Pollution of the soil, pollution of the sea, pollution of the air, pollution of the water: there is pollution everywhere. Let us wage war against pollution as we are doing against poverty.

The number of unemployed and of those who have tighten their belts in the face of affluence is a concrete proof that there is also, within the government, pollution of the mind, pollution of the intellect.

One thing is sure: that the government is about to increase taxes. On January 26, 1971 La Presse reported the following statement made by a bank manager. I quote:

NO TO AFFLUENCE IS THE PRICE OF POLLUTION CONTROL.

"Canadians must be willing to forgo affluence so as to palliate the cost of pollution, said last night the Chairman of the Bank of Montreal, Mr. G. Arnold Hart. However, the public must be cautioned—" —about what is forthcoming.

"Because the problem is really there: any effort against pollution will result in economic restraints, added the banker who explained however that "it is much too easy to demand that the cost of pollution control be paid by those responsible for pollution".

"All of us create some pollution and we must all pay the cost, either by accepting an increase in prices or in taxes, or by forgoing certain goods which seem very desirable, or by putting up with the unemployment caused by the closing of industries incapable of complying with new standards."

This is a bank manager who says that: factories will close down, the number of unemployed will increase, taxes will be increased. So as to satisfy the voracious appetite of the banks, the people will have to tighten their belts. Privations and reductions, that is good enough for the people. Meanwhile, banks bring up their interest rates. It is possible that this expert, a bank manager, will go as far as getting his salary increased.

And who knows if the increase in the assets of the Bank of Montreal, which was 33 per cent for 1969-70, will not reach 50 per cent. Anything can happen since this bank is one of those which can tighten or loosen credit at will.

We remember quite well the years 1929 to 1939 when credit was under strict control. It had been enough that the word "war" be used for all the banks to grant more credit. We are still paying for this supposed favour. The people have lost from it and so have the provinces. We remember that under the pretense of temporary measures which were to last during war time only, the provinces had agreed to part with some of their taxing powers. To save Christianity and freedom the provinces had yielded. Unfortunately, more taxes are levied so that people enjoy less and less freedom and communism is spreading throughout the world.

Taxes were increased to establish the family allowance plan. These taxes have gone up but family allowances have remained unchanged. Other taxes were imposed to cover the increase in old age pension. Other collection methods have been created under the pretense of fighting poverty. The number of poor people is increasing but we still have the same methods.

The government, which has been fighting inflation by new taxes and restrictions, is now launching war against pollution because our major businessmen have finally agreed to co-operate.

We have known capital shortages but surely our businessmen will put an end to them to fight pollution.

In return, the citizens' work will still be taxed, and so will building materials, clothing and many other life related commodities.

In setting up this new department, I am convinced the government will find a way to tax the air we breathe.

Clause 5 of the bill reads as follows:

5. The duties, powers and functions of the Minister of the Environment extend to and include all matters over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, not by law assigned to any other department, branch or agency of the Government of Canada, relating to

(a) sea coast and inland fisheries;

(b) renewable resources, including

(i) the forest resources of Canada,

(ii) migratory birds, and

(iii) other non-domestic flora and fauna;

(c) water;

(e) the protection and enhancement of the quality of the natural environment, including water, air and soil quality;

With regard to the soil, Mr. Speaker, we must get acquainted as soon as possible with all available research in this field.

As to air, which changes in colour from one region to another, action should be taken as soon as possible.

In the case of water, studies involving the various aspects of water resources management have been carried out in the province of Quebec and elsewhere in Canada. These studies lead us to confirm that from a legal as well as practical standpoint water supply and treatment fall mainly under provincial jurisdiction.

However, in view of the inter-relationship of water related problems in the different areas of the country, we must recognize that the provincial framework is hardly adequate if we want to approach their various aspects efficiently. Some of them are of Canada-wide concern.

We do not necessarily conclude that it is either mandatory or desirable for the federal government to assume full responsibility over the water question, but that it should rather take a keen interest in all aspects of the various Canadian problems.

The water question can be broken down into three parts. First, municipal and industrial water supplies.

In this regard, it is generally recognized that to date provincial jurisdictions have fulfilled their tasks adequately. Drinking water is available in adequate quantity and quality as well in Quebec as in the rest of the country.

Then there is the comparatively new problem of sewage treatment whose solution is to be found mainly in a collective desire to take the appropriate measures. Purification costs remain almost the same whether the undertaking is achieved under the federal, provincial or municipal government or with industrial participation. In this connection, the federal government can and must help financially to make up for inequalities and take the necessary measures.

Finally, as water is a basic element in our environment, the part it plays should conform to the ways of life followed by all Canadians. In this respect, the approaches may differ from one province to the other; however, a general notion of the minimum requirements is essential and the federal government can and must assume a constructive role in determining the goals.

Under every aspect of water management, each level of government should discharge its responsibilities within the framework of our Canadian political institutions and in a spirit of co-ordination and co-operation. Any federal government initiative or arrangement likely to impede the action of a provincial jurisdiction would act contrary to the results looked for.

On the one hand, the federal government's action must be very strong in the fields where it has exclusive powers, but on the other hand it should be complementary only in the fieds that traditionally come under provincial jurisdiction.

Nevertheless, in their own interest, the provinces should take advantage of any financial or technical aid available from the federal government. In our opinion, initiative and planning should remain in the hands of the provinces. Besides, the federal government can and must act as a catalyzer of public opinion, guiding the choice of national goals and choosing measures calculated to create a collective will aimed at correcting the situation.

To that end, we suggest that the complementary action of the federal government deal with the following aspects: research, technical information and popular education. There must be co-ordination in research and information. All Canadian citizens must be sensitized in a rational way to the problem of water and environment.

Minimum criteria should be established on the quality of water and waste in co-operation with the provinces. A step has already been made in proposing Canadian standards. There only remains to complete them.

The government should, in co-operation with the provinces, make an inventory of the water resources of Canada. Although each province is interested in that inventory, the general picture must also be considered.

It would be necessary to set up mechanisms of federal financial participation based on long term estimates of financial needs. In other words, we suggest that spending estimates be made for each province as well as for the whole of Canada. The allocation of expenses, for each level of governments and for all the users, must be made according to these estimates within the framework of an orderly financial program.

Every effort must be made to find more equitable and more rational financing methods. In the immediate future, municipalities and industries are confronted with a financing problem which impedes the implementation of the required programs. The federal government can give essential financial aid and must give it without delay.

In the issue of October 3, 1969 of La Presse, one could read a statement by the then Minister of Resources, who said:

> —that some Canadian firms will be forced to close their doors because of the government antipollution program.
> During an interview, the minister explained that pollution was at the present time everybody's problem, but that the pollution caused previously by certain firms was their direct responsibility.
> Some industries might not be able to pay for measures to fight pollution and will then have to shut down.

Mr. Speaker, if industries are forced to shut down, due to lack of funds, I think there is a serious problem and before spending millions here and there to start new industries we should find ways to save those that already exist.

The same thing goes as far as public undertakings are concerned. Public needs may be urgent, well detected, expressed and understood by public bodies, but if those bodies have no money or not enough, the implementation of plans is delayed.

What is missing, then? There is no lack of materials. We know that manpower is abundant. There are plenty of competent people. Finally, the only thing missing is money, financial credit.

In short, with or without this new department, the pollution problem in our country is becoming a financial problem. There is no going back. The co-operation of the public, the provinces and municipalities is necessary, but the essential steps cannot be delayed. However, we know that in the present system, most public bodies are deep in debt and can no longer consider any development, even in the case of pollution which is a matter of life or death.

It is obvious that it is only by incurring other debts at a 10 per cent interest, that we could reimburse our old ones and carry out the necessary pollution control programs.

As the government is the supreme authority in this country, I wish it would prove its capability by demanding that the Bank of Canada grant to the provinces and municipalities which might request them interest-free loans similar to those granted foreign countries.

I agree that we must set up programs to control soil, air and water pollution, but if we really want to do it we should first wage war against financial pollution by reorganizing the Bank of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, on rising to comment on Bill C-207 I wish to associate myself with those hon. members who have already expressed objection to it. I do not believe it is necessary to go into detail on the aspects of an omnibus type bill other than to state that all too often in this Parliament we have seen a few goodies thrown in with a bag of tricks in one piece of legislation, parts of which are unpalatable but which are presented to Parliament for approval.

This bill gives the government power to expand, to spend and to entrench without recourse to the representatives of the people. From now on a ministry may be established simply by proclamation, something which is completely contrary to the traditions and precedents of our parliamentary system. This bill reaffirms the trend of the present administration toward the establishment of a bureaucratic dictatorship. It also reaffirms the truth of the often used cliché that the Liberals are concerned with expectations of power-patronage in perpetuity.

When we look at the potential expansion of ministries combined with the expansionary provision for parliamentary secretaries, we can see that this bill, if passed, will give everybody on the Liberal side a chance to be somebody; and the suggestion is that they had better behave and support the government or they will find themselves among the minority group classified as nobodies. I suggest this would be extremely disastrous for them when they face the electorate in the next election, and that applies even to my hon. friend from St. Boniface, Manitoba.

With the exception of that portion of the bill which proposes the establishment of a department of the environment, of which I approve although I suggest it is a rather feeble and cursory attempt to strike at the "gut" issue of pollution, I see nothing in the bill which will give any measure of ease to the many Canadians suffering economic burdens and miseries. The creation of a department of the environment will be in fact a non-event. I submit that the bill should establish a comprehensive administrative structure to fight pollution. Instead, it proposes a piecemeal structure which will have incomplete power. I say this because the acts to be administered by the new department were drafted for other diverse purposes and will not provide the new minister with sufficient regulatory power to undertake a comprehensive campaign against pollution. Indeed, if the government is serious about a comprehensive and planned attack on pollution, it must introduce comprehensive regulatory powers directly intended for this department to enable it to carry out its ambitious responsibilities.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, the bill offers nothing in the way of a measure of ease to alleviate the burdens, miseries and pressures which affect so many Canadians today. On the contrary, they will be asked to dig deeper into their pockets to finance the rewards to be handed out to Liberal members who have distinguished themselves as well-disciplined, well-behaved boys fully endorsing the policies and trends of their seniors. I am given to understand that already the impact of the bill has been felt in this regard. I am told that many Liberal members who wanted to speak on the bill have been asked to refrain from participating in the debate. This is the brand of participatory democracy in which the government believes, the kind in which Liberals cannot afford to disagree.

To the more than three-quarters of a million Canadians who are presently on unemployment insurance, to the many, many more living in poverty without access to public assistance, to the old age pension recipient, to the war veteran, to the many small businessmen who have been forced to close their enterprises and to the many, many more on the verge of closing because of the government's perpetrated economic crisis, to the many, many small farmers and to some not so small who have been attempting to eke out a living on 63 cents per bushel for barley and $1 per bushel for wheat, of which 50 per cent is retained in respect of previous advances, this bill offers no hope and is nothing more than a clouding of the issues.

This bill deserves nothing more than contempt, because the government simply does not care. It cares not about those who are unable to assert their rights and privileges because of lack of organization or political power. The people in these groups are suffering the gravest injustices in our society. This government with callous and cold-blooded disregard simply carries on building its empire and its bureaucracy. It is creating positions which will do nothing but increase frustrations and complicate the channels of redress for those attempting to obtain consideration for their plight.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that until the war on inflation was won there was little hope of relief for those struggling at or below the poverty line. The Prime Minister now states that inflation is licked. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that those were nothing more than empty words. I remind the Prime Minister that only because of lower food prices the cost of living index levelled off and reduced. Speaking as one who represents an agricultural area and many agricultural producers, I hope the Prime Minister does not expect producers and retailers to bear the brunt of the war on inflation. I hope he does not expect us to fight inflation single-handledly. I submit that if the major food chains declare a truce, we shall again experience a rise in the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. No doubt he will recognize that it is necessary for the Chair to relate directly what the hon. member is saying to the bill before the House. I know that this is an omnibus bill which covers quite a bit of terrain. Perhaps the hon. member would enlighten the Chair and indicate how his remarks relate to one of the many parts of the bill.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I was merely following the pattern established by previous speakers who, it seems to me, covered a wide range of topics. Turning to the subject of inflation again—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot under the guise of discussing this bill discuss unemployment and the general financial and economic situation of the country. I recognize that the hon. member who had the floor before spoke of the Bank of Canada, and for a while I wondered how those remarks related to the bill before us. Just when I had determined to rise and bring this to the attention of the hon. member, he managed in some way to relate the Bank of Canada to some of the provisions of this bill.

Nevertheless, I very much doubt that hon. members should take advantage of this bill to promote a general debate on the economic situation of the country. I certainly do not think that this is in order. I invite the hon. member to return to consideration of one of the many aspects of the bill. Hon. members have complained that this is a very general bill which covers a large number of subjects. If that is so, it should not be difficult to make a 40-minute speech on some of its aspects.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I was merely trying to point out that this bill is inflationary in effect. I was hoping to make my point because so far as I am concerned inflation is very closely related to productivity. I would like to know what productivity factors will arise as a result of approval of this carte-blanche measure which will authorize the expenditure of millions of dollars to entrench more firmly the Liberal establishment. The only increase in productivity, I suggest, will be that involving an increase in propaganda emanating from Information Canada. Much of that production we can well do without.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Also, closely associated with the fight against inflation—this is why I contend that the bill is inflationary—is the question of administrative efficiency. Certainly this applies to the government. We have the Prices and Incomes Commission pleading with the private sector to contain price increases. Similar requests have been made to unions and bargaining agents of employees. Nevertheless, the government has broken all such voluntary guidelines and has disregarded the fact that it, too, contributes in a major way toward inflation.

This is reflected in the supplementary estimates as well as in this bill, Mr. Speaker. It is also reflected in the fact that the cost of operation of the Prime Minister's office has for the first time in history exceeded $1 million. The Auditor General focused attention on this aspect of government efficiency and indicated that there was an increase in administrative costs of 76 per cent between 1963 and 1968. I need not remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the office of the Auditor General was not granted a corresponding increase, for very obvious reasons. Year after year he has drawn the attention of the House to the gross lack of efficiency and wasteful expenditures of the government. I cannot foresee anything but a continuation of this type of wasteful expenditure under the auspices of this bill. The federal government, instead of laying down guidelines for industry, labour and other levels of government has proposed one guideline for industry and labour and another for government. This will not work; there is bound to be conflict. It is the responsibility and study of government to provide leadership in such a campaign if it intends to contain rising costs, wages and expenditures. This bill reflects a directly opposite approach to the principles of efficiency, productivity and price stability.

One thing that bothers me somewhat is the distinction drawn between and rationalization of certain government priorities. It is most difficult for me to comprehend, for example, why in one case the government must spend as much as $300 million on a bilingual education program, which has turned out to be a unilingual program, in Quebec when at the same time a small farmer on 1½ quarter sections of land in Alberta, who cannot eke out a living because he cannot sell enough grain, is not eligible for public assistance because he possesses goods in excess of the established criterion. I find it hard to justify a program of this type to a small farmer. It is also difficult for one to justify expenditures of $7 million on Information Canada, when a mother of three, earning $244 per month, whose husband has been unemployed since last February—this case applies also to Alberta—is not considered eligible for assistance because the maximum allowable earning is $201 under the welfare program. These programs are all difficult for me to justify, especially in light of an omnibus bill of this nature which to my mind only spells more expenditure.

I am somewhat puzzled by simplistic clause 23 of the bill now under consideration, which authorizes the establishment of more ministries of state. I suggest that this is an open-ended provision. In theory, it will be possible for each minister, without the approval of Parliament, to appoint an associate minister. According to all indications, we shall have departments administered at three levels; there will be a junior minister, a senior minister and a superminister. I hope this clause will be adequately dealt with and clarified in committee of the whole.

My friends from the Atlantic provinces have expressed, quite rightly, very harsh criticism because of the disappearance, under this bill, of the Department of Fisheries. I share their concern. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) clearly outlined the importance of this industry to Canada and particularly its importance to those engaged in it. Traditionally, the industries of agriculture and fisheries have provided the economic foundation of Canada. These industries continue to represent our potential as a great trading nation. I submit that they should continue to hold their distinction and should not be downgraded in any way, shape or form. These two industries, because they are subject to many vagaries to which other industries are not, ought to be strengthened, not weakened, by government assistance and protection.

What do we see? We see the Department of Fisheries downgraded and buried in a new department, thus becoming a nonentity. The Department of Agriculture has been fragmented almost into non-existence by the shared responsibilities of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). Today the ministry of agriculture has become not much more than a title. With respect to agriculture, my colleagues from the Atlantic provinces wondered why the Department of Agriculture was not buried in the omnibus bill as well as the Department of Fisheries. Let me only remind them that when we look at the record of achievement for the year 1969 as outlined in "Canadian Farm Economics", it is shocking and disturbing to learn that in 1969 for the first time in our history Canada became a net importer of agricultural products. I would like to record the figures but I may be ruled out of order.

This is shocking, unbelievable and unwarranted in a country which has the agricultural base, technological know-how and ability to produce. It is certainly a harsh and chilling indictment of this government's mismanagement in the field of agriculture. This occurred within a year and a half of the present government assuming office. The hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) wondered why agriculture was not included in the new department of the environment. Even though we will still have the Department of Agriculture, it has been emasculated and downgraded to the point where it is no longer a prime department. Agriculture is not considered to be a priority item or a national asset. The government wants to see the last traces of agriculture reduced to so-called manageable proportions.

The hard fact of the situation—an area of public life usually skirted by the government—is that this reorganization bill evades grappling with our demanding and contemporary problems. It contributes to structures and privileges which already allow excessive evasion, indecisiveness and arbitrariness on the part of the executive. The issues of our urban and rural life styles—shelter, transportation, full employment and environmental control—if they are to be solved, require hard decisions. If they are to be solved democratically, the hard decisions must be made in public.

If this were an honest and comprehensive reorganization of the government, with different concepts of government in action than those which characterize this government, I could applaud the bill. However, it is not. This government has not in the past, and does not seem now, willing to introduce legislation outlining specific intentions regarding these problems. Indeed, we are asked to create structures without passing judgment on the philosophy and goals they are to pursue.

The preamble to a particular war, whether pollution or poverty, is to be made in public: however, the strategy and the tactics are to be made in private. I reject this. This is an aberration and distortion of democratic government. Parliament can delegate the administration of a goal, but it cannot delegate goal-setting and the essential choice of means. However, that is what this administration continually asks of Parliament: it asks us to share in the platitudes but leaves the choices to the government, choices to be rejected or accepted in secret. This measure is no adequate substitute for strong and democratic government. Strong and democratic government openly makes decisions. That it not what we are getting.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, some aspects of Bill C-207—are of vital interest to my constituents. I refer to the creation of a department of the environment. I believe this is an important step forward. If the department is given the means and the tools to do the job, it may play an important role in the meeting the environmental crisis.

I do not wish to detract the very reasonable criticisms of my colleagues about the hodge-podge of different subject matters brought under the cover of this bill. That is extremely unfortunate. However, I do not propose to deal with that aspect of the matter. I shall deal with the subject of pollution of the environment particularly as it affects areas such as the one I represent, the metropolitan area of Toronto. It is trite to say that we have reached the situation in which the unintended result of our practices has been to threaten animal and plant life and to destroy the environment on which the quality of human life depends. There has been no lack of warning. In the course of this debate, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) drew attention to a declaration of the United Nations in 1968 which gave that warning very clearly and explicitly. I will not repeat what he said.

We should pay close attention to that warning. It refers to a crisis of worldwide proportions. It refers to the explosive growth of human population, poor integration of a powerful and efficient technology with environmental requirements, the deterioration of agricultural land, the uplanned extension of urban areas, the decrease of available space and the growing danger of extinction of many forms of animal and plant life.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), when he was Acting Prime Minister a short time ago filed a report on pollution of Lake Erie and Lake Ontario. It was an extensive and full report of the International Joint Commission. Lake Ontario and Lake Erie are two of the greatest freshwater lakes in the world. While the report refers to one part of the country, similar problems have arisen in nearly all the great waterways and freshwater lakes in Canada. I quote from the conclusions reached by that commission as follows:

> In response to the question, "Are the waters of Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, and the international section of the St. Lawrence River being polluted on either side of the boundary to an extent which is causing or is likely to cause injury to health or property on the other side of the boundary?"

The commission finds that the waters referred to in the question are being seriously polluted on both sides of the boundary to the detriment of both countries and to an extent which is causing injury to health and property on the other side of the boundary.

In response to the question, "If the foregoing question is answered in the affirmative, to what extent, by what causes, and in what localities is such pollution taking place?"

The commission finds the polluted waters are lakewide in extent; that the two principal causes are wastes discharged by municipalities and industries into the above waters and their tributaries; and that pollution is taking place in all jurisdictions whch share these boundary waters.

The report goes into greater detail in the full text. The third question was as follows:

• (8:50 p.m.)

If the commission should find that pollution of the character just referred to is taking place, what remedial measures would, in its judgment, be most practicable from the economic, sanitary and other points of view and what would be the probable cost thereof?

The response was the following:

The commission finds that the remedial measures include the adoption and adherence to this commission's general and specific objectives as a matter of urgency; immediate reduction of the phosphorous content in detergents; the prompt implementation of a vigorous programme to provide the necessary municipal and industrial waste treatment facilities and to reduce the phosphorous inputs into the above waters and their tributaries—

And so on. Later in the report is a series of detailed recommendations spelling out what ought to be done—the setting of water quality objectives for these boundary waters, as they are called, among other things. The tragic part of all this is that a report in almost exactly similar terms—and I have it here—was made by the International Joint Commission as long ago as 1952, I believe it was, and very little or nothing has been done about it. The International Joint Commission exists by virtue of a solemn treaty made in 1910 between the United States and Britain, representing Canada at that stage of history, in which both countries pledged themselves not to pollute the waters in the other country. Yet this pollution has been going on since 1910 and was reported on fully in 1952 without, as I say, anything being done about it.

This is why I am glad to see specific reference to the matter in the bill before us. Under clause 5(g) the proposed minister of the environment is to be given jurisdiction in connection with the enforcement of any rules or regulations made by the International Joint Commission in respect of boundary waters, as far as pollution control is concerned. This task alone is a tremendous one for the new department and I earnestly hope it will be carried out.

I wish to call attention to two points with regard to the whole question of pollution of the environment. First, on the question of enforcement: there have been many studies made and much research done in the pollution field, and there is need for more studies and more research; but all the studies and research in the world will not enable us to deal with this question adequately unless there is adequate enforcement. I hope the minister will succeed in getting an effective staff on the enforcement side. I hope he will get people who are not only trained in the law but who have the required energy, tact and determination to enforce the legislation in co-operation with other jurisdictions.

The other thing that is required is consultation with informed and interested local organizations. I am happy to see that many of these are springing up. In this connection, as well as in connection with the point I have just made about the necessity of adequate enforcement measures to ensure that the rules made are not disregarded, I refer the minister to a new body known as The Canadian Environmental Law Research Foundation. I do not know whether the minister is aware of this association. It is a group of mostly younger lawyers in Toronto; I am sure they will soon spread out on a national basis. I wish to read what they say about their purposes, because this is of great importance. They say the following:

In downtown Toronto people choke and wheeze. Elsewhere in Ontario fishermen and Indians lose their source of livelihood when the fish become contaminated with mercury. Vacationers turn away as mounds of green algae pile up on the beach. What can they do about it?

Growing numbers of Canadians are seriously concerned about the deterioration of their environments. Groups have sprung up across the country which, each in their own way, attempt to meet the pollution crisis head-on. Whatever they do to arouse the public, however, they are ultimately faced with the realities of the Canadian political and legal system.

If we are to proceed in an orderly fashion to solve some of these problems quickly and rationally, current law must be put to better use and new approaches must be explored. Given the constitutional and jurisdictional complexities of resource management in Canada, an all-out effort must be made by the legal community to assist in the formulation and, more important, the interpretation of legislation for the management and control of the environment.

Recognizing, however, that in a democratic society the public must understand and be able to utilize the law, we believe that citizens must be educated as to the legal recourse offered them. Unfortunately, the Canadian public and, indeed, most lawyers remain largely unaware of the existence of such remedies.

Recently a group of lawyers and law students, brought together by a common concern for their imperilled environment, formed the Canadian Environmental Law Research Foundation. Although a separate entity, it will work closely with Pollution Probe.

I urge the minister to get in touch with this organization and consult them in the development of his staff. Unless he has on his staff people who are not only knowledgeable about such matters as prosecutions but are endowed with the requisite tact and judgment to enable them to co-operate with other law enforcement jurisdictions, I fear the department of the environment will not carry out the purpose to which it is dedicated.

I wish to speak, now, about another organization which exists in my own constituency and which has concerned itself deeply with the question of local pollution, something which closely concerns federal jurisdiction and the proposed new department. This organization is called ForWARD 9, "ward 9" being the municipal designation of part of the area covered by the riding of Greenwood. It is a non-partisan, voluntary citizens' organization. It has formed a pollution task force which has surveyed the nature of the source of pollution in the area. Its findings draw attention to what are probably the three main polluters: the Richard L. Hearn generating station of Ontario Hydro which is, itself, a creature of the Ontario provincial government; the municipal incinerator on Commissioner Street operated by the metro works department, part of the municipal government; and the main sewage treatment plant on Ashbridge's Bay, also operated by the metro works department. It turns out that the three main polluters are all public organizations, so the report throws light on what is likely to be one of the main problems in this field.

I shall not go into detail here as to the findings of this pollution task force, the type of pollution caused and the methods necessary to improve the situation. As to the hydro station, they say proposals have been put forward which if acted upon will lessen the damage being done by that plant. I should like to put on record the following conclusions reached by the task force:

1. These three plants are responsible for constant, hazardous and massive pollution of the city.

2. Methods of cutting down this pollution are known and available.

3. While there is some public discussion of pollution control measures, and a little implementation of partial schemes, there has as yet been no all-out effort to attack and eliminate pollution from these three plants.

4. The three plants belong to public and semi-public agencies rather than private firms. They are supposed to serve us and to operate in our interests. The condoning of pollution from such sources inevitably forces us to question whether our representatives at city, provincial and federal levels are yet either serious or honest in their much proclaimed concern to do something about pollution.

5. Finally, it is quite obvious that there are many ways in which the pollution could be cut down—e.g., regular replacement of screens on the incinerator stacks, better precipitating equipment at the incinerator and at the Hearn plant, covering the sewage plant tanks to cut down the smells, speeding up the sewer separation program, etc. All these improvements cost money. But pollution costs us a lot, too—every day, in many ways. It's hurting our lakes, our air, our houses—and probably our health too.

That is the authentic voice of people from my riding who are interested in this subject, and I am sure their message could be duplicated across the country, particularly in urban areas. I urge the minister to take full advantage of the provisions of clause 6 (b) which are as follows:

The minister of the environment, in exercising his powers and carrying out his duties and functions under section 5, shall—

(b) promote and encourage the institution of practices and conduct leading to the better protection and enhancement of environmental quality, and co-operate with provincial governments or agencies thereof, or any bodies, organizations or persons, in any programs having similar objects.

I would be glad to send the minister the address of the Forward 9 pollution task force so he may, if he wishes, be apprised of their findings. In working on this problem he and his department will have the advantage of the information gathered by many very knowledgeable and concerned people in the area.

There has been a lot of criticism of this bill, but I would conclude by wishing the new minister and the new department the very best of luck in the urgently important task that they will be undertaking. I suggest that this task will call for imagination, tenacity and fact. For the sake of future generations of Canadians, I sincerely hope the new department will be a success.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I echo the sentiments of most members of the House who have spoken so far. I echo their expressions of concern for the environment and their good wishes to the minister. I think these expressions were sincerely put forward. If not totally sincere, they were at least put forward out of a very deep and continuing sense of concern for the condition of our environment and our seeming inability to cope with the problem as time goes by. I join these people in wishing the minister good luck in the task that faces him. No minister in Canadian history has faced such a monumental job with such a total absence of sources of information, guidance and precedents. As well, no minister, at least in my opinion, faces the task that is ahead of him with better skills, talents and, I am sure, more sincerity and dedication to the task of bringing some rhyme and reason to this headlong rush of madness that we are facing.

If I may be permitted one other comment in connection with the minister's very real responsibility, it is this. I hope the minister will have the fullest support not only of the cabinet in its present configuration but as well in its proposed configuration. I am a believer in numbers and I believe there is strength in assistance. Whether or not the minister will get that support every time he asks for it in trying to clean up all aspects of our environment and all the problems of pollution remains to be seen, but I have some confidence in his ability to get it.

Like my colleagues who have spoken before me, I express concern over the downgrading of our fisheries. I trust that in practice this will not take place. I am prompted to raise this question because of the very startling step taken today in closing down the swordfishing industry. The implications of such a move are very serious. I hope the minister is much more on top of the situation than the news that has come to our attention so far would indicate. The closure of this industry means the loss of a swordfishing fleet of 40 to 60 ships, involving 300 to 400 men and their families, not to mention the supporting services of the industry and the satisfying of the palates of thousands of North Americans who enjoy swordfish as a delicacy.

The source of mercury pollution in fish must be identified rapidly, not only to save the industry but to preclude the fear and panic that I think the minister is well aware could spread among those who enjoy this food. I am terrified that one morning I shall wake up and find the pollution situation so bad that I have to give up eating mackerel, lobster, tuna, cod, hake and halibut. The minister shakes his head, and I pray to God he is right—that this is just an isolated incident, a phenomenon of the industry. However, it is still my understanding that the source of this pollution has not been identified. The causes are not completely understood, but I hope they will be as soon as possible, for the sake not only of those of us from the provinces next to the sea but for those inland who only know of the oceans through the delights of fish dinners.

With regard to the minister's department, like everybody else I have been waiting very patiently for a long time, realizing that the minister has no clear precedent to guide him—

Mr. Comeau: Just his head.

Mr. Forrestall: I am almost prepared to accept that reason alone, because time is running out. But the minister now virtually has his new department. As my colleague who just interjected said the other night, departments, concern, care and talk are all very well but it takes dollars and cents to do something about pollution. It will take dollars and cents to find out about the swordfishing industry, but it will take a hell of a lot more dollars and cents to lay out a program that will be effective against those primarily responsible for polluting our environment in its totality. Is the government prepared to make them pay for this?

Mr. Drury: We cannot do that without the legislation.

Mr. Forrestall: The minister says they cannot pay for it without the legislation. If the President of the Treasury Board would get on his feet and guarantee that the new minister of the environment will be given the necessary funds to clean up the Great Lakes, the oceans and our northland, I am sure the co-operation of the members on this side of the House would be very readily achieved. To come back to the question of money, so far no member on the other side of the House has dared even to approach the question of the cost of cleaning up our environment. Yet this must be done. The people of Canada who so anxiously await the steps to be taken by the minister also await a price tag. So I repeat the words of the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau): it takes money to fight pollution, and money must be forthcoming if we are to survive and not permit raw sewage to be dumped into our inlets, harbours and bodies of fresh water. I was going to mention the Ottawa River, but that is a moving body of water. Perhaps I should confine my remarks to bodies of water that do not have self-flushing capabilities.

One of the first steps the minister should take is toward stopping what is taking place. He should not accept suggestions and proposals which would only perpetuate in one way or another the problem we are attempting to attack. If we are to clean up pollution, let us at least start by putting an end to situations which permit new pollution to creep into our environment. When new plants are built, let us insist upon standards which are high enough to be effective and keep the air clean. Let us apply the same principle and influence in respect of the effluent that pours into our rivers, lakes and oceans. Let us put an end to this pollution quickly.

In spite of the difficulties the minister will face in the coming months with the type of legislation and regulations required, he will find comforting support among his colleagues in the House of Commons. I hope he is aware of the fact as he steps forward armed with his new legislation.

One might argue that it is a form of pollution to allow governments and societies to continue to discard policies before they have been effectively used, policies which have been demonstrated to be effective but which are changed in some way to meet the demand for change. This happens frequently. It seems to me that those who are filling responsible positions have been by and large useless. The cabinet system has not been a bad one up to now. The worst I can say about it is that I think it is in the wrong hands. Our system of government seems to have worked fairly well for a number of years but I am not at all sure it has not outlived its usefulness. That is one of the conclusions one must draw from what appears to be the intent of this legislation. It seems to discard other policies simply because change seems to be the desirable thing. When we discard ideas and concepts before they have fully served the needs of society, we have wastage—and that is pollution. As my leader said some days ago, this is prideful pollution and it is unnecessary at this time. It is wasteful in itself when it has not been demonstrated to the satisfaction of the people of Canada that there is a real need to expand the cabinet.

The people of this country, through their representatives in the House of Commons, are being asked to accept this open-ended legislation. This is wrong, if the legislation is placed in the hands of those who would use it for other than correct purposes, in terms of our understanding of the political system. Sometimes I wonder just what is the concern of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government in proceeding to this extent. What does this all mean, and how far do they intend to go? What is their intention? Apart from the department of the environment, for which there is an obvious need, why do we need these open-ended ministries of state? They are very loose in their application.

An hon. Member: How about pay-offs?

Mr. Forrestall: Good salaries and pay-offs could make the boys happy. That is one argument, but I think it is a little too simple. The government could act on the Beaupré report: that would keep the boys happy and it would not displease me.

An hon. Member: And it would cost less.

Mr. Forrestall: It would cost a lot less in the long run. I am little more concerned about this measure than is expressed by that suggestion. The legislation seems a little too superficial. I wonder what this bill really has to do with the acquisition of power. Let me cite an example and in this way perhaps throw some light on the message of my western colleagues. Let me caution the Premiers of the provinces west of the Manitoba-Ontario border. Inherent in this piece of legislation is an uncontrolled desire to effect total and absolute power, not in a wider and broader cabinet but in the hands of relatively few people. I wonder why the government and those close to it desire the type of power included in this legislation.

I refer to an article which appeared in a periodical in that city across the harbour from mine, the capital of Nova Scotia. It is entitled "The 4th Estate". In volume No. 2, issue No. 28, dated January 21, 1971—just eight or nine days ago—there is the headline, "Tom Kent Killing Maritimes". It is the use of power in such a manner that I have alluded to which would cause a reporter such as Dulcie Conrad, who has eight or ten years' experience in covering the political scene in Nova Scotia, to write the type of article the editor would feel deserved such a headline. Whether I am right or wrong, I have no pathological fear of Tom Kent, deputy minister notwithstanding. One must take note of such an article by a responsible reporter with some prestige and some ability, depending on whether you agree with her or are in favour of what she says at a given time.

I would like to quote from this article so as to demonstrate what I am afraid is really happening. I refer to the divide and conquer policy which a handful of people with tremendous power can apply. Miss Conrad writes:

> The latest example of Mr. Kent's power over maritime planning was his order to Liberal Premier Gerald Regan of Nova Scotia to get rid of the province's newly formed cabinet secretariat, a planning body set up by the previous Conservative government. The secretariat had been making at least a tentative start at planning for Nova Scotia at the provincial level keeping in mind special provincial conditions and, hopefully, the feelings of the province's people.

What concerns me is that a perceptive writer would attempt to deal with power in this way. I do not believe that she is shooting down Tom Kent. I do not think Dulcie Conrad has a pathological fear of Tom Kent. She is really asking what happens to a province when a minister is given virtually unlimited authority to do things. What happened to Prince Edward Island? My dear friend and colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), is not here. If he were, he would tell you—and so would the people of P.E.I.—that they have lost their provincial rights, they have lost their autonomy.

I would not be afraid to bet a buck with anybody that in the preparation of budget considerations and papers for the forthcoming fiscal year, every blessed minister in that province had to submit them to Tom Kent for approval before they could come up with their final budget or estimates. The suggestion, of course, is that Tom Kent or the Deputy Minister of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is using the same type of control and the same type of power in the province of Nova Scotia. I am afraid of that type of power. I am afraid of a philosophy of political office that says: Let us appoint a whole lot of ministers. Let us so divide and conquer, let us so spread out the responsibility of government that any one of the responsible ministers can be ticked off just like that.

I am afraid of that. Better a powerful, single, bad man whom you can understand than the weakness that comes with the division of broad responsibilities so that surreptitious methods can be employed to usurp power, to take away power, and in this case to take away power from provinces which enjoy it and have every right to it.

The story is that Tom Kent is killing the Maritimes. By God, he had better not try it! But that is not all. So extensive is the article that the newspaper decided to editorialize it. The title reads, "Stop the Sellout to Ottawa". Again, this type of headline by an editor or an editorial writer is born out of a sense of fear, not of what could happen but what indeed is happening. Of course, the bill speeds up that process. It creates a ministry with tremendously broad authority and unlimited power which, mind you, is still open and above board. People can see and understand it and they can deal with what they can see and understand. But there is fear of a broadening of power, for whatever reason, of ministries about which we know nothing and whose authority is open-ended and unlimited. The author of the editorial asks:

> Who should have the final say about how the three maritime provinces plan for their future future economic development?

This is a rhetorical question. There is no question about it in my mind. It has to be done jointly. That may surprise hon. members. It must be above board and open. But the intitiative and final authority must come from the Maritimes. The author goes on to answer the question, also rhetorically:

> The federal government, which provides the bulk of the money for this development? Or the political leaders of the three provinces who are—or should be—in touch with what the people they serve feel are the important issues of development?
> There's the old saying, he who pays the piper calls the tune.

It is this hidden uncertainty, this unknown quantity that gets me to my feet tonight to express some concern. I do not think the government is moving in this direction simply to create and enhance income positions for 60, 70, 80 or 100 of its members. I do not think they are quite that stupid. I do not believe they are quite so unsubtle as that. I think there is a much more sinister reason behind their action. There might not be, mind you, but I would still like to see a minister rise to his feet and talk seriously about what really is intended by this legislation and tell us what it means. What does the government intend to do with an unlimited number of ministries?

A colleague of mine on this side of the House said the other day that if they are interested in an efficient government there are many examples around the world at which they could look, not the least of which is the British House of Commons where with a relative handful of men—12 or so—they manage the affairs of a nation of 50 million or 60 million people. Great Britain has a unitary form of government. I wonder if that is what this government is after. I wonder sometimes whether they are trying to create such a proliferation of ministries that, for example, cities will rapidly become less concerned with dealing with Ottawa through their provincial legislatures. I wonder if this is what they are after.

Are they trying to make service so acceptable to people as to bring about a situation where they can leapfrog over the whole system of government in Canada, that is to say, the existing levels of government provincial and municipal? I wonder if that is what they are after. Whatever it is, I am afraid they are attempting to divide and conquer, to so diversify responsibility that no one will ever really know who is supposed to answer for what. This would let men like the Deputy Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and men like the director of the cabinet—the real source of power in this country—Mr. Lalonde in the Prime Minister's office, do what they damn well please about the country. I for one do not like that. I do not think the people of Canada will accept it, but that is what seems to be happening.

We have blank looks on the faces of members on the front benches opposite when matters are raised. Just the other day we raised the question of aid to Francophone college graduates. Good God! Who knew about it? Where did it come from? I do not know why anybody is puzzled about it. It came out of the Prime Minister's office, but probably not with his knowledge. It came out of that real source of power, or what seems to be becoming the real source of power. It was not the deputy ministers, a closely knit little group of people who whenever they run across a problem say, "Feed them peanuts, feed them apples. We will fix them up one way or another." This is not the way Canadians want their government to operate. I do not think that is pursuing the course that the vast majority of Canadians want to follow. I wish to read another comment from "The 4th Estate" as follows:

> The N.S. secretariat, and its chairman, planner Len Poestchke, are being axed by the provincial government because they could prove a thorn in the side of Mr. Regan when he wants to collect a fast bunch of goodies (in the form of money from Mr. Kent's Department of Regional Economic Expansion for such things as highways and sewerage systems).

What prompts a writer to make comments like that unless it is fear about who wields the political power, unless it is fear about the method by which the destinies of Canadians are being controlled? Mr. Regan is not alone in his surrender to this bureaucracy. Premier Campbell has also been involved. The new Premier of the province of New Brunswick, Mr. Hatfield, hopefully has seen enough to know how to approach the federal authorities.

I say to my hon. friends from the Prairies that when the government comes to them bearing gifts for infrastructure developments, saying "What do you want and we will give it to you?" let them beware. I fear that the thing they are after is total and absolute power. That is a form of pollution. Pray God what I am saying is not true; but if it is, it is probably the worst form of pollution this country will ever face.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I must say that I do not see much in this legislation that looks like a gift for western Canada or for any other part of our society, with the exception of a few more members of the Liberal party who will be advanced to the esteemed position of Parliamentary Secretary.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

The headline item in this legislation is the establishment of the department of the environment. Of course, this is a very saleable item at the present time, but I believe the government is using it as a method of slipping through many other things that are not quite as desirable and that probably would not stand the test of careful scrutiny. If the bill does nothing else, we can hope that with the establishment of a single department of government concerned with fostering a better environment in Canada, all the agencies concerned with that objective will be drawn under one roof.

I understand that there are well over 100 agencies of the federal government concerned with various aspects of protecting our environment, but in many cases they do not know what each one is doing. They seem to be going off in all directions, duplicating many functions at the expense of the taxpayer. In many respects they could be considered inflationary because they spend money but do not produce very much. So perhaps we can get some sort of efficiency into this aspect of the government's activities.

What worries me is that once the government estalishes this department it may be tempted to split its authority, which it has already done with respect to other departments, particularly the Department of Agriculture. The Department of Agriculture is nothing more than a name at present. So far as western Canada is concerned, most of its important functions have been hived off in other places; for example, I think of the Wheat Board which has travelled through a number of ministries and is now resident in the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

I would like to hear an explanation from the minister who is piloting this legislation through the House as to why the government does this. Why does it not leave the things that are concerned with a particular area under the control of the minister who would ordinarily be thought to be responsible for that area? In light of the government's past actions in this regard, we are rather suspicious of what may happen in this case. If the government is really concerned about organization, why does it not do something about the split in jurisdiction between the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Department of Labour with respect to unemployment problems? Since the Unemployment Insurance Commission has remained with the Department of Labour, the Manpower centres across the country no longer deal with unemployment insurance; such matters have now been centralized in the larger centres. From questions raised each day during the oral question period, we know that serious problems exist in the administration of unemployment insurance.

An hon. Member: They give counsel.

Mr. Schumacher: My hon. friend says that they counsel, but I think they are developing an attitude of arrogance, something which seems to be prevalent in Liberal administrations. I think that those in the unemployment insurance offices do not care whether people have to line up. They treat people like sheep. In many cases the clerks are shuffling papers back and forth while the unemployed have to stand in line as if they were seeking a favour instead of a service which the government has a duty to provide.

I think of a situation in the city of Calgary. A painter became unemployed on January 4 and submitted his claim on January 5. Last Friday, January 29, I believe, he was advised by the Unemployment Insurance office in Calgary that his claim had been lost and so far as they were concerned he had to fill out a new one. We are talking about government organization. I think the government should be more concerned about the every day administration of programs already on the statute books and should try to accomplish practical results, instead of shuffling matters around as it is here. That course, I submit, is not really productive.

I refer to another part of the bill. I went through the bill and saw that it contains many parts. I can understand why so many people have objected to lumping together so many pieces of legislation in one bill. I think there is probably room for suspicion. Perhaps the government is trying to put something across. Some matters are being introduced which properly ought to be introduced under separate bills. Hon. members have referred to the question of Parliamentary Secretaries. I have not studied that office, being a new member on the opposition side of the House and therefore I have no practical knowledge of it. I do not understand why a substantial increase in Parliamentary Secretaries is contemplated in the bill. It seems that if this bill is passed well over 30 new Parliamentary Secretaries could be appointed.

Mr. Paproski: The government backbenchers are not making enough money.

Mr. Schumacher: The increase could be in the order of more than 100 per cent, compared with the present number of Parliamentary Secretaries.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Schumacher: I can only speak of Parliamentary Secretaries from personal observation. On the first day of the resumed part of the session, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), as reported at page 2272 of Hansard, diverted a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). That minister was not here. According to the roster system, he should have been here. In his absence the Parliamentary Secretary said he would look after that inquiry of the ministry. Actually, the Parliamentary Secretary said he would bring the matter to the minister's attention and that he hoped a proper answer could be provided on the following Thursday, which I believe was January 14.

Mr. Mazankowski: Many Thursdays have since gone by.

Mr. Schumacher: As my hon. friend from Vegreville says, many Thursdays have since passed and no answer has been given. Your Honour knows that because the question was asked during the question period, it must have been urgent; otherwise, I suggest, it would not have been allowed.

Mr. Mazankowski: The matter still is urgent.

Mr. Schumacher: It concerns the outbreak of rabies, a disease prevalent in western Canada at present. The matter is still urgent, and the Parliamentary Secretary still has not answered. This leads me to believe that our present Parliamentary Secretaries are not overworked.

Mr. Paproski: That Parliamentary Secretary no doubt needs an executive assistant.

Mr. Schumacher: Perhaps, as my hon. friend for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) says, he needs an executive assistant.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): So do some others.

Mr. Schumacher: The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) wants one too.

Mr. Paproski: He needs a couple, to help him on his trips.

Mr. Schumacher: As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, although there is a demonstrable need for the new department of the environment there is no demonstrable need for other parts of this legislation. I object to doing things that are not required to be done. I have said before—and I shall probably say it again—this government is doing too many things that could well be left undone. The government's attitude is that it knows best how to order the affairs of this country's citizens, a philosophy I cannot and will not accept. I feel that is the main reason behind our unemployment crisis. Most people in this country do not feel that the government will allow them in future to determine what ought to be done with the rewards of their labour. They do not know how much money they will be allowed to keep. They do not know whether a government directive will take money from them, money that will be used for purposes over which they have no control.

I think it is clear that the private sector of the country lack confidence in the immediate future. Such people are holding back. The last budget was an example of the government's philosophy. It would not cut taxes and allow citizens to decide how to spend their money. It kept taxes high and directed the money where it thought the funds would do most good. Evidently the government does not have the answers. We heard today that only about $40 million, or 25 per cent of the loan fund, has been taken up. Even that money will not work to create jobs. We also see that the government is doing its best to fill the gap left by private capital which has been leaving Quebec. I suggest that no government can fill a gap of that size.

In the meantime, those areas that could be productive, in the short term, in the creation of employment are not being attended to. Obviously the government does not know what to do. It does not have the right answers to our difficulties and as a result the economy is stagnating.

An hon. Member: They are saving our money.

Mr. Schumacher: I do not know that they are saving it. Certainly they are spending it and even that does not seem to be doing any good. That course will never produce the results the government hopes to achieve. If the government has any desire to reorganize, I suggest it should begin at the bottom and not at the top. Let it begin with those areas that directly affect the private citizen. The private citizen is not overly concerned about the number of departments of government or ministers of state, except to the extent that the additional bodies will mean more expenditures and additional bureaucracies which grow under new ministers.

Although the concept of a department of the environment is good, I do not think much can be said for the rest of the bill. Before resuming my seat I would mention the superannuations dealt with in this bill. It appears to me that some of our senior civil servants were involved in the drafting of that part of the bill for their own benefit. I really do not see what merit there is in that portion of the legislation. What has this to do with a bill on government organization? I think that part of the bill should receive more attention from Your Honour. Your Honour ought to decide whether it is proper to include such a provision in this type of bill.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as stated by several hon. members, a bill of this nature provides a tremendous amount of scope for debate because it encompasses so many aspects. I hear the government whip muttering from his seat. Regretfully, I did not hear what he said—not that it matters a great deal. Initially I wish to deal with that part of the bill which relates to the establishment of a department of the environment. I also have some views regarding other parts of the bill. As there are only five or six minutes remaining this evening, I will deal only briefly with the proposal to establish a department of the environment.

In recent years almost everyone has got into the act of pollution control. There has been a tremendous amount of discussion on the subject. A large number of community groups and organizations of a voluntary nature have become concerned with the environment and its quality and preservation. Politicians are not excluded from this exhibition of concern. At least on paper, the proposal of the government indicates that it wants to exhibit another aspect of its concern about environmental matters. Perhaps the most helpful aspect of concern which the general public is showing is the intensity with which the younger generation is approaching the problem. I am familiar with a great many grade school students in my constituency and other areas. Many of them have embarked upon essays and projects relating to environmental matters in their own areas. Some have even effected prosecutions against industries in contravention of the various provincial laws relating to pollution control. This is very gratifying because these young people depend upon the heritage which we will establish. Young people feel they are going to live forever. There is a tremendous period of time in front of them. As one gets older, that period of time shortens. Perhaps that is why older people have a less enthusiastic and intense approach toward matters such as this.

The government is faced with the British North America Act. The government has not shown any great interest or desire in overcoming the problem of our Constitution. The British North America Act gives the provinces exclusive jurisdiction over matters relating to civil and property rights. The exercise of that jurisdiction prevents Parliament enacting legislation for environmental control or legislation that impinges upon the rights of provinces, municipalities and individuals. The Canada Water Act was passed in the last session of Parliament. It conceived establishing authorities and criteria for water quality control in Canada. The proposals in the Canada Water Act were, and still are, merely pious expressions. The act is of no value to Canadians unless there is mutual agreement with the provinces. As a consequence, we have a piecemeal approach to that aspect of the environment which relates to water.

The bill before us seeks to establish a department of the environment. Any companion legislation dealing with pollution of land, air or any other aspect of our environment will hinge upon agreement being worked out with the province. This does not apply to fisheries and shipping, where we have constitutional jurisdiction. That is not the proper approach to the matter. It simply reflects an oversensitivity on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with regard to technical concepts and constitutional rights.

I am not suggesting that Parliament should take action which would override the constitutional authority of the provinces. Ethically and morally that is not right. In any event, it would flounder in the Supreme Court. The government is not prohibited from proposing to the provinces specific constitutional amendments to deal with the environment. In 1941 there was an amendment which dealt with unemployment insurance. A few years ago there was a constitutional amendment dealing with survivors benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. At that time there was unanimous agreement on the part of the provinces to give this authority to Parliament.

The matter of environmental control is as vital as life itself. If we do not act quickly, there may only be two or three generations of life left in the world. Surely this fact should be important enough for the government to overcome its extreme sensitivity about the constitutional question and directly propose to the provinces that differences of opinion about the Constitution be set aside. Surely there is some common ground where Parliament can have jurisdiction over environmental matters. Rather than approach the subject on a piecemeal basis by agreement with the provinces, it should be dealt with by Parliament because the problem is national in scope.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT RESPECTING PENSIONS TO EXPEDITE HOUSE BUSINESS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before I begin, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I can be given a nod as to whether there is someone in the House to answer my question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are two questions, one in my name and one in the name of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), which call for an answer from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) or someone representing him. I do not see anyone who might be doing so, or is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) going to give the answer?

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is good to know there is someone in the House to give an answer, but what an answer we usually get from him! As hon. members are aware, on September 9, 1970, the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications adopted a report in which there was a clearcut recommendation for immediate increases in the pensions of retired employees of Canadian National Railways along the lines of the increases provided for retired federal public servants.

• (10:00 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to note the applause from the other side of the House and on this side of the House as well. That report was presented to the House of Monday, October 5, 1970. Two days later, the House of Commons unanimously endorsed it.

Mr. Perrault: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is another "Hear, hear". We are doing well tonight, Mr. Speaker. In other words, it is the clear and unanimous wish of this House of Commons, including all the members of all parties, cabinet ministers, backbenchers and all, that the pensions of retired employees of the Canadian National be increased.

On Friday, October 9, 1970, I asked the Minister of Transport whether he would bring this matter to the attention of the railway company. He said he would do so though he had the impression the company was aware of it. I asked a similar question on October 23, 1970, and was told the matter was still under consideration. There was a "late show" discussion of the issue on Monday, October 26, 1970, and there was the usual talk about the sympathy felt for this proposition on the government side of the House, but we had to let the CN run its own affairs.

Some of us, Mr. Speaker, have contended throughout this business that since the CNR is before the House seeking a large sum of money, we have the right to get this matter settled, to get this wish of the House of Commons complied with, before we vote these additional amounts. Therefore, on December 11, 1970, as reported in Hansard at page 1965, I asked the Minister of Transport whether he would be able to assure hon. members that these pension increases would come through so that we could get on with the business of passing the CN financing bill. The answer on that occasion was not particularly satisfactory and that is the reason the subject was posted for a "late show". In the meantime, however, on January 22, 1971, as reported at page 2659 of Hansard, I put the following question to the Minister of Transport:

> Has he yet received assurances from the Canadian National Railways that the pensions of retired CNR employees will be increased along the lines recommended by this House?

The minister in his answer referred to discussions he had had with CNR and then said:

> I think I can say at this time that there is sympathetic response. I have asked for the specifics of what the company is anticipating it will do and I should have this information on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Well, what was then next week is now last week, so really all I am doing in raising the issue tonight is giving the government, out of the kindness of my heart, an opportunity to tell us it now has the specifics of what is to be done about this very important matter. I do not think this House or the retired employees of the CNR should have to wait any longer. It is a reasonable proposition which has been made, and the entire House is behind it. I think the CNR should be told in plain language that the time to put these pension increases into effect is now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the House that I am responding to this question on behalf of my hon. friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Duquet) who is, regrettably, in hospital at the present time.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has raised this specific question on a goodly number of occasions over the past six months. It is an important one and I think all hon. members are aware of the hon. member's genuine concern on the subject of pensions. I recall the extensive work of the Standing Committee on Transport whose recommendations as set out in the fourteenth report put new impetus on the Crown corporation, the CNR, to look closely at their different pension schemes. The Minister of Transport

(Mr. Jamieson) has explained to the hon. member and to the House on different occasions, most recently on January 22, that he has had direct discussions with the CNR on these recommendations. He has expressed hope of what would appear to be a sympathetic response by the company in their discussions.

There are, as all hon. members know, complicating factors in that different aspects of the pension issue are a matter for collective bargaining. While it would not be appropriate to comment on this particular point, the subject was covered in the House by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) in a reply to the hon. member from Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) on January 20, and again on January 22 by the Minister of Transport in a reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). In responding to this adjournment proceeding, the Minister of Transport has asked me to express to the hon. member and to the House that he is optimistic about this subject and very hopeful that progress will be forthcoming at an early date.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DISCONTINUANCE OF DINING CAR SERVICE, OTTAWA-MONTREAL

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, some time ago Canadian National Railways announced it was going to discontinue the dining car service on their passenger trains between Montreal and Ottawa. When the CNR made that announcement, several of us in this House protested. I personally approached the president of the CNR, the president of the Canadian Transport Commission and the minister. Hon. members protested because, to begin with, these trains travel at the breakfast hour and the supper hour and have been receiving very heavy patronage. As a matter of fact, I travel on these trains very often and it is not uncommon for me to have to wait up to half an hour before I can get into the dining car.

In addition, many people use this train between Ottawa and Montreal—a service between the national capital and Canada's metropolis—because the highway is so bad that it is almost impossible to drive upon it safely. I think someone wrote an article recently pointing out that this stretch of highway has had the highest rate of accidents and deaths in Canada for the last few years. We based our protest also on the fact that more people would be put out of work at this time of heavy unemployment if this service were withdrawn.

In posing my question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson] last Friday, I asked whether he had received any further answer from the CNR on this matter and he replied he had not. At that time I had not received any answer from the CNR either, but today I received an answer from the president of the CNR in which he stated that despite the use of the service, the CNR is sustaining a loss of $300,000 annually. I am not suggesting that the government of Canada should subsidize people's meals on this service to the tune of $300,000 a year. But I am wondering whether the railway has really looked into alternate methods of providing dining car service. I think many people would be willing to pay an additional amount to receive a good meal in the morning and at supper time. Has the company investigated the possibility of giving out a concession for this service?

What really disturbs me is this. I support what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I was a member of the transport committee which put forward the report on pensions, and what bothers me is the way the CNR disregards the wishes of the elected representatives of the people. It seems to me that the CNR should not only administer this national railway in an economical and efficient manner, but should also administer it with a social conscience. I am not convinced that they do this. They are not doing this with respect to pension plans, they are not doing it when they take off a dining car service at a time like this.

The minister's representative is here tonight, and through him I ask the CNR to reconsider this whole decision. I ask them to reconsider whether there might not be a way of providing this service and in particular I ask them to pay more attention to the fact that they are a national railway. They should serve the needs of Canadian people. When they come here from time to time and ask for money through a finance bill, we should have the right, as members of Parliament did in the seventeenth century in England, to refuse them money until they deal with our grievances.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), is very much aware of the decision of Canadian National Railways to adjust food service facilities on the Montreal-Ottawa passenger service effective today. It is understood that the adjustments, including the specific one mentioned by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), were designed to rationalize the Montreal-Ottawa service. They include revised arrival and departure times at both cities, the use of rail-liner equipment on several trains and reduced club car fares. The dining car service, which is extremely expensive to operate, is being replaced by hot snack and bar service facilities.

As the hon. member knows, the Canadian Transport Commission is also aware of this matter. In reference to the National Transportation Act, this decision is one which the railways are free to make without coming to the commission for prior approval. The Canadian Transport Commission would, of course, be required, subject to the terms of section 315 of the Railway Act relating to the adequacy and suitability of accommodation and incidental service, to investigate complaints respecting the change.

I assure the hon. member that I would be pleased to bring his representations to the attention of the Minister of Transport, who will no doubt refer them to the government-owned railway for its consideration.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That will be a big help!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PROPOSED AMCHITKA UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, in the very few moments at my disposal tonight I want to ask the government whether it is going to allow another and very much greater nuclear underground test in the Aleutian Islands of the North Pacific, to the potential peril of British Columbia and coastal communities. Is it going to protest this intention of the United States government, as indicated over the weekend in President Nixon's speech, as it did in 1969 in the case of a smaller test? If such a protest is made and fails, will the government consider other protective action on behalf of British Columbians?

I should like very briefly to interpolate the fact that my concern over the proposed Aleutian explosion is underlined by two other developments also exposing British Columbia to foreign pollution. I refer very briefly, Sir, to the announced intention of the Atlantic Richfield Oil Company to ship oil by tanker from Alaska down the B.C. coast, through Puget Sound to a point within a few miles of British Columbia recreational and beach areas in my constituency, with its attendant danger of oil spills. I also refer to the application for the right to build a spur railroad line from a B.C. coalfield to link with a U.S. rail line in order to ship coal to the United States and up through the existing rail line in White Rock and Crescent Beach in my area. This is some of the most beautiful beach area on the continent.

Specifically in connection with the news we heard over the weekend of the intention of the United States government to provide funds for this very much greater nuclear explosion in the Aleutian Islands in the north Pacific, I want to say that this is an area which is earthquake prone. While there was no quake and no tidal wave as a result of the small test in 1969, there is certainly no guarantee that this will not happen as a result of the test which I understand is to be made next fall. British Columbians, at least, can recall the effects of the Alaskan earthquake which took place a few years ago. There was a tidal wave generated in the same area which resulted in high waves crashing into B.C. communities such as Port Alberni, causing tremendous damage.

The underground nuclear test planned in the Aleutians by the United States—I have studied this matter at some length—will be of immensely greater blast power than the previous one, having the power of thousands of tons of TNT to be exploded underground in the Aleutians in what we could call British Columbia's back fields. I think this proposal is a very foolish one from three points of view. In the first place, it will cost millions of dollars to the United States even if it does no damage to Canada, to Alaska or to other areas on the Pacific coast. In the second place, it can do no conceivable good; it will only spur the Soviet Union to undertake similar, insane tests. In the third place, it really poses a threat to the health and property of Canadians.

I remind hon. members that in 1969 this government warned the United States, in the case of a smaller test, that if damage resulted to Canadians we would expect the U.S. government to compensate Canadians for that damage. In other words, we objected to that test. Now we are faced with a much larger one. My general contention is that British Columbia, and British Columbians in particular, are in danger from what is proposed. I ask the government whether it is going to accept this threat of foreign pollution or whether it is considering what efforts it may make to prevent the test being conducted.

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, the decision of the United States to undertake a series of nuclear tests on Amchitka Island in the Aleutian Islands prompted Canada to make very energetic representations to the American government.

I understand the point of view of the hon. member, especially as the Canadian government is extremely concerned about the very serious consequences the explosions could have on the environment. But it is also worried about the whole matter of nuclear testing. In fact, Canada is extremely worried about all nuclear tests in general and our aim is that nuclear tests everywhere, including of course underground, must stop as soon as possible. We hope that it will be possible in the near future to come to an agreement to end all nuclear tests. This is our hope in Canada, and this is what the government is endeavouring to realize.

In this connection, we expressed the hope that every country which is not a party to the 1963 treaty which provides for partial prohibition—including nuclear powers such as China and France—will sign and ratify this treaty. In the meantime, in order to facilitate progress toward a total prohibition of tests everywhere, the Canadian delegation to the Geneva Committee on disarmament kept up its efforts to further an agreement, by requesting international exchanges of seismic data which would assist in identifying undergroung nuclear tests. At the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1969, Canada moved a resolution urging member states to provide information on their methods to detect earth tremors and to indicate which data they would be prepared to communicate on a guaranteed basis, in an international exchange on detection and identification of underground tests through seismological methods.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.22 p.m.

SINGAPORE COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ AND DECLARATION

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I referred yesterday in my statement on motions both to the final communiqué of the Commonwealth heads of government meeting and to the Commonwealth declaration. Under Standing Order 41(2) I should like now to table each of these documents and, should it meet the pleasure of the House, request that they be printed as an annex to Hansard for the convenience of members, as has been done in the past.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROJECTED TAKEOVER OF HOME OIL BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 having to do with the projected takeover of a Canadian oil company by a United States firm. Since 83 per cent of oil and gas production and 99 per cent of petroleum refining in Canada are now under foreign control, it seems imperative that the government should take action, as it did in the case of Denison Mines, to preserve a degree of Canadian ownership. I therefore wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the following motion:

In view of the announcement that negotiations are in progress for the purchase of Home Oil Company Limited of Calgary, Alberta, by Ashland Oil Incorporated, of Ashland, Kentucky, this House urges the government to take whatever steps are necessary to prevent the takeover of the largest remaining Canadian-owned oil producer.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. Under Standing Order 43, is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROJECTED TAKEOVER OF HOME OIL BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am happy to see him looking so well on his return from Halifax. Has the minister had conversations with the executive of the Home Oil Company and the alleged prospective purchaser of control of that company? If so, can he indicate very briefly the nature of the conversations?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his kind words. I want to assure him that while in Halifax I paid his respects to the people of Nova Scotia. With regard to the question, Mr. Speaker, I have had conversations over a period of some weeks both with the potential buyers, the Ashland Company, and with the president of the Home Oil Company with regard to the purported sale. I have urged upon them the desirability of maintaining a majority Canadian ownership and Canadian control in this company. To date the president of the Home Oil Company has clearly displayed his very keen interest as a Canadian citizen in maintaining a majority interest in Canadian ownership. Under the laws that exist, I will, to the best of my ability, continue to maintain the position that this major Canadian oil company should be retained as a Canadian company.

Mr. Stanfield: I am sure that Mr. Brown is anxious to maintain control of this company in Canada, but is the government making any proposals to assist in the retention of the control of this important independent oil company in Canada?

Mr. Greene: We can only operate under the law as it exists, Mr. Speaker, and within the law as it exists we will do everything possible to assure the maintenance of this company as a Canadian company. I am assured that both the potential American buyer and Mr. Brown, the president of Home Oil, are very much aware of the government's concern that this company be maintained as a Canadian company.

Mr. Stanfield: May I remind the minister that there are ways of accomplishing things other than by issuing orders. Does the minister now realize that some of the proposals in the white paper on tax reform make it very difficult for independent oil companies to operate successfully and face the future with confidence?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, it seems that Your Honour jumped the gun a little soon. The minister was about to reply and I would like to hear his reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps it is the hon. member who has jumped the gun. I suggest to the hon. member with respect, in the same way in which he commented on the Chair's reaction, that that is hardly a point of order. It was my impression that the Leader of the Opposition was satisfied to let the matter rest, having made his comment. His question was more in the nature of comment, argument or debate. I would not think the Leader of the Opposition would insist that the Chair fracture the rules to allow the minister to reply. In any event, the Chair has recognized the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since Mr. Atkins, the President of Ashland Oil, has said he is negotiating to secure a controlling interest and not a minority interest in Home Oil, can the minister tell the House whether he has received any assurance either from Mr. Atkins of Ashland Oil or from Mr. Brown of Home Oil that a Canadian majority interest will be retained in this transaction now being negotiated?

Mr. Greene: I have no legal undertakings or anything as strong as that, but certainly Mr. Brown, the president of Home Oil, has indicated very clearly his desire that this company be retained as a majority Canadian company. Mr. Atkins, president of Ashland, has also indicated to me that he fully understands the representations I have made to him as to the desire of the government that this company be continued as a Canadian company and as to the political sensitivity of the Canadian people in this regard, and he is making every attempt to assure that this be enabled although again, as I have said, I have no legal undertakings in that regard.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the minister's statement a few moments ago that he can only operate within the law, may I ask the hon. gentleman whether the government is prepared to exercise the same powers with respect to Home Oil Company remaining in Canadian hands as were exercised by the government with respect to Denison Mines in order to maintain a measure of Canadian ownership in each of these industries?

Mr. Greene: I cannot speak for the government in that regard at this time. That would be a matter for the government to decide. However, I am sure that the very positive decision taken by the government at the time of the Denison situation is very much in the minds of the potential United States buyer.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since this is of great importance and there is not much value in discussing it after the transaction has been completed, will the minister undertake to report back to the House as to the success of his negotiations with these two companies and indicate whether or not he has been able to persuade the Canadian company to retain a majority interest and Ashland Oil Incorporated to be satisfied with a minority interest?

Mr. Greene: I quite appreciate the very great importance of this question to the Canadian people and to this House, and I certainly undertake to keep hon. members apprised of developments as I am aware of them and as I feel that within the sensitivities of my relationship with the buyer and seller I am able to do so.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN COMPANIES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a related question for the Minister of National Revenue. Can the hon. gentleman tell us the date by which it is expected a report will be received from the working group set up under the minister's chairmanship to examine the whole area of the operations of multinational corporations so that the government's policy in this regard can be clearly delineated, if not understood?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): I am not in a position at this time to give the hon. member the information he is seeking.

SOCIAL SECURITY

DIFFERENCE OF OPINION BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Following the refusal of Quebec to take part in other discussions on social security because its ideas are diametrically at variance with those of the federal government, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether Ottawa intends to disregard the Quebec claims and to thrust its views, especially on the guaranteed income program and on the whole social security program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why the hon. member refers to a refusal to discuss or to a dead-lock. On the contrary, this matter will be discussed at the federal-provincial conference next week.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—IMMEDIATE AMENDMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT IN VIEW OF INCREASE IN FUND—INCREASE IN FEDERAL SHARE OF WELFARE COSTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is it the position of the government that the problems of unemployment and the unemployed are being met this winter by the existence of the unemployment insurance program, as was suggested by the right hon. gentleman outside the House yesterday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker, and the suggestion is not one that I made.

Mr. Lundrigan: Perhaps the Prime Minister would like to clear up the statement he made outside the House yesterday because it certainly communicated exactly that impression to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the positive need for amendment of the unemployment insurance regulations, will the Prime Minister give consideration to bringing in immediate amendments in order to help the many thousands of people who are unemployed and fail to qualify for assistance because their benefits are exhausted or because they do not qualify under the present regulations? I ask this question particularly in view of the fact that the unemployment insurance fund has jumped to a figure of almost half a billion dollars.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that this question has been asked a number of times in the past few days, but I recognize that the matter is one of importance and interest to all hon. members on both sides of the House. Perhaps the Prime Minister or someone else on behalf of the government might be allowed to reply.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North has a supplementary so perhaps both supplementaries might be answered at the same time.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Since most large cities in Canada are showing an increase in welfare costs of 30 per cent or more this year over last year, which is an intolerable burden for the cities, is the government giving consideration to providing special assistance to the cities and provinces to meet these greatly increased costs?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, any increase in municipal or provincial expenditures also means an increase in expenditure for the federal government since we match their expenditure to the extent of 50 per cent.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, may I repeat my question to the Prime Minister. As there are many thousands of Canadians who fail to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits under the existing regulations or who have exhausted their benefits, will the government give consideration to bringing forward immediately amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to enable these people to qualify and take advantage of the almost half a billion dollars now in the unemployment insurance fund?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the whole question of unemployment insurance has been before the House in the form of a white paper and I am surprised that the hon. member has not made suggestions at the right place. As far as the government is concerned, we will be introducing legislation shortly on this matter.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact that the answer to that question is no, could I ask the right hon. gentleman whether it is the policy of the government that people who are desirous of work but unable to find employment should resort to welfare or the dole?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that this question is hardly in order. I do not think that in its present form it is acceptable.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the unemployment insurance fund, I understand, in September amounted to some $450 million, has steadily increased, has now reached the figure of $470 million and is still increasing, can the Prime Minister advise what plans he has to enable those who are unemployed to obtain some benefit from this money which seems to be out of their reach at this particular time as a result of the government's attitude?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the use of this fund will be dealt with when we introduce the legislation to revise the unemployment insurance scheme.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister what these people who cannot get work or unemployment insurance are expected to do in the meantime?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition I would ask that the Prime Minister now answer the question posed by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the answer given by the Prime Minister in regard to the federal government sharing the costs, and he was correct in what he said, but may I ask the right hon. gentleman whether the government is giving any consideration to increasing the percentage of its share of the costs to 60 per cent or two-thirds rather than one-half?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED ESCALATION OF MILITARY ACTIVITY ACROSS FRONTIERS OF LAOS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister in respect of distressing reports of escalating military activity across the frontiers of Laos. Can he advise whether the government has any information in respect of these widespread reports that might be of interest to the people and the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not understand where the increasing military activity was.

Mr. Macquarrie: The reports indicate it is across the frontiers of Laos in Indo-China, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Were you not aware of it?

Mr. Trudeau: I am not aware of it, Mr. Speaker, but I will refer the question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES AND CITIES BECAUSE OF UNEMPLOYMENT—INCLUSION ON AGENDA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question similar to one I asked yesterday. When he meets with the premiers will there be discussion of financial assistance to the provinces and cities because of increasing unemployment in the larger urban centres of Canada, particularly in light of the fact that the Minister of Justice said in Winnipeg yesterday this subject was on the agenda?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if it is on the agenda it obviously will be discussed.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister's attitude in regard to unemployment in Canada is the same as his attitude toward Members of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask him whether he has had time since his return, after being away for a few weeks, to determine whether the subject of unemployment is on the agenda?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have communicated with the provinces and submitted to them a final agenda. Until they agree to it, it is not customary to make the agenda public.

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister said yesterday it was not on the agenda, although during an intellectual spasm at that time said he thought the problem was serious, will it be on the agenda?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD AND PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In view of a statement attributed to him, can he say that NORAD is now regarded as a very effective means of protecting Canadian sovereignty against United States incursions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might find some other way to ask the question. I would think it sounds very much like an academic question, and in those terms it should not be asked at this time.

INQUIRY RESPECTING CONTINUANCE OF MILITARY COLLEGES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence. In light of the very favourable role that military colleges play in connection with our armed forces, can he now indicate to the House and the people of Canada, particularly those in the armed forces, what his reaction is to the suggestion contained in the youth report to the Secretary of State regarding the closing down of military colleges in Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I cannot really respond to speculation as to what may or may not be in the report.

Mr. Forrestall: I apologize, Mr. Speaker, as I did not intend to arouse the ire of the minister. Can he indicate whether any consideration is being given by his department or the government to closing down our military colleges?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

OPPORTUNITY FOR PROMOTION OF ENGLISH-SPEAKING MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES WHO FAIL TO PASS SECOND LANGUAGE TEST

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether any English-speaking members of the Canadian forces will be denied the opportunity to qualify for promotion if they fail to achieve a certain minimum score on a language aptitude test, notwithstanding that in all other respects they now qualify for promotion?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would have to make a further examination, but my impression would be that there would be no difficulty in this regard.

Mr. McIntosh: Will any English-speaking members of the Canadian armed forces be denied the opportunity to qualify for promotion if they fail to admit willingness to serve in a Francophone environment, notwithstanding the fact that in all other respects they now qualify for promotion?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Again I would think not, Mr. Speaker, but if the hon. member has a specific question in mind I would be glad to hear it and obtain the exact facts.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in the course of his investigations will the minister determine the source of the policy behind the directive sent to certain regiments in western Canada in respect of ineligibility for promotion if members fail to acquiesce or indicate their willingness to serve at Valcartier in a bilingual capacity?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite happy to do so. The hon. member seems to have some particular information and I would be glad to have his assistance in pursuing this inquiry.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NOVA SCOTIA—CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES ON RESERVES TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In light of the statement by Mr. Noël Doucette, President of the Union of Nova Scotia Indians, that 90 per cent of the Indians are unemployed, would the minister bring forward any potential projects planned for the reserves, with particular reference to the construction of new houses which I realize the minister knows are urgently required?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have already advised the House that I asked the officials of my department to implement immediately the housing programs on all reserves and I shall inquire to see whether there is a special problem in Nova Scotia.

I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member for Churchill and advise him that, on the contrary, there has not been—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I first might inquire whether there is a supplementary to the question asked originally by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys.

Mr. Muir: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Would the minister be good enough to report back when he gets his findings?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to report to the House.

Now I would like to answer the question I was asked previously—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: It was my intention to recognize the hon. minister for that reason.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

CUTBACK IN HOUSING CONSTRUCTION ON CLANDEBOYE AND FISHER RIVER RESERVES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. member for Churchill asked me if there had been budget cuts about the housing program in some reserves of northern Manitoba. I am now pleased to inform him that, on the contrary, there has been a $100,000 increase in the 1971-72 budget.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not aware of the fact that the chiefs in the Fisher River-Clandeboye districts have been advised quite recently there will be a cutback in the housing program in these areas?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I would be most surprised if they had been advised, Mr. Speaker, because there has been an increase in the amounts of money granted. However, hon. members will realize that the costs of construction may have increased a little, which means that we may not build more houses but there will be more money available this year.

COMBINES

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION OF APPARENT COLLUSION OF AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE COMPANIES REGARDING RATES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can he indicate to the House whether he or officials of the Combines Investigation Branch are presently investigating the apparent collusion of automobile insurance companies in raising their rates across Canada substantially and in Manitoba by some 30 per cent?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if there is collusion, as I have made clear in the House before it can be taken that the Director of Investigation and Research of the Combines Investigation Branch will enforce the Combines Investigation Act as it is now written.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, can the minister say when he will be introducing the revised combines legislation and whether service industries such as insurance will be subject to the provisions of the Act?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, we are working on the revision now, as the House knows, and I would hope to introduce the bill as soon as it is drafted. It would be improper, of course, for me to say now what the provisions of that legislation will be. They will be made known when the legislation is read the first time.

UGANDA—INQUIRY AS TO GRANTING OF DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION TO NEW REGIME

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can he inform the House whether Canada has taken or is taking steps toward recognition of the new government of Uganda?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, I cannot inform the House, but I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be happy to answer when he is in the House.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the Prime Minister has had any communication with Mr. Obote since leaving Singapore?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker; there has been no communication with Mr. Obote since I left Singapore.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LENNOX ISLAND RESERVE—SAFE MEANS OF TRAVELLING TO MAINLAND

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in an attempt to clear up a misunderstanding. About a week and a half ago the minister informed me no decision had been taken in respect of the establishment of a solid link with the Lennox Island Indian Reserve. It is my understanding that the people of the Lennox Island Indian Reserve were informed that such a decision would in fact be taken and that construction would start this spring. Can the minister clear up this confusion now? If not, would he be prepared to make a statement on motions in the near future?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I shall inquire, Mr. Speaker, and answer the hon. member tomorrow.

NATIONAL REVENUE

COMPLEXITY OF TAX RETURNS REQUIRED OF OLD AGE PENSIONERS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he is aware that old age pensioners 70 and over, many of whom suffer from chronic illness, are being asked for the first time by officials of the government to fill out what to them are very complex tax returns? Will the minister explain why this harassing action is being taken against these people?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is not the purpose of the department to harass old age pensioners or Canadians generally. If the hon. member would care to give me particulars of the cases in question, I would be glad to have them looked into.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION OF CAR REPAIR INDUSTRY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is somewhat related to one asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. Can the minister say whether his department is investigating, plans to investigate, or is in consultation with the provinces in respect of the complaints about the high cost and low quality of car repairs in Canada?

Hon. Ron. Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have examined a number of aspects of that situation and I know a number of provinces have also done so. I am not aware, however, of any communication from any province with regard to this matter.

PROPOSED LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES OF CANADIAN ARSENALS, MISSISSAUGA—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF CLOSING OF PLANT

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, on January 18 last I asked a question of the Minister of Supply and Services through the Acting Prime Minister. It is reported in Hansard at pages 2487 and 2488. The question referred to the problem of the lay-off of employees of the Canadian Arsenals plant at Mississauga. Is the minister in a position to answer that question?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that the government is considering the sale of the Canadian Arsenals plant at Long Branch. I believe the hon. member's chief concern, as revealed in his question, is the position of employees in the event of a sale. I can tell him I have been advised by officials of Canadian Arsenals that every consideration will be given to the interests of the employees in the event of a sale. I might say further that if a sale is made it will be to a commercial user who will, of course, have use for the plant's facilities, and therefore I would expect that a sale would lead not to a decrease, but to an increase in the employment opportunities in the area.

Can he give us any information in this regard?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Only to reaffirm to the hon. member that we are attempting to obtain a suitable person to carry on that work. I will communicate the detail to him privately.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SECURING OF TANKS STORED IN GERMANY AS REPLACEMENTS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. As it now has been discovered that there are some 5,000 battle tanks mothballed principally in Germany, is any effort being made by the Canadian government to secure some of these tanks to replace those presently being used by our forces in Europe, which the minister said will soon be worn out?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, prior to any such effort we would have to decide whether we intend to continue to perform that role in Europe or perform one that is more consistent with the force structure in Canada.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all aware of the facts, but I will be pleased to ask the Quebec Minister of Justice for information which I will pass on to the hon. member.

Mr. Asselin: I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In line with his answer, could the minister inquire as he indicated and table the requested information in the House?

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—COMMISSION MEMORANDUM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the memorandum entitled "Special Recruitment of Francophones in the Public Service" which the President of the Treasury Board tabled in the House, saying that it was issued without his knowledge or consent. Since this memorandum seems to violate the whole merit principle of the Public Service Employment Act, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he knew about this memorandum and whether it was issued with his authority?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no agreement on my part that it violates in any way the merit principle. On the contrary, as the President of the Treasury Board said in his statement to the press, it is the intention of the government to seek to hire something like 1,250 university graduates in the Public Service next year. That 250 of them should be Francophone does not seem to indicate that there would be any violation of the merit system. It seems to me rather lower than the proportion that the B and B Commission tends to recommend as Francophone members of the Public Service.

Mr. Simpson: What about bilingualism?

Mr. Trudeau: What have you got to say?

Mr. Simpson: What about bilingualism?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I had not finished the answer. The question asked was whether I had knowledge of the memorandum. The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the question of bilingualism in the Public Service is not the question at issue but rather the matter of authorizing the expenditure of money and taking steps to bring people into the Public Service through the back door rather than through the front door, I want to ask the Prime Minister if he knows who did authorize the issuance of this memorandum and, if he does not, would he undertake to find out?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the memorandum was issued pursuant to a decision of cabinet last November.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition but the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond seeks the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege. It is based on the answer just given that this memorandum was put out by direction or decision of the cabinet. In that case, it is time this House called on quite a few members of the government to resign because they told the House otherwise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister arising out of his answer that it was intended to hire 1,250 persons in a particular category, of whom 250 would be Francophones. Am I to conclude from this that the other 1,000 positions may be filled only by Anglophones?

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I will come to the hon. member for Calgary North in just a moment.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like the Prime Minister to clarify his answer. The President of the Treasury Board and the Acting Prime Minister both said they had no knowledge of this memorandum. The Prime Minister now says this step was taken as a result of a decision by cabinet last November. If the cabinet authorized this memorandum, may I ask the Prime Minister how it is that ministers in his cabinet did not know anything about it?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is because the memorandum itself was not seen or authorized by the cabinet.

Mr. MacInnis: Make up your mind.

Mr. Trudeau: My mind is made up.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, when the President of the Treasury Board said, and I am paraphrasing him, that this was not approved by cabinet, at that time so far as his conscience was concerned was he telling the truth in the House of Commons as a member of the cabinet?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is quite simply yes. I was telling the truth. If the hon. gentleman will refer to Hansard, page 2753, he will find I made reference to a lack of comprehension, which apparently still persists.

Some hon. Members: Where?

Mr. Drury: I said:

> It is well known that the government has expressed its intention and desire to increase the proportion of Francophones in the Public Service. To this end it is willing and has declared its willingness to devote additional resources toward the accomplishment of this purpose if satisfactory means are proposed to achieve this. The process we are looking at here—
> That is this celebrated memorandum.
> —is part of an exploration of possible means of achieving this purpose.

I repeat again that it is the declared intention of the government to raise the proportion of Francophones in the Public Service. The government has declared its intention to devote additional resources to this end, up to $2 million if need be, if a feasible method of accomplishing this purpose can be found. The memorandum to which the hon. gentleman from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands refers is the beginning of the process of finding an acceptable means of increasing this proportion, which would cost about $2 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the minister's statement correctly, the cabinet approved the hiring of additional Francophones but this memorandum was sent out without the cabinet's knowledge. This document, which violates the merit principle in the Public Service Employment Act, was sent out without the Prime Minister's consent. May I now ask him whether the government intends to take any action with reference to this violation contained in the memorandum which was sent out without the consent of any minister, including the Prime Minister?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the imagined offence is. I have tried to explain. We are looking at a part of the process of endeavouring to find a feasible plan to give effect to the government's intention. It is inevitable that in this process all courses of action will be explored, some of which will be good and some of which will be bad. The bad ones I hope we will not accept; the good ones I hope we will. I look forward to the not too distant future when we will have a good and feasible plan which will be consonant both with the merit principle and the expressed intention of the government to increase the proportion of Francophones in the Public Service.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's statement that the government is seeking for a plan, may I ask him if he has read the second last paragraph in the memorandum which says that to "help speed up the implementation of the program, it is proposed to hold a preliminary meeting" on such and such a date? Is this not a program already, a program on which a telephone survey had already been conducted, and a plan which had been put into effect by the Public Service Commission without the knowledge of the government?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised that a man who has headed a government, albeit in another place, should be so unaware of the processes of government. I have explained to him that until such time as a so-called program receives the formal approval of the Treasury Board it is not a program, and this proposal which is being canvassed and explored had not been submitted to and consequently had not received the approval of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I seek some clarification from the Prime Minister. When he said a few moments ago that the intention was to employ 250 Francophone Canadians out of a total of 1,250, did he imply or mean to imply or to suggest that the other 1,000 would be Anglophones? May I ask him in all sincerity to explain what he meant in order to prevent further misunderstanding?

Mr. Trudeau: Quite simply, Mr. Speaker, it was foreseen that the government would need about 1,250 university graduates in the coming year. According to the way these processes have operated in the past, everyone knows that of the requirements of the government the overwhelming majority of them have been Anglophone rather than Francophone. It was in order to try to redress this imbalance, which has perhaps been the result of lack of policies in the past, that the government wanted to ensure that there would be at least a minimum of 250 who would be Francophones. If there can be more, well and good, but obviously, because of the way the administration has operated in the past, they did not come automatically. We never had the proper percentage. In order to permit the government to implement effectively its policies of bilingualism, we must spend a little more to make sure that we have at least this minimum of one-quarter which, as the hon. member knows, does not even correspond to the percentage of Francophone people in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister which, if answered, will I think allay some of the confusion and misunderstanding relating to the government's policies in the development of Canada. With respect to its attitudes and its policies, is the government basing these matters on the fact that Canada is a bicultural country or a multicultural country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is a multicultural country but a bilingual one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period expired a few moments ago, but perhaps we might recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for one more supplementary.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, may I add to my answer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Prime Minister could add to his reply when replying to the hon. member's supplementary question.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple and direct question which I think will clarify what has taken place this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Which is it, a feasibility study not yet approved by Treasury Board, as described by the President of the Treasury Board, or a firm project approved by cabinet last November? Which is it?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, last November the cabinet authorized the expenditure of an additional $2 million if a feasible plan could be found. In order to find such a feasible plan—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Is the House interested in the answer or not, or are members trying to make political yards? That seems to me a rather narrow approach to the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: One could never accuse the Prime Minister of that.

Mr. Trudeau: As a result, the cabinet took this decision. That decision was communicated to the Public Service Commission and the Public Service Commission went about trying to devise a plan which would produce the results sought.

To add to my previous answer, I said that this is a bilingual country, but the specification was Francophone and they might be of any racial origin.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The President of the Treasury Board on January 26 said: "It will not be a program approved by the government until it has been submitted to the Treasury Board and approved." Now the Prime Minister says that it was approved in November.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some people have been asleep at the switch.

Mr. Woolliams: Go on; let us have another answer like that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is hardly a question of privilege. It is a point of discussion. There will be other opportunities to discuss this matter. There will be another question period tomorrow, and I suggest to hon. members that the matter might be pursued then.

Mr. Bell: No doubt it will be aired on television.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I ask the Prime Minister to explain why he said that this matter was decided in cabinet in November when only last week we were informed that the government, after trying to find who was responsible for the memorandum, had not been able to do so. I therefore suggest that this nonsense about a November cabinet decision is just that, nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a question of privilege. It is further questioning. As I said, there will be another question period tomorrow and hon. members may then be given an opportunity to pursue the matter if they are not satisfied with the information they have received. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Monday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury (for the Prime Minister) that Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, just before the debate ended yesterday, I had mentioned—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if hon. members would allow the hon. member who has the floor a chance to make his remarks. Perhaps the conversations going on might be pursued outside the House or behind the curtains. They are somewhat embarrassing for hon. members who want to listen to the hon. member and, as well, for the hon. member who is trying to make a speech.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, members who rise immediately after the question period run into this sort of situation almost every day. Last evening, when concluding my remarks, I mentioned that the question of the control of our environment ought to transcend any sensitivity about the constitution, about what might be said at the meetings of premiers and the like. What is involved here, quite apart from the environment, is life itself. Every day we become aware of new substances polluting our environment. Every day we learn of additional chemicals and poisons.

The notable case brought to our attention in the last few days is the discovery of a higher than tolerable level of mercury in swordfish. Many of these swordfish live in midocean. Earlier on the west coast, we discovered that catches of dogfish, destined for Europe, contained a higher than tolerable level of mercury. The fish were condemned. There are many other species of fish which feed on the bottom of the ocean. They could, likewise, contain levels of mercury or pesticides which, if consumed by humans, would be injurious. Such chemicals are so injurious to the fish life in the oceans. It is true that, politically, Canada cannot exercise jurisdiction beyond its boundaries anad beyond its territorial seas. It is true that, if we take some action, we may be able to influence indirectly other countries about controlling the environment within their jurisdictions. Certainly, Canada ought to pursue the course it has pursued in some instances.

For instance, to indicate our concern we passed a bill to permit us to exercise some control over the environment in the Arctic. In that case, the government did not hesitate to bring forward legislation extending our sea boundaries 100 nautical miles out from our land. Indeed, we were concerned about international law and international concepts of law, but we said that our decision could not be challenged in international courts. Surely, even if it may not be practical or even desirable to extend our jurisdiction for such purposes out into the ocean, to the extent that we can exercise such jurisdiction we should take definitive measures to protect life and to protect ourselves.

The ocean produces 70 per cent of the oxygen which we breathe. Scientific studies have shown that because of pesticides, other chemicals, tons of junk and billions of gallons of other materials being poured into our oceans, which are considered inexhaustible cesspools, the process of producing oxygen is being destroyed. The very minute organisms in the oceans that produce 70 per cent of our oxygen are being killed by pollutants being dumped daily into the oceans. Who knows how long it will be before these organisms are all destroyed?

We are participating in a world-wide program of destroying the production of oxygen. It will not be too much longer before there is no oxygen left, and that will mean the end of all forms of life. Possibly we cannot do a great deal in view of our position and the relative amount of pollutants we pour into the oceans. However, we can do something. We must do something concrete and forceful about this situation in order to convince other members of the United Nations to adopt the same course.

Studies have shown that DDT and similar pesticides have almost an interminable life. Photoplankton in the ocean are the basis for protein-producing organisms that capture sunlight. Through a process of photosynthesis, they produce protein for the animal life in the ocean. These are being destroyed by the billions of gallons of chemicals and effluent being poured into our waterways by municipalities and industry which eventually reach the oceans.

Another matter that should be of concern to the government is air pollution. All the government has done to date is to make a simple declaration in the bill presently before us. There is no point repeating the fact that in the United States automobiles produce 60 per cent of the air pollution. When the emission from automobiles is combined with rocket fuels, insecticides and smoke from industrial plants and incinerators, oxygen is destroyed. This affects human life, and in particular, can cause impairment of the mother's foetus.

The government does not recognize the serious situation with regard to sulphur dioxide, carbon monoxide and ash in our air. I do not know what the constitutional position is with regard to control over the air. The government should not introduce a verbal declaration of its concern without indicating what it intends to do about air pollution. If the government follows the same course with regard to air pollution as it did with regard to water pollution under the Canada Water Act, that will not be good enough. It will simply mean another set of standards relating to air that will only come into effect if there is agreement with the provinces. The verbal concern expressed by statute or regulatory form will be meaningless unless agreement is reached with those areas that have the constitutional jurisdiction to deal with these matters.

A conference will be held between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the provinces. This will provide an opportunity for the government to take immediate action. Differences of opinion about the constitution should be brushed aside and the provinces should agree to give the federal government authority to deal with environmental matters. Because the problem is national in scope, there should be a national approach rather than a piecemeal approach by the provinces.

Another area of conflict about which the government does not seem to be seriously concerned is the matter of population. Scientists and biologists have predicted the world population for 1975, 1980 and the year 2000. As a companion measure to the control of the environment and ceasing to pollute our air, land, water, foodstuffs and the like, there must be a world-wide program to limit population growth. If our population doubles by the year 2000, our pollution problems will also double. There is also the problem of the multiplication factor which presently exists with regard to pollution.

Although the government states that it is concerned about the environment, the Department of National Health and Welfare is not concerned about birth control, family planning, and a zero population increase. The department has not recognized this as a matter of tremendous concern. Increased population will contribute to a possible elimination of life within the next two, three or four generations. Even a government that does not care about unemployment should be shaken out of its lethargy on this matter. The government should do more than present a well drafted bill in the hope that the publicity and propaganda machine will lead Canadians to believe that something is really being done.

The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) is very presentable. He is adept at making statements when interviewed over television. One of his pet phrases with regard to pollution is that industry must keep its pollutants within the plant gate. Industry must recycle the water which it uses. The pulp and paper industry cannot be permitted to dump effluents into any body of water. It must have a closed circuit water system. The only water lost as a result of industrial production should be by absorption or evaporation. Neither the minister nor the government have taken any steps to require any industry in Canada to meet these requirements. It is just a declaration and a bit of propaganda. How can anyone believe a government which says it intends to do something and then does not do it? How can we believe anything which the government says about the environment?

Although the department of fisheries has full authority and jurisdiction, there has been no concrete activity to prevent pollution of our environment. It is the only federal department which has full authority. It is true that the department has taken some action which has resulted in pulpmill companies appearing before the courts. A pulp company in my constituency was fined $3,000 for having contravened the Fisheries Act, but that did not stop the pollution. It is true that the company is preparing a plan to present to the department of fisheries. However, that plan does not include a provision to contain their water system within the plant gates, use the same water over again and reclaim the chemicals in it. There is no requirement of that sort. All the $3,000 fine, or whatever it is, amounts to, is a licence to continue to pollute the waters outside the plant. And this case can be duplicated thousands of times across Canada.

Much as I hope that somebody in this government will recognize the need to take concrete action to preserve our environment, and much as I consider this to be probably the most valuable thing with which we can concern ourselves at this time, I am afraid the bill before us does nothing but provide a bit of window dressing; it looks to me as though government policy on pollution control has got into the hands of the speech writers and not into the hands of the cabinet itself.

We are being asked by this legislation to approve the enlargement of the cabinet. We know that this Parliament does not operate in accordance with the rules of democracy. It has not done so for many years. It operates more under the rules of a dictatorship. When decisions are made in Parliament they are made, as everybody here knows, on the basis of party alone. All the Liberals vote one way, and that is that. The concept of democracy, of a person casting a ballot in Parliament according to the dictates of his conscience, just does not fit. It has no place in the system. If the Liberal party does make decisions they are certainly not made in parliament; they are made in back rooms, in secret, in some confidential place where the public cannot see what is happening. This is bad enough in terms of our democratic structure. It is bad enough that no freedom is permitted to the great bulk of the members of this House because they happen to belong to the government party. It is bad enough that the interests of the constituents who elected them to Parliament are not fully represented. It is bad enough that the rules of Parliament are such that power is concentrated in the hands of the cabinet.

I know the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Perrault) has a very long interest in this matter because he used to say precisely the same things as I am saying now when he was a free member in the legislature in Victoria dealing with Premier Bennett.

Mr. Perrault: You read my speeches, did you? Perhaps you learnt something.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): No. I was not able to do that because there is no Hansard in the legislature in Victoria.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): He did not know that.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): What I have been saying may be unpalatable, but it is a fact of life. The general public does not always realize this. They think there is a tremendous amount of freedom in Parliament. They do not know that Parliament operates under the authority of one person, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). That is the case not only with the present Prime Minister but with all of his predecessors I have known. In effect, it is one man rule, except when it completely disintegrates as it did prior to 1962, but that was a unique situation peculiar to the construction of the cabinet at that time. Basically, a political party under the authority of whoever happens to be prime minister, controls Parliament. Parliament does not influence the government. I know that people in the country get rather fed up with the situation. Why is it, they ask, that all we do in Parliament is debate.

For example with regard to the serious unemployment situation which exists at the present time, they ask: why is it that all you do is ask for emergency debates, and then debate the subject? The simple answer is that this is the only course available to an opposition. There is no authority in the rules which permits a member of the opposition to move a motion giving any direction to the government unless by unanimous consent, and it only takes one person to disagree—usually the Prime Minister—to prevent any such motion being put. This is the structure which has been built up over the years to consolidate authority in the hands of one person and give him a dictatorial position. It is bad enough when there is someone in office as prime minister who is incompetent and inept. But when you have a person in office who is an authoritarian, who has a dictatorship concept as to the way in which things should be run, who is rigid in his make-up—as he has said himself in his writings—the matter becomes much more serious.

What the bill before us seeks to do, as others have pointed out, is to give further authority to the Prime Minister which will prevent Parliament from operating even in the limited way in which it is operated at present, and further remove from Parliament one of its opportunities to influence government activities and purposes. Not only does the Prime Minister desire this additional authority, as though he did not possess power enough already; not only does he wish to add to the dictatorial status of his office, but he seeks even further power to control other people should there happen to be one or two in the Liberal party who might wish to show an independent spirit, to depart from the structure or to contend against the government.

The number of cabinet ministers now permitted under the Salaries Act, excluding the leader of the government in the Senate, is 25. The bill before us seeks to establish, in addition, five ministers of stage, making a total of 30. It also seeks to establish posts for a number of parliamentary secretaries, but not more than the number of ministers who are in the cabinet. I assume that these, together with the 25 under the Salaries Act and the five ministers of state, would make a total of 60 posts within the government structure to which a salary is attached. This arrangement permits the Prime Minister to say to another 60: If you do not behave yourselves you will never get into this inner circle. So, he has already got 120 members of the Liberal party tied up with the prospect that if they do not behave according to his satisfaction they cannot expect to remain in, or enter, this inner circle. What little independence may have beat within their breasts would be subdued by the prospect that they would never be appointed a parliamentary secretary or cabinet minister.

In addition, there are the posts of Whip and Deputy Whip which are power posts—two more people the Prime Minister can control. There is the deputy to yourself, Mr. Speaker, and there are the chairmen of the committees, 25, more or less, depending upon the number of special committees, who also occupy positions of power controlled by the Prime Minister. We all know that if the chairman of a committee operates properly, catches the eye of the Prime Minister and makes sure that the will of the government is done in that committee, he has a chance of being elevated to the ministry. The effect of all this is that the Prime Minister is, in a very real sense, in a position to exercise control over all but two members of the Liberal party. He can either ignore them on the grounds that two people do not matter, or he can hold out the prospect that they may become ministers without portfolio.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Or they could go to the Senate.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The Senate is a bonus. I did exclude that, but in order to get into the Senate you first have to get into the cabinet and prove your incompetence at that level. Usually it is not a direct step from the Commons into the Senate.

Mr. Rynard: How about judgeships?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): My friend says, what about judges. I think I have made my point in speaking just of those who happen to be in Parliament and the positions that are available within the parliamentary structure.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is nobody left.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): No, there is no one left; no one with an independent mind or an independent thought. The only independent thought from which we might have benefited might have come from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Perrault), but I see he is leaving.

Seriously, Mr. Speaker, the purpose and intent of this bill is not government reorganization, but government organization of the dictatorship concept. There is no idea here that Parliament shall have any degree of supremacy or authority in this nation. There is no concept within the government structure or within the bill itself of Parliament having any influence, authority or control over what the government does. Through a process of consolidation, governmental power is to be retained within the hands of the Prime Minister. The bill will give him whatever additional authority he needs to keep his own boys in line or to pay them off for having remained in line, and this runs absolutely contrary to our concept of democracy. It is true that we go to the polls on election day, a day when we have true democracy. Individual citizens have the right, without anyone peering over their shoulder, to vote in the way they see fit. But this is also where democracy ends under the present parliamentary structure and under the Prime Minister that we have today.

As I have said, there is one feature of the bill that might have some value, the creation of a department of the environment. Even though this appears to be window dressing, there would be a great tendency to vote for the bill in view of this concept alone because it is headed in the right direction. However, the other parts of the bill make the total package completely unacceptable.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am going to deal first with the general concept of pollution, then with what is taking place under this bill by the government joining the subject of pollution with a variety of other proposals that are unacceptable. It is an obvious endeavour to bring about a vote on the whole bill so that those who vote against the bill will be misinterpreted as voting against action against pollution. As far as I am concerned, Sir, I am not going to be deluded in any way in this regard. This bill is political effrontery. It is designed to deceive the people of Canada and to place members of this House of Commons in a position which, if there were any regard for the House, the government would never have undertaken to do.

I am going to make reference later to some of the hon. gentlemen opposite who now sit in a state of deep concern. I was not here this afternoon during the incident that happened. I am never around when controversial matters are raised, and therefore I missed the scene.

Mr. Francis: Then, you don't know what happened.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member would have received honourable mention even without his interruption. As I say, I missed what took place this afternoon and I wondered what had happened when I returned and saw the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) dancing a political jig in trying to raise some support from the House Leader for the frightful position in which he now finds himself. He ended up, of all places, in a seat with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Let me tell him that, having regard to some of his performances recently, I very much doubt that it will be for very long that he will hold the position of chief whip. Certainly, no one has been placed in a more embarrassing position than he was this afternoon. And I say that with deep concern for him and his welfare, Mr. Speaker.

Last night he had an interview with the press, wherein he stated that he would not be associated with any stand that I took on the Francophone situation. In effect, he said that it did not take place.

Mr. Francis: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West on a question of privilege.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, since the right hon. member referred to me, I think he should do me the courtesy of making his reference precise. I very carefully dissociated myself from a general attack on Francophones, which is what I understood the hon. member himself was doing. I made it very clear it was that from which I was dissociating myself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member was reported in the press as saying that he did not associate himself with me, and as a result of his interpolation I am reminded of a remark made in the House of Commons by Winston Churchill. Apparently as a boy his mother denied him the right to enter a side show at a circus which was advertised as having therein a person with a jellyfish backbone. Finally, Churchill said: "All through the intervening years I felt very badly about the way in which my mother interfered with me seeing that boneless wonder and now what do I see today? I see the Prime Minister of my country occupying the position of that individual in the sideshow". As a result of what happened this afternoon the hon. member, who has had a lot of difficulty climbing the greasy pole of the chief whip, finds himself in a disagreeable position to say the least, the discomfiture of which I can only hope will not result in the decomposition of his chief whipship.

He has now apparently had an assurance that he will not be interfered with, because there is a smile on his face which was not there a few minutes ago as he talked with the House Leader of the Liberal party. I see he also had the assistance and advice of the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner). I did not intend to bring him into this but he has propelled himself forward; and having been Deputy Speaker he is able to speak to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) with authority.

I support the setting up of a ministry of environment. I go further than that and say that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) is a minister who has shown a regard for Parliament in that he answers questions concerning his department without evasion. He has a few colleagues who have a similar regard for the House; there is the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans), the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing), and one or two others. Those ministers understand Parliament, as does the Government Leader of the House. These men are examples from day to day of the manner in which questions should be answered in the House. There are others, who represent the majority, who regard this place as a forum in which they can exercise their histrionic capacities for evasion, and they do so regularly.

I support that part of the bill which has to do with the subject of environmental control, although in point of fact what is revealed in the bill is really meaningless. I cannot bifurcate my vote and will not, under any circumstance, be bamboozled into voting in favour of this bill because I want action taken on pollution thereby giving approval of actions which will pollute Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This resolution was in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the bill was introduced by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), neither of whom are here now. What are they doing?

An hon. Member: Playing with orang-outangs.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: While we cannot hear them, we can very easily imagine.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They are getting their stories straight.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a sad picture. This afternoon we witnessed an example of what has been stated over and over again by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the deception of Parliament by members of this government.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) asked a question this afternoon in connection with the $2 million Francophone expenditure program or plan. We have been asking about that regularly in recent days, trying to find out the origination of this and the circumstances connected therewith. The President of the Treasury Board said he did not know anything about it. As I recall it, although not having reviewed Hansard in respect of questions asked during the last week he said that the situation was that such a measure was unknown to him, and, it was apparently unknown to other ministers because they supported him by their applause.

As I recall, the President of the Treasury Board said there was no program or plan and that the ephemeral, non-existent program had not been before Cabinet. Profumo was not required to leave the House of Commons in 1963 because of his extramural activities; he went out because he deceived Parliament. The President of the Treasury Board said he did not know anything about this plan. The Prime Minister today said it was passed by the Cabinet in November. Where was the President of the Treasury Board? I should like him to be present at this time. He is absent and I feel sure he is not receiving the warm reception the orang-outangs got in Borneo.

This situation has to be cleared up. There has been a deception of Parliament. I have watched the members of the Cabinet because I like to look at the beauty and pulchritude that is there. I watched them as he contended that he knew nothing of such a program and one and all of those who were present showed a reaction in support of what was said by the President of the Treasury Board; that is, he knew nothing about it and it had not been before the Cabinet. To what degradation has this Parliament been reduced. Hidden was the order or the declaration. Even their chief party whip was not enlightened and he has been saying ever since the matter came up in the House that all was well as there was no such plan. I should like to hear him make his alibi tomorrow.

An hon. Member: Will you come and listen?

Mr. Diefenbaker: You cannot laugh it off because I heard him say on television, speaking as the chief Whip for the Liberal party, there is nothing to this matter. When a man with that authority behind him speaks, one must understand even the gods must be silent.

The time has come for this matter to be cleared up. We cannot ask for the production of a Cabinet minute. How was the Minute concealed from the other colleagues in the Cabinet? Surely this government has not arrived at the point where the Prime Minister simply says, this is what the cabinet is going to do and that is a Cabinet minute. Where was the $2 million coming from? That was revealed the other day, when it was said that there are always accounts from which it could be procured. What has happened in this instance reveals the dangerous position in which our democracy is in this country. The government can find $2 million and we would never know about it. We would never know about it if it had not been for Peter Riley of CTV who found out about it, and then was ridiculed for having something that was non-existent. Today the Prime Minister has given his prime ministerial blessing to those who made the assertion that there was a Francophone plan. What were they hiding? If it was all above board and proper, why hide it. I say to the government, that is the three ministers and one hopeful who are present—he is now giving advice having recently returned from his safari across the country on the constitutional question—where is this Parliament going? Parliament has been deceived and deluded by this government. Is it any wonder that in 1963 the Prime Minister uttered certain words which I think ought to be placed on Hansard. He said that the Liberals were a bunch of idiots.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: How true.

Mr. Greene: We have learned a lot since then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman certainly knows how green his valley is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: These are the Prime Minister's words. He said that we have to put up with some bums in the Liberal party and, after the election of 1968, he added that some of the bums were beaten in that election. Is there not an opportunity here for self-identification? Under no circumstances should those who qualify for that description ever become ministers of state. Speaking again of various Liberals of that day he said: "All lousy idiots, for crying out loud." He added that among the old guard, there was the same brutal cynicism. How right he is. What happened today in this House of Commons has not been exceeded since 1931 or 1932 when Mr. Mackenzie King walked in the valley of humiliation. Mention was made by the previous speaker of the fact that with all these jobs created under this bill, there will be a high degree of obedience to what the master says. The Prime Minister, as reported in Cité Libre of April 1963, referred to the "autocracy of the Liberal structure and the cowardice of its members." What of today? Is there anyone who dares be independent now? The sun will not shine for those who dare to disagree. I have more quotations for the edification of those who desire to hear them but I shall pass on, Sir.

Today is a black Tuesday in parliamentary history. The Prime Minister says this program was passed in November, and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) contended last week that it was never before cabinet. Is it any wonder the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) inquired as to who was telling the truth. This bill, in its present form, is a patently transparent attempt to reduce the House of Commons to a decorative nullity. What manner of trick is this? The Prime Minister has been pushing Canada along the road towards being an imitation of or a creature like the House of Representatives of the United States. This bill is to reform the organization of government. Last week the President of the United States stated that reform in organization is necessary. One of his suggestions was to reduce the membership in his cabinet from 12 to 9. At the very same time the government of Canada is asking us to multiply cabinet positions and parliamentary secretaryships to a degree that would make even rabbits blush.

What has been revealed today is an amazing confirmation of that which this Opposition repeatedly has placed before this House. I have seen the Prime Minister thumb his nose at members of the Opposition. I have heard him refer to Members of the House of Commons as bums, and he said the rest of us were nobodys. I have been here for over 30 years. I am 75 years of age, not one or two years younger or older.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have never known a government which treated Parliament with such disrespect. We all wished the Prime Minister well on his trip to the Prime Ministers' Conference. He was welcomed back on Monday. As he got off the aircraft, or just before he gave an interview as reported in the press, he said that a little less talk in the House of Commons is what is needed. I can understand that debate shocks the sensibilities of the government. As to unemployment the Prime Minister's immortal words were that criticism of unemployment was stupid and silly.

The Prime Minister, along with 20 members of his cabinet is to visit Saskatchewan on February 12. This legislation will pass and I hope the appointments will be made before the trip. I would like to see the whole cabinet go out there so that the people will see something they have never seen before. What about this legislation creating parliamentary secretaryships, ministers of state and associate ministers of state? In addition, provision already exists for an unlimited number of ministers without portfolio. I often think of the definition of Sir Robert Borden when asked what a minister without portfolio was. He was unable to answer, except to say they might be called eunuchs—without portfolio.

But what a host! Secretaries to the right, but none to the left. Sir, obviously this bill has been thought up to relieve unemployment in the government ranks. This is a serious matter. This is a serious course that is being followed. It is another step in the direction of a deliberate and calculated degredation of parliament. They are getting away with anything. The other day one of the members said outside the House, "Anything we want to do we get away with." An exception was the Auditor General. When strong objection was raised all across the country the government ran, and evacuated the position it had taken.

What of the institutions of our parliamentary system? Why this multiplicity of ministers? Does it mean that quantity makes for quality? Mr. Speaker, this is the greatest political gravy train in Canadian history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I note the smile on the face of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto). He is a man who, whatever his adversity may be and the hopelessness of joining this select group, smiles, and debates in a way that I always appreciate hearing. The other hon. members sit and wait. There is to be $10,000 a year for ministers without portfolio. There can be ten ministers of state, five for a two-year period. In keeping with the way in which ministers today play this game of revolving responsibilities in the House they can have ten for two-year periods, and ministers of state are to get $15,000.

Mr. Woolliams: In addition to their parliamentary salary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. We are all entitled to that, even those of us who sit in opposition. At present we have the largest cabinet in the history of Canada, with 29 ministers, and now there are to be additions to that number. Sir, this is a shocking example of contempt, with more than a half million Canadians unemployed. "We have nothing for you now," is the answer from the government of Canada to those who call for help.

Today the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked whether or not legislation would be brought in and made effective now, not on July 1, in connection with qualifications for unemployment insurance, and the answer was in the negative. What happened today in this House means that this Parliament is discredited and made a mockery of, a counterfeit, and a travesty of what it should be.

Who are going to get appointed? I feel sorry for the parliamentary aides who were given exit permits. I mean that sincerely. They were becoming experienced, and then they were sent on their way. Who will be appointed? If I can give a suggestion to those who want to, I would say it will be those who practice obsequious cringing and servile flunkeyism who will have the necessary qualifications. I offer this suggestion to hon. members opposite as advice.

Now, let me mention a few examples of the way in which things are hidden, and I must hasten because my time is limited. What about the directive that went out from an official of the Manpower and Immigration Department? The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) said he did not know anything about it. That in no way relieves him or any minister of responsibility. This government hides information it does not want Parliament to know. I will give you an example, Mr. Speaker. I think it was in the month of April I found out that a Treasury order had been passed for the expenditure of $190,000 for letter writers to answer criticisms of the White Paper. I do not know by how much that has been increased since. Some $200 a day was to be made available to chartered accountants. The Prime Minister said he did not know anything about that Treasury order. His memory today was no better concerning the cabinet minute in November, to which I made allusion earlier.

The President of the Treasury Board criticized me. I never was so frightened in my life. He announced outside the House—he did not announce it here—but on the television forum that he was going to get to the bottom of the matter and those who released the information to me—and I too—were going to be proceeded against. He asked, where did it come from? In his eyes the offence was that it was revealed, and not the fact that $190,000 hard cash, taken out of the Canadian taxpayers' pockets, was going to be used for political purposes to explain the unexplainable in the white paper.

The other day the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) gave a good answer when he was asked about the directive issued by the Department of Manpower. He was asked, where did it come from and he replied, "Do you think I want to add to the unemployment ranks?" Apparently over everyone hangs the threat of the government, this intimidation.

Canadians are asking for a reduction in taxation. Questions are asked by the Leader of the Opposition and by other members of the House. They asked the government, "What are you going to do?" The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), in effect, has said that if the government had the opportunity of doing again what they did earlier, they would not follow the course that has been followed. In other words, the government knows that they were wrong. In December, the government produced a budget, Sir, and increased taxation for 1971 by a 3 per cent surtax. All over the nation demands have been made for the government to recognize the proposition put forward by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, namely that taxes must be reduced. Some little changes were made in the budget that provided some eyewash for the Canadian economy; and when we criticize them they say, "You wait." As the Prime Minister said in effect the day before yesterday, anyone who talks about unemployment is talking nonsense.

A revelation took place here today that is the greatest condemnation that any government could have visited on it, namely the revelation that it would, in the House of Commons, deceive and dare to conceal. In what a terrible predicament that put the bashful President of the Treasury Board. I feel sorry for him; and if there were any way in which condolences could be conveyed, that would be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Answers given to many questions asked in this House bear little resemblance to the facts. We are being fooled day by day. What has happened to Parliament? I know that some of my colleagues were all for rules changes. The rules were to be changed; committees were to be set up. I said, "If you do this, you are going to place Parliament in a straitjacket; and that is where it is. Your Honour is not at fault. Your Honour must take the rules as they are. Standing Order 43 today is a joke because, on every matter on which a motion is made, those sitting opposite say, "No". Consent is not given. The doors are closed. It is a bigger joke when members ask for the production of papers.

An hon. Member: The government transfers these questions for debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Instead of having a vote, as was the case in the past, the government transfers these matters for debate. What does this mean? It means the motion is buried, without embalming. In other words, the thing is no more, gone. The people opposite are making a gigantic farce of Parliament.

I have been here, as I have said, a long while. I saw Mackenzie King in action and he was often condemned; but Mackenzie King trusted Parliament. He listened to the views of Parliament when legislation was brought in and changes were suggested. Colonel Ralston, Chubby Power and other great parliamentarians like Ernest Lapointe would agree to changes. That does not apply to the government today. They say in effect, "This is what you will do. You can talk, but we are not going to change." That is the reason, sir, that Parliament today is losing its prestige and significance. There is nothing we in the opposition can do; there is nothing left for us to do. That supine majority that bows before the Prime Minister in obeisance and adoration sees dangling before it these wonderful prizes. Where has independence gone?

I shall conclude with a very serious appeal. In this institution, as I mentioned earlier, some ministers understand Parliament. I hope that they will stand up and save this institution from the obloquy with which it has been visited by this government, a government that seems determined to carry out the views of Machiavelli. The Prime Minister was once asked, "Who is your favourite politician?" He said, "Machiavelli". The next time I speak I shall quote from Machiavelli, because the comparison is tremendously revealing.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-207 which is now before us may be related to Bill C-211 entitled "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1971" of which section 2 reads in part as follows, and I quote:

2. From and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, there may be paid ... and being the aggregate of:

(a) the total of the amounts ... as contained in Schedule A $261,312,756.00;

(b) the total of the amounts ... as contained in Schedule B $204,000,002.00.

These sums of money are especially intended to allow the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to fulfill the promises he made to some hon. members of his party, before the last electoral campaign, in order to convince them to run for re-election.

It was necessary to promise to some of these gentlemen parliamentary secretaryships and to others opportunities for being appointed to a position inside the cabinet. Promises were made so they would decide to run for re-election. And now the time has come for the Prime Minister to carry out his promises.

Bill C-207 will enable the Prime Minister to carry out his election promises but, in order to swing it, a lot of things have been carefully included in this bill; those provisions are not bad in themselves, but they are more or less relevant to the problem under consideration. This new omnibus ill tends to implement the Prime Minister's promises or those of the Liberal organization.

As for the Liberal candidates who took the risk of running, their act of bravery will be rewarded, because the bill will allow almost everyone of them to get a position created under this bill which provides for most interesting remunerations. This is the most important point: five new ministers will be appointed; they will also be paid as such. Sixteen Liberal members, at least, will be appointed Parliamentary Secretaries, which will bring them an allowance of $4,000 in addition to their indemnity. Remuneration is also provided for all the committee chairmen.

Thanks to this new bill, I trust all Liberals will be happy because they will be able to get additional remuneration. I trust that with all this consideration on the part of the Prime Minister, we will hear no more about dissatisfaction within the Liberal party; and that all the Liberal members will be obedient, faithful, and follow religiously the orders of their big chief. I am convinced that disputes within the Liberal caucus will cease for a while.

This bill provides for the setting up of a department of the environment; that makes me laugh because, at the same time as just about everyone is being rewarded in the Liberal party, a pollution department is being created. Some wits might say: Pollution is created, first; then, a department is set up to fight it. There are several types of pollution: water, air, noise, scenic, political and financial.

As a rule, up until now, water and air pollution have been most talked about, but the most important one, which Créditistes have always fought, is financial pollution. Despite good intentions to fight all kinds of pollution, if there is no war against financial pollution, all other forms will remain.

To eliminate water and air pollution, to fight noise, to preserve our landscapes, money is needed. The Department of the Environment created by this bill will spend public funds to create commissions for the study of problems. In order to fight the various kinds of pollution, finance will have to serve municipalities and provinces, so they will be able to take the physical, necessary and essential means to lead an efficient war against pollution where it exists.

The primary function of government is to fight the worst kind of pollutions, that is financial pollution and to make available to provinces and public bodies interest-free loans granted by the Bank of Canada, in order to enable those organizations to take the necessary steps, according to their jurisdiction, and fight pollution.

The government is already polluted by its election funds. It cannot fight financial pollution, because it proceeds therefrom. This is why I have more or less confidence in the establishment of the proposed Department of the Environment.

It is already compromised and will have to be satisfied with finding out the deplorable effects of every kind of pollution. As usual, it will leave the task of solving the problem of pollution to private industry or to others. It will be able to give lessons to everyone on pollution, but it will not act, because it is already polluted.

On Saturday, our Prime Minister came back to Canada, and yesterday, he was in the House for the first time, after an absence of over 25 days, following a trip to Asia.

A few months ago, he said on television: Enough of this nonsense. And today, after several trips to almost every country in the world since 1968, particularly when we see how our Prime Minister behaves in foreign countries, we have to admit that the nonsense is not yet over.

The supreme talent of our great traveller is to bring with him many publicity people who are very well looked after and travel in his own plane. In fact they are shown so much consideration during these long and frequent trips that it is very difficult for them to publish anything but praise for our great traveller when he returns from his long and costly trips.

I would like to give you here the list of all those who accompanied the Right Hon. Prime Minister on his trip to the East. There were forty-five of them. They are Messrs. J.E. Walker, former Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, R.G. Robertson, Secretary to the Cabinet, A.E. Ritchie, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Ivan L. Head, special assistant to the Prime Minister; Romeo Leblanc, press secretary to the Prime Minister; J.L. Gray, President of Atomic Energy of Canada; D.D. Tansley, vice-president in charge of operations, Canadian International Development Agency; A.G. Kniewasser, assistant deputy-minister, Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle), physician to take care of the sick on the trip; Gordon Gibson, special assistant to the Prime Minister; John Gongos, RCMP inspector; H. Stewart, Director, Administration Division, Privy Council Office; R.V. Gorham, Eastern Division, Department of External Affairs; A. Donnelly, assistant press secretary to the Prime Minister; V. Chapman, assistant in some capacity or other to the Prime Minister; Captain R. Godfray, in charge of luggage; Miss Cécile Viau, private secretary to the Prime Minister; Miss Annette Walls, secretary to the Clerk of the Privy Council; Miss Thérèse Brazeau, secretary to the Prime Minister; and Mr. Y. Rivet, communications agent, Department of External Affairs, that is 21 persons to serve the Prime Minister, plus 24 others: newspapermen, radio or television reporters. I have a full list of those people, but it would take too long to read it. Altogether 45 people—a regular foot-ball club—accompanied our great traveller. That represents more than the whole Canadians hockey team travelling to win the Stanley Cup, more than the world football champions.

Our Prime Minister is acting big, as representative of 21 million Canadians. Perhaps he takes himself for his great friend Mao Tse-tung who is at the head of the Chinese Communist government and represents over 800 million Chinese.

With such an escort, Mr. Speaker, with such a team of information jugglers accompanying him, striving to boost his popularity abroad, the Prime Minister liberally distributes Canadian taxpayers' money which he enjoys taking out of their pockets through application of white paper recommendations, resulting in permanent unemployment for thousands and increasing the burden of Canadians.

For instance, during this last trip, our Prime Minister has handed out gifts in all directions, wherever he set foot on the ground. The local press has fostered his publicity by proclaiming him a great friend of their countries unaware that here in Canada the unemployed and the poor were being driven deeper every day to despair. The international vision of our big chief has been well entertained to compensate for a continuous devaluation of his public image here in the minds of Canadians because it is becoming more obvious now and ever since 1968 that this man was brought to power through misleading publicity. In fact, the national image of our great leader is deteriorating and this in the eyes of the Canadian population is tentatively offset by an attempt at popularizing a kind of international superman picture.

Like the frog that wished to be as big as the bull and busted, our great Prime Minister left for Asia twenty-five days ago accompanied by a publicity team which was anxious to present him as the saviour of the Commonwealth, the man who would pull England back into the rank with his diplomatic touch and his athletic prowess, and convince her of the necessity of ending all arms sales to Rhodesia if the Commonwealth was to be saved, its existence being threatened, according to the newspapers.

The conference has now ended and England—

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, the hon. member for Lévis on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a brief question?

Mr. Rondeau: Yes, if it is a brief one.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, if, as the hon. member said, the Prime Minister of Canada went to visit foreign countries, because his popularity was decreasing in Canada, I wonder whether he and his leader are not making trips to western Canada for the very reason that their own popularity is decreasing in Quebec—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making a speech rather than asking a question.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member for Lévis rose. This will enable him to remain in the eyes of his constituents, which he dearly needs, for his interventions in this House have been few and far between.

I see no objection, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that our Prime Minister travels the country or that other members tour Canada to ascertain the problems facing us, for we, as parliamentarians, are here to run the country and pass legislation. Cross-country tours for informational purposes are therefore in order, but it is abnormal that one should spend 60 per cent of one's time abroad as has been the unfortunate case with the right hon. Prime Minister since 1968 who has been trying to solve the neighbours' problems instead of looking in his own backyard.

This conference is now a thing of the past and Britain continues to sell arms to South Africa. May I say in passing that the right hon. gentleman busted his political balloon during the conference since he supported the British position he disapproved prior to his departure for Singapore.

During his 25-day trip, in consultation with the experts who accompanied him, he has done some sort of a political somersault, for he has already proved indeed that he could practically walk on his head—

[English]

Mr. Deakon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to know what all this talk has to do with the organization bill. Is it on the subject, or not?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is questioning the relevancy of the remarks of the hon. member who now has the floor. It seems to me the hon. member for Shefford is, generally speaking, within the relevancy of the debate. He has been speaking about the travels of the Prime Minister within the framework of the organization of government. In this debate so far, I think we have granted fairly wide latitude in the matter of relevance as long as the subject matter related generally to government organization.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, we are considering the organization of the government in general and when we talk about the Prime Minister's trips, I realize that it may hurt some members of this House. Be it as it may, this regards the organization of the government, because we are asked today to vote various amounts of money that were not provided for in the estimates, as a reward for some members on the government side and in order to keep some promises that our Prime Minister made.

In the meantime, our businessmen and Canadians in general are worrying, and rightly so, about the economic situation which is deteriorating day by day. The number of unemployed is increasing at an alarming rate.

The Prime Minister claims that unemployment is nonsense, and that those who speak of it are talking nonsense. The number of unemployed continues to increase at an extraordinary rate while our great traveller, the Prime Minister, turns political somersaults by day and performs—we noticed during his last trip—Asiatic dances during the erotic hours of night in Chinese discotheques.

Our Prime Minister seems concerned about the economic situation in Canada; yet he neglects to solve Canadian problems. His last trip enabled him to—

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for Mercier, who was promoted "whippet" a few days ago, to make the most of his qualities from time to time in the House—

Mr. Boulanger: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether the translation is getting to you correctly, but what the hon. member for Shefford is saying right now, is that 60 per cent of the time the Prime Minister is away from the House. That is not in order. He is telling falsehoods.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has, I think, allowed throughout the speeches of all hon. members a latitude which I believe to be in order and in keeping with the very general nature of the bill before us, a measure dealing with government reorganization. I would hesitate at this stage to indicate that a narrower interpretation should be placed upon the rule of relevancy.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not hold it against the hon. member for Mercier. On the contrary, I congratulate him on his appointment as "whippet", and I hope the government will take into consideration the few interventions he makes in good faith, I believe, in the House.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Could he give me the definition of the term "whippet" if it is in his dictionary?

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the position the hon. member takes, if he cannot find out by himself how to define his functions here. I cannot tell him everything he has to do.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I have another question to ask.

He is not very good at telling the truth—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question asked by the hon. member for Mercier may have been outside the bounds of relevancy. I will ask the hon. member who has the floor to continue his remarks and to keep them within the confines of the bill under consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member for Mercier to kindly ask his superiors, who have appointed him, to define his position, so that he might learn the nature of it.

Mr. Speaker, during his recent trip to Asia, our Prime Minister has once again played Santa Claus, for he has distributed loans to certain countries.

He will soon be telling Canadians—once again—that they must tighten their belts, and that they will have to make sacrifices. He will tell them: Tighten your belts so as to pay for the gifts that I have just distributed in Asiatic countries which, in turn, have given me very nice publicity as an international Superman.

I have no time, today, to give out the list of the interest free loans granted since 1968 to more than 50 countries, but I would like however to bring two of these to the attention of the House. During his recent trips, the Prime Minister has granted an interest free gift-loan of $94 million to Ceylon, payable in 50 years. He has furthermore granted an interest free loan of $4.5 million to Indonesia, payable in 50 years, with a 10 year period of grace, if that country so wishes.

The Prime Minister of Ceylon, Mrs Sirimavo Bandaranaike—having received the gift-loan from the Prime Minister of Canada—paid all respects and gave all praises that might be delivered to a head of state.

It can't be helped: our Prime Minister is fond of reverences and compliments.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member please resume his seat. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, will my hon. friend allow me a question?

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Mr. Rondeau: I will not tolerate any questions.

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will not allow me to put a question. Would he be afraid of that question?

Mr. Rondeau: By no means.

Mr. Marceau: My question is this: Is my hon. friend aware that money loaned by Canada is used to buy machinery in Canada and that it is not an outright gift? Is he aware that such loans are used not only to develop countries but also to help this country? Is my hon. friend aware of these facts? If he were, would he still state that these loans which help both Canada and Ceylon are harmful?

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear the member for Lapointe make those remarks. I believe he learned about this matter recently, for we have known for quite some time that this money is used to buy Canadian products. This is even worse, Mr. Speaker.

If this money is used to buy Canadian products—and we have nothing against that—we do say that the same gifts that we offer to the Indonesians or the Cingalise should be given to the people of Quebec, of New Brunswick, of Nova Scotia, of the western provinces; Canadians should be entitled to the same interest-free loans for the purpose of buying Canadian products. This would benefit the economy and make it possible to raise the standard of living of Canadian people and it would also enable them to pay only once for the public services they use.

The hon. member for Lapointe approves of the fact that interest-free loans are granted to foreigners; if those same loans were granted to the Province of Quebec, we could build schools, CEGEPs, technical schools or help public developments through the construction of bridges, roads, including the East-West expressway in Montreal, and enable all Canadians to pay only once for those roads, those bridges and those schools.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Rondeau: The hon. member for Lévis says: "That is exactly what we are doing". This is absolutely untrue. At present, the Quebec-Hydro—

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that I said yes, and it is true. In fact, I have the means to prove it, as indeed it is all so well here in this House—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Has the hon. member a point of order? If so, I should like to hear it.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Rondeau: So do I; I want to raise a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question of privilege I will hear it.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to forget that here in the House we are entitled to the truth. He seems to forget that we not only promote Canadian industries by loans, but that we also give them grants. That is more than loans without interests, it is in fact giving away money.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has a point of debate rather than a question of privilege.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to you that I am getting tired of being interrupted by members who never take in the House the opportunity to say what they think, who enjoy throwing sand in the works and making statements that are more or less relevant.

I know that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is giving incentives to some industries. However, I am not aware that the federal government has made interest free loans to municipalities in the province of Quebec or in any other province of Canada. That is what we are talking about. We are not discussing the merits of the decision made by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to subsidize industry. We do not criticize, but if Canada is giving interest free loans to other countries, we ought to do the same for the Canadian provinces.

Mr. Speaker, granting an interest-free loan to another country—although Canada never received one—amounts to a gift. The right hon. Prime Minister has made such gifts during his last trip. This reminds me of the time when Indian chiefs were receiving gifts designed to keep them quiet so that they could be more readily exploited afterwards. Was it really necessary to keep some Commonwealth countries—such as England—quiet because of arm sales to Rhodesia? Did several countries threaten to wreck the Commonwealth?

Did those gifts—loans granted by our Prime Minister help save the Commonwealth? Did the profits made by British arms merchants and manufacturers keep quiet several angry countries who still believe that it is necessary to kill in order to live?

Has the old saying "Money talks" been able once again to save the Commonwealth? History will tell perhaps but too late, unfortunately, for we Canadians shall have to pick up the tab for those gifts which we cannot really afford for ourselves.

To date we do not know, apart from what has been said about it, whether the Commonwealth is really in danger. We know, however, that England will keep selling arms with the approval of our Prime Minister, though he did oppose this move before he left for Asia. Who has won the battle? The political experts, before the Prime Minister left, or the British financial experts?

And while men will kill each other with English weapons, we Canadians will grant loans without interest to others so that arms dealers be paid and that those who wish to live out of war be well financed.

Some wish to fight, and some dealers or manufacturers from England have arms to sell or profits to make. But we Canadians pay them handsomely so that the English can sell their arms and be paid and that Asiatic belligerents be financed in order to be able to kill one another.

When the Créditistes ask for loans without interest from the Bank of Canada in order to finance waterworks or other projects which we need everywhere in Canada, politicians committed to finance, like those we heard a few moments ago, say that it is impossible because it would entail too much money, which would do nothing but contribute to inflation. Unfortunately we see a bunch of fools without money who are afraid of inflation, who are afraid of having too much money and who shout parrot-like: That would make too much money.

When the Créditistes wish to obtain interest-free loans from the Bank of Canada in order to finance the construction of waterworks for instance, or to carry out any other project necessary and workable involving public expenses, they say this would lead to inflation. But is it not known that when we build a bridge costing $1 million and that we have to pay $3 million in interest and $1 million on the capital, we create inflation because we pay in taxes four bridges, three in interest paid to finance and one to reimburse the capital, while the whole project could be financed without interest through the Bank of Canada?

When our Prime Minister grants gift-loans to Ceylon or Indonesia, as he did during his last trip, and as he has done for several countries in the world almost each week since 1968, no one asks questions. Nor do hon. members opposite. Where will the Prime Minister get almost $100 million, the amount he agreed to loan over the last three weeks? However, when members of the Ralliement créditiste request equivalent treatment for the provinces, public bodies or school boards, the hon. members on government side laugh.

Bill C-207 is an omnibus bill which is mainly intended to carry out the election promises made by the Prime Minister who, in order to get candidates during the last election campaign, had promised jobs, additional salaries and rewards. The time has come for rewards and this is why we cannot, Mr. Speaker, approve this bill unreservedly, though we are against pollution. Besides, we said repeatedly in this House that it should have been checked years ago. But the present government merely studied the problem and referred it to the provinces which lack the monetary and financial means necessary to face their responsibilities, because presently, the Constitution grants them responsibilities in areas such as education, public utilities and others.

However, the federal government kept for itself all monetary powers, and because it does not put any funds at the disposal of the provinces to enable them to carry out their responsibilities, for the past 100 years, there has been perpetual conflict, as the provinces are at daggers drawn with the federal government. They want to carry out their duties, but the federal government, on the other hand, is hindering their progress by not supplying them and public agencies with the money needed for this. For that reason, we have had for years and whatever party is in power, perpetual conflict between the provincial governments and the federal government and between municipalities and school boards and the provincial governments.

We are members of the House of Commons, that is responsible for the financial administration of the country, but our hands are tied because of the supremacy of high finance. Why? Because governments that are elected through election funds are the first victims of the financial pollution of such electoral funds.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of lively and scintillating debate on this bill this afternoon. If by way of contrast I enter it in a low key, I am none the less serious about two or three things I think ought to be said at the second reading stage.

Because there are to my knowledge many public servants who have worked for this country a good many years who would like the opportunity to retire early, as is provided in this legislation, I should like to see the bill passed and put on the statute books as quickly as possible. On the other hand, because in the same field, namely that of public service superannuation, there are provisions which I think are most unfair and could be used in an unfair and dictatorial manner over some of our public servants, I should like to see the bill set aside.

If I may jump ahead in my thoughts and offer a similar couplet, may I say that because of the provision in this bill for the establishment of a department of the environment, I should like to see the bill passed tonight, between government and parliament I think it should be torn and kicked out of the House as was done in the United Kingdom parliament once in respect of an iniquitous piece of legislation.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

It is mainly in respect of those two phases of the matter that I should like to make a few remarks at this time. I return, therefore, to the superannuation question. It is true that this bill will make it possible for quite a number of civil servants to retire with an immediate pension even though they have not reached the usual retirement age of 60 or 65.

Under this bill a letter carrier, for example, who has been working for the Post Office for 30 years, and who is now 55 and rather tired of carrying the mail around, would be able to retire with an immediate pension equal to 60 per cent of his average salary during his six best years. Likewise, anyone 55 years of age and over, but not yet 60, would be able to claim the benefits of this bill and retire early with an immediate pension.

There is also provision for retirement between the ages of 50 and 55. The several formulae set out in respect of this matter make it clear that if one retires earlier than the age of 55, even though he has passed aged 50, he would not get what otherwise would have been a full pension, but one reduced by a certain percentage for each year he is short of age 55 or each year he is short of a certain number of years of service.

In so far as there are public servants who would like to do this, even though the pension they might get would be quite low, this is a privilege or an opportunity being offered to them which quite a few might wish to accept, although I suspect there will be more advantage taken of the provision to retire at age 55 than there will be of the provision to retire below that age, because at age 55 at least one can get a full pension for the number of years he has worked up to that point. For those who retire below age 55 the reduction formula stares them in the face, and the prospect is not so inviting.

At any rate, in so far as the rights offered to our public servants by Part VII of this bill are put on a voluntary basis so that the public servants concerned may avail themselves of them if they wish to, this is good. That is the reason I say from that side of the coin I should like to see this bill on the statute books as soon as possible, for there are many public servants who are in fact waiting for it. I can understand this just from reading the legislation, but I can also say I have received a fair amount of correspondence from public servants in their middle fifties who are looking forward to availing themselves of the privileges of this legislation.

However, the other side of the coin, in so far as the superannuation portion of this bill is concerned, is in my view a rather ugly one. The other side of the coin is that the government may avail itself of the provisions of this Part VII and compulsorily retire people at age 55 on the pension they would get, or even down to age 50 on the reduced pensions provided by this legislation. I know the government will say it is fair to have it both ways. If you give a free right of retirement to the individual, should you not give a free right to the employer to retire that individual even if it is against his will? This is like the equity between one horse and one rabbit.

May I point out that the so-called free right to retire accorded to the individual public servant is not completely free. He has to meet the conditions set out in the legislation. He has to be 55 or over in order to get an immediate pension equal to 2 per cent times the number of years he has been in the service, times the average salary of his six best years. If a public servant is between 50 and 55 he has to meet the further condition of having a certain minimum number of years service, and he has to subject his early retirement pension to a reduction formula.

I have tried to understand the various formulae in the legislation and I believe I do understand them. I admit I am picking out for purposes of my illustration the minimum one. As I understand this, a public servant who is 50 years of age and has 20 years of service can retire or can be retired at that point and receive an immediate pension. But, by the formula set out in this bill, that immediate pension is cut in half from what it would be for 20 years of service so that instead of receiving 20 times 2 or a 40 per cent pension he would receive half that or a 20 per cent pension. I submit it is all right to give a public servant the privilege at age 50, if he desires it, to leave the public service and go out on a pension equal to 20 per cent of the average of his six best years. That is his choice and he must meet the conditions in order to receive such a pension. One of the conditions is that he must accept the reduction in his pension rate.

But, Mr. Speaker, the government would be in a position to say—and this is why I use the word "ugly"—to a public servant who is 50 years of age and who has worked for the government and the people of Canada for 20 years: You are out; you are retired and our hands are clean because we are putting you on an immediate pension; you do not have to wait until you are 60 or 65 years of age, you get it now.

What is that pension? It is 20 per cent of the average salary he has had for his best six years. It is just talk these days to say that such a person is therefore free to go out, obtain any other kind of job he wishes and build up another pension. There is such a thing in this country today as unemployment. We ought to be aware of it from the efforts made on the floor of this House to make the government aware of it. We are aware of the fact that it hits certain groups very severely. One of these groups is the people over 40 or 45 years of age.

I say that to retire a person today at age 50 on a pension equal to 20 per cent of his average salary over his best six years is a mean and ugly thing to do. Yet, that is what is being made possible by this legislation. I know someone on the government side might defend this position, if he has the gall or nerve to do it, by saying that the government can do this now. The government can dismiss a public servant at age 50 on no immediate pension. The government can dismiss such a person and the best that person has to look forward to is a deferred pension when he reaches age 60. We have the notion that because that is the situation, because a public servant who can be fired by the government today at any age has only a deferred pension to look forward to, there is a little bit of inhibition working here; that is, that the government is a little reluctant to fire people and turn them out in the cold without any pension at all. Under this legislation the government will lose that inhibition and be able to say, with all the pride and virtue it is able to present, that it is not turning these 50 year olds out in the cold because it is placing them on an immediate pension.

Because I think my working out of the formula is correct, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that a public servant at age 50 who has had 20 years service can be retired at this point on a pension of only 20 per cent of the average salary he has enjoyed over his six best years. So, Mr. Speaker, I say this is unfair. I usually read with interest what organizations of employees say about matters of this kind and when they say things with which I agree I do not hesitate to quote them. Sometimes, I am a little disappointed. I believe the Public Service Alliance has missed the point on this. I saw its publication of a few days ago in which the Public Service Alliance greeted without qualification this right of public servants to retire early. I repeat that I am with the Public Service Alliance to the extent that in so far as this is a voluntary right, it is something to be greeted. But what about the position of the 50 year old or even the 55 year old who is right in the midst of trying to get his sons and daughters through college, who is trying to pay off the mortgage on his home and who has made plans to retire at age 60 or age 65, for whom there is no old age or Canada Pension Plan benefit until age 65? The government might say to that person that he must go.

Now do not tell me, Sir, that this government would not do such a thing. It did it in the last year or so, even when these immediate pensions were not available and when the best to be offered was a deferred pension arrangement. So, I see this business of placing this weapon in the hands of the employer as being mean, ugly, and despicable. I wish the organizations which are prepared, as I am, to welcome the voluntary side of it would take another look at this side. I said earlier that the President of the Treasury Board probably will say it should work both ways, and that if the employee has the right to make his choice the government should have the right to make its choice. The employee must make his choice within certain conditions and his whole life is at stake. He knows what his plans are and can make his choice in the light of those plans, but the government does not have to meet any condition at all. It does not have to offer any alternative. The government can say to the person who is placed in these circumstances that before this legislation came in he could have been fired anyway, without a deferred pension, and now because he can be retired immediately with a 20 per cent pension, out he goes, whether he likes it or not.

I think this is an ugly situation and one at which we might look a little further at eight o'clock.

Scientific Research Animals Protection Act

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale): Air Transport—Manitoba—Restoration of Class A Regional Service; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Sokberg)—Canadian National Railways—Discontinuance of Dining Car Service—Ottawa-Montreal; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland)—Social Security—Guaranteed Annual Income—Old Age Pension Cost of Living Bonus—Changes in Canada Pension Plan.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

I understand the first order standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is to stand. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH ANIMALS PROTECTION ACT

PROVISIONS FOR THE PROTECTION OF ANIMALS USED IN SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved that Bill C-19, for the Protection and Humane Treatment of Animals used in Scientific Research, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

She said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill standing in my name is very easily explained. Its purpose is to provide legislative machinery to assure humane treatment for live animals used in scientific research for which grants are provided by the government of Canada. It is the intent of this bill to cover all phases of protection for animals used in such research, including general policy, the conditions in which animals are kept while on the premises, and the sources of supply where such animals are purchased.

