in the way of the execution of such an agreement which would be even more difficult in the situation described by the hon. member.

Mr. Leggatt: We should have something like a conditional sales agreement. There have been recent reports that nuclear exporting countries have been meeting in order to rationalize their sales procedure and introduce additional international standards regarding safeguards. In other words, there were reports, though not official, that Canada and other countries were participating with countries like France, West Germany, and so on, with regard to rationalizing the sales approach so that we do not have people bargaining off the safeguards in order to make a sale in the face of other competitors. Would the minister advise the House whether such meetings took place, and also whether any general agreement was arrived at in terms of international safeguard provisions governing sales by nuclear exporting countries to various purchasers?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there have been meetings among suppliers, including Canada, and one objective of this series of meetings was to upgrade the standard of safeguards among the supplying countries as one effective method of improving prospects for non-proliferation. We have put forward proposals at those meetings and I am certain we are in the vanguard of those who advocate improved and upgraded safeguards. Some progress has been made, and I hope that when the process is completed I will be able to report separately to the House on the results of these meetings of the nuclear suppliers. That is the primary way to achieve our objectives.

Mr. Leggatt: Can the minister advise why he did not consider delaying these sales until at least such time as those negotiations with other nuclear exporting countries were completed, on the simple basis that if the standards are higher than the ones we are now obtaining from Argentina and North Korea, we will have sold these nuclear reactors abroad at a lower standard than other nuclear exporting countries, therefore having a more immoral position, if I can put it that way, in terms of the way we flog these things abroad.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not fear that we will be placed in an immoral position as a result of any developments at a meeting of the nuclear suppliers. We have not declared the moratorium because we believe such a gesture would be futile and we would lose any influence we might have among the suppliers. In the meantime, the sales would be picked up by others and our position as a supplier in the way of influencing other suppliers would be, if not fatally damaged, at least seriously damaged.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote just one sentence of a speech the Prime Minister made to the annual meeting of the Canadian Nuclear Association on June 17, 1975, because, I think it is important in this examination. The Prime Minister said:

> Nuclear activity is one of the many ways in which man is now engaged which, if not made susceptible to reason and discipline, could become ultra-hazardous, even cataclysmic.

The Prime Minister went on to talk of our joint wisdom. I wonder if, within the minister's position, the use of the pronoun "our" in that case by the Prime Minister was a sort of royal or editorial "we", and that this parliament is not to have an opportunity to debate the agreements. If the Prime Minister is to be believed—and in these times that is very important—then surely he should be careful with his language. This is the place where joint wisdom might just perchance assist the government.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agree that this is the place to share and to exchange views. I hope the material that I have made available, and the agreements themselves, will make it possible for hon. members to consider whether there are additional ways in which we can achieve the objective of non-proliferation.

I heard one extreme suggestion this afternoon, namely, that we declare a moratorium on the supply of these nuclear reactors which are urgently needed for power generation purposes and for social and economic development. I have heard that point of view, which I reject. I have heard very few suggestions, apart from the work that we ought to be doing in the suppliers' meetings, for the improvement of the international safeguards system that we have put into these two agreements.

I remind hon. members that we have taken every possible precaution in the case of the Republic of Korea and in the case of the Republic of Argentina so that no Canadian-supplied material, technology or equipment can be diverted for explosive purposes. That is our obligation. In the case of the Republic of Korea, we have been advised that their order for a reprocessing plant from France has been cancelled, thereby denying the opportunity at this stage of completing the fuel cycle.

Mr. Stanfield: At this stage.

Mr. MacEachen: I made a reply to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that I think is a response to the valid interjection of the Leader of the Opposition. However, we must also bear in mind that in the Republic of Korea at the present time there is under construction a power reactor supplied by the United States and a second one under order. The United States obviously has an interest and an obligation in this situation as well as Canada. In the case of the Republic of Argentina, there is no implication, direct or indirect, that Canada through its nuclear reactor is in any way adding to the freedom or ability of the Republic of Korea to develop nuclear weapons if it so decided.

Mr. Stanfield: Argentina, you mean.

Mr. MacEachen: Argentina does not have a reprocessing plant. The reactor that is there, supplied by Germany, is under safeguards. The heavy water that is supplied by the United States is also safeguarded. Canada is adding nothing to the infrastructure of the Republic of Argentina that would justify the fears that have been raised by hon. members today. On the contrary, it has fully safeguarded its own participation. I believe it has created an incentive, if not an obligation, to possibly upgrade other suppliers operating at present or in the future in the Republic of Argentina. I believe we ought to bring in all the facts before we denounce Canada as being an agent of proliferation. In this case we are an agent of non-proliferation and an agent of economic and social development in countries that desperately need that development.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question for clarification. I understood the minister to say a few minutes ago that Argentina had a small experimental separation unit. I later understood him to say that they do not have a separation unit. If the minister makes a distinction between a large separation unit and an experimental one, may I point out that the explosive device which was produced by India was made from a small experimental unit. A small experimental unit is just as capable of extracting plutonium as a large one, except that it only produces small quantities. That, however, can be accumulated over a period of time.

In view of the statements the minister just made, and in view of the fact that most of what he said today was based on the documents that he will make available to hon. members—the position papers and the actual terms of the contract—is he prepared to give us an opportunity to discuss this at a later date? I received this material at about 10.45 this morning, and the House started at eleven o'clock. I did not have a chance to read these papers. If the minister is basing his whole case on the basis of the documentation with which he is supplying us, as I understand it, we ought to have an opportunity to examine that documentation and then discuss it subsequently at the earliest opportunity.

● (1440)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is true I stated that the Republic of Argentina does not have reprocessing facilities of commercial or military significance. I am not an expert on these plants. However, I am advised that the amount of plutonium, provided you had a reactor from which to extract it, that would develop from the plant referred to is not significant and is not a viable danger. That is the distinction to be drawn between the commercial and military significance and the laboratory model, the potential of which I have described as accurately as I can. I have undertaken to consider the possibility of further parliamentary discussion of this question. I repeat that to the House, and do so in good faith.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MEDICAL CARE ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

The House resumed, from Thursday, January 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-68, an act to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, at ten o'clock last evening we were debating the amendments to this act which would limit the annual increase and the per capita costs of insured services under medical care plans. I wish to take a few minutes in an effort to develop background material for the amendments now before us, because of the fact that when the original act came into effect there were many people who said we would be having trouble at about this time. This would now appear to be the case.

Last evening I had reached the point where I referred to an article in the Medical Post, a journal published, rather interestingly, by Maclean-Hunter Limited. I think in a few weeks we will hear more about Maclean-Hunter when we hear how the government wishes to stamp out Reader's Digest and Time magazine. In an editorial written under the date of January 6, 1976, this magazine has some interesting comments which I believe warrant consideration. As I read these excerpts, I should like members to think of the three aspects discussed in this editorial. One relates to the predictions of increased high-cost medical care a number of years ago by very reputable authorities and, second, the fact that there may have been some ulterior motives on the part of the government, first of all when it introduced the plan, and even again now, we might suspect. Third, there is a hint in this editorial of how improvements might be made that would help reduce the cost of medical and health care. I quote as follows from this editorial of January 6, 1976:

> All of a sudden the politicians have decided that our sickness care system, which they did much to create, has become too expensive.
> Too expensive compared to what?
> Apparently most of them have forgotten that Mr. Justice Hall in the Hall Commission report back in 1964 predicted costs would run to 7.04 per cent of gross national product in 1976 and he was working in 1957 constant dollars. At the present time the total cost of all U.S. sickness services is running about 9.0 per cent of that country's GNP. According to figures from the Ontario Ministry of Health the total sickness services in the province is running almost exactly 7.0 per cent of the provincial GNP.
> But, of course, the politicians designed an open-ended system, mainly because it looked good to the voters, and decided to operate the entire system through tax revenues, making it look as though the whole service was free. It was not free, of course—it just looked that way because the government undertook all payments and collected all the taxes to pay for it. Thus was the tap of public expectations turned wide open, while the politicians basked in their cleverness.
> It did not take long before the deliverers of the service began to realize that having the tap of expectations left on full resulted in a huge demand for service. Eventually the politicians began to realize that once that tap had been turned on full it was extremely difficult to close it off, even a little way. They tried all sorts of maneuvers to turn back the tap without appearing to do so; they accused the doctors of overusing the system and railed against the gross inefficiencies in hospitals and set civil servants to finding alternatives to the system to reduce costs. But they dared not touch the real problem, that excessive flow of public expectations.

The editorial goes on to say this:

> The outcry about accelerating sickness care costs have come mostly from the politicians who are afraid they have come to the bottom of the taxpayer's pocket.
>
> And they are right in that fear.
> Yet nobody seems to suggest that perhaps the public look on the present sickness service as so important that it will pay a share of the cost of the service directly—and that the public itself will by this means turn off some of the flow of service expectations which it has been educated to expect.
>
> No politician has broached this because he probably feels his constituents might not like it.

Finally, there is another paragraph which reads:

> The idea of having the public pay some of its sickness service directly is probably verboten around the ministry.
> It is our opinion that the whole government-financed sickness service has been over-extended and mismanaged since it started. Now financial pressures are forcing governments to look for scapegoats and the sickness service is going to be one of them. It is going to be curtailed whether the taxpayers approve or not simply to bail out a government which has grossly overspent for years.

I draw the attention of hon. members to the three points I raised before I read this editorial. First of all, a person—no less than Mr. Justice Hall who was chairman of the royal commission—anticipated this problem and, second, it is suggested that the government had some ulterior motive in wanting to get votes, by this scheme, back in 1967-68—and one wonders whether this still applies. One begins to wonder whether the government has an ulterior motive now in trying to control the income of physicians by bringing in this bill at the present time. Perhaps more worrisome to some of us is that one wonders whether we will have sprung on us, in the next year or two—or certainly before the next election—some other universal welfare plan that will put us in even deeper trouble.

Perhaps this is the reason the government is trying to cop out of the plan already in effect and is trying to get rid of some of the charges that have been turned over to it in the hope that there will be money left over, somehow, for other plans which will be brought in and which will place another strain on the country. The third thing in this editorial of the Maclean-Hunter Company publication is a hint that probably there is an opportunity yet in this country for Canadians themselves to feel some responsibility for looking after their own health care.

I was encouraged somewhat in the debate yesterday when the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) conducted a very judicious plea as he gave his presentation with respect to this bill. I think my hon. friend and professional colleague from Halton did a good job, riding several horses. He certainly did well on behalf of the medical profession and on behalf of the Canadian Medical Association. I think he did reasonably well on behalf of his government. But I was very pleased to note, as recorded in Hansard of January 29 at page 10450, that he said:

> In light of these complexities, the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have apparently promised not to impose any more universal programs on the provinces, hopefully, not even on the country.

I hope the hon. member for Halton is correct in that we will not be confronted by this government with more, similar schemes. In reviewing the historical past of this bill, I should like to conclude with a further quotation from someone all government members opposite respect, namely, former prime minister Lester B. Pearson. I shall quote from the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, of November 13, 1975, page 68:185. A submission to the committee at that time contains the following quotation from the statement given by Mr. Pearson:

> It is a national responsibility, a federal government responsibility, to ensure that our medical care insurance program is comprehensive, universal, publicly administered and portable. If a certain standard of public medical services is needed and approved by Canadians generally, appropriate fiscal resources have to be brought into play on a national scale—

I underline the word "national".

> —in order to make the services available to a national standard in all parts of the country.

● (1450)

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, at that time Mr. Pearson felt this was a national responsibility and not something that could be approached in a unilateral and arbitrary way by the federal government alone, as is being done at present.

I should like to move on to other broad areas in this debate. I will touch very lightly on the first one, that is, some of the other effects of the bill before us. This has been dealt with rather adequately by many previous speakers, and I do not wish to take a long time on it. The effect of this bill on the quality of medical care no doubt will be very great, and it is a risk which the people of Canada will be facing. If the federal government puts more of the expenses of medical care on the provincial governments, they will either have to take more money from the people of the provinces or they will have to curtail and limit medical services and other health care services. I think this is a regrettable situation, but I will not take up more time because we have heard about it from several speakers. Incidentally, this is bound to affect the poorer provinces more than the richer provinces, and that is deplorable.

The second area which has been dealt with adequately, both by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook), speaking on behalf of the government, and by other speakers on this side, is in connection with the effect this bill may have on physicians' incomes. There are now two pressures on physicians—the anti-inflation measures and the amendments in Bill C-68. This is regrettable, in view of the fact that back in 1971 physicians took the government at its word, and when the Young commission advocated voluntary restraint, that was carried out by the medical profession. They will be the ones to suffer because they tried to co-operate at that time. Enough said about those two situations which I find regrettable.

Now I want to go on to some positive aspects of the legislation before us. I do not want the minister to feel that I am only attacking his policies on health care. Sometimes we hear it said that the opposition parties should always be on the attack. I am not sure that should be so. I think that sometimes positive things come from the government side, and this should be acknowledged. The minister alluded to the fact that there will be some reductions in health care costs by virtue of the seat-belt legislation which is being implemented across the country gradually, and the reduction in permissible speeds on highways. I dare say he is right to a certain extent, but I would remind him that we are debating a medical care bill, not a health care bill.

If one looks at the medical costs saved by the seat-belt legislation and the reduction in highway speeds, one finds it is true that some reductions may be effected in medical care costs, but they are far greater in the health care field. If a person smashes his head in an accident and lies unconscious in a hospital for six months, the big cost is not the medical cost but the health care hospital cost. If a person has two or three fractured bones and is in hospital for several months, again the medical care cost may be equivalent to four, five or six days of hospitalization, but the hospital stay of three or four months which is required is much more significant. So I think we must not feel too satisfied that by introducing these pieces of legislation we will reduce medical care costs, but we may be largely reducing hospital care costs.

The other matter about which the minister spoke was his effort and the effort of the provincial government to improve our lifestyle as a means of saving health care costs. I think that is commendable, but we should look at one more point in reference to that question. We must begin to think about the concept of an experience rating of our health insurance plans in accordance with our lifestyle. This is not a new concept. We do it now with life insurance and we do it with collision insurance; we also do it through the Workmen's Compensation Board. However, I am not so sure we shouldn't do it with health insurance. People who choose to lead lifestyles that are less than healthy and are conducive to high costs in the health care field perhaps should have to pay their share of that extra cost. That is one thing the minister should consider in the future.

Another possible means of controlling excessive health care costs might be through legal and other mechanisms for providing payment for allied health personnel. We could resort to paramedical professionals, to some extent, who have developed skills that do not require as much training and education as those required by physicians and yet are very essential. The cost of providing such health care assistance is somewhat less. However, the problem is that at present there is no legal mechanism which would permit the practising of those skills or payment for those skills in conjunction with physicians' services. The government should study this matter.

Of course, there are times when hospital facilities can be built more cheaply, and this would reduce health care costs. However, let us revert to the matter of bringing about legal changes in the system. We are fast approaching the state which exists in the U.S.A. where legal actions against physicians and hospitals are increasing at an alarming rate. There is no question that this leads to increased costs of health care, if for no other reason than that physicians and other health care personnel, in order to protect themselves against possible legal action, greatly increase their requests for certain lab work, certain X-ray work and certain consultations. I think we should be looking at ways and means of limiting the number of legal actions and the amounts of these claims to a more reasonable level, thus relieving some of the financial pressure on the health care system.

Another matter that should be considered is that in recent years increasing emphasis has been put on training young physicians in the use of hardware and the technology of medicine, rather than in the old skills of history-taking and plain, physical examinations. These have been popular areas to stress in the last few years, but they are expensive and they increase health care costs. Similarly, the situation has been aggravated, I am sure, by the news media which tends to lay emphasis on the heroics of medicine, on heart, kidney or liver transplants as though these were the essence of medicine. I am not trying to deprecate or lower the need for research, both experimental and on humans, but since we are living at a time when costs are to be reduced, we should be careful about the money spent on these heroics in medicine.

Another area to which the minister might like to give consideration is the development of appropriate regulations to discourage high costs. Over the last ten years or so—for example, under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act—the provision regarding X-ray services was such that if you were an out-patient, your X-ray costs were not covered by the insurance scheme, but if you could finagle your physician to admit you to the hospital, your X-ray costs were covered. Not only did the state, or the plan, have to pay for the X-rays in such cases, but it also had to pay for the costs of the stay in hospital.

The same thing occurred with dental care services. For a long time, good dental services with general anaesthesia were being provided in the dentists' offices and the only cost to the plan was for the anaesthesia service. Then the government changed the regulations so that when the patient was admitted to hospital, everything was covered—anaesthesia, hospitalization and, of course, dental services in the hospital. This added further to the expense.

● (1500)

I am pleased to see that the minister is suggesting that he will introduce some low cost medical services into his new plan, and for this I think we must commend the minister, but I caution him in this one particular area. I have had some communication with a provincial minister of health on the topic of nursing homes. I have been approached by a number of my constituents who feel that it is absurd that health care plans should be paying for families to put their elderly relatives into nursing homes. If the children in a family decide that their parents are getting old and need more help, there is an economic advantage to placing them in a nursing home, whereas if the government saw fit to pay perhaps half the price it pays nursing homes on a per diem basis to those same children, they would look after the old folks at home, and everyone would be happier.

I caution the minister that if he is going to put more money into services such as nursing homes, he should be positive and see if we cannot spend that money in a cheaper way which will keep patients out of nursing homes and in their own homes if at all possible.

I am coming close to the end of the points I wish to discuss. There is the matter of perhaps considering transferring some tax points from the federal tax treasury to provincial treasuries. That would give the provinces some feeling of control over their health expenditures and some assurance of revenue to provide those services.

Another thing the minister might consider under this legislation is removing these arbitrary ceilings he has included and putting them under regulations instead of in the legislation. This would allow some flexibility. We all know how difficult it is and how the government refuses to predict inflation for the future. It must be difficult to plan a rigid percentage at this time which would be appropriate. Surely it would be better to have flexibility built into this.

The government might also consider having a tripartite committee of some sort composed of federal representatives, medical profession representatives, and provincial people who could discuss some of the problems, particularly as they relate to medical care financing for the future.

I wish to conclude with some views on a matter which I think is very important. This relates to something I touched on earlier and something which was touched on in an editorial I read in the Medical Post. This is the matter of patient responsibility for his own health care and his participation as a patient in the provision of his own health care from an economic point of view. I should just like to take a moment to read something further from the report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the same date as before, November 13, 1975, at page 68:186. This is from the presentation of the Canadian Medical Association to the committee at that time, and I will read from the report:

> Public education relative to the prudent use of medical services might help to lower frivolous patient demands for medical services. However, it remains our opinion that unnecessary, frivolous patient demands for medical services and overservicing by physicians would be most effectively controlled by some degree of direct personal responsibility of the patient in the payment for such services.

I will go on to what I think is another very significant quotation on the same subject. This is taken from the Canadian Medical Association Journal of October 18, 1975 at page 792. Dr. Bette Stephenson, now the minister of labour for Ontario and a former president of the Canadian Medical Association, was asked to appear before a subcommittee of the Congress of the United States on health care. They were trying to look into the future of health care plans there, and I quote from the Canadian Medical Association Journal:

> Even more important, says Dr. Stephenson, it removes from the patient a feeling of responsibility for his own health. Dr. Stephenson noted that "the most significant advances in the health of our populations will be achieved through increased acceptance of personal responsibility for health maintenance, not through the provision of additional services. By all means protect the American public from catastrophic health care costs, but do not remove the individual patient from the financial aspect of his personal health care. Keep the patient involved."

There are many other areas, in the present concepts our government has, where it is taking away responsibility from the citizens of this country, not only in the health care field but in other fields as well. It seems to be the concept and the philosophy of the government that the more control it can have over the individual, the more effective and better lives the people of Canada will have. This has been proven historically to be wrong over the centuries. Civilizations have gone down to complete failure and doom where this sort of situation has developed. I hope the government will see fit to begin to reverse its stand whereby it takes away all responsibility from individuals.