Clause 2 of the bill, which is the main operative clause, reads as follows:

> No grant for scientific research involving live animals shall be made by or through any department or agency of the Government of Canada unless the applicant has a certificate of registration or a licence issued by the Minister of Agriculture on recommendation of the Canadian Council on Animal Care or an equivalent body so designated.

I would point out that Bill C-140, standing in the name of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos), has been on the Order Paper for the last three years, and my bill was intended to be supplementary to his, underlining some of the points covered in Bill C-140. The only reason that mine appears ahead of his is the luck of the draw held to determine the position that a private member's bill will have on the Order Paper.

This afternoon I speak for a great many people across Canada. For years a growing number of Canadians have been deeply concerned about conditions surrounding experimentation on animals for medical and scientific purposes. They are concerned about unnecessary cruelty, and repetitive experiments. Above all, they are concerned because Canada has no legislation to protect animals used for scientific purposes.

For years some hon. members have been trying to get this situation changed. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), has placed innumerable resolutions on the Order Paper trying to have this whole matter referred to committee for study. As I have said, the hon. member for Victoria has had a bill on the Order Paper for three years, and this is the second year for my bill.

Other countries are far ahead of us in the provision of such legislation. For example, in Britain legislation was passed in 1876, and recently that country conducted a far reaching study resulting in the Littlewood Report which it is hoped will be embodied in new legislation before long. Denmark has had legislation governing experimentation on animals since 1953, and the United States has had such legislation since 1965. I ask the question: why not Canada?

People may argue that this is a provincial matter, and I reply that the scope of my bill is not provincial. It is strictly federal. The bulk of medical research grants to Canadian universities comes from the federal government, and virtually all universities, either directly or indirectly through their research staff, receive grants from the federal government for this purpose. Therefore, the federal government has the right and the duty to withhold grants for medical research from the universities until or unless certain standards and conditions are met. I would point out that those sections of the Criminal Code designed to prevent cruelty to animals are ineffective so far as the protection of laboratory animals is concerned because humane inspectors do not have the right to enter research laboratories, and provincial inspectors are not able to carry out the provisions of the Criminal Code. For this reason federal legislation is necessary.

There is a precedent for such federal legislation. The Meat Inspection Act contains a provision that humane slaughtering methods must be used in packing houses that come under federal inspection. I suggest that protection in what amounts to the scientific slaughtering of laboratory animals is equally necessary. What has been done to investigate the situation respecting laboratory animals? The Council for Laboratory Animals, based in Vancouver, made a submission to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) as late as January of this year regarding the use of animals in scientific research. All hon. members have received copies of this submission, but I would wager that a very small percentage of them have read it through. Therefore, I am going to summarize some of the points contained in it. In part, it reads:

It is now seven years since the Council for Laboratory Animals first drew the federal government's attention to the unsatisfactory treatment of research animals in Canada.

During the last three years considerable progress has been made in improving the housing and husbandry of laboratory animals in Canadian universities. The Canadian Council on Animal Care, set up by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada in 1966 with National Research Council financing, has ben active in encouraging the universities to upgrade the 70 per cent of animal facilities which were rated as inadequate at the time of the original survey. Animal care committees have ben established at most universities, and steps taken to raise the standards of training of laboratory technicians responsible for the animals.

The Canadian Council on Animal Care has not, however, been given the responsibility of reviewing experimental procedures and this represents a major gap in the protection afforded to laboratory animals. The medical journals report considerable numbers of Canadian experiments involving pain or stress to animals each year, some of which appear, on the face of it, to be of doubtful value in relation to the suffering involved.

I have a dozen documented examples of this. Here is one titled, "Conflict and Conditioned Aversive Stimuli in the Developments of Experimental Neuroses," and I read:

Method: 30 cats used. Cats placed in metal box with floor bars (electrified) ¾ inch apart. A squeeze partition employed to note cat's response to constriction. Cats trained to open food container and eat (after 24 hours starving). Then two cats placed together to test "dominance in feeding." After training, shocks given on removing food cover or when food entered mouth.

Some of the "neurotic behavior" noted:

Violently resists entry to cage, agitated pacing and tremors, seeks escape, crouching in corner, violently resists approach to food, hissing, clawing, arching back, persistent violent combat with partner cat, rejects all food, panic, maximum fear of signal, panic reaction to constriction etc.

This is one of the lesser forms of torture recorded in various medical journals. I maintain that the Council for Laboratory Animals is perfectly justified in saying:

We believe that, just as the private individual is required under the Criminal Code to justify the infliction of suffering on an animal, so the scientist should be ready to justify painful experiments before a competent body. We suggest, therefore, that the staff of the Canadian Council on Animal Care be expanded to include a small, but highly qualified, inspectorate of medical and veterinary scientists who would review proposals for experiments approved by University Animal Care Committees and the subsequent reports of these experiments.

The Council goes on to outline the degree of such inspection, and suggest exactly the sort of thing that is proposed in my bill:

• (5:10 p.m.)

We suggest that the federal government take steps:

(1) to provide permanent funding for the inspectorate of the Canadian Council on Animal Care in order to ensure its continuity and

(2) to make the inspectorate responsible to the Minister of Agriculture rather than to the institutions whose facilities it is required to supervise.

It would be impossible to over-emphasize the importance of this second point. It is not a good idea, as I have suggested, for a conflict of interest to obtain wherein the inspectorate is responsible, as is the case now, to the very colleges and universities that it seeks to supervise. It is far better that the council on animal care should be made, as proposed in this bill and in that of the hon. member for Victoria the responsibility of the Minister of Agriculture, who is in no way responsible to the universities and colleges of Canada. That, I submit, is a good principle to adopt in legislation.

I realize that in the recent press communiqué of the association of universities and colleges of Canada it is claimed that a great deal has already been done in the matter of voluntary controls. Undoubtedly, this is true. Nevertheless, I submit that voluntary controls are not enough, partly because of the conflict of interest I have mentioned and partly because legislation is the only way of making sure that animals in the hands of sadistic, thoughtless or careless people shall not be subject to unnecessary cruelty. Therefore, our reliance on the effectiveness of voluntary controls in this matter is quite insufficient. The council for laboratory animals emphasized this point in a pamphlet that it submitted to the prime minister some years ago. It said that education and persuasion do not go far enough; that what we need and must have, in addition, is an outside policing of those institutions using animals for experimental purposes. We must have legislation. We must have the framework to protect, so far as possible, helpless creatures from unnecessary cruelty at the hands of anyone using them.

May I point out that across Canada there are about half a million helpless animals used every year for experimental purposes. The amount of cruelty perpetrated on those animals is beyond belief and quite beyond the imagination. May I also say to those people who think that the present system is not good enough, that increasing attention is being given in other countries to the substitution of nonsentient materials, or of other methods, in place of animals in testing and experimentation, and to a reduction in the number of animals used through better methodology. A number of practical alternatives to the use of animals have been developed in recent years. These include the use of tissue and organ cultures, chick embryos, chemicals, chromatography, radio-immuno assays, mathematical models and the computer, etc. In medical education, sophisticated audio-visual aids can largely replace the living animal.

But since I was taught in my childhood that often the best is the enemy of the good, so I believe that to make a plea right now for anti-vivisection would be to take away emphasis from that which I believe we most need, legislative controls, legislative standards and legislative prohibitions against the unnecessary cruelty that goes on behind the scenes in our scientific laboratories from coast to coast. I welcome the work which has been done voluntarily and which has improved the situation to a certain extent. Yet I emphasize again, Mr. Speaker, that the only way we can control this experimentation and be sure that these voiceless and helpless creatures are receiving proper attention in our medical laboratories and in university laboratories, is to bring forward effective legislation. It must be legislation which will make these colleges and universities subject to the animal care people who, in turn, shall be responsible, under this legislation, to the Minister of Agriculture.

I commend my bill to this House, hoping very much that this time the "talker-outers" will be absent and will allow this legislation that is long overdue to be placed on our statute books.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Will all those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Will all those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): In my opinion, the nays have it.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, there are not enough members on this side of the House to stand up with me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion (Mrs. MacInnis) negatived.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, may we call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the wish of hon. members that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Since it has been called six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.22 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury (for the Prime Minister) that Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I commenced my remarks on Bill C-207 just before five o'clock I indicated that my concern about this bill is that it has too many cases of the good and the bad, too many coins that are beautiful on one side and ugly on the other. I believe in my remarks before five o'clock I pinpointed the two examples of this that bother me most. I am prepared to confine my remarks to those two examples. The first is in the field of public service superannuation. Before five o'clock I said most of what I wanted to say on this point. However, there are a few more words that should be added.

I pointed out this afternoon that this is a clear case of a coin that is beautiful on one side and ugly on the other. The beautiful part is that the possibility of early retirement is extended. This is something that our society will have to face before long. Public servants who have a certain number of years to their credit and have attained a certain age may, if they wish, retire and receive a pension beginning at the moment of retirement even if they are only between 50 and 55 years of age. In so far as this bill permits public servants to avail themselves of this privilege, it is good and I welcome it. I want to see this provision on our statute books.

The other side of that coin is that part VII of the bill gives the government, as employer, the right to retire—in more realistic language, the right to fire—public servants and put them on pension between age 50 and 55 whether they want to retire or not. I am not impressed by the argument that this is a matter of equality, or that it is a two-way street which makes it possible to have the initiative on either side. You do not equate one lone employee, trying to sort out his finances and his old age security, against the weight and power of an organization as large as the government of Canada. It is not fair to say that because an employee has the right to retire at an early date if he wishes, the Canadian government has the right to force him to retire even if he does not want to do so.

I pointed out before five o'clock, and admitted I was taking the minimal case I could work out from the formula contained in the bill, that it would be possible for the government to force into retirement a public servant who was 50 years of age and who had 20 years of service, on a pension of only 20 per cent of his average salary during his six best years. To require a public servant to retire at age 50 on a pension of only 20 per cent of his salary, whether he wants to retire or not, is—pardon me for repeating the word—ugly. I do not like it and I do not think it should be in this legislation.

In the same area, the government provides in the bill before us what has already been described as a special privilege for those who attain the rank of deputy minister or deputy head: this is a phrase which I assume will include a secretary to a minister of state where that minister has been given, by proclamation, a department over which to preside. If such a deputy head has been in the public service for ten years and chooses to leave, or is turned out, he is given the privilege of continuing to contribute to the public service superannuation fund until the age of 60, at which time he can draw the full pension available to him on the basis of the number of years during which he has paid into the fund.

This is clearly a case of special privilege for a very select few. The only defence I can see anyone trying to put forward from the government side is that the government might want to possess machinery by which it can bring in deputy heads and turn them out again. I cannot understand why the government should want an arrangement of that kind. It will not be much of an inducement to an outstanding person to come in and undertake this type of job if he knows he can be turned out very readily. So this is a special privilege available to no one else. I can think of scores of cases where people have asked for the right to continue to pay into pension funds so they could build up their pension, but this is usually not allowed. Yet an exception is made for this select group whose number we can probably count on our fingers and toes.

I should like to make a comparison between the special privilege for such deputy heads and the treatment accorded ordinary individuals in the public service who retire at the age of 50. Take the case of a postal employee, a clerk, an employee of the House of Commons who at the age of 50 has been in the public service for 20 years. He can be forcibly retired on a pension of only 20 per cent of the average salary of his six best years. But a deputy head who at age 50, let us say, has spent only 10 years in the public service can go out into private business or industry, continue to contribute for the following ten years and become qualified at the age of 60 for a 40 per cent pension on the basis of ten years service but 20 years contribution to the fund. So the hardworking public servant who spent 20 years in the public service up to the age of 50 goes out with a 20 per cent pension, while the deputy head with only 10 years in the service gets 40 per cent at the age of 60. If that is not turning things upside down, if that is not being unfair to those at the bottom of the ladder and being unduly generous to those at the top, I do not know what is. These are examples of ugliness on one side of the superannuation coin which detract from the attractiveness of the other side of the coin. I earnestly hope that when we get into committee of the whole and reach part VII we can persuade the government to get fair play and justice written into this aspect of the measure.

I said there were two examples of coins which are beautiful on one side and ugly on the other about which I intended to speak. My second point has to do with the fact that on one hand this bill sets up a badly needed new department, the department of the environment, which I would say is welcomed by every member of this House. We shall have to assess what the department achieves when it gets going, but the rumours are that the minister who really has shown his concern in this area is to be the new minister of the environment and I think that even on the opposition side we can welcome the appointment of that minister and the establishment of this department.

It might be said, in criticism, that this step should have been taken long ago. But it has been taken now; we welcome it and it is good. I wish it could take effect right away. But instead of presenting the House with a simple proposition along those lines, something we could all welcome with enthusiasm, the government has put forward this ministry of state garbage.

Mr. Otto: Now, now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) says now, now. What puzzles me is that we are trying to clear up pollution on one hand, yet we are bringing in pollution on the other. If the hon. member for York East, who is one of the two Liberals who will not get one of these new jobs, would prefer that the government has given us pollution instead of this garbage, I do not mind.

I listened to the explanation the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) gave for the proposition concerning the five ministries of state. I shall not rehash what he said or try to put it into my own words, but it is clear that what is being presented is a blank cheque to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by which he can create and dissolve departments at will without coming to Parliament at all. The only limitation is that there can be only five of these ministries at a time; I hope there is no need for us to anticipate a cabinet even larger than the 32 or 33 ministers we shall have under this legislation, not counting ministers without portfolio.

So the Prime Minister will have five slots that he can play with, five new departments that he can create. After all, this is what they are. Just to say that they are ministers of state does not tell the whole story. Under the legislation the Prime Minister can appoint a minister of state, make him head of a departmental establishment, give him a secretary of state and all the civil servants he needs to go with his new office. These new appointees will be called ministers of state of this, that or the other and they will be just as much ministers as those who are named in the Salaries Act: they will have all their rights and privileges; they will be members of the cabinet.

Between the things that the Prime Minister can do under this bill by way of proclamation and the things that he can do under the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, this will probably be the last time a government will have to come to Parliament for legislation to approve the restructuring of departments of government. The line that the President of the Treasury Board gave us was that this was efficiency. I agree. It is efficiency gone mad, technocracy gone mad. I happen to think that it is important to make governments responsible to Parliament, and you do not maintain that responsibility when you increase the actions that the Prime Minister can take on his own.

Let me tell the President of the Treasury Board, in case he is thinking of interrupting me to ask a question, that I am aware that he said Parliament will have the final say because the estimates have to be brought to Parliament.

Mr. Drury: The Appropriation Acts.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, the Appropriation Acts. I will put on all the sackcloth and ashes that I should put on in saying that I went along with most, although not all, of the changes that we made to our rules of procedure during the last two or three years. Some of them I went along with enthusiastically, some I went along with reluctantly—but I went along with them. One of the changes that I went along with was the elimination of committee of supply and the institution of this new regime for handling estimates. May I be permitted to make the defensive statement that I think that most of the changes we made were good, particularly the way we now handle legislation. I think we improved our treatment of legislation tremendously. I think the committee system, as far as committees handling legislation is concerned, is also a great improvement over the former system. But as far as the handling of money is concerned, Parliament now has no control over the government's spending power.

When the House debates appropriations, we find that at a quarter to ten in the evening of a fixed day Mr. Speaker stops the debate and we then take a few votes. Unless some of us have put down motions to take votes on particular items, we just take the one vote. Technically, the President of the Treasury Board is correct; it is Parliament that votes the money. But this system has become just about the supreme farce of this institution. I am not saying that we should go back to the old committee of supply system, because that had become pretty farcical too. But we have not yet solved the problem and it is a problem that we must solve in terms of procedure.

I had the privilege, as did other hon. members, of talking to some of the new interns at the beginning of this session, and I threw out to them a challenge. I tried to tell them what we had done and then I said, "I hope that in the time that you are here you can come up with the answer to the problem of parliamentary control over finance". That is my answer to the point made by the President of the Treasury Board that Parliament does have control because we vote on appropriations bills. I suggest that does not mean a thing.

The fact is that once we have passed this bill, the whole business of structuring government, the kind of departments we have and the authority that is given to them will become a matter of proclamation. I am not referring to just the first proclamation that appoints ministers of state of this, that or the other, but to the several proclamations in respect of various duties. No president has the power the Prime Minister will have. He will sit over there, or in his office, and run the whole show.

I do not want to detract for one moment from the good fun we have had in this debate, particularly this afternoon. The bill is being condemned because it will create all these new positions for the boys, with additional salaries for parliamentary secretaries, additional salaries for ministers of state, and so on. There has been some good fun in that regard. But I also think there is some seriousness to it. I do not want to name him, but I have had letters from an outstanding political scientist in this country who is wondering whether we are not shooting right through the whole independence of Parliament principle by putting so many people on the government payroll.

As I say, I think this criticism of additional appointments has been serious. But I am a little afraid that with all the attention we have paid to this particular question, and with all the natural defences that are raised by members on the other side, we are rather obscuring the main point; we are missing what is mainly wrong with this bill. The thing that is mainly wrong with it is that it divorces the government, the executive, still further from parliamentary control. I suppose one would have to admit that this has been going on down through the years. I have not the time, even if I wanted to take it, to cite some of the things I have seen over the years, but I have seen far too much of this sort of thing since the present Prime Minister came to power.

Some hon. members on the other side may think it is a minor point that ministers no longer have to be in the House five days a week to answer questions, as used to be the case. This was not brought about by a change in the rules. It was not done by consent of the House or by direction from the Chair. It was not done by statute. This was done on the fiat of the Prime Minister, who told his ministers, "Two days a week you do not need to be in the House at all. You are on the roster for three days, and if you are absent, then that is just too bad for the House". We have become used to this proposition, but it is an instance of removing government from the control of Parliament. I have already mentioned our treatment of the estimates. Perhaps we are all to blame; we participated in the changing of the rules. But perhaps we will have to make more changes, because the way the matter stands at present we just do not control the purse-strings at all. Parliament is presented with a fait accompli. True, we can vote yes or no; but with a government majority the vote is always yes, and that is it. We are now presented with a great big appropriations bill that has everything in it from the salaries of our page boys to the huge expenses of the Department of National Defence. All this is in the one item, the good with the bad. How can we vote against the main appropriations bill? The government has extended this principle until, as I say, we no longer have parliamentary control over spending.

There is also the growing practice of introducing omnibus bills. This is demonstrated by the present bill. I hope Your Honour does not mind if I join with others in recalling your phrase about your own raised eyebrows when you saw the bill. The bill has nine different parts and covers a myriad subjects. Not only does it include many items which will make it difficult to know how to vote, but in addition to all the provisions of the bill there are two schedules. A number of items contained in schedule B, in particular, are in themselves little bills that amend statutes here, there and all over the place.

The commissioners who revise our statutes will have a wonderful time when they find that this bill may be cited as something or other and in four or five places says that this part may be cited as another bill. It is a terrible mess. Again let me say that what is wrong with this measure is that it removes parliamentary control of the government. We are given an omnibus document just like the omnibus appropriations bills and we do not get down at all to details.

I agree with the proposition I read in an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal during the last week or so about the point of order we debated when this bill was first called. We would be foolish, as Members of Parliament, to go the other way and say that every last item and every last detail must be contained in a separate bill. Surely what we need is a government with a sense of its responsibility to Parliament, one that puts things before us in reasonable proportion. That is not the case with this bill and it is not the case with many pieces of legislation that are brought before us.

We have had all these experiences in respect of the question period, the estimates and omnibus bills of this type. Now we have, in the name of efficiency, in the name of technocracy and in the name of expediency the plea that once and for all we do away with the necessity of the government having to come to Parliament to restructure its affairs. Its affairs are not its affairs; they are Parliament's affairs and they are the affairs of the people of Canada. I think this is very important.

I said when I started that there had been many lively and scintillating speeches today, that I would not try to match that approach but that I was deadly serious, and I am. I do not think it represents good government, I do not think it leads to a good relationship with Parliament, and I do not think it is good for the running of the country for the government to bring in a bill like this which puts the good and the bad together. I refer to the arrangement for public servants who want to retire, coupled with the dictatorial right to push people out in the cold with inadequate pensions whether they want to retire or not. Likewise, I do not think it is good to lessen the control of Parliament over the affairs of government. The members of the government are here for a period of time because the people of Canada put them here by the way they voted. They put them here to run the store. But they do not own it and they should not act the way they are in respect of Bill C-207.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this bill has already been described in many ways. One of the polite terms applied to it was that it is a grab-bag. I think this description is about as appropriate for this bill as it is for the government's policies as a whole. Here we have a situation where the government is putting forward one or two good proposals and then filling the bill with a lot of junk, much of which is harmful, and attempting to bull it through the House of Commons and Parliament. An indication of the arrogance of the government lies not only in the stuff it piles into the bill but in the fact that so far at least it has not even bothered to reply to the serious and earnest criticisms put forward. The government sits in silence and simply counts upon its troops to force the bill through the House regardless of criticism.

Mr. Bell: The minister is laughing.

Mr. Stanfield: Events that took place in this House this afternoon have again shown how this government intends to act at the cabinet level and how it intends to deal with Parliament and the country. I shall have further comments to make on this matter in the course of my remarks on the bill. Let me remind the government that the mere fact of setting up a structure is no guarantee of effective action. This bill has many faces, some pleasant, some progressive, some that I think represent honest attempts at improvement, but others much less than that. We can, for example, readily support the principle of creating a federal department of the environment. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, virtually every member of the House has been for some time asking for such a department. But structures are no guarantee of effective action.

With regard to pollution, I notice there is no mention in this bill of any mechanism for co-operation between the federal government and the provinces. This would appear to be for the government's convenience; it would seem to be the kind of omission that could serve as an escape-hatch. The Lord knows that this government is making a habit of using escape-hatches these days. At least the first part of the bill dealing with pollution, even though indirectly, does deal with a matter of substance. Pollution control is one of the great challenges facing us, and the creation of a structure which might permit action in this field is certainly of importance.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke this evening about some of the compulsory retirement features of the bill. I thoroughly agree with him that it is nonsense to suggest it is simply reciprocal to allow the government the right to retire a man simply because the man is given the privilege of retiring. The change providing for compulsory retirement hardly seems consistent with the kind of security of career which Parliament has been trying to establish over the years.

As to the provisions of Bill C-207 in general, once we leave pollution and the question of retirement—which was discussed so ably by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—we enter the realm of forms and structures, leaving substance far behind. In this way I think the bill symbolizes the attitude of the government, because it is a government which feels much more at home dealing with structures and forms which it can manipulate than it does in dealing with the substance of problems. This opinion regarding the attitude of the government of the day is not confined to the members of my party. I noticed that the president of the Young Liberals of Canada, speaking generally of Canadian political parties, including his own, in Halifax said that they should spend much less time on structures and more on issues.

He went on to criticize the national Liberal party for being unresponsive to the problem of youth unemployment. If my hon. friends opposite will not listen to me, I hope they will at least heed one of the younger voices within their own party.

We in Canada are faced with the crucial and terrible issue of unemployment. This was emphasized by the president of the Young Liberals of Canada. We are at a time when it is obvious to the people of Canada, even if it is not obvious to this government, that the first priority must be to act promptly to help people, to help dissipate the uncertainty that exists, to act to restore confidence and, in short, to act to get the economy moving again. But what does the government do? It presents us with this kind of bill to restructure the organization of government.

Ever since this government came into power it has been telling us and the Canadian people that it is clearing the decks for action, that it has been clearing the decks for action. Ever since the election of 1968, it has been sweeping away the deadwood and getting itself organized. This is the government which talks about action and about preparing for action, but in terms of effective steps toward economic progress it never gets any further. I say that what needs to be reorganized is not so much the structure of government but, rather, the priorities of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The main problem this bill will solve for the government concerns the necessity for this or any other government in the future to come before Parliament with regard to any reorganization of Parliament or any change of parliamentary responsibility. Under the proposals contained in this bill there will no longer be any need to consult Parliament. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre emphasized this matter and referred to the emphasis the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) placed upon the need of the government to come before Parliament on questions of supply. Since I have been in this House, supply has been a farce.

Before the adoption of the recently changed rules even when we were in committee of the whole there was a limit, under the rules, in respect of supply and I observed very quickly that whereas in the legislature where I had been, a minister had to answer questions in order to get his estimates through the House, here a minister could answer a question if he chose but the embarrassing questions were never answered when time was up and supply was voted. So do not let the President of the Treasury Board try to suggest to us on this side of the House that supply will give members of the opposition or the people of the country any meaningful opportunity to check the vast powers the government is seeking in this legislation.

This bill will certainly make things much easier for hon. gentlemen opposite. But I would remind them that what this or any government does in terms of organization is not simply a matter of internal interest to them alone. Whatever measures governments take are of interest to Parliament and to the Canadian people. I am, therefore, totally opposed to any move that would lessen parliamentary supervision which, after all, is one of the major roles of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: This government already has downgraded Parliament more than enough. I say it is time to cry halt, and we on this side of the House intend to do so. Even before this bill we saw on several occasions the contempt this government has for Parliament and for the people of Canada. The most recent example came to a head today when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made it perfectly clear that members of his cabinet, and not the least of them, last week abused the confidence of this House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: Last week the President of the Treasury Board and the Acting Prime Minister made statements in this House clearly intended to deny the existence of a secret $2 million government program to hire unemployed Francophone students for the federal civil service. Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking at the moment of the desirability of such a program; I have already declared my support for the principle of attracting more French-speaking Canadians to the federal public service. But I must say I was shocked as I watched a replay of the interview with the President of the Treasury Board when he was first asked about this program and denied its existence or, at least, to be perfectly fair to him, said he could not believe any program would exist that would give any such preference.

I must say, Sir, as I said before, that I have some concern about any element of discrimination in such a program. However, what I am emphasizing tonight is not the substance of this program but the manner in which it was approached and the manner in which it was hidden. I am speaking of the methods used by the government to achieve this goal and the attempts of members of the cabinet to mislead the House.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: I am not interested in verbal quibbling. I do not doubt there was a good deal of verbal cunning displayed last week by various members of the government. But whatever the cunning, whatever the mentally crossed fingers and whatever the intellectual acrobatics by ministers, members of this House and the people of this country were given to understand that all talk of a specific $2 million program was false. That was the impression given, and I believe this was the impression the government or those speaking for the government at the time intended to be given.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister today, outside this House, said that in his review of last week's proceedings all the opposition questions related to whether or not members of his cabinet had seen the secret memorandum. That is not true. It was the answers of the ministers that related to this point, and not the questions put to the ministers. As if it were not bad enough for ministers of the Crown to use these tactics for purposes of evasion, the Prime Minister himself now contributes further to the smokescreen with his statement of today. What needs reorganizing is this government's approach to integrity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In this bill the government proposes the creation of up to five ministers of state who will be responsible from time to time for dealing with special situations as they arise. In other words, I suppose we can say that these will be ministers of state for contingencies. From the way in which this government handles contingencies, they could probably more aptly be called ministers of the status quo; their main role undoubtedly will be to maintain the status quo in the face of any situations which arise. It is a measure of the government's foresight that it is able to foretell that there will never be more than five extraordinary situations at a time which will demand the undivided attention of a minister. Never fear, however, because there will still be ordinary ministers of state and ministers without portfolio constantly on the watch for trouble from any direction—trouble, that is, for the government and its image.

Under the new system this will be an awesome government in size if in nothing else. There will be superministers. There will be first-class, second-class ministers and subministers; and I have not even mentioned the Parliamentary Secretaries yet. In sheer quantitative terms this will surely be a government to remember. This will be a multi-tiered government, and we shall all shed a few tears when we think of what it will cost the Canadian taxpayers who will have to pay the bonus of additional cabinet salaries to support it.

But in government and elsewhere it is not sheer bigness that solves problems. Evidently, however, there are more important things for this government than solving problems—jobs for the boys, for example. We know, or at least we hear, that there has been some resentment among hon. members opposite about parliamentary secretaryships. I suppose the sort of proposal contained in this bill is one solution to that kind of problem. Independent observers have calculated that under the proposals in this bill, during a normal four-year parliamentary term no fewer than 138 members on the government side of the House could be patronized in one way or another. That is something we would have to call a bonanza for obedient backbenchers. Mr. Speaker, there are more important things to do in this country today than to work out systems of parliamentary patronage for government members.

What needs re-organizing is the government's approach to appropriate action for these times. Whether the government realizes it or not, the use of the pork-barrel by government is no longer acceptable in Canadian politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: What does this bill do about the legitimate, the real, the urgent problems of the Canadian people? For example, what does it do about mass unemployment? The answer is, nothing. I call on the government to face up to its responsibilities to the Canadian people. I call on this government to take immediate action to meet the grave economic problems that face us. I call on this government to act now to get the economy moving ahead vigorously. That is the challenge this House must face. The Canadian people are fed up with waiting. They are fed up with constant organization and reorganization that leads nowhere. They are fed up with sterile structure-building, of which the present bill in many of its aspects is another example. They are fed up with confusion, with incompetence and with evasion. They want action now.

What needs re-organization is the government of this country and I am confident that when they get the chance, the Canadian people will look after that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to express my views on the bill before us, especially as regards new departments.

I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) saying a few minutes ago that he did not think any member would oppose this bill. I beg to differ on this point because ever since we have been here, we have been flooded with new departments and the situation has not improved for that.

The problem of the pension plan mentioned by the member for Winnipeg North Centre will not be settled by way of new ministries. This has not put a single penny into anybody's pocket, quite the contrary, this has resulted in the country sinking deeper into debt, in citizens being taxed more heavily and having to carry a heavier burden.

The government reaches abundantly into the taxpayer's income to establish new departments, in order to determine whether there are any problems in Canada. We know the problems, we know that the smell is bad in Canada, that pollution is everywhere, we know that the departments are polluted and that our leaders have pollution in their heads.

The situation is not settled; on the contrary, the problem is getting worse. We know what is to be done in Canada. The provinces know what they have to do to deal with pollution. The municipalities know that they must build filtration plants, but they have no money to do so. Is a new department going to solve the problem?

It is up to the Minister of Finance to solve the problem, with all the other people responsible for it. It is up to us to solve this problem which is essentially a matter of economy rather than of pollution.

Everybody knows that the engineers, the materials and the technical facilities of all sorts needed to fight pollution are available; but it is also a fact that it is impossible to find the money needed for that purpose.

This is the aspect of the problem that has to be dealt with in order to be in a position to set things right and get rid of all these obnoxious problems.

In fact, the problems are nothing new; they have existed for a long time. Pollution has been a subject of discussion in this House for years but very seldom have we taken effective control measures.

This government should provide the required credits at reasonable interest rates and finance these projects while entrusting their implementation to the provinces and the municipalities which would readily assume their responsibilities.

That, Mr. Speaker, is where we should turn for a solution to the economic problem we have long been studying. We never solved it, we always went on polluting. As time passes, there is more and more stench, more and more pollution, the debts and the taxes of citizens increase: one tax after another, one levy after another, to pay administration expenses of departments which have never solved anything. There are enough people idle in the Department of Finance. If they are capable of doing something, they are unable to do so because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) does not meet the wishes and requests of other departments.

If we want to give the matter serious consideration, as men who know what they have to do and where they are going, we will find the solution.

Mr. Speaker, once more it is the financial system which is old-fashioned, which is extremely polluted and more and more governments are granting powers to financiers who further pollute our economy.

Our present system is good for a small group of people who get rich at the expense of the rest. When one considers capitalization one sees that the big institutions are building up reserve funds, all kinds of reserve funds, secret and semisecret. They try to disguise their maneuvres. Indeed they have put in billions and do not want to let one cent out because their investments yield interests of 10, 12, 15 or 20 per cent. This is exploitation of the people and administration is so carried out as to keep that pollution, that exploitation which kills all citizens and makes all people equal, except the small number who benefit from this. This is where the problem lies and as long as it remains unsolved, it is useless to create new departments.

Mr. Speaker, everyone is complaining about pollution, air pollution, water pollution, food and soil pollution, intellectual and sexual pollution, educational pollution and finally, spiritual pollution. Everything is polluted.

Let us say that there is a little truth in all that, but also a lot of fake. The only pollution that ought to be feared, Mr. Speaker, is that of the mind, of the intelligence, and particularly, the pollution of ministers' intelligence, they who control the Canadian economy, who have control over persons, families, corporations, in short over all components of our country.

I say once again that the greatest pollution, the one which creates the greatest unrest in this country, is the pollution of minds, which is the source of all pollution to be seen in nature. Let us look at it more closely.

In January 1971, an article published in Montreal's La Presse dealt with pollution. The Chairman of the Bank of Montreal, one of the most influential figures in the Canadian economy for years, the one who perhaps knows it best, the director of several large Canadian companies, cautioned the public against hasty adoption of our ill-advised legislation. In fact, this is what he said, and I quote:

Canadians will have to give up affluence to pay the cost of fighting pollution.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we shall have to tighten our belts a little more in front of this enormous affluence, this tremendous technical progress while refraining from touching this affluence in order to solve the problem of pollution.

If we are able today to get to the moon to find out if grass grows on it, we are surely able to solve the pollution problem which is far from being comparable to a trip to the moon.

Big words are always needed to focus public attention on imaginary problems and prevent the people from enjoying the benefits of their production.

In Canada, there is talk about inflation, about unemployment, and about poverty. There is also talk about pollution, to bore the people with imaginary problems, with the bogey-men who scare children, while millionaires, multimillionaires, presidents, directors and shareholders of large banks and corporations gorge themselves and grow fatter every year reaping 40 per cent of what is left of the production of all Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, the main government departments here in Ottawa are docile puppets putting on a show for a Parliament which is dumbfounded by pollution. Their ignorance, pretended or real, is reported in all the papers the next day and the public is kept uninformed on possible administrative reforms. Yet it would suffice to reinstate a favourable national economic balance for the benefit of all Canadian citizens without exception.

This is where we must intervene, Mr. Speaker. It is in the human and economic field that we must labour with the human being as the foundation of our endeavours so that all Canadians may benefit by this immense progress.

I feel that if Canadians have been capable of polluting themselves, they are indeed capable of depolluting themselves.

The President of the Bank of Montreal, Mr. Arnold Hart, director of several of the most important companies in Canada, recommended, in an article which was published in La Presse of January 26, 1971, that we forgo affluence to pay the cost of pollution, and cautioned us against passing ill-advised legislation. And all members agree with him and say that we must tighten our belts in the midst of affluence, when we do not know what to do with such affluence, when we can afford to pay unemployment insurance benefits to close to two thirds of the people, at the expense of those still working, without touching however those who accumulate millions taken from the workers who pay for those who are unemployed.

Despite all that, in 1970, we succeeded in capitalizing a surplus of about $34 billion. Certainly, there are materials to solve the problem of pollution. They are not lacking. Nobody here is afraid of not having enough materials to clean up pollution.

The government has no engineers, it does not have the technology required to solve this problem, but all members fear that the financial means may not be sufficient.

If it is physically possible to build a country, to accumulate surpluses, it is certainly easy and physically feasible to finance the economy when it is prosperous and when there is affluence everywhere. Workers are laid off because there are too many products. There are even huge stocks.

We must therefore assume our responsibilities. The establishment of a new department with very little funds will not solve the problem. Taxes will have to be increased to create new worries for taxpayers. They will be told: Pay more; empty your pocket; you have not done enough yet. As for us we will continue to ask for more. Happen what may, the problem of pollution will continue to exist. Our environment will become so much polluted that we will be crushed by pollution.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Recently, Mr. G. Arnold Hart stated and I quote:

> All of us create some pollution and we must all pay the cost, either by accepting an increase in prices or in taxes, or by forgoing certain goods which seem very desirable, or by putting up with the unemployment caused by the closing of industries incapable of complying with new standards.

What will the new department demand in order to solve the problem of pollution? We might be compelled to close 25 or 30 per cent of existing industries for that purpose.

The means suggested are poverty, hunger and hardship. Everything is extremely polluted. This is the main problem we have to cope with.

Long enough has it been smelly in our country and our departments; let us spray some perfume in there and allow Canadian citizens to freely enjoy pure air, abundance, and additional well-being in this affluent country where there is everything necessary to organize sound economy and plentiful production, and purify our water resources.

First of all, we must cleanse our already polluted minds, bent on remaining in their present condition. Some people put their noses on manure and think it sells good. I, for one, consider that it does not smell good. I am unable to get used to it.

Since other hon. members have dealt with the technical aspects of pollution, I shall not mention them. However, I should like to ask the government to put aside its policy for the creation of these many departments which will prove unable to settle anything whatsoever.

The government has only thing to do, namely put the financial system at the disposal of the provinces and municipalities. They should be allowed to discharge their responsibilities. The government must look after financial matters, and forget about the rest. The departments have nothing to do in that connection, because the municipalities and the provinces are able to fully and totally discharge their responsibilities. They know what they want and where they are heading, but they have no money. It belongs to the federal government to provide the provinces and municipalities with the necessary tools to enable them to do the job. As Churchill said during the last war: "Give us the tools and we will do the job." Tools must be given to the provinces and municipalities, and they will do the job. The government should not bother about the rest.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member wishes to put a question to the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) before he sits down, if the hon. member for Compton is ready to answer a question.

Mr. Latulippe: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bonaventure.

Mr. Béchard: The hon. member said a few moments ago that everybody knew the extent of pollution and that everybody knew this and that and those, and that the government was responsible for action in this field. He finished his speech by saying: Give us the tools and we will do the job.

Does the hon. member know that for some time the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been helping municipalities to fight pollution by granting loans for building sewage treatment plants and that the corporation is lending substantial amounts of money and does he know that municipalities recognize this fact?

Mr. Latulippe: I have known this for a long time, but if adequate action had been taken, pollution would have been checked, at least partly. But the situation is worse than ever. It is not by lending money to municipalities at interest rates of 8, 10 or 12 per cent that the problem will be solved. Higher interest rates mean more trouble for municipalities. The deeper they get into debt, the more difficulty they will have to get out of it. They get bogged deeper and deeper.

[English]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable attention and a great deal of interest—

An hon. Member: It's the first time.

Mr. Drury: I would be pleased if hon. members would do the same.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I apologize to the minister; I should have brought to the attention of the House that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Drury: I think it might be useful, before the government organization bill goes to committee of the whole for examination, if I reviewed some of the principal issues which have been raised, in the hope that I will be able to answer some of the questions of principle involved and clear up some of the misunderstandings about what is admittedly a complex bill. In this way I hope the discussion in committee of the whole will be facilitated for all concerned. I do not intend to go into detail in my remarks because there will be ample opportunity to consider the details of the bill in committee of the whole.

It will be recalled that at the outset of this debate some hon. members wondered whether it was correct procedure to include in one bill several matters of principle. After some discussion, Your Honour ruled that there was no procedural impropriety in the introduction of Bill C-207. I clearly do not want to open the issue on which Your Honour made a ruling, but I think I should explain the view of the government on the need and desirability of government organization bills. Adjustments in the machinery of government have been considerably more frequent in the past ten years than in bygone years, because of the accelerated rate at which demands upon the government have grown. In moving second reading of Bill C-207 I explained that as demands on the government have grown, new responsibilities have had to be tagged on to ministers already overloaded, and transfers of powers and elements of the public service have had to be made in a patchwork manner in an attempt to keep up with these demands.

The introduction of bills relating to the organization of government has not only permitted new adjustments in the machinery of government but also a consolidation of many of the adjustments which had to be made on an urgent basis to meet demands at an earlier time and requiring immediate action. Government organization bills, therefore, provide Parliament with a broad and unique perspective of the nature and scope of many of the issues relating to the function of the machinery of government that cannot be provided if organizational measures are introduced on a piecemeal or single-thought basis. There is also the related consideration that certain statutes such as the Salaries Act and the Financial Administration Act generally have to be amended in the course of reorganization of government. The amendment of these statutes often relates, as it does in the case of Bill C-207, to several parts of the bill, hence the logic of bringing them together in a single bill.

No government organization bill is a complete picture of all the implications of changes in the machinery of government, but it gives a much clearer picture than if the government were to submit for the approval of Parliament individual proposals for changing the organization of government. Of course, this may have to be done from time to time, but in such circumstances Parliament cannot be given as clear a view of the context of these changes as when a government organization bill is introduced. I will come back to this point later.

Several hon. members said they could see no connection between the provisions of Bill C-207 relating to the early retirement of public servants and to government organization. However, in my view perhaps nothing is more important for proper functioning in respect of government organization than good personnel and, hence, good personnel policies. The provision in the government organization bill pertaining to early retirement is an important basis for personnel policy consistent with trends elsewhere in Canada.

Before making a few brief comments on questions that were raised regarding the establishment of a department of the environment, I wish to commend hon. members who spoke on this part of the bill for the insight and understanding they displayed on the problems of environmental quality and pollution. I was particularly impressed with the observations of several members. In the final analysis, the quality of our environment will depend upon the values of our society. If our society is to be characterized by high consumption and the consequent creation of uncontrolled and vast amounts of waste, a lack of concern for aesthetics, and so on, we will never effectively come to grips with the fight against pollution and the fight for preservation of our environment. However, from an organizational point of view the implication of this observation is that in the final analysis a minister of the environment must be concerned with the quality of life. There is no doubt he will share this concern with us all. This gets to the essence of the question.

Every minister, and indeed all of us, must be concerned about the quality of life and the condition of our environment. However, the government organization bill provides that one minister will have, in addition to having specific responsibilities relating to renewable resources, air, soil and water, a general watching brief on the quality of our environment. He will naturally be concerned, for example, if oil from ships pollutes our waters. But it will not necessarily be his responsibility to lay down specifications for the construction of ships and for rules regarding their navigation so as to avoid oil spills. This is appropriately a responsibility of the Minister of Transport. In other words, the department of the environment, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) pointed out to this House some months ago, will not be a superagency with all the operating responsibilities relating to environmental quality and pollution control which are the proper concern of the government of Canada. It will, however, provide the focal point for environmental policy.

Hon. members have proposed that the administration of our national parks and other activities related to environmental concern should be made the responsibility of the new minister. There is no doubt that many of these suggestions have a good deal of logic. However, in the case of the national parks, their primary purpose is recreational rather than ecological and this makes it currently appropriate to let parks and parks policy remain the responsibility of a minister who would have more time to devote to this important area.

Another point I wished to refer to was the suggestion that, in effect, a department of the environment already exists in the newly expanded Department of Fisheries and Forestry and that provisions in the government organization bill relating to the department of the environment were of little significance. I think this is a rather superficial reading, particularly of clause 5 of the government organization bill. Clause 5 not only confirms the transfer of responsibilities made by virtue of Order in Council P.C.1970-2047 pursuant to the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, but gives the minister a broad, residual responsibility relating to environmental quality. It is important to note that the responsibilities of a minister are not simply to administer the legislation which has been assigned to him; ministers' responsibilities are much more vast than that.

The department of the environment cannot be a "department of everything". Acknowledging that it might be desirable for a minister of the environment to exercise a great variety of responsibilities, all of which impinge in some way on the environment, one must at some point make a judgment as to precisely what responsibilities he must have, to be effective. In the case of the national parks, the act and long-standing policy dedicates them for the "benefit, education and enjoyment of all Canadians". Thus, while environmental concerns rank high in the administration of national parks, it is not essential at this time for the minister of the environment to have control of their administration to lead the fight against pollution and for the enhancement of environmental quality. Indeed, it is largely because of the excellence of parks administration, and the careful attention paid to conservation and environmental concerns in the pursuit of their primary objective, that it was decided not to transfer them to the new department. Close co-ordination of policies on the one hand and policies related to the environment on the other will, however, be ensured and the ministers and officials concerned have already begun in this regard.

Statutory authority of ministers can never hope to cover all the matters with which they must be concerned. Partly for this reason, clause 5 provides that the duties, powers and functions of the minister of the environment "extend to and include all matters over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, not by law assigned to any other department, branch or agency of the Government of Canada relating to," and then there follows a specific enumeration which includes, "the protection and enhancement of the quality of the natural environment, including water, air and soil quality". In other words, the responsibilities of the minister as outlined in the government reorganization bill go well beyond the responsibilities transferred to him him by the order in council I have mentioned. It will be the responsibility of the minister of the environment to be concerned with any matters relating to the quality of the environment. What specific action the government takes is another matter. It may be that the minister himself will have to take on new and additional responsibilities, or it may mean that one of his colleagues will be asked to do so. If these new responsibilities require statutory authority then, of course, parliamentary approval will be sought.

The final point I would like to raise with respect to the department of the environment is the question of what is going to happen to the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. Several hon. members have expressed their concern over this matter and have suggested that fisheries matters will be given a low priority with the creation of the new department. This is a completely unwarranted assumption. Some hon. members suggested that the fishery service would be swallowed-up in the new organization. The fear was also expressed that the proposed minister of the environment would not have the time to devote to fisheries matters. These fears are understandable and pose a challenge to the new minister. However, the circumstances also offer considerable advantage to those renewable resource programs in the new department.

One of the most troublesome aspects today in all renewable resource program areas in the threat of pollution. At both the provincial and federal levels, ministers responsible for renewable resource programs are being plagued by pollution threats affecting land, sea and air. By being able to influence directly the management of both renewable resource programs, such as fisheries development, and all those polluting influences that threaten these life-sustaining resources, the minister will be in a good position to safeguard the quality of the habitat of marine life. Undoubtedly, the new minister will face a major management challenge in his new department. However, the size and complexity of this new agency is not such that it stands in a class by itself. I am confident that the Canadian fishery service will benefit greatly as a vital component of the new department. It will be clearly identified and sufficiently autonomous to guarantee an increased rather than a decreased vitality in fisheries development in this country.

In my view, some of the most important observations on the government organization bill were those relating to ministers and ministries of state. One observation frequently made was that the executive was being aggrandized at the expense of Parliament, and such remarks were often accompanied by suggestions that parliamentary committees should be strengthened. As I mentioned in my earlier speech, a fundamental reason for establishing ministers and ministries of state is to strengthen Parliament by enhancing the accountability of ministers to this House. In essence, the provisions of Bill C-207 relating to ministers and ministries of state will serve to sharpen the focus of responsibility as between ministers and hence will facilitate their accountability to Parliament.

This government, then, accepts fully the premise that Parliament, and this House in particular, should be strengthened as an institution. It may well be that one of the ways in which Parliament can be strengthened would be by reviewing the role of parliamentary committees to determine whether we should go even further than we have in strengthening them. I think we should allow ourselves time to reflect on the changes we have made so far, before going further, but we should clearly not ignore this question. In any event, the role of parliamentary committees is not a matter to be included in a government organization bill; it is a matter for this House and for Parliament in general. There can be no doubt that every Member of Parliament should be able to play a meaningful role in this institution and to take his job seriously, but in most respects what is done in this regard requires no special legislative authority.

The point was made that the manner in which ministries of state are to be established will, in fact, reduce Parliament's control over the executive. As I observed in my remarks when I opened this debate, it has been the custom in Canada, unlike in Great Britain, to have departments of government established by legislation. Ministries of state, however, will not be departments. They will not usually have any significant operational responsibilities. In other words, they will not manage programs. They will be relatively small in size and in most instances of a temporary nature. Their fundamental purpose will be to enable the government to assign responsibility to a minister for the development of policy in an area where the development of such policy is urgently required, and to equip him with suitable staff resources to discharge this responsibility.

If in addition to obtaining parliamentary approval of the budget of a ministry of state, the government also had to obtain prior approval for the very existence of a ministry of state, the fundamental purpose of quick response to urgent problems would, I submit, be completely lost. I do not think there is anything unreasonable in this proposal. Indeed, an arrangement of this kind is clearly essential in any modern government. I believe the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) was particularly concerned about this matter and it surprised me somewhat that he should appear to be unaware of the legislation that has been enacted in his home province to give the executive virtually unlimited authority, without recourse to legislation, to organize itself as it sees fit. The authority obtained recently by the Manitoba government in this regard is far more sweeping than the authority currently being sought by this government.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from one section of Manitoba's Executive Government Organization Act to illustrate the extraordinary nature of the powers of the Lieutenant Governor in Council in respect of government organization in that province. I quote:

> Notwithstanding any act of the legislature the Lieutenant Governor in Council may determine the organization of executive government and of the various departments thereof, and for that purpose may
> (a) establish, vary, or disestablish any department;
> (b) determine or vary the duties and functions of any department and transfer any duties and functions from one department to another;
> (c) determine or change the name of any department.

Although the legislation passed by the Manitoba government, where the hon. member for Selkirk was only recently executive assistant to the Premier, is clearly very far reaching, several other provinces have legislation that gives the Lieutenant Governor in Council far greater flexibility to organize machinery of government than is the case at the present time with the Governor in Council. Concluding my observation on this part of the bill, Mr. Speaker, if one has any doubt whether the potential number of cabinet ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries in Canada would be excessive after the enactment of Bill C-207, I would refer them to the situation in the United Kingdom where the total number of ministers, both of the cabinet and not of the cabinet, and parliamentary assistants is vastly greater than what is proposed here.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Surely that is a completely different situation.

Mr. Drury: In conclusion, let me revert to part VII of the bill relating to early retirement, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made special reference. Hon. members will appreciate, I hope, that deputy heads—that is, deputy heads and chief executive officers of boards, commissions, corporations and other portions of the public service who are appointed by the Governor in Council—by the very nature of their appointments do not and should not enjoy security of tenure of office. In view of the lack of safeguards regarding tenure of office which are enjoyed by the great majority of public service employees, the government concluded that the least that could be done was to ensure that the pension prospects and related benefit protection should not be abruptly curtailed but should be extendable to age 60 if the retiring deputy head so desired.

The purpose of new section 11A of the Public Service Superannuation Act is to make it possible for a deputy head to continue to be a contributor under the Public Service Superannuation Act if, after ceasing to hold that office, he does not continue to be employed in the public service of Canada until attaining the age of 60. The ordinary public service employee who is given leave of absence to go on assignment with international organizations or to serve on a full-time basis with staff associations, for example, is permitted to continue to contribute under the Public Service Superannuation Act by paying both his own and the government's matching contribution to the superannuation account, presently 14 per cent of his last salary.

This is what is intended under this legislation when a former deputy head has elected to continue to contribute in accordance with its provisions. On making his election, he will indicate if he wants to continue to do so up to age 60, but it will be open to him to terminate that arrangement earlier if he so desires. The new regulations contemplated by this legislation will be of general application and not open to individual discrimination. However, it might well be that his combination of age and service would make it possible for him to request the application of the early retirement provisions proposed in the previous section of this bill. This would also be possible.

Finally, I should like to deal with a point made by some hon. members, more particularly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who argued that the passage of this bill would represent the final abdication of control by Parliament over the executive. I suggest that perhaps this is rather too apocalyptic in view of what is a sensible bill. The hon. member has failed to take into account the real essence of what really should be parliamentary control. It should be based on knowledge and on ability to apply knowledge as a process of control, rather than merely a dead hand based or founded on ignorance. To meet this objective the government has proposed a number of measures that are designed specifically to place in the hands of Parliament more knowledge and information than has ever been the case in the past. There has been provided to Parliament—I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre agreed with this—a new and much more illuminating form of estimates, so that now out of the estimates it is possible to get information whereas in the past one merely got a series of numbers.

There has also been provided to both sides of the House sources of research for the provision of more knowledge and information to members. I think all hon. members will agree that this is a step in the right direction. But acknowledgement should be had of these steps when setting them against endeavours on the part of the government to increase its accountability to Parliament; and it is in terms of accountability that real, effective control can be exercised.

There is one further point I should deal with, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre expressed the view that with the disappearance of the committee of supply, control over the estimates was thereby effectively lost. I have had some experience in committee of supply, and it was quite clear that this was a control based not on knowledge or intelligence but on an erosion of the respective wills of members on either side of the House. With a system for reference of adequate estimates for study in detail to a much greater extent than is possible in an examination of estimates in the Nova Scotia Legislature for instance, I think we have enhanced and will continue to enhance the kind of framework in which Members of Parliament and Parliament itself, through knowledge, can establish effective control over the executive. This is the kind of control which is needed, desirable and appropriate. It will be control based on knowledge and real information rather than on cumbersome procedures which merely delay rather than control.

I hope hon. members will recognize the steps which have been taken and accept the fact that the government will welcome, as I have indicated, further steps in this direction.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a question about one of the fundamental points I raised yesterday, with which he has failed to deal. It relates to the ability of the Governor in Council to transfer funds allocated in an appropriation bill for a certain purpose to another function, such as a ministry of state. This apparently may be done by order in council. I have in mind the effects of clause 16.

Can the minister tell me what effective control Parliament will have, having in mind knowledge of order in council and what can be done by Parliament? Will he explain how he can reconcile this attempt to transfer funds, if that is to be the case, with the requirements and regulations contained in the BNA Act, the Financial Administration Act and appropriation bills?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how to get around the BNA Act, the Financial Administration Act or appropriation bills.

An hon. Member: You just don't know how to get around much any more.

Mr. Drury: The government is not proposing a technique to do this. The hon. gentleman who asked the question is aware of the existence and operation of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act. I think he will find that clause 16 provides no greater extension of powers than is contained in that act, and we have lived with it for many years.

In so far as the transfer of funds is concerned, Parliament does appropriate moneys for specific purposes and programs, and the executive does not have the right, nor does it seek it, without the approval of Parliament to transfer funds voted for one program to another program. In view of the act to which I have just referred, all clause 16 will allow is that the agency administering or directing the program may be transferred from the authority of one minister to another. The purpose for which the money has been voted cannot be changed without subsequent authority of Parliament.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a further question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister still has some time left. I do not want to prevent hon. members asking questions, but I respectfully point out that such questions might appropriately be asked at the next stage of our proceedings. However, I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With the greatest deference, Your Honour, I think an hon. member should be allowed to decide whether a question is appropriate at this or at the next stage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister whether his thinking is that we would have to follow the procedure he has suggested, in view of clause 29 of this bill. Apparently this House is being asked to give permission to have funds allocated to an agency, along with its duties, transferred to the minister of the environment or reallocated to that department when and as the Governor in Council may decide. I suggest that the ruling of the Chair last year in connection with Bill S-3 absolutely precludes such transfer. Perhaps the minister would explain clause 29 to the House in order that we may better understand the thinking of the government.

Mr. Drury: I must confess that I did not understand the entire question, particularly the reference to Bill S-3. When we come to clause 29 I will endeavour to deal with it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Hon. members may agree that since clauses 1 and 2 are short title clauses, in accordance with section 1 of Standing Order 75 the committee should now proceed to the consideration of clause 3 of the bill. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 3—Department of the Environment—Department established.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think the course adopted is technically correct, but I think it also points out the dilemma I referred to earlier when I raised the point of order that a bill having so many things in it would be extremely difficult for the House to consider and, now, for this committee to consider. Let me now deal with the division we face in respect of the creation of the department of the environment. I will do so on the presumption that the discussion will be on the clause the Chair has called.

It is difficult to deal with some of the points raised by the President of the Treasury Board at this time while they are fresh in the public's mind. If we had a regular clause 1 debate we might be able to impress these points on the minds of the members of the press gallery who are present. For one thing, Sir, to confuse a unitarian government such as exists in the United Kingdom with a federal system such as we have in Canada is like trying to equate oranges—I hate to say this about the Canadian government—with lemons.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, obviously that was a fitting remark in a debate such as this. After all, the original scenario comes from the gang responsible for having horses on the payroll, and now we have the great sequel—the Grits will have their own gravy train. This is the best I can do this evening, but I advise the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that my best this evening eclipses anything the minister has been able to do for a number of years.

The point I want to make about this clause arises from a problem that has hit pretty hard the fishing industry in my province and which I presume will be hitting other industries as the department of the environment swings into operation. The problem has been presented to the House by the hon. member for South Shore and the hon. member for South Western Nova. It concerns the fact that because of mercury pollution, the swordfish industry in eastern Canada has been pretty well laid flat on its back. When questions are raised in the House, the minister points out that some assistance will be given in the way of retraining these fishermen, I presume to catch other types of fish, and that an effort will be made to find employment for them in other directions.

This may seem to be the solution to a substantial problem, but I suggest it ignores two very fundamental facts. I bring these to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board, his colleague from Nova Scotia who is with him, and the new minister of the environment. First, I would point out that these people have lost their livelihood through no fault of their own. They had nothing to do, except in a very small and inconsequential way, with any mercury pollution of the swordfishery. So they have by happenstance come upon this problem.

The serious thing is that nothing that has been suggested as a remedy takes into account the fact that swordfishing boats are of a specific types; they are large and have their own special equipment. In short, they represent a substantial capital investment. The people who are thrown out of the swordfishery are to be given some help through retraining and the like, but this would not seem to be as helpful as other methods might be. Through no fault of their own they are in very serious difficulty.

I think in committee we might give consideration to the problem of what happens when pollution controls, standards and measurements have the effect of taking dozens or hundreds of people and suddenly knocking them out of work and placing them in the position of having to ask for help from everybody else. I do not quarrel with the idea of giving them help, but so many people are asking for it now that it is becoming a serious problem because our resources are stretched thin. However, we can see this happening to people involved in swordfishing. We can see it happening, after hearing the statement of the minister, to people working in paper plants. It could also happen when we become involved in the purification of our air. It could happen to any number of plants, I suggest, that are now polluting the atmosphere, particularly in cities such as Toronto and Montreal.

So we have a question of principle here. I do not think it has been raised so far in this debate. It is coming up to ten o'clock, and although I do not believe we will have an answer to this question tonight I thought it important enough to be raised at the earliest opportunity. I refer specifically to the swordfishery, but also generally to people who through no fault of their own will find themselves in the same situation. I hope the President of the Treasury Board, when he is considering with his colleagues the points we have raised in the debate and those we will raise in the next day or so, will give some consideration to the problem I have raised on behalf of the people in the swordfishing industry of Nova Scotia.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, it is about half a minute to ten o'clock. If it is desired that I continue until ten o'clock, that is fine with me. We are on clause 3 of the bill, which is to set up the department of the environment. There are several points I should like to raise in this connection. The first is that if we are to establish a department of the environment, why do we not cover the whole environmental field instead of just one small portion of it? This is one of the basic points I should like to leave with the government and the minister who will be in charge of this new department.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, perhaps before we proceed to the adjournment debate the House Leader would indicate, for the benefit of all members, the program the government anticipates placing before the House for the remainder of this week or for as long as he can announce it.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose to continue with committee of the whole stage of the government organization bill, and following that the CDC bill and the bail reform bill. If it is possible to slip in other items between these, we will call the Export Development Act bill, the omnibus loans bill, the Canada-New Zealand trade agreement bill and the Canada-Jamaica tax agreement bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just to be realistic about the matter, can the President of the Privy Council tell us if it is the intention to stay in committee of the whole until we finish this bill, particularly if it continues through Thursday and Friday of this week?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it would be the present plan to continue with this bill until we complete it, but I thought the Acting House Leader of the official opposition asked about more than the present bill and inquired what would come after it.

Mr. MacLean: That is right. But am I correct in assuming the House Leader means that the present bill will not be interrupted to consider the CDC bill, that is, before committee of the whole stage is finished?

Mr. MacEachen: That is the plan. But if the bill were kept in committee of the whole for an unduly long period, it might be necessary to revise the schedule.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—MANITOBA—RESTORATION OF CLASS A REGIONAL SERVICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, last week I asked two questions for the purpose of clarifying the government's regional air policy. I have been encouraged to pursue the matter at this time because in his reply the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) indicated that so far as the regional air policy affecting western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan is concerned, it is under review and it is anticipated that there will be an upgrading of this service along the lines that existed from the time it was first inaugurated in the early part of the 1950s.

It is just a year ago that the ATC authorized the downgrading of this part of the regional air service affecting western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan. At that time the link provided for under the charter of the air company authorized to perform this service, TransAir, was discontinued between Winnipeg, Brandon and Regina. Since that time there has been a further downgrading and TransAir is no longer providing daily air service between Winnipeg and Regina.

Now that the minister and the department are in the throes of reconsideration, I raise the matter to review briefly the vital importance of regional air policy to the general program of regional economic development in all parts of Canada. We have been passing through a communications and transportation revolution. Railway service is disappearing rapidly, and the end of that process is not yet in sight. To compensate for the loss of adequate rail service, the regional air policy was inaugurated. In the initial stages it was provided in this region by Trans-Canada Air Lines, later Air Canada. Then around 1960 Air Canada authorized TransAir to carry on this service with a subsidy or service development grant. In one respect Air Canada is still obligated to provide this service because in the first instance it was merely a lease arrangement.

The real crisis came when the government withdrew the subsidy from TransAir in 1968. As a result of that loss of support the private carrier applied to withdraw from several of its route obligations, with the results that I have already indicated. It is obvious, if you trace the development of this service over the past 15 years, that the Department of Transport intended that this part of Canada, along with other parts, should be provided with adequate air service. A considerable sum of money, up to $2 million, has been spent on a new runway. A new terminal building costing $200,000 was completed just one year ago to provide for a constantly improving service. This new terminal, of course, will stand derelict until a reasonable and just solution can be reached by the minister and there is restoration of an adequate service that is so urgently needed.

I think it is essential for the minister to recognize, as he considers this problem, that until traffic has been built up on this western lateral of the TransAir service, a subsidy or grant in aid ought to be made available. This would not be the only air service in Canada that is subsidized. I have figures before me relating to the early part of the 1960s and showing that Air Canada service is subsidized to many points in Canada. For example, the Toronto-Ottawa-Montreal run was subsidized to the tune of $2.25 million. The Air Canada Montreal-Atlantic region run was subsidized to the tune of $2.5 million. So this would not be an isolated instance of subsidy. If granted, it would be recognition of the fact that in this day and age adequate air service is necessary for industrial progress and development.

I wish to mention another aspect of the problem. One reason TransAir has found it increasingly difficult to operate in the black is the unfair competition of Air Canada, particularly on the Winnipeg-Regina stretch of the western lateral. Every time TransAir tried to adjust its schedule so that it could provide the best service for intervening points like Regina, Swift Current, Brandon and Winnipeg, that service was bracketed by Air Canada. I think Air Canada ought to be required to conform to the regional air policy laid down by the government, under which it is to provide the best possible air transport service to all parts of Canada.

There is one other aspect of the matter, Mr. Speaker. TransAir has been given some lucrative routes into Winnipeg, Thunder Bay and Toronto. It asked to withdraw from the Kenora-Dryden-Thunder Bay service, but because it was allowed to continue on to Toronto that service is continuing. I have flown that route from time to time. If anyone says that too few passengers are generated on the Regina-Brandon-Winnipeg run, I can advise the minister that there are even fewer generated at such points as Kenora and Dryden, yet those points are provided with class I service. All we are asking for in western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan is equity so that we may be able to benefit from the general regional development program of the government.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond this evening on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to the questions raised by the hon. member from Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). The House is not unfamiliar with this subject; I recall several questions over the past few weeks which were put by the hon. member to the Minister of Transport. On the aspect of providing additional passenger service to Brandon, it appears to me that the real essence of the situation can be found in the minister's answer to the hon. member during the question period of January 26, as reported at page 2757 of Hansard as follows:

> I think he is as well aware as I am that level of usage is one of the determining factors. We are doing our best to put the kind of aircraft into that service that will accommodate the people who are offering their patronage.

The hon. member, Mr. Speaker, has raised some additional points which I will bring to the minister's attention. At the same time, these representations might be referred to the Canadian Transport Commission in the event that a further application to serve Brandon is filed with the commission.

In response to a related question asked by the hon. member on January 22 about the possibility of the minister visiting Brandon, I am informed that His Worship Mayor Wilton has extended a kind invitation to the minister to officially open the new air terminal building. The minister has accepted the invitation and has agreed with the mayor that he will visit Brandon early in the coming spring. Specific arrangements will be made in the weeks ahead.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DISCONTINUANCE OF DINING CAR SERVICE—OTTAWA-MONTREAL

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I realize that this question was asked last night by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand). I thought that perhaps the duty man tonight would not be the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) and that someone else would give a different type of answer. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary has had an opportunity between last night and tonight to look at the situation.

We have heard a lot about rationalization in the last few days with regard to railways generally. Never did we believe that nationalization of Canadian National Railways would lead to the rationalization of "the public be damned" policy that is being adopted by the CNR. It has been said that in the first half of the century Canada was a child of her waterways and that in the second half she was a child of the railways. Now Canada is to lose that child because the president of the Canadian Transport Commission does not care about public service in this country.

I am sure the questions asked in this House concerning the dining car service on trains 30 and 31 between Ottawa and Montreal and Montreal and Ottawa have led everyone to believe that there is public demand for this service. The chairman of the dining car local tried to get the figures from the CNR as to how many meals are served on that train. He was informed that he should go to the regional vice-president of his organization to find this information. He in turn would apply to the CNR regional vice-president to confirm whether the number of meals on the train was in fact necessary. It seems strange that the figure of $300,000 was quoted last night as the loss on that train without any substantiating facts whatsoever.

Last Thursday morning I rode the train from Ottawa to Montreal. There was a line-up of people waiting for meals. I can visualize what will happen after today when a person leaves the train. I can visualize the public relations image of a bright young businessman stepping off the train at Montreal with a hot meat pie stuck to his black suit. This is exactly the type of situation we are now looking at. Surely somewhere along the line people do count in our transportation system. The president of the CNR and members of the Canadian Transport Commission must realize that railways in Canada have an obligation to provide service to the public. Public interest means something in this day and age. We know that the Canadian Transport Commission could have quashed the ruling to discontinue this dining car service. I wish to read from an article which appeared in the January 29 edition of The Citizen:

> A CTC spokesman said today that the commission "has had a good look" at the proposal and feels passenger service won't be adversely affected.

The article continues:

> —the CTC could legally quash the change.

A spokesman said as follows:

> "We feel discontinuance of dining car service was an admirable move on the part of CN to cut down costs."

It seems strange that the article did not name the CTC spokesman. The words of the CTC spokesman are very familiar with regard to the rationalization we heard about recently on other types of service. If we look at the situation we realize that this train serves the capital of our nation as well as our largest city. It is strange that this service is being discontinued. Many people have suggested that if the railways can cut off the politicians' train without too much of an uproar, they can cut off any train on the continent. This is the policy of the railways; they believe that if they can do this, everything will be fine. I quote from another newspaper article as follows:

> Cyrus Eaton, Nova Scotia-born Cleveland industrialist, says that Canada is making a great mistake in allowing the railways to phase out services and lines.
> Mr. Eaton, Chairman of the Chesapeake and Ohio railroad company said Canada "has no more important and necessary institutions than the railways."

Somehow some change will have to be made if we are to be recognized as having a transportation policy in Canada at all. The other day the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) introduced legislation providing pensions for workers laid off as a result of changes in the textile industry. I believe it is high time he took a look at what is happening in the transportation industry and applied similar measures there. We know there will be some 21 people affected by cutting off the dining car service. We also know that this service is used and appreciated. The railways should not be allowed to segregate services and say: We are losing on this and gaining on that. They have a responsibility to the public, and in these circumstances they should be compelled by the Transport Commission to provide reasonable service.

It seems strange that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), having been requested to meet representatives of this organization to discuss the problem, should have failed to do so. I can only say that somewhere along the line we must produce a Minister of Transport who will stand up to the Transport Commission and tell its chairman that the minister is running the show and not him. It is vital that we should know who is really running the transportation system, whether it is the Minister of Transport or the chairman of the CTC.

The travellers using this service say without hesitation that they want it continued. It is the same game that we have seen over and over again. The CNR cuts down a service, within six months probably 50 per cent of the passengers become discouraged, then a further application is placed before the Transport Commission to abandon the route and transportation disappears. Will the Parliamentary Secretary please use a sledgehammer on the CNR to try to get them to reinstate a service which is in the best interest of the people of this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, last evening at this hour I had the opportunity, on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), of providing pertinent information in answer to what would appear to be an identical question. Last night it was to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand); tonight it is to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg).

The information respecting this matter has not altered during the past 24 hours. Without meaning any disrespect to the hon. member or to the trade union officials he quoted as authorities, I think it would not be inappropriate to refer him to last night's proceedings. There is one additional point which might be made clear in view of the hon. member's comments. The number of the employees affected is about 13. They have rights under their contract and can elect to exercise those seniority rights.

Mr. Skoberg: Where?

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

SOCIAL SECURITY—GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—OLD AGE PENSION COST OF LIVING BONUS—CHANGES IN CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, November 30, as reported at page 1582 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) whether he would make representations to the provincial governments in connection with the advisability of reducing property taxes in the case of pensioners, as a means of increasing their discretionary income. The minister replied as follows:

> This may be a matter which could be discussed at meetings of ministers of both health and welfare, but it seems to me this is an area which lies exclusively within provincial jurisdiction.

The point I wish to make is this. It is obvious to anyone with eyes in his head that pensioners, especially those in receipt of the guaranteed income supplement, are in desperate need of additional income. In my question I was suggesting to the minister a way of providing some of that needed income to pensioners. I suggested it could be supplied through a remission of property taxes. I find it unacceptable for the minister to hide behind the Constitution as a means of avoiding the provision of such needed aid to pensioners.

It is true beyond any doubt that property taxes are a matter for the provinces under our Constitution. But I suggest that that fact need not inhibit the minister suggesting to the provinces that the reduction or elimination of property taxes to pensioners would have worth-while social effects. I also suggest that he need not restrict himself to purely moral suasion in this regard. He has at his disposal the instrument of the Canada Assistance Plan, which I suggest he could properly employ in this respect. Why not offer under the Canada Assistance Plan to pay half the costs which will be incurred by the provinces in the form of lost revenue through the remission of property taxes to pensioners? I speak not only of property taxes paid directly but also of property taxes paid indirectly as one of the component factors of rental fees that are charged.

Some provinces, through home owner grants, now do this or something similar to it in respect of the entire property tax paying population. In saying that this method is employed by some provinces I do not express my concurrence with it as a form of public policy but simply to indicate that that kind of approach is possible. I am suggesting to the minister that the provinces could decide, if he were to place such a plan under the aegis of the Canada Assistance Plan, whether or not to participate in such a program once it was offered, as they do now in the case of other Canada Assistance Plan programs and as they did in the case of medicare and hospitalization.

I realize that the federal and provincial governments do not have bottomless purses, and thus assistance that could be offered in this manner under the Canada Assistance Plan could be tailored to suit financial circumstances. For example, one approach would be to remit all property taxes to pensioners. Another approach would be to remit the health, welfare and education components of property taxes to pensioners. A third approach would be to remit only the education component of property taxes to pensioners. Another would be to remit to all pensioners their taxes, or to restrict the remission to those pensioners in receipt of the guaranteed income supplement. I am trying to demonstrate that this kind of program is infinitely adjustable. Other approaches will probably readily occur to hon. members.

The point that I insist on making is that the federal government could do something in this regard if it wished. The legislative precedents are there, and I suspect that within the Canada Assistance Plan the legislative authority to so act is already extant. Certainly the need is there. Our pensioners must pay far too high a proportion of their income for accommodation. This is true of people living in rental accommodation as well as those owning their own property. I think it is said that people who have worked in order to purchase a home are now finding property taxes so high that they are unable to keep the home. It is a sad fact that governments seem unwilling to act to prevent them from losing their homes. I am simply saying to the minister that he need not feel that his hands are tied by the Constitution if he really wishes to deal with this problem. I have suggested several approaches to him this evening. I hope he will consider them when they are transmitted to him by whichever parliamentary secretary replies on his behalf.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, since the fiery and sprightly member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) is in his riding on official business with his constituents, he asked me to pass on to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) the answer he would have given him himself.

Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, the government is always prepared to consider any worthwhile and practical system designed to increase the income of needy pensioners, as indeed it did recently by increasing the guaranteed income supplement. As the minister pointed out on November 30th, the hon. member's suggestion falls within a field that comes under provincial jurisdiction.

Whether he likes it or not, there exists in Canada a constitution, and property and property rights come under provincial jurisdiction, as he himself has just recognized.

That, for instance, is why Ontario, facing up to its responsibilities, recently set up a fiscal assistance program to help elderly people; this program applies to all those who, at the end of October 1970, were eligible for the federal guaranteed income supplement. The province has decided to help needy people in future, easing their tax burden, deeming it should start with those whose need is greatest. The authorities therefore decided to include in this class old people receiving a guaranteed income supplement.

These people have been the most affected by the increase in real estate taxes, whether they are owners or tenants, and the Ontario government has judged these taxes to be among the most unfair to be levied by the different levels of government.

A few years ago, Ontario and Quebec established a tax abatement applicable to all municipal real estate taxes.

Recently, the Ontario government reduced the school tax rates for farmers and has now begun paying up to $100 per month to older persons in order to help them pay their property taxes or their rent.

British Columbia and Saskatchewan have also adopted programs to help persons in need pay their property taxes.

There, Mr. Speaker, is an example of the way in which the different levels of government endeavour, each in its own field, to help needy people to overcome their difficulties. Because of the various budgetary requirements which governments must face, one must admit that, inasmuch as possible, those whose need is greatest should have first priority, and that, I believe, is what the NDP advocates. For that reason, we may have to introduce programs on a selective basis, evaluating a series of needs against another, while at the same time taking into account the various methods and resources through which such needs may be satisfied.

Each level of government must determine its own priorities, in its own field of jurisdiction and according to its means, in dealing with the problems of our modern age.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

COMMONWEALTH SECRETARIAT
Marlborough House,
London, S.W. 1, Tel. No. 01-839 3411

COMMONWEALTH HEADS' OF GOVERNMENT MEETING
SINGAPORE, 14-22 January, 1971

FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

Commonwealth Heads of Government met in Singapore from 14 to 22 January. All Commonwealth countries were represented, seven by their Presidents, seventeen by their Prime Ministers, one by the Vice-President, and six by senior Ministers. The Prime Minister of Singapore was in the Chair.

2. This was the first Heads' of Government Meeting to be held in Asia. Heads of Government welcomed this and expressed gratitude to the Government of Singapore for the hospitality it had provided.

3. The Meeting expressed a warm greeting to the Prime Ministers of Tonga, Western Samoa and Fiji whose countries had become members of the Commonwealth during 1970, and particularly welcomed their membership as it brought to Commonwealth consultations additional views of the peoples of the south-west Pacific.

Commonwealth Declaration

4. Heads of Government approved unanimously and issued a Commonwealth Declaration.

International Affairs

5. Heads of Government reviewed the world political situation and trends. Views were exchanged on: East-West relations; Chinese representation in the United Nations; the steps required to end the conflict in Indo-China; the neutralisation of south-east Asia; the conditions necessary for achieving a durable settlement in the Middle East; the violation of the security and sovereignty of the Republic of Guinea by the military and naval forces of Portugal in conjunction with other elements; the need for general and complete disarmament under effective international control, the cessation of the nuclear arms race and the conclusion of collateral measures with particular attention to nuclear disarmament until general and complete disarmament is achieved; the staging of nuclear weapons tests and the dumping of chemical weapons in the peaceful south-west Pacific area; and the complementary role of regional organisations and such trans-regional groupings as the Commonwealth.

Southern Africa

6. The Meeting reviewed major developments in southern Africa, including in particular those in South Africa and Namibia (South West Africa), the Portuguese colonies and Rhodesia, and noted that tensions in that region were likely to increase rather than decrease unless there were fundamental changes in the conditions now prevailing. Earlier discussions on N.I.B.M.R. were recalled. There was unanimous reaffirmation of the importance of the principle that any proposals for settlement must be acceptable to the people of Rhodesia as a whole.

7. The Meeting had before it the report of the Commonwealth Sanctions Committee which reviewed the working of economic sanctions over the last two years. Heads of Government authorized the Committee to continue to review the situation.

8. Heads of Government discussed fully the question of the sale of arms to South Africa.

9. Heads of Government considered the factors affecting the security of maritime trade routes in the South Atlantic and Indian Oceans, which are of vital importance for a large number of Commonwealth countries. They decided to set up a Study Group, consisting of representatives of Australia, Britain, Canada, India, Jamaica, Kenya, Malaysia and Nigeria, with instructions to consider the question further and report to them through the Secretary-General as soon as possible.

10. Certain Heads of Government stipulated the understandings on which they agreed to support the proposal to set up the Study Group.

The Security of the Indian Ocean

11. In their discussion of a paper presented by the Prime Minister of Ceylon on the security of the Indian Ocean, Heads of Government agreed on the desirability of ensuring that it remains an area of peace and stability.

Economic Affairs

12. Heads of Government held a full and frank discussion on the world economic situation and broadly reviewed recent developments and trends. Among the items discussed were: liberalisation of trade and access to markets; the special problems relating to exports of developing countries; the generalised preferences system and the problems connected with it; international commodity problems; high freight rates, inflation and its consequences; debt servicing problems of developing countries; targets for the transfer of resources to developing countries; terms and conditions of assistance, including the untying of aid; supplementary financing; the possibility of a link between Special Drawing Rights and development finance; and, the lending policies of international financial institutions.

13. Heads of Government expressed their satisfaction that agreement was reached on the International Development Strategy for the Second Development Decade at the United Nations General Assembly. They reaffirmed their Governments' resolve to take the measures to translate into reality the goals and objectives of the Decade. In summarising their discussions, they also reaffirmed their conviction that fulfilment of the economic and social aspirations of the peoples of the developing countries was a matter of vital concern not only to the developing nations but to the world at large.

Possible British Entry into the EEC

14. Heads of Government discussed Britain's possible entry into the European Economic Community and the implications of this for other Commonwealth members. Among the matters discussed were the questions of: the effect of the Common Agricultural Policy on the exports of Britain's traditional suppliers; the need for any enlarged Community to be outward looking; standstill arrangements for those countries which desired or may be offered association or other trading arrangements with an enlarged Community; reverse preferences and their impact on international trading arrangements; the potential advantages and disadvantages for the Commonwealth in the event of Britain's accession; and methods of consultation during negotiations. They welcomed the resolve of the British Government to continue to press during the negotiations for measures to safeguard the interests of Commonwealth countries.

Commonwealth Co-operation for Development

15. Heads of Government welcomed the establishment of the Commonwealth Fund for Technical Co-operation and noted that the way was now open for it to be made operational.

16. Heads of Government discussed the recommendations embodied in a study on Commonwealth Export Market Development. They decided that these recommendations should be given further consideration at an early meeting of trade and finance officials.

Commonwealth Information Programme

17. Heads of Government agreed in principle on the proposals submitted to them for a Commonwealth Information Programme.

Commonwealth Co-operation on Youth Questions

18. Heads of Government noted with approval the Secretariat's activities in the youth field and agreed that such activities be expanded. They noted that a number of related matters would be discussed at the forthcoming Commonwealth Education Conference in Canberra. They decided that a meeting of Ministers concerned with Youth matters be convened as early as possible.

Commonwealth Book Development and Gift Voucher Scheme

19. Heads of Government approved in principle the establishment of a Commonwealth Book Voucher Scheme.

Special Commonwealth Programme for Assisting the Education of Rhodesian Africans

20. Heads of Government took note of the development of the programme and supported its continuation.

Commonwealth Foundation

21. Heads of Government noted the progress of the Commonwealth Foundation and agreed to its proposed expansion.

Comparative Techniques of Government

22. The Conference agreed that the item on "Comparative Techniques of Government", which was introduced by the Prime Minister of Canada, should be the subject of further discussion at the next meeting of Commonwealth Heads of Government. It was proposed that the Secretary-General should facilitate such discussion by arranging for preliminary study of the subject by appropriate officials.

APPENDIX B

COMMONWEALTH DECLARATION
COMMONWEALTH HEADS' OF GOVERNMENT MEETING
SINGAPORE, January 1971

The Commonwealth of Nations is a voluntary association of independent sovereign states, each responsible for its own policies, consulting and co-operating in the common interests of their peoples and in the promotion of international understanding and world peace.

Members of the Commonwealth come from territories in the six continents and five oceans, include peoples of different races, languages and religions, and display every stage of economic development from poor developing nations to wealthy industrialised nations. They encompass a rich variety of cultures, traditions and institutions. Membership of the Commonwealth is compatible with the freedom of member governments to be non-aligned or to belong to any other grouping, association or alliance.

Within this diversity all members of the Commonwealth hold certain principles in common. It is by pursuing these principles that the Commonwealth can continue to influence international society for the benefit of mankind.

WE BELIEVE that international peace and order are essential to the security and prosperity of mankind; we therefore support the United Nations and seek to strengthen its influence for peace in the world, and its efforts to remove the causes of tension between nations.

WE BELIEVE in the liberty of the individual, in equal rights for all citizens regardless of race, colour, creed or political belief, and in their inalienable right to participate by means of free and democratic political processes in framing the society in which they live. We therefore strive to promote in each of our countries those representative institutions and guarantees for personal freedom under the law that are our common heritage.

WE RECOGNISE racial prejudice as a dangerous sickness threatening the healthy development of the human race and racial discrimination as an unmitigated evil of society. Each of us will vigorously combat this evil within our own nation. No country will afford to regimes which practise racial discrimination assistance which in its own judgment directly contributes to the pursuit or consolidation of this evil policy. We oppose all forms of colonial domination and racial oppression and are committed to the principles of human dignity and equality. We will therefore use all our efforts to foster human equality and dignity everywhere and to further the principles of self-determination and non-racialism.

WE BELIEVE that the wide disparities in wealth now existing between different sections of mankind are too great to be tolerated; they also create world tensions; our aim is their progressive removal; we therefore seek to use our efforts to overcome poverty, ignorance and disease, in raising standards of life and achieving a more equitable international society. To this end our aim is to achieve the freest possible flow of international trade on terms fair and equitable to all, taking into account the special requirements of the developing countries, and to encourage the flow of adequate resources, including governmental and private resources, to the developing countries, bearing in mind the importance of doing this in a true spirit of partnership and of establishing for this purpose in the developing countries conditions which are conducive to sustained investment and growth.

WE BELIEVE that international co-operation is essential to remove the causes of war, promote tolerance, combat injustice and secure development amongst the peoples of the world; we are convinced that the Commonwealth is one of the most fruitful associations for these purposes.

In pursuing these principles the members of the Commonwealth believe that they can provide a constructive example of the multi-national approach which is vital to peace and progress in the modern world. The association is based on consultation, discussion and co-operation. In rejecting coercion as an instrument of policy they recognise that the security of each member state from external aggression is a matter of concern to all members. It provides many channels for continuing exchanges of knowledge and views on professional, cultural, economic, legal and political issues among member states. These relationships we intend to foster and extend for we believe that our multi-national association can expand human understanding and understanding among nations, assist in the elimination of discrimination based on differences of race, colour or creed, maintain and strengthen personal liberty, contribute to the enrichment of life for all, and provide a powerful influence for peace among nations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 3, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DOUGLAS (NANAIMO-COWICHAN-THE ISLANDS)—STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS RESPECTING MEMORANDUM ON HIRING OF FRANCOPHONES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights of all members of the House. I refer to the conflicting and misleading statements which have been made by various members of the cabinet with respect to the memorandum issued by the Public Service Commission concerning the hiring of Francophones. I contend that these misleading statements constitute a contempt of Parliament. If Your Honour agrees that I have a prima facie case of privilege, I would ask leave to introduce a motion for the consideration of the House.

On January 26 the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) tabled the memorandum issued by the Public Service Commission. At page 2752 of Hansard for January 26 the minister described that memorandum in the following terms:

> This is in the nature of what I may describe generally as a feasibility study.

I will not take the time of the House to quote the many instances in which the minister and the then Acting Prime Minister said this was not a program but a feasibility study. The fact is that a reading of the memorandum gives an entirely different view of the matter. The opening paragraph of the memorandum reads as follows:

> This letter is further to a recent, brief telephone survey of departmental requirements for post-secondary graduates if special funds were made available for 1971. The basis of the survey was a request as to how many additional Francophone graduates you could gainfully employ should the salary costs be covered from funds outside your budgeted programs.

The second paragraph goes on to state:

> We are now in a position to clarify some of the aspects of the program. The following factors (although not in order of priority) will be considered.

Then follow 11 factors. The closing two paragraphs state:

> In order to avoid any misunderstanding and help speed up the implementation of the program, it is proposed to hold a preliminary meeting on Tuesday, January 12, 1971, at 2:30 p.m. in Place de Ville, Tower "A", 14th floor, room 1430.
> It is hoped you will be able to attend and if possible give some thinking as to the practical application of this program, as it applies to your department, before the meeting.

At the foot it says:

> N.B.: This information is confidential and no official announcement will be made.

23786—50½

I contend in the first place that this is a program which was under consideration. The minister denied any knowledge of the memorandum. I accept his word that he had not seen it. But it was a program which was under consideration by the various departments.

The second point I want to draw to the attention of the House is that we received misleading and evasive replies as to who was responsible for authorizing the study of this program and who had indicated that $2 million would be available for its implementation. As reported on page 2752 of Hansard for January 26, the President of the Treasury Board said:

> I might say that this memorandum outlining a procedure for increasing the proportion of Francophones in the Public Service is not an approved program. It will not be a program approved by the government until it has been submitted to the Treasury Board.

Yet the Treasury Board, as members of the cabinet, had already played a part in authorizing a sum of money for this program.

As reported on page 2753 of Hansard for January 26, I directed the following question to the President of the Treasury Board:

> May I ask whether the Public Service Commission or whoever was responsible for formulating this memorandum had authority to say that $2 million would be made available for the purposes stated in the memorandum without the President of the Treasury Board having given his prior consent?

That was a straight question. All the minister had to say was that the government had authorized the expenditure of $2 million and that a program was being prepared. But the minister's reply was:

> As I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, this memorandum is couched, at least in the opening phrases, in the conditional tense, as it should be. Perhaps there is a greater element of certainty in subsequent paragraphs which I do not think is warranted inasmuch as there is no approved program.

As reported on page 2754 of Hansard for January 26, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond asked the President of the Treasury Board to tell the House who, outside the Treasury Board, had the authority to authorize the $2 million. The Minister's reply was as follows:

> It is only the Parliament of Canada that can authorize the $2 million.

The fact is, of course, that yesterday the Prime Minister told us that cabinet had already authorized the expenditure of $2 million.

As reported on the same page of Hansard, the President of the Treasury Board said:

> There is no program and there will not be a program until such time as formal approval has been given to a proposal. This is a step in the gestation of a proposal, and until it becomes approved it is not a program.

Recruitment of Francophones

I should like to draw attention to one other quotation, Mr. Speaker. It is the question which I directed to the Acting Prime Minister on January 28, as reported at page 2843 of Hansard.

> Does the Public Service Commission have the authority to commit the government to an additional $2 million annually over and above the regular appropriations, and does it have the authority to set aside the merit system on its own initiative?

The reply of the Acting Prime Minister is clear. He said:

> As I said in the House the other day, there has been no money appropriated by Parliament yet for the next year, and before any money would be expended for this purpose not only would the Treasury Board have to approve it, not only would the government have to approve it, but Parliament would have to approve it. No money has been appropriated for this purpose yet.

The government may take refuge in the statement that money had not yet been appropriated, but the fact is that the expenditure of the money had been authorized. I also refer to the press release that the President of the Treasury Board issued on January 25:

> Treasury Board President, Honourable C. M. Drury, stated today that recent press stories purporting to reveal a secret government fund of $2 million for special hiring of Francophones for the Public Service have been seriously misleading.

Then the last paragraph reads:

> So far as the $2 million is concerned this has not been allocated to any specific program.

Then I ask the House to look at the statements which were made yesterday, February 2. As reported at page 2982 of Hansard I asked the Prime Minister:

> —I want to ask the Prime Minister if he knows who did authorize the issuance of this memorandum and, if he did not, would he undertake to find out?
> Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the memorandum was issued pursuant to a decision of cabinet last November.

So it is perfectly clear that the statements made by various ministers disclaiming any knowledge of a proposed plan were just not in accordance with the facts, that last November the proposal had been agreed upon and the Public Service Commission was acting under instructions from the cabinet to prepare such a plan.

As reported at page 2983 of yesterday's Hansard, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, last November the cabinet authorized the expenditure of an additional $2 million if a feasible plan could be found.

I submit that for an entire week we sought to ascertain from the government who had authorized the plan which was under formulation and we were given evasive and misleading answers. We endeavoured to find out who had indicated to the Public Service Commission that $2 million would be available this year and in subsequent years for the implementation of a program which would be prepared and finally approved, and again we were given misleading and evasive answers. The fact is, of course, that the cabinet had already authorized the preparation of such a plan and had also authorized the expenditure of this amount of money when the plan was completed.

I want to make it perfectly clear the question of the hiring of Francophones is not at issue at this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hogarth: Don't look now but your bigotry is showing.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If the government is desirous of hiring 1,250 students it has a perfect right to delineate what percentage of them shall be French-speaking, and it can say so in the specifications calling for applications. What I am objecting to is that the government has not come clean, that the government has attempted to deceive the House, that it has withheld information from the House. If Your Honour finds that I have a prima facie question of privilege, I propose, if Your Honour agrees, to move the following motion:

> That the conflicting statements made to the House of Commons by several cabinet ministers concerning the memorandum on special recruitment of Francophones in the Public Service, tabled in the House of Commons on January 26, 1971, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates for consideration and report.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before I recognize the President of the Privy Council, perhaps I might suggest that there should be no debate at this stage. However, in view of the practice we have developed I think it is in order for the minister or ministers whose conduct has been impugned to indicate for the guidance of the Chair and for the information of the House their interpretation of the situation. To this extent the Chair will hear from the President of the Privy Council and make a ruling immediately thereafter on whether there is a prima facie case of privilege.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat has sought to have a ruling of the Chair made that his motion raises a prima facie case of privilege.

It is clear, and it has been so established, that the function of the Chair at this point is to determine whether the allegations by the hon. member constitute a prima facie case of privilege. If that were determined by Your Honour, it would then be up to the House to decide whether in fact such privilege existed.

The hon. member has based his question of privilege on what he terms are misleading and evasive replies made by ministers of the government. He has also based his question of privilege on the suggestion that contradictory statements have been made by ministers of the government. I suggest that never in the history of this House has a question of privilege been found to be valid on the basis of conflicting statements made by ministers or any other members. I do not admit for a moment that such conflicting statements have been made, but, indeed, if they were made they do not constitute a question of privilege in any sense at all. A dispute over facts does not raise a question of privilege; it is a question of debate.

If the leader of the New Democratic Party is asserting that ministers have made conflicting statements or have made evasive replies, this is a dispute over what has happened and he can engage the ministers in debate on an appropriate occasion.

The hon. member went further and said that these ministers had attempted to deceive the House in this case. The hon. member knows as well as I that if he is making the clear statement that ministers of this government have deliberately deceived the House he has one course of action to follow. It is not uncertain as to what he ought to do. If he believes that ministers have deliberately deceived the House—that is, of course, a question of privilege, but he has not said that yet—then he has raised a question of privilege and he ought to follow the time-honoured practice of the House. That practice was decided most recently in 1959 when His Honour, Mr. Speaker Michener, made a ruling that still stands as the ruling affecting privilege in the House, and which was subsequently confirmed by the membership of the House in the vote on that occasion.

It was a very important debate, Mr. Speaker. On that occasion the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the former Minister of Justice, the Hon. Davie Fulton and others who are in opposition at this time expressed themselves as to what the correct procedure is if a question of privilege is raised affecting the conduct of any member of the House of Commons.

Presumably the leader of the New Democratic Party is asserting to the House that ministers have deliberately misled the House. He is asking for an examination of their conduct by a committee of the House. On that occasion Mr. Fulton, speaking in the debate, made this comment:

> In every case, therefore, where a member has really felt that the conduct of any other member of the House of Commons should be examined—

This is what is implied in this motion.

> —that member has followed the correct and honourable course of making specific charges so the member concerned will know what it is he has to meet.

In the same debate the right hon. member for Prince Albert insisted upon the necessity of making specific charges. He quoted a statement that had been made by Mr. Mackenzie King when early in the 1940's a member of the House of Commons had made a comment to the effect that the government had produced three new millionaires since the declaration of war. On that occasion Mr. Mackenzie King said:

> I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member should be obliged either to withdraw the statement completely or else to convert it into a specific charge to be investigated in the usual manner, and the consequences of the investigation also to be followed up in the usual manner.

I could, of course, refer to the judgment of Mr. Speaker Michener. We know that when the conduct of a member on either side of the House is impugned—and Your Honour has suggested that this was the effect of the comments made by the leader of the NDP—it has to be impugned in the form of a specific charge formulated in a specific motion. Then the House will naturally respond to that charge by ordering an inquiry, and the charge is validated or invalidated. If it is invalidated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the minister and perhaps allow him to conclude his statement in a moment, but it does appear to me that at this point we are embarking on a wrong course. My interpretation of the practice we have followed over the years is that the Chair has allowed a member whose conduct may have been impugned in a statement accompanying a question of privilege to indicate what in his view the facts are and perhaps to rectify the situation as it exists in his own mind. It has not been the practice to debate the procedural point at all.

I am not in disagreement basically with any of the procedural points made by the President of the Privy Council. Indeed, I suspect all hon. members would be in agreement with what he has said. But I suspect at the same time that if he, on behalf of the government, is allowed to argue the matter procedurally, there is no reason why another 15 members of the House should not be allowed to debate the same matter procedurally.

This is why for some time now I have thought that, in order to keep some control over these questions of privilege, the debate should be limited purely to the statement made by the member who raises a matter by way of question of privilege and a statement by the member who is involved personally in the question raised by way of privilege. This is why I suggested initially that an opportunity should be given to a minister who felt that he has an explanation to give when he thinks such explanation is necessary. I am not suggesting that it was. I am just saying to the minister that we might get ourselves into difficulty, and become involved in a lengthy debate on questions of privilege if, every time a question of privilege were raised, the President of the Privy Council or someone on behalf of the government felt constrained to put forward a procedural argument on the question of privilege and whether there was a prima facie question of privilege. I suggest that it is for the Chair to determine that point. The matter is an important one, but perhaps the minister might like to take my suggestions into consideration and bring his statement to a close.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I take the position that at this point what is being determined is whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. My argument is, of course, that what is alleged in the statement is a matter of debate, not a question of privilege. If there is a dispute over facts, that dispute can be treated in normal debate. But I think Your Honour will agree that if it is alleged, either implied or inferentially stated, that ministers have deliberately misled the House it is incumbent upon any hon. member to clear that up, and if he wants to assert that ministers have deliberately misled the House he ought to make his charge—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition wishes to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Stanfield: I hesitate to interrupt the President of the Privy Council but it seems to me, Sir, that he is paying absolutely no attention to your directive.

Som hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my hope that the President of the Privy Council will take into account the suggestion I made to him. He will bring difficulties on his own side of the House if he pursues the course of action he is embarked upon at the present time.

An hon. Member: He is abusing the rules.

Mr. MacEachen: What I intended to do was really to agree with your formulation of the situation but at the same time—and I do not make any apologies to the Leader of the Opposition or any member of the House—because of the gravity of the situation to outline not what the course I am following will lead me to but what the course which the hon. member is following will lead him to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I thank the President of the Privy Council for his forbearance and again I suggest, with all due respect, that perhaps the practice we have been following has worked rather well. I think hon. members have appeared to want to co-operate with the Chair in following this practice. It seems so much better to consider questions of privilege, to hear the question stated as briefly and lucidly as possible by the hon. member who raises it and not to embark on a procedural argument. I think the practice has functioned rather well until now, and I hope the Chair will continue to have the co-operation of hon. members in following that practice which, I think for the benefit of the House in general, we should follow.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has given the notice required by section 2 of Standing Order 17 in the following terms:

> At two o'clock today I wish to raise a question of privilege arising out of conflicting statements of cabinet ministers which I consider a contempt of Parliament.
> Should Your Honour decide that I have a prima facie case of privilege, I am prepared to submit a motion for the consideration of the House.

In a preliminary way, I should mention that since then I have given the matter the most serious thought and consideration. I have looked at precedents and citations and applied my mind as diligently and objectively as possible to the important matter raised by the hon. member. I have also listened with interest to the arguments submitted by the President of the Privy Council and, as I said a moment ago, I do not disagree with any of the points which he made from a procedural standpoint. I believe he stated correctly what the position is from a procedural point of view of procedure.

I should like to ask in a hypothetical way whether an assertion to the effect that certain proceedings are in contempt of parliament is inherently a matter of privilege as understood by our practice. I have some serious doubts about it. What the hon. member suggests in the notice he has given to the Chair is that being in contempt of parliament constitutes a question of privilege. If all hon. members will look at the definition of privilege which has been cited from time to time in the House and which is reported in May's 17th edition at page 42, they will find that this definition indicates that so-called contempt of parliament does not by itself constitute a question of privilege. It might be an element, of course, it might be part of the general picture, but by itself to say that there has been contempt of parliament and therefore there is a question of privilege is, I suggest to the hon. member, not the complete picture, and that when there is nothing more it does not constitute a question of privilege.

It seems to the Chair that the matter raised by the hon. member may be classified or categorized in one of three ways. First, an hon. member may allege wilful misconduct or wilful intention to mislead the House. As has been pointed out correctly by the President of the Privy Council, there is here a long-established rule which would apply, a rule to which the Chair has alluded from time to time. May I refer hon. members to the ruling of Mr. Speaker Michener, which again the President of the Privy Council quoted. It is reported at page 584 of our Journals for Friday, June 19, 1959:

> In my view, simple justice requires that no hon. member should have to submit to investigation of his conduct by the House or a committee until he has been charged with an offence.

I fully recognize that the words uttered by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, as well as the words contained in his notice to the Chair, do not by themselves imply a charge of personal impropriety on the part of the minister. If they did, the hon. member knows as well as I do that by virtue of the long-established practice he would have to make a specific charge in the House and the matter would then be referred almost automatically to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On the other hand, if the hon. member wishes to press a grievance or to censure a minister or a group of ministers, or the government in general, our practice provides specific procedures to effect such a result. In particular, the hon. member could move a substantive motion, after notice, in the ordinary way. I recognize that this may not be a very helpful suggestion, but it is one of the practices or procedures provided by our Standing Orders. In addition, I suggest that our supply procedures are designed at least in part to achieve such an object.

The third point is that the hon. member's notice is based on the suggestion that conflicting statements have been made by cabinet ministers. In his statement to the House a moment ago the hon. member was suggesting that ministers have made misleading declarations in the course of replying to questions in the House. The Chair has frequently referred to citation 113 in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which in part states:

But a dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

On one hand the hon. member contends that there is a conflict in the statements made by one minister and another minister and perhaps statements made by other ministers and an answer given to the House yesterday by the Prime Minister. On the other hand, the President of the Treasury Board argued yesterday that there is no such conflict. Surely this is a matter of debate.

Hon. members may remember that a similar question was raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on February 26, 1970, as reported at page 4109 of Hansard for that day. The hon. member suggested to the House that there was a conflict between statements on water resources made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The hon. member argued that these allegedly contradictory statements constituted a contempt of parliament and suggested that the matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. After considering all the precedents and our practice, a ruling was made by the Chair concluding that the matter did not constitute a question of privilege.

Again, in this instance, after having considered the precedents and our Standing Orders, I must conclude that there is not a prima facie case of privilege, the only matter which is before the Chair at present, and therefore the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands cannot be put to the House.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table copies in the two official languages of a report by the Prices and Incomes Commission on newspapers.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT REQUIRING APPLICATION TO CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION FOR REDUCTIONS IN PASSENGER SERVICES

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-221, to amend the Railway Act (reduction in passenger service).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Proposed Legislation

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, at present a railway can reduce its passenger service over any particular line without making application first to the Canadian Transport Commission. Such application is necessary only when a railway wishes to terminate completely such passenger service. This bill would amend the Railway Act and require an application to the Canadian Transport Commission when a railway wishes to reduce its service. The railway would have to follow the same procedure as when it wishes to terminate a service. This bill is prompted by the action of the CNR in discontinuing service in Northern Ontario and between Montreal and Ottawa.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the bill be read the second time now?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I gather that there is not unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Regretfully, the question cannot be put at this time.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In this day and age, which member uses roller skates to go between Ottawa and Montreal?

An hon. Member: The Minister of Finance.

SUPERSONIC AIRCRAFT

PROHIBITION OF USE OF CANADIAN AIR SPACE BY COMMERCIAL FLIGHTS

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-222, respecting supersonic aircraft.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. St. Pierre: Mr. Speaker, this bill goes beyond present Department of Transport regulations which forbid commercial aircraft to fly at supersonic speeds over Canada. This bill would ban supersonic commercial aircraft, operating at any speed, the purpose being to reduce the threat of air pollution, to reduce the danger of ground damage caused by sonic booms, to avoid increased air fares, and, hopefully, to avert the possibility of the Canadian airline industry bankrupting itself on behalf of the technical community's insane passion for speed and gadgetry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous agreement for the second reading today. The bill is to be read the second time at the next sitting of the House. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of The Privy Council): (a) and (b) The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development advises that it would involve an inordinate cost and time to provide the information requested. The Council is developing its information retrieval capabilities to include collation by research topic in the future.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a serious question of privilege which involves starred question No. 710, placed on the order paper by me on January 15 following a rather resolute or positive response by the Minister of Public Works with regard to some questions about the provision of winter unemployment for Canadians. Since the minister seemed to be so definite at that time, I ventured to ask a rather specific question. I see no reason why that question could not have been answered within at most ten days.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I put question No. 415, which is a simple request for information, on the order paper on November 12. I seriously think that it could have been answered before now.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, those numbers have been noted. I have noted the comments of hon. members opposite. In the last few days I have asked all ministers holding questions for periods longer than ten days to two weeks to review them. We are looking at each one individually in the hope that all of them can be answered very soon.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers Nos. 1, 150 and 164 are acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and to the authorization of the government concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations or conditions expressed by the parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure to the House to adopt these motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motions for Papers

MEDICAL SERVICES FOR INDIANS, NEW BRUNSWICK

Motion No. 1—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the government or any agency, department or branch thereof and the Government of the Province of New Brunswick relating to medical services for Indian people in the said Province since July 1, 1969.

Motion agreed to.

ST. REGIS INDIAN RESERVE ANNEXATION—BAND RESOLUTIONS

Motion No. 150—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all resolutions in the possession of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development passed by the St. Regis Indian Band or the St. Regis Indian Band Council relating to the annexation by the City of Cornwall, the Province of Ontario or any group established under the aegis of the Province of Ontario, of Cornwall Island or any part of the St. Regis Indian Reserve.

Motion agreed to.

COPY OF REPORT REGARDING BLOW-OUT AND FIRE OF PANARCTIC KING CHRISTIAN EXPLORATORY WELL

Motion No. 164—Mr. Harding:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report on the investigation by Mr. R. King undertaken for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, regarding the blow-out and fire of the Panarctic King Christian D-18 exploratory well.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notices of Motions Nos. 85, 134, 147 and 153.

STUDY ON THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND THE ARTS

Motion No. 85—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study on the federal government and the arts undertaken in the fiscal year 1966-67 for the Secretary of State as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st session of this Parliament.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the present motion is the same as Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. 213 of the previous session. As was pointed out then, the study in question was a confidential one addressed to the Secretary of State. I would therefore invite the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: The confidentiality is not mutual, Mr. Speaker. I call for a vote.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

[Mr. Speaker.]

FREEZE ON URBAN RENEWAL PROJECTS ASSISTED BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Motion No. 134—Mr. Gilbert:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and provincial and municipal governments regarding the federal government's decision to put an immediate freeze on all urban renewal projects in Canada assisted by the federal government.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing that there was no freeze on urban renewal projects already approved and under way as of August 14, 1969, the date of the public statement on urban renewal issued by the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing. There was no intention on the part of the government to withdraw its assistance, nor was there a freeze on the processing of all applications for new urban renewal projects. Since, in fact, there has not been a freeze on urban renewal projects already under way, or on projects for which applications for federal aid had been received to the beginning of 1969, I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

APPLICATION OF BILINGUALISM IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Motion No. 147—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence between Mr. John Carson, Chairman of the Public Service Commission and the Hon. John Turner, Minister of Justice, regarding bilingualism in the Public Service and its application under the terms of the Public Service Employment Act.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the correspondence reflects on the personal competence or character of individuals. Some of the papers are private and confidential. It is not the practice of the House to have such correspondence produced. It is respectfully requested that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the answer of the Minister of Justice sounds good, but it is an important question. Since the minister wrote to the chairman of the Public Service Commission I think we should have the correspondence.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

SALE OF RYERSON PRESS LTD.

Motion No. 153—Mr. Macquarrie:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., betwen the Government of Canada and the United Church of Canada and other individuals and organizations relating to the question of the sale of Ryerson Press Ltd.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this motion is acceptable in so far as the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and National Defence are concerned. However, for the Prime Minister's office to comply, a considerable number of man-hours would have to be assigned to extract this correspondence from the files. Since these man-hours are not presently available, extra staff would have to be employed on a casual basis in order to complete this job. I have been assured that approximately 165,000 pieces of correspondence—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am in doubt whether the hon. member can make an argument as to why the documents cannot be produced. Perhaps the hon. member might briefly indicate whether it is proposed to table the documents or under what conditions or with what reservations the parliamentary secretary would want to proceed.

Mr. Jerome: I was about to say that accurate statistics on the numbers of such correspondence are maintained, and such information could be provided in response to a question on the order paper. The motion is therefore acceptable, Mr. Speaker, except in so far as correspondence from the Prime Minister's office is concerned.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that the parliamentary secretary is prepared to table this correspondence or these documents subject to certain reservations which are not entirely clear. I wonder whether the hon. member for Hillsborough would like to ponder the situation and perhaps allow the matter to stand.

Mr. Macquarrie: I will send for the text, Mr. Speaker. Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand. Shall the remaining Notices of Motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I have had a motion on the order paper since November 25, 1970, No. 58:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the interim report in March, 1968, by Dr. A. Vennema, Director of Canadian Medical Aid in Vietnam in 1967-68 and for copies of any subsequent correspondence between him and the Department of External Affairs.

I wish to inquire as to when I can expect the production of these papers.

Mr. Jerome: With the frequency with which the hon. member has been appearing at five o'clock on Thursdays with Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers, it is hard to believe that some remain unanswered. I will certainly look into the matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF TAX REFORM LEGISLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the importance of the economy moving forward as vigorously as possible and of removing uncertainties as rapidly as possible, will the minister indicate when he proposes to introduce his so-called tax reform legislation? May it be expected within a month or will it more likely be several months before it is introduced?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend would spend more time in the House, he would know that I answered this question two weeks ago.

Mr. Stanfield: I would like an answer to my question as of today as the minister changes his mind so frequently.

Mr. Benson: The answer today is the same as the answer I gave when the hon. member was not in the House. I expect to introduce legislation for tax reform some time toward the end of April.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the concern and uncertainty and the length of time between now and the introduction of the legislation, will the minister reduce the uncertainty and concern by indicating in a statement in general terms at a very early date the extent to which he is prepared to accept the recommendations of the parliamentary committee with regard to tax reform?

Mr. Benson: This is very difficult to do, Mr. Speaker. If I were to indicate in the House what we intend to do with regard to tax reform, on which my hon. friend campaigned for us to withdraw it, I would also have to indicate the details. Several of the provinces have asked me to meet with them before the legislation is drafted. We tried to arrange a meeting this month but this has been impossible. I hope to meet them when a date can be arranged. I do not think it would be possible to indicate a general outline of tax reform without indicating specifics.

Mr. Stanfield: May I express the hope that the attitude of the government toward the taxpayer was not accurately reflected in the remarks made by the Prime Minister to the Lapalme workers yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): In view of the economic situation and the large-scale unemployment, will the minister indicate whether he intends to bring forward a regular budget in the next four to six weeks?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think we should get rid of the present budget first—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: —by the opposition allowing us to proceed with the business of the House—the government organization bill and the two remaining days of the budget debate and the legislation involved before we have another budget.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUMOURED INVASION OF LAOS BY SOUTH VIETNAMESE TROOPS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding rumours coming from various parts of the world about an invasion of Laos by South Vietnamese troops backed by the American air force. Has the minister received any information from the Canadian members of the International Control Commission, the government of the United States or any other source which he can give to the House on whether such an invasion is actually in progress at the present time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. The blackout of news apparently applies to me as it does to everyone else.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Has the minister been in touch with the Canadian representatives of the International Control Commission? If not, will he endeavour to get in touch with them in order that we may obtain some information regarding this rumoured invasion of Laos?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we are, of course, regularly in touch with the members of the International Control Commission. They do not know anything either about the invasion that is being talked about in the newspapers.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the serious consequences that such an invasion could have on worsening the already disastrous situation in southeast Asia, is the minister making representations on behalf of Canada to the government of the United States in the hope that any military activity now going on in southeast Asia will not be accelerated and escalated?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I know how difficult it is to get information about apprehended invasions.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Has the minister been able to obtain any information in this regard from our men in Peking, from Peking's representative here or directly from the Viet Cong?

[Mr. Orlikow.]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. According to last night's news reports, he is supposed to have had a conversation with the former employees of G. Lapalme Inc. who have been parading in front of the Parliament buildings. Is it true that he invited them to a special banquet where a choice menu will be served?

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—ESTABLISHMENT OF SECOND FACILITY

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): My question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is it the intention of the government to proceed this year with the development of a second national park in Prince Edward Island and, if it is, what area of the province has been chosen as the site of this park?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have no immediate plan for developing a second national park in Prince Edward Island, but discussions are still going on in this regard with the premier of that province.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROVISION OF EMERGENCY FUNDS TO PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question should have been directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare but since he is not here today, even though his name is on the roster, perhaps I might direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the apparent build-up of pressure on welfare offices in Canada and the reaction of the disadvantaged, particularly as expressed in Hamilton, is the government giving immediate consideration to providing emergency funds to municipalities and provinces to enable them to relieve the pressure on welfare funds caused by unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that this question was asked yesterday. I may be wrong and, if I am, the minister concerned might wish to reply. But the hon. member will perhaps agree with me that the question was asked in just about the same terms yesterday.

Mr. Marshall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the question is more urgent today, and it will become even more urgent tomorrow and every day.

Mr. Speaker: That is just the point. If that argument were accepted, we would find the same 15 questions asked every day and I wonder whether that would be a proper practice. Perhaps the hon. member would wait a couple of days before he asks the question again.

UNEMPLOYMENT—DELAY IN PAYMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMS IN HAMILTON

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Is the minister aware that the problem with regard to welfare in Hamilton has been accelerated because workers who are entitled to unemployment insurance have been unable to take advantage of the fund and have been directed to the welfare office. As I understand it, payments covering some eight to 12 weeks have been held back as a result of delay in dealing with cheques. Would the minister look into this situation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I will try to ascertain immediately the reason for the delay and report back to the hon. gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. Marshall: While I am waiting for a couple of days for my answer, would the Prime Minister ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to announce the plans of the government to cope with the need of the disadvantaged of Canada for immediate relief while continuing discussions are held with the provinces in the course of the next several months?

ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED IN LIGHT OF SMASHING OF KINGSTON UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE OFFICE WINDOW BY BULLET

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I should direct this question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, but I will direct it to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that last evening a bullet smashed a plate glass window at the Kingston unemployment insurance office, an incident apparently precipitated by an irate insurance claimant, may I ask whether the situation is being investigated and whether the government, and especially the Prime Minister are now willing to offer some measure of possible encouragement to the unemployed in order to alleviate their chronic frustration and anxiety?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The only thing I can report with accuracy is that the window is being replaced.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: I want to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the present attitude of the Minister of Labour, and in view of the serious disquiet and disunity being hastened and heightened in this country as a result of this attitude—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Lundrigan: —would the Prime Minister be willing to suggest a modified diet to help all Canadians, especially the bona fide—

Mr. Speaker: Order please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION OF PROPOSALS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Will he be making any announcement in the House regarding the implementation, in part or in whole, of the proposals regarding grain income, or does he intend to make such announcement in Saskatoon or Regina in a week's time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I would expect that any announcement of that nature about the finalization of programs would be made after our discussions with producers and provincial governments have been completed, and that it would likely be made in the House.

Mr. Benjamin: Would the minister assure us that any such announcement about the implementation of proposals or legislation for their implementation will be made in this House before it is made anywhere else?

Mr. Lang: I should like to look at the exact text of the hon. member's question before I give either an affirmative or a negative reply.

CONSOLIDATION OF FARMS—PRESERVATION OF FAMILY FARM

Mr. John L. Mr. Speaker: This is a question which is very general in nature. The hon. member might consider that he has made a representation to the minister. Perhaps the question should be viewed from that standpoint. I would not think the minister should be allowed to reply.

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—PERSONS INCARCERATED AND REFUSED BAIL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, about ten days ago I asked the Minister of Justice whether he would report to the House as to the number of people still incarcerated under the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, no bail having been granted, in view of his recommendation for new bail legislation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): The question asked by the hon. member was not quite that; he asked me whether anyone was still incarcerated who had not been charged with any particular offence either under the Criminal Code or under the special legislation. I have the answer to that question. There is no person presently detained who was arrested either under the regulations made pursuant to the War Measures Act or the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act who has not been charged under the regulations or under the Criminal Code. In some instances individuals have been charged under both the Criminal Code and the regulations or under the temporary measures act.

Mr. Woolliams: To clear up a misunderstanding which seems to be spreading across the nation, can the minister tell us how many people have actually been charged under the public order law. I am not talking about the Criminal Code and criminal conspiracy or other crimes. How many people have actually been charged under the public order law, and how many have been refused bail to date and are still incarcerated?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I cannot break down the figures as between those charged under the Criminal Code and those charged under the War Measures Act.

As of this morning the total number arrested was 497. Those charged number 62; those still detained number 32; 465 have been released and two have been convicted. In other words, 435 were released without being charged and 28 are appearing later on charges.

JOBS LOST BY PEOPLE DETAINED AND RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): On a couple of occasions some months ago I asked the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General how many people had lost their jobs as a result of being apprehended and released, despite the fact that in the great majority of cases no charges were laid. This is important information I should like to have.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): We do not have any definite information. I should like to suggest to the hon. member, who is aware of earlier questions which were put to the Solicitor General, some just recently, that it might well not be in the interest of those who may have lost their employment to identify them in particular terms. I am sure he would not want to do that.

I might say that the Quebec Minister of Justice has stated that any recommendation by the ombudsman of Quebec to the effect that there may have been personal loss suffered in individual cases, including loss of employment, will be seriously considered by him if such complaint is referred to him by the ombudsman.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I wish to direct to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner).

Since the Liberal party Convention to be held next weekend intends to submit amendments to Criminal Code provisions relating to contempt of court, has the minister consulted with his fellow members of the cabinet as to their opinions on this question?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): The Criminal Code is being continuously revised by officers of the Department of Justice, Mr. Speaker.

RETURN OF FINGERPRINTS AND PHOTOGRAPHS OF PERSONS RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In light of the fact that 435 people were detained for a period of time and then released, and that photographs and fingerprints were taken and other records made, can the minister inform the House whether or not these records have been retained or disposed of since these 435 people have not been charged?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, since fingerprints can only be taken of accused persons who have been properly charged, in the case of those persons who were not charged I wrote to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police advising them to return all fingerprints of those arrested but not charged. I am informed by the police that that has been done.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I may have missed the minister's answer, but in the breakdown he gave a few moments ago did he indicate how many of those charged have been granted bail? If he has that information, would he give it to the House?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Sixty-two less 32, which makes the answer 30.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Ukrainian population of Canada is still celebrating the 53rd anniversary of the proclamation of independence of the Ukrainian national republic, and in view of the fact that many Ukrainians were illegally sentenced to concentration camps in Soviet Russia for exposing terror, racism, intellectual and cultural persecution and injustice against Ukrainians and other minorities in the U.S.S.R., would the Prime Minister inquire when he meets with Kosygin, Brezhnev and Podgorny about the release of Valentyn Moroz and Sviatoslav Karavanskyi who have been sentenced for acts of conscience which are described and guaranteed by the United Nations declarations as basic human rights?

THE BUDGET

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL—COMPLETION OF DEBATE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as Government House Leader. Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether a supplementary should be allowed. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might have a different question to ask.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the minister is not prepared to meet the request of the Minister of Finance to get rid of the budget, when will he bring it forward for further debate?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of other items that I should like to get rid of before the budget if I could set priorities, but I will give the House an opportunity to spend two days on the budget later this month.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Since we have not much more than ten minutes left, I wonder whether I could suggest to hon. members that we try to limit supplementaries.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing further to report. Discussions are continuing. We will continue to make every effort to assure the continuation of the Home Oil company as a Canadian company. There is nothing specific to report except that we have had further meetings and those meetings are continuing.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanfield: Has the government directed its attention in any particular way to the control of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and the extent to which this company might be affected?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is, to the best of my knowledge, something like 90 per cent or more Canadian owned, and from what I have seen to date I do not think that these purported transactions would affect the continuation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines as a Canadian owned and Canadian controlled company.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Tuesday, February 2, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose last evening Clause 3 of the bill was under consideration. Shall Clause 3 carry?

On Clause 3—Department established.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, Part I of Bill C-207 deals with the establishment of a Department of the Environment, and during second reading we had some very interesting debate on this matter. I, myself, made some suggestions to the government but I am quite sure they have received little attention from the minister. Nevertheless, I hope that if I reiterate some points, consideration will be given to them by hon. members and by the departments concerned.

I think that the name "department of the environment" is a misnomer. Everybody would like to see a department of the environment set up. I do not want to be misunderstood on that score, but it seems to me that such a department should be able to deal with all environmental problems all across our nation, and that the environmental aspects of work being done by other departments should come under its scrutiny and control. Unless we get that type of control in one department, which will co-ordinate our attack on pollution problems, we will not get the job done that should be done.

During the debate on second reading I said that a department of the environment should not be responsible for any specific resource. Once you have a resource department established, its work is primarily directed toward the economic development of that particular resource. If resource development and environmental problems are mixed too closely, there will be major conflict between those in the department who are anxious to see the exploitation of a resource and those who insist that its development be strictly controlled in the interests of the environment.

A real department of the environment should be able to set national standards and co-ordinate enforcement activities. For that reason, I think the government has made a blunder with respect to its proposals in this part of the bill. I repeat that I am not objecting to the establishment of a department of the environment. We should have such a department but it should supervise all the activities of government connected with environmental matters, including fisheries and forestry, water resources and our Arctic areas. To exclude supervision over our Arctic areas from the responsibilities of this department does not make sense.

Only recently we passed an Arctic pollution bill, but responsibility for it is not being transferred to the proposed new department. Our northern territories comprise over 40 per cent of our land mass, but control in this area will still rest with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. A better name for the new department proposed in this bill would be the department of renewable resources. While I am critical of the fact that we are not moving far enough, I must say that in this legislation we have moved further toward pollution control than we have in any other legislation on our statute books.

Canada has an opportunity to take a worldwide lead in dealing with environmental problems. Again, I repeat that we will never adequately solve our pollution problems, or those of the world, until we realize there are three main things linked closely together and which cannot be separated. We may make some progress in some fields, but we will never do a thorough job of pollution control unless we look into these three aspects and their relation to environmental pollution.

One deals with population planning. I am thinking not only in terms of Canada but of the world. We can cut the worldwide pollution rate in half, and yet if the population doubles, there will be as much pollution as there is today, and possibly more. We have to tie our plans to the plans of the United Nations and of other international agencies.

Then, we come to resources. Again, exploitation of resources is linked extremely closely with pollution problems. In the future, I foresee a department of environment coping with this type of resource development and the allocation of our raw materials. One matter which should be considered by the department of environment is the recycling of materials which we have been using and which we currently have in this nation today. This is where the source of our pollution problems. We are one of the most wasteful nations on the face of this earth. Other nations, such as the nation to the south of us and other industrial nations, face a similar problem.

We dig out minerals in one section of the country, and after they have been through one cycle of use we discard them. Very little effort has been put into recycling. Until we get down to this type of planning and research, we will just be batting our heads against a stone wall so far as adequate pollution control methods are concerned. This is why I stress the absolute need for a department that can overlook the departments concerned and work out a sensible type of approach toward pollution problems.

I will make several suggestions to the government and to the minister. I think that the department of environment should take the responsibility for coordinating and enforcing all current environmental legislation. The way this new department is set up it would not do this. There is nothing in the legislation which provides for the new department enforcing control legislation which we already have on the statute books today. This is why we are in trouble, and why we have stressed this apsect on numerous occasions. It does not make sense to pass laws if they will not be enforced. We have numerous examples of this all over the country.

We would not have a pollution problem in Canada today if we had enforced the regulations which we currently have on the statute books. This lack of enforcement has resulted in the mess we have in the Great Lakes and in the pollution of our navigable rivers. The objective of a department of environment should be to make certain that these regulations are co-ordinated, and that the departments concerned are forced to make sure that companies, individuals, municipalities and others live up to the legislation which is already on our statute books. We have not done this job.

The second point is that any department of environment should be given the task of scrutinizing all activities in the country for their potential environmental impact. I will give you an example. We should have the power we need for this scrutiny under the Navigable Waters Protection Act if, for example, British Columbia decides to build a hydro plant on a river. However, B.C. hydro today is not responsible to any department of government. It does not have to produce a plan to the federal government to show that the building of that hydro plant is a sensible thing.

We should make certain that someone oversees projects of this nature. Some department should be able to say that this project is either beneficial and economic or it is not. It does not make sense to build a dam, thereby flooding hundreds of thousands of acres and doing immense damage to the ecology, without some kind of scrutiny. There is nothing in the statutes today that can stop this type of project from being built with the resultant damage to ecology.

Mr. Perrault: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harding: This is why we are asking for amendments to the bill and for a department which is strong enough to oversee activities of this nature. I will suggest to you that public bodies all over the country, as well as individual citizens, are interested in this type of approach being taken toward such projects. I have just referred to hydro plants. Other types of development could be considered, such as the building of a pipeline down the Mackenzie valley or the drilling for oil up in the north. There must be someone to ensure that our regulations and our basic approach are sound, so that we can leave Canada to future generations in better shape then we found it. But I am afraid that is not going to be so.

There is a third point. I think the department of environment should establish positive reclamation programs for those parts of the country which have already suffered damage. Again, this is an overriding consideration in spite of the narrowness of the bill before us. It does not matter in what part of Canada such damage occurs or in what fields, if damage is being done this department should be able to set up some kind of positive reclamation program and take it to the governments concerned. I am referring to the federal and provincial governments. They should say that this is the type of program needed to reclaim some body of water, some piece of land or some section of air that has been fouled to the point where it is dangerous to the health of Canadians. This bill does not give these powers. Certainly, it is a step forward, but it does not give us the overriding power which we need.

The fourth point I mentioned earlier was that the department should have the power to develop a population policy for this country and to relate it to the resource activities about which I have just spoken.

There are one or two other suggestions which I made the other day which I would like to repeat. I am quite convinced that the government will not set up the type of department which I have outlined. If they will not do that, I suggest the least they can do is to set up an environmental council of Canada similar to the Economic Council of Canada. The environmental council of Canada could be a Crown corporation, but it should be a body that has the power to do a great deal of research. It could act as an adviser to government departments. If there is anything that is desperately needed in Canada, it is a council of this type. It could even work with the over-all department of environment which I suggested should be set up. This is the type of independent body that we need. It should be divorced from the government and should be capable of being extremely critical of government policy, government programs and government direction. I will urge the new minister of the department, once he is appointed, that it be one of the first and main objectives of his department, to get this council rolling. Do not let us wait for six months or six years before setting up this council. We need the advice which such a council can give us.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him that his time has expired. Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few comments about the appointment of the minister of the environment consequent on passage of this bill. I will deal with the Problem of pollution. A minister responsible for environmental matters is needed; the task is large. Pollution is one of the major factors in the lives of the people of this country today. Pollution could actually destroy this country. It is probably as lethal as any war or as any intercontinental missile could be. It affects the water, the land, the air; it can involve noise and waste and it is something that parliament has to consider from all angles. In the first instance, pollution is a disease of society and of science. Scientists learned how to control and prevent epidemics, thereby enabling more people to live longer and reproduce. We see the pollution of war, war which has been made possible through the advances of medical science. If science had not advanced, modern war would be impossible. If science had not been able to conquer and then prevent epidemics involving certain diseases, we should not be here arguing about the matter of pollution germ warfare would have looked after that.

The increase in population brought urbanization. As science made further inroads on disease more people were enable to live longer and reproduce. Consequently, the population of the world has grown and will double in the next 30 years. More people have become urbanized. More people moved to the cities and created the problem of pollution. Under sanitary procedures of other days, people poured raw sewage into the rivers and lakes. The rivers and lakes were able to absorb small quantities of raw sewage. But, as city populations grew, the volume of sewage dumped into rivers and lakes also grew. The rivers and lakes could not cope with those large quantities and became more and more contaminated. Today some cities of Canada, particularly on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts as well as those situated on large rivers flowing into the ocean pour raw sewage into the ocean. Cities along the Great Lakes have sewage treatment facilities that are unable to meet the demands made on them so there are overflows of raw sewage. Also, sewage going to the lakes, rivers and streams is finally being deposited in the ocean.

As we know, the people and animals on the earth would be unable to breathe and, hence, unable to live if they could not obtain oxygen. An hon. member said the other day that 70 per cent of our oxygen comes from the ocean. It is produced in the ocean by micro-organisms. The ocean is becoming polluted, and we are discovering that is having an effect on fish such as, for example, swordfish. We were informed in the House that swordfish contain levels of mercury dangerous to human beings eating the fish. Other fish, also, are contaminated with quantities of mercury and are unfit for human consumption. In many cases, these mercury levels may be bringing about mutations and other undetermined problems. We also know that pollution is destroying those organisms which enable fish to transform the food they feed on into protein. I refer to protein dialysis by plankton. We can see that there is a vicious circle here.

In Canada we have tried to control pollution by introducing legislation such as the Canada Water Act. We have set up authorities under this Act such as the authority in the Northwest Territories which the hon. member who just spoke mentioned, as well as other authorities on the coast under the department of fisheries. Although the Canada Water Act does contain some good provisions, its effectiveness depends largely on co-operation and co-ordination with the provinces. The new minister of the environment must be able to get along with the provinces. There must be communication both ways. The government must be far seeing, and make sure that the old gag we have seen pulled over and over again is not pulled in this area. No one must say, "We will do our share if the other fellow does his share." To be effective, the authority in this matter must be vested in Parliament. I am not saying that provincial rights should be eroded; they should not be. Nevertheless, there must be an indication that we are to move more quickly than in the past and with a better chance of success in this area.

As well as considering the matter of water pollution, we ought to consider the problem of industrial pollution. We have seen factories pouring refuse into our rivers and lakes and polluting them. For instance, the pulp and paper industry and other industries are pouring chemicals and waste products into our lakes and rivers. I sometimes wonder how many industries will be closed down as a result of proceedings taken against them to enforce the law against pollution. What provision is being made to help industries that are financially unable to handle this situation?

In other words, I am asking myself this question, Mr. Chairman, and I think most people here are also asking themselves this question: is it better to ask an industry to move to one of the regional areas and support it with subsidies, even though there is a risk that the industry will not be successful, or is it more businesslike and to the point to keep that industry where it is and assist it to clean up its pollution problem? I do not think this government has grasped that point at all. I think it has run wild all over the land, and particularly in the east. I think its regional incentive program has become an equalization payment program. I think the minister of the new department should consider those points carefully. We are told that there are between 600,000 and 800,000 unemployed; no one knows the exact figures. Could it be that as many as 900,000 are unemployed? The unemployed need our help. They want to work. Extreme caution must be used, and perhaps special treatment given in some cases, to help industry clean up its sewage problem.

We must also consider the people who are paying the 3 per cent surtax which was continued this year. The money these people are paying in taxes is paid out under these incentive programs. I think the provincial and federal governments ought to consider carefully what should be done about an industry that may be polluting.

It may cost little to clean up that pollution. Nevertheless, because of taxation and as a result of sticking to certain guidelines, the profits of such industries may have been so low that they do not have the necessary money with which to clean up the problem. I do not think it is good sense to close an industry merely because it is polluting, thereby causing hundreds of people to become unemployed. There is far too much of this. It does not add up to good common sense to spend ten times the amount of money we would spend on pollution control to establish a new industry in a regional area.

When dealing with the problem of pollution, we must also consider air pollution. Year after year Members of Parliament have seen the air over this city become polluted. Pulp mills and industry across the river in the neighbouring province have been polluting the air. Year after year people have been upset by the fumes they have been breathing, yet Parliament has not done anything about this. I wonder what the new minister of the environment proposes to do about air pollution since air knows no boundaries. This jurisdictional problem relates to the provinces, but also to the United States.

What is going to be done about the problem of air pollution caused by motor vehicles in our large cities? In the United States, as well as in large cities such as Toronto, over 50 per cent of air pollution is due to this cause. This occurs mostly in the rush hours. Pollution forms an umbrella over a city and descends during a rainfall. In addition, pollution causes disease, certain morbidity and a certain amount of sickness. Some authorities have stated that 25 per cent of illness may, partially or wholly, be caused by pollution.

On occasions hundreds of people have lost their lives because of air pollution. Almost 5,000 people in the city of London died in one period of fog. The smog and chemicals irritated the bronchial tubes to the point where these people actually died. These things must be carefully considered, because they are part and parcel of the whole problem. The larger our population becomes, the more pollution we will have. Will the minister of the environment deal with the problems of population control, urbanization, how many people shall live in cities and how many shall live in rural areas? I wonder what the thought of the minister will be on that subject. Something must be done about those problems. It is people who pollute.

I will not deal with all the problems that beset us. I think it proper that we have a minister of the environment. I see the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) in the chamber. I do not want him to get a swelled head because that would be bad. However, his work has been very good; his answers honest and carefully thought out. We must have this type of minister if we are going to do more than just a bit of fancy dressing.

I now want to deal with the question of how this new department will control the problem of pollution. How many committees will be established to deal with the provinces? Population, air and water are interprovincial and intercountry matters. These problems have not been dealt with as yet. There will be problems with respect to people. Perhaps it will be necessary to relocate them. How will the population of the large cities be controlled? Recently, a bill dealing with abortions was passed by this House. There now seem to be some unsatisfactory aspects of the bill. I am in favour of creating a department of the environment. I believe it is necessary. One cannot be against motherhood or anything that proposes to clean the air, water, and soil.

I now wish to deal with the matter of pollution of Parliament. Included in this bill are matters which will pollute Parliament. I will now dwell on the pollution of Parliament. Departmental ministers are a necessity. We cannot say anything about them in so far as pollution is concerned. The ministers without portfolio are allowed to be foot loose. How many will be appointed? This may be a source of pollution. I have already dealt with the problems of population. I now wish to deal with the proposed increase of ministers without portfolio and ministers of state. The five additional ministers of state will have designated purposes. However, what will the ministers of state without designated purposes do? Are they going to pollute the place with Bureaucracy? Are they going to help the departmental ministers? We would like to have these answers.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I wish to point out that we are dealing with clause 3. Hon. members should stay as closely as possible to the clause under discussion.

Mr. Rynard: I am dealing with clause 3, Mr. Chairman. I am still dealing with pollution. I have raised the matter of pollution of Parliament. People pollute and noise pollutes. I am going to stick to that, Mr. Chairman. It can be included under environmental studies.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) established regional desks. They help to cause pollution. They may even pollute the government with wrong opinions, I do not know. My information is that the Prime Minister's office costs the Canadian taxpayers $500,000. This figure may now be increased to $600,000 or more. It cost less than one quarter of that amount ten years ago.

I do not say that the civil service superannuation at 50 pollutes because that may even be stretching my ideas a little. However, I would like to know what this proposal is going to cost the Canadian taxpayer. I note that Your Honour is looking at me quizzically. I asked what was going to be done about cleaning up pollution in industry. I am now asking the same question with regard to this aspect. What is the cost of establishing a new minister of state? There is the cost of office space, new furniture and telephones.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Rynard: Would $100,000 cover this cost?

• (4:10 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I would direct his attention, and the attention of all hon. members, to the terms of Standing Order 55(2). Perhaps I should read it:

Speeches in Committee of the Whole House must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I would ask the hon. member to bring himself back to clause three of the bill which deals with the establishment of a department of environment and the designation of a minister of environment.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, how can we discuss the relevance of setting up a department, as this bill seeks to do, if we cannot relate it to the other parts of the bill? The government has brought in an omnibus bill which should have been ruled out of order—

The Chairman: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member was listening to the hon. member for Simcoe North. He was really, in my opinion, speaking on other parts of the bill which relate to the establishment of ministers of state and departments of state. Those clauses will be before the committee for discussion in due course.

Mr. Rynard: Perhaps there is a fine dividing line to be drawn, but I do not think there should be any trouble about making the connection between this clause and the pollution of parliament; the item applies very clearly and honestly, it seems to me. However, I do not intend to hold up the House. I shall content myself by expressing regret, once again, at the creation of a bureaucracy within the government itself which could provide practically everyone on the government benches with a subsidy sometime within the life of this Parliament. I have some good friends on the other side. I hope they are all friends of mine, as I am of theirs. But I say this: when you can offer bribes and incentives, as is the case here, we are entering a very dangerous phase in parliament. I wonder about the fellow who has to pay the 3 per cent surtax? How does he feel about those new expenditures?

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order. I interrupt the hon. member to advise him that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, clause 3 of Bill C-27 states as follows, and I quote:

There shall be a Department of the Government of Canada called the Department of the Environment—

That covers some ground!

—over which the Minister of the Environment appointed by commission under the Great Seal of Canada shall preside.

Subclause (2) states:

The Minister of the Environment holds office during pleasure and has the management and direction of the Department of the Environment.

That is clear enough. It is an invitation for us to discuss all related matters. A Minister of the Environment is a minister of the environment. I have been rather surprised to see a bill introduced to establish a Department of the Environment.

At a time when all ministers are complaining about a lack of funds to administer their department, the government introduces a bill to set up a new department, that of the Environment. The environment of other ministers, or what? This new department will obviously call for new expenditures! This is a repeat performance of what has been going on for two and a half years with the setting up of commissions and boards: an inquiry board here, a commission there, a commission report, the setting up of a new commission to inquire into the report of the previous commission. We are going from one commission to the other without really knowing where we are heading.

We have established a royal commission on bilingualism at a cost of approximately $15 million to the taxpayer so that we could learn that english is spoken in western Canada and French in the province of Quebec. We did not learn anything else from that commission.

And the Department of the Environment involves new expenditures.

While existing problems go begging for a solution, the government appoints new ministers and new parliamentary secretaries, thereby increasing administrative expenses in the hope of some final solution to Canada's economic problems.

We want to create jobs. However, the more we dwell on the subject, the more the number of unemployed people in Canada increase! And a further increase of their number is forecast within a couple of months, although some slowdown is foreseen thereafter. Meanwhile, the government introduces bills establishing departments.

I earnestly believe that we need no Department of the Environment at the present time, but a national credit office to provide the ministers now in office with the money they require adequately to run their departments.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. At the beginning of his remarks the hon. member read the clause which is under debate. I think his comments were relevant for a short time but I doubt that they are now. Perhaps I could ask the hon. member, and all other hon. members who intend to speak on clause three, if they would, in the course of the particular proceedings upon which we are now engaged in Committee of the Whole, observe the Standing Order and keep their remarks relevant to the subject under discussion.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Clause 3 of the bill deals with the creation of a Department of the Environment; I would like to know whether under our Standing Orders anything prevents me from moving that clause 3 be replaced by another one, dealing with the creation of a department of national credit, so as to reach a convenient solution. As a matter of fact, clause 3 states, and I quote:

(1) There shall be a department of the Government of Canada called the Department of the Environment—

I suggest that the word "Environment" be replaced by "National Credit" in an effort to help out the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and all the other ministers, who are always strapped for funds.

Mr. Chairman, I am certainly going to be told to propose an amendment to clause 3, and I would be tempted to do so. I would probably have more to say, but under the circumstances, I suggest that the bill does not solve the problem of the organization of the government. The establishment of a Department of the Environment is useless. This is not what Canada needs; the country needs something which will not contribute further to increase taxes for the people, without involving any benefits.

I said a while ago that all kinds of commissions and departments have been established. If we do not have enough, we will establish some more with the consequential bureaucracy. As usual, that will create jobs. There is no mistake about it, it will be possible to appoint bureaucrats.

In my opinion, the establishment of a new department will not serve the best interests of the Canadian population. I challenge the government to prove to me that the establishment of a Department of the Environment will solve the problems which confront us at the present time.

I have plenty of comments to make on that bill as a whole and I will wait until third reading to say exactly what I think and at the same time offer the solutions which we advocate to replace poultices on wooden legs which are being proposed in Bill C-207, and more particularly in clause 3, which provides for the establishment of a new Department of the Environment. At the present time, we already have too many departments.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants on a point of order.

Mr. McCleave: My point of order is this. This bill was put on the order paper in the name of the Prime Minister and, in its initial stages, has been dealt with by the President of the Treasury Board. I am wondering which of the two ministers now in the House is responsible for carriage of the bill through this particular part of the debate. I think hon. members should know this so they know with whom they can engage in debate.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am following this bill as Minister of Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the minister of Fisheries who I understand is responsible for the bill. If I am satisfied with his answer it might save the committee a speech. If the minister has answered this question previously, I am not aware of it.

What is the rationale behind the fact that the Arctic waters pollution legislation, the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the shipping act amendments and the National Parks Act do not come within the purview of the new minister of the environment?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, if I may answer this question, the new department of the environment cannot possibly cover all aspects of the environment. The environment is a very wide subject. The department's main role will be one of co-ordination. There are a number of other departments which in their own way must have an impact on the environment—for example, the Department of Transport in the area of shipping. The Canada Shipping Act deals with a very effective federal power; and the amendments currently being introduced to the Canada Shipping Act, for example, deal very effectively with one aspect of pollution, namely spills from vessels on the high seas, in Canadian territorial waters and fishing zones or indeed in navigable fresh waters in Canada. So, the Department of Transport is clearly involved in the part of the bill dealing with pollution.

Then, there is the Arctic seas pollution bill and the northern inland waters bill. In many ways the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is like a provincial government. It has the equivalent of provincial powers in the north. It must exert powers in respect of rivers, streams and the islands of the north. Legislation pertaining directly to the north is generally administered by that department, as is similar legislation administered by the provinces—that is, the properly instituted provinces of Canada.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, may I briefly say that I accept the explanation of the minister with regard to the Arctic waters bill. The explanation sounds quite reasonable and, after thinking about it, I understand the rationale quite well. I am less sure about the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, though. The minister did not mention the National Parks Act, either. Could he explain why the National Parks Act will not be administered by this new department of the environment?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there is obviously a close relationship between the environment and parks. The administration of parks, however has been closely linked to other elements of administration in the department of northern affairs. The wildlife service, which is being transferred, will continue to act in a support role to the parks branch. The environment department will on occasion be working very closely with northern affairs, which is concerned with parks and the establishment of new parks, indeed the protection of existing park areas. So, one must assume that there will be a measure of co-operation between departments, together with interchange of information and consistent policy.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley completed his remarks?