Just in summary, what I have attempted to do in this debate is discuss the origins and the historical background of Bill C-68 and why, in retrospect, it is completely unnecessary. That could have been predicted years and years ago, and indeed it was predicted. We must beware of further encroachments upon the individuals of this country, whether by more universal health care plans or whatever. Let us beware that there is not some trick in this bill by which the government will introduce something in the next two or three years, or even sooner, which will take away more responsibility from people.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have dealt at some length with a dozen or so ways which I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare should consider appropriate to help reduce both medical care and health care costs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to review this legislation from the standpoint of a doctor. However, I want to make it clear that I support the minister and his legislation.

Bill C-68 is designed to amend the Medical Care Act. It was originally antedated or previewed by the June budget of 1975 introduced by the former minister of finance. In one section of his policy which was for retrenchment he brought out the fact that the government aimed to rewrite the Medical Care Act, or renegotiate the costs and percentages. He laid down ceilings, 13 per cent on increases for 1976-77, 10½ per cent the following year, and 8½ per cent subsequently. He retained the per capita approach to determine the total contributions to the provinces.

Apparently there is some desire on the part of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to keep the 10½ per cent as a figure for the subsequent years, and I think this might be a good idea. No one in the medical profession in this country fights a policy of control very strongly. They recognize the need for prevention of unregulated cost increases in medical care. Somehow both hospitalization and medical care costs will have to be renegotiated, and they might need restructuring. Health delivery care systems may eventually have to evolve, and most doctors are strongly against cuts in national medical research which is given to universities and the Medical Research Council.

In certain countries in Europe, and in the United States, large multinational corporations of the pharmaceutical industry do much original research. Canada enjoys this second hand. These companies also subsidize university and research institutes in those countries.

It is important for Canada to retain her present eminence in research, and it is hoped that the medical research funds will not be cut, but rather that they enjoy the same rate of increase as the hospitals and the medical profession; in other words, according to the present guidelines.

There has been much argument in Canada about the whole health delivery system. The four cornerstones, universality, portability, accessibility, and government administration are very prominent in our minds. We cannot argue with that a great deal, but in certain ways we do.

● (1510)

The cost of medicare was rising at over 20 per cent annually. It would be irresponsible to allow this to go on. However, the doctors that I know feel that free medical care, irrespective of recipient's income, is one of the weak points of the system. Many people also believe that old age security for everyone cannot be defended.

There is no doubt that health and accident sickness insurance companies were charging in their premiums $1.25 to $1.55 for every dollar of benefit. But cost of administration had risen in the last few years. The government claims it can provide a dollar benefit to hospitals and medical incomes for $1.03 from tax money. This is rather unrealistic to me. This does not take into account any of the expenses required to borrow money or the expense in the civil service for the handling of money. It refers only to the administrative costs of doling it out to the provinces.

Doctors feel, as far as I can make out, that there should be a sliding scale of participatory payment of insurance according to incomes. I agree with that idea. The socialist group feels that a means test is a demeaning manœuvre. This is not so, in my opinion. The very wealthy would pay a certain premium for the same services and the scale would descend to zero at the poverty line, which would presumably take in a great many of the retired people, invalids, handicapped, and other low income groups. Everybody would be given identical care in doctors' offices and in hospitals.

In Ontario many small hospitals are about to be closed. There is a rumour that the city of Port Colborne may lose its hospital; this would be a shame and I cannot quite believe it.

A sizable percentage of "acute" beds are being closed in every hospital in the province. This is an attempt to reduce the cost of hospital care, and it is quite true that many people are in acute beds who do not need that level of care. It is also true that there is a small percentage of people admitted to hospital and treated surgically as well as medically when these patients are not always in the category of urgent treatment. I think that the type of doctor practising in this manner is not as common as some years ago, but this type of practice did exist. However, I would hope that the provinces will call a halt to the closing of these acute beds at such an alarmingly rapid rate.

Hospital care may be cut to some extent because that was the portion of the cost which was increasing at such a rapid rate. Doctors' incomes have had a low rate of increase for the past several years. It was about 4 per cent in two of the years, 7 per cent plus in another year, and there was no increase in another two years. At the same time one has to remember that there was a windfall increase in doctors' incomes of around 35 per cent to 40 per cent when medicare was instituted. This was due to the fact that 90 per cent of the bills were paid instead of 65 per cent to 70 per cent. One cannot forget, however, that the doctor does get paid for only 90 per cent of his potential income under medicare.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare states that doctors will have to regard their raises as related to the year 1971. But more truly would be the years preceding the institution of medicare, because their style of life did rise very quickly since medicare began. All this will have to be accepted. Dr. Grisdale of Calgary, President of the Canadian Medical Association has already appeared before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs and indicated acceptance of the guidelines since October, 1975.

One thing that worries doctors in Canada is the role of government in medicine. Our government has a tendency to point to the improving infant mortality and longevity tables as if it were due to medicare. However, these same improvements are present in the United States, where there is no universal medicare. These improvements are really evidence of increased medical and public awareness of the need for better care for pregnancy, good care at childbirth, and the post delivery care of the infant, along with the recent institution of intensive care therapy. Improvement in health in Canada recently stems from the great advance in medicine and surgery following the second world war.

One has to give credit to the provincial governments as well as the federal government for building excellent hospitals in the affluent years of the fifties and sixties. Certainly all these improvements in health have not been due to government interference in the health field, that is, as far as medicare is concerned.

At this time I would deplore attempts to curtail too quickly our present style or system of medical care in hospitals and in doctors' offices. One must realize also that there is a dangerous feeling in some circles that prevention or personal change in living habits will do a great deal to make everyone healthy and almost put the country in such a blessed state that a great reduction in the cost and complexity of medical care can be produced. This, I think, is an impractical dream.

The huge population increases of the past 20 years have been really due to the discoveries in preventive medicine. Starting with such things as prevention of smallpox, plague, typhoid, cholera and other widespread epidemics, and the introduction of antibiotics which have reduced deaths from bacterial infection, to the subject of viruses—which may come under control soon; all these have collectively conspired to lengthen longevity. However, we still do not, and will never have complete control over blood and tissue tumors, natural disasters, road, rail and air accidents, industrial accidents, congenital defects, and defective organ inheritance producing premature mortality. Certainly change of life style, reduction of obesity and other health hints will do something, but will not change much the need for hospital care.

Painful maladies, low back pain, degenerative arthritic joints, causalgic pains have been treated in the past by irregular practitioners, and by everything from quackery to faith healing, yoga, transcendentalism, and acupuncture. Recently there was a scientific breakthrough with the discovery of transdermal electric stimulation. This may be very helpful or even curative. These simply are things which are here and must be mentioned because they do take a lot of medical care and are not amenable to amelioration entirely by "taking thought".

One of the benefits that the voluntary health committee of the House of Commons conferred was to hold a luncheon meeting with Dr. William Ghént of Queen's University, and Dr. Ken Wilson of Ottawa, to discuss the question of traffic accidents. In that committee they showed us that half the mortality, half the morbidity, and half of the cost of traffic accidents could have been prevented. They were working as members of the traffic accident research foundation. This body proved that the total cost to Canada of road accidents is $2 billion annually. The number of lives lost in the province of Ontario is over 1,700 annually.

Prevention is directed to reduction of the number of alcoholic drivers, reduction of the speed limit, and the mandatory use of seat belts. These would be very easy to promote in a big educational campaign on television. I believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare is pushing this concept at the present time.

All these things that I have mentioned have helped reduce the amount of sickness and the number of people who die too early, or who are incapacitated by illness. However, there is a belief among some health and welfare officials that we could get along in the future without much medical care if people believed in the precepts of proper personal health direction. I regret to say that this is not at all likely, and I do not think that the present number of hospital beds should be reduced any further.

When this act is passed the provinces of necessity will have reduced their expensive hospital facilities to some extent. By then they can enjoy a long breath as they look forward to the next two years. It would appear that the 10½ per cent would be the bottom of the reduction as allowed for annual increase. This of course will be dictated by the inflationary rate and the new agreements.

When we discuss a health care delivery system we have to admit that our present system has grown without too much planning. It has developed in line with those of all other modern industrial societies. However, we have now a medical profession which is enjoying private practice without its members being salaried government servants as they are in England, Sweden, and to some extent in Germany.

We have built large hospitals with excellent emergency departments and excellent intensive care units. The hospitals have been departmentalized and any urban centre of 20,000 or over has usually had an excellent staff of general practitioners, pediatricians and specialists in all the usual diseases, all well trained and academically certified. Many people wonder why anyone would change this. The only reason of course is to cut costs.

I do not think there is much doubt that in the parts of Canada which have average density of people, medical and hospital care are known to possess the highest quality in the world. When one talks about changing the present system one would have to experiment, and a sudden experiment might be disastrous. At the same time we will have to make some changes in the system. It is quite irresponsible to let total medicare costs absorb more than the 6 per cent or 7 per cent of the gross national product, which they now absorb.

I have been in Nigeria where they had one genito-urinary surgeon for the whole 20 million people in the north. I have been in India and have seen highly trained specialists congregating in the cities and doing general practice for wealthy people, instead of accepting public health positions at a low salary to bring medical care to the poor.

In Canada our main unserviced areas are on the frontier. Certainly salaried people, doctors, nurses, and technicians, should be provided and are being provided. We are doing our best with aircraft to transport seriously ill victims of sickness or accident to proper centres.

There are very few Canadians who would really accept the second-class services of community centres after having had the high quality medical care which they now enjoy. It is all very well to use a nurse and a nurse-practitioner as front line defence against the surges of applicants for medical care, or to use a surgical technician instead of a doctor to assist in operating rooms. I have gone through all that in my army experience, and in Nigeria. It just is not as good. So I believe that furture lowering of costs can only be done by continuing sensible preventive medicine and pruning frills from hospitals and medical care. Some of these expenditures are due to inertia and laziness. For instance, total laboratory examinations, totally complete X-ray examinations, and total physical examinations sound good, but are merely ways of avoiding taking an interest in each patient, spending the time necessary to dig out a complete and pertinent set of facts about the case history, and doing a fair amount of thinking about the case.

Although we could do much to improve mass health delivery systems, we will never improve on the combination of experience backed by academic qualifications, and the use of brains by the medical practitioner.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to intervene in the debate taking place this Friday afternoon in this quiet, thoughtful atmosphere. I listened to a couple of thoughtful speeches which were made this afternoon.

I read the speech of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). I am afraid I could be in the House long enough to hear only part of what he said, but I read his speech with great care.

I was also unable to be present in the House when the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) spoke, but I read his speech with great interest. I thought it was a thoughtful and strong speech on the subject. I notice that there was some controversy about the extent to which the Minister of National Health and Welfare listened to the hon. member for Athabasca. I do not know to what extent he was able to listen to the hon. member for Athabasca, but I hope that in this quiet, thoughtful atmosphere he will listen to me.

The hon. member for Athabasca said just about all there is to be said about the bill when he described it as an arbitrary, unilateral act by the federal government. Since I feel that this bill reflects a most arbitrary, unilateral approach to health care and, in a broader sense, to federal-provincial relations, I feel impelled to intervene in this debate, even thought it is 3.30 on a Friday afternoon. But no matter how eloquent I may be on a Friday afternoon, I doubt if I can express my indignation at this bill.

I hope the minister will not mind my saying that in my various capacities I have been involved in this area longer than he has been. I do not say that with a view to delivering him lectures on how the Department of National Health and Welfare should be run. I say it simply as a preface to my remarks, which arise out of my experience in negotiations connected with health plans.

Although as a provincial premier I was not involved in the negotiation of the hospital plan, I was in politics in those days and followed closely the scope of the plan. I know beyond doubt that the nature and terms of the plan were dictated by the federal government of the day. Some provinces had grave reservations about all aspects of the hospital plan, but the federal government persisted and, eventually, all provinces of Canada were persuaded to participate.

I was involved in the negotiations leading up to the medicare plan and know, of my personal knowledge, that the representatives of the Government of Canada insisted on the present medical plan being adopted if the government were to participate. The federal government imposed this program on the provinces. I do not for a moment say that all provinces were reluctant to accept. If I remember correctly, the province once headed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) did not have great reservations about the plan as proposed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They were in the field.

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, they were in the field, and their plan was substantially the same as the present program. But, as I am sure the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands will agree, not all provinces came to the federal government. Not all of them knocked at the door and begged for a plan in precisely the form of this plan.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They were induced to come in.

Mr. Stanfield: They were induced to come in.

An hon. Member: What about your own province?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must listen.

Many provinces had grave reservations about the form of the plan and were gravely concerned that it would lead precisely to the kinds of difficulties about which the government is worrying today. An even more basic concern of the provinces when these programs were being negotiated was that the federal government would get them launched, run around the country pounding their chests, proclaiming the great thing they had done, and then saddle the provinces with the cost. I felt this concern as the premier of Nova Scotia and I know it was felt by other premiers too. And that is exactly what we are seeing today. The government has given notice of its intention to withdraw from the hospital plan.

● (1530)

Mr. Lalonde: And replace—

Mr. Stanfield: And replace what?

Mr. Lalonde: And replace the financial arrangements.

Mr. Stanfield: Here we see the government attempting to impose a ceiling unilaterally, not on the cost of medicare in this country but upon the federal government's contribution toward the cost of a program which the federal government itself has insisted that the provinces establish and administer. Madam Speaker, surely treachery is not too harsh a word to use to describe conduct of that kind. There is no other word for it. I must say it is consistent with the behaviour of a government which seems to regard itself as in no way bound by its word.

The minister has offered what he considers to be some concessions. He intends to move amendments which he described as improvements. One of these alleged concessions is that the very arbitrary ceilings on the federal contributions for the years 1976-77 and 1977-78 would be preserved but that from then on a new flexibility will be introduced. The rigid ceiling which was in the previous bill is to be dropped. Let me say that the ceilings for the next two fiscal years are entirely arbitrary. They are not to be related in any way to what will happen, to what the experience of the provinces might be, or to the success or failure the government might have in controlling inflation. The ceilings which remain for the next two years are entirely arbitrary, and the minister cannot justify using those figures or asking parliament to adopt them.

In the second place, far from having made a concession or an improvement in taking out the ceiling for the subsequent fiscal years, the minister is giving himself a blank cheque in those subsequent years. That is what he is asking parliament to do. Much as I would hate to see those set ceilings continue—I would fight them in the next two or subsequent years—I would prefer to see some figures set out in the act than to see the provinces left to the tender mercies of the minister after what he calls consultation with the provinces. I say to him, Madam Speaker, that after the next two years for which there are specific ceilings set out, the government, if it is still in power—and God preserve the people of Canada from such a fate—the minister, or any minister who might be minister of national health and welfare, could arbitrarily impose a ceiling of his own choosing on the contribution the federal government would make to the cost of medicare in this country.

I do not think the hon. gentleman will have much success in persuading anybody on this side of the House, or very many people in the country, that the government will in fact work out an agreement with the provinces as to what those ceilings should be. I am as sure as I am standing here that not one member of any provincial government today believes the Government of Canada will do anything but impose a highly arbitrary ceiling on its contribution following the two years in respect of which ceilings are set out. I say that if parliament passes a bill imposing specific ceilings for the next two years and giving the minister, or the government, the discretion to impose ceilings for subsequent fiscal years, parliament will be participating in a betrayal of the total understanding upon the basis of which this plan was launched a number of years ago.

The minister spoke of incentives. He wants to give the provinces a greater incentive, he said, to control the cost of medicare. As the hon. member for Athabasca pointed out, the provinces already have a very strong incentive to control the cost of hospital care and of the medical program since, in rough terms, they pay 50 per cent of the cost. This, in itself, is a very significant incentive. It is hard enough as it is for many of the provinces to bear the 50 per cent of the cost they are called upon to pay, and they struggle mightily to control the expense of this plan.

If the minister does not yet know, I can tell him it is very difficult for the provinces to control increases in the cost of these programs. Certainly I can speak for my own province. The provincial commission dealing with medicare and the one dealing with hospital care are very tough. If things are anything like they were when I was premier—and I suspect they are—they are constantly at war with many parts of the province in connection with services or improvements which are wanted in one direction or another. The problem is that every body wants as high a standard of service as it suspects anyone else is getting. I just heard the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) say he does not think the number of active beds should be cut down any further. I also heard him say he felt it would be a mistake to bring about any drastic revision of the doctor-patient health delivery system which now exists.

The nature of the plan imposed on the provinces by the government makes its cost very difficult to control. I agree as to the importance of control. I agree also with what the minister had to say about preventive measures which could be helpful. His suggestion about cutting down highway accidents is one which appeals to me. I spoke in the House on this subject the other day and I certainly would support the thrust of his efforts in that direction, together with measures he might propose.

It might well be that health delivery care arrangements could be more efficiently organized, although I would judge from the remarks of doctors to whom I have spoken, and from listening this afternoon to the hon. member for Welland, that there are no great magical possibilities in this area. Granted that there is room for improvement in these delivery systems and that we should try to determine needs, I cannot accept that the federal government, which virtually imposed these plans upon the provinces, should now impose an arbitrary limit on its contribution during the next two fiscal years, trying to arrange things so that, following those two years, it can impose upon the provinces any limit that the minister of health may see fit. That to me, Madam Speaker, is unacceptable.

● (1540)

I do not want to be offensive to the minister or his colleagues, but I have to say that the announcement out of thin air in the budget of the former minister of finance last June, and the subsequent steps the minister of health has taken to implement the announcement, are conduct that I can only describe as shabby and treacherous. I have to say to you, Madam Speaker, that the rules of parliament prevent me from expressing to the minister what I really think of him and his colleagues in this regard. I call upon this House, and upon what I hope are some decent members on the other side of the House, to reject this effort on the part of the minister of health and his colleagues to go back on their word and betray everything they stood for when they were making these enticing propositions to the provinces and the people of Canada a number of years ago.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Madam Speaker, I am happy to take part in this debate this afternoon, especially because of the opportunity offered to me to join in the discussion just after the hon. Leader of the Opposition has spoken on the same subject.

[English]

I feel it is important that at this point in the debate I seize the opportunity given me to praise the work of the Leader of the Opposition in this difficult period of history for his party. I have admired him especially during the last two weeks because I know he has had some very important decisions to make, and in all of them he has shown a great sense of fairness and justice for all those involved in the forthcoming leadership convention. I am greatly impressed by the way he is performing his present functions.

[Translation]

However, Madam Speaker, I cannot agree with some statements he made today. On the one hand, he said that the federal government had imposed medicare programs on Canada. I do not believe that is correct. On the other hand, he mentioned that in the bill before us, the government is taking unilateral action without giving adequate consideration to the provinces' budgetary plan that must take inflation into account, as all other governments of this country have to do at the present time.

Madam Speaker, when we are talking of consultation, we must not restrict the scope of this term, that is refer to consultation merely in terms of expenditures. When a decision is taken about the number of hospital beds, or about building new hospitals, or else to enlarge existing services, it is quite obvious that all these decisions have an immediate and direct effect on the bill to be paid.

In the context of the present legislation, the federal government is prepared to meet the costs without saying a word about how they are incurred. The provinces have full discretion to plan the extension of their services and the salary scales of health professionals.

Now, Madam Speaker, both factors cannot be excluded from the bill to be paid. Thus, for example, in Ontario in measures announced before the budget speech in June, the salaries shown for health professionnals as well as aids were to be increased by 22.6 per cent for 1976-77, by 20.7 per cent for 1977-78 and by 18.6 per cent for 1978-79. In the same province salary increases of over 50 per cent were granted to nurses on an 18-month period for 1974-75 and they were even prepared to vote another for 1976. Substantial raises were also expected in British Columbia.

It is quite obvious, Madam Speaker, that if all provinces unilaterally establish a fee schedule and decide to plan hospital facilities and to improve medical cares—those are objectives shared by each and every province—all those provinces incur expenses which are certainly desirable but they do so without a second thought for the bill they will have to pay. Those provinces contribute so much to swell the budget expenses that it is impossible even to think about any budget planning in health costs in Canada.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

However, Madam Speaker, you know that on October 14 the Prime Minister urged the provinces to better co-ordinate their public outlays because health expenditures are those we will have to reduce in the first place. I cannot think, Madam Speaker, it would be possible to co-ordinate our budgets at both provincial and federal levels unless we have considerably more than an inkling of the amount of the bills we will have to pay within five years.