Mr. Thomson: For the moment, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I just wanted to be sure of that.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, as the minister has said the subject of the environment is so very wide and complicated that it is hard to know where to start. I know everyone in the country as well as in the House, agrees that a start must be made on a plan to protect our environment; that regardless of how we feel about this bill—and there is plenty of criticism in our minds on many aspects of the bill—we should be very glad that at least a beginning is being made to protect the environment through the measures proposed in the bill.

Since there is so much to be done in the way of protecting the quality of water, air, soil and all the other factors involved, it must be very bewildering for the minister to know just where to begin. Not a day passes that there is not some fresh story about pollution on a large scale. In one paper this morning there was a story concerning a large corporation, Domtar, and the pollution it is causing in the Perth region. Stories appear about other corporations almost daily.

I think most of us are glad to see the present minister is minister-in-waiting of this new department because most of us feel he is very much in earnest and will, to the best of his ability, make a start on tackling this tremendous job, even though there are undoubtedly aspects of the protection of the environment that are not dealt with in this bill. As a result, we may find that other arrangements will have to be made.

The job that confronts us all across Canada is a tremendous one, as we discovered during our study of the Canada Water Act. Indeed, it is becoming increasingly obvious. In the minister's province and mine there is much to be done. For example, starting from the eastern portion of the province, we have the strip mining in British Columbia near the Alberta border which has made the landscape into a moonscape—sterile and terribly ugly. Then, we have the mining and logging problems in the provincial parks. Measures must be taken to protect the forests. In British Columbia, for every seven acres cut only about one acre is reforested, and we know it takes about 75 years to regrow marketable timber on the mountainsides. Then, the Utah Mining Company dumps tailings into the tidewater on the far side of Vancouver Island. And so, on I could go.

I know that the minister will agree that it is not a complete answer to say that provincial jurisdiction is involved here, although we know that that is the case. I really do not believe anyone who thinks about it would feel that we can allow the constitution in its present form to stand in the way of getting at this problem. I think the amendment of the constitution, in its totality, may remain a conversation piece for many years. I remember well the Rowell-Sirois commission back in the 1930's when the amendment of the constitution was considered of tremendous urgency. We are still working on it and it may be a long time before we have a completely new and rational constitution.

I have felt it to be true of other departments of government, and doubly true of the new department of environment, that the minister will have to initiate the over-all planning in these matters and then go to the provincial governments with propositions that can be discussed and amended, but which will result in action.

He knows very well that in our province, which he and I probably know better than any other province, the people are very anxious to see action in this regard. He also knows that in the province of British Columbia the people are very anxious to be allowed to help. This was very true all across Canada when the matter involved was the cutting down or the removal of phosphates in detergents. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should be the first one to be thankful that there was such a flood of letters and protests from ordinary people across this country, because it made his job not only easier but perhaps possible within the time he had to accomplish it. The present minister who will handle problems in respect of environment would do well to realize this fact. If ever there was a sector or a field in which the public can help, it is this area of protection of our environment.

Even if we do get things set up, all the policing that can be done through government sources will not be enough. If the minister can arrange things to avail himself of the voluntary policing of the thousands of consumers across this country he will find his job much easier. And that policing will be provided free of charge. People are so concerned about saving our environment that they are willing to report infringements. They are anxious to bring as much pressure to bear as possible.

Ways and means will have to be found within the existing constitutional machinery to provide authority in respect of saving the environment even where there is divided jurisdiction, as is the case in respect of mining, forestry and other aspects of resource conservation. The hon. member for Kootenay West has at least twice made the point that the laws on the statute books are no better than the enforcement of such laws. In years past we have not been sufficiently vigilant and have not realized what is happening to our ecology.

We have now reached the point where we must find new and effective machinery. Instead of waiting until he has a completely new plan in respect of fish, wildlife and other things, the minister should build up the confidence of the public by proceeding on a pilot project. In this way he could win a victory for our environment. In this way he could gain the confidence of the public to a greater extent than through any amount of regulation, talk or negotiation in respect of the larger issues. He could obtain the support to do what he must do.

In British Columbia there is such a pilot project. I have reference to the saving of the Skagit Valley. This morning I was very pleased to find that the Toronto Globe and Mail recognized, in a fair sized editorial article, the value of saving the Skagit Valley in British Columbia. This is the first time I have seen anything of this kind on this scale outside British Columbia.

This editorial recognizes the fact that a valley such as the Skagit River Valley is a great asset, not only to British Columbia but to the whole of Canada. It recognizes that the salavation of this area should be considered not merely on the basis of its value to British Columbia, but on the basis of its value to Canada. The editorial suggests:

> This is too important a decision to be left to the local authorities of Victoria and Seattle. The Skagit Valley is an important wilderness and recreational area, but it is more important as a test of Canada's willingness to defend all such areas from the unjustified encroachment of indutsry.
> Ottawa should say no, and make Mr. Bennett return his $35,000.

Let me say that the last sentence is perhaps unnecessary. Premier Bennett has already indicated that if Ottawa can find a way out of this present impasse he will not stand in the way. It is for this and other reasons I feel this would be an ideal project for the minister to try out his new powers. I am sure the minister will not find any objection from the province of British Columbia. I am sure Mr. Bennett would be very glad to be helped out of this difficulty in which he now finds himself. The public is very much aroused about this situation.

This whole matter goes back a long way, in fact further than I want to take it at this time. Back in 1942 the city of Seattle, with the consent of the International Joint Commission, was allowed to flood part of the Skagit Valley behind a dam built within the United States. The city needed more power to support war industries. It also received under this agreement, with the consent of the International Joint Commission, the authority to raise this dam 125 feet higher when necessary, providing the consent of the government of British Columbia was forthcoming.

In 1967 Premier Bennett gave the city of Seattle a 99 year lease for $35,000 a year permitting the flooding of about ten acres of the Skagit River Valley. This is one of the most choice recreation sites anywhere near Vancouver and, indeed, is one of two remaining river valleys suitable for recreational purposes in British Columbia. On the basis of a 99 year lease at $35,000 per year, this works out to about $5.50 per acre.

When Premier Bennett leased this area to the city of Seattle he gave the city something else. He gave a three-year timber cutting permit in order that the Skagit River Valley could be prepared for flooding, a permit now withdrawn under public pressure.

Under the guidance of organizations such as SPEC, which is the equivalent of Pollution Probe in Ontario, the people of Vancouver have realized what is happening. They are beginning to realize that fish spawning grounds there are being destroyed. There will be ten miles of floodded area, but there will be a great deal of spawning area destroyed. They are beginning to realize that meadowlands on which between 400 and 500 deer are feeding will be destroyed. They realize that a number of species of wildlife will be destroyed because of the flooding of this area. They also realize the tremendous loss of a recreational area within 125 miles of Vancouver which will result fromthis flooding. The people are beginning to fight to save the Skagit River Valley, but they need the help of the minister.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Perrault: He is working on it.

Mrs. MacInnis: I know he is working on it, but I point out that there is a deadline involved. Time may run out. I believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has stipulated that one cannot raise a dam more than one-tenth of a foot on an international waterway without Ottawa's consent. I hope he has done that because it would be a roadblock to this project.

Further, the Federal Government has asked Seattle City Light to apply for a licence under the International River Improvements Act, but Seattle says it is going to stand by the 1942 International Joint Commission consent. Seattle has, therefore, gone ahead and asked the United States Federal Power Commission for permission to proceed with the dam. That is the position at which we are now. I hope the minister, cloaked in his new powers, will begin operations by going down there and arguing that this river valley should be saved for the people of British Columbia and of Canada. When I was recently in British Columbia, I heard that one of the most powerful conservation groups trying to save this valley is on the other side of the border. The Sierra Club on the other side of the border is just as concerned as we are, and probably more so, because they have seen so much destruction of recreation areas in the United States.

Whether we like it or not there is a great deal of traffic passing back and forth between our two countries, and recreation areas extend across our borders. I hope very much—

Mr. Deachman: May I ask the hon. lady a question? While she is giving a plug to the Sierra Club would she also give a plug for David Brousson, the Liberal member for North Vancouver-Capilano in the B.C. legislature, who has done more to save the Skagit Valley than anybody else?

Mrs. MacInnis: Yes, I certainly will put in a plug for David Brousson, and David Anderson, and Ron Harding and Mark Rose, because to me this is not a partisan issue. Some of us may become very partisan on issues where there are sharp differences of opinion, but there is no difference of opinion on this issue. I know everybody is anxious to save the Skagit River Valley. All I am urging is that the minister use his new powers without delay.

According to this Toronto editorial, the Federal Government is inclined to be timed about approaching the U.S. authorities because it is afraid they may say that if Canada does not allow the Skagit River Valley to be flooded then they will not help to clean up the Great Lakes. That is a wrong and unrealistic attitude. The U.S. authorities, and more particularly the American people, are becoming well aware of what would happen if pollution of the Great Lakes is allowed to continue. They know it will be a tremendously expensive matter to clean up the Great Lakes. Perhaps that would be the initial reaction of the U.S. authorities, but it would be foolish, and I do not think they are quite that foolish. They have as big a stake as we have, if not bigger, in the Great Lakes.

I am well aware of the minister's attitude. We all appreciate what he has said. When he was out in Vancouver last October he referred to the flooding of the Skagit Valley, and said his attitude was that it must be stopped. I say that his attitude must be re-enforced with whatever weight the Canadian government can apply, and not only the weight of the Canadian government but of all of us in opposition as well as the weight of the provincial government, even though it will not admit that it would be willing to give it. I know that the provincial government is in a bind because the people of British Columbia are terribly concerned that these acres have been alienated for a song. The Premier of British Columbia is aware of that fact.

I would remind the minister to some remarks he made last October with respect to water resources. He outlined the rules as follows:

> Don't export water to the United States because it wil never be possible to cut off the flow.
> Don't direct whole rivers from one river basin to another.
> Don't regulate water flows in such a way as to jeopardize other resources in the area.

This fourth rule has particular relevance here.

> Don't sacrifice trees, fish, landlife and other living things for the production of power or protection of real estate unless absolutely necessary.

I do not think the minister believes it is absolutely necessary to sacrifice the Skagit River Valley. Armed with these new powers, I believe he now has the courage to go in and save the Skagit Valley. If he does so, he will have the confidence of the people of British Columbia when he goes on to battle for the other things that must be battled for in that province. He will have the power of the people with him if he opposes the standpat attitude of the provincial government. He will be able to go on to stop a lot of the other depredation of our parks and natural wildlife areas, depredation caused by mines and other private interests. This is the plea that I make to him.

I could talk about many other aspects of environmental control, but I end by saying that the people of British Columbia, and by extension people all across Canada because we have not got a fence running along the Rocky Mountains, would be everlasting grateful to the minister if he could save the Skagit River Valley for Canada.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I spoke on a second reading of this bill and then mainly on that part of it which concerns environmental problems. This is the part we are discussing today, and the reason for my participation is that I feel that when we passed the Water Act of 1970, which repealed an earlier statute, it was not a good move. I refer to the repeal of the Water Conservation Assistance Act of 1951.

I do not know how many of the provinces took advantage of that act, but I do know that the province of Ontario did. I again cite the water authorities and the commissions that were built up on the Saugeen, the Maitland, the Don, the Humber, the Thames and the Grand. These river authorities did a tremendous job. They were assisted with their capital projects by the provisions of that act under a formula whereby the federal government paid 37½ per cent, the provincial government paid 37½ per cent, and the municipalities involved paid 25 per cent of the cost. These authorities did a tremendous job in building up parks and recreational areas, and I think they deserve a great deal of encouragement.

But when the Water Conservation Assistance Act was repealed, the Water Act was brought in which contained a provision to the effect that the federal government would agree to some kind of water management assistance program. However, there was no stipulation as to how much assistance would be given. Many of these authorities and commissions have worked very hard in their areas to try to improve the recreational facilities related to water. It is true the water conservation bill might have been introduced in the first place to look after flood control. Possibly that was its initial impetus because it protected some of the towns and rivers downstream that had been in trouble as a result of spring floods. But now, we find that during the summer period when the flow in the rivers drops, there is not enough water moving down those rivers and creeks to carry away the effluent from many of the sewage disposal plants or lagoons that have been set up in the towns and villages.

Many of these authorities have plans to build more dams to increase the flow of these rivers, but because the provincial government have to pay 75 per cent of the cost and the municipalities pay the 25 per cent many of these projects are being withheld. I had a private conversation with the minister the other day in connection with this matter. He said that perhaps the government might start a program of water management in these particular areas. This is all right, but the original planning must be done by the local authorities. If they do not have some idea from whence the assistance will come, whether it be from the federal or provincial governments, the projects may have to be withheld because the municipalities cannot undertake to cover the whole cost. The province is involved but sometimes it does not feel it wants to be responsible for a big share of the cost. So, I would like to urge the minister, when he considers water conservation, to suggest some formula whereby the cost of these projects might be shared equally by the provincial and federal governments, 37½ per cent each, and 25 per cent by the municipalities.

I sincerely hope he will suggest such a formula for the new water management programs, because I think it would be of tremendous assistance to these water authorities and commissions which have worked so hard to set up good programs and areas for recreation and camping. They should be encouraged in the conservation programs, and any federal assistance that can be given will be appreciated, I am sure. When the minister is answering, perhaps he could give us some idea of just how much assistance the federal government could give under the new plan for water management now that the old conservation programs no longer exist. It would be of tremendous assistance to a great many people, not only in areas in southwestern Ontario but also in other provinces, who would be happy to set up a type of program similar to this one which has been so successful.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Chairman, is rising to take part in this discussion, particularly in relation to clause 3 which has to do with measures proposed to establish the new department, I would like to say that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, who comes from the same polluted province as I do, will be the new minister of environment in this country, as I understand it.

There are many forms of pollution and environmental impairment, as we all know, but at this time I want to devote the main part of what little I have to say to one aspect of pollution which is rather ignored or down played. I refer to sound pollution. I hope to bring attention to these particular aspects of environmental impairment which exist, particularly in British Columbia. At present we have a threat to our environment in B.C. by air and sea which is posed in the now approved underground nuclear test by the United States in the Aleutian Islands. It has been approved to the extent that money has actually been allocated for this explosion. We all recall what happened a year or two ago in a much smaller test. We can well understand that the public of B.C. will be much exercised at what is now threatened, because a new test in that area will be much larger than the one we have had and survived. It is not impossible that we will experience a tidal wave as a result of this intended blast in the Aleutians. It is taking place in an earthquake prone zone, as we know, and a few years ago when there was an earthquake, B.C. communities such as Port Alberni experienced very high waves and damage as a result.

I want to urge the minister to do whatever he can to get this government to ask the United States to delay or cancel this test until such time as negotiations going on between the United States and the Soviet Union hopefully reach a level of sanity which will end in an agreement to abandon this type of underground nuclear testing. That is one point in connection with the environmental problem facing British Columbians.

Second, I want to urge the minister to do whatever he can to get this government to avert the planned shipment, by U.S. private interests, down the B.C. coast of great quantities of oil from Alaska. These oil shipments are to be carried in tankers which are a threat, as we all know, through spillage of oil to some of the most beautiful areas in coastal Canada. I raised this matter the other day during the question period, and the minister told me that this was a matter which concerned the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Again, I take this opportunity to urge him to do what he can to get the Secretary of State for External Affairs to step up activities to avert this very threatening pollution problem.

Third, I want to allude briefly to a problem which affects a number of British Columbians. We have about two million people in B.C. over half of whom within a very few miles on half of one per cent of the land area. A good many of them live in and around my constituency. These people are faced with another threat of pollution in the form of coal cars, trains carrying coal coming up from the United States through the White Rock Crescent Beach and Ocean Park shipment points. These are among the best recreational and residential waterfront areas. I urge the minister, when established in his new post, to take whatever measures he can think of to alleviate the situation.

Having said that, I would like to speak now about a form of pollution about which I am particularly concerned. I have placed on the order paper a bill on the subject of noise or sound pollution. Before I do that, however, I wish the minister every good fortune in whatever endeavours he undertakes in his capacity as minister of environment. I know he means well in every case where he shows his intention, and he will certainly have the support not only of his party but of the people of British Columbia.

The fourth form of pollution beyond that of air, land and sea, is noise or sound pollution. In my view, this type of pollution should be under study by a standing committee of the House which concerns itself with all matters of pollution. The time is overdue when sound pollution should be recognized as a health danger to individuals and communities. In urging that this form of pollution be recognized as part of the environmental problem with which this legislation sets out to deal, I want to quote very briefly from a few articles which have been published on the subject. I will quote now from a report in the Ottawa Citizen of a Boston meeting which reads in part as follows:

> Slowly, in a sneaky sort of way, noise is ruining the health of hundreds of thousands of North Americans and bringing death years closer for thousands.
> That's the message which has been preached over and over again in the first few days of a session on noise pollution at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science here

• (5:00 p.m.)

> There's not much in the frightening medical evidence that is brand new, but it's the first time that it has ever been put together like this, in a discussion drawing scientists from Canada, Australia, Germany, Argentina and the U.S.S.R. . . .
> —noise isn't good for . . . just about every bodily function you can name and that doesn't count hearing because the scientists aren't even talking about that problem since it has been well publicized.
> Noise isn't good for you, . . . because it causes the small blood human body shows little inclination to adapt to repeated noises like the sound of horns blowing outside the window at night.
> Noise isn't good for you, . . .because it causes the small blood vessels in the body to contract and then expand involuntarily. This contraction happens even to people who are deaf and eventually the weakening of elasticity in the blood vessels because of it leads to circulatory problems and could be a contributing factor in strokes and heart attacks.

The article goes on to list the reports of other scientists concerning the seriousness of noise pollution.

May I quote from another editorial in the Globe and Mail. It reads

> A two day symposium on noise pollution conducted by the American Medical Association ... estimated that environmental din is doubling in intensity every decade. Even bigger jumps are in prospect with the mounting volume of air traffic—expected to triple by 1975—and the advent of supersonic transport planes with their sonicboom capacity to shatter eardrums as well as window panes.
> But planes are only a fraction of the cacophony. Heavy traffic clocks in at around 80 decibels or just about the tolerable level. A motorcycle can shoot that up to 110 decibels, a siren to 125 decibels (one doctor complained recently that ambulance sirens were killing more patients than they were saving) ...

There is a great deal of literature on this subject, which I hope the new minister of the environment will read. I hope, as a result, that the government will act.

Last March I was glad to receive assurances from three ministries that action to deal with the matter of sound pollution is to be taken. The Minister of Labour replied to a letter I had sent him and said that regulations pertaining to noise control and hearing conservation in industries subject to federal jurisdiction and in the Public Service of Canada are being developed pursuant to the Canada Labour (Safety) Code. Another reply from the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that the department intends to increase its activities in these areas. Finally, I received a letter from the President of the Treasury Board. It said that sound and man's sensitivity to it are being studied under ten general headings.

I received these assurances last March, almost one year ago. I hope that such action as was indicated in those replies has been taken by the departments concerned. In any event I intend to keep on making representations, either at the committee level or at any other level, for the minister to include sound pollution in the protection of the environment.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, may I direct a question to the minister? Are other departments of government to be concerned with enforcing pollution control regulations? I am referring to departments such as the Department of Transport, which may be concerned about supersonic jets and the like. Also, will certain people serving with present departments be transferred to the new department which is to be set up, the department of the environment?

Mr. Davis: The answer, Mr. Chairman, is yes. I mentioned that there were a number of other departments which are vitally concerned about the environment, departments such as the Department of National Health and Welfare. Clean air is essential to health and the Department of National Health and Welfare will continue to be concerned about the quality of the air around us. The environmental health unit of the Department of National Health and Welfare has been transferred already and will be part of the new department of the environment. Nevertheless, remaining within the department of health will be others who are concerned about the health of human beings in industry, the health of people as distinct from the general well-being of the environment. The new department of the environment will therefore be working closely with the Department of National Health and Welfare. The people who have been transferred from the occupational health unit to the department of the environment will, themselves, be working closely with the medical people of the department.

I might mention other departments. Clearly, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is concerned about fuels and the quality of fuels. Clearly, the sulphur content of a fuel has a great deal to do with the quality of the effluent being discharged. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources will be concerned about such things as industries that use sulphur bearing coal and will be vitally interested, far into the future, in that aspect of the pollution problem. Clearly, the people in the department of the environment will be working closely with the people in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Reference has been made to transportation, and to aircraft. Aeronautics as well as shipping will be a matter for the Parliament of Canada. The Department of Transport focusses particularly on this kind of transportation. It can regulate the devices used by aircraft, the design of ships, and so on. Personnel in the Department of Transport will be working closely with the meteorological service, which is being transferred to the new department of the environment. The meteorological service looks at the weather side of things; weather forecasting is essential to transportation. So, there must be co-operation, again, between the "met" service, the new department of the environment and the Department of Transport. Among those three departments, transport, energy, mines and resources and national health and welfare, there will be close liaison in future with the department of the environment.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question to illustrate my point? Suppose an aircraft is flying over Canada and, before landing, dumps some fuel into one of our lakes thereby polluting that lake, as has happened in many cases. Whose responsibility will this be? I should like to know whether, in the department of the environment, a board will be set up which will co-ordinate the responsibilities of that department with those of other departments and exercise some supervision with regard to laws affecting other departments as well as the department of the environment. At the same time, I am thinking of what is happening in the United States. That country has not decided as yet whether to go ahead with the SST. There is a fear that the aircraft will contribute to atmospheric pollution. Will there be someone in the department of the environment whose responsibility it will be to co-ordinate in this area? I am also thinking of the millions of dollars being spent on anti-pollution devices for automobiles on highways. The Canadian Transport Commission does not seem to mind doing away with other forms of transportation that are less polluting than automobiles. I wonder whether there is to be a co-ordinating body, with special powers to work with the Canadian Transport Commission, which would take all these matters under consideration.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, again, the answer in a general way must be yes. The department of the environment will have that co-ordinating function. Several of the problems which the hon. member has mentioned relate to the air. We have already, under the meteorological service, air monitoring. We are soon to have a new clean air bill. I hope it will be passed during the present session. We are to obtain additional powers to expand our monitoring network across the country through which the air will be monitored. Under the bill, we shall set up national air quality objectives and standards, and we shall be in a position of knowing what the quality of our air is.

When it comes to a particular problem, such as detecting fuel that has been dumped by an aircraft in difficulties, and so on, we hope that the department of the environment people will detect this. Nevertheless, the Department of Transport, which has the direct authority over aircraft and the manner in which they are operated, will be involved. It will have to determine how widespread those practices are. This involves co-operation and close co-ordination between the departments.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I wish to mention another point. I do not think we want to be put in a position where various departments of government will set their own standards of pollution control. The minister has suggested that since the matter of dumping of fuel will come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport, there will be national standards. Will a committee of the various departments of government responsible for pollution control be established under the supervision of the minister which will cover the entire field of pollution control? I gather from the minister's remarks that there will still be the same lack of co-operation between various departments as far as pollution standards are concerned.

Canadians are interested in a department of the environment. If we are really concerned about environmental pollution control, there must be cooperation and liaison. Will the minister state whether a committee will be established comprising members of all government departments responsible for pollution so that there can be national standards? Various water resource commissions throughout Canada realize there must be national standards. Without them, they realize they cannot continue for many more years. There must be national standards, supervised by the department of the environment, that have teeth in order to deal with the areas causing pollution. Will the minister elaborate on whether a committee comprising members of every department in this area will be established.

Mr. Davis: I think it goes without saying that there will probably be several committees. We now have a committee of the cabinet. There will be a committee of resource ministers who have federal and provincial responsibilities in this area. There will also be interdepartmental committees which will probably be at the deputy minister level. These interdepartmental committees will deal with specific aspects of pollution, such as the motor vehicle. The department of the environment must act as a coordinator with the Department of Transport which administers the Motor Safety Act. It must also be involved with the Department of National Health and Welfare and with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce because we are concerned about imported vehicles as well as those manufactured in Canada. The several departments which are concerned must be represented.

We will have a number of committees because there are several levels of government, a number of federal government departments and different kinds of pollution problems. The Council of Resource Ministers, which is already in existence, will assist in our liaison with provincial ministers. We already have a cabinet committee which deals with this subject.

Mr. Howe: Will the minister answer the question I asked him? Is the government considering any financial assistance or any formula which would assist the projects to which I referred? So that people will have some idea when formulating plans, will the minister state how much assistance might be forthcoming from the federal government to assist water management commissions in carrying out these projects?

Mr. Davis: I cannot answer the hon. member's question in precise numbers. He referred to the fact that an earlier piece of legislation was repealed when the Canada Water Act was introduced. Under the former legislation, the federal government, provincial governments and local municipalities or authorities carried out certain river development projects, usually on a modest scale. They varied in size from province to province. Under the original act, the federal government paid 37.5 per cent, the provincial government 37.5 per cent and the local body 25 per cent.

The Canada Water Act which superseded the previous legislation is much more comprehensive. It envisages many kinds of river development such as whole river basins or single tributaries. It covers any conceivable water development in which there is a need for several levels of government, including the federal government, to participate. The basic philosophy is that each level of government should make a contribution which reflects its constitutional responsibilities. If there is a major concern with navigation on a river or stream, there is a federal involvement. If there is a hydro requirement or capability there is probably just a provincial involvement. If fisheries are involved, particularly on the ocean coasts, there is a federal fisheries involvement. If there is a flood control aspect, more than likely there is a provincial involvement. If a development is entirely for hydro, it would be 100 per cent provincial. If a project involves hydro, navigation, flood control and fisheries, the contribution will vary depending on the benefits.

If the benefits of a project are mostly in the federal area, it will probably be largely financed as a federally supported development. If the benefits are largely provincial or local, the financing will fall that way. The expected benefits will be the determining factor of shares of cost rather than the precise formula laid down in the earlier legislation. Because there is not a precise formula, I do not want the hon. member to think that there is not a way of getting around this problem. The approach is more general, flexible and realistic because it will reflect the benefits to the federal, provincial or local area.

Mr. Howe: In other words, the federal government will give assistance in most of these programs as long as there is some federal interest involved.

Mr. Davis: The federal government must be concerned if there are navigational, fisheries or even flood control aspects. If it is a very small development within a province, the answer may be no. If the federal government is strapped for funds, the answer may be no. There must be a joint study to see where the benefits fall within the federal, provincial and local responsibilities. The costs will be apportioned in that fashion.

Mr. McCleave: The minister seems to be in a very obliging mood this afternoon. I never fault the minister in that regard. I wish to direct two questions to him. Last night I raised the matter of the swordfishery. These fishermen seemed to have been forced out of employment because of the high mercury content in swordfish. I do not have any quarrel with the retraining and unemployment insurance programs for fishermen. However, this seems to go a little further. These fishermen have large capital obligations. They have been forced out of their normal employment by reasons outside their control.

My question last night, which perhaps the President of the Treasury Board did not pass along, was not only whether the government was considering that particular matter, but whether the government had given any consideration to the plight of innocent people who are suddenly deprived of their livelihood because somebody has offended against anti-pollution laws.

The second question arises out of the wording of some of these clauses in which ministers are given the right to enter into agreements or to co-operate with provincial governments or agencies. I am sorry I used the word "agreements" because that is precisely the word I did not mean to use. The phrase is "to co-operate" rather than "to enter into agreements". Perhaps the minister could deal with that point, too.

Mr. Davis: The hon. member raises two questions. The first has to do with the compensation or interim income which should be paid to fishermen who, through no fault of their own, suddenly find their livelihood terminated. The other relates to the nature of our formal relationships with the provinces.

To answer the first question. As the hon. member knows, there have been a number of unfortunate experiences involving fishermen in various parts of Canada during the last 18 months—phosphorous first, and subsequently mercury. In all cases we have endeavoured to maintain the incomes of fishermen during the period in which they were being retrained for another occupation or during the time that another element of the fishery was being opened up to them, or until the fishery was restored.

In the case of swordfish, there may be a protracted period during which fishermen concerned are unable to to practice this long distance fishery. We are looking into a number of alternatives such as using the same vessels and the same crews to take groundfish with the aid of trawling and seining methods which have recently been developed. Meanwhile, the practice has been to make funds available to these people to assist them during the period when otherwise they would have no income from their normal form of employment. We would like to have, indeed, we must have, for the longer term, a program of what I might loosely term catch insurance. We must have something which would not only look after closures of this kind, closures of a particular fishery for months, or, maybe, years but also cases of unpredictable decline in income. We are examining a longer term program but meanwhile we are dealing with cases on a hand to mouth basis, as they arise, as expeditously as possible.

I turn, now, to the question the hon. member asked about the use of the word "agreements" instead of the word "co-operation".

Mr. McCleave: No. The other way around.

Mr. Davis: The use of the word "co-operation" rather than "agreements". When we come to clause 6, we shall focus on this point and by then I hope to have an adequate answer. As it is, I hope we shall reach agreements with the provinces and I hope we shall also co-operate with them on questions of this kind.

Mr. McCleave: That is fair enough. Perhaps it is a legal point and the minister can deal with it tomorrow. With reference to the answer he gave to my first question, is any continuing study being made to find out whether the standards imposed as to mercury content are justifiable? I am not asking that anybody should pollute their own souls by setting standards which are not right, but I understand that the mercury problem as far as swordfish are concerned has been with us for a long time. Is it that standards are, maybe, being set too high? I want this answer for general information; I simply do not know.

Mr. Davis: This is a very difficult question. I do not want to appear in anything I say to be questioning the present standard, because we are not considering an immediate change in the standard of one half part per million of mercury in fish. At the same time, the instruments which are being used to detect these very small amounts are still very new—the equipment has only been available for some 18 months—so we are learning a great deal about a condition which in some measure has always existed in nature. Though we do know there have sometimes been very much higher concentrations of mercury in fish caught near certain industries which use mercury, we find mercury in very small amounts everywhere and it may well be that certain species of fish, especially the more carnivorous fish at the top end of the food chain, have always been high in mercury content compared with others. How high is dangerous to health is something which health officials in this administration, in the United States and elsewhere are very concerned about. I am sure that as they develop more knowledge on this subject they will be reassessing their views. I hear some of them say they might be lowering the standard. I would hope that they might be able to raise it.

I might perhaps refer to the standard Sweden has set. Sweden has set a standard of .2 parts per million ranging to one part per million and if any fish product is sold below .2 parts—remember, our standard is .5—they do not mark it. But anything between .2 and one part they mark it "only to be eaten once a week". I do not think we want to mark "only to be eaten once a week" on fish sold for consumption in Canada or for export. We have set our own standard. The United States has adopted it. It is now a North American standard of .5 parts. It can be argued that double this figure is reasonable, but Sweden has not taken this view. A conference is to be held in Ottawa in February to which experts are coming from all parts of the world. We are focussing on this problem and hopefully we shall be able to provide more information which will help us to set standards which are realistic in the light of that new information. However, as I say, I do not want to infer that we wish to change our standard of .5 parts per million.

Mr. MacLean: One brief question. I am not expecting a reply, now. Perhaps the minister could reply when we get to an appropriate clause, which would be clause 4 or 5.

It seems to me that in addition to the regular treaties which were formerly administered by the department of fisheries, and which will be administered by the new department, for example, the Migratory Birds Act, the whole concept of pollution control will involve international consideration in many areas. The pollution of swordfish by mercury is a case in point. I should like to hear some explanation of the role the department will play in these areas which are not specifically covered by legislation at the present time.

Will the new department be in direct contact with other govenments or will it act only in the role of adviser to the Department of External Affairs? What will be the division of responsibility and how is it anticipated the administration will be carried on? I have in mind effective pollution controls of an international type, as well as controlling pollution that kills birds or migratory fish that may become polluted in some other country's waters or on the high seas.

Mr. Davis: The hon. member was minister of fisheries for a number of years, and he knows there are direct contacts between a particular ministry in Canada and a ministry of another country. In the first instance, what usually happens is that these contacts are established through the Department of External Affairs and the foreign office of the other country. Once the contacts are made and the ministers and officials begin to talk more specifically about, for example, fish, external affairs officials and the foreign office people in that country may remain as observers or, perhaps, leave the room. So there are many opportunities for discussion in depth, the reaching of understandings on matters of that kind, and so on. These are matters limited to the department, however, and fisheries is an example.

I am sure this will happen in the case of pollution. Other countries are setting up departments of the environment, departments of pollution control, and so on. I am convinced that we will be able to develop standards that are not simply national in Canada but some of which are international, even global in scope. We have a Canadian as chairman of the United Nations agency dealing with the environment, Mr. Maurice Strong. We are going to have a conference in 1972 with other nations regarding the application of standards on a global basis pertaining, for example, to mercury pollution. I am sure there will be many meetings between officials of the environment department in Canada and their opposite numbers in other countries at such conferences, as well as bilaterally in direct negotiation with, say, the United States and countries overseas.

I think that through the Canada Water Act, a new clean air act, and so on, we will be able to set up study groups and task forces that will develop standards. I am thinking now of standards that we are developing in Canada for the pulp and paper industry with regard to the discharge of its effluent into water. A number of other countries are watching what we are doing. We have 170 mills and need to do something quickly about this problem. Our standards may well become the standards of the United States and of the Scandinavian countries of simply because we are focusing on this matter as our specialty or priority item. I am sure there will be a good deal of coming and going between departmental officials and technically qualified people competent in this area internationally as well as in Canada.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions to put to the minister who will be in charge of this new department. The first has to do with national standards. I understand the minister is very interested in national standards, as I think are most hon. members. Will the minister definitely set up national standards under this new department? I am thinking in terms of pulp mills and so on. Has the minister run into any difficulty to date in dealing with provinces that might wish to have lower or different standards?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. The hon. member for Etobicoke on a point of order.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member opposite is referring to standards. May I draw your attention to clause 6 of the bill, which would seem to me to be the appropriate clause to discuss this particular subject and to put such questions.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. On the point of order, I think the hon. member will realize that the Chair has been very lenient so far. A great deal of latitude has been given on this clause to the discussion of matters that really belong within clause 6. Perhaps if the bill had been properly drawn, clauses 4 and 5 would have been subclauses of clause 3. Since this Chairman, at least, has taken this into account in his intelligent attitude toward the drafting of bills, and since other Chairmen who preceded me have allowed such discussion, I feel that now is not the time to limit the debate.

Mr. Harding: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I can assure the Chair that any question I ask under this clause will not be repeated later on. My question to the minister was this. Is the minister going to have authority to set national standards? This is a very general question but an important one. How will these fit in with the enforcement of the Canada Water Act, where you have to deal with ten provinces on an individual basis? How can the minister arrive at an agreement on national standards with each of the ten provinces when under the Canada Water Act water quality management areas have to be negotiated with provinces that have differing standards? I should like the minister to clear up this point. I assure him that we will do everything we can to tighten up the bill, and we are all behind him if he is able to formulate national standards. We need and should have these national standards.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, my answer would be this: We can have national standards, we must have national standards and we will have national standards. The hon. member asks how. We can develop national standards—I am talking more in legal or constitutional terms here—for industries under federal jurisdiction, and some of these are very large. Any industry that has an impact upon our fisheries in so far as its water effluent is concerned can be required to meet the standards under the federal Fisheries Act, because these standards are national in scope and in impact.

There are other industries that come totally within provincial jurisdiction. In many water situations, to regulate properly a body of water you must regulate not just provincial development of water but federal development as well, and in such a case a joint body may be appropriate. If so, we could proceed, for example, under the Canada Water Act or under a similar provision for federal-provincial co-operation under the terms of a clean air act.

In all these instances we would insist that the national standard that we had developed would be the standard to be employed in the joint development in that particular area, so that through federal and provincial agreement it would be possible to bring about the enforcement of national standards. You do not do this through direct federal legislation without reference to the province concerned. In that case you would have to have an agreement with the province relative to the particular industry in that province.

There is a third way to bring about national standards, and this is what we are really doing at the moment with the pulp and paper industry. We are working closely with the provinces and the pulp and paper industry, along with experts from several other countries, in the development of standards that we believe the provincial pollution control boards will adopt as well as our own authorities. Through thorough discussion and sweet reason we believe we will arrive at standards which will in fact be national standards that are applied by the provinces because they believe in them, not because there is federal jurisdiction in every instance within the provinces. So through co-operation and certainly careful discussions we can set standards. The hon. member asks if there are difficulties. The biggest single difficulty is that relating to older plants. We can readily develop standards that apply to new plants by requiring that new plants henceforth must be designed to produce effluent of a quality stipulated in the regulations.

Those regulations and standards have to be the objectives toward which the old plants must progressively be upgraded. The unkown element in this is, how long will it take for the old plants to come up to that standard? In an industry that is totally within a province and totally within provincial jurisdiction, the matter must be left primarily with the province to negotiate with the firm in order to bring this about. There is just no way in which the federal law can reach directly into that situation or do anything about it.

Admittedly, if there is a fisheries aspect or a navigable waters aspect or a flood control aspect and so on, Ottawa can get into it. I am referring to situations where there are no federal aspects, legislation or federal laws that apply. These are the difficult areas.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I very much appreciate the frank answer given by the minister. It is obvious we are not going to have national standards in Canada. We might be trying to get them, and without blaming any province, it is very conceivable that in the pulp and paper industry some company will tell a province that these standards are too high, and if a company says it will not establish a mill because of these standards, then perhaps there is a requirement for some adjustment. If there is to be any agreement at all, and there is some thought that the requirements are too high, you will get into trouble. In this way, pollution havens will be established.

This is one of the disasters of the Canada Water Act. It allows the Canada water management areas to set their own standards, although the federal government is involved. I hope the minister and his department will be firm when these water quality management areas are being set up and insist that the most modern technological machinery which can be devised is installed in any plant that may be built within a water quality management area, or outside of such an area.

I recall the debate we had on the Canada Water Act. The thinking at that time by the department in respect of water resources was that if a pulp mill were built in northern Canada or some area where there was not a large population, it was not necessary to have such high standards. It was felt that if there were enough water flow to carry the effluent away, why should these mills be forced to put in this modern, technological equipment.

We should not fall into this trap. It should not matter where these industries establish, they should have to meet the standards. Whether a pulp mill exists in Newfoundland or the province of British Columbia, it should have to meet the same requirements. The regulations should not allow these companies to move from one province to another or from one area to another in order to avoid the capital expenditure of $1 million or $2 million in respect of modern pollution machinery.

It is for this reason I am apprehensive about the way we are doing this. We do not have this overriding authority, and I realize the constitutional difficulties. We are not getting a national standard as a result of this bill. I know the minister is very anxious to obtain this and will do everything he can to bring it about.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want the impression left that I can see loopholes as far as the federal government is concerned. There will be no pollution havens as far as our standards will apply. These standards will apply wherever the Canada Water Act is enforced because that Act will not be enforced without federal participation. Any standard which is developed in an area under the Canada Water Act is a standard which is referred back to the minister of environment. If it does not conform with our national standards it will be out. The standard can be higher but it certainly cannot be lower than the standards we set for that industry. Wherever we invest federal money, wherever we have federal power and wherever we have agreement with a province for joint management agencies, the federal standards will obtain. In this regard, we will have national standards.

However, we do have two levels of government in this country and sometimes there may be little pockets where there is no federal jurisdiction or avenue for federal participation. It is conceivable there would be different standards under those circumstances, although I do not expect to see much of that. There will be none of it in so far as my department is concerned. We will have national standards and we will try to keep them everywhere through participation if we do not have direct power.

Mr. Harding: I have another question to clear up this point. Would the minister indicate whether he feels the water quality management areas would be an aspect to which federal jurisdiction will apply?

Mr. Davis: Let me answer that question very simply, Mr. Chairman. The water quality management areas are areas which come under the Canada Water Act, where there is some federal input or federal participation. Where federal authority is involved, we can influence the standards and this is where the standards will be national. Wherever the federal government is in the act it will influence national standards, do not worry about that. The Canada Water Act is a vehicle by which the federal government can influence local situations. It is not the reverse of that situation. This is not a device for permitting pollution havens.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I was pleased to hear the minister refer to those areas under federal jurisdiction. I should like to ask him about the situation at the Moose Jaw armed forces base in my area. I take no exception to the base being there. These people are good citizens. A great deal has been spent on the existing sewage disposal plant at this base, but there is still some discharge of effluent into the Moose Jaw River. This is a river which has a very light flow at the best of times. The sewage is highly treated and it becomes damaging when it breaks down after entering the river. This same thing applies in respect of various areas in Canada where sewage disposal plants have been constructed through CMHC investment. These areas are under federal jurisdiction.

The minister suggested he would use all the persuasion he possibly could. Will there be national standards enforced in respect of the treatment of sewage and disposal by plants such as the one I referred to at the Moose Jaw armed forces base? This is a situation which could be rectified by diverting the sewage into the city system. How is the minister going to bring about national standards when he does not have control of that particular aspect of national defence operations?

Mr. Davis: The hon. member is really saying to the federal government, put your own house in order first. Clearly there is an area where there must be national enforcement even though we have not had standards in the past. We must develop standards where we do not have them, and we must enforce those standards. We must first enforce them through our own departments and crown agencies. I hope this situation will be tidied up quickly.

Mr. Skoberg: Are we going to be able to put some money where our mouth is in order to put our house in order, or will this be a lot of window dressing? Will money be put into the budgets of the various departments in order to bring about real, meaningful pollution control measures?

Mr. Davis: We are now drawing up the lists of federal establishments which, in one degree or another, offend the standards that we are developing. We will present these lits to the relevant departments. If they cannot find the funds within their present budgets, we will have to take this up as a special matter with cabinet, and have it dealt with as a matter of priority to get additional funds.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased to hear the minister state unequivocally that we are going to have national standards all across Canada. But what about an international standard? What is the situation in this regard? I am thinking particularly of the area where I live, surrounded by the Great Lakes.

If I may refer ahead to Clause 5 dealing with the enforcement of any rules or regulations made by the International Joint Commission, I would like the minister to reconcile that with the national standards to which he made reference. What good are all the national standards that this country can establish if we do not have a standard that applies to all the Great Lakes? How are we going to arrive at a situation where this mess is going to be cleaned up?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think we are faced with some of the same problems that we might be faced with if we had different standards from province to province. If we have different standards from nation to nation, we will have difficulties, particularly trans-border difficulties. However, with respect to pollutants that are moving around the earth and are universal in their effect, I think we will quickly see international agreements as to standards. There will be many standards that will be worldwide in their effect. There will be considerable pressures develop, especially from nations which are cleaning up, on nations which are not cleaning up as rapidly as they are doing.

I was recently at a conference in Washington. The concern expressed there was that the nations that were cleaning up rapidly might set up barriers of one kind or another against nations that were not cleaning up their industry. In other words—don't buy dirty products. Already, a tendency is developing for standards to be applied internationally, as well as inter-provincially, or nationally within Canada.

There is some value in being first. There is some value in cleaning up first. In British Columbia, where a lot of pulp mills are new, those on freshwater salmon rivers have been cleaning up. In fact they were forced to clean up, but the clean up technology had more or less to be developed from scratch. Engineering consultant services in this field came into being, and several of these firm are being retained by Sweden and Russia to show them how to clean up their industries. By being first we can get our toe in the door with new technology, which can provide new opportunities for trade as well.

But Finland does not want to clean up its pulp mills unless its competitors do the same. However, with Canada cleaning up its mills, and Sweden doing likewise Finland will be forced to take similar steps. There is a movement in this direction, and there is a great deal of public opinion behind it, not only in Canada but worldwide. So, I think we will see standards develop internationally as well as in Canada. There will be a tendency toward uniformity of standards and to the avoidance of pollution havens.

Mr. Barnett: Would the minister take a minute or two to relate some of his remarks to the whole question of the discharge of effluent from mining operations? I noticed a press release issued by his department today. Unfortunately, I have not been able to do anything more than read the headline on it, and it had some reference to mining operations in New Brunswick.

I am sure the minister is quite aware of the fact that the discharge of mining tailings, particularly from the newer, large open pit type of mines, which are going to be mining low-grade ores in huge tonnages, is a matter of growing concern. He has talked a great deal about standards with regard to effluent from the pulp and paper industry, which certainly I would agree are necessary, but he has not given any indication of where we stand with respect to the development of standards governing mining effluent. How will the department of the environment tie into the activities and decisions of pollution control boards as, for example, the recent decision of the Pollution Control Board of British Columbia with respect to the proposed Utah Construction and Mining operation on northern Vancouver Island?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the mining industry is not as tidy in many ways as are some other industries. The kraft paper making process is a single process. When the answer is found to the cleaning up of its effluents it is an answer—and this includes standards—which can be applied across the country to all new kraft mills, and progressively to older ones as time and money opportunities present themselves to make the changes.

But mines not only produce a variety of different metals, they also produce them in a variety of different combinations and circumstances. As the hon. member knows, we have used the federal Fisheries Act not only to monitor but to suggest clean up processes, and to enforce cleaning up in a number of mining operations that are close to important fisheries. We will have to use a similar approach in respect of many other mining operations across the country. But there is no single set of regulations that will apply to all mines because the metals and the variety of circumstances differ from place to place.

In other words these are particular situations rather than a single industry to which a single cleaning up procedure would readily apply. We intend to tackle the job, but it is a bigger and much more complicated one than the pulp and paper industry.

Mr. Barnett: Since the minister has referred to the Fisheries Act, can he say whether the sections of that act which require the advance submission of plans and proposals with regard to the processing of ore are in operation? In other words, is the situation now that any mining operation which involves fisheries waters has to get the approval of the minister of a company's proposal in advance before a new mine can go into operation. Where do we stand with regard to having existing operations submit plans of their operating procedures, so as to determine whether or not any modification of their tailings disposal programs are required?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, we are taking advantage of this new provision in the Fisheries Act. However, the onus is on the department, on its officials, to support the development in the first instance, to ask for information and plans, and so on, to vet them, and if they are found unsatisfactory then of course we can stop construction in the last analysis. If, however, we do not find circumstances where fish are likely to be killed in any numbers, then we stand back.

In effect, we provide any information that the provincial departments require. But if we do not have evidence of likely damage we do not intervene. We do not give a permit. If evidence of damage does come to our attention, later we will move in but we never give approval. We will watch with interest, and we are prepared to move in at any time.

• (6:00 p.m.)

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): It being six o'clock, shall I rise and report progress?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Before the House adjourns, may I ask the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) if he would confirm that this bill will be the first order of business tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

TRADE

CO-OPERATION IN INDUSTRIAL APPLICATION OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY—TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA AND PROTOCOL AND PRESS RELEASE

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41 (2) and with the agreement of the House, I should like to table, in the two official languages, copies of the agreement between the governments of Canada and the U.S.S.R. on co-operation in the industrial application of science and technology, the protocol of the first meeting of the Canadian-Soviet Mixed Commission, as well as the communique issued at the end of those talks.

Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of leading the Canadian delegation composed of civil servants and businessmen. The purpose of this visit was to sign the agreement referred to, and to hold the first meeting of the Canadian-Soviet Mixed Commission set up under the agreement.

We were greeted warmly, our discussions were constructive, and everything seems to indicate that they will lead to mutual benefits.

The agreement aims at encouraging co-operation between the two countries in the field of industrial science and technology. That co-operation could take the form of exchanges of information, and visits of businessmen and experts. It could also lead to licensing agreements in specific areas of technology.

[English]

It might lead to all kinds of "joint ventures". I suggest it will also lead to increases in two-way trade between the two countries.

Numerous meetings were held in Moscow between members of the Canadian delegation and their opposite numbers in various industrial and research sectors of the Soviet administration. These discussions identified a considerable range of subjects of mutual interest to the two countries. As a result, six working groups have been established in order to further identify prospects for mutually beneficial exchanges. The groups are as follows: architecture, construction and building materials; forest-based industry; non-ferrous metals industry; electric power industry; oil industry, and gas industry. Formation of an additional group to consider airport design, facilities and servicing is under consideration.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Certain features which emerged from the discussion are worthy of special mention.

1. Problems arising from severe climatic and permafrost conditions are of considerable interest to both countries and have been identified for study by the working groups in construction, electric power, the oil industry and the gas industry.

2. The naming of the six working groups I have mentioned does not, of course, exhaust the area of possible co-operation in the industrial application of science and technology. In addition to working groups, other contacts will continue, and further working groups may be established by agreement.

I was impressed by the speed with which our Canadian businessmen and experts were able to get down to specifics with their Soviet counterparts.

The next session of the mixed commission will be held in Ottawa early in 1972.

While I was in Moscow I met separately with Mr. Patolichev, the Soviet Minister of Foreign Trade. We engaged in a useful review of trade developments and of prospects for the further expansion of trade. I was invited also to call on Mr. Polyansky, Deputy Premier of the Soviet Union. Our discussions covered the broad range of relationships between Canada and the Soviet Union. Mr. Polyansky particularly asked me to convey to the Governor General of Canada and to the Prime Minister the greetings of Mr. Podgorny, President of the Soviet Union, Premier Kosygin and First Secretary Brezhnev. He also asked me to tell the Canadian Prime Minister—and I do so now—how much the Soviet government is looking forward to welcoming him to the Soviet Union later this year.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I certainly appreciate the minister's courtesy in making a report to the House on his recent visit to Russia and on the series of meetings which were held during that visit. I think what was done will serve a very useful purpose.

The basic concept behind the whole mission is an arrangement whereby two states which have so much in common in terms of climatic condition and industrial development will be able to exchange ideas and information not only at the governmental level but at the industrial level. We note the minister's observation that the effectiveness of these meetings will be reviewed on an annual basis and that provision has been made for the setting up of further working committees if necessary. As is so often the case, their success will depend to a great extent on the initiative shown by the Canadian business community and Canadian industry, encouraged, of course, by government action.

There is no doubt in our minds that the Russians will take full advantage of this agreement by sending over their experts and students to assimilate, as far as possible, any advantageous information which may have accrued from our development here in Canada. The onus is upon us to see that this interest is reciprocated and that we in turn take full advantage of the opportunities which are granted to us by the Russian government.

The minister told us of the meeting between himself and his Russian counterpart in the field of trade. I am sorry he was not able to go into more detail, because the Soviet Union is and can be an important buyer of Canadian grain, pulp and paper, and other exports; anything which can be done to encourage a still greater readiness on the part of the Soviet Union to purchase the commodities we have to offer will work to the great advantage of this country.

We welcome the minister's statement and the tabling of this agreement. We shall await with a great deal of interest the development of this new arrangement between the two countries.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) for having worked out these mechanisms for closer integration with the Soviet Union in respect of the exchange of information, technical know-how and trade. It is undoubtedly true that as nations learn to trade with each other there is a tendency for some of the tensions that can lead to conflict to be reduced. I think the minister has taken a very excellent first step in this direction.

When Your Honour's predecessor took a delegation of parliamentarians to the Soviet Union in 1965 we found that the Soviet Union was interested in a great many commodities which Canada produces. One of the main obstacles to trade was that they in turn wanted to sell in Canada so that they could pay for their purchases. I think that the machinery the minister has set up should make it possible for the Russians to find markets in Canada for goods that are competitive and this should enable them to purchase more Canadian products. I think the minister has taken an excellent first step and we hope that success will attend his efforts.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and myself are most happy that the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) tabled copies of the agreement between the Canadian government and the government of the USSR on co-operation in the industrial application of science and technology, as well as copies of the protocol of the first meeting of the Canadian-Soviet Mixed Commission and the press release.

As the leader of the New Democratic Party just mentioned, during the visit of a Canadian delegation to Russia in 1965 there were definite talks about establishing more cordial relations between the two countries with the specific objective of co-operating in the industrial application of science and technology.

I believe this is another step towards fostering better understanding between both countries in order to achieve more significant trade relations.

TABLING OF PRESS RELEASES ON FINAL PAYMENT FOR BARLEY AND OATS AND SALE OF FLOUR TO RUSSIA

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table copies in both official languages of a press release on the final payment for barley and oats for the 1969-70 crop year, and also a press release on a flour sale to the U.S.S.R.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATE INCREASES IN ATLANTIC REGION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I refer to the complete disregard of the public interest in the Atlantic region which the railways have shown by taking advantage of the government's failure to work out its promised special transportation policy for the Atlantic region in the past two years, which has meant that in less than a year and a half freight rate increases have averaged 25 to 35 per cent and those on lumber as much as 40 per cent. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

That this House believes that the railway freight rate increases in the Atlantic region since September, 1969, have prejudicially affected the public interest in the Atlantic region and orders the Minister of Transport to appeal these increases, for and upon behalf of the public, under section 16 of the National Transportation Act.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Moncton which requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent the motion cannot be put.

SHELVING OF WABUSH MINES EXPANSION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I also rise to ask leave of the House to make a motion under Standing Order 43. I hope I have more success. I refer to the announcement today by the Wabush Mines consortium that their proposed $100 million expansion program at Wabush, Newfoundland, is to be shelved because of economic factors, including the general level of taxation in the country.

My motion, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) is:

That the Standing Committee on Finance immediately invite representatives of Wabush Mines to appear before them to elaborate on the factors which forced them to make this decision and thus enable the committee to recommend measures which would create an economic climate in which this company and others may expand and develop.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed for the consideration of the House. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 the motion, to be put, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and therefore the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROJECTED TAKEOVER OF HOME OIL BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—ABILITY OF OTHER CANADIAN COMPANIES TO COMPETE IN BIDDING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I am sure the matter is of such concern to him that it will be within his knowledge. Has the government now indicated that it is no longer opposed to the acquisition of the control of Home Oil Company by Ashland Oil Company, Limited, or is it still trying to interest some Canadian company in making a more acceptable proposition?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the situation as far as I know is still the same as that revealed in the House by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, assuming that the government of Canada is interested in putting Canadian companies in a position of equity in bidding for control of other Canadian companies, does the government propose to take any measures to put Canadian companies in such a position of equity? For example, I have in mind the privilege United States companies now have in borrowing money to buy shares in Canadian companies and charging the interest on those loans against net income for income tax purposes, whereas this right is not available to Canadian companies. Will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance tell the House whether the government proposes to take any measures immediately to put Canadian companies in a position in which they can hope to negotiate on a competitive basis with United States companies?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is asking a very complicated question. I am sure he has read the proposals in the white paper which do—

An hon. Member: The white paper; that makes it worse.

Mr. Benson: —alleviate the situation to some degree.

Mr. Bell: The white paper is the cause of the whole trouble.

Mr. Benson: Obviously my friend has not read the white paper. I am also sure, Mr. Speaker, that the Leader of the Opposition is familiar with the submissions which were made to the Commons and Senate committees in respect of this problem and which are contained in their reports.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I judge from what the Minister of Finance says that the government does not propose to take any such action. I have another question for the Minister of Finance. Again with a view to putting Canadian companies in a position where they will be competitive in bidding for control of Canadian companies, does the minister propose to take any action with reference to the inability of Canadian oil companies to charge against income their losses from drilling abroad, as in Alaska, whereas United States companies buying control of such Canadian companies can transfer that operation and get back through tax deductions much of the money expended in acquiring control of the Canadian company? Does the minister propose any action to put Canadian companies in a competitive position in that regard?

Mr. Benson: My hon. friend is getting into some very interesting areas where I would maintain that it is sometimes possible for Canadian companies, through the use of offshore subsidiaries, for example, to take advantage of offshore depletion. This is really what my friend is talking about.

Mr. Stanfield: I know what I am talking about.

Mr. Benson: It also was a question which was contained in the submissions of the oil companies to the parliamentary committees, which I am sure my hon. friend has read and which we are presently considering.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the reports that a solution is being worked out between Home Oil Company and Ashland Oil Incorporated of Kentucky so that there will be Canadian ownership of a new company but effective control by Ashland Oil Incorporated, thereby divesting Canada of the control and transferring it to the United States, would the Prime Minister undertake to see that such a deal is not completed at least until the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has made his promised report to parliament and we have had an opportunity to discuss this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: I did not understand what report the hon. member alleges that the minister said he would make.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Last Tuesday I asked the minister if he would report back to the House before this deal was completed and the minister undertook to keep parliament informed. The main point of the question I am asking the Prime Minister is whether, in view of the seriousness of having the last remaining, large, independent oil producer taken over and effective control placed in the hands of a United States company, the Prime Minister will undertake to assure the House that such a deal will not be completed until parliament has had an opportunity to look further into this question?

Mr. Trudeau: I can only repeat the commitment of the minister, who is following this question very closely and who undertook, as the hon. member just said in his second intervention, to keep the House informed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since the indications are that this deal is likely to be completed this week and, unless the minister makes a statement tomorrow, it may be too late, I want to ask the Prime Minister this question. Having regard to the fact that Home Oil owns about 10 per cent of the shares of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, would the government undertake to ensure that steps will be taken to see that an increasing number of shares of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines are not divorced from Canadian ownership?

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question along the lines of that asked by the Leader of the Opposition in reference to the white paper. Since the United States and, indeed, Great Britain and other countries have a set capital gains tax and ours, as set out in the white paper which the minister talks about reading, will be applied on a progressive rate and could reach as high as 50 per cent, has there been any clarification so as to encourage Canadian capital and Canadian companies to buy Canadian corporations in this field in particular?

[Mr. Benson.]

Mr. Benson: I am sure again that my hon. friend has read the recommendations in the House of Commons and Senate committee reports. With reference to the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition earlier, there is a basic question involved with regard to offshore depletion: should the taxpayers of Canada generally be giving up money to oil companies in order to encourage them to drill for oil in Alaska, Malaysia or somewhere else rather than in Canada?

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he thinks it an appropriate policy for the government of Canada to follow which actually and effectively gives United States corporations a very substantial advantage in buying Canadian corporations?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, that is not Canadian policy; it is American policy. In the United States there is a shortage of oil and they are willing to encourage their companies to go into other countries and drill for oil. The question is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: As a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we are getting rather deeply involved in a debate on this very interesting subject, and perhaps we should try to limit ourselves to seeking information and, on the part of the government, giving information. The Leader of the Opposition has a supplementary question.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the policy of the Canadian government to leave Canadian companies at a disadvantage, admittedly created by United States law, which has the effect of making it easy for United States corporations to acquire control of Canadian corporations as opposed to other Canadian corporations acquiring control of them?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is talking more broadly than the specific question he raised earlier with respect to oil companies. As I indicated, if he would read the submissions to the House of Commons committee and the Senate committee and the recommendations those committees made, he would know what has been said in this regard. The government's policy with respect to the future will be indicated when the legislation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I suggested, perhaps we have embarked on a debate. Do I understand the hon. member for Calgary North has a supplementary question?

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me. Mine is not a supplementary question. The Minister of Finance thought about an answer to give the Leader of the Opposition and forgot about the question I put to him. I know he did not do this deliberately, and I know he is anxious to answer it because of discrimination in the recommendations in the white paper with regard to a capital gains tax.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member read the House of Commons committee report he would have seen that the result would be a lower rate of tax in Canada on capital gains than in the United States, but I cannot say at this point whether we are willing to accept the recommendations in that report until we introduce the legislation.

Mr. Stanfield: Of course not.

Mr. Benson: Now, if the Leader of the Opposition wants to say something—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question either to the Minister of Finance or to the right hon. Prime Minister. Since Home Oil Company of Calgary last year purchased some $52 million worth of equity stock in Richfield Oil in order to get into development in the far north, and the sale of Home Oil will now mean that $52 million of Canadian investment will fall under the control of an American company, does the government intend to do anything to prevent this steady erosion of Canadian savings into the control of foreign companies?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, just speaking off the top of my head, I think the investment in Richfield was for exploration in Alaska and not in northern Canada.

Mr. Bell: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see hon. members wish to ask supplementaries but I think we should go on to another subject and in a short while return to hon. members who have supplementaries. I notice in particular the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster and I will return to him in a moment.

[Later:]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance, and I do not care whether the answer if is off the top of his head. Will he explain how he expects Canadian companies, Home Oil or any others, to do business in view of all the indefiniteness that has been created by recent government actions on this matter, including the white paper itself?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I feel that the supplementary asked by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster is an indication that we have embarked on a debate. Perhaps there will be another opportunity to pursue the matter further.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CONVERSION OF PLAN INTO SOCIAL SECURITY MEASURE

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Labour.

Would he tell the House whether he intends to revise the unemployment insurance policy in order to convert this plan into a social security measure financed by the federal treasury?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

PROPOSALS RESPECTING AMENDMENT AND REPATRIATION OF CONSTITUTION

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

In view of the important statement the minister made yesterday concerning revision of the Constitution on the occasion of the coming federal-provincial conference, may I ask him whether the government intends to put before the provinces amendments other than those included in the federal government publication on the Canadian Constitution?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, all matters being the object of preliminary discussions with the provincial premiers have already been announced by the federal government.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

Can he tell us if the federal government will put forward a new formula for the repatriation of the Canadian Constitution or if it will propose other amendments?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, both subjects are among those that will be discussed.

POLLUTION

MONTREAL AIR—ASSISTANCE TO MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES —EXTENSION OF MASS TRANSIT SERVICES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns the very serious problem of air pollution in the city of Montreal, which has gone well past the danger level of .1 up to .6 on the pollution index. Can the minister indicate whether any special plans for assistance are being formulated by his department, or whether in fact he has received any request for assistance from the municipal authorities in Montreal?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): To answer the latter part of the question, no. However, I think this particular area of air pollution in terms of the environment is more appropriately the responsibility of my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, and I will refer that question to him and have him answer it in the House.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the urgency of the problem and the well known difficulties that the government encounters with the constitution, can the Prime Minister indicate whether any plans or efforts will be put forward with respect to special services by Canadian National Railways, thus alleviating one of the major sources of pollution in Montreal, automobiles, because I understand that Decarie Boulevard is almost completely invisible because of air pollution? Does he know of any immediate assistance on a mass transit basis?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not, Mr. Speaker, but I imagine if there is any such plan it would come to the attention of the Minister of Transport rather than myself.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUMOURED INVASION OF LAOS BY SOUTH VIETNAMESE TROOPS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday in answer to a question he said that he suffered from the general blackout in regard to the alleged invasion of Laos. Is he now out of that blackout, and can he say whether that invasion has taken place?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. Our officers have been in touch with the United States government and no information has been given to us.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Has the minister been able to obtain any information in this regard from our new mission in Peking?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. They seem to have kept the Chinese in doubt too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE INTRODUCTION OF TAX REFORM LEGISLATION IN VIEW OF SUSPENSION OF EXPANSION PROGRAM BY WABUSH MINES

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the announcement today that Wabush Mines is suspending plans for a proposed $100 million expansion of iron ore operations in Wabush, Newfoundland, and also in the province of Quebec because of economic factors, including the level of taxation, would the minister introduce his tax reform legislation immediately, instead of in April, to remove the uncertainties in the economy that cause industry to postpone such vital developments?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in this regard and without accepting the premise that tax was the basis for this action which I do not think was the case, I would be pleased to move forward the tax reform legislation. The opposition has indicated from the beginning that there should be widespread discussion of these proposals in Canada, and I would hope that when we can introduce the legislation the opposition will help us to move forward with it very quickly.

Mr. Peddle: Is the government currently holding any negotiations with the owners of Wabush Mines with a view to a possible reversal of this serious decision?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker, not at this point.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has had any discussions with or representations from the company, the consortium referred to by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, since the fall of 1970, and has he been able to offer any encouragement which would facilitate the beginning of this project?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have had any direct representations from this particular company. That was not the case with respect to Quebec Cartier Mines and the Iron Ore Company of Canada, representatives of which came to see me about tax problems. After an announcement as to some changes we were thinking of with respect to taxation, they are going forward with expenditures of more than half a billion dollars on their particular projects.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he is prepared to make recommendations or to meet or negotiate with the companies in question in order to try to offer them some certainty with respect to their taxation position, as referred to by my colleague, and also the general economic climate, and perhaps give some indication to the companies of the legislative proposals to be brought forward so that they can move ahead in 1971 with this $100 million project?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would be more than pleased to meet with representatives of the company at any time they want to see me, in the same way as I have indicated my willingness to meet with other Canadians and discuss changes in taxation in Canada. I would be pleased to see them at any time. But I could not indicate to them what the ultimate tax reform legislation might be without, of course, indicating it to the House of Commons first.

RENFREW AIRCRAFT AND ENGINEERING LIMITED—INCENTIVES TO ASSIST COMPANY AND AVOID LAY-OFFS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a related question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has he been able to be of assistance in offering incentives to Renfrew Aircraft and Engineering Limited in view of the lay-offs and the very serious unemployment existing there and elsewhere in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any formal request from the company asking for assistance; but, in any event, I shall look into the matter.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister to confer with the Member of Parliament for that area?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That has already been done, Mr. Speaker.

POLLUTION

THREAT POSED BY TANKER TRANSPORT OF OIL FROM VALDEZ, ALASKA, TO CHERRY POINT, WASHINGTON

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The other day, in answering questions, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry indicated that he believed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was aware of and would be concerned about the massive pollution threat to British Columbia involved in the plan of American oil companies to ship oil from Alaska by tanker down the British Columbia coast. This is a matter of grave concern to many British Columbians. Would the minister consider making an early statement indicating what the position of the government is on this matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would consider doing this. I can assure the hon. member that the statement made by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry that we are very concerned is correct. We are following developments very closely. There are a number of lines upon which we can approach the subject. I think he is aware, however, that the ships would pass either through international waters or through American waters and never through Canadian waters. Therefore it would be a question of seeking international action to deal with the threat of pollution.

he give favourable consideration now to further assistance, through tax concessions or tax incentives, to exploration companies interested in exploring for more oil in view of the uncertainty of supplies from the Middle East?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course any suggestion made by my hon. friend will receive consideration by me. I would, however, indicate that any announcement with respect to tax policy would have to be made in the ordinary way in the House of Commons in the budget.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Has the Montreal based film company, Cinepix, been taken over by Kalvex Incorporated of New York? If that is the case, what action has been taken by the government to protect the investment of the Canadian Film Development Corporation in this former Canadian company?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the transaction mentioned by the hon. member has effectively taken place. I have no special information about it, but the sale was announced in the newspapers.

As to the measures taken by the Canadian Film Development Corporation to protect its investment in certain films produced by Cinepix, I will have to inquire from the Canadian Film Development Corporation before giving a reply to the hon. member.

AGRICULTURE

CORN BLIGHT—PROVISION OF INFORMATION BEFORE PLANTING SEASON

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. As a result of the devastation caused by the corn blight in Canada last year and the uncertainties as to the extent of the danger this year and as to the availability of resistant seed, does the minister propose to make known, by way of a statement, press release or bulletin, all pertinent information on this matter before the planting season?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are watching this very carefully and also looking carefully at the forecast that the United States is making respecting the prospective plantings of corn in the United States during the coming season. We believe, from what we know, that there will be not sufficient resistant seed available for the whole of North America. Nevertheless, we certainly think there might be something that would be useful to the farmers which could be announced before the planting season and, if so, we shall do so.

HOUSING

LEGISLATIVE CHANGES TO PERMIT PUBLIC HOUSING TENANTS TO SHARE SAME BUILDINGS WITH OTHERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. Is he giving consideration to changes in the housing legislation which would permit public housing tenants to share the same building facilities with other tenants who are not subsidized?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, that accommodation would be possible in certain ways under the provisions of the Act as it stands now. We have been trying to exploit this matter by asking the provinces to be the prime tenant in buildings to accommodate such people which are not completely public housing units. There are other ways of doing it. This involves a rather detailed approach and I could discuss it with my hon. friend outside the House if he so wishes.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister, in view of what he said, whether Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is preparing proposals which could be discussed with the provinces in order to put into effect this kind of policy?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, discussions of that kind are going on all the time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DELIVERY OF CF-5 PLANES—STORAGE AT NORTH BAY

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. It has to do with the tactical ground support air fighter known as the CF-5. Have the balance of the 115 CF-5's been delivered by Canadair? Second, in view of the shortage of storage space at Trenton, is the minister planning or arranging to dismantle these aircraft and store them at North Bay?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my most recent information is that the assembly line will be delivering both NF-5's for the Netherlands government and CF-5's for another several months. I believe I am correct in saying that some of the aircraft are in temporary storage now at North Bay. I can inform the hon. member that we will be submitting the CF-5 to trials in Norway for the balance of this month. I would hope to be able to make a statement about the middle of March, probably to the committee on defence, with respect to the use of the aircraft.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might respond to a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member for Wellington has a supplementary.

Mr. Hales: I intended to ask a supplementary but the minister has answered it.

OPPORTUNITY FOR PROMOTION OF ENGLISH-SPEAKING MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES WHO FAIL TO PASS SECOND LANGUAGE TEST

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East raised questions with regard to a circular distributed among units of the armoured corps units of the land forces on the question of bilingualism. I found that the circular related to opportunities for promotion with the Douzième Régiment Blindé Canadien which is stationed at Valcartier. As the hon. member knows, there are four regiments in the armoured corps. In three of them the primary language of expression is English. In the fourth the primary language of expression is French. In the English-speaking units there is a surplus at present of senior NCO's.

Mr. Forrestall: How come?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I suppose they have more sergeants than time at present. In any event, there is a surplus owing to the reduction of the number of units from the previous force structure. There is a shortage of senior NCO's in the French-speaking regiment. Efforts have been made, of which the circular was one, by which NCO's would be given the opportunity to gain promotions by acquiring a facility in the French language and joining that regiment. I confirm to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek that, while that offers opportunities within the Douzième Régiment Blindé Canadien, it does not affect regular promotion among English-speaking units, which will, as always, be on the basis of merit.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I wish to correct a misunderstanding with regard to the minister's statement. I did not mention a circular or directive in my question. I asked two straight-forward questions. Will promotions for English-speaking Canadians be based on an aptitute test and their willingness to serve in a Francophone environment? The minister has not answered those questions in his statement today. I wish to correct some of his statements. I know for a fact that certain officers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. This is now a debate between the hon. member and the minister.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I welcome the indication from the minister, but in the directive that went out was there an indication that promotions within the armoured regiments of the Canadian Armed Forces would be restricted for the next two years to those who have a facility in the French language and desire to move into the Francophone unit?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am not sure if that was in the directive. It was certainly in the copy of the document which the hon. member gave me. It would only be on the basis that, where there is a shortage of sergeants in the Francophone unit, obviously promotion will be quicker than in the other units. I confirm that promotion within the English-speaking force will be on the same basis as always, but of course the same opportunities will not exist there because there are more men than positions at the present time.

Mr. Forrestall: Just so that I will understand the situation correctly, is the minister in effect stating that there has been no basic change in promotional procedures within the Canadian Armed Forces, or is there some slight exception with respect to the armoured regiments because of an overbalance of both commissioned and non-commissioned officers?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would say there would be no difference at all in procedures. At the present time there is a difference in opportunities. Perhaps at a future time it may be balanced in the other direction.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I did not get the hon. member's question. Would he be kind enough to repeat it?

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister prepared to make an early statement as to the government's plans with regard to the implementation of the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women?

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL SECURITY

RETURN OF FINGERPRINTS OF PERSONS RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Minister of Justice further to a question asked yesterday. I wish to clarify the record or at least my own mind. Have the fingerprints been returned to all the 435 people who were detained under the War Measures Act and subsequently released without charge, regardless of whether they were apprehended by the RCMP or by other police forces? Have all fingerprints been returned to these 435 people?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when I used the word "returned" it might have left a certain ambiguity. What happens is that fingerprints taken by any police force in Canada are sent to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police by way of a central depository. When I was Acting Solicitor General and Minister of Justice at the same time I advised the RCMP that they had to return these fingerprints. These fingerprints were returned to the police forces that originally took them. The prints are presumably in the hands of the police forces which originally apprehended or arrested these people, unless they have since been returned.

Mr. Fairweather: Yesterday the minister clearly indicated that the practice of holding fingerprints was clearly illegal. What steps is the minister taking to ensure that police forces illegally holding these fingerprints will return them to the people who have been released without charge?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The steps that can be taken by the federal jurisdiction have been taken, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fairweather: Have all the fingerprints been returned by the provincial and municipal police to those people who were released without charge? Are there any fingerprints of those 435 people still in the hands of the police? If the minister does not have this information, will he please obtain it?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will certainly get it, Mr. Speaker.

EXCLUSION OF CATTLE AND CALVES FROM FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING BILL

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of sharp conflicting interests between the cattlemen's associations and other producer groups, especially in eastern Canada, is it still the minister's intention to have cattle and calves excluded from Bill C-176 as he stated earlier?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it will be up to the Standing Committee on Agriculture as to how they wish to amend the bill. What I said was that there was general agreement, as found in the communiqué issued following the first ministers' meeting in September, that this would be an amendment upon which they would look favourably.

POLLUTION

AIR—SARNIA-WINDSOR AREA—DISCUSSION OF INTERNATIONAL CONTROL STANDARDS WITH UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the report released yesterday by the International Joint Commission that air pollution along the St. Clair and Detroit rivers in the Sarnia-Windsor area has reached the point where it is detrimental to health, safety and property, and that much of this air pollution comes from the United States, have any moves been made to discuss international air pollution standards with the United States government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harding: Will this problem of air pollution be transferred to the new department of the environment in the same way that water pollution problems are under the International Joint Commission?

Mr. Sharp: I expect so, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Fisheries, who is the minister-designate of the new department, has already put in hand steps for consultation between the United States and Canadian governments even before this report was made available.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the recent report of the International Joint Commission dealing with air pollution, particularly the section which states that in the Sarnia-Port Huron area Canadian and American culpability is 50-50, will the minister in conjunction with the new minister of the environment consider a pilot project of government aid and direction in this area in conjunction with the American authorities to clean up the air and set a pattern for all levels of government to follow?

Mr. Sharp: We will be very happy to consider this suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

STATUS OF MORTGAGE ON ROCHDALE COLLEGE, TORONTO

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. On January 21 I asked the minister if he had any statement to make with regard to Rochdale College in Toronto. He replied: "I shall be making a more elaborate statement on the situation in the not too distant future." I would ask the minister if he is in a position to make that statement today? If not, when can the House expect it?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I cannot make it now. I will try to make it as soon as possible, but there are several negotiations under way at the moment with no final decision capable of being taken under the circumstances.

[Mr. Olson.]

WELFARE

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I wish to direct this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has to do with the federal-provincial conference which is to take place next week and the indication that some premiers would like to discuss unemployment on a priority basis. Can the minister advise whether the federal government intends to offer to the provinces additional assistance to enable them to meet the high welfare costs this winter which are a direct result of unemployment?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not believe so. As I indicated in reply to a similar question on Monday, the government has this matter under consideration. If and when a decision is reached, an announcement will be made in the House.

GRAIN

SALE OF FLOUR TO RUSSIA, COMPLETION OF AGREEMENT, HANDLING OF ARRANGEMENTS BY MILLING COMPANIES—INCOME PROPOSALS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In light of your observation about supplementaries, Mr. Speaker, I shall try to make it a triple-barrelled question. Having regard to the statement of the minister concerning the sale of flour to the U.S.S.R. for delivery to Cuba, can the minister advise whether this completes the master agreement as far as flour sales are concerned or, if not, what portion of the agreement has now been completed and whether or not any of the private milling companies are handling these arrangements? Can he assure the House that the industry is in a position to handle this transaction without difficulties such as it has had in previous years? The third part of my three-barrelled question is this: is the minister now able to reply to the question I asked yesterday; in other words, can he assure the House that any announcement he may make respecting his proposals for grain income will be made here and not outside the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister might be allowed to answer this triple-barrelled question quickly, but the question period expired a few minutes ago. I believe the Leader of the Opposition also has a question to ask and perhaps with the consent of the House he might be allowed to do so.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The flour sold to Russia was basically for shipment to Cuba during 1971. It amounted to 248,000 long tons, roughly the equivalent of 12,300,000 bushels of wheat. This would leave an approximate amount outstanding of 41,000,000 bushels on the long-term contract. The sale was negotiated by the Canadian National Millers Association on behalf of its members and I have no doubt of their ability to fulfil the contract. As to the third part of the question, it would ordinarily be my intention to make any important announcements concerning government policy in the House.

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Since the Minister of Justice has announced that the subject of unemployment will be on the agenda of the conference with the provinces, can we be told when the Prime Minister will be in a position to indicate to the House the agenda which the conference will be considering?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We shall follow the usual procedure. It has been usual to make the agenda public after its adoption by the conference on the Monday morning, and I will again propose this course to the provinces. I do not see why they would not agree, as they have in the past.

Mr. Stanfield: I hope the Prime Minister will not reprimand the Minister of Justice for releasing a portion of the agenda.

POLLUTION

MONTREAL AIR—ASSISTANCE TO MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, earlier this afternoon I attempted to ask a serious question with regard to pollution in Montreal. Unfortunately, the minister responsible was not present in the House at the time. He will not be here tomorrow, and since there is an immediate problem I wonder if Your Honour would allow the hon. gentleman to tell us what steps his department is taking to deal with the emergency which has arisen with respect to air pollution?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The immediate situation is being dealt with by the local authorities but we have been in close consultation with the Quebec government on the subject of the clean air bill to be brought before the House shortly, a measure which will enable us to co-operate more effectively with the province in dealing with problems of this kind.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacLean: Perhaps I might be permitted to ask the President of the Privy Council whether he can announce the business the government proposes to bring forward tomorrow and next week.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. MacEachen: Today, we shall continue to discuss the reorganization bill. Tomorrow, we propose to call the legislation dealing with the setting up of the Canada Development Corporation, or, alternatively, the bail reform measure. I understand there will be some consultation later today to determine which of those two subjects would be more appropriate.

On Monday I should like to call the CNR financing bill, to be followed by the government organization bill. After that, until Wednesday, the House will deal with any bills which now remain on the order paper at the report stage. On Wednesday and Thursday I should like to resume, and end, the budget debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might say just a word. It was at my request, during the negotiations which have been going on in the past hour, that the business for tomorrow was not made firm. We understood that the Official Opposition did not wish to go ahead with the debate on the Canada Development Corporation. We had some difficulty in getting ready for the bail bill. Now, I am able to say that if there is general agreement to proceed with the bail bill, this would be agreeable to us and we might proceed on that basis. It might be useful for everyone to know for sure what will be the business for tomorrow.

Mr. MacEachen: That is satisfactory. If, perchance, we complete the second reading of the bill respecting bail, we might take some of the smaller items which have already reached the report stage.

Mr. MacLean: It might be preferable to proceed as suggested and take the bail bill tomorrow followed, if there is time, by some small items.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 3, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. Before any hon. member rises, I should indicate that yesterday evening we had almost concluded discussion of clause three and that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had the floor.

On clause 3—Department Established

Mr. Barnett: I have now had an opportunity of examining the observations made by the minister yesterday in answer to some questions I raised about quality standards as affected by mine tailings. I cannot but express surprise at the indication that the proposed ministry will play a very passive role when it comes to the application of the new provisions in the Fisheries Act, for whose administration the new department will be responsible.

As I understand it, the application of the relevant provision of the Act as amended last session in connection with the requirement for the submission of plans by industry, is to be left in abeyance. The minister suggested that his officers might keep the situation under surveillance and take action of some kind if the situation seemed to require it. However, apparently no provision is being made for any official approval or permission being given before a plant proceeds with its plans. He said no permit would be issued.

I think the minister fully appreciates the importance, indeed the urgency, of this question in relation to some of the mining developments that are taking place near the coastal waters of British Columbia. Certainly, he is aware of the developments at the north end of Vancouver Island on Quatsino Sound. I am sure also he knows about the application by Texada Mines, which I understand is before the pollution control board of British Columbia, with regard to the disposing of its effluent into the Strait of Georgia. This is an area very dear to the minister's heart, and he has been talking about having it made into a national park.

I wonder whether the minister could enlighten us a little further on the statements he made yesterday with regard to how he envisages the new department of the environment will control mine effluents in water areas. This question is important not only to the commercial fishery but also in respect of many other amenities such as recreation and the enjoyment of areas such as the Strait of Georgia.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has been asking whether we are taking advantage of the new provisions of the Fisheries Act to insist on information from mining companies relative to their plans for expansion. I hasten to assure him that this is the case. We are reviewing a dozen projects at the moment. In instances where we find there is not likely to be any damage to the fishery or to any other aspect of the marine ecology, we still reserve the right to prosecute if later the development is found to be of a different character than we had been led to expect or our own analysis turns out to be wrong.

I must hasten to add that we do not give permits to carry out a given operation, but we do insist on obtaining the plans and vetting the intentions of the company in question. We can ask for modifications, as was the case with the Utah Mining company in Quatsino Sound, and will always monitor the industry's operations to ensure that the aquatic environment is protected. This practice is being followed in a number of places across the country. For instance, in the Miramichi we are working with the mining industry, vetting its plans for expansion and giving advice with a view to reducing hazards to fish life in that basin.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, there is one further aspect I should like the minister to clarify. I am not in any way seeking to encourage any areas of difference between federal and provincial administrations; nevertheless, I think we are all aware that from time to time, as a result of different approaches and the existence of different legislation, federal and provincial, there may well be at times some difference of view.

One of the things that has been puzzling me is this. Let me take as an example the Quatsino Sound operation of Utah Construction and Mining, to which both the minister and I have made reference. I understand a permit has been issued in respect of that operation by the pollution control board of British Columbia. I also understand that, generally speaking, the plans which are being developed have, if not the blessing, at least the acquiescence of the Department of Fisheries. This development is taking place in what is undoubtedly an important fisheries area. In view of this, if a permit were issued by the provincial pollution control board under terms and conditions that required action to be taken to deal with the discharge of tailings but which, in the opinion of the minister and the department, were entirely inadequate as far as the protection of the environment and aquatic life were concerned, what kind of machinery would the minister envisage to resolve an impasse of this kind? The minister has mentioned that no permit would be issued; that the blessing of the department with regard to the specifications for carrying out the operation has priority over the decision of any provincial board in such an instance as this. Could the minister enlighten the committee in this regard?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is thinking of a specific instance on Canada's west coast—

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, may I intervene to say that I cited that only as an example. I am not suggesting there is any dispute in this regard; I am merely putting a hypothetical proposition to the minister.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, might I use the example that the hon. member brought forward to illustrate my point. My point is that there are federal provisions dealing with pollution in the west coast instance referred to, the Fisheries Act. There is also provincial legislation, the legislation setting up the provincial pollution control board. It is necessary for the company in question to comply with both pieces of legislation. While it is possible that this development would receive the full approval of the provincial authorities, it could still run head-on into federal legislation, the regulations, for example, made pursuant to the federal Fisheries Act.

In the instance of the Utah Mining the company would have to do two things. It would have to satisfy the federal government, particularly with respect to the provisions of the federal Fisheries Act; it would also have to satisfy the rules laid down by the B.C. pollution control board. We have a good working arrangement with the B.C. pollution control board whereby, before it grants a permit, it has the application vetted by the federal department of fisheries regional office. We have had no instance within the last year or two of any provincial permit being granted without the scrutiny of and clearance by the federal fisheries people. We are working closely together. But in an imaginary case where the industry offends the Fisheries Act but somehow manages to gain the approval of the provincial control board, it, the industry, is still in trouble with the federal authorities.

Mr. Barnett: Coming back, Mr. Chairman, to the minister's statement that no permit is issued, what evidence does an operating mining company have that in fact it has the approval of the federal authorities? Take the case of a mine development where, as matters stand, part of the ability of the firm to secure the necessary development financing hinges on federal approval of its operating plans. If there is no system of permits, what evidence does the mining company have that, in fact, the plans that it is proposing have the approval of the federal control authorities?

This is one of the administrative questions that arise in the development of this kind of legislation which I think is of interest and concern. I can see some important question being raised with regard to the ability to develop a resource as well as the ability of a company to give evidence to concerned citizens in the area that its plans have in fact been examined and approved.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the company would be unwise to proceed with its plans and to invest a substantial amount of money in a development which was likely to have an unfavourable impact on the local ecology without first having discussed it with our federal people in that area and having been satisfied that we saw no great difficulty in their planned proceedings. In situations where the provincial board also requires the approval of the federal authorities the industry should make doubly sure that our federal people are happy with the development and can see no major problem arising from it.

Of course, the federal department can step in and demand plans in cases where the company has not been cooperative in making its plans available, or neglects to make modifications which our engineers say should be made to protect the local environment. This is a matter involving disclosure, close liaison and frank advice on the part of the department. As I said, we do not approve of the project. The provincial authorities may give approval, but we reserve the right to move in at any time and to require further modification if there is any evidence of danger to the environment.

Mr. Harding: I have several questions I should like to put to the minister. I asked a question this afternoon of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the moving of international air pollution problems into the jurisdiction of this new department. Does the minister feel that the existing legislation gives him the power to deal with these problems? As I see it, he only has authority to deal with international problems in respect of water. If the powers are not there, will he bring in an amendment to make certain that solutions in respect of international air pollution will fall within the purview of the new department?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is one of the essential elements of the new clean air act.

Mr. Harding: Does the minister then feel he needs nothing in this measure to indicate that his department is the one which will deal with these problems? I think the authority should be included or at least clarified. Will it be included in a schedule to the new clean air act? If it is not, it should be in order that international air pollution problems may be handled by the minister's department.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the clean air act is not a fact. It has not yet been introduced in this House. It is the government's intention, however, to include a new clean air act as one of the responsibilities of our new environment department.

Mr. Harding: That is very welcome news. Is it the intention of the new department to set up a council of the environment based on similar lines to the Economic Council of Canada?

Mr. Davis: We are giving this matter very serious consideration. I doubt, however, whether legislation to set up a council can be brought in during the current session. It will have to be considered during the next session of Parliament because of the heavy agenda we already have ahead of us in this House.

Mr. Harding: Who or what section of the new department will be in a position to assess the ecological costs of different development programs throughout the country? I am thinking in terms of a hydro plant being built on some river. Are there powers under the minister's department to carry out an ecological survey in respect of the cost of these projects?

Mr. Davis: I think the hon. member was one of those who said the fisheries service should be separated from the environment department. One of the capabilities which will be brought to bear on any hydro development in a fisheries river will be the staff of the federal fisheries service. We will also have the support of the biologists in our wildlife service and the engineers from the water sector of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. We will have the technical competence to assess the ecological consequences of hydro dams and other types of industrial development as well. One of the reasons for including the fisheries service in this new department is to include a biological competence to deal with the ecological aspects of industrial development.

Mr. Harding: Might I just follow up with another question or two on this matter? The fisheries department has always been interested in navigable waters, and in a position to take a stand on anything that would have an effect on the fisheries in navigable streams. The point I am getting at is that Crown corporations which wish to build a hydro dam are not covered by the Navigable Waters Protection Act. They are answerable to no one, either provincially or federally. We are bringing the water resources branch into the new department but why are we not putting the Navigable Waters Protection Act under the jurisdiction of this new department? This is one of the things excluded in schedule A.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the simple answer is that the Navigable Waters Protection Act has to do with navigation and not ecology. If a hydro development were likely to interfere with navigation or the use of a river for that purpose, such an assessment would, I think, be made by the Department of Transport rather than a department dealing with the environment.

This is not to say we will not be concerned about the impact of that development on living resources, or about an industry which exploits the living resources of a stretch of river including fisheries, wildlife and, to the extent we have federal authority, forests and so on. We will be concerned about hydro development or any other project on a river, and we will have some views about navigation as well. Nevertheless, the administration of the Navigable Waters Protection Act should be a matter for the Department of Transport, not the department of environment. I think the hon. member sees this as a way of stopping pollution rather than protecting navigable waters for navigation. This Act is to protect Canadian waters from the point of view of navigation alone.

Mr. Harding: I think this is one of the key points as far as studies of the ecology are concerned. I have in mind what might be done behind a hydro dam, for example. The Navigable Waters Protection Act prevents one from putting many types of pollution into a navigable water. However, the point I am coming to is that the minister's department will be helpless to do anything about the ecological damage which occurs behind a dam. The department will be able to make ecological surveys, but will not be able to do anything about the damage unless we make the Navigable Waters Protection Act applicable to Crown corporations in the name of the provinces or the federal government. I urge the minister to give serious consideration to this aspect.

As the minister knows, we have had several disasters in British Columbia. One occurred behind the Duncan Dam, where tens of thousands of acres of valuable timberland were flooded. This pollution problem will exist as long as we allow this type of thing. The Mica Dam on the Columbia River will create a lake 125 miles long, and none of the timber is to be cut before the area is flooded. Since this is a navigable stream, it is within federal jurisdiction. There must be some provision in the legislation which will force hydro authorities to clean up. We will not allow that type of pollution to exist. This is the point I am trying to make. We cannot allow this legislation to pass without some provision for checking on the type of development that has taken place all over Canada, not only in B.C. These are the things about which we are apprehensive. I urge the minister to attempt to insert into these acts—and the Navigable Waters Protection Act is one—a provision which will make Crown corporations subject to those acts.

I think the minister's department should call for ecological surveys to be carried out. If the cost of the damage behind the dam is so extensive that the project is not a paying proposition, we should turn thumbs down on the project and obtain power by other means. This is of vital interest to all sections of Canada. New dams will be built; some of them will start this year. We cannot let this situation go on any longer. Someone has to start surveying, and I suggest this new department should tackle it.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has raised an interesting point, but let me draw his attention to the Fisheries Act which enables us to do the very things that he has been mentioning. The Fisheries Act was amended in several ways last spring, that is in the spring of 1970. One way in which it was amended was to include Crown corporations and agencies, provincial and federal. We have used it against Manitoba hydro, requiring it to release water into the lower reaches of the Nelson River recently. We required Manitoba hydro to look after the ecology downstream of the big new dam at Kelsey on the Nelson River. We have done in Manitoba just the sort of thing that the hon. member is suggesting we do under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Under the Fisheries Act we can deal with pollution and directly. We do not have to use the pretext of navigation. We have the powers which he is asking us to use.

Mr. McCleave: I should like to draw to the minister's attention a recommendation by members in the Official Opposition in connection with the environmental council of Canada to which reference was made a few minutes ago by my hon. friend to the left. Earlier in the debate I referred to the report of the pollution probe conducted, under the auspices of the Leader of the Opposition, a document signed by one John A. Fraser and our colleague, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka who has been absent from this debate because of illness. The House will be pleased to know that he is recovering and we hope will be back with us very shortly. When a person of his calibre is missing there is a substantial loss to a debate like this.

I should like to quote, without very much embellishment because I am not as knowledgeable in this field as is the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, one of the recommendations of the pollution probe carried out under the auspices of the Leader of the Opposition.

> Establish an environmental council of Canada, composed of a majority of members outside the government service, drawn from such organizations as citizens' anti-pollution groups, universities, industry, labour and conservation bodies, and with government representation. The council would be provided with the necessary funds and facilities to advise the government and Parliament on environmental matters generally.

I have quoted word for word what is contained in that document. Since the minister is faced with the challenge of a new department and with some rather substantial problems indeed, some of which have been raised by me and some by other members during the debate, members on this side of the House as well as those on the minister's side would probably find it acceptable if he were to decide to take the plunge and establish an environmental council of Canada.

The only other point I would make to the minister, if he were to consider such a worthwhile step, is that he and the government pay more attention to such an environmental council's recommendations than the present government is now paying to the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada.

Mr. McCutcheon: Recently, a report of the International Joint Commission painted a pretty dim picture of the situation so far as the Great Lakes are concerned. I was pleased to learn yesterday during the debate that the minister is establishing national standards which will apply across Canada. I understood from his answer that the standards set by his department would be the yardstick so far as pollution levels across the country were concerned. I asked him yesterday about the Great Lakes and quoted from clause 5 which provides that his department is to enforce rules and regulations made by the International Joint Commission. The question is this: does the International Joint Commission have the necessary expertise in this particular field to make these recommendations? If they do, will we not be duplicating this service through the minister's new department? I am concerned that one day the International Joint Commission might make a regulation with which the minister had nothing to do other than to enforce it.

I respect the dedication of the minister, but I am afraid that he may wind up one day in a straitjacket, being told what to do by IJC and their regulations may not meet his standards. Is there not a chance that we will be duplicating services? Every time you do that you are just postponing the day when this problem will be solved. The more bodies we have, the more chance there is for a foul up.

Mr. Davis: The answer is that there is no overlapping and no duplication. The International Joint Commission is a very compact commission. In a sense, it is like a court, a six man body made up of three Canadians and three Americans. I believe the staff of the Canadian section includes one engineer only, one lawyer. It looks to government personnel in each country to find answers, factual answers and make technical judgments. These studies are provided by agencies of the Canadian government, of the U.S. government and, on occasion, provincial and state water resources commissions.

Our technical people in the new department of environment, with the people from the Ontario Water Resources Commission in the case of the lower lakes, will be doing all of the basic technical analyses. We will be making many of the technical recommendations that flow up to the International Joint Commission. Those six gentlemen, in their wisdom, will make certain general recommendations to the heads of government in the two nations. So, coming back to the same technical people, these recommendations will, in large measure, stem from their technical expertise in the first place, and will be coming back to them to enforce. Of course, the IJC, in its wisdom will make the recommendations, delete some, and perhaps modify others, but the technical overlap is at an absolute minimum. There is no duplication and the technical recommendations made by our staff to this IJC may be recommendations which they, months later, will be required to enforce.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the minister's statement that under the new regulations the federal government insisted that Manitoba Hydro take steps to assure the water flow in the Nelson River, behind the dams that are being built, would be sufficient to protect the ecology in that area. Could he tell us what he and his department are doing about the pollution of very important waters in the province of Manitoba by industries outside the province?

Lake Winnipeg is one of the largest lakes in the country, and probably for a hundred years very important commercial fishing operations have been conducted there. Now, the lake has been closed to commercial fishing because it has been polluted. The Manitoba government is in the process of taking legal action against a paper company in Dryden, Ontario, and against a chemical company in Saskatoon which has been discharging poisonous material into the Saskatchewan River which flows into Lake Winnipeg. Can the minister tell us whether, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act or the Fisheries Act, he has the authority to take steps to prevent companies from continuing to discharge into waters which eventually flow into another province, the kind of substances which would destroy both commercial and sport fishing operations?

Mr. Davis: The answer to the hon. member is that we do have the powers. We have powers today which are sufficient and have been sufficient in the case of mercury pollution affecting the Lake Winnipeg fishery. The two plants in question, one in Saskatchewan and one in western Ontario, have ceased to discharge mercury in any quantity into their neighbouring waters. They have reduced their pollution by upwards of 95 per cent in one case and by 99.5 per cent in the other. This reduction has been the result of our action under the Fisheries Act.

We have another problem here. We do not have adequate legislation to deal with compensation for the downstream interests that have been affected by pollution of this kind. It is principally under provincial legislation that the damage done to property is covered, and this is the main reason that the Manitoba government is using provincial law to prosecute the two polluters, one in western Ontario and the other in Saskatchewan.

Similarly, the government of Ontario has passed legislation which will enable its arm, the Ontario Water Resources Commission, to deal with polluters in that province and gain compensation for downstream interests for loss of income and injury to property. We are looking at ways and means by which we could deal with this problem at the federal level. In other words, we do not have all the legislation we may need in order to deal with the problem.

Mr. Orlikow: With respect to mercury pollution, can the minister say whether his technical people have made any studies, and reached any firm conclusions, as to when the steps taken recently to prevent further pollution will be so effective that the content of mercury in Lake Winnipeg will have dropped to a point where commercial and sports fishing will again be feasible?

Mr. Davis: It is difficult to tell. We do not have enough information. But the northern end of Lake Winnipeg has improved to the extent that recently the Premier of Manitoba was able to announce that it would open to summer fishing in 1971.

Mr. Ritchie: I would like to ask the minister what facilities he will have in his new department for the evaluation of tests to determine the toxicity of various products? I ask this in view of the fact that mercury has to be measured in very small quantities and, according to our tests, it has suddenly become a large pollutant. However, I notice that recently scientists are starting to question the validity of the tests, and whether it may not be mercury in its natural state which is responsible.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I did try to answer that question yesterday. Briefly, there is mercury present in minute quantities in nature. These quantities vary from one location to another. We are endeavouring to find out what the background levels are in order to assess the over-all problem.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask one or two questions dealing with reclamation projects. For example, a section of the Ottawa River has been so badly polluted by mercury that it has been closed to fishing. There are a number of rivers all over the country in a similar state. Is the minister's department going to look into the question of reclamation projects, as I call them, for these rivers, and assess them on a basis of priority? What is the over-all plan in this regard?

Mr. Davis: We will do our utmost to rehabilitate our fisheries. In some cases dredging out mercury deposits near industrial plants may be the answer. In other cases, we may have to concentrate on other fish species in the area which are not affected to the same extent.

Mr. Harding: My next question applies not only to mercury pollution but to other sources of pollution that have caused tremendous damage. One is pollution from sewage. Where is the money coming from? Will the minister have enough money to handle reclamation projects? Is his department setting up some kind of loan fund so that plants or communities involved may be able to get cash to tackle these projects?

Mr. Davis: As the hon. member knows, Mr. Chairman, the federal government, through CMHC, has already made hundreds of millions of dollars available to municipalities to improve their sewage collection systems and to add to their sewage treatment facilities. I think it will be the principal vehicle for dealing with these situations which, in the first instance, must be assessed and dealt with by the municipalities, backed on occasion by the provinces. We will help fund or make moneys available at the federal level for the purpose of cleaning up.

Mr. Harding: I admit there is some money available through CMHC, but not enough. I think the fund was originally $75 million, and this was jumped to $80 million. There are a host of programs that municipalities cannot tackle because they do not have the cash. The money is not available to provide all the sewage treatment facilities needed. Something must be done. More money has to be made available through the department or through CMHC. Some 97 per cent of Montreal's total sewage is being poured untreated into the St. Lawrence. We often hear that there is a sufficient volume of water in the river to flush the effluent out to sea, where it cannot do too much damage. Yet, we find the same thing happening all across the country, even in British Columbia. The capital city of British Columbia is dumping its effluent in the sea. May I suggest to the minister that, even if we pass effective measures to deal with effluent, we shall have to increase the funds available to municipalities for the cleaning up of the sewage problem.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked several questions of the minister, one of which was related to the Canadian Armed Forces Base in Moose Jaw. Having read Hansard I may say one answer leaves the impression that, despite the amount of money spent on the sewage disposal plant at the base, a certain amount of unwelcome effluent is still discharged into the Moose Jaw River. The fact remains that all the effluent from the base flows into the river, and is treated. The point I wish to illustrate is this: On Monday last, February 2, the Moose Jaw and District Labour Council attempted to present a brief to Moose Jaw City Council. According to a news release, they got part way through their presentation and were hammered down.

Mr. Francis: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I have been trying to follow the hon. member's remarks. I fail to see how his remarks are relevant to the clause before the committee.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is patient he will see the relationship between my remarks and the subject we are discussing at this time.

An hon. Member: Don't make a speech first.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I will not repeat what I took the opportunity of saying yesterday. My hope is that when we come to clause 5, we shall not discuss at length those matters which ought to have been discussed on clause 5.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, you made that quite clear yesterday, when the hon. member for Ottawa West may not have been here.

Mr. Francis: I was here.

Mr. Skoberg: One of the base officers appeared before Moose Jaw City Council last Monday and said that effluent from the armed forces base was treated to a greater degree than required by the Department of National Health and Welfare. My question to the minister is this. Although the standard to which that effluent is treated is above the national standard set by the Department of National Health and Welfare, has the department taken into consideration the fact that there is practically no water flow in that river at this time of year or, indeed, early in the summer? In the supervision and policing of regulations, will this fact be taken into consideration? I ask this because various departments of government set various standards which they consider to be effective for the control of pollution.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, one must assume that any standards which are well drawn would make some reference to the surroundings into which the effluent is being discharged.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the minister made a speech in one of the maritime cities, Fredericton I believe. He is reported to have said that the new regulations being drafted by his department would prohibit or prevent industrial operations from polluting air and water, but that one would not expect existing plants to be brought up to standard immediately. I do not think any member of this committee or any person in Canada would disagree with the statement the minister is reported to have made. After all, we have plants in operation which are anywhere from five to 50 years old. When built, their designers did not pay the attention to pollution matters that we are now paying. I wonder if the minister would indicate whether, when he made that statement, he or his department had in mind some kind of timetable. Is there some time within which existing plants will have to be brought up to standards? Is it one year, five years, ten years or 20 years?

The hon. member for Ottawa West made a remark just now about speeches being in order. When I drove home last night, I thought I needed a gas mask. The odour coming from the paper plant across the river was so strong that one could hardly breathe. Could the minister indicate to members of the committee whether there is a timetable for imposing strict controls on new plants. What sort of timetable will be established with respect to plants already in existence?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the deadline for each old plant or old mill will vary from plant to plant and mill to mill. It will be negotiated case by case. The longest time span I have heard of is seven years. For the great majority of instances involving plants such as pulp mills in western Canada, it will be less than five years. In other words, it will be two years or three years. Seven years is the outside limit.

Mr. Orlikow: What about the pulp mills on the Ottawa River, Mr. Chairman? How long will they be given?

Mr. Davis: The province of Quebec and the province of Ontario will, of course, be involved as well in cases where the mills are in Quebec or Ontario. Negotiations have yet to take place. However, our new regulations dealing with pulp and paper mills will shortly be promulgated and, as soon as they are, we shall have definite standards to enforce in these negotiations.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the interjection by the hon. member for Ottawa West a moment ago, I recalled that not too many days ago he made a brief but eloquent speech about restoring the Ottawa River to its former pristine glory. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the Moose Jaw River is quite as important to the people of Moose Jaw as the Ottawa river is to the hon. member and to many of us who must come here to transact the public's business.

Mr. McCleave: It is just one more river to cross.

Mr. Barnett: I, therefore, wish to indicate to the hon. member, and to members of the committee, that the point raised by my colleague for Moose Jaw was most germane to the question of the establishment of the department of the environment. He spoke of the effluent being discharged from the Canadian Armed Forces base in the area. I had the opportunity of visiting Moose Jaw and of hearing some of the presentations on this subject. Nevertheless, as the minister said yesterday in committee, the federal government and the federal Parliament must clean up its own house first.

Although it may be true that, according to the health standards of the Department of National Health and Welfare the effluent being discharged into the Moose Jaw River is safe in that it will not breed diseases adverse to humans, the fact remains that the nature of the effluent discharged, effluent treated with chemicals such as chlorine, is such that it uses up the oxygen content of the water in the river. In the Ottawa River, this process has reached the point at which fish and other forms of aquatic life cannot survive. The people who like to take good fish out of the stream in the hon. member's constituency are finding that their local fishing has been destroyed; similarly, fish in the Ottawa River have been destroyed. The point I wish to have elucidated by the minister is whether, in his view, this department will effect some measure of improvement in situations such as these.

May I mention another point? I was inclined to agree with the minister when he suggested to my colleague from Kootenay West that the primary concern of the Navigable Waters Protection Act is navigation. None the less, I think the minister will agree that the interrelationships, in certain circumstances, between the Fisheries Act on the one hand and the Navigable Waters Protection Act on the other are quite important. While in some cases the amendments to the Fisheries Act, which are binding on Crown corporations and which were passed very quickly in the previous session, can be effective, there may be other cases where the effect on a fishery will not be quite so great. Other forms of wildlife not covered by the Fisheries Act or the Canadian wildlife service may be affected. It might be effective to have a clear provision in the Navigable Waters Protection Act as well to make the Act binding upon both federal and provincial Crown corporations.

Possibly the minister might be willing to accept the offer of a gift. I would be glad to pass to him the initiative for taking over Bill C-105 which stands in my name. This bill puts a provision into the Navigable Waters Protection Act which is on all fours with the provisions included last year in the Fisheries Act. This could be very quickly dealt with in this House. I wonder whether the minister or his colleague, the Minister of Transport might see fit to put that proposition forward as a government proposal. It could then be brought forward on the Order Paper and dealt with quickly. It would ensure that disasters, such as occurred on the Peace River would be avoided. The fishery aspect of that disaster was not immediately apparent. In addition to protecting the fishery, we could ensure that Canada would have a further control over developments in various areas which directly or indirectly affect people in other parts of the country. Is the minister prepared to indicate whether he would accept that bill to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act?

Mr. Davis: Some hon. members have argued that there are already too many departments in the act, and that the new department of the environment should have more powers. The hon. member is suggesting that under the guise of navigation, in effect the Department of Transport, we could deal more effectively with pollution. I cannot see the compatibility of those two arguments. I think that under the Fisheries Act or Canadian wildlife act we have the power to deal with the situation or to make other federal powers more explicit through new legislation, but not under the guise of navigation or under the general heading of transportation. Let's deal with pollution head on and call it by that name.

Mr. Harding: The minister referred to a Canadian wildlife act. I was not aware that we have a Canadian wildlife act on the statutes books. We have acts dealing with wildlife, but I did not think that we had a specific Canadian wildlife act on our statutes books. When are we going to have a Canadian wildlife act? Is it part of the policy of the new department to bring the various segments of wildlife under one act? Is this part of the plans of the new department?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I should have used the right name of the act. It is the Migratory Birds Convention Act. My slip of the tongue was related to a wildlife act which is being prepared in my department. As the hon. member knows, many of the powers relative to the management of wildlife are provincial. When drafting our federal legislation, we have to be careful in this respect.

Mr. Harding: I have one or two short questions. This is very important. Will the new department have any control over the enforcement of the land use regulations which are in the process of being drafted for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon district?

Mr. Davis: Not directly, Mr. Chairman. The Northwest Territories administration, in many ways, acts in a similar manner to a province. Certainly, there will be close consultation. I expect in the department of the environment we will have much of the expertise upon which northern affairs can draw when preparing recommendations and developing a policy with regard to land use.

Mr. Harding: This is one of the weaknesses of the new department of the environment. A department which focuses mainly on economic development and not on protection of our northern ecology has control over 40 per cent of Canada's pollution regulations. Many of us are extremely worried. We feel that the new department should be an umbrella over all government activities rather than have its jurisdiction limited to a specific resource area.

I have one final question. I understand that the department will be dealing with the Skagit river. Can the minister indicate how these negotiations are progressing as this topic is very important to the people of British Columbia?

Mr. Davis: I understand that there has been close and continuing liaison with the United States through the Department of External Affairs. I hope to make a statement with regard to progress in that connection within the next week or two.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Deputy minister.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, you have been following the line of questioning quite closely for the last half hour or three quarters of an hour. I am sure you will agree that all members are faced with a dilemma in view of the scope of this bill. Clause 4 reads:

> The Governor in Council may appoint an officer called the Deputy Minister of the Environment to be the deputy head of the Department of the Environment and to hold office during pleasure.

As I stated when speaking during the debate on second reading, I have no objection to establishing a department of the environment with a deputy minister of the environment whose prime responsibilities will be related to pollution control, especially as it affects our seacoast and inland fisheries. The department will also be responsible for our renewable resources, including the forest resources of Canada, migratory birds and other domestic flora and fauna. The department will be responsible for meteorology reports, the protection and enhancement of the quality of the natural environment, including water, air and soil quality. It will be responsible for technical surveys within the meaning of the Resources and Technical Surveys Act as well as the enforcement of any rules or regulations made by the International Joint Commission which may be promulgated pursuant to the treaty between the United States of America and His Majesty King Edward VII relating to boundary waters and questions arising between the United States and Canada as far as they relate to pollution control.

I feel sure that all members will agree this is a tall order. The minister and the deputy minister, who will be responsible for the administration of this department, will be kept more than busy. In view of the many and varied responsibilities heaped upon the minister and the deputy minister by the establishment of this new department of the environment, all members from Atlantic Canada are concerned that the department of fisheries, which is being phased out by this legislation, will become the unwanted stepchild of this new department. This will, of course, be unfortunate, especially in view of the importance of this industry to many important areas of Atlantic Canada where fishing is a way of life, and where the income derived from fishing is the only income available in some regions of economic disparity.

Fishing provides a livelihood for some 68,000 Canadian fishermen and it is estimated that the value of fishery products derived from last year's catch, of which 70 per cent was exported, will amount to approximately $370 million. However, part of this industry is today being threatened by mercury pollution of the seas. Only last week some 30,000 pounds of swordfish landed in Nova Scotia were found to contain mercury to the extent that they were unsaleable for human consumption. This has resulted in the closing down of this industry. In reply to a question I put to the present Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, as reported on page 2941 of Hansard, the minister replied:

> Unfortunately, most swordfish caught on the high seas at a considerable distance from Canada contain more than the half part per million of mercury.

He then went on to say that the government would endeavour to do much the same thing as was done for other fisheries in this country, namely, support the incomes of fishermen until they can find work in another segment of the fishery or be retrained for employment in other industries. Mr. Chairman, this is not good enough. Many of our fishermen do not wish to leave a way of life or a vocation which they have followed since childhood. Some are incapable of learning another trade, while others have a lifetime of earnings and savings invested in ships and fishing gear which today cannot be used as a mean of providing for their needs and the needs of their wives and families. I ask the minister and I ask the government: what are these men to do with their ships and with their fishing equipment? Even if they qualify for retraining, who is to pay them for their equipment now made obsolete by the pollution of the seas?

It seems to me that the government has an immediate and urgent responsibility to determine the source of mercury pollution in some species of fish, especially swordfish and tuna. Fortunately, we have a large oceanographic base at Bedford Basin near Halifax, and one of our first priorities should be to undertake an immediate water study in the hope of determining the sources of mercury pollution. As the matter is also of concern to the United States, I feel certain that the American government would be willing, if approached, to co-operate by making its facilities at Woods Hole, Massachusetts, available for a joint water study.

I mention these matters in connection with the clause under review because I wish to make it clear that the deputy minister of the environment will bear vast and varied responsibilities. I have given the committee an outline of some of them, and there are one or two other items I wish to bring to the attention of the committee in order to buttress the motion I intend to move at the conclusion of my remarks.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The hon. member has now cleared up the point I had in my mind.

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As I say, I intend to move an amendment at the conclusion of my remarks.

I referred to the fact that this question might well be of concern to the United States government. As it happens, it is the regulations enforced in the United States which prevent our selling swordfish to that country. I believe 90 per cent of the catch goes to that market. This is something the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry should be doing. He should be working quickly in consultation with the United States to determine the sources of mercury pollution.

It may well be that mercury compounds in anti-fouling paints used on the bottoms of our ships are among the culprits or it may be the methods used in the manufacture of caustic soda by shore installations are adding greater quantities of mercury to our air and water than first realized. I cannot help but wonder if the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has given any thought to outlawing the present method of producing caustic soda which releases mercury tainted waste. There is another method which might be used but it is more expensive, and industry resists making a costly change-over.

Can anything be done to prevent an increase of these plants? Last spring, when the Lake St. Clair fisheries were closed, there was a great deal of publicity about mercury pollution. One newspaper article mentioned that there were a dozen chlor-alkali plants releasing mercury across Canada, including one shortly to go into operation in Nova Scotia.

Now, in Ontario, they have found that reducing the amount of mercury entering the water has no effect on reducing the mercury level already present. In other words, mercury does not dissipate as does radio-activity. Once it is there, it is there to stay. Notwithstanding this, in the Globe and Mail of January 19, 1971, we read:

> Dow Chemical of Canada Limited is still dumping mercury from the Sarnia plant into the St. Clair River and the governments of Canada and Ontario are considering legal action, the U.S. Supreme Court was told yesterday.

This company has now located in Nova Scotia, and I wonder if the process they will use in their chlor-alkali plant will add more mercury to our sea water. Has the minister investigated this company's plans, and were they approved by his department?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): I hope the hon. member will soon relate what was to be the background of his argument to clause 4, which has no bearing on specific types of pollution such as mercury content in fish.

Mr. Crouse: That you, Mr. Chairman, but if you will bear with me I am sure you will see my point. As it is at present, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and his deputy minister are more than overloaded with responsibilities pertaining to fisheries alone. Clause 4 provides only for the appointment of one deputy minister of the environment. Obviously, if the existing deputy minister is, along with his minister, unable to cope adequately with the problems facing the department, the arrangements we are now asked to make are not adequate. I want to lay the background in support of an argument for a special, separate deputy minister for the fisheries to ensure that the fisheries, along the problems of Canadian fishermen, do not become orphans. These are not problems which can be taken lightly. These are projects we must carry out immediately. The whole chain of our fisheries resources might be threatened if there is delay.

For these reasons and many others I could cite, I firmly believe we should have a separate deputy minister of fisheries. He would be responsible for the continued good health of our fishing industry and would not only look into matters such as mercury pollution but lead the fight for the preservation of the fishing resources on our continental shelf, which today are seriously threatened by overfishing from massive fleets of foreign nations.

The proposed deputy minister of environment has a good reputation for competence arising out of his success as deputy commissioner general of Expo '67. But a resumé of his previous activities makes absolutely no reference to any experience in matters relating to fisheries. This lack of fishing knowledge will not be helpful to our industry or to Canada when we meet with other fishing nations for discussion of our fisheries resources at the next Law of the Sea Conference to be held in 1972. Who will press for a solution to the thorny problems concerning relations between France and Canada as they relate to fishing rights surrounding the French-owned islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon? Since 1964 we have been told these matters are under discussion with the French government, but we have never received a report in this House on the result of those discussions. While this question of fishing rights around these islands is unresolved, we can never fully implement our 1964 Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act—our 12-mile limit legislation.

For these reasons, and for many more that I could mention, I want to move the following amendment. One of my colleagues has just asked me what I mean by "these reasons", and I am referring to the reasons I have given, though there are others. The deputy minister of the department of the environment will have conflicting responsibilities. On the one hand, he will be responsible for the purity of our water and our air while, on the other hand, he will be responsible for the development of our renewable resources. However, sometimes the development of our resources brings with it the polluton of our water and our air, so I am just wondering which hat the deputy minister of the environment will be wearing when he is faced with this problem.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate:

That clause 4 of Bill C-207 be amended by adding thereto, next after line 3 on page 2 thereof, the following:

"(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1) the Governor in Council may appoint an officer called the Deputy Minister of Fisheries to hold office during pleasure and to perform all such duties and functions of a deputy head as extend to and include all matters relating to sea coast and inland fisheries."

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I want to take a few minutes to support the amendment moved by my colleague from South Shore and also to add a few comments in this debate since I have not had the opportunity to take part. I specifically want to address my remarks to the fisheries.

I have absolutely no objecton to the creation of a department of the environment or to any move that will help clean up this young Canadian nation of ours. Perhaps I could suggest that the minister commence a pilot project to keep the most easterly province of Canada completely pollution free as a sort of garden for the rest of Canada, an area where tourists can share the beauties of a relatively unmolested province.

If I may deal with the amendment, I may say that most of the major nations of the world today which are coastal states and have anything to do with fishing are stepping up their fishing activities. I need not tell the minister this because he is only too well aware of it. Just going back over the last two decades we find that a number of nations, including not only coastal states but some of the eastern European nations that are not coastal states, have developed their fisheries to such an extent that Canada's fishing efforts appear miniscule in comparison. For example, two decades ago Russia was almost unheard of as a fishing nation. Countries like West Germany, Poland, Roumania, the Scandinavian countries and the countries in southwest Europe have continued making major efforts to become fishing nations.

The minister of fisheries knows that the marine environment as a renewable resource—I am not referring to mineral resources or to oil, which are non-renewable resources—is one of the great frontiers of Canada, yet in many ways is unexplored and undeveloped. Bill C-207 now before the committee seeks to eliminate the fisheries department. My colleague from South Shore has placed on the record in no uncertain terms the contradiction implied in the government's move to create numerous ministers of state and, on the other hand, to eliminate entirely the department of fisheries. The excuse cannot be used that this is a move to cut down on bureaucracy or to try and create efficiency in government, because in another section of the bill that argument is disproved. If I were to argue that the creation of a deputy minister of fisheries is sound in terms of managerial and administrative theory, then the minister, who has considerable background experience, might disagree.

It has been proposed over the years that two ministers of fisheries should be appointed. The argument for this is that there is a difference between the fishery of the Atlantic region, eastern Quebec and the Gaspé, on the one hand, and the Pacific coast fishery on the other hand. I think it would be logical for the minister to argue that two ministers, each given equal power within the one department, or each having dual administrative control, would not be sound in theory and in most cases would not work out in practice. The amendment moved by my colleague from South Shore does not suggest this at all; rather, it suggests that over and above the general responsibilities of the minister of the environment there should be appointed a deputy minister responsible for fisheries.

I do not want to go into the detail of this matter. Indeed, perhaps I am not capable, with the knowledge that I have about administrative responsibility, of arguing that there should not be dual control or any areas that have to be well defined, because there might well be in fact. But I do contend that we would be creating a department where the weaknesses of dual control would certainly be minimal.

I suppose the minister of fisheries will argue—I hope that he does get an opportunity to place on the record a more forceful argument than he has to date—that there will be no degradation of effort on the part of the federal government as far as our fishery is concerned. But it seems to me that we are going to be at a considerable disadvantage as far as our national and international fishing efforts are concerned if we do not have at least a deputy minister of fisheries to speak on behalf of our fishermen.

During the last few years there has been a good deal of kerfuffle over the depletion of our resources by foreign nationals. I need not go into the detail of this because all of us are only too aware of it. Members of this party, indeed members on both sides of the House, have supported the need for a great deal more activity in the area of international discussion and bilateral agreement vis-a-vis the fishery, and some of us have been pushing for a conference on marine resources which would place Canada at the same table as many of the nations that are harvesting our resources in waters above our continental shelf so that we might come to some definitive conclusions. But as yet we have not been able to get to that stage, and perhaps this is understandable when the international law of the sea is as complex as it is.

Of course we have a great disadvantage. As I look across the way, I see the Secretary of State for External Affairs sitting in his seat. I have known him as far back as 1953. He has treated the fishing industry very badly and would prefer to eliminate fishing as an industry with any priority at all in the Canadian nation. Very many of the problems the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has faced in the last couple of years have involved trying to push obstructions out of his way which were placed there by his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have read some of the statements made in the last 12 or 15 years by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and have discovered conclusively that his idea is that fishing should not occupy any position of priority, or perhaps any position at all, in the economic structure of Canada.

This business of environment and pollution has become a major issue in the last few years. Any government worth its salt would have realized the political consequences of siding with motherhood and moving legislatively into the area of environmental control. In that respect, I am not suggesting that legislation is purely and simply a political move, but I must remind the members of the House that ever since we have had a Fisheries Act there has been legislative provision for the government to move in respect of pollution control.

I think I have now gained the attention of the minister for external affairs. Perhaps I had better not count on that because it is obvious his interest in fisheries can be covered in about a two second span.

An hon. Member: There is trouble in Toronto.

Mr. Lundrigan: Yes, perhaps there is trouble in Toronto, but that is the extent of his interest in fisheries.

We have had a Fisheries Act ever since 1867. Down through the years there have been provisions which would allow the federal government to get involved in pollution control. It does us little good to remind ourselves of this because successive governments have never really considered it necessary to use them. I do not refer to this particular government alone, but governments over the last several decades. It was never really an issue because it was felt that in this country, with very few people and a great land mass, pollution would never become a problem. In the last few years, it has become a problem.

Let me point my finger at what I think is a major concern of the thousands of people who earn their livelihood from fishing. I think the Canadian people will realize that by submerging the department of fisheries under the department of environment we are taking away the status that department has enjoyed. No one is going to get up in the House of Commons from now on to talk about fishing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: We have had a dual response, one which indicates that this is a serious matter and another which applauded the possibility that fish will not be on the menu once or twice a week in the House of Commons.

Perhaps there is little we can do about the situation because the Prime Minister has introduced a piece of legislation and it is going to be pushed through. We feel it is a mistake to eliminate the department of fisheries because it will downgrade the fisheries industry in Canada. The department will certainly not have the status it has enjoyed in recent years, and neither will the fishing industry.

I must say that in the last couple of years the fisheries department has gained a great deal of status. I think this is the result of the combined effort of the minister and members on this side of the House who have responded to fisheries issues in an effort to draw more attention to the value of this industry which should occupy one of the top priority positions in the nation. It is unfortunate that members do not realize the value of the fisheries industry to the Canadian economy. They might then realize the tremendous return from investment in the fisheries area, not only to the fishermen but to others located in other than coastal areas.

As the minister has pointed out, this year the United States market has never been better for fish products. In any supermarket across Canada today you will find sections in the meat area specifically set aside for fish products. Anything related to the marine resource is, in fact, a good investment for businessmen and for the government.

We were hoping that the government would give the fisheries industry an important position in the hierarchy of decision making and spending. The minister will perhaps say that he intends to work hard to see that this industry is given a position of priority and prestige. I cannot accept the minister's word for that because of Bill C-207. As a result of its provisions, we will never again hear about fishing in the House of Commons. As hon. members, we will have to ask the minister of environment about fish. Why could the department not be referred to as the department of fisheries and environment?

If I recall correctly, we had a department of fisheries in 1957, and then that department became the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. With the passage of Bill C-207, even that department will no longer exist. I have watched the minister in the last couple of years and I have come to the conclusion that his ambition goes much further than being the minister of fisheries. I think he has wanted the role he will now have with the government. I have read the speeches he has made all across the nation, and I have watched the way he has handled himself in the House of Commons.

I have also watched the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources eyeing the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, handle questions on air pollution so well. His background and professional qualifications would indicate that he could do a job in this area. I do not see why the government finds it necessary to eliminate the department of fisheries. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs is delighted by this elimination and probably hopes that the fishing industry becomes non-existent.

This has been one of the major stumbling blocks. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has consistently refused to offer any support in the House of Commons as well as on an international level for Canadian fishermen. The attitude of the government has been wishy-washy, and there is more backbone in a marinated herring than has been shown by the Department of External Affairs down through the years in respect of our fisheries. As far as fisheries are concerned, the minister's statements since 1953 have borne out this fact. Perhaps I might suggest that the minister has a political backbone as solid as a marinated herring. He is not too concerned about the fishing industry. He sits there smiling and laughing. He is pretty jovial about the whole matter. I cannot see him standing up at a conference on the law of the sea and getting very excited about fishing.

An hon. Member: What is there to get excited about?

Mr. Lundrigan: A friend of mine in the Liberal party asks what there is to be excited about.

An hon. Member: They will be there until doomsday.

Mr. Lundrigan: I doubt if the hon. member could tell a cod from a cohoe, but he is the expert on fisheries. A gentleman from the riding of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, when referring to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, said: I do not think you will get anywhere with him because the smell of fish is likely to make him sick. Perhaps that is the attitude of the government. Perhaps the Prime Minister should make a greater effort during his many excursions to promote the fisheries industry in markets abroad. I do not know what would happen if the fishermen of Canada were aware of the attitude of this government toward that particular industry.

Let me ask the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry to give serious consideration to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Shore before he resigns as the minister of this department. Some time ago an announcement was made that we would be losing Dr. Needler as deputy minister. I do not think there is a person in Canada who has not learned to respect the ability of this man. In the international sphere, he has gained a reputation as a very knowledgeable expert in this field, and I do not think anyone would disagree with this.

We are to get Mr. Shaw as deputy minister of this new department. I believe he was educated at McGill and born in Montreal or Quebec. He is Canadian. I do not know this gentleman and I would not presume to comment on his capability, but I would doubt very much that he has the all encompassing qualifications to handle a department of the environment which gets involved in anything from effluents from a sawmill to the effects of atomic waste on squids on the Atlantic coast. I cannot imagine that he would be able to sit down before an international commission or convention and talk with any great depth of knowledge on the subject of fisheries. This is an area which is not identical with environment and pollution control, and the minister knows this.

Before this bill was introduced, I was concerned about the fact that we had a minister from British Columbia, who has learned a great deal about the Atlantic fishery, and a deputy minister who was not from the Atlantic region. Consequently, we have no one with specific sensitivity and deep knowledge of the Atlantic fishery. One of our members actually recommended some time ago that we have two deputy ministers of fisheries, one for the Pacific coast and one for the Atlantic coast. I do not know how sound that would be in the opinion of the minister, but what will happen to us now when we have a minister responsible for the environment as well as a deputy minister responsible for the environment? Will there be anybody in the department at that level who will have the authority, both nationally and internationally, to deal with fisheries policies and programs, with protecting the industry, developing the technology of fishing, marketing skills and transportation techniques, as well as negotiating with the Soviet Union as was done on the west coast in the past year?

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a point of order to inquire whether the amendment before us has been accepted by the Chair. It occurs to me that a question of the expenditure of public funds is involved, and I wonder whether the amendment is in order.

The Chairman: My understanding is that the amendment was accepted by the Chair and that the debate is now on the amendment.

Mr. Barnett: I have been ruminating for the past few minutes on just what the Secretary of State for External Affairs would look like if he were marinated. However, I do not think I will pursue that question.

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps he would be more durable then.

An hon. Member: Anyhow, we only marinate herrings.

Mr. Barnett: On a more serious note, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the amendment which has been proposed to the committee by the hon. member for South Shore may be the answer to the conundrum with which a number of us in this House have been wrestling ever since it became apparent that the proposal for the establishment of the department of environment would involve the merging into that department of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. Those of us who participated in the discussions last session on the amendments to the Fisheries Act had it impressed upon us very firmly, as a result of evidence and debate, that undoubtedly the Fisheries Act stood in the front line of the defence of water quality across Canada. So, I think there is undoubtedly much virtue in the idea of establishing a department where policies in respect of water quality and fisheries are co-ordinated. It is apparent that this is part and parcel of the proposal in this part of the bill which involves the setting up of a department of environment.

The question that has very obviously been of concern to some members from the Atlantic coast who represent many commercial fishermen, and some of us from the Pacific coast who also represent areas where the commercial fisheries are very important, is the apparent dissolution of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, or what might be construed as a downgrading of it. I think many commercial fishermen have, quite rightly, been fearful that in the process of setting up this new department with much broader responsibilities under the minister who has been the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, less attention, less money and less effort will be given to the commercial fisheries. So, I think the proposal put forward by the hon. member for South Shore may be in part at least, the answer to the problem.

As I understand the functioning of a department, the primary responsibility at the policy level rests with the minister who, together with his colleagues in the cabinet makes determinations of policy directions. I would agree that in the areas which are under discussion, particularly those relating to fisheries and water—leaving aside for a moment the sections of the bill which deal with air and soil quality—close co-ordination at the policy level by a minister who is prepared to evolve a policy for the protection of the over-all environment, can very well be tied in with creating the necessary circumstances for the growth and survival of fish. However, if my understanding is correct, the main function of the deputy head of a department is that of administration. I would be prepared to argue that the administration of a department involved with the commercial fisheries is certainly important enough to warrant the full time of a deputy minister.

Our present department is called the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, and we had no quarrel with the concept of adding to the department of fisheries the federal responsibility in the area of forestry. I think members of the committee will recognize when we are talking about fisheries and forestry we are really talking about—I was going to say—two different kettles of fish so far as the operations of the federal government are concerned. As has often been said, the primary jurisdiction constitutionally over forestry and forestry resources of Canada, their harvesting and development, rests with the provincial governments. However with regard to fisheries federal jurisdiction over seacoast and inland fisheries is firmly embedded in the BNA Act. So, in this particular area we exercise a jurisdiction over the management and the well-being of this resource industry that is parallel to the powers exercised by the provinces in relation to forestry.

Essentially, what happened was that we played an ancillary role in respect of the forest industry in Canada by undertaking research programs, and programs leading towards fire protection, protection from disease and that sort of thing. In addition, of course, the federal government agreed to co-operate with the provinces in the development of an inventory. But, Mr. Chairman, those are very different kinds of responsibilities administratively than administering the very far flung commercial fisheries of Canada which involve three oceans in addition to the vast inland waters that we have in this country. So, I think a very logical argument can be developed for the proposition that, even if we were having a unified ministry, there should be two deputy heads.

The hon. member who preceded me made some reference to the apparent lack of interest of the Department of External Affairs in fishing matters. I am not sure I agree with all of his observations in detail, but for a period of years I have felt that our Department of External Affairs regards the increasingly important international questions involved in the survival of our commercial fisheries as very peripheral matters so far as the foreign policy of Canada is concerned. This may perhaps be another good reason why we should have at least a deputy minister of fisheries who, from time to time, can deal as a co-equal with his opposite number in the Department of External Affairs. I think even the unmarinated Secretary of State for External Affairs would agree that there is a need for very close co-operation on the matter of fisheries. I hope he will more and more agree that his department should be a very important arm of what, up to now, has been called our department of fisheries if we are to maintain this resource, and if it is going to be worth while putting federal money into helping develop this resource.

I would like to point out to the committee that this proposition of having two deputy heads within a single department is not an unprecedented proposal. In fact, at the present time we have two deputy heads within the Department of National Health and Welfare, one with responsibility for the administration of health matters and the other with responsibility for welfare matters. Over a period of a great many years in the Department of National Revenue there were two deputy heads, a deputy minister for customs and excise, and a deputy minister of taxation, performing pretty well defined functions but under the general policy jurisdiction of a single minister. I have not heard that this created any insuperable problems in that department.

So, I suggest that this proposal which has been placed before us has merit. Certainly, it is worthy of very serious consideration. Undoubtedly, there will be overlapping of areas of responsibility in some respects. Such bodies, for example, as the Fisheries Research Board undoubtedly would be providing expertise which would flow through both the deputy head of the environment and the deputy head of fisheries. Nevertheless, as I see it, the responsibility of the minister for the commercial fisheries of Canada is pretty clear, distinct and well defined, and necessitates a full-time deputy head.

As has been so often stated, there has been argument among fishermen, and even in this House, that we really need two ministers of fisheries, one for the Atlantic coast and one for the Pacific coast. I have never accepted that proposition. When it has been suggested to me by fishermen on the west coast, I have tried to point out that it could lead to differences in policy matters and I do not think we want this. But undoubtedly there is a need for differences in administration regionally as between the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast, and there is also a need for co-ordination of administraton, which of course must take place at the headquarters of a department.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would ask hon. members of the committee, including those who occupy positions on the treasury benches, to give serious consideration to the amendment that has been proposed. I think it may go a long way toward satisfying the real and legitimate concern that commercial fishermen across Canada will have at the apparent disappearance of fisheries as a separate ministry within the operations of the federal government.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is five o'clock.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order, to rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin): Grain—Sharing by government of cost of storage; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave): Agriculture—Inquiry as to continuation of feed grain freight assistance; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett): Indian Affairs—Alberta—Establishment of facility in dinosaur area.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers), and public bills. Since there are no private bills, the House will proceed directly to notices of motions (papers).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WELFARE

REQUEST FOR COPY OF REPORT REGARDING INFORMATION MEDIA RELATIVE TO WAR ON POVERTY

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Heward, Newman and Associates and Julian, Hebert and Associates, Montreal, regarding information media relative to the war on poverty undertaken in the year 1967-68, for the Privy Council Office, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on January 14, 1970, I brought forward motion No. 212, standing in my name on the Order Paper. That motion is the subject matter of the present debate. The parliamentary secretary answering for the government at that time said the report requested was intended for use only by government officials and was not in a form suitable for other than internal use. The firms acted collectively as a staff extension of the special planning secretariat, supplying an expertise that was not available internally at that time. He asked whether, for those reasons, I would agree to withdraw the motion.

I think that when we talk about the war on poverty we must know what the government is attempting to do. It ought to tell members of the House what its plans are for dealing with this situation. In my opinion, it is not good enough for those plans to be used for the internal purposes of the department only. If members of the House are to debate intelligently the proposed actions of the government, they ought to have access to that information obtained as a result of research by experts. That information is available to the government and to the department concerned, but has not been given to the House of Commons. Even though the information may be in a form that is suitable only for internal use, as is the case here, I think that the government ought to make such information available to the members of this House in an abbreviated form. Perhaps the information could be provided in such a way as to enable hon. members to know where the government is going.

Unfortunately, it appears that the government is using the war on poverty as an excuse for saying that this information cannot be divulged. We know that poverty is no longer merely of domestic concern. It is a national disgrace. Every member of the House, I submit, thinks that something must be done to cure poverty, and the research undertaken in this area, research going back over the years, ought to be made available to the House in order that hon. members may have a concrete idea of what is being done to eradicate poverty. The House of Commons and the people of this country are under an obligation to eradicate poverty in this country.

We know that once poverty takes root in a certain area or in a certain group, it completely destroys the fibre of that part of our society. If unchecked, it will destroy the fibre of our society and of our nation in the long run. I need not cite examples of poverty in any particular area of the country but we know that once grinding poverty sets in, hopeless despair is the result. As a result of that despair, the people affected by poverty will act; they will try to destroy that which brought about their poverty. I hope that we can prevent, in future, the sort of destruction we have witnessed in the past. The government and society must act to prevent this type of destruction. We can only prevent it if we are serious about fighting the war on poverty and if we consider the problem of poverty in its entirety.

Some are aware, I am sure, that the people of the middle classes would like to close their eyes to the war on poverty. They consider that policies such as urban renewal are sufficient for dealing with poverty. Our middle classes think as "haves" and they would like to think they are unaffected by the real problems of the "have nots". While this attitude persists, I submit that it will take a long time to bring about any changes in the conditions of the poor in our society. If we are to fight the war against poverty effectively, we must revolutionize our thinking in connection with such matters as pollution and unemployment, as well as many others which have been mentioned in the House of Commons. In this country we must bring about an employment ratio that will permit us to do away with poverty. We must be able to create conditions in which everybody will be entitled to a job opportunity.

If we are truly concerned about poverty, we must train and retrain more people. Members of this House must examine government programs relating to urban and rural poverty. May I, at this time, refer to a question I directed in the House yesterday to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). It related to policies upon which the government is embarked. I said, as reported at page 3033 of Hansard:

> In view of the continuing and real threat to the existence of small and medium-sized farm units, is the Minister of Agriculture prepared to tell the House whether his study to encourage the adjustment of farm units to a more efficient size has taken into consideration the importance of the preservation of the family farm?

Unfortunately, that question was not allowed. I asked that question because many thousands of family farms are disappearing today. The people from those farms are being driven into large, urban centres, and they will swell the numbers of our urban poor. The migration of these people to our cities will create real difficulties. They are not trained for any particular occupations to be found in large urban centres, and there are no jobs for them. Clearly, we ought to be concerned about the rural poor. Our present system, under which we move the rural poor to our cities, will create difficulties that are graver than this government may realize. It appears that there is a concentrated effort to put more farmland into the hands of large corporations and a result, there will be less and less employment on the land.

We know very well that many people in the country have voiced a wish to bring about some type of change. May I refer to what the Canadian Welfare Council has said? Mr. Reuben C. Baetz, executive director of the Council, has said the following:

> If the just society is ever going to be anything more than a meaningless and flimsy abstraction, it must be based on certain tangible, fundamental rights, including social as well as civil and political rights. Among social rights, no right is more important than that of an adequate income. We should build this socioeconomic goal into our value system now. The method of administering the guaranteed income can be worked out later. If necessary, it can be introduced in stages.

There are various ways of looking at the whole question of poverty. Nevertheless, it was my hope that the government would make available the information asked for in the motion, in order that we might know what the government's thinking is. That way we could either subscribe to its actions, challenge them or critize them constructively, and the entire nation would benefit. So far the government has refused to divulge this information which, I submit, is necessary for the House of Commons to have.

Our party believes that the welfare of all depends on the well being of each one of us, and that every man is entitled to a basic share of the nation's goods and services, regardless of his power in the marketplace. We also know that we shall have to create a type of system in which there will be fairer sharing and in which everyone will be able to live above the poverty line. It is necessary to bring about an increase in the personal disposable income for those Canadians living in poverty. We know of various ways and means that this can be brought about. If we are really concerned about the war on poverty, we must bring about a guaranteed minimum income. We must do this now, not tomorrow. It is too late to say that we should continue in the present manner and that we are not interested in a guaranteed minimum income.

There must also be an increase in public services in communities where people live in poverty. There must be increased investment, employment and economic growth in regions of poverty. This, too, must be done now, not tomorrow. I am pleased to note that the government is moving in the direction of providing some self-determination in certain programs. There must be an organized program to promote self realization and self determination for individuals, communities and regions. The government has recently announced projects for a number of areas in Canada to enable residents to develop effective citizens' organizations through which they can identify and solve local problems and needs. The most important part of any program is that those directly affected should be a part of it, since they are the ones who must be assisted in the long run.

I have noticed that when an announcement is made, a government member always announces the program for his particular constituency. I presume the same opportunity will be given to opposition members if and when announcements are to be made that affect their constituencies. If we are to be consistent in our war on poverty, we must make funds available for the poor. It is not good enough to do only little things as this will not solve the problem. At the present time 20 per cent of all Canadians live in conditions of poverty and another 20 per cent live on the verge of poverty. This is not good.

I urge the government to make available the information which is being provided by research directors. Many hundreds of consultants are preparing reports for the government. We do not want the type of information that is contained in confidential memos to departments concerning specific individuals. However, we do want information on research projects being carried out for the government. In this way, we will have information about policies. With that type of approach, we would have a far better government and Parliament. Canadians would, as a result be better educated. If the government made available the papers for which we ask, the Canadian public would know what is going on and would not engage in the revolution and destruction that has been experienced in the past.

I urge the government to give serious consideration to adopting an amended policy and tell us they will supply some information requested in this order for return.

PRIVILEGE

MR. TURNER (OTTAWA-CARLETON)—RETURN OF FINGERPRINTS OF PERSONS RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE—CORRECTION OF ANSWER

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise at the earliest opportunity on a question of privilege to correct a statement I made in the House. Yesterday I said in answer to a question put to me by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) that I had been informed by the RCMP that all fingerprints of those arrested but not charged under the regulations of the War Measures Act or under the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act had been returned.

By this I meant, as I explained today to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) that I understood they had been returned to the police forces which had originally taken the prints. I learned a few hours ago that in fact the prints had not yet been sent by the RCMP to the police forces concerned, although they were ready for dispatch. I have been informed that the prints have now been sent to Montreal to be delivered to the appropriate police forces. I have already so informed the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. I apologize for inadvertently misleading the House.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Knowing the minister as we do, of course we all expected no less of him. Also, I want to record my thanks to him for letting me know that he was going to raise this question of privilege.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES ETC.

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Drury (for the Prime Minister)—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): When the committee rose at 5 p.m. it was considering an amendment to clause 4 of the bill.

On clause 4—Deputy minister.