It is essential, Madam Speaker, that the provinces put their own planning in order, not to prevent them from improving the services they administer to the patients in their own area, but to ensure that the improvement of services will be the same throughout Canada.

It is true that some provinces are in a better financial position. They can put more money in health services than others which unfortunately are financially limited. And those provinces which are financially well-off exercise considerable pressure on those which find it hard to maintain minimum standards.

● (1550)

Bill C-68 does not seek to prevent provinces from upgrading their services or moving within a planning scale. Bill C-68 aims at setting minimum standards within which the federal government will continue to participate in the planning and financing of the existing program upgrading.

Consequently, Madam Speaker, I do not think that the provinces which have additional funds allowing them to keep on upgrading their services will be prevented from doing so in the present situation. The danger and the risk we are now facing is that without this legislation being passed, the financially underprivileged provinces will not be able to catch up with the well endowed provinces which will have made progress while we have lost all control over soaring costs.

Bill C-68 is not then an imperative legislation, it is one which tends to maintain the philosophy the federal government has always advocated and defended since the beginning of the seventies.

You will recall, Madam Speaker, that during those years we had reached an agreement between the 11 government levels to sign the Victoria Charter.

You will also remember, and the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Stanfield) took part in those sittings, that during that conference one province in particular had not given its agreement, mainly on the basis of the coordination of health and social security services in Canada.

Now, it is absolutely striking that today the same province unilaterally supports the objectives of federal coordination and acknowledges that the role of the federal government is to maintain these minimum standards of health and social security services. Therefore, I do not accept, as some members of this House would have us believe by their indignation and their protests, that the provinces are completely unhappy with the health care plan as it is now administered in Canada.

Obviously, there are some parts of the country which are not served adequately. In some regions, there is also a lack of physicians and specialists. It is the responsibility of the province concerned to provide such coordination within the province. It is its responsibility to establish a scale of wages, salaries and allowances which will result in equal health care services for all citizens, wherever they live.

Bill C-68, Madam Speaker, is not designed to keep Canadian citizens from equal access to health, but rather to avoid an over-concentration of health services where the financial basis is wide enough to provinde the luxuries which other areas of the country unfortunatly cannot get in this economic context.

Consequently, far from being in jeopardy, the objectives the government had set itself in the '70s, when it tackled the gigantic task of the internal organization of health services, will be achieved. In fact, Bill C-68 is designed precisely to better guarantee the citizens access to health services in times of inflation. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I cannot agree with claims to the effect that the government is acting unilaterally. On the contrary, the very provinces who are least able to make up for increasing costs are all for Bill C-68.

Mr. Stanfield: Not at all, that is simply not true.

Mr. Joyal: It would never occur, Madam Speaker, to any sensible person, that he should foot the bill without having a say in the decision. Nor would it ever occur to any of the governments in Canada to increase thoses taxes because one of them, whether in Western or Eastern Canada, in central Canada or elsewhere in the country, is adding indirectly to the costs to be borne by the federal government, through its decision to improve its own services over and beyond the national standards.

We are now in a situation where the federal government will have to curtail projects, and programs of extreme importance to the betterment of the living conditions of Canadians, unless it does something about increasing health costs. I feel, Madam Speaker, that Bill C-68 is intended to ensure that the government of Canada maintains its leadership within the minimum standards that must apply throughout the country.

Bill C-68 expresses the federal government's desire to ensure that provincial governments, which want to provide more than minimum standards will seek in their own coffers the money they need to update their medical services. Consequently, this is not unilateral action, but action intended to protect the poorer provinces and allow them to offer the minimum standards within their present medicare services.

The leader of the opposition protests, he has the right and he has to do so. I listened very carefully and I hope that later he will have the opportunity to answer to my questions, but I am personally convinced that the medicare program, as it presently works, was not imposed unilaterally by the federal government. On the contrary, this discussion has been lasting for the last nine years. The first bill was introduced in 1966. The debates lasted more than five months, and though during the 1965 campaign the three main political parties in Canada—the Liberal party, the Progressive Conservative party and the New Democratic Party—all recommended complete medicare, when the vote was taken in the House in 1965 all those parties voted by a margin of 90 per cent for the adoption of the present medicare system. It would be misleading the House to pretend today that the government had imposed medicare at that time. On the contrary this debate has been going on for nine years. Ever since 1970 there have been many federal-provincial conferences aiming at achieving closer coordination of the health and social security programs. At each stage of the discussion, at each level of decisions, there were press releases expressing the consensus which was beginning to take shape within the different governments of Canada in view of continually improving health care.

However, Madam Speaker, when financial measures aiming at improving the coordination and distribution of funds are adopted there are always government levels or agencies which do not feel free to take advantage of the financial options which may exist within the whole budget. Let us remember that the aims of Bill C-68 are written in the law which was adopted by Parliament in 1965. Therefore it cannot be said that we are dealing with a unilateral measure but on the contrary with a measure which is in keeping with the government's aim to ensure accessibility to the same quality of medical care throughout Canada.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Madam Speaker, may I call it four o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that we call it four o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At one stage this week there was some uncertainty about what we might be dealing with on Monday. Can the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader advise the House of the government's intention for Monday?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to advise the House that on Monday we will be proceeding with Bill C-68.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

[English]

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, after consultation in the usual way, I believe there is general agreement to deal with private members' order No. 57 under public bills on page 11 of the order paper, a bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that all the other orders shall be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE HOUSE OF COMMONS QUORUM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that Bill C-257, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

He said: Madam Speaker, I suppose it is because the notices in the lobby indicated that this would be the subject of debate this afternoon that we have a better attendance at four o'clock Friday afternoon than we usually enjoy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, do all these interruptions come out of my time?

The purpose of this bill is to exercise our right in the Parliament of Canada to amend the British North America Act with respect to matters that are exclusively federal and, in doing so, to increase the quorum for sittings of this House of Commons.

● (1600)

Ever since the year one, namely 1867, section 48 of the British North America Act has read:

> The Presence of at least Twenty Members of the House of Commons shall be necessary to constitute a Meeting of the House for the Exercise of its Powers, and for that Purpose the Speaker shall be reckoned as a Member.

I suggest that if any of us were to ask, as I have, ordinary persons what they think the quorum of this place is, from those who do not know you would never receive the answer 20. Some think it is 50 per cent, or 50 per cent plus one, and when you tell them it is not that high they will come down to 100 or even to 50, but those who do not know never come down to 20. They find it difficult to understand when they are told that it is 20 in a House of Commons whose members number 264. They find it difficult to understand that it is only necessary to have 20 members present to carry on the business of this House.

I wonder if hon. members are aware of the reason that figure is there. I suggest it was not just pulled out of a hat. It is the figure that was in the rules of the old parliament of the province of Canada which was in existence from 1841 to 1867. There were in that assembly 130 members, 65 from Upper Canada and 65 from Lower Canada. We have seen again some of the sessions of that House in the Pierre Berton CPR show. I simply say to members that that is where we got the figure 20.

An hon. Member: From Pierre Berton!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not from Pierre Berton although it would seem that we get a lot of things from him. We got it from a house of 130 members which had a quorum of only 20. When 1867 came along and this House was constituted the original membership was 181. I suppose the Fathers of Confederation thought that if 20 was a sufficient quorum for 130 members it was sufficient for 181 members.

[The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin).]

But we are now 264 members, and surely the fact that 20 was sufficient for 181 or 130 does not mean that it is a sufficient quorum for 264 members. As a matter of fact where did that 1841 assembly of the United Province of Canada get the figure 20 as a quorum? It got it from the rules of the assembly of the earlier body which constituted Lower Canada or Quebec by itself. I confess I have not been able to find out how many members were in that body. I hope someone will find out and tell me, but I suspect it was a much smaller number than 130, probably 65, 70, or something like that.

It is all because some time ago in a small body of 60, 70 or so members, 20 was a quorum that the figure 20 has persisted down through the years; now we have 264 members and it is still our quorum under the BNA Act and the Standing Orders of the House. The quorum is still only 20. I do not think that is good enough. I think the public is justified in being concerned that at times the attendance of this House can get so low.

If I seem to be levelling any criticism in saying this I am levelling it at the entire House and at all parties. None of us can throw many stones when we talk about attendance in the House, although I suppose I could put in a word or two to the effect that my attendance record is not bad.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was hoping I would get applause for that and I thank my hon. friends, especially those opposite.

I know the arguments that will come forward during this debate. Earlier this afternoon I noticed one of the hon. members opposite handing out sheets of paper to four or five members on the government side who usually take part in the talking out process. I asked him where was my speech. He did not give me one, so I have to make my own.

Mr. Blais: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. On the question of creating speeches and handing out speeches I think if the hon. member is to make comments of that type he should indicate to the House that he received exactly the same material that was handed out to members on this side of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was avoiding embarrassing the hon. member by not indicating who it was, but now he has done so.

I know one of the main arguments will be that there are other things members of parliament have to do. There are committees, there is work in the office, and there is work back in the constituencies. However, I suggest there never is a time when 244 members have to be out of this House at the same time. That is what is being said when it is argued that the quorum can only be 20 because members have to be somewhere else.

The committee process sometimes becomes almost impossible, but we never have more than five committees meeting at the same time. That would account for 100 members, but our membership is 264 and I submit that these arguments that we cannot be here because of the requirement to be other places does not really stand up.

It is argued of course that all the debates are not exactly interesting. I suppose that is an argument which could be made right now; why stay in the House to listen to me speak? This is the main thing we are elected to do. We are elected to be members of parliament and to participate in the democratic process here on the floor of the House of Commons. We have to do a lot of other things, too, and we do them.

This is a full time job. I do not think any of these arguments excuse us from having a much better attendance in this House than we have a good deal of the time. We are here at two o'clock. This place is almost full and the press gallery is full, but a little later there are very few members here except the Friday afternoon faithfuls who are always here, and we still have one faithful in the press gallery.

Someone will point out that I have introduced this bill quite a number of times. That is true. I have not counted the number of times but it is probably 10, 15 or 20, and I have not yet succeeded. I think I shall win my point very soon. I may not win it by getting this bill passed or by having the quorum increased, but I think I shall win my point that there should be better attendance in the House. Do you know what will do it? Television.

If we get the television cameras in here and the people back home start to say, "I was watching the House of Commons the other day—where were you because I did not see you?"—this will have its effect. I hope that day is not far off. There is a motion on the order paper having to do with this and the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization has spent a good deal of time on it. I do not think this is far down the line. So, as I say I hope that day will soon come and we will have better attendance in the House because the people will be watching us and expressing to us the view that we ought to be here.

I know one argument that will be raised against increasing the quorum to 50, which is what my bill proposes to do, and which I believe is consistent with 20 prior to 1841 and 20 between 1841 and 1867, will be that because of one rule, namely, that when the House is found to be short of a quorum it must adjourn for the day, this would put us in some difficulty.

One of my colleagues whom I shall not name said to me when he heard what I was going to do at four o'clock, "What do you want, Stanley; do you want the House to adjourn every day?" I do not think it is impossible to keep 50 people here. But I would be happy to change that other provision and provide that when the House is found to be short of a quorum instead of adjourning we simply stop the business of the House for a moment and the Chair order the bells to ring and get the members in here and carry on.

Mr. Francis: But your bill does not provide for that.

● (1610)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I point out to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) that neither does the BNA Act provide that other rule. In fact the rule under which we adjourn for the day is not even a Standing Order, it is in the citations in Beauchesne somewhere. So that would not be difficult to alter at all, and I think that if this bill were sent to a committee that is one of the recommendations that could be made. With the very high attendance this afternoon—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six of us in my party are here, and if the same proportion of all the other parties were here this afternoon that would give us an attendance of about 100. We are not quite up to that, but the attendance is pretty good. At any rate I suppose that with the liveliness in the debate and the fact that a good many members have already made their contribution by interrupting me, the possibility is that this bill will get the usual Friday afternoon treatment.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope that there will be a general consensus that, whether my bill in its precise form is approved or not, the subject of attendance in the House should be discussed and that for that reason this bill, or certainly its subject matter, ought to be referred by the House this afternoon to the appropriate committee.

It has been a joy to get all these responses. I am glad to know that members are interested in this question. I really do not see how anyone can defend a mere 20 as a sufficient quorum for the business of the House. I certainly think it should be larger. I think we should take steps to improve the attendance of members in the House, and for that reason I hope that this bill will either be passed this afternoon and sent to the appropriate committee or, if that is too much for hon. members to swallow, that at least the subject matter will be sent to the appropriate committee so that this question can be thoroughly discussed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Will the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) allow a question from the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams)?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I will put my question very succinctly. What is the quorum in the British House, and what would be the hon. member's comment on what I am sure he as a senior member of the House appreciates, namely, that if all the British parliamentarians appeared in the House on one day there would not be room for them to sit? I should like the hon. member to comment on those two questions.

An hon. Member: Forty.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has already been given the answer from across the way. The quorum in the British House is only 40 out of a much larger number. Perhaps they have something else. Their House is smaller, there is not enough room for everybody to be there. I think that perhaps if we had to crowd together to get into this place we might be here in greater numbers.

May I also remind the hon. member that in both Houses in the United States the quroum is 50 per cent plus one. But of course down there they follow that other rule that if the House is found to be short of a quroum, instead of adjourning the bells are rung until members get there. I recognize that there is a quality of debate in the British House that is not always apparent here. But I sat there a few times in the gallery when it was as dull as this place can get.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But I suggest that there are other things that make up for the quality of debate there that we could emulate as well.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues on all sides of the House in welcoming on behalf of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) a most unusual number of his colleagues here. As we enter what I think is one of the most important parts of the parliamentary week, that is, private members' hour on Friday afternoon, we are all happy, those of us who are here regularly on Fridays, to say to our good friend and senior member of the House that the loneliness of his usual weekly sittings has been lifted by the presence of his smiling colleagues around him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want to say that frankly I look forward to next Friday when I am sure that group over there will increase from five to eight. They must not overdo it!

My hon. friend knows from the friendship between us and the very high regard that I have for him that I make those remarks in friendship, and I make them knowing that there is perhaps no one more concerned about the proper workings of this House and its committees than is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think that is acknowledged. However, there are some who are equally concerned, and I suppose there are some who do not really care, but the majority of us care rather strongly about how this House looks.

However, you know, Madam Speaker, there is a lot more to parliament than how it looks. There is a lot more to being a member of parliament than appearing in the Chamber, although I would have to say that this Chamber is the focal point of parliamentary life.

I believe the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) touched on something that was quite important a few moments ago. He spoke about the quorum in the British House of Commons. The membership in that House is over 600, and yet their quorum is only 40.

The British House of Commons is held up as the model for the operation of this House of Commons. One of the things that struck me when I first visited it was the difference in the size of the chambers. Their chamber is small and compressed. But the debates I have heard there on six or seven occasions had a spontaneity about them and an element of true debate which is not present in this House in the sense of the interruptions, the back and forth throwing of comments, and the exposure in a graphic way of the two sides of the coin, and in some cases three sides of the coin, because we have to remember that we have a minority party of some significance in the House, at least in their estimation of some significance.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

• (1620)

I think we made a mistake in some respects in terms of the workings of this House when some time ago we increased the membership of the House. I think we could have considered decreasing the size of this House physically, the removal of the benches to provide a real debating chamber, which there is in fact at Westminster. There are some nights when it is dull there. However, I remember the last time I was there in November of 1974, and they were debating emergency legislation arising out of the difficulties they were having with IRA activities in London and in the surrounding communities. The day I was there a bomb went off in Piccadilly as I was walking through Piccadilly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I disclaim any responsibility for that happening, but nonetheless I was there, and the headlines of the papers in London were dramatising that situation. The House of Commons was under guard on that occasion. Even with the pass given to parliamentary visitors one could not go from one door to another within the building without being stopped. It was a very dramatic situation. The House was not full for the question period, only half full.

As the debate wore on through the night there were fewer members on that occasion of great emotion in the British House of Commons than there were here throughout the whole of the all-night debate we had with respect to the rail stoppage some time ago. Yet the quality of that debate in terms of the issues being discussed was one of the high points in my life in terms of listening to the utterances of public men in the forum to which they were elected.

When we are dealing with this matter we must be sure we are not dealing with it only in terms of cosmetics. Members of the public have come to me saying that the House is empty and that there should be better attendance. I think the House would be full if there were always the drama of the question period or an emergency situation of some kind, but our life is not like that, and our House of Commons is a reasonable reflection of our life in this country. While I sympathize with the objectives of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I do not think this is quite the way this should be done. It is true that the life of a member of parliament is different now than it was in 1867 when this parliament started, or during the existence of the parliament of Upper Canada when the quorum was higher.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Upper and Lower.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My hon. friend referred to Upper Canada in the course of his remarks. There has been a basic change in our community, our society, and our way of life. We have much faster communication than there was at that time in terms of telephone, mail—sometimes—and in terms of the ease of people moving back and forth across the country. What has happened is that there is a burden placed upon a member of parliament—and I do not use that word in its usual sense—such as was never a burden in those days and which, by the way, is not the burden of a member of parliament in the United Kingdom today, and that is the intensity of the day to day constituency work of a member of parliament.

I do not have to quote the numbers of letters, requests, complaints, suggestions, and other things which have to be acknowledged and dealt with by a member of parliament. The office work of a member of parliament is a very important part of his representative capacity.

The hon. member mentioned House committees. There are a tremendous number of them. I suggest that perhaps we might think they are too large, but as our society changes and becomes more complex we will be working more and more in House committees.

I dare say our speeches are too long. I think they are repetitive. I think hon. members on the government side are from time to time too silent—and I do not necessarily mean to criticize the government, although that would be a delightful thing from the point of view of the opposition—in terms of exposing the two or three sides of every issue in a way which does not happen at this time.

If there were something interesting, engaging or absorbing in terms of a particular member of parliament and his responsibilities for his constituency, I dare say that member of parliament would be here for that occasion, but I think it can reasonably be argued that if the issue could be handled with greater knowledge by other members of parliament because they live with a particular problem, then those not directly involved ought not to have to sit in the House. If they do sit in the House they may be neglecting another very important part of their responsibility in representing 125,000 or so Canadians. Speaking candidly, I think we have lost a bit of spontaneity in debates because people tend to read speeches, and we tend to speak to each other—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member seems to forget that the subject of the bill is the quorum in the House of Commons.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I was just coming to that, and your intervention could not be more timely because what I am saying is that, despite the good intentions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with respect to a quorum, it can be, and on many occasions would be merely cosmetic rather than getting to the root of the problem, which is improving the opportunities of private members to have ideas considered here and later in committee, improving the quality of debate in the House, helping members of parliament to obtain information, and helping the backbencher on the government side to participate in debates of this House.

If those things were done it would not be necessary to do what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is asking us to do, and it is to fly in the face of parliamentary tradition to become more conservative than the Conservatives by citing, as he does, the precedent of the rules of the House of Upper Canada. That is going back a long way, even for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order or to ask a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member not like to keep it straight that we got our quorum from the 1841-1867 parliament, and that that body got it from the assembly of Lower Canada, not Upper Canada?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think it is safe to say that while the hon. member may have been a member of the parliament of Upper Canada, he certainly was not a member of the parliament of Lower Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That's worth three points, Walter.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my time is getting rather short, but let me say that I think everyone in this House appreciates the intentions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not think there is any doubt about that, but if all of us and those who are observers of this House of Commons would think about it for just a moment—and certainly all hon. members have thought about it—there are many things in terms of some of the matters I have mentioned which might achieve what the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has urged for parliament, that is, to make parliament live a bit more than it does.

● (1630)

I think it is important as well that while we have shortened the time for communication—we have electronic devices to help us, computers that solve problems in a shorter span and we can produce things more quickly—we should note that the average member of parliament still just does not have enough time. I think all of us, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, want to improve this House of Commons realistically for the benefit of members on all sides of the House.

I hope I will be forgiven if I say I am particularly interested at this point in improving the rules and other amenities of this House for members of the opposition. I think that is important to the parliamentary process, but the procedure that the hon. member has proposed is not going to do that for members of parliament in their representative capacity. I want to thank all hon. members for their interest this afternoon, and I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is grateful as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

House of Commons

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, I want to, and I will retain my great personal respect for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), not only because of my admiration for him personally as well as with respect to his role as one of the leading members of the House of Commons but also because he is renowned as one of less than a handful or fewer members of the House who are experts in parliamentary procedure.

I am going to do everything I can to make a distinction between the hon. member personally and my feelings about Bill C-267, which I find utterly without merit and which completely dissatisfies me.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre proposes that we increase the quorum from 20 members of parliament to 50. The suggestion seems to me to be something less than meritorious. It seeks not only to worsen an already unsatisfactory situation in this House but goes even further, and suggests in effect that we willingly take this House back to nineteenth century Britain when the British parliament was organized to meet the convenience of a small group of titled lords and not very busy ministers.

The hon. member knows very well indeed that it is the governing party, the majority—in this parliament the Liberal party—which is traditionally bound to provide sufficient members to meet the quorum of 20. Not only do we do that but as the governing party we provide approximately 70 members from this side as ministers, parliamentary secretaries, Speaker and Deputy Speakers, committee chairmen, whip, deputy whips and so on. On top of that work load and time load, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre now suggests that we add still further to the problem by having to meet a quorum of 50 rather than 20 members.

Hon. members should look around the Chamber. There are at least two Liberal ministers here and there are 25 or perhaps 30 members of the Liberal party here. As is the case today, and is the case every day of every week in this House, it is this party that provides the quorum, not the NDP, not the Conservatives, and not the Social Credit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had simply suggested in his bill that he wanted to amend the British America Act and the standing rules of the House to provide there would be all party responsibility for this quorum and every party would contribute to the time factor by having its members sitting tied to their desks, I might have found some sympathy for him.

I certainly do not find any sympathy for the bill the way it stands. It would simply see more Liberals tied at their desks in this House while members of his own party and other opposition parties rush across the country suggesting to citizens that the government is not getting its legislation through, that we are not doing our job, that parliament is not working. It is no bloody wonder! It is because we are tied to our desks here while at the same time no similar obligation rests on members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Blaker: I would suggest to the hon. member that he take his idea back to his caucus, then go to the Conservative caucus and the Social Credit caucus and tell them that they are going to supply the quorum. I would be delighted if that happened. I do not think they would buy the idea.

Other members have referred to the British House of Commons. The quorum there is 40 out of 635 members. That is 6 per cent of the membership. Our quorum is 20 out of 264—8 per cent. The hon. member now proposes we go to a quorum of 20 per cent or 50 members. What for, Madam Speaker? To make us look better for the media? The media regularly report to the country at large that the House is empty but they never bother to say that there are scores and scores of members in their offices or in departmental offices, or seeing constituents, or working on legislation, or working on committees.

I am not going to suggest that we add 30 more Liberal members of this House—the governing party—simply to satisfy someone who says it looks better, when he does not bother to explain that every member of the House from every party has too heavy a work load already. There is no rationale to this House sitting the number of hours it does. There is no rationale to members sitting here day and night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: I know my next remark can be interpreted personally by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not mean it that way, I mean it with the greatest respect; but some of us do have families and I am getting a little fed up watching the effects on my children of not having a father 12 or 14 hours a day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: Madam Speaker, I want to remind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of something. He and I, with others on the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, went to London to study the system at Westminster. We were very impressed with their efficiency because in two or three days they can get legislation through the system whereas it takes us two or three weeks, or months!

We wound up at a meeting where we talked to a very important person in the labour party. I am not going to mention his name. We were from all parties in Canada and I do not want to embarrass anybody by mentioning his name, but he was very senior in ranking. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows who I am talking about. We admired the system in Britain and we said, "You are so efficient, but how do you deal with the third party, the minor parties? How do you make sure they can participate in the system?" It was the very senior Labour party man who responded, and I quote him exactly, "We treat them with the contempt they deserve". We do not treat the smaller parties in this House with that contempt, Madam Speaker.

Look at the committee system here. If there were any rationale to the quorum being proposed by Bill C-267, why is it that in the committee system virtually every committee with which I am familiar has already organized matters so that no vote will be taken in the absence of one of the minor parties? We give them that courtesy. What do we get in return? A demand that 50 Liberal members sit here listening to opposition members drone on for hours on end.

Mr. Yewchuk: As you are doing now.

Mr. Blaker: As I am droning on right now, as the hon. member suggests. I want to put forward a proposition, Madam Speaker. If that comment came from the Conservative benches I want to make it very clear that logic and history say we are going to change sides, and some day the people on the Conservative side are going to form the government of this country. I do not think they are any more anxious to put up with this procedural flim-flam than I am or anybody else on this side.

Mr. Prud'homme: I hear silence from the Conservatives.

Mr. Blaker: I want to point out some of the difficulties. We all talk about the UK system, about the mother of parliaments, but I should like to point out a couple of defects.

I am fed up seeing 30 ministers of the Crown sit here every day for an hour and a half when they do not have to be here, when three quarters of them are not asked any questions whatsoever, and the balance from time to time cannot believe the lack of organization in the questions they are asked. The administrative and executive time of the governing party is tied up partly on the front benches. In the United Kingdom there is a roster system and the men and women of parliament are out doing their jobs, not sitting twiddling their thumbs and waiting to answer questions that never come.

I am fed up seeing the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) put in the same position every day. In the U.K. the Prime Minister goes before the House of Commons for question period maybe every two weeks, or on special occasions. In addition, the questions addressed to the Prime Minister of the U.K. are written in advance, provided to him in advance; hence he has the opportunity to answer them properly. The problem here is that we are continually agreeing to allow the question period to be completely the prerogative of the opposition parties; the cost is that we are tying up talent and all sorts of qualified people who are not needed for the theatre, so to speak.

● (1640)

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member is making a modest speech.

Mr. Blaker: It is a modest speech, for I, as a backbencher, am simply expressing the frustrations felt by scores of other backbenchers in this House who are fed up to the teeth waiting for procedural reform to take place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: I cannot find any merit at all in this bill. It seems to have something to do with cosmetic effects for the press and news media. Is it felt that it will look better in the press if we fill the House with more members? If that is the theory, I do not want to stay here tied to a desk for the benefit of the news media. That is not my role in life. Perhaps we should change the law, or the constitution, and secure better attendance in the press gallery.

I find no merit in this bill, with one exception. Obviously it has made one backbencher damned annoyed. I will put it this ways. I have been here only three years, and I am sure members far senior to me are laughing because they recognize the frustration of backbenchers with procedures of the House.

An hon. Member: Give up.

Mr. Blaker: To those who are ready to give up I say I am not yet ready to give up. This question will resolve itself in one of two ways. Either we are going to satisfy the Canadian people that we are serious and here to do our best to meet the problems of this country, or we will continue to operate some sort of play-pen in which half a dozen, or a dozen, or some small number enjoy the use of particular procedures available, and carry on to the detriment of getting legislation through the mill.

If it remains a playpen, those on my side will face one of two courses of action. Either we will get the opposition party, or opposition parties, to agree to reform the rules, soon, soon, soon—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: —or I, for one, will stop being gentlemanly about it, go to the backbenchers of my party and plead to the best of my ability that we use the government majority and steamroller through reforms, and do away with the archaic, stupid tactics which are constantly being used in the House of Commons.

Mr. Woolliams: That is a truly Liberal speech.

Mr. Blaker: There is not much more to add. Certainly it will not surprise the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to learn that I would not vote for this bill if his life, my life, or both our lives depended on it.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I warn the House that words do not come as easily to me as they do the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker). Nevertheless I shall try to put forward some of my views with regard to Bill C-257.

No one can deny the urgent need for the reform of the rules of this House. There are several areas of reform with which I shall deal as I proceed. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is taking the wrong approach, and that is only one reason why I oppose this bill.

That reform of the rules is necessary is self-evident; but I am convinced that the kind of piecemeal approach which this bill represents will only add to the continuation of our archaic rules and procedures. Changes must come, but in an orderly and systematic fashion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Without any steamroller.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): If necessary, yes.

It is my hope, indeed, that if no agreement in the near future can be reached among the parties represented in this House—and I mean in the very near future—the government will have the guts to bring before the House a package of reforms and put them through, so that we can operate in the twentieth century, not in the nineteenth century.

As my colleague said, our present rules might have been all right in 1867, in Great Britain; perhaps they were suitable to a gentleman's debating society, or suitable for members who came from the landed gentry of a compact nation. But even in 1867 they were not applicable to Canada, I suggest; certainly they are not applicable to us now.

This is a large country geographically and, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has said, members of this House have many duties to perform besides sitting in this House. We have other responsibilities.

I am glad the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore mentioned family responsibilities, because I see no reason why being elected to this parliament should mean that we should have to abandon our families, let our children grow up without their fathers and, as fathers or mothers, miss the developing years of our children's lives. It is not right, it is not fair, and is not part of our service to this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The family is the basic unit of society; if we abandon it, what kind of example are we showing our nation?

May I quote briefly from Appendix "C" of the report of the Committee on Procedure and Organization dated November 20, 1975. Referring to procedural reform, the committee asks: "How does the Commons use its time?" The answer is as follows:

> In the present session of parliament—up to the summer adjournment—the greatest proportion of time of the House of Commons was taken by matters other than government business. About 45 per cent was taken by question period, private members' hours, questions of privilege, adjournment debates and so on. Somewhat less than 40 per cent of the Commons' time was taken by consideration of government bills. Tne remaining 15 or so per cent of the time was taken by consideration of other government motions or on the Business of Supply, the approval of expenditures, (which takes place on days that are colloquially, but not completely accurately, called "opposition days").

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I see the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) rising. Does the hon. member wish to raise a point of order or ask a question?

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have listened to the hon. member for some time and noted he is not speaking to the bill. Perhaps you could call him to order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I was about to ask the hon. member if he would speak to the subject now before the House.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I considered that I was speaking to the principle of the amendment to the British North America Act with which this bill deals.

[Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The paper the hon. member has in his hand does not even mention the subject of the quorum.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I do not know why it should make the two members of the NDP present in the House uncomfortable to hear how the time of the House has been wasted. But, if it does, I shall cease quoting from the document before me.

If we are to amend the British North America Act, and amend the quorum, we must introduce some other amendments as well. We must eliminate the practice of sitting here half the night three or four days a week. There is no need for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): We must shorten the length of speeches and stop members from speaking for hours and hours on any particular bill or motion. There is no reason why members other than ministers or party leaders should speak more than 15 minutes on any topic. As far as I am concerned, 40-minute speeches on the part of other members of the House are unnecessary.

We must also place limits on the time available for the debate on any bill, and allow members to make arrangements whereby they can make regular and sensible visits to their constituencies. Also, we must assign to the minority parties in this House time limits proportional to their representation in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The purpose of the bill is very, very clear; it concerns the quorum in the House of Commons. The hon. member talks about changes to the procedures of the House. This is not included in the bill today. The bill clearly concerns the quorum in the House of Commons. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne).

● (1650)

[English]

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I thought I was trying to explain why I could not support the bill, but I shall not argue with your decision.

An hon. Member: Take your punishment.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): A little punishment would not hurt you. We got it on Bill C-69 which the NDP held up for a week, and the hon. member who orchestrated it all was not even here for the vote.

As to the quorum which has been suggested, would it be required that each party should provide members of that quorum in proportion to its strength in the House, or would that responsibility be foisted mainly on members who sit on the government side, placing more work and more pressure on us in addition to our other duties in committees and elsewhere?

Will it mean, also, that in increasing the quorum in the House we should also increase the number of members required to stand up to demand a recorded vote so that the NDP, for instance, could not on any given day chain five of their members to the Chamber and then pop up and down every whip-stitch to require recorded votes in the House?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he, along with that, say that when someone says no to a request to move a motion under Standing Order 43 he should stand up?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Sure. I would be most happy to stand up.

I intend to end my speech, now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With all those notes?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): What is being put forward here today is not reform, it is a posture, and it is an excellent example of the waste of the time of the House to which I have been referring.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, I would like to say just a few words about Bill C-257. First, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for presenting this bill.

No, I do not congratulate him directly because of the bill, but I am glad that he has given us the opportunity in the House to say something about the business of the House because we often hear things about attendance in the House which are not justified. The mover of the bill uses a comparison to ask for a quorum of 50. He compares the present situation with a past period, when there was an Upper and a Lower Canada. To be logical in his comparison, he should also compare the number of committees now and at that time. There may be twice as many members now, but there are now three times as many commitees. Indeed, 26 committees sit at the same time as the House. I heard someone say: We shall force representatives of all parties to take part in the quorum in the House. I was wondering how a party like ours could meet this requirement when seven, eight or nine committees sit on the same day. Madam Speaker, this comparison is impossible to make. It is simply illogical.

Regulations concerning the business of the House have now changed, and if we require the same quorum as in the past, it is because a greater number of members must work outside the House. I am glad to have this opportunity to reply to the people, since this will be read by the public. If we truly want to require a quorum when the House is fully capable of sitting, the quorum should also be required between two and three o'clock during the question period. I believe that this is the quorum that we could require, increase, double or triple. Apart from that, apart from the question period, as was said earlier, hon. members leave and the House becomes empty. How many times will we hear this? What the people do not know is that the House becomes empty because two thirds of the members have to sit on their committee and work there the rest of the afternoon and often in the evening. If we want to come back to quorum of 50, we shall have to disband committees, to stop working in committee and do all the work in the House. Then it would be logical. But if we continue working in committee, I believe that it is illogical to require a quorum in the House. I do not have the time to speak about our work in general, others have done so in my place, but I still wish to congratulate the hon. member for giving another opportunity to the population to obtain some information. Those who read Hansard will learn something about the business of the House.

[English]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, there are only a couple of minutes left, but I should like nevertheless to make some observations.

It is significant that the proposer of this bill should come from the one party which, from my nine years' experience in the House, has drawn attention to the lack of a quorum. A little game is played frequently. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) is particularly expert at it. He looks around the House. If he thinks there are not enough people here he persuades his colleagues to go behind the curtain. He alone of that party is in the House, and there is a quorum called. It is a nice little game. The last time it was played was in 1974 when the question of the salaries of members was raised.

The hon. member who raises this point today talks in a bland way about the need to improve parliament although he knows himself that if this bill were accepted, with its one change, it would be totally unworkable and would make this place look ridiculous. He knows himself, by his own admission, that a number of other changes would have to go with it. He suggested, for example, not adjourning the House when a quorum fails. Why? I suggest something else should go with it. When a quorum fails Mr. Speaker should look at any party which has fewer than ten of its members in the House and not recognize any of them for the next week in question period. Maybe that would have an interesting effect.

What should we do with regard to opposition days, Madam Speaker? I suggest to my colleagues that there is no reason why they should make up the quorum when the opposition makes thundering charges against the government, and a few moments later there is nobody from the NDP party sitting in the House while it is considering their opposition motion. I think the rest of us should not be faced with the obligation of the quorum at all. If those who want to present a charge against the government are not sufficiently interested to make up the quorum themselves I see no reason why we on this side should make it for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: There are many games we can play, Madam Speaker, if we choose to do it, if we choose to be irresponsible, if we choose to be like the colleague of the hon. member who moved this bill today, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). This, as we all recognize, does not bring credit on parliament. This one bill, with its single proposal, would be unworkable and would bring discredit on this House. It would have to be part of a package, a package which I would be prepared to support, but not one single item.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. The hour set aside for private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF RAIL PASSENGER POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the commitment by the former minister of transport to allow the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications the full opportunity of examining transportation policy in Canada as a total concept, and in view of the statement by the present minister of his intention to continue this full investigation, and in view of the desirability of attaining a reasonable and co-ordinated transportation policy to extricate the country from the present mess, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to withhold implementation of rail passenger policy until the government announces a full and co-ordinate policy for transportation rather than piecemeal announcements respecting individual modes of transportation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House before the motion can be put. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION MINISTER ATTEND BONSPIEL IN RED DEER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to introduce a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of a January 27 announcement by a Liberal party spokesman that the Minister of Agriculture will officially open the Alberta Liberal Party's annual convention in Red Deer on February 13, and that the minister might attend the farmers' bonspiel in Red Deer just prior to opening the convention, and in view of the fact that the farmers' bonspiel takes place this week and the convention not until next week, proving once more that the Liberals are not only off the rail but out of date, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That this House advise the Minister of Agriculture to attend the bonspiel, a more important gathering, where he would be exposed to a higher degree of intelligence and, hopefully, enlightenment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER DISCONTINUE USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT FOR PERSONAL PLEASURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

● (1410)

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion arising from information disclosed several days ago in answer to my order paper question numbered 3,610 which provides a further illustration of the government not practising the restraint it preaches to the Canadian people. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt):

In view of the recent disclosure that the Prime Minister spent $10,185 of public funds to transport himself, two members of his own family and his sister and two members of her family to the Grey Cup game, the House deplores the continued misuse of government aircraft by the Prime Minister for pleasure or political transportation for himself, his friends and his relatives and demands, in keeping with the Prime Minister's request to the Canadian people to exercise restraint and cut expenditures, that this sponging rip-off practice cease forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FISHERIES

PROPOSED DELAY IN RESTRICTIONS ON LOBSTER FISHING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, involving the continuing unrest and dissatisfaction by the fishermen of Nova Scotia with the methods used in implementing restrictions on lobster fishing. I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That the Minister of State (Fisheries) adopt a course of action urged by many knowledgeable people in the industry in Nova Scotia, and suggested as well by the Nova Scotia Minister of Fisheries, and delay or defer any restrictions on lobster fishing until more input is received from the fishermen themselves, monies are made available for legal counsel for those in the industry who feel wrongly classified as part-time fishermen and thirdly, the bureaucrats who conceived this program are made to realize it is not a problem involving lobsters but an industry involving people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the matter cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBLE MEASURES TO AVERT STRIKE OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—ROLE OF ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before I put my question may I express the hope that while the Prime Minister might think out loud I hope the government whip does not start thinking out loud.

My question is for the Minister of Labour and is in connection with the expected breakdown of negotiations for a new collective agreement between the railways and significant railway unions. Can the Minister of Labour indicate to the House whether he proposes to take any measure to head off a possible railway strike?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the Leader of the Opposition will be aware that under the Act I am required within 15 days of receiving notice of a breakdown from the union, which I officially received last Thursday, to appoint a commissioner to inject himself in an endeavour to mediate a settlement. I am considering that course of action today, tomorrow and the next few days.

[Mr. MacKay.]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, what would be the parameters within which such a mediator would work with regard to the increase in wages. Have the parameters been determined by the Anti-Inflation Board or will such a commissioner work in the dark as to what would be acceptable to the Anti-Inflation Board?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I should make it quite clear that I am talking here about a single man commissioner as opposed to another possibility that of the appointment of a board of conciliation. But generally speaking, I would suppose that if any mediator were successful in bringing the parties together and in arriving at a collective agreement, which I would hope be the case here, that collective agreement might be subject to interpretation by the Anti-Inflation Board just like all other collective agreements which fall under the policy.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, does it seem sensible to the minister that he would ask for the commissioner or mediator to take on a task without precise terms of reference, without the mediator knowing what the terms of reference really are and possibly bringing the parties together on a basis that is quite unacceptable to the Anti-Inflation Board? Would it not seem to the minister to make far more sense to get the Anti-Inflation Board to lay down the parameters in advance rather than take the company through a fruitless and possibly quite disastrous exercise?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that the proper procedure under the legislation and the regulations backing up that legislation is that either one of the parties or both parties can approach, if they wish, the Anti-Inflation Board for advice on a proposed or mutual agreement, and it is possible that one of the parties might do that following which they would arrive at some type of agreement.