Mr. Olson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I wonder if I may be permitted to raise the matter of the propriety of this amendment to clause 4 of the bill now before the committee. I do not wish to raise—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Olson: I have already raised a point of order. I am not sure the hon. member can raise a point of order at the same time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not see what right the minister has to raise a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. Olson: Perhaps the hon. member should hear it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. The minister cannot debate a ruling that has been accepted.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Before the Minister of Agriculture speaks I assume that he is raising a point of order on the validity of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Shore. If this is so, I will not consider further representations because there has been a ruling by the Chair which was not challenged. Therefore, the amendment stands.

Mr. Olson: With great respect, an examination of the "blues" has been made and a question was raised as to the propriety of the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Shore which would, in fact, increase the charge on the public purse. If Your Honour has finally decided that you will not entertain further representations with respect to the intervention that was made, then of course I understand the situation. But in my view we would be setting a very important precedent if indeed that judgment stood.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): I am afraid that in this case the ruling must stand.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Chairman, the amendment to clause 4 which we are now discussing deals with the appointment of a deputy minister in charge of fisheries. As was pointed out by the hon. member for South Shore, the reason for the amendment is very simple, namely, we feel that the new department of the environment will be taking over the responsibilities of the Department of Fisheries plus new, added responsibilities. That is why we proposed this amendment and that is why we support it. It is essential that the Department of Fisheries be maintained as a definite entity within the new department.

I contend, as I have before—I do not intend to speak too long on this matter—that the minister will have more than he can handle as minister of the environment. This is why we from the Atlantic provinces proposed the amendment. We want to make sure that the problems of the fishermen will receive attention. The minister knows that I applauded him whenever he introduced programs that were worth-while to fishermen, and that I was critical of him when he introduced programs that I thought were detrimental to the interests of fishermen, or that at least were not in accordance with my ideas. Therefore, he knows that it is not out of criticism of him that I support this amendment.

We know that the minister is from the west coast and that he is very much interested in pollution matters. Having been in charge of fisheries and forestry for the past 2½ years, he is probably looking for a new challenge; therefore, I suspect he will be paying a lot more attention to environmental matters than to fisheries. Let there be no mistake, Mr. Chairman: none of us is opposed to the establishment of a department of the environment, but we believe there should be a deputy minister responsible for fisheries as well as a deputy minister responsible for forestry and for pollution in general. Therefore, I say the amendment is a valid one. Its validity is not in question at the moment; it has been accepted and we are debating it. We know that the minister and his parliamentary secretary will want to accept this amendment. His parliamentary secretary shakes his head in disagreement.

[The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard).]

Mr. Corbin: I have confidence in the minister.

Mr. Comeau: So have I; but I want to make sure that a Deputy Minister of Fisheries will be appointed, and if I dared to go further than the terms of the amendment I would ask that he be from the east coast. Although the parliamentary secretary comes from the east coast, he does not represent a real fishing area. Therefore I say the proposed deputy minister should come from the Atlantic region.

The minister will have added responsibilities in the new department. Many problems connected with the fisheries remain unanswered and I do not believe they will receive full attention when the new department is established. The minister and the parliamentary secretary may argue that the appointment of another parliamentary secretary responsible for fisheries would help, and that they will have a parliamentary secretary in charge of fisheries and a parliamentary secretary responsible for environmental affairs. I do not consider that adequate.

As I have said, there are many fisheries problems that have not yet been solved. There are problems in connection with the 12-mile limit. Not long before Christmas the minister ordered the closing of certain bays to foreign fishermen, including the Bay of Fundy, the Gulf of St. Lawrence and certain bays on the coast of British Columbia. But that is not sufficient, Mr. Chairman; it does not fully meet the interests of the fishermen. This closure does not include one of the great herring spawning areas of the Atlantic region around Trinity Ledge; it is not protected from foreign fishermen.

This morning's newspapers record another complaint concernings the lobster season. Some of the fishermen are not satisfied. They have made dozens of representations with respect to the lobster season, particularly in District 4. A deputy minister in charge of fisheries would be able to pay more attention to such things than a general deputy minister in charge of many matters. There is another problem connected with the fisheries that has not been fully solved and which is becoming more serious as time passes. Last May the minister announced a program of assistance for the construction of fishing boats but to date the regulations affecting boats of 75-feet and over have not been promulgated. I know that they have to be made in co-operation with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but the delay is becoming longer and longer.

If the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Shore is accepted, a deputy minister of fisheries would be able to tackle some of these problems. I know the minister is a good listener, as is his parliamentary secretary. I know that when they have heard all the arguments they will wish to accept the amendment. I repeat that fisheries must remain an entity within the new department and that there is a relationship between fisheries and the environment. Recently a question was raised concerning both. The Department of Fisheries has banned swordfishing on the east coast because of mercury pollution, and the fishermen involved will have to engage in some other activity at least for a while. I ask, what is to be done for them? It is a very important fishery on the Atlantic coast and also on the west coast.

These fishermen will have to devote their energies to other ventures. The Department of Fisheries ought to suggest what the fishermen should do next.

Unquestionably, mercury pollution affects our environment; there is no question about that. Nevertheless, these fishermen must enter another field of the fishery. They can only do that if their interests are taken into account. Someone in the Department of Fisheries must say to these people, "You can fish for scallops or go into another field, but there are limitations in certain areas." For those reasons there must be a deputy minister in charge of fisheries. As I say, there are too many questions still unanswered. Once the new department is set up and once the minister is given these added responsibilities, it is less likely that we shall obtain the answers to some of our questions. The Department of Fisheries is much too important merely to be amalgamated into the conglomeration which is being set up. The minister is to take over some of the responsibilities of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and, in addition, some of the responsibilities of other departments. Therefore, too much will be left to one deputy minister who must also deal with fisheries. I submit, therefore, that a deputy minister in charge of fisheries should be appointed.

The minister is most enthusiastic about pollution control. I expect almost everyone here is enthusiastic about pollution control. At the same time, a proper balance must be struck and we must consider the interests of our fisheries. I said that many problems have been left unanswered. I was referring to fisheries regulations, to matters such as the lobster season and the 12-mile limit. There is also a problem with regard to fishermen who catch swordfish. Are they to engage in another part of the fishery? What is to become of these fishermen? I hope the minister will make a statement shortly about the mercury content of swordfish, for example. I hope his statement will be to the effect that the consumer need not be scared and that all fish are not contaminated. I know he has already said something along these lines.

What would happen if the consumer who will not eat swordfish suddenly were to say, "I am not going to eat scallops or lobster either"? That situation must be avoided and the minister must make a positive statement to allay fears. I am sure he will do that in due course. Many problems have not yet been solved in this field. With the additional responsibilities the minister is to assume, they will receive less attention. For that reason I say this amendment is a good one and should be accepted.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak briefly on the amendment before the House. I speak in support of the amendment. I submit that the amendment is simple yet it is essential. I do not understand why the government should not accept the idea that since we are now setting up a new department of the environment which will encompass the Department of Fisheries and Forestry and, in addition, assume responsibilities in the field of the environment, there should be appointed two deputy ministers each of whom should have clear and distinct duties. That is what the amendment seeks to do and I think it is an excellent idea.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is plain common sense to remember that if you are going to enlarge the activities of a department and one man is to be given responsibility for the enlarged department, he will be able to give less time to the fisheries and forestry responsibilities of the department. I think we are making a mistake in not keeping the responsibilities relating to the environment clear and separate from all other responsibilities of the department. If that is not done, we shall find ourselves in a position we have been in so often. We will find, on the one hand, that the deputy minister of the department will be in charge of fisheries and forestry, resources which are exploited, and economic interests will be involved; but on the other hand we will find that the same minister must sit down and try to talk out of both sides of his mouth. Out of one side of his mouth he will say, "We will do this." Then from the other side of his mouth he will say, "No, nothing doing. We must hold the reins in because what is proposed will affect the environment; therefore, we shall have to clamp down on the type of development proposed." That would not make any sense.

An hon. Member: There would be a conflict of interest.

Mr. Harding: There would be a clear conflict of interest and without doubt we would get into trouble if the department were set up that way. Since we are setting up this department now, let us do it properly: let us have two deputy ministers. Other departments of government have two deputy ministers. In the Department of National Health and Welfare a deputy minister is in charge of one part of the department and another deputy minister is in charge of another part. All we are asking is that one deputy minister be appointed to be responsible for fisheries and forestry and that another be appointed to take charge of the environmental responsibilities of the department. To me, that makes sense.

May I point out again that once you create a conflict of interest you will not be able to do the sort of job that ought to be done with respect to the fisheries responsibilities of the department or with respect to the environmental responsibilities. I think that is clear. The Science Council of Canada in its last report indicated to the government what ought to be done so far as fisheries are concerned. That body asked for a vast increase in the number of research projects on the east coast, the west coast and inland waters. It told the government that we need to have at our disposal vastly increased information in certain fields.

Also, the Science Council told the government that we are not assessing to the full the potential of our fisheries in all parts of the nation. This indicates to me, Mr. Chairman, that the fisheries responsibilities of the department ought to be expanded, especially so far as research and allied activities are concerned. It seems to me, however, that we are to load the responsibilities of a brand new department on top of the responsibilities of the existing department, and therefore we shall not obtain satisfactory results in all areas.

I will not go into all the details which have been covered by previous speakers. I reiterate that this is a sound and sensible amendment. I hope that this Liberal government for once in its life will accept one of the recommendations of the opposition and appoint two deputy ministers of the department. That would increase the department's efficiency; it would be good for Canada and good for both the fisheries and the environmental branches of the department. We need this deputy minister, so let us adopt the amendment.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I have a few comments to make on the amendment of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) to Clause 4 of Bill C-207 which provides for the appointment of a second deputy minister who would be exclusively responsible for fishery legislation.

In Schedule A of Bill C-207, we note there are 19 acts relating to fisheries, 16 of which directly concern water utilization and fisheries.

Mr. Chairman, at first sight it would seem that the area of fisheries has been neglected in the new department of environment. However, those 16 acts on fisheries already exist and there is also a Department of Fisheries and Forestry that is responsible for their administration.

I greatly hesitate to support the amendment of the member for South Shore, because it tends to multiply more and more important positions in the government administration. It often happens that deputy ministers have more authority than ministers themselves. In the first place, they receive a higher salary and they seem to have better control over the officials around them than ministers do.

Mr. Chairman, the members and a large segment of the population—especially fishermen—are concerned by the result of the report which has just been communicated to us and according to which tuna and swordfish fishing is greatly compromised due to the mercury pollution of sea-water.

Nothing prevents the Canadian government from asking American authorities to fight mercury pollution. However, it has occurred. With a deputy minister directly responsible for the enforcement of fishery legislation, I wonder whether there would be an increase in efficiency.

Even if the bill does not provide for the appointment of a second deputy minister who would be responsible for the enforcement of fishery legislation, the minister still has the authority needed to appoint all the officials required to handle environmental affairs and water pollution matters. These officials will look after the implementation of fishery legislation designed to protect not just the fishermen from the Maritimes but also the fishermen from British Columbia and the Canadian consumers.

Although we live in central Canada, we are very concerned by the Canadian fishermen's activities because we are aware that if they cannot sail for the high seas to catch the swordfish, this will be reflected in higher consumer prices not only for swordfish, but also for other species of fish and sea products.

I am not at all sure that it will be necessary to appoint a second deputy minister to the Department of the Environment. I believe that we should rather give the present minister more power over his officials and provide the latter with the required freedom to wage war against pollution and implement the existing laws.

[English]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The hon. member for Halifax—

Mr. Forrestall: With all deference to Your Honour, I used to be the junior member for Halifax. While I love that part of Canada, I have no connection with it, although I happen to like the military people there. That area is represented by the leader of my party and the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. My constituency is in the greatest part of Canada, Dartmouth-Halifax East. If Your Honour does not think there is a significant difference, I extend an invitation to you to visit the eastern shore of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Comeau: At Christmas.

Mr. Forrestall: I do not particularly want to invite Your Honour at Christmas; it would be better to visit in the spring, summer or fall when the countryside is delightful.

I wish to make a few comments in support of the amendment now before us. I do not represent a large segment of the fishing community but I do represent a typical and very significant part of the total fishing industry on the Atlantic coast. There are hundreds of full-time inshore or groundfishermen. The families of fishermen I represent have fished for generations. Their fathers and grandfathers were fishermen as well as their sons and grandsons. They have all fished off the eastern shore of Nova Scotia. These people have pride in their way of life and ability to provide for their families. These things cannot be dealt with lightly. Their support of this traditional way of life has been characteristic of the support that has built Canada in a maritime sense.

The fact that this bill will deprive them of the right to recognition within the bounds of ministerial or governmental prerogative is not important. What is important is that if they are deprived of the identification of their way of life, this will be very harmful. I could speak meaningfully about fishermen from Ecum Secum to Halifax and from Halifax to Hubbards. However, this has already been eminently done by the hon. member for South Western Nova and the mover of this amendment. I support their views and concern. I simply echo the concern of those who live in Dartmouth and along the eastern shore of Nova Scotia.

What I wanted to do, because it is appropriate to the bill albeit a little out of context but still very important with respect to the development of this new department of the environment, was talk to the minister for a moment or two about the way in which he ought to approach the question of information about his department. If I go a little outside the scope of the amendment I can quickly bring myself back within its terms, Mr. Chairman, and I know you will remind me if necessary. In recent months we have heard a good deal about information arrangements. I relate this in no small way to the role of information regarding the omnibus bill which is before us, because it is important in that sense if not in the total sense. Perhaps before we vote on the amendment tonight and move to the next clause, the minister will express his views on the subject and answer some questions I have in mind.

I wonder whether with respect to information the minister has considered instituting his own system. Will the new department have its own resources in dollars and cents and professional expertise to build up its own data system, experts who will be able to identify, through his policy directions, his needs in terms of the acceptability to the department of the environment of information from other sources? Or will he develop his own source in response to the need for bringing to him the type of information which would satisfy his requirements? I wonder if he intends to do anything about the storage of such data. I wonder if he will do anything about retrieving it as required. I wonder what he intends to do about computerizing it. I wonder what he intends to do about analysing it.

Mr. Davis: What has this to do with the amendment?

Mr. Forrestall: I am talking about a deputy minister, the man through whom the minister must translate into practical working arrangements his own particular views. I can do this in half an hour or it can be done now, but one way or another you will get a little lecture from the junior member for Halifax about careful planning. I will bring it within the scope of the debate by indicating the necessity for a deputy minister. I do not think it is in character for the minister to be smart or impertinent. He has had a bad week or ten days. What hon. members opposite do not need in this chamber tonight, what the minister does not need, are enemies, particularly as he goes ahead with the work in front of him.

I wonder how he would go about creating the type of staff which will analyse this information, in the sense that it will be useful to him and to the people who are directly affected, in this case the fisheries; but not only fisheries, the total environmental program. The problem which occurs to me is that data collected by non-users of the data is very often of little practical relevance to those who are forced to use it. Put it in another sense and relate it to the deputy minister. The expenditure of public funds must be justified, with the result that the broad data collected is not forced down the minister's throat with respect to fisheries, or any other program in which he is involved, by somebody who has collected the information and finds he has to justify it because it involves the expenditure of public moneys. This is particularly true when the collectors of the data which must find its way to the minister are people who have no concern for the area in question.

If the program is to be successful it must be geared to the requirements of the minister. One of these requirements is fisheries. A broader requirement is the environment, the concept of the world we live in. I ask again to keep this information relevant. How is the information with respect to fisheries to be placed in front of the minister? In what form is it to be placed in front of the minister, unless there is a knowledgeable and acceptable deputy minister in charge of fisheries?

If the program is to be expanded, the department must have its own source of professional expertise. It must not be the result of random information passed to the minister in a form that neither he nor his department are capable of understanding or applying. He must have around him that area of expertise which is intelligible in the area of immediate concern. If he does not, the program will fail simply because he will be at the mercy of collectors of information, not users of information. The minister should be the user of the information.

The Chairman: Order, please. I have been listening to the hon. member carefully. I think he has tried very skilfully to keep his observations relevant. At the same time, the matter the committee is now considering is, very briefly, whether there should be appointed an official called a deputy minister. Perhaps the remarks of the hon. member would apply more when clause 6 of the bill is under consideration. I mention this in the hope that the hon. member will come back to order.

Mr. Forrestall: I am afraid you will have to rule me out of order, Mr. Chairman. The point I am trying to make is that there is a necessity for a deputy minister in this department with responsibility for fisheries. How will information be transmitted to the minister from somebody about whom we know nothing? You are right, Mr. Chairman. I am not only talking about the Department of Fisheries and the necessity for a deputy minister; I am talking about something I believe to be very revelant. If Your Honour orders me to sit down, I will, and I will speak again on a later clause. But I make the point that unless the minister gathers around him the expertise to determine what his requirements are, the legislation will fail.

I do not want this legislation to fail simply because we have been shortsighted, narrow minded or concerned with other matters. The role of the fisheries in this country is a very important one. If those who are somewhat removed from salt water are not aware of this, then I suggest they become aware of it. The economy of this country has been built in no small way upon the efforts of those who go out in small and in large boats to reap the harvest of the oceans. If the hooter from Hamilton questions that, I suggest he goes east some time, goes out in a dory and finds out what life is all about.

I think the presence in the chamber of so many members on the other side is indicative that we are going to have a vote. I should like to know how many members opposite have spoken on this bill. Let the former mayor of Toronto tell us how he feels about it, or the great oil man from Calgary. Let them talk to the fishermen and the unemployed of Canada. They do not even listen once in a while to those who express concern for the fishing industry of Canada, and this the fishermen in my part of the country find difficult to understand. This situation is symptomatic of the approach of hon. members opposite. What we need, instead of all the tired debate we are having on this bill, is a statement by the minister on how he will determine what information he needs to cover the broad spectrum of his responsibilities, including the necessity for having a deputy minister of fisheries. I hardly think that such a statement would be irrelevant to the debate.

The point I am trying to make was put much better than I can put it in a recent address to an international symposium held in Ottawa. Mr. R. F. Tomlinson, chairman of the symposium, in his opening address to the International Geographical Union Commission on Geographical Data Sensing and Processing made the following pertinent observation in regard to the value of making the proper use of information:

> The environment is enormous; there will be too much environmental information available even with the use of current capabilities for data gathering in the next ten years, let alone the next one hundred years, for it to be handled efficiently and economically. The need, then, is to be selective about the data which will serve as a basis for the decision making process. For this reason, the data required must be chosen by the agencies responsible for their use, and not, as at present, by the agencies responsible for their collection.

This is the point I am trying to make to the minister, and if the minister is to remain credible I hope he will heed this suggestion. I hope he will be the one to determine his requirements in regard to information, instead of reacting to the advice of collection agencies that spell out his programs on the basis of information supplied to them by other agencies.

An hon. Member: Such as Information Canada.

Mr. Forrestall: Yes, and others. I am not saying that their information is not of value or pertinent. However, unless the minister seeks the advice of professional experts and determines his own requirements—such as appointing a deputy minister of fisheries—I do not think—

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member to inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister one or two simple questions before he accepts the amendment. Has the minister consulted the provinces in regard to eliminating the Department of Fisheries, and would he give the committee an indication of the response he received?

Mr. Davis: The answer really is no, Mr. Chairman. I have described our program and our new department to provincial ministers who are interested in the fisheries, forestry, wildlife, water and air. I have not asked them for their advice, nor have they sought mine in regard to the reorganization of their departments. Many of them are making changes that are similar to the ones we are proposing.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Lundrigan: Has the minister received any reaction from any of the ten provinces in regard to the diminution of the role of the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. Davis: I think I answered that question, Mr. Chairman. I outlined to them what our plans are and I have not received any unfavourable comment.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, the first question I asked the minister was whether he had had any consultation winth the provices. I then asked whether the provinces had made any recommendations. I can hardly believe that the answer to my first question was what I thought I heard, that there had not been any consultation although the program had been explained to the provinces. Has the minister not had some sort of discussion to iron out some of the difficulties of consultation and future planning with provincial departments of fisheries and their future relationship with the now non-existent branch of the new department that will be set up to deal with the fisheries? Provinces like Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia will continue to have their own department of fisheries, so I should like to know whether the minister has ironed out with the provinces how discussions will be held on a federal-provincial level.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, we have had discussions about programs and policies of a general character. We have also had some discussions, particularly at the council of resources ministers, as to the way we were organizing to cover our new responsibilities. The provinces were not asking Ottawa how to organize their affairs, nor were we asking them for their advice as to how we should organize our affairs.

Mr. Lundrigan: Perhaps I could follow that line of questioning, Mr. Chairman. When we have international discussions and bilateral discussions, as we have with the Soviet Union and anticipate having again with them and other countries, and when we have discussions on the Law of the Sea and what we hope will be a marine resources conference among various nations at some time in the future, who will represent the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. Davis: It is hard to say, but we will get the most competent people we can to represent us, whether they are in the public service or have to be retained from outside.

Mr. Lundrigan: I hope the minister will not send the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I am sure this will meet with the approval of the House. In reacting to the debate we have had today, would the minister indicate whether it whould be in order, in accepting the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Shore, to have a very competent person in marine resources and fisheries as the deputy minister, that is, the type of person with expertise similar to Dr. Needler? He commanded tremendous international respect. It will be necessary to have that kind of man at the highest level in the department in order to carry on the bilateral discussions we must have if Canada is to continue to maintain a fishing industry.

Mr. Davis: I think the simple answer is that we hope Dr. Needler will continue to represent us at these negotiations. We will be asking him to act on a retainer basis to perform some of the functions he has performed in the past in the international sphere. We will have both Dr. Needler and an Assistant Deputy Minister of Fisheries, which is a better arrangement than the hon. member is proposing.

Mr. Comeau: Did I understand the minister to say that Dr. Needler would be associated with the department? If he is to remain in the department, what will his position be? Will the minister make a comment in this regard? My question is simple.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Comeau: Some hon. members only come here to say, "Come on" and, "Oh, oh". That is all they are here for tonight. We never see them here in the evenings. Some of the faces we see here tonight we hardly recognize. Will the minister accept his responsibility, while he is still Minister of Fisheries, of protecting the interests of the fishermen by accepting the amendment presented by the hon. member for South Shore? Give us some argument as to why you are going to defeat this amendment. We understand you intend to, because you have all your members here.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Comeau: Does the minister not want to answer my question or present any argument? Can he tell us who the deputy minister of the new department will be and where he will come from?

Mr. Davis: The Prime Minister has already announced the appointment of Mr. Robert Shaw as the prospective deputy minister of the new department of the environment. The present Deputy Minister of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, Dr. Needler, has indicated that he would be willing to negotiate an arrangement with the department to help us out, particularly in the international sphere. So I hope we will have the services of both these gentlemen in the years ahead.

Mr. Comeau: Can the minister state what experience the new deputy minister will have in the fishing industry?

An hon. Member: None. He was with a foundation company.

Mr. Comeau: Can the minister answer that question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MacInnis: I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. He said that the Prime Minister has announced that Mr. Shaw will be the deputy minister. Will the minister ask his colleagues why Mr. Shaw was chosen for this particular position, when he was recommended by members of the cabinet to be chairman of the board of Devco? The cabinet also chose Mr. Fullerton, and everybody knows Mr. Fullerton's record.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to yourself and the lateness of the hour, I want to complete my—

Some hon. Members: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Forrestall: Hon. members may laugh and treat this matter as lightly as they wish. The urgency of having somebody next to the minister who has expertise and an awareness of the industry may be important in a very minor way to most hon. members over there, but some of us think it is very important. I should like to reiterate, in order to complete the remarks I started earlier—

The Chairman: Order, please. I realize the hon. member is entitled to the floor, and I want him to have it. My only admonition is that his remarks should be relevant to the amendment under discussion in the committee.

Mr. Forrestall: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to describe to me the relevant procedure for transmitting information to the minister. I suggest that Mr. Robert Shaw knows not a wit about fishing. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I ask the minister when was the last time he was out in a dory.

Mr. Bell: Another Jack Pickersgill, that's all he is.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, when I moved the amendment to clause 4 this afternoon I did so in all seriousness and with the realization that the fishing industry is, and will be, in desperate need of a spokesman during the months and years ahead. As the minister is very much aware, the fishing industry in Canada today is facing very serious problems. The fishing industry is faced with a tremendous problem in respect of mercury pollution in Atlantic Canada. It is faced with a tremendous problem of overfishing by foreign nations on our continental shelf, to the extent that our resources are being seriously depleted. I am aware that the minister has taken some action to conserve our haddock stocks. He is also aware that his action has not in any basic way helped solve the problem. I say to hon. members who have enjoyed a dinner of haddock, you would be well advised to obtain that fish if you can find it in the supermarkets, because the quantity available is seriously depleted on the offshore banks and the continental shelf.

An hon. Member: No commercials, please.

Mr. Crouse: This is only one of the many problems facing our fishing industry. In moving the amendment to clause 4 I realize that our fishing industry needs as its spokesman a person who will have as his primary concern the needs of Canadian fishermen. This is a primary industry which provides employment for many thousands of people in Atlantic Canada. Fishing is the only type of work these people know. Through circumstances beyond their control, many of them are uneducated and cannot be readily trained for other types of employment.

We cannot allow this industry to be relegated to second place. We cannot allow it to be put in a position where it will only receive secondary consideration by this government, by the minister and officials of the Crown. This is our genuine fear. It is a fear expressed to me by leading people in the industry in letters and telephone conversations. I wish hon. members could talk to some of the sea captains whose lifetime earnings have been spent on a long-liner which is now tied to the dock and cannot be put to sea for swordfishing. This is the problem that many of them face. They have put their entire savings into boats and equipment and now, through no fault of their own, they find their ships tied to the dock with no alternative fishery available to them.

The minister and his officials may well say that these ships can be converted to another form of fishing. However, the minister is well aware that there are very few types of fishing to which a longliner can be converted. A longliner does not require much power. You can put 300 horsepower in a 100-foot ship and it will have adequate power; but once long-lining is no longer profitable, you cannot use the ship as a scallop-dragger, for example, because the power has to be doubled.

The minister said that some way will be found to assist these fishermen. I wonder when he or the deputy minister of the environment will find the time to meet and counsel these fishermen and set up a plan to assist them. Will the government make available the necessary funds to repower some of these ships? A 600 horsepower engine costs in the neighbourhood of $60,000 or $70,000. These are astronomical figures to Canada's fishermen. You must remember, Sir, that their operations have not been overly profitable; they are operating in regions that are well known to be economically disadvantaged. Hon. members from Newfoundland could give a more graphic description of the plight of some of these fishermen. I am also well aware of the difficulties they face.

For all these reasons I ask—in fact if it is necessary, I beg—the minister to give careful consideration to what he will be doing by not making available a deputy minister who will be responsible for fisheries. The minister said a few moments ago that the retiring deputy minister, Dr. Needler, may well stay with the department for another few years. This is encouraging news and we welcome it. But I ask the minister, does this mean that Dr. Needler will continue in his position as deputy minister? If this is to be the case, the amendment I have moved is somewhat redundant.

I think that before we take a vote the minister should make a clear statement about the position of Dr. Needler. He has been with the department since 1929, I believe. He has a tremendous grasp of the fishing industry and tremendous knowledge gained through experience in the industry and of individual fishermen over the years. Dr. Needler's knowledge, as I have said before and as I repeat, would be invaluable to the fishermen and to Canada when this country attends the conference to determine the amount of fish which will be taken on our offshore banks. I refer to the international conference to be held in 1972. Therefore, I think it is necessary that the minister clarify the position of the one known specialist within his department, namely, Dr. Needler. We would like to know if he will continue as Deputy Minister of Fisheries. I hope the minister will make this clear to the committee.

Mr. Lundrigan: The opportunity to say a few words on fisheries when there are so many members in the House is rare, because I have never seen more than a dozen hon. members in the House when we have been talking about fisheries. I would like to supplement the remarks of my colleague, the outstanding fishermen's representative from South Shore who has been involved in fisheries ever since he was knee-high to a grasshopper, a man who understands the fishing industry of Canada from the dory to the dragger, the long-liner and the like. I was amazed a few minutes ago to hear several hon. members ask, "What the heck is a long-liner?" Someone else asked, "What is groundfish?" Perhaps they think it is something you put through a mincer to end up as a patty. I am not surprised at this lack of knowledge about fisheries in the House of Commons because we do not often have fish on the menu here.

We have in Canada five provinces on the Atlantic coast and one on the Pacific coast which are directly affected by the fishing industry. There is British Columbia, the east part of Quebec, the Gaspé area and the four Atlantic provinces. I do not know whether members know this, but fishing was the staple industry of the nation. They did not start Canada with the great industrial complexes of Ontario. They did not develop the railway across Canada to open up the fishing industry, either. That came a lot later than 1497. People came over from Europe and asked why we did not turn the east coast of Canada into a marvellous garden of marine resources, a great area where there exists the most advanced marine resource industry in the world.

The British, 400 years ago, milked the economy of the Atlantic region with their great naval fleets. The Spaniards sent out their fleets and so did the Portugese. They came across the Atlantic and developed the economy of the Atlantic region which supplemented their own economies. That was the beginning of these great European nations. The British always treated Newfoundland as a vessel moored off the Gulf of St. Lawrence, a very convenient vessel moored along great fishing banks such as the Grand Banks, the Georgia Banks and all the great fishing areas of the Labrador coast, Hamilton Inlet and Groswater Bay. We could never really develop our fishing industry because of lack of industrial expansion and because we did not have the type of taxation base to give us the necessary funds.

The Chairman: Order, please. I hope the hon. member will move very quickly to the area of relevance dealing with the amendment before the House. I hope his initial remarks are introductory, but I also hope he will soon speak to the amendment before us.

Mr. Lundrigan: Yes, Mr. Chairman, these are introductory, preliminary remarks. I want to lay the foundation. The fact is that we could not develop our economy appropriately because we did not have a taxation base, and the wealth of our resources was not developed to a point to allow us to develop our fishing industry. Twenty years ago we became part of the Canadian nation. But so far as Newfoundlanders are concerned, the Canadian nation has been most disappointing because it has never treated the fisheries as a major part of the economy, with the result that you get a sheaf of Newfie jokes passing around, just like the one that a member of the NDP told earlier this evening.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lundrigan: If hon. members would allow me to complete my remarks, their attitude is that the eastern Canadian is some kind of stepson in the unity of this great nation. We have to depend on handouts—this has been the case year after year—when trying to develop our economy. We have never been given a full opportunity to develop our resources, particularly the fisheries. The Canadian fishing industry has gone through several years of relative depression. The Soviet Union, West Germany and Poland have depleted our resources. Now I understand that even Algeria is building a fishing fleet.

The Chairman: Order, please. I invite the hon. member to move quickly into the area of whether or not there should be appointed a Deputy Minister of Fisheries. I know that he is building up an argument in this respect, but again I invite him to move quickly to the question of why, or why not, such a deputy minister should be appointed.

Mr. Lundrigan: I am not at all surprised that the Chair does not recognize the relevancy of my argument. In 1968, for example, the Russians took 25 per cent of the fish stock off the Hamilton Inlet Banks, which are the great spawning grounds for the Labrador fishery. The amount of fish they took was one billion pounds, enough to keep the biggest fish plant in my riding going for 100 years.

Canada has sat on its haunches. It has not moved aggressively to protect these resources. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has not had the backbone, the courage or perhaps the interest to take any initiative. We have not identified this industry as being important enough. We have not been determined to harvest these resources ourselves. Mr. Chairman, just check the tins of kippers that you put on hors d'oeuvre at your cocktail parties and you will find they do not come from Nova Scotia, P.E.I. or Newfoundland. They come from Europe, because the Germans sent over great fleets to take the herring, package them and send them back to us.

The Norwegians and the Icelanders have developed their fishing resources. The fisheries are almost their whole economy. But what have we done? This year, after all the fuss we have had about fish, all the racket we have raised, the "W5" programs on television with the minister coming across on the tube and saying he is aware of the problem, with the people of B.C. almost launching a naval attack on the Russians, and after the bilateral discussions we have had with the Russians, what have we done? We are going to retire the Deputy Minister of Fisheries. We are going to get rid of the Department of Fisheries. After spending a lifetime in the service of the fisheries, we are going to retire Dr. Needler and tell him, "If we want your advice one of these days, we will ask you."

The Minister of Fisheries is not concerned. He is moving into an area in which he is very competent. I know he will be competent in controlling various types of pollution. This is the job he has been seeking. But the government has not said that it will appoint one of the proposed ministers of state to be responsible for fisheries. No longer will we be able to ask questions in the House of the Minister of Fisheries. Instead, we will have a minister of the environment, another man called the deputy minister of the environment, and away down the line we will have an assistant, an associate, a kind of director or some other kind of character responsible for fisheries. This cannot be tolerated. The Prime Minister's Bill C-207 should be carefully torn up and thrown into a large waste paper-basket.

The people of Canada whom I represent, the fishermen of Canada, are not fully aware of the implications of this legislation. At a time when France, the U.S.A., Germany, England and other countries are setting up special departments to launch an aggressive initiative in the area of harvesting marine resources, because they know this is the last great frontier, we in Canada are eliminating our Department of Fisheries in order to create a very beautiful, sweet tasting, sugar-coated department of the environment, and this solely because environmental pollution is the political issue at the moment. That will not solve the problems of the fisheries. It will be a sad day for the fishermen of Canada when this bill is passed. If the government does not want to help us harvest our fishery resources, then it had better develop a beautiful welfare scheme or put us all on the dole.

The Chairman: Order, please. I hesitate to rise again because this is the third time that I have interrupted the hon. member. With respect, I think the hon. member has not dealt with the amendment that is before the committee. I earnestly invite him to deal with the question of the appointment or non-appointment of a deputy minister of fisheries.

Mr. Lundrigan: If I am going to have as much trouble convincing the minister as I am the Chair, then I had better quit right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, the question posed by the mover of the amendment is serious enough to warrant a reply from the minister. How, exactly, will the fisheries be represented in the new department—in what capacity, at what level and with what authority in relation to the minister? I will accept your admonition, Mr. Chairman, and not talk about information, although I think that is equally relevant. Before we vote on the amendment I think the minister should reply.

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Chairman, on the understanding that this will be the last statement before there is a vote on this issue. The organization of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry at the moment is that we have a deputy minister. We have an Assistant Deputy Minister of Fisheries and an Assistant Deputy Minister of Forestry. That structure will be retained in the new department. We will have an Assistant Deputy Minister of Fisheries and an Assistant Deputy Minister of Forestry so that organizationally the new department is the same as the old one.

The real problem that the fishing industry has faced over the years is that of environment, pollution, power dams, discharges from industry, sewage from cities, and so on. If we deal with the environmental problems we will have solved half of the problems of the fisheries. If we can get the ocean fisheries on to a sustained yield basis, which again is a matter of environment, we will have gone three-quarters of the way toward solving the fishery problems of this country. So basically our approach is to deal with the main problems of the fisheries by dealing with the environment of the fisheries. Hence a new department of the environment.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

• (9:30 p.m.)

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Crouse) negatives: Yeas, 29; nays, 51.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Duties of Minister.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, yesterday I took advantage of the discussion on clause 3 to ask some questions about the water problems encountered in Ontario. Clause 5 stipulates and lays down the duties of the minister and the different areas in which he has such duties. I am thinking of the water problems of Ontario, one of the most outstanding of which is the one that has developed in the Great Lakes and particularly in Lake Erie. I ask the minister whether there have been any recent agreements involving the International Joint Commission, the government of the United States and our federal government on setting a date for cleaning up Lake Erie. Has a target date for any such cleanup been set?

This is a tremendous problem. We find that 30,000 tons of phosphates are dumped into Lake Erie every year. When one realizes that 1.5 pounds of phosphate enrich 10,000 gallons of water, one can imagine the effect of 30,000 tons of phosphates being dumped into Lake Erie each year. Anyone who has been in that area realizes that something must be done. I know that the federal government assists the provinces, through CMHC, in sewage programs.

I am glad the minister in charge of housing is here tonight because I should like to ask him a question in connection with this water problem and sewage. I understand that the money to be allotted to the provincial governments has been used up. I am referring to the money that is available from CMHC to assist the province of Ontario with its sewage problems. I understand that all the money available in that fund has been used up. Is that correct?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, the sewage treatment fund for 1970 was allocated early in the year. Like most of our budgets it is, I fear, not sufficient to meet all the requests or needs. There was an increase in the sewage treatment fund in 1970, from $50 million to $75 million. Those funds are all committed and used up. They were used up some months ago. Further requests are coming in for 1971. The CMHC budget will be announced very shortly. We shall be in communication with all the provinces, including Ontario, with regard to their share of the sewage treatment fund as well as other matters. At the moment I cannot disclose that share because I am still awaiting final approval. I expect to wait for another few days.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Ontario minister in charge of the environment has been writing to the minister. He has complained that he has not received replies. He wrote to the minister in November in connection with this matter and is disturbed because he has not received a reply. I presume that the minister will decide how much to give the province before replying to the letter. Is this correct?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, I cannot remember the letter to which the hon. member has referred. I would be chagrined if the letter had arrived and had not been acknowledged. I rather suspect that this is the case. I will check forthwith. I return to the main point. The fact is that the 1971 budget is being considered now. The funding will be made known to all the provinces very shortly and, indeed, to the House at the same time.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, is there to be an increase for 1971 as compared with 1790?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, hope springs eternal in the human breast. I am hopeful that that will be the case. However, until my budget is ready to be announced in the House I could not deal with the kind of detail the hon. member seeks.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, may I address a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry whom we understand will be in charge of programs involving the environment. Could he answer the question as to whether there have been any agreements or discussions with the federal authorities of the United States? Has any deadline been set for cleaning up Lake Erie, or is any percentage of that lake to be cleaned up within a certain time? Will that be possible? Have there been any discussions in this regard? If so, what deadline has been set?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member knows, the International Joint Commission tabled its final report, including a number of recommendations some months ago. Those recommendations were to the effect that a number of water quality objectives be met in Lake Erie and Lake Ontario and that they be met by the mid-1970s. This recommendation has gone not only to the government of Canada but also to Washington. We expect to hear shortly as to the endorsation or otherwise by the United States government with respect to these objectives.

Mr. Howe: I understand that this clean-up will necessitate the use of special equipment which is provided for special programs already under way, in particular in Ontario. I talked to some Ontario officials today and understand that in the interim the province will require $30 million in order to instal nutrient-removing equipment in existing sewage disposal plants. Will the government go part way with the province in meeting this expenditure?

Yesterday the minister told the committee that the extent of federal aid in these water programs would depend, of course on, whether the federal government was involved. In this case there is an indication apparently, that it is involved because the waters I am speaking of are international waters, and the recommendation referred to has been made by the International Joint Commission. I was told that $30 million would be needed. I expect the minister knows about this already. I hope the federal government will help the province and provide part of the $30 million which is necessary to obtain this special equipment. The equipment must be installed and used in conjunction with present sewage treatment programs if Lake Erie is to be cleaned up as we hope it will be. I do not ask the minister to give me a definite, affirmative answer tonight. I merely ask, will the federal government help the province of Ontario in this program?

Mr. Davis: The answer is definitely yes, Mr. Chairman. The figures which the International Joint Commission quoted were between $200 million and $250 million to clean up the Ontario side of the lower lakes, and roughly six times that amount to clean up the United States side. As has been the case in recent years, I am sure that the Canadian government will, through loans, assist the municipalities with sewage treatment plants in future years. I think the annual expenditure of this program to clean up the lower lakes will run somewhere between $30 million and $40 million per year, not $30 million in total.

Mr. Howe: Perhaps I have the wrong figure; it may be $30 million a year as the minister has suggested. I am glad to hear that funds will be available. As this is a specialized program, I sincerely hope this will not be considered part of the money received through CMHC, but that it will be a special fund to assist the province of Ontario in this area. They have already set up sewage treatment programs. If this money is taken out of the funds allocated through CMHC, there will be less money for that and for developing new programs where they are required.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, concerning clause 5, I would ask the minister whether he has received a report from those in charge of the investigation into the polluted waters flowing into James Bay, which created major problems for Eskimos fishing for white whales.

Last year, white whales were considered unfit for consumption because of mercury pollution, whereas this cetacean is an important source of food for the Eskimo population living along the coast of Hudson's Bay.

Following questions put by me at the end of 1970, I was told that an investigation was under way to determine the source of mercury pollution in James Bay and Hudson's Bay.

Has the minister had any reports on this investigation and is he in a position to tell us what steps are to be taken to avoid that waters flowing into this inland sea continue to be polluted by industrial plants. In fact, there is not much doubt that they are responsible for such pollution.

[English]

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Chairman, our scientists and engineers have been making investigations. The principal sources of pollution by mercury from industry have been detected. The industries in question have taken the appropriate action and the discharges of mercury have been reduced by more than 90 per cent. By April 1, these will have been reduced by more than 99 per cent. However, the mercury in the river system and in James Bay is persistent. The problem may continue for some months or even years.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister. Can he say which industries have been a source of pollution in the rivers flowing into James Bay?

[English]

Mr. Davis: The principal source of pollution and the principal source of mercury in this case is the industry manufacturing chlorine and caustic soda, normally referred to as the chlora-alkaline industry.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, clause 5 of this bill gives the minister of the proposed department tremendous responsibilities and authority. He will be responsible for a whole list of important aspects of our life. Under subclause (c) the minister is responsible for water. I presume that means the quality of water. Under subclause (e) the minister is responsible for the following:

> the protection and enhancement of the quality of the natural environment, including water, air and soil quality;

These are very important responsibilities. The minister and his officials have been thinking about the problems which we will face in the future. A very interesting and important paper was presented by Mr. J. W. MacNeill, director of policy research in the department, at a meeting in Washington. I shall quote from that paper because the author deals very well with some of the problems which Canada will face:

> —Canada is now one of the most highly urbanized countries in the world—
> —73 per cent of the Canadian population was urban in 1966. By 1981 this proportion is projected to rise to 85 per cent and by 2000 to 94 per cent—
> —within 30 years more than half the population of Canada—some 16 million people—will be resident in 21 centres stretching along the St. Lawrence lowlands from Windsor to Quebec City.

This being the case, the minister and his officials must realize what is happening in terms of urbanization of this country. I am completely astounded and constantly amazed at the lack of concern the federal government has shown about what is happening. In the largest cities in Canada we are permitting, and the minister is encouraging by his lack of action, municipalities to dump almost all or most of their waste into rivers fronting or running through them, with virtually no treatment. What is the federal government doing about this situation? Almost nothing.

The Sixth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, entitled "Perspective 1975" deals with this question. It states that the following cities have virtually no facilities for the treatment of sewage being dumped into rivers or the sea: St. John's, 100 per cent no treatment; Dartmouth-Halifax, 99 per cent no treatment; Quebec city, 100 per cent no treatment; Montreal, 91.6 per cent no treatment; Windsor, 85 per cent no treatment; Saskatoon, 93 per cent no treatment; Vancouver, 59 per cent no treatment; Victoria, the capital of British Columbia, 98.9 per cent no treatment.

An hon. Member: What about Toronto?

Mr. Orlikow: Toronto is doing somewhat better, no thanks to the federal government. For a considerable time the citizens of Toronto have been trying to meet the problem. This also applies to my city of Winnipeg. What is happening around the capital of this country, Ottawa? In the 80 miles between Ottawa and the mouth of the Ottawa River, near Montreal, there are 14 communities which are pouring raw sewage into the Ottawa River, ten in Quebec and four in Ontario. I am not going to deal with the pulp and paper plants because the minister stated that they have a program and timetable. I will take his word for it. I think, however, that they should speed up the timetable. The minister stated that within seven years it is expected that even the old pulp and paper plants will have installed the kind of equipment which will end the dumping of effluents into the rivers.

• (9:50 p.m.)

The minister has said not a word about the problem of the cities and, particularly, of sewage disposal. Ottawa only takes care of 30 per cent of its sewage; 70 per cent is dumped into the river virtually raw. The city of Hull, with a population of 57,000 people, has no facilities for sewage treatment. I have already mentioned Montreal. I put these facts on record not because I am critical of the cities—no one living in any city in Canada can fail to notice how his taxes go up year by year—

Mr. Whelan: May I ask the hon. member a question? How recent are his figures?

Mr. Orlikow: I said these appeared in the sixth annual report of the Economic Council. That was published probably last year or the year before.

Mr. Whelan: I know that the city of Windsor last year turned one part of the city into a treatment plan.

Mr. Orlikow: Then I congratulate Windsor, but I would be interested to know how the figure I quoted for Windsor of 91 per cent untreated sewage has been reduced. I am sure that a substantial majority still goes untreated. It is not that the municipalities are unaware of the problem. On March 3, 1970, the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities made a submission to the Commons committee which was then discussing the water act. The submission shows clearly that they recognize their fault and they came to the federal government for help. I quote a few sentences from that submission:

> The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities recognizes that to make such a massive co-operative effort successful—

They are talking about sewage treatment systems in Canada.

> —municipalities will be called upon to assume many responsibilities, to make many important adjustments in their programs and methods of operation and, in many cases, to alter their scales of priorities for spending.
> There is little doubt among municipalities that the primary creative role in combating air and water pollution should be assumed by the provinces.

The brief went on to say:

> Federal involvement, through fiscal, technical and resarch assistance and, ultimately, through punitive sanctions, seems absolutely essential to effective planning and enforcement in any region in Canada.

I do not have time to quote further from the submission, but it is clear from the few passages I have placed on record that the cities of Canada know what the problems are. What they are looking for now is leadership and meaningful assistance from the federal government.

An hon. Member: You mean money.

Mr. Orlikow: Yes, they are looking for money. I say that in 1971 to have a city the size of Montreal, a city of 2.5 million people, dumping its sewage untreated into the St. Lawrence River is a disgrace. And what has Ottawa done about it? Nothing. Ottawa has said: We have $75 million a year available for all of Canada but if you want to hold the Olympic games we will give you substantial financial help. It is circuses instead of bread. I would take the government more seriously if instead of the fine phrases we get from them they were to show real concern by putting up the money required.

The minister has told us that in seven years he expects the pulp and paper mills to have cleaned up the pollution they have created over the years. I wish he could get up and say that within twice seven years or three times seven years the cities of Canada will have been required, forced by law and helped by the federal government to end the disgraceful practice of dumping raw sewage into the rivers and lakes of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I have a few words to say on this clause.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Harding: It is anything but a filibuster. Clause 5 is very important.

Mr. Deakon: We all know that.

Mr. Harding: I should like to read the clause:

> The duties, powers and functions of the minister of the environment extend to and include all matters over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, not by law assigned to any other department, branch or agency of the government of Canada, relating to—

Then follows a long list of the items with which the new department will be concerned. In my opinion there are several gaps in this program. The most important concerns our Arctic areas, 40 per cent of Canada's territory.

The Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GRAIN—SHARING BY GOVERNMENT OF COST OF STORAGE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on January 13, as reported at page 2369 of Hansard, I asked the minister in charge of the Wheat Board the following question:

> In view of representations by representatives of the farm organizations concerning the storage of the six major grains, can the minister say whether or not the government has decided to share the cost of storage of some basic amount of these six major grains, or whether the government is at least considering such a policy?

The minister replied that discussions were going on with the producers about many things—I did not ask him about many things—but that it was not his intention to speculate on the results of the discussions until a full announcement could be made. I chose to discuss the matter on this occasion because I hope that the minister will reconsider what seems to me to be a position on which he has already made up his mind. It seems to me that the minister gave me a non-answer, one that many in the House, and more importantly the members of farm organizations, feel indicates conclusively not only that the government is going to cancel its program of sharing with the producers the storage costs of wheat but that his mind is closed on this and other similar measures.

With this type of stubbornness and arrogance the minister continues to ignore basic principles and minimal fundamentals that apply to agriculture, specifically—in this case—to western grain farmers. He offers not the slightest acknowledgement or even shows an awareness of the fact that, in fairness if nothing else, the Prairie grain farmer is entitled to treatment and benefits that are at least equal to those the government feels justified in providing to other sectors of the economy, sectors that are not nearly so basic to our economy.

The government to which the minister belongs feels it is fair and proper to pay up to $120 million to store and stockpile uranium, to pay millions of dollars to support our gold mines or to pay millions to subsidize the railroads, but that somehow it is bad for the nation to share with the Prairie grain farmers the cost of storing a reasonable inventory of grain. In his proposal—and had the minister proposed in this way to a lady he would have been a born loser—the minister states that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act would be abolished. This is an item that has cost the federal government an average of $41 million a year since 1956. By abolishing this measure the minister—I suspect in agreement with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), if not at his urging—will then have funds to pay most, if not all, of what he might need to put into what he calls the grain income stabilization fund.

This means that little or no new federal money will go into the western grain industry, particularly after the current crop year. In other words, the minister can be a hero to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance by using money already provided for a different purpose, getting the federal government off the hook so far as participating to a greater extent in the assistance of western agriculture is concerned. The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act gave proper recognition to the principle that the country as a whole has a responsibility to bear a fair share of storing an inventory of wheat, as is the case with gold. That act is not perfect; I think the minister as well as I would agree that there are inadequacies in it. But at least it took account of the benefit to the nation as a whole of maintaining an inventory of "on ship" or "en route to on ship" loading of western wheat.

Public responsibility for sharing the cost of storing this grain recognized the benefits to the nation as a whole of grain exports, as well as what it does for our foreign exchange position, for enabling our importers to have new avenues of trade with other nations and for the nation in the eyes of other countries, particularly those who buy our wheat. The minister can choose not to consider my views or those of my colleagues and I would not blame him for that. After all, we are members of the New Democratic Party and he is a Liberal. I can understand that, accept it and even forgive him for it. But he ignores at his peril and at the peril of agriculture the spokesmen of those organizations which represent farmers. They unanimously opposed the abolition of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I quote Mr. Ted Turner, president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, as follows:

—that some of the cost of grain storage is a public responsibility. Producers reject any move to eliminate that principle from national agricultural policy.

I ask the minister to reconsider, because I think he has made up his mind to abolish national participation in sharing the cost of grain storage. I suggest he will never find disagreement in me or farm organizations if he retains this principle and brings in new legislation that will provide a cost-sharing program for the storage of a reasonable amount of all six grains.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question the hon. member has raised was originally pinned to the question of a program of paying for storage, but he touched on a number of issues at the same time. One thing which is clear in the proposals that have been made, and upon which further discussions are to take place, is that the government's financial commitment to the grain industry is being significantly increased by the new form of action. This is due in no small measure to the fact that you will not find stronger advocates for the case of justice for the grain farmer than you find today in the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and other Liberal members from the Prairies who have been supporting the farmers so stongly.

The hon. member asks about farm representation. I say to him that when I put to farm organizations the question whether they are simply asking that more money be paid or whether they really want a storage program, they admit each and every one that it is the former rather than the latter in which they are interested. If the Wheat Board, for instance, were to pay for on-farm storage, and therefore the final price to the farmer would be lower, they would no longer be interested in such a program.

This simply turns us back once again to the fundamental and broad argument about whether it is right for the treasury to pay for the support of the grain industry. As I think our proposal indicates, our commitment in this regard has and is increasing, due in large measure to the stalwart support for the grain farmer of the Liberal members in this House.

AGRICULTURE—INQUIRY AS TO CONTINUATION OF FEED GRAIN FREIGHT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, as recorded at page 2892 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) the following question:

Could the hon. gentlemen indicate whether feed grain freight assistance will be continued, as requested at the meeting this week of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture?

The minister replied:

—early last summer we indicated that the rates in effect now will continue until the end of this fiscal year. Of course, in the new fiscal year we will have to bring estimates before the House for the appropriation of funds for the levels we set for that year.

I then asked:

I wonder whether the minister would tell me whether he said yes to me or whether he said no.

That is the purpose of my exercise at this time. This question is probably the most serious one to face agriculture in my part of Canada, and I make no apology for raising this matter at least once a year and for having this enjoyable debate during the "late show". There is suspicion among the farmers of the Atlantic area, and I think among others as well, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is trying to axe this program. I think the farmers also suspect that the Minister of Agriculture is a doughty proponent of the program, and I hope he will be able to hang in there and see that his colleague does not exercise what would be ridiculous and dangerous parsimony.

I have been talking to people who attended the meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, some of them being in the chicken business in Nova Scotia. Of course, chicken is one food that has not changed very much in price over the last few years. Enormous quantities are being produced now and dispensed to the public by such people as Colonel Sanders, Chubby Chicken, and the like. I asked the suppliers of this chicken whether they were getting greater returns for it: the cost must have gone up, so how on earth could they stay in the chicken business? After a long pause one of the most successful ones in Nova Scotia replied, "Well, it must be the feed grain freight assistance that made the difference between having a chicken farm that operates at a profit and one that would have operated at a loss". So it is frightfully important to the livestock industry in Halifax-East Hants and the adjoining farming communities in Nova Scotia.

I think the minister will recognize that it is important that these people receive an answer to the question, if only so that they may plan ahead. Who wants to be ordering extra livestock if suddenly the animals are going to be eating the head off the farmer because the assistance program is not forthcoming or is watered down? I think the minister will recognize the merit in my bringing the question before him at this time. The Nova Scotia Federation of Agriculture, in its position paper regarding the report of the federal task force on agriculture, made some points with regard to this problem. I quote from page 6 of this document as follows:

> We are amazed over the fact that no mention was made of the transportation problems, especially in the maritime region. Factors such as railway tariffs, transportation facilities, access to markets and systems of agreed charges are the root cause of many problems. A special study should be undertaken to look into this matter and recommendations made for the solution to these problems.

On the following page this statement is made, and perhaps it is a misprint:

> We must take great exception to the recommendation that the feed freight assistance program be disconinued by August 1, 1970.

This document was put out on November 1, 1970, so I am at a loss to understand why that particular date appears where it does. In any event, they make the point that Nova Scotia is only 20 per cent self-sufficient in feed grain production, most of which is oats: there is also some barley and mixed grains. They say, "The prospect of self-sufficiency by 1980 is a far removed dream". So I ask the Minister of Agriculture to take that message to the Minister of Finance and tell him to put it in his pipe and smoke it. We are not likely to become self-sufficient in this area, commendable or attractive as that objective might appear to be.

We are one country. In the west we have farmers who are growing grain and doing their darndest to find somebody to buy it. In the east we have farmers who for their livestock or chicken industries desperately need foodstuffs. So I suggest, what is more obvious and practical than to bring the supply to the demand and thus bring health to agriculture at both ends of Canada? Therefore, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture two questions. Will the program continue after March 31, 1971? If so, at what level? That is, will the formula be the same?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have no wish to question the hon. member's right to bring this matter before the House of Commons and to request or demand a reply. However, I do not believe he should purport to be the spokesman for the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I am aware of the motions that they accepted and the ones they defeated. I understand they are going to put them in a brief which will be submitted to cabinet. It will be presented by that organization very shortly to the cabinet. However, I want to make it very clear that as yet we have not received that brief based on the resolutions which were accepted and defeated at the recent convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

The hon. member is demanding a yes or no answer. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in many cases—this is one of them—the most accurate answer cannot be either a categoric yes or no because quite obviously there are anomalies that creep into the system, changes in the freight rates in various zones from one year to the next, and it is our intention in consultation with the farm organizations to review them and adjust them accordingly. I can say to the hon. member that there will be a feed freight assistance program after the end of March 31, 1971. He wants to know how and at what level the expenditures will be. I think he is asking a question that he knows I cannot answer. We have to bring these estimates to Parliament about April 1, at the beginning of the new fiscal year, and when that new fiscal year starts we generally make an announcement of what the rates will be.

Last year, during the course of the year, because of apprehension about the task force's recommendations, we announced that we were prepared to carry on the rates at the existing level to the end of this fiscal year. This year, if we can make the announcement early in the new fiscal year we will do so because it is useful for farmers to have that information.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—ALBERTA—ESTABLISHMENT OF FACILITY FOR DINOSAUR AREA

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in raising this matter tonight is in recognition of the fact that on some matters it is impossible to get governments to act, particularly where more than one level of government is involved, except through arousing public opinion. While I realize that within the four walls of this chamber tonight there is not present a very large segment of the Canadian public, nevertheless I hope to make a contribution to the resolving of the issue.

The record of Hansard will show that on January 13 last I sought unanimous consent of the House to move a motion which, if passed, would have resulted in the repatriation to the public realm of the areas of Wood Buffalo National Park alienated under timber lease agreements. In my introductory preface to the motion I indicated that what was going on in that national park was a complete negation of the basic terms of the national parks trust, and that it was incompatible with the general administration of national parks in Canada. As a matter of fact, what precipitated my decision to move that motion which, as you will recall, Mr. Speaker, did not get the unanimous consent of the House, was the story which appeared in that day's issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail, a Canadian Press story which was headlined, "National Park Being Stripped—Forester Says", the forester being one of the people involved in the administration in Alberta of the national parks.

Since that time I have seen a rather interesting cartoon depicting the buffalo trying to graze around in a sea of stumps. The implication was that this was not a very satisfactory habitat for wood buffalo. As a follow-up to that and as a result of the report of the attempt to have that motion dealt with in the House, a statement was issued by officials of the parks branch here in Ottawa to the effect that among other things the parks branch did not have the kind of money that would be necessary to repatriate these areas which were under timber lease. It mentioned that they had spent money buying out timber leases in Jasper and Banff National Parks. As a follow-up, I asked a question of the minister which Your Honour thought should be placed on the Order Paper. In Hansard this rather ambiguous heading appears over the question, "Alberta—Establishment of facility in dinosaur area".

• (10:20 p.m.)

An hon. Member: That refers to Liberals.

Mr. Barnett: That heading does not explain what kind of facility is meant. An hon. member near me has made a remark agout the kind of dinosaur in Alberta that I perhaps had in mind. However, Mr. Speaker, the question is a serious one and I was not altogether ignorant of what was involved when I asked it. As a matter of fact, the minister had an opportunity or replying as a result of a related question asked by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). He pointed out that timber is being cut in Wood Buffalo park and went on to say, as reported at page 2447 of Hansard:

—we are presently negotiating with the government of Alberta to establish new limits, as far as Wood Buffalo park is concerned, which would enable us to obtain in exchange the areas where dinosaurs are still to be found, in Alberta.

I think the minister's statement was a little ambiguous. I am sure members of the House realize that we were talking about rare dinosaur bones and not about living and roaming dinosaurs. The point at issue is this: When are the two governments going to get together and really do something about this matter? I remind the House that on April 23 of last year a minister of the Alberta government, Hon. A. O. Fimrite, appeared before the committee and presented a brief. He was questioned by the members of the Northern Affairs Committee on the subject. I refer to the issue of April 23. At page 12:42 Mr. Fimrite explains one section of the brief which says this:

If Wood Buffalo Park was fulfilling the function of a national park, matters would be much different, as a viable national park would be served by road or rail and significant facilities would exist to serve the visiting public. The operation of a national park similar in scope and attractiveness to either Banff or Jasper would be a substantial asset to the province. Such, however, is not the case.

He went on to say that not all national parks have the same kinds of attractions. He continued:

I would give as an example the Dinosaur Park in Alberta in which the federal government has indicated an interest for an exchange with Wood Buffalo park. The provincial government is prepared to consider this suggestion because this area does lend itself for a park of a type which would be the only area in Canada with this particular attraction.

This was said last April, almost one year ago, yet the other day in the House the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) said that the government is negotiating with the government of Alberta. I know that discussions between the two governments went on for a long time before the minister of the Alberta government made that statement before the committee. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, in Wood Buffalo park there is a basic violation with respect to national parks trust.

I suggest it is time the two governments got together, reached agreement and established new national parks in the province of Alberta. They should redefine the Wood Buffalo park's areas so that if there is logging in some areas it will be done under management and conservation arrangements and under the law of the province of Alberta.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help feeling that I am in an Alice in Wonderland atmosphere tonight. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) was somewhat vilified in the questions asked by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) and the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). I did not have the opportunity of responding to their questions. However, I now have the opportunity to respond to a question.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) devoted approximately 80 per cent of his time to timber operations in Wood Buffalo National Park. The question on the adjournment debate is the establishment of a dinosaur park in the province of Alberta. I am very pleased to have the opportunity on behalf of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) to respond to this very important question affecting the province of Alberta.

The desirability of including Dinosaur provincial park in the national parks system has been discussed with the province of Alberta since 1963. A joint federal-provincial survey of the area in June, 1966, confirmed that the scenic and scientific values are sufficiently significant to warrant designating this area as a national park. This area is reputed to be the richest bed of dinosaur fossils in North America, with well over 200 finds since the first fossil was found in 1912. The exposure of a large portion of the Oldman geologic formation in this area has resulted in an extensive example of badland topography. Within this park the prairie vegetation gives way to a dry vegetation type, providing a unique combination of plants and animals not portrayed in any national park of Canada.

Acquisition is directly connected with federal-provincial discussions on Wood Buffalo National Park. Alberta has requested the release of all Wood Buffalo Natioal Park lands in the province to permit resource exploitation. Successive federal administrations have rejected this request but have expressed a willingness to consider an exchange of some lands in Wood Buffalo for other areas of high quality in the province. This exchange would not necessarily be on an acre-for-acre basis. It is an express condition that national park values in Wood Buffalo be retained within any reduced boundaries.

The federal position was reiterated by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to the provincial minister responsible, Hon. J. Donovan Ross, at a meeting with him in March, 1970. At that time Dr. Ross was asked to submit a proposal indicating the lands within Wood Buffalo of interest to them and which could form the basis for an exchange of lands. That proposal has not yet been received.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 5, 1971

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN RETIRED EMPLOYEES' PENSIONS

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when I conveyed to the Canadian National Railways the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications some weeks ago I undertook at the first opportunity to return to the House with the response of the CNR to the various proposals which were contained in that report which had to do, of course, with the company's pension plan.

I am glad to be able to inform the House that I have been advised by the chairman and the president of Canadian National of steps being taken by the company to offer a substantial measure of relief to its existing pensioners because of the increase in the cost of living.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Pensioners under the Canadian National 1959 pension plan who retired on or before December 31, 1969, will have their pensions increased by 2 per cent for each year of retirement. For example, a pensioner who retired in 1969 will have his pension increased by 2 per cent; one who retired in 1960 will have his pension increased by 20 per cent; one who retired in 1950 will have his pension increased by 40 per cent, and so on. Similar increases will be made, I am pleased to say, in survivor benefits being paid to widows of deceased pensioners.

In the case of pensioners under the 1935 Canadian National pension plan, the non-contributory basic pension of $25 per month will be increased to $50 per month for those who retired in 1965 and prior years. For those who retired in 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969, the increase will be $20, $15, $10 and $5 respectively, since such pensioners are in receipt of pensions under the Canada and Quebec pension plans which more than make up the difference. These increases will be effective from January 1 of this year and payment will commence just as soon as the necessary procedures can be instituted, which will probably be April next.

I might point out that as announced by the company last fall, Canadian National 1935 plan pensioners who are in receipt of pensions toward which they had contributed now have the right to have their pensions recalculated under the 1959 or 1952 plan in force when they retired. If it is in their interest to do so, they will, of course, also receive the increases now instituted for 1959 plan pensioners.

These measures substantially implement the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications in so far as they relate to existing pensioners. Recommendations of the committee relating to employees in service have been included with the wage demands of certain bargaining groups and are currently the subject of negotiation between the railways and unions concerned. I am sure that all hon. members of the House will be as pleased as I am at this very welcome news for these pensioners of Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the minister for his courtesy in providing me with a copy of his statement before coming into the House. I must say that it is a case of the mills of the gods grinding rather slowly, since this is something that had been requested over a considerable period of time.

I do not think that we are giving these pensioners all that much when one considers what inflation has done to their pensions over most of the past decade. Nevertheless, this action does show there is a certain benefit in the parliamentary process and underlines the value of persistence, of committee study, and of digging in one's heels from time to time as a member of the opposition. Only a week ago I was talking to one of the gentlemen who made the pension decision and it certainly had not been made as of last Friday. He asked me what was going to happen to the CN and Air Canada financing bill that is before the House of Commons. I told him that I suspected it would come in for considerable scrutiny, even to the extent of an intensive study of the minutiae, unless we could be given some assurance that these old railway pensioners were being looked after. Apparently the message did get through. I assume that what has been done by Canadian National Railways will also include the pensioners of those older railways that now form part of the CN system.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that while the news is welcome in that it means the winning of a battle that has been carried on for a considerable period of time, the fact is that with the 2 per cent formula these pensioners have not been placed in the position in which they should have been in the first place.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, for those of us who have been working for an increase in the pensions of retired Canadian National employees for a long time—in my own case for nearly 25 years—this is a very welcome announcement. I enjoyed the comments just made by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) about some of the factors that have led to action being taken, such as our persistence over the years and the assurance in the last session or two that Canadian National matters would be debated rather fully. I think these as well as other factors have contributed to the realization that a favourable decision had to be made.

I welcome the support I have had in my own efforts from my colleagues who joined us in this parliament, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg). They, along with others, have been members of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I think it is another tribute to our committee system that as a result of deliberations in a committee there are times when an unanimous decision can be reached. This is what happened in that committee, and on behalf of all members of the committee I think I can say that each one was determined that in this session this objective would be achieved. I commend the members of that committee from all parties for the determination they have shown. It has now paid off.

I congratulate the many thousands of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways who will benefit from what has now been announced. But I am afraid I must also, in my own mind at least, think of the many thousands who should have had this increase over the years but who have passed on while we have been fighting this battle.

Mr. Speaker, the basic outlines of the plan so far as it goes are good. As the minister said, the proposal is somewhat along the line recommended by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, but there are two or three gaps to which I should like to draw attention.

In the first place, the plan for public servants which was announced on December 19, 1969, and put into effect on April 1, 1970, provided not only for 2 per cent per year for each year since retirement but provided for that 2 per cent to be compounded back over the years, so that 20 years, for example, would amount to much more than 40 per cent. I regret that this plan does not include that compounding element.

The second shortcoming is that in the plan for public servants not only were immediate increases for the number of years of retirement put into effect but it was provided that in subsequent years there would be further increases as the cost of living went up. In this case it seems to be an ad hoc increase with no provision for further increases as the cost of living goes up in the years that lie ahead. I hope that both these shortcomings will be looked at by Canadian National and that there will be improvements along these lines.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

In particular, I think that the existing CNR pensioners must get the assurance that this increase is not the last they are going to get, and that as the cost of living continues to go up they will get further increases just as retired public servants get them and just as others who have this provision get them.

The other gap is one to which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) referred. I mention it, but I do not do so in a quarrelsome fashion. He referred to the fact that there is nothing in this plan respecting those now in service. In the case of public servants we did the whole job at once. We guaranteed to those now working increases after they retire. The minister says that in the case of those now in service in the CNR this matter has been left to collective bargaining. I do not quarrel with that, but I trust that because of this precedent which has been set, because of other like precedents, and because of the wide concern of employees generally for such improvements, the result of collective bargaining will be to include a provision for the automatic escalation of Canadian National pensions for those now working when they retire.

Mr. Speaker, I have only one other word: Canadian Pacific Railway, please take note!

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we sincerely commend the minister for the announcement he has just made to the House. The persons who will be most happy about this announcement will certainly be the retired employees of the Canadian National Railways who for years have been asking for an adjustment of their pensions.

We realize that this increase will not satisfy all former CNR employees but this is a beginning and pensioners who devoted their lives to the service of the Canadian public deserve some consideration after they retire.

We were happy to hear the minister say how much attention the government pays to the representations of CNR pensioners. As I just said, this is only a beginning and I only wish for one thing: that the government will not stop following so good a course.

AGRICULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION PURCHASE PRICES FOR SKIM MILK POWDER AND CHEDDAR CHEESE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that the Canadian Dairy Commission will increase its purchase prices on skim milk powder and cheddar cheese, effective February 8.

The new price for skim milk powder will be 24 cents per pound; it is now 20 cents. The basic price for cheddar cheese is to be 51 cents per pound; it is now 47 cents.

These increases, which are the first in four years, will permit an improvement in market prices to producers for manufacturing milk. Hon. members will, of course, appreciate that negotiations with respect to milk prices to producers fall under the jurisdiction of the provincial agencies.

Two recent developments have made it possible to take this action at this time. The most important was the agreement between the commission and the respective authorities of Quebec and Ontario for a supply management program in those two major producing provinces, which I announced to the House on January 14. This guards against the possibility of an improvement in prices to producers resulting in unmanageable surpluses.

The situation on skim milk powder has changed dramatically in the past year. While production of this commodity is still considerably in excess of Canadian use, the price in export markets has improved substantially and the commission expects to have disposed of virtually all its stocks when the new heavy producing season starts in April.

These increases will have little effect on consumer prices. The new cheese price is slightly under the prices in the market in recent weeks. Skim milk powder is used to a considerable extent for industrial purposes.

It will be recalled that when the dairy support program was announced for the year ending March 31 the rate of holdback from subsidy payments, to finance the cost of disposing of surpluses, was set at 26 cents per 100 pounds of milk on deliveries by producers up to their subsidy quotas and $1.25 on deliveries in excess of subsidy quotas. This was calculated to yield an average of about 39 cents on all milk deliveries by quota holders.

When market quotas for manufacturing milk were established in Ontario and Quebec, effective December 1, 1970, the commission made it clear that the 26 cent rate was applicable only to March 31, 1971, and that the rate as of April 1 would be reviewed in relation to the cost of disposing of surpluses in the 1971-72 year. The commission will, over the next few weeks and in consultation with its advisers, determine the rates necessary to finance its export operations in the year starting April 1.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the statement made this morning by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), may I point out to the House that it was a rather curious statement. It indicates in no uncertain terms that there will be no increase in the prices to consumers in certain commodities. I think this will meet with general favour across the nation. What I am concerned about is the indication that there is to be an increase in the support price for powdered milk and for cheese. There is also an indication in the minister's statement that this will not cost the government anything. It is really hard to judge from this statement whether the producers will actually receive an increase. The minister stated that stocks of skim milk powder are almost depleted and that the price of 51 cents for cheese is lower than the current market price. Therefore this morning's announcement will not cost the government anything more unless there is a tremendous downward trend in the market place.

It is interesting to note that there is an indication of a further government policy—part has been announced to the House—whereby the holdback on overproduction of manufacturing milk will be doubled both for export sales and when the milk is disposed of to dairies. Despite the very optimistic tone of the minister's statement this morning I fail to see—I hope I am wrong—how the dairy producer will, in face of the over-all program, receive more for his production rather than less. When the dairy industry is made aware of this announcement, it will be very interesting indeed to find out what their reaction will be.

I want to make one final point concerning the government's policy toward the dairy industry. That policy is directed toward the elimination of a government subsidy to the dairy industry. It is bringing this about by a general over-all policy of curtailment of production in Canada. I am not so certain that this policy is correct in face of indications that over-all dairy production in the world is not sufficient to meet current world needs. This evidence is borne out by the disposal of our skim milk powder which, until a few years ago, was very hard to dispose of. There is an increased demand for skim milk powder. Our own production in Canada is so close to our consumption that there is a danger that from time to time we will have to import dairy products to a greater degree than we export them.

I believe the dairy industry will look very closely at this announcement and other announcements on dairy policy, because we may find in the very near future that we have curtailed our dairy industry to such a degree that it will not even be able to meet domestic requirements.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has announced that dairy farmers will receive an increase in the price of some of their products. We are happy to note that there will be an increase. Certainly farmers' costs have continued to rise and any such increase will at least help to meet a portion of the increase in their costs. While we agree that there should be some management of dairy supplies, we advocate a more positive approach to the manufacture and sale of new dairy products similar to what has been done in Europe. We feel that the federal government should give more leadership in the manufacture and sale of new dairy products.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) for his statement. We have not had too many chances to congratulate him in recent months, but I believe he is to be commended this morning for his motion providing that the Canadian Dairy Commission raise the price of both cheddar cheese and skim milk powder.

The purchase price of both skim milk powder and cheddar cheese will be increased by 4 cents. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that these steps will get the surplus to move rapidly in order to enable the government to allow farmers to increase their quotas. I believe that, at the present time, it is the quota system that creates more problems for the farmers.

The minister also tells us that the prices paid to milk producers are set by provincial agencies. According to the recent agreements, provincial agencies administer this sector, and I hope that the milk producers associations, the co-operatives and the federations will not use this increase to add to their expenses, but will pass it on to the producers. In fact, I am sure that the minister's first objective was to help the milk producer, who is today in such dire need of assistance. I hope that the new administrators of this sector, that is the agricultural federations and co-operatives, will offer better prices to the milk producers.

We are very happy with this statement and we hope, once again that the farmers will benefit from it while they are waiting for a higher subsidy in respect of quotas. If we want the farmer to get as fair a price as that paid for fluid milk, the government will have to consider increasing the price to $1.25 per hundredweight, which is the actual price paid for subsidized quotas, and this increase should not come into effect after March 1, 1971.

As I said, we are happy and I hope the farmers will benefit from this 100 per cent.

MANPOWER

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I beg the unanimous consent of the House in order to move a motion to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

[English]

Yesterday the Minister of Manpower and Immigration admitted outside the House that the general economic situation is worse than a year ago, and that more students will be unemployed this summer than was the case last year. Student unemployment last year would have been 10 per cent greater if the federal and provincial governments had not provided makeshift programs which private business could not while it slumped under a government created recession.

In Manitoba the minister's manpower department is now training college graduates to become businessmen at a time when the government has declared that businessmen and their employees are surplus to government policy. Mr. Speaker, I move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That this House condemns the government for its policy of providing students with paper diplomas instead of paper pay cheques.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for South Western Nova. The hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the House in order to put the motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROJECTED TAKEOVER OF HOME OIL COMPANY BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said he would keep the House informed regarding negotiations between Home Oil and Ashland Oil. I wonder if he is going to make a statement on that matter this morning?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This kind of question should normally be asked during the question period and consent sought to revert to motions. However, the question has been asked and as the matter is of interest to the House perhaps the minister might reply to the hon. member's question.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a statement on motions this morning.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INCLUSION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES ON AGENDA OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In light of the deepening youth and student unemployment crisis and in light of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration's pessimistic projections for the next six months, will the Prime Minister now advise the House whether he will put unemployment and also the question of financial assistance to the provinces as the first priority on the agenda of the premiers' conference to work out a comprehensive job-creating program now?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I already confirmed yesterday in response to the Leader of the Opposition that this topic would be discussed at the federal-provincial conference on Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that we now have mass unemployment among young people, and in light of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration's estimate that there will be 300,000 more students on the labour market this summer, what emergency employment measures has the federal government to recommend to the provinces at that conference? Could the Prime Minister briefly outline any new emergency legislation or new ideas or programs that he now has in mind?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the conference proceedings are, at the request of all participants, in camera, and it would not be appropriate for me to tell the House what is going to transpire there.

Mr. Woolliams: Without disclosing any goodies he has up his sleeve, has the Prime Minister any suggestion to make to the provinces in regard to helping these young people, particularly the 300,000 students who are coming into the labour market on May 1 from our universities?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question is a repetition of the previous one read by the hon. member, but I can tell him I have no goodies up my sleeve.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PLANS FOR PROVISION OF SUMMER JOBS FOR STUDENTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the statement made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration yesterday, and in light of the statement by the Canadian Student Liberals about the deepening unemployment crisis affecting students, would the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government is working on new plans, first of all so that more students will be employed this summer and, second, so that students who do get jobs will be employed for more than one or two months as was the case with so many of them last summer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government is working on plans for student employment this summer. I might say in reference to that publication that it very badly misquoted things I never said.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT—JOBS TO BE CREATED BY LOAN FUND TO PROVINCES

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, knowing that parliamentary secretaries are in the news these days I wish to direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. In view of the crisis among young people generally across the country, which will deepen in the coming summer, can the parliamentary secretary state how many new jobs will be created by the $160 million loan fund made available to the provinces?

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will bring the question to the minister's attention. The hon. member can be assured that it will be answered on a day when the Department of Finance is answering questions in the House.

Mr. Comeau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, that question was already taken as notice and I still do not have an answer. I thought the parliamentary secretary would have been interested and would follow it up.

FORECASTS OF STUDENT UNEMPLOYMENT IN 1971

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the government made any projections about the extent of student unemployment in 1971, and is he prepared to apprise the House and the country of the projections which have been made in order to give students, members of the public and members of the House of Commons an opportunity to make positive recommendations to the government to alleviate the problem?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I know of no such projections, Mr. Speaker, but the Minister of Manpower and Immigration may have made some. Perhaps the question could be addressed to him.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister plans to render the Minister of Manpower and Immigration at least partly unemployed by lifting from him his duty and responsibility for the Wheat Board, so that he will have—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much that the question as asked is not in order. The hon. member appears to be making a submission or representation and as such I would not think the question is in order.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I rephrase my question. Will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and of the Wheat Board or some other minister be designated to assume full responsibility for the unemployment problem in the country during a period when it has never been worse?

Mr. Trudeau: Judging by the question of the hon. member, the research staff of the Official Opposition must be partly unemployed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, judging by the presence in the House of just a handful of ministers today it looks like there will be a lot more unemployment. I would like to say, that the attitude of the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot engage in debate. The hon. member prefaces his supplementary by stating that he wants to say something. Unfortunately the rules provide that he may only ask a question and not make a statement. If he has a supplementary the Chair will allow the hon. member to ask it.

Mr. Lundrigan: I will not try to compete with the Prime Minister in being a smart-aleck.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PLANS FOR PROVISION OF SUMMER JOBS FOR QUEBEC STUDENTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): In view of the fact that approximately 18 per cent of the student population in Quebec were unable to find jobs last summer and in view of the present circumstances in that province, can the Prime Minister state whether any plans have been made to rectify that situation this summer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Prime Minister could reply to the question of the hon. member. However, I suggest to hon. members that the type of questions they are now asking should normally be answered by a general statement. The questions are very general. They may be pertinent, relevant and important, but they are phrased in such a way that normally they should be replied to by way of a statement. Having said that, the Prime Minister might reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have no answer.

Mr. Speaker: There are a number of hon. members who have supplementaries, but perhaps we might return to those who have supplementaries in a short while.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order. On a number of occasions it is the custom for the Chair to rule questions out of order. Does this not also apply to answers which are out of order? Should the Prime Minister not have been called to order on several of his answers today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROJECTED TAKEOVER OF HOME OIL BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of his promise on Tuesday that he would keep the House informed with regard to the negotiations which are going on between Home Oil Company of Calgary and Ashland Oil Company of Kentucky. Has an agreement virtually been reached which will leave the ownership of the company mainly in Canadian hands but place virtual control in the hands of Ashland Oil Incorporated of Kentucky?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge agreements are either reached or not reached. There is no such thing as "virtually having been reached". I do not think I can do anything useful by disclosing the state of negotiations at this time. I will inform the House when I have something definite to report. In the meantime, I will continue to use my office and such authority as I have under the law to do what I can to maintain Home Oil as a Canadian Company.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On Tuesday, as recorded on page 2975 of Hansard, the minister stated:

> I have urged upon them the desirability of maintaining a majority Canadian ownership and Canadian control in this company.

Has the minister been successful in assuring himself that there will be continued Canadian ownership and Canadian control of Home Oil Company?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I have no way of so assuring myself. Such is the case to date. As I stated, I will continue to do my best to assure that this situation continues.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I note that the minister has used the word "authority". Has he sought advice from the legal officers to determine whether he or his department or the government has the authority to interfere with this sale? I am thinking of the number of shareholders of this company across Canada and the effect on them and the company. Has the minister sought advice from the legal officers on the use of the same authority he used in connection with Denison Mines involving a completely different commodity, uranium?

Mr. Greene: In the case of Denison Mines, Mr. Speaker, it has been indicated that legislation will be brought before the House with regard to the ownership of uranium in Canada. If my understanding of the law is correct, this House can do anything except make a man a woman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: May I follow that up, Mr. Speaker? Now that the cat is out of the bag, is the government preparing legislation with regard to provincial fields where the federal government has no authority?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, any legislation that we propose will be within our authority and will be brought before the House in the proper manner.

INCREASED ACQUISITION OF IMPERIAL OIL SHARES BY STANDARD OIL OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Is the minister looking into reports that in the last few months Standard Oil Company of New Jersey has increasingly been acquiring shares in Imperial Oil of Canada and is now reported to own 68 per cent of the shares of that company?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am not familiar with those particular statistics, Mr. Speaker. I believe that over the years Standard Oil has, to the best of my knowledge, controlled Imperial Oil of Canada. It was my understanding that in past years a greater proportion of the stock of Imperial Oil had been made available to Canadians.

Mr. Nesbitt: Will the minister look into the reports that Standard Oil of New Jersey has been greatly increasing its holdings in Imperial Oil during the last two or three months?

Mr. Greene: I will be pleased to do that, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO RESIGNATION OF CHAIRMAN AND/OR OTHER COMMISSIONERS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received the resignation of Mr. John Carson, the chairman of the Public Service Commission, and/or any of the other commissioners as a result of the way in which the government has fumbled the handling of the memorandum in connection with Francophones?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not in correct procedural terms. The hon. member might like to rephrase his question.

Mr. Baldwin: I will restrain my feelings and not ask the last part of the question. Has the government received the resignation of Mr. John Carson, the chairman of the Public Service Commission and/or any of the other commissioners?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had not received it when I left my office this morning. I will check when I return. I can assure the House that if I do receive a resignation I will turn it down and ask the member to reconsider because they should not be discouraged by the bungling of the opposition.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PLANS FOR PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the concern expressed by the Cape Breton Deaneries of the Roman Catholic Church and the Cape Breton Council of Churches regarding the severe unemployment problem which is reaching crisis proportions in Cape Breton, and in view of the alarm expressed by these bodies concerning the apparent inactivity of the Cape Breton Development Corporation in developing programs to alleviate this grave situation, will the Prime Minister consider making a statement, or having the appropriate minister do so, as soon as possible indicating the short and the long-term plans of the corporation? In other words, what is the blueprint for the future of Cape Breton in so far as Devco is concerned?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REPORTED AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND QUEBEC GOVERNMENTS ON REPATRIATION AND AMENDMENT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the significance of the forthcoming meeting of Ministers of Justice, I have given him notice. Have the federal and Quebec governments agreed upon a formula for repatriation of the British North America Act and on an amending formula, as reported in today's Montreal Gazette in a Canadian Press story which states that the Quebec-Ottawa agreement has been worked out since last fall?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I thank the hon. member for giving me notice. I must say that this story is incorrect. What is correct is that the federal government and the provinces have been carrying out the mandate given to them by the September conference which suggested that parallel to the work which was proceeding bilateral talks should develop between the federal government and the various provinces. Since that September conference we have carried out our mandate. There have been meetings with all provinces trying to find ways of progressing with the constitutional debate. Proposals have been put forward by Quebec, and indeed by other provinces, but no agreement has been reached.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROTEST AGAINST SHELLING OF ISLAND OF CULEBRA BY CANADIAN FORCES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Has the right hon. gentleman received a protest from the mayor of Culebra against the shelling of that island by Canadian forces and, if so, what response has he made to the protest?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As a result of the news story I did check with my office and I had received no such correspondence before entering the House. I know that the Minister of National Defence is prepared to deal with the substance of the matter if he is requested to do so.

Mr. Brewin: I would so request him, then.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that Canadian naval units were not in the vicinity of Puerto Rico on the date mentioned in the news story which appeared in the Globe and Mail, that is, January 21. They were on station and shelling on January 27 and 28. On the first of these days no difficulties arose and no helicopters were airborne. On the second day Canadian ships took their place on station after ships of other countries. The safety officer sent a signal indicating that ships should cease firing because there was someone on the range. A Canadian helicopter participated in a search, with United States aircraft, to see whether the person could be located. No one was located within the area and the safety officer gave instructions to resume firing again.

With regard to one aspect of the report, I might tell the hon. member that tear gas is not carried in the inventory of Maritime Command and at no time on the day in question did the helicopter land or drop anything on the range. These are the facts of the situation as communicated to me.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Can the minister assure us that exercises of this sort will not take place in future near places where people live?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This particular operation was carried out under the NATO Atlantic Command and the arrangements were made with the NATO states involved in the exercise. In this case the range was within the jurisdiction of the United States authorities; the question might be discussed with them, but it seems to me they are the sovereign authority in this case.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE WITHOUT JURY RECOMMENDATION FOR MERCY

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of reports that the government has just commuted the death sentence of a convicted killer of a policeman, the first time this has occurred in the absence of a recommendation for mercy from the jury, will the government at least be honest with the people of Canada and make it clear that it has no intention of carrying out the existing law by presenting parliament with proposals for appropriate changes in the Criminal Code so that the people may at least have an opportunity to express their views on the subject?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot make that statement because the government does carry out the law and it will continue to carry out the provisions of the law. The law never did abolish the prerogative of mercy; it always rests with the Crown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO CONVENING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL-MUNICIPAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of housing. It has to do with a statement he made, I believe, in June 1970, in which he indicated to the House that he intended to convene a federal-provincial-municipal conference early in 1971. In view of the increasing economic and social difficulties faced by our cities, involving housing, municipal affairs, welfare, urban transportation and high unemployment, and bearing in mind that numerous provincial and municipal representatives have actively sought discussions on these matters and that the cities will likely have no representation at the forthcoming conference, will the minister tell the House why he has not been able to call such a conference as he himself proposed? What has prevented him from doing so and does he still intend to call one in view of the urgency of the situation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I do not think I said I would convene such a meeting, Mr. Speaker. That, of course, would not be proper, since jurisdiction affecting municipalities clearly lies with the provinces. However, I did indicate the willingness of the government to be a party to three-level consultation arrangements. I believe I can say with confidence that this idea has been furthered in the course of informal talks with several ministers of municipal affairs and, more recently, by letter. When, precisely, these discussions will take place, and what form they will take, is a matter for the provincial ministers to decide, as is proper. I expect to have a more definitive response shortly.

Mr. Alexander: I believe that in June, 1970, the minister also indicated to the House—he will correct me if I am wrong—that he was prepared to establish a national urban council. I hope he is in a position to tell the House when he intends to have this organization set up, or, if not, what has caused the hold-up.

Mr. Andras: This is one and the same subject. The question of tri-level consultation was deeply embedded in the proposal for an urban council. It is one of the forms of arrangement to which I was referring and my previous comment as to the role played by the provinces applies to this as well. It is unquestionably dependent upon agreement between ourselves and the provincial governments.

Mr. Alexander: Is it possible for the minister to give an assurance that immediately after the forthcoming conference he will use his good offices, together with those of his colleagues, to see that negotiations are begun toward a solution of the problems faced by municipal and provincial authorities. It is the municipal authorities who appear to be hit hardest.

Mr. Andras: I do not think anyone could resist that proposition. It is a good suggestion. I might add that it would be helpful if the House could make progress with the government organization bill, so that at least that ministry could become legitimate.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR DISCONTINUANCE OF JOB OPPORTUNITY ADVERTISING IN EUROPEAN NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question I wished to direct to the Minister fo Labour or the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but I do not see either in the House. Perhaps somebody else across the way could take it as notice. Having regard to the high level of unemployment, especially among our youth, may I ask whether representations have been received from British Columbia, for example, from the Parent-Teacher Federation of British Columbia, urging that what are described as misleading advertisements in European newspapers advertising job opportunities in Canada should be discontinued until such time as the present high level of unemployment has been reduced?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sorry, I did not hear all the question. I understand that the ministers of the departments to whom it might be addressed are not answering in the House today. I will bring the matter to their attention.

AIR CANADA

EFFECT OF ROLLS-ROYCE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES ON POSITION RESPECTING LOCKHEED AIR BUSES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the recent fate of Rolls-Royce affected our position with respect to the Lockheed air buses and, if so, can the minister tell us whether he has taken steps to protect Air Canada's interest therein?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I met yesterday with the chairman of the board of Air Canada to discuss this matter. It is still not clear whether the actions of the British government are such that Rolls-Royce will be able to continue its manufacture of that particular engine. We are watching the situation closely, especially as to the relationship between Rolls-Royce and Lockheed. I shall be glad to report as soon as there is anything definite I can say.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question supplementary to a previous question. With regard to the Lockheed contract and the existing Rolls-Royce problems, can the Minister of Transport assure the House that Air Canada will keep a very close eye on possible alternative engines since Bristol Aerospace in Winnipeg has a very large contract that is crucial to employment at the company?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, it is not really a question of an alternative engine; the issue really becomes one of whether Lockheed itself will be able to proceed with this particular program in view of the apparent breakdown of its relationship with Rolls-Royce. If, however, for any reason the entire project should fail to proceed, then presumably Air Canada and other airlines will be looking for alternative types of aircraft and engines.

DISCUSSION OF EMPLOYEE LAY-OFFS WITH MINISTER

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): In the minister's discussion with Air Canada yesterday was the question of employment taken up? I realize there has been action on this, but was there any word of a possible abatement of the program of lay-offs being undertaken by Air Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): As I have already informed the House, I have taken the view that I should acquaint the board of Air Canada with the concern felt by the government and by parliament with respect to these lay-offs. I have done so. The chairman tells me that the matter is under discussion with the unions. I think this is the appropriate manner in which to pursue the issue. Other than saying they were discussing it he did not have anything specific to tell me on the subject.

PENITENTIARIES

KINGSTON PRISON FOR WOMEN—INQUIRY AS TO CLOSURE AND TRANSFER OF INMATES TO PROVINCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a question for the Solicitor General. In view of the opinion expressed in the Ouimet Report and the recommendation of the commission appointed to consider the status of women that the prison for women in Kingston should be closed and its inmates transferred to provincial institutions and held there under federal responsibility, what steps are being taken by the Department of the Solicitor General to effect such a move, and when can we expect the transfer of inmates to be completed and the institution to be closed down?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have received a report from the internal commission of the department which is studying the Ouimet report, and I shall be in a position, in a while, to submit to the cabinet a proposal likely to improve the fate of women in penitentiaries.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FAILURE TO ACCEPT CONCILIATION BOARD RECOMMENDATIONS ON WAGES AND JOB SECURITY

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the majority report of the conciliation board dealing with the wages and rules dispute between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Canadian Union of Public Employees, will the Prime Minister give the House some indication whether he is prepared to find out why the CBC is refusing to go along with the recommendations of the conciliation board on the key issues of wages and job security?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not the usual practice of the government to interfere in the process of collective bargaining. I believe the Secretary of State has not made it a practice to do so.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. Will the President of the Treasury Board say whether he has been approached to provide any necessary funds that might be required for any wage and job security plans?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION INVESTIGATION

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance. On March 23, 1970 I rose in the House and asked for a royal commission to investigate the affairs of the Royal Canadian Mint. At that time, I was assured that all was well. Recent cases have been disposed of and others are pending, which indicates that all is not well. At least, all was certainly not well at the Royal Canadian Mint during centennial year. My question is: Will the Prime Minister look into this matter, since obviously the Minister of Finance has refused to do so in spite of the fact this is a branch of his own department? The matter is of such serious importance—

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked his question. Perhaps he would allow someone to reply to it on behalf of the government.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the Royal Canadian Mint now reports to me, not to the Department of Finance. The RCMP have made a complete investigation during the past year into both internal and external security arrangements. Many of their recommendations have been implemented and I think the security position is secure.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED EXPANSION OF MILITIA TRAINING PROGRAMS TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In order to help the government find means of overcoming the problem of employment of students, would the minister seriously consider increasing the quotas and duration of student militia training this summer, increasing the training time for the reserve forces, and instituting a Canada wide special militia training program for graduate students, not only to alleviate unemployment but to provide all-round, purposeful development for our youth?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have had proposals very much like these under consideration for some time, and I appreciate the hon. member's interest in the matter.

INCLUSION OF ROLE OF RESERVE FORCES IN WHITE PAPER

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Is it his intention to include within the white paper he is now preparing any reference to reserve forces and their role, in light of the fact that there is some confusion about the role of the reserve forces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO FORMATION OF MINERAL EXPORT CONSORTIUM

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is consideration being given to the formation of an export consortium in the mineral industry? Could the minister also indicate whether the federal government is taking any initiative in the matter and what role it might play with respect to sponsorship and participation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was about to get up and ask myself a question but it would not have been that one! The term used by the hon. member, "mineral industry", is really too wide for me to understand, but I will consult with him after the question period, clarify the question and answer it Tuesday.

AGRICULTURE

PASSING ON TO PRODUCERS OF DAIRY COMMISSION PRICE INCREASE AFFECTING SKIM MILK POWDER

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement the minister made on motions today about the increase in the price of skim milk powder, has the minister received assurance from the other parties involved that this increase will indeed be passed on to the producers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I very carefully avoided saying that because it would obviously prejudice the negotiation that has to go on between the provincial marketing agencies and the producers. What we do know is that the value of this manufacturing milk will be increased from 32 cents to 36 cents per hundredweight.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, has the minister made any representations to the provincial marketing boards that most of the increase should be passed on to the producers?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we fully expect that, as the hon. member says, most of it will be passed on, but I should like to avoid becoming involved in the negotiations.

POST OFFICE

CONSIDERATION OF MAIL RATE INCREASE—REQUEST FOR DELAY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Post Office and arises from his statement that he is contemplating a general increase in postal rates. Since the loss of revenue prompting this move results from the loss of business caused by deteriorating service under the former minister, would the minister, as an alternative solution, delay any increase until his new policies have had time to take effect?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept all of the premise to the question, but I do think that when we are faced with such a large deficit as is the case this year the minister in charge of the Post Office would only be acting responsibly if he were to look at the question of increasing rates.

TRANSPORT

ACCIDENTS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF SUBJECT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In light of the indication he gave the other day in response to a question that he would welcome an opportunity to look into the procedure respecting the investigation of transportation accidents in Canada, and in view of support from such groups as the Airline Pilots Association, would the minister consider referring this subject matter to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for review perhaps some time in the fall?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all certain that that is the appropriate forum. I think this is a matter that requires a good deal of expert—in the precise meaning of the word—advice. I had meetings on the matter last night with a number of authorities in an effort to seek possible alternative ways of proceeding, and I would welcome representations from the pilots association or from anybody else. I have stated that we are not adamant on present procedures but that we would want to be sure that what comes after will be as good or better.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REQUEST THAT MINISTER INFORM COMPANY OF PENSION INCREASES FOR RETIRED CANADIAN NATIONAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the welcome announcement that the minister was able to make this morning concerning increases in Canadian National pensions, and in view of the fact that this House is as anxious about Canadian Pacific pensions as it has been about those of the Canadian National Railways, would the minister make that fact known to the Canadian Pacific Railway in his own persuasive manner?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to make it known, but I am sure the hon. member recognizes there is some slight difference in the relationship.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LENNOX ISLAND RESERVE—SAFE MEANS OF TRAVELLING TO MAINLAND

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday the hon. member for Egmont asked me a question with regard to the Lennox Island Indians.

In actual fact, we have received new estimates which are much higher than former ones. I have had to ask the engineers of the department to submit plans that are less costly than the ones formerly submitted.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the minister. Could the minister inform the House whether he or his officials have been in touch with the chief of the band council on Lennox Island with regard to this matter? As I understand it, the band council was informed earlier that construction would definitely proceed this spring, and I think they are having considerable difficulty at the moment with regard to this matter.

Mr. Chrétien: Probably there was a misunderstanding between those who have communicated. We have received estimates, but we find these estimates too high so we have to revise the plans. I do not think we will be in a position to proceed as soon as we wanted.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member would take note of the fact that we are running short of time. Perhaps the hon. member for Egmont might ask a very brief supplementary and we will then move on to the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister, in view of these difficulties, would be prepared to provide some form of interim transportation during the difficult spring breakup which almost always causes the death of innocent individuals?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the danger with which we will have to cope in the spring. I can assure the hon. member that we will take all the necessary steps, so that there will not be any loss of life during the spring thaw.

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister of Indian affairs. I wonder whether his officials are or will be discussing with the Indians of Lennox Island the possibility of moving to another area that is more accessible in light of the fact that studies indicate the cost of a causeway would be very high?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are trying to find some means to build a more adequate bridge. However, if it is not possible to do it inexpensively, I will feel that the hon. member has made an excellent suggestion.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

PLANS TO INCREASE TOLLS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and concerns the recommendation of D. William Carr and Associates that tolls be increased on the Canadian segment of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Will the minister say whether there are plans to increase tolls on the seaway effective with the upcoming seaway shipping season?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have already made it very clear, and I welcome the opportunity to do so again, that there will be no change in the toll structure during the upcoming season, as he calls it—that is the 1971 season—nor has there been any decision by the government or by any other agency with regard to increasing tolls. What we have done has been to make the report available and invite public comment. No decision will be made until after that comment has been received.

MAINTAINING OF CANADIAN COASTGUARD COLLEGE AT PRESENT LOCATION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent disastrous fire in a portion of the quarters used by the cadets at the Canadian Coastguard College, and since this college was placed at its present excellent location to assist with the unemployment problem in Cape Breton, can the minister assure the House, the leaders of the municipalities concerned and other groups, that the government has no plan, now or in the forseeable future, to change the locale of the college?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as to the first part I can say we have no immediate plans to change the location. We have been successful in keeping on with that course in spite of the loss of some of the buildings by fire.

The whole question of the future of the Canadian Coastguard College is now being examined and I can assure the hon. member that the present location will be given every consideration in this decision which is a fair distance in the future.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, Dr. Barber has completed his work and I expect the report will be available shortly. There has been no such directive. In practice, tasks are assigned to constables and officers of the RCMP as required and when an Anglophone has to serve in a Francophone environment, or vice versa, we offer him every facility for becoming bilingual.

It must also be said that in the RCMP bilingualism is a factor of efficiency, and that we consider it to be an advantage when a member is able to at least understand or speak a third language, as this can be helpful in the kind of work to be carried out.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT DEPARTMENT WILL NOT BE DOWNGRADED

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. In the interests of the fishermen of British Columbia, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, will he give an assurance to the House that the Department of Fisheries will not be downgraded to the point where we will not have a full-fledged Minister of Fisheries in the House of Commons after Bill C-207 becomes law?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the hon. member is anticipating an order of the day. He is attempting to bring into the question period a debate which is taking place currently in the Committee of the Whole, and which has taken place in the House on second reading of the bill. I assume if the bill passes the committee stage and returns to the House for third reading, it will be debated again. In those circumstances, I do not think the question is in order.

Mr. Lundrigan: I will rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker, and ask the Prime Minister if he will be present in the House in the future when his Bill C-202 is being debated?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS RELATING TO ARREST AND BAIL

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-218, to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: This bill presents to the House proposals for bringing about fundamental changes in the law in respect of powers of arrest, pre-trial detention and bail. Hon. members may recall a statement I made to this House during the debate on the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act on November 4, 1970, when I said some of the measures we had to adopt under that Act for a short term were and are philosophically abhorrent to us.

I said that as soon as we could, I intended to turn once again along the road of law reform and continuing enhancement and protection of civil liberties. I am pleased to be able to fulfil that undertaking to the House today, as I believe I did when I introduced, a week or so ago, the statutory instruments bill which has now received approval of this House on second reading and been referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The statute law regarding bail has historical origins that date back to the English Bill of Rights of 1689 which states: That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. This wording was adopted with very little change by the United States and now forms the substance of the 8th amendment to the constitution of that country which was ratified in 1791.

The language of our Canadian Bill of Rights, for which the right hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), deserves the gratitude of his country—and I am delighted to see him in the House—guarantees also that no law of Canada, unless it is expressly declared that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, shall be construed and applied so as to deprive a person charged with a criminal offence of the right to reasonable bail without just cause.

The attitude the ordinary man and woman in our society holds about our law does not result merely from what we do in this Chamber to reform the substance of the law. It depends, in great measure, on the proceedings which he or she encounters if brought into contact with the law. At root, the attitudes of ordinary men and women in this country are based on the first contacts that they have with the local law enforcement authorities, with the local police force or local criminal court. This bill is directed at making that first contact between citizens and the criminal judicial process less abrasive.

In this age of confrontation, law enforcement agencies the world over are required to deal with a complete spectrum of problems that run from so-called misdemeanors or petty crimes such as theft, assault and so on, through to new and sophisticated ranges of crimes that border on civil disobedience and all the way to violence and organized, syndicated crime. We, as legislators, have the duty to provide the police with the flexibility that they need to meet whatever particular situation is at hand and to meet it, of course, with measures that are effective in restoring order and in preserving public order; yet, these must not amount to overkill, with the resultant destruction of the rapport, public support and community identity which police forces across Canada are striving, I believe, to achieve. This rapport, this consensus, this feeling of necessary community identity between our law enforcement authorities and the people who entrust them with the preservation of freedom and order under law, is the only continuing basis for sustaining the rule of law in our country.

The initial decision to arrest is the decision that activates and initiates the entire criminal law process. It is a decision involving a certain administrative discretion. It is a decision which involves, as Henry Culp Davis, of Stanford University has said, an invisible, low profile discretion that is not easily understood nor seen by the average person. As a matter of fact, the adversary process, as we understand it in criminal law, only comes into play if a charge is laid and not at the time an arrest is made, a summons is issued, or a warrant is issued from the bench. The arrest is the citizen's first confrontation with the criminal law process. The way it is done or the fact that it is done may well have a determining influence on that citizen's reaction to the law generally and to the criminal-legal process in particular for the rest of his life.

I believe it to be a fact, Your Honour, that at present in Canada many persons are unnecessarily subjected to arrest.

Mr. Woolliams: Such as, under the Public Order Act.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): And I believe that there are other means, such as a summons, which might be perfectly adequate to secure the ends of justice. I believe that we can in many cases avoid the indignity and embarassment that begins with arrest. At the moment the only alternatives open to a peace officer who has reason to believe that a crime has been committed are, first, to arrest without warrant or, second, to go before a justice of the peace and lay a charge, at which time the justice of the peace decides whether to issue a summons or to issue a warrant. The suspect may be arrested without a warrant or arrested under the authority of a warrant issued by the justice of the peace.

Professor Martin Friedland of the University of Toronto Law School has pointed out in a study he made and incorporated in a very important book entitled "Detention Before Trial" that a summons was used in only 10 per cent of the cases studied, although most prominent criminal lawyers in the metropolitan area who had studied this question were of the opinion, on the basis of their own practice, that a summons was used in at least 40 per cent of the cases. Furthermore, notwithstanding the intention of the Criminal Code that arrests are to be made primarily only after a warrant had been issued by a judicial officer in ordinary cases, arrest without a warrant was in fact made in over 90 per cent of the cases.

Mr. Woolliams: Did the minister say 100 per cent?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, in 90 per cent of the cases where an arrest was made.

There are a number of changes in the law of arrest that I feel to be desirable. First of all, I believe that a peace officer, a policeman, presently lacks sufficient statutory flexibility or the statutory guidelines that would help him in judging whether or not an arrest should be made. In order to avoid unnecessary arrests, the peace officer, surely, should be obliged not to arrest without a warrant where he has reasonable and probable cause to believe that the public interest may be secured by proceeding other than by arrest. An exception would be made in cases of murder and certain very serious offences against public order.

Second, a justice of the peace, at the moment, before whom a charge is laid has an unfettered discretion to issue a summons or a warrant. I believe that the present vague and inarticulate situation should be replaced with statutory guidelines which would oblige the justice or magistrate to issue a summons, except where a warrant, and hence an arrest, may be necessary in the public interest.

Third, I believe that the police also suffer under our present law from a lack of statutory direction regarding the issuance of a summons. In my view, the law should authorize a peace officer, where a minor offence has occurred, to issue on the spot to the alleged offender a form of summons which might be called, and which is so-called in the present bill, an "appearance notice." This would be very much like an ordinary traffic ticket, and would require the accused to appear at a later date specified in the notice, and he would be subject to penalties if he were not to appear.

Let me now turn to the present situation, as I see it, regarding bail. The processes of arrest and of bail are interrelated. If an arrest is not made, of course bail is not required. If an arrest is made, then the process of bail comes into play. At present, a large number of those arrested are taken into custody. Professor Friedland, in the study to which I referred, demonstrated that of those arrested, 85 per cent were held in custody until their first appearance before a magistrate. But it is this custody period which is really the source of the indignity and embarrassment of the administration of criminal justice, because there is a serious social and legal price attaching to a decision to arrest and hold in custody.

There are the possible effects of custody on the outcome of the trial and on the sentence of the accused if he is not released pending trial. I do not want to attach too much importance to the statistics that I have seen from certain areas in Canada, and in the United States, about the effect of pre-trial detention on the outcome of the trial itself. It may be that there is not an exact cause and effect relationship, as alleged, or as may apparently be borne out by some statistics. But there is an indication that those who are held under pre-trial detention will have, on the basis of statistics, a lesser opportunity for an acquittal and, certainly, they will have less of an opportunity to present a reasonable defence and assemble the evidence necessary for that defence. I think that we cannot ignore, either, Mr. Speaker, the high incidence of guilty pleas by persons who are detained and kept in custody under pre-trial detention. I think there is the possibility, and we cannot ignore it, of improper treatment while in custody and prior to trial. There is the possibility of delay and inconvenience in attempting to raise bail, particularly in view of present financial considerations attaching to the order for bail. There is the opportunity for the accused to become enmeshed with a legal bondsman. Also, generally, there are all the personal considerations to take into account, such as loss of employment, loss of income, loss of protection for the accused's family, the anxiety of relatives, friends and so on.

Every member in this House has had some reason to be painfully aware of this, either because there are many of us here who have practised law or because some of us have had to intervene on behalf of someone not able to obtain bail. Under the present law, a judge or magistrate has no real guidance as to how or indeed whether to allow bail to an accused, nor is there any express provision in the Criminal Code stating whether it is the Crown or the accused who bears the burden of proof on a bail application, whether it is up to the Crown to show cause why bail should not be granted or whether, on the other hand, it is incumbent on the accused to show why he is entitled to bail. In doubtful cases, the place where the burden lies may be influential in determining whether bail is granted or withheld.

The corollary to these vague formulations that are now found in case law is that bail of some kind has in practise been required in virtually all cases. The process of bail has been conducted in a rather mechanical fashion, where there has been no meaningful attempt by the judge to determine the likelihood of flight from trial and the predictability of whether the accused will show up for the hearing which, after all, is the main consideration which ought to be before the magistrate or judge at the time of a bail hearing.

The defects of present bail procedures are serious and have been widely documented. First of all, it is obvious that to demand of a poor person any significant amount of bail, either in cash or by way of other security, is tantamount to a requirement that he remain in custody until his trial. Money bail or cash bail in these instances amounts to preventive detention. Second, a wealthy or influential or professional accused is usually able to produce bail with little or no difficulty. Yet, there is no evidence so far as I can find that wealthy people are more prone to show up for their trial than those without influence and without wealth.

Mr. Woolliams: It worked the other way with Banks.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Accordingly, the almost universal requirement of bail results in bail for the rich and preventive detention for the poor, without any determination of the real question which I believe should always be before the mind of the court, namely, will the accused appear for his trial. It is not unknown for bail to be put up by a bail bondsman in return for a fee, rather than by the accused himself. Thus, often the real responsibility for seeing that the accused shows up for the trial does not rest with the accused but with the bondsman. Again, bail is regularly set in many if not most, jurisdictions solely by reference to the gravity of the offence with which the accused is charged, rather than being based on an evaluation of the personality of the accused himself, of his identity with the community, and the chances of his appearing for trial.

Finally, although a subsidiary objective in pre-trial detention but a very important one if you weigh the rights of the individual against the right of society to protect itself—the first consideration should be whether or not he will show up for his trial—the second consideration should be whether or not, if he is allowed to go free on bail he will detrimentally affect the public interest, perhaps engage in serious anti-social conduct prior to trial. But I believe that at the moment the decision to set bail on grounds of the public interest is often not accompanied by any evidence or finding of potential danger to society from the accused or evidence of his tendency to commit or recommit an offence. As a matter of fact, it puts the judge or magistrate in the indelicate position of attempting to predict whether or not a crime will be recommitted or whether or not the accused has a proclivity to crime, and this may again result in a purely mechanically imposed judgment.

The provisions which the government is submitting to Parliament for its approval are based on the belief that the personal freedom of the individual should be interfered with by the state only where such interference can be proven by the state to be necessary to protect the larger interests of society as a collective whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I believe we must go farther than that. I believe that we have to give the courts and the police reasonable guidance on what we mean by the public interest. I believe that we have to support legislation which will diminish personal freedom only when any restrictive measures will in fact result in protecting the public interest. This balance in any given situation or under any particular law which tests the rights of the individual against the rights of society is the most difficult balance that a legislature has to achieve. Certainly, in individual cases, the most difficult decision that a judge and jury as well as police and magistrates have to make, particularly at the arrest and bail stage is, the rights of the accused and the rights of society. These judgments are human, and the balance between liberty on the one hand and the security of the state or maintenance of public order on the other, requires the most difficult human judgment that men and women are called upon to make. There is no need for me to underline to the House how difficult it is to make such a judgment, but I believe that we have to make it if we are to reconcile authority with freedom.

The objectives of this bill are fourfold: First, to avoid unnecessary pre-trial arrest and detention; second, to ensure that in cases where arrest with or without warrant has taken place, the person accused, whatever his means, is not unnecessarily held in custody until his trial; third, to ensure an early trial for those who have been detained in custody pending trial; fourth, to provide statutory guidelines for decision making in this part of the criminal law process relating to arrest and bail and thereby preclude the possibility of "discretionary injustice".

The provisions of the bill place an onus on police officers not to arrest a person where the public interest can be satisfied by less stringent measures. The other options available to the police officer would be the summons procedure that is already in effect under the Criminal Code as well as a new procedure which will involve the issuance of a new type of summons defined in the bill as an "appearance notice". The appearance notice will instruct an accused where and when to attend court and may be issued on the spot by the police officer on the beat or in the car, or following an arrest if an arrest is in fact made.

A bill relating to bail reform was previously given first reading on June 8, 1970, just before the last session of Parliament adjourned. At that time, I observed that there was little prospect of its being passed before Parliament adjourned for the summer recess. I said then that I was most anxious that it be made public now in order that the provincial authorities who are charged with the primary responsibility of enforcing the Criminal Code would have a full opportunity to study the proposals before the bill began its passage through Parliament.

I have discussed the bill at the meeting of provincial Attorneys General in Halifax, last July, and with various police organizations including the Canadian Police Association and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police.

In addition, the bill has received detailed study by the criminal law section of the Conference of Commissioners on Uniformity of Legislation in Canada.

In September there was a meeting of the Canadian Bar Association. Constructive criticisms were made on the first version of the bill. Also I received many comments from hon. members and I am much obliged to them.

In expressing my thanks for the various observations made on the bill, I must point out that while I have adopted those suggestions that I am satisfied assisted in achieving a clear and workable law, I have maintained intact the basic principles and objectives of the legislation as I enunciated them on June 8, 1970.

So the following is among the most important changes made since the June bill.

Under the June version of the bill, both the officer on the beat and the officer in charge of the police station would have had to rely entirely on their own judgment as to what "the public interest" required in relation to the arrest and the release of accused persons.

The new version of the bill before the House recognizes explicitly that decisions by the police may have to be made under difficult conditions, and spells out guidelines which should be taken into account by them in making their decision. If, for example, a person who is found committing any offence or who is, on reasonable and probable grounds, believed to have committed an indictable offence, exercises his right to refuse to properly identify himself, the officer is justified in arresting him. Similarly, an arrest is justified where the offence involved requires a search of the person or where, if the person were not arrested, evidence would likely be lost or destroyed; and again, where it is clear that, unless the person involved is taken into custody, the crime being committed will be completed or another crime committed.

A main objective of the new amendments to the Criminal Code to avoid unnecessary arrest and, if arrest is necessary, to ensure early release from custody in appropriate cases. To help achieve this aim, new duties are placed on the police to direct their minds to what the public interest requires. However, it is not the intention of the legislation to jeopardize the community by discouraging proper and efficient law enforcement by the police. For this reason, the new bill expressly provides that an arrested person who contends either that the criminal proceedings against him should have been commenced in some other way, such as by summons, or that he should have been released earlier by the police, must demonstrate that the police did not carry out their new duties properly if he is to recover damages against them in civil proceedings.

[English]

Turning now to bail, Mr. Speaker, the Criminal Code itself does not at present, as I have already said, offer any real direction on the approach to be taken by justices of the peace in admitting an accused to bail or as to the burden of proof on the matter of bail. The new proposals, I believe, remedy the defects of the existing law in the following respects: first, the new general rule is that an accused person should be released simply upon giving his written undertaking to attend court as required for the purposes of his trial. Second, the burden is expressly placed on the prosecutor to justify either any more onerous form of release than a mere undertaking, or the detention of the accused in custody pending his trial. Third, the detention of the accused in custody pending his trial is justified only on the following grounds, and without wishing to trespass on the rules of the House here I would like to refer to the proposed new section 445A(7) which is to be found at page 24 of the bill:

—the detention of an accused in custody is justified only on either of the following grounds, namely:

(a) on the primary ground that his detention is necessary to ensure his attendance in court in order to be dealt with according to law; and

(b) on the secondary ground...that his detention is necessary in the public interest or for the protection or safety of the public, having regard to all the circumstances including any substantial likelihood that the accused will, if he is released from custody, commit a criminal offence involving serious harm or an interference with the administration of justice.

This drafting is different from the drafting of any bail law, seeking reform, in the United States. It is also different from the bail reform act of the United Kingdom. I wanted to make it perfectly clear that the primary ground was whether or not the accused would show up at his trial, and that the secondary ground would be whether the public interest would be protected, focussing the mind of the magistrate first on the rights of the individual and secondly, but only secondly, on the rights of society.

The second ground takes proper account, I believe, of the need to protect the public interest, but at the same time it affords the courts guidance against too broad an interpretation of the provision of protection for the safety of the public by using terms like "substantial likelihood" and a "criminal offence involving serious harm."

The proposals in the bill permitting a justice to impose reasonable conditions on the person released are an additional encouragement to pre-trial release. Moreover, under the new proposals where the accused is released by the justice, the terms of his release continue right up to the conclusion of his trial. They do not have to be renewed. Of course, they can be varied if the conduct of the accused so militates in favour of their being varied, but they do not have to be automatically renewed.

Finally, there is a review procedure at every stage of the proceedings whereby the action of a sergeant at the desk, the action of a justice, and the action of a judge can be reviewed right up to the court of appeal.

Moreover there are important new proposals in the bill which provide that where an accused does not achieve bail after an arrest, there are methods for expediting his trial. These are not found in the present Code. There are full measures for appeal. The basic test in a case of bail is that if an accused on bail has lost his trial at first instance and then appeals, he is entitled to have his bail renewed if he is able to establish that his appeal is not frivolous, that he will surrender himself into custody as required, and his detention is not necessary in the public interest.

It is significant that in their practical operation, the provisions of the bill place an onus on the police to initiate action in the first instance to grant bail. No application by the accused is necessary. I believe this is important because the average citizen, the average layman, does not really know what his rights may be, and the obligation under the bill is on the police, the law enforcement authorities, to institute the procedures for bail. The bail reform bill will require police officials to make a first assessment as to whether or not an accused should be held in custody, and this will not require any initiative on the part of the accused who, as I have said, may be unaware of the procedures available to him.

The provisions of the bill also ensure that where an accused is being held in custody pending his trial, or pending an appeal of his conviction, the situation must be reviewed by the courts within set periods of time, and directions may be given by the courts for getting the case on to trial, or for review proceedings by way of appeal. Corresponding, of course, to the right of the citizen to receive fair treatment and respect in the legal process, it is his duty reciprocally to honour that same process. A good deal of what we are trying to do in bail reform requires the voluntary appearance of an accused at trial. Correspondingly, I believe that if this undertaking to appear voluntarily is not met by the accused, without just cause, that ought to be an offence. There has to be an obligation placed upon the citizen in return for the added scope that we are giving individual rights and therefore failure, without lawful excuse, to comply with process issued by the courts or issued by the police, and confirmed by the justice, is an offence under this bill.

Under the June version of the bill, failure to attend court when required to do so would simply have been a summary conviction offence. Under the new version of the bill, a first such offence will remain a summary conviction offence only, but in the case of a second or subsequent offence, the Crown will have the option of proceeding by way of indictment. Obviously, if the charge is indictable, failure to appear the second or the third time should be given the same measure of penalty. Otherwise, the deterrent is no longer there.

Generally speaking, the courts in deciding what sentence to impose on a person convicted of an offence take into account the time he has spent in custody awaiting trial. However, under the present Criminal Code, a sentence commences only when it is imposed, and the court's hands are tied in those cases where a minimum term of imprisonment must be imposed. In such cases, therefore, the court is bound to impose not less than the minimum sentence even though the convicted person may have been in custody awaiting trial for a period in excess of the minimum sentence. The new version of the bill would permit the court, in a proper case, to take this time into account in imposing sentence.

I want to draw to the attention of hon. members that cash bail in this bill is only a last resort. The provision under the present Criminal Code whereby an accused person can be required to deposit cash or valuable security as a condition of his release on bail can in many cases operate harshly against poor people. One of the objects of these new amendments to the Criminal Code is to restrict the circumstances under which a person could be required to deposit cash or valuable security as a condition of his release pending trial by providing that cash bail could be required only where the alleged offender was not ordinarily resident in the community where he was in custody.

I am suggesting to the House and the country that there are cases where a person does not live in the community where he is arrested and has no means of identification, community identity or ability to prove to the court that he will appear for his trial. In such a case the only security or evidence of good faith he could adduce would be cash bail. Even in those cases it is not encumbent upon the justices to insist on cash bail, but the justices are required to go through the same process of reasoning under the general terms of the bill. There is sometimes less guarantee that an accused will appear for his trial when he lives a good distance from the court. He may live out of the community, province or country. He should be given the opportunity to provide cash bail as an added guarantee of his faith.

I wish to stress that because the bill will bring about major changes in the law of arrest and bail, extensive education will be necessary to train the police of this country in the new procedures. It will be necessary to provide guidance for judges, magistrates, Crown prosecutors and defence counsel in the practical implementation of these new procedures.

At the annual meeting of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police in London, Ontario, last September, I urged them to begin initial planning for the training that will be required. While this bill is simple in intent, it will be somewhat more complex in implementation. Education of the police and thorough briefing of magistrates, judges, Crown prosecutors and defence council will be necessary for the effective implementation of the new proposals.

I have asked the provincial Attorneys General to be prepared to update the manuals now used by magistrates, justices of the peace and police officers. I did so because I believe that it is imperative that the proposals become part of the routine procedure of the criminal judicial process as soon as possible.

I look forward to defending this bill in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I will welcome constructive suggestions from that committee and from the House at the report stage. I have enjoyed my association with the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I believe that for the past two and a half years, on behalf of Parliament and the people of Canada, this committee has dealt competently with a good deal of legislation. I think the record compares favourably with that of any other committee of this House, past or present. I want to thank the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Tolmie), the chairman, and the members of that committee. I just have three more minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Brewin: Talk it out.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The Bail Reform Act recasts some of the law dealing with arrest and most of the law dealing with bail for the first time since Confederation. The real defect of the present provisions of the Criminal Code is that they are too short on precision and too long on discretion. Power to arrest and authority to release are conferred in such broad terms under the present law that the means by which they are exercised in practice overshadow the purposes for which they are granted. The consequence is a widespread, and I do not say deliberate, but unheeding misuse of power and authority. In the nature of things, the impact of this misuse is felt mainly by those, guilty or innocent, who are least equipped to alleviate for themselves the consequences of the unreasonable use of authority. Because of poverty, a lack of education or a lack of influence, they are unable to bring the necessary counter pressure to bear on their own behalf. For them, this bill will be a statutory voice equalizing their opportunities before the courts.

It is an attempt to emphasize that, as the power to fetter the individual is given for use only in the interests of the country, the sole test by which the limits and the fair use of that authority are to be measured is the extent to which its exercise is needed in the public interest. Arrest and detention are not designed to be an informal means of rough justice or anticipatory punishment for the untried. Their purpose is not to usurp the function of the trial or to block or modify the right of every accused to have his case determined under the rule of law. That there should be a need to restate the limits of the power of arrest, and the need to restate the justification of the authority to detain, is in a large measure caused by the lack of specification and precision in the present Criminal Code.

This bill, therefore, attempts to rechannel the law to guarantee the least possible pre-trial interference with individual liberty that is consistent with the proper administration of justice and the interests of the public.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, the minister is obviously in a much happier frame of mind presenting this civilized legislation this morning than on an earlier occasion this year. Perhaps I could call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair. The House will resume sitting at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a general disposition to see whether we cannot get the bill into committee before the end of the afternoon. In the circumstances, my remarks will be somewhat shorter than they would normally be. I point this out because the minister has made a long, reasoned and interesting opening statement and I would not want to appear to be doing a discourtesy to his splendid effort. If it would warm the cockles of his heart, I might say that the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) will shortly be entering this debate, and he, with his vast experience of human freedom and liberties, will be providing the frosting on the cake for this particular party.

May I make a few observations about the bill itself? It is an attempt to strike a balance between the rights of persons involved with the law and the protection of the public. As the minister has stated, the law under which we operate at present in this field has been in effect for almost a century, and change is long overdue. The hon. gentleman made reference to the question of the protection of society from those under arrest when they apply for bail, and the considerations which should guide a court when determining whether these people should be allowed on the loose between arrest and trial.

This is a fearfully complicated problem, I suggest, because every once in a while we read stories about horrendous crimes being committed by those who are free on bail. While Canada has a reputation perhaps for being overly zealous about keeping people in prison, one sometimes wishes more people of a certain kind were kept in prison. But how to determine whether a person charged with a crime is likely to commit another crime if freed while awaiting trial would probably defy the wisdom of a Solomon.

One practical remedy has been suggested, one that the bill does not include. I refer to the remedy that appears in the Ouimet report, which is the backbone of the measure we are considering today. The Ouimet report recommended that there should be a central registry in each province so that a court could quickly determine something of the background of a person who is charged with an indictable offence and is asking the court for bail. Either when the minister closes the debate or when the bill is dealt with in the justice and legal affairs committee, I think we should be given an explanation why this rather important element is missing from the bill. I suppose we will be confronted with the explanation that this is really a matter for the provinces. I do not know whether that will be the case, but the Ouimet report did suggest one practical method for dealing with bail applicants who have been charged with serious offences.

Another point which should be made is that we simply do not have sufficient statistics of a comprehensive nature regarding the likelihood or unlikelihood of persons who are released on bail committing further offences. This is a surprising area of deficiency in an age when we seem to revel in statistics and information on all sorts of topics. The finance committee has been considering the Statistics Act and has discovered that the number of categories that statisticians at the federal level have dealt with in an area such as this has almost doubled in recent years. This leads one to think that we have all the information we need, yet that is not the case.

My next point concerns the method of proclamation. In his statement the minister met head on any objection I might have had when he acknowledged that this was a complicated bill—as indeed it is—and that a large measure of education of the police would be required before the legislation could be proclaimed. If the bill has to provide statutory guidelines for the police with regard to arrest and release before trial, then why not follow one of those statutory guidelines that every police officer should follow? I refer to page 35 of the bill, which includes this provision:

> (8) The provisions of sections 445C, 445D and 445E apply mutatis mutandis in respect of any proceedings under this section, except that subsection (2) of section 445D does not apply in respect of an accused who is charged with an offence mentioned in section 445H.

I suggest that a police officer who is able to contain all that in his mind has a bright future. I might even suggest that that portion of the bill must have been drafted by the gentlemen who put together the Income Tax Act. Of course, with the Income Tax Act you can hire a lawyer at great expense, or a chartered accountant, to ramble through the various confusing labyrinths. However, in this bill we are trying, in about 75 pages, to tell police officers how to carry out their duties. There must be a simpler way, though if I were challenged to think of one perhaps I would be no more successful than those who drafted this measure. In any event, my little quotation underlines the fact that it will take a large amount of education of our police forces before the measure can be properly put into operation.

Perhaps this really goes to the heart of the bill. We have to make sure that our police officers, given this brand new approach and somewhat greater responsibility in the matter of decision making than they had hitherto, will apply this measure uniformly from one end of Canada to the other. There is nothing that holds the law up to contempt so much as a feeling on the part of the public that it is unevenly administered; that the burden of the law does not rest equally on the shoulders of everyone but that some people are able to escape its provisions. It is therefore important that the police officer, whether in Sainte-Anne de la Pocatière or in Kamloops, enforces and administers the act on a roughly comparable basis.

The extent of the powers given to police officers and others in charge of detained persons by the provisions of this bill is not, I submit, objectionable in ideal circumstances; but in view of the discretionary powers given the police, and, in the case of bail applications, the judicial powers given the police, I think we should reflect upon the amount of professional training that is given our police officers. In this regard the Ouimet report recommended:

> —it would be highly desirable to conduct continuing education programs for justices of the peace who frequently have to make decisions of great consequence to the individuals directly affected by them and to the community at large, sometimes with very little preparation for the heavy responsibilities involved.

If that is true of justices of the peace, it is equally true of the guardians of the peace, our police officers. While we do not yet have a national police academy for municipal police forces as we have for members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I think in view of the extra responsibilities that are to be thrown on the shoulders of the police considerable thought must be given to some kind of continuing education for members of police forces. Perhaps the sending out of booklets to crown prosecutors, to provincial magistrates or to justices of the peace would not suffice. Perhaps the whole success of this measure will depend on a consideration to which we have not given enough attention, namely the expenditure of some hard cash on the education of those who are responsible for the operation, and therefore the success, of this measure.

Subject to those qualifications, and the fact that we will be examining many important aspects of the bill in committee, I can say on behalf of my associates that we support second reading and referral to the committee.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party fully support the provisions contained in the new bill. I, for one, welcome the bail reform bill with a little less enthusiasm, perhaps with the same enthusiasm with which I receive my income tax form. The reason is that when I came here in 1965 and met the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), then watched him in operation, he sort of impressed me as the new Messiah in respect of reform of the criminal law. When I read some of his speeches to university groups, law students, lawyers and various other groups across the country, I realize that he is now becoming a reformer by way of rhetoric rather than by way of action. From the time he became the Minister of Justice to the present he has not fulfilled the requirements of the new Messiah, as I was hoping he would when he took this position.

An hon. Member: He walks on water very effectively.

Mr. Gilbert: This bill is a step forward in comparison with the long step backward he was partially responsible for taking in respect of the War Measures Act and the Public Order (Temporary) Measures Act. When I think of these two acts and the way his image has been tarnished, not only in the minds of the people generally across the country but more especially in the minds of university law professors, I understand why it was incumbent upon him to make the type of speech he made this afternoon, one of persuasion, clarity and coherence. I really thought he was addressing a jury on many occasions when he spoke today.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This is a jury.

Mr. Gilbert: He certainly made a deep impression on all of us. Not only is the Minister of Justice a reformer by way of rhetoric, I think he has taken what is known as the cold-feet approach. I say that because since taking office he has done nothing with regard to the abolition of corporal punishment, nothing with regard to amending the Criminal Code to abolish vagrancy charges; he has done nothing with regard to bringing forth legislation concerning the uniformity of sentencing procedures, and he has done nothing with regard to the dangerous offenders amendment. Those are just four areas in which he has done nothing.

This bail reform bill is a more blatant example of that cold-feet approach. When he first presented the bail reform bill in June of this year, he issued a press release and I should like to quote a few of his statements. From page one of the press release, let me quote the following:

> Mr. Turner said that, "at present many people are unnecessarily subjected to arrest, though other means such as a summons might be perfectly adequate to secure the ends of justice—

This is a laudible statement. He then said:

> —criteria for bail, reference is made to the special emphasis that is placed upon the consideration of the likelihood that the accused will turn up for his trial.

Then, he refers to the Ouimet report also referred to by the previous speaker. He said:

> The Ouimet report recommended that there be an additional pre-requisite for the justification of the exercise of the power to arrest, namely, that the arresting officer has reasonable grounds to believe that arrest is necessary in the public interest. Under this bill arrest will not be justified if the arresting officer has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a method other than arrest is adequate.

Then, in rather strong terms he says:

In this regard it must be borne in mind that peace officers who fail to comply with the proposed new laws respecting arrest may be open to civil liability.

This was the minister's attitude in June of this year. In other words, the onus was upon the police officer making the arrest to ensure that he is following the proper procedure.

In the meantime he has taken the cold-feet approach, and I now refer to this attitude as expressed on page six of the bill. Let me read very briefly from it. He sets forth in proposed new section 436(2) the powers that a peace officer shall have with regard to arrest when he can issue an appearance notice rather than make an immediate arrest. Then, subsection (3) reads:

Notwithstanding subsection (2), a peace officer acting under subsection (1) is deemed to be acting lawfully and in the execution of his duty for the purposes of

(a) any proceedings under this or any other Act of Parliament, and

(b) any other proceedings—

In other words, what he has now done has been to shift the onus from the police officer to the person himself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What section is that?

Mr. Gilbert: It is section 436(3). He has shifted the onus from the peace officer to the person who is being arrested. I imagine he did this because of the reaction he received from the police associations across the country. That is why I say that in June he had one approach with regard to making arrests, and then in February of this year he adopts another approach. It seems to me that he is really adopting the attitude of law and order, and this is not in keeping with the previous thoughts I had of him as the great reformer of criminal law.

If I have to stress this more forcibly, let me recall a speech he made in May of 1970 at the Bessborough Hotel in Saskatoon to the Law Society of Saskatchewan. He started out by saying:

Canada needs a more contemporary criminal law—credible, enforceable, flexible and compassionate.

He could not get a better opening sentence than that in any speech. A few sentences later he goes on to state:

For it is here that the most fundamental values of life, liberty, property and dignity are to be protected and sanctioned. Here, our commitment to these values will be tested.

I suggest he attempted to test those values of life, liberty, property and dignity in his bill in June, but then he received a little pressure from police associations and other organizations so he adopted the cold-feet approach.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Gilbert: I will answer questions later.

In his eloquent and persuasive address today the minister set forth the four objectives he had set forth in his press release back in June. He said the objectives are fourfold:

(1) To avoid unnecessary pre-trial arrest and detention;...

(2) To ensure that, in cases where arrest with or without warrant has taken place, the person accused whatever his means is not unnecessarily held in custody until his trial.

(3) To ensure an early trial for those who have been detained in custody pending trial.

(4) To provide statutory guidelines for decision-making in this part of the criminal law process and thereby mitigate against the possibilities for "discretionary injustice" in the decision to arrest, hold for custody, admit to bail, etc.

He said that the bill would continue to humanize the administration of criminal law in Canada, and that the right to bail should not be the prerogative of the rich while detention is the plight of the poor. There cannot be more laudable objectives than these. It is 85 years since we have seen any substantial changes in the powers of arrest, bail and detention, so it was high time for the Minister of Justice to take action in this particular field. He mentioned the methods used in arresting people. Under those methods, an officer could make an arrest without a warrant, take that person into custody, lay a charge before a justice of the peace and then bring a person before a justice. He also mentioned the second method, under which an officer could lay an information before a justice of the peace, who would then decide whether to issue a warrant or a summons.

The minister's illustrations were rather striking. He pointed out that 90 per cent of all arrests in Canada are made without warrant and that in only 10 per cent of cases are they made by way of summons. He quoted Martin Friedland, who said that 85 per cent of persons are under detention before being brought before a justice. That is a striking figure, because that situation is actually the reverse of what was originally intended when the Criminal Code was first enacted. The original intention was that a warrant should be issued before the arrest was made. Now, we find that 90 per cent of all arrests are made without a warrant.

The minister, in this bill, has brought forward a third method which could be used, the method involving the issuance of an appearance notice by the peace officer. This has been likened to giving a person a ticket. That ticket will indicate to the person that he must attend at court at a certain time and that he must attend for purposes of finger printing and photographing. The requirements for these matters will be set out in the notice of appearance.

I am sure some hon. members know what happened in the past with regard to bail. The primary consideration was ensuring the attendance of the accused at trial. Many courts have thought that the attendance of the accused could be better secured if cash or property were put up by the accused or by sureties. From that practice developed what is known as the professional bondsman. Professional bondsmen are not allowed in Canada, although they are to be found in the United States and elsewhere. As matters developed, these bondsmen in many cases were charging between 15 and 20 per cent for supplying bonds which were necessary in order to allow the accused a measure of temporary freedom while awaiting trial. It must be obvious that these moneys or charges were paid by people who could least afford them; they could least afford to buy their freedom. The alternative was a period of detention before trial. During that period they languished in jail as a result of crowded dockets.

In this connection, we ought to consider the Manhattan bail project in New York and the report of the Amicus Foundation of Toronto. In both projects, certain studies were undertaken with regard to bail and detention. As a result of those studies, it was found that the percentage of those who failed to appear for trial was almost the same as between those who had posted bail and those who were released on their own recognizance. Let us think about that, Mr. Speaker. In other words, the percentage of people who had posted bail and failed to appear was the same as the percentage of those who failed to appear after being released on their own recognizance.

The second finding was that detention in jail imposed difficulties in obtaining counsel in preparing the case and interviewing witnesses. In addition, detention in jail resulted in a higher percentage of pleas of guilty, as compared with the numbers of accused persons on bail. The attitude of a person who is not granted bail is, "well, I may as well get it over with and plead guilty." A person may do that without appreciating the charge and the consequences of the plea of guilty.

The fourth finding made was that there was a variation in sentences and fines applying to those accused who were in jail and to those admitted to bail. That, I think, is remarkable, and illustrates that the human factor, or human weaknesses of judges and justices, must be considered. It must be far easier for a justice to impose a light fine on a person who is well dressed than on a young fellow who is poorly dressed. Conversely, it must be much easier to impose a jail sentence on a fellow who is poorly dressed than on a man who is well dressed and represented by counsel.

Another factor which these studies illustrated was this: there was a serious loss of employment, a loss of income and loss of protection for the family. That, I think, has been instrumental in bringing about an ameliorated attitude on the part of justices, magistrates—in Ontario magistrates are now called provincial judges—and superior court judges with respect to bail. I can well recall when the late Crown Attorney of the county of York, Mr. Henry Bull, Q.C., was before a committee which was discussing bail. He pointed out the changes which had been made in Toronto. There, bail magistrates travelled round to the different jails during the evening and made arrangements for bail. The attitude of magistrates had changed; they were granting personal bail instead of forcing the accused to put up money. I think that this process, shown in certain ameliorated attitudes, culminated in the criminal amendment bill of 1968-69, which gave power to the peace officer to release. One can say that this bill respecting bail is almost too late. In England, one does not need to put up money for bail. The same procedure is followed in Scandinavian countries, notably in Sweden and Denmark.

Many of the provisions of the bill are good. It says that the accused does not require to put up money unless he resides 100 miles from his place of arrest; even in that case, the limit is $500. The bail may be by way of the accused's personal recognizance. The justice or the officer in charge has the discretionary power as to forcing the posting of a deposit. Mr. Speaker, the more I look at this bill, the more I consider it as a colossus of complexities. In his opening remarks the minister said, "You know, we are introducing this measure because there have not been guidelines for peace officers to follow with regard to bail provisions. Now, we are bringing them forward. We shall now place a heavy duty on peace officers. Consequently, we shall need to embark on an expensive educational program to train people; they must become familiar with the provisions we have passed and with the application of those provisions."

It seems to me that some of the provisions we are now considering may impose a heavy burden on the peace officer making the original arrest. They may impose a heavy burden on the officer in charge, who is defined as the constable at the station in charge of the guardroom, et cetera. He must ask the accused to sign a promise to appear in court. The minister also mentioned justices of the peace. If the peace officer does not release the accused on bail, he will take him into custody. Next, he must go before the justice of the peace. He has the power either to obtain an undertaking without conditions or to have the man sign an undertaking with conditions. I wonder whether this is the type of procedure used in English courts. It seems to me to be very complex.

I hope when we are in committee the minister will give us the details with regard to the procedures followed in other jurisdictions. Hon. members are familiar with the old, legal maxim that equity varies with the length of the chancellor's foot. If bail is granted, the terms of it may vary according to the health and mood of the arresting officer, the officer in charge, the justice of the peace or the judge. The guidelines that have been imposed may be too stringent rather than flexible and helpful. That is the main thrust of the argument concerning the complexity of the bill. I hope the minister will also go into detail with regard to the problem of detention without bail. In the past, when a person was kept in custody, this was done to ensure his attendance at trial. Now, the minister is setting forth a new test, the primary object of which is the assurance that the accused will be present at the trial and, secondly, the safety of the public. It seems to me that in this case what the minister has done has been to develop case law and extend it into statutory law. I do not think he is to be given any great credit for that achievement.

The minister also outlined the procedure whereby the decision of a justice of the peace may be reviewed by a judge, and this is good but it is what we have done in the past. If you were unhappy with the decision of a justice of the peace in the setting of bail, you made an application to a county court judge. One thing I am pleased with is the major change with regard to long detention. The minister stated that if a person is detained for 90 days or more on an indictable offence or 30 days or more on a summary offence the person who has charge of the accused shall bring an application on behalf of the accused so that he may present his case for bail.

There are also some consequential changes that have been made in the law. The important one is that now bail is to be continued until the completion of the trial. Anyone who has done any criminal law work will appreciate the difficulties that we had in the past when bail had to be renewed. At one time every time the accused made an appearance, and certainly when he appeared after preliminary hearing was conducted and was committed, bail had to be renewed. This is a marked improvement in the law.

Also, I must give the Minister of Justice credit for stating clearly and decisively that time spent in custody will be counted against the sentence. In practice, many of the judges followed this procedure, but no judge was bound to take that factor into account. As a result, many people spent much time in jail before their case came up, but this time was not taken into account when the sentence was imposed.

I also commend the minister for the provisions for the release of the accused before sentence or suspended sentence. Many of us have found that before a person is convicted he has to take time out to arrange matters relating to employment and domestic affairs. Detention in jail imposed a hardship. Many judges and magistrates have been allowing the accused to be released pending sentence, although many of them felt uneasy about it because they knew they did not have the power to do so under the act.

These are some of the main provisions of the bill, but the more important one—and I would like the minister to pay close attention to my comments at this point—relates to the application of the reform bill to the young offenders bill. We are now in the process of considering that bill. It has brought about a major change. In the past, when a young person had committed an offence, he was charged as a delinquent. Usually he was charged for breaching a federal, provincial or municipal statute. Now, under the young offenders act, the young person must be charged with an offence under the Criminal Code. The questions arise: if a young person is charged with an offence, would the provisions of the bail bill apply? Suppose an arresting officer picks up a young fellow who is 12 years old, and who has committed an indicable offence such as the theft of $50. Is this arresting officer going to give the youngster an appearance notice? Will he take him into custody and have the officer in charge at the jail make him sign a promise to appear? Just how will bail for young people be handled? I hope the minister will give that matter his consideration.

If I may speak for a moment on this matter, may I say that one of my main objections to the young offenders bill relates to the age problem. I tried to point out that there should be an age distinction between the group of youngsters 10 to 14 years old against whom no criminal charge should be laid and the group from 14 to 17 who may be charged for serious indictable offences. This is in keeping with the English law. I find that the minister, although he is usually 25 years behind the times with regard to English law, is trying to keep up.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is not my bill.

Mr. Gilbert: I hope the minister will direct his attention to this problem. What is the procedure with regard to young people being arrested by officers? Are they given an appearance notice or made to sign a promise to appear? Are they bound over by recognizance or are they brought before a justice of the peace who determines bail? These are some of the questions which I hope the minister can answer. I hope that when the bill is before the committee he will bring forth Mr. Friedland who wrote the book on pretrial detention, as well as other specialists in the field, so that we can get the total picture of the application of these new provisions. One thing we would like is uniformity with regard to application. If the minister admits that this is a complex bill—and I say it is a colossus of complexities—surely we should have expert witnesses to guide and direct us with regard to its application. I hope we go into it in depth. I hope the minister will appear and give some of the answers to our problems.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments at this stage of the consideration of Bill C-218 entitled "An Act to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal".

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this bill has been introduced because of certain needs and of certain pressures coming not only from the public, but also from jurists who must deal every day with persons who have difficulties with the law.

We intend, once again, through this legislation, to amend our Criminal Code. If some persons find it difficult to abide by the law, one must also recognize that some laws do not respect the individual, and that some officers have responsibilities regarding their application.

I received this morning a letter from one of my constituents who is experiencing difficulties with unemployment insurance. This individual lost his job about three months ago, and since that time, he has been claiming unemployment insurance benefits to which he is entitled, or at least, thinks he is entitled to. Inquiries are being conducted. Recently, he was told that his case was delayed for further study and that it will not be possible to pay him before many days. Therefore, this individual is in revolt, although I do not think that he will put into acts what he feels. However, in such cases, I wonder whether an individual would not be almost excusable if he went wrong.

If we want our laws to be respected, we have to make every effort to understand what is human in the individual and to do him justice. The bill purports to improve the provisions regarding bail which some defendants are required to provide. As we all know, too often unfortunately people get for instance, arrested for theft and without their being fully aware of it, bail is paid out for them to secure their release pending trial. This procedure in effect binds the defendants to whoever has bailed them out often without their consent.

Some of the underworld sharks have found their way into our courts of justice and taken advantage of the situation of some individuals who, as the minister indicated, due to their lack of education or their great poverty cannot afford their defence. They have been offered freedom without asking where it came from and they have accepted it only to discover they were indebted to rather unscrupulous characters and very often it was too late, they were already in the pineline.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the amendment to the Criminal Code concerning bail will correct this situation and prevent a man who has been arrested from being deprived of his freedom while awaiting trial for the simple reason that he is poor or cannot communicate with his relatives or friends.

I am convinced that this bill will have very serious consequences on the administration of our laws.

The bill also tends to introduce some changes in the methods of work of our police officers. For instance, we want the police officers in charge of arrests to be very careful in carrying out their duties. We must recognize that there has been some abuse here and I think that police officers should not be asked to exercize their judgment in a way that would tie their hands.

I wonder if in the past police officers have always been sufficiently educated about their duties to carry them out efficiently.

I wonder whether it would not be advisable for universities to give special courses to policemen. In the past, policemen were hired for their physical strength without too much concern about their level of education. It was considered that the size of their muscles was enough for them to be good policemen. But I think they should have a fair amount of judgment. A lot of common sense is sometimes required for the enforcement of certain legislation quite often in urgent situations. Our universities should offer occupational courses for would-be policemen both provincial and municipal.

I would like to make a few remarks on the proposed reforms concerning juvenile delinquency. Much is said about juvenile delinquency which is alarmingly increasing in our villages and our cities. Considering the overall situation and certain reports on the subject, one is led to wonder if the parents should not be arrested instead of the children since quite often juvenile delinquency is the direct result of parents' carelessness.

Means designed to prevent juvenile delinquency must be found. There is no need to enact drastic legislation, but rather we have to remedy the situation through proper education for your young people and, in many instances, for their parents.

As concerns Bill C-218, members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will have an opportunity to hear and question experts called in to give evidence. This will enable them to appreciate much more accurately what this bill is worth.

I hope that this bill will be referred to the committee as soon as possible and undergo a thorough examination.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be to compliment you on occupying the Chair this afternoon, you being a parliamentarian who, through the years, has that love of Parliament which has been evidenced on so many occasions.

I will be frank with you, Sir, when I say I did not intend to participate in this debate. I came into the chamber to listen to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and I became so interested in what he had to say that certain ideas came to me which I thought I might share with the House.

I am not one of those who say that this bill is a colossus of complexity, to use the phraseology of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). It is dramatic, but I cannot argue. The bill indicates a desire on the part of the minister to bring about reform in the administration of the criminal law. While it may be suggested that it could be done all at once rather than piecemeal, that is not the way in which advances are made, particularly with respect to those matters which have an emotional content.

We are today dealing with a problem that throughout the years has been one to exorcise the thinking and emotions of all who have participated in the administration of the criminal law. Too often poverty has been a passport to prison. The poverty of an individual has often contributed to his incarceration because of his inability to obtain bail. Not being able to obtain bail, there is a psychological reaction against him on the part of many people. Even though the individual has subsequently been found not guilty, there is always an adverse reaction to the individual who has served time.

We have representatives of the law in the House. We have a former distinguished member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg). In the discharge of his responsibilities throughout the years he has been, above everything, considerate of the rights of individuals. Indeed, that is the background and essence of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as a whole. I appeared on many cases in which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were witnesses. Of the hundreds of cases on which I appeared, in only two did I note any deviation from the course of responsibility that has been the tradition of the force and is the prestige it has established for itself.

We are now speaking on a subject that will receive more than passing interest. The police, RCMP or otherwise, are often castigated, condemned and chastised. We apparently have not had enough hell-raisers in Canada during the past few years: we have permitted the importation of a number of people from the United States whose major subject in speeches and discussions has been contempt for the police whom they refer to as pigs. Recently, in the city of Regina one of these imported revolutionaries stated that only revolution would bring about the eradication of the pigs. He then stated a threatening indecency, that it is not a long journey from being a pig to being bacon. He asked those at the university meeting to which he spoke to do their part to destroy the police forces.

An announcement was made today concerning the commutation of the sentence of death on an individual found guilty of the murder of a police officer. There will be widespread criticism. I was one who took the position that we ought not to divide murder into two classes, capital and non-capital. I contended that it would lead to anomalies. A murderer of the Governor General would be guilty of non-capital murder, but if he killed a guard or police officer while attempting to avoid arrest, he would be guilty of capital murder. There have been tremendous changes in criminal law. No longer are the punitive and retributive aspects of our criminal law of the same importance as they were considered to be years ago. One of my great grandfathers was present in Upper Canada in 1836 at the public hanging of an individual charged with pickpocketing. The pioneers came from everywhere to join in this great celebration. Lo and behold, after the day's festivities were over, four in the audience found their pockets had been picked!

Everyone knows my feelings on the subject of capital punishment. Nowhere in countries with our tradition, our common law background—including Great Britain and the United States—has anyone been executed for murder in the past few years. As I recall it, 580 persons have been in death-row in the United States for 1½ to 2½ years. Some of them were convicted of having killed police officers or guards.

Responsibility falls generally on the Prime Minister to sign the cabinet order approving the carrying out of death sentences. When I was Prime Minister I signed the last two orders in this respect because I believed the law ought to be enforced and that there was clear evidence of guilt in both cases. The trend in the last few years is away from capital punishment. It has been abolished in the United Kingdom, and as I am informed there is no possibility of its being reinstated there despite public demands that it should be. I believe with all my heart that guards and police officers should be protected, but I do not think it is possible for the criminal law to say that if a man commits one type of murder he shall go to the gallows, while if he commits another, even though it be a most dastardly and damnable murder by poisoning or the like, he shall not.

I am one who has formed my ideas as to who in the future has among the members of the House, the possibility of becoming Prime Minister, and I have no hesitation in saying that among the two or three I have in mind, the Minister of Justice falls into that category.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, he has been given a series of duties to perform which have not been conducive to public acclaim. I refer first to the hate literature bill. Portions of that bill would, if charges could be laid and proceeded with, put nearly everybody in jail were it not for the fact that prosecutions cannot take place without the consent of the Attorney General of the province within which the alleged words inciting hatred were uttered. Everybody would be in jail: there would be only two groups in our country who would criticize and condemn as far as the FLQ are concerned—those in jail and those of us who were waiting for the others to come out so that we could get in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can only say too that if it were not for the Attorney General of Quebec, upon whom falls the responsibility to determine whether prosecution can take place under the hate literature bill, there would be many prosecutions.

Of all paradoxes, the Minister of Justice, as the law officer of the Crown, had to introduce or support legislation connected with the temporary powers act and, as well, give his undivided support to the imposition of the War Measures Act. I can only conclude that when he now says bail should not be denied and that no one should be kept in jail because of inability to raise a bond or put up cash, the views he expressed as far back as June last, referred to by the hon. member for Broadview, had to be put in cold storage in the months of October, November and December. I should like to see the Minister of Justice, now that he is so definitely of the opinion that changes concerning civil liberties must be made, join at once in supporting an end to the temporary measures act. It is not necessary any more, if it ever was—and as to that I have strong opinions.

In the spirit of reform which has always been a reason for action on his part I should like the minister to consider the setting up of a royal commission to look fully into the question of infiltration into Canada of international wrongdoers and also the infiltration of Communists into areas of public responsibility. I believe such a commission, if it had been set up at the time I first suggested it in October, 1969, regarding the FLQ would have contributed greatly to preventing what took place last October and November. Various individuals were talking of revolution and were uttering seditious libels. But no royal commission was set up and Canada has reaped the disadvantages since.

The minister mentioned new rules for bail and the new plan, which I entirely support of reducing arrests to a minimum. In support of his views Canada has twice as many people in the penitentiaries and jails in Canada than has the United Kingdom. Crimes are multiplying in Canada. In an age of permissiveness, lawlessness has become a way of life. I shall not go into statistics except to read to the House the percentage increase in crime between 1962 and 1969, the last year for which statistics are available. Murder increased by 57 per cent, attempted murder by 169 per cent, rape by 77 per cent, assault, not including indecent assault, by 159 per cent, robbery by 99 per cent, breaking and entering by 97 per cent, theft of property valued at more than $50 by 100 per cent, and frauds by 92 per cent. Mr. Speaker these statistics are an indictment of us all. I believe the legislation now before us will be beneficial in establishing for the individual a reasonable degree of security of his civil liberties, and at the same time will maintain the security of the state.

I suggest to the minister that it is time judges across Canada kept their mouths shut in regard to political matters. As to royal commissions I hope that the Spence commission dispensed with the use of High Court judges for political purpose commissions once and for all. However, I am concerned that during the last few months judges have been expressing themselves in a way that is not in keeping with the independence of the judiciary and its freedom from political considerations. One of our High Court judges of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba, speaking in Toronto, said:

> What the FLQ did in the Cross and Laporte matter was a frontal challenge to the rule of law. What Canada did by response was a courageous refusal to yield to that challenge.

He is an experienced and able judge—

An hon. Member: But a political judge.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not say that. I recall, in connection with that interruption, the remarks attributed to F. E. Smith the inimitable, when he clashed with a judge. He had been truculent in the presentation of his cases, and the judge said to him, "I would remind you, if you have ever read the great Bacon, that youth and wisdom are scarcely ever good companions" Frederick Smith replied, "And, my Lord, I would remind you that the same great Bacon has said that the garrulous judge and justice have never met".

Let me give another example. A judge of the Ontario Court of Appeal made a speech in which he said that Canadians should be prepared to carry identity cards bearing their photograph and thumbprint. I say to that judge that he should stay on the bench, and not advise Canadians they should adopt such a system in this country. Mr. Speaker, judges should not give their opinions when they are of a political nature. I could mention two others in inferior courts who have been expressing themselves in a way that cannot be justified and cannot but contribute to disrupt the law in our nation.

The minister mentioned that accused persons who possess the necessary resources are able to get their freedom before trial and even after trial. There have been a couple of examples of individuals who, having been convicted but having power and wealth, have escaped. I am not going to bring up the case of labour leader Hal Banks—"Prince Hall" of Liberal favour. He got out on $25,000 bail after having been convicted. He then left for the attractive atmosphere of New York.

However, the United States traded us one in the person of John Doyle, who still takes his part in the political life of this country. Having been convicted in the United States he got out on bail and came to Canada. When I recently mentioned in Barbados to an American lawyer that law enforcement in the United States was not always of the best, he said to me, "Well, we believe in fairness. We traded you Doyle for Banks". Both of these gentlemen were financially well off.

I shall have more to say about Mr. Doyle on another occasion. In the month of April, 1963, he was a mastermind. At a time when certain Social Credit members decided they ought to sign a petition of support for the opposition of that day, he had with him a civil servant of high rank today occupying a seat at the top echelon in a semi-judicial capacity, as well as a man by the name of Moise Durabaner who was the accepted apostle of Liberalism in Quebec. I shall be referring to this matter on another occasion. However, let me point out that Mr. Durabaner could tell a story in support of what the Minister of Justice stated, that too often when an individual is incarcerated awaiting trial, practices take place that are not in keeping with justice. He was kept in custody for seven months, was pressed daily and weekly and threatened until he finally confessed. This is a matter that might be looked into because it would be an interesting story. He has been in custody a long while and there are some who are not anxious that he get out on parole after 5½ years.

Since the minister has become "Mr. Clean-up" in the world of criminal law, I think the time has come for a commission to be appointed to look into the state of Canadian penitentiaries. Two or three investigations have been made. I have asked a number of questions during the last couple of weeks concerning the Prince Albert penitentiary. There again, as always, the little man at the bottom gets the condemnation. A public investigation should be conducted into that penitentiary and into others across the country.

The criminal law protects the security of each of us. But the individual who is before the courts has a right to the preservation of those freedoms without which life itself is meaningless. The Minister of Justice referred to the provisions concerning bail, imprisonment and a denial of cruel and heinous punishments going back to the days of the British Bill of Rights which were incorporated in the United States Bill of Rights and amendments to the Constitution, and are included in our Bill of Rights.

At this point I want to refer to what to me appears to be a major division in the cabinet opposite—just one of them. The Minister of Justice is sincerely desirous of preserving the freedom of Canadians, and I have no hesitation in saying that. I have never got around to handing out compliments where they are not deserved. It is not flattery to say that. I think of Sir John when he was interrupted once in the House: he had said something favourable about a minister in the Mackenzie government, and the minister said, "That is flattery." Sir John said, "No, it is a compliment". The minister said, "What is the difference?" Sir John replied, "Flattery is an agreeable untruth".

The minister has a feeling for the Bill of Rights, but what of the others in the cabinet? The Bill of Rights came before the Supreme Court of Canada and the government of Canada stood against the Bill of Rights all the way along. It had its counsel argue that the Bill of Rights was an ineffective and pious declaration of human rights but did not mean anything to the individual.

It was not the present minister who made the appointments, but in the Supreme Court of Canada, counsel for the government of Canada, while embracing the principle of freedom in their arguments did everything they could to induce the Supreme Court of Canada to say that the Bill of Rights did not mean anything.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is not quite right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister not read their factum? It is apparent that in the arguments they advanced they were not representative of the present Minister of Justice but of another group within the cabinet which does not believe in human rights.

This is a worth-while bill. It does not cover the entire situation. I presume one is permitted to quote a Chinese proverb, now that the Communists have their representatives in Ottawa: a journey of a thousand miles begins with one step. This is an important step and I congratulate the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, it is always a privilege to participate in a debate in this House, particularly when one follows the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I was a little suspicious when he indicated that he was not prepared for this debate and I saw the papers he had on his desk and the material he drew upon. I think that was an agreeable untruth. In fact, he may not have been prepared for the debate on this bill but he was certainly prepared for a debate on all the things he had to say.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert attacks the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and says there is a paradox between the position he took on the War Measures Act and the position he is taking on this legislation. I do not see a paradox. Instead, I see the Minister of Justice doing what he was called upon to do at that time: he was called upon to do his duty, and he did it. If I may be permitted to say this, I think the Minister of Justice did his duty well. I do not think there is any question in the mind of any member of this House, particularly those who know the Minister of Justice, that the kind of decisions he was called upon to make at that particular time were necessary. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert has said, in his position as a law officer the minister was faced with making these decisions and he made them.

I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-218 which relates to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal. One of the charges levelled by many citizens—and I am embarrassed to say I have often heard this charge made in the House—is that there is a law for the rich and a law for the poor. It is the kind of statement that makes a conscientious member of the Bar wince. I see in this legislation a narrowing of the gap in the treatment that will be afforded to the rich and to the poor. This type of legislation and the philosophy behind it augurs well for increased respect for the law.

I think that in order to understand this particular piece of legislation, we have to look at the present situation. I read very carefully a series of articles by two practising lawyers from Toronto, Mr. Sydney B. Lindon and Mr. Joel Goldenberg. They made some interesting and, I think revealing comments about the present situation. These two gentlemen conducted a Toronto bail research project. This study was conducted over a two-year period from 1966 to 1968. They concluded that the system of bail as we know it today does not work, because it keeps people in custody who should not be there and it allows people out of custody who should perhaps not be free pending trial.

It does not appear to have any greater reliability than release on recognizance without bail, and unhappily it punishes before trial. In effect, it seems to make a mockery of the statement that a man is innocent until proven guilty. Mr. Linden and Mr. Goldenberg stated—I am paraphrasing their series of articles—that the Parliament of Canada must take the lead and provide a legislative and philosophical framework within which reforms may take place.

Knowing the situation and knowing the demands that will now be placed upon policemen in the country, it is my feeling that this legislation pays a great compliment to our police forces. This Parliament has an obligation to pass good laws or what the minister called in one of his speeches credible laws. He said this in an address to the association of police chiefs. As good as the laws that we make here may be, I suggest that we will have worked in vain unless the practical problems of administrative reform and enforcement are solved. The minister in his address to the association of police chiefs said as follows:

> It is unfair to expect the police to enforce laws that have lost the respect of the public for in doing so the police become the butt of public criticism, criticism that should be more correctly directed at the legislator.

In fact, it is criticism directed toward hon. members of this chamber. I stated earlier that this legislation pays a compliment to the police forces in Canada, and I submit that we owe it to the policemen to state here publicly that we will, by this bill, be giving them greater responsibility in their already crowded schedule of responsibility. Modern society has, unfortunately, complicated the task of the legislator and of the policeman. The two gentlemen referred to previously, Messrs. Linden and Goldenberg, have challenged Parliament to provide the legislative and philosophical framework. This bill has done that. If it is not applied with humanity, understanding and common sense by the police, our work will have been in vain. Attitudes of the public are based on the first contact of the citizen with the police, so that they are in effect the vanguard or our front line troops.

The minister and others have outlined the objects of this bill and I do not believe it is necessary for me to reiterate them. We are not studying the bill clause by clause. I support the philosophy and framework of the bill but I thought it incumbent upon me to pay tribute to the men who must make it work—the policemen of Canada. Unhappily for the policemen in all too many communities, the only time people hear about the kind of job they are required to do, the kind they will be required to do under this bill, the type of risks they are required to take, the kind of intelligence they have to exhibit and the decisions they have to make, is at salary bargaining time. A somewhat shallow and cynical public has said: They are saying all these things and exaggerating them because they want an increase in pay.

Happily, in many communities there is a good public relations effort and there are splendid programs of school visits, films and safety lectures. The school systems of the country have an obligation to do that which is possible to accord policemen the kind of respect they have earned and deserve. I believe that the police forces of Canada are intelligent enough to deal with this legislation, because they know it is good law and they will have all the more reason for making it work. Very early in the game, the Minister of Justice met the Attorneys General of the provinces, and this bill has won wide acceptance. As I indicated earlier, the minister spoke to the police chiefs in Canada to impress upon them the need for training and educating so that policemen will understand their responsibilities under this bill.

I do not think this is unpopular legislation. I think it is the kind of law that once again points up a new attitude toward an accused. It is a law which, if properly enforced will bring new respect for justice and the administration of justice. Press comment is favourable: it has indicated that the bill will make major reforms of the Canadian law relating to arrest, detention before trial, and bail. I think the general public will also accept the philosophy of this bill when it understands that it seeks to prevent the unnecessary arrest and detention of persons suspected of having committed a crime, but that it provides proper guidelines for the exercise of police and judicial authorities.

I have referred to the philosophy behind the bill. The philosophy of the bill, in essence, is this: A police officer should not arrest a suspect if the public interest can be secured by proceeding in another fashion. The fashions are outlined in the bill. If a suspect is arrested and detained, his financial means should not be the determining factor in deciding whether he is to be released on bail pending trial. In this bill we have said a man is innocent until proven guilty and the onus is on the authorities to establish why bail should not be granted. Money is not the measure: the basic question should be whether an accused person is likely to appear for his trial.

One of the other areas which the government and the Minister of Justice have considered is that it is necessary to bring down a piece of legislation and not to be hidebound to follow it in minute detail. This legislation was introduced early, with the full knowledge that time would pass before Parliament would have an opportunity to deal with it prior to the summer recess. This was done, as the minister has indicated, to make it public and so provincial authorities charged with the responsibility of enforcing it would have full opportunity to study the proposals before the bill was passed by Parliament. I am informed that since June, 1970, the Minister of Justice has discussed the bill at meetings in Halifax of provincial Attorneys General and with various police organizations. It was also discussed, as I have said, with the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police which met at London, Ontario. The bill has received detailed study by many sections of the public. It was then reintroduced by the Minister of Justice, as he has indicated. He said:

—I am satisfied assisted in achieving a clear and a workable law but to maintain intact the basic principles of the legislation—

From the standpoint of the people who will be operating under the aegis of this bill, everything possible has been done to bring it to their attention, to give them an opportunity of studying it and to present their observations. In the final analysis decisions have to be made. The bill, as I indicated previously, was redrawn and reintroduced. This is a good bill. It is a bill which I think all members of the House can support in principle. If there are specific changes to clauses that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs might see fit to make, changes which will improve the performance of the bill, its image or the standard, I know they will be welcomed by the Minister of Justice. On second reading of the bill we are dealing with its general principle, and I have no hesitation in declaring my complete support for this good piece of legislation.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I shall speak briefly on this bill, partly because there is general disposition on the part of hon. members to send it to committee and partly because I think it would be unwise for some of us to reveal the depths of our ignorance on this subject. Speaking as a layman in the field of law, I feel it incumbent on me to speak on this bill which is the first major proposal to be presented to the House by the minister since the activities with which he was involved last fall.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The statutory instruments bill was a most important measure.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): The statutory instruments bill has been dealt with. This bill is important, yet the minister's attitude with regard to it is clearly inconsistent with the attitude he displayed last fall. I listened carefully when the minister was speaking before lunch. He enumerated effectively and clearly the reasons for bringing in this kind of legislation, reasons in which I wholeheartedly concur. I am sure that anyone who has followed the minister's speeches during the past six months is more than somewhat amazed to hear him today talking about the desirability of restoring order and that there must not be overkill in the methods used. His remarks concern people who might be detained unnecessarily, as well as the economic, social and financial difficulties resulting from detention. But it seems that only yesterday, or perhaps it was the day before, this minister seemed to be totally unaware that those factors would also apply to those detained under another piece of legislation which even he could not adequately define.

We have learned recently that 90 per cent of those arrested under that law may have suffered, as innocent individuals, the loss of economic and social opportunities, the loss of jobs and all the deprivations following upon that. In addition, they have acquired a criminal record which is available to municipal or provincial authorities. Clearly, under the law as it now stands, this should not be tolerated for one moment. Yesterday afternoon the minister indicated a willingness to tell provincial officials how bad it would be if they were to maintain the records of the 435 people who never have been charged with a criminal offence, because these people to the end of their days would know that their criminal dossier was in the hands of the authorities. This is something the citizens of the country would not wish to tolerate for one moment.

Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this reform bill having to do with bail, detention, and so on, demonstrates that every possible step ought to be taken to ensure that nothing detrimental happens to an accused provided, of course, that he is still presumed to be innocent before being found guilty. This point was argued strenuously last fall when we argued the implications of the regulations under the War Measures Act and, subsequently, those falling under the public order bill.

The minister and the government apparently refused to accept our minimal request for the setting up of a review procedure. The minister argued that you could not introduce such a review procedure when this matter fell under provincial responsibility. It could be argued, if one were looking for inconsistencies in the law we are debating, that it too will be administered on a provincial basis. Nevertheless, that in no way prevented the minister to ensure that people will be properly dealt with by the law. If we have to choose between the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) whom we see in February, and the Minister of Justice whom we saw in November, I will take the one this month, as I am sure most enlightened Canadians will.

As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said, we must look more earnestly at many aspects of legal reform. One that I hope we will discuss before long is the question of contempt. I think it is interesting that members of this House can pass comments, as they often do, on the effective use of procedures in courts, but citizens generally, were they to comment publicly on the regular day-to-day business of the courts, would leave themselves open to being cited for contempt by the judiciary. We have seen this with respect to court proceedings in Montreal recently.

The whole question of contempt must be seriously considered if the citizenry of the country is to be able to properly appraise the effectiveness and fairness of the courts. It has been well said by the minister and a number of hon. members that this legislation is attempting to redress the imbalance of the rich with respect to the poor. There is in my mind no doubt that it has been true for many years that those who are well-off have always been more fairly treated—not only in courts but in society—because they have been able to take advantage of the kind of sway and stature that money and influence bring, which naturally give them a better opportunity, even before the courts, when perhaps their objective, legal situation is exactly the same as that of those who have not the money or influence with which to defend themselves.

I trust that in bringing forth this legislation the government is moving to remove these inequalities from the law. What the minister said is very true, that those who have found themselves unnecessarily detained, who have experienced a period of pre-trial detention, have often prejudiced their own case with regard to the eventual outcome of the trial. In fact, if I were to speak as a layman I would say that I have been even more concerned about the personal effect of long periods of pre-trial detention. Having spent some time working in prisons and penitentiaries, particularly in prisons where men are usually detained before trial, I know the kind of debilitating effect which may occur, particularly to individuals who for the first time find themselves in the worst kind of social conditions in our provincial and municipal institutions of incarceration.

I think it is a sad comment on our system of penology that those who first run afoul of the law, or who at least are charged with running afoul of the law are immediately thrown into conditions that cannot help but influence them to become increasingly anti-social and at odds with society in general. It would perhaps be useful if more of our public leaders and members of this House would visit people being held before trial or would talk to those who have had that experience. There is no doubt in my mind that if that incarceration does not immediately affect the progress of the trial, it certainly has a disastrous, long-term effect on the accused. For that reason, if for no other, I welcome the legislation put forward by the minister. There are, however, two or three dangers in this legislation of which we should be aware.

In his opening remarks the minister said that one of the main objectives of this bill is to ensure an early trial. I hope this is the case, but in view of the tremendous number of trials pending in many provinces because of an insufficient judiciary, it is not at all obvious that by passing this legislation we will alleviate the problem. By putting this bill into law, steps must be taken immediately—perhaps the provinces could do so in conjunction with the federal government—to ensure that the undue or lengthy detention period before trial does not occur. If these steps are not taken, then indeed, the bill will defeat the very purpose for which it was introduced.

I was intrigued to hear the comment made by lawyers who have spoken in the debate regarding the complexity of this legislation. We know that we live in an increasingly complex society, but many of the problems we face are not simple in terms of solution. I think we must avoid, if at all possible, introducing solutions that are more complex than need be. I think that one of the services the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs could provide would be to ensure that in the final analysis the legislation directed toward these reforms is as simple and clearcut as possible.

I think this legislation introduces a number of important questions with regard to administration, not the least of which is the effectiveness of those in positions of authority in the police forces. This interesting question was raised at length during our debate last fall on the War Measures Act and the temporary public order bill. Increasingly, questions are being raised as to how effective police action can be in a modern society.

I think members on all sides of the House have been disturbed by the increasing loss of respect for authority and the frequent inability of authority to question itself effectively and objectively. In the first instance, I think public confidence in the police must be restored where it has been lost. Second, I think we must begin an effective upgrading program so that modern-day police officers will be competent and able to handle the kind of legislation that is placed in their hands. The wide powers of judgment being asked for in this bill will require a much more comprehensive training—perhaps in-service training—for police authorities provincial and federal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock p.m.—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it has been stated several times that there is a general disposition in the House to conclude second reading of this bill today. Toward that end, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), whose bill would be coming up in this hour, has agreed that it would be all right for me to say that we would give unanimous consent to Your Honour not seeing the clock.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I thank the hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: We give that agreement as well.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I will conclude very quickly so that other hon. members may be able to speak on second reading. I conclude by saying that because of the substantial change with regard to bail and detention, we require much greater public education.

• (4:00 p.m.)

As we know, in the main public education is a provincial responsibility. It seems to me the government will have to be prepared to assist the provinces, where requested, in this respect in order that a much greater understanding of the operations of the law will ensue. It has been suggested that the police officer will have a responsibility to inform the individual of his rights. Traditionally, that has been expected; but in addition I would hope that in concert with this legislation there would be a program to educate citizens so that generally they would know the application of the law with respect to their individual situations.

Finally, with reference to the meetings of the committee which will study the bill in detail, I hope the committee will have available the testimony of those who can offer professional advice and those concerned with the area of provincial administration, so that when the bill goes into our statute books it will be in the best interests of Canadians.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I commend the minister, without reservation, on the introduction of this bill. I speak only for myself: I know this is perhaps an unusual occurrence, but whenever it is deserved I prefer to take this attitude. Contrary to the fears expressed by some people, I am satisfied that the legislation will aid law enforcement. It will do so by promoting greater public respect for the law and for its enforcers, the police and the courts.

Everybody in this House would agree that law and order are essential to the security of all of us. There are some people outside the House who perhaps do not accept that, but I think it is a basic truth. At times, the slogans of law and order are used to deny the liberties and rights of the individual, and I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) was absolutely right when he said that the real task of legislators, as well as of courts, is to balance individual liberties against the needs and the necessities of the community.

I am happy that the atmosphere that surrounded the invocation of the War Measures Act and the enactment of the public order act has not prevented the minister from bringing forward this bill which expands the rights of the individual. I am glad that the program of reform, to which I know he is devoted, has not been ended by the degree of public fear and hysteria which accompanied the events of last October and November. I think this legislation is needed, and has been badly needed, for a long time.

The minister referred to Professor M. L. Friedland and his book on this subject. I have in my hand an address delivered by Professor Friedland to the John Howard Society in February, 1966, which I think summarizes extremely well the case for this bill. I am not going to read all of it, but the first thing emphasized by Professor Friedland in his address is the very infrequent use of the summons to initiate criminal proceedings in this country, as compared with the situation in England. He said:

> The relatively infrequent use of the summons is clearly undesirable in light of the many sound arguments in favour of limiting the process of arrest to those cases in which it is a reasonable necessity.
> When an accused is summoned, rather than arrested, all the harmful consequences of custody pending trial are automatically eliminated: for example, the higher incidence of guilty pleas for those kept in custody;—

The minister referred to that.

—the possibility of improper treatment while in custody; the possible delay and inconvenience in attempting to raise bail; the opportunity for the accused to become enmeshed with illegal bondsmen and unscrupulous lawyers; and generally all the personal considerations, such as loss of employment, decreased income and protection for the accused's family, and anxiety of relatives and friends.

The minister referred to these matters when introducing this legislation, and they are extremely important to the individuals concerned. Professor Friedland went on to say:

English law has always maintained that the physical integrity of the body and freedom from confinement are of paramount importance. Summoning an accused saves him from the indignity of being physically taken away by the police. Unless the application of even the most minimal force is reasonably necessary it should not, of course, be applied.

He want on to express what I think is the core of the reason this legislation is required.

Unnecessary arrests weaken the whole fabric of the administration of justice. They further community disorder and create bad will between the public and the police force. Many of the cases involving police violence, resisting arrest, and assault on police officers arise out of situations in which the police are legally but needlessly using the arrest procedure. The administration of the criminal law directly affects a substantial proportion of the community. Not only will the accused react unfavourably to what he feels to be abusive procedures, but his friends and relatives will also tend to lose respect for those who use unduly harsh and primitive techniques for compelling appearance in court. By arbitrarily arresting all accused persons the police cannot hope to enlist public sympathy and support.

I sincerely believe that is entirely true. Most of us in this House come from elements of society that have relatively little contact with the police. We are fortunate that we do not often have to face these things. But I think a great deal of the lack of sympathy from the police, which people have complained about, has been due to the practice of unnecessary, unneeded and unrequired use of the procedure of arrest rather than the procedure of summons. I think the usefulness of the legislation will be tested in practice by whether there will be a substantial reduction in the use of arrest and a substantial increase in the use of summons and the other notification procedures outlined in the legislation.

In addition to dealing with the substitution of less punitive forms of initiation of criminal procedures, the bill also deals with the question of bail. Again, I think the essence of this was set out in the address by Professor Friedland, to which I have referred, when he said:

In the setting of bail there is an undue preoccupation with its monetary aspects. Security in advance is generally required in our courts. At the time of the study release on one's own recognizance was used in less than 20 per cent of the indictable offence cases where bail was set...

The tragedy of this preoccupation with money is that a large percentage of persons are unable to raise the bail that is set. The data showed that 62 per cent of all persons for whom bail was set at their first court appearance were unable to raise it, and in particular, when bail was set at $500, 60 per cent were unable to raise it.

The purpose of this bill, in part, as I understand it is to remove that discrimination which means that a person with property can obtain bail, can obtain liberty and escape from the indignity of prolonged or any imprisonment before conviction has been registered. He can escape that indignity if he has money: he cannot if he does not have money. That is the plain fact that has existed for many years in our criminal procedure. It is grossly unfair. It creates disrespect for the law; the feeling that the law aids one section of the society and not another. This is one of the reasons for dissatisfaction, contempt and eventual lawlessness.

If an accused is to be released, he should be released on his own recognizance. If the recognizance is not appropriate, it should be by surety of a reasonable amount recoverable if an accused fails to appear. There should be an adequate investigation of the background of arrested persons. As any practising lawyer knows, bail is often set without any knowledge of the person concerned. It is set almost entirely on the gravity of the offence. It is necessary to have background information when allowing bail. I hope this bill will promote an investigation of the background of those concerned. Financial security in advance must be eliminated from our release practices before trial. Because the bill does this, I think it deserves favourable consideration by the House.

It has been justly said that the bill is complex. However, it is not unduly complex. If the members of this party who are members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs can assist in removing the complexities of the bill, we will try to do so.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I will not take very long in commenting on this bill. It has had a fairly good run this morning and this afternoon. Many of the points that I might have made have already been underlined. I support the bill, as do my colleagues. Without being unfair, I say that this bill, unlike the young offenders' bill, indicates that the minister has been sensitive to the opinions and expertise of those who have given this subject a good deal of study. I congratulate the minister for this. In doing so, I do not want to be uncomplimentary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) who was practically handed the bill with his appointment as Solicitor General.

I think there is a lesson to be learned here. The bill shows that care and attention has been paid to this question by those who have knowledge and information. The minister has had the advantage of many inputs, to use the current cliché, one of which is the book entitled "Harrison Liberal Conference, 1969". I have volume 3 in my hand. This book contains a most interesting summary of a paper that was presented. It might be worth while quoting. I will not quote the complete summary of what occurred at Harrison Hot Springs but just that aspect which deals with the bill now before us.

Sixty-two per cent of all people who had a bail with deposit order set during a 6 months' study were unable to post that bail. They could not afford to buy their freedom.

The language used at Harrison Hot Springs is being parachuted into the record by the member for Fundy-Royal.

> Studies have indicated that the fact of being in custody at the time of the trial will prejudice the accused person.
> The Amicus Foundation report noted that almost the same percentage of people who had posted bail failed to appear for trial as those who were released on their own recognizance.
> The writers suggest that the Criminal Code's section 125 be vigorously implemented thereby prosecuting those who fail to appear for trial.
> An abuse of the bail system is the usurious rate of interest charged by money lenders to post bail. Possibly a worse abuse is that inability to produce bail imposes punishment before the trial.
> Crowded dockets require inordinately long periods of incarceration before trial.

I may be transgressing on a field which is basically a provincial responsibility, although sometimes we might profitably indulge in a discussion of this whole area. I do not believe one can slough off his responsibility in a sort of constitutional minuet as has occurred in recent months. There are very few cases where an accused person should have to wait for what in another age was the arrival of an assize judge. This should not be part of the modern day mobility. This aspect might also be investigated by the minister, who has been having very useful meetings with Superior Court judges across the country with regard to the whole aspect of sentencing.

When this bill becomes law it will require a great deal of study by the various police departments in Canada. I hope that the minister will continue to show leadership in this field by initiating discussions and studies that will be essential if the municipal and provincial police forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are to give effect to the philosophy behind this bail reform bill. It must not be left to an ad hoc committee of Attorneys General or Ministers of Justice: I hope the leadership will come from the Minister of Justice in the same way that it has with this bail reform bill. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) referred to a very interesting study made by Professor Friedland. I shall not lard up the record by repeating what he said. He made his speech ahead of me, so Professor Friedland is now his man. Presumably, Professor Friedland is also the minister's man. A good deal of very useful information contained in Professor Friedland's articles and studies have obviously gone into the drafting of this statute.

We must continue to keep a sharp distinction between our treatment of a man suspected of a crime and a man convicted of one. It is not a useless admonition to keep reminding ourselves of this. The amendment to the Criminal Code, through this bill, requires careful examination by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I am anxious for it to soon become part of the statute law of Canada. Like other hon. members who have spoken, I think the appearance notice will be an extraordinarily helpful reform to the law. For the life of me, I have never understood why the police have felt compelled to use warrants in so many instances. This bill will give them not only the alternative but a legal obligation to use the appearance notice. It will compel the courts as a general rule to accept a man's word or written undertaking that he will turn up for his trial. These two things are the key to what the minister described as a complicated piece of legislation.

I had occasion once in my career at the Bar to appear on behalf of an 11-year old boy who had been kept in jail for eight days without a charge being laid. We found, when a visiting clergyman drew the case to my attention, that the police had been trying very hard—this is not a general rule, I think, with the police—to "break" him. That is the term they use. When I arrived at the jail I was asked by the police officer to wait because they were just about to "break" the boy. I suggested it would not be the boy who was broken, but the police, if he was not delivered with me to the magistrate within minutes.

I am not usually as upset about things as I was then. This is a terrifying example of what could happen in a small out of the way place if people, particularly the police in this instance, are not sensitive or knowledgeable about their obligations under the law. This is a roundabout way of saying there will have to be help given to the police. Some have suggested the publication of a manual written in straightforward terms and also that an opportunity be given to the various police forces for re-education in connection with the whole thrust of what is a very useful bill.

There is one provision which worries me a little because of its complicated nature. I refer to the criticism which was expressed by the Quebec Association of Judges in a brief dealing with the clause amending section 445 C. The judges suggested it should be amended so as to prohibit not only publicity of a proof made, but also publicity being given to the name of an accused from the time of his first appearance in court. There are recommendations which I am sure the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will wish to study. A serious problem also arises from the fact that an accused might be prejudiced by having his case brought before the magistrate who heard his application for bail. It should therefore be possible to arrange for another magistrate to conduct a trial in circumstances in which the magistrate who would normally try the case had disposed of a contested bail application during which evidence not admissible at the trial had been produced. The judges claimed that it would be very difficult to administer the clause because there are so few judges and their workload, already great, would not allow an extra burden to be placed on Superior Court judges. If the situation is bad in the large cities, even more serious inequalities might arise in the smaller centres.

I have just given hon. members an instance of what can happen in a small jail. I do not know whether, had there been a Superior Court judge there, it would have made any difference. Of course, if the matter had been brought to his attention the situation would have been remedied. As the judges say, it may well lead to unfortunate situations in smaller centres which judges of the Superior Court of criminal jurisdiction visit only on occasion on circuit or for assizes, depending upon which of these terms they prefer.

Statistics are not available on a comprehensive basis with respect to the number of persons released on bail charged with indictable offences who commit indictable offences while on bail, or the relationship of a criminal record to the probability of the commission of an indictable criminal offence while on bail. The Ouimet report recommended that there should be a central registry, and I am sure this has been discussed. I have not heard every speech in this debate, unfortunately, but I hope the federal government is working on this problem and that it will establish a central registry in each province with some link with the national capital. This would be an important addition to the legislation when the act receives the approval of Parliament and becomes law.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there seem to be a few reluctant people around. I believe there have been some discussions and it may be possible to proceed with orders Nos. 27 and 39. Both are set for report stage and third reading. I am told the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has a brief statement to make in each case, and provided he is unprovocative these two items should get through fast.

Mr. Mahoney: I intend to be unprovocative, but I must say the items with which I am prepared to deal are items 39 and 51, the Canada-Jamaica Tax Convention—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is satisfactory. We shall switch to items 39 and 51 and hear what the parliamentary secretary has to say.

FARM IMPROVEMENT SMALL BUSINESSES AND IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACTS

AMENDMENT PROVIDING ADDITIONAL THREE-YEAR LOAN PERIOD

Hon. John N. Turner (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-191, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is the report stage: the hon. member should wait for third reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I will put the motion again.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Again on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is not here. The motion should be made by a minister who is here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Turner, for Mr. Benson, seconded by Mr. Richardson, moves that Bill C-191, an act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, be concurred in. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? Now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton, for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to take a chance on anyone missing this remarkable offering that they are about to receive. The only reason for saying anything at all is that a number of general questions regarding the scope, application and effectiveness of these programs were raised at the committee stage and the government would like to record a review of the programs being undertaken. For this reason I should like to take about two minutes of the time of the House.

We have before us Bill C-191 which has been reported, without amendment, by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. The purpose of this bill is to extend the existing legislation governing these programs for a three-year period ending June 30, 1974, and to provide for appropriate loan pools to permit their continued operation. The current lending periods for these programs would, in the absence of amendment, expire on June 30 of this year.

Hon. members will recollect that when the most recent amendment was made to one of these acts, the Small Businesses Loans Act, in March 1970, the government indicated that it was the intention to review these three very similar programs as a group in order to assess their effectiveness and, if justified, to bring forward any changes resulting from the review at a later date. This review has been started, but it would be unrealistic to expect it be completed before the end of June, 1971, when the present legislation expires. In particular, sufficient time must be allowed to obtain a comprehensive picture of the views of the various interested groups affected by these programs—of their needs and the adequacy of existing private and public facilities.

With this in mind it would seem shortsighted to make piecemeal changes in the existing legislation at this time without the benefit of a comprehensive overview. It is the government's intention to proceed with this assessment and to press forward with it, bearing in mind that it is essential to come up with realistic conclusions covering all facets of the situation in order to ensure that any government action will be effective and meaningful.

The government has already received a number of suggestions with respect to the provisions in the present legislation, as have a number of hon. members. All such submissions are, of course, receiving study and will be taken into account in the course of further developments. In the interim, passage of Bill C-191 will ensure that these programs will continue to be available to these three important sectors of the economy.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Just one or two sentences, Mr. Speaker, keeping within the caveat laid down by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) not to be provocative. I only want to say that it has been reported to me that the committee hearings were excellent and that the members of the opposition, with that inspiration, intellectual honesty and dedication to duty that characterizes them, had an extremely useful discussion on the bill. They made a lot of very interesting and provocative suggestions which I am sure the government will take in mind, and when these bills come to the House to be amended once more, as I am sure they will, the government will have the benefit of the collective wisdom of the opposition members of the committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to endorse the well spoken words of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA-JAMAICA INCOME TAX AGREEMENT ACT, 1971

IMPLEMENTATION OF AGREEMENT FOR AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. John N. Turner (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-217, to implement an agreement for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax between Canada and Jamaica, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Again being unprovocative, Mr. Speaker, but just a trifle longer, I am sure that when this bill is referred to the standing committee members of all parties, as they did in the case of Bill C-191, will have an opportunity to suggest improvements.

The purpose of this bill is to implement an agreement with Jamaica for the alleviation of double taxation on certain categories of income. Canada now has international agreements with 15 other countries relating to income taxation. Such an agreement, in fact, existed between Canada and Jamaica for some time by virtue of a special provision of the 1946 Canada-United Kingdom income tax agreement which extended its application to a number of Commonwealth territories. In 1965, that agreement with the U.K. was terminated and Jamaica was not party to the new Canada-U.K. agreement. Shortly thereafter, following the 1966 Commonwealth Caribbean-Canada conference, negotiations began with Jamaica for a comprehensive tax agreement. However, they were interrupted after the report of the Royal Commission on Taxation was made public early in 1967. The pending reform of the Canadian tax system made it difficult for Canada to contemplate the negotiation of comprehensive fiscal arrangements with Jamaica or, indeed, with any other country.

In 1970 Jamaica introduced a fundamental reform of its system of taxing corporate earnings and distributions. The government of Jamaica approached Canada to explore the possibility of entering into a special agreement in order to alleviate the adverse effects of the Jamaican tax changes on those Canadians with Jamaican investments or business activities. Over the years Canadian capital has been a significant factor in the development of Jamaica.

In view of the special circumstances involved and of the special relationship which has long existed between our two countries, it seemed appropriate to conclude an agreement which would also serve in an important way to facilitate Canadian investment in Jamaica. The agreement, which is appended as a schedule to this bill, is of limited scope. As reflected in the preamble to the agreement, it is intended as an interim arrangement to be replaced by a more comprehensive agreement as soon as the program of tax reform, now under way in both countries, permits. The agreement deals with the taxation of four categories of income: dividends, management and technical service fees, teachers' salaries and the earnings of non-resident employees.

On dividends, the withholding tax is restricted to a maximum rate of 22½ per cent. This represents a reduction from a 37½ per cent statutory rate in Jamaica. It will have no effect on the existing rate of Canadian withholding tax, which remains at 10 per cent for dividends paid by companies with a degree of Canadian ownership and 15 per cent in other circumstances. On management and technical service fees, the Jamaican withholding tax is reduced from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent on the gross amount of the payment. The same rate will apply to interest, rent and royalty payments to Canadian recipients. The agreement also contains additional technical provisions designed to provide effective double taxation relief on such items of income.

The Jamaican tax on dividends and fees for management and technical services paid to Canadians is automatically reduced should Jamaica impose a lower rate of tax on such payments to residents of any other country outside the Caribbean Free Trade Association.

Under another article of the agreement, Canadians are entitled to a two-year exemption from Jamaican tax on any remuneration from teaching in Jamaica. This represents a special concession on Jamaica's part to attract Canadian teachers. The agreement does not provide for a reciprocal concession by Canada. The government has already given notice of its intention to negotiate the termination of the special treatment given foreign professors and teachers under a number of Canada's existing treaties. In addition, each country agrees to exempt from tax up to $2,500 of the remuneration of temporary employees who are resident in the other country.

Finally, the benefits of the agreement will extend from the beginning of 1970, the date on which the Jamaican corporate tax reform took effect.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious from what the parliamentary secretary has said that this bill lends itself to consideration by a Standing Committee. There are complexities in some of its provisions, and the committee will have an opportunity to study them and report to the House. I end by saying that while I do not usually pay tribute to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), I must in this case. I notice this agreement was made at Kingston, Jamaica, on January 4, 1971. I commend the dedication to duty of the minister who was prepared to sacrifice his winter vacation and go to Jamaica to execute the agreement at that time of the year.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as has been indicated, this is the type of bill that can be dealt with best in a committee and we are happy to concur in the motion for second reading in order that this may be done.

While I am on my feet, as ministers used to say before Mr. Speaker got wise to the trick, it seems to me that the best way to achieve avoidance of double taxation between Canada and Jamaica would be for Jamaica to become part of Canada. Bearing in mind the kind of weather we have had for the past few weeks and the kind of weather that exists outside today, I think if I were to move such a motion at this time it might receive unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may we call it five o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By consent, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4.45 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MOVEMENT OF SOUTH VIETNAMESE TROOPS INTO LAOS—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware of the movement of South Vietnamese troops into Laos with the support of United States air and other elements based in South Viet Nam.

The government, of course, is concerned about any violation of Laotian neutrality and, as a signatory of the 1952 protocol of the Geneva Agreement on Laos and a member of the International Control Commission for Laos, we support fully the demand of Laotian Prime Minister Prince Souvanna Phouma that the neutrality of Laos be respected by all parties. The disregard for Laotian neutrality by neighbouring states has been the subject of complaints to the International Control Commission from the Royal Laotian government for some years now and we have on several occasions within the International Control Commission supported commission activity to investigate these complaints.

Unfortunately we have had no success in persuading our colleagues on the International Control Commission to undertake investigations of the Laotian government complaints, the most recent of which were made in the middle of last year, in that instance against North Viet Nam. Despite this past failure we are, nevertheless, instructing the Canadian commissioner on the Laos International Control Commission to request an urgent meeting of the commission to discuss the situation in southern Laos and to undertake appropriate action to initiate an investigation of outstanding complaints of violations of the neutrality of Laos by whatever foreign forces.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I say a few words in response to the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as the hon. member for Fundy-Royal did not hear the whole statement and the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not give any prior indication of a statement on this subject.

I must say, first of all, that it does not seem to take things very far for Canada simply to continue to protest against the breaching of the neutrality of Laos by various neighbours. This in itself may tend to make us feel a little more virtuous but it does not do anything to restore peace in Laos.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has renewed his attempts to reactivate the efforts of the commission with a view to conducting an investigation. I am sure this move will certainly receive the support of my own party. However, the minister did not indicate in his remarks what effort, if any, is being made to generate support among other countries for this intiative. In other words, Sir, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not made clear whether this is simply a request Canada has made and is leaving at that, or whether Canada is moving energetically on various fronts to generate support from other countries for the reactivation of the commission and the conducting of this kind of inquiry. The making of this request by itself may be helpful but if it is merely left there it may not amount to anything. It would be helpful to have the minister throw further light upon the question of precisely what the government of Canada intends to do.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the invasion of Laos by South Vietnamese forces with the assistance of United States forces threatens a new escalation of this disastrous war and the piling of disaster upon disaster. I am glad the Secretary of State for External Affairs was able to tell us that Canada has protested, but I wonder whether protests are enough when both sides have repeatedly violated the neutrality of Laos and Cambodia and when the Geneva agreements have been torn to shreds by both sides in this conflict. I wonder whether it is consistent with the dignity of Canada any longer to remain a member of the International Control Commission which controls nothing in these countries. I wonder whether serious thought should not be given to Canada's withdrawal. I would be very much in favour of the reactivation of the International Control Commission if there were the slightest likelihood that it would be effective, but if not I would like to see it withdrawn.

I conclude by saying that while the United Nations has not always been effective it is the international forum for the conscience of mankind, and I wonder whether the repeated violation of the rules in Southeast Asia is not a matter which should once again be taken to the forum of the United Nations.

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the announcement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) of the invasion of Laos by South Vietnamese troops causes us great concern.

It all means that the population will have to suffer and make sacrifices because of this endless war, which has already been going on for some 30 years. We support Canadian initiatives and efforts toward prompt achievement of peace in the South of Asia. We urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to continue his efforts to that end.

IMMEDIATE MEASURES TO COPE WITH UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I ask for unanimous consent under Standing Order 43 to make a motion in respect of an urgent and pressing matter.

This country and this parliament need no reminder that unemployment, so degrading and humiliating to hundreds of thousands of victims, is the number one problem in the country, nor that this Prime Minister and federal government which deliberately created it now wilfully refuse to provide any immediate relief.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member who knows, as well as any other hon. member, what are the restrictions regarding the proposing of a motion under Standing Order 43. The arguments which can be put forth are relatively limited. I suggest to the hon. member that he cannot argue the case; he can only indicate why there is urgency. Perhaps I interrupted the hon. member too soon and the remarks he has been making are purely introductory, but there should be a limitation. If we place ourselves in the position where every day we have a number of motions under Standing Order 43 and general statements are made by the hon. members proposing these motions, we will put ourselves into procedural difficulties. I would therefore invite the hon. member to keep this in mind, as I am sure he will.

Mr. Baldwin: I quite agree, Your Honour, that we must establish as a condition precedent urgent and pressing necessity, which I was attempting to do.

The federal government, which is primarily responsible for unemployment, is now meeting with the provinces in Ottawa and there is an indication that some provinces do recognize the urgency. If the senior authority can be made to realize its duty, then together, even at this late date, something can be done to respond to these imperative needs. I therefore ask leave to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

That this House speaking for the people of Canada urges the governments of Canada and of the provinces at the current federal-provincial conference to give priority to immediate measures to deal with the current unemployment crisis.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion which would be proposed by the hon. member for Peace River. The motion has been submitted under the terms of Standing Order 43 which requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there agreement?

[Mr. Rodrigue.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimity, the motion cannot be put.

An hon. Member: Who says no?

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Bourassa) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-223, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to change the name of the riding of Bourassa to that of Montreal-Bourassa, in order to eliminate the confusion arising from the fact that both federal and provincial ridings bear the same name without having the same geographical boundaries.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—NEW PROPOSALS TO FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—BUSINESS INVESTMENT FORECASTS—STIMULATION OF ECONOMY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as is becoming almost normal I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the problems relating to unemployment and the deep concern expressed about this subject by a number of the provincial premiers, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he or any of his colleagues intend to make any new proposals to the federal-provincial conference that is taking place—that is, to the provincial premiers—or whether it is simply the intention of the government to defend the proposals and arrangements it has already made?

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we intend to discuss fully with the provincial premiers the economic matters which will be raised by them.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, that is not very encouraging particularly in view of the forecast of business investment made by the Economic Council of Canada, based upon studies conducted last autumn. In view of this forecast, described as the most pessimistic medium-range forecast the Council has made since its establishment and which forecast has even been described as too optimistic by the well known firm of James Richardson and Sons, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he now proposes to undertake any measures designed to give some vigorous stimulation to the economy?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, if one takes a look at the comments of the Economic Council it will be seen that it pointed out to business, as I have often done, the stimulus included in the special provision in my recent budget through increased depreciation. It also pointed out that in the first year its forecast with regard to expansion of new business investment was about 2 per cent less than that given by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I think we can stick by our forecast of an 11 per cent increase.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he simply proposes to stick to his own forecast in light of the very pessimistic forecast that the Economic Council has made with regard to business investment in 1972, which is hardly the stuff of which business expansion is made? Does he intend to stick stubbornly to his own forecast, or does he intend to put something forward that will effectively encourage business expansion?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would think, based on past experience, that a survey taken in October, 1969, is not a very good forecast of what is going to happen a year and a half later.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the Economic Council estimates that business capital investment for 1971 will increase by only 9 per cent compared with the government's estimate of 11 per cent, and that for 1972 it will actually decline back to the 1970 level, may I ask the minister whether he is preparing, either in his budget or in any legislation which he will bring before the House, measures designed to stimulate capital investment, certainly for 1972, because if the forecast is correct the level will actually decline?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend will take a look at the recent budget I presented in December he will find that there is considerable stimulus there for capital investment by business.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact—

Mr. Benson: And the Economic Council agrees with that.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the Economic Council's survey shows a very pessimistic outlook for 1972, is the government taking any measures to provide adequate social capital for 1971 and 1972, particularly in view of the statement that investment, for instance, in university construction will actually decline in 1972 by 10 per cent below the present level?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, if one takes a look at my budgetary forecast which I brought forward in December, one will find that the government has provided a stimulus, on the budgetary side alone, to the tune of some $600 million in 1971 and 1972 and over all, cashwise, to the tune of some $2 billion.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be allowed to ask his supplementary, but I am wondering whether we are not at this time entering on the budget debate. There are still two more days of that debate remaining and I assume it will be brought before the House again in a short while. Having said this, I gather that the hon. member has a supplementary question, as has the hon. member for Peace River, but for the moment the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has the floor.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the Economic Council of Canada dealt only with the capital spending of business and universities but made no survey of capital expenditures in the fields of agriculture, fisheries or housing, has the government any forecasts of capital expenditures for 1971 and 1972 for those three areas? If the government has, would the minister be prepared to make them available to the House?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate that I think there is serious deficiency in the Economic Council's forecast in that such important areas have been left out. For example, housing has been very strong, and the minister in charge of housing will be speaking about this in a few days. It is expected to be very strong in the period under review.

Mr. Stanfield: The government had better change the record.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROVISION OF MORE LABOUR-INTENSIVE PROJECTS UNDER REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION PROGRAM

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Minister of Regional Economic Expansion? Since the economic expansion program has failed to create enough jobs to provide for even the normal increase in the work force, would the minister review his program with the provincial governments now gathered here and see if it is not possible to provide more labour-intensive projects at this time?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that in December last amendments were passed to the Regional Development Incentives Act which greatly enlarged the programs of the department and those programs have relation to the present situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: That is not what the provinces say.

UNEMPLOYMENT—DISCUSSION AT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—TABLING OF AGENDA

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister? I believe that last week the Prime Minister indicated that when a decision had been made on the agenda for the present conference of heads of government the agenda would be tabled in the House. Is the Acting Prime Minister prepared to table that document? Could he also indicate when, according to the agenda, the item of unemployment will be discussed, how much time will be devoted to it, and whether it is a priority item at this conference?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the agenda for the conference. I understand, however, from consulting with my colleagues, that the item of unemployment will be discussed tomorrow morning.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REVISION OF MANPOWER RETRAINING REGULATIONS—DISCUSSION AT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. For some time now I have been trying to find out from the minister the number of people who have applied for training but have not qualified. In view of the difficulties encountered by people applying for training assistance, will the minister be discussing the problem of revising the regulations with the heads of government this week with a view to providing that greater numbers may make use of the program during this period of high unemployment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would not expect that item to come up in the discussions this week, although there certainly is room for constant consultation with the provinces on the question of how best to make our training and operating programs effective. I agree that the hon. member was not able to obtain some figures he wanted about the number of people who had sought training and had not been able to receive it, but we have made some changes there which may allow us to provide better information in the future.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ASSUMPTION OF GREATER SHARE OF WELFARE COSTS BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the increase of 25 to 30 per cent in welfare costs faced by most of the provinces and cities in 1970 and in view of the estimates by both federal and provincial officials that these costs will sharply increase this year, is the federal government considering discussing with the provinces the possibility of assuming a much greater share of the cost of welfare?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should point out that as welfare costs go up the federal government's costs go up as well. As my hon. friend knows, we pay 50 per cent of the cost. This matter was discussed at the meeting with provincial ministers of health and welfare, but I am not sure whether it will be brought up at this conference.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, what I asked, and I wonder whether the minister could answer, was whether the federal government is giving consideration to increasing the percentage of its share of the cost of welfare. I am not talking of the total cost, of which as it goes up the federal government still pays 50 per cent.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, no such decision has been made at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVASION OF LAOS BY SOUTH VIETNAMESE TROOPS—SIMILAR ACTION BY NORTH VIETNAMESE—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION BY UNITED NATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and arises out of the statement that he made at the beginning of the sitting this afternoon in connection with the situation in Laos. Is it not a fact that in the past several months the North Vietnamese have been invading and infiltrating that country, and that no particular criticism has been made by members in certain parts of the House who invariably criticize any action taken by the United States or by the South Vietnamese?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as to whether or not there had been invasion, we did receive complaints from the Royal Laotian government to this effect. We tried in the International Control Commission to have an investigation put in hand and as I said in my earlier statement, we were not successful. This is why in the statement I made I pointed out that I feel the whole question of the situation in southern Laos should be the subject of investigation by the International Control Commission. We took this action on our own initiative in advance of any request.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the basis of experience which indicates the degree to which the other two members of the International Control Commission actually have dragged their feet and refused to participate in any way, is there not something that could be done by Canada to bring this question directly before the United Nations in order to have a committee of the UN to look into the problem of Laos so as to clear up once and for all the continued condemnation of the United States and those associated with that country who are preserving us against the advance of communism in Asia?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of Canada to bring this matter before the United Nations but I do understand that initiative may be taken to bring the matter before the Security Council by one of the parties mainly concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which is that?

Mr. Sharp: One of the countries concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But which country?

Mr. Sharp: I am not certain, Mr. Speaker, I have heard some rumours and I do not want to prejudge the success of their application. I think it would be better for them to make their application before I announce it. I should also add that the British government has called on the Soviet government to reconvene the Geneva conference for the purpose of investigating the invasion of the neutrality of Laos.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the reaction of the USSR? Did they show the same contemptuous disregard that has existed in the past?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there has been no response.

INFORMATION CANADA

EXHIBITION BRANCH—REPORTED LEAVING OF DESIGN SECTION PROFESSIONAL STAFF

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. In view of reports that the entire professional staff of the design section of the exhibition branch of Information Canada is leaving because of the difficulties under which they have to work, can the minister say what steps are being taken so that we can retain these very valuable employees?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there has been no indication to me of any such move on the part of the employees. We are very hopeful, of course, that we will be able to retain this very talented staff if sufficient work is committed by departments. As the hon. member knows, we act as a contractor for departments, and to the full extent that work can be committed we would like to retain staff.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the minister look into the point I raised, and will he also look into the question whether or not work that might be done by this staff is being let out by contract?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SASKATCHEWAN, WESTERN CANADA—INQUIRY AS TO NEW PROGRAMS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who, according to the roster, is supposed to be in the House. In his absence I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of current statements by the Premier of Saskatchewan, will the government be stating any new positions with regard to regional expansion programs in Saskatchewan and western Canada and, if so, when?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will direct that question to my colleague.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Speaker, when the minister directs my question to his colleague, would he also ask him whether the minister has replied to the charge by the premier of Saskatchewan that the federal government has been sitting on the initiation of an approved grant to a food processing complex for Saskatchewan and, if so, what was the response?

INDUSTRY

CONSTRUCTION—INITIATION BY GOVERNMENT OF LONG-TERM MONETARY AND DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In light of the warning by the president of the Canadian Construction Association that the basic problems of the construction industry relate to the widespread swing in construction activity—a feast or famine syndrome—is the government going to construct a long-term monetary and development policy for the construction industry in order to avoid further wide swings in federal policy toward this industry, as recommended by the Economic Council of Canada?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize, I am sure, that the question is put in wide terms and is one of very general scope. I wonder whether it is in order to ask it in those terms. Perhaps the hon. member might like to cut down the scope of the question so that the Chair can accept it in other terms.

Mr. Carter: Yes, Mr. Speaker. To put my question simply, in view of the problems encountered by the Canadian construction industry and the statement made by the president of that association, can the Minister of Finance say whether the government intends to make any monetary or other policy changes to help the construction industry, as recommended by the Economic Council of Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this is a matter to be determined by monetary changes. As far as federal government construction is concerned, we have for the past several years been working out long-range construction programs so that one does not get the dips that usually take place and which bother the construction industry very much. One of their main problems is that when people decide that they are going to economize, or they believe the market is falling, one of the first things they cut down on is capital construction. As the economy goes up and down, capital construction feels it very severely.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since the Minister of Supply and Services will be addressing a public meeting in Southey, Saskatchewan, this coming Saturday, would the minister be prepared to substitute himself on that occasion and discuss with the people of that area why he and the hon. member for Assiniboia proposed to the Postmaster General the closure of a post office in that area?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REPORTS OF HOUSE AND SENATE COMMITTEES ON TAX REFORM WHITE PAPER TO ASSIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Since several pulp and paper companies are withholding expansion plans in Canada, according to the Economic Council, would the minister now consider making some sort of temporary reply to the Senate and House committee reports on the white paper on tax reform in order to clear up the indefiniteness as to the financial position of the country?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I do not think that has anything to do with the question of the pulp and paper industry expanding at the present time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Bell: In view of the need to plan this spring to make work available during the coming summer, and especially in view of the fact that many young people, even the sons of some Members of Parliament, may not be able to get jobs, will the minister make a statement to try to clear up the uncertainty which is spreading throughout the country?

Mr. Benson: I have indicated how we shall proceed in connection with tax reform; I have indicated this clearly to the House and it is the intention to do that.

PROCEDURE FOR PRESENTATION OF TAX REFORM LEGISLATION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): A supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Does he intend to proceed with tax reform on the basis of a budget or on the basis of a separate bill?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If it is involved in a budget it will mean a separate bill anyway.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Minister of Finance whether he will make a statement about tax reform which will be accompanied by a separate bill or whether he will do it in the course of a budget speech with associated legislation?

Mr. Benson: One could do it either way. If I made a statement involving tax reform it might be considered by many as being tantamount to a budget. I could also make it in a budget speech, but in any case it has to be followed by a separate bill in the form of amendments to the Income Tax Act.

Mr. McCleave: I am asking which course the minister will take. If I cannot get an answer now, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is not quite that late yet.

Mr. McCleave: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF 1969-70 WHEAT POOL AND FINAL PAYMENT

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): My question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that an announcement was made recently about the closing of the 1969-70 oats and barley accounts of the Canadian Wheat Board and the final payments involved, can the minister tell us when the 1969-70 wheat accounts will be closed and the approximate size of the final payment which may result?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give this information now. The previous year's pool for wheat was not closed until June 30. I would hope that the pool which is still open may be closed somewhat before that date, but I cannot be more definite than that.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Can the minister in charge of the Wheat Board tell us when the report of the committee which was set up to study the operation and marketing methods of the Canadian Wheat Board will be tabled for the information of the House?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The report is in the process of being translated and printed and it will be available to the public as soon as this has been completed.

INQUIRY AS TO CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING RAPESEED FUTURES OPERATIONS

Mr. A. P. Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that this is really a supplementary, but the question having been asked, perhaps the minister would like to reply.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The item is on the order paper and is being dealt with in the usual way.

1969-70 BARLEY DELIVERIES—FORWARD SALES—PRICE RECEIVED

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Of the 163 million odd bushels of barley delivered to the Canadian Wheat Board in the 1969-70 crop year, can the minister tell us what amount of this barley was involved in forward sales and what price was received from the Wheat Board for this barley?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, it would not be customary to comment on such items.

USE OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL CAPITAL INVESTMENT FORECAST IN PREPARING DECEMBER BUDGET

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the budget presented to the House in December last was prepared with the Economic Council's forecast concerning capital spending in mind?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): We had our forecast for the oncoming year available to us, developed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It was based on that. Incidentally, it is very close to the forecast of the Economic Council.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to gather from the minister's answer that he did not have available to him the forecast made by the Economic Council based upon returns compiled by the council as of October?

Mr. Benson: I have no secret access to the Economic Council.

GOVERNMENT ECONOMIC OBJECTIVES AND POLICIES FOR 1971—PROPOSED PORTABLE WELFARE GRANT SCHEME

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the call by the Premier of British Columbia to declare a one-year moratorium on constitutional talks, and in face of the unemployment and economic difficulties in which the country finds itself, does the government now intend to outline its economic objectives and policies for 1971 and give a specific date for a full employment economy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking the minister or someone on behalf of the government to make a statement very general in nature. I would not think this should be done at the present time.

Mr. Ryan: With respect, Your Honour, I was asking him to give a specific date for a full employment economy in Canada. This is very urgent.

An hon. Member: What time of the day?

Mr. Speaker: I would not think a question in those terms was in order. The hon. member might be allowed to rephrase the question.

Mr. Ryan: Will the government at least reconsider British Columbia's request for a portable welfare grant scheme under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I think that is a matter for submission by British Columbia to the government. Of course, we always consider submissions by British Columbia. With respect to the economic forecast for 1971, I would suggest that the hon. member read my speech—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS ON NEW AGREEMENT TO REPLACE INTERNATIONAL GRAINS ARRANGEMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I direct this question to the Minister of Manpower who reports for the Wheat Board. Is the minister now in a position to place before the House a general picture as to the degree of success or failure being attained by the conference in Geneva on international wheat matters?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is there justification for the very strong rumour that there has been a virtual collapse of the discussions there, three weeks having gone by without any progress being made?

Mr. Lang: As my previous answer indicated, I do not think it would be timely to report to the House on these negotiations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the minister, as ringmaster of the cabinet safari, goes to Saskatchewan on Friday or Saturday next, will one or other of the 20 cabinet ministers present, but not for athletic purposes, let the people of Saskatchewan and western Canada know what hope there is for the future in connection with the sale of wheat at a fair and reasonable price?

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will Canada consider resigning from the International Control Commission if it is not successful in persuading its fellow members of the commission to investigate the Laotian situation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recognize that the question as asked is hypothetical.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MANPOWER

PLANS FOR PROVISION OF SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): This is a question for the Acting Prime Minister because it also involves one or two other ministers. In view of the great concern, particularly among university students, as to future summer employment, will the Acting Prime Minister undertake to tell us at the earliest opportunity, or have one of his colleagues do so, exactly what type of plan the government has in mind to assist these students?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The subject is under consideration in cabinet and just as soon as decisions are reached they will be announced, because it will be our purpose to promote the employment of students not only in industry but in government as well this summer.

STUDENT LOANS—INCREASE IN AMOUNT, EXTENSION OF REPAYMENT FAILING SUMMER EMPLOYMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact that last summer many students failed to find employment for part or all of the summer, and as this situation may occur again this summer, has the Minister of Finance worked out any plan with his provincial counterparts to stretch out the period of repayment of student loans and to increase the amount of the loans available to students who are unable to find employment this summer?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): First of all, with respect to payments, Mr. Speaker, these can be stretched out through the banks at the request of the individual.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What if the banks won't?

Mr. Benson: If the banks will not do so, there is a procedure for requesting it through the provincial governments and we follow up the provincial governments in this regard. With respect to the size of loans, we have annual meetings on the students loan plan at which the provinces put forward their views on the level of loans, as do we, and the matter is decided then.

FORECASTS OF STUDENT UNEMPLOYMENT IN 1971

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I raised the question of unemployment projections among students with the Prime Minister who asked me to redirect it to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. May I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether the department has made any projections of the expected level of unemployment among students in 1971, and would he be prepared to make available to the House estimates indicating the extent of such unemployment to allow us some basis for making recommendations?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there are any reliable methods to distinguish a certain group of unemployed people statistically at a certain period in the future. I think it is possible to put together certain conclusions about the previous year and the current year, the size of the student body, economic conditions, and to draw some conclusions, but I would think that the hon. member would be able to do that by himself.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I am concerned whether the minister is capable of doing it. May I ask the minister if his officials have put together all of these complications and calculations and whether he would be prepared to make the results available to the House and the public to enable us to estimate the extent of unemployment among students, which he has predicted this year will increase over 1970?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question and I do presume that the hon. member can draw the same logical conclusions that I have.

NUMBER OF PERSONS REGISTERED AS SEEKING WORK

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. A week ago today I asked him to give the House some information as to how many persons in Canada seeking work had registered with the manpower department. I wonder whether the minister could give the House this information now.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did have the figures before me. I believe at the end of December the number of people who were in the columns of the manpower offices as being unemployed and seeking work totalled 641,000. However, an examination of the figures over the month leads members to be cautious in their use of such figures. There are periods when unemployment is actually lower but these figures may be higher because they exclude some people who are unemployed and not registered and include people who may have found employment but not made that known to the office. These are some of the difficulties created by the figures.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the wide discrepancy between the figures given by the Department of Manpower, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the survey made by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, is there any liaison among these three agencies of government so as to reach a reasonably accurate and reliable figure on the number of persons unemployed at a given time?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, of course there is, and it is the Dominion Bureau of Statistics' figure which is recognized as the best guide to the number of people unemployed at the time in question. The other figures which are available, whether of the number of people on unemployment insurance or of the number of people registered with manpower in one column or another, may be accurate measurements of quite a different thing. Therefore all three figures, while each very different, may be accurate measurements. Nevertheless it is the DBS figure on unemployment which is normally considered the most reliable indicator of the number of people out of work at a particular point in time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might wish to ask a further supplementary but we are running short of time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I want to ask the minister if the DBS figure is merely a sampling survey made on the basis of some 30,000 samples, rather than a figure extracted from other figures which are a matter of record both in the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the manpower department?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that certainly is true. The survey is considered by statisticians to have a statistically reliable base, and of course that statistically reliable base is relied upon by the hon. member when he likes to do so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY RESPECTING CONTINUANCE OF MILITARY COLLEGES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Could the minister elaborate on the reply by the Minister of National Defence the other day in which he indicated that he was not at the present time giving any consideration to closing the defence colleges in Canada—a matter I put in the realm of employment if nothing else. Is any consideration being given by the cabinet to a recommendation that the armed forces colleges be closed?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am not aware of any such recommendations being before the cabinet at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State bother to sit down and read the recommendations that are emanating from his own department?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO ORGANIZATION OF CERTAIN STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the President of the Privy Council. On this 71st day of the third session of Parliament I wonder if the President of the Privy Council, who I know is responsible for organizing other government business, could make a report to the House this week on why five committees of the House, namely the Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts Committee, the Transportation and Communications Committee and three others, have not yet been organized? I direct my specific inquiry to the Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts Committee because there are a number of matters that have come up on the floor of the House many times and should be raised. I asked this question about a month ago and I wonder whether the minister could reply either today or later this week.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, normally the committees are organized when the House makes a reference. To my knowledge, that is the reason the committees mentioned have not yet been organized.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF NEW CHIEF COMMISSIONER

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and it arises from an answer given by the minister a few minutes ago concerning the report on the review of Canadian Wheat Board operations. In view of his answer can the minister indicate if he is now in a position to announce the appointment of a new chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, and can he also assure the House that the appointment will be made from within the present membership of the Wheat Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have not reached any conclusion on this question. As hon. members know, we wanted to await and report, and of course I would want to have some further discussions with the Wheat Board about the report before that phase is really completed.

CLOSING OF CANADA PACKERS' SLAUGHTERING FACILITIES, HULL—CORRECTION OF ANSWER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may be permitted to correct part of an answer I gave to a question the other day because it may have led to some misunderstanding. In reply to a question from the hon. member for Renfrew-Lanark-Carleton with respect to the closing of the slaughtering facilities at the Canada Packers Hull plant, I said, among other things, that this action was more directly related to the treatment of effluent coming from it. Canada Packers have been in touch with me and have advised me that the facts are, and all of their official announcements have so stated, that the slaughter facilities at this plant are being closed because of the lack of sufficient livestock being consigned to the plant as well as the obsolescence of the facilities, not for the reason I stated. I am sorry if I misled any member of the House.

PURPOSE OF TIME AND MOTION STUDY IN EDMONTON OFFICE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the time and motion study now deing performed by 30-odd staff officers from the Winnipeg head office in the Edmonton manpower office, would the minister please advise the House whether this study was implemented to demoralize the staff in Edmonton or can we expect the staff to find more jobs for the unemployed after the study has been completed?

SIGNIFICANCE OF TRAINING PROGRAM FOR UNEMPLOYED COLLEGE STUDENTS—AVAILABILITY TO GRADUATES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the announced training program at the Red River Community College in Manitoba for unemployed college students, can he inform the House whether this program signals a new approach to manpower retraining?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

Mr. Murta: May I also ask the Acting Prime Minister whether, in light of this announcement, the government is now prepared to make this course available to all unemployed college graduates?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE WITH UNION OVER WAGES AND JOB SECURITY—PARTICIPATION OF DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR SPECIALISTS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State regarding the CBC. In view of the deadlock between the CBC and the Canadian Union of Public Employees, particularly in the area of wages and job security, has the minister sought assistance from the Minister of Labour in assigning one of his industry specialists to the dispute?

An hon. Member: What for?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its employees' union were followed very closely by my department and also by the Department of Labour and I must say that at the present time the CBC is still ready to re-open the negotiations as soon as the union is willing to do so.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. After looking at the names set forth in the roster list, effective as of January 11, 1971, and after looking round the House, I find that seven ministers are not present.

Mr. Benson: There is a federal-provincial conference going on.

Mr. McCleave: The seven in question are the Prime Minister, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, soon to be the minister of environment, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I happen to have questions for three of four of those ministers, in particular for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I should like him to explain certain remarks he made in Quebec City over the weekend. I have questions for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry dealing with the unemployment problem facing shore fishermen, as well as questions of somewhat lesser importance for other ministers.

I suggest this is an absolute breach of faith on the part of these ministers having regard to the business we are expected to deal with in Parliament. I take this opportunity of raising this as a very serious and substantial question of privilege. I know we will be faced with the answer that—

An hon. Member: How many members have you got over there?

Mr. McCleave: I can give a very simple answer to that question. When we have questions to raise we are here to raise them, and we want to find people here to answer them. It is the responsibility of the government to answer these questions, not ours.

An hon. Member: You have only 21 members over there.

Mr. McCleave: I am not directing my remarks to all the ministers who are absent but rather to those to whom I have specific questions to direct today. I suggest this is an absolute breach and dereliction of duty on the part of ministers which denies the rights of Members of Parliament, and I raise this matter as a question of privilege at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES

The House resumed, from Monday, November 30, 1970, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-186, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1970, to the 30th day of June, 1971, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which relates to the progress of the debate on second reading of this bill. As the House is aware, during the last session on a comparable bill a request was made for a special reference to the committee of two items, namely the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways system and the question of Canadian National pensions. Such a reference was made and the committee was able to deal with the latter question but did not have time to deal with the former.

When this debate started in this session we asked that the same two matters be dealt with. The matter regarding pensions has now been dealt with, and in order to facilitate the debate perhaps the Government House Leader would assure us that the other matter, namely the capital structure of the Canadian National, will again be referred to the committee.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have had a word with the Minister of Finance on this point and we see no difficulty in making this reference.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, like most hon. members, I am sure, I was happy to hear last Friday, that is February 5, that the pensions of CN pensioners will be increased. I take this opportunity to remind CN officials that such an effort calls for recognition. Still, I trust this increase is but a sample of what the company plans for the future.

In fact, over the weekend I met a former CN employee who retired in 1955; he now gets a pension of $95 per month; thanks to the new adjustment, he will receive $122.50 from now on. I also met the widow of an employee who retired in 1955; at the time he received $47.50; she will now receive $61.75 a month. To my mind, should those pensioners ask for more, they would be justified in doing so.

As regards general administration, we can see once more under Bill C-186 that this Crown company is unable to do anything but submit budgets in the red, and among the steps that I intend to propose I think that the most efficient would be the resignation of its Chairman,

Mr. MacMillan. I take the liberty to ask for his resignation because this Chairman has sufficiently proven, by submitting annual Canadian National deficits, that he has never assumed his responsibilities and that he does not intend to change. I feel that the salary paid to the Chairman of this Crown company is high enough to enable us to look elsewhere and to select an executive who is really competent to fill the position.

Finally, the Canadian National is a staggering business because it is basically rotten. There is also too much snow on the roof: too many foremen, too many inspectors, too much unproductive personnel. To really remedy the situation, I see nothing else but a royal inquiry commission endowed with full powers. Unlike the membership of previous royal commissions, I would suggest that we refrain from appointing lawyers and economists because they know nothing in this field.

So that an inquiry may bring results, as far as these Crown companies are concerned, I think that the members of the commission should be chosen among stationmasters, train employees, clerks, etc. at various levels. In my opinion, this would avoid the waste of time since those people already know what is wrong and where the fault lies. Since this category of citizens will not be stopped by money, it is obvious that we will get all the information we were denied until now.

With regard to the prevailing situation among pensioned railway workers, I take the liberty of quoting some of the evidence heard by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on June 4, 1970, as recorded in report No. 31:

> CNR acts as trustee for the Pension Fund. This simply means that the CNR Board of Directors has sole and absolute control of the assets of the Fund. The employees who contribute to the Fund have no share whatever in policy decisions.
> It is true that the pension is administered by a Pension Board on which employees have minority representation but the function of this is largely administrative.
> This situation is almost incredible and we find it remarkable that the Superintendent of Insurance continues to countenance such an inequitable arrangement.

This representation was made by E. T. Harrison, Chairman of Local 173, Sarnia, Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, the days follow one another but they are not the same. In the case of the witnesses before the Committee, we can say that their complaints are the same. Here is the proof.

On page 29: 48 of the proceedings of the meeting held on June 2, 1970, there appears the following statement from J. L. Pickett, Secretary-Treasurer of the United Transportation Union, and I quote:

> I am the Secretary-Treasurer of Local 861 of the United Transportation Union. I have been delegated by Local 861 to appear before this Committee and also to speak for other employees in the Edmonton area.

Canadian National Railways

A few moments ago I was reading the evidence of a witness from Sarnia. This is an evidence brought by a witness from the Edmonton area I quote:

Over the years as a trainman or a brakeman, I have heard many rumours sweep the system about changes that are going to take place in regard to the pension, especially regarding the lowering of the retirement age. Of course, nothing ever happens.

At our union meetings, I used to listen to the senior brothers discuss what we should do but nothing ever happened. It appeared to be comparable with the old saying "hammering our head against a brick wall".

The same witness says, as is recorded on page 52, and I quote:

As you know, the body that represents us on the Pension Board with the Company is known as the General Chairman's Association. Mr. V. I. Clements is the Chairman. He is the spokesman for thousands of CNR employees coast to coast. The General Chairman's Association has complained about having no position of strength from which to operate.

I cite further:

The General Chairman's Association put in a brief last July 5, 1969, to the CNR Pension Board, recommending changes. They received an answer eight months later.

Mr. Speaker, they had to wait eight months to receive an answer! What kind of a deal is this?

There is something odd now about Crown corporations, and the public wonders. However, Parliament has the answer. If we examine the Public Accounts, the report made by the Auditor General for the Receiver General for Canada, we see substantially the following concerning the Company of Young Canadians:

In last year's report, we mentioned that the CYC staff was working in cooperation with us towards establishing controls to correct deficiencies in the accounting system...and efforts are being continued to implement adequate controls.

It was then just a matter of a statement by the Auditor General to the effect that the books were not properly kept, in the case of the Company of Young Canadians which, for that year, had received an amount of $1,900,000.

Mr. Speaker, documents have clearly established that violence in the city of Montreal resulted from propaganda emanating from the Company of Young Canadians, printed on machinery paid for by the Canadian government. The authorities of the City of Montreal appeared before the committee for three days in support of a 47-page document and it is known that they had sufficient proof to call for a Royal Commission inquiry. Not only did such an inquiry not take place, but the government continued to finance the Company of Young Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, as far as Crown corporations are concerned, one wonders whether the government is in collusion or has lost control. But our particular concern today is with the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Speaker, when the bill was introduced, I mentioned that an item for $371 million had been deleted from CNR ledgers, and I should like to know how much money was spent to do this.

Since the Canadian National Railways go to great lengths in order to escape audits, as can be seen from the evidence, at page 22 of issue No. 31, June 4, could it be that they have something to conceal? Is there an agreement under which half of these $371 million, or $185 million, would have been paid into election funds?

Mr. Speaker, the campaign managers of the Liberal party never agreed to disclose the source of their election funds. Could it be because the CN has gone as far as depriving its pensioned employees or their widows of their livelihood that such a silence has fallen over the question? We have every reason to believe it. In fact, we are again dealing with a Crown company which manipulates in a professional way. The evidence heard during the many committee sittings provide damning evidence which the Canadian people is entitled to know.

Referring to page 58 of Issue No. 31 of Thursday, June 4, let me recall the words spoken by Mr. McGregor of Local 108, Bank Street, in Ottawa, and I quote:

For the purpose of delineating some of the inequities that exist in the railway pension plans, we make the following rough comparison of major pension plans.

We urge the committee to take a serious look at the federal plan. We wish to point out that there is no good reason why pension plans of various federal Crown corporations should be so radically different. It was also shown earlier in this brief that the CN as employer pays a much lower pension plan cost benefit to its employees, vis-avis cost benefits assumed by the federal government as employer, while at the same time the rates of employee contributions are more or less at the same level in both institutions.

As reported at page 27 of issue No. 31, Mr. Egan, representing local No. 700, in Ottawa, stated:

Proposals which should be carried out immediately are:

a. Review all pensions that are being paid now.

b. Increase these pensions which would give our pensioners a decent Canadian standard of living today.

c. Review these pensions quarterly and raise them again by an amount based on the cost of living index.

d. Widows' pensions to be handled in the same manner, with one exception. Upon the death of the pensioner the widow will receive 100 per cent of pension and not 50 per cent as at present. The assumption here is that costs are supposed to halve when the spouse dies. I would like to know how.

Pension age to be reduced to 60 on a voluntary basis for 5 years, then all should retire at 60 automatically with full benefits, and I must stress this—full benefits—

Mr. Speaker, as reported in the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 32 on pages 27 and 28, Mr. Clements said, and I quote:

In conclusion we request that this Committee take action to ensure:

1. The Company transfer the $371,010,000 surplus, appropriated by the Company, back to the company's unfunded liability acount.

2. The Company improve the benefits of the 1959 Plan in line with the proposal we placed before them.

3. That the 1959 Plan rules be made to comply with the Pension Benefit Standards Act forthwith.

4. That the Pension Benefits Standards Act regulations be amended to prevent the arbitrary use of surpluses arising in Pension Trust Funds for the Company's benefit.

5. That equal representation be given to the union representatives on the Pension Board and that the reconstituted Board become the Board of Trustees.

6. That provision be made by amendment of the Pension Plan rules for meaningful negotiation of the rules of the Plan.

7. That a full-scale independent investigation be made of the developments of the growth of pension monies in the Pension Trust Fund.

8. That the Company make immediate provision for the supplementing of the pensions of present pensioners.

Mr. Speaker, representatives of pensioners have come from all parts of the country to discuss the pensioners' hardships and to say that they have had enough and that the conditions in which they lived were inhuman.

Being convinced that they have involuntarily supplied electoral funds to the Liberal Party, which had promised to establish a just society, they hope that they will not be forgotten and will receive their share. They do not ask for a share of all taxes collected, but only for what they have paid, as they should have a right to expect in an honest society.

Through their depositions, CN pensioners have, in the last year, shown a bit of the truth. I believe that this game of "hide-and-seek" with public funds has lasted long enough.

In connection with the CN employees' Superannuation Fund, it is obvious that pollution has reached a dangerous level, because this company is a Crown corporation financed with public money. I believe that the taxpayers are also entitled to know everything about this matter and that all hon. members will agree that, if we cannot have honest administration of Crown corporations, it is useless to talk of a just society.

As for the government, which may have sold its silence, it is time to make amends through putting into application the measures proposed by those most directly concerned.

• (3:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I notice the next speaker, this might be an appropriate time to rule on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe).

When Bill C-186 was last before the House on November 30, 1970, the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo proposed an amendment as follows:

That Bill C-186 be not now read a second time, as in the opinion of this House, the making of financial guarantees or grants to the Canadian National Railways without the appointment of the Auditor General of Canada at least as a joint auditor of the CNR is not a principle that this House ought to support.

On that occasion I indicated that I intended to deal with the procedural aspects of the amendment but before I could do so the hour for private members' business intervened and, subsequently, the debate on Bill C-186 was unanimously adjourned. This is the first occasion when the bill has been back before the House and therefore, if it is agreeable to the House, this might be an opportune time for me to deal with the procedural aspects of the amendment.

It seems to me, and I appreciate that this was the intention of the hon. member who moved it, that the proposed amendment, if adopted, would have the effect of amending clause 15 of the bill which provides for the appointment of auditors. It would, in the words of the proposed amendment, provide for "the appointment of the Auditor General of Canada at least as a joint auditor of the CNR." While the purpose of the amendment is clear, my concern must be whether or not it is procedurally correct.

With great respect to the hon. member who proposed the amendment it seems to me there are two aspects of it which may not pass the test of a reasoned amendment which could be accepted at this point in the proceedings. First, it appears that the proposed amendment does not oppose the principle of the bill. It opposes or adds to the provision of clause 15 by substituting one auditor for another, or by providing that instead of the auditor named in clause 15 acting alone, he would act jointly with the Auditor General of Canada. I cite here as authority, without reading it to the House, Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 393(3).

The second point which gives me some concern, and on which the proposed amendment may fall somewhat short of the practices of the House, is that the purpose the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo is attempting to achieve is the amendment of a detail of the bill which might very well be attempted in the standing committee, or at the report stage of the bill. Again, without reading the citations, may I refer hon. members to May's 17th edition, pages 527 and 528, and Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 389.

I am not unmindful of the care with which the proposed amendment was drafted but, because of the caution which the Chair must exercise to ensure the procedural acceptability of amendments, and for the reasons I have mentioned, I am of the opinion that the hon. member's proposed amendment cannot be put at this time.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, once again Parliament is being asked to go through its annual exercise of rubber stamping expenditures for the Canadian National Railways and Air Canada. Most of the money has already been spent. In addition, we are being asked to give our approval to substantial loans to both of these companies, and even to guarantee the payment of any losses which the companies might incur beyond the specified amounts.

It is very disturbing to me, and I am sure to many other hon. members, that when introducing the bill the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) saw fit only to catalogue the provisions of the bill without any explanation of government policy in respect of the many criticisms that have been levelled at the CNR and Air Canada in the past year. Surely, someone on the government side could tell the House if the government is planning to investigate the growing public criticism of both the CN and Air Canada. Surely, someone could tell us whether the government agrees with the CN policy of passenger line abandonment, and more particularly the obvious intention of CN to abandon all those lines which it categorizes as unprofitable. Why should the profit aspect be the sole determining factor of whether or not a line should be discontinued? Surely, Mr. Speaker, there are criteria, other than profitability, in developing a national transportation policy.

Consider, for example, the hundreds of millions of dollars that will have to be spent on new highways to take care of the great influx of automobile traffic that will result from the abandonment of all passenger trains, even the runs between densely populated centres. Already, the government is incurring an annual deficit of $57 million on the operation of airports. It also spends about $121 million a year on communications, navigation and meteorological services, much of which can be regarded as a direct subsidy to airlines. Certainly, it is fair to say that the government is already subsidizing the airlines to a greater extent than the $70 million that it will pay to the railways in 1970. Then, too, millions of dollars will have to be spent building new airports and expanding existing ones. I need only mention the $1 billion that will go into the new Ste. Scholastique airport, and the $300 million to be spent on expansion of Toronto International Airport.

One has only to look at United States experience to get a disturbing picture of what can happen in Canada if the railways are allowed to continue their wholesale abandonment of passenger lines. In the United States, back in the 1920's, some 20,000 trains were busy carrying people. At the end of 1969, only 500 of these were still operating. The effect of turning all those people loose on the highways has been staggering.

Since 1956 the United States has spent $75 billion on new highways, and it is estimated that in the next 15 years new highways will cost more than $320 billion. It is little wonder, then that editorialists are questioning the idea that profitability be the sole criterion for determining a national transportation policy. One cannot measure the annual return on investment of the road and highway networks, still consuming billions, or the profitability of taxpayer involvement in the air transport industry. Road and air corridor congestion is getting so bad that the logic of a railway renaissance cannot much longer be avoided. It is time the government laid down priorities. If we are to subsidize the CBC to the tune of $150 million, spend hundreds of millions of dollars on highway systems and possibly $1 billion on one new airport, is it too much to ask that this government take a hard look at its railway policy and abandon its stated principle of profitability for one of service to the public?

Recently, in leafing through some reports and comments connected with the McPherson report, I was interested to read the comments of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) who, at that time in 1961, was president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions. At that time he said that transportation policy is closely tied to economic planning and, as such, must be linked to the common good and not the profitability of private enterprise. I wonder how that hon. gentleman now feels, in his capacity as Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, when he sees his efforts to correct regional disparities largely negated by the policies of the government. The imposition of staggering freight rate increases, with the blessing of the Canadian Transport Commission which has adopted profitability as its sole criterion, is crippling industry. These remarks apply not only to passenger traffic but also to freight traffic.

For example Mr. Speaker, let us see what is happening in the Atlantic region. What is happening is happening with the blessing of the Canadian Transport Commission and under the provisions of the national transportation legislation which set up the commission. Before the National Transportation Act was passed, the railways had to make an application for rate increases and justify those increases before a board. Under the new regulations, it is only necessary for the railways to file notice of the increase 30 days in advance.

Tariff policies adopted at the time of confederation to promote an artificial east-west trading pattern effectively excluded the maritimes from their historic north-south trading routes. At that time it was recognized that transport would be a vital element in the ability of regional industries to compete in and obtain world markets. This fact was recognized by the Duncan commission and embodied in the Maritime Freight Rate Act, which was passed in 1927. It was also recognized that competition is the most effective method of regulating freight rates and, since effective competition did not exist in the Atlantic region, special consideration in the form of financial assistance must be given. The National Transportation Act relies largely upon the force of competition to protect shippers from discriminatory rates. Owing to the lack of competition in the Maritimes, it was understood that the provisions of the National Transportation Act would not be implemented until a new transportation policy was developed for the Atlantic region—hence the so-called freeze that was instituted on certain rates.

The Atlantic premiers' report recognized that subsidies to the carriers were not the answer to the problem, and that they should be phased out. The report emphasized what I consider to be the crux of the situation. I quote from the report:

> The provinces will accept modification in the blanket subsidization of intra-regional traffic subject to the strict qualification that a federal-provincial agency be empowered to administer transportation assistance from federal funds to selected industries within the Atlantic provinces.

In other words the premiers' report recognized that subsidization was not the answer, and that assistance should be provided to new, select industries, to enable them to compete in the markets. They agreed that subsidies should be phased out, but only on the condition that any money saved on the phasing out of the subsidies would be applied in the form of special assistance to the industries. That is the situation we face today. The government has begun to phase out subsidies without giving any thought to replacing them with the type of assistance for which those premiers had asked.

Let us see, Mr. Speaker, what has happened since the freeze was lifted on September 23, 1959. On that date, two railway freight increases were announced simultaneously. They ranged between 8 and 12 per cent for one, depending on the commodity carried, and between 3 and 5 per cent for the other. On April 6, 1970, we had an increase averaging between 5 and 8 per cent. On September 1, 1970, we had an increase of between 3 and 5 per cent. On February 6, 1971, we had an increase of 3.125 per cent on certain non-competitive rates. The latest increase announced a week or so ago, to become effective as of March 1, 1971, is to run between 4 and 8 per cent. The net effect of these increases is this: average increases since September, 1969, have ranged between 25 and 35 per cent. On some commodities, such as lumber, the increases have amounted to more than 40 per cent. No wonder the newspapers in the area have been protesting against the government's obvious lack of concern for maritime transportation.

The Telegraph Journal of January 29, 1971, contains an article headed "Where is the Policy?" which reads in part:

> The freight rate increase announced by the railways for March 1 will be the third within 11 months for Atlantic region shippers. The three total a minimum of 12 per cent to a maximum of 21 per cent, depending on the type of goods and services. Ah, those 6 per cent guidelines!
> The problem is, of course, that this region is both absorbing country-wide increases, such as the new one, and catching up with those imposed in the rest of Canada while Atlantic rates were frozen for two years.

Now comes the crunch:

> Ottawa was supposed to use those two years to work out a special transportation policy for this region. It didn't. It displays no interest in working out a co-ordinated policy to this day, and that seems to be water over the dam.

As if these increases were not enough, there is a rumour that even further increases will be brought forward as a result of a reduction in subsidies to the railways from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent.

Another editorial dated February 1, 1971, in the Telegraph Journal reads:

> Is there no end to the succession of hammer blows inflicted on the Atlantic regional economy by railway freight rate increases?

Then, referring to the latest increase of 6 per cent to be effective as of March 1, the editorial continues:

> And now shippers have been told that because the federal government is whittling down the subsidy paid the railways, for traffic moving within the Atlantic region, and the railways naturally want to recoup the lost revenue, there will be yet another increase shortly on rates within the area. Informed guesses are that this boost wil be about 3 per cent.

That will be on top of the 35 per cent already imposed.

Mr. McCleave: Shame!

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): No wonder we, on this side of the House from the maritimes, are sort of sick when we hear about the government's so-called 6 per cent guidelines. The editorial continues:

> It is time for the Atlantic premiers to swing into action again. They should put strong concerted pressure on Ottawa to draw up regulations providing special aid to industries whose markets are jeopardized by the subsidy reduction or any other rate juggling.
> And they should demand that Ottawa call a halt to further rate increases of any kind in this area until our long-awaited regional transportation policy become a reality.

As I have mentioned, there is a great deal of concern among shippers and businessmen in the area. They are beginning to wonder if the government will ever bring forward its long promised transportation policy. The government has been given plenty of suggestions. Very often, when we criticize the government, the snide remark is thrown back to us: what about suggestions? Well, the government has had the benefit of a great many suggestions in this field. There was the Atlantic premiers' report which outlined a comprehensive Atlantic transportation policy; there was the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications which had plenty of recommendations to make on Atlantic transportation—

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: Right on.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Then, there is the federal-provincial committee which is supposedly meeting daily. This committee has also been sending suggestions along, but unfortunately the minister and the government are only prepared to accept the recommendations with which they agree.

An hon. Member: Too bad.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): We on this side have repeatedly asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to tell us when the government is going to act on the recommendations of the premiers. Recently, in reply to a question, the minister stated the government had already acted on a number of the recommendations. Let me refresh his memory. Of all the recommendations made by the premiers, the government has acted only on those involving a reduction in the subsidy and its extension to trucks, as well as reductions in ferry rates between New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. These are the only recommendations upon which the minister has acted, and they happen to be recommendations which tend to reduce the amount of assistance which has been granted, rather than help the situation in the Maritimes. The cabinet has completely ignored the recommendation of the premiers' report that any reduction in subsidy should be offset by special assistance to the shippers.

Mr. McCleave: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Instead of getting better, the position of shippers in the area is worsening, because fierce competition in other parts of Canada between road and rail has led to a reduction in railway rates. So, in reality, the shipper in the maritimes is now worse off than he was before this report was written.

Mr. McCleave: Right, and shame.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): This is why I felt it necessary last Thursday to see whether I could get some action out of the Minister of Transport who sits there and brushes off all our questions with snide answers. Last Thursday, I sought to propose a motion calling upon the Minister of Transport to appeal the most recent freight tariff increases. Unfortunately, but not unexpectedly, I was denied unanimous consent to put the motion by members on the government side. It is difficult for me to understand how Liberal members from the Atlantic provinces could take such an attitude in the light of mounting dissatisfaction expressed in leading newspapers, by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission and businessmen in the region. At a time like this, could they not forget partisan politics? I might point out, however, that the Minister of Transport was not in the House on that occasion, so I cannot include him with his colleagues; I know he has the interests of the Maritimes at heart. Unfortunately, he is not in the House today, either, but possibly someone will carry this appeal to him.

Mr. McGrath: Why is he not here?

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): The minister should intercede with the railways to forgo the increase slated for March 1, as well as further increases which are rumoured, until such time as his department announces the new policy which has been promised us for some four years, now. If the railways will not heed persuasion, I ask the minister to avail himself of the right of appeal provided in section 16 of the Railway Act. This section provides that where a person has reason to believe the effect of any rate established by a carrier might prejudicially affect the public interest, such a person may apply to the commission for leave to appeal. The minister has a staff which should be well qualified to produce all the statistics and figures necessary to substantiate an appeal of this type before the board. Obviously, it is impossible for a private person to be in possession of these figures and statistics. Since the minister does have this information available, I trust he will recognize his duty to the people of the Maritimes and take the action necessary to forestall further tariff increases.

I know the reply of the railway companies will be: We cannot afford it; our deficit is $25 million or $29 million. But I would point out that in 1969, Canadian National had the third highest operating surplus since the war years, and that every year except three since the war, the CNR has shown an operating surplus. What distorts the picture is that most of the loss shown in the CN accounts arises from the need to pay interest on debt accumulated over the years, in fact, from the time the company began operations. Very often, members of the public are not aware of this. I am last to throw rocks at the Canadian National. I live in a Canadian National town and I realize the effort the company has made to up-grade its services, to modernize and improve the handling of freight. Indeed, the company is handling a higher volume of freight now with less equipment—though more modern equipment—than was previously the case. But despite these efforts, it cannot show a net profit when it is faced with paying $75 million in interest charges on debt incurred many years ago. This is why we in the opposition, both in my party and in the New Democratic party, have requested that the question of the capital debt structure of the CN be referred to the standing committee. Perhaps in that way some sensible solution can be found, after which the railway could go ahead and operate on a current basis. I repeat this request.

I should like now to say a word about air services and Air Canada. I know this is a subject which is causing great concern to airlines all over the world. In the last year, airlines throughout the world have found that increasing expansion, decreasing revenues and decreasing passenger traffic have placed them in the position of incurring heavy losses. I shall not go into detail of the reasons for these losses. Many solutions have been proposed. Some will say: you must reduce airline fares and increase the flow of traffic. They cite the case of Icelandic Airlines which does not belong to the International Air Transport Association and which sets its own fares. This airline managed to fill every seat on its jets between New York and Nassau whereas other airlines were travelling half full. This is one solution. I am not saying it is the only one. With more people travelling and bigger loads possible, the airlines' loss can be reduced.

The point I want to make before I conclude my remarks on this bill is that there seems to be nothing but doubt and uncertainty as to the future of Air Canada. We have seen the wave of shock and indignation created two or three weeks ago when Air Canada announced the lay-off of some 415 employees. Some who had been with their employer for 25 to 30 years were given two weeks' notice. Air Canada justifies this action on the basis of the old argument of having to cut down because traffic was falling. But how far can you cut back before you start to decrease the service that you are providing, Mr. Speaker? When your service deteriorates, passenger traffic drops off still further. It looks to me very much like the CNR passenger service policy repeating itself. It is the argument that not enough people are using the service and so you reduce the service. Since the reduced service attracts fewer customers, you then say that as no one is using the service you must abandon it.

This is the sort of thing worrying people in Canada today. They fear that Air Canada is adopting the same policy the CN has employed for the last 15 to 20 years. We have questioned the government several times about announcing some air carrier policy. We have questioned the minister about what his policy is in relation to second and third line carriers. So far, to my knowledge, the only answer we have received has been that this question is under consideration. In my particular area of Moncton, which is the freight terminal for the Maritimes area, there is a good deal of concern not that services have been cut back, though of course people are worried about this, but that the airlines have created disillusionment and the morale of the people is shot. Rumours are being circulated that Air Canada is going to pull out of all unprofitable services, following much the same pattern as the CNR. Rumour has it that another airline is going to take over. This sort of uncertainty is upsetting to residents of the area, to shippers, manufacturers and so on.

Once again, I call on the Minister of Transport to let the House know what his air policy is going to be. If he has decided upon an air policy, then I would ask him what is going to be done about these small carriers. Is Air Canada going to end up with all the profitable long-haul routes? If so, let him tell us. Then we will know how to attack the problem of getting a proper service on shorthaul routes. If Air Canada is going out of the short-haul business, then the minister should not be negotiating with carriers such as Eastern Provincial and Quebecair who apparently are quite prepared to take on these smaller routes. But let us have some clear, delineated policy. These are the things that give us some concern in connection with the bill. Not only that, we are being asked to rubber stamp the spending of money in the face of no clear statement of transportation policy by the government with respect to rail traffic, air traffic or highways. Let the government give the House some answers to these questions. We will then be able to discuss these matters in committee intelligently with officials of CN and Air Canada.

Before resuming my seat may I say that I hope the officials of Air Canada will appear before the committee this year. How can we obtain answers from Air Canada when none of their officials appears before the committee? They did not appear at all last year. I hope the minister will give his guarantee that the Air Canada officials will appear before the standing committee to justify some of the actions they have been taking in the last few weeks.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, this bill gives the House the opportunity of dealing with so many situations, most of them horrible, such as the laying off of 415 Air Canada employees, that one hardly knows where to begin. However, I think I would be remiss if I did not take a moment at the commencement of my remarks to comment upon the welcome announcement made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) last Friday that the Canadian National Railways has improved the pension benefits of its retired employees. I would be remiss in not mentioning that because the capitulation of the railway was due to the unceasing efforts of some of the members of this House over a long number of years, and they deserve our congratulations. In this regard I should like to make special reference to my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has worked on this problem for some 25 years.

I should like also specifically to congratulate members of all parties in the House who did such an excellent job in preparing the unanimous report of the Standing Committee on Transportation and Communications which recommended action by the CNR on the pension question. Undoubtedly, the report of the committee, coupled with the firm resolve of members in all parts of the House not to let this bill through until the pensions of retired CNR employees were improved, precipitated the decision of CNR management to implement many of the committee's recommendations.

Having said that, it remains necessary to remind the House once again that there are still three battles to be fought and won before we can be satisfied with the CN pensions. First, in the plan for public servants announced on December 19, 1969 and placed in effect in April of last year, provision was made for the 2 per cent increase for each year of retirement to be compounded back over the years so that ten years' retirement, for example, would result in more than a 20 per cent increase in pension benefits. I suggest that the CNR would be well advised to look at this precedent with a view to implementing it in respect of their own retired employees.

Second, the plan recently announced by Canadian National Railways does not seem to include provisions for future increases in pension benefits as the cost of living increases. This provision was made for retired public service employees, and once again it is a precedent that the CNR would be well advised to follow.

The third factor to which we must devote some attention, I suggest, is that there be included in the retirement plan for current employees of the Canadian National Railways provision for the automatic escalation of their pensions in order to keep them in step with increases in the cost of living. The minister has said that this question is going to be left to the process of collective bargaining. I can only express the opinion that the CNR would be well advised to avoid resisting any such demand on the part of its current employees in light of recent precedents.

I should like to turn now to another matter, one that was highly contentious in the transportation committee and which it seems is going to be referred now to the committee for study. I refer to the capital debt structure of the CNR. The work that the transportation committee did on the question of pensions provides an excellent recommendation for its becoming involved in a study of the capital debt structure of the railroad. Ever since its inception the CNR, no matter what its operating position has been, has shown a net loss because of the burden of public debt with which it has been saddled. I refer to public debt, not to railroad debt.

The CNR was saddled with this immense debt because the government backed crabwise into public ownership of a group of bankrupt railroads, not with the need to provide necessary public service as its primary consideration but, rather, in an attempt to save a number of its political friends from sustaining severe financial losses. The result was that the government paid 100 cents on the dollar for shares worth about 25 cents, and the railroad has ever since been paying interest on what was essentially a rotten investment.

I think it is about time that this debt was removed from the shoulders of the CNR and that it be treated as it properly is, a public debt. In this way the government, this House and the public could finally get the true financial position of the CNR. This is something long overdue and something which I have no doubt the Standing Committee on Transportation and Communication will recommend once seized with the problem.

I am sure hon. members of this House have been receiving letters, as I have, protesting the cancellation of CNR trains Nos. 7 and 8. I am in entire sympathy with the demands for reinstatement of this service, and I should just like to take a moment to explain why. First, I was annoyed by the fact that without even waiting for an examination of the question by the Canadian Transportation Commission, the CNR took it upon itself to advise the Canadian post office that after February 1 it could no longer supply mail car service between Winnipeg and Long Lac. The post office was advised, back in December, to seek other means of providing that necessary service to the communities involved. That seems a bit presumptious to me, but it may be a small incident.

Second, the cancellation of trains Nos. 7 and 8 represents a severe curtailment of service to many Canadian communities. Prior to the discontinuation of trains Nos. 7 and 8, passenger, express and mail service could be given to any community in northern Ontario in winter or summer within a 24 hour period from either Toronto or Winnipeg. For example, refrigerated grocery goods could be sent by express from Winnipeg at 9 p.m. and arrive in Sioux Lookout at 3.10 a.m. to be delivered fresh that morning to the merchants. The alternatives are now uncertain because many of the 91 communities between Winnipeg and Toronto have no highways. Furthermore, since trains Nos. 7 and 8 are being discontinued, the Supercontinental is expected to carry an extra load, resulting in the Supercontinental running on a schedule which will make it operate like a milk train.

The management of the CNR suggests that adjustments in services will result in an extended running time for the Supercontinental of from one to one and a half hours. It is already obvious that Supercontinental trains are arriving three to four hours late as a result of attempting to give proper service to the 91 communities I have mentioned. This downgrading of the Supercontinental will, in turn result in a decline in passengers and passenger demand for sleeping and dining car services. I have no doubt that ultimately the CNR will ask for the abandonment of Supercontinental service. I would, therefore strongly suggest to the government that it should immediately take steps to have the CNR put trains Nos. 7 and 8 back into service to provide the alternative necessary to the Supercontinental and to prevent the erosion of that first class service. There was no justification, financial or otherwise, for dropping the services of trains Nos. 7 and 8.

As a further suggestion, I would indicate to the government that it is essential to immediately establish a definite policy on the development of a proper continental passenger train service with modern passenger equipment, one capable of providing service to communities without highways as well as other Canadian communities which require such a service.

I have mentioned a number of specific problems and I could mention many more, but they all boil down to the direction government policy has taken in the past number of years in respect of public transportation. It has been entirely wrong. Increasingly, governments have been attempting to divorce themselves from making policy decisions in the area of transportation by insisting, rather too strongly, upon the autonomy of Crown corporations operating in this field; by setting up so-called independent boards and commissions to look after the development and implementation of policy on public transportation; by insisting upon treating crown corporations engaged in public transportation as normal business ventures, and thus judging them on the basis of their balance sheet rather than on the basis of whether they are meeting public needs.

[Mr. Rowland.]

I am not saying that crown-owned transportation companies should not concern themselves with their profit and loss positions. What I am saying is that their primary consideration should be whether they are providing the sort of service which meets the needs of the country. To put it another way, the government must decide what kind of transportation system this country requires to meet its current needs and to assist in its future development. Having made such a decision, the government must then instruct its Crown corporations to meet those needs as efficiently, both in terms of service and costs, as is humanly possible. If such a policy results in the corporations running a deficit, then the deficit should be paid and paid gladly as one of the costs of developing our country in an orderly fashion and providing our people with the quality of life to which they aspire. If this means changing the legislation governing the CNR and Air Canada, then change it.

What is happening now is that we are dealing with transportation in a piecemeal fashion through the Canadian Transportation Commission. Air Canada is having its routes carved up and handed over to regional carriers without regard to the over-all implications for the nation or the cumulative effect of each individual decision. I suggest that this may very well result in the kind of situation that occurred in the 1920's when railroads all over the country were going bankrupt and the public of Canada had to invest wildly in an attempt to establish some sort of a rational system. The debt thus incurred is one of the major problems confronting the CNR at this moment.

To get back to my point, the railroads are applying to reduce service or to abandon lines on a piecemeal basis. Decisions are made one by one, once again without proper regard for their cumulative effect upon public transportation in this country. Indeed, as in the case of the abandonment of trains Nos. 7 and 8 by the CNR, we have the ridiculous situation of a minister of the Crown informing this House that he has absolutely no control over the actions of a Crown corporation in an area of public policy as vital to the national interest as public transportation. This has to stop. Something else must be begun. Except for the turbo train now operating between Toronto and Montreal, virtually no experiments in high speed rail service are being undertaken in Canada. This is the situation at a time when in all other parts of the developing world countries are up to their elbows in such developments. Indeed, we in this country are busily engaged in divesting ourselves of what little passenger service remains.

I wish to quote some figures in this regard from an article which appeared in the January edition of the United Transportation Union's publication "Unity through Progress"

In 1944 railroads in Canada registered about 6.8 billion passenger miles; in 1968, the figure was down to about 2.6 billion Last November, the CNR and CP Rail filed 31 applications with the Canadian Transport Commission seeking relief from the burden of uneconomic passenger trains.

They claim they are uneconomical. In terms of public policy this would appear to be absolute madness at a time when 85 per cent of North American interurban transportation is carried out by automobiles; and at a time when it is a demonstrable fact that the automobile is one of the major sources of environmental pollution. Surely, any sane government would be bending every effort in seeking ways and means of encouraging the public to abandon the use of automobiles in favour of public transportation in order to reduce both pollution and the high costs in terms of money and social side effects of the construction of more freeways to accommodate automobiles. Instead, our government appears to be ready, for example, to allow the railroads to downgrade the passenger service between Ottawa and Montreal, something which can only result in the increased use of automobiles and increased expenditures on highways.

What we need in this country is a national transportation system, the first priority of which would be to meet the requirements of the country, both in terms of present needs and in terms of the demands of future development, not one designed in principle to meet the demands of an accountant's ledger. We need that kind of transportation system, and it is necessary that the government begin action to create it immediately. All protestations of government members to the contrary, there is no such animal yet extant.

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, each year the government of this nation introduces a bill for CNR financing and capital expenditures for the year. The chiefs walk in with cap in hand, hon. members of this House fill the cap, and then the chiefs return to their head office to calculate how much service they can eliminate. It is high time that the members of this House and the government of this country stopped writing the CNR a blank cheque. It is time we asked for a full report on what the CNR does with all their money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (London East): As one who has spent over 30 years of his life in the railroad business, I can tell you in a few words what is the matter with the CNR—too many highly paid chiefs and not enough little Indians, and most of the chiefs know nothing about running a railroad. During the war years when railroad men worked 14, 16 and 18 hours a day, we had few bosses. If you had occasion to meet the boss, he was usually running around the country with a pair of pliers and a length of wire trying to keep locomotives in good repair. But when the boss caught up with you, usually you found you had done something wrong. He wanted to give you a good tongue lashing and a few demerits, then send you on your way.

Employees had the highest respect for their bosses who knew their job. The latter also knew their respective employees' jobs, and the men knew that when they went into the office for an investigation they would get a square deal. Today, the morale is so low it will never recover. Why is it that most of the middle management bosses have retired at the age of 60, and why is it that most of the middle management bosses today can hardly wait for their pension time to arrive? There is something wrong when employees are unhappy about their working conditions. There is definitely something wrong when many bosses are waiting for their retirement.

Recently we had a wildcat strike at Fort Erie, Ontario, and a few weeks ago we averted a wildcat strike at London, Ontario. Both these strikes were the result of CNR trying to force a change on the employees without prior consultation. CNR employees are sick and tired of these high-handed methods of change without notice, without talking to the union officials. There is no dialogue, no meaningfull co-operation in the CNR. The management just moves the hatchet men in and bulldozes the employees into submission. I, personally, know hundreds of the employees and I can honestly say they are not easily stirred up. However, these new methods of trying to make the employees submit without prior talks will not work. Employees wish to be treated with common sense and they want management to prove to them that the changes are necessary to improve the service. They are always ready to co-operate but not when the CN uses the methods which are employed today.

As a former railway engineer I have operated passenger and freight trains over all CNR lines west of Toronto. During my 30 years of service I have watched how the company eliminated service and downgraded the passenger service. First, the service is run late so that mailmen complain and the mail contract is lost. In most small towns the express is delivered in the morning, but if the train is late the express man has to deliver his parcels well into the afternoon and then starts to pick up his shipments to go into the big cities on the afternoon train. If he cannot finish his route in the morning, he leaves the express until the next day. Therefore, a day's delay results in the shipping of express. The shippers get angry and find other ways of shipping their goods, so the express business is lost. Then, the railway can show the Canadian Transport Commission that the train is losing money, and the CTC rubber stamps the application of the railway so the train is eliminated.

Mr. McGrath: That's what happened to the "Bullet".

Mr. Turner (London East): If you ride some of the passenger trains between Toronto and Ottawa, you find you cannot even buy a lunch or get a drink of water because so many of the employees have been laid off the company does not have the workers to do the job. The car windows are dirty and so are the coaches. I have talked to many of the track workers and they have told me that even if they had the supplies they could not keep the track in good shape because their numbers have been cut to the bare minimum. You must have a good track to run high speed trains, and if you do not keep the track in shape you have derailments. We have certainly had many derailments in the past few years.

Some time ago car inspectors were cut off at the London, Ontario station. I understand that passenger trains now run from Toronto to Windsor and Toronto to Sarnia, a distance of over 200 miles in one case and just under 200 in the other, without inspection. The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications held hearings last spring and returned early in the fall to complete their report, which was tabled in the House on October 7, 1970. But other than the introduction of a change in rules allowing CNR employees to join the pension scheme with the option of paying back money which they owe to the pension plan, plus the introduction of pensions at the age of 60 with no reduction, we have heard nothing about that report. It is time the CNR made a statement regarding the committee's report. The pensioners and the employees want action, and they want it now. I am pleased that some action was taken last Friday.

The transport committee did their job and are patiently waiting for a statement, as are CNR pensioners. The CNR pensioners, who find themselves in dire straits, are hoping and waiting for improvements in their pension plan. The employees of other railways, and indeed all Canadian citizens, are also waiting. The real problem, of course, is inflation. Like all who are on a fixed income, the railway pensioner who retired many years ago sees his standard of living deteriorating as the cost of living continues to soar. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics indicates that in the last decade alone the cost of living has increased some 30 per cent. What hon. members may not be aware of and what I wish to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, are the factors which, aside from inflation, have acted to place the older pensioner in a steadily worsening financial position.

The first point involves the depression years and the fact that all railway employees suffered a 20 per cent reduction in wages which was not restored until the late 30s. This, of course, affected the average annual earnings on which pensions were calculated. This reduction of wages during the thirties left no room for the workers to save for their old age, and in many cases reduced the amount of pensions paid when employees retired. Many employees were laid off and, to live, had to withdraw their contributions, further reducing their pensions.

This situation was corrected to some extent by the 1965 revision of the CNR pension plan, whereby one and a half per cent was allowed for each year of pensionable service. However, this change was not made retroactive, and therefore it was of no value to those who retired prior to the revision. The older pensioners, those who have been on pension 18 years or more, had their allowances calculated on the basis of their best 120 months of service rather than on the best 60 months. This longer period of service, of course, included the low wage years of the late thirties and early forties, resulting in lower pensions for those who did not benefit from the rule change.

The new rule providing pension benefits calculated on the average earnings over the best five years of service completed, with the more generous allowance of one and one half per cent for each year of pensionable service as compared with 1 per cent for the first 20 years, one and a quarter per cent for the next ten years, and one and a half per cent for the remaining years of service, provides a built-in hedge against rapidly rising inflation, which the old rules did not have. Naturally, these rule changes were accompanied by a slight increase in contributions to help pay for the cost of the changes. I say, Mr. Speaker, that pensioned employees should have shared in the increased benefits by reason of their equity in the fund which has increased in value over the past few years, and by reason of their right to equal treatment from the company with respect to that portion of pension costs assumed by the company for future pension benefits.

I suggest that the cost of increased pension benefits could well be financed by the pension trust fund, assuming a proper valuation of that fund is made and that there is a fair, equitable disposition of the so-called surplus. I also say that increased benefits should be extended to pensioners who were contributors and who have an equity in that surplus. I believe, too, that the 13,000 retired employees who did not elect to become pension plan contributors, because they could not afford to pay into the fund, should receive more than the $25 per month which they presently receive. This has been increased to $50 now, but I do not think that is enough. I say that the CNR has a moral obligation to increase minimum pensions to these employees who gave many years of long, faithful service to the company.

It is common knowledge that the government of Canada recently increased the pensions of its retired civil servants in recognition of the problems caused by continuing inflation. This action has been matched by the governments of Ontario, Quebec and Alberta. In the private sector Bell Canada, with a non-contributory pension, is paying supplementary pensions to retired employees to ease the effects of inflation. Although the Canadian National is a Crown corporation, I see little reason for any difference in the treatment between a civil servant and an employee of a Crown corporation. If there is a difference, then railroaders can easily be compared to employees of Bell Canada since they both work in a rate regulated industry.

The committee, Mr. Speaker, has done its job. Now it is up to this House to tell the management of the CNR to implement fully the recommendations of the transport committee, and to do it now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (London East): The employees and pensioners will not wait much longer. They all want action and they want action now. Each year this House votes millions of dollars for the financing of the CNR debt.

If the people of Canada are called upon to pay the shot they should also be allowed to have some say in when and where the trains are going to run.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read into the record the contents of a letter I received from a railroader describing the feelings of the employees of the CNR. It reads:

> Thank you for your efforts on behalf of the CNR employees recently when it appeared that we would have to resort to a wildcat strike because of the arbitrary and unilateral action of the company. After talking to you on Monday evening, a meeting was scheduled for Tuesday morning at 8 a.m. This meeting lasted until 10 a.m. when it was terminated as no progress could be made of the belligerent attitude of the company officers. At 2 p.m. the company contacted the local chairman and the difference in attitude was as night and day. It was quite obvious that instructions had come from higher up.
> The company requested that a brief be drawn up concerning the Ingersoll switcher, also another with all the grievances that did not come under our respective collective agreements.
> A meeting was scheduled for Wednesday, November 25th, at 2 p.m. that lasted until 8 p.m. Although the tone of the officers was very cordial the results were negative.
> The Ingersoll jobs are to be changed as of October 7th, 1970, to out-post jobs.
> After the attempt of the CNR to arbitrarily run through in Northern Ontario, resulting in the Freedman Commission, all brotherhoods negotiated a clause stating that all changes that adversely affect the working conditions would be negotiated. The company claims that these jobs are not adversely affected even though five crew members must now drive 25 miles to work. The adverse effect can be judged by the fact that one engineer was forced to cover one job; the other was bid by a very junior man that was just set up, that lives near Ingersoll. These jobs are not covered by one of the most senior engineers in London, and the other by a man about middle of the seniority list.
> Contracts also provide that the company provide a cook room and cooking facilities. Their answer to this is that they will put anyone up that has to stay overnight at the Ingersoll Inn, and have a restaurant stay open until the afternoon job is finished.

Imagine having a restaurant stay open for one man, or even five men.

> In answer to the objections to this the company states that we could take it to a grievance, but we couldn't start this procedure until after the jobs were changed.
> This statement clearly shows that they intend to take the full time and could prolong this for over a year. A great many things, in all contracts, depend to a certain degree on mutual respect and acting in good faith, in the spirit that an agreement was entered into. Recently, the past two or three years, it has become increasingly evident that the CNR in the London area has no intentions of acting in good faith with its employes, the general public, or its freight shippers.
> I am enclosing a clipping from the London Free Press that you are no doubt aware of. These incidents can only increase unless this company changes its attitude. Should the union officials ever decide to act like union leaders this country will be into one of the biggest strikes it has ever seen. The morale of the men is the lowest I've ever seen. Their frustrations and resentments could make a strike very costly and ugly. A strike could, or could not be with the sanction of the unions. Given the right set of circumstances a wildcat strike in one terminal could spread through an entire area or province.
> Another area that is causing some concern is the CTC. This body generates no respect from the rank and file railroader in transportation. Hearings before this body in regard to passenger train abandonment are regarded as a farce and a charade, and the CTC is often referred to as "that rubber stamp outfit." Mr. Pickersgill should be removed from office and the whole body revamped. It is quite interesting that many of the towns and cities that are affected by passenger train cut off have come to the conclusion that it is useless to protest at the CTC hearings. The action of the CTC reminds one of a saying about old time western justice, "You will have a fair trial and then we'll hang you."
> I know that on many occasions you have warned your colleagues about the conditions on the CNR. Your efforts are greatly appreciated by our people in this area. It would be a shame if action by the railroaders is the only way to convince them of your good judgment.
> It's rather amusing to hear talk of forcing foreign owned companies to act as good Canadian corporate citizens when the government apparently can't force a Crown corporation to act in anything but their own interest. The public be damned attitude of the CNR is becoming more apparent every day.

• (4:30 p.m.)

It is time, Mr. Speaker, for this company to change its attitude towards the people of Canada.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would allow a question.

Mr. Turner (London East): Certainly.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the hon. member's comments about company methods for making passenger runs unprofitable. Did he happen to be on the CNR train running between Toronto and Ottawa on September 25 when, to my knowledge, passengers requested chairs in chair cars and were told that there was no chair car service? I was a passenger on that train and there were three empty chair cars on the train. That sort of thing is bad; first, for the economy of the railway and, second, for the economy of railway employees, who suffer as a result of lost tips. I was told that this sort of thing is very common, in large part because the computer works out the seating arrangements. Has the hon. member heard about this?

Mr. Turner (London East): Mr Speaker, I have heard from those who run the passenger trains that these are the instructions they receive from officials, and that they must follow instructions. The position of employees is this: if they follow the rules, they are fired, and if they do not follow the rules, they are fired. That is the situation.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, this is probably one of the most difficult bills coming before Parliament. Of course, my valued colleagues from Newfoundland have raised from time to time in a short, orderly, but persistent fashion, the affairs of the Newfoundland "Bullet" when bills of this nature have been debated. I tend to find myself thinking like James Forsyte, the elderly solicitor of the Forsyte Saga who, when faced with monumental changes, looks blank, and says, "I do not know about it, because nobody ever tells me about these things." However, all the time knows what is going on. You know that that sharp old devil is trying to save his own skin, and that somebody has told him something is going on.

That something is happening you and I know, Mr. Speaker, as does everybody in this chamber. Monumental changes are taking place in Canada transportation, and all the while the government tries to make it appear as if no changes whatsoever were taking place. So, we have a perfect right to raise the questions being raised here, and to raise the sort of questions that the last three or four speakers this afternoon have raised. We shall continue raising them. Probably it is a good idea that the Canadian National system and Air Canada have to appear before us and account for themselves. I do not think anybody would be very happy if all this spending or lack of spending that we are discussing were to be dealt with by some committee of the House of Commons. We, therefore, make no apology for becoming involved with this matter.

I should like to raise a myriad of questions but will try to be reasonably brief, so that some of these matters that are raised can be considered by the managements of both systems and answered. For one thing, I can never understand why there should be a difference between first class and second class on aeroplanes. Why should people be crowded, as it were, in one part of the aircraft and others be given a little more flank room, if I can use that expression, in another part of the aircraft. I saw the worst instance of this discrimination last Saturday when I finally took a trip back to the Maritimes. On that Air Canada flight a television crew was flying to Halifax. Also on board was a very distinguished person who was to be photographed on the flight. As I say, there was a CBC crew on board with its flash bulbs and cameras and the like. This most distinguished, most photogenic person, was photographed in the second class part of the Air Canada aircraft that was flying to Halifax.

I asked this very distinguished and photogenic person, whose songs have made up a large part of the Canadian content on Canadian radio during the last few weeks—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: —why she was now travelling second class when I felt sure that she could afford to travel first class and that her sponsors would insist on it. She said that it was not her fault; that she had made no arrangements like that. The CBC had checked with Air Canada and Air Canada had said "No, no; we cannot allow things like that to go on in the first class part of the aircraft." Consequently, the photographs were taken in the second class part. There must have been four or five people in the first class part, yet this photogenic person had her picture taken in the second class part. I thought that an unfair distinction had been raised between first and second class passengers. I have not mentioned her name, even though her songs have made up a large part of Canadian content for, lo, these many months on Canadian radio. I thought I would raise this at the first opportunity in Parliament because there should simply not be a distinction as between first and second class on Air Canada. The criterion for where one sits should be extra length of one's legs, or one's extra girth, or whatever other physical reasons one can bring forward. The criterion, surely, in seating arrangements should not involve first and second class...

An hon. Member: Were the CBC people first class?

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. McCleave: No, not at all; not the people who did the picture taking. Nevertheless, the extremely photogenic person I have described, this consummate actress—I suppose I have given her identity away—was first class indeed. Anyway, Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say all this. I hope that she will talk to me the next time we make the same trip together.

Now, Sir, may I tell you about another adventure in real debt financing involving the Canadian National system? I have taken my crack at Air Canada; now may I take a crack at the Canadian National system? All this happened a few weeks ago when I went from Ottawa to Montreal on a Friday evening. On that occasion the main line between Montreal and Toronto had been "blown out" in some extraordinary fashion. As a result, all the Canadian National trains from Toronto to Montreal were coming up the Ottawa line and then finding the best route they could to their destination. We all gathered in the station which, as we all know, is a fair journey out by dog sled, or bus, or whatever form of travel one uses.

You are allowed on board the train when the officials are good and ready, after which the train goes off, lurching as the case may be to Montreal or Toronto. On this evening—the station was packed. We had to line up for half an hour and then were suddenly allowed on the train. We found that the train did not have enough space for all the passengers, and that there were no extra cars. This Canadian National train to Montreal, travelling on one of the most heavily travelled lines in Canada, I suppose, did not have enough space for the passengers. To be told by the conductor that they simply did not have those extra cars was one thing, but then to get 17 miles out of Ottawa on the route to Montreal and find that there has been a derailment between Montreal and Toronto, and that trains were being rerouted to Ottawa and then to Toronto, was another thing. Then, to find oneself submerged on a siding in Ontario for one hour while all those trains went by from Montreal to Ottawa and then to Toronto was still another thing.

But the thing that really shook me was that the people in the station who look after CN affairs knew there had been that derailment and knew there was this hold-up on the CN service toward Montreal. I realize that when there is an emergency you have to expect that the best is being done. I do not complain about that. But the fact is that no one was told before we left Ottawa for Montreal that this would take place. Not one soul told us that if we had to be there at a certain hour we were going to be delayed. Not one soul told us until we got under way that once you got aboard that train you might have to stand all the way to Montreal because there were not going to be enough cars. This is exactly the sort of thing which would prove to any passenger that the management does not give a damn about passengers, and that is exactly what happened on that journey.

I will tell you what I did. As soon as that train drew out of the station, I was told there were no seats available. I got in between two cars, you know, where they have a platform and they have that little chair sort of thing that they put on the station platform on which you step to get out on the platform. I sat there between those two railway cars and when the conductor came along he said "What are you doing there?" I said "Well, it so happens that they told me I am not going to get a seat. I have figured out the answer to that. I am going to put a few questions on the House of Commons Order Paper and eventually the CN is going to answer for this, "I began to scribble my questions on a pad. Then, the conductor, who happened to be a reasonable and bright sort of chap, said "You had better come back with me and sit down at my table and maybe we can talk this out." And that is exactly what happened. But in an enlightened day and age, when certain people running the CN knew there was a derailment between Ottawa and Montreal, they did not have the sense to tell any passenger on that trip that he should have taken the C.P. which would have brought him very quickly into Montreal with no trouble at all.

Perhaps this was the first time it had ever come home to me, but I am one of those who now believe that the railways are out to get their passengers, that the railways are now out to move all their business into the movement of chattels and goods, bulk carriers or simple carriers, with no regard for the movement of human persons from one part of Canada to another. I would not have thought, until that experience of about two weeks ago, that this was exactly what is going to happen. You may say it is paranoia or suspicion but that is exactly what I believe about the operations of the CNR and perhaps exactly what I am going to believe about the operations of the Canadian Pacific.

I agree with most of the speakers who went before me. It may be a very odd thing that members as disparate as socialist members and the hon. member from London, Ontario—I do not know what kind of member you would describe that as—or a member like myself, or a maverick Liberal, or a maverick Tory, or the like, should all share the same view with regard to the operations of the Canadian railways, but I think we all do and that surely must be some kind of tip-off to the people who run our railroads as to what we feel. I think perhaps we shall all share the same view with regard to Air Canada operations as well. These are some thoughts. The railways do have a tremendous public relations job to do, and I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, it is not an easy public relations job they have to do among the members of this House of Commons or among the members of the other place. I think the time has come when they have to do that public relations job with the public of Canada they are supposed to serve.

Mr. Richard: Perhaps I might interpose a comment. We have just heard a recital of a trip by train on that fateful day from the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). I was personally involved because my young daughter, 16 years of age, was on her way to Toronto that day. She was told to be there at 5.10. She was there at 4.30. A little later they told her there was an accident and the train was delayed until 7.30 when it started for Toronto. Somewhere past Smiths Falls, in the darkness, the train stopped and remained there for many hours. There was no coffee, no sandwiches. It was dawn before they landed in Toronto the next morning at 6.15.

Mr. McCleave: I think that is a very good question. It certainly makes it clear there are really no political differences when we deal with the services of the Canadian National Railways.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, everybody knows the importance of exerting an effective control over the use of public funds. As a consequence, it is our duty to review the actpons of crown corporations which, as is the case here, can spend these funds at the public's expense.

There is cause for concern about the adequacy of the programs established by the CNR in terms of public need and service. I entertain some doubts, Mr. Speaker, since for so many years we have seen a decrease in the service provided to the public by this company in terms of passenger service as well as in terms of freight transportation.

Obviously, the objective of a state owned corporation is not only to show profits. We recognize this and since the only objective is not profitability we must review all possibilities to provide adequate service to all areas of the country and particularly to those where this service is of vital importance.

There are, Mr. Speaker, some striking contradictions. For instance, at a time when we are speaking of decentralization, while we seek through the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to help some areas somewhat less developed than others to rise from economic stagnation, we can hardly accept that the CNR should reduce its service to these areas. This is particularly the case in my region, the Saint-Maurice Valley and in the Quebec City area where I must say that the service provided by the Canadian National Railways is becoming less and less efficient; indeed, for all practical purposes, this service tends to disappear. This is why all the municipalities presently served by the CNR are up in arms and wondering what is happening and how far the CNR will go along these lines.

Mr. Speaker, we are not against progress and we do agree that if we manage, thanks to ingenious plans, to reorient and to reorganize our railway service, this will be so much the better if this can provide better service to our citizens. But we wonder whether there is an actual improvement in the service provided.

Is there not too many individuals more interested in setting up plans and creating new techniques than being exclusively concerned with the service? Is there not connivance between the Canadian Transport Commission and the CNR and even, in certain cases, the railwaymen union?

Mr. Speaker, let me explain myself: When new plans are introduced, when a new technical orientation is devised for the CNR as I said earlier—I do agree. But we should not at the same time forget to take the required precautions so as to solve also the human problems intimately connected with it.

For example, when it is decided to eliminate, for all practical purposes, all the stations, all the stationmasters or all the technicians who are now working in the small railway stations, is it advantageous? I hesitate to say that it may be advantageous in view of the need for decentralization.

But even more serious is the fact that they now neglect entirely the condition of human beings who have been with the company for 20, 25 or 30 years, and for whom no proper means to live fairly and decently are provided, since the existing pension fund is inadequate. And one can hardly imagine, especially in the present circumstances—while unemployment is so accute that we meet an increasingly large number of well-educated unemployed people—how difficult retraining is for an individual of 45, 50 or 55 who must get it to find a new job as well-paid as that of stationmaster or telegraph operator, for instance. Mr. Speaker, this problem must absolutely be solved.

At the present time, the way the problem is approached is absolutely unfair for a rather large number of individuals who are in the same situation. And we wonder, for instance, how it is that a company like General Motors has come to an agreement with its employees to the effect that no matter the age, retirement after thirty years of service will be granted a minimum pension of $500. Therefore, regardless of age, after thirty years of service, there is a $500 minimum pension.

Why should not the railway employees' pension fund, with a couple of millions in it, be able to solve the pension problem for those whose jobs will disappear or who will need retraining at an age where that is impossible? Those employees should have at least the same thing, especially since at this time there is no shortage of money in the pension fund.

Now, to solve the problem, if really nothing else can be done, if better techniques are available and if it is believed that stationmasters or telegraph operators in various small stations can be dispensed with, if the problem has been seriously examined and if it is considered that a more adequate and better service will be provided through the new plans, then let us solve equitably the human problem which is involved.

Therefore, what those people are asking for is rather simple and quite fair. They merely ask that retirement be made optional after twenty years of service and that after twenty years of service, an employee who cannot be transferred, cannot be retrained and decides to retire be given a minimum of $500 per month. Thus we will have at least solved his problem so that he may continue to live decently.

Therefore, it is extremely important to consider all viewpoints with regard to a truly human solution to such a problem.

Mr. Speaker, may I point out that it is five o'clock?

[Mr. Matte.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

ESTATE TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT PAYMENT OF TAX BY TRANSFERING GOVERNMENT BONDS AT FACE VALUE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to amend the Estate Tax Act to provide that taxes, interest, penalties, costs and other amounts due and payable under that Act in respect of an estate may be paid in whole or in part by the transfer or transmission of government of Canada bonds or other securities of Canada to Her Majesty where such bonds or securities form part of the estate and were acquired by the deceased at least five years prior to his death; and that payment so made shall be deemed to be payment at the face value of such securities with interest, if any, accrued thereon.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion you have just read from the Chair asks the government to give consideration to introducing legislation to amend the Estate Tax Act so that Canadians who bought government bonds or other securities in good faith should be able to cash those bonds at face value for the purpose of paying off their succession duties.

In order to take care of any speculation that may be involved in such legislation I have suggested that provisions be included to the effect that these bonds or securities must have been in the hands of the deceased five years prior to death. Of course, it also makes provision for any interest or coupons that might be attached to the bonds or securities. This is the first time that such legislation or a suggestion of this kind has been made in the House, and I think it has some urgency and necessity. In view of the fact that more and more Canadians will be required to pay succession duties, this amendment is of great importance.

If I may quote from Taxation Statistics, in 1969 in the $50,000 to $75,000 bracket there were 2,455 estates from which was collected $5.3 million. In the $75,000 to $100,000 bracket there were 1,697 estates from which was collected $8.2 million. In the $100,000 to $125,000 bracket there were 1,008 estates from which was collected $9.3 million. The total for the year 1969, representing approximately 8,000 estates, paid succession duties amounting to a total of approximately $207 million. It would seem only fair to give people the opportunity to use these bonds to pay succession duties. The original purchasers paid $100 for them, but at the death of the individual they may be worth only $80 or $85. Under the present regulations these securities are valued at their market value when the individual passed away. My argument is that they should be taken at their face value when used for paying off a debt to the crown. They were purchased in good faith from the crown and if they are used for paying a debt to the crown they should be valued at their face value of $100.

What do the trust and corporate concerns think about such a plan? Let me read from some of the comments made by officials of these organizations. The President of the Canada Trust Company has said:

> I believe the proposal has much merit. Indeed it parallels existing policy in my own Company—and I am sure other financial institutions that issue term instruments—whereby we cash outstanding obligations before maturity at par in the event of death.

Let me quote what the president of the Montreal Trust Company has said:

> —proposed bill is commendable in principle and probably the qualification that bonds must have been owned by the deceased for at least five years was reasonable protection,—

Let me quote what the president of the Canadian Council for Fair Taxation has said:

> I am quite sure, however, that in order to prevent trading in these bonds, it would be necessary to restrict this privilege to any bonds in the possession of Canadians before say January 1, 1972.

The president of the Canada Permanent Trust Company stated:

> The proposed Motion would certainly be advantageous to many estates and, as a corporate executor, we would support it.

Those are some of the comments made by people engaged in this field.

I do not propose to take any more of the time of the House at this stage. I think I have put forward the idea as clearly as I can. In respect of perpetual bonds, I should like to make one or two comments. People purchased these bonds at $96.50, yet on today's market they are perhaps worth $42 or $44. The bonds have been in their possession for 35 years and have been paying only 3 per cent interest. Indeed, I know of a widow whose husband had purchased about $50,000 of these Canada perpetual bonds bearing 3 per cent interest. If we look at the situation in a very fair and reasonable light why should these bonds not be accepted by the crown at their face value for the purpose of paying estate taxes? Admittedly this would allow some capital gains, but that would be a much smaller amount in relation to the over-all benefit provided to long-term holders whose estates would have the opportunity of gaining the face value for the payment of succession duties.