POSSIBLE STRIKE OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—SUGGESTION MINISTER ASCERTAIN WAGE INCREASE PERMITTED BY ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Since the minister has the responsibility of trying to head off any breakdown in rail services in the country, and since the present negotiations are now very substantially circumscribed by the guidelines under which we have to function in this country, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether, in the interest of trying to prevent a breakdown in the rail service in this country, it would not be in the public interest for the minister to meet with the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board prior to the appointment of a commissioner to find out just exactly what maximum settlement would be permitted under the present guidelines since the current offer of 9.2 per cent, which is within the guidelines, is not acceptable to the unions?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I think the hon. member might agree that there are different ways for a government or a minister to express themselves in a dispute in terms of what procedure to follow. I do not think that at this stage it would be the appropriate thing to do.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR LIST OF SITES IN WHICH NUCLEAR WASTE DEPOSITED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last week I asked the Minister of the Environment if he would provide the House with a list of sites, other than Port Hope, where nuclear waste is deposited and also if his department had undertaken investigations of the problems that might have occurred there following what has transpired in Port Hope. The minister, in a letter written to me in reply, said that his department had not done that but that the "lead responsibility" belonged to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. So I should like to ask that minister now if his department has investigated the other sites where there are such waste deposits and if he is prepared to table in the House a list of such sites.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall the precise wording of the question. Of course, the Atomic Energy Control Board is very active in the whole area of monitoring nuclear waste, including the mining processes which start the cycle in Elliot Lake. They have been working very closely with the Ontario ministry of health. I will be pleased to answer any particular questions on that subject if the hon. member has any.

Mr. Broadbent: The specific question I am putting to the minister is whether he would provide the House with a list of the sites where deposits, such as those in Port Hope, exist and, secondly, could he tell us whether, following what has transpired at Port Hope, these other sites have been investigated? To add a specific question I should like to ask the minister if the situation at Port Granby has been investigated recently following the incidents some months ago of several cows having died as a result of coming in contact with a pond in the area that is alleged to have been contaminated by nuclear waste.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I understand the precise question. I will be very pleased to provide a list of the sites under investigation or under surveillance by the Atomic Energy Control Board.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR RADIOACTIVE CONTAMINATION OF HOMES IN PORT HOPE

● (1420)

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Since it is reported that somewhere between 15 and 70 homes have been affected by radioactive contamination in the Port Hope area, does the federal government or its Crown agency, in this case Eldorado Nuclear, intend to assume financial responsibility for this damage to these homes, and if so, to what extent?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I refer back to my last answer. If the hon. member understood that to mean that I would give him a precise list of all the homes so affected, I want to clarify that. I understood his question to mean various areas of the province or of Canada, and in that case I will do that.

As to the question of who will assume the financial responsibility for the clean up, this is not clear at the present moment. However, I have made it very clear that Eldorado Nuclear has been given the green light to proceed with the clean up. The most important thing from my point of view is to accelerate the investigation and to accelerate clean up where there is any radioactivity in Port Hope. We will argue about whose responsibility it is at a later date.

TRANSPORT

BODY RESPONSIBLE FOR HEARINGS ON RAIL PASSENGER POLICY

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Last week, in his statement dealing with the reform of transports, the minister said to the House that the inquiries would be held in all areas concerned. Can he tell us whether those inquiries will be conducted under the aegis of his department, which is answerable to Parliament, or by the Canadian Transport Commission only?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the intention is that the Canadian Transport Commission would hold hearings throughout the country.

ALLEGATION TRANSCANADA PIPELINE UNSAFE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of allegations that portions of the TransCanada pipeline are unsafe, is the minister in a position to reassure the Canadian public with respect to the safety of the line?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with the National Energy Board. The Board tells me that it has investigated all the evidence which has been placed before it. Mr. Arnesen, who made some allegations I believe last night, has been repeatedly requested to submit any evidence he has to show that the welds are not safe. So far as the National Energy Board knows, it has not received that radiographic evidence.

Mr. Balfour: Is the minister therefore prepared to give a reassurance through this House of Commons to the public of Canada that the line is in fact safe?

Second, is the minister prepared to order a formal inquiry by the National Energy Board into the allegations of unsafe wells in order that this reassurance may become meaningful?

Mr. Gillespie: The board has every reason to believe that the line is safe. Therefore it sees no reason for a public inquiry at this time.

Oral Questions

TRADE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEASURES TO OVERCOME TRADE DEFICIT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister knows very well, Statistics Canada reported on Friday that this country suffered a merchandise trade deficit of nearly $800 million during last year, the first such trade deficit in the past 15 years. Would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what basic plans he has for overcoming this very serious situation, and will he bear in mind that the solution requires a far more basic plan than simply leading a trade delegation to a group of exotic countries, which is the only plan his predecessor ever offered, and which simply did not pay off?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to do that, either on motions or in some other appropriate form. The hon. member neglected to say that the forecast for this year is that that figure will rise and will be at least modestly above the line in terms of a surplus. However, certainly I will be glad to discuss with the hon. member, and all others who are interested, what our strategies are, and I think they will be impressed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSAL TO LEASE LEOPARD TANKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION—ALLEGED OVERPRICING OF TANKS BY SENIOR OFFICIALS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the forthcoming trials between the German Leopard II tanks and the American XM-1, the outcome of which could determine the standard main battle tank for NATO for the next 20 years, will the minister and the government now consider the opposition suggestion that Canada consider leasing Leopard I's until the winner of the U.S.-German competition is determined?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that is one of the alternatives that we have considered, but we are at this time considering the two main options which are to refit the Centurians or to purchase the Leopard I.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, the minister, the deputy minister and the chief of the defence staff have priced the Leopard I at anywhere between $1.4 million and $1.8 million. The Economist says the competition winner will be in the "just over $500,000" class. Does the minister think it wise to have these senior officials wandering about the international arms market with their pockets stuffed with Canadian dollars looking for tanks and apparently ready to pay up to 200 per cent over the going price?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I think we will negotiate the price, as I indicated, between the two options—the cost of refit compared to the cost of purchase. That is partly why we are taking that position, so that we will get the best possible buy.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED USE OF GANDER BY CUBAN AIRCRAFT CONTAINING MILITARY PERSONNEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Can he assure the House that the Cuban aircraft which stopped over at Gander for refuelling recently were not en route to eastern Europe to collect arms and munitions for delivery to Cuban troops now taking part in the fighting in Angola?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no evidence to suggest that they were en route to eastern Europe.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question. Is the minister saying that he is not interested in the reasons for or concern about the unusual stopovers by Cuban aircraft at Gander?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. The question is not supported by the facts.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the role that Cuba admits playing in Angola, I wonder if the minister could assure us that Canada has taken steps to refuse further refuelling stops for Cuban aircraft at Gander at least until Cuba repatriates its troops from Angola? After all, Guyana and Barbados refused permission for stops; why not Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the information I have is that there were two unscheduled flights at Gander.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They must have been heavy.

Mr. MacEachen: I have no evidence as to the contents of those civilian aircraft but upon hearing about these occurrences, especially, as in one case the destination was Guinea Bissau and in the other case the designated point was Brazzaville—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The long way round.

Mr. MacEachen: —we advised the Cubans we expected them to observe the requirements under international civil regulations. I am satisfied that these will be observed.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESULTS OF SUPPLIERS' CONFERENCE ON NUCLEAR SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning nuclear inspection safeguards. In view of the statement made in West Germany at the weekend that there was an exchange of notes between Canada, the United States, the Soviet Union, Japan, Great Britain, France and West Germany on the suppliers' conference held recently in London, England, I wonder if the minister would undertake to make a statement at the earliest opportunity and make an opportunity for discussion in this House respecting the safeguards and the new inspection protocol and methods?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I noticed the press report, too. It is true that the suppliers have been meeting in an effort to upgrade the nuclear safeguards—in other words to remove the safeguards as an element of competition in this field. At the present time there is no agreement among the suppliers about revealing publicly the progress that has been made at the meeting. Just as soon as that obstacle has been cleared, and if it is, I shall be glad to report to the House on what has transpired.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, surely that would not prevent the minister indicating that there was an exchange of notes and what was contained in them.

RADIATION LEVELS IN PORT HOPE AREA—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION IN VIEW OF STUDIES IN 1951 AND 1953

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, may I put my supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence? Last week the minister undertook to release certain information respecting radiation levels in the Port Hope area. To date, I have not received anything from him and I have not seen anything made public. Why do we have to bring it up in the House again?

● (1430)

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have an unclassified report about the surveys undertaken by the armed forces back in 1951 and 1953 at Port Hope and would be glad to table that report.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

CHANGING NAME OF OTTAWA—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO NON-STATUTORY PROCEDURE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the right hon. member for Prince Albert asked me a question concerning a letter sent by the Clerk of the Privy Council to the deputy minister of justice with regard to the seat of government. I have now had an opportunity to look into this matter and wish to inform the House that the Clerk of the Privy Council did indeed write to the deputy minister of justice in the course of preparations for the reference to a joint parliamentary committee of matters relating to the national capital. The purpose of this letter was to determine the full implications of a recommendation made to the government by Mr. Douglas Fullerton in his report on a special study on the national capital.

Hon. members will recall that the first recommendation contained in this report, which was made public on November 1, 1974, was that the federal government—and I quote:

> Accept the National Capital Region as its 'seat of government' and as its capital.

The government had not decided at that time, did not decide later and has not decided now to accept this recommendation. It awaits the report of the joint parliamentary committee to which this House and the Senate referred the Fullerton report.

In these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, you will understand that it is difficult to believe that we had any hidden design to circumvent parliament or, indeed, the Canadian public. Parliament is being consulted and will continue to be consulted. May I just—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Let him answer the question.

Mr. Hees: You should do it on motions, Mitch.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are facing, in this exercise, the balance of the difficulty referred to many times by members of the House concerning a minister who has given an undertaking. The Chair has reacted by refusing supplementaries with respect to undertakings given by ministers who said they would investigate matters and come back with an answer at a later date. The complaint has often been that the minister has not come back at a later date. Frankly, we faced this difficulty originally when we did not introduce into the new process procedures to that effect. This is taking place now. Desirable though that may be, there are two shortcomings in this process.

First, I would not want the minister to be given the privilege of going on too long. Second, of course, someone ought to be permitted to ask supplementary questions on the matter; indeed, the original questioner is not now present in the House. I do not know whether someone would want to take on that responsibility for him, or whether the information ought simply to be on record, awaiting the presence in the House of the right hon. gentleman who put the question originally, with the understanding that there would be supplementaries at that time.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the minister giving a succinct response, but he has gone away beyond that. I rise again, not to suggest how Mr. Speaker should conduct the House, but to say that I hope this procedure will not constitute a precedent and that anybody who does this in future will be succinct, factual and not spend a long time answering.

Oral Questions

REQUEST FOR OPPORTUNITY TO MAKE SUBMISSIONS TO ADMINISTRATOR BEFORE DECISION ON IRVING PAPER CASE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister? As representatives of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act will be visiting Irving Pulp and Paper Ltd. in Saint John to obtain evidence on which the administrator shall arbitrarily hand down a decision on the Irving settlement with the Canadian Paperworkers Union, and as the conduct of this inquiry shall set a precedent for future appeals, what assurance can the minister give this House that both the union and the company will be given the opportunity to present submissions to the administrator or to his representatives before a final decision in taken?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what I can say by way of assurance other than that the administrator must, I would think, examine all the evidence and he would be only too anxious to get the facts before making a decision.

Mr. Symes: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the administrator is to act in a quasi judicial way, I would think the government would set out precise guidelines. Will the minister further assure the House that the evidence gathered by the administrator or his representatives during the conduct of an appeal will be made available to all involved parties and to the public, to ensure that the administrator's decision is the product of a fair and complete judicial appeals procedure?

Mr. Sharp: I have heard the suggestions of the hon. member. I am sure they will be looked at carefully by the administrator, who will be anxious, in discharging his duties, to discharge them in such a way as to retain full public confidence.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF CANADIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE ON GOVERNMENT SPENDING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In his temporary absence may I direct it to the Acting Prime Minister? It is in regard to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce report on government spending and inflation, of January 19, 1976. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House if the government is planning to take specific action on any proposals mentioned in the chamber's brief?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, obviously we study all suggestions very seriously. Still, some of those contained in that brief were, to my mind, very odd; even the Chamber of Commerce did not want to recognize them as its own policy. I trust that, in the future, when it makes suggestions, it will assume full responsibility for them.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

BILINGUALISM

NUMBER OF MAN-HOURS PER YEAR LOST IN LANGUAGE TRAINING

SUGGESTION PRE-TAX MONEY USED FOR POLITICAL FUND RAISING—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a brief question to the Minister of National Revenue? Some time ago I asked the minister whether his staff or other investigative personnel were checking on possible pre-tax money being used for political fund raising. I understood from the minister at that time that he would check and let the House know. Has he any information on whether such practices exist and, if they do, their nature and extent?

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT CUBAN AIRCRAFT CONTAINING MILITARY PERSONNEL FROM USING CANADIAN TERRITORY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the Cubans landed two unscheduled flights in Canada, where they were refuelled, while en route with Cuban troops for the fighting in Angola, will the minister inform the House what steps he has taken to inform Premier Castro of Canadian displeasure over this action and whether any steps have been taken to prevent the recurrence of this procedure, in order to prevent Canada from being directly embroiled in this conflict?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have made it plain to the Cuban authorities that we would reserve the right to inspect in future such unscheduled flights. We have also made it clear that we would not tolerate any such use of Canadian facilities for military purposes if, indeed, that was the case. At present, as I said, I have no evidence either to deny or confirm an allegation along those lines.

ALLEGATION CHAIRMAN TRAVELLED FIRST CLASS ON FLIGHT TO TORONTO

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the minister's statement on December 18 that first class travel for government officials will be eliminated, would the minister inquire about Air Canada's flight 351, from Ottawa to Toronto, of Thursday, January 23, a flight with sufficient room to enable stand-by passengers to be taken on in economy. Would the minister confirm that in first class, splendid isolation the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Review Board sat, with a couple of assistants?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of making an inquiry into all Air Canada flights. Instructions were given and I trust civil servants will follow them.

As for the preliminary question on the hours lost by those who are studying French, I doubt that anyone wastes time learning or studying French. The hon. leader of the opposition spent many hours studying French, which to my mind is all to his credit and also furthers the cause of Canadian unity.

● (1440)

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: After he has confirmed that information, will the President of the Treasury Board draw the chairman's attention to the speech he made in the House and suggest to the Chairman that Canadians find it difficult to co-operate with the chairman's call for restraint as he wings his way around Canada dropping leaflets, looking at the masses from a first-class window?

POSSIBLE CLOSING OF CFS BEAUSÉJOUR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. Even though my question is specific, I believe the minister can answer because it relates to a base in our province. In view of the apprehension currently being voiced by both military and civilian personnel at CFS Beauséjour and the detrimental effect the closing of CFS Beauséjour will have on the local area, will the minister indicate whether a decision on the future of that base has been made and what it is? If not, will the minister be making a statement in the House in the very near future with regard to the future of CFS Beauséjour?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there has been no decision concerning the radar station at Beauséjour. I do not expect to be making a statement about bases specifically within the next few weeks. However, we will be talking further about the rationalization of our infrastructure. Beauséjour, though, will not be involved at that time.

Mr. Landers: Is the minister prepared to undertake to sit down with his provincial counterparts in the province of New Brunswick and work out a solution to the perennial flooding problems in the Glen Falls area of Saint John, New Brunswick?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I know that meetings are now going on between officials in my department and officials of the government of New Brunswick. When will the government make a decision on DREE assistance for the New Brunswick's government program of control of the budworm infested forests of New Brunswick? I ask this question because of the long lead time required for such a program and the urgency of the situation.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): In response to the hon. member, the minister has recently met with officials of the New Brunswick government, including the premier. With regard to the particular question, it will be necessary for the minister to reply later as to the details of this forest industry program.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not very accurately stated my views on the subject which are ones that I have held as a general principle for a long time. Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I have no information on that. I will check and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Cossitt: If the minister looks into this matter and finds it is a fact, will the government be prepared to object or have the appropriate officials already considered objecting to this obvious breach of Canadian diplomatic rights, even though it has been reported that while it was going on, the Prime Minister was inside the music room cuddling up to Castro?

TRADE

RATE OF INTEREST ON LOAN TO SOUTH KOREA TO FINANCE PURCHASE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of the inability of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to tell the House on Friday the rate of interest the Republic of Korea will pay on the $300 million that the government of Canada is advancing by way of a loan to finance the nuclear power reactor.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is an unusual question to put to me. I am not the minister responsible for the Export Development Corporation. However, I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition is aware that the Export Development Corporation does not make it a practice to make public its interest rates.

Mr. Stanfield: With all respect, Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of what the officials of the Export Development Corporation may think. I ask the minister or Acting Prime Minister whether the government is refusing to give this House, and through this House the people of Canada, the rate of interest being charged on this $300 million so that the people of Canada can at least form some estimate about the extent to which this sale is being subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman understands that the Export Development Corporation is trying to assist Canadian businessmen in getting business. His seatmate one removed, who was in this business at one time—when he was the minister, will know that to give this kind of information is to place at a disadvantage certain sections of the Canadian business community. I hope the Leader of the Opposition is not suggesting we should breach that principle.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the spokesman for the government about a transaction between the government of Canada and a Crown corporation on one hand and another country on the other. I find it difficult to believe that the government of Canada will withhold this information. Is the Acting Prime Minister prepared to tell the Canadian people the terms upon which this sale was completed and the terms under which the people of Canada are advancing $300 million to sell a nuclear reactor?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would quite want to give a flat refusal.

Mr. Stanfield: I hope not.

Mr. Sharp: I hope my hon. friend will understand the implications of the question he is asking. I would point out that the Export Development Corporation has not lost any money. Therefore, it is not subsidizing Canadian business as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: This is not Canadian business, it is the government.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the announcement made by an official of the department some time ago that there would be a certification program for industries and for farmers who could purchase 2,000 gallons of gas once every month, I am wondering why provision was not made for the purchases to be in 500 gallon lots rather than 2,000 gallons since it is almost an impossibility for any agricultural producer to buy that much at one time?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, so far as quantum is concerned I suspect it was a judgment decision regarding the number of staff who would be made available. Also, we have to be a little careful here since we are moving into provincial jurisdiction in regard to coloured gasoline and the dyes used. So there were problems all round. We are trying to reach a compromise in order to be as helpful as we can and also to cut down as much as we can on red tape.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR STUDY TO RELOCATE NORWAY HOUSE

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. I should like to ask the minister about the extensive survey that was conducted over the past two years to relocate the settlement of Norway House. This has been a very secretive operation. Can the minister advise why the settlement of Norway House, which consists of 3,000 people, treaty Indians and non-treaty, has to be moved?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is a secret but I am not in a position to answer today. If the hon. member would wait until tomorrow I will give him an answer then.

ENERGY

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SIGNING AGREEMENT UNTIL ATLANTIC RICHFIELD SURRENDERS LEASES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with regard to the final signing of an agreement respecting Syncrude, which I understand has been delayed because of the difficulty in getting Atlantic Richfield to surrender certain leases which it holds. Have those difficulties been resolved and, if so, how; and will an agreement be signed in the near future?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, those difficulties with respect to the leases have not yet been resolved but I am hopeful that they may be resolved this week. Meetings are taking place this week in Calgary. But that is not the only difficulty; there are also some difficulties with respect to the rates of return charged by the public utilities and the pipeline. I hope that they can be sorted out within the spirit of the original salvage operation of approximately one year ago today.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Atlantic Richfield withdrew from the consortium, then these leases ought to belong to the consortium. I should like to ask the minister for an assurance that, unless the Alberta government acts to recover those leases and make them available to the new consortium, the minister will not sign the Syncrude lease.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the settlement of those leases is absolutely fundamental and crucial to any signing by the government.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF THIRD JUDGE TO NEWFOUNDLAND COURT OF APPEAL

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. It is now seven months since the amendments to the Judges Act were passed setting up an appeal court for the province of Newfoundland. That appeal court still only has two judges, thereby holding up the whole judicial appeal procedure. There are a number of very important cases outstanding awaiting the appointment of the third appeal judge by the minister. May I ask the minister whether he can give me some indication when he will be making this appointment? I hope he will not tell us "soon".