Let me conclude my remarks by giving my reasons for suggesting this legislation. It is only fair and reasonable that these bonds should be accepted at face value for the payment of a debt to the Crown. More and more people are involved in succession duties. This legislation would be useful to a greater number of Canadians at a cost not too great so far as the government is concerned.

As I said earlier, the government collected only $207.1 million in 1967, in the form of succession duties, from approximately 8,000 estates as compared to $5 billion in personal income tax. The adoption of this proposal would give a tremendous advantage to widows and senior citizens. The inflation allowed by this government has cost these people a great deal, and through the adoption of this legislation the government could pay back much of the loss incurred as a result of inflation.

Several trust companies in Canada cash outstanding obligations or debentures before maturity at par in the event of death. If an individual owns a debenture which is due sometime after the death of that individual, many of these companies will accept it at par. I suggest the government should do likewise as this is only fair and reasonable. I will be most happy to hear the views of other members of the House in respect of my proposal.

I hope hon. members will not talk out the bill before six o'clock. I should like it to come to a vote. It is my hope that the government will see fit to have this motion referred to the Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs at which time officials from the Department of Finance, the Bank of Canada and others could give their views. I feel it is a fair and reasonable proposition put forward on behalf of Canadian citizens.

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): I am glad to be able to participate in the debate on this very interesting question. I regret that I may not be able to be as brief as was the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) who presented the resolution. I would like to read the resolution because I think a misunderstanding has developed initially about its import. It reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to amend the Estate Tax Act to provide that taxes, interest, penalties, costs and other amounts due and payable under that act in respect of an estate may be paid in whole or in part by the transfer or transmission of government of Canada bonds or other securities of Canada to Her Majesty where such bonds or securities form part of the estate and were acquired by the deceased at least five years prior to his death; and that payment so made shall be deemed to be payment at the face value of such securities with interest, if any, accrued thereon.

The hon. member suggested in his remarks that this would imply that the bonds were acquired by the decedent at face value. But in fact, when you read the actual text of the resolution, it is apparent that all a person has to do is buy the bond more than five years prior to his death to qualify for this special treatment. One can pick up bonds in the market today, some of the least successful bonds, at 40 per cent or less of their face value. Presumably, therefore, such bonds could be acquired at this enormous discount and could be used by a person five or six years later at face value to discharge his estate tax obligations. I do not think the hon. member in his statement faced up to the possibility of that taking place. Certainly, the language of the resolution would permit it.

However, I do not want to deal solely with the technicalities of the resolution. In general, it is a recognition of the important fact that inflation is a fact of life, and that it is an unfair factor. Second, in addition to a recognition of the evil of inflation, the objective of the proposal, apart from the technicalities, is to produce equity for a certain class of victim of inflation. The resolution has that objective, but I do not think it has that result. I would like to deal in turn with these two aspects: first, the recognition of inflation as an evil in our society, and second, the proposal to compensate one very small segment of our population for the impact of inflation.

I do not think there is any doubt that while some people benefit, and have benefited in the past from inflation in our society, by and large it is a general evil of which all of us eventually become victims. Not only that, it is a danger to society as well as to our economy. From the point of view of the evil that it represents to the individual it is apparent, when you look at it and consider the cases to which the hon. member himself referred, it is en evil which preys more on weaker members of society than on strong members. People whose savings consist of bank balances, of annuities, of pensions contributed during the working period of their lives for their retirement, are those who are hit most hard. These tend to be the assets of the less wealthy members of society, and these are the assets which are hardest hit by inflation. I think it was with this in mind that the late President John F. Kennedy referred to inflation as a cruel tax on the weak. Indeed, it is that. It is a tax which strikes those least able to pay it, those whose assets are of a fixed nature.

Viewed from the point of view of society as a whole, inflation can, and indeed should, be regarded as a transfer of wealth. It is a transfer of wealth from lenders to borrowers. It is a way in which, over a period of years, those who have lent their money transfer a part of their wealth in real terms to those who borrow it. From the point of view of the government's responsibility, it can be seen that, at least in the short run, the government is one of the greatest beneficiaries of inflation because it is the largest debtor in the country by far. So, one should regard inflation as a transfer of wealth from the private sector to the public sector. Not that it is an object which the government seeks to achieve because we have recognized that inflation is not in the interest of the government any more than it is in the long run in the interest of any particular individual.

The hon. member's resolution comes to terms with the fact that bond holders are victimized by inflation at accelerating rates. But there are other victims of inflation in society, and one wonders why this resolution is so narrow that only the interests of the smaller group are taken into consideration. I sat on the committee which heard representations about tax reform. One of the proposals for tax reform was the establishment of a capital gains tax, and a number of representations were made asking for mitigation on behalf of those whose position was worsened by inflation.

I would like to cite three completely different ways in which inflation can damage the individual. First, we received representations on behalf of those whose assets go up in value over a period of time because of inflation. They buy land or stocks, and inflation is taken into account in the market price. When their assets are sold, the government's white paper proposed that a tax be imposed on the full capital gain, with no recognition being given to inflation. Representatives on behalf of these interests urged us to permit inflation to be taken into account and to make adjustments so that they would not have to pay taxes on anything more than an inflationary gain.

But when you look more deeply into the matter, you consider the interests of another group which is affected just as seriously by inflation. These are people whose assets decline in real value. One could take the example of the bond holder, or the example of an annuity holder. He buys a ten year annuity for, say, $1,000 which pays $60 a year to him. Every year for the ten years he receives the $60 as income and pays income tax on it. At the end of the ten years period he gets back $1,000 when his annuity is redeemed and finds that its real value may have declined by as much as 40 per cent. This is the case of an individual who suffers from inflation just as severely as a man who realizes the capital gain, who pays a tax every year in the form of taxation of his interest or annuity income, and at the end of the period may find himself worse off. What of the equity of doing something in the way of inflation adjustment for the man with the capital gain and doing nothing for this second individual whose real assets have declined in value and who has had to pay tax every year?

• (5:20 p.m.)

A third group are people who are on fixed salaries for a fixed period, for a two or three year term. These individuals have bargained for a certain level of real income to last for a given period, and they find that over that period they are victimized by inflation as well, with no account being taken of it by the Income Tax Act. Mr. Speaker, all of these are people whose situations suffer because of inflation. But the point I want to make, by using these three examples of extremely different kinds of economic activity that suffer from inflation, is that everyone in society suffers from inflation in the long run. The solution, surely, is not to give special benefits to a small group but for the government to take whatever steps are necessary, and to obtain the co-operation of all segments of society where that has to be done, to ensure that inflation will not continue.

I would like to look again at the specific benefits that would result from the proposal of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales). Who are the people who are to benefit? First, Mr. Speaker, they are people who pay estate taxes, and that is a very small sector of our society. Even though $50,000 may seem like a small amount to the hon. member, there are very few people who die with an estate that large, although I agree with the hon. member that there will be an increasing number. The real victims, the weak who suffer the cruel tax of inflation, may not have a taxable estate. They suffer from inflation with no adjustments proposed, because they are too poor. So, you have to have a certain status, a certain economic position, before the benefits which are proposed by the hon. member would apply.

Secondly, you have to have invested in government bonds. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are all kinds of bonds. I do not think it is in the interests of the government to try to corner the market for loan capital. I do not think it is in our interests to see government bonds very much more desirable than other bonds because I think it is important that bonds offered by the private sector are also attractive investments. However, only those who have chosen to invest in bonds of the government are to get any benefit from the proposal put forward by the hon. member.

A third factor to be kept in mind is that bonds do not only decline in proportion to inflation. The value of bonds is also affected by their interest rate, so that as they may go down in value because of inflation taking place they are also affected by the particular interest rate at which they were contracted. It very often happens that bonds can be declining or increasing at the same time as the interest rate is going one way or the other, so that their value is not only related to the amount of inflation taking place but related to the changing interest rate. For example, in the last few months government bonds have been sharply increasing in value, but I do not think the opposition would be willing to acknowledge that inflation has disappeared or is declining in a proportionate amount.

The five year rule which the hon. member has proposed not only compounds the unfairness of the proposal but adds an element of Russian roulette because it is an arbitrary number, and based on an arbitrary number one's estate tax liability is to be determined. I think for a rule along this line here to be considered it would surely be inappropriate to attach some arbitrary qualifying period to it.

I would like to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by simply pointing out again that the appropriate strategy, in my opinion, for dealing with inflation is not to go around creating loopholes for particular individuals to escape from the effect of inflation. Everybody suffers from inflation. The appropriate solution is for the government to seize upon a policy of monetary control and policy of fiscal control which assures that inflation, if it is to take place, will take place at a steady rate rather than an arbitrary unanticipated rate, or to a constantly accelerating rate.

Since I have a few minutes left, I might refer to the excellent suggestion which the hon. member made when referring to the illustration of those trust companies which agree to redeem bonds at face value regardless of their market value at the time that they may be tendered for redemption. This is an excellent idea. It is nothing more than an insurance feature of a bond. I would urge the Department of Finance to consider offering bonds which do contain an insurance feature, that is to say, which contain an assurance that when tendered on the death of the purchaser they will be redeemed at face value. The interest rate paid on them will have to be proportionately less because this is an actuarial problem which would have to be included but, if I may use the Bay Street term, it is certainly a sweetener which will make the bonds far more attractive. In that connection I am glad to have that suggestion brought to my attention, and I hope it will also come to the attention of the government.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales), in whose constituency it was once my pleasure to live, for putting this very thoughtful and practical notice of motion before the House. In particular, he suggests that the Estate Tax Act be revised:

> —to provide that taxes, interest, penalties, costs and other amounts due and payable under that Act in respect of an estate may be paid in whole or in part by the transfer or transmission of Government of Canada bonds or other securities of Canada to Her Majesty where such bonds or securities form part of the estate and were acquired by the deceased at least five years prior to his death; and that payment so made shall be deemed to be payment at the face value of such securities with interest, if any, accrued thereon.

I wish to direct attention to two phrases in this notice of motion. The first is the five year provision to which the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) has alluded. If we are going to pursue this suggestion should we not think of a period perhaps double that length, say eight or ten years, because in its present form it creates the loophole that has already been articulated by the hon. member for Don Valley. There is that weakness in it.

Mainly, Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on the next part of the notice of motion which says that the bonds or securities shall be deemed to be payment at their face value, etc. Here we come, I think, to the social costs of inflation, the social costs that have fallen upon all segments or our society including—and this factor has not been yet introduced in this debate—governments. The one segment of society that must pay part of the price, or indeed the lion's share of the cost of inflation, is government itself.

But it is the government which through such issues as government of Canada perpetual bonds has been able to devise through the years an instrument whereby it is able to dole out this cost to be borne by individual citizens on behalf of the country as a whole. In other words, the cost of inflation falls on government just as it falls on every citizen in society. However, through such techniques as perpetual bonds the government is able to pass on to individuals the cost of that which should really be borne by the government itself. This, it seems to me, is basically unfair.

I think, therefore, that the gist of the hon. member's motion is that it seeks redress, in the sense that government ought to take upon itself this hardship or some segment of it. Obviously, this motion is not a panacea for solving all the problems that infest a culture as a result of significant inflation. It merely suggests that the government ought to take on itself a portion of the burden that is caused by inflation and climbing interest rates because the money raised by the original issuance of those government bonds was for government financing.

Many Canadians, many of whom unfortunately are now of advanced years, are finding themselves in the position of one person who wrote to me some months ago on this subject. I quote from a letter that I received. I realize that I am bringing this question down to the personal level. This person wrote:

I am writing you a letter re perpetual bonds which are paying 3 per cent interest and have a base market value of 49. I am stuck with $7,000 worth and I need more income. I managed to save that amount when teachers' salaries were very low and am now on a small pension—

I understand that Mackenzie King had instituted these bonds on a trial basis. Each bond was labelled "Can be called in September, 1966." As you know, Mr. Sharp committed what I consider legalized robbery when he refused to call them and added 30 years to their duration.

Now, how many holders of these bonds will be living in 1996—very few, and we need our money now.

This situation is a gross injustice—

One woman . . . is 89 years of age and holds $5,000 in perpetual bonds. Several others of my acquaintance are stuck with them.

Surely the point is this, Mr. Speaker, that the interest rate is not only low but that the value of the money has gone down as well. The value of the dollar has been eroded, while the value of equal amounts invested in most stocks or real estate over the same period of time has increased dramatically. Thus, people with bond investments have suffered doubly and many are now in the poorest position to defend themselves against this insidious erosion of their savings, as the writer of the letter pointed out.

It therefore seems to me that, above all, the motion of the hon. member for Wellington demonstrates in a stark and simple fashion the evils of inflation and how the average Canadian suffers thereby. But beyond those considerations, I for one think that the nation as a whole must lift a portion of this crushing burden from the shoulders of men and women who did nothing wrong except to believe in Canada enough to invest in her future. They have been stung, and stung badly as a result of their confidence in their country.

I recognize that the writer of the letter from which I quoted harbours some impressions that are basically wrong. There are abroad some basic misunderstandings about those bonds and the government's obligations in issuing them. In order to be fair, I quote from a letter dated March 12, 1969, from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). He wrote to me in part as follows:

In 1936, the government of Canada issued $55 million of those 3 per cent perpetual bonds at a price of 96.50 per cent to yield 3.11 per cent in perpetuity. Since the bonds were offered at a relatively attractive yield and gave investors an opportunity of purchasing, in effect, an attractive annuity, the issue was broadly distributed and received a good market reception. While this was the first issue of perpetual bonds in Canada, similar bonds had long been an important part of the United Kingdom's debt structure. In fact, in 1935 about 60 per cent of the U.K.'s marketable outstanding debt was in the form of perpetual or undated bonds.

The next paragraph concerns a number of investors in Canada including, perhaps, the constituent who has written to me on the subject as well as others who have written to hon. members. The statement continues:

Unfortunately, a number of investors misunderstood the nature of these bonds and apparently still do. The bonds—

This is the important point.

—have no maturity date, as their name implies, though they did become callable at the government's option on September 15, 1966. This is a normal feature of such bonds. The well known U.K. 2¾ per cent consols, for example, which became callable on April 5, 1923, are still outstanding and have a market price currently within a range of 32 to 35 per cent of par value.

The hon. member for Don Valley said that some of the less attractive issues stood at around 40 per cent of par value. The particular bond issue that was referred to in the statement was callable in 1923. The letter goes on:

In fact, this callable option protects the government in the event that interest rates decline substantially. However, the last coupon on the bearer bond and the coupon-registered bond certificates also became payable on September 15, 1966, the date when the government's option began. A number of Canadian investors incorrectly assumed that the bonds matured on this date. Furthermore, an issuance of a new certificate with an additional supply of coupons attached thereto, sufficient for the next 30 years—

That was the point to which my constituent's letter alluded.

—does not mean that the perpetuals have been issued for another 30 years. The perpetuals continue to have no maturity date.

These bonds are marketable bonds and their price is determined in the bond market. Since the perpetual bonds were issued, their market price has generally reflected changing levels of interest rates in Canada. Their market price for several years after the war exceeded the original issue price. Sellers of the bonds at that time could have obtained a capital gain from the original issue price. In recent years interest rates in Canada and elsewhere have risen to higher levels and the market prices of perpetual bonds and many fixed interest obligations have, as a consequence, declined substantially below issue prices.

From correspondence I have received I am aware that there are a number of perpetual bond holders who can ill afford the capital loss that would be involved in selling at current market prices. A good deal of consideration was given to this problem including possible ways in which some of these hardships could be alleviated. Unfortunately, all such proposals carried with them the implication of protecting investors in marketable securities from the vagaries of the market. To accept this principle, even in circumstances designed to alleviate hardship, would lead to demands for similar treatment by all other investors in government of Canada marketable securities selling below issue prices.

It is cold comfort for the average citizen to learn that the traditional callable option exists not to protect the citizen from a future shift in interest rates but to protect the government. If the going interest rate should decline substantially, the government can recall the bonds and presumably issue new ones at lower interest rates. If, on the other hand, interest rates rise dramatically, the government has in effect obtained cheap money at the expense of the citizens and there is nothing the citizens can do about it. That is the nub of the matter and that is the cause of the grievance.

It seems to me the hon. member for Wellington has drawn attention to a legitimate grievance when he places this question before us today. The injustice built into such a system must surely be self-evident to most members of the House, especially so in a day when all of us in public life are, or at least ought to be, sensitive to the need to protect individuals against the colossal power of the state. In addition, our role as private members requires that we decry this dead-end street in which a portion of our constituents have found themselves. Indeed, our present role of ombudsmen which amounts to such a large slice of our function as members of the highest court in the land, if not common compassion alone, requires us to air this serious social grievance.

Allowing the face value, plus interest accrued, of such securities as payment of tax on settlement of estate duties would permit the financial loss to trickle back into government financial coffers, but this is hardly an adequate solution as far as those who hold such bonds are concerned. It is hardly sufficient for people to be told that when they are dead and gone and when their estates are being settled, then, and then only, will the bonds be worth what they say they are worth on their face. Such an arrangement will only benefit the heirs, not the people who need the benefit.

The main contribution I wish to make to the discussion today is to point out that this load falls most heavily on the shoulders of those who are least able to carry it. In other words, there are thousands of citizens across our land, most of whom are now elderly, who are caught in the trap about which I read in the letter I quoted earlier.

In conclusion, I want to quote a couple of sentences from the final report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging which was completed a few years ago. It draws attention to the financial difficulties in which elderly people so often find themselves. I quote:

> We deplore the tendency to confuse economic dependency with social or psychological dependence. To assume that one who needs financial help must be an inadequate individual will help to make him feel unworthy and preclude satisfactory solution of his plight. The elderly are particularly sensitive to any implications of that kind.

They are particularly sensitive when they have in fact long since put by considerable sums of money, especially taking into account the conditions when their earning power was at its highest. Then they find that because of inflation on the one hand, and because they got into buying the kind of bonds we have been discussing, they are forced, in spite of having savings, to live in meagre circumstances or in ways that require them to ask for assistance, when they feel strongly that they ought never to have been obliged to seek that kind of assistance or to suffer what amounts to a financial loss.

This reminds me of a blunt statement which appears to sum up the position in which these people find themselves: It is no disgrace to be poor, but it is damned unhandy. In this sense, if we can find a way to improve the situation of elderly people as suggested by the hon. member for Wellington, we ought to seek to do so by every avenue available to us.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) for again bringing before the House the subject of inflation. I think it is regrettable that no one from his own party or indeed from any other opposition party should have seen fit to support him in this very worth-while endeavour. This is attributable, however, to the economic tunnel-vision that hon. gentlemen opposite enjoy. Now that they have discovered unemployment, they have forgotten inflation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are waiting for your words of wisdom.

Mr. Mahoney: I was trapped into being unprovocative last Friday and I welcome the opportunity this afternoon to stimulate some interest at least in some of the other dimensions of the Canadian economy. The hon. member for Wellington raised a number of questions in his speech, and I would certainly be prepared to resume my seat for a few moments to give him an opportunity to answer some of them. He refers, in his resolution, to "other securities". Before the House could properly deal with the issue he places before us he might wish to give us some idea of what he has in mind when speaking of government securities other than the bounds he specifically mentions.

Other speakers have dealt with his five-year proposal as protection against speculation. I have grave doubt that the holding of these bonds for five years—to use the perpetuals as a specific example, in the light of their tremendous discount today—would ensure against speculation. The hon. member also suggested in his speech that trust companies redeem their debentures at par. I should like to know whether this is a matter of policy or one of contractual obligation on the issuance of these debentures.

The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) commented the insurance feature of government of Canada bonds for the consideration of the finance committee in cases of future financings. However, I would point out that Canada Savings Bonds do indeed have this feature, and the parity feature is not dependent on the death of the registered holder. The insurance of parity feature, to use the term of the hon. member for Don Valley who is familiar with Bay Street jargon, is a sweetener that the government of Canada has used in the case of some bond issues and I am sure will use in others.

Another question raised in my mind relates to his suggestion that the finance committee of the House might profitably have an opportunity to consider this matter. The resolution before the House does not embrace that concept and again I am wondering whether it was the intention of the hon. member that a general reference of this kind should be made to the House of Commons.

Therefore, on the question of other securities, on the question of the adequacy of the five-year holding provision, on the question whether trust companies' redemption of their debentures at par on death regardless of market value is a question of policy for the companies concerned or a matter of contract, and on the question of reference to the finance committee I would be quite prepared to yield the floor immediately and let the hon. member—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I have been following the hon. member for a few minutes, and it is not in order for him to choose an hon. member and ask him questions or to intersperse his speech with questions to any hon. member. The hon. member may accept questions, but I must insist on following the rules. If the hon. member sits down he will have released his right to speak further.

Mr. Hales: I would be very happy to answer the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I am sorry. We have breached the rules badly in the past few years. There is too much verbal intercourse between members on both sides of the House at the wrong time.

Mr. Mahoney: I very much regret even attempting to allow this matter to degenerate from the making of set speeches to a debate.

Mr. Hales: Talk about oil, Pat.

Mr. Stanfield: Surely the promoters of the just society have all these answers.

Mr. Mahoney: We have had the opportunity to consider the matter of inflation for the first time in a long while. Regrettably, hon. members opposite have not chosen to be drawn into the debate, but perhaps they will. I am very sorry that the hon. member for Wellington will not have the opportunity to elucidate further his comments, and I apologize to the Chair for not raising the question when the hon. member himself had the floor.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Mahoney: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of his desire to hear once again from the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) who proposed the motion, does the parliamentary secretary realize that if he were to sit down now the hon. member, by virtue of his having moved the motion, could get the floor again to close the debate?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, I am quite aware of that. However, I should like an opportunity to finish my remarks and this presents us with the dilemma we now face. The question of inflation which is raised by this motion is one that has been of very major concern to the government over the past many months. The hon. member is aware that the consumer price index dropped in December by 0.4 per cent, which is the first such decline between the months of November and December in more than a decade. He will also be aware that the year to year increase in December amounted to 0.5 per cent, the smallest increase since December, 1954. By contrast, the year to year increase in the consumer price index in the United States, taken December to December, amounted to 5.6 per cent. For the year as a whole, consumer prices went up an average of 3.3 per cent in 1969 in Canada compared with an increase of 6 per cent in the United States.

I think that the battle the government has waged against inflation over the past year and a half is one that has been successfully waged. While the hon. member's resolution is well worth considering—and he may rest assured that I will commend it to the finance minister for his consideration—it is one that perhaps is not as timely now as it was a year ago. In fairness to the hon. member, I would be quite prepared to have him answer my questions, but I think the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Danson) has a few comments to make and the hon. member may not have the opportunity.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see the time is short and perhaps I should have spoken on the railway financing bill, which might be a more satisfactory vehicle for expressing oneself. I think the motion of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) is motivated by grave concern and deep compassion. Similar sentiments were expressed by my colleague from Renfrew-Lanark-Carleton (Mr. McBride).

The whole quetion of perpetual bonds in particular is one that concerns all of us. It is a subject on which many of us have received letters from senior citizens who have bought these bonds in good faith and now find their investments are not as worthwhile as they thought at the time. It would be nice to find an easy solution to the problem, though easy solutions usually come from gentlemen on the opposite side to my far right. However, they are not here to speak to this matter. Perhaps this is one of the difficulties in reaching solutions to inflation, among others that have been mentioned during the debate.

One suggestion I had from a correspondent as far back as May, 1969, in regard to these bonds was to allow senior citizens who have held them for a number of years to use them as a deposit on government annuities to supplement their old age pension. From the point of view of compassion I think this is a noble suggestion. If people express the wish to do this and are prepared to accept a discount of 25 per cent or even 30 per cent—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The seventeenth hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair to resume same at eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-186, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1970 to the 30th day of June, 1971, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed for a few minutes more to explain why I am participating in this debate.

It is obvious that the Canadian National is intent on pursuing, at any cost, the centralizing of all its operations. We are being assured that it will thus give better service. We have some doubts regarding this.

Direct transportation of goods from Quebec to Montreal, for instance, will keep several communities or municipalities from growing. Montreal will become still more monstrous, and companies which might have become interested in investing in economically weak regions will not be so anymore, because of difficulties brought about by a lack of railway transportation. There are also numerous other consequences which may sometimes be disastrous.

Good maintenance and operation of railways require the presence of employees in all places. For instance, last year, CNR employees discovered, while going their rounds, that a rail length was cut. So as to avoid accidents and disasters, it is important to decentralize services.

If the revenue of the Canadian National is insufficient, the situation will not be corrected by abolishing such important positions as those of stationmaster or telegraph operator. We must not forget that it is by providing better service that we will increase traffic and make the company's operations more profitable.

The carelessness and unconcern of the Canadian National tend to discourage the population. How perplexing is the fact that roadmen travel by truck on already congested roads rather than move from one place to another by rail. This is all the more inconsistent that in travelling by train, the roadmen could detect and correct minor troubles. Otherwise, the Canadian National just acts as if it were not interested in railroads any more.

What about, for example, the employees who only work eight months a year, while others are hired and paid time and a half and double time and may that way increase their income substantially?

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I come to the conclusion that it is necessary to think it over before making any change which might prove inefficient and useless. If in spite of all, we are to make them, we shall have to take into account the need for finding a fair and just solution for all the employees who have spent part or the whole of their lives serving the Canadian people through the Canadian National Railways. They have worked hard, toiling strenuously and conscientiously, often risking a little and sometimes much of their health.

Trying to get rid of them off-handedly by doing something which to them would mean that they have become useless, or still worse, by sending officials to tell station masters: "Find yourself a job, this station may be closed", that should never be done.

There are two alternatives: freeze these employees' jobs until they reach retirement age or give them the opportunity of retiring after 20, 25 or 30 years of service, whatever their age. Retraining is no longer possible at a given age and depreciating the dignity of these people by using them at odd jobs without any consideration for their qualifications, is absurd and degrading.

Furthermore, the minimum pension, after 20 years' service, should be approximately $500 a month. It is often said that companies are like a body without a soul. In this case, it would be all the more absurd to act inhumanly that it is the Canadian people who pay the cost, and I am convinced that my fellow citizens would be delighted if the problem were solved in a fair and reasonable manner.

Mr. Speaker, we must not forgo human dignity for technological progress, and in the changes considered by the CN, we must examine their human effects, and this is why we must find an immediate solution to this problem, in order to promote good will among all the employees of this Crown corporation.

• (8:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words before this bill goes to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. In general I agree with many of the remarks that were made in the House today by members from all parties. If the CNR and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) would heed some of these remarks, we would be very much further ahead.

I would be remiss if first of all, I did not express a great deal of happinness at the announcement made by the Minister of Transport last Friday that CNR pensioners will be getting a raise in pension which they fully deserve. I am sure that day will go down as one they will long remember. The only thing with which I am somewhat disappointed is the length of time that it took to convince the CNR and the people who have the power that an increase in pension was needed so badly. For many years we saw some retired employees of the CNR living in conditions that were absolutely unnecessary, on a pension that was highly inappropriate, before the CNR realized that something should be done.

The recommendation of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications with regard to people who are already on pension has now been accepted. I, along with others, congratulate the committee for making this unanimous recommendation and for being able to convince the CNR and the Minister of Transport to make the increased pension a reality. Under the new scheme the retired employees will enjoy greater pension benefits. The same will be true with regard to the widows of deceased CNR employees.

I should also like to say that in the future I hope the CNR will be more responsive to the wishes of and recommendations made on behalf of its employees and pensioners than they have in the past. This is something of which they should take heed: they should set an example to other corporations both private and public in dealing with their employees. I think that once senior citizens retire from work they should no longer have to worry about financial problems and they should be able to live in security. These are the people who have laid the foundations of this country, and in western Canada they are the pioneers who opened up the west.

As I said before, I welcome the increase in pensions and the decent break that CNR pensioners will finally have. Many people have suggested that much of the credit should go to the committee which came out with a unanimous recommendation to this effect. I too would like to add my voice to those who have congratulated the committee. But first and foremost I must congratulate the pensioners and employees themselves who for so many years have been determined to put their case forward and have finally convinced the CNR and the minister that they have a case.

In my own constituency there are some 600 CNR employees who have for years petitioned and prepared briefs which they have sent to the CTC, the CNR and the minister. Finally these efforts have paid off. I know that when the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications was meeting and considering making recommendations on the pension, these people were there submitting their briefs. I think they are largely responsible for finally convincing the CNR that they have a case. I would like to join other hon. members, such as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg), in congratulating these people for their determination.

The CNR is a Crown corporation that should be operating to serve the people of this country. A debate such as this gives us an opportunity to look at the different things the CNR is doing or perhaps should be doing to broaden its service in Canada. In the speeches made by hon. members earlier today and on other days many shortcomings have been pointed out. For example, the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) informed the House of many things to which people who sit in the seats of power should listen and take heed.

I myself, coming from Saskatchewan, am very concerned about many of the pressures that are put on the CNR and indeed on the CPR. I am very concerned about the many pressures upon the transportation systems to centralize. Here, of course, I am talking about pressures to abandon rail lines and railroads which are not used as much as are some of the main lines. I am very concerned about the pressure to abandon passenger service in many parts of the Prairies. I am also concerned about the pressure being exerted by the CNR on the CTC to eliminate the station agents in small centres, towns and cities of Saskatchewan.

I am concerned about these things because I think it not only creates a great deal of difficulty for the employees but also the people in rural Saskatchewan and other parts of rural Canada, because it is only expediting what is happening in rural Saskatchewan, that is the movement of people from farms and small towns into cities. All of us who are from that province agree that there are already too many ghost towns in Saskatchewan. What is happening is that a whole way of life is being challenged, and moves such as those contemplated by the CNR or indeed by the CPR only expedite that trend in our province. I think this is a trend that should be reversed.

I would like to spend two or three minutes talking about our general transportation policies and perhaps making a few suggestions as to what should be done. As I watch the people in charge of transportation in Canada today, I cannot help getting the impression that they do not really have an over-all transportation policy. What I see is a piecemeal, ad hoc approach to transportation. We do not have the over-all planning that I think is so necessary in a country as large and as diverse as Canada. I think we must have a national transportation policy with a top priority of being of service to the Canadian people no matter where they live, whether it is in Newfoundland, the Prairies or western Canada. Our transportation policy must be responsive and sensitive to the needs of people in all parts of Canada.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, we must have an efficient transportation system and one that can operate cheaply so that every Canadian, no matter where he lives or what type of money he makes, can use the system any time he so desires. When we evolve a proper transportation system in this country we must keep in mind things such as pollution. The automobiles on the road today are one of the greatest contributors to pollution. When we evolve a proper transportation system it must be one that lessens pollution and not increases it.

It is the duty of Members of Parliament on both sides of the House to keep pressuring the government, the CNR and the CTC to formulate immediately a plan that will intelligently organize and co-ordinate national transportation services in Canada. This must include all types of transportation, not just the railways but automobiles, airplanes, bus transportation and what have you. Perhaps I could spend one or two minutes talking about the problems that are involved in some of these other areas.

The bill before us concerns Air Canada as well as the CNR. In the Prairie provinces a great deal of the air transportation service is provided by regional carriers. I look again to my own constituency for a good example of this. Yorkton is served by a regional carrier. It provides a service, not once a day but maybe four or five times a week. The schedule often changes every three or four months; it is irregular and limited. When you have a whole series of unplanned regional carrier services, you are only asking for inefficiency, you are only asking for something that does not take the needs of each community into consideration. A community the size of Yorkton should have regular, cheap, efficient air service. It doesn't have that today. We should work as rapidly as possible to integrate the regional air carriers with Air Canada. In that way better services could be provided to all communities regardless of their size. We should have one air transportation system in the country. When we have several we are only asking for inefficiency and inferior service.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, my impression is that transportation in Canada today is badly planned. It is provided by different companies on an ad hoc basis. There is a general lack of government control over transportation planning. As I said before, we must evolve a national transportation plan in which the government has influence and where it can take into account all factors and all types of problems. I think we must have a transportation system that is publicly-owned. One transportation system would be more efficient than present arrangements and it would be more responsive to the needs of people. Again I say that I am talking about a publicly-owned transportation system that could be orientated to the service of the people. In that way we could plan according to social priorities and needs.

Once again I welcome the announcement made the other day by the Minister of Transport, bringing into effect the recommendation of the Tranport and Communications Committee pertaining to the pensions of retired employees of the CNR. I suggest to the minister once again that he do something about long-range transportation policy. This is badly needed, not only for the railway system but for the airlines as well. Smaller communities should not be penalized. It is time to integrate the regional carriers into a national system and let Air Canada service the whole country.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to be brief because I know the Government House Leader is anxious to get this bill on its way, and by the attitude of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) I can see that he is probably anxious too. I hope he will be influenced by that anxiety and so restrain himself from his usual observations from his seat.

This is a very important bill, a very important event in the legislative process of any session of Parliament because it gives us an opportunity to voice our frustration at the CNR. I am sorry that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) is not here tonight. I do not see his parliamentary secretary in his seat either. I am sorry because what we have to say about transportation in Canada, especially as it applies to the CNR and Air Canada, should be of importance to them. After all, the minister does have the statutory responsibility of reporting to Parliament for these two Crown corporations.

Canadian National Railways and Air Canada are very important to the Atlantic provinces, and especially important to my province because transportation in Newfoundland in general is Canadian National. Right from the outset of this Parliament we have been concerned following the announcement that rail passenger service in my province was to be eliminated and replaced by road service. We have been pressing for a statement of policy from the government and from Canadian National as to the exact nature of their future plans for Newfoundland, but I am sorry to say that we are still as much in the dark as ever.

Surely it is not too much to expect that Canadian National, which is so important to my part of the country, should be in a position to announce its long-range intentions with respect to the many services it provides. We hear suggestions from the Minister of Transport that continual discussions are taking place with respect to the coastal service in Newfoundland. Indeed, just a few days ago he said he would like to see the coastal service replaced by a more efficient method of transportation. Certainly that is a desirable objective, one with which we all agree, but whether or not it is an attainable objective is something else again. I suspect, and I have long held this belief, that there is a plan within the CNR a plan with a definite time limit, to eliminate the coastal service in Newfoundland and indeed to eliminate railway service in Newfoundland entirely. The events of the last few years certainly indicate this to me.

The railway in Newfoundland today is not as efficient as we would like to see it, yet it still occupies a very important place in the over-all transportation set-up of the province. The coastal service is still very important; it has a vital role to play in providing our people with goods that are so necessary to their way of life around the coast of Newfoundland. Of necessity, these services require substantial public subsidies and will continue to require them. These subsidies should be granted for as long as they are required, provided we as Members of Parliament discharge our obligation during our annual examination on the CN annual report and our annual consideration of this bill to determine whether the service is as efficient as it should be, whether we are getting value for our money and whether we are getting the service that we need. I do not think we are, Sir.

It is a well known fact, for example, that the ferry link between the province of Newfoundland and the mainland is not what it should be. We have often experienced frustration as a result of not having enough accommodation to provide passage for the many tourists who want to visit Newfoundland or for people who either want to visit the province or leave it in their day to day activities. Now, after making repeated representations in this regard, additional ships are to be provided during the peak months of June, July and August.

It is only now that that suggestion, repeatedly made in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, has been given serious consideration. In this respect we were encouraged a few days ago when we heard the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) say in a speech in St. John's that a plan was being devised whereby extra accommodation would be provided during the peak tourist months when the service was not able to cope with the demand for traffic. He did not elaborate exactly what the government has in mind. Perhaps when this bill comes before the committee we shall have an opportunity to question the minister.

I hope the minister will be present in committee. He has not honoured us with his presence in the House during the second reading debate on this very important bill. We want to know what he has in mind with respect to the Newfoundland ferry service which is the life link between Newfoundland and the mainland of Canada. This service is very important to our province from the point of view of the tourist industry, which is assuming greater importance yearly, as well as from the point of view of providing an adequate service for the shipment of goods on a year round basis.

Although we experience peak tourist traffic during the months of June, July and August, the normal traffic still has to be carried across the gulf at the same time. Often this traffic has had to be turned back because accommodation has not been available. We shall wish to question the minister on this question. In this respect, Sir, we were encouraged because the minister told us that the authorities concerned expect to obtain a replacement for the Patrick Morris, a ship which sank in the gulf a few months ago under tragic circumstances. The replacement will have to be brought into service quickly because the tourist season is approaching once more.

May I now say a few words about the m/v Ambrose Shea. How many times have we, both in the House and in committee, had to impress upon the CNR the absolute necessity of promoting this service which could be vital to the tourist industry in my province and which could be a vital transportation link in the over-all structure? We have urged the railway and the minister to promote this service by an imaginative advertising campaign as well as by a reduction in rates. They finally got around to doing just that.

We are gratified that patronage of the service has increased substantially to the point where the service is now certainly justified. Nevertheless, we had to endure three frustrating years during which this service was not advertised. It was not promoted and the fares charged were too high. Even now there is still a case to be made for reducing rates on this east coast of Newfoundland service between Argentina and Sydney for truck traffic, because the rates charged discriminate against trucks. The rates obviously are designed to protect the CN monopoly. That, I think, is unfair and the matter deserves to be considered again.

There are other matters that we are concerned about. One of them is the road cruiser service which has replaced rail passenger service. It is not what it should be. Certainly the buses are providing a service. Statistics indicate that many more people are being carried across Newfoundland by Canadian National buses. The fact remains that it is still a hazardous business to cross Newfoundland by bus in winter, as events of the last few days have dramatically illustrated.

That prompts me to ask this question: Why cannot that CN road cruiser service be supplemented with a rail-liner service? Rail-liner service is to be provided in northern Ontario. There is rail-liner service between Sydney and Truro, Nova Scotia. Why cannot the bus service in Newfoundland be supplemented with this type of rail service, utilizing the tracks across Newfoundland and providing a much more reliable service during the winter months? I offer that as a serious suggestion which I think ought to be examined when this bill is before the committee.

The question of freight rates, Mr. Speaker, is a cause of continuing concern. Since the freeze was lifted, freight rates have continued to rise. The continuing rise in freight rates, naturally, has been passed on to the consumer. The consumer in Newfoundland is already burdened with the highest cost of living in the country. In the final analysis it is the consumer who must pay. We are wondering where this will end and when these increases will level off at a point at which we can say, "This is what we have to cope with." We want assurance from the railway, when this bill is before the committee, that they are not contemplating any additional increases in freight rates to the province of Newfoundland.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is the question of Canadian National hotels. This matter has been raised on a number of occasions in the House. Canadian National hotels are not operating under the minimum wage laws passed by this Parliament. They refuse to recognize the jurisdiction of Parliament with respect to minimum wages. This matter, I understand, is now the subject of a court hearing in one of the provinces of this country. That the minimum wage laws of this country, as defined by Parliament which has jurisdiction in this area and which has set the minimum wage at $1.65, are not recognized by Canadian National hotels is, to me, a cause of great concern. I think this matter ought to be reviewed by the Transport Committee. I know it is a matter of great concern to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) who has taken great interest in it.

A serious situation has developed across the country which affects unions involved with the CN hotels system. At this time of year the unions are normally negotiating new contracts. At present they find themselves in the position of saying, "Well, we really cannot sign any contract because we must await the decisions of the court and the federal government in the matter of the minimum wage laws of the country." In my province, Newfoundland, CN operates a hotel. In St. John's, the employees of the CN hotel are receiving less and in some cases, considering the number of hours they have to work, considerably less than the minimum wage of $1.65 an hour that has been established by Parliament. This area of concern I think is most serious.

These hotels are, in effect, owned by the people of Canada and they should be governed by the minimum wage laws of Canada. We shall expect the officials of the railway, when they appear before us in the committee, to tell us why this cannot be done. I understand the Chateau Laurier hotel has recognized the minimum wage and that as a result of the new contract arrangements none of the employees are receiving less than the federal minimum wage of $1.65 an hour.

If this can apply to the Chateau Laurier hotel in Ottawa, why cannot it apply to CN hotels across the country? Rates are very much the same; the traffic is very much the same. In the case of the hotel in Newfoundland, I know for a fact that it is operating at capacity most of the time. I do not know what the situation is at present, but I recall that for a period it was one of the few CN hotels across the country operating in the black. I shall want to hear good arguments on the part of the company in support of its contention that it cannot pay the minimum wage in all its hotels.

Perhaps the officials will tell us that the whole matter is sub judice because it is before the courts. I am not prepared to accept this argument because the matter before the court concerns only one hotel in one province of Canada. I want to know about the situation in all the CN hotels, not only in Alberta where CN is currently contesting the right of the unions to expect the company to honour the minimum wage law.

Before resuming my seat I should like to refer to our national airline. Service is not as it should be. Generally we are proud of Air Canada but there are regions where service has deteriorated. We shall place before the airline evidence which I think will show that there has been in some regions a falling off in service. A contributing factor is the morale of the staff which today is at an all-time low. The ground personnel are insecure; they do not know from one day to the next whether or not their jobs will be there. In my own province of Newfoundland—and I speak from personal contact with these people—they are discouraged and demoralized. There have been lay-offs and there are rumours that there will be additional lay-offs. How can people who have chosen careers for themselves with Air Canada operate efficiently in such an atmosphere and contribute to providing the service for which the airline had a unique reputation? Hon. members will note that I used the past tense—"had".

I do not believe the argument that the reduction in staff stems from a general appraisal of the airline industry throughout North America is a valid one. Air Canada is not an airline like the others. It is publicly-owned; it belongs to the people of Canada. The people have the right to expect the good service they always had from Air Canada, and I believe they have the right to expect the airline to treat its employees fairly and not to hold this cloud of uncertainty over their heads. I have tried to get the Minister of Transport to reassure us in this regard, and we shall endeavour in committee to get some assurance from the airline that they have reached the end of their lay-offs.

One does not have to leave Ottawa to know what is happening. Ground personnel are being moved from Ottawa to Montreal ostensibly to centralize the reservations and ticket service and make it more efficient. I wonder if efficiency is not being used as cover to justify further staff reductions. A number of those employed by Air Canada are not bilingual, just as there are many millions in this country who do not have the advantage of speaking both of Canada's official languages. I am wondering exactly how serious this factor is in influencing the decision to move the reservation and passenger service from Ottawa to Montreal. A definite statement should be forthcoming from the airline making clear what its intentions are and explaining how it proposes to justify this move.

Finally, a case could be made for eliminating some of the costly services. For example, I find it difficult to justify the first-class service provided on domestic lines. I think this is a useless appendage and a waste of money. Most of the airlines flying domestic routes in North America have eliminated first-class service. A case can be made for it on transAtlantic, transPacific or transcontinental routes, but in the case of domestic runs within the country it is ridiculous to maintain two-class service. This is one way in which the airline could reduce operating costs and increase its revenues.

I say once again that it is a frustrating experience to have to go through this exercise once a year. As Members of Parliament in the discharge of our responsibility we are bound to voice our concern, make our recommendations and offer our criticisms of the airline and of the railway in the process of examining this financial bill. After all, this is what we are here for and this is where it should be done, while we are in the process of voting funds for the operation of these two important Crown corporations.

It is a matter of regret that neither the Minister of Transport nor his parliamentary secretary are here. They should be here. They should listen to the observations which Members of Parliament have to make in the course of this debate. They should themselves take part in the debate, examine the observations which have been made and where possible make announcements of the government's intentions with respect to these important matters.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, every year we are faced with the problem of bailing the national railway out with this finance bill. It is funny that no one has suggested that the debate be curtailed just to financial matters.

An hon. Member: Don't give them ideas.

Mr. Peters: Changes have been made which are advantageous. I do not wish to discuss those changes except to say they are long overdue. We are all pleased that there has been a change in the pension plan. One of my hon. friends asked why the government had waited so long. He has been here only a year or so, but my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has been here forever, says this is a matter he has been raising here forever. So the wheels grind very slowly where the CNR are concerned. They could probably look to us in the same way because their financing has been long delayed.

The cost of operating Canadian National Railways has always been influenced by its freight and transportation structure. I recall that last year Parliament financed the payment of interest of $40 million due on the original purchase price of the railway. Although Canadian National Railways can legitimately look to Parliament to do something about getting its house in order, I suggest that the money that has been paid CN should be transferred to the national debt account rather than remaining a liability in the financial structure of the railway.

I am sure that as Your Honour listens to the speeches made by many members you ask yourself why we are paying $40 million in interest. A few weeks ago all the members from northern Ontario stood up in the House and asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to give consideration to hearing representations from people in the communities of northern Ontario whose rail service was going to be curtailed. The minister said that this was a good idea and that he would consider the matter; but a couple of days later he had to come back to the House and tell us that he was sorry, it could not be done because he really did not have authority to do it. Nevertheless, he said, he had been assured by the CTC that they would consider the matter.

Since we are paying this kind of money, Mr. Speaker, is it not time that we had control of this transportation facility? I have said many times that really we do not own it, it is not nationalized. We are now debating the debt structure of CN, a matter that the government has reluctantly but finally decided to examine. If the government does not, then I am sure the bill will not pass Parliament; that one day Canadian National will be left with the burden of a $40 million debt, they will not be able to operate their lousy railway and Canadians may find they can get along without it—which is what people in many areas are doing now.

Since I have been a Member of Parliament I have travelled from North Bay to Ottawa on trains Nos. 7 and 8 which were recently withdrawn. These trains came into northern Ontario with a sleeper and went as far as Swastika, where they picked up passengers from Noranda and northern Quebec. Then they serviced the Timmins area, Cochrane and Hearst. At that point they picked up a sleeper of Ontario Northland and then went on to Montreal.

These trains 7 and 8 offered good accommodation and were well patronized. But then CN began charging Ontario Northland too much money to haul its sleeper and the railway considered that it was not worth while. Whatever the reason, they decided the proposition was too expensive. As a result you had to sit up travelling across northern Quebec and northern Ontario until you got to North Bay. You arrived there at around one or two in the morning, depending on weather, and then you could board the sleeper which would get you to Ottawa about seven o'clock in the morning, in time for you to shave and even have breakfast.

I remember when there were meals available on the train. Then they only offered lunches and finally there were no meals available and no beds. They almost got to the point of having no seats. The train consisted of coaches that came out of the ark. I remember saying at the time that the train would soon be withdrawn because it would not pay. The train had nothing to offer; there was no accommodation to sell.

Many of the communities of northern Ontario were built along the railway and depend upon it for their very existence. The Minister of Tourism and Information of the province of Ontario, hon. James Auld, had this to say in regard to the dropping of these two trains:

> In our northwestern Ontario administrative district there are a total of 56 establishments located along the line. Six of these are primarily dependent on CNR rail service.
> In northeastern Ontario, there are 208 establishments along the line. Eighteen of these are heavily dependent on rail service.
> If the rail service is reduced or discontinued, the majority of these 24 establishments which depend on the trains for transportation of guests and supplies will find it very difficult to survive.
> Some of the establishments which are adjacent to the line but are less dependent on the rail services may also find their businesses damaged. These tourist camps are more fortunate in that they have other means of access with most of their clientele arriving by road or air.
> My field staff has also noted that cottagers and tourists use these rail services for transportation to and from Parry Sound and Toronto.
> The department is making the strongest recommendation that the CNR must recognize and fulfil its responsibilities to the tourist establishments and communities along the rail line.

I suggest that will get the minister nowhere, Mr. Speaker. If rail service is gradually withdrawn, then the number of passengers using the service will decrease by about the same percentage. It is Parkinson's law in reverse. I presume that if you do not offer the accommodation you will not get the passengers. Certainly that is true of transportation. I suggest there are very few people who do a lot of travelling who would not think twice about travelling by train if the accommodation were adequate and they were able to reach their destination at a reasonable hour. They would prefer this to travelling by automobile or aircraft.

This afternoon one hon. member told the House about getting on a train to go to Montreal and not being told that the line had been closed as a result of an accident further up the line. What does the railway care what the passengers think? The railway get their money just the same—provided the passengers do not walk, of course. If they do decide to walk and have paid for their ticket, then there is no station at which they can reclaim their money anyway. The railways could not care less. But surely some Members of Parliament care. They know that rail transportation can be provided in many areas much more economically than building additional highways.

In northern Ontario the roads are crowded with transports towing a trailer, and in some cases two trailers, loaded with lumber. It would be much easier to load this lumber into freight cars and dispatch it by rail. The other day I was talking to a buyer from Boston and he told me that he thought lumber supplies would be scarce in about a year's time. As a result, he was going out to British Columbia and also visiting northern Quebec and Ontario in order to cement his business relationships. He had his wife with him and was touring around. During our discussion he told me he never considered rail as a method of transporting lumber unless it had to travel a long way—for example, from British Columbia. But he would not think of sending it by rail from northern Quebec. I think the railways should reflect on the fact that here is a buyer of lumber, a broker who orders hundreds of thousands of carloads of lumber but does not consider shipping it from northern Quebec by rail.

I suggest that the rail transportation system has got into disrepute because of the way the companies treat the people. They treat them in the same way they treat freight. Recently a number of members from northern Ontario were asked to meet officials of Canadian National Railways. I attended the meeting. Those officials told us that everything was going to be all right and that the problems were going to be solved. We were informed that a service centre was to be established at Barrie. They did not tell us that as a result of the establishment of this service centre nine people employed at Capreol were going to be out of jobs.

We were informed that the CNR intended to establish a computer centre in order that reservations could be made through the computer system. We were not told about the lay-off of the nine people in that community, which cannot afford lay-offs because it depends upon the CNR for its economy. Anyone who has attempted to make travel arrangements through a computer system knows that such a system is not as good as it is made out to be. In spite of that fact, the CNR intends to remove these nine people from its service in the area. I suggest that if those nine people spoke French, they would not be removed; they would be given a grant in order that they might stay there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: Hon. members may laugh, but I can tell them that in my area there is a small cafe which has received a government grant of $2,500 on the basis that its employees speak only French. I suspect that if those nine individuals spoke only French they would be given a grant to keep them in Capreol.

Not only should this House be considering the finances of the CNR but it should be considering nationalizing Canadian Pacific Railway. It is my opinion that these two railway companies cannot supply two separate passenger services across this country. I suggest they will be very hard pressed to provide passenger service on the basis of one operation. Let me refer to a letter from Alan Lawrence in which he suggests that the Ontario Northland Railway take over passenger service in Ontario. I suggest this as an alternative. It may be a good one. I realize that this is a little beyond your area, Mr. Speaker, but the Go train is a government train which moves out as far as Pickering, and I expect it will move to the Kingston area and eventually connect up with Montreal. It will be a streetcar type of operation.

I suggest that the service which is being provided on both sides of Toronto is very effective, and it is not being provided by the CNR but by the Ontario government. For years we have been trying to buy one of the Canadian National lines but they have been asking an exorbitant price. This is little like the story of the dog in the manger. The CNR does not want to operate it itself, and it does not want anybody else to operate it for fear someone else might make it a success.

A man in Toronto can charter a train to North Bay. He can make enough money on sales in that area that he can pay for the cost of that service and make a contribution to a charitable organization. If Canadian National and Canadian Pacific do not want to operate a passenger service, let the officials come before a parliamentary committee and say so. In that way we can find an alternative. Let us find such an alternative before we have no passengers.

Had it not been for the centennial year service many of our young people may never have known what train service is all about. Many of these young people travelled on the trains on which customary accommodation was made available. Those trains operated satisfactorily, and I believe there is still a sufficient number of travelling public to make such service effective and efficient. We set up the Canadian Transportation Commission to perform this service, but it has failed. That commission has been seduced by the officials of Canadian Pacific and Canadian National and we are paying for that seduction.

I am sure many members of this House represent communities which are dependent on rail service. Surely they have suggestions to improve efficiency. If the CPR and the CNR do not want to operate passenger services, let us set up a transportation facility that will operate those services. We will not expropriate their lines; we will damn well run over them and they will maintain them. I am sure they will maintain them in a condition safe for freight transportation. In that event we can run passenger trains over them without derailment, because passenger trains do not carry the same weight. Let us set up the passenger service. I am sure it could be operated efficiently.

What I have said about the CNR and the CPR applies equally to air transportation in this country. The computer system works very well for Air Canada, but if I want to be sure of a reservation—I admit this is pretty stupid—I get in touch with the small airport at Earlton, Ontario, where two men handle the whole operation. They used to have a little box in which they dropped a card to confirm my reservation on a flight. I think that system has been removed in the last few months because Air Canada has gone honky-tonk in this area. Even if I get in touch with the special people in Parliament who look after air travel reservations, I often find myself on a flight where two extra passengers are booked. The powers that be in this case offer a free meal to anybody who will get off and wait for the next flight. This is the type of service we get from the computer system and this is one reason for the trouble in which airlines find themselves today.

Many airports in Canada can accommodate small aircraft of the type Air Canada will apparently be operating in five years. These airports should be servicing air transportation to many communities. Obviously they cannot accommodate the stretched DC-8 jet. We should have better air service. If we are to improve the service we should not start by subsidizing the kind of service now in existence. Let us bring all the airlines in Canada under one agency to provide the best service possible. We have only 21 million people in this country, yet we probably have more internal flight routes than any other country with the exception of Russia. We cannot carry on the type of air service the people of Canada demand, with the proliferation of airlines that we have. We should not have an increasing number of regional routes.

Having in mind this entire transportation problem, we must look at the over-all picture. There is no more logical time to look at transportation in Canada than now, when we are discussing the finances of Canadian National Railways. Last year every Canadian paid $2 in subsidy to this system. Most of these Canadians could not go down to the station and buy a ticket on a train because a train did not run through the local station. The government can play around, as it obviously does, but it will eventually have to face up to the need for efficient transportation in this country. Perhaps it will not face up to this problem on an over-all basis, but I am sure the people will not wait much longer before raising a great fuss. They will not wait until trains Nos. 7 and 8 are taken off, and they will not wait until the transcontinental passenger service is done away with before making a fuss about the system.

I think we should sit down and design a new transportation facility for the rural areas which will meet the conditions of the 1970s. Hopefully, we will be smart enough to develop the kind of transportation policy which is required to meet the needs of the 1980s. I suggest that rail travel in Canada will be required for years. Air transportation will become more important as the years go by, but we will find that as air transportation increases there will be a resurgence of need for ground transportation. This will represent an economic means of transportation to the major centres of population.

We will need that kind of transportation and we in parliament are not doing anything about it. We are letting the CNR make small deals and arrangements where they say, "Never mind the nine people. We will be working toward efficiency. We will drop these people or move them to a major centre and thus provide a better service". If I am being billed for freight that I have received, I as a consumer am not really interested whether my account comes from Capreol or from Toronto, and I am not really interested whether I get it this week, next week or even next month. I think that CN economists are not producing anything for the Canadian people and they are certainly not reducing the size of the debt that we are discussing.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the CNR and Air Canada are asking Parliament to approve, according to my calculations, some $500 million to take care of the service that they intend to offer to the Canadian nation in the next year or so. I find it difficult to think nationally, for two reasons. The first is that Newfoundland has only been part of the Canadian nation for 21 years, and the second is that we have so many problems in Newfoundland that they tend to occupy our full time. So I will speak very briefly on the CNR and Air Canada as their services relate to Newfoundland.

My opinion of how these services treat Canada's newest province is already on the record. I spoke in the same debate last year and the year before, when the whole matter was regarded pretty unanimously as a joke. But I think the message is getting through to many of our colleagues, including many of our Liberal colleagues who at that time did not regard the matter too seriously, that these Crown corporations are using us as guinea pigs and that now the sore is festering all across Canada. As I said, I am on record in the House as well as at the meetings of the Committee on Transport and Communications and in the files of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson).

In Newfoundland today, as everybody is aware, there is no rail passenger service. But we have a bus service which in no way fills the need for public transportation. The bus service is not safe—this has been proven; it is not comfortable—which anybody who has driven any distance can attest to; and it is certainly not dependable—which can be affirmed by many people who set out on Wednesday and did not get to their destination on Friday and maybe not even then.

After a couple of years of operation, this service does not even offer the amenity of a drink of cold water during the course of a 550-mile journey. I would not like to be accused of making puns or playing on words, but I do not think it would be unfair for me to say that the evidence is piling up that this service is not suited to the travel needs of Newfoundlanders, at least during the winter months. To substantiate my point that the evidence is piling up, I have here a press story of April, 1969, with a picture which shows the Expedo, the cream of the crop of the CN bus transportation service in Newfoundland, lying on its side, almost over on its back, over a six-foot embankment. That happened within a month or so of the commencement of the bus service. The driver cannot be blamed. The story says:

> A spokesman for the RCMP said the bus apparently met another vehicle while rounding a turn in the highway and in swerving to miss the other vehicle slipped off the road and overturned down a six-foot embankment. It was snowing at the time.

There is lots of snow in Newfoundland and there are lots of curves and embankments. However, this is not the only example and it makes me fear for the safety of the many Newfoundlanders who are using this service. This service has only been in operation for two years at the most. Another press items reads:

Extensive damage was caused to a Canadian National bus early Tuesday when it skidded off the Trans-Canada highway near Notre Dame junction. The driver and five male passengers were uninjured.

It becomes all too evident as we go along that the CN is operating and has operated this service in Newfoundland since its inception on pure, sheer, absolute luck—and thank God for their luck. There was an interesting little editorial in the Daily News following the last accident. It is headed "The Bus that Overturned" and reads:

It is both natural as well as inevitable that any accident to a Canadian National bus must cause some comment and anxiety. This is particularly true among those who are far from convinced that the substitution of buses for passenger trains meets all the conditions for safety that is desirable in public transport, particularly under winter conditions.

There were only the driver and five adult male passengers on the bus that overturned near Notre Dame junction and all came out unscathed. But it might have been another matter if the bus had been fully occupied.

Statistics indicate that buses have become a popular means of travel and, to the extent that valid comparisons are possible, have been carrying twice as many passengers as the passenger trains in an equivalent period. They are faster and operate on more convenient time schedules.

But public safety is the primary consideration and road conditions at certain times are far from adequate. When an accident occurs, an inquiry should be held immediately to determine causes. At the same time the transport authorities ought to have a good hard look at the means by which recurrences of this kind of mishap can be prevented.

Apparently that editorial did not do much good, because despite many requests from me and my colleagues to the minister to have these bus accidents investigated, I think I am safe in saying that I have not received a report although they were always promised. I was told, "We will look into this and that immediately". I have heard my colleagues ask the same question but I doubt that they have received any answers. I do not have a file of all the accidents. These are just some I happened to pick up. This is a headline from the Western Star of April 4, 1970, "Storm Hits West Coast; Buses, Truck off Road." In part the article reads:

• (9:20 p.m.)

Two CN buses—515 westward and 502 eastbound—were blown off ice-coated roads between Port aux Basques and Tompkins early Friday, but a company spokesman said no one was injured. Three other buses made it through without damage despite winds of 80 miles an hour, gusting to 100, that lashed the stretch of road leading to Port aux Basques.

Passengers from the ditched buses were transferred to other vehicles, and one of the buses eventually got back on the road. The other, however, was still in the ditch late Friday afternoon.

Two transfer trucks and a number of automobiles were reported also off the road because of the high winds.

It is not the fault of the drivers; it is not the fault of the buses; it is the fault of the CN that would inflict this sort of service on the Newfoundland people.

A CN spokesman said that no thought had been given to cancelling services but added that late night buses would not pass over the dangerous stretch unless winds had subsided.

Canadian National Railways

Bully for the CN! Here is another clipping from just before Christmas. The headline reads "Two CN Buses Involved in Separate Accidents." The story appeared in the St. John's Evening Telegram of December 21, and reads in part:

Two Canadian National road-cruisers received only slight damage during the weekend in separate traffic accidents.

There were no injuries and both buses are back in service.

A CN spokesman said an eastbound bus was blown partially off the road Friday morning on the Trans-Canada Highway at Wreckhouse, about 20 miles east of Port aux Basques. The 80 miles per hour winds blew the front end of the bus into a ditch but the rear of the bus stayed on the road.

The second accident occurred Saturday evening near Rushy Pond, just west of Grand Falls.

The spokeman said the driver of the bus was forced to strike two cars, parked on the side of the Trans-Canada Highway. He said the two cars which had a snowmobile between them were parked on the side and the driver was unable to swing out around them because of oncoming traffic.

By sheer luck, some of our Newfoundland people were not injured or killed. One of the most recent accidents concerned a bus carrying 28 passengers. I referred this story to the Minister of Transport and hon. members thought I was joking. On December 3 a bus with 28 passengers ran over an embankment. Any hon. member who wants to see a photograph of what occurred can come to me and I will show him one. Luckily, there were a few birch trees there, and the photograph shows this bus suspended over the majestic Exploits River in Newfoundland. Just a few flimsy birch trees saved it from falling into the river. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, this is not a joke. In answer to my question the minister said that he once had been held up in a train for three or four days. I asked him if he had ever been held suspended over the Exploits River in a train. Those 28 people had a miraculous escape.

Many of these incidents are never reported in the press. I know of some from my own personal knowledge. I was at the CN bus station at Grand Falls not too long ago when a driver came in from the west coast with a bus full of passengers. I do not blame the driver, but he was terrified. The Trans-Canada Highway is very narrow, especially in wintertime, and he had just lost a mirror from the side of the bus. He was driving at 60 miles an hour when a big transport truck whizzed by at 70 miles an hour and cleared the mirror clean off the side of the bus. The truck didn't stop. The driver was terrified. A matter of a few more inches and there could have been disaster. Mr Speaker, anyone who makes light of this account that I am giving should make himself known in this chamber.

The Minister of Transport, our so-called Newfoundland representative in the cabinet, just a couple of weeks ago treated very cavalierly the last incident which was brought to his attention. A CN bus had been lost for some 12 hours in a Newfoundland snowstorm. The passengers had no water aboard, no food, no chance to sleep and no communication with the outside world. The story had it, although it is not included in the press report, that another bus went next morning to look for it and it, too, became lost for three or four hours.

I do not look forward within the next month or few months to being in the position where I stand in this House, point my finger across at the Minister of Transport and say, "I told you so." But I very much fear that if this bus service is continued during the winter months regardless of weather conditions, we in Newfoundland will be faced with a tragedy and somebody will have to answer to the Newfoundland people, bearing in mind that during 70 years of operation by the Newfoundland Railway, and later Canadian National, they never lost a passenger. So far the bus service has not lost a passenger, but this is by sheer, absolute luck.

When we raise our voices about this matter to our own Newfoundland minister he accuses us of being antiquated. I forget his exact reference, but he said we were back in the days of Noah and very glibly and blandly referred to the ark. He said we were advocating the retention of an antiquated train service. We were not supporting the retention of an antiquated train service; we were suggesting that the service be upgraded. The minister told us that we were out of step with progress. The photographs and the news stories I have here—is that the progress we are supposed to accept? If this is progress, then somebody has his wires crossed and I suggest it is the minister. We do not have any objection to a bus service. Of course we want a bus service. But when it is the only means of public transportation for a 550-mile journey across our province, we say that although it may do a fine job in the summer, during winter it is extremely perilous, and if continued will end in tragedy.

Just a few days ago on January 29 we received a report from the Canadian Transport Commission. This one is signed by Mr. Pickersgill himself, Jolly Jack. He did not sign a similar order agreeing to the discontinuance of our passenger service, but he did sign this one. It concerned an application from Canadian Pacific to discontinue "The Canadian". In the report appears this line "...that this historic service could not be abruptly discontinued." They turned down this application, Mr. Speaker. "The Canadian" is a historic train. They said they could not think of its being discontinued summarily or abruptly; that would not be good enough. I ask, what about the historic trains in Newfoundland that served the people so well? Canadian National have provided a bus service that will kill half the people of Newfoundland if they ever use it. That proposal is just nonsense.

Since the bus system was instituted it has become apparent that Canadian National have allowed railbeds to deteriorate in Newfoundland. That is pretty well recognized. I cannot quote all the instances of derailment of freight trains during the last year or so. Recently I personally have seen more freight cars and the merchandise they contain strewn over the Newfoundland countryside than I have ever seen in my life. It seems that the attitude has been something like this: Well, passengers are not using the service anymore; we need only worry about five, six or seven trainmen or enginemen.

[Mr. Peddle.]

There does not seem to be very much regard for their lives. I have clippings before me from last year's newspapers. One says that four 175-ton CN diesels were derailed two miles east of Deer Lake. Another asks, "Is this a parking lot?" It says that four tank cars were strewn across the railway tracks and that 300 feet of rail were torn up. Another says there was a large derailment near Corner Brook. The local St. John's newspaper has taken the cry up in an editorial. Since the editorial sums up what ought to be said, I shall read it in its entirety:

> Last week the CNR had a bad derailment near Deer Lake with 11 cars, including four diesels, going off the tracks. As things go at the railway, this was not an unusual item of news, for derailments are fairly common with the CNR in Newfoundland. What was different about this accident was that it came so soon after the change in the method of maintaining the tracks.
> In January, the railway announced that it was laying off 67 sectionmen in favor of a new mechanical system of doing their work. The sectionmen were employed on the old method of a detailed and constant survey of the track, using speeders to cover the part of the track assigned to them. The men were available at all hours of the night and day and during or after a storm they would be out on the line making sure that everything was in order for the trains coming through.
> In many ways the sectionmen were the unsung heroes of the railway, for with them lay the responsibility of keeping the track up to safe standards, regardless of weather or time. But now the railway has turned to a new system which puts track maintenance on a more centralized, directed process, using special closed and comfortable maintenance cars to move the work gang to the areas needing repairs.
> This may be in keeping with modern technology but as far as things like track maintenance are concerned, it is hard to beat the devotion and individual attention of the totally involved workers such as the sectionmen were reputed to be.
> The run-off near Deer Lake will probably cost the CNR over $250,000 in parts, repair work and time lost by the diesels, an amount which would have paid a lot of work hours for the sectionmen. It will also help to reinforce mainland opinion that it is not economically possible to run a railway in this province. And that kind of thinking may lead to the abandonment of the entire system.
> The CNR is a Crown corporation and gets a lot of its money from the public purse. In accidents of this kind the enquiry should be public. The railway may not always be as lucky with its accidents; another accident of this kind may lead to the deaths of the engine gang. That is why it is essential that the public have the full assurance that everything is being done to maintain the tracks in a safe condition. A public enquiry into accidents is one way to see that this is being done.

It is useless asking for a public inquiry. We have asked for it and have been told, "Yes, it is coming." My colleague for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has already referred to the ferry service betwen North Sydney and Port aux Basques and I see no purpose in repeating what he said so well. I should, however, like to mention the CN coastal service which serves the Labrador coast and parts of my riding. Just before Christmas a CN coastal vessel loaded with 300 tons of supplies for the Goose Bay area became blocked in ice that was not anticipated, and had to return without delivering the merchancise.

I maintained then, and I still maintain, that although Canadian National might not have been under a legal obligation to deliver the goods, it ought to have assumed its moral obligation in the same way Air Canada accepts its obligation to deliver its passengers. Sometimes you may leave the aircraft and spend a night in a hotel at the expense of Air Canada. You may end up on a bus or on a train but you will arrive at your destination. They will get you there. I think Canadian National was obligated in this regard to deliver merchandise that had been accepted in good faith from shippers, that had been shipped in good faith and that had been ordered by the consignees in good faith. That moral obligation to deliver was completely ignored. Now, just because it happens to be election year in Newfoundland, the government in Newfoundland has decided that it will take on the obligation of delivering such merchandise and it will deliver it, if you like, via Air Canada; they will use Air Canada. The Newfoundland will pay that airline to fulfil the obligation which had rested on Canadian National.

I can only say that I will not say anything about Air Canada at this time. May I add my voice to those who are urging the Minister of Transport to start making decisions and to come up with his regional air policy. Let him enunciate the policy that he is always referring to, so that we shall know where we are going and by what means. I cannot urge the minister too strongly at this point, especially since he has talked about this policy so long, to make his decision and bring forward his policy. Let us have it.

If it were not a gesture—and I have no desire to delay the House—I would move an amendment. I will not do that. Nevertheless, the amendment that I would have moved if my moving of it were not a gesture, would be that the amount requested by CNR and Air Canada be reduced to $1—if I had my way it would be even less—and not increased until such time as CNR and Air Canada decide to live up to their responsibilities in Canada's newest province.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss in my duty if I were to allow this debate to end without making a few comments on the operations of the CN in my province and specifically in my riding. My riding of St. John's West is very much concerned about the operations of the CN; a large number of people in the area depend on employment with the company to make a living. Of course, the story of the great train robbery in Newfoundland in 1969 has been told many times in this House. Indeed, tonight my hon. friend from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) spoke at length concerning the system with which we now have to contend in Newfoundland, that is, a bus passenger service inaugurated by Canadian National to replace the traditional passenger service which we enjoyed in the province for so long.

Certain aspects of the story of the abandonment of rail passenger service in Newfoundland bear repeating. Most hon. members, I am sure, will recall that during the debate on the railway financing bill in 1969 members on this side of the House urged the government and the CTC to reconsider the abandonment of rail passenger service in Newfoundland. My hon. friends and I, supported by the vast majority of our fellow Newfoundlanders, objected very strongly to the proposed bus service on the grounds that neither the terrain nor the climatic conditions of the province would lend themselves to such a service. Today, with just two winters behind us, we find that our fears were justified. My hon. friend from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador pointed out that there have been several accidents, several near-tragedies. On one occasion a bus disappeared with all its passengers for some 12 hours.

When the debates took place concerning the abandonment of our rail service we were the butt of jokes by hon. members opposite who were amused by our antics, as they called them, in our efforts to retain that which was our own.

An hon. Member: Even the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Carter: Even the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). We now find they are laughing on the other side of their faces because hardly a day passes when we do not hear complaints from them about the proposed abandonment of rail passenger services in their own provinces. This is extremely serious. We in Newfoundland were the guinea pigs in a plan by the CN to abolish its rail passenger service.

I endorse the comments of my hon. friend from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) when he referred to the efforts of the CN to downgrade the coastal boat service in Newfoundland. It is obvious to even the smallest child in Newfoundland that Canadian National is deliberately downgrading this service and discouraging patronage with a view to eliminating the service. I would not be at all surprised to learn that this is their intention also with regard to the hotel service in St. John's. I should like the minister to give us an assurance in the committee that it is not intended to downgrade the hotel service in Newfoundland or to downgrade the coastal boat service. I want him to assure us that the company will make every effort to improve these services, thereby assuring their success.

I should like to refer now to the CN dock facilities in St. John's. This dock is a major contributor to the economy of my riding; indeed, it is a major contributor to the economy of Newfoundland generally. But I feel that the full potential of this dock and the full potential of St. John's as the so-called service station of the Atlantic is not being realized because of inadequate facilities at the dock. We have tradesmen working at the dock who are second to none in Canada, men of long service and training who can take their place alongside any in the country. But they are handicapped because of the antiquated system employed and the indifference shown by the CN in the docking facilities.

I have been told by officials that almost weekly a large volume of business is turned away from the facility, enough to give full employment to all the people working there plus a large number of others who could be engaged. I urge the Minister of Transport, and Canadian National, to realize the full potential of the St. John's harbour and take advantage of the strategic position we have as the service station of the Atlantic, so as to maintain full employment there all the year round and, indeed, to increase employment thereby improving the economic position of the area as a whole.

I am not satisfied with what is happening in my province with regard to Canadian National; I am not satisfied with what is happening in Canada. I get the impression that the only role a member of Parliament has to play with regard to Canadian National is as a rubber stamp when they come to this House asking for financial assistance. But when it comes to representations for a better service or for a service to be maintained, our pleas fall on deaf ears. I do not enjoy being a rubber stamp. I think the railway company has a responsibility to pay more attention to our pleas in this House. When we make a legitimate complaint or a considered suggestion, I believe it is incumbent on the company to study that complaint or suggestion and, if possible, to implement it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Carter: I am not too happy with the method Canadian National is using in the city of St. John's to dispose of damaged goods arriving at the terminal. I am sure I echo the views of a large number of people, especially CN employees, when I say that a new system should be devised instead of the present monopolistic method of disposal. These goods in the course of a year amount to a very considerable sum and should be disposed of in a more equitable way than at present.

In closing, I strongly suggest that the minister appear before the committee where we shall have a lot of question to ask him. As my colleague from St. John's East has already said, we shall be asking him questions in relation to Hotel Newfoundland, CN coastal services in the province, their bus passenger service and other aspects of their operations in our province, indeed in all of Canada.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part briefly in this debate. I shall keep my eye on the clock and I assure the government House leader that I will leave time for the second reading that he is so anxious this bill should receive. Bill C-186 provides financial assistance for the operations of CNR. One of the operations that will be financed is the servocentre program and I rise to speak about this since it vitally affects parts of the area I represent. A new servocentre is to be established in the city of Brantford and will serve my area. When this centre is completely in operation, all the present station facilities at Courtland, Delhi, Simcoe, Jarvis, Cayuga, Hagersville and Caledonia will be discontinued, with consequent loss of employment.

The first concern I have is for the quality of service that will be available to municipalities formerly served by these stations. Much has been said this evening about computers. The servocentre is to be a streamlined service, much of the work being done by computers. A few nights ago one member of the House spoke about results produced by computers, which were pretty well summed up in the phrase "Gigi", which means "Garbage in-garbage out". In view of the results produced by the computer of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, I am sure we would all agree that a great deal of garbage comes out. Members on both sides of the House are continually trying to unravel the mistakes made by this computer. I have the same reservations about a computer that will allocate railway cars and answer questions asked by people using railway facilities in the area about which I have just spoken.

Station masters, station agents and assistants will no longer be employed and thus passengers will be robbed of the personal touch. After all, who can better solve passengers' problems than the man on the job who is familiar with local situations? Now these problems will be solved by a clerk sitting in an office in Brantford, 25 to 30 miles away, and one can imagine the snafu that will result when he tries to locate a railway car that should have been let off at the town of Delhi but ends up at Caledonia, 40 miles away. We can all see the shipper concerned biting his nails, wanting to get the car loaded and his product on its way.

The other cause for concern is the fate of the men who will be displaced by this new program. We want to know what is going to happen to the railway station agents. Will they, as I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) a few days ago during the question period, retain their seniority, their pension privileges and so on? I suppose the answer will be yes, that work will be found for them somewhere. But let us remember that they have established homes in the municipalities they now serve. These men are going to be asked to drive up to 40 miles to sit at a desk if they want to retain their employment with CN. These are the two problems I see arising from the servocentre program: first, the quality of service to the community; second, the effect of the program on present employees.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) said to me that if I can convince the House, and particularly the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission, that rail transportation is still a realistic and basic ingredient of the transportation system of this country, I should run for the leadership of my party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Skoberg: As long as the present incumbent is chairman of the commission, I realize that this would be impossible. With that I take my seat.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, could we have the business for tomorrow from the government House leader?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the government organization bill. After consultation with House leaders tomorrow it may be possible to make arrangements to complete the export development bill. In any event, we will call the government organization bill tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SPORTS—1976 OLYMPIC GAMES—CANADIAN POSITION ON PRINCIPLE OF NO RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on January 20 I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) the following question:

Considering the firm decision of the International Olympics Committee to adhere rigidly to the principle that there shall not be racial discrimination in sports, can the minister give some indication to the House of the position to be taken by the government on that principle so far as the 1976 Olympic games are concerned?

I suggest it is very necessary that Canada make its position on racist and apartheid policies very clear to the rest of the world, and with that thought in mind I posed the question to the minister. I feel confident that human rights are being violated in many countries. Although we are quite aware of this, it is only in South Africa that these policies are sought to be justified on racial grounds. Canada's disengagement from South Africa should be positively encouraged at all levels by whatever means is open to us as Canadians.

I am sure that the people of the world who are dedicated to upholding the declaration of human rights would like to know what is our position, and I feel we should make our position quite open and clear. Every means should be utilized to make known our convictions against racism and apartheid. One way of doing this is by inconveniencing and embarrassing the white regimes of countries that practise apartheid and racism until they realize that somewhere along the line they must change their policies. We must make our position abundantly clear in so far as racism and colonialism are concerned. One way Canada can do this is to insist rigidly on the principle of non-racial sport.

We have the decision of the International Olympics Committee regarding South Africa, which no doubt will leave Canada in the position of only having to reaffirm this decision. I would suggest that a pronouncement be made by our government stating categorically that we will adhere rigidly to the principle that there will be no racial discrimination at the 1976 Olympic games in Montreal. If this is not possible, I suggest that no federal money should be made available to the 1976 winter games in Quebec. In this way we will be in a much better position in respect of nations of the world. I believe that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will agree to a firm acceptance of this basic condition of non-racism. It will be of interest to all freedom loving Canadians dedicated to the eradication of apartheid, discrimination and racism to refer to the answer this House will, hopefully, hear from the minister tonight.

A news article suggests that the business hangman in the world is in Pretoria, South Africa. I suggest we should make sure that those responsible for these racial injustices do not have the opportunity of joining our 1976 Olympic games. I will be most interested in hearing the response tonight and I am sure all of us are waiting for a reaffirmation of policy in respect of non-racial sports in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, the federal government rejects all forms of racial discrimination.

With regard to the summer Olympic Games to be held in Montreal in 1976, the federal government believes that such Games are a very important means of bringing together peoples and nations. By asking for and obtaining the 1976 summer Olympic Games, Montreal has tacitly accepted to obey the rules of the International Olympic Games Committee, that is not to tolerate any racial discrimination.

For this reason, the federal government sees in the 1976 Olympic Games in Montreal an occasion for all Canadians to show that they have no prejudices for reasons of race, colour or religion.

Let us hope that this answer, Mr. Speaker, will sink into the minds of all Canadians, including the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

FINANCE—PROCEDURE FOR PRESENTATION OF TAX REFORM LEGISLATION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, what I like about this "late show" is the sense of expectancy that falls on all members of the House of Commons and those people who have rushed in from this, that and the other thing, including the full attendance, I am sure, of the National Centre for the Performing Arts, all of whom have come from hither, thither, to and fro to see if they can find out anything at this late hour. On occasion I have felt that perhaps the question I had in mind should have been asked and answered during the question period. However, I thought I should not put it at that time but should wait for a couple of hours until the country was really agog and alive.

I find myself here at this hour with a rather simple request of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). I realize he has more important things on his mind than a simple answer to the question which I ask in order to satisfy my own curiosity. As a matter of fact, I do not even see him here tonight. His parliamentary secretary is in attendance in a fresh, pink shirt—

An hon. Member: It is red.

Mr. McCleave: He is here in a fresh, red shirt, and since this is a good colour I am emboldened to press on with the question that brought me here this evening. Earlier in the day, during the question period, I asked the Minister of Finance whether he intended to proceed with tax reform on the basis of a budget or on the basis of a separate bill. He was able to pick his way through that question like nobody's business, because really I should not have asked it in that form. I should have asked a longer and much more complicated question. Anyway, I will give him the benefit of his answer which was that if it is carried out in a budget, it will involve a separate bill anyway. This is quite true. But, Sir, I wanted to ask a brief question without bringing everybody back tonight. I did not want this huge crowd around me tonight. All I was asking was how he was going to do it.

The country is also asking the question, the group that has been floating full-page advertisements in the newspapers of this country. They have been asking how the Minister of Finance will proceed with his tax reform. Will he have the same crowd—I think that is the expression—that wrote the original white paper? Is that crowd going to be doing it again, will it be another crowd or will the Minister of Finance descend from the heights of Olympus to do it? All I was trying to find out was how and when it will all happen. Perhaps it is unreasonable to ask such deep and fundamental questions at this hour, but this was what I was trying to discover earlier in the day, and nothing came back.

However, seeing the parliamentary secretary here, an old friend of us all, and knowing he will take our question seriously, we can rest assured that we will be told when this tax reformation will take place.

Mr. Bell: Don't count too much on it.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) is a friend of mine, but we know he is somewhat cynical. I expect we will hear the whole thing unfolded. Anyway, I will give the parliamentary secretary the chance to do so.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance on numerous occasions has indicated his intention to introduce the legislation implementing the tax reform in April. I would refer the hon. member to the minister's most recent statement in the House in this regard, made in response to an inquiry by the hon. member's leader last Wednesday as recorded at page 3031 of Hansard. The minister stated:

> I expect to introduce legislation for tax reform some time toward the end of April.

The question was not, as the hon. member appeared to believe during the oral question period today, whether or not tax reform will be introduced by a separate bill or by a budget speech. Evidently the hon. member has had an opportunity to get that matter straightened out since the question period. A bill amending the Income Tax Act will be introduced in any event. The only question is whether the introduction of that bill will be preceded or accompanied by a budget speech. It is not possible at this time to indicate which of the procedural options will be followed.

HOUSING—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF MUNICIPAL LAND BANK

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the attendance here of the minister in charge of housing. He is one of the hardest working members of the House and I will be very happy when he becomes a full minister and receives the full pay that he so richly deserves.

• (10:10 p.m.)

On January 29 I asked the minister in charge of housing a question with reference to an article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram, written by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) in which he stated that the Canadian housing situation is bad and is getting worse. He said that the government missed an excellent opportunity in the setting up of a municipal land bank and providing all the necessary moneys so that the cost of housing, especially the cost of land, would be sharply reduced. Mr. Speaker said that my question was in the form of a submission and that he assumed the minister would consider it as such.

If I can give you a little history concerning this matter, Mr. Speaker, I will go back to 1967 and the Dominion-Provincial Conference on Housing. The then Prime Minister set forth the problem in very clear and concise terms. He issued a press release and on page 1 this passage appeared:

> The broad facts and forecasts about urban growth are well known to all of us.
> Almost three quarters of our population now live in cities and towns.
>
> By 1980 nearly two-thirds of all Canadians will live in 29 major urban communities; one-third will live in Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver.
> At least 500,000 acres of new land, including much of our best farmland, will be needed to accommodate the physical expansion of these 29 urban centres by 1980; three or four times that much if we don't make more efficient use of land in the future.

On page 11 there were these words:

> It is true that housing costs have increased by about 50 per cent between 1951 and 1966.
>
> This is more than for most other costs and must cause concern—
> Land costs, however, will be an increasingly significant and disturbing factor in housing costs, unless appropriate action is taken to reduce or at least limit further increases.

On page 15 the then Prime Minister was reported as saying the federal government was going to attack the problem on four main bases. I shall quote two which he considered to be part of the answer:

> Federal financial participation in comprehensive planning of our urban regions and in the advance acquisition of land for transportation corridors and open spaces for recreation and similar community purposes.

Federal financial suport for land assembly and development of comprehensively planned new suburban communities within urban regions.

That was in 1967. Then in January, 1969, the hon. member for Trinity issued his task force report. What he said could be summarized as follows: the present system of assembling and servicing land in much of urban Canada is irrational in concept and inefficient in practice. He then referred to the grand practice followed in the city of Saskatoon. That city acquired a great deal of land during the thirties as a result of default on payment of taxes. It used that land in the proper planning sense. The land was serviced and lots were sold. Further land was acquired in the suburbs and the city now has 5,000 acres, which will meet its needs for the next 20 years. He said the lesson to be learned from this was that municipalities or regional governments should acquire and service substantial portions of land within their boundaries and the federal government should be prepared to make loans to municipalities for this purpose. He also set forth the example of Mr. William Teron, creator of the Kanata development in Ottawa, who said that there is no use dreaming about planning a city unless you own the land.

From January, 1969, we have had very insignificant government action. It has been very much like giving a starving elephant a peanut, very much like giving a starving man a handshake. There have been two methods by which the government has acquired land for housing purposes. Under one the federal government pays 70 per cent of the cost of assembling raw land for residential purposes and the balance is borne by the province and the municipality concerned. From 1948 to 1969, 25,568 lots were authorized for development, but I would point out that in 1969 only 960 lots were authorized for development. The second method is a federal-provincial agreement under which the federal government pays 90 per cent of the acquisition costs and then it recoups its money by having the municipality take out a loan which is repayable within 15 years. In 1969 we spent the small amount of $7 million on land acquisition.

On the issue of the land bank there was a great confrontation between the hon. member for Trinity, when he was responsible for housing and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As a result the minister, who is now the hon. member for Trinity, resigned his cabinet post. Notwithstanding what happened between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Trinity, the present minister has not acted. Is it any wonder that the hon. member for Trinity wrote an article in the Toronto Telegram in January, 1971, in which he said that housing in Canada is bad and is getting worse, and that the government missed an excellent opportunity by not providing funds for municipal land banks in order that we could reduce one of the main costs of housing in Canada? He said that the cost of land and the servicing of land is one of the main elements in the cost of housing.

The hon. member for Trinity also said that he could see no reason, financial or constitutional, why this could not have been done. We in the New Democratic Party have said the same thing for many years. We continue to preach the gospel to the minister but he continues to be deaf to our requests. We ask the minister, why has he not accepted the excellent recommendations which the hon. member for Trinity made in the Toronto Telegram?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as always I welcome the constructive suggestions of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). I always have respected the recommendations and suggestions of my predecessor and close friend and associate, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). The fact of the matter is, however, that the situation is not quite as it was presented. I am sure that the hon. member had no intention of being incorrect.

We made a change in the act in June, 1969, with regard to land assembly. I believe that the hon. member for Trinity had suggested 100 per cent loans when we were dealing directly with municipalities. We considered that seriously. There were no ideological considerations attached to it. However, the fact is that the municipalities, whether we liked it or not, operate in part under the jurisdiction of the provinces and any loans to the municipalities would sooner or later, directly or indirectly, have to be approved by the provincial governments under their municipal acts.

There was really no indirect way around that. However, we amended the act to permit loans to municipalities, with provincial approval, for amounts of up to 90 per cent of the cost of acquiring and servicing land, as the hon. member pointed out. We changed the breadth and scope of that provision from what it was before, because it was restricted to assembly of land for public housing purposes. We widened it to general housing purposes. That is a fairly large hole through which many endeavours can be brought in.

I cannot tonight, off the top of my head, correct the hon. member precisely with regard to the amount of money spent last year, but I think it was closer to $30 million than to the $7 million that he mentioned. When the CMHC budget is laid before the House, I hope within the next very few days, he will find that we have given increased attention to that program under the National Housing Act. Rightly or wrongly, last year we chose to devote a very significant portion of our capital funds under the CMHC budget to the provision of housing for fast starts and, particularly, for low-income housing.

If I may now refer to the article of the hon. member for Trinity stating that housing in Canada is bad and is getting worse, which the hon. member for Broadview mentioned, I think that that is an overpessimistic view of the situation and interpretation of the facts. Last year, despite the disastrous forecasts from many corners of the House, and some articles, there were more than 190,000 starts during the year. Far more significant than what I call the numbers game is the fact that in excess of 50,000 of these starts were financed for low-income housing through CMHC.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but his time has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.22 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

WELFARE

FEDERAL SHARE OF COSTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43. Usually, when one presents such a request under Standing Order 43, it is assumed that one is asking for the entire House to agree to the substance of the proposition. In this case I know that the substance of what I am asking for has not yet been agreed to; therefore I am simply asking for what is provided in Standing Order 43, namely, that consent be given to the making of the motion so the House can decide whether it agrees with the substance of the proposition.

Therefore, in view of the $75 million welfare budget in the city of Toronto and similar high costs in other cities and in other parts of the country I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather):

That this House urges the government to give immediate consideration to the raising of the federal share of costs under the Canada Assistance Plan from 50 per cent to 65 per cent during any fiscal year in which unemployment in Canada exceeds 3 per cent of the labour force.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has explained, he requires the unanimous consent of the House in order that the motion can be put. I have to inquire whether there is such unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity so the motion cannot be put.

AIR CANADA

TABLING OF REPORT ON CRASH OF DC-8 AIRCRAFT AT TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT, JULY 5, 1970

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table in the two official languages the report of the board of inquiry into the accident at Toronto International Airport, Malton, Ontario, to Air Canada DC-8-CF-TIW aircraft on July 5, 1970, held before the Hon. Mr. Justice Hugh F. Gibson, Commissioner.

MEASURE RELATING TO AMBIENT AIR QUALITY AND CONTROL OF POLLUTION

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROJECTED TAKEOVER OF HOME OIL BY UNITED STATES COMPANY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the imminent takeover and foreign control of Home Oil Company of Calgary by Ashland Oil Incorporated of Kentucky, and the vital necessity for Parliament to consider ways and means of preventing the last major Canadian-owned and controlled oil company from being sold to non-residents, this subject being of equal importance to the Prime Minister's interruption of an emergency debate on March 2, 1971, to announce that the government would prevent the sale of control in Denison Mines Limited to non-residents.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has given the notice required under Standing Order 26, and I have considered the matter most attentively. The matter raised by the hon. member is one which is of national interest and concern to all members of the House. This has been indicated by the number of questions which have been asked on a number of days during the last week or so. Indeed, it seems to me that this is the very kind of situation which appears to be contemplated by Standing Order 26. In ordinary circumstances, the motion could very well have been put to the House.

The spirit of the Standing Order is that hon. members should be given an opportunity to discuss an urgent matter of national importance within a reasonable time. However, it has already been indicated to the House that tomorrow and Thursday would be set aside for the consideration of the budget debate. These will be the last two days spent on that debate. These two days will provide an opportunity to consider the problem raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

I had some reservations about this possibility at first, thinking that a number of hon. members had already taken part in the budget debate. But since only two hon. members spoke on the main motion—the others spoke on the amendment and subamendment—just about every hon. member except two will have an opportunity, if they want to and provided the necessary time is available, to participate in the debate. If I may make a suggestion, which may be beyond my competence and jurisdiction, an arrangement might be made among the House Leaders regarding the setting of a time limitation of the speeches which can be made during the next two days. In other words, I suggest to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that it would be very difficult for the Chair on the eve of a general debate to say that we should have a special debate under the terms of Standing Order 26.

Again I insist that I recognize that this is the kind of matter which might very well be the subject of a debate under the provisions of Standing Order 26, but because there has already been an indication that tomorrow and the day after will be provided for the study of problems such as this one I do not think I could allow the hon. member's motion at this time.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ENTERING OF CAVEAT REGARDING NATURE OF BILL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before you call oral questions I would like to file what I might call an oral caveat with regard to Bill C-219, dealing with the Canada Development Corporation. Before the bill is presented for second reading we intend to argue that it is a hybrid bill and as such it is subject to certain consequences, if this is so declared by Your Honour. It may well be that because of precedents the argument must be made before second reading is called. I am giving the government due notice of our intention so that before the bill is called we may have the opportunity to argue the point.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

OPINIONS OF BANK OF CANADA AND GOVERNMENT REGARDING APPROPRIATE ECONOMIC POLICIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister arising out of the apparent tightening of the monetary supply by the Bank of Canada in recent times. Does this indicate a difference of opinion between the government of Canada and the Bank of Canada with regard to appropriate economic policies of the day, and that the primary concern of the Bank of Canada relates to inflation whereas the government has been indicating that its primary concern at the moment is expansion?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is that I know of no difference in view between the bank and the government on economic policy. I might add one comment, that it is the purpose of the government, and I believe of the bank, to promote steady and sustainable expansion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: "Wrong-way Corrigan" again.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, since the Acting Prime Minister has indicated that there is no difference of opinion, is the government of Canada concerned that the economy of Canada is currently expanding too rapidly or that interest rates are falling too rapidly?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to get into a discussion on monetary policy on this occasion but, as I said in answer to the first question, if we are going to ensure high levels of employment in the future it is important that we are embarked on a sustainable increase in our gross national product and in our general activity. The worst possible thing would be sudden inflation and a subsequent recession.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Acting Prime Minister would agree with the importance of removing all possible uncertainties that may stand in the way of expansion. Would he have the government take into consideration a presentation to the House as to just what the policy of the government and the Bank of Canada is so that the whole country will know where they fit and uncertainties of this sort, creating doubts and some confusion, may be avoided, particularly in view of the very difficult outlook facing the country regarding unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Before the Acting Prime Minister replies I should suggest that the question as asked invites a rather general statement, and I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister should be allowed to make that kind of statement at this time. It should normally be made on motions.

Mr. Sharp: As Your Honour has said, we are resuming the budget debate tomorrow and this would be an excellent topic for discussion at that time.

Mr. Stanfield: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I did not ask the Acting Prime Minister for a lengthy statement. I simply asked him whether the government would take this into consideration.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROJECTED TAKEOVER OF HOME OIL BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who seems to have difficulty being in his place on those days when he is on the roster, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister with reference to the negotiations which have been going on between the Home Oil Company and Ashland Oil Incorporated of Kentucky regarding a takeover of the former by the latter. Can he give the House any information on whether or not an agreement has been reached and what is the nature of that agreement?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. Could the hon. member repeat the question?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am asking the Acting Prime Minister if the discussions which have been going on for some time between the Home Oil Company and Ashland Oil Incorporated of Kentucky have been completed and if any agreement has been reached?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the discussions are continuing and that no decision has yet been reached.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on February 2, as recorded on page 2976 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources "whether the government is prepared to exercise the same powers with respect to Home Oil Company remaining in Canadian hands as were exercised by the government with respect to Denison Mines." The minister replied at that time:

> I cannot speak for the government in that regard at this time. That would be a matter for the government to decide.

Since that was some days ago I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government has looked into this matter and if he can now assure the House that the government is prepared to exercise all the necessary powers, including asking Parliament for the necessary legislation, to prevent the takeover of Home Oil Company of Calgary by Ashland Oil Incorporated of Kentucky?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that undertaking. As the minister has said, discussions are going on now among the various parties, including the minister, to do everything possible to see that this company remains in Canadian hands. As the hon. member knows, in the case of Denison the federal authority had declared that uranium was a work for the general advantage of Canada. In that case there was no problem with respect to constitutional authority. I do not think the situation is quite as clear with respect to oil.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if I am to take from his remarks that the government considers that the retention in Canadian hands of a share in the oil industry, which in the foreseeable future will probably be the largest industry in Canada, is not just as important as keeping control of part of the uranium industry in Canadian hands?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, I think there might be some resistance on the part of the provinces if the federal Parliament were to take complete jurisdiction over oil. That, it seems to me, is the difference between the uranium case, in which many years ago a declaration was made that uranium is a work for the general advantage of Canada, and the kind of situation that now exists in the oil industry.

PROJECTED TAKEOVER OF HOME OIL BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—ABILITY OF OTHER CANADIAN COMPANIES TO COMPETE IN BIDDING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the position of the government of Canada that under existing Canadian tax laws it would be possible for another Canadian company to compete with a United States company in acquisition of the control of Home Oil Company or any similar company? Is the government pretending that the Canadian company would be on any grounds of equality in connection with such negotiations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Your Honour may recall that the same question was directed to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, last week. I have nothing to add to what he said then.

Mr. Stanfield: Why does the minister not want to answer the question?

Mr. Woolliams: I thought the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said the opposite.

OIL

POSSIBLE STOPPAGE OF OFFSHORE SUPPLY—CONTINGENCY PLANS FOR EASTERN CANADA—FEASIBILITY OF CONSTRUCTING PIPELINE

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I had a question I wanted to direct to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources but since he is not in attendance, I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister.

Because of the threatened embargo by the oil-producing nations and bearing in mind the limited oil reserves which according to some experts would barely provide for our domestic consumption for a period of 16 days, would the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether the government is considering a speedier delivery of oil from Western Canada to our Eastern areas by sponsoring the building of a pipeline or by providing some other means of transportation?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this gives me an opportunity to correct a story that has appeared in the newspapers that may have caused some alarm. There are very much larger reserves of oil in Canada than those mentioned in the newspaper report referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Harkness: Where?

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Would the Acting Prime Minister inform the House whether the government intends to ask impartial and independent experts to make an investigation or a study of the economic value of a Trans-Canadian pipeline?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. The question of constructing a pipeline is, as the House knows, an active one and has been for some time, but so far there has been no application for the building of a pipeline, which would be the normal course of events.

May I add to the answer I gave to the previous question, in order to give some reassurance in the present circumstances. There should be somewhat over 60 days supply of product available for the eastern Canadian market at the present time.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, has the minister, on behalf of the Canadian government, had any discussions with the United States government with respect to any contingency arrangements to supply United States oil to eastern Canada if there should be an embargo?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think this is a hypothetical question. We had some discussions when the ministers and secretaries were gathered in Ottawa on the general situation. At the moment we see no reason for any emergency meetings to deal with this hypothetical situation. It is still our hope that there will be no emergency whatever.

SUGGESTED FEASIBILITY STUDY OF ECONOMICS OF BUILDING PIPELINE FROM WEST TO SERVE EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in connection with his answer with regard to a pipeline. In view of the petroleum situation and the economic situation, particularly in this country, will the government initiate and promote a feasibility study to ascertain the economics of building a pipeline from western Canada to supply central and other parts of Canada with petroleum?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. It is not the intention of the government to initiate any such study. If the economics of the situation justify building a pipeline to Montreal, for example, there are many companies in this country with sufficient information which can make the necessary application for the building of such a pipeline.

Mr. Woolliams: Does the Acting Prime Minister intend to leave this serious economic matter to foreign controlled companies to decide for the good of Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows the Trans-Canada Pipe Line is almost wholly Canadian owned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and then go on to another subject.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I remind the Acting Prime Minister that he is talking about the trans-Canada gas pipeline, not the interprovincial oil pipeline which is owned by a subsidiary of Standard Oil.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The minister stated that there are 60 days oil supply in reserve in eastern Canada. What is this statement based on in view of the fact that the storage capacity is 15 million barrels of crude oil and 54 million barrels of crude oil products, which represents approximately three weeks supply? What is the source of the minister's optimistic estimate of 60 days?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest we are now entering the field of debate between the hon. member and the minister.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What is the source upon which the minister bases his 60-day estimate?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in anticipation of these questions being asked I asked the National Energy Board to advise me with regard to the position because they were rather concerned about the reports which appeared in the papers. Perhaps I could give the answer to the hon. member's question. The 16-day figure given for Canada is for crude oil refinery throughout. There are, however, some 50 days product supply on hand. Available crude oil would provide another 14 to 15 days product supply. Therefore there is somewhat over 60 days product supply available for the eastern Canadian market.

WELFARE

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY FUNDS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Since welfare costs in Metropolitan Toronto have risen 50 per cent above what they were a year ago because of excessive unemployment, a pattern which has developed in municipalities right across the country, is the government now giving consideration to taking steps to help these municipalities to meet these very high costs which have been brought about by excessive unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the impression the question asked by the hon. member, important though it may be, has been asked at least a few times during the past few days. Possibly the hon. member might like to rephrase the question. He is really asking a question which has been asked in those precise terms in the past few days.

Mr. Hees: I will make my question a little more specific. Is the government giving consideration to assisting Metropolitan Toronto which is faced with very high costs because of excessive unemployment? This question has not been asked, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have received requests from many cities and provinces for an increase in the proportion of welfare costs. As has been stated on a number of occasions when the same question has been asked day after day, the matter is under consideration.

Mr. Hees: Can the Acting Prime Minister advise the House whether the real reason the government is refusing to assist these municipalities is the fact that the Prime Minister's just society is running out of cash as well as steam?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PUBLIC WORKS

TORONTO—PROJECTS TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government is giving consideration to the request of the mayor of the city of Toronto to assist in compiling a list of public works to give employment in Toronto?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not personally seen these requests but I am sure they will receive every consideration.

PROVISION OF MAKE-WORK PROJECTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Public Works.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Is it the policy of his department, in line with the policy of the government, to expedite the decision-making process in relation to public works projects and to proceed with projects as a make-work effort? I ask him in all seriousness, if this is the case would he accept the recommendations of Members of Parliament?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered a like question in the affirmative about ten days ago.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PREFERENCE OF DIRECTOR OF INFORMATION FOR CANADIAN ACCENTS—SUGGESTED PURGING OF PORNOGRAPHIC PROGRAMS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State and the Minister without Portfolio who reports for Information Canada I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation decided to get rid of non-Canadian accents, and can we expect to see much less of Ron Collister, Gordon Donaldson and all the rest?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hope that the applause from the government side of the House was in approval of these persons. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether or not the government agrees with the view expressed by Knowlton Nash, the CBC's director of information, that "all things being equal, we would prefer Canadian voices"?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether this is a question or a representation, but I will take it into account.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then may I ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister have a statement made, and at the same time advise that the CBC should give consideration to purging filth, pornography and that kind of programs that are all too general these days?

INDUSTRY

ROLLS-ROYCE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES—OPPORTUNITY OF ADDITIONAL WORK FOR CANADIAN FIRMS ON JET ENGINES FOR LOCKHEED

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that Rolls-Royce in the United Kingdom has gone into receivership, and in view of the announcement yesterday that Lockheed Aircraft Corporation of Canada is attempting to arrange to have the RB-211 engine built by a Canadian based company, what action is the government prepared to take to encourage this possible opportunity for additional work in the Canadian aircraft industry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that it is too early for me to comment on this matter. The subject is still extremely hot and the companies involved are still looking for a way through this situation. I might observe, though, that if the project is too big for Rolls-Royce of England, with the full support of the British government, in co-operation with one of the biggest U.S. companies, to handle, it might be a bit too big for Canada too. Nevertheless, we will be looking at all avenues, Mr. Speaker.

ROLLS-ROYCE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES—CONTRACTS HELD BY CANADIAN FIRMS RESPECTING JET ENGINES FOR LOCKHEED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate to the House the value of the contracts held by Canadian companies under the Rolls-Royce project to supply these RB-211 jet engines to Lockheed?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not have that figure. I might try to find it, but I will acknowledge the fact that these contracts were very important, especially to some Canadian companies who counted on them very much.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister, having looked into the matter, make a statement to the House indicating the amount of the contracts, the number of people employed and what measures, if any, the government is going to take to help the companies and the men concerned to meet the problems that may arise as the result of the cancellation of these contracts?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I will try to include as much as I can in my answer to the question.

[Later:]

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning the questions and answers about the Rolls-Royce company and related companies. Is the minister discussing with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, the question whether or not the Canadian dollar should be pegged at the present time in view of the present rate of exchange, which has had a near disastrous effect on many secondary industries, particularly the aircraft and auto parts industries?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Finance is aware of whatever is true in all that. I do not think he would learn more by reading the question.

[Mr. McBride.]

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING RECOGNITION OF NATIVE PEOPLE'S HUNTING AND FISHING RIGHTS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which may be of some concern to two or three ministers, but since it involves Canada's relationship with another state I will address it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Are negotiations under way with the United States concerning the amendment of the Migratory Birds Convention Act in order to give recognition to the aboriginal rights of our native people with regard to fishing and hunting? If so, can the minister say when there is likely to be some conclusion of this matter with the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take that question as notice.

AIR CANADA

ACTION TO MAINTAIN COMPETITIVE POSITION IN OBTAINING EQUIPMENT

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On March 13, 1970, a question was asked whether Air Canada's order for air buses would be switched from Lockheed to another manufacturer to ensure delivery. In view of the projected one-year delay in delivery of the Lockheed Tri-Star, what steps is the government going to take to keep Air Canada competitive in obtaining equipment and to rectify their error in giving the order to Lockheed?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can merely repeat what I said on Friday, which is essentially what has just been said by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, that at this moment it is not clear what the future plans are of Rolls-Royce vis-à-vis the Lockheed 1011. I can only say that Air Canada has the matter under constant review and will move just as soon as the situation has been clarified.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LENNOX ISLAND RESERVE—SAFE MEANS OF TRAVELLING TO MAINLAND

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On Friday last the minister indicated that his department would not be proceeding as indicated earlier with the construction of a causeway or bridge to Lennox Island Indian reservation but hoped that he would shortly be able to make an announcement with respect to the project. Is the minister able to make such an announcement today? If not, when might he be able to do so? Has the minister had any communication with the government of Prince Edward Island which was under the very firm impression that the project would go ahead this spring?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that was our intention, but as the cost was found to be too great, we are reconsidering the proposal. As soon as we are able to submit a report to the House, I shall be happy to so inform the hon. member.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—ALLEGED BIGOTRY OF SUPERVISORS IN NOT ENSURING JOBS FOR NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Are the minister or his officials investigating the charge contained in a resolution passed by the Northwest Territories Council that his department is hiring as supervisors thinly disguised bigots who are doing little, if anything, to ensure that native people are hired for anything but unskilled positions?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, most of the civil servants in the Northwest Territories are hired locally by the government; it is answerable to the Council which adopted that resolution, copy of which I have yet to receive.

However, I want to point out to the hon. member that we have conferred much authority upon the government of the Northwest Territories, as the hon. member has requested so often.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, would the minister investigate the claim that a very high percentage of those employed on drilling crews, for which not much skill is required, are being recruited in southern Canada instead of from the native people in the territory?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is true that many of those who are hired come from the south, but I point out to the hon. member that two years ago we established a school in Edmonton to train Indians and Eskimos of the north as competent members of those crews. I think that last summer about 20 of them worked in those crews, and we hope that industry will be able to hire many more next season.

POLICY OF TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT RESPECTING HIRING OF NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is it the normal policy of the Department of Transport not to hire native people? I refer to the same report mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. If not, is the government going to investigate the allegations of discrimination and, if so, will the findings be made public?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member is repeating substantially the same question that has already been asked. There may be new aspects to it and it might be easier for the minister to answer the hon. member's question.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there certainly is no policy of not hiring native people—quite the contrary. As for the allegations in the item to which the hon. member has referred, I will undertake an investigation and I see no reason that the outcome should not be made public.

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—DISCUSSION AT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the very serious problems which have been created as a result of provincial regulations interfering with the free flow of agricultural products, is the present federal-provincial conference dealing with this situation and is there any intention to suggest a solution?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I am not sure, Mr. Speaker. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, is at the conference today so perhaps it has got around to this item. Certainly it is our purpose to have a Canada with as few restrictions on interprovincial trade as possible.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT OF SECTION RESPECTING CONTEMPT OF COURT

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General.

Does the minister intend, as suggested by some of his party's supporters during the week end, to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code concerning condemnations for contempt of court in order to allow a judge other than the presiding judge to make an objective decision as to whether or not a statement made by a witness or an accused is in contempt of court? Does not the minister believe that this formula would prevent some accused who intentionally insult the court from claiming that the judge is biased against them?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the minister who wants to reply to the hon. member for Charlevoix.

[English]

I understood that the hon. member for Athabasca was rising on a question of privilege. He should be given priority. Before he is recognized I should bring to the attention of hon. members that we are running short of time. We had a mini-debate on oil policy which took up quite a bit of time and we should move along as quickly as possible.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the proceedings but the translation was interrupted. There is no translation coming through at all.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The Solicitor General has the floor.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I am so far not aware that delegates to a political conference have made any decision on this matter one way or another. But it is certainly not up to adepts of urban guerilla to dictate priorities to the government. The government has stated what its priorities were concerning the Criminal Code and I believe they are well known.

Mr. Asselin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not feel that would be one way to preserve the dignity of our courts and upgrade the role of our judges which is deteriorating disturbingly in Montreal now?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GEORGES BANK—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the dispute between Canada and the United States over sovereignty claims on Georges Bank, which lies midway between Yarmouth and Cape Cod, Massachusetts, has any progress been made or agreement reached that the median line, as set out in the 1958 Geneva Convention, is the accepted international boundary? I ask this question in view of the environmental hazards of offshore oil investigation and the need for establishing pollution control regulations in the area.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the discussions are still continuing but that no agreement has been reached.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact it was 13 years ago as a result of the Geneva Conference that these discussions began, when can we expect the jurisdictional dispute regarding Georges Bank to be brought to a satisfactory conclusion?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, just as soon as the United States agrees with our point of view we can settle it immediately. There is a problem between us and we are trying hard to reach an amicable settlement.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would stop giving us this kind of nonsense and begin exercising a little bit of initiative.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time.

CONSULTATION WITH SECRETARY OF STATE'S DEPARTMENT REGARDING ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACT ON PROGRAM "WEEKEND"

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In his absence I will direct it to the minister responsible. Following the program "Weekend" of last Sunday evening concerning the drug problem in Canada, would the minister inform the House whether his department was consulted regarding the showing of an illegal act on national television, namely, two young girls self-injecting drugs in their veins, and were these performers paid for their participation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will see that this question is brought to the minister's attention.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): Will the minister make inquiries and advise if the staging of an illegal act on national television contravenes the law of this country or—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not in order.

In view of the possible inflationary effect, would the minister's department look into the matter or perhaps have the Prices and Incomes Commission do so?

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

POSSIBLE LEASE OF PROPERTY AT ENTRANCE TO STANLEY PARK, VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and arises from an indication that he might have something further to say about the lease by the National Harbours Board of property at the entrance to Stanley Park in Vancouver, about which his assistant was questioned on January 28. Does the minister or the government intend to take any action with regard to the development of this land in the interest of the people in the area? Does the minister intend to act or let nature take its course?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can answer on behalf of the National Harbours Board that as of Tuesday or Wednesday of last week a decision was made to seek a resolution of the initial question having to do with an appropriate and proper valuation for the land. It is my information that the National Harbours Board has now taken steps to have an independent assessment made of the land value.

As to the larger question of the future of the project, it is, of course, really one in the last analysis for settlement by the municipal government of the city of Vancouver, except for the fact that National Harbours Board leases always include the requirement that the lessee abide by the bylaws of the community in which the land is located. Whether it would be appropriate for the federal government to intervene at that level I suggest is open to question. I think the first job, which we have now undertaken, is to get an independent assessment of the land value.

Mr. Stanfield: I take it from the minister's reply that at the present time neither the National Harbours Board nor the minister intends to halt the sale or lease or to do anything other than to proceed with the sale or lease after satisfying themselves as to valuation?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker. At the moment the position is, as I said, that we are seeking to obtain a fair market value. No decision beyond that point has been taken. I emphasize the basic question of whether in fact we have any authority to determine the use to which the land is put once it is sold.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Could the minister give us the assurance, in view of participatory democracy, whatever that means, that before a firm decision is made in this regard interested bodies in Vancouver will be able to make representations to the city council or that the department will bring pressure to bear so that the views of the public on this project can be expressed?

Mr. Jamieson: Whatever regard I may have, and it is great, for what the hon. member calls participatory democracy, I certainly do not have the hon. member's high regard for what he regards as government arrogance, and it would certainly be arrogance on my part to instruct the city council on who they are going to hear. That is entirely up to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: In so far as representations to the government, to the National Harbours Board or to myself are concerned, these of course will be received, as many have been, and will be given full consideration.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the minister's answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway first and return to the hon. member in a moment.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to ask the minister whether he can give us some idea of when the survey having to do with land valuation will be completed?

Mr. Jamieson: I fear I cannot do so at the moment but I will try to determine how long it will take and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the minister not agree with me that part of the problem in the whole project has been the arrogance of certain government officials, let alone—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At this point the hon. member is arguing with the minister. I do not think that is a legitimate supplementary question.

Mr. Nowlan: I will rephrase it, Mr. Speaker. In view of some of the past proceedings with regard to this project and the different forms of arrogance that may have arisen, it would be healthy for democracy to have public participation in any final result. Certainly the minister, without being arrogant or dictatorial, could use his good offices with the city council of Vancouver to arrange for that type of public participation at meetings on what should be done in a matter of such importance to Vancouver.

WAYS AND MEANS TO INCREASE STARTS AND PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): I have a question for the minister in charge of housing. Since housing starts declined on a seasonally adjusted basis in the month of January to 182,900 from 254,700 in December, would the minister make a statement on motions outlining ways and means of increasing housing starts to meet the necessary levels and also to provide employment?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): We think the downage is due to weather conditions. Within the next few days I will be making a statement to the House with regard to the CMHC capital budget, at which time I will try to deal with the matter the hon. member has inquired about.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): So far as I know, no definite arrangements have yet been made for any such shipments. We have the situation under very close examination and at the appropriate time we will make representations. We do not think this is the time.

AIRPORTS

ST. SCHOLASTIQUE—ADVANTAGES OF SITE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport a question.

Does he agree with some officials of his department who now admit that the site of the St. Scholastique airport, if recommendable from a technical point of view, is not an ideal one with regard to the industrial future of Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: As asked, this question is not admissible.

[English]

TORONTO—PROGRESS ON SELECTING SITE FOR NEW FACILITY

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is also for the Minister of Transport. Now that the four-site option plan for the Metropolitan Toronto airport has been discarded as impractical, is the minister working feverishly or fervently with the other levels of government to arrive soon at a single site for this airport?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, feverishly, earnestly and at the moment courteously, I hope, by letting some of my associates at the provincial level of government get past a certain event of some importance which is taking place this week.

Mr. Ryan: Will a decision be taken about the site this year or before the government goes to the country?

Mr. Jamieson: I suppose it could very well depend on whether the hon. gentleman is going to that event and on how he votes. But the point of the matter is that I am waiting to see what kind of new team will be fielded at Queen's Park.

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTED EMPLOYMENT OF NATIVE INDIAN GIRLS AS STEWARDESSES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): My question is for the Minister of Transport and it relates to his earlier reply in which he indicated that there is no discrimination in the employment policies of the Department of Transport. As I travel constantly on Air Canada across the country and have yet to see—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I should not interrupt the hon. member's travelogue, but he should ask a question.

An hon. Member: Now we know where you were.

Mr. Rose: I was in full flight when I was interrupted.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, out of control.

Mr. Rose: I was going to observe that in all my travels with the Committee on Agriculture in the last two weeks I did not see a native Indian employee—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question. I am not sure whether his remarks up to now were just introductory, but we have already reached the end of the question period. He should ask his question as quickly as possible.

Mr. Rose: I was about to ask my question, Mr. Speaker. I was about to ask the minister if he would lend his great weight to persuade Air Canada to employ some native Indian girls as air hostesses?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's representation has been noted. I have just pointed out that the question period expired a few moments ago, but the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand has been trying to ask a question and perhaps he should be recognized.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—OLD AGE PENSION AND SUPPLEMENT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT TO CLEAR UP CONFUSION

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Thank you for allowing me the privilege of ending the question period, Mr. Speaker. This question is addressed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Since war veterans now receiving the veterans allowance are being directed to apply for old age security pensions plus the supplement, which means a loss of certain fringe benefits now available under war veterans allowances, will the minister look into all aspects of this question and make a statement on motions in the near future to clear up the confusion now existing in the minds of our older veterans?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): We are at present preparing legislation on these increases which will greatly benefit many veterans in this country.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 4, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Thursday, February 4, clause 5 of the bill was under consideration. Shall clause 5 carry?

On clause 5—Duties of minister.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with clause 5 of Part I of Bill C-207. I do not think we spent too much time discussing this clause last Thursday, and there are several points which I would like to make today. I would point out to hon. members that the clause as presently constituted gives the new minister a rather limited function so far as the total environmental picture is concerned. During second reading, a number of members of the parties on this side of the House expressed a desire that the minister's duties be expanded to cover all problems relating to pollution and pollution prevention. I again want to stress the need for an overall authority so far as pollution is concerned.

Surely, Canadians have learned from past experience that the division of jurisdiction for pollution among a number of departments has just not worked. It is the reason we are faced with major pollution problems from one end of the country to the other. We must have some minister in a position to oversee all pollution problems, in a position to set national standards and to see that they are enforced. One minister must be responsible for co-ordination and co-operation between the various departments with regard to environmental problems. Until we get that type of organization, we will not effectively reach the root of the problems.

I notice that several major areas which have pollution problems are excluded from the provisions of clause 5, and omitted from the jurisdiction of the new department. Again, I point to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, which comprise 40 per cent of Canada's total area. The ecology of that area is extremely fragile. It is an area which should be directly under the control of the new department of the environment, yet it is being excluded. This does not make sense in any way, shape or form. The department must have authority to move into the north and do a proper job of pollution prevention.

At present we have no land use regulations for the Northwest Territories. They are in the process of being drafted, but over a period of years exploration has been taking place on an increasing scale in the north. Ecologists, and others who have done research, have told us that if we get a major oil spill or major pollution problem in some of the big Arctic rivers, Canada will be in real trouble. This immense, newly developing area should come under the control of the minister of the environment with regard to pollution matters.

A number of other areas are also omitted from the new department's control. Again, I stress it is absolutely essential to have one department act as a kind of umbrella over all other departments when dealing with the pollution problems of the nation. I have spoken on this matter previously, and I hope to ask questions of the minister once more. At the moment I would like to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West:

That clause 5 of Bill C-207 be amended by striking out the first seven lines of the section and substituting the following:

The duties, powers and functions of the Minister of the Environment extend to and include all matters over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction relating to pollution prevention and control and to

The Chairman: If the hon. member has concluded his remarks, I will put the amendment.

Mr. Harding: Before I sit down may I just say a word or two about the amendment. If adopted, it would do the job that I have suggested should be done. It would give the new department control over all pollution problems. It is a good amendment. It is what we have been fighting for over a number of years, and I think the committee should accept it.

The Chairman: Is the Committee ready for the question? Shall the said amendment carry?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, on the face of it this amendment purports to be both a simplification and expansion of the phraseology contained in the bill The difference between the wording of the amendment and the wording of the bill is the removal of the clarifying phrase, "not by law assigned to any other department, branch or agency of the Government of Canada." I think this clarifying phrase is important. This is in the nature of a residual clause, that all the jurisdiction related to pollution problems is vested in the minister except where Parliament, in relation to a particular matter, has expressly decreed otherwise.

To accept the amendment would, in effect, be acting in a manner contrary to the expressed intention of Parliament in either past instances or in future cases, and I do not think the House would really want to do this. I think hon. members feel the House should be free to assign specific duties to particular departments in the legislation covering their particular jurisdictions, even though to some degree they relate to pollution, or pollution prevention and control, rather than vest the supreme, the overriding authority in this particular minister.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The intention, obviously, of the current bill is this: where pollution is the primary concern of Parliament, unless it is decreed that that particular matter shall be under the jurisdiction of some other department, it shall be under the jurisdiction of the new minister of the environment. I think that this is the type of provision which allows the House full freedom to make specific exemptions from the general control where, in its view, it is necessary. For that reason, the government would not wish to support this amendment.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board. I speak in support of the amendment, because it seems to me that one of the problems we face as Canadians is fighting this sinister force known as pollution that can, if left unchecked, destroy us all. I was interested in the minister's remarks about Parliaments of the future. Many of us are concerned in case our future is rather limited. It will be unless we actively, positively and ruthlessly do something to solve this particular problem. The battle against pollution has not been conducted in a comprehensive way because responsibility for pollution control is split among many levels of government, federal, provincial and, of course, municipal. Also, the responsibility is split among so many ministries at the federal and provincial level that the prosecution of offences and the correction of excesses is exceedingly difficult.

Some of us who are interested in this matter had hoped that the government intended designating the minister of the new department as the person with supreme responsibility in our country for the fight against pollution. We hoped that he was to be the veritable czar in matters of pollution. The public, I think, is concerned about pollution control. If we are to heed the public's justifiable concern over pollution, it seems to me that we ought to invest the minister with the power he needs to combat pollution at every level. Is the idea of a czar in the field of pollution control mere window dressing? If it is not window dressing, why cannot he be given the power he needs to combat pollution at all levels?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I will speak briefly. I support the amendment wholeheartedly. In the past, the government has displayed a wishy-washy attitude towards pollution. Pollution has taken the place of motherhood; everybody is for it, so long as no one has to do too much about it. That has been the attitude of the government, as illustrated by the Canada water bill.

I think the problem we face has been set out precisely by the hon. member who moved the amendment. Jurisdiction in the field is divided. I know the President of the Treasury Board has said that Parliament has decreed otherwise. I think Parliament has decreed otherwise wrongly. This amendment is an attempt to rectify the situation, and would also make sure that pollution could be dealt with as a single issue by a single minister. As a matter of fact, I think that pollution ought to be a matter of discussion today, at the federal-provincial conference.

An hon. Member: It is.

Mr. Baldwin: Someone says that it is. How do we know that?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I had expected to be asked to explain why the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is not present today. The fact of the matter is that, right now, he is at the federal-provincial conference to discuss pollution.

Mr. Baldwin: Of course, he is over there to discuss pollution. But is he urging the provincial governments to agree with the federal government that the direction of the battle against pollution which threatens all humanity and all citizens of our country should be placed under a single administration? The pollution problems that we shall have to face in this country for a long time are the problems that peoples of all countries will have to face. Nevertheless, we have seen the government adopting a very wishy-washy approach to the matter. It is fine for the minister to talk about pollution; everyone loves to hear talk of pollution control. But what is the government doing to control pollution? There is before the committee a sensible amendment. I support it wholeheartedly. I hope the mild words I have spoken will induce some government members to support it as well.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board a question? Why has he specifically omitted the Northwest Territories and the Yukon area from the jurisdiction of the new minister?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I think the answer is that we have not expressly omitted the Northwest Territories and the Yukon from the jurisdiction of the minister in pollution matters.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, although it seems to me that the government is determined to defeat the amendment, may I say this. It seems to me that the government will ignore the economic developments in the north and bypass the environmental problems of that area. I do not think there is any doubt about it, and the people of the area know this. For years, many environmental problems of that area have been ignored, and that is why there are no land use regulations today to control the current economic developments. It is true that those regulations may be introduced later. I submit that the failure to include one of the most vulnerable parts of our nation under this bill is a disaster.

On the other hand, if it is intended to include the area, let us make absolutely sure about it and do so specifically. If the government does not like my amendment, let it bring in some other appropriate amendment to cover the point I have been trying to make. Will the government bring in an amendment to cover the point I have been trying to make?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, if the purpose of the amendment is to ensure that jurisdiction in matters of pollution in respect of the Yukon and Northwest Territories is covered by this wording, the answer is, yes it is. If one says explicitly that this must include the Yukon and Northwest Territories, one would also have to say yes to a plea on the part of the representatives of Newfoundland for that province to be mentioned. And, if you are to include Newfoundland explicitly, what about Ontario?

Mr. MacEachen: Why not include Cape Breton?

Mr. Drury: I have received a representation about Cape Breton. Unless the hon. member feels that the Yukon and Northwest Territories are excluded, he perhaps will accept my assurance that they are included. They are not excluded, and the fact that they are not excluded does not seem to me to be a good reason to mention them explicitly.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, may I ask another question? If the minister does not want to mention the Northwest Territories and the Yukon area by name, will he include the land use regulations in the schedule which assigns environmental problems to the jurisdiction of the department?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I did not get the exact significance of the question. Unquestionably, under this statute the co-ordinator, the man who has responsibility for pollution control, will have authority vested in him except in those areas where it is expressly vested in another minister.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, may I speak to that point, which is of concern to all of us. Responsibility for fighting pollution in various areas of Canada is vested in different ministers. The government gained much ground in dealing with Arctic sovereignty on the ground that the environment of that part of our country was particularly sensitive to the threat of pollution. Yet I see that responsibility for this particular area, according to the schedule, is not to be under the minister designated but will remain under the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This is the kind of splitting up of jurisdictional responsibilities that worries us. We are concerned because it may mean buck-passing and people never really being certain who has responsibility for control in this very vital area. If the ecology of the area of the Arctic over which Canada has declared sovereignty is particularly sensitive, it follows that the ecology of the lands immediately south of that where a great amount of development will take place, often in the absence of any control, is equally sensitive. This area should also be covered by this bill. This is the whole point of the exercise.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? The question is on the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Harding) negatived: Yeas, 17; nays, 39.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. McCutcheon: I wish to ask the minister one question. Why is meteorology included in subclause (d) of clause 5?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is as well aware as I am that meteorology, in the present state of the art, is principally concerned with the measurement of air movement and, to a lesser degree, air quality, as well as an attempt to forecast the weather. In this sense, it is merely a measuring rather than a control device. The apparatus we now have is not for the purpose of regulating, but merely measuring and forecasting. One of the agencies which will be largely concerned with these measurements and forecasts is the department of the environment. I hope it will be able to undertake measures designed to improve the quality of the air. In order to do this, there must, of course, be some great familiarity with the operation of the medium in which the department is interested.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment to clause 5. I move:

That clause 5 of Bill C-207 be amended by adding thereo next after line 37 on page 2 a new sub-section (h)
(h) pollution prevention and control

This is a new subclause, pollution prevention and control. The President of the Treasury Board objected to knocking out some of the phraseology in the bill presently before us. One way of partially getting around this problem would be to add this new subclause. The legislation would then directly state that pollution prevention and control would be under this department.

Perhaps this amendment will be more acceptable to the government. There is certainly nothing wrong with it. This is the reason for the establishment of the new department. The amendment will cover a lot of the sins omitted in the present legislation. I urge members of all parties to seriously consider this amendment. We need this provision in the legislation. We have enough trouble now with pollution. There is absolutely no reason why a simple amendment like this should not be accepted by the government.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, it will be seen from examining the bill that the words "pollution" and "pollution control" are not used. In Canada and elsewhere we are faced with the problem of precisely understanding what is meant by the term "pollution". It means different things to different people. In order to avoid this difficulty and still give effect to the purpose to which this amendment is allegedly directed, clause 5 (e) expresses this purpose, but in perhaps more precise terms. Clause 5 (e) reads:

the protection and enhancement of the quality of the natural environment, including water, air and soil quality;

I suggest to the hon. member that the responsibility vested in the minister covers a wider spectrum than words which are liable to a variety of interpretations, namely pollution and pollution control. I think that the object being sought by the hon. member is more than adequately covered in clause 5 (e).

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the remarks of the minister. He stated how difficult it is to precisely define pollution and pollution control because it means different things to different people. I agree. If these terms are difficult to define in clause 5, why is the same phrase used at the end of clause 6 (a)? I invite the minister to tell the committee exactly what it means there. If the minister's argument is based on the difficulty of definition in one clause, he might have some further difficulties with the next clause. A definition within a bill is a definition. The minister is not very convincing.

The reason my colleague and I are interested in having this particular clause added to the bill is the same as we argued on the previous amendment. We would like to underline and emphasize the need to give the minister power under this bill to take the necessary steps. The minister is a reasonable man. I am sure he can prevail upon his colleagues to accept this reasonable amendment, especially after the explanation he has given and the one I have given in return.

Mr. Baldwin: Pretty optimistic.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the last speaker stole part of my message out of my mouth. Not only is it true that the phrase "control pollution" is used in clause 6(a), which is the next clause with which we shall be dealing, but the expression also appears at the end of clause 5(g). So obviously somebody thought when drafting this measure that it had some meaning that could be expressed in a statute. Therefore, I think the minister's argument falls by the wayside. No doubt upon reflection the minister will conclude that we should vote to accept the reasoned amendment to clause 5, as I intend to do.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I must confess I was caught in ignorance as to the term "pollution". I can only suggest that fortunately in clause 6(a), to which reference was first made, it appears as an alternative or literation of the previous phrase "standards relating to environmental quality, or to control pollution", the suggestion being that these are essentially the same things.

I would have some hesitancy about accepting amendments of this character that are designed to emphasize powers which already appear in the act. As the hon. gentleman is well aware, drafting statutes is a rather esoteric art with which I am not too familiar. Grave mistakes can be made through light-hearted attempts to improve the language of the draftsman, and unless the powers outlined in the bill are sought to be changed, we should not really try to improve the drafting. I suggest to both hon. gentlemen who have spoken that clause 5(e) covers the point they are seeking to make, though in slightly different words.

[Mr. Drury.]

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I know the minister did not mean to suggest that because we were not shouting and pounding our desks our approach to this matter was light-hearted. On the contrary, some of us are very heavy-hearted when we look at this piece of legislation. It seems to me the minister suggested that this was an "either/or" proposition relating to environmental quality or to pollution control and they may be one and the same thing. On the contrary, those two phrases may mean something entirely different. If "pollution control" is difficult to define, it occurs to me that the minister would have difficulty in defining "environmental quality". If that had not been the case, I suggest there would not have been such an astonishing reluctance to assert the concept of national standards for water quality when we were debating the Canada Water Act.

I was also impressed with the minister's line of thinking that the members of this House should be reluctant to alter or to amend particular sections of a piece of legislation which had been drawn by, as I think he described them, esoteric experts in bill drafting. If that is the case, then why are we engaged in a clause by clause study? Perhaps we are just here to shout at one another.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I was not suggesting that we are engaging in a fruitless exercise; I think I said unless it were desired to change in a material way the powers or authority granted by the bill, we should think twice about amending it. If an amendment seeks merely to emphasize a certain phrase or to make it clear, then I would have some hesitancy about accepting it. I suggested that clause 5(e) does confer the responsibilities and powers on the minister that the hon. gentleman has suggested in his amendment. We should hesitate before trying to make these powers clearer and look hard at the drafting problem. That is all I said.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make two points. I find the minister's argument against this amendment very weak. I would like to express to him some sympathy since I feel he has been placed in a most difficult position this afternoon, inasmuch as the minister who will be responsible for the implementation of the various aspects of this part of the bill is not in the Chamber. This is unfortunate for the quality of the debate and for our attempt to determine the best legislation possible.

The minister has made a number of arguments, some of which have been dealt with. A moment ago he suggested that if this matter is important it should be referred to someone outside the House. It seems to me that that approach is contrary to the way this institution operates. On the other hand, if the minister is arguing that the proposition is already covered by the bill, then I cannot see what his argument is all about. He seemed to indicate in another argument that perhaps it was taken care of under clause 5(e). I feel there is something fundamental involved here, and it is to that that I direct the attention of the committee for a moment.

Five, 10 or 15 years ago, a debate on the establishment of this kind of department would have seemed irrelevant to the point of ridiculousness. It was not the thing then to be concerned about the future, or the possible non-future, of the environment. But in the last decade we have heard increasingly of the danger of pollution, so much so that now a great body of material has been written indicating that the natural resources of this earth are not inexhaustible, and certainly not those within our own jurisdiction.

There seems to be one attitude—perhaps this is the attitude reflected by what the government is about to do—that we should merely take some kind of band-aid approach to what is really a most basic problem. This approach to pollution is: "We will simply try and muddle through as best we can and dampen down the most glaring evidences of pollution that affect some aspect of our land, our water or our air". If the minister's attitude is being correctly reflected here this afternoon, there seems to be a willingness to adopt a kind of fire engine approach in which you rush in, put some water on the fire, and hope that everything will be taken care of, instead of having a positive desire to, in some instances, effect a very major restructuring of industries or undertakings that are continually contributing to pollution.

The minister indicated a few moments ago that it was very difficult to define what is meant by "controlling pollution". However, that is the phrase used in the bill. It may be that we are faced with some kind of good-guy approach and there will be an attempt to deal with the problems of pollution without causing too much sweat or getting too many people upset. That approach may satisfy some people but it certainly does not satisfy me, and I do not think it satisfies the hon. member who introduced this amendment.

I suggest that if we are serious about dealing with pollution, we must concern ourselves with preventive measures. We must, in many cases, get at the root cause of pollution, which in itself is a continuing problem. In the final analysis, if we are to make a major change in our attitude in this country, the emphasis will not be placed on controlling pollution, because that could mean anything. Certainly, it does not indicate the department is going to adopt the attitude of trying to eliminate pollution; it simply means that the department is going to involve itself in some way with pollution, which might amount merely to making some kind of report on a regular basis, or taking some other superficial or limited approach to the problem. If the commitment of this new department is, in effect, the eradication of pollution, then the word "prevention" must be in this bill. It is not just a question of semantics; it is a question of basic attitude.

If the minister feels, as he mentioned a moment ago, that there is an important question of interpretation and that there is a sophistication beyond this House in terms of drafting this legislation, then I suggest we should allow the clause to stand. I think this whole matter will have to be debated quite seriously at some stage, but in this instance at least if he feels there is a question which should be resolved by the law officers of the Crown, or whoever drafted this bill in its final form, surely we should allow the clause to stand. I do not want to put words into the hon. member's mouth, but I am sure the mover of this amendment would be quite willing to allow it to stand so that there could be sufficient consultation to clear up any difficulties and make sure it will not jeopardize any other legal aspect of the bill.

I suggest it will not be enough for this government to say: "Sure, this is what we mean. We are concerned with the eradication of pollution, or, we are concerned primarily with preventing pollution and that is the reason we are setting up this new department". Words from the minister or any other members of this House, if I may say so without disrespect to their own worth or sincerity, mean nothing. They mean nothing in so far as the legal interpretation of this bill is concerned. If we are serious, and if the government is serious, in eliminating, removing and preventing pollution, then clear-cut language has to be used in the establishment of this new department. I do not really think it is possible for the minister to pass the matter off by saying it is a question of definition or the problem is already covered in some sort of general way.

The essence of the commitment of this government and this department is, in fact, to eradicate pollution from this country. This is about as basic as anything can be in respect of the establishment of this department and in respect of dealing effectively with the growing problems of pollution in this country.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I endorse the words of the last two members who spoke from this side of the House. Let me point out to the minister and the government that we are not here to harass them with amendments. We have done a lot of thinking about this problem. We have delved into this matter and we are convinced this amendment will tighten up the legislation. That is why we brought it forward. There is absolutely no doubt about the fact that the people of Canada want a good bill which will give the department the power to get at the pollution problems facing the nation. We are not certain about the wording of this bill and we have put a great deal of time and study on it. We are not convinced that it covers everything.

I am quite willing to let this amendment stand if the government wants to have a little more time to check it to find out how it will affect the other clauses of the bill. This debate may continue for a day or two and the government will have ample time to take up this matter with the appropriate staff. I have no objection at all to allowing this amendment to stand if that is the wish of the minister or the members of the committee. That would suit me just fine. Let me point out that last year we fought the Canada Water Act in the House. We were fighting for national standards and for the need for industry to recycle the effluent within the factory fences. What do we find now? Within six months after the bill passed the man who will be the new minister of this department travelled throughout Canada saying the very things we enunciated six, seven or eight months before.

The amendments we proposed in this regard were defeated by that group across from us.

We suggest that the government should not get into the same box it got into last year by turning down amendments that would help tighten the legislation. I again urge hon. members of the House to accept this amendment. If they will not accept it, at least they should take time to consider if for a day or two.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in support of what the hon. member has said. We find ourselves in the position today of having the President of the Treasury Board reject out of hand amendments that could very well meet with the approval of the minister who is responsible for the administration of this department. The President of the Treasury Board has indicated the reason for the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, and it is a good and logical reason. His presence is required at the federal-provincial conference taking place in this city today. Notwithstanding that, this amendment could very well be held over until tomorrow. I make this suggestion seriously and honestly because in my view this is a very important amendment. I have an amendment which I hope will be accorded the same treatment.

I suggest to the President of the Treasury Board, and hon. members of the House, that we are very serious about this matter, particularly in the light of the experience we had with the Canada Water Act, as pointed out by my hon. friend. As suggested, sometime after the passage of that Act we found the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry going around the country enunciating the same positions we had taken. In fairness to the members of the committee who are serious about this matter, I suggest that the minister hold this amendment until the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has had an opportunity to listen to arguments in connection with it.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think that the question is whether the present wording confers or does not confer certain powers on the minister. I feel as strongly as he does about the importance of the task in which he is about to engage. Whether he shares my satisfaction with the present wording, and believes it embraces all those responsibilities and powers, I do not know. Perhaps he should be here himself to express his opinion.

On the advice of the legal advisors, I continue to suggest that the authority being sought by the amendment is already included in the bill. In the interests of amity I would agree that we stand this amendment until the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry comes back to the House. I hope he will say the same thing.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 5 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 5 stands.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Since clause 6 relates to the same question, there might be some consequential amendments. I wonder whether we could not stand that clause as well, rather than get into a long debate we will have to repeat for the benefit of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry when he returns.

Mr. Drury: If hon. members propose amendments, we might as well know what they are.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which is not to clause 5 or to clause 6. It involves a new clause and I should like to refer to it at this stage because this is where it belongs.

The amendment I intend to move deals with the need for setting up an environmental council of Canada which would be an advisory body to assist federal and provincial governments on problems of pollution. I might add that this is the recommendation of the Science Council of Canada, and it seems to me that reference should be made to it in the bill. Again, I want to point out that if the government wishes to introduce an amendment of this type it would be fine with me. I do not care who brings it in as long as it gets into the legislation, because I think it is a very essential part of our fight against pollution problems throughout the nation.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West:

That Bill C-207 be amended by adding a new section 6 and renumbering the following sections:

6. The minister of environment shall create an environmental council of Canada whose task would be to:

(a) conduct and publish studies and forecasts of environmental problems in Canada

(b) make analytical reviews of environmental questions which are of public interest

(c) advise the federal and provincial governments in the area of pollution prevention and cleanup

(d) advise particular ministries of the interrelationship between resource development and environmental protection

(e) advise as to the need for specific environmentally-oriented research.

The Chairman: The Chair has listened to the amendment and I have some concern about its procedural acceptability. It would seem at first blush—and I may not be accurate in my initial assessment—that the amendment contains financial implications. The recommendation attached to the bill under consideration does not seem to anticipate covering the sort of charge that might follow the adoption of this amendment. But if hon. members, including the hon. member who moved the amendment, have advice for the Chair, I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. Harding: May I say just a word on this amendment. Possibly one way of overcoming the difficulty may be found by using the words "the minister of the environment shall consider creating". This is not the way I would like the wording to appear in the legislation, but I think it might get around the difficulty which you have indicated, Mr. Chairman. This wording would make the amendment eligible for discussion before the committee. We might even put in the word "may" so that the amendment would read "the minister of the environment may create an environmental council of Canada". This might get around the technicality facing us. I would ask leave of the committee to make that change so that we can discuss the proposal because I think a very important principle is involved which should not be omitted from the legislation before us.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should try to find sin where it is not easily perceptible. There is nothing in the amendment that would in any way suggest the environmental council shall cause a charge to be levied on the Crown. It may well be that if the amendment were passed, the government would be faced with the responsibility of finding dedicated people, either within the public service or outside it, who would serve on this council. I think the Chair must find, as a condition precedent to saying that the amendment is not in order, that it actually contains a provision which would logically lead the Chair to believe that a charge will be made against the Crown. Putting it in reverse, without authority being granted in a statute, no funds can be provided in the estimates. This amendment does not purport to enable the government to pay anybody. As I said, the amendment may create some problems for the government in finding people who will serve on the council, but there is nothing in the amendment to suggest that money would have to be expended.

It is a dicey problem, comme ci comme ça. I suggest, however, that under these circumstances the Chair would be justified in accepting the amendment. There is a rule which provides that the Chair should be vigilant in trying to find an amendment is in order. However, unless an examination of the amendment reveals a clear direction which will result in a charge upon the Crown,—while we may be faced with some doubt as to what will be the result of the amendment—the amendment cannot be ruled out of order. It is not for the Chair to decide what the result of the amendment will be. The Chair must decide whether this amendment specifically provides for a charge. If it does not, I submit with great deference that it should be considered to be in order.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I am filled with admiration for the deviousness of the Conservative House Leader. He is eloquent and articulate but unfortunately thoroughly unconvincing. I am sure he has had no more luck in convincing you, Mr. Chairman, than he has had in convincing me. Let me follow through with his inverted logic. If it is accepted that this amendment is in order and as a consequence does not impose a charge upon the Crown, this will then be a clear instruction to the minister to operate this particular section without there being any charge, otherwise he would be contravening the law.

Mr. Baldwin: Perhaps I will serve without charge.

Mr. Drury: To suggest that he will be able to have an effective council to advise not only him but also the general public and provincial governments at no cost to the Crown does not seem to me to be a reasonable proposition. We, as a House, could be well charged with endeavouring to legislate unrealistically, and we would not want to get into that position, I am sure, nor would the House Leader. While one should not seek reasons for finding an amendment not to be in order, I suggest this is one of the clear cases when, to be practicable, there would have to be a charge upon the Crown. If there were no charge upon the Crown, then the modus operandi would be unrealistic.

Mr. Baldwin: With regard to the substance of what the President of the Treasury Board said, may I point out that the government is receiving a lot of bad advice for which it is paying a lot of money. It would be interesting to see what it would do with advice for which it did not have to pay. It might be good advice for a change.

Mr. Jerome: I would just like to add briefly to the discussion the reference in May's 17th edition at page 551, subparagraph (13), which reads as follows:

> Amendments on new clauses creating public charges cannot be proposed, if no money resolution or ways and means resolution has been passed, or if the amendment or clause is not covered by the terms of the resolution.

The principle is clear that if an amendment changes the terms of the recommendation that is before the House—and certainly that would be the case in the present instance—it cannot be made. The citation continues:

> This rule, which is of fundamental importance, is fully explained in Chapter XXV and on page 803.

Accordingly, I would invite you, Mr. Chairman, to find that the proposed amendment clearly seeks to amend the terms of the recommendation, and therefore must be faulty.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, as usual the government spokesmen are several years behind the times. The precedent cited applies to the situation before the rules were changed when a bill of this kind had to be based on a resolution. As I say, that has been changed. Now, there is a recommendation from His Excellency. If this amendment were couched in such terms as compelled us to derive from it the clear impression that money must be paid, then obviously the recommendation must be amended. However, what the parliamentary secretary has said has absolutely no application to this situation. The citation applied prior to 1968 when the rules of the House were changed in this respect.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the case has been argued so well and so effectively by others, especially by the hon. member for Peace River, that there is really nothing much I need to add. However, there have been two nonsensical statements from the other side of the House which I hope the Chair will ignore. The President of the Treasury Board suggests that if this amendment were passed it would be a clear instruction to the government to appoint counsel without paying them any money. It does no such thing. It calls for the appointment of the counsel, and makes no provision for any expenses, but that would not stop the government from putting an item in the estimates if it wished to do so.

The second nonsensical statement from the other side has, of course, just now been deflated by the hon.

member for Peace River. The requirement that an amendment must not go beyond the terms of the recommendation that we receive from the Governor General is only to the effect that it must not go beyond the money provisions of that recommendation. If the amendment now before the House does not in itself, involve the expenditure of money it is in no sense going beyond the terms of the recommendation that the Governor General attached to this bill. Indeed, all that appears in that recommendation, so far as this whole part of the bill is concerned, is these words, "to establish a department of the environment." I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that just as there have been other amendments seeking to enlarge upon or alter the terms under which the department of the environment would be operated, so, too, this one is in order.

I agree that the wording might be better if, instead of saying "shall create" it said "may appoint," but even if that change were not made, I still submit that the proposal itself does not directly involve the expenditure of money and should not be ruled out on that score. Rather it seems to me that this is an attempt to improve upon the conditions of the department of the environment, and therefore the amendment should be put so that the committee can vote on it.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, may I add very briefly to the comments that have been made in rebuttal to what the parliamentary secretary has raised as a point of order. When one looks at the recommendation it is very brief in this respect. All it says is, "to establish a department of the environment." I suggest the parliamentary secretary is trying to say that the government should be allowed to give its interpretation of what those words mean, but that nobody on this side of the chamber is to be allowed to give an intepretation, or to move any amendments, motions, or what have you, with regard to the setting up of an important government department.

If one accepts his argument and takes it to its logical conclusion, then it would have very disastrous consequences for the operations of this committee and for the operations of the House of Commons. Therefore, I think Your Honour has no choice but to refuse such an argument coming from one in a junior ministerial position, and to assert that the practices and privileges of Parliament are quite something else indeed.

Mr. Jerome: With the greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that all three members who have spoken from the other side on this point of order have missed the basic point of the argument altogether. The point is that the wording of the recommendation, if one will refer to it just briefly, starts out with these very important words, "His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure—." These words surely make it abundantly clear that the recommendation of the Governor General is directly related to the provisions contained in the measure. He has examined the measure and he recommends "the present measure" to the consideration of the House.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Peters: Then, what is the point in having committee of the whole if you cannot move any amendments?

Mr. Jerome: Accordingly, it is clear that the Governor General's recommendation is related to the measure he is recommending to the House, and that the change which is proposed at the present time is, in fact, something that is added on, something that is not contained in the present measure by anyone's interpretation of that phrase. I cannot see how any member could argue the opposite position, that there could be any other meaning than that the Governor General has examined the measure and recommended it. I am sure hon. members would agree it would be sufficient for the Governor General to indicate, "His Excellency has recommended to the House the present measure," and that would be a sufficient and satisfactory recommendation for the purpose of our rules because it is related to the measure that is put before the House. Those words, "the present measure", circumscribe the recommendation that has been given by His Excellency. Accordingly, anything that is added—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Jerome: By all means.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does he realize that what he is saying is that no amendments at all can be made?

Mr. Jerome: No, that is not so. Changes may be made to legislation put before the House that do not impose an additional charge on the treasury.

Mr. Baldwin: You are begging the question.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into details on the argument of whether or not this amendment would qualify under the old rules, but I think this discussion raises some very serious questions. We have made substantial changes in the rules of the House, and we have been very conscious of some of them in terms of dealing with money resolutions. But I think the attitude of the parliamentary secretary with respect to the interpretation of this particular amendment is obsolete and reactionary.

To adopt such an obsolete attitude with respect to amendments of this kind would prevent this chamber from making a proper contribution. I would agree that if this resolution is considered by the Chair to involve the expenditure of money, it would be out of order in terms of the old rules of the House. I think there is some debate as to whether it actually does involve that, but even if that is the case we must consider the importance of the decisions made in this chamber. The kind of precedent established here must not negate the principle that this House can make the kind of decision that is involved in the amendment put forward by the hon. member. In arguing against that principle the parliamentary secretary is adopting a most reactionary and obsolete approach, and is really arguing against this House being a viable chamber, able to make decisions of this kind. I really cannot understand his argument.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am shocked at the position put forth by the parliamentary secretary. What he is really saying is that no change can be made to the original proposal put to the Governor General and endorsed by him. I see the government house leader nodding his head. If that is so, Mr. Chairman, then you have a very serious decision to make. If that is really what is involved, Mr. Chairman, then you are now deciding whether or not there should be a Parliament at all. If that argument is sound all you need is the Governor General and the cabinet. No amendment whatsoever, money or otherwise, could alter the proposal put forward by them. In that case, all we could do would be to get down on bended knee and ask the minister if he would be prepared to take a recommended change to cabinet, and have cabinet ask the Governor General to endorse it. If that is the position, Sir, your responsibility is going to be very grave because you are really deciding whether or not this is a democratic institution which can make amendments if the majority of members agree.

Really, the decision that the parliamentary secretary is leaving up to you, Mr. Chairman, is whether the Parliament of Canada has the power to move an amendment after the Governor General has examined a bill. If you decide affirmatively, and support the parliamentary secretary, your decision, I submit, will mean that there is no Parliament at all. I suggest that that would be a very grave decision for you to make, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Chairman, apparently the discussion has come full circle. The first speaker on the other side conceded, and certainly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre conceded, that if the amendment imposed a further charge on the treasury, it would be out of order. It would contravene the rules.

Mr. Peters: But he did not say that any change would be out of order.

Mr. Jerome: I am addressing myself to a narrow point. The hon. member for Timiskaming has attempted to say that, according to my argument, no amendments are possible. That is ridiculous.

Mr. Peters: The parliamentary secretary is saying that.

Mr. Jerome: That is absurd. We are addressing ourselves to a question that I think is fundamental. Obviously, to judge from the remarks of the hon. member for Timiskaming, he does not know that it is fundamental. Two speakers from the opposition side have conceded that if the amendment proposes an extra charge on the treasury, then it is out of order. If we can start with that point and stick with it, then surely it would be sensible to attempt to understand the terms of the recommendation.

The argument brought forward was that since the recommendation, the fourth line of the paragraph, reads "to establish a department of the environment", hon. members opposite may establish the department in accordance with their taste. That power to do so is circumscribed by the ability to draw on the treasury, and that cannot be done without the recommendation of His Excellency. Also, there is a specific recommendation to be considered which is the subject matter of the discussion before the House. The limiting factor is His Excellency's recommendation. Since His Excellency has taken the trouble to say that he has examined the bill, his recommendation is obviously a fundamental part of the legislation and we are bound by it.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, many of us are becoming confused. There is confusion arising from the changed rules. We are using precedents that predate the new rules. That is one thing. The parliamentary secretary has again said that since His Excellency the Governor General has looked at the bill, the recommendation of His Excellency cannot be changed. We cannot dot one "i" or cross one "t" because, if we did, the Governor General would not have looked at the changed bill, and he may not have approved it if it had been changed in that way.

I make no argument about the financial resolution. I am merely arguing that if the parliamentary secretary's position remains that we cannot bring in amendments just because the Governor General has seen the bill, then there really is no Parliament.

Mr. Jerome: I was speaking of changes which pertain to charges on the treasury, period.

Mr. Peters: But the parliamentary secretary did not say that.

Mr. Jerome: Of course, I did.

Mr. Peters: If he did, it was not clear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, this debate will make interesting reading. I hope the parliamentary secretary will read it and see what he said on at least two occasions. Earlier this afternoon he read the first line or two of the recommendation. This is what he read, "His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure...". Then he said, and he should have stopped there, that he has recommended this measure in this form; and, by having seen this measure and having recommended it to the House, that the House is circumscribed. We cannot do anything but accept what is in there.

My friend for Timiskaming was perfectly right. If that is the interpretation to be placed on the rule, we may as well quit the committee stage because no amendments are possible. You must take the bill the way it is introduced. That, however, is not the position. The position, so far as the Governor General's recommendation is concerned, is that we cannot exceed the financial aspect of that recommendation.

Mr. Jerome: That was exactly my point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If that is the hon. member's point, I wish that he would state it and not go back to his other point, namely, that we cannot do anything because the Governor General has recommended to us this measure. May I quote from Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, at page 216, citation 250. After discussing the limitations Beauchesne says:

This principle,—

This principle being that there cannot be additional expenditures.

—however, is apparently disregarded when the recommendation of the Crown is given to a resolution empowering the expenditure of public money which, framed in general terms, places no limitation on the amount of expenditure to be authorized by the resolution.

The resolution stage has gone, but we still have the recommandation. The Governor General's recommendation with respect to this bill is simply that we have authority to establish the department of the environment. That bit of the recommendation, Mr. Chairman, contains no reference about amounts of money. I say it is clear that we have the right to move amendments, and it is open for us to say in more detail what that department of the environment shall do. I still say that, in the over-all sense, a private member must avoid a motion which directly enlarges the expenditure of money. My friend for Kootenay West has avoided that. In his motion there is no proposal for the spending of money, and I submit that he is completely within the authority which says that a private member may propose amendments to a bill which add to its specifications and qualifications so long as they do not directly involve the expenditure of money. That is all that is involved in this procedure.

If you listen to the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary, that because the Governor General has recommended this present measure we are therefore bound by the limits of the measure, then of course you will get us into trouble. I submit that when this debate has been thoroughly digested, it will be seen that the weight of the argument comes down on the side of the hon. member for Kootenay West, and that he may move an amendment.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Chairman, may I clarify my position, hopefully, for the last time. The only importance of His Excellency's recommendation for the purposes of this debate is that it is the limiting power. That is all it is. The recommendation limits us with respect to the financial provisions contained therein. I ought to have said this afternoon that we are limited by the recommendation in respect of the financial provisions contained therein. If I did not say the last words it was only because I thought it was totally unnecessary. Certainly, the recommendation limits the financial provisions; we are clear about that. We are arguing whether this amendment proposes an extra charge on the treasury and, if so, whether it is limited by the provisions of the recommendation and, therefore, out of order. The provisions of the recommendations, I say, clearly relate not just to the establishment of the department of the environment, but to the establishment of the department of the environment as set out in the measure to which His Excellency has given his attention. I am talking only in terms of the charge on the treasury and His Excellency's recommendation thereto. I say that the legislation is clearly circumscribed by the terms of his recommendation.

If we see that the amendment involves an extra charge on the treasury, it will be clear that the amendment is out of order. The establishment of some kind of council, staffed by human beings who must be paid, constitutes a charge on the treasury. It is as ridiculous for us to say that that new council would not be a charge on the treasury as to say that we could appoint a new cabinet minister to look after certain departments without remunerating him.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, since I raised this particular point, perhaps I might be permitted to say a few words. I note that we have been joined by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. I presume he now shares the piloting of this part of the bill with the President of the Treasury Board. While we have engaged in a pleasant exercise with the parliamentary secretary, that knowing old fox, the President of the Privy Council, has been sitting quietly in his seat. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, who will be the minister of environment, may want some help. Will he tell his colleagues to cease persisting in niggling and haggling so that we can get on with the bill?

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, in the same vein as the previous speaker, I should like to ask the future minister of the environment whether he would like to have a national advisory council on the environment. I note that in today's Order Paper there is a recommendation by the Governor in Council with regard to a clean air act for Canada. It recommends an advisory committee and other committees in connection with air pollution abatement. As it has been the practice of many departments to establish national advisory councils for certain problems, I wish to ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government to establish a national advisory council on environmental quality.

The Chairman: Before the minister answers the question of the hon. member for Parkdale, the Chair will deal with the amendment of the hon. member for Kootenay West and dispose of it at this time. Initially, I agree with and accept the advice of the hon. member for Peace River. He stated that we should not look for sin in these amendments. The Chair certainly agrees. I think it is a general philosophy that we expedite the work of the committee if we are not too technical when looking at amendments. Hon. members will agree the Chair has the responsibility, in so far as it is able, to apply the practices and precedents of the committee when questions such as this arise. I thank all members for their very helpful contributions.

With respect to the matter initially raised by the Chair, as to whether an additional or extra change will be imposed on the Crown if the amendment is passed, I think we must be realistic. The argument of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council has some appeal. He stated that we cannot accept the suggestion that the enactment of an amendment such as this, which would then become part of the statute, would not result in some charge being imposed on the Crown. I refer hon. members to the specific wording of the amendment. It would require the environmental council of Canada to conduct and publish studies and forecasts of environmental problems in Canada, make analytical reviews and advise the federal and provincial governments as well as particular ministries. If the council is charged with these types of responsibilities, an expenditure would be involved.

I agree with the argument made by several hon. members, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that this sort of amendment might be in order. I am sure that hon. members are ingenious enough to draft an amendment along these lines that could very well be in order. As indicated by hon. members, the recommendation provides the authority to establish a department of the environment. Clause 3 reads:

There shall be a department of the Government of Canada called the department of the environment—

The Chair has to draw a distinction. It may be a fairly fine distinction. If it seems that the particular amendment fits within clause 3, which establishes the department, it would be in order. Having said that, the Chair must draw a distinction. This particular amendment moves too far away from the recommendation. It is in fact a substantive motion, not an amending motion, within the terms of the recommendation. It extends or enlarges the recommendation too much. I regret that I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, we appreciate the thought which Your Honour gave to your ruling on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Your Honour invited the ingenuity of various members to substitute some other motion along similar lines which would be more acceptable to the Chair. I should like to do that now. I move:

That Bill C-207 be amended by adding a new Section 6 and renumbering the following sections:

6. The Minister of the Environment may appoint an Environmental Council of Canada whose task would be to:

(a) Conduct and publish studies and forecasts of environmental problems in Canada

(b) Make analytical reviews of environmental questions which are of public interest

(c) Advise the federal and provincial governments in the area of pollution prevention and cleanup

(d) Advise particular Ministries of the inter-relationship between resource development and environmental protection

(e) Advise as to the need for specific environmentally-oriented research.

The Chairman: Order, please. As the members of the committee will have noted, the amendment is in the same terms as that proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West with the exception of replacing the words "shall create" with the words "may appoint". I suggest the effect is to make the amendment permissive. It may be closer to being procedurally acceptable. Without having made any decision, I would like to hear arguments on the point.

I invite hon. members to argue the procedural point. I ask hon. members to assist the Chair as to whether the amendment now before the committee which would permit the minister to appoint a committee would, if enacted, establish a financial obligation. Again, this seems to be a substantive motion which moves beyond the recommendation. I invite hon. members to assist the Chair on that point.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I seemed to detect in your remarks that you might well be compelled, unless very significant and remarkable arguments were addressed to you that persuaded you to change your mind, to declare this amendment out of order. I do not think that was your intention, but on the assumption that it was I would suggest this to Your Honour and to the hon. member who moved the amendment.

We are here driven back to clause 3. In your remarks on the disposition of the last amendment, Your Honour referred to this clause and said that the recommendation provided for the establishment of a department of the environment. That is a pretty wide expression and lots of things can be included within such department. I draw to Your Honour's attention subsequent parts of the bill, such as Parts IV and V which deal with ministers of state and parliamentary secretaries. Those parts might well be called provisions for the relief of members of the Liberal party in the House of Commons. There is a looseness and flexibility there as to the numbers, just as there is in the expression "department of the environment".

Arguing from this, if the hon. member who moved the amendment were willing to consider a further amendment, he could substitute a new clause 6 to provide that the department of the environment may include an environmental council of Canada whose task would be, and then would follow subparagraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f). This might meet the case. I am using here the precise words of clause 3, which provides for the creation of a department of the environment. I am being fairly specific and saying that this department of the environment may include an environmental council.

I put this suggestion forward only in the event that Your Honour does rule this amendment now before the committee out of order. If the hon. member who moved the amendment were willing to accept such further amendment, then I submit it would be squarely within the very specific principles that Your Honour laid down in your previous remarks.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me appropriate only to comment on the new words that give the minister the option to bring this environmental council into being. As Your Honour has suggested, there may be the ingenuity on the other side of the House to bring this amendment before the committee in terms that you would find acceptable. The question therefore becomes: Is this an expression of that ingenuity, or has the hon. member for Peace River more accurately expressed what is in mind?

Your Honour having found the amendment out of order in its previous form, we have to address ourselves only to the question whether it is out of order for the same reasons when it gives the minister the option to create this department. Giving the minister the option does not make that much difference, it seems to me. Once the minister did exercise his option we would run into the same problem. Therefore, the device of giving the minister an option is no better than making the creation of this department mandatory; you have the same evil.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that it is necessary to force upon you the necessity of making a ruling as to whether providing an option constitutes a charge on the crown or does not. I think it is well known that under a variety of general statutes the minister, subject to approval under the Appropriations Act, has the power to appoint advisers to himself. The basic purpose of this amendment is to provide for the setting up of a body to provide the minister with advice. The minister now has authority under other statutes to do this, as I say, subject to approval under the Appropriations Act. Therefore, it may be we are not giving him any authority he does not now enjoy, or will enjoy once the bill is passed. In any event, in either case, approval must be had under the Appropriations Act. I say that this general authority does exist and has been exercised in a number of cases.

I would ask—and perhaps the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry might reinforce this—whether it is wise at this point to specify in such detail the kind of body that should be set up to provide him with advice. I think it is probably more appropriate not to limit his freedom of action in this way, but rather to give him an opportunity, under the general authority that he has, to find from time to time the advisers he needs as he proceeds and as circumstances change. I am sure that he will have heard and accepted the representations being made here without it being necessary to include them in a statute which is not as easily amended or as flexible as the general authorities he presently exercises.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, first of all, on the question of providing an option for the minister to set up an environmental council of Canada and whether or not such action involves additional expense, may I point out that the amendment as proposed does not impose any additional cost on the crown other than the cost that the crown itself may decide to impose and has the power to impose. If the crown were to decide not to set up an environmental council, then that would be the crown's decision, of course. If it decides it will set up an environmental council and provides funds for so doing, then again that is a decision that the crown is making; it is not being made by this House. Consequently, it seems to me that no additional cost would be imposed upon the Crown if this amendment were accepted.

With reference to the point raised by the President of the Treasury Board, I might agree with him as to the specific terms of reference. It might be wiser either not to include them or to couch them in more general terms, but I do not think it is sufficient merely to leave to the discretion of the minister whether to have advisers. It is taken for granted that any minister will secure the advice of experts in his particular field. There should be set up an environmental council which would bring in not only experts but involve representatives of provincial governments, municipal bodies and the general public in one form or another in order to secure the participation of groups particularly concerned about pollution in Canada. It seems to me that this is a desirable step. All that this amendment is proposing is that the minister shall have the power to set up such a council if and when he deems it advisable to do so, and then only when he can persuade his colleagues to authorize the expenditure of money for that purpose.

If the President of the Treasury Board were prepared to accept an amendment that gives the minister the option of setting up an environmental council, if and when he is ready to do so and when his colleagues agree, then it might be possible to put the terms of reference in much more general form, or alternatively to omit any specifics except that the environmental council would embrace experts in the field and also encompass those organizations that have manifested their concern with regard to pollution of the environment.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Parkdale and myself almost brought the minister to his feet a few moments ago to answer this question. He may be able to prove to us that this is exactly what he wants, and therefore the whole argument would become excessive and academic. He may indicate that he plans to go ahead with the establishment of such a council as soon as the department is properly founded and he has had a chance to anchor himself in his ministry. I really think we should hear from the minister before Your Honour makes a pronouncement on this point of order.

The Chairman: I should very much like to hear from the minister if he wishes to address himself to the procedural point. I should also like to hear from other hon. members who wish to do the same. I suggest, with respect, that the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants may be leading the minister slightly away from the procedural point.

Mr. McCleave: He is pretty smart; he will not be led astray.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On the procedural question, if Your Honour had any doubt as to the acceptability of this proposal it must have been completely dispelled by the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board. I thank him on behalf of all members of the House for removing what concern there might have been.

The parliamentary secretary suggested that various means were being attempted to circumvent the problem regarding the expenditure of money. I do not want to get off on this discussion now, but I think at some point we will have to look at this very seriously. We do not have a resolution stage anymore and recommendations are always of such a general nature that if we are going to continue to limit and live by what I think are the absolute rules, we will greatly hamper the effectiveness of this place.

For one thing, we can no longer hold up supply in what was the traditional manner up to a year or two ago. We have substantially altered the rules in respect of the control of expenditure of money by this government. If we are to avoid downgrading the workings of Parliament even more, we must look at this whole question thoroughly and objectively. Perhaps, in the first instance, it should be referred to the Committee on Procedure, although at some point I think it must involve a debate in the whole House because it is a basic matter.

I felt the President of the Treasury Board had overcome all the problems your Honour must face this afternoon when he indicated that under the Appropriations Act there is provision for ministers to establish the kind of body envisaged by this amendment. In effect, we would not be asking for the expenditure of any money which is not otherwise provided for by statute.

If that is the case, and I take the President of Treasury Board at his word, there is no problem. The President of the Treasury Board has said consciously that there is no real procedural question here. We just have a question of substance and it might be quite useful, if your Honour rules in favour of this amendment coming before the House, to have the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry indicate his intentions in this regard.

The Chairman: If hon. members have completed their arguments on the procedural aspect, I might deal with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. In my earlier remarks I suggested that the hon. member could no doubt draft an amendment which would be procedurally acceptable to the Chair and might very well fulfil the purpose of the amendment then before the committee. With great respect I think that, from the procedural standpoint, the hon. member really has not changed anything by changing the two words. The question seems to the Chair to be one of relevancy, and in turn the question of a financial provision.

The purpose of part I of Bill C-207 is to establish a minister and a department of environment. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to establish an environmental council of Canada, and it sets out the tasks to be assigned to this council. The question is whether the proposal contained in the amendment fits within the recommendation and part I of the bill. If they do fit, it would be acceptable because the authority is there.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when speaking to the first proposed amendment referred to citation 250(3) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. It would seem to me that if the proposed amendment is relevant and within the terms of the recommendation and of the bill, it would be acceptable. Because there is no limiting Provision in the recommendation in respect of the expending of public money, the amendment would be relevant if it fell within the terms of the recommendation and of the bill, and in that sense it should not be ruled out.

In this particular case, I regretfully have to rule out the amendment on the ground that it does not fall within the provisions of the recommendation or of the bill.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I should like to pose a question to Your Honour with regard to your ruling. In view of the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board, who suggested that such expenditure is already provided for under statute, why would an amendment of this nature be out of order on the basis of the provision relating to the expenditure of money already allocated, if only potentially, for a department and a minister of the government? It seems to me that Your Honour perhaps inadvertently failed to deal with that part. The President of the Treasury Board tried to help hon. members in this House deal with this amendment.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think we should hear from the minister about what he plans to do. There was an indication on several occasions that he wanted to speak when questions were directed by the hon. member for Parkdale and myself. There is some indication that hon. members feel this environmental council is a pretty good thing. I placed a resolution directed at such a council on the record the other day, and I do not want to reiterate my remarks. Life would certainly be a lot easier if we had an indication that the minister was listening to some pretty responsible suggestions from this side of the House.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I gather we are off the procedural point now and it might be appropriate for me to say a few words.

First of all, we need an advisory council and it is my intention to appoint one in the next few weeks. This will be an advisory council to the minister of environment, and it will be appointed shortly after the department is properly instituted under the law. It will be an advisory council to the minister similar in character to the Canadian Forestry Advisory Council which we established last year. We will also have an advisory council on fisheries.

I want to repeat that these are councils to provide advice to one minister, not to the Prime Minister or several ministers, and certainly not to the provinces. These were referred to in the motion that has just been ruled out of order. Many members have raised the bigger question as to whether we should have a national advisory council in the sense of a national environmental council much as we have an Economic Council of Canada. Such a council would certainly report to the Prime Minister and would be independent in many ways. It would have its own staff and so on. It would certainly cost more money. This may very well be desirable but I do not think we should deal with it in a bill of this kind, certainly not in a bill that deals specifically with one minister.

So, in brief, my answer again is that I will certainly be setting up an advisory council in the new department of the environment and doing so right away. However, I think the bigger, longer term question of whether we should have a council akin to the Economic Council of Canada reporting at the highest level and reporting to the people of Canada, is another matter which should be dealt with under other legislation at another time.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask the minister whether he has cleared this with the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council?

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question to the minister. There is no doubt that we desparately need a national environmental council, something that is outside the department, somebody that can do the research and can criticize government policies and programs, as well as give to the Canadians public information upon which they will be able to base value judgments so far as all environmental problems are concerned.

Most hon. members realize the absolute necessity of getting a group of experts to do the very job which I have just outlined. This is what we require. Since the amendment is out of order, I will suggest to the minister in all sincerity that he, himself, bring in an amendment to indicate to the Canadian people that we have an all-out attack going on pollution and that we are going to use every facet of information of which we can get hold. We are going to get top resource people in Canada to give us information and advice on how to tackle the problem. This will do a lot of good and will give people confidence that this government will, at long last, take action. I suggest that the minister give serious consideration to bringing in an amendment if he will not accept one from this side of the House.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the minister a question which arises from the vagueness of clause 6. I have to relate back to clause 5 in order to preface my question properly. Clause 5 provides that the minister has certain duties and powers, but does not have any powers or jurisdiction by law assigned to any other department, branch or agency of the government of Canada. May I ask the minister, who will make the ultimate decision about pollution control in areas over which the minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development now has authority, in areas covered by the Canada Shipping Act over which the Minister of Transport has authority and in areas over which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has authority? Under clause 6, can we assume that this minister will have ultimate jurisdiction and control to undertake programs relating to those areas?

Mr. Davis: The common practice under the English parliamentary system, and certainly in the cabinets with which I am familiar, is that each minister is responsible for his own department and for the administration of statutes which fall within the ambit of that department. Where a subject is all-embracing, such as finance, for example, or in this case environment, and several departments, ministers and powers are involved, the reconciliation of any differences has to be made by the government as a whole in the cabinet and under the direction of the Prime Minister. The final decision rests with the Prime Minister, not with any one minister. This applies to finance and to any broad subject of great concern to more than one department.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I, therefore, conclude that the minister of the environment will not be the czar of environmental control in Canada? I want to be completely correct in my interpretation of what the minister said. If the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is looking with great envy across the aisle at the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry who now aspires to be minister of the environment, decided to set certain water standards, for example, in the Fraser Valley and the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry disagreed with him, would this matter have to go back to cabinet and be resolved there? Does the minister mean that he does not have an overriding responsibility for pollution control?

Mr. Davis: Not at all, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of the Environment will have authority in so far as pollution standards are concerned, as well as their enforcement. There may be matters which may overlap. For example, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources may consider an application to drill for oil on the Grand Banks. In that case a mechanism exists already to ensure, for example, that the new department of environment will not only be fully consulted but will have a veto in instances where it decided that this will have an unfavourable effect on the environment. I think that consultation between departments is not only desirable but inevitable. I am sure the hon. member is not suggesting that the minister of the environment will always be able to overrule the Minister of Finance, for example. There has to be consultation and reconciliation.

Mr. Rose: I see we have about two minutes left and I will make my question to the minister very brief and to the point.

I listened with interest to the minister's support for an advisory committee on the environment. He suggested that this advisory committee would be a private body reporting to his department alone. He appeared to be pointing out that this was one of the benefits or advantages of this kind of arrangement. May I point out that it certainly defeats the amendment proposed by my friend, the hon. member for Kootenay West. People on this side of the House are concerned with the kind of structural set-ups that report privately to the government. We have an example of this in consumer affairs. If I had more than a few minutes time, I could go on to list others. I think that if you look down the various points in these amendments, the first being to conduct public studies, you would find that we cannot get information on pulp mill pollution in B.C. because that kind of information goes directly to the minister. It is not available to the public.

May I ask whether the minister is turning down the formation of an environmental council of Canada which would report publicly?

The Chairman: Order, please. It being five o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland)—External Affairs—suggestion by Somalia respecting elimination of trade with South Africa; the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton)—Airports—Regina—Meetings with city regarding sale of city-owned property; the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose)—External Affairs—Proposed oil pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez, Alaska—consultation with United States authorities.

It being five o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the conduct of business during this hour, I wonder if I might point out that on the order paper there are several bills in the names of private members having to do with changes in the names of their respective constituencies. The most recent of those was introduced yesterday. It was thought that since all of these fall due to be considered in this hour today, the best possible arrangement would be to gather all such bills together to be processed in this house and, unless anyone has any objection, to seek the unanimous consent of the House that those bills receive second reading, committee of the whole procedure, and be passed, so that they could be disposed of during this hour. I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to proceed in that manner.

The bills proposed to be dealt with in this way are Bill C-21 in the name of the hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson); Bill C-83 in the name of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard); Bill C-88 in the name of the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather); Bill C-178 in the name of the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Laniel), and Bill C-223 in the name of the hon. member for Bourassa (Mr. Trudel).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Does the House give unanimous consent to the suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary?

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to withhold unanimous consent, but I do want to make one comment. Speaking as one private member and one backbencher, it seems to me we have done very little to regularize a way in which we might deal effectively with private members' public bills during private members' hour.

The argument put forth by the parliamentary secretary is that because these are not substantial measures, as I understand it merely involving the changing of names of constituencies, they are measures, that can be disposed of easily. I would say it is becoming increasingly important that the bills put forward by private members on both sides of the House be effectively dealt with in some fashion so that there is a resolution of them, whether they come to a vote or be referred to a committee. But at the present time, as one member who had a bill debated here recently, one on which all hon. members agreed to the principle, only to see it talked out, I find this practice increasingly offensive to the effectiveness and the utility of private members' hour.

While I will not stand in the way of giving unanimous consent today, I serve notice on the government that if this practice of talking out private members' bills continues, and a better way of dealing with them is not found, I for one will prevent unanimous consent being given in the future.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment just briefly on that. Perhaps the hon. member would be well advised to co-ordinate his efforts with those of his House Leader who is doing quite an adequate job on that matter. In fact, only as recently as this morning, he discussed that matter with the other House Leaders to see if a referral could be made of this subject to the Committee on Procedure.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I resent the inference by the parliamentary secretary that in some way I have been advised, or other members of the House have been advised, of the meetings of a committee which I understand is still meeting. Until that committee makes its recommendations and this House takes a decision on them, I take the view that we have evolved no regular procedure for dealing with private members' bills. In fact, I think we have adopted a very sloppy procedure. I have agreed to it today, but only on the understanding that I will not do so in future unless definite action is taken with respect to private members' bills.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I just make the simple comment that I do not think we will improve the situation by a discussion at this time. I speak as one who would like to see the return of the arrangement whereby there was a whole day devoted to private members' business.

Mr. McGrath: Those were the days, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it agreed that Bills C-21, C-83, C-88, C-178 and C-223 be read a second time and referred to committee of the whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT—MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

The House in committee on Bill C-21, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Mr. Robinson—Mr. Richard in the Chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall the title carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if at least in each case we could have the sponsor of the bill tell us what the new name of the riding is to be. Some people read Hansard, and might like to know what we are doing in this expeditious way.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, I rise on behalf of the hon. member for Lakeshore, at his request, to deal with this bill this afternoon. The purpose of the bill is to change the name of the electoral district of Lakeshore to that of Toronto-Lakeshore.

Mr. McGrath: Where is Toronto?

Mr. Deachman: As the member for Vancouver-Quadra, I can only give you the vaguest kind of general idea where the city of Toronto is situated.

Title agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall I report the bill?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a procedural question, Mr. Chairman, are we taking these bills seriatim, or are we taking them altogether?

Mr. Jerome: No, one by one.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Inasmuch as this and the succeeding bills provide for a change in constituency names, and considering the likelihood that we are not that far away from another general election, I wonder if somebody on the government side of the House could indicate if there will be sufficient time for the Chief Electoral Officer to incorporate these amendments into all the various constituency materials that must be provided by him in the effective discharge of his duties? I think we will be creating some very serious problems if we agree to something if there is not enough time to fully implement the change by the time of the next election.

I assume somebody on the government side has cleared this up with the Chief Electoral Officer, and that the changes can be fully implemented before the time of the next election. If that is not the case, we may be creating more problems than we are solving.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Chairman, it is never possible to predict with accuracy when the next election will take place, but we do have the assurance of the Chief Electoral Officer that it will probably be possible to do all that is necessary before the next election.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): How much time is required?

Mr. Deachman: We have until the spring of 1973 according to the constitution.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT—CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

The House in committee on Bill C-83, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Mr. Béchard—Mr. Richard in the Chair.

On clause 1—Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of Bill C-83 is to change the name of the electoral district of "Bonaventure" to that of "Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine". Doubtless, I will be allowed to make remarks somewhat more elaborate than those of the members who spoke before me because of the importance of this change to my electors of the Magdalen Islands.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that after the government of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson set up an independent commission to revise electoral boundaries, an act of parliament did away, on the electoral map, with the riding of the Magdalen Islands as a separate entity. At the same time, said act bound the territory formerly and until then occupied by the Islands to the riding of Bonaventure.

That decision of the Canadian parliament, Mr. Chairman, was very much resented by the Madelinots at the time, and I am not ready to say that the wound has healed yet. I understood, and I still do today, the normal attitude and reaction of the people of Magdalen Islands.

Indeed, I think the Magdalen Islands should get special treatment, considering their various distinguishing traits.

Firstly, they are isolated, being located and lost in the middle of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, 175 miles from Gaspé and Bonaventure and 100 miles from Prince Edward Island. Secondly, fishing is their only source of revenue. Thirdly, it is quite difficult to get to Magdalen Islands in all seasons, more so in winter when, for instance, the hon. member for Bonaventure who lives in the western part of Bonaventure cannot easily get there on account of the precarious air and maritime transportation between Bonaventure and Magdalen Islands. Besides, air services between Gaspé or between Prince Edward Island and Magdalen Islands are extremely hazardous in winter because of frequent and severe storms. Fourthly, the insular mentality of the people of Magdalen Islands is necessarily and inevitably different.

It is easy to realize that the Îles-de-la-Madeleine must be dealt with in a special way, and we understand thus the vigourous reaction of its citizens regarding the disappearance of the riding which had been established since 1947, under the Electoral Boundaries Act.

The Îles-de-la-Madeleine have had most distinguished representatives. The first one was the father-in-law of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Gervais), the hon. Charles Cannon, Justice of the Quebec Superior Court; the second one was the ex-member for Gaspé, Mr. Russell Keays; the third one, no less distinguished, was the hon. Maurice Sauvé, and since the Îles-de-la-Madeleine are linked up with Bonaventure, I have the great honour of representing the Madelinots, whom I esteem deeply.

It was specially in recognition of these characteristic features of the Madelinots and of their almost unique needs that Parliament has established, in 1947, an independent riding called "Les Îles-de-la-Madeleine".

From this time on, the Madelinots have felt more secure, having their own representative, their own member of the House of Commons, to look after them only and to deal with their problems, without having to deal with situations foreign to the Îles-de-la-Madeleine, as had been the concern of the member for Gaspé, and as it is for the member for Bonaventure.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, one must understand those feelings which are not only those of the citizens of the Îles-de-la-Madeleine but of all Canadian citizens, from Vancouver to Saint Johns, Newfoundland. So, from that time, the Madelirots were sure of having their own representative whose feelings were not divided.

That is why they reacted strongly when the riding disappeared, as they were losing, or so they thought, their real representative, their personal representative with the federal authorities. As the reason given for this change was that the population of the Islands was not large enough, it has appeared impossible, at least until now, to modify the situation and to give back a representative to the Îles-de-la-Madeleine Islands. So, this problem will be dealt with at the next census. The least that can be done for the Islands now, is to grant them some identity by adding the former name of their riding to that of Bonaventure.

The new name I am proposing is more in keeping with the geographic reality of my riding, and will enable to avoid much confusion while at the same time reflecting the pride of my Island electors who have joined my electors from Bonaventure since 1968.

So, I ask the House and the Committee to support this amendment, for which the citizens from the Islands and their representative will be forever grateful.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I shall speak for a moment only because I realize that two or three other bills are to follow. I think it is ironic that the hon. member whose bill is before the House is the very individual who, two or three weeks ago, talked out my private members' bill. That only shows how inadequate is our method of dealing with bills arising in private members hour.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: I wish to inform the hon. member that I have never spoken until 6 o'clock on a bill designed to change the name of his constituency.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, it is not my fault if the hon. member has a bad memory. If he looks at the record he will discover that he was the last speaker on that occasion.

Mr. Béchard: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. member did not understand what I said. I said that I have never talked out a bill sponsored by the hon. member to change the name of his riding.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, my bill was not for changing the name of my riding. It dealt with the abolition of corporal punishment. I will not deal with that now. Obviously, that is not the purpose of this bill. The purpose of this bill is to change the name of the hon. member's constituency.

He has pointed out the most difficult problems encountered in this area, the greatest being the effect of redistribution on an area which originally was represented by its own Member of Parliament. Its status was altered and, in the redistribution of ridings which came into effect in the 1968 election, Îles-de-la-Madeleine was joined with a constituency on the mainland of Quebec.

I realize that the parliamentary secretary has been suggesting that he has presented a simple matter for the consideration of the House. However, as the hon. member conceded in speaking to his own bill, substantial problems must be considered. Îles-de-la-Madeleine has such a small population, when compared with the average size of constituencies, that it was not possible in the view of the boundaries readjustment commission which met, I think, in 1965 and 1966, to establish the area as a separate constituency. Yet it is quite obvious that the interests and concerns of the people of Îles-de-la-Madeleine are different from the interests and concerns of those who live in the mainland of Quebec. I say this because I come from Prince Edward Island. We have a number of close ties.

The hon. member spoke of a lack of airline communication between Îles-de-la-Madeleine and the rest of his riding. There is direct communication from Prince Edward Island to Îles-de-la-Madeleine and, as well, there is communication by boat. I think, when the boundaries commission meets again, that it will need to take into consideration the distinctly different case of a settlement of people that is far removed physically and, perhaps, culturally, linguistically and economically from the rest of the riding.

I am not in any way trying to take away from the abilities of the hon. member to adequately represent those two areas. I am merely saying that it must be very difficult, if not impossible, for him to give effective representation to the entire Îles-de-la-Madeleine area under the present distribution of constituencies. Perhaps when the commission meets again, and quite likely this will be after the census returns have come in this year, they will have to take into account the problems and remarks of the hon. member. He has here, this afternoon, indicated the difficulties that the people of Îles-de-la-Madeleine have experienced since 1968 in being effectively or adequately represented in the House. Their difficulties stem from the fact that they live in a part of the country which, generally, does not share with them a number of common interests. This is a very grave problem and I do not think it will be solved simply by changing the constituency's name. That will save face, I suppose, but I do not think that such action will really deal with the essential problem.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member who has just resumed his seat a question. Since the sponsor of the bill is disturbed, does the hon. member not think it might be worth while considering moving Îles-de-la-Madeleine from the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec to the jurisdiction of the province of Prince Edward Island?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, certainly there is a high degree of economic relationship between Îles-de-la-Madeleine and Îles-de-Prince-Edouard. Both communities, too, contain French speaking populations which are not in the main stream of the French speaking population of Quebec. For a number of years there have been close transportation links. There was a good deal of personal contact between these two places. While we do not want to get into questions involving the constitution, in view of the mutual affinity that seems to exist between Îles-des-Madeleines and Îles-du-Prince-Edouard, it might be well if these two areas could come together in a much more realistic way politically and economically, as well as from the transportation point of view.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT—AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

The House in committee on Bill C-88, Respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment act—Mr. Mather—Mr. Richard in the chair.

On clause 1—Surrey-White Rock

Mr. Mather: Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a few words in support of Bill C-88 to change the name of the constituency of Surrey to Surrey-White Rock.

My constituency is in the deep southwest of this nation. It comprises the municipality of Surrey, the largest municipality in British Columbia, and includes the very beautiful small city of White Rock. The city of White Rock is singular in climate and, in some degree, of location to the south coast of France or the Costa del Sol in Spain. It is an admirable section of the constituency of Surrey.

The intent of the bill is to give a better geographical expression to parts of the riding of Surrey by changing the name of the constituency of Surrey to that of Surrey-White Rock. This will in no way reduce the recognition of the very important municipality of Surrey. It will give better recognition of the importance of the city of White Rock.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT—CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

The House in committee on Bill C-178—Mr. Boulanger (for Mr. Laniel)—Mr. Richard in the Chair.

On Clause 1.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I rise on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Laniel).

I should like to take this opportunity to wish a quick recovery to the Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House, the hon. member for Beauharnois, who had an accident.

The purpose of the bill under discussion is to change the name of the electoral district of "Beauharnois" to that of Beauharnois-Salaberry. On the request of the hon. member for Beauharnois, the motion for concurrence in this bill is seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Jean (Mr. Smith).

The name "Salaberry" is a historic name in that region, and this is where the famous battle of Chateauguay took place.

The use of the name "Beauharnois" raises a problem, because people seem to believe that the boundaries of the riding do not extend as far as Huntingdon, Chateauguay, while the electoral district of Beauharnois includes both sectors.

By saying only "the hon. member for Beauharnois", one never knows whether the federal member or the provincial member is involved.

Therefore, I am pleased to ask the hon. members, on behalf of the hon. member for Beauharnois, to pass Bill C-178.

[English]

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, we are very happy to give our approval to this change. We have listened to the very appropriate words of the sponsor of this bill and the amiable manner in which he brings matters forward. We have already indicated that we will pass this bill without too much debate. I would like to have the assurance of the sponsor of this bill that when opposition members have private bills they will be passed without too much discussion, and certainly not talked out. Will the hon. member promise that he will give the same co-operation and try to have his colleagues do the same?

Mr. Boulanger: I am glad to answer the opposition whip. To show that I am bilingual, I will answer in English. It will be a pleasure to assist in passing bills to change the name of a constituency. The hon. member can count on my support.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT—CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

The House in committee on Bill C-223.—Mr. Richard in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to change the name of the constituency of "Bourassa" to "Montreal-Bourassa".

For quite some time now, the provincial county and the federal constituency have borne the same name of "Bourassa", which creates a lot of confusion among people.

Furthermore, since Quebec's current premier is called Bourassa, people wonder whether it is the electoral constituency of that name, or that which is represented by the premier of Quebec and which is called Mercier. Therefore, we are always wondering what exactly we are talking about. That is why a request was filed to change the name of this constituency to "Montréal-Bourassa".

• (5:30 p.m.)

Furthermore, to do justice to that part of the population of Montreal residing in the constituency of Bourassa, we felt like the other members from the Montreal area that we should add the word "Montreal" to the name of the constituency of Bourassa since that part which is in the city of Montreal accounts for approximately 40 per cent of the entire constituency.

Therefore, I ask the committee members to be so kind as to approve this change in name to eliminate any future misunderstanding.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall clause 1 carry?

[English]

Mr. Skoberg: Does the hon. member agree that it may be easier to change the present premier of Quebec rather than change the name of the constituency?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Chairman, I believe this item was not on the agenda of the Prime Ministers' conference. I wonder whether, by unanimous agreement of the committee of the whole, we could not ask the premier of Quebec to withdraw. I shall however pass on to him the representations of the hon. member for Moose Jaw and shall personally inform him of the reply.

Bill reported.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, seeing that the House has been so co-operative and amiable this afternoon I wonder whether it would give unanimous consent to changing the name Témiscamingue to Quebec Nord-Ouest, since this is also causing difficulty.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I have a problem similar to that of my colleague. My riding is Mercier, which is also the provincial riding of Mr. Bourassa, the Premier of Quebec. I sometimes receive personal letters addressed to "The member for Mercier", and I know from the way they are written that they are not addressed to me, but rather, to Mr. Bourassa. I should like the same thing to be done in my case.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would be agreeable, if the rest of the House is, to changing the name of Témiscamingue riding to Quebec Nord-Ouest.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Chairman, it is only with the deepest regret that no such bill is before the House; otherwise, we would be only too happy to give the matter consideration.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, in view of all these suggestions about name changes, may I say that I am quite happy with "Winnipeg North Centre".

Mr. Jerome: But are they happy with you?

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, since we had such a productive afternoon, and I do not think there is anything else on the agenda—

Mr. Jerome: Third reading.

Mr. Bell: Yes, I am sorry.

Public Bills

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): I think it is time for the Chair to resume ordinary business.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): When shall the said bills be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council) moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill C-21, respecting the Electoral Boundaries, Readjustment Act—Mr. Robinson.

Bill C-83, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Mr. Béchard.

Bill C-88, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Mr. Mather.

Bill C-178, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Mr. Laniel.

Bill C-233, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Mr. Trudel.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: I want to say a few words to thank the House and my colleagues for the courtesy they have shown towards the citizens of the Magdalen Islands and their representative.

[English]

Motion agreed to and bills read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, if I may deal with the business of the House for this evening before we call it six o'clock, the government proposes to deal at eight o'clock with the Indian Affairs reference on the Order Paper, followed by Bill S-4, the New Zealand trade measure and then Bill S-2, the statistics measure. From consultations had with hon. members opposite it is anticipated that there will be little or no debate on these measures. The House will then go to Bill C-184, the Export Development Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Does the House agree to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I do now leave the chair to resume same at eight o'clock p.m. Once again may I suggest to hon. members that they might consider my suggestion that instead of wasting unfinished half hours of their time, as has been the case today and recently, it could be much more logical to discuss their business for a full day on Mondays.

At 5.35 p.m. the House took recess.

[Mr. Bell.]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ANNUAL DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS AND SUBJECT OF ARCTIC ICEBREAKER SERVICE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (for the President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the following matters be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development;

1. The annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for the year ended March 31, 1968 and the evidence adduced by the committee in its consideration thereof during the twenty-eighth Parliament;

2. The annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for the year ended March 31, 1969;

3. The subject matter of Arctic icebreaker service; and

That during its consideration thereof the committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe these terms meet the request of members of the committee and we are happy to agree to this motion.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would just add that while the committee has a very wide bill of fare here, I hope it will not neglect to look at some of the problems raised fairly recently involving the question of logging in Wood Buffalo Park and—

An hon. Member: And the Peace River dam.

Mr. Baldwin: You took the words right out of my mouth. I had in mind the very deteriorating effects on the Mackenzie River system as a result of the stupidity of a previous government allowing this dam to be built. My hon. friend goaded me into saying that. These are questions that have been raised and I know that the committee, which is very dedicated in its duties, will look at these problems.

Motion agreed to.

NEW ZEALAND TRADE AGREEMENT (AMENDMENT) ACT

PROVISION FOR APPROVAL AND COMING INTO FORCE

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill S-4, to implement an agreement amending the trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on third reading of this bill to amend the Canada-New Zealand—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are at the report stage now. Is any debate allowed, if there is no amendment?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Pepin moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on third reading of this bill to amend the Canada-New Zealand trade agreement. The main points of the agreement are not at issue and I am sure that this bill will be passed promptly. However, I would like to say a few words about the present implication of the bill in relation to the impending trading rearrangements that must necessarily follow within a few years. These arise because of the likely entry of the United Kingdom into the European Common Market.

New Zealand, which has long valued the United Kingdom market as its main area of trade, is faced as a result of the entry into the European Common Market by Great Britain with virtual exclusion of its products from Great Britain and the common market. The British are sensitive to the needs of New Zealand and have tried to obtain from the European Common Market assurances that trade from New Zealand can enter the United Kingdom under its old preferential rate. Appreciating the value of the British market, New Zealand supported Mr. Heath at the Singapore conference to do something to counteract Soviet influence in the Indian Ocean.

Although Canada is vitally interested in the British market, especially for agricultural products, the Canadian delegation confined itself to protesting that Great Britain was not affording Canada proper recognition of the importance of Canada's exports to Great Britain, and the Prime Minister then proceeded to negate the importance of maintaining some Western influence in the Indian Ocean.

The importance of the agreement to Canada and New Zealand lies in the fact that until now New Zealand has been largely a dairy producing country depending on the British export market for butter and cheese. But with the possibility of losing drastically their trade with Great Britain in dairy products, New Zealand has introduced a change-over from dairying to beef production and has been looking for markets around the borders of the Pacific, particularly in Canada, the United States and Japan.

Trade with New Zealand was in Canada's favour until 1969, when it became roughly balanced. In 1970 until October, Canada imported $27 million worth of beef. The Canadian beef industry has always operated with a minimum of protection. The flow of beef which has been substantial shows a danger of creating dislocation in the meat industry. Since 1964 the United States has imposed quotas on beef from Australia and New Zealand. The European Common Market has imposed rigid quotas, tariffs and variable levies against all manner of agricultural products, including beef. Japan imposes a quota plus a tariff of 25 per cent of the value—cost plus freight—of beef. The United Kingdom, reversing its almost century-old process of food subsidy in preference to tariff, is now in the process of instituting a system of variable levies for many agricultural products, including beef, to go into effect April 1, 1971.

It is interesting to note that in the other politically sensitive area where importation of New Zealand agricultural commodities such as butter is effectively prevented from being imported into Canada by means of an import licence, the Canadian Dairy Commission has a monopoly—85 per cent of the dairy industry is concentrated in Quebec and Ontario—and this percentage is steadily being raised by the transfer of quotas from the Prairies. This means that the dairy industry will not have to bear any competition from New Zealand, particularly in dairy sensitive areas of eastern Canada. But in the matter of beef production and other forms of meat there is really nothing in this bill that will help even at times of a very severe dislocation of our market. Last year about 7 per cent of the beef consumed in Canada came from Australia, and this year it is estimated that 12 per cent of the beef consumed in Canada could come from Australia and New Zealand.

In the few comments I have made on trade I have indicated the importance of the British market both directly to New Zealand and indirectly to Canada. We all wish, however, that the European Common Market, in the interests of world trade, will reduce the massive walls of tariffs, quotas and other restrictions that have created in the eight years of its existence a relatively inefficient agricultural industry. In conclusion, I should like to state that Bill S-4 can be said to be largely non-argumentative and is welcomed as a means of updating the trade arrangements between New Zealand and Canada.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words during the third reading stage of this bill. My remarks are along the lines of those of the previous speaker in trying to bring some warning to this House and to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) regarding the situation into which we are heading. I first stated my views back in 1969 when the minister returned from a trip to Asia. One of the goodies that he brought back was, as he told us, that we would have an increase in imports of beef from New Zealand. At that time I pointed out that we really did not need that much more beef from New Zealand, that we were practically self-supporting and that we had a satisfactory trade with the United States in beef. Sometimes the products were flowing from their country into ours and sometimes it was the other way around. I also told the minister that he was encouraging imports in a pretty sensitive area.

The minister, who was good enough to reply to me, set out the situation as he saw it. However, I am afraid that even at that time I could not bring myself to agree with him. He pointed out that what we would be bringing in would be largely what can be described as manufacturing beef. Subsequently, I corresponded with the Department of Agriculture to find out what quantities of beef were coming in, the manner in which they were coming in and the manner in which this beef was classified. Predictably, the quantities of beef coming into this country increased to the extent that the Canadian Cattlemen's Association became alarmed, and a recent issue of their magazine carries an article by Mr. Gracey expressing the alarm of the association.

Those who are acquainted with the Canadian Cattlemen's Association know that they do not usually go to the government or raise a protest. I suppose they pride themselves on being one of the last bastions of free enterprise in Canada. Their favourite saying is: We will stand on our own feet. However, they are becoming alarmed because they think their feet will be kicked out from under them. That is the situation. The minister can afford to be bland about it, but frankly I cannot afford be so indifferent to the situation.

In the matter of dairy products we realized a number of years ago that a balance would have to be maintained because of the higher cost of dairy production in Canada as compared with New Zealand which has an extremely favourable climate. We have developed with New Zealand a quota system, an agreement or an arrangement, whereby their products can come in here if they do not unduly disrupt and, indeed, destroy our own market. Yet in discussions in this House I have not been able to obtain any commitment from the government that they are prepared to take a similar attitude with regard to beef. I have raised the question in the House as well as in the committee when the bill was before it. I asked the witnesses before the committee whether the sale by New Zealand of beef in Canada could be regarded as dumping. The answer was no. That is right because the New Zealanders are not selling beef to us any cheaper than they are selling it to their own people.

I also asked the witnesses before that committee whether quotas could be established by negotiation or by agreement, that is, whether we could establish by agreement or by negotiation the quantity of beef that may be allowed into this country. Again the answer was that under this agreement we could. I am a little baffled as to why I am unable to receive a clear and coherent answer concerning the policy that will be followed on the amount of importation of beef from New Zealand in reply to the long series of questions which I put to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), as well as in answer to the question I put in the adjournment debate to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard).

I do not know why they are reluctant to give this information or to set out the policy, unless they do not have a policy. This is what really concerns me. We had such an influx of this product into Canada last year that we were exporting it to the United States to the point where the United States stopped it at the border and said they did not want any more of it. This ban continues. As a result, of course, whatever was on the high seas at that time simply came into Canada. Canada then was forced, through its representatives, I understand, to say to New Zealand that they would have to slow down.

[Mr. Gleave.]

When I asked a question regarding this matter the other night, the answer I received was that if this continues the government will have to take the kind of action that needs to be taken, an answer which was not too clear. I submit to the government that this is just not good enough. I think that the beef producers of this country are entitled to know government policy. They are entitled to know how much beef will be brought into this country, what the limits are and what is the competition in terms of price and volume with which they will have to contend. I think they are entitled to know this, because the people who are producing beef in this country, the farmers and the ranchers, are putting money into production. Cattle herds are increasing. Feed-lot establishments are substantial. All this is capital investment. As I pointed out the other day, we are being urged to plant more land to forage, which means increased beef production, sheep or dairy cattle. Anyone who has followed the policies of the Minister of Agriculture knows he is not encouraging anyone to go into increased dairy production.

• (8:20 p.m.)

What really concerns me is that there is not a limit of policy set out that can be understood to have this are in the business. I think we are entitled to have this limit of policy set out; I think we are entitled to know. I do not think it is good enough to sit and wait while the government decides it may be something or may not do something, to sit and wait until the United States opens its borders and then wait until it closes its borders. According to the information that has been given to me by responsible people in government, it is possible to work out a policy. As the previous speaker said—and he was dead right—New Zealand is doing what it is because it is in a tough position with dairying and sheep and it is increasing its beef production and then exporting its problems to us. I say to the government that we have enough problems of our own. Let us not expect to handle other people's as well.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene only briefly for the purpose of correcting some of the misinformation, or at least wrong information, that has been given respecting the magnitude of beef imports during the past few months. I am surprised that people from the great agricultural areas of Canada, particularly those areas that are dependent on export markets for most of their economy, would be advocating protectionism and restrictions in advance, because we know that these kinds of moves lead to retaliatory or what some people call compensatory action by other countries. It seems to me it is in the interests of Canada, which has a very highly efficient beef and other meat producing establishment, to do as little as possible to encourage other countries to throw up barriers against it.

To get back to the substance of the matter with respect to the statistics that have been given, some figures have been thrown around to the effect that we have been importing from 10 per cent to 12 per cent of Canada's beef requirements from oceanic countries. I do not know where these figures came from, but they are completely erroneous. I do not have the exact figures in front of me, but speaking from memory the amount of beef imported for use in Canada during the first nine or ten months of 1970 was in the order of 60 million pounds as compared with a total production in Canada of something like 1.8 million pounds or, in effect, about 3 per cent. The fact is that there was some transshipment of beef through Canada from the latter part of 1969 until July 2, 1970, and this was destined for U.S. packing houses for use in the manufacturing industry. This was manufacturing beef. I hope hon. members will bear in mind that the greatest amount of manufacturing beef coming into Canada is frozen blocks of beef, just to fill in the deficiency in Canadian production for those purposes; and almost all of it goes into plants for processing and manufacturing.

I admit that some attempts were made to put this frozen meat on the fresh meat market, but I know of none that have been very successful because it was not comparable with the product produced here in Canada and offered in an unfrozen condition to housewives, that is, a product that has never been frozen. I hope hon. members are not suggesting that we should now build up a series of barriers to this kind of trade, which to my mind is legitimate because we do not have enough production to supply the requirements. I do not think it would be in our interests at this time, and perhaps not at any time, or at least until we see some serious deterioration in our own price structure, to put up these kinds of barriers.

In conclusion may I say that in our discussions with the Australian and New Zealand meat marketing agencies during the past summer, they fully realized it is in their interests to ship into Canada only that which can be absorbed to fill the deficiency and to do this at prices beneficial to them and to our producers.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has already spoken in the debate. He cannot speak a second time.

Mr. Gleave: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member seeks the floor for the purpose of asking a question of the minister. Is the minister prepared to answer a question?

Mr. Olson: Yes.

Mr. Gleave: I was not aware that the figures mentioned by the minister were quoted. However, I would like to ask him whether the agreement which he described, or the understanding with New Zealand and Australia has reached the point of Canada and Australia mutually working out the quotas which our market can absorb.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, this agreement is only with New Zealand and as far as I know there are not specific provisions in it for establishing any kind of quotas either to fit our market or for any other purpose. In practical terms, the only difficulty we have had with this importation of meat was when there were great quantities of it going through Canada to U.S. destinations. That caused us and the United States some problems too. I do not want to gloss over the magnitude of those problems other than to say that the amount coming in was not disruptive of our own markets or to our producers' interests in those markets.

Mr. Benjamin: Can the minister say whether discussions have taken place with the New Zealand government to develop some sort of international rationalization of markets as between New Zealand and Canada? They grow mutton and lamb, and we grow beef. Has there been discussions about trade-offs, or has the minister looked into this possibility?

Mr. Olson: Not in those terms. The discussions we have had from time to time have concerned their wish to have access to the Canadian market for the type of beef to meet the deficiency in our production and for our own consumption. In that respect the discussions have been very useful and have led to agreements, not formal agreements but an understanding that we would operate in this market to the benefit of both countries.

Mr. McKinley: Can the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) give us an assurance that what happened with respect to this beef being transshipped through Canada to the United States, when its entry to the U.S. was cut off, will not happen again?

Mr. Olson: I cannot assure the hon. member that someone will not try it in the future. What happened in the last instance was that New Zealand and other countries had a beef quota set by the United States and they were getting some additional supplies by transshipping through Canada. I communicated to the governments of the countries concerned that we did not wish to be party to this attempt to circumvent U.S. rules. While I cannot positively assure the hon. member that someone will never try this again, I think we reached an understanding that it was not beneficial to our countries to be involved in this kind of operation.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister another question? Since the minister has indicated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must remind hon. members that we are not involved in discussion at committee stage. Technically, the minister still has the floor. The hon. member may ask the minister a question if the minister is prepared to accept it. I must again suggest to hon. members that we are not in committee at this stage and we should not embark upon a committee-style discussion. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) may make a speech, if he wants to, when he has the floor.

Mr. Rose: I do not know what to say, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: As usual.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: The Minister's remarks seem to me to be quite contradictory. It seems to me the minister is suggesting that New Zealand beef will be allowed into Canada so long as it is not a threat to the Canadian cattle industry and that it is helping us to overcome the deficiencies of the Canadian cattle industry so far as our domestic market is concerned. I hope the minister agrees with my assessment of what he said. My question to him is this: Since the beef industry has a continental market, is he suggesting that if the market for Canadian beef should be enlarged in the United States, we in turn will be importing beef to fulfil our demands domestically and that this would depend upon the amount of beef imported under the continental market system to the United States?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I still have the floor to answer questions. I assume that I have. There is no suggestion of that at all. There are certain types of meat—we have been referring to manufacturing beef which is said to be of low quality but which is actually of high quality—that Canada is deficient in so far as its own requirements are concerned. We would not like to see a situation developing in which this meat was coming through Canadian ports and also supplying the market for this type of meat in the United States. Although they import much larger quantities of this kind of beef for the same purposes into that country, they set quotas. It seems to me that it is up to the United States authorities to make their own decisions of how great a quota for this kind of meat they want and how much of it they want imported, and Canada should not be a party to trying to circumvent rules which have been set in the United States.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister prepared to consider other questions?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a brief question of the minister which arises from his remarks. Could he inform the House if any consultations or discussions were held with Canadian canners, dealers or other firms that were engaged in the transshipment of meat and meat product from New Zealand to Canada and to the United States? Were discussions held with those firms and, if so, could he indicate what were the results of those discussions?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I cannot say that any particular meeting was called for that purpose. We made it known to the people in the trade that Canada was very unhappy at being in the position that it was the country through which transshipment was taking place and that we were not going to allow it to happen to the point where it could jeopardize the very satisfactory trading relations that we have established with the United States. The people in the trade were advised that that is the position of the government.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker,—

[Mr. Rose.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising to ask a question or to make a speech?

Mr. Benjamin: I should like to ask a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot ask a question unless the minister is prepared to accept it. I see that the minister is willing to accept it. The hon. member may have the floor to ask his question.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister how in the agreements concerning the importation of New Zealand beef he was able to reconcile the demands of the various provincial governments, particularly those of Saskatchewan and Alberta—regardless of whether the quality of beef produced in Canada meets the needs of our market—for an enlarged production of beef of any kind or quality without the establishment of a quota, with the importation of beef from New Zealand, some portion of which stays in Canada. Has he had any discussions with the administrations of the provinces which are paying the farmers money to diversify? Can he reconcile that position with the agreement reached with New Zealand?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the fact is that we export beef at times and import beef at other times. Our present situation is that there has been a deficiency in almost all classes of beef in this country for several weeks, and as a result there has been some importation of some high quality, fresh beef from the United States as well as manufacturing quality beef from these other countries. It seems to me that the determining factor in whether demand is being met or not at a certain price is the market place. The canner and cutter cows, which provide the class of beef that we are importing from Australia and New Zealand, have been running at up to $2 per hundred higher this year as compared with the same date last year.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

STATISTICS ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF STATISTICS CANADA, PROVISIONS FOR ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill S-2, respecting statistics of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Pepin moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, BORROWING, LIABILITY UNDER CONTRACTS OF INSURANCE

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-184, to amend the Export Development Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton), who first proposed an amendment at this stage, has suggested that the amendment not be proceeded with on the understanding that all the arguments would be made on third reading. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-184, to amend the Export Development Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

• (8:40 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to move an amendment which has been recommended by the Governor General. I think that copies of the amendment have been distributed to all parties: if not, I have several copies that can be distributed. Am I to assume that the amendment has been read or does Your Honour suggest that I read it?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the amendment might be put to the House at this time. Moved by Mr. Pepin:

That Bill C-184 be amended

(a) by striking out lines 4 and 5 on page 1 and substituting the following:

'1. (1) Subsection (1) of section 4 of the Export Development Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"4. (1) The chairman and six other directors shall be appointed by the Governor in Council from among persons employed in the public service of Canada."

(2) Subsection (3) of section 4 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(3) The five directors not appointed from among persons employed in the public service of Canada shall be appointed by the Governor in Council to hold office during pleasure for such term, not exceeding five years, as will ensure as far as possible the expiration in any one year of the term of not more than one such appointee."

Export Development Act

2. (1) Subsection (1) of section 11 of the said act is repealed' ; and

(b) by renumbering clauses 2 to 10 as clauses 3 to 11 respectively.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under normal circumstances the amendment which the minister now seeks to move would be out of order. Because I say it is out of order I do not wish that to sound as though it is, unless hon. members want to take it that way. This is not an amendment to the bill that is before the House, but rather to the act which the bill seeks to amend. We on this side of the House have tried that scores of times and Your Honour has rightly prevented us from doing so. However, we were asked earlier today if we would give unanimous consent to waiving the rule in this case. If the substance of the request is as it was communicated earlier today, we will not object to proceeding with it in this way, but we would like it to be clear that the opposition is granting a concession to the government which is seldom granted to us.

We are willing to have the rule waived and for the minister to be permitted to amend the bill before the House in a way that actually goes behind the bill and amends the act. This, of course, is on the understanding the minister has been able to persuade the Governor General to give his recommendation to the proposal.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we have been consulted about this. We are prepared to give our consent. As a matter of fact, it is a good indication. Any time the government frankly admits it has made an error and wants to correct it, we are always prepared to allow them to rectify it. We do that in this case.

Mr. Pepin: I thank hon. members opposite for their generosity. I suggest that I am not being terribly immoral, because this procedure can be used when there is unanimous consent of the House. However, I am grateful.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Chair should express the thought that the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is well taken. There is no question but that the amendment is not regular from a procedural standpoint in that it seeks to amend the act rather than the amending bill. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, such amendments proposed from time to time are always ruled out of order. I do not want it to be considered a precedent that on this occasion we have accepted the amendment. As mentioned by the minister and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), it is understood that this procedure, which is highly irregular, is proceeded with by unanimous consent.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Pepin) agreed to.

Motion (for concurrence) agreed to.

Mr. Pepin moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, we in the official opposition are glad to support this bill because it will do something very important, that is, help increase exports. It is important that we do everything possible at this time to increase exports of manufactured products. As hon. members know, manufactured products are labour intensive: they are our best weapon to combat the serious unemployment situation which we are facing. This country has not been doing too well in increasing exports of manufactured products during the past year. I received the latest report from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics today. During the past year our exports of manufactured products increased by only 4.2 per cent over the previous year. People may ask what is wrong with that. The answer is that it is not good enough. As the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) stated recently when answering a question put to him in the House, the number of jobs in Canada is increasing but the number of people looking for jobs is increasing faster.

Our work force is rapidly increasing. Young people are entering the labour force at a very rapid rate. We must provide jobs for them. Obviously jobs are not being provided at a fast enough rate: that is why unemployment is steadily increasing. It is obvious that unemployment cannot be cured by the public works method. When this party was in power a few years ago, we tried that. We were faced with the same situation. It did not work because it cost too many thousand dollars of public funds to create a single job. There is just so much that the exchequer of the country can afford at any time. Once the construction projects are completed, you are right back at square one: once again you have unemployment on your hands and you have to find jobs.

The only way to cure unemployment is to create jobs. By stimulating the economy it is possible for producers to sell in an atmosphere which will enable them to increase sales, production and employment. This does not cost the Canadian taxpayer one cent. It is the only-practical way of overcoming unemployment because it is on a continuing basis. That is what we are looking for. We in the official opposition are very glad to support this bill. This measure will do something that is most important for the country at the present time, namely, help increase sales of manufactured products. We say to the government: Get on with the job and use this tool to help you sell more manufactured products and thus produce more jobs for Canadian workers.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was considered on second reading I noted that the Export Development Corporation and its activities represented a very important instrument in our trade policy. I think this has been borne out by the subsequent consideration of this bill. Through its programs of export credit insurance and export loans and guarantees, I think the Export Development Corporation has played and can continue to play a very important role in promoting a healthy trade relationship and assist the economy. However, I think it must be noted once again that this instrument of policy can only be effective if in fact it is developed within the framework of an adequate trade policy.

This I pointed out during the second reading debate and I think it was underlined by some of the comments made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard) when he introduced the bill to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. He pointed out that discussion had taken place during the second reading debate on the problem of promoting the export of Canadian products and the fact that considerable emphasis must be placed on the sale and export of semi-finished products and raw materials rather than more highly manufactured products. The parliamentary secretary went on to point out that promotion of one kind of export in preference to another rests with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Still later he made reference to concerns that have been expressed about the degree of our trade with the United States and said that in this case also it is the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, rather than the corporation, that would make that kind of effort in dealing with these problems.

I think this underlines the point that some of us made at the time the bill was considered at second reading, namely, that this instrument of policy can operate effectively only if there is an adequate policy framework. It is perfectly obvious to all hon. members that some of the programs of this corporation have made a very important contribution to the Canadian economy. I draw attention to the value and importance of its operations to western Canada and particularly to my region in such things as grain sales. However, there is one area of the operations of this corporation which was included in the act originally passed in 1969 which I think requires further consideration. This has to do with the section of the act relating to foreign investment insurance. There are in fact amendments in the bill now before the House to some of the provisions of the original act which the government has found unworkable, and thus were unable to conclude with other countries the type of agreements and treaties that were originally hoped for when the act was first passed in 1969.

We are very concerned with the fact that Canada is becoming involved in this kind of business. I want to make it clear that we are dealing in this bill, and indeed in the act that is being amended, with the provision which encourages private investment in other countries. This has nothing to do with whether this is allowed or prohibited, but only with the point as to whether as a matter of public policy we will introduce programs that will have the effect of encouraging private Canadian concerns to develop enterprises in foreign countries through the instrument of insurance protection against what has been termed political risk. It has been suggested that this may be interpreted in some quarters as an attempt on Canada's part to enter, as it were, the twentieth century scramble for investment in countries that have not been so fortunate as Canada in terms of economic development. It has even been suggested that this could be interpreted as Canada becoming part of the new investment imperialism, a new form of colonialism that is becoming prevalent in the twentieth century.

I think we can question the propriety of this situation and ask whether this is a good approach to take to our international relationships. Is this sort of policy going to serve the long run interests of Canada? Secondly, I think we can question whether Canada can really compete in this league, given all the circumstances.

It seems to me that a second area of concern relates to what benefits accrue to Canada as a result of this action. It can be pointed out that there is provision in the act to safeguard Canada's interests and to ensure that in fact there will be benefit to Canada as a result of assisting or encouraging private investment of Canadian money in foreign countries. However, I suggest this is a subjective matter, one on which it is very difficult to make an objective judgment. I suggest conflicts will arise in assessing these projects in terms of the extent of the benefits that will accrue to Canada. It might very well be the case that some short-run benefits can be measured, but we have as well to take into account some of the long-run problems that will develop and determine whether in the long run we will see the growth of a resentment toward Canada of the sort that some countries now suffer.

The political implications involve subjective considerations that are very difficult to measure. We have Canada's experience, where our resources have been developed to a great extent by foreign financial assistance. Some people suggested that this was essential for the development of Canada, and given a particular set of circumstances this was possibly so. But the fact is that we in Canada did not do an adequate job of developing our own resources and of mobilizing their full potential. Consequently, in the absence of adequate facilities and machinery it was really a case of foreign capital moving in to fill the vacuum.

We now have the situation where while we are still concerned about imports of capital into Canada we are going to adopt as a feature of public policy a program that will encourage and assist the export of Canadian capital for purposes of private investment to develop other countries. I think the very real question that arises is whether this is the best way in which we as a nation can assist the developing nations of the world.

This investment insurance program has been referred to as a program to protect investments against losses due to political risks, such as war, revolution, confiscation or expropriation. It seems to me that some of the evidence which was revealed at the committee indicated not only difficulties which were encountered with the structure originally developed when the act was passed in 1969 but also very fundamental questions as to the advisability of this program.

The officials and the parliamentary secretary, when they appeared before the committee, reported in answer to questions by members that there have been some 200 inquiries on behalf of international prospective investors and that this represents an interest in over 70 countries, 40 per cent of which were in the Caribbean and the remainder distributed over other parts of the world. By category of investment, 40 per cent was in respect of manufacturing, 17 per cent in respect of hotels, 15 per cent in respect of food or beverages, most of which is also manufacturing or processing, 10 per cent in financing and the balance of 15 to 20 per cent in a variety of mining, service industry, retail outlets, housing and warehousing.

It was also reported to the committee that bilateral negotiations have been carried on with 20 countries in an attempt to reach some sort of an agreement within the framework of existing legislation. It was indicated that difficulties had been encountered and that there were in fact fundamental objections on the part of some countries. Other countries just said: Look, we cannot deal with you because we are prohibited from signing an agreement under the laws which presently exist in our country.

It is now the intention of the government to change this act so that it will remove the requirement for a bilateral agreement authorizing the Export Development Corporation to provide investment insurance in cases where the minister is satisfied that the legislative atmosphere is such that Canadian investment will be adequately protected. It was also mentioned that the second requirement is that an investor must get a letter from the appropriate governmental authority of the host country that they do not object to this investment and, hopefully, that they approve.

Some questions were asked and some evidence was given concerning the negotiations that had been carried on with individual countries such as Spain, Nigeria and others. It was indicated that a great many difficulties were encountered. I do not intend to go into them in detail now. A further point of concern, as was indicated, is that there would be no difference in the manner in which the Export Development Corporation would deal with a foreign-controlled or owned company in Canada which desired to make further investment in a foreign company. In answer to a question asked by myself, Mr. Aitken said:

> —we would not have any view with regard to the ownership of a particular Canadian company that came to us and wanted to make an investment abroad because after all you need not necessarily know who owns the company. The shares may be held abroad even though it appears to be entirely a Canadian company. However, with respect to the inquiries we have had I have here in front of me a list where we have given the investor a commitment to provide him with insurance in the event that we can have this bilateral arrangement. On looking over this list I see only one case where I know that the parent company is an American concern and there are some 20 on the list.

When I asked him if other companies which are foreign-owned or controlled were to make inquiries, his answer was, "We would treat them equally". I suggest there are policy implications that need to be considered by the government. These to some extent go beyond the considerations of the operations of the corporation itself and must be considered by the government as a matter of policy in establishing the framework for the operation of this corporation.

The parliamentary secretary, in answer to one of the questions put to him during the committee proceedings, indicated that it was the hope of the government that the new limitations being established in this bill with regard to export credit insurance, export loans and guarantees would last for three or four years before the government would again have to come to Parliament asking for an extension of the limits. At the same time, in answering a question concerning the foreign investment insurance provisions of this bill Mr. Aitken indicated that in so far as they could judge at this early stage of development they anticipated, or thought likely, that the firms which would take up this provision would use up approximately $120 million of the liability. That brings us very close to the $150 million limit proposed in this bill.

I would note in this regard that one of the clauses of the bill does call for the extension of the limit of liability that might be undertaken under the foreign investment clause, the extension being from $50 to $150 million. Thus, it would seem to me that if there is in fact the interest that has been indicated in this part of the bill, the government will have to come back to Parliament very shortly to ask for an extension, particularly if it wishes to continue with this measure.

I noticed in this regard that the parliamentary secretary indicated that the Department of Finance was only prepared to go up to $150 million. This indicates to me that the Department of Finance must have some doubt about this clause of the bill and that it has some questions in that regard and does not wish to see the limits of foreign investment insurance provisions extended too far. We will have to watch the operations of this part of the bill because in the long run there are very serious dangers contained in it for Canada.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we have a few minutes left at our disposal. I will not be selfish enough to take up all the time because I know other hon. members wish to speak and the minister is straining at the leash to respond to the very illuminating comments that have been made. There are one or two comments I should like to make very seriously at this time. I hope he will agree with me.

What is involved in this bill has a lot to do with our general trading position in the world. I think we are in a precarious position and need legislation of this kind, so I am glad to support it. We are in an extremely weak position in world markets. One reason is very simple: the prestige of this country greatly diminished after the Second World War. I think this is due to a number of reasons, some of them controversial, which I do not intend to go into in detail. Because of steps we have taken to reduce certain commitments, military and otherwise, in Europe and because during the Kennedy Round negotiations our negotiators, no doubt acting skilfully in bargaining in a hard way, obtained a number of concessions which benefited us in the short term, we lost a lot of friends. I recognize the importance of negotiation and the fact that you cannot be too honest on an international basis, but it is tremendously important to have a reservoir of good will and understanding.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Within a comparatively short time we will be faced with a difficult situation. No one can predict what will happen in Europe. The United Kingdom government is headed by a very determined man who apparently is going to get his country into the European community. Even today it is quite obvious that the international trading world will have great difficulty in salvaging the English market for New Zealand commodities and for sugar products from some of the other Commonwealth countries. Certainly there will no incentive to create circumstances which will permit Canada to benefit from this situation. England and some of the other Common Market nations may ultimately react to our benefit, but we are faced with that situation and our situation vis-à-vis the United States. We do not have the capacities of Japan, although I am not downgrading the Canadian position. I am sure that the minister, who has been over there recently, will bear me out. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was over there a few months ago, and so was my leader who publicly stated the things which he knew but which were reinforced by what he learned over there, things which the government should have known.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, acting as an innocent abroad, was publishing statements from time to time indicating that he was first discovering these very alarming facts. Where will this leave Canada? We will be faced with a very serious problem, and the minister knows it. I am not saying that he is not trying to do something about it—and perhaps this bill reflects it but I wonder whether it goes far enough. I would like to think that some time we will have a discussion. We have had many debates in this House. Unemployment is our No. 1 problem and we have to do what we can on this side of the House to awaken the government to these problems. But I think the minister should take the opportunity to initiate a debate. He should take a day of the government's time and initiate a debate on the situation. We do not have this kind of debate. If he does so, we will be glad to participate in it and decide, after he has spoken, whether we will continue to support him.

I was overseas recently and met a number of people in the European countries. I discussed with them the question of our trading relations. We must consider the extent to which we can make use of this bill and its ability in working with underdeveloped countries. We are starting what is known as the second decade for aid to developing nations. The fact that it is called the second decade is of some importance, because when the program was first initiated it was called the decade of aid to developing nations. However, it was discovered that ten years was not enough.

We must bear in mind that the gap between the developed and the developing nations is widening and it may take 30 or 40 years to close it. In the meantime, time is against us. We cannot wait, because time does not wait and because a train of circumstances is set in motion which is leading us toward an unbridgeable chasm. The growth and the per capita wealth of the developed nations in comparison with that of the developing nations is tremendously serious. Now that the developing nations are able through various media to discover that there is a better way of life and a better world, these people will not sit idly by for an eternity and permit the situation to continue.

Mr. Nowlan: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I am glad to have support for my point of view. I conclude with this comment. I shall read to the minister two or three paragraphs from a booklet of which the minister may be aware: it is called "Canada's Trade Policy in the Second Development Decade", written by Benjamin and Jean Higgins. It deals with the uses which we can make of such weapons as this bill, the Export Development Act and other measures to assist the developing nations through our trade policy. I am reading from page 65 of the booklet. These are words which the government may well bear in mind with respect to problems near at home. They read as follows:

> But from what has been said already concerning unemployment, it should be clear that the most useful discovery of all would be a formula for modifying western industrial technology, applicable over a wide range of manufacturing activities, which would use less capital and more labour while raising productivity of both labour and capital. Here indeed is a challenge, and one that has yet to be accepted and translated into action in any country, whether advanced or underdeveloped. What is required is not merely laboratory research but application on a pilot-plan scale as well. And no matter how brilliant the engineers and the natural scientists engaged in such research, their efforts are unlikely to be crowned with success unless they understand clearly what it is they are seeking. After centuries of inventing labour-saving devices and of identifying the discovery of such devices with technological progress, it is not easy for western engineers and scientists—or for the engineers and scientists of LDCs whose training is essentially the same—to think in terms of new techniques that will use more labour rather than less, while raising output per man-hour and per unit of capital. But we cannot say that no such technology exists, because no one has tried seriously to find it. If Canada could produce such a technology—

I interpolate here to say that I wish Canada could produce such a technology and export it using the medium of the Export Development Bank.

> —it would be a boon to mankind.
>
> Technical assistance programs are essentially a device whereby the existing stock of skills and the flow from the educational system are supplemented through international transfers of human resources. Very often the lack of certain types of human resources is the major bottleneck in the development of a particular country and the major factor limiting capacity to absorb capital assistance. In such cases transfers of any type of scarce skills can be helpful.
>
> From the analysis above, however, it is clear that the most useful form of technical assistance in the Second Development Decade will be provision of those managerial, scientific, and technical skills needed to ferret out opportunities to establish successful new industrial enterprises, to organize them, and to nurse them through their infancy. In Canada these skills are usually found in private enterprises rather than in government departments or universities.

I am waiting for some approval from my friends to the left, but apparently they are not interested.

> One way of making such skills available to the LDCs, obviously, is through the establishment of new Canadian enterprises in those countries. But this method may not always be appropriate, and ways must be found of making the skills of private enterprise available to our foreign-aid program. The new private enterprise division of the Canadian international development agency could prove very useful in this respect.

This may not be completely relevant, but I point out to the minister that this is a technique by which we can be of assistance to the developing countries through the effectiveness of this bill. I commend these thoughts to the minister's attention when this bill is passed and he administers it.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is a line from Shakespeare that is appropriate tonight—"The quality of mercy is twice blessed; it blesses him that gives and him that takes". I remind hon. members of that line because I think it applies to the comments made by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) and by the hon. member who has just spoken, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Tonight we have heard two sides of the same question. We have heard the fears of the hon. member for Regina East that Canadian corporations operating abroad are somehow going to bring disrepute to Canada and will bring down anger on all of us.

Mr. Burton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I did not make any such statement.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I have paraphrased the hon. member's words, but he implied that if we send Canadian companies to take their place in the markets of other countries we will somehow inherit the opprobrium that has fallen on a number of other nations which did this. I cannot accept that premise. I believe we have a responsibility to take our talents and invest them abroad, if this will help other nations, and I believe that the points raised by the hon. member for Peace River are worth remembering in that regard.

We have an obligation that we have accepted in international aid. We are seeking to achieve a target of 1 per cent of our gross national product as aid to the developing nations. We know that this is a difficult objective for a country the size of Canada, but the United Nations and other authorities in this field are more and more encouraging the development of foreign investment in the developing countries as a legitimate and useful way in which the developed countries can aid those nations. I believe this is useful to those nations not just because of the wealth it creates for them but because of the skills we are able to transfer to them and the managerial techniques. The plants we establish bring wealth to them as well as to Canadian corporations. In doing so, I think we must recognize that we should be prepared to abide by the laws that those nations may want to apply to Canadian corporations operating within their boundaries. We should be willing to accede to their desire that such corporations should be good corporate citizens. But that does not preclude Canadian corporations performing a very useful and valuable service to them and to us. It is for that purpose that this part of the bill has been included.

The hon. member mentioned that during committee discussions we dealt with the question of foreign-owned corporations in Canada being eligible for this benefit. Well, it is possible that this can happen, and Mr. Hugh Aiken, the chairman of the Export Development Corporation, indicated that in some cases it had happened. I make no apology for this. A corporation which operates in Canada brings wealth to Canada and should qualify for the same benefits as a Canadian citizen or Canadian corporation.

The hon. member also mentioned the $150 million limit, which he indicated would not last very long. I think this may be true. I think it is quite possible that we will reach that limit very soon, but I do not think that the reluctance of the Department of Finance or of the Treasury Board to authorize higher limits in this case was because they feared the money was not well invested. I think it was simply because there were outer limits beyond which the Canadian budget could not go at that time.

Now I wish to make some comments on the statements made by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). He seems to have hit-and-run: I do not see him in the House at the moment.

Mr. Baldwin: He won the ball game; he hit a home-run.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I think he struck out. He was citing statistics concerning development of our manufactured, semi-manufactured and raw material exports. It is very convenient, if you take a particular statistic from here and there and use it according to whim, but you are not giving the whole picture. One of the points the hon. member tried to make was that somehow we have been remiss in the development of our manufactured goods exports, and he cited figures for a particular year. I want to tell hon. members that over the past five years our exports of manufactured goods have gone up by 300 per cent. I think that is a pretty good figure, a better figure than that used by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

The hon. member for Peace River said that we need to obtain the tools, the instruments that we need to meet the responsibilities and difficulties that we may encounter because of the expansion of the European Economic Community. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Export Development Corporation bill is just such a tool that Canada needs. It is the kind of tool with which we can do what he has suggested, and for that reason I respectfully recommend it to hon. members for their concurrence.

[Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary).]

Mr. Burton: Before he resumes his seat, would the parliamentary secretary accept a question?

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Yes.

Mr. Burton: In his remarks the parliamentary secretary made reference to my comments about the limits which the Department of Finance had insisted upon, as revealed during the committee proceedings, and in answering the point I made in that regard he indicated there were other limits imposed upon any action the government might take in this regard. He also referred to the government's budget. Would he elaborate on what other limits are involved in establishing the $150 million which would be considered by the Department of Finance in that regard, and indicate just how the government's budget comes into the picture, because it seems to me that this is not a direct imposition on the government.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the acoustics are bad in the chamber tonight. I mentioned outer limits, and what I suggested was that this was the outer limit for budgetary purposes to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) was prepared to go at that time.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, the only reason I am prompted to intervene in the debate is that listening to the parliamentary secretary I was reminded of the salesman on the old Mississippi boat who had made his sale and then almost protested too much. In fact if I were charitable, a trait derived from my Irish ancestry, I would say that the parliamentary secretary had almost protested too much in biblical terms, but since we are not talking about biblical terms I will let it go at that.

• (9:30 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Nowlan: The few remarks that I intend to make tonight are more relevant than the minister might think. I confess that my remarks may not be very relevant to the Export Development Act, but they will have a lot to do with exports. I am one of those on this side of the House who finds the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) one of the more interesting, ingenious—

An hon. Member: Intelligent, and capable.

Mr. Nowlan: —and capable ministers on the government side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Frankly, I can well understand—

Some hon. Members: More.

Mr. Nowlan: —why they are clapping at this innuendo which reflects on the government. It is because there are so few ministers who are interesting or intelligent: that is why they are clapping. They have a good character reference with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

He is one of those ingenious characters who can stand up in this House with a snowball—in fact, he could stand in Hades with a snowball and it would not melt in his hands: it would remain unmelted while he recited the latest statistics up to the end of the month. If the snowball dissolved, and that would not help his statistics, he would not tell a white lie in this chamber. The snowball would be dissolved and it would be a lump of water in his hand. Therefore, he would never betray the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), the co-ordinator of committees in this House, would do well to talk on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, especially if he is interested in seeing peace, progress and harmony in this House. I have a great personal kinship with the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, but we hold a political dialogue. I say to the hon. member, with all deferrence to the House, that this minister helps us detour and circumvent most problems. I am now coming to my point.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: My point is this.

An hon. Member: Hurray.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not apologize to a gosh darned person in this whole gosh darned chamber. I give full credit to the hon. member to my left for making the pontifical, profound and positive remarks he has made: that is great alliteration. I think it is time, since we are talking about the Export Development Act, to talk about a different kind of export. We can say how great this will be for our great customers, but I am talking about Canadians who are unemployed and who have not a gosh darned breadcrumb in their throats because of the policies of this gosh darned government, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I say this because the government can help the people who are unemployed.

An hon. Member: By exporting them.

Mr. Nowlan: I hear the hon. member from the Kootenays, who replaced that other great member from the Kootenays, the late Mr. Herridge. But the point is—

An hon. Member: He is too late.

Mr. Nowlan: Do not distract me from my thoughts. My thought is this—

An hon. Member: Don't go away.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member on my left—

An hon. Member: Let's hear from the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding).

Mr. Nowlan: There is no coaching here. Let me start over again.

An hon. Member: Previously it was the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton).

Mr. Nowlan: That may be so. He has it made. I was talking about exports in Canada. We are considering the Export Development Act, which is all very fine. I think the minister would be the first to agree that if I were to suggest that if he were anxious to help Canadians to export he should seek the help of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to find pretty quickly some type of counterbalance to the floating dollar. I am serious in what I say about the floating dollar. The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) is commenting. He is one of the guilded figures of the skating world as a result of the North American championships which have been held in Peterborough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I do not fault him for that. I know that hon. member well. In many ways we are ad idem, which is an old Latin term for "togetherness". He might say that we are together in this just society. I do not say that. I say that if the just society means anything, it means that instead of talking about the apocryphal Export Development Act we ought to be concerned about the export of Canadians from Canada.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the minister is not in charge of this area. I hope, goodness to gracious, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will not flounce around and bubble with our dollar. Just because some may call him "Bubbly Benson" does not mean that he can bubble with the dollar. To find its level you almost have to look at a thermometer. I sometimes wonder just what the level of the dollar is. In Canada's interest, it is time for us to deal not only with the Export Development Act but with the stabilization of the dollar. The Minister of Finance ought to introduce some income tax reforms over a five-year period or a two-year period which would help us make up through exports what we are now losing as a result of our floating dollar.

I come from an area that exports certain quantities of goods, yet they do not know what they are competing against in the Boston market. None of us know what they are competing against in that market and few of us know the problems our traders encounter in competing in the American market. We do not know exactly what we are competing against, because of our floating dollar. I do not mind if some things float. I have seen this government performing for eight years, and all it has done in that time is float from problem to problem. They do not have the guts to build a dam, but they are floating along. In my flight of fancy there is nothing to compare with the bubbling, floating procrastination of this government that represents the establishment. It is no reflection on the Chair, Mr. Speaker, when I say as a liberal Canadian that I would find myself compromised if I were a member of the government. They imagine that they are Liberals, yet this is one of the most staid, reactionary, Cromwellian and Conservative governments that we have ever had. especially since 1922.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member is making a gosh darned good speech.

Mr. Nowlan: I hear the former parliamentary secretary for fisheries, who grows tomatoes, interjecting. That is meant to be no personal slight. I am saying nothing against that great Canadian who was part of this whole government machinery. The fact is that Canadians wonder, and I sometimes wonder, why we are debating the government organization bill, why we are getting involved in these areas when, frankly, we are only concerned with our own pockets. The great majority of Canadians—

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Forrestall: It is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit a question. Is he speaking on the bill in front of us?

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Nowlan: I am glad the point of order is from that member. He is one of the most relevant members and relevant contributors.

Mr. Forrestall: All I did was ask a question.

Mr. Nowlan: If you have a question, ask it through the Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: I did.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) has a question. If the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) is prepared to receive it, I think the House would be interested.

Mr. Forrestall: My question is based on some very relevant comments which were made in the gallery a few moments ago. Isabelle wonders whether she can come down and straighten this out.

Mr. Nowlan: Isabelle may be the name of a new cone going to the moon. I have not gone to the moon yet.

An hon. Member: Oh, no?

Mr. Nowlan: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) is one of the more constructive, charitable and intelligent ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: That is not saying much.

Mr. Nowlan: As my whip says, while lashing me across the back, that is not saying much. Be that as it may, it is time that we in Canada started to define some policy. I am completely against the policy of pay out from the pocket with no philosophy. How are we going to get the money in the pocket? I am not accusing the minister of this; I will do that later when we get to some other issues. Right now I am talking about the Export Development Act. I suggest to Your Honour and members opposite—

Mr. Deachman: Carried.

Mr. Nowlan: It is not carried yet.

An hon. Member: He is still quoting.

Mr. Nowlan: I hear echoes saying "Nowlan, you shouldn't get serious because people do not want you to be serious". Unless we start getting serious in Canada about some of the problems, this institution will go down the drain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I am not fooling with the member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, or wherever the hell he may be from, or with any other member. There will come a time when institutions will land and when people will land. It is time to be serious.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I agree with some of the litany opposite. I may not have been the most serious person when I started and I may be taking too long to make my point.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I agree with the "Hear, hears." What bothers me is that Bill C-184, and most other bills introduced in this chamber, are fine for one specific purpose. No one can take exception to them. However, as far as concerns the great malady, illness or sickness that is across this land tonight, they do not do anything to resolve the fact that there are "X" number of unemployed and "X" number of people on welfare. I am not suggesting that if this party were in power, as it was in 1960 and 1962, the same situation would not be in tune. I state to members opposite that I do not stand here tonight as a hypocrite. The member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) can laugh, because he has not been through the battles. He is still a neophyte. In terms of eons of political time, I am on the moon and he is left in the swamp.

An hon. Member: There is no doubt that you are on the moon.

Mr. Nowlan: Many members opposite are not tuned in to the realities of this land. I was a visitor in the opposition lobby and in the opposition gallery.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Earlier the hon. member used a Latin phrase. If I could reiterate it, I suggest with great respect that he and I should be ad idem as to what is relevant before the House at this time. I invite the hon. member to return to being relevant.

Mr. Nowlan: I agree, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour has correctly chastised me. I have wandered to a degree. Frankly, I do not apologize for that. However, I accept Your Honour's direction. I will close my remarks as long as there are no interjections. That is not a bribe; it is blackmail. I support the Export Development Act. I suggest that we get on with it and pass it this evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I agree with that. I agree with the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) exquisitely, profoundly and most articulately. Until the treasury benches, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce get together to develop a system whereby our exporters will get some tax relief from the floating dollar, we are pretending to be like Alice in Wonderland. I will continue this chapter at another time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, subject only to the consideration of the three members who are involved in the adjournment debate proceedings this evening, I feel we are ready to call it ten o'clock. However, in so doing we might embarrass some members who are expected to be here at ten o'clock to ask their questions. If not, I would certainly be prepared to proceed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The first two members are here, and the third will be here shortly. We agree to calling it ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the Chair should call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SUGGESTION BY SOMALIA RESPECTING ELIMINATION OF TRADE WITH SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, November 30, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the following question, as recorded on page 1584 of Hansard:

Has the government of Canada had an opportunity to evaluate the suggestion put forward by the government of Somalia to the United Nations that South Africa's major trading partners hold meetings to discuss ways and means of eliminating their trade with South Africa and, if so, is the government of Canada considering initiating such consultations?

In his reply the Prime Minister indicated that the placing of an embargo on trade with South Africa had been discussed on numerous occasions at the United Nations and that the major trading nations had succeeded in defeating any such move. The clear implication of his answer is that Canada has no intention of even surveying the possibility of precipitating talks of the type which Somalia has suggested. I submit that he rejected the idea without even looking at the speech by the ambassador of Somalia in which the suggestion was made.

I was very impressed by the presentation of the ambassador of Somalia. It displayed a reasonableness and sensitivity to the problems which would confront major trading nations should an embargo on trade with South Africa be imposed, which one can hope for but which one has no right to expect from the representative of an African nation discussing apartheid. The ambassador in his speech acknowledged the dislocation which might be occasioned within the economies of South Africa's major trading partners should an embargo be imposed. He acknowledged as potentially valid the fears of South Africa's major trading partners that total compliance with such an embargo might not be achieved, with the result that some nations might make considerable sacrifices only to see other less scrupulous countries profit by seizing upon the opportunity thus provided to increase their own exports to South Africa, thereby making the sacrifice fruitless. The ambassador also acknowledged the undesirability of committing the United Nations to actions which it could not follow through. The ambassador was simply asking that South Africa's major trading partners get together to seek ways and means of avoiding the problems I have outlined, in the hope that such talks might ultimately result in making it possible for the United Nations to take effective action against South Africa's racist government.

I was simply asking the Prime Minister if his government was willing to take the initiative in this regard. His answer to me implied a total lack of interest in the proposal, and the reasons for his lack of interest are not difficult to discover. First, the government's white paper on foreign policy makes it quite obvious that for as long as this federal government remains in office, Canada's primary foreign policy objective will be to make all the money it can. Answers which I have recently received to questions I placed on the Order Paper make it plain that in South Africa Canada is making more money with a vengeance. In answer to question No. 177 on the Order Paper I was informed that Canada's exports to South Africa in 1970 were expected to be approximately 30 per cent more in value than they were in 1969 and would likely exceed the 100 million mark. I realize the total value of our exports to South Africa, even at their new level, represents only a small percentage of our total export trade. The point is that they are increasing at a proportionately high rate and that the increase represents a victory of the dollar over the human conscience.

If I may be permitted a brief aside at this point, I find it deplorable that this government's policies should have also resulted in a 30 per cent increase in imports of sugar from South Africa at a time when our imports of sugar from Caribbean nations, which desperately require the revenue thus to be gained, are dropping off. I submit that the unwillingness of this government actively to seek ways and means of reducing or eliminating trade with South Africa, let alone its permitting increased trade with that nation, is a cause for shame on the part of every Canadian. I submit that those who argue, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs often does, that there is nothing to be gained from isolating the South African regime—the corollary of which is that there is something to be gained through reinforcing it through trade—are engaging in the same sort of self-deception as those who put forward similar arguments with respect to Nazi Germany in the 1930's.

The authors of the Black Paper had this to say:

—the value of Canada's economic disengagement from southern Africa should not be measured in immediate economic terms. It is important that some at least of the western nations demonstrate publicly that they are more concerned with the denial of basic human rights in southern Africa and the implications this has for human dignity everywhere than they are with short run financial benefit. A stronger Canadian policy would help to prevent the southern African confrontation from becoming an alliance of the white and wealthy west against the black majority. Already the southern African issue is causing serious rifts at the United Nations and within the Commonwealth. It is in Canada's national interest that these institutions operate successfully and expand their capabilities as multinational, multiracial forums for the resolution of international tensions.

Surely it is not too much to ask that our government take the extremely timid step of beginning the discussions suggested by Somalia.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, following the question asked by the hon. gentleman I looked up the proceedings of the United Nations General Assembly to see the origin of the proposal that had been made by the ambassador of Somalia. None of the resolutions ultimately passed by the General Assembly contained, to our knowledge, the suggestion made by the ambassador of Somalia. I would have to get confirmation from our permanent mission in New York, but it would appear that there has been no follow-up whatever to the suggestion and no consultations have been initiated by anyone.

I might add, however, that we have carefully considered the general question of cutting off trade with South Africa. In the foreign policy papers which were published last year we discussed the issues that are involved. I would point out to the hon. member that the principle that Canada has adhered to for a long time, with the exception of sanctions which have been approved by the United Nations, is one of not refusing to trade with a nation because we disapprove of its form of government or find its action to be repugnant. I can assure the hon. member that the actions of the South African government in enforcing apartheid are as repugnant to us as they are to him.

We have been urged on many occasions to break off trading with countries because people do not agree with the policies followed by those countries. I would remind my hon. friend that we have been urged to break trading relations with Cuba and with Communist China. We have refused to do so. We believe that we should encourage trade as a means of making useful contacts between peoples. We believe that this is a principle that is worth preserving and that we should follow our practice, as in the past, of breaking trading relations only when sanctions are approved by the United Nations.

AIRPORTS—REGINA—MEETINGS WITH CITY REGARDING SALE OF CITY-OWNED PROPERTY

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, for some time negotiations have been carried on between the city of Regina and the Department of Transport concerning the transfer of operations of the Regina municipal airport to the Department of Transport. One of the factors involved in making this transfer is an acreage of land that is still owned by the city of Regina but which was an integral part of the airport property. On January 15 I addressed a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), as reported at page 2445 of Hansard as follows:

Will the minister be holding further meetings with the city of Regina with regard to the sale of city-owned property at the Regina airport? If so, will the minister inform the House when such meetings will be held?

The Minister of Transport replied that arrangements had just been made for a further meeting with the mayor and other officials of the city of Regina. Subsequently on January 29 I addressed another question to the Minister of Transport, reported at page 2894 as follows:

Can the minister indicate whether any progress was made at the meetings this week with the city of Regina concerning the proposed sale of land by the city to the federal Department of Transport at the Regina airport, and can he give any indication when we may expect to have an agreement signed on this matter and also dealing with the future operation of Regina airport?

The Minister of Transport answered:

Considerable progress was made at the meetings this week with the mayor of Regina and other officials of that city. As I recall the timetable, we are going to Regina practically at the same time as the meetings will be held in Saskatoon to which I referred a few minutes ago, and I would hope that if we do not resolve the matter completely at that time it will be sufficiently advanced so that the contracts can be signed and the whole deal completed within the present year.

• (10:00 p.m.)

I am very happy to see that progress has been made in resolving the problem at Regina airport. The purpose of my intervention is not to be at all abrasive in respect of negotiations which are now going on. I welcome the fact that progress has been made and I note that negotiations are to continue. I hope they will be successful. I urge the government to do everything in its power to ensure that a satisfactory agreement is reached.

In this respect I want to outline a few matters which have been of concern to the people of Regina and area regarding this matter. I am going to deal with this in a somewhat disjointed fashion since a notice of motion for the production of papers which I placed on the Order Paper on December 15 has not yet been called by the government. That notice of motion asked for a copy of all correspondence and other documents concerning the proposed sale of land owned by the city of Regina at the Regina airport to the Department of Transport.

Some of the points concerned were dealt with in an article in the Regina Leader Post of December 11 last. I might say that this was prior to the recent meetings which were held. The article stated in part:

> Negotiations over the proposed sale of airport land in Regina to the federal government have been stalled, with the government refusing to accept the value placed on the land by two independent appraisers—

It was also noted as follows:

> Involved are 320 acres of airport land which the federal Department of Transport requires if it is to assume operation of the airport as it announced in 1967.
> In reports prepared this summer, the two appraisers, Warren-Hawes Real Estate and Vernon Peterson of the provincial highways department, had assessed the land value at $16,285 and $15,400 an acre respectively—

Later on in the article it is pointed out that there are other contentions made by the city which will presently be negotiated regarding the computed value of the rent of the land which is owned by the city and being used at the Regina airport operations since January, 1968, when the last agreement between the city and the Department of Transport expired. There was a statement made by the mayor of Regina, in December last, when he referred to one point upon which I should like to hear the comments of the parliamentary secretary. This was his statement:

> Since then the Minister of Transport and his department officials have consistently refused to accept the agreed appraisals and present them to the Treasury Board with recommendation for payment according to the agreement with the city—

Later on it was stated that last March the transport minister agreed that the price of the land would be established by two separate qualified appraisers. I hope the parliamentary secretary can throw some light on these matters and that progress will be made in negotiations. My purpose in drawing this to the attention of the government tonight is to urge the government to do everything to ensure that a satisfactory agreement is reached.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Duquet), who is unavoidably absent from the House, I am pleased to respond briefly to the question raised by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton).

The subject matter is one which has been around for some time in that preliminary discussions and subsequent negotiations between municipal representatives and transport officials have been under study for a number of years. The hon. member's original question was raised on January 15, at which time the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) informed the House of his initial conversation with the newly elected mayor of Regina, His Worship Mayor Walker.

Since that date the minister met with Mayor Walker in Ottawa on January 25 and reported that considerable progress had been achieved from their discussions. Then on January 29, in answering the hon. member's question, the minister stated that he would be going to Regina for further discussions with city officials and indicated that he was very hopeful that a contract could be signed at an early date. To be precise, I quote the minister from Hansard of January 29 as follows:

> —if we do not resolve the matter completely at that time it will be sufficiently advanced so that the contracts can be signed and the whole deal completed within the present year.

In conclusion, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) asked me to inform the hon. member that he will be meeting this Saturday afternoon with a representative of Mayor Walker and with members of the Regina city council in Regina, and that he is extremely optimistic that satisfactory progress and conclusion can be reached from their discussion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PROPOSED OIL PIPELINE FROM PRUDHOE BAY TO VALDEZ, ALASKA—CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset how pleased I am to see the minister here during this adjournment debate. I presume he is here to respond to the question raised. Too often those of us who participate in these debates on a fairly regular basis receive a 3-minute reply prepared by someone in advance a reply which has nothing at all to do with the particular representation we make. So I welcome the minister here and look forward to his response.

In recent weeks various Members of Parliament have raised the question of the threat to Canada's west coast ecology by the transshipment of Prudhoe Bay oil, first by pipeline to Valdez Island, Alaska and then by tanker to Cherry Point in Puget Sound which is just a few miles from the Canadian border. Members from Esquimalt-Saanich, Edmonton East, Kootenay West and I have all been attempting, possibly fruitlessly, to spur the Department of External Affairs into action, but as yet—in spite of our representations—we received nothing in reassurance from the minister.

It seems that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has been unduly reticent about this extremely serious matter. I realize that it is fraught with difficulties for him. Tankers are currently being built by the Bethlehem Steel Company in the United States which, according to my information, have a capacity of about 100,000 tons, and these are reputed to be planned to ply off our west coast for periods of up to 20 years. These 100,000-ton monsters are giants compared to the 18,000-ton Arrow which ran aground in Chedabucto Bay last year. At that time, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) suffered at least a week of sleepless nights over this threat, and what could he expect if one of these 100,000-ton monsters went aground? I do not think the Minister of Transport can last as long as a month without sleep.

These 100,000-ton tankers in trouble can cause approximately six times the amount of damage that was caused by the Arrow grounding. In addition, this is a very sensitive area in Canada. The Boundary Bay, Puget Sound area is very close to our area and Puget Sound is the only marine productive area in Canada. Anyone familiar with marine productivity of tidal flats cannot fail to be alarmed at what a tanker wreck could do to Canada's south western ecology. I think it can be accepted that fishing could be ruined in large parts of our spawning areas for years to come and water fowl, resting and recreation areas such as beaches would also run the risk of being defiled for years ahead.

During the debate of the bill of the Minister of Transport to amend the Canada Shipping Act last October, a bill which was designed precisely to protect our shores from the kind of tanker pollution of which we are now fearful, my party strongly urged the minister to extend Canada's sovereignty in regard to pollution at least 100 miles off shore instead of the measly 12 miles proposed in the bill. Other countries have done this. The United States has gone out to its tidal shelf for a number of reasons into which I have not time to go now. Peru has done so; and even we saw fit to extend our sovereignty 100 miles out in the Arctic. If this had been done last October when we were debating the bill, if the minister had accepted the suggestion warmly, I think it would have served as a warning to the Americans that we will not tolerate the possible devastation of the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

In that case perhaps the oil companies concerned, who have obviously committed to this plan if oil tankers are under construction, might have been impressed with the need to locate their refinery further south instead of just on our border, perhaps in southern Washington, Oregon or California. However, this did not happen and we have been left with Hobson's choice: either Canada accepts tanker oil off our west coast or we may be moved to rationalize future Alaskan oil movement through the corridor which is now being proposed to carry natural gas. Either choice is agonizing. Simply put, the case is whether Canada is prepared to risk its marine or Arctic ecology. It is a horrid position in which to be put.

It is fair to say that U.S. energy demands are only beginning to be felt, and it behoves Canada to depart from its historic timid, perhaps deferential position of reacting to U.S. initiative, and instead began to assert its own initiative in this U.S. energy game. The United States are desperately short of energy because of their population growth and because they squandered their own resources during the last 200 years. Therefore, I submit that we are in a very strong bargaining position and we will be more respected if we begin to assert ourselves. One of the things that might be agreed upon is an Arctic corridor.

I am sure the minister is anxious to respond, Mr. Speaker, because I know he is concerned about the question. Perhaps he feels it is beyond his jurisdiction, but I would like to hear him agree with our concern and say that he has made preparation to discuss this matter seriously with Washington and offer alternatives.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government shares the concern of the hon. member regarding possible damage to the coasts of Canada and the United States which could result from the massive movement of oil by tanker from Valdez to the United States Pacific northwest. We intend to discuss the hazards involved with the United States authorities at an appropriate time.

Oil spills would affect the United States as well as the Canadian coastline. This is a concern that we have in common. It really does not matter on the Pacific coast where a spill occurs, because some of it will affect both countries. In view of the interest which the United States shares with Canada in protecting the environment, it would be my hope that both countries will take such action as lies within their respective jurisdictions to ensure that the movement of oil does not despoil the Pacific coastline of our two countries.

So long as tankers confine themselves to the U.S. side of the boundary line, they will be wholly within United States waters. Canada, of course, cannot legislate concerning traffic on that side of the border. I say to the hon. member that even the declaration of a 100-mile or 200-mile limit would not affect the position in the Straits of Juan de Fuca. This is very much a problem that concerns our two countries and cannot be resolved by unilateral action on our part.

Mr. Rose: What about farther north?

Mr. Sharp: But that is not where the problem is going to arise. They are going to regularize this traffic through the Straits of Juan de Fuca.

However, it is the view of the Canadian government that a country is obliged to prevent activities within its jurisdiction from damaging persons or property within the territory of any other country through pollution of the environment. It might be of some value to request the International Joint Commission to study the risks of pollution which might result from heavy tanker traffic through the Juan de Fuca Strait. As the hon. member knows, the United States government is still studying environmental considerations relating to the construction of a pipeline across Alaska. We are following this matter very closely. However, I do not think it would be appropriate for us as a federal government to appear before any U.S. tribunal that is considering these questions, any more than we would consider it appropriate for the American government to appear before our tribunals. Our contacts must be much more direct. I am sure the hon. member recognizes the question of the dignity of our government in dealing with the governments of other countries.

In view of the harm which could result to the Canadian environment, we will be approaching the U.S. authorities at an appropriate time to seek their assessment of the risks of oil spills in the Pacific northwest if the proposed massive oil movements materialize.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.17 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 10, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RATING OF CEREALS UNDER FOOD AND DRUG DIRECTORATE

Question No. 103—Mrs. MacInnis:

1. What Canadian cereals can claim to be a good source of protein under the Food and Drug Directorate rating scale?

2. What Canadian cereals do not qualify under the Food and Drug Directorate rating scale?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. On the basis of evidence in the possession of the Food and Drug Directorate in relation to the following cereals only, a statement made on the label or in an advertisement that one ounce of the cereal with four ounces of milk is a good source of protein, would not constitute an offence under the Food and Drugs Act: Kellogg's Special K; Cheerios; Shredded Wheat; Muffets; Hot cereals such as Rolled Oats and Red River Cereal.

On the basis of evidence in the possession of the Food and Drug Directorate, a statement made on the label or in an advertisement for High Protein Pablum and Gerber's High Protein cereal only, that the food is a good source of protein, would not constitute an offence under the Food and Drugs Act.

2. See answer to Part 1.

NUMBER OF PATENT APPLICATIONS FILED 1969-70

Question No. 632—Mr. Saltsman:

1. For the latest available year, how many patent applications have been filed in Canada by (a) residents (b) non-residents?

2. For the same year, how many patents have been filed for residents per 100,000 population?

3. Does the Government of Canada have similar information on patent filings by residents per 100,000 population for (a) United States (b) Great Britain (c) Japan (d) Switzerland (e) Sweden (f) Australia (g) Argentina?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. For the fiscal year 1969-70, (a) 1,814 and (b) 29,546.

2. Approximately nine.

3. (a) For the calendar year 1968, 67,180 patent applications were filed in the United States by nationals, and 26,291 by foreigners, which works out to approximately 35 applications filed by nationals/100,000 population. (b) For the U.K. the comparable figures are 26,711, 35,284, and 50. (c) For Japan the comparable figures are 71,114, 25,596, and 70. (d) For Switzerland the comparable figures are 5,928, 13,609, and 118. (e) For Sweden the comparable figures are 4,742, 13,338, and 53. (f) For Australia the comparable figures are 4,201, 12,511, and 28. (g) For Argentina the comparable figures are not known.

COST OF MOLASSES TO CANADIAN FARMER

Question No. 650—Mr. Watson:

1. Was there a change in the cost of molasses to the Canadian farmer following the sale in 1960 of Imperial Molasses Company to Sucrest Corporation and, if so, was the Minister of Agriculture requested by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to supply pertinent information?

2. Does the government have data or is information available on the comparison of prices of black-strap molasses as between Montreal-Toronto and Albany-Buffalo, N.Y. for the years 1960-70 and, if so, will the government undertake to have such information studied by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as follows: 1. The price of molasses increased between 1960 and 1961. Supplies of molasses in 1960 were at record levels, not equalled in any subsequent year. Lower supplies since 1960 have been a factor in higher prices since 1960. There is no record of any request to the Department of Agriculture from the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to supply information respecting the sale of the Imperial Molasses Company to Sucrest Corporation.

2. Price information of the kind described is available. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will have such information studied by the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act to determine whether on its face it raises any question under that Act.

TRANSCONA, MANITOBA—CONSTRUCTION OF BREWERY

Question No. 707—Mr. Horner:

Has the government, through the Regional Development Program or any other program, granted any money for the construction of a brewery in Transcona, Manitoba, near the old Catelli plant?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): No.

*PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS

Question No. 710—Mr. McCleave:

1. What are the public works projects which make up the $23 million referred to by the Minister of Public Works at page 2401 of Hansard and what are their approximate amounts?

2. How many man-hours of work are estimated to be involved?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Minister of Public Works that capital projects, such as building construction and improvements to existing structures, will account for about $18,500,000 of the amount referred to on January 14. An additional $5,500,000 will be spent on small repair and maintenance projects which will be advanced in priority. A detailed and somewhat lengthy list of capital projects could perhaps be taken as read and published in Hansard.

The answer to the second part of the question is that it is estimated that 2,246 man years of work are involved.

Mr. McCleave: As the poser of the question, the course suggested by the parliamentary secretary is acceptable to me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REPORTS ON KAMLOOPS CONFERENCE OF INDIAN CHIEFS

Motion No. 4—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all reports prepared by any employee of the Government of Canada or any agency, department or branch thereof and specifically, a Mr. Glynn and a Mr. Smith, who attended the Conference of Chiefs held in Kamloops, B.C. from November 17 to 22, 1969.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has requested a copy of reports prepared at the request of the Conference of Indian Chiefs during their meetings in Kamloops, British Columbia, from November 17 to 22, 1969.

This report was prepared for the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs and is in their hands. Since it contains remarks of a confidential nature we would prefer that any decision to release the report be made by the chiefs themselves. Under the circumstances I would hope that the hon. member for Skeena would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, that is quite contrary to the information that was given last session.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CONSULTANT REPORT REGARDING PLANNING FOR A LONG-TERM DEVELOPMENT STUDY OF CITÉ DU HAVRE, 1968

Motion No. 70—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report undertaken for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regarding the planning for a long-term development study of Cité du Havre in 1968, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st session of this Parliament.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the consultant report on the planning of a long-term development study of Cité du Havre has not yet been formally presented to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing, nor to the Minister of Transport. Officials have been asked to study the report and make recommendations to the government on it. The report is therefore at this point a confidential one. Consequently it would not be in the public interest to table it at this time, and I wonder if the hon. member would agree to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Skoberg: Possibly we could allow it to stand until we see if it is still confidential after the cabinet sees it.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

MERCURY WATER POLLUTION

Motion No. 106—Mr. Harding:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence between the Department of Fisheries and Forestry and the Chemical and Pulp and Paper Industry regarding mercury water pollution in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, mercury poisoning is a most serious matter. Nevertheless, we solicit the co-operation of the hon. member and ask him to withdraw his motion, since we have good reasons to apprehend less than spontaneous co-operation from the companies concerned, should we make such documents public.

[English]

Mr. Harding: I would like to have it transferred for debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—WATER POLLUTION AND POLLUTION GUIDELINES

Motion No. 148—Mr. Rose:

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we would ask the hon. member to kindly withdraw his motion, considering that production of the papers mentioned therein could have very unfavourable effects on the present good relations between the Department of Fisheries and Forestry and the British Columbia pulp and paper mills.

[English]

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, this is the answer I have received on numerous occasions, and my attitude is still the same. I request that the motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all plans and specifications received by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry from Bulkley Balley Forest Industries Ltd., relating to the control over and treatment of the waste from that company's proposed pulp mill near Houston, B.C.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the plans and specifications mentioned in that motion belong to the Bulkley Balley Forest Industries Ltd. In my view, that is a valid reason for asking the hon. member to kindly withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I think it is much more important that the people in the area know what is happening to their natural resources and their environment.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate. Shall the remaining Notices of Motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning question No. 216 which was placed on the order paper on October 21 last. [English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker could the statement of conclusions that has just been tabled be made part of Hansard as they are of great interest to all hon. members?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As an appendix.

Mr. Speaker: It is suggested that this document be published as an appendix to Hansard. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister clarify the matter of the documents he has just tabled in the House in view of the fact that the French reads as follows:

La Conférence se déclare en accord avec cet objectif social et fondamental.

—whereas the English text, on page 8 of the document, reads as follows:

The Conference expressed its sympathy for this basic social objective.

I would ask the Prime Minister to specify whether the word "sympathy" is the equivalent of the word "accord" used in the French text.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, that question could be put by the hon. member during the oral question period.

TABLING OF REPORTS ON DEVELOPMENTAL APPROACH TO AND COST OF PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have the permission of the House to revert to motions. I gave an undertaking to an hon. member opposite that I would table the task force reports on a developmental approach to public assistance and one relative to the cost of public assistance.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Munro: I think I have described the nature of the documents and I now table these reports.

Mr. Baldwin: Are you going to attach those to Hansard too?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

INDICATION TO PROVINCIAL PREMIERS OF EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION RESPECTING BUSINESS PROFITS AND UNREALIZED CAPITAL GAINS TAX PROPOSALS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Did the minister advise the premiers at the conference yesterday that the government expects to make an announcement in the very near future about its intentions regarding the implementation of various proposals contained in the white paper on taxation, particularly the proposal to cancel the 21 per cent tax on the first $35,000 of profits and replace it with the full 50 per cent tax levy and the proposal to tax unrealized capital gains, so that the confusion which is causing businessmen across the country to withhold decisions to expand operations, thus contributing to unemployment, may be removed?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): That was a nice speech, Mr. Speaker, but the answer is no.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, did the minister then confine his offers of help to the provinces to the advice that they should raise their own taxes to fight unemployment which has been brought about largely by the mismanagement of the economy by the federal government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is an argumentative supplementary and I would not think a question could be asked in those terms. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont has a supplementary question.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I put the question in an unantagonistic way?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Egmont and will return to the hon. member in a moment.

PRIORITY OF UNEMPLOYMENT OR INFLATION—MEASURES AGREED UPON BY FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS TO FIGHT UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's statement yesterday to the premiers that "The worst possible thing would be sudden inflation and a subsequent recession," has the government now dropped as its number one priority that which was indicated by the Prime Minister a few weeks ago, the fight against unemployment? If not, has the minister further measures to report from the conference yesterday, agreed upon by the federal and provincial governments in order to fight this number one priority, unemployment?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has correctly stated that our number one priority is to fight unemployment. In my submission I simply raised the problem that as the economy grows throughout this coming year, which everyone thinks it is going to do under the policies we have followed, we then have to worry about inflation and make sure we do not find ourselves going around in a circle so that we face inflation again next year.

Mr. Bell: The Prime Minister says it does not exist.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could ask the Minister of Finance to answer the question I put a moment ago, whether or not unemployment or inflation is the number one priority. I should also like to know what consideration is being given to a number of specific suggestions made by the provincial representatives over the past few days, particularly with regard to special tax adjustments or incentives?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, that is a rather long question to answer. With respect to unemployment, this is our prime concern. In this country, however, we must also worry about getting into another inflationary spiral. I remember that about six months ago hon. members opposite were saying that inflation was terrible, and although I assured them it was coming to an end—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are getting into the field of debate at this point. Has the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings a supplementary?

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As it is well known that the provincial premiers all pressed the government very hard for information about what it was doing with regard to unemployment and what assistance could be given by the federal government to the provincial governments, did the minister confine his efforts to help to the suggestion to them that they raise their own taxes?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I did not at any time suggest that they raise their own taxes.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, is the minister claiming that he was misquoted in the press, because that is exactly what the press reports said?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: I did not read those press reports.

Mr. Hees: That is what they said.

Mr. Benson: I did not say that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: So the press is wrong again so far as the minister is concerned.

Mr. Benson: They are.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might allow the hon. member who is seeking the floor a chance to ask his question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REFERENCE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S SUBMISSION TO JOINT PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTION FOR REPORT ON PROPOSALS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the communiqué he has just tabled. As some progress seems to have been made in reaching agreement about the procedures for patriating the constitution and devising an acceptable amending formula, is it the government's intention to send the federal government's submission to the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution in order that, hopefully, they may be able to bring down an interim report so that Parliament may be fully aware of the implications of these proposals?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the committee certainly has general terms of reference to study all the matters which were brought before the constitutional conference and which were the object of published white papers or position papers by the federal government. As the hon. member knows, the subjects covered yesterday were those subjects which had been listed in February, 1968, as being the object of the constitutional examination. Therefore, if the committee wants to look at these conclusions I am sure it will feel itself authorized to do so.

SPECIFIC PROPOSALS TO PREMIERS TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since in the communiqué just tabled it is said that the "First Ministers discussed the unemployment situation across Canada, and expressed their concern for the problems being encountered by many Canadians this winter," can the Prime Minister tell the House what specific proposals the federal government placed before the first ministers in order to assist the provinces in dealing with the problems of unemployment mentioned in the communiqué?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the federal and other governments expressed their concern about unemployment. Each government indicated the way in which it thought unemployment could be more appropriately countered. The federal Minister of Finance explained to that audience what the federal government had been doing and is doing to combat this very serious problem of unemployment.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Apart from telling the provinces that if they need more money they should go out and borrow it, may I ask whether he indicated to the provinces that any additional funds would be available for housing or public works, or that additional assistance would be available to meet the very high welfare costs which they are now experiencing?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the House, and my hon. friend has no doubt heard me, that next year the federal government will be borrowing $2 billion to pour into the economy and that a large part of this will go into housing.

STATEMENT OF MR. BOURASSA ON GRANTS TO PROVINCES—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion a question concerning a statement made by Mr. Bourassa last night at the end of the constitutional conference.

The premier of Quebec is reported to have said and I quote:

—that for the federal government to make loans instead of grants to the provinces as economic incentives, as was the case with the $150 million approved recently, was unacceptable since it meant double taxation for the citizens of the provinces concerned; and that we had initiated negotiations—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may, before asking his question directly, refer briefly to a statement that was made, but I do not think that he may quote it in extensa as he apparently wants to do. Perhaps he could get to the question proper.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, my question is based on this statement to the effect that Premier Bourassa had opened negotiations to this effect with the federal government.

Can the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion say whether negotiations have been held in this respect and whether he intends to comply with this reasonable request from Mr. Bourassa?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that any negotiations had been held and before I venture to answer I shall read Mr. Bourassa's statement.

Mr. Valade: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

When the minister has read that statement, will he then inform the House and tell us whether he intends to agree to that request of Mr. Bourassa?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes. Perhaps.

[English]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister arising out of his answer a few moments ago. The Prime Minister stated that the Minister of Finance outlined to the provincial premiers what the federal government had been doing and intends to do about unemployment. Was this outline greeted with laughter or with tears?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

USE OF LOAN FUND BY PROVINCES

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister say whether the province of Saskatchewan or any other province has indicated it will not be using its share of the new loan fund announced in the budget during the current fiscal year?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the province of Manitoba has not. The hon. member mentioned the province of Saskatchewan. I think we have received a letter from that province indicating that they will not be using the funds, in which case they will be available to other provinces that may find themselves in need of them.

AGREEMENT ON PATRIATION AND AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION IF APPROVED BY PROVINCIAL CABINETS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister arising out of the answer he gave with regard to the amending formula. Provided the provincial premiers get the approval of their cabinets, will there then be agreement on bringing home the constitution and on the formula for amending the constitution in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I hope that something of that kind will obtain, Mr. Speaker. I do not know in which way the various premiers and prime ministers will want to prepare themselves for the Victoria meetings in June. I imagine it will be as the hon. member suggests, that they will get authority from their cabinets to look at these proposals. I imagine they will do that more readily after we have negotiated amongst ourselves a text spelling out what was agreed upon in broad general lines yesterday, and that with this text in mind the various premiers and prime ministers will go to Victoria in June to see whether or not they agree to it.

Mr. Woolliams: As there now appears to be agreement, is the Prime Minister now considering the fact that the constitutional committee is travelling across the country, at a cost of thousands of dollars, looking into the same matter while the government and the premiers are making a deal apart from the committee? What is the purpose of the committee in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure the member cannot object to the federal government negotiating with the provincial governments. It is not the purpose of the parliamentary committee to embark upon bilateral or multi-lateral discussions with the various provincial authorities. It is the purpose of the committee, and I understand they are performing it very well—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —to explore in depth some of the proposals which have been discussed between the various levels of government and to hear from the Canadian public the various opinions and representations that they want to make on these positions which have been taken by various levels of government. I must say that I and the other members at the conference felt that the work of the committee in past months has helped a great deal to impress upon all members of the conference the importance which the constitution has in the minds of the Canadian people and the urgency to achieve some results.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL SECURITY—DIFFERENCE OF VIEWS BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister with regard to the sharing of rights between the federal government and the provinces, in particular Quebec.

Are the differences of opinion between Quebec and Ottawa fundamental, with regard to the social security program Quebec wants to set up, regardless of what might be done by the other provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, here is the position of the federal government: each province—this is stated specifically in the communique—is free, under the terms of the Constitution, to have the social security program that best suits the needs of its own citizens, within the limits of the jurisdiction it now has according to the Constitution.

Now, we went even further. We stated that one of the objectives of the federal government would be, as much as possible, to see to it that the federal policy, when applied in an area directly or indirectly related to social security, is co-ordinated as much as possible with the policy of the provinces.

In the next few months we shall discuss whether the social welfare and income security systems, at the level of the provinces and of the federal government, could be co-ordinated in such a way as to benefit the people—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Shefford would like to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, by his reply, does the Prime Minister mean that the government intends to maintain its position with regard to social security programs, such as unemployment insurance which is the responsibility of the provinces, or will it agree to make funds available to the provinces so that the administration of family allowances, for instance, be part of established provincial programs?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the government considers that unemployment insurance comes under federal jurisdiction, not under provincial jurisdiction, as the hon. member has just said.

We also took the position that the right of the federal government to give money to the citizens directly, in the same manner as it has the right to take money from them through taxes, is a right that we could not give up.

However, we are quite anxious to develop in the whole country a social security system which, once again, will serve the citizens.

SUBMISSION TO PARLIAMENT OF FINAL PROPOSAL TO AMEND CONSTITUTION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Prime Minister. Will he undertake that any final proposal for the amendment in Canada of the Canadian constitution will be submitted to Parliament for its approval?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the process which we would envisage. It is something to which I cannot commit all the other governments in Canada, but if there is accord on a text in detail in June the process would be, as stated in the communiqué, that we would ask for a resolution at the federal level in the normal fashion. I believe a resolution can only be obtained from the House, and on that occasion we would ask for a resolution supporting the government's approach which it would then, hypothetically, have agreed to in June.

I believe it would be the intention of the provinces to proceed in like fashion, although whether they would do it by way of resolution or statute I cannot say.

DISCUSSION OF INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which also relates to the communiqué. As there has been some discussion about the constitution and unemployment, will the Prime Minister indicate to the House whether the problem in respect of barriers to interprovincial trade in agricultural products was on the agenda, was there a discussion in this regard with the various heads of the provinces, and what was the outcome of that discussion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this was on the agenda and I should be very surprised if it is not covered in the communiqué. It is covered under the title: "Canadian Interprovincial Marketing". We did discuss this at some length and we expressed the hope that Parliament would co-operate with the federal government to ensure swift passage of this legislation on marketing in order to permit us to introduce a bit of order into this whole process in Canada. We did express a veiled regret that the opposition had been so slow in co-operating in this regard.

HEALTH—NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Joliette wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. La Salle: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

In view of the outcome of the last federal-provincial conference and the social welfare proposals put forward by the Quebec Minister of Health, can the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House if the federal government is fully willing to negotiate before the next conference all the proposals made by the Quebec Minister of Health?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, some meetings have already been decided upon in the field of health and welfare, not only with Quebec authorities but with the authorities of the other provinces as well, and we have also indicated—as I have just stated—our desire is to co-ordinate the programs at the various levels as much as possible.

I think it is important to note, so that we do not allow the success of the constitutional conference to distract us from the fact that we have also proposed—and it seems that everyone wishes that it comes through—a way to amend the constitution, in order that social security and all other problems that will not be solved before June might be eventually settled within a constitution made in Canada, by Canadians and for Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice a number of hon. members rising. I am not sure how many wish to ask questions supplementary to those which have been asked on the matter of the constitutional discussions, but I would suggest that perhaps at an early moment we might move on to the consideration of other subjects. For the moment, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Charlevoix.

REPATRIATING OF CONSTITUTION—OFFICES OF GOVERNOR GENERAL AND LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the formula for repatriating the constitution, I believe it has been decided that if such a formula were accepted by the federal government and the provinces, a resolution would be passed requesting that all British legislation applying to Canada be repealed. Why should the posts of Governor General and Lieutenant Governors become exceptions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would consider the formula very closely, he will see that even these clauses could be amended eventually within the framework of Canadian constitution, provided the agreement of the federal government and of six out of ten provincial governments is first ascertained. There is nothing in the constitution, not even the post of Governor General, that could not be amended eventually with such an agreement as provided for in the repatriating formula.

Mr. Asselin: If I have it right, Mr. Speaker, the post of Governor General and Lieutenant Governors have been established under British laws. How come then that in the formula for repatriating the constitution, where we decide to repeal those British laws which apply to Canada, we make an exception for the posts of Governor General and Lieutenant Governors?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I fear that we are somehow initiating a debate.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance in relation to his very interesting submission to the conference. Will he arrange to send a copy of these charts to each one of the unemployed so they will know that things are not really as bad as they seem?

PROVINCIAL UTILIZATION OF CREDIT TO OBTAIN CAPITAL

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister.

NATURE OF TENDER CALL FOR BROILER CHICKENS TO EXPORT TO FAR EAST

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I should like to direct my question to any responsible minister or parliamentary secretary. Has a public tender call been made recently for the purchase of three million pounds of Canadian broilers for export to the Far East and, if so, will the minister investigate and provide information to the House as to whether or not this was truly an open tender call or whether it was designed to give a special advantage to producers in one province to the possible detriment of other producing areas?

GRAIN

PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS ON NEW AGREEMENT TO REPLACE INTERNATIONAL GRAINS ARRANGEMENT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the report from the Geneva meeting of the major wheat trading nations that only the hollow shell of the International Grains Arrangement will survive, can he inform the House whether the Canadian delegation has had any success in respect of its proposals, such as the retention of the food aid program?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it would still be premature to comment. As the hon. member knows, this is an international meeting, and to my knowledge no official communiqué has been issued yet. There was a further meeting this morning concerning items on the agenda and it is now expected that a communiqué, a press conference or a release by the secretary will take place very soon. It may be possible at that point for me to go further in indicating to the House where the negotiations stand.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of rumours to the effect that this conference may collapse without suitable agreements being arrived at, will the minister immediately fly to Geneva with the object in mind of lending all support possible to the bringing about of a successful conclusion to this very important conference?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to comment on the premise any further than I have already, but I may say that I have every confidence in our delegation at Geneva.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PREFERENCE OF DIRECTOR OF INFORMATION FOR CANADIAN ACCENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked a question in the absence of the Secretary of State in connection with a report concerning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation having decided to get rid of non-Canadian accents. Is he in a position to report yet on the attitude of the CBC in this regard?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have read the question asked in my absence by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I forwarded the question to the CBC; I have not yet received any answer, but I know that it will be negative.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether or not the minister had decided to put out a white paper on the meaning of "Canadian accents" so that all will understand the meaning that the CBC has in mind.

DISCUSSION OF EMPLOYEE LAY-OFFS WITH MINISTER—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister report any further progress in his talks with Air Canada about a possible abatement of lay-offs of personnel?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not had any further word other than what I reported last Friday, but I will make additional inquiries and try to pass on the information as soon as I can.

Mr. Bell: Is the minister aware that laid-off Air Canada personnel are being refused unemployment insurance because it is stated that they will be rehired?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I discussed this problem this morning. I have no tangible evidence of this being the case, and certainly I would be hard-pressed to believe that anybody laid off by Air Canada would be refused unemployment insurance, particularly on the strength of the rumour or possibility that these people may shortly be re-engaged by Air Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: That may be a rumour from the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Mackasey: This would be a false premise and unfair to the workers, so I have asked the union whether they have any specific instances in mind and I will give them my personal attention.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister check with the Minister of Transport to ascertain whether there is going to be an abatement of these lay-offs? Surely some hope should be held out to these people.

NATIONAL SECURITY

RETURN OF PHOTOGRAPHS AND FINGERPRINTS OF PERSONS RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Have the Quebec Provincial Police destroyed or given back to the 435 individuals the photographs and fingerprints illegally obtained during the term of the War Measures Act, or has the minister instituted any procedures for their return?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wrote to the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec asking what he intends to do about this matter.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. Since only 62 people were charged and 435 were released who were apparently arrested illegally, and as most of the 62 have been charged under the Criminal Code, is it the intention of the minister to withdraw the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act as it is not applicable at this time?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, you draw a little faster than we people from Calgary. The Minister of Justice was about to answer.

Mr. Speaker: From this distance this was not obvious to the Chair.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

COMPENSATION TO PEOPLE DETAINED AND RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I would not want to prevent the Minister of Justice from answering the hon. member for Calgary North; when he answers my question perhaps he will answer his also. Can the minister indicate whether, in conversations with the provincial Minister of Justice or with his own colleagues, consideration is being given to compensating those who, because of having been detained over a period of time, have suffered economic or other forms of hardship and are still in a situation in which they need to be compensated in some tangible way for being detained unnecessarily and without any charges being laid?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I have already indicated to the House that the Minister of Justice of Quebec has said publicly that if the ombudsman of the province of Quebec, to whom this type of complaint has been directed, is able to indicate to the Minister of Justice of Quebec that there has been economic loss, then those complaints will be seriously considered by the minister.

ONTARIO ADDICTION RESEARCH FOUNDATION MARIJUANA RESEARCH PROJECT—PARTICIPATION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question relating to a program of the Ontario Addiction Research Foundation to pay a number of young gentlemen to smoke marijuana. Is the federal government or the minister's department participating in that program?

An hon. Member: They are all on pot over there.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It may be a valid research project to determine the effects of marijuana by the Ontario Addiction Research Foundation which has possibly one of the finest reputations in this connection in Canada. As to whether it has been in any way funded by the department, I cannot say precisely and I will try to answer the question tomorrow.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I did not ask whether it was being funded by the department. I asked the minister whether or not his department was participating with the Ontario Addiction Research Foundation in that program. I ask the minister to look into the question of whether or not the marijuana that is being used was grown under ideal conditions by the federal Food and Drugs Directorate specifically for this purpose and these tests, and whether or not this is another of those harebrained crackpot ideas that have no relevance—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BROADCASTING, FILMS AND ASSISTANCE TO THE ARTS

REQUEST FOR MEETING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Hon. Donald C. PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF MONEY PRIOR TO SPRING SEEDING

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether, since the outline of the minister's proposed grain stabilization program has now been before the public since October of last year, and since many farmers in western Canada are now making plans for spring seeding operations, he can now tell the House how soon legislation will be brought in to implement all or part of these proposals?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Our discussions with the producers and other interested persons are continuing. We hope with regard particularly to those matters in the program which are relevant to spring planting that we shall be able to make some announcements before very long. As hon. members know, there is in the proposals some indication of hope for an announcement before March 1, and it is still my hope we shall be able to keep to that date.

Mr. Gleave: Since the white paper involves at least tentatively the distribution of $100 million to farmers during the current crop year, can the minister inform the House whether all or part of this money will be distributed to farmers prior to seeding?

Mr. Lang: I doubt that the money involved will be available prior to seeding. This, of course, is part of the whole question of the proposals and their implementation. We are conscious, of course, of the desirability of having this money in the hands of the grain producers as soon as possible, and I hope that as the legislation comes forward it may secure speedy passage so that this can be accomplished.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF REPAYMENT FORMULA UNDER PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Having regard to the critical shortage of cash among western grain producers and because of the current low prices received for grain, would the minister give serious consideration to amending the repayment formula and having it fixed at a more manageable rate in connection with the repayment of advances under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, thus enabling producers to have a better opportunity to assemble sufficient cash for spring operations?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would seem to me the hon. member's question is in fact a submission.

POLLUTION

PROVISION OF ADEQUATE TREATMENT FACILITIES IN CHURCHILL FOREST INDUSTRIES PROJECT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry arising from his reply to an earlier question with respect to the pollution threat at the Churchill Forest Industries project. The minister said he intended to meet with the provincial minister concerned. Now that he has done so, is he satisfied that pollution control is adequate and, if not, what action is he taking?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): We are not satisfied that the measures which are being taken are adequate as presently planned. However, our officials are meeting and discussing this problem in greater detail with the province to ensure that the new quality standards will be met at the new mill in the north.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is Ottawa represented on a continuing basis on the clean environment committee in Manitoba?

Mr. Davis: No, that is a provincial committee.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN HUDSON BAY MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY AND EMPLOYEES—ASSISTANCE OF DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the possibility of an extremely difficult economic situation arising as a result of the labour dispute at Flin Flon, Manitoba, can the minister say whether he or his officials have any plans at the present time to approach the two parties concerned in an attempt to have them arrive at a satisfactory solution?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The strike at Flin Flon has serious repercussions on that community because of the importance of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company. We are watching the situation very carefully but as yet we have received no official request from either of the parties concerned for the mediation services of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member and to all hon. members, since we are reaching the end of the question period, that for the next two or three minutes perhaps we should forgo supplementaries. The hon. member for Churchill has referred to an important matter and perhaps he might be given an opportunity to ask supplementaries later on or tomorrow.