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I do have to tell the hon. member "soon". I am in consultation, in accordance with the procedure that has been established, with the Canadian Bar Association in order that we can make an appointment that is in line with previous appointments, namely people of outstanding merit at the bar. I hope that that process will be completed very soon.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

POSSIBILITY OF STUDIES OF ALTERNATIVES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I will address my question either to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the minister in charge of science and technology. My question relates to the energy reserves that Canada has in sight. I wonder whether the minister is preparing to give the House a statement on the research and development being carried out regarding various alternative fields of energy such as coal, tidal power, solar and wind?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be making in the near future a statement with respect to a number of the elements of an energy strategy for Canada. One of those important elements will be research and development with respect to energy conservation, existing and conventional forms, and, of course, the non-renewable fuel kinds referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister specifically say whether there has been any real research conducted into the utilization of coal for conversion into liquid petroleum?

Mr. Gillespie: Research is being undertaken at the present time on projects of this kind. I suppose from my point of view we could be spending a great deal more money than we are. I think we have to recognize though that there are only limited resources available to pursue a number of very important projects all at the same time.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REQUEST FOR COPY OF CONTRACT WITH LOCKHEED FOR LONG-RANGE PATROL AIRCRAFT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. In December the minister promised me that he would give me a copy of the contract when signed with Lockheed for the close to $1 billion worth of LRPA's. I have not yet received a copy of the contract or heard whether it has been signed. Can the minister inform the House whether or not the contract has been signed and, if so, when I can expect to receive a copy?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): The contract has not been signed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKinnon: Could the minister inform the House when he expects to sign the contract?

Mr. Goyer: There are some technical problems that we have to settle, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

BLUE TONGUE DISEASE—REASON FOR MINISTER'S ASSURANCE CANADA FREE OF THE DISEASE

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. It stems from a question asked on Friday by the hon. member for Medicine Hat regarding the livestock disease of blue tongue. The Minister of Agriculture assured the House that blue tongue was non-existent in Canada. How can the minister assure the House that we are free of blue tongue when we have been shipping cattle back and forth over the border for the last 100 years?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have been making checks of herds and we are continually making checks of herds. The only herds that we found any blue tongue in was some recent cattle imported from the United States and those herds have been destroyed, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Hurlburt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The only over-all tests that we have had in Canada were for tuberculosis and brucellosis and the only checks that have been made have been on a few shipments from the United States. Again I ask the minister how he can assure the House that we are free of blue tongue in Canada when we shipped cattle across the border 100 years ago and have been doing so ever since?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, all that the hon. member has to do is to examine some of the checks we have done in the Department of Agriculture under the director of the health of animals branch, which will show that we have proved to other nations that we are free of this disease. We are exporting semen, and the hon. member's province probably has the most concentrated form of checks in all of Canada blue tongue.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order respecting the business of the House for this week. Last Thursday, the government House leader said that this week we would be dealing with Bill C-58 and Bill C-81. On Friday, his parliamentary secretary said that today we would be dealing with Bill C-68. I presume the latter still holds, but in view of the indication that other bills would be taken this week, can the government House leader tell us what the order will be? While he is answering that question, would he also indicate to the House whether there will be a statement to the House tomorrow by the Prime Minister concerning his visits to Mexico, Cuba and Venezuela?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in regard to the second of those two questions, I hope to be able to see the Prime Minister shortly after his return and I will ask him whether it is his intention to make a statement on his very successful trip through Latin-America. As to the first question, it is the government's intention to call those bills this week, but not today. Even if we do get second reading of Bill C-68 we will not call either C-58 or C-81 today, but it is our intention to call them later. It may be, however, that when we do call these bills one of them will take the remainder of this week.

● (1500)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is hypothetical, but it is the only way to get the matter cleared. On the assumption that Bill C-68 is not concluded today, what will we be dealing with tomorrow?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have an opportunity of talking to the Prime Minister about this, since he will be at home tonight. Tentatively, I had intended to call Bill C-58 tomorrow. It would not be our intention to go on with Bill C-68 tomorrow in any event. However, we would call either Bill C-58 or Bill C-81, but I should like to talk to the Prime Minister before finally making that decision.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, as I understood the government House leader, he indicated that if we finish Bill C-68 tonight we would not start with Bill C-58 or Bill C-81. Does this mean that we are going to get another night off?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, no.

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I indicated earlier that if we got through Bill C-68 in the next few days, we would call Bill C-72. That would be my intention tonight if we conclude Bill C-68. I hope we can proceed expeditiously with all this important legislation. Therefore, I would ask the House to co-operate with the House leaders and with all other members in proceeding with the balance of the legislation of the present session.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege regarding a statement made earlier by the President of the Treasury Board. It seems strange to me that when members legitimately inquire into government spending, members opposite become very touchy. Let me point out that I did not refer to either the French or the English language training programs. My inquiry was in respect of the cost incurred by the taxpayer for language training in the federal civil service because of man-hours lost.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, and I do so reluctantly as, if my memory serves me correctly, it is the first time I have done so in respect of any matter relating to the question period. My point arises from the observation of the Leader of the Opposition regarding the Acting Prime Minister's undertaking to answer the question of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. The Leader of the Opposition noted that answers should be succinct and factual. I suggest the answer was just as succinct and as factual as the question, and it was far shorter. My point of order is this: is there one set of rules for the right hon. member for Prince Albert and another set of rules particularly for ministers of the Crown?

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member might take that question up with the right hon. member for Prince Albert. If he has some further inquiry—

An hon. Member: He is afraid.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I take it there is no need for me to go further into this matter in spite of its being raised again. I take it as being accepted by the Chair that such interventions as the one made by the government House leader today should be far shorter in future than the one he made today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thought I had given a rather general indication to that effect when I intervened. On the other hand, it is a very interesting subject for discussion raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence. I certainly would not want to deprive the House of the opportunity of discussing this matter more fully during the presence of the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning an answer given by the Minister of National Defence to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham in which the minister agreed to provide some information to be tabled in the House. I should like to ask whether there is unanimous agreement at this point to having that information made an appendix to today's Hansard, as there are a great many members of the House interested in the matter.

Mr. Speaker: It has already been agreed that the Minister of National Defence should be allowed to table the document to which he referred in his answer. However, the matter of having it included in Hansard was not taken up. Is it now the wish of the House that this be done?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That it be printed as an appendix.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that it be made an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For above mentioned document, see Appendix "A"]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding the business of the House today, with particular reference to the procedure of taking questions as notice which has become more prevalent in the last few weeks. Our question period was never designed to handle replies to questions asked on another day. I would ask Your Honour to give consideration to referring this matter to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization so that consideration could be given to having these answers presented during a later question period with or without the right of further limited questioning on the answer. Some consideration could be given to having such answers provided at another time slot during the question period, perhaps immediately following it.

[Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi).]

If questions are to be taken as notice, with replies provided at a later time, this will create a continuing problem during our question periods. I would, therefore, ask Your Honour to give some consideration to the referral of this matter to the appropriate committee so that almost immediate consideration can be given in order to eliminate the difficulty which is obviously going to become a continuous one.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. In the matter raised by the hon. member who just spoke there is a question worthy of consideration by the committee. There is another problem which arises during the question period. Many ministers quite honestly say in answer to questions that they do not have the specific information but will inform the hon. member. This reply usually takes the form of a letter from the minister's office to the hon. member. The questions are asked as public matters on the floor of the House and then become private matters between the ministry and the hon. member, with little opportunity for the answer to become public. I would think that in addition to the matter raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming this question might also be referred to the committee.

If some way were found of making these answers public, I think this would make the question period much more meaningful and, though I hesitate to say it, it might be a way of perhaps having ministers a little better informed in terms of answering questions which are asked about urgent public matters.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I can understand the concern of the Leader of the Opposition today when he suggests I should give the information I had promised in reply to a question by the right hon. member for Prince Albert when that hon. member is present. I might add another element of the problem which faces us for Your Honour's consideration. I was urged by the media to appear on all sorts of programs to give the reply I had promised the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I resisted that temptation because I thought it was only appropriate that I should give the answer here in the House of Commons. When I tried to give the answer there was objection because the right hon. member for Prince Albert was not present. So there is a real problem. I hope it is one to which we can address our minds.

● (1510)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The President of the Privy Council has made a most reasonable contribution in respect of any intervention by the Chair, because I really do not think it is for the Chair to refer proposals of a specific nature to the committee but it is, rather, for the House to do so. I know the committee is sitting actively and has undertaken to examine a number of procedures and in fact has had procedures under discussion by way of subcommittees. Certainly, this question about the problem of ministers who for one reason or another, in most cases—as was pointed out by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton—with all proper motivation have indicated that it is necessary to bring in information at a later date, has raised a number of problems, not the least of which was the one raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys on Friday last relating to the Chair's attitude toward supplementaries when that kind of answer is given.

It has always been the practice of the Chair to defer supplementaries until in fact the minister does come into the House. However, today's example showed us that we are really ill-equipped to receive such subsequent provision of information by the minister, and it would certainly be hoped that the procedure committee could examine at an early date whether there is an acceptable method for accommodating that kind of process which is certainly in the interest of exchange of information in the House.

JOB OPENINGS REPORTED BY EMPLOYERS AND FILLED BY CMCS (QUEBEC REGION)

Question No. 3,885—Mr. Howie:

1. MEDICAL CARE ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

The House resumed, from Friday, January 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-68, an act to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-68 seeks to amend the Medical Care Act so as to limit the federal government's contribution to any increase in the cost of medicare above specified limits. When taken in conjunction with the notices given the provinces last June announcing the federal government's intention to terminate the present five-year agreement with regard to hospital insurance, this legislation represents the beginning of the federal government's opting out of the solemn undertakings given the provinces when the hospital insurance and medicare program was introduced. The provincial governments were induced to participate in these worth-while programs on the assurance that Ottawa would pay approximately 50 per cent of the cost.

We are now witnessing a betrayal of these commitments and a determination to shift the burden to the provinces, with what I predict will be disastrous results. This is legislation which ought to be resisted by every member who wants to protect our present health care programs and who wants to promote better relations between the federal government and the provincial governments of this country.

Last Wednesday, the minister opened his statement with the declaration that "Canadians enjoy one of the best health systems in the world." It is true that we have made commendable progress in this field in the last 20 years, but we should not delude ourselves that our system is the best in the world. Many countries, such as the Scandinavian countries, the United Kingdom, Holland, New Zealand, West Germany and Israel have had comprehensive health insurance programs for a much longer period and which cover a much wider range of health services than we have. So far, our health programs have covered only hospital and medical services insofar as federal financing is concerned. Such additional services as home nursing, denticare, prosthetic appliances and pharmacare have been financed entirely by some of the provinces at a cost for all the provinces of $1.5 billion this fiscal year and an estimated cost of $1.9 billion in the coming fiscal year, plus a supplemental payment of another $800 million annually until 1980.

Those provinces which cannot afford these additional services have had to deny these benefits to their people because Ottawa has failed to expand the medical care program beyond the services provided for in 1968. Now the federal government wants to limit its financial contribution even in respect of the present limited programs. The fact is, of course, that the Liberal party always has been a reluctant proponent of comprehensive health insurance. Let me review briefly the history of health insurance in this country and the part the Liberal party has played in that program. In 1919 the Liberal convention held in Ottawa pledged itself to institute a comprehensive health insurance program. If my recollection is correct, I believe the resolution was moved by the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. No action was ever taken by successive Liberal governments to implement that commitment in the 36 years between 1921 and 1957. Liberal governments were in office for 31 of those 36 years, and they left office in 1957 without having implemented one iota of a comprehensive health insurance program.

At the end of the war in 1945 they brought down the excellent green book proposals which contained many fine proposals, among which was comprehensive health insurance. No action was taken. On January 1, 1947, the provincial government of Saskatchewan launched the first comprehensive hospital insurance program not only in Canada but in North America. But where was the Liberal government in Ottawa? It never contributed a dime to that hospital insurance program. As a matter of fact, the Liberal party in the province of Saskatchewan opposed the hospital insurance plan with all the power at its command. On July 1, 1948, the province of British Columbia also introduced hospital insurance and it, too, was left to carry on without any federal participation.

● (1520)

It is true that in 1956 the hon. Paul Martin, who was minister of health in the St. Laurent government, introduced a bill for hospital insurance, but it had a glaring loophole in it. That legislation said that the act would not come into effect unless a majority of the provinces in Canada, representing a majority of the population of Canada, consented. Of course, at that time it was perfectly apparent that both Ontario and Quebec had indicated their opposition to hospital insurance, and in consequence the Liberals left office in 1957 without having contributed in any way to hospital insurance in Saskatchewan or British Columbia and had made no move to assist any other province which might have wanted to set up a hospital insurance program.

The government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in 1958 removed the loophole which had been placed there by the St. Laurent administration, with the result that Saskatchewan, after financing a program alone for 11½ years, and British Columbia after financing their program alone for 10 years, were eligible for financial assistance from the federal government, and other provinces subsequently joined in carrying out the hospital insurance plan. On July 1, 1962, the government of Saskatchewan introduced the first comprehensive medicare program, and again that program was financed entirely out of provincial revenue. The government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert made no financial contribution, but I give him full credit for setting up the royal commission headed by Mr. Justice Emmet Hall who brought down a report in 1964 which, in my opinion, is probably the finest report on comprehensive health insurance that has been written in the English language.

From 1965 to 1968 we had in this country a minority government, and it is noteworthy that the Liberal party is always much more sensitive to public opinion when they are a minority government than when they have a huge majority. In 1968—and I give them full credit for it—the Pearson government brought in a comprehensive medicare program. The man who piloted that legislation through the House as minister of health was the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen). I am sure he must be very proud of what he did. I would certainly like to hear him take part in this debate and tell us what he thinks about the way in which that plan is now being eroded.

When the federal government brought in medicare and participated in the sharing of costs, of course the province of Saskatchewan became eligible for financial assistance after having financed medicare entirely out of provincial revenue for six years. Of course, other provinces then began to join the plan until eventually all the provinces were covered. But those provinces joined the medicare plan reluctantly, not because they were unwilling to provide their people with medical services but because they knew, as anyone who had studied the problem knew, that the cost would escalate. There had been a great backlog of people who needed medicare and who required surgical care; consequently, the provinces knew that the costs would rise. But they were induced to enter this expensive new program on the solemn undertaking that the federal government would meet approximately 50 per cent of the total cost. They never dreamed that the day would come, as it has now, when the federal government would pull the rug from under their feet.

For a number of years now, the Liberal government has been seeking to reduce its responsibilities with respect to medicare. For instance, it is noteworthy that since 1968 they have not added one health service to that medicare program, although there is provision in the act for the government, by order in council, to include additional services and enter into agreements with the provinces for that purpose.

It is no secret that members of the cabinet were not enthusiastic at the time about the medicare program, and that ever since they have been seeking ways and means of transferring some of the burden to the provincial governments. For instance, at the federal-provincial health ministers conference in May, 1973, a new formula was suggested which would have limited federal contributions to the increase in the gross national product. Can you imagine anything more ridiculous than tying the federal government's contributions to a health program to the GNP? There is no possible relationship. Had that formula been accepted by the provincial governments, it would have meant that on the basis of 1975, when there was virtually no increase whatsoever in the GNP, the provincial governments would have received no increase in the federal government's contribution despite the fact that the costs in 1975 went up by 16 per cent.

I do not need to tell the House that in September of 1974 the provinces rejected this formula and stressed the need for alternative and lower cost programs which would reduce expenditures for higher-cost programs. At the federal-provincial health ministers conference held in January of 1975, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) promised more money for the provinces and agreed to arrange meetings to explore the possibly of reconciling the different points of view between the federal government and the provincial governments. That commitment to arrange discussions was sabotaged by the former minister of finance when he announced his budget last June, and it is very significant that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has consistently refused to convene another federal-provincial conference of health ministers. There was going to be one in the fall, then it was put off until December, then it was put off until January or February. January is gone, and I do not know whether or not it will be held in February.

It is quite apparent the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not want to meet the provinces because the budget of June 23 last was one in which the former minister of finance, unilaterally and arrogantly, made two decisions without any consultation whatsoever with the provincial governments. The first decision was that the federal government gave notice of the termination of the hospital insurance agreement. Last Wednesday, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that this termination notice was for the purpose of replacing the present agreement with another agreement. That statement will fool nobody. If the present 50 per cent sharing agreement is satisfactory, there is no need to replace it. The real purpose of giving notice of the termination of the hospital insurance agreement is so that the federal government can force the provinces to accept limits upon the financial contributions of the federal government. This is a form of blackmail which will do nothing more nor less than injure future federal-provincial co-operation.

● (1530)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The second decision which was made and announced through the budget of last June was that the federal government was going to limit its contribution to any increase in costs of medicare to 13 per cent in the fiscal year 1976-77, to 10.5 per cent in the year 1977-78, and to 8.5 per cent in the fiscal years which follow. That is what the bill we are debating prescribes. The other day the minister said that it could go up to 14.5 per cent in 1976-77, to 12 per cent in 1977-78, and to 10 per cent thereafter, but that is assuming a population increase of 1.5 per cent. In view of the fact that part of the formula is based on per capita per province, of course those figures represent a maximum possibility and not a guarantee to the provinces. It is far more likely that the provinces will be held down to the 13 per cent, 10.5 per cent and 8.5 per cent, with some slight adjustments.

In opening the debate on this bill, the minister said that when the bill goes to the committee of the House he intends to introduce three amendments. The first amendment he will introduce will be to remove the arbitrary ceiling for the years after 1977-78. The press and media reports have mistaken the effect of this proposed amendment. The amendment does not mean there will be no ceilings after those two years. It means that the legislation will give the federal government, and I quote the minister's words——authority to set ceilings for subsequent years, in accordance with an appropriate formula to be developed in the meantime, after consulting with the provincial governments.

In other words, after 1977-78 it could be less than 8.5 per cent. It could be anything the federal government chooses to set by order in council. When the minister says "after consultation with the provinces", that is a joke. This is consultation with a club, because the minister and the federal government have the power to set whatever limit they want on their participation and the provinces will have no option but to make petitions and to utter pleas. But the federal government will make the final decision. In other words, what the minister is asking is that this parliament give the federal government the authority to impose any formula it chooses. The government is asking for a blank cheque to reduce its financial commitments, irrespective of the adverse effects on the provincial governments and the sick, and irrespective of the escalating costs of health services at that particular time.

In my opinion, the second amendment proposed by the minister makes good sense. It suggests that where new services are introduced under medicare, the federal government's share, on a national per capita basis, should be dealt with separately and not lumped with the per cepita cost figures of all medical services. That still does not mean that the federal government will add any new services to the present program. As a matter of fact, it has not added any in the last seven years, and now that it is on this austerity kick based on fighting inflation I think it is fairly safe to assume that this government is not going to add any new health services to the present medicare program.

The third amendment which the minister says he intends to move merely seeks to extend from one year to three years the period during which the federal government will pay 50 per cent of the cost of a newly-insured program. In other words, the government intends to do, with respect to new health services, what it is already trying to accomplish with respect to present health services, namely, to get the provinces into a program on a 50-50 basis and then impose limits on the contributions of the federal government when costs are most likely to rise.

I ask, would any hon. members of this House, if they were provincial premiers, be prepared to launch denticare, pharmacare or home nursing programs, knowing that after three years the contribution from Ottawa would depend on the whim of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the whim of the Minister of Finance. When one looks at their record, it is predictable that most of the provinces will be inclined to take the position of "once bitten, twice shy."

What reasons has the minister given for introducing this legislation imposing limits on any increase in the contribution of the federal government? The minister admits that although costs have risen for health services, as has the cost of everything else that we buy; nevertheless, our total health expenditures, as a percentage of our gross national product, have actually declined. The only reason given for this legislation was given by the minister as reported at page 1408 of Hansard. He said:

The ceilings will provide an incentive to exercise appropriate cost control over medicare costs, for example, by encouraging prudent use by both providers and recipients of services, and by introducing lower cost alternatives to high cost services, wherever feasible.

I draw the attention of the House to the fact that there is no guarantee the federal government will share in the cost of any lower-cost services in order to reduce the cost of higher-cost services. It always seems strange to me that the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) have never understood that the provinces are more anxious to keep down the cost of hospital insurance and medical care than the federal government is, because the provincial governments have to be more anxious to keep down costs than the federal government does. Every provincial government has had to wrestle with the problem of rising health costs ever since this program was implemented, because for them the cost of health services, in the main, represents a larger percentage of their budget than it does of the budget of the federal government.

The real reason for the escalating costs of health care is not that the provinces have been imprudent and wasteful. The real reason for the escalating cost of health care is the failure to recognize that removing the financial burden from the patient was only the first phase in implementing a medicare program.

● (1540)

Those of us who had anything to do with introducing medicare always told the public and those who supplied the health services that phase II must inevitably follow phase I if we were going to control health care costs. This second phase of a properly constituted health insurance program is to alter the delivery system. The federal government has done absolutely nothing about this. Hospital costs could be reduced by assisting the provinces to institute extended care units for the chronically ill who are occupying too large a percentage of beds in acute care and active treatment hospitals. Home nursing programs would enable many patients to be cared for at home. Rehabilitation centres would provide physiotherapy and psychotherapy for many people on an out-patient basis if properly organized.

In the same way, medical costs could be reduced if financial inducements were available for the establishment of community health clinics which place the emphasis on preventive medicine. Denticare programs, particularly for children, would pay dividends in the years ahead. Pharmacare would help reduce the cost of drugs and enable many people to cope with minor ailments which, if neglected, could result in heavy medical expenditures.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare and his department have never effectively faced up to providing lower cost alternatives or encouraging the practice of preventive medicine as insured services under the medicare program. Some provinces have tackled these problems but have received no federal assistance. The result is that provincial governments in total, as I said previously, are spending in this fiscal year $1.5 billion. For the next fiscal year the estimate is $1.9 billion, plus $800 million additional per year up to 1980. That is a tremendous burden for provincial governments to carry. After more than four years in his present office, this minister has been derelict in his duty and now wants to blame the provinces for his negligence.

Of course we want to control expenditures. Of course we cannot allow health care costs to run away, as they can easily, but I suggest the minister is starting at the wrong end of the spectrum. If the minister wants to curtail costs, he should work with the provinces in providing lower-cost service to replace the high-cost services which are resulting in these escalating costs all across Canada. Mr. Speaker, I think we have to ask ourselves one very serious question. If this legislation becomes law—and I hope it will not—and if it saves the federal government some money because it reduces the contribution the federal government will make to medicare, who is going to pay the costs of this iniquitous piece of legislation?

If, in the next few years, the cost of providing medical services in this country rises more rapidly than the limits contained in the bill now before us, the provinces will have very serious budgetary problems. They will find that instead of getting 50 per cent of their costs from the federal government, they may be paying a larger share than the 50 per cent they have been paying up until now.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

What options will be open to the provincial governments in that situation? They have several options. The first is that they can raise provincial taxes to make up for the loss of any revenue from the federal government. Their tax field has limits, however. They can raise the sales tax, for instance, but in many provinces the sales tax is now so high that any increase would be counterproductive. They could put a tax on land, but if they did that they would be interfering with almost the only source of revenue that the municipalities have. They could impose a per capita medicare tax and levy upon every family a certain amount of money in order to provide health services for members of the family. Surely that is a regressive tax. It has no relation whatsoever to ability to pay. We do not want to go back to a per capita tax in this country.

What other options do the provincial governments have? As has been suggested in some quarters, they could impose a deterrent fee; they could require that every person going to see the doctor would pay $5, and $10 in the case of a house call. They could provide that those who must undergo surgery pay the first $50 or $100. They could require each person to pay a certain amount for X-rays and laboratory tests. It is true that for those on middle and upper incomes this might not be a great burden, but for those on lower incomes and on fixed incomes, those with prolonged or protracted illnesses, it could be a disaster. Do we want to help the federal government save money by instituting what virtually will be a tax on the sick? Are the people who are to bear the burden of the federal government's austerity program to be those who are lying flat of their backs through illness or going into surgery?

What other alternatives do the provincial governments have? It should also be remembered that for the less affluent provinces there may be no alternative but to reduce the fees paid to medical practitioners. That could result in a migration of health personnel from the less affluent provinces to the more affluent provinces, with the result that those in the poorer provinces of Canada would have substandard medical care.

When I look back over the years to the Rowell-Sirois report—of which I think all Canadians were very proud; it was a watershed of federal-provincial relations in this country—the report said we must set as our first goal the day when every Canadian, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, no matter where they lived, no matter what their income, no matter what their situation, would be entitled to the same standard of health, education and social security as any other Canadian. That goal will not be reached if this legislation is passed, Mr. Speaker; on the contrary, we are taking a backward step. It may mean that some of the provinces, of necessity, will have to accept lower standards of medicare because of the legislation now before us.

This government is on an austerity kick; it is deciding to cut down on its expenditures, and with some of those reductions I have no quarrel. They decided to discontinue Information Canada: they are going to put a sign in the window, "Open by mistake". I have no quarrel with that, but what are the things they are cutting? They propose to eliminate some of the community programs carried on by the CYC. They have decided not to continue with the indexing of family allowances, and now they are to limit their contributions to medical care. This government seems to have adopted the well known law of the sea—women and children first.

● (1550)

I say, in conclusion, that this legislation ought to be defeated. Some of us will do all we can to defeat it, but we cannot defeat it by ourselves. I appeal to members on the government side of the House to oppose this legislation. If they cannot summon the courage to defeat it, they can at least ask for the legislation to be deferred.

Mr. Benjamin: Forever!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It should be deferred until the federal and provincial ministers of health meet to see if this problem can jointly be worked out. Possibly there is a compromise under which it can be worked out. I think the provinces might accept some limitation if the federal government were to say, "We are prepared to share with you the cost of all programs which provincial governments have financed entirely on their own," and if the federal government were prepared to guarantee the provinces that in the case of lower-cost programs which are introduced to help reduce higher-cost programs, the federal government was prepared to pay at the beginning of the fiscal year up to 50 per cent of the cost.

If the federal government is not prepared to do that, then I say this legislation ought to be resisted. Those of us who hold strong beliefs on this subject will do everything we can to delay it at least until the people of Canada become aware that the health program of this country is being sabotaged. I think that when the Canadian people become aware, there will be such an outcry that this heartless, iniquitous legislation will never be passed.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Bill C-68, an act to amend the Medical Care Act, I begin by restating a truth which this act recognizes but which has for long been dismissed by politicians and proponents of government health care. This truism was stated succinctly by Mr. Enoch Powell when he was minister of health in the Conservative government in England in the 1950s. He said that health care must always be rationed; if it is not rationed by the patient's pocket-book, it has to be rationed by the entrance into the health care system, namely, at the doctor's office or at the hospital door. In effect, this bill represents the first, timid beginnings of our recognition that the economy will not support unlimited health care programs.

Politicians often thought that the advent of federal-provincial programs for hospital and medical care suddenly extended the life expectancy of Canadians, or suddenly improved the health of Canadians and relieved overnight their terrible suffering from disease. This, I submit, is doubtful. The proponents of medical care felt that it would improve health so much that illness would vanish. Unfortunately, the opposite is true. The British felt that their health care system would improve health in this way. Some British health researchers thought that health care would so improve health that many hospitals would not need to be opened. Of course, if you improve a person's health in his younger years, he will live longer. Nevertheless, eventually, in the latter part of his life, he or she will suffer from some chronic illness and take up space in hospital or occupy a nursing care bed.

Prior to the introduction of the federal-provincial medical care system between 75 per cent and 80 per cent of our people were covered by private health care plans. Many of these plans were so good that when medicare came in some people opted to remain out, for their own personal benefit. Thus, there existed health plans for individuals under which they could obtain medical care. At present, much of our medical care is of lower quality than was available in pre-plan days. Hospital beds are not readily available now, whereas previously they always were available, even if one had to be admitted as a charity patient. But now there are long lists of patients waiting for admission. Often, by the time patients are admitted the need for admission has gone or the value of admission has declined. Indeed, the pressure to keep patients in hospitals, a pressure exerted on individual physicians, is so great that often, even though a physician would like to admit a patient who exhibits slight symptoms but is suspected of suffering from a serious illness, the physician does not do it because he is afraid the hospital will impose disciplinary action and reduce his hospital privileges.

Of course, one must always choose and judge: do you admit an elderly person, severely ill and in a terminal state, or do you fill the bed with a young person who needs an operation or whose illness might not be life-taking but for whom hospital treatment immediately will result in improved health in the years ahead? These facets of medical care and hospital function have never been properly assessed by politicians when setting up health care programs.

Perhaps it is difficult for one to criticize and be objective about "motherhood" issues such as taking care of the ill, and the health of the population. I say this because the study of health cannot be strictly defined. From the day we are born, until the day we die, we are never completely healthy nor completely ill. Always, in some measure, we are in some in between state. Governments and ministers of health like to reel off statistics dear to the hearts of bureaucrats. The minister did this in his speech which opened the debate on this bill. He suggested, for instance, that there is no upper limit to the insured services which people may receive. I suggest that is not correct. I mentioned a few limits just now. Also, hospital lists are so long that for practical purposes admission cannot be gained for the condition concerned. Sometimes payments for procedures are so low that some physicians may curtail certain procedures or lessen the amount to be done.

Hospital and medical care programs have been instrumental in introducing some interesting developments. For example, the control of medical care has been taken away from professionals and given to the new super group, hospital administrators and lay people involved in administering the act. Perhaps this is necessary, because someone must spend the money which governments allocate. But the result has been a curious change in general medical care, particularly within hospitals. Before the government passed the hospital program, most people working in a hospital were directly involved with the medical care of patients. After the hospital program was adopted, the number of people caring directly for patients did not increase greatly; on the other hand, hospitals are now alive with the many people codifying, supervising and cataloguing the daily work of the hospital. The reason, partly, is the attempt of Canadian hospitals to reach accreditation standard.

Hospital boards and administrators tend to downgrade the care of patients and to concentrate on the documentation necessary to have the hospital accredited. No criticism will be made of a hospital if patients expire on its doorstep, but the hospital could be severely reprimanded for not having its documentation up to standard. Perhaps hospital accreditation in Canada improved health care a little and documentation a lot, but it increased enormously the cost, and most of that cost went into non-patient services. It has been said that the programs are completely portable. Certainly, as far as physicians are concerned it is always difficult to get paid from the plans of provinces other than the one in which they are practising.

● (1600)

The minister has suggested that a measure of what has been achieved by these health programs is indicated by the maternal mortality and infant mortality rate. I would suggest that the programs have had very little effect on these indices. The drop in the birth rate, whereby a mother is having only two or three children, is the reason that statistics will always be better. Furthermore, transportation has played a considerable part in allowing individuals to seek better medical care. One of the interesting developments of present hospital and medical care plans is exclusion from the decision-making process of the bureaucratic system of hospital and medical administration. In the province of Manitoba, for instance, the minister of health has indicated that he alone will decide what an individual physician is worth, and he alone will decide the value of new procedures and changes that might occur from time to time in the fees schedule. At the hospital level it is difficult to have new drugs introduced or to have new instruments purchased. Preoccupied, as they are, with the day to day running of hospitals, it is understandable that administrators do not want to introduce new drugs, new techniques, and so on, some of which may not be very useful.

A few years ago a drug act was introduced. It was to reduce the cost of drugs. The cost has been reduced to some extent. What is notable is that newer drugs coming on the market in the United States, the United Kingdom and Europe are not being distributed in Canada. The drug act discourages the marketing of new drugs that would be useful in this country. Most drugs are formulated and researched abroad.

Mr. Speaker, it is a great tragedy that when the medical and hospital care programs were introduced, the form they assumed was cost-sharing. The federal government seemed reluctant to trust the provincial governments to bring forward a scheme to upgrade the many programs that were already in effect. This seemed to be in the mistaken belief that many provincial governments would not have spent the money wisely and would have used it on other ventures. The 50-50 cost-sharing proposal has meant the establishment of the most expensive form of medical care. A province that tried to be careful was penalized, and the citizens deprived, because the program was geared to the most expensive provincial medical plan. For example, the hospital that introduced a $1 or $2 deterrent fee, as many did, found that when working out the formula, because of the $2 the patient had paid, the federal government paid $1 less.

From the beginning these should not have been cost-shared programs; they should have been transfer payments, without strings, so that the provinces could have instituted and brought forward their own plans. There is nothing sacred about having a uniform plan across this country. Indeed, with our regionalism we obviously cannot have the same level of care in any two provinces. This new act by the government is obviously an attempt to return fiscal responsibility to the provincial governments. This, I think, is a good idea if satisfactory cost-sharing arrangements are worked out with each province. My opinion has been that the proposals given to the provinces were generally highly unacceptable and that until further encouragement is given to the provinces in the way of proposals, difficulties will remain.

The minister spoke of the number of physicians in Canada. I agree with him to a considerable extent that the number of physicians is adequate and in some cases more than adequate. Under the fee-for-service basis of practice where the medical plan pays, there is a tendency to manufacture patients. Studies carried out by the medical care groups seem to indicate that there are enough physicians, although there is widespread suggestion that they are poorly distributed. The distribution is perhaps not as bad as has been suggested. For instance, a neurosurgeon may need 200,000 people to provide him with enough patients to exercise his skill. Therefore, it would be hardly practical for him to set up in northern Manitoba or in northern Ontario. Transportation has made people able to take advantage of medical skills available far removed from their home. Indeed, if people are really ill or feel that they could have a serious problem, they often make a trip to a large centre where there are numbers of specialists available for their immediate problem. This is, on the whole, quite a good thing.

Canada has been accused of importing many thousands of trained personnel, especially medical, from the developing countries. Many of these come through the United Kingdom which, in order to fill up with cheap doctors the lower echelons of the hospital services in that country, admitted thousands of third world doctors. Many of the displaced United Kingdom doctors immigrated to Canada and, of course, to other parts of the world. More doctors stayed in Canada because remuneration increased due to our affluent society and the discouragement of the immigration of physicians to the United States because of the Viet Nam war.

My understanding is that opportunities and conditions in the United States are once again increasing. Nevertheless, with a population growth decelerating there would seem to be adequate numbers of physicians being trained in Canada for our needs. Medical colleges are full, and they will likely remain so until the university population drops to coincide with the birth rate. For medical colleges, this could well come in 1984, because by 1964 the number of births had dropped drastically. It is interesting to compare this with the fact that in 1956 the medical colleges in Canada were hardly half full because there were so few applicants. This coincides with the 1936 birth rate, the lowest of the depression.

Governments should study carefully the effect of immigration of physicians on the total health care program. There is little point in having immigrated physicians to excess. There is little to be gained by overservicing, but I admit it is very difficult to determine when there is adequate health care. It is difficult to foresee what would be totally best for health care. I believe that the one group on which forward progress in health care largely depends has been shunted aside to some extent and left out of the decision-making process—and that is the physicians. After all, the physician has had, and will probably continue to have, an important place in the health care delivery system. On his opinions rest, and will probably continue to rest, the over-all responsibility for much medical and hospital care. He usually initiates the patient into the system by examining him, prescribing drugs and admitting him to hospital. In this role, the present medical care system has probably not materially changed.

It is significant that the cost of physicians' services has not escalated as rapidly as in other parts of the health service. In fact, most increases have come about, so far as medical care is concerned, because of the relative increase in the numbers of physicians as compared to the general population. With medical care in place for the past seven years, some fees are now getting out of line and physicians at times are arranging their practices to seek the fee schedule that will best serve their needs. There is a tendency to reduce the number of procedures carried out and to increase the number of consultations. It is time physicians recognized that the medical care system is becoming rigid, detrimental to good medical care and, hence, to patients.

One suggestion I would like to make in this regard is that to a certain extent physicians should opt out of the medical care plan. This would increase the flexibility of the medical care plan and would chart new courses in health care. In my own province of Manitoba, the doctors who are members of the Manitoba Medical Association are in dispute with the government over the fee increase to which they should be entitled. Under the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines the minister of health says the increase should be no greater than $2,400, whereas the physicians are arguing that the average should be no more than $2,400.

I agree with what the minister of health in the province of Manitoba, Mr. Desjardins, has said, namely, that physicians should opt out of the medical care plan. Their patients would pay through the paying agencies the same rate of fees that the physicians had under the plan. In my opinion, this is one of the better ways of controlling fees and it also acts as a safety valve on the care of patients. In my opinion, approximately 25 per cent of the physicians should be outside the plan. If being outside the plan increases physicians' collection costs, then they will have to work for less, or charge more. If he can still keep his office filled and his income still reaches the desired level, it means there is a need for further physicians in the area and that people are willing to pay extra for extra service.

In addition, the physician is able to practise a much better brand of medicine. However, if too many physicians are outside the plan, in effect this means that the payments are too low. It is always easy, under a medical care plan, to keep patients coming into the office. At the moment I think one of the best ways to get an over-all reading of how good a medical care plan is for the population is to ascertain how many physicians are in fact practising outside the plan.

With regard to hospitals, I think the outlook for increasing and improving the standard of hospital care is somewhat bleak. I suggest there will be a steady reduction in the quality of care that is given in hospitals. More and more hospitals will become institutions for those who work in them, with patient care designed for and correlated to the needs of the hospital. Hospitals, by and large, are filled with large numbers of relatively low-paid people. It will be extremely difficult to apply rigid cost rationalization, both for political and practical reasons.

I should like to point out that in the province of Manitoba this year the cost of hospital care is to rise by something like 30 per cent. This is a significant increase and I think is an indication that we are dealing with relatively low wage groups that must receive an increase. It is too bad, as suggested by the previous speaker, that the government has not seen fit to have further consultations with the provinces on this problem.

I sympathize with the aim of the government; I think medical and hospital care must be returned to the provinces. They alone must be responsible for the programs and they must decide how much they have to spend. Obviously, health care must be rationed in some manner since there is not enough money to go around. After all, there can be no end to the good things one can do by way of hospital and medical care. The government's way of going about this has not been a useful exercise. I hope that the minister and the government will reconsider their position before they proceed with this action, in order to see whether something further can be worked out with their counterparts in provincial cabinets.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I am following one of my own colleagues. Surely some member on the government benches would want to defend this bill. Sadly, the bill is the result of a treasury decision, obviously not a decision of the government's health department. As my hon. friend, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), said, the provinces are not all the same. This is what members of parliament must keep repeating and repeating to the government benches. My own province of New Brunswick is only now, I regret to say, in the stage of making large capital expenditures on hospital facilities. We in New Brunswick have lagged well behind other provinces which now have enough hospital beds. We are now making large capital expenditures for extensive facilities which are supported by some community facilities.

Another point I want to make is that the suggestion of the minister that he will move an amendment so that after 1978 we swing free, so to speak, is really a preposterous suggestion, one that gives us no confidence at all. As my own leader said, much as we dislike the formula, we did have something to look at. Under the minister's proposal we will have nothing to look at except the record of this government, and I must say that does not fill us with very much confidence.

We are really fighting a lost battle today when it comes to a properly funded health service for this country. The minister—who has had, both in the ministry and in senior positions in the public service, a great deal or responsibility in the last few years—would be filled with alarm, I would think, presiding over the winding down of an essential element of the Pearson government's program. Those of us who have been here long enough heard the trumpets blow and witnessed the program start up. We stood to attention, and bulletins were issued. Then a little while later the trumpets are muted, the program is being wound down, and co-operative federalism comes to a jarring halt. I, for one, regret this.

● (1620)

I am opposed to the bill. The bill revokes, unilaterally, co-operative federalism. It buries the concept of sharing and it inters the high hopes of the Pearson years. As a matter of fact, I had to sort of scrape away some of the cobwebs to recall that high-sounding phrase "co-operative federalism". Jets were flying from here to Quebec City and back again, with seatbelts fastened, as well they might have been in view of the doubt that the government of the day could survive. It survived because it pulled out a good slogan and, to the government's credit, a major part of that concept was the Medical Care. The government of that day is entitled to some credit for that; I do not dispute that fact.

I do get alarmed about slogans, that were once so much a part of the government's boast, when they are suddenly put away again because they do not fulfil the present concept of need. It is obviously a treasury need and not a health need, and I regret this. I have said this before; I have never understood why words or concepts like "federalism" need any adjective like "co-operative". After all, federalism is a co-operative concept. However, there are people in the language game who like to add things. We have had an addition to the word "democracy" that intrigues me. We were to have a participatory democracy; although that, too, is being retired. Participatory democracy is now a couple of years old. We find that the word is not a bad one and does not need embellishment. When we embellish words like "federalism" with unnecessary baggage, the words themselves cannot keep up with the concepts that government writers or publicity men usually try to give them. Federalism, after all, is shared power and shared responsibility, and the bill itself is a denigration of the concept of sharing.

Obviously the medicare plan should be rethought in light of today's conditions. This does not mean Canada can walk away from medicare or that Canada can freeze itself into a fixed position unilaterally. It grieves me to see a government which touts itself as being one of co-operation and one of justice withdrawing from this plan in the way it is doing. Obviously, too, individual Canadians have an obligation—many speakers have made this point—in the way we fasten our seatbelts. May I say, parenthetically, that I regret the fact that in this very building, at this moment, people are being asked to sign a petition against the wearing of seatbelts in this province. I think this is not in the best tradition of co-operation. The government of this province, for good or ill, has a good deal of courage in this issue and I regret that these halls are being used to prepare petitions among the employees of this place against the wearing of seatbelts.

When I was approached, I said I thought it was wrong. I said I had a very personal experience in my own family which demonstrated to me the efficacy of seatbelts. I hope that inquiries can be undertaken and that this petition can be stopped. I am a believer in freedom, but the way to protest the seatbelt legislation is not by scurrying up and down the halls of this building. The wearing of seatbelts is only part of the whole subject. We have a great deal of evidence about the dangers of smoking. I am an offender, being one of the most notorious cadgers of cigarettes since the former leader of the NDP retired. He and I had a contest to see who could cadge the greater number of cigarettes, but I think the Secretary of State comes in a good second in this regard. In any event, we know that smoking is injurious and adds to the costs that are troubling governments both provincial and federal.

An hon. Member: If you don't want to do it, quit.

Miss Bégin: We don't want to lose you; we want to keep you.

Mr. Fairweather: Thank you very much. I am touched; I am overwhelmed. I should like to touch for a moment or two on a couple of aspects of the program. First of all, the reaction by the provinces is more than understandable. The provinces were looking for a trumpet from on high, and I suppose trumpets from this government are usually unilateral. The provinces reacted exactly as we would have expected, in a federal system, to any decision which was taken unilaterally. From an over-all perspective, I would like to suggest it is time for federal government initiative in health costs reforms. No responsible member of parliament could ever allow free-wheeling, and any one of us who has a slight knowledge of the provinces' efforts to control health costs know that they are serious in undertaking them. It is not the same thing to have a bill which makes a unilateral decision, dumping the problem onto provinces without offering any compensation or national leadership and direction. Really, what the federal government is doing is walking away from the problem. Furthermore, Bill C-68 deals solely with medical services, an area which has not demonstrated unwieldy cost escalation.

Let me make some suggestions in respect of the official opposition. First, a method of avoiding the arbitrary and rigid nature of the ceilings would be to remove the percentage delimiters from the statutes and implant them, instead, in regulations. We have the statutory instruments committee which could decide whether the regulations were fair, just, and so on. This approach would allow a year-by-year examination and review of the guidelines as set down in the regulations, thereby guaranteeing close federal government monitoring and at the same time meeting conditions necessary to ensure desirable levels of health standards. Second, we should establish a tripartite committee to investigate the fiscal aspects of medical financing. Such a committee could consist of provincial representatives, members of the medical profession and federal officials, and could play an integral role in establishing the very guidelines about which I have spoken.

In the area of general health care and hospital care, the federal government should suggest specific proposals to the provinces in order to make the system more cost-effective. Considering that the provinces have a built-in incentive in achieving this end—after all, they are responsible for 50 per cent of the costs—they would undoubtedly be receptive to such an overture. Such an approach could consider the standards of hospital admission, the length of bed occupancy in hospitals, the use of X-ray and laboratory equipment in local clinics and hospitals, and a review of the comprehensive nature of medical and hospital care.

● (1630)

Next, taking the typology provided in "A New Perspective", we should escalate a government program designed to improve lifestyle. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), on New Year's Eve spoke about a new economic order and said that we must change our habits. He, himself, in the area of personal care, has been a leader. We must escalate a government program designed to improve lifestyle, environment and human biology, as well as some of the points I made earlier about our way of living which might in themselves result in a decline in medical costs. The document to which I referred, "A New Perspective", suggests that over 60 per cent of all accidents and deaths, for example, in respect of persons between the age of 17 and 35 are related to the automobile.

I should like to make the following suggestions: First, recognizing the importance of financial control of the delivery of health services, I propose a new financial partnership relationship with the provinces in which the responsibility to manage and effectively control these costs would be turned over to the provinces, where it belongs. These costs were alluded to by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, chaired by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) and Senator Mogat which, incidentally, had some suggestions to make about the national capital commission which seem to have been overlooked by the gallery and other people who think the end of western civilization is about to occur.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I have just fastened my seatbelt. At the same time, the provinces should be asked to allow constructive co-ordinated entry by the Government of Canada into areas of major concern on national health problems. It is really not too much to ask that social aspects of our federalism be very much in the provincial field. I have an idea this really is what Quebec has hoped for and what many other provinces have wanted. One's perception in respect of national goals really, in a curious way, depends on whether one is in or out of office. I notice that in the United States the Democrats are now decentralizers and are busy saying that most things are done better by the states. I wonder what Franklin Delano Roosevelt would think of the new Democratic philosophy. I am sorry about this cynicism, but I ask: are we in, or out?

Second, for the serious Canadian health problems of mental health, drug and alcohol abuse, there should be a working partnership with the provinces and professional agencies. Third, with provincial acceptance and support, the Government of Canada should launch a new, all-encompassing research program under which biological or medical research, particularly in the areas of cancer and heart disease, will be intensified. May I say I am deeply troubled by the fact that the treasury of this government has really, in effect, frozen—which means diminished—the amount of money spent today for medical research in Canada.

I do not think it is responsible to take a couple of areas in health and spend massive amounts of money there. I think there should be a very large amount of money spent on the whole spectrum of health care. I, for one, believe it is false economy on the part of the government to diminish the amount of money spent on medical care. Fourth, much research must be undertaken in the neglected areas of lifestyle and environmental health which contribute substantially to unacceptable disease levels. I really think governments of Canada, be they provincial or federal, must come to grips with such matters as asbestos poisoning and mercury poisoning.

I think ex post facto solutions on the part of the legislatures really are quite irresponsible. We are waiting—and I am being all-inclusive here—as we did in the 1930s in respect of silicosis in the coal mines. At that time governments waited until circumstances were so horrible that they were forced to act. In respect of mercury poisoning and asbestos fibres, I think the workman and his family are entitled to protection—not some day down the road, but now. I think it is a tragedy so little is being done in this area.

Next, the federal government should develop programs of prevention or education to alter the poor Canadian lifestyle habits which contribute to the evolution of tragic and often fatal disease processes. In some cases, legislative intervention and action are requested and demanded to enhance lifestyle habits: it probably would be well for the hon. member for Fundy-Royal and a couple of other members who might benefit from such institutionalized activity. Sixth, governmental responsibility is supreme in the field of environmental factors affecting health. In any debate on environmental health, specific courses of action have been recommended. A moment ago I alluded to mercury and asbestos. Of course there are other situations which have occurred to us.

Seventh, there should be more participation by Canadian citizens in the future evolution of health policy by making public representation mandatory in the proposed national institutes for mental health, alcohol and drug abuse. Last, I think the whole problem of the way our country responds to aging people borders on scandalous. It is not a very popular topic. Geriatrics, of course, is substantially down the list of priorities. Governments go for more glamorous subjects like cancer and heart disease. I, myself, have been guilty of that in this speech. The fact is there are a good number of unlicensed premises. In an all-encompassing health care plan we must have some responsibility here. I hope this aspect of sensitivity, compassion and fairness to older people will be recognized soon by the levels of government responsible.

I very much regret Bill C-68. I regret the winding down of co-operative federalism. I regret the fact that the Government of Canada is putting aside the high hopes of the then minister, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen).

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston). The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say I am somewhat disappointed by the lack of interest the other side seems to be showing in this debate. It seems to me that debates should be based on the adversary system, and so far we have not had very many adversaries. The minister is not here to defend his bill and nobody else seems to be interested in defending it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think, in fairness, I should point out for the record that the parliamentary secretary to the minister indicated his willingness to intervene in the debate but has only stepped aside on examining the list in order to allow the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) to speak next. I think the parliamentary secretary would either speak now or following that hon. member. Order, please. The hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay.

● (1640)

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, since I am intervening in the debate this afternoon, I feel that I myself have now become a health problem. One is very conscious of the aging process, especially when I realize that I was one of the people who voted against the original bill presented some ten years ago by a government which was making all things new, bright and shiny. The hon. member for Fundy Royal (Mr. Fairweather) referred to those heady days when a whole variety of measures were taken, measures that are now being rethought. At the time, I suppose I thought I would be at least 80 years old, if not 90, before the wheel came full circle and I would find that the descendant of that government and of the same party had abandoned what had been assumed so lightly and taken on so enthusiastically at that time.

I voted against the original medicare bill, not because I was opposed to the principle, the idea of the bill to even out for the poor and the rich the cost of health service in a civilized country. I also know how utterly damaging to the fortunes, not only of individuals but of entire families, a serious medical operation could be in the 1930s or 1940s, and how lives and planned careers would change because the money with which to pay medical bills had to be found somewhere from private sources. I can say that in the knowledge that the good doctor who attended our family at that time was the kind of general practitioner who was beloved and revered because of his devotion to his small community, because of his sympathy for his patients in the areas that he served, and his reluctance to charge anything corresponding to a high fee. But even the minimal fees that he charged could be at that time a fearfully debilitating blow to a family whose income was very low.

I am sure that many people in the communities around Armstrong will join me in paying tribute to doctor Roy Haugen, a small town physician whose story, I am sure, will be told one of these days, and yet the only publication which would carry it at present is Reader's Digest which, if the government has its way, might well cease to be a publication where Canadians could read the somewhat simple annals of those who have devoted themselves to the selfless service of their fellow men.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

I recall very clearly the final, fatal morning when the then minister of national health and welfare, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), rushed into the House to make his ultimate statement, rejecting all the protests and representations that were being made by the provinces which, I think, could see a little further into the future than the minister did. He parted the curtains and sailed into the House that morning with all of the hauteur, intelligence and stubborness of a ship of the desert. He launched into a speech in which he rejected any scheme that did not fulfil the four principles of comprehensiveness, universality, administration and portability. Of course, there was a fifth principle in the background that should have been stated at that time, that is, the open-ended nature of the cost which the provinces could see. The federal participation was a promise which, one gathered, would go on and on for ever. We should have been warned at the time, because the government at that time was involved in a very small thing, perhaps, in the ending of perpetual leases that had been undertaken many years before, so we should have realized that their concept of perpetuity amounted to about ten years in time and the time of reneging was coming sooner than anyone might have thought.

I am sure we will not have an intervention in this debate—various remarks have been made about members on the other side not intervening—from the Secretary of State for External Affairs; yet I would like to hear him because it would make an interesting coda to the debate that has gone on these last few days. Just a simple expression of regret perhaps would be adequate.

Mr. Stanfield: It would be difficult to swallow, and he might gag.

Mr. Johnston: It calls for something. It struck me, as I listened to the present minister as he spoke at the opening of this debate, that his speech did not make the bill any easier to accept. I almost thought, as I listened to him, that he was about to retract completely and renege on the bill when he spoke about accomplishments in health care. He said:

> There have been some dramatic improvements in certain indicators. Our maternal mortality rate dropped from 27 per 100,000 live births in 1968 to 11 in 1973, which is now one of the very lowest in the world. During the same period, our infant mortality rate dropped from 20.8 per 1,000 live births to 15.5, by-passing the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and France in ranking.

One could make the suggestion that he might have included the abortion rate while he was laying down that statistic, because if you read the glowing statistic that he has given us, you find that this nation sounds as if it were a nation which truly cared about births and infants, and about dropping of the mortality rate. What a strange, ironic contradiction that as that statistic is being given we note that in the background there lurks another dark statistic which has some connection with the process of birth, life and death. Of course, the minister referred to the various things that so many Canadians who can recall the 1930s and 1940s know, the terrible problems that were visited on families when a medical bill could ruin the fortunes of a family. All of these things are simple indicators of how terribly difficult it is to go back on a piece of legislation such as medicare.

The reason I voted against it was simply that it failed to consider representations which had been made by the provinces. Failure to consult is here again, and it is as necessary now as it was then. Hindsight is always valuable, but as we look back there is the feeling that if the program had been phased in much more carefully and slowly, it would not have been necessary to retreat from it so rapidly.

I hope some of the things being said in this debate will have some effect on the nation. Others have spoken about the role an individual can play in the whole health process. The self-induced disease is the scandal of our time. Some diseases which arise out of the use of tobacco are emphysema, hardened arteries and heart attacks. All these are terribly costly and debilitating diseases. Medical problems which arise from the use of alcohol are of two kinds. One is the physical kind, cirrhosis of the liver, and other changes in the physical structure of the body. Beyond that there is the terrible toll of road accidents which are directly related to the abuse of alcohol in our society. The casualties and deaths are terrible, but there is a far more awesome statistic which tells of terrible injuries requiring the total resources of medical teams and the best hospitals to rebuild and restructure the results of those accidents.

Besides tobacco and alcohol there is the question of drug abuse. Far be it from me to suggest that just because alcohol is so bad we should then feel free to legalize and endorse a whole new set of health dangers. There is a strange logic which is used very frequently these days by those who argue that alcohol is terrible and we should be much easier on some other things which are around. I cannot quite accept that argument. As a schoolteacher, I watched too many students at an early age virtually disintegrate in the prime of life because they had gone into this business of experimenting with all kinds of chemicals and exotic materials. I knew that many of them would spend the rest of their lives in mental institutions, charges against the health system of this country. Even something as simple as being overweight is a problem individuals can tackle.

It seems to me that one of the greatest failures resulting from the approach to medicare used by the government in introducing it was the failure to see the significance of the federal role in medical research. For years, hon. members have been receiving an annual complaint from the medical people of this country that there is not enough money for research facilities, and it seems to me that it never has been more important to direct money and resources into that field than it is at the present time.

As I read articles about some of the things which might be altered if we knew more about them, some ideas occur to me. We hear a great deal these days about proposals for less traumatic birth and for a changed system of birth which would make birth for the infant a far happier and comforting event than it is at the present time. I think there are grounds there for some very careful consideration. If the government was seriously looking to reap large rewards in terms of mental and physical health, that is one matter which could be very closely studied and reported on. There is a tremendous incidence of mental disorder today, and if the fact that birth as it occurs in most Canadian hospitals is a traumatic experience, that the impact could be softened and from that softening there would be a better chance of a happier and healthier child, this should be looked into very carefully.

Another matter which is terribly important is the question of what happens to the child of a mother who smokes heavily, or at all, during the course of pregnancy. It seems that the effects are various. At least one researcher has suggested that the offspring of mothers who smoke during pregnancy will have significantly greater difficulty learning to read and, in a sense, lower intelligence than if the mother had not smoked. If ever there was a matter on which we should zero in, this is it. The expenditure is not entirely medical; it is spread throughout the school system.

A word has come into our language in the past ten years describing a child with reading difficulties, which cannot be understood because the parents are intelligent; there are books in the home and the mother and father read to him: yet the child cannot read. So we have the word dyslexia, which simply means the child cannot read or has trouble reading. It sounds terribly medical and the educational faculty learned long ago to borrow medical or pseudo-medical terms to mystify the public about what was really under discussion. Yet there is a tremendous load of expense in the educational institutions of this land, as well as in medical institutions, as a result. The demand now for reading specialists, remedial courses and for other help, is greater than it ever has been. In the 1950s and 1960s, particularly in the field of education, enormous strides were made in the teaching of reading. The texts and the methodology were improved, but that has not paid off, and we wonder why. The suggestion resulting from the research of that one medical man should be considered very carefully, quickly and seriously.

When I started this speech I had words of praise for the medical practitioner. However, I am concerned about one aspect of the medical field and that is the question of the automatic operation. When medicare was being introduced, it was suggested that doctors would leave the country. After medicare came into operation, one thing which occurred to doctors was that the centralized medicare system was a far better bill collector than the private physician had ever been. I know that the good doctor I spoke about earlier would be a far wealthier man now had he been as efficient at collecting as medicare has been. Under medicare, the doctor is always paid, or almost always, for his efforts. From that and a variety of other things has come the automatic operation. The tonsillectomy is perhaps the prime offender, and the hysterectomy comes close to it. Again I will trespass on ground which I expect will be the subject of a later debate, and refer to abortion on demand. That would open an entirely new dimension in the field of the automatic operation.

I would have thought that one of the criteria to distinguish between the physician and the quack was that the former had the professional sense to say no to a patient.

That aspect of medicine would be breached in a strange way if the appeal for abortion on demand were granted by this or any other parliament. Perhaps the medical people themselves need to consider very seriously the question of the operation that is so taken for granted that almost anyone who shows up receives it.

Finally, I should like to mention the other serious and disturbing question, that of the artificial prolongation of life itself. This is very important to provinces that obtain a continual inflow of retirees from other parts of the country. It is an important matter in British Columbia. One must be very careful in talking about it because life is sweet still—in spite of the rule of the Liberal government opposite. There is a tendency to cling to life and to hope for a long, happy and useful life.

I am disturbed when I see some of the things that are possible now with modern medical techniques. I know that massive surgery is being and can be carried out on people when the possibility of their living even a year or a year and a half longer is very slender indeed. But the technique is there, the physician is there, the facilities are there, medicare will take care of it, and so the surgery is done. In some cases it seems to me, from my layman's point of view, that the added brief months of life are months of pain and misery and the death that was inevitable is simply slightly postponed. There is no return to a useful, happy or productive life at all. I do not know just how this can or should be approached.

I am afraid nobody believes in an after life any more, least of all some of the churches and some of the preachers. The great Paul Robeson, who died recently, in a song that many people associated with him, "Old Man River," sang the line "We're tired o' living but feared o' dying". I think this describes a large portion of our population at the present time.

In the field of medical research and in an area where institutions can complement each other, I should like to refer to the studies of Dr. Kubler-Ross on death and dying. I know that several churches, the United Church particularly, have held seminars, discussions and classes for ministers so that they could listen to Dr. Kubler-Ross and read her books. I suspect sometimes that her latest writings must be an embarrassment to some of the clergy, because the more she studies the problems of death and dying, the more she has become convinced, not just that there is a hope of an after life but a very good possibility of it. We can take heart to find that concept returning to the churches even by a roundabout route.

An hon. Member: I always thought it was the Senate.

Mr. Johnston: There was a poet who said, "Go not gentle into that good night; Rage, rage against the dying of the light." One sees that Dr. Kubler-Ross knows that there is a time when rage, rage against dying is part of the process. One would hope that somehow a certain dignity could be restored to death and that it might be more acceptable than it has been for a very long time in our society. It should not be a grim topic, because the gift of life implies also the gift of death, and were we as a people able to face death then we would have less of a problem with medicare and our governments, federal and provincial, would have less of a problem.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the government pay more attention to the provinces this time around than the previous time around. I would plead, again, that the federal government regard funding of medical research in this country as one of the most important and, ultimately, one of the least inflationary places in which they can put their money.