In his absence I believe someone on the other side took notice of it. Having in mind the action of the British Columbia Telephone Company in seeking a substantial increase in telephone rates, which, if granted, would result in increased living costs for many in British Columbia, would the minister and his department concern themselves with this situation, perhaps to the extent of making representations on behalf of the consumers to the federal agency to which the B.C. Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not the custom for a government to make known the positions adopted by other governments during an "in camera" conference. I believe the rule is for each government to express its own position, the communiqué mentioning only such discussions as have had agreement of all governments. Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member has a valid point of order. I realize the hon. member asked a question, and perhaps as we proceeded a little too quickly he did not have an opportunity to get a reply. The minister may remember the question and perhaps he might answer it now.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to certain figures which I would be glad to have him verify with my colleague the Minister of Labour, if that is what he is interested in. Of course we have had discussions before on the fact that there are available different reports of figures measuring different factors in relation to the unemployment situation, so that is nothing new.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): I have received no specific recommendation from that committee. We are continuing to explore every possibility for negotiations on this important subject with the U.S.S.R.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, January 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson, that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of thinking in the country now, and I believe it is taking hold quite broadly, that economic conditions are beginning to show signs of upward trends in North America. The signs seem to be becoming more positive all the time. One of these indicators is the expected pace of home building this year or, rather, the pace and the nature of home building in 1971. Nobody can deny that both are strong and healthy this year. Therefore, I think we might begin to recognize that quite a few things are going right in Canada too. Our expectations are that there will be 220,000 housing starts in Canada in 1971—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: —which is well over the previous record of 210,000 starts in 1969. Moreover, the emphasis of the government on homes for the low in income, where the chief needs really are, will be continued. So, Mr. Speaker, there will be an accelerated and buoyant housing program in Canada this year. This accelerated program will pump substantially more jobs and more spending into the Canadian economy and its effects will be felt quickly at a time when jobs are the Canadian priority. Jobs are the absolute Canadian priority right now, Mr. Speaker, and caring for and response to the most felt needs of today mark what we must do.

Equally important, when the people most in need of our concern are those who must worry most about decent shelter as well as jobs, a very large part of the building activity will be directed to modest and low-income housing. I am talking about home ownership for low to middle-income families, public housing and low rental housing. This is our thrust. Its benefits will reach importantly into Canadian society over the long haul and in trying to deal with today's most urgent needs. These prospects are reflected in the 1971 capital budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which I now wish to table in the House. This budget is the federal government's main strategic instrument for affecting the housing conditions of Canada and for helping to shape urban form and process. Because we have followed a target of at least one million new homes over the five years 1970 to 1974, increasing federal assistance when the private market slackened as it did last year, we have kept house production and mortgage flow on a more even keel. We are beginning to find ways to avoid the old boom and bust cycles.

This year's total budget is $942 million, represented by $902 million plus a previously announced $40 million, against the original 1970 budget of $854 million. It will assist in the production of about 220,000 starts during the year. There will be an expected 165,000 starts by a private market that is resurging as mortgage rates drop and mortgage money becomes significantly easier, and frankly, to my encouragement, as the lending institutions appear to be accepting their obligation to the social needs of housing as well as to profit opportunities. The remaining 55,000 housing units will be financed by CMHC in co-operation with our partners in the provinces and other sponsors. In addition, of course, to the $942 million capital commitment, the CMHC expenditure budget in 1971 is $67 million, as will appear in the estimates to be tabled shortly.

I would like to explore for a minute the economic impact of the residential building in store for this year. New housing construction has one of the highest labour contents of any major economic activity. Each new dwelling unit provides at least two man year's of employment on site and in the production of building materials. This is direct employment, which is only part of the story. In 1970, in spite of the forecasts of doom and disaster there were 190,000 units started, the third best year in Canada's history, despite the economic conditions that slowed down private market activity. The federal government played a major part in keeping the pace active last year. In August, as hon. members may remember, we extended the original 1970 CMHC capital budget by $240 million, the great bulk of which went to low-income housing.

In 1971, as I have said, the prospect is for 220,000 starts. In addition, from last year there are 148,000 dwellings under construction and to be completed during this year. In direct employment alone these starts and completions will mean a minimum increase of 60,000 man year's of employment in housing construction in 1971. The beauty is that house building work is turned on quickly. We have made estimates which show that from the approval of a loan to start of construction, to the employment of people, can be as little as 40 days and certainly under 90 days. The job-providing impact will be even higher in the first half of the year than for the whole year because of the work on dwellings already started. Of course, there are many indirect employment benefits as well. To cite a relatively small but important one, the residential building increase this year implies additional employment of about 2,000 man-years simply because people, when they move into new homes, spend about $1,600 per home on new furniture, appliances, drapes and the like Then further up the scale, this year's housing program is equivalent to building a city of close to a million people. That bespeaks new or expanded streets, sewers, schools, shopping centres and other facilities and adds another 6,000 or more new jobs.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The biggest economic impact, one generally dispersed throughout the economy, comes from the spending of income by workers who would otherwise be unemployed. That provides another 70,000 or 80,000 man-years of new jobs. In all, Mr. Speaker, the new jobs created directly and indirectly simply by the increase in residential building activity will total 140,000 to 150,000 man-years. That is a very substantial part of the unemployment picture. Therefore, housing construction in 1971, in spite of all the derisive and almost wishful comments from the opposition, will greatly aid Canada's employment picture.

An hon. Member: We told you that two years ago.

Mr. Andras: The pace of construction has a vibrant look this year, for several reasons. The federal government will directly support lower priced housing substantially again this year, almost to the exclusion of support for higher cost housing so far as the CMHC budget is concerned. The low to medium priced homes are not only where the need is but, as builders are rapidly learning, where the market is. The higher priced market is in many places overbuilt and demand is soft. The government, to provide housing but also to spur employment is pressing its housing program now. More and cheaper money is becoming available for private mortgages. I am in continuing contact with major lenders and major pension trusts who are showing signs of responding. They have given me strong indications that they are prepared to put large amounts of money into modest income housing.

An hon. Member: Could I ask a question?

Mr. Andras: Mortgage rates may well drop somewhat further this year. We are reaching this more optimistic position partly because the federal government set the stage for it.

An hon. Member: Would you allow a question?

Mr. Andras: I have mentioned the additional $240 million last August, funds which went mainly to the building of most income housing. Also, at the beginning of last year I reserved $200 million of CMHC mortgage funds for a special program to seek innovative ways to build homes for owning and renting by families earning as little as $4,000 a year. The plan worked well. Commitments under this program were made for just under 15,000 units with some carryover still to come. That had to be something of a crash program for we were forced to gear it to starts made during 1970 since the private market was slipping. But it provided excellent experience and lessons in new forms of tenure and land use, new methods of financing, imaginative mixes of commercial with residential building so that the commercial would help pay for the residential.

Favourable National Housing Act lending terms of 7⅞ per cent and 8 per cent were provided for the building of low-rental housing projects public housing, student housing, sewage treatment and land assembly projects. I am happy to announce, Mr. Speaker, that these special interest rates from today are lowered further, both to 7½ per cent.

Innovation—the essence of our approach last year in the $200 million program—the search for and the incentives for new ways to build good housing cheaper, will continue to be sponsored by the government this year. For 1971, $558 million has been reserved for the provision of housing for low-income Canadians through sections 35 and 16 of the National Housing Act. Of this, $253 million has been allocated for provincial housing programs. Another $295 million is allocated for section 16 lending under the National Housing Act. Under this section non-profit organizations, governments, entrepreneurs and sponsor groups can evolve special housing projects for elderly people, families of low income and other disadvantaged persons. The relatively low interest charges make relatively low rents possible.

These funds will produce 38,000 housing units designed specifically for the low-income market. Thus, in the three years 1969-71 commitments will have been made for 113,000 such dwelling units. The measure of that progress is that only 82,000 such units were committed in all of Canada's time up to 1969. This is not to say I am satisfied or complacent, but it is a positive indication of progress.

In addition to the specifically designed low-income units, Mr. Speaker, we have increasingly been devoting funds under section 40 of the National Housing Act to low-income application. The allocation of funds for section 40 this year is $172 million. It is directed at new building in resource towns and small urban centres and also at the rehabilitation and/or purchase of existing homes anywhere in Canada. In addition to those self-contained housing units. the new budget—$789 million all told—will finance 14 450-bed hostels for elderly persons and students.

While the 1971 budget continues to give primary emphasis to housing concerns, it also provides $153 million for urban infrastructure. That includes $87 million for sewage treatment projects, $43 million for land assembly and $20 million previously committed to urban renewal. I would be the last to claim that the housing activities of a nation—still less of one government—could be adequately summed up in a listing or programs. I do believe, however, that following the important activities of my predecessor and his 1968-69 task force on housing and urban affairs—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: —and during the almost two years that I have held responsibility at the federal level for housing, major steps have been taken. A new importance is attached, countrywide, to the housing needs of Canadians, and not just by numbers. The climate or relations among all levels of government in focusing on these needs has perceptibly improved. In dramatically shifting emphasis to the housing needs of low-income Canadians, priorities have been clearly defined. More Canadians will either have to swallow their rhetoric on poverty or get in with us and support our efforts to provide more housing for people on low income.

I also urge the provinces and the municipalities to do more of that which only they can do. Let them make use of the national building code, which no other level of government can force upon them, for instance. Let provincial governments review the recommendations of the 1968-69 task force on housing. Nearly all the recommendations that were purely federal in scope have been implemented. It is true that some requiring provincial, municipal or private sector response have not been acted upon. We must all act in concert as much as possible. We recognize more than ever before that housing and all the complex environment of urban living is interspliced. like the structure of an atom, with many other issues such as jobs, poverty, pollution, transportation, education—the whole range of contemporary matters.

We at the federal level are seeking every possible method of defining real need wherever it exists and trying to meet those needs, whether it is a study of the housing needs of Métis people in Alberta or Saskatchewan, the disadvantaged in the territories or the very special requirements, of the old people. The fact is that these needs should never be treated as simple, single and isolated one from the other. Therefore, no one level of government is capable of coping in isolation from the others. As our cities and city systems grow larger, and there is every indication that that is the way we are heading, that factor of interdependence will become ever more the case.

These complexities are what should be discussed and, who knows, resolved by a much closer working together of the various levels of government. We are starting such a process with the provinces. We hope that preliminary talks now going on will result in a trilevel—federal, provincial and municipal—meeting on urban problems and priorities later this year. These discussions, Mr. Speaker, can well influence National Housing Act programs as we move toward careful and deliberate efforts to order together our urban lives.

If I may sum up, we forecast 220,000 starts this year. We forecast an increase, as a result of this increase in starts, of between 140,000 and 150,000 man-years of work. That means more jobs, which are needed most of all in this country today. The budget will be $942 million. The capital budget of CMHC will continue to emphasize the need for us to work with the private sector in the provision of housing in the low-income sector where there is a great need. May I have the permission of the House to table the capital budget for 1971 of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in both official languages?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister, before tabling that document, would permit a question. Having listened to the minister's impassioned appeal to the provinces and other bodies to get behind the housing program, may I ask him why the Manitoba government, which submitted proposals for a $55 million public housing project, has just been informed by CMHC that because of the unavailability of sufficient funds this project is being reduced to $31 million, which is a reduction of 40 per cent? In view of the minister's appeal to the provinces to get busy, it seems to me that this is not the best way to encourage them to support public housing and thereby increase employment.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the optimist sees the doughnut and the pessimist sees the hole. I would have been delighted to have been able to give Manitoba the exact sums asked for, because they are embarked on a sophisticated five-year planning program, which we encourage. We are giving them three times as much as we gave them last year. Notwithstanding the $942 million budget, we had to make some allocations. Most provinces have asked for more than we can give them out of that budget. It was ever thus. I share the hon. member's concern that there are certain constraints within the budget. It is, nevertheless, very, very satisfactory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) is seeking permission to ask the minister a question. Is it agreed that the hon. member shall have permission to ask a question before the hon. minister resumes his seat?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I have raised this question with the minister from time to time. It has to do with increased federal assistance for the rehabilitation of existing housing stocks. The minister mentioned this matter in his speech today. In view of the great importance of a vigorous rehabilitation of the housing program to help us meet the unemployment crisis, can the minister say whether vastly expanded action in this field is contemplated by the government?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it is our intention—and my reference to this matter was deliberate in the statement I made—to emphasize that the rehabilitation approach will be escalated over anything we have done in the past.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing (Mr. Andras). I only wish that I could share his optimism about the state of the Canadian economy. I have very serious doubts whether that optimism is shared by the hundreds of thousands of unemployed people who are walking the streets of Canada today. He suggested that the interest rate on housing loans will be lowered to 7½ per cent. I think that is a very worthwhile objective. As a matter of fact, it should have been done many years ago. But what is the point of lowering the interest rate to 7½ per cent when hundreds of thousands of people cannot afford to borrow the money and cannot afford to pay any interest, let alone interest at 7½ per cent?

Today, Mr. Speaker, we face a real crisis in Canada so far as unemployment is concerned. It is a crisis which in many respects is as serious as the one we faced in the so-called hungry thirties; a crisis which is growing worse every month and which is causing an awful lot of misery for thousands of Canadian families; a crisis the blame for which can be laid entirely at the feet of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: The blame can be laid at the feet of a government led by a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who has said to the Canadian people, "If you don't like it, lump it."

Mr. Baldwin: Shame.

Mr. McQuaid: That, apparently, is the government's attitude to many people who find themselves unemployed. This is a government that is led by a man who just a few days ago is reported to have used disgusting and disgraceful language to a group of people who were only exercising their democratic right to parade on Parliament Hill and make known their grievances to the people and to the government. It is a government, Mr. Speaker, under the leadership of a Prime Minister who is obviously losing the confidence and respect of the Canadian people. If he were doing his duty, I suggest that he ought to resign and let the people of Canada determine whether they are satisfied that this government is doing all it can in the interests of our unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: Our massive unemployment today, Mr. Speaker, was not created by the people of Canada, nor was it created by labour. It was created by this government, the government which created tight money, the government which pushed interest rates sky high, the government which over the years has increased taxes and is continuing to increase them, the government which has limited the supply of money and has placed a very severe restraint on federal spending. Yes, it has been caused by the government. One would expect that the Prime Minister and his government would accept responsibility for this. Apparently, however, they do not wish to do so.

Mr. Asselin: I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is listening.

Mr. McQuaid: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said in this House not long ago that everything is on the up and up and that everything will soon iron itself out. I ask him to tell that to the almost 600,000 people who are today unemployed and walking the streets, not knowing what to do.

Mr. Hales: They are told to live on $30 a week.

The Budget—Mr. McQuaid

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. McQuaid: I ask him to tell that to the men and women who are out of work and whose families are suffering. This is through no fault of their own but, rather, to the lack of attention by this government to the problems of unemployment. There may be no crisis for the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, but there is a crisis for hundreds of thousands of Canadians and their families. Figures bear out the fact that the year 1970 was one of general slowdown in the Canadian economy. This slowdown was brought about by the fiscal and monetary policies of this government. We were told that these policies were adopted to fight the so-called inflationary trend. The result is that we are now suffering a slow growth in our economy. We are also suffering a very high rate of unemployment.

According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, 155,000 more people were unemployed in December, 1970, than in December 1969. This represents an increase in unemployment of 40 per cent in one year. It is a disgraceful situation. Yet the government is not prepared to do anything substantial about it. In December, 1970, there were 62,000 more people unemployed than in the month of November. This represents an increase, in one month, of 14 per cent. But the government is apparently not prepared to do anything about it. The rate of unemployment in this country is more critical than in the worst years of the depression.

A very large proportion of the unemployed are the youngest people in the labour market. Almost 20 per cent of the registered unemployed are 19 years of age or younger. I suggest it is a very serious matter when 20 per cent of our young people are introduced into an atmosphere of forced idleness. Many of them do not want to be unemployed, but there isn't anything for them to do. At one time only the unskilled were unemployed. That is not the situation today. Many of our better educated people are unemployed. There are unemployed people walking the streets today with university degrees as high as doctorates. They are unable to find work. The unemployment situation in Canada is serious.

I wish to direct the attention of hon. members to the very serious situation in my area, Atlantic Canada. There has been a very serious increase in unemployment in that area. The number of unemployed increased from 42,000 in November to 54,000 in December, an increase of 12,000 in one month. That is the largest monthly increase of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces since 1956. The government has done very little about the increase in unemployment in the past 14 years. The rate increased from 6.3 per cent in November to 8.3 per cent in December. The rate in that area was the highest in Canada, with the possible exception of the province of Quebec. The latest figures available for my province of Prince Edward Island are for March 31, 1970. At that time there were 8,959 people receiving social assistance. Many of these almost 9,000 people were willing but unable to find work. In order to support themselves and their families they had to lower themselves to the point where they had to ask the government for social assistance. That is the highest figure of any province with the exception of Newfoundland. In March, 1970, 16.2 per cent of the people of Newfoundland were receiving social assistance. In Prince Edward Island it was 8.1 per cent; Nova Scotia, 6.2 per cent; New Brunswick, 8.1 per cent. The average in the Atlantic area at that time was 9.6 per cent. Almost 10 per cent of the people received social assistance: they had no other means of supporting themselves or their families.

The situation with regard to social welfare in Canada is very serious. Statistics show that in the field of social welfare Canada is one of the highest per capita spenders in the world. The answer to our problem is not social welfare. I am convinced that if our spending in the social welfare field continues as it has in the past we will very soon be faced with a rude awakening. It is the responsibility of the government, indeed Parliament, to ensure that everyone who is willing to work has the opportunity to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: The people of Canada only ask for the opportunity to earn a decent living for themselves and their families. To date this government has not done anything to provide that opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: We do not quarrel with the fact that welfare assistance is a necessity for the sick and the unemployable. However, it is time we devised a formula to provide employment for those who are capable of working and willing to work. There are hundreds of thousands of such people today in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: There is a serious problem in Prince Edward Island. As hon. members know, we depend largely on agriculture to earn a living. There is a serious problem in so far as agriculture is concerned. I wish to quote some figures to make clear how serious this problem is. In 1930 the farm population in Prince Edward Island was 55,000. That figure represented 63 per cent of our population. By 1960, 30 years later, the farm population was reduced to 31,000, 28.1 per cent of our total population. Since 1960 it has continued to decline at a very alarming rate. In 1931 there were 12,865 occupied farms in our province. Today there are less than 5,000, a decrease of almost 8,000.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Unfortunately, the situation is not improving. As Your Honour knows, we depend very largely on our potato industry and that industry at this moment is being dealt a serious blow up, I would say, a small group of general store operators in Toronto who are apparently doing their best to promote the sale of Ontario potatoes. Let me give hon. members an example of how this is being brought about. Yesterday Prince Edward Island farmers were receiving 31 cents for a 10-pound bag of potatoes delivered in Toronto. These potatoes were selling on the Toronto market for 50 cents; that is to say, at a profit of 19 cents to the retailer. Ontario farmers were receiving 30 cents for a 10-pound bag of Ontario potatoes, only one cent less than the P.E.I. farmers were receiving, and Ontario potatoes were selling on the Toronto market for 39 cents. In other words, retailers were making 19 cents on P.E.I. potatoes, when they could sell them, though they were prepared to sell Ontario potatoes at a profit of only nine cents for a ten-pound bag.

This, of course, puts P.E.I. potatoes at a disadvantage despite their exceptional quality, because people will not pay 50 cents for a 10-pound bag of potatoes if they can buy reasonably good potatoes for 39 cents. As a result, our potato farmers estimate they will suffer a loss of some $5 million this year. I cannot help wondering whether the price of P.E.I. potatoes is not being deliberately pushed up in Ontario in order to promote the sale of Ontario potatoes. I do not know whether there is anything the government can do about it—I am not laying this at the feet of the government—but I do hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) will take notice of what is happening, and if the federal government can do anything to overcome this injustice I hope that action will be taken as soon as possible; otherwise, P.E.I. farmers will not be able to stay in business and the number of unemployed will be increased.

Mr. Osler: Would the hon. member mind answering a question? While I agree with many of the things he has said about the need to end regional disparity, does he consider he is being completely fair when he blames all unemployment problems on the present government? I have looked at the charts and find that the percentage of unemployed in the United States is even greater. And our federal government has nothing to do with what is happening in the United States; there is a Conservative administration there.

Mr. McQuaid: I am blaming this government for not doing enough to overcome the unemployment problem as it exists in Canada. The necessary concrete measures are not being taken on behalf of people who are looking for work and who are able to work.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, for a new member, his maiden speech in the House is perhaps an unforgettable occasion and I think that all members who went through this before me would agree that they have been deeply moved by this experience.

It is certainly gratifying for me to represent my constituency of Labelle in Parliament, but it also vests me with the responsibility for measuring up to my predecessor, the hon. Léo Cadieux, who fulfilled his duties in this House with remarkable zest. I wish to pay due tribute to him and to renew the testimony of admiration from his constituents of Labelle who have so often taken pride in the way he discharged his duties as Minister of National Defence and we are sure that he will brilliantly represent our country in Paris.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank all the members for the very warm reception they gave me in the House after my election on November 16 last. I have been reassured by their liberal welcome and I wish that all members of the opposition who applauded on this occasion will not soon regret it.

May I also congratulate the hon. members for Frontenac and Lisgar (Messrs. Corriveau and Murta) who were brought to the House by the same by-election and may I wish them both a cloudless and fruitful career.

I will take advantage of a well-established tradition, on the occasion of a new member's first speech in the debate on the motion of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in directing my comments especially to my constituents in Labelle with the hope that all Canadians who believe in dialogue will also be listening. May I be allowed to express my gratitude for their so generous support, their loyalty to my leader and my party, loyalty they so eloquently expressed on November 16 and which can be found in my province and everywhere else in Canada.

Despite the successful result I obtained in this by-election on account of the great popularity of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I do not forget the obligations and responsibilities I accepted.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the riding I have the privilege of representing in this House, and which was so ably represented by my predecessor, is composed of 50 municipalities ranging in terms of population from the highly industrialized city of St. Jerome to a large number of renowned summer and winter resorts in the heart of the Laurentian mountains and small villages and settlements six miles south of Mont Laurier. It is, as closely as one can find, an accurate demographic reflection of the province of Quebec on a smaller scale.

Our population is composed of proud Quebeckers who are loyal and deeply-rooted Canadians. I can advance this assertion without hesitation, having known a vast number of them, having been brought up in the area and having lived in that part of the province for most of my life. We are the descendants of settlers who came to that region at the very beginning, settlers who plowed the land with courage, perseverance and an expectation which was not always rewarded in accordance with the full measure of their efforts.

Our history is, in a way, similar to that of the first Canadians who explored and developed this great land in which various ethnic groups are represented. In fact, most of the elements to be found in the Canadian mosaic, the largest proportion being French-speaking, all have, with their particular talent and ability, contributed in large measure to the development of our region. Together we have adjusted to the accelerated evolution of our time, although for all of us the first and utmost priority is still economics.

• (3:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

If Canada is rich on account of the diversity of its population, my constituency is largely endowed in this regard and shares such wealth with the rest of this country.

An important part of the constituency of Labelle, Mr. Speaker, enjoys a long-standing tourist tradition known throughout this country, on account of its great beauty, its numerous lakes full of various species of fish and the majestic Laurentian mountains.

We believe our constituency is the most visited in this country, by our fellow citizens of other provinces as well as by our neighbours to the South. The best known tourist establishments in the province are in our constituency, a few miles north of Montreal.

The construction of the new Montreal airport and the economic upsurge that should follow for the whole area compel us to think of what the future has in store for us. We must ensure that our existing facilities will be able to meet the soaring demand from our citizens who are anxious to enjoy the countryside and come closer to nature and who increasingly insist that all those natural beauties which are so many features of our region be preserved and made accessible to them.

As economic requirements force us to alter our environment, those elements become more important to our mental health, to our return to wilderness and to an environment not spoiled by man.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that this ambition is being voiced by influential people in this region who want a major part of the territory to be turned into a genuine national park similar to those existing throughout the country. This undertaking will have a dual impact: the creation of permanent jobs for skilled people already dedicated to tourism and proud of its tradition and consequent high repute and, for the most densily populated area of North America, the provision of a holiday resort second to none. This ambitious project is winning more and more supporters in all quarters, and it is becoming more and more difficult to resist the trend.

In our area, close to holiday resorts, there is a huge territory well suited to that kind of development, involving no danger of ecological unbalance and remarkable for its climate, topography and wildlife.

The tourist industry, one of the main industries in the province, in which we have specialised and acquired a reputation, seems now to offer more security than many others which, on account of changing times, are no longer important sources of employment. We must pave the way in that field and protect this source of foreign currency. We should be prepared to meet the needs of the people in our area who want well-paid work and job security.

During the last few years, we have faced rather serious employment difficulties caused mainly by an important migration of farm hands and labourers from the North of the riding who believed that they could find greater employment opportunities in Saint-Jérôme. That exodus has had the effect of greatly increasing the unemployment rate.

As all other Canadians, Mr. Speaker, we are concerned with the yearly increase in seasonal unemployment. That situation is ascribable to many factors which hon. members of the opposition have not identified. Reports indicate especially that agriculture in Canada has been losing 24,000 jobs a year since 1955. That is mainly due to a greater availability of capital, to automation and to a greater efficiency.

Unemployment is caused both by fluctuations in demand, as severe here as in the countries where we export, as well as by the work reduction factor in production, technological changes, labour mobility, depletion of natural resources in a given area, changes in management and ownership of undertakings which leads to the disappearance of some manufacturers.

We must also ask ourselves whether the unions, with their requests for ever increasing wages for fewer and fewer employees, do not contribute to a large extent to reducing the labour force. I suspect that disproportionate union demands force the employers to excessive efficiency, which leads to smaller staffs, which are better paid, I agree, but which are more exposed to unemployment. Would it not be better if the unions would rather have more men paid decent wages than fewer workers drawing higher pay?

To that one can add the continuous increase in the number of multiple jobs. That is too often the case with people holding two or more jobs, the wife and husband sharing the financial burden of the family with the income each of them has. In Canada we once had the highest employment increase among industrialized countries, but in spite of this increase, in 1970, as everyone knows, the unemployment rate reached 5.9 per cent compared to 4.7 in 1969. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, in 1961 the national unemployment rate was 7.2 per cent, and 9.3 in my province. Of course, unemployment must be the concern of everyone, because of its implications on the social structure. Also, the people of my province who exert themselves in opposing any measure conducive to the right atmosphere for creating the famous 100,000 jobs, should be despised by the unemployed. We must ask if those people see, beyond statistical data, the human anguish, the solitude, the alienation and even often the desperation of the human beings those figures represent. We hope they understand that people on welfare are permanently branded with indignity.

I am thinking about those who, for obscure reasons, oppose the construction of the East-West expressway in Montreal, those who by their loud statements perpetuate this atmosphere of uncertainty to which is due the crisis of October last, brought about over the last few years by the verbal violence of petty politicians who remind us of the so-called "conquerors of the useless". There is also this too common attitude whereby employment is a right rather than an elementary duty which fulfils and glorifies human beings.

[English]

Of course, those, fanatical people with dreamer's eyes who desire change for the amusement they find in pulling things to bits make pandemonium and call it progress. Society is satiated with quacks and their quick cure-alls, the like of them being responsible for many ills in Europe of yesteryear. These conflicts, insecurities and frustrations which are the difficult legacy of the Canadian youth have at least one positive aspect: they are in a sense the growing pains of evolving cultures. These very difficulties provide the impetus for a constructive search for new cultural forms. Today, social institutions are extremely complex and no single approach provides a complete understanding of them. Countless young people find themselves confused. They see an apparent disintegration of hitherto solidly established codes and traditions. They sense that their elders are bewildered and perplexed.

• (4:00 p.m.)

No one has ever been young before in such a world. Both young and old wonder what brought about the present state of things, and the young have an itch for activity that will make the future brighter. The great majority of young people show an awareness of what is going on and a mature understanding.

The crisis in human affairs that confronts every generation anew is never as new as it seems to that generation. There were equally spectacular political, economic and social changes and equally showy transformations of dress and manners in other ages, some long past. People talk about new generations as though they were separate waves, but they are not: they flow into each other and each new generation has many good qualities and thoughts to exchange as it overlaps and merges with the previous one. Every period of life has its problems and its solutions, and the benefits which flow from these solutions are available only to those who are pliable. Someone once said that old or young, we have to keep flexible in living our lives, not flexible as to principles or as to things of eternal truth but flexible in our reactions to environment, to people and places, to the going and coming of friends and family and to changing situations and circumstances.

[Translation]

The Canadian dream, Mr. Speaker, is the establishment of a democratic society within which men know how to govern themselves and are free to achieve self-improvement to the full extent that their capabilities and energy will permit, with the objective to promote well-being in the population, according to similar principles of decency, freedom and equality.

When looking at our gigantic country and its numerous development possibilities, we sometimes get the impression that we are midgets playing on a stage designed for titans. This could perhaps explain the attitude of some of my fellow-citizens who have thrown in the towel because they do not believe they can meet the challenge.

Our Canadian mosaic is not an obstacle, but a positive factor in the task of building a great nation.

Civilized people accept, Mr. Speaker, that their neighbors have opinions which differ from theirs. They are free from this mental disease, the symptoms of which are total intolerance toward the views of other people.

Not only is it important to believe passionately in democracy, but also to practise it earnestly. In this society of ours, the individual may, by participating in government and by being educated, realize more than ever his role as a citizen.

People cannot live happily in isolation. That is why Jewish prayers insist on plural rather than singular forms, on community rather than on individuality.

Where questions of substance are concerned, Mr. Speaker, we may say that most Canadians pay respect to the same values. They believe in a social order in which individuals are more important than objects, in which ideas are more important than slogans, in which individuals are judged on their personal values and in which men may express their opinions under the protection of the law.

The Canadian way of life offers one method of having intelligence, good will and individual efforts work towards solutions to the problems. Success depends on whether we may expect that the ordinary citizen will act to the best of his knowledge, that he will do his duty and that he will perform it intelligently.

Then, as people say on our coasts, the rising tide will get all boats afloat.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Dupras: Certainly.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I wish first to commend the hon. member for his first speech in the House.

In his remarks, he mentioned, among those who create verbal difficulties for a job-creating economic organization, those who objected to the proposed East-West expressway in Montreal. If I have interpreted his remarks faithfully, can the hon. member tell us whether his criticisms were aimed at the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), the Liberal member for Hochelaga, who was the first, as cabinet minister, to object to this proposal?

Mr. Dupras: Mr. Speaker, my remarks were not aimed at anybody in particular. I do not recall referring to anyone or naming anyone. I meant all those who object to this proposal being implemented as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the new member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) on his maiden speech. It was an excellent speech and I am certain that much thought went into it. It was idealistic and intelligent. I am certain that members of the House who heard him share my sentiments. His comments were positive and optimistic.

Unfortunately, I have to turn now to a matter which I cannot greet with optimism and confidence. I find myself somewhat limited in expressing my sincere anger and unhappiness at the current state of our unemployment picture. I cannot express myself well because all the best adjectives have already been used by previous speakers. We have heard words like "criminal", "immoral", "tragic", "insensitive", "technocratic", "vicious" and "callous". All these have been hurled at the government, and I think rightly so. These word weapons are the only weapons at the disposal of the opposition to get the government to respond to the crisis of unemployment facing 700,000 Canadians.

I know that these words fall on deaf ears. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) told us that he has heard them all before. The wives, children and families of 700,000 Canadians are facing a desperate crisis this winter, and 23 per cent of all those unemployed Canadians happen to live in my province of British Columbia. The other day when the Minister of Finance was speaking about his budget he accused the opposition of attempting to make political capital out of the tragedy of this issue. What does he expect Members of Parliament in the opposition to do—sit silently by and accept it all? If one thinks of it in more concrete terms than the abstract figure of 700,000 people, you realize that this is roughly the population of Vancouver, which is Canada's third largest city. Here we have a metropolis of people who are bitter, idle, deprived and degraded, not by chance, not by acts of God—unless you consider the cabinet a many-headed god—but by the deliberate, premeditated, inhuman economic policies of this government. You do not have to use the words of the opposition to document this. The classic remark made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) at the time we debated this matter previously testifies to this fact. The minister said, "It takes courage for a government to create unemployment." What a line that is!

We speak today rather belatedly on this issue, not because we did not know it all before, not that we did not know it was coming but because last fall suddenly we had problems in Canada and people were in no frame of mind to listen seriously to this issue. We were preoccupied with the problem in Quebec. People might have listened to unemployment predictions if they themselves had been unemployed, but the average Canadian was not yet touched by it. He was touched, however, by the FLQ crisis. I happen to believe that the FLQ crisis, the so-called apprehended insurrection, was blown up out of all proportion by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for reasons best known to himself, his buddies, his confidants. Our Prime Minister is experienced in show biz. Just as he did last fall in the Quebec crisis situation, I would now like him to use his talents to give a lead in arousing all Canadians to the far more pernicious and widespread personal crisis of no work and push this to its true perspective, because in my view in the long run joblessness is far more serious. There is no point in the Minister of Finance or any other minister trying to cover it up or to explain it away with some sort of sophisticated sophistry. As hon. members on all sides of the House know, unemployment is very real and widespread. It reaches into every hamlet, village and city throughout the land, with tremendous waste and leaving a legacy of despair that will last for years to come. You do not get over being out of work in a hurry.

I do not believe there is a family in Canada that has not a relative or friend untouched by the grim hand of unemployment. There is the husband who has received his notice from Air Canada and then fails to get unemployment insurance. There is the son who dedicated himself to get an education or a trade and who now finds there is no job for his particular skill. Some people's sons have even had to move in with their parents. They are the lucky ones. Some parents do not have room for them in their houses. What about the merchant who has to lay off a long term employee or who has to close his business because customers do not appear at his door in sufficient number? What about the farmer, unskilled, chased off the land, adrift in an urban environment because of the enclosure policies with respect to agriculture devised by the government? The same applies to the fishing industry.

Ask the guy lining up at the unemployment insurance wicket for welfare, or at the soup kitchen, who is to blame. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) found out when he visited Vancouver, the answer is that the worker's misfortune is due to politicians. An unemployed man no longer believes his problems are his own fault, nor does he distinguish between members of the government and members of the opposition—again something that the Leader of the Opposition found out. He lumps us all together. He no longer believes in the conventional mythology of the Protestant ethic that being unemployed is his own fault, not the government's, and is due to some failure in his own personality. He brands all politicians as a bunch of useless, parasitic individuals. And if opposition members follow the advice of the Minister of Finance and fail to speak out, knowing our words are going to fall on deaf ears because of the government's obstinacy, then we will be parasites. It is our job to talk about this matter and no amount of advice from the Minister of Finance will prevent us from doing it.

The government has taken all the credit for retarding inflation. It seems to me only just that if it wants to bask in the euphoria of having accomplished its deflation goal, it must also accept the major responsibility for causing much of the current unemployment. I do not see how the government can have it both ways. This "no work" crisis was brought about as a direct result of the government's exclusive preoccupation for the last 2½ years with balanced budgets and inflation-fighting.

As I mentioned earlier, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance entertained us the other afternoon. He blamed the problem of unemployment on Canada's severe winters. He blamed it on labour disputes. He forgot about the labour disputes in previous years, and the winters too. It may be convenient for him to do that. He blamed it on almost anything except on what in fact has been its major cause, the deliberate economic slowdown and austerity measures which have been high priority items of the government. The government cannot escape this and we are not going to let it escape it. The government did it. It did it deliberately. It knew full well the risk, in its policies of unemployment, of human redundancy.

A while back the Prime Minister was so committed to the government's economic policy that he was prepared to see unemployment go to 6 per cent. Well, he succeeded beyond his wildest dreams. In December, unemployment across Canada was 6.6 per cent on a seasonally adjusted basis and predictions were that things would become worse and not better. We expect the announcement tomorrow of another seasonally adjusted figure. Perhaps that figure will be lower, but the total number of unemployed will go up. Just ask the guy who is out of work how it feels to be seasonally adjusted! We can hardly blame him for being seasonally maladjusted. He becomes unhappy every winter.

The Minister of Finance claims that Canada has been outstanding in the western world in providing more jobs per capita. I cannot quarrel with his figures—but tell that to the guy in the soup-kitchen. Tell that to the municipalities I represent, where welfare costs have tripled over the past three years. The other day I received in the mail the welfare officer's report to the Langley municipal council, an area which I represent. I quote:

> The chairman presented this report which showed the percentage of population in receipt of welfare for the month of December, 1970, was 9.95 per cent. This compares with 9.34 per cent in November and 7.64 per cent in December, 1969.

The figure now has increased by roughly 2 per cent. This is not dealing with costs: it deals with the number of people applying for welfare. I am sure this sad story is repeated through all the nine municipalities I represent. Some 2½ yeras ago the winter works program was withdrawn. We were told it would not be missed because millions of dollars would be devoted to manpower training and retraining. Now a lot of municipalities would like winter works programs reinstated because they are starved for funds for capital projects. My province is fortunate; it is to get 23 per cent of the $150 million loan fund recently announced. In fact, as was said today, we may get even more if other provinces do not fully use their share. But, Mr. Speaker, we must be fair about this matter. I am always fair, impartial and non-political when dealing with matters such as this and I point out that the tripling welfare costs in B.C. cannot be laid entirely at the door of the federal government.

By a stroke of a pen, three years ago the B.C. government, by changing a formula, doubled the cost of welfare to municipalities. Until then they were required to pick up 10 per cent of the welfare costs; but that was increased to 20 per cent. Now in Mr. Bennett's most recent budget that has been cut by 5 per cent. Municipalities will have to pick up only 15 per cent of the cost. I imagine he will receive great applause all around for that—but it is like the old story of the man who kept hitting himself on the head because it felt so good when he stopped. I think the policies of the federal government can be blamed for at least half of this increase which the municipalities must meet. As I have said, capital projects have been delayed in the municipalities. People are beginning to make dark mutterings about work-for-welfare proposals because they are sick and tired of bearing excessive costs which they cannot meet, and they see little relief for the future. All the people of Canada in one way or other pay for the waste of manpower. But what about the things we need? We need pollution abatement, roads, housing, sewers—so it is not that there is no need for full employment. It is simply that there is no government will to produce full employment, and even if there were such a will there are no programs to put it into action.

Mr. Speaker, apart from the Prime Minister there are three men who should be responsible for doing something about the unemployment crisis. They are the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and, of course, the Minister of Labour. Why don't they have the courage to admit that they have bungled the job? Why do they gloss over it and say that things are going to look great in the future? If they had the courage to admit their mistakes and start afresh, everybody would respect them. They are only human. I truly believe that the Minister of Finance is human. Sometimes I wonder, but really I am convinced he is. Sometimes we on this side of the House make mistakes and I am sure we would allow the Minister of Finance the same human characteristics. I am certain that if Canadians were asked to make sacrifices for something positive, they would be prepared to do so. But they are not prepared to accept the continuous sophistry of the flim-flam men. If these three ministers will not admit that they have bungled or that they disagree with the policies put forward by the Prime Minister or the government, policies that have caused so much grief and hardship, and if they continue to stumble around under orders, doing things against their better judgment, they are little more than the reincarnation of the Three Stooges and should be regarded as such.

Mr. Speaker, other members have pointed out that in December there were 218,000 young people out of work. Most of them were looking for work. There is a relatively recent phenomenon, however, of the voluntarily unemployed youth. I do not know whether this stems from discouragement, but there are the check-outs, the drop-outs, the goof-offs—those young people who are so cynical or discouraged about our system that they spend their time examining their navals, freeing their minds or using any other excuse for indolence. They are a serious problem. I think we should be talking about this phenomenon but I do not think this is the time to do it. However, we will have to face the reasons behind their alienation in the near future. The goof-offs are a relatively new phenomenon and I think they are in the minority.

What kind of things might we do for these young unemployed, Mr. Speaker? The first thing we should look at is the opportunity for them to make social and economic contributions in Canada's northland if programs were designed to employ them there. Anyone interested in what is happening in other countries might be interested in reading Farley Mowat's new book about Siberia. Changes must be made in the manpower retraining regulations to allow these young unemployed access to the retraining programs even if they have not been part of the work force for the required three years. That is a relatively simple amendment which would solve a lot of problems. I know there are some flaws in this proposal because we are accustomed to thinking that only those who lack skills are unemployed. This is not true. A previous speaker mentioned the plight of some professional and trades people. If it is suggested that the unemployed are skilled people, the reaction will be: What is the point of training more plumbers and electricians just to be unemployed at a time when we already have unemployed plumbers and electricians?

Some long-range planning is essential on the question of the overdevelopment of skills. Canada is somewhat like some of the emerging nations who while desperately needing the skills of their own people force those who have been trained to emigrate and seek a market for their skills elsewhere because their country is not sufficiently developed to employ them gainfully. Canada's difficulties in this area stem from the fact that we have had an historic dependence on imported skills and have thus neglected training people here. In effect, we stole our doctors, teachers and other skilled people from other countries. We should have been training these people ourselves. And now that we are, there is currently limited opportunity for them to be gainfully employed. Hopefully, this is a temporary situation but I would not bet on it.

Besides greater manpower access, Mr. Speaker, maybe we should face the fact that for a long time to come we will have a large number of young people unable to find employment. The Minister of Labour admitted that there would be some instability in our labour-intensive industries while they automated and retooled in order to compete with low-cost imports. He mentioned textiles in particular. If the industry cannot meet the competition now and has to automate, it will not use the number of workers it once did. Muscle power is no longer saleable, and maybe for a long time to come we will have to face the bleak prospect of underemployed youth. What are we going to do about it? First of all, we might face the prospect squarely and begin to shorten the labour lifetime of the average man. There are many more pleasant things to do, Mr. Speaker, than to spend 45 years locked to the treadmill of an unrewarding job. Why is it necessary for men to spend 45 years performing work in order to eat, raise their families and then die? Surely there is more to life than this. But for many people there is not.

I was intrigued by the recent United Auto Workers contract proposal of "30 and out". This suggestion would help young and middle-aged people alike and certainly it would be popular. The suggestion was this: Can't we arrange our affairs so that a man can complete his labour from age 20 to 50 or 25 to 55 and then be retired at three-quarters of his salary? More men would be willing to retire earlier if it did not mean facing severe financial hardship. There are a lot of pleasant things to do before a man dies after the age of 55 when he has raised his children and discharged his responsibility. I talked this idea over recently—it is not a radical one because the armed forces and the RCMP have done this sort of thing for years—with a friend of mine who is a railroader. His wife works because he cannot provide for their five children on his salary alone. He said that most of the guys who go to work with him are going through the motions waiting for retirement. They are fulfilling their obligations and they would jump at the chance of early retirement. I asked: Is the price of packing it in worth a criminal reduction in income? My friend went on to say that he would buy a camper and travel, thus helping tourism and, incidentally, allowing himself and his wife the opportunity of enjoying life a little before they are too old.

• (4:30 p.m.)

I do not see why we have not considered something like this much more seriously. If we can arrange things so that we can retire a Member of Parliament after six years with $3,690 a year, surely to God we can do the same thing for the average guy after 30 years on the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: I think that would be logical. A security constable aged 55 in the House of Commons said to me that he would retire tomorrow if he could obtain three-quarters of his salary. I ask, why cannot we do this sort of thing? It would bring opportunities and benefits to our young people. We do not do anything for them now, Mr. Speaker. If we could give them increased opportunities they could be employed and build their future with confidence. It is no joke for them to be forced into retirement at the age of 55. What is the good of that?

I am no economist, Mr. Speaker, nor do I pretend to be one. No economist is required to tell the government of the despair and desperation encountered by many people today. The government may not like our talking about the staggering proportion of our idle work force, but the age of obedience disappeared with the coming of the age of aquarius and people will not remain silent and accept certain conditions any more. Confrontation is never far from their minds. Do not expect the unemployed to remain deferential if conditions do not improve markedly, and soon. If we do not act soon, Mr. Speaker, it would come as no surprise to me if violence were to erupt across the land. Some of that violence, I am afraid, may make the FLQ crisis look like a Sunday school picnic.

In addition to the suggestions I have brought forward, may I reiterate some of my leader's suggestions brought forward the other day. We do not want to make political capital out of the tragedy of unemployment. Hopefully, however, the government will listen to some of our suggestions. We think that the 3 per cent surcharge on income tax ought to be dropped. This surcharge is being perpetuated and very soon our people will think of it as a permanent tax: it will just be there. Also, what about inviting the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing (Mr. Andras) to use his influence for the dropping of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials? I know how costly that would be in terms of the projections that the Minister of Finance has made, but if this could be done at least for senior citizens' housing it would be greatly appreciated. If you dropped the tax you could build them 11 per cent larger accommodations for the same money. The minister in charge of housing today said that it is planned to build 38,000 public housing units. Our party supports that concept. Our people need public housing units. Yet that need shows something else: it shows that our economy is in such desperate straits that many people are being forced into low-cost public housing units because they have no hope of buying houses of their own.

[Mr. Rose.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rose: I thank hon. members, Mr. Speaker. I will do my best to conclude my remarks as quickly as possible. I had been making some suggestions and I had mentioned housing. That some of these public housing units have been most helpful is beyond question. Nevertheless, under existing loan arrangements the loan is repayable over 50 years, and as a result of interest rates the cost of these projects is tripled. These high costs also impose a severe strain on the budget of the societies concerned, the result being that those societies collect from their tenants far greater rents than would be absolutely necessary if the interest rates were lowered. The rents now are often greater than most tenants are able to pay comfortably. If we got rid of interest rates with respect to public housing units and senior citizens' housing units, we could lower rents. At present it is only the favoured few who are accommodated in senior citizens' housing. Many of the older people in our cities live in slums or under appalling conditions. As I say, only a favoured few are accommodated in senior citizens' housing. Also, why cannot we consider increasing amounts paid by way of unemployment insurance and do that now? There is talk that we are to do it in April, but why could we not do it now?

In these times when more than 3 per cent of our people are unemployed and when such unemployment seems to be part and parcel of government policy, why can we not assist municipalities by paying them 65 per cent of their welfare costs instead of the traditional 50 per cent? After all, the municipalities did not invoke this policy, the federal government did. The federal government has responsibility but it is the municipalities that must grapple with this problem. That is all that I have to say at this moment, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether my remarks will make any difference. Hopefully, somebody is listening. Perhaps this is a dialogue of the deaf, but we must speak on these matters. If we appear to be making political capital out of them, perhaps that is the name of the game.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, on December 3 last, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) stated in the House with vigour and optimism his economic forecasts for Canada.

That was over two months ago already and nobody has caught a glimpse yet of the improvement that the minister said was coming. The economy remains stagnant, it staggers more and more and the most eloquent proof of it is the insoluble unemployment problem. Everybody talks about it, but nothing changes. This government seems to have been most successful in increasing the unemployment rate as a result of its epic struggle against inflation.

He has now more difficulties in suppressing what he has himself brought on.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, these are unavoidable consequences of a government which fight theoretical enemies first instead of considering in a very concrete manner the true well-fare of the human being. It is not in the mathematical feats of the Minister of Finance that solutions are to be found but in reverting entirely to the true monetary concepts, those that give money its actual role which is to serve citizens by promoting production and distribution of goods.

All along his budget speech, the minister did not fail to emphasize how the budgeted expenditures would act as incentives for the economy.

The amount of $54 million allocated to the Unemployment Insurance Fund, he said, and I quote:

...will, as well, give an immediate and direct stimulus to the economy, the benefits of which will spread quickly right across the country.

He added that "the $150 million granted to the provinces will have the same result."

He therefore agrees with the principle of fighting the stagnation of the economy and even stimulating it by resorting to an increase in the purchasing power. That is the very advice we have given the government all along. Naturally, the economy needs that valuable and essential motor which is the purchasing power. Each citizen, having more money, spends more. All want to improve their lot; a greater need for products makes itself felt. Therefore industries wake up, organize themselves to fill the demand, hence the increase in jobs. That is simple, and we do not understand why the government does not implement the solutions which we advocate.

Against all logics, and even against sheer common sense, the natural and instinctive theories of Social Credit are rejected without considering and implementing them. A continued floundering in the obscure labyrinth of the present financial system is deemed preferable.

I wish to quote a passage from the minister's speech, which illustrates this mathematical struggle:

A responsible government which is operating on a realistic basis has to be concerned about the total size of its net borrowing requirements. We have to guard against creating too rapid an expansion of the money supply, that is to say we have to guard against another encounter with the second obstacle to a rise in living standards ... a renewed surge of prices. The borrowing needs of the government must be covered by a combination of sales of securities to the banking system and to the public.

In a few years, when at long last monetary reform has been achieved, such words will appear naive. One will wonder how supposedly sensible people could tolerate such absurdities. They will say that the old campaigner was above all an expert in bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, the efforts made by the government in order to eliminate that famous problem of unemployment, the subsidies granted through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in order to put new life into industry, all this of course deserves our support especially when housing projects are being encouraged. We quite agree and we wish that this policy will actually enable more Canadians to enjoy the advantages inherent in home ownership.

We are therefore quite glad about the achievements in this field but there are still a few small gaps which I would like to point out to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing (Mr. Andras). Earlier today, he entertained us about some splendid housing projects; however, these projects are somewhat minimized by the fact that they are not generalized enough.

No doubt a community as important as Montreal may have more pressing needs than others for housing but, to build them, the city must be able to borrow at lower interest rates.

Of course, we understand that. We also understand that a locality such as Quebec City must also have these possibilities. But I do not agree anymore when the same advantages are denied to regions whose needs are as high if not higher than those I just mentioned.

For instance, God only knows how the region of Trois-Rivières-Shawinigan-Grand'Mère, in brief the whole Saint-Maurice Valley, needs, as do Montreal and Quebec City, a true economic incentive such as housing. It is, therefore, necessary that this gap be bridged immediately and not in the near future and that the home building industry in the Saint-Maurice Valley be offered lower interest rates comparable to those elsewhere in the country.

Mr. Speaker, I know that grants have been made at a lower rate of interest for building apartment houses. Of course it is for houses to let, with apartments to let.

But Mr. Speaker, if some individuals are willing to invest tremendous amounts of money to promote one-family housing, this is as important—if not more—as promoting construction of low rent apartments. For this is a material ideal well understandable on the part of young families and even of all families, I think. Such an ideal, namely to have a house of their own, to feel really at home, is normal but it will materialize only if the terms are such that people may buy those houses.

Now when people are ready to invest so as to provide houses of that kind for workers with an income ranging from $4,000 to $5,000, I believe that requires all the attention of the minister responsible for housing, and he should give unreserved support to builders and would-be investors, in order to help the worker with an average or less than average salary, so that he may also have a house of his own.

This is the gap I wanted to outline in this housing program, but again I wish to repeat that I support the government measure.

I also support the drive shown by the minister responsible for housing and I hope he will throw himself with even more vigour and dynamism in implementing his policy to increase construction in this country.

The unemployment problem is being set forth in every detail by the whole community. The issue is so serious that, not long ago, the Quebec Minister of Labour even suggested that it could bring about revolution in some parts of the country before long.

Unfortunately, this may well be true and this is why we should absolutely pool our resources to come up with a real solution to this problem. It is a well-known fact that solutions are limited within our present fiscal and economic system. There are not many solutions. But if we seriously consider the possibility of bringing about basic change in our fiscal and monetary principles, we shall reach a final, not a temporary solution.

For instance, when technological progress and automation are forcing a great number of workers out of their job, should we conclude that it is necessary and essential to steer clear of progress and give priority to manpower over automation? If we keep within our present economic concepts, we finally come to this nonsensical situation where the extent of technological progress and automation is linked to the necessity of maintaining a given number of workers in a given industry. What happens next? Inflation, unavoidably. Then production costs go up accordingly. This is why we should now consider progress in a completely different perspective.

With enough ingeniosity, and thanks to his God-given intellectual capacities, man will find out a way to produce more with less manpower; we should be grateful to Providence and the genius of man. But since machinery is replacing the arms of man, why should the profits earned by machinery not be distributed to men?

Mr. Speaker, this principle that, in their usual language, Créditistes call a distribution of the purchasing power, of dividends, would if it were followed give us the possibility of eliminating unemployment, because we are in a dead-end street.

Must we spurn modern technology in order to have full employment, or change the system? If we are smart enough to replace ten men by a machine operated by only one worker, let us distribute the financial benefits brought about by this conversion to those ten workers. There is a normal way to consider life. And until these fundamental principles are applied, Mr. Speaker, I fear that a genuine solution will never be found. All the more since the present unemployment rate, which is given by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, is far from representing the actual unemployment rate, if one considers that the samplings which are made in order to identify this unemployment rate may not be adequate, if one considers that a good many unemployed do not bother to register anywhere, either because they know that they cannot qualify for unemployment benefits, so they do not register, or because they know that it is useless to inquire for a job at the Manpower Centre.

But where are we going to find and count these unemployed? The rate that is given is in my opinion well under the actual rate, especially as it is recognized that there are now from 500,000 to 600,000 unemployed people in Canada. Taking into account the fact that a good many are not accounted for in the statistics, I would say then that there must be at present, in Canada between 800 and 900,000 unemployed and since each unemployed person has the responsibility of at least another person, it may be said that more than 2,000,000 people are directly affected by this plague called unemployment.

And when one has been living for the last couple of years through this idiotic fight unleashed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and based on an increase in unemployment as a means to combat the inflationary balloon, one knows what it is all about. And today, a cure is being sought for this disease which has now become just about incurable.

Nevertheless, we are still optimistic and we are prepared to offer our full and complete co-operation to the government so that by its action it may effectively fight unemployment and in this way help workers and all those in need to live a better life, even more so when we consider that in a land of plenty such as ours, it is absolutely shameful and still even more disheartening to have to starve in the midst of unparalleled plenty.

[English]

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in the budget debate is prompted by the failure of this Parliament to provide sufficient financial resources to deal with one of the most dangerous threats to our environment. I refer to solid waste and the problem of its disposal. The growing piles of garbage in this country have a potential for harm even greater than the pollution of our air and water. It is true that during the life of this Parliament we have dealt at some length with the question of the pollution of our air and water, but we have not yet come to grips with the problem I am discussing today. Perhaps the present order of priorities was inevitable since the attention focussed on the belching smoke from municipal dumps and incinerators, and water quality research into the effects of land fill, first prompted some of the concern felt today with regard to the disposal of solid waste.

• (5:00 p.m.)

The matter to which I am directing attention has been brought before the House twice within the last year by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) by way of private member's motion and I would like to commend that member for his foresight and perseverance. The motion proposed by the hon. member called upon the government to initiate a national research and development program in respect of methods of proper and economic solid waste disposal, including studies directed to the conservation of natural resources by reducing the amount of waste and unsalvageable materials and recovering and utilizing potential resources in solid waste and—I think this is especially important—to provide technical and financial assistance to provincial and municipal governments and multigovernmental agencies in the planning, development and conduct of solid waste disposal programs. I believe that such a program should be funded by the federal government through the soon-to-be-created department of the environment.

It has been argued that this is basically an urban problem. Strictly speaking, this is not true because a formal definition of the term "solid waste" would include mineral and agricultural waste. These two categories account for roughly 90 per cent of the solid waste produced in this country and this waste is usually found in the rural and less developed areas. The other 10 per cent which is made up of residential, commercial, institutional and industrial waste represents perhaps the most serious problem in that it is concentrated in our few heavily populated urban areas. Everywhere people live and work, solid waste builds up and most Canadians live and work in a few urban centres. Surveys show that 1,000 pounds of solid waste are produced annually for every man, woman and child in Canada. This figure is climbing each year, largely because of an improving standard of living.

Mr. Baldwin: How about cabinet waste?

Mr. Goode: Combine this fact with the prediction that by the year 2000 about 90 per cent of Canadians will live in urban areas and it is easy to see that we have quite a problem on our hands—a problem that will not go away just because we do not have the intergovernmental apparatus to deal with it. We have solved these problems before and we can do it again. In fact, we must do it again. The costs to city and regional governments for solid waste disposal continue to mount sharply. Part of the increase in cost is, naturally, a result of the growth to which I have referred. But other factors have contributed to this increase. One of these factors is the increased cost of collection resulting in large part from very necessary salary increases for traditionally low-paid sanitation workers. It is estimated that up to 80 per cent of funds spent on solid waste management goes into the collection and hauling of the waste to its final destination. Yet even with the expenditure of such a large percentage of the waste management budget on collection, we still have not advanced substantially from the days when a horse-drawn cart was the means of rubbish removal. We have simply replaced the horse with an internal combustion engine.

Another factor in the escalating cost of solid waste management has been an increase in capital cost expenditures as progressive local officials discover the need for new and improved modes of disposal of solid waste. They are finding that the old, open dump method of handling waste is not meeting the needs and higher standards of today. Yet it is disappointing to note that by far the greatest percentage of collected municipal solid waste is still disposed of in this manner.

There are a number of major disposal techniques that have been used in North America. These generally come under one of four headings: land disposal, incineration, composting and ocean disposal. Land disposal can mean anything from the worst open dumps to the most efficient sanitary landfill operation. I wish I could say that the day of the open dump was over, but as I have just indicated this is far from the case. A rat-infested, stinking heap of garbage in a gully all too often still passes for land disposal in parts of the country. On the other hand, a properly run, sanitary landfill can ultimately result in the creation of parkland, golf courses and other public facilities. Such landfill techniques have been extensively and successfully employed by municipalities in the greater Vancouver area.

However, problems can arise. For example, in humid climates there is a tendency for contaminated ground water immediately under the landfill to be flushed into adjacent water bodies, creating a potential pollution hazard.

An even more basic problem is encountered in trying to secure suitable landfill sites: land in and around our major urban centres is scarce and costly. Homeowners object to such facilities near built-up areas. Ecologists, quite rightly, stress the dangers involved in even the best of such schemes. Even municipalities and districts which have set aside large areas for sanitary landfill eventually realize that in doing so they have not provided a long-term solution: they have merely shifted the problem along by 10 or 20 years to the time when the landfill is completed.

The second disposal technique is incineration. This method, properly utilized, has very attractive side benefits. Among these benefits can be heat recovery to produce electric power or steam. For instance, I am informed that the newest Montreal incinerator produces steam which services most of the buildings in its immediate area. In the United States, the Combustion Power Company of Palo Alto, California, is developing a fluidized-bed incinerator which utilizes solid waste, burned at high pressure, to produce hot gases which power a turbine driving an electric generator. It is anticipated that this incinerator will produce about 15,000 kilowatts of electric power every day while in the process of burning 400 tons of municipal waste. Experts claim that municipal solid waste constitutes a fuel with a heating value equal to approximately one-third that of good grade coal, about 5,000 British thermal units per pound. There are, however, certain drawbacks to the incineration technique. These include the polluting properties of the by-products and the fact that after most existing incineration processes, roughly 25 per cent of the waste by weight remains in the form of ashes, glass and metals.

Composting is the third disposal technique. In this process inorganic substances are separated from the organic in mixed refuse and the latter is converted to a peat-like organic fertilizer and soil conditioner. This process has proved popular in European cities such as Madrid which composts 200 tons daily, and Moscow which in recent years opened a 600-ton per day plant. The process has never been very popular in North America because the compost product tends not to be of uniform quality and because the garbage and refuse of our cities is relatively low in organic content. Finally there has been a tendency for some cities and industries to look to ocean disposal as a means of getting rid of solid waste. Fortunately, this has not been much of a problem in Canada and the provisions of the new Fisheries Act make this undesirable practice extremely unlikely in the future.

After considering these various methods it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that probably the best solution to the solid waste problem lies somewhere within the framework of what has been called the three R's—recovery, recycling and re-use. We have been made most vividly aware in recent years that on this planet our resources are not infinite. Just because Canada has been blessed with natural resources which are the envy of every nation on this earth does not give us the right to fritter them away. In fact, the opposite is true. We must conserve them by every means at our disposal. One of these means is the process of recycling.

When we talk of recovery, recycling and re-use it is well to bear in mind that while these processes promise much hope they are as yet far from being totally explored. At the present time most techniques for separating and recovering waste remain relatively primitive and costly. The potential results of a successful program, however, are well illustrated in an example given in a report on solid waste management prepared by Mr. J. J. Kaller for the Greater Vancouver Regional District. It reads in part as follows:

> Hypothetically, a hundred thousand tons of paper per year taken out from municipal refuse collection and disposal budgets would mean close to a $1,000,000 per year saving in the cost of these services. It would also save space in the refuse dumps, create work for a salvaging company and save many acres of forests. To bring this more in perspective, it can be said that Vancouver daily papers alone can save about 10 acres of forest per day, or in the order of 3,000 acres per year. This year's Regional Districts 555,000 telephone directories, if repulped after salvaging, could save 35,000 trees.

Another dramatic example of what can be done is written up in the September, 1970, edition of "Environmental Science and Technology". According to that journal, construction should now be under way on a new $10 million solid waste reclamation plant in Newcastle county, Delaware. This plant is unique in that it will completely process 500 tons of domestic solid waste and selected industrial waste and 70 tons of sewage sludge per day and may eventually be expanded to process 1,000 tons per day. When I say completely processed, I mean that at the end of the process every bit of the solid waste will have been turned into a useful product. Ferrous metals will be removed and sold; organic wastes and sewage sludge will be turned into a high quality humus product; clean paper will be shredded, baled and sold; other paper and materials such as tires and plastics will undergo a technique which provides good quality carbon products; glass, grit, sand and non-ferrous metals will be sorted and sold. The objective is that the plant be brought as quickly as possible to the point where it is self-supporting, with the return from the reclaimed products offsetting operational costs.

Who will pay the construction costs? This, I think, is the significant point. Under a federal statute of the United States, the solid wastes resources act of 1970, pilot plants of this nature stand to receive up to 75 per cent of construction costs. What I have been trying to suggest today is that this is just the type of thing which I believe the government of Canada should be doing. I have outlined a number of problem areas in which the government could usefully employ funds for research, training, demonstration of new technology, technical assistance and grants for local, regional and provincial solid waste planning programs. Our neighbour to the south is doing this very thing, even though until the passage of the solid waste disposal act of 1965 local governments there, as here, have traditionally carried the primary responsibility for solid waste collection, processing and disposal with no assistance from the senior government. In other words, they are far ahead of us.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, a program such as I would like to see implemented would undoubtedly cost money but it would be money very well spent. I end with the following remark by the Conservation Council of Ontario which makes the point especially well:

> We are living in a highly complex world and the answers we will find will entail difficult choices, and they will cost money. Conservation is a matter of intelligent choices which will benefit mankind's own long-term interests and be in harmony with his environment. But we must choose, and we cannot afford not to pay the cost. Economic yardsticks can no longer be the major criterion in our decisions.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, we often say when we rise on an occasion like this that we had no intention of speaking, but the previous speaker, to whom I listened very attentively, referred in particular to pollution. I have good news, I think probably the only good news that this House has had on this subject for many months. Today in Lethbridge the weather is particularly nice; it is in the high 50s. The snow is melting and nothing but good, clean snow water is draining gently into the river systems. I hope this will make my friend on the opposite side feel better.

I want to speak on several subjects, the main one being unemployment, a subject which most of us have tackled, as well as the OAS, the just society, Indians and agriculture. I say right at the outset that I have great respect for the office of the Prime Minister of Canada. Some time ago I felt very proud when one morning I heard a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I have always been proud of the office of the Prime Minister. There are some things that have taken place right here in this House, however, that lead me to be somewhat critical of the present occupant of that office.

I mentioned earlier that I wished to say something about unemployment. This reminds me of a cartoon that I saw in a newspaper two or three weeks ago which showed the Prime Minister as a goal tender with the net behind him almost completely filled with pucks labelled "Unemployed". The referee depicted in the cartoon was the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), a greatly respected man, in a striped shirt. The caption read: "Are you interested in the score?" I think the cartoon well describes the debate today. Certainly the leader of the government must be interested in the score. But why are all these items piling up day after day, week after week and year after year?

I wanted to say something about agriculture and I think now is a good time to do so because early today, during the question period, the Prime Minister said, in answer to a question from a member of the opposition relating to agriculture, that if the opposition were not so slow, the government would have moved more quickly. I regret that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is not in the chamber at the moment. I recall that on many occasions he has told us that all ten provinces agreed to the bill that he was sponsoring. He even asked a committee of the House to travel throughout the country in two different years. It was a very expensive procedure. But even with all that, the public did not go along with his marketing bill. The government did not bow to the slowness of the opposition; it bowed to public opinion.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I recall an experience with a former Minister of Agriculture, a westerner whom I respected. He fought for western Canada. I do not mean that a minister of agriculture necessarily should fight for one particular region or area. On that occasion the then Prime Minister said the opposition was being very slow, and the reply given to him was: "The Minister of Agriculture has less regard for the facts than a tom-cat has for a marriage licence." People in agriculture feel the same way.

The Prime Minister has placed the blame for many things on the opposition. He does not seem to have particular regard for the facts. At one time reference was made to members of the House of Commons to the effect that they were a bunch of bums. I have been a member of this House for a long time, Mr. Speaker: the people who represent the Canadian public are not bums. I know some hon. members of the House have been bumming around the world lately. They have been promoting Canada as a peacemaker throughout the world yet under the present administration we cannot look after our own affairs. They have been bumming around the world giving away money interest free. I shall have something to say about the interest that Canadians pay on money they borrow.

Returning to the question of unemployment, I would point out that we have the highest rate of unemployment in the western world. We have the highest rate of unemployment, percentagewise, related to population that Canada has ever known. It has been said that the thirties were our worst era in that respect, but I repeat that today we have the highest rate of unemployment percentagewise that our country has ever known. For years we have been told that the opposition has been at fault. I have heard many good suggestions made by members of the opposition, but they have not been accepted. I am scared at what is happening. Where are we going? Our country is becoming more divided. We are getting more unemployment. Interest rates are rising higher and higher, and all we hear is excuses.

I was happy to hear the announcement made by the minister responsible for housing. I am convinced this is one key to the solution of our unemployment situation. I would like to mention one case relating to unemployment, housing and OAS. I have here a communication that I received from a senior citizen in Ottawa. There are thousands like her across the country. She is a lady who is 82 years old, the widow of a former captain in the Ottawa fire department who retired after 42 years service, and whose pension lapsed when he died. Today she receives $133.61 a month, everything combined. Her rent is $117.50, leaving her $16.11 per month for food and clothing. This is the situation in the capital city, but there are thousands of people like this all across the country. She has been notified that on March 1 her rent will be raised by $10 a month, leaving her $6.11. I think $117.50 is a pretty high rent for a 100-year old building in centre town.

I was happy to hear what the minister said today but I have heard it many times. Had the scheme started even two or three years ago this senior citizen could be living quite nicely at half the rent. That kind of rent should allow for a nice new apartment. perhaps with a sauna bath and swimming pool. This situation is not confined to Ottawa but applies to my own city of Lethbridge. Why do we have so many announcements? Why do they tie up this tremendous building fund for years and years? The government says that we never offer anything, we are just a bunch of bums. Referring to the cartoon which appeared recently in the Hamilton Spectator, showing the Prime Minister with a net full of pucks, I ask why the devil he is piling up all this stuff. The thought which occurs to me rather scares me. If money were free for housing, a lot more people would be employed directly and indirectly: many thousands would be employed, including young people. But all we hear is talk.

I want to have a word about unemployment, particularly of young people. I mentioned the thirties. That was the last time we had unemployment that could be compared with today. No one can challenge my figures when I say that unemployment is higher today than it was in the thirties, percentagewise. We all know that the biggest force of unemployed is the medium-aged who have families to support. I have been through that myself. There has been a lot of talk about the young unemployed, and we all wonder what they are thinking. I believe they feel that the government of Canada has allowed foreign capital and foreign ownership to dominate the resources of this country to the point where we are controlled from outside. When we say foreign control we immediately think of the United States, but when we speak of winning battles against that country all we have to do is walk down the corridor opposite the library where a brass plaque commemorates the war between Canada and the United States. In that war we won over 20 battles; in fact, we won the war. We can do it again, but not the way this government is going.

We want to develop this country and keep it Canadian, but when you get on a train, bus or airplane you meet people from the United States who are interested in developing and investing in Canada. This is simply because this government—and I lay this at the feet of the Prime Minister—allows tax concessions to foreign countries investing in Canada that are not allowed to Canadians. These young people ask a legitimate question, Mr. Speaker, and I think they should have an answer. If Canadians were given even a part of the concessions allowed foreign investors, Canadians would control their own resources as never before.

I wish to say something about the just society that we have heard so much about. With all this unemployment I am beginning to wonder if there is even a society. I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) here and I want to say that I have a great deal of respect for him. However, unemployment will get worse before it gets better. I have pointed out, Mr. Speaker—and I hoped someone would challenge my remarks—that we are experiencing the worst unemployment in Canadian history. One wonders just how to define the just society. If unemployment becomes much worse, one may have to say, "We have just had a society." That is what scares me. We have drifted. Surely the government, which rests squarely on the shoulders of the Prime Minister, cannot blame other people for being too slow in this area. I do not want to go over the details—we have all heard them before—but if we go on like this much more I am afraid that what I have suggested may happen.

In conclusion may I say a word about a matter that ties in with unemployment. The other day we were told about the treatment of locals employed in the Northwest Territories. I have been a member of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development ever since coming to Ottawa. I know that the allegation is true. I have sat in many committees and we were often promised that discrimination would no longer take place. I should not put it that strongly, perhaps. We were assured that it would no longer take place; there would be a conference among all departments in order to see that local, and particularly native people, would be fully employed.

The report the other day showed that people from southern Canada had been employed up there at between $12 and $15 a day in dragging chains. They were employed in surveying. To the native people, and particularly to Eskimos, such a sum would be a pretty nice stake: it would improve their lot. They are not educated in the sense used when we refer to educated people. They have no degrees; they have no secondary education. Nevertheless they are educated in the sense that they know how to survive and how to adapt to conditions, and that sort of thing. Why should they not be given that sort of job? I sat on the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates when it was considering on November 26, 1970, the supplementary estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I tried then to introduce a question that had to do with the welfare of Indians and Eskimos.

I spoke of the death of an infant on the Blood reserve, Alberta, last September. The death was looked into by the chief coroner of Alberta, which shows how serious this matter was. In the coroner's inquest it was said that when the parents brought the young child to the hospital, they found a locked door. I am referring to the Indian hospital on the Blood reserve in Alberta. This was drawn to the attention of the minister when the committee was considering supplementary estimates. In addition it was learned that the parents were at one point refused the use of a telephone. They simply wanted to call a doctor.

It was also drawn to the chief coroner's attention that the attending physician had said much later that if he could have attended earlier, the death might not have happened. I referred all the details to the minister. The minister said that he could not accept any responsibility, that it was the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Nevertheless, after insistence on the part of some members he agreed to call the matter to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This was an accident, he said. I do not think it was an accident, Mr. Speaker. A few days later, when the supplementary estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare were being considered, I asked whether the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development had transferred this matter to the Department of National Health and Welfare and was told that the latter department had not heard of it.

We have been discussing this and that matter and talking about reorganization of the government. To me, this will only give more jobs to people opposite. At a time when there is unemployment and suffering we are talking about reorganization and the additional expenditure that will be involved. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the members of this government are really communicating one with the other. I have given one example of what I mean but there are many others. We are asked to reorganize the government, but there is no communication between departments. We talk about reorganizing the government, but what is the use of establishing new departments if there is lack of communication between them? I think this situation will get worse. I have tried to bring forward my points and alternatives that could be taken. There is nothing new in them. With those words, Mr. Speaker, I shall sit down.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes remaining today I want to use the latitude that is extended to us in this debate to direct my remarks entirely to one subject, agriculture. A concern for agriculture, its problems and people is not, of course, as Your Honour knows, limited to Canada: it appears to be increasing throughout the world. The roots of the concern are indicated by the words hunger, malnutrition, surplus, poverty, disparity, credit, markets, power, integration and information. With respect to those words Canada is no exception; the root words are found here too.

Many studies have been made in the past two or three years to identify agriculture's problems, analyse alternatives and recommend changes which, hopefully, will permit the realization of existing and future opportunities for food, feed and fibre and will increase the farmer's share of Canada's wealth. I want to take the liberty that is extended to me by participating in the debate to put on record a few statistics. By virtue of this being the House of Commons, I hope that these comments will receive a hearing in segments of the Canadian social structure other than agriculture. I am convinced that there is a vast breakdown in communication and understanding between agriculture and industry, especially the prime producers and the so-called urban people and consumers in general.

The most recent statistics indicate that in Canada there are in excess of 430,000 farm holdings, of which approximately 100,000 are commercial farms. There are 95,000 farms with sales of more than $10,000 per year, and 119,500 farms which paid federal income tax. Wheat and livestock farms account for one half of the commercial farm census, and dairy farms account for one-fifth. The total farmland area is 174 million acres. Eighty per cent of the total agricultural land is in western Canada. The total investment in Canadian agriculture of farm operators was estimated to be $22.4 billion in 1968, the most recent year for which statistics are available, or approximately $41,000 per worker, excluding rented land and buildings. New capital formation in agriculture is estimated to be approximately $1 billion a year, or approximately eight per cent of the new capital formation. The sources of new capital available to agriculture are varied, but a few sources predominate.

The farm labour force numbered 1,096,000 persons in 1948, 22 per cent of the total employed Canadian labour force. In 1968, 20 years later, this number had dropped to 546,000, or seven per cent of a much larger labour force. Capital inputs, compared to labour and real estate inputs, have increased from about one third of the total input in the period 1948-52 to over 50 per cent in recent years. The primary agricultural industry has become one which is highly dependent upon the non-farm or off-farm sector for supplies and services. Agribusiness is a term used to describe the non-farm industries which produce goods and services for farm use and those industries engaged in the process of raw materials of farm origin. Employment in the agribusiness industry, which includes food processing, tobacco manufacturing, leather goods, manufacture of implements and fertilizers, etc., has been estimated at 338,000 persons, or about 60 per cent of the employment in the farm or primary producer sector.

The two groups, the on-farm or primary producer and the off-farm producers, comprise about 12 per cent of the Canadian labour force. It is important for Canadians who are not familiar with or have not been interested in agriculture to recognize that approximately 18 per cent of the total rail freight in our country is comprised of farm products. Agricultural commodities represent exactly one quarter of the tonnage moved through the St. Lawrence Seaway. Farm expenditures on fuel and lubricants are equal to approximately 17 per cent of the total sales of motor fuels for use in motor vehicles. In the wholesale trade field, almost one quarter of the persons employed owe their employment to the sale of farm products, food products or farm supplies.

The most recent statistics indicate that $2.5 billion value added by the food and beverage industries represents 57 per cent of the cash receipts from farming, or $4.3 billion. In other words, Canadian farmers receive $4.3 billion. The food is taken off the farm and certain processes or actions are carried out. By the time it reaches the consumer, it increases in value by $2.5 billion, or 57 per cent of the original price. The food and beverage industry, compared with the paper, chemical, electrical, transportation and metal fabricating industries, employs the most people, pays the largest amount of wages and salaries, spends more on materials and supplies, ships goods of its own manufacture exceeding $7 billion and has by far the largest total value added, $2.5 billion in 1966.

Changes in agriculture during economic growth are influenced directly by the developments in food marketing. The most significant of these for agriculture is the rapid growth of large market-oriented food processors and distributors. The market-oriented firm, in contrast to traditional production-oriented business such as farming tries to discover what consumers want and to design an integrated research-product-package-promotion-distribution operation to meet these demands. In its outlook on operations it gives priority to consumers and marketing over production and procurement. This is especially true and relevant when the basic product that needs to be procured is produced in surplus and is easily available. As a result, farmers are increasingly called upon to tailor farm production to meet the dynamic, more exciting requirements of modern markets.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon. At 9.45 p.m. tomorrow a vote will be recorded on this motion.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

Constitutional Conference
Third Working Session
Ottawa, February 8 and 9, 1971
Statement of Conclusions

PART I

General

1. In accordance with the conclusion of their working session last September, the First Ministers gave priority to the questions of an amending formula and an early patriation of the Canadian Constitution. The Conference agreed that the Government of Canada and the provinces should proceed as quickly as possible to patriate the Constitution, with an appropriate amending formula applicable entirely within Canada, and with such other changes as can be agreed upon quickly. This approach would permit a substantial degree of progress to be made quickly, while work on other aspects of constitutional revision continues. The First Ministers considered that such action might incorporate the elements set forth in the following paragraphs. However, the First Ministers reserved their right to further analyze all the juridical and other implications.

Patriation of the Constitution

2. The Constitutional Conference agreed on a procedure to be undertaken in Canada at a very early date in order to bring home the Constitution and to transfer to the people of Canada, through their elected representatives the exclusive power to amend and to enact constitutional provisions affecting Canada. This procedure would involve:

(a) Agreement among the governments as to changes and procedure.

(b) Approval of a resolution in the usual way, by legislatures plus the two Houses of Parliament, authorizing the issuance of a proclamation by the Governor General to contain the amendment formula and whatever changes are agreed upon.

(c) Recommendation that the British Parliament legislate to:

(i) recognize the legal validity of the Canadian proclamation and its provisions;

(ii) provide that no future British law should have application to Canada; and

(iii) make any consequential repeal or amendment of British statutes affecting the Canadian Constitution.

(d) Issuance of the proclamation by the Governor General on a date to coincide with the effective date of the British law.

The Amending Formula

3. The Constitutional Conference has considered the nature of the formula which should be adopted to permit the Canadian Constitution to be amended wholly within Canada. The First Ministers agreed that the following formula was a feasible approach.

I. General Procedure

All constitutional amendments in future, except those covered in II and III, would require a resolution of consent at the federal level plus consent of the legislatures of a majority of the provinces of Canada including:

(a) the legislature of any province now containing at least 25 per cent of the population of Canada, and of any other province that hereafter contains 25 per cent of the population of Canada; and

(b) the legislatures of at least two provinces west of Ontario providing that the consenting provinces comprise 50 per cent of the population of the provinces west of Ontario and the legislatures of at least two provinces east of Quebec.

II. Federal and Provincial Constitutions

Sections 91(1) and 92(1) would be repealed and replaced by a section giving the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces power to amend their respective Constitutions except with regard to the following matters when the general procedure set out in I would apply:

(a) the functions of the Queen, Governor General and Lieutenant Governors;

(b) need for annual sessions;

(c) maximum period between elections; (The above three would apply to the legislatures as well as to Parliament; the following would apply to Parliament only.)

(d) principle of proportionate and minimum representation of members of Parliament from the provinces in the House of Commons.

(e) the number and residence qualification of Senators representing each province, and the powers of the Senate.

III. Amendments of Concern to Canada plus One or More but not All Provinces

Such changes would require a resolution of consent at the federal level plus the consent of the legislatures of the provinces concerned.

Fundamental Rights

4. It was agreed to entrench in the Constitution the following basic political rights:

(a) universal suffrage and free, democratic elections at least every five years;

(b) freedom of thought, conscience and religion;

(c) freedom of opinion and expression; and

(d) freedom of peaceful assembly and association.

The exercise of these freedoms may be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and as are reasonably justifiable in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety, health or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others.

Language Rights

5. It was agreed that English and French should be declared the official languages of Canada, with the following provisions that would have equal application in all parts of Canada and to both languages:

(a) Any person may use English or French:

(i) in the Debates of Parliament and, with reservations expressed by some provinces, in the legislatures;

(ii) in any pleading or process in federal courts;

(iii) in communication with the federal administration.

(b) Federal statutes and instruments shall be in both languages.

(c) The individual shall have the right to have English or French as his main language of instruction in publicly supported schools in areas where the language of instruction of his choice is chosen by a sufficient number of persons to justify the provision of the necessary facilities. It was recognized that some further consideration will have to be given by various governments in order to determine appropriate administrative arrangements to implement the provision, what constitutes a "sufficient number", and what should be the percentage of instruction in the main language. Quebec lodged a general reservation with respect to this sub-paragraph pending an examination of all its implications.

(d) Parliament or a legislature may accord further recognition to the two languages.

Supreme Court

6. It was agreed that the existence and the independence of the Supreme Court of Canada should be entrenched in the Constitution, which should also provide for its basic structure. Its jurisdiction would continue to be that of a court of final appeal for the country. It was also agreed that, while the Federal Government should retain the power of appointment to the court, the Constitution should recognize the importance of provincial participation in the process of selection of suitable candidates for appointment. It was also concluded that study should be given to the means of assuring the availability on the court of civil law judges to hear civil law appeals. It was agreed, in addition, that there should be discussion of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to hear appeals in matters of strictly provincial law.

Regional Disparities

7. Recalling their conclusion on the subject of regional disparities at the working session in September, the First Ministers agreed that the Constitution should include a recognition of the importance of equality of opportunity for all Canadians. It was therefore concluded that the reduction of regional disparities should be referred to both in a new preamble and in the body of the Constitution.

(a) The preamble should state that one objective of Confederation is the social, economic, and cultural development, and the general welfare and equality of opportunity for all citizens in whatever region they may live;

(b) In the body of the Constitution there should be a statement of obligation on all governments, federal and provincial

(i) to promote equality of opportunity and well-being for all individuals;

(ii) to ensure, as nearly as possible, that essential public services of reasonable quality will be available to individual citizens.

(iii) to promote economic development which will reduce disparities in the social and economic opportunities of individual Canadians in whatever region they may live.

This obligation would not be enforceable by the Courts and would not have the effect of altering the distribution of legislative powers.

Mechanisms of Federal-Provincial Relations

8. It was agreed that the revised Constitution should contain a provision, probably in the preamble, recognizing the important role of intergovernmental consultation and cooperation in the effective working of Canadian federalism. Also, in order to provide for the basic mechanisms of federal-provincial consultation, there should be a specific provision that the Government of Canada shall at least once a year consult with provincial governments about the desirability of holding a Conference of First Ministers.

Modernization of the Constitution

9. Finally, the First Ministers agreed that work will be undertaken between now and the next meeting of the Constitutional Conference in June to propose specific alterations in the Constitution such as a new preamble and the deletion of spent and irrelevant provisions. Specific proposals in this respect will be brought forward for consideration by the Conference in June.

Next Step

10. It was recognized that the next steps would include further bilateral discussions leading up to the next meeting of First Ministers, and in addition as required, the on-going coordinating work of the Continuing Committee of Officials.

PART II

Social Policy

1. The Conference heard the views of the Government of Quebec on social policy in general and income security in particular. Quebec emphasized a broad conception of social policy and the importance of fitting income security measures into a global integrated policy with the objective of meeting effectively the problem of poverty. The Conference expressed its sympathy for this basic social objective. Quebec emphasized the fact that the existing distribution of legislative powers cannot be maintained if it impedes the realization of that objective. In addition, Quebec considers that the question of social policy is a fundamental element of the constitutional revision as a whole.

2. The federal government for its part expressed its desire to coordinate its income security measures with the social policies of the provinces in order that each provincial government as well as the federal government may best realize its social objectives. There is and should continue to be room for different social policies in different provinces.

3. In regard to the Quebec proposals in particular, the federal government noted that what was suggested in regard to family allowances was very similar to the proposed federal Family Income Security Plan. The Quebec statement also indicated that the Old Age Security Pension and Guaranteed Income Supplement would fit into its plans. Similar improvements in the Quebec and Canada Pension Plans have also been proposed.

4. Already decisions have been made to modify certain features of the proposals for amending the Unemployment Insurance Act on the basis of the information and arguments advanced by Quebec Ministers. Only in the case of the General Social Allowance Plan does there appear to be the necessity for further time and study to ascertain what is practicable during the near future.

5. The Conference was informed that bilateral discussions had already been planned between provincial and federal ministers and officials on these matters and their possible constitutional implications, and a further meeting of the Ministers of Welfare on income security was scheduled several months from now. The First Ministers asked that this work be accelerated and that the Ministers of Welfare report to the meeting of the First Ministers in June.

Canadian Interprovincial Marketing

6. Reference was made to current problems being encountered in connection with interprovincial marketing of certain agricultural products. The view was expressed that the problem had still not been solved, since the last discussion in September, and some provinces suggested that the Federal Government should exercise existing constitutional powers to deal with the matter. A further suggestion by some provinces was that provincial marketing boards should retract certain regulations that affect the freedom of movement of goods, but another view was that this could not be done unless other action were taken to replace such regulations and avoid harm to local agricultural industries. In this connection, it was suggested that the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Bill, now before Parliament could facilitate a satisfactory resolution of the problem.

7. It was also observed that the question of interprovincial trade was a fundamental constitutional question which should be examined at a later meeting of the Conference.

Environmental Management—Pollution

8. The Constitutional Conference examined proposals for constitutional changes in jurisdiction related to the control of pollution.

9. In particular, the First Ministers considered a federal proposal that there should be a new concurrent power for Parliament and the provincial legislatures to make laws in relation to the control of pollution of air and water. Under this proposal, if there were a conflict between a federal law made under this power and a provincial law made under it, the federal law would prevail when it applies to control pollution which has, or if permitted would have, significant international or interprovincial effects, but in other circumstances the provincial law would prevail over the federal law.

10. Some First Ministers expressed interest in this proposal. Another view, however, was that new provisions could better be considered after there has been more experience in dealing with pollution; in the meantime, it would be preferable to rely on improved arrangements for coordination and cooperation between governments based upon existing constitutional provisions. A further view was that areas of exclusive federal and provincial jurisdiction would be preferable to the general concurrency which has been proposed.

11. It was agreed that the implications of various constitutional approaches should be given further study.

Other Business

12. The Conference received a report from the Continuing Committee of Officials on Paramountcy as Applied to Public Retirement Insurance, and accepted the recommendations regarding additional study.

Next Meeting

13. The Constitutional Conference confirmed that it would meet next on June 14-16 in Victoria and that the meeting would be public, at least in part.

PART III

NON-CONSTITUTIONAL MATTERS

Unemployment

1. The First Ministers discussed the unemployment situation across Canada, and expressed their concern for the problems being encountered by many Canadians this winter. Several First Ministers urged the Government of Canada to take additional action to alleviate the problem.

2. The Minister of Finance of Canada outlined the policies of the Government of Canada to combat unemployment, and stated that present indicators point to increasing economic growth and declining unemployment as the year progresses. He stressed that over-reaction would aggravate the problem by causing a resurgence of the inflationary spiral.

3. It was generally agreed that the federal and provincial governments should consult together concerning any possible additional steps which might be taken to alleviate the present situation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—EFFECT OF CHANGE IN METHOD OF CALCULATING SEASONALLY ADJUSTED UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects every member of the House. It concerns the obligation of every member to do his duty as a member to his constituency, the nation and the House.

I conceive it is a member's duty to engage in meaningful and relevant debate on the business of the nation which comes before this House. To speak meaningfully, a member must be informed. When he speaks in criticism or praise of the administration of this nation's affairs by the government, it is essential that he be properly and correctly informed.

Parliament, therefore, has placed a duty upon the government to provide those members who request the same with accurate statistical information on a variety of aspects of the nation's business. To that end, Parliament established and staffed the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and placed the bureau under the administrative responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Section 32 of the Statistics Act reads in part as follows:

> Subject to the direction of the minister, the bureau shall collect, compile, analyse, abstract and publish statistics in relation to all or any of the following matters:
> (e) employment, unemployment.

Your Honour must be fully aware of how much time of the House has been devoted this session to debate on the question of unemployment. Your Honour must be fully aware of how important to that debate are the statistics used by members in comparing total unemployment figures, seasonally adjusted unemployment figures, unemployment insurance recipient figures, manpower job applicant figures, and in making monthly comparisons of these figures. If the Dominion Bureau of Statistics at any time changes its method of abstracting these statistics, it is the duty of the bureau not to act secretively but to announce this change and to give proper notice as far in advance of the change as possible, and it is the duty of the minister to announce it to members in the chamber and to explain and justify the reason for the change having been made.

The importance Parliament attaches to meaningful information, including consistency in the methodology of abstracting statistics, is made signally clear in section 35 of the Statistics Act. That section makes it an offence for any person to wilfully provide the bureau with false information or practise any other deception.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Manpower and Immigration have made a joint public report on the labour force which was released today, and it would appear that they have changed their statistical methodology in calculating the seasonal adjustment of labour force figures. By that one change, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Manpower and Immigration have deprived Members of Parliament of meaningful comparison between the seasonally adjusted unemployment figures for most of 1970 and those of 1971. This change can only confuse the debate on unemployment that has continued throughout 1970 to the present time, is being debated today by the House, and will continue. I could go through this release and establish beyond any shadow of doubt that the information contained in it can only serve to confuse and make it difficult for members to participate in this debate.

Any doubts I may have had about bringing up this question of privilege have been overborne by the fact that this is the fourth time within a few weeks that the government, through issuing secret memoranda, has engaged in what I can only call a program of deceit which is repugnant to this House and repugnant to the country. It is in that larger sense that I ask Your Honour to hold that I have in fact established a prima facie case and can move the motion which I have prepared if Your Honour so holds.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River has given the Chair the notice required under the Standing Orders of his intention to raise this matter by way of question of privilege. As he and all other hon. members know, the duty of the Chair is to give an opinion by way of ruling on whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. If the ruling of the Chair were that there is a prima facie case, then a motion could be put by the hon. member and debated by the House.

I have given the matter very serious thought and I have to inform the hon. member that I really do not think there is a prima facie case of privilege. What he complains of is that the statistics, which I understand have been published today, do not follow the methodology, to use the hon. member's word, followed in previous months or previous years, which makes it difficult for the House to continue its debate on unemployment. I would think that this is essentially a grievance. The hon. member may have a very legitimate complaint with respect to a question of administration, but this does not amount to a breach of parliamentary privilege. Again, with great respect I suggest to the hon. member and to the House that while there may be a grievance on the part of the hon. member for Peace River I do not think there is a question of privilege which ought to be debated or referred to a special committee of the House for consideration.

I understand that there is to be a continuation this afternoon of the debate on unemployment until later this evening and that a vote is to be called at 9.45 p.m. Between now and 9.45 there will be an opportunity for the hon. member who has just spoken and for other hon. members, if they want to take part in the debate, to refer to the grievance raised by the hon. member for Peace River.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pépin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Regarding the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker I think that the House ought to be informed that there has been no change in the method of establishing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Down.

Mr. Pepin: I am not talking to you.

Mr. Hees: Look to your left. Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Obviously the minister is rising in connection with the question which has been raised by the hon. member for Peace River. As the Chair has ruled that there is no question of privilege, there should be no debate. I suspect that during the question period inquiries will be made about the matter to which the minister has just alluded, and if he wants at that point to give an explanation in reply to a question asked, that will be the proper time to make that explanation.

Mr. Lewis: Or on motions.

GRAIN

STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS FOR NEW INTERNATIONAL GRAINS ARRANGEMENT

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, before commencing my statement I wonder if I might express a word of apology. The lateness of the receipt of messages from Geneva has prevented us making available to hon. members copies in both languages. This will be corrected at the earliest possible opportunity.

The United Nations Wheat Conference was convened to conclude a successor agreement to the International Grains Arrangement which comprised a Wheat Convention and a Food Aid Convention. The Canadian delegation was led by Mr. Maurice Schwarzmann, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and included officials of other government departments, the Canadian Wheat Board and representatives of producer organizations.

Canadian objectives at this conference were to conclude a new wheat agreement designed to provide market stability and price discipline for wheat trade. We wished to include price levels which would reflect adequate returns to efficient wheat producers. We stressed the fundamental issue of production policy and urgent need for countries which subsidize wheat production to reduce such subsidies, but it was clear that this issue could not be encompassed in this negotiation. We were openminded as to the specific details of a new agreement provided that Canada would not be placed at a competitive disadvantage and provided there was equity in rights and obligations among exporters and between exporters and importers.

We made it clear from the outset that Canada could not accept selection of a Canadian wheat as the single reference wheat as had been the case under the old international wheat agreements. Because of significantly changed world trade and production in wheat this would have put Canada at a competitive disadvantage.

A number of proposals were considered as to the shape and nature of a new agreement and as to the types of wheats on which its structure could be based. Preliminary consideration was also given to the price levels for such an agreement both at the minimum and maximum.

It would not be in the best interest of the future of wheat co-operation to enter into detail as to the particulars of these issues which were under negotiation in Geneva and which will be the subject of future discussions aimed at arriving at an acceptable solution. However, it became clear in the discussions in Geneva that despite every effort and with best will on all sides it still was not possible at this particular time to reach agreement among the major countries concerned on these questions.

Despite the difficult issues and the divergent approaches that have been identified, we consider that the intensive work accomplished will be helpful in facilitating the elaboration of a new agreement on wheat prices at a later date. Therefore while it is a matter of serious regret that an agreement including pricing provisions could not be concluded, we are not unduly discouraged or pessimistic by the lack of such agreement at this time. Indeed it is clearly understood by all participants that the matter of an agreement on wheat prices is to be kept under review and that new negotiations of this subject will be initiated at an appropriate time.

In absence of agreement on a price framework, negotiations are now proceeding in Geneva for the conclusion of a new wheat agreement designed—

(A) To maintain the full institutional framework for continued wheat co-operation including all the traditional functions of reporting on wheat trade, prices and freight;

(B) To provide specifically for close consultation among exporting and importing countries with respect to price in the light of actual market trends with a view to avoiding serious price fluctuations or undue difficulties in wheat marketing;

(C) To ensure that the new Wheat Council shall keep under review the possibility of reopening negotiations for a pricing agreement and to ensure that such negotiations take place when circumstances are considered to be favourable.

In parallel to this negotiation, discussions are also taking place for the extension of the Food Aid Agreement for which the developing countries at the conference have expressed the strongest support. Canada is prepared to continue its participation in such a Food Aid Agreement.

The results of this conference are far removed from what Canada had sought to obtain. However it should be borne in mind that the price provisions of the 1967 agreement have not been operative for some time. While the new wheat agreement now being concluded is of only limited significance, it does provide the framework for continued co-operation in wheat matters and contains within it the potential for subsequent agreement on the important questions of price levels and the pricing framework.

The producer representatives who participated fully as advisers to the delegation and who are aware of the underlying issues which have led to these developments in Geneva, are of the view that the limited wheat agreement now being concluded is, in the light of all the circumstances, the most appropriate and constructive outcome possible at this time from the point of view of Canadian interests.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What an alibi for a defeat!

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is very disappointing that no conclusive agreement has been reached at the United Nations Wheat Conference. At this time of year the grain farmers of the west need to know what is to come in the years ahead so that the industry may once again rise to the heights it once knew. In the absence of any satisfactory international arrangements at present, I think all of us hope that the government, on its own, will give top priority to providing Canadian farmers with a suitable price guarantee.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, all the flowery words that the minister used and might use cannot cover up the fact that he and the government are whistling in the dark. The fact is that this conference was a failure. We are witnessing a collapse of orderly international marketing. I think this is underlined in the minister's statement where he said, "To ensure that the new Wheat Council shall keep under review the possibility of reopening negotiations for a pricing agreement and to ensure that such negotiations take place when circumstances are considered to be favourable".

This is one of the things they are working toward. This illustrates the fact that we have witnessed a collapse of orderly international marketing. The government must accept the responsibility for this situation.

For the past several years we have seen an unparalleled series of errors and poor judgments on the part of the government. They allowed the situation to get out of hand. It started in the 1966-67 period. The government cannot say they were not warned. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and others warned that what the government was doing would result in a catastrophic situation for Canadian wheat producers and the international wheat market. The government allowed Canada to be persuaded to replace the International Wheat Agreement with the International Grains Arrangement. They were persuaded to keep Russia, the largest wheat producer in the world, out of the new arrangement.

They allowed an 11-month gap between the expiry of the old International Wheat Agreement and the commencement of the new International Grains Arrangement. There was no firm price arrangement in the International Grains Arrangement. The private United States trade was allowed to break the new agreement before it even commenced. The government did not stand behind the Canadian Wheat Board in the 11-month gap in time for the Canadian Wheat Board to take effective action to deal with the situation which developed in 1967. They did not stand behind the Canadian farmers in 1969 and 1970. It is not the government but the farmer who is now reaping the whirlwind of government policy failures.

The key must be to ensure that there is adequate assistance to agriculture and the wheat producers of Canada. We must take steps to ensure that the wheat farmer does not have to bear the brunt of competing against other countries, as pointed out in the minister's statement.

Canada will suffer from the situation that is now developing. It is a further step in the destruction of rural society and the rural economy in Canada, western Canada in particular. We need firmer government action than we have witnessed to date in order to ensure an adequate price level for Canadian wheat producers.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just made a statement on the report of the Wheat Conference held in Geneva, and I am sorry to say that I have just received a copy of it.

The minister has stated that the United Nations Wheat Conference had been convened to conclude a successor agreement to the International Grains Agreement which included a Wheat Convention and a Food Aid Convention. He has also stated that there was no concurrence for the simple reason that the other countries would not decrease their subsidies.

This is what surprised me, Mr. Speaker. We think that Canada is the third wealthiest country in the world and when our country tries to come to an agreement with nations that are considered poorer, it cannot be done because those nations assist their producers to a greater extent by way of subsidies. And instead of announcing a decision to raise subsidies to the same level as the other countries and thus achieve perfect agreement, the government persists in giving farmers nothing, in not increasing assistance to production, and then tells the House: We were not able to come to an agreement. The government seems content to state: After all, we had good discussions, there has been constructive agreement on Canadian business. Such an attitude astounds me, Mr. Speaker. Having first told us that the conference was a failure, the Minister then says it has been very constructive for Canadian business. We know, however, that it was destructive for Canadian producers. I wonder how he was able to come up with such a conclusion. Anyway, the government always reaches such conclusions, whatever level of production is involved. It is always satisfied when giving as little money and help as possible to producers. We have here one more example of that attitude.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to put a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The necessity arises as a result of the surreptitious introduction by the government of a new method of calculating the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment. Throughout 1970, the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate for each month was calculated according to a statistical program called X-9. Some time before the end of 1970, the government ordered that a new statistical method of calculation be put into effect on January 1, 1971. This statistical program is called X-11. As a result, the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment for January, released today to the public, the press and Members of Parliament, is calculated according to formula X-11. The government, by this deliberate and furtive switch of statistical horses in midstream, has lowered the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate for January from the rate that exists under the method heretofore used by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics; the government has attempted to deceive the public, the press and Members of Parliament by hiding its adoption of this formula—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. member. He will recognize that he is reiterating essentially the point made earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Peace River who made a statement suggesting that a grievance should be put to the House by way of a question of privilege. The hon. member is aware of the limitations placed on him at this time by the terms of Standing Order 43. He cannot make a general statement. I have expressed the thought on earlier occasions that if hon. members were entitled, when moving a motion under Standing Order 43, to make a general statement it would only be equitable that someone on behalf of the other side should be allowed also to make a statement, and that certainly would be contrary to the spirit of Standing Order 43.

The Standing Order is clear enough. The hon. member has to explain briefly the reasons for urgency. He cannot make a statement of a general nature of the kind he is making at the present time. I invite him to indicate as soon as possible the terms of the motion he proposes for the consideration of the House.

Mr. Lundrigan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I assure you that my words are well chosen to set out the very basic reason for my motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: Just one last sentence.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Lundrigan: The government has prevented the public and the press from making meaningful comparisons between the 1970 rates and the 1971 rates. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House condemn the government's manipulation without notice of the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment in an attempt, deliberately calculated and intended to deceive the public, the press and Members of Parliament as to the disastrous effect of the government's unemployment policy—

Some hon. Members: Order!

An hon. Member: Pitiful.

Mr. Lundrigan:

—and further, that the government immediately distribute—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Lundrigan: I am touching a very sensitive nerve centre across the way, apparently.

—and further, that the government immediately distribute a revised series of unemployment rates between 1954 and 1971 to enable this House and the public meaningfully to compare this new statistic with previous years' data.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I have to express serious reservations about the kind of statement that has been made by the hon. member. I appreciate that the matter he has raised is one of interest to all hon. members, but I suspect that perhaps the statement did go beyond the limitations imposed by the Standing Order. In any event, I now have to inquire whether there is unanimous consent under the terms of Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity so the motion cannot be put.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS AND WELFARE ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 which entitles me to make a brief statement in explanation. The figures released today by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics indicate that there were 668,000 persons out of work in mid-January. Optimistic predictions that we have turned the corner and that the economy will improve later in the year are cold comfort to those who are walking the streets in the depths of winter looking for jobs. The immediate responsibility of this Parliament is to ease the privation and hardship these unemployed are now suffering. The least we can do is to provide them with the necessities of life during a crisis which is not of their making and for which the federal government must accept the major responsibility.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis):

That this House urges the government to take emergency steps to extend the eligibility period for unemployment insurance, to increase benefit payments and to relieve the pressure on municipal welfare budgets by increasing the federal government's contribution to 65 per cent under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands under the terms of Standing Order 43. The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the urgent and pressing necessity for at least a limited wheat agreement, and taking into consideration reports that there appears to be little chance of good will being arrived at between the wheat trading nations during the Geneva meetings which are due to end on February 19, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House request that either the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Manpower and Immigration responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board attend the meeting in Geneva this weekend in order to bring cabinet support to those that are now negotiating for Canada and that this House authorize leave of absence for such minister as required under Standing Order 5.

Mr. Speaker: This motion also requires unanimous consent before it can be put.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimity the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—IMMEDIATE ADDITIONAL STEPS TO STIMULATE ECONOMY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Does the minister now intend to take immediate additional steps to stimulate the Canadian economy in view of the fact that, according to the last publication of Dominion Bureau of Statistics, unemployment in January reached 8 per cent, involving a total of 668,000 Canadians?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have dealt with this matter very often. I have indicated that we believe that the steps we have taken will have an effect upon the economy. I have said that there would be higher unemployment this month, as is always the case in January, but that, seasonably adjusted, the rate would go down. This is quite contrary to what my hon. friend has said, as reported in the Globe and Mail on February 1—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Benson: —that unless the government took further steps it would not go below 6.6 per cent. I wonder whether he would now like to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether or not he is prepared to revise his program, particularly in view of the fact that the increase in unemployment between December and January amounted, according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics, to some 130,000 Canadians, as opposed to the minister's own forecast of what he called a normal increase of some 100,000 persons between the months of December and January?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend would look at the seasonally adjusted change the figure is 109,000.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, again I would ask my hon. friend whether, in view of the fact that his own forecast of the increase in unemployment between December and January has been exceeded by some 30 per cent and amounts to a figure of 130,000 Canadians, whereas a year ago the increase between December and January was 102,000 and the year before that 94,000, he could explain to the House or to anybody else how he finds any seasonally adjusted improvement in these figures?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—AMENDMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT TO BROADEN ELIGIBILITY FOR BENEFITS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance, if I can persuade him to stop playing the numbers game and deal with the unemployed. As the number of unemployed who have been out of work for six months or more has increased by 100 per cent this January compared with last January, from 54,000 to 108,000, is the government prepared to bring in immediate legislation to extend the eligibility period for those who have already exceeded it and thus enable them to receive payment and so that the younger people who have not acquired sufficient stamps to be eligible may be brought under the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is, of course, a matter for the consideration of the Minister of Labour who looks after unemployment insurance. With the assistance of the House we would hope to have new unemployment insurance legislation very quickly. In addition, we have already increased benefits, as my hon. friend knows, in the December budget for those on unemployment insurance.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the increase in benefits was only 10 per cent and the white paper proposes raising the benefits much higher, is the minister prepared to give any consideration to the 277,000 unemployed under 25 years of age, many of whom cannot qualify for unemployment insurance, who are debarred from the manpower training allowances because they have not had three years in the labour force, and cannot get welfare because—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps it might be assumed that the hon. member has asked a question. If he has further questions to ask he might put them in the form of supplementaries.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might complete the question I was asking. Many of these young people cannot receive welfare as they have not established residence. Does the government propose to take any measures either by way of an amendment extending the benefits under the Canada Assistance Act or by alterations in the Unemployment Insurance Act in order that many of these young people who are not provided for now will be taken care of?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the problem regarding residence, but it has been indicated to me by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that residence should not really be a problem under the Canada Assistance Plan. I should also like to suggest, in respect of the use of the figures game, that last week the hon. member and other members of his party were raising the fact that there are more people receiving unemployment insurance than there are unemployed.

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED EXPANSION OF MONEY SUPPLY

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance.

As a result of the ever-increasing number of unemployed and since new credit facilities for some $13,425 million have been requested, according to the Canada Sun Life Company, is the Minister of Finance or the government considering the possibility of asking the Bank of Canada to grant the credit in order to meet those constant financial needs?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, there has been a great expansion in the money supply in Canada. Credit is a great deal easier to get now and at much lower interest rates, thanks to government policy.

USE OF WORKS PROJECTS OR TAX REDUCTIONS TO STIMULATE ECONOMY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I should like to direct to the Minister of Finance. In view of the seriousness of the situation, as made clear by the figures released today, does the government intend to try to fight unemployment primarily by means of federal works projects, or does it intend to try to stimulate the economy by lowering taxes, thereby stimulating production and jobs?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government has to make a choice as to whether it is going to attack unemployment in areas where it is the worst, which is the choice the government made, or adopt general measures in respect of the whole economy by way of reducing taxes.

Mr. Hees: Can we take it from the minister's remarks that the government is not really concerned with unemployment conditions right across the country which—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member's question is argumentative.

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROPOSAL BY QUEBEC OF SPECIAL PROGRAMS

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance.

As unemployment has reached very serious proportions in Quebec, would the minister inform the House whether, at the last federal-provincial conference, the Quebec delegation proposed some special programs to the federal government in order to help solve this problem? If so, what was the federal government's response?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that special programs were submitted by the province of Quebec at that time. However, in respect of the loan fund which we raised to $160 million, the province of Quebec was the first to take advantage of it to the tune of some $70 million, which I am told will create approximately 12,000 jobs.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MONEY LENDING PURPOSES—AVAILABILITY TO UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that he says much more money is available for lending purposes at lower interest rates, will he indicate how the hundreds of thousands who are unemployed can obtain some of that money?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): That was not the original question raised. I have sincere sympathy for people who are unemployed, but they can take advantage, of course, of unemployment insurance—

Mr. Baldwin: You told them they could live on $30 a week.

Mr. Benson: —and the many benefits this government and its predecessor brought in by way of improvements in the Canada Assistance Plan and other programs.

An hon. Member: How are they going to live on $30 a week?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware of the fact that one of his closest friends, the Bank of Montreal, has predicted that even though there may be an upsurge in the economy the unemployment level will still be approximately 6 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REPLACEMENT OF LOANS TO PROVINCES TO FIGHT UNEMPLOYMENT BY GRANTS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Have any of the governments of the Atlantic provinces requested the federal government to change some of its loans intended to fight unemployment to grants in areas where unemployment is high? In light of the fact that Premier Campbell of Prince Edward Island has stated that the capital loans program only shifts the responsibility for action from the federal to the provincial governments, is any change in plans contemplated and will grants be given?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The purpose of the loans program is related to our feeling that if we provide substantial amounts of money to the provinces they in turn would have public works projects which they could proceed with in the municipalities very quickly. Of course all the provinces would rather have grants than loans, but the loans are being made at very low interest rates over a long period of time.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. In light of the present massive burden of unemployment and the government's refusal to further assist the provinces and municipalities in carrying this burden, will the government immediately introduce access and benefit amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in order that the provinces will no longer have to finance welfare assistance for unemployed employables who are the federal government's responsibility?

Mr. Benson: That question was just answered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that this question has been asked on a number of occasions.

UNEMPLOYMENT—RECEIPT OF INCREASE IN INSURANCE BENEFITS BY ALL UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. He mentioned a recent increase of 10 per cent in the rate of unemployment insurance payments. Is he aware of the fact that in spite of the definite promise by his government the 10 per cent increase is not going in all cases to those who are unemployed?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated previously, we increased unemployment insurance benefits by 10 per cent. Although this is an administrative function of the Department of Labour, I assume that this increase is going to the people who are unemployed and drawing unemployment insurance.

Mr. MacInnis: I have a further supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond on a supplementary question, but I notice that there are ten or 15 members rising to ask supplementary questions on the same subject. The Chair will soon have to make a decision on whether we should spend the whole question period discussing this important matter.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that this is a decision the Chair will have to make. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

Mr. MacInnis: Does the minister not consider that his position as Minister of Finance makes it incumbent upon him to carry out the definite promise made by the government in respect of the payment of unemployment insurance to the unemployed—and that should be enough to wipe the grin off the Prime Minister's face.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT—EASING OF WORK PERIOD REQUIREMENT FOR MANPOWER RETRAINING

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker. I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the high unemployment rate among young people in Canada, will the minister say whether he is considering amending the manpower regulations in order that young people with less than three years in the labour force can qualify for retraining assistance?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anything has changed since we had the last discussion on this matter.

Mr. Baldwin: The rate of unemployment has changed.

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES ON LOANS TO PROVINCES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

In view of the answer he gave earlier to the effect that his government was trying to provide supplementary funds to help the provinces and municipalities undertake some public works, and considering the outrageous interest that provinces and municipalities will have to pay, does the minister intend to offer the loans at a much lower interest rate so as to enable municipalities and provinces to achieve their projects and, at the same time, reduce the unemployment rate?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what the loan fund is intended to do. It will be included in the estimates to be presented to the House very soon. We will be turning the funds over to the provinces as soon as they require them to move forward with their projects.

UNEMPLOYMENT—FISCAL AND MONETARY POLICIES TO COMBAT PROBLEM REGIONALLY

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Atlantic provinces have an unemployment rate of 10.2 per cent, with an unemployment rate in one province of 13.9 per cent, and in view of the fact that Quebec has an unemployment rate of 10 per cent and British Columbia has an unemployment rate of 9.4 per cent, with a 2 per cent increase on the Prairies is the government contemplating the adoption of fiscal and monetary policies to combat this serious and chronic problem at the regional level?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we have been doing through our regional development program, through the ARDA program, through the manpower retraining program, and recently in my budget through the program for special loans with the larger amounts going to the areas that have higher unemployment.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the Prime Minister, who has sat there for the last 20 minutes with a grin on his face, as my hon. friend said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor to ask a question. If he does not want to do this, we should move on as quickly as we can.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it is inconceivable that the Prime Minister of our country should sit there grinning all through the question period.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Are the minister's manpower retraining facilities available to the Minister of Finance so that he can retrain for a new job when he resigns?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

FAILURE OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT CONFERENCE TO REACH AGREEMENT—PLANS TO ASSIST PRAIRIE FARMERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. He has announced what I predicted weeks ago, namely, the failure of the conference in Geneva, which will be a death knell to the western wheat farmers. Will he say what plans, if any, the government has to meet the serious situation on the Prairies?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a good bit has been said in recent days about what we are doing, including our very aggressive selling policy both in barley and wheat, which has borne such fruit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: We are selling wheat, not fruit.

Mr. Lang: In addition, there has been a whole package of proposals for grain producers which is before them at the present time. There is in addition the statement which I made earlier in the House in which I indicated the continuation of discussions and the real prospect of continued co-operation in order to maintain some order in world wheat markets without specific pricing provisions in an international agreement. I believe there is real substance for an agreement which will maintain that kind of order as we work for what the Canadian government supports firmly, which is international order in the form of a fully binding international agreement in the future.

Mr. Baldwin: And they lived happily ever after.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As one minister recently stated, it takes courage for a government to create unemployment. Will the government give consideration now to having the same courage to face the situation on the western prairies and bring about acreage payments, a two-price system, and a floor price for wheat which will cease now owing to the inability of the nations to agree in Geneva? What is the minister going to do about it?

Mr. Lang: As I indicated, there is a whole package of proposals before the Prairie producers by which we hope to help the industry, and we are examining every facet of the industry. So far as a guarantee is concerned, that was the subject of an international agreement which did not add substantially to international order at one time even though the agreement existed. As hon. members know, the government took some steps in connection with the domestic market, notwithstanding the lack of firmness in the international area.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister, instead of giving us a Niagara of words say what the government has in this package except airiness?

Inquiries of the Ministry

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—FURTHER DISCUSSION WITH FARM ORGANIZATIONS FOLLOWING FAILURE TO ACHIEVE INTERNATIONAL WHEAT PRICE AGREEMENT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I should like to ask the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board if he can indicate, in view of the statement he made to the House today, when he will again be discussing his grain policy proposals with farm organizations, and in particular whether the meetings with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and National Farmers Union this weekend are designed to discuss further these proposals? Also, is the government now considering a policy which will take account of the developments in Geneva and the effect which these developments will have on wheat producers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Of course the question of the effect of international events on our domestic policies is always in our minds. The farm organizations will be meeting with the members of the cabinet during the course of this coming weekend. It will be the usual kind of meeting at their request to discuss subjects of their choice. We have received from them briefs which presumably will be discussed, and certainly the issues raised by the grain proposals and other matters are contained in their briefs and I am sure will be the subject of discussion.

Mr. Burton: I would like to ask the minister if he can indicate when there will be another round of negotiations at Geneva regarding price matters, and could he also indicate what price proposals were made by Canada to the conference which has just been concluded?

Mr. Lang: As I indicated in the statement, discussions are going on in connection with what might be called an interim agreement without price provisions, and the council and the parties will hold a watching brief for the right time for these discussions. I am not sure it would be useful to try to recount on a blow by blow basis the position taken by different parties in the course of the discussions in Geneva.

LIFT PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF DEADLINE DATE FOR PAYMENTS FOR HAIL DAMAGE

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): My question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. It concerns the administration of the Lift program. In view of the fact that payments under the Lift program fall far short of the $140 million allotted to the program, would the minister say whether he is now prepared to adjust the deadline date of July 15, 1970 in respect of payments for hail damage so that farmers who suffered hail damage after that date may now qualify for payment under the program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): There is no intention to alter the date on which the land must be in a particular condition to comply with the Lift provisions. Of course, the amount of money available for Lift always depended on the extent to which farmers participated in the program, and participation has been rewarded at the rate of $6 per acre and it will be rewarded at the rate of $10 per acre for forage, using the amount of money for which farmers have applied. The other figure to which the hon. member referred was always hypothetical. It was based on the total possible participation by farmers.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—EARLY INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): My question is directed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the failure to achieve a pricing arrangement at the wheat conference in Geneva and the fact that this makes an effective grain income stabilization plan even more desirable and urgent, can the minister state, as a result of his consultations with the Prairie Ministers of Agriculture earlier this week, that improvements have been made in the proposal tabled last October 29 and that legislation will soon be presented to Parliament which will permit the implementation of such an improved plan?

Mr. Baldwin: Answer yes or no.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board): There were fruitful discussions between myself and the Ministers of Agriculture from the Prairie provinces concerning the proposals as part of the process of coming to final conclusions. I look forward to the possibility of coming before the House with the necessary legislation and with policy decisions for implementation at a very early date.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED MORATORIUM ON REPAYMENT OF LOANS TO WESTERN FARMERS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the economic plight of a great many western farmers because of low grain sales over the past few years, would the minister give serious consideration to declaring a one-year moratorium on the repayment of farm improvement loans, Farm Credit Corporation loans and farm machinery syndicate loans in order to assist the western economy to make a reasonable comeback?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I have indicated on a number of occasions that Farm Credit Corporation loan payments can be deferred by any farmer who can show that it is a very serious hardship for him to make these payments. It is not prudent to establish a general moratorium because there are some farm producers who are producing other products and whose receipts have not declined.

PROGRAMS TO ASSIST FARMERS BECAUSE OF RATIONALIZATION OF INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since a modified form of early retirement is being proposed for those workers in the textile industry who have lost their jobs as a result of the rationalization of that industry can the minister advise the House whether similar programs are being considered for those members of the agricultural industry who are also being victimized as a result of the rationalization process which is taking place within that industry?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the preamble to the question, I can say that eight or ten months ago we announced we were working on a program to deal with the small farmers' problems.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Again, I point out that there are a number of hon. members who wish to ask supplementaries and I suggest that perhaps we should move to another subject. However, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vegreville at the moment and then go to another subject.

Mr. Mazankowski: In light of the evasive and flippant answer to the minister, can he tell the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask a supplementary.

Mr. Mazankowski: I wonder if the minister could indicate to the House when he will have the fortitude to stand up and defend the agricultural—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT CONFERENCE—CANADIAN POSITION ON FOOD AID PROGRAM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of reports that the United States was prepared to arrive at a pegged price for wheat, provided there was agreement amongst all participating countries to continue the food aid program, in which all exporting countries would participate, would the minister advise if Canada was the fly in the ointment on this issue, or did Canada support such a program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board): Without accepting the preamble, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize to the House that Canada at all times has supported the inclusion of a food aid program in any new agreement. We still look forward to that being included in the agreement to be arrived at soon.

INDUSTRY

ROLLS-ROYCE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES—CANADIAN CONTRACTS AND EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is he now able to give the information I requested the other day as to the total amount of contracts held by Canadian firms under the Rolls-Royce jet engine arrangements, the total amount of employment that will be lost if these contracts should fall through, and whether the government of Canada has any measures in mind to meet this situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have some figures here. Only one company, Orenda Engines Ltd., holds contracts directly related to the Rolls-Royce RB-211 engine project. Orenda has three contracts for the production of gas turbine components for a value of $5.65 million, and I understand this occupies about 60 people.

The real significance to Canadian industry in the Rolls-Royce situation has to be measured in terms of the Lockheed project, that is, the L-1011 trijet aircraft. Six main Canadian companies have been engaged in subcontract work for this project and the whole thing, at its present value, is worth about $60 million. The Canadian companies participating in the program produce auxiliary power units, structural components, simulators and other equipment. At this time these subcontracts could provide jobs for about 675 people.

The government is following carefully the developments in this matter and is maintaining close liaison with the companies involved. Although the L-1011 program is threatened, there is no evidence at this point that it has been cancelled. The future of the program must await the decisions of Lockheed, Rolls-Royce and their governments.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PLANS FOR PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the severe unemployment problem which is reaching crisis proportions in Cape Breton, is the minister in a position to reply to a question I posed the other day to the Prime Minister in the absence of the minister? It is further to the continuous representations I have been making for some months on this same subject. Will the minister make a statement now indicating the short and long-term plans and programs that the Cape Breton Development Corporation has for the future of the island, with particular reference to employment and industrial activity? In other words, can the minister indicate what is the blueprint for the future of Cape Breton so far as Devco is concerned?

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have learned that Devco is in the process of preparing short as well as long-term programs for the industrial development of Cape Breton Island. As soon as I have received them, I shall make a statement to the House.

[English]

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, is it correct that at the moment a multimillion dollar program has been placed before the government of Canada by officials of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, and could he indicate when he would be in a position to elaborate further to the House and give encouragement to the people of Cape Breton, although I realize this will not put bread on their tables immediately?

FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN ACTION BROUGHT BY TEACHERS RESPECTING BRITISH COLUMBIA ORDER IN COUNCIL

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Does the federal government plan to intervene in support of the action brought by five teachers against the British Columbia government's order in council issued on October 22, 1970?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that matter is before the courts on a provincial order in council. We do not plan to intervene.

Mrs. MacInnis: Will the federal government challenge the constitutionality of the order in council?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ACCELERATION OF PROGRAMS IN REGIONALLY DISADVANTAGED AREAS TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It is based on the special statutory responsibilities he has with regard to creating jobs. What steps is the minister prepared to take to accelerate the programs under his department in the regionally disadvantaged areas, especially the Atlantic provinces, where unemployment is so high and where the programs seem to be lagging because of bureaucratic red tape?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think that a study of the figures which were made public today will indicate to the hon. member that the rate of unemployment in the Maritimes has decreased more than anywhere else in Canada, by 1.4 per cent, which has been unheard of since the beginning of Confederation. So there has certainly been an effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Mr. McGrath: As a supplementary question, would the minister answer my original question?

Mr. Trudeau: He did.

Mr. McGrath: Precisely what steps is he taking to accelerate the programs under his department in the Atlantic provinces to create jobs in this period of record high unemployment?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the department as a whole which has been established and the development rate tend precisely to create jobs in the Maritimes and in slowly developing areas. The departmental goal is—

ACTION BY MINISTER TO BROADEN MANPOWER RETRAINING PROGRAM REGULATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that more than 10 per cent of the labour force in the Atlantic region is now unemployed and that many of these people have exhausted the training period for which they are eligible under the present regulations of the manpower retraining program, has the minister been in consultation with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration as well as with provincial ministers with a view to adjusting this program to take care of the very large number of hard-core unemployed who badly require this kind of retraining during this difficult period of unemployment?

[Later:]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the officials of my department are in constant communication with those of the provincial governments and the Department of Manpower, to ensure that there is the largest possible number of jobs available and that the largest possible number of people are trained for new occupations.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: You are supposed to create jobs.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, and I do.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a question of privilege. I think the question I put to the minister, as well as the previous question put by the hon. member for St. John's East, were very clear, but we are receiving absolutely no answers, just puffery, from the minister. Why won't he answer?

An hon. Member: Our people want more jobs.

NATURE OF TENDER CALL FOR BROILER CHICKENS TO EXPORT TO FAR EAST

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, there was no reply to the question I asked yesterday, which is reported at page 3245 of Hansard. I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce could look at that question and reply to it before the end of the present question period.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. member, with regard to the question that he raised yesterday in connection with tenders called for the purchase of three million pounds of broilers for export to the Far East, that this was an open tender. The relevant section of the tender reads as follows:

> Tenders will be accepted from persons normally engaged in the processing, wholesaling, brokerage or exporting of poultry products.

In fact, invitations to tender were requested by and sent to 35 firms across Canada. I have the figures for each region if the hon. member wishes them. I can assure the hon. member that firms in all regions of Canada were invited to tender.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I bring to the attention of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, who wishes to ask a supplementary, that we are running short of time. Perhaps, to clear the matter up, the hon. member might be allowed another question, after which I shall recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Rose: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary question is for the Minister of Agriculture. I understand that arrangements have been completed for another shipment of four million pounds of broilers. Can the minister tell the House whether or not this four million pound order has involved any government assistance?

INFORMATION CANADA

RESEARCH PROJECT ON RELATIONS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. In view of the special commission arranged by the Director General of Information Canada to conduct research on the past and future relations of the federal government with the various departments of the province of Quebec, can the minister tell the House if such a research program is also to be conducted with the other provinces of Canada or is the minister satisfied that those relations have been in good order all the time?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Yes, and no, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanbury: The answer is yes to the first question and no to the second. We are conducting very favourable discussions with various provinces on interrelationships between information programs. I think each province is evincing a great deal of interest. We have noticed a particularly strong interest among candidates for the leadership of the Conservative party in Ontario in establishing an agency similar to Information Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the directive of the Director General of February 2. May I ask the minister whether a specific research program has been instituted and whether a commissioner has been appointed by the Director General to investigate relations between the federal government and the other nine provinces of Canada, since the minister is a member of the cabinet of a government that does not believe in special status for anybody?

Mr. Stanbury: No, Mr. Speaker, but I think the hon. member would agree that there is a particular need to ensure that our fellow Canadians in Quebec understand their relationship with the federal government. I hope the hon. member will appreciate this and agree that it is extremely important to the future of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TESTS—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring a question to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the very welcome news today of the signing by the United States, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union of an agreement to ban nuclear weapons from ocean floors and seabeds, would Canada give consideration to urging the United States to refrain from tests or at least postpone the scheduled massive nuclear tests to take place in the Aleutians area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members would like to join the comments which have been made about the signing of the agreement banning nuclear weapons from the ocean floor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: As hon. members know, we were one of the first countries to sign this agreement yesterday. I do not think, however, it is directly relevant to the forthcoming tests on Amchitka. But I want to say that I hope the United States is reconsidering these tests, not only in light of that particular treaty but also in light of the earthquake in Los Angeles. Because this is a problem that has been of great concern to people all along the Pacific Coast.

[Mr. La Salle.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, has the Secretary of State for External Affairs made direct representations to Washington urging that the proposed tests at Amchitka be not proceeded with?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have been studying the scientific data that was supplied to us as a result of the previous tests. This data will be examined again in light of recent experience which adds support to the view that tests could result in earthquakes in that part of the world.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister what scientific facts led him to put out that scare statement that atomic explosions have something to do with earthquakes?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, perhaps if the hon. gentleman knew something about the Pacific Coast he would know that there is a fault which leads sometimes to earthquakes, and that an atomic blast could result in triggering an earthquake. I hope he will extend his education and inquire about another part of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is proper that a minister of the government should rise and make a statement—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has risen on a point of order. He should be given an opportunity to explain what the point of order is.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs can cause a great deal of concern throughout the United States and other countries where earthquakes are possibilities. I do not think he has the scientific knowledge to back up that statement, and furthermore—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member might indicate what the point of order is so that we can proceed as quickly as possible.

Mr. MacInnis: I suggest we had better get out of the House because, if faults cause earthquakes, there is a big fault over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Government House Leader about the business for the rest of this week and next week?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will call the government organization bill and following that the Canada Development Corporation, Yukon minerals, young offenders and the clean air bills. In any event, regardless of the progress made on these bills, we will regard Monday next as an opposition day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this announcement varies a bit from what we had understood the program to be for tomorrow. In light of what has been said, may I ask a question? If we get to second reading of the Canada Development Corporation Bill, will the Minister of Finance, in whose name the bill appears, be here to introduce the bill?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if I thought we would get to the Canada Development Corporation Bill, I would produce the minister tomorrow afternoon. In my view, it is unlikely that we will complete the government organization bill tomorrow. For that reason, I am not asking the minister to stay for tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson, that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose last night, I was explaining some of the reasons it is important that the agricultural industry should be given a higher priority, not only by governments, but especially by consumers and all Canadians. As recorded at page 3267 of Hansard, I had drawn to the attention of the House the high need for capital for involvement in agricultural production and, in particular, that, on the average, a $41,000 investment is necessary to create a job in the agricultural industry in Canada.

Agricultural output in Canada has been increased, using an even smaller labour force. As I pointed out last evening, the proportion of the labour force in agriculture has decreased in 20 years from 22 per cent to approximately 7 per cent. When this percentage is added to the 5 per cent of the labour force that is involved in agribusiness or food processing, we have a total of 12 per cent of the total labour force of Canada directly involved in this industry. In spite of the fact that the proportion of the population processing a producing food in Canada has continually decreased, production of food or agricultural products has increased. Productivity for all commercial industries in Canada has increased at an average rate of 3.5 per cent per year since 1946. On the basis of a classification into seven broad industry groupings, the growth rate for agricultural productivity has been the highest at 5.5 per cent per year.

Consumers expenditures on food as a proportion of their total outlay is continually declining. In 1967, it was estimated to be 20 per cent compared to over 25 per cent immediately after World War II. The declining proportion which consumers spend on food means that a greater proportion of their total income is available for other consumer goods or for saving. In this sense, I do not think it is a distortion of the facts to conclude that the agricultural industry in general, and the primary producers in particular, are continuing to make a larger and larger contribution to the welfare of the nation by supporting a cheap food policy through the sweat of their brows. Our problems would be fairly simple if we were alone. Unfortunately, a number of other countries have improved their agricultural productivity in the same way at the same time that we have improved ours. As hon. members recognize, if our agricultural products are to compete in the international market as well as in Canada, we must realize that agriculture is a basic industry in the sense that we have to sell outside our borders. If we are going to compete in the international market we must be concerned about how other countries are faring, rather than simply the portion of the Canadian consumers budget allotted to food.

When we look at Canadian agriculture in the context of the world economy, we cannot help but be impressed with the fact that Canada has a vast production capability and a small domestic market. Therefore, if we are to compete successfully with farmers in the United States, and farm producers in other parts of the world, agriculture in Canada must be as efficient and competitive as possible. One thing that firmly assists agriculture in many other nations to be competitive is the significant assistance that the industry receives from governments. The amount of support the Canadian government gives agriculture is about the lowest in the western world. OECD studies indicate that federal expenditures in agriculture in Canada average approximately $286 per active person in farming compared with the somewhat staggering sum of $1,287 for each United States farmer. If we think of that one factor, we will recognize there is a great disparity. There are different points of view with regard to agriculture. I want to summarize three differing points of view from three different segments of our culture.

There are two main problems in Canadian agriculture from the point of view of the farmers. The first is low farm income. The second is uncertainty as to the future. There are, of course, other problems such as instability of prices and incomes, the rising cost of credit, inability to market certain products and so on. The main problems of Canadian agriculture, as seen by agribusiness men, turn around the subject of markets. Good farm incomes mean better markets for machinery, fertilizer and other inputs. When there are good markets for farm producers, there is more business for milk processors, meat packers, elevator operators, and retailers. The welfare of agribusiness is inextricably tied with that of the farmers.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The difficulties in which agriculture finds itself, as seen from the point of view of governments, tend to arise largely as a result of low basic incomes. It would seem to me that from the viewpoint of the government the cost to the treasury of price supports and similar programs becomes part of the "farm problem". We come to the root of the matter when we recognize that among ministers of the cabinet conflicting responsibilities arise in their different areas of authority. Cabinets in countries such as ours tend to divide on the question of food prices. Ministers with special responsibility for agriculture and related fields want higher prices so as to raise farm incomes, while consumer-oriented ministers want prices to be as low as possible so as to counteract the tendency to inflation. Governments also find that unsatisfactory social conditions arising out of low farm incomes necessitate manpower, urban housing and adjustment programs since they contribute to urban pressure and increase the influx to already crowded cities of young people who, if the situation were more favourable, would remain in the agriculture industry. Governments have also tended to regard agriculture as a special subject. Its earnings abroad could be an important source of vital foreign exchange, though exports from year to year were subject to violent fluctuation.

The main difficulties of agriculture, as seen by the agricultural task force, also revolve around the fact of low farm incomes, though one should bear in mind that this is the symptom of a basic inequality in the allocation of resources as between agriculture and the other sectors, in labour mobility, in education, in alternate employment, in the international competitiveness of Canadian products and, finally, in the adequacy of government agricultural programs.

Mr. MacInnis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not expect my point of order will get anywhere but I would draw attention to the fact that the hon. member is reading every word of a prepared speech.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has called the attention of the Chair to the fact that the hon. member who had the floor is referring to notes. He knows that a number of hon. members making formal presentations to the House do refer to notes. There was, at one time, an established rule, I believe, that members ought not to read their speeches but it seems that increasingly in recent years we have reached a position where hon. members, or a number of them, feel they have a better chance of making a complete presentation to the House if they refer to copious notes. This practice is followed by a number of hon. members on both sides of the House.

The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has raised a valid point of order. The hon. member who has the floor has noted it, and the Chair has noted it also.

Mr. MacInnis: I acknowledge Your Honour's statement about the reading of speeches. I do not always call attention to the fact that hon. members are reading their speeches. In this case, it is my way of criticizing the critic.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think there is any point in pursuing the matter, but it seems to me that in fairness, if one hon. member is referring to notes and another hon. member calls attention to that, it should be done in the case of all hon. members, and to the personal knowledge of the Chair speeches have been made from notes on numerous occasions during this particular debate. However, I will not take upon myself the initiative of calling the hon. member to order. While it is in order to use notes, I suggest it is better, though, that presentations be made to the House by way of unwritten speeches.

Mr. McBride: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I would only say that the phrase is "refer to notes" in a general way. On the other hand, I might add that most of us who sit in the House believe many speeches are improved if they demonstrate a little research and people have brought some notes with them. Another thing that bothers me is the limited time available to us. If a speaker does not bring in any notes, and does not deal with his subject in an orderly way, he can easily find himself cut off before he has really put over what he wanted to say.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the lecture the hon. member is now trying to give the House. If he paid a little more attention to his own constituency and a little less to the heavy water industry he would perhaps know what is going on.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order. I now have to call the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond to order. The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton has the floor.

Mr. McBride: The point I was coming to before I was interrupted is that farm people all over the world tend to be among the lowest paid segments of society.

Mr. MacInnis: You are still reading.

Mr. McBride: The result is, of course, that the power for action, the political power, the power as consumers, available to the farm segments is lower than that of other segments. This is particularly true in Canada where the farm community has been so largely made up of people imbued with what I might call the pioneer spirit, the type of person who prefers to go it alone. The result is that the farm population in Canada has never formed itself into a cohesive unit which could make its wishes well felt in government and administrative circles. This is probably linked with the fact that the farm community is made up of thousands of individuals whose products are sold to a relatively few purchasers. In consequence, the traditional family farm, which has for so long been the backbone of farming in Canada, finds itself in a period of adversity; the need for increased capital, larger structures and bigger enterprises has made it impossible for many individuals who would otherwise be growing food to continue to do so.

I recognize, in spite of the intervention of the hon. member opposite, that there are many others who wish to speak this afternoon so I shall conclude as rapidly as possible. It would seem to me that effort is needed at governmental level to eliminate surpluses or at least to keep them within manageable proportions in order that farmers may not be caught up in the vicious cycle of over-production. As a result of over-production prices fall, and many producers decide not to enter that field. Then, prices rise and production begins again with a rush, as a result of which farmers are caught in what I would call the swinging back and forth of the economic pendulum within the agriculture industry. I am pleased to see some form of stabilization program being established, especially in the grain-oriented economy of the west. It will soon be brought to fruition and implemented by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). Indeed, I should like to see programs of this type extended throughout the industry.

Finally, it seems to me that the whole agriculture industry must think in terms of food, not simply in terms of products. The day may have come when we should be thinking in terms of integrating forward, that is to say, producers integrating into the processing field and then into the consumer marketing field so that the producers are in control of an integrated production line, instead of integrating backward as we have seen happen with processors taking over production, as a result of which pressures have been created adverse to the success of the family farm.

I would commend to hon. members a study known as the Special Study of Agricultural Science in Canada, 1970. One of the sections in this study bears repeating, and it is as follows:

• (3:40 p.m.)

Agriculture has been, and continues to be, the most important primary industry in Canada, contributing major economic and social benefits to Canadian society as a whole. Research and development constitutes the key to its continued progress. However, the organization for research, the philosophy of research, and research itself, must reflect the needs of the agricultural community, and utilize all the relevant disciplines in new forms of integration, if agriculture is to meet fully the problems and opportunities of the immediate future.

Several of the recommendations I should just like to tick off. They include, the establishment of an agricultural centre for bio-economics research and development, a population ecology research centre; a research centre for rural adjustment, an Atlantic resource management centre and a centre for research on cold and drought resistance in plants. This study is well worth the attention of any member who is interested in the agricultural industry, as are the recommendations included in the agricultural task force report.

My main purpose in rising to speak in this debate is to remind the government and all Canadians that, as an industry, agriculture makes a very large contribution to our nation; and that it is to the benefit of all Canadians to have a strong agricultural industry.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a sad day for Canada. Today we have been informed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics that 668,000 people were unemployed in the month of January. If one adds to this total the 100,000 people attending manpower training courses, and groups such as Indians and Métis in western Canada who have never been included in labour force statistics, we realize that more than three-quarters of a million people are unemployed today.

The 668,000 people unemployed in January 1971 represent an increase of 130,000 over the month of December 1970, or an increase of 183,000 over January of 1970. If we look at the regional figures, we do indeed see a grim situation, one that should bring a feeling of foreboding to all hon. members, particularly cabinet ministers from the province of Quebec. The figures for Quebec show there has been an increase from January 1970, when 178,000 people in that province were unemployed, to 234,000 in January 1971.

The last four or five months have been amazing months for the province of Quebec. The kidnappings of Mr. Cross and Mr. Laporte, and the latter's subsequent murder, created a quite understandable feeling of fear, indeed—I say this not in a critical way—a feeling of hysteria in that province. Deliberate attempts were made by some members on the government side, particularly the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), to try to convince the people of Quebec that all separatists are terrorists.

I have no use for, and reject completely, the proposals made by the Parti Québecois for the separation of the province of Quebec from the rest of Canada. But surely the by-election held last week in the provincial constituency of Chambly ought to alarm the government of Canada, and particularly its cabinet ministers from Quebec. Despite the pressure put on the people of Quebec and the attempts to convince them that separatism is not only wrong but in fact subversive, the Parti Québecois held the votes that it received in the general election in Quebec and increased its share by a percentage point or two. Almost one-third of the voters in that constituency voted for the Parti Québecois, and to a large extent I think this can be attributed to the despair and feeling of hopelessness of the ordinary people in the province of Quebec.

In Ontario, our wealthiest province, unemployment increased from 124,000 persons in January 1970 to 201,000 in January 1971. Unemployment among young people between the ages of 14 and 24 increased from 199,000 in January 1970 to 277,000 in January 1971, an increase of over 35 per cent. The actual rate of unemployment as calculated by DBS rose from 6.1 per cent in January 1970 to 8 per cent in January 1971.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has expressed happiness at the fact that the seasonally adjusted rate has dropped to 6.2 per cent. I do not want to embark upon a discussion as to whether changes in the method of calculation have had any effect in the drop, but let us assume that 6.2 per cent is the actual seasonally adjusted rate. Only a government headed by a group of millionaires, with a Prime Minister who has a computer where his heart should be could be happy about an unemployment rate of 6.2 per cent seasonally adjusted and ignore the real plight of three-quarters of a million or more unemployed.

The government has set up a straw man for the people of Canada. Having got this country into a situation which no other industrialized country in the world is facing with an unemployment rate of 8 per cent, it then tells the people of Canada that things are going to be better, and that since things are going to be better in the coming year it ought to ignore the mess that Canada is in at the present time.

If one looks at the seasonally adjusted figure, one soon observes that in the past four months the actual reduction in the percentage of unemployed has been only 0.4 per cent. If one keeps in mind that the number attending manpower training courses is higher than it had been, and that in the past 12 months the strike at General Motors had a very serious, though temporary, effect upon the whole economy of Canada, then one realizes that in fact there has been very little improvement in the rate of unemployment.

For the past two years the Minister of Finance has been insisting that the major problem facing this country was inflation, not unemployment. As a consequence, the government has adopted a deliberate policy of slowing down, of deflating, the economy. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said a year ago that he was not going to be deflected from his anti-inflationary policies even if we had to face a figure of 6 per cent unemployment. Newspapers sympathetic to this government, such as the Toronto Star, felt it incumbent upon them to criticize the Prime Minister for that callous statement, as they should and as the Prime Minister deserved. In fact the actual unemployment rate is not the 6 per cent the Prime Minister spoke about, but is 8 per cent.

If we take into account the trends as they develop in the course of every winter, next month when the figures for February come out we will have not 668,000 people unemployed but rather somewhere around 725,000. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) are proud of the fact that last year's price increases in Canada were among the lowest in the world. They speak about this constantly. However, they do not tell us, and they do not tell the Canadian people, that the inevitable result of the policies they followed in creating this situation has been that Canada has the highest rate of unemployment of any industrialized country in the world. According to the newspapers, Great Britain is facing the heaviest unemployment it has faced since before world war II. What is that rate of unemployment in Great Britain? It is 3 per cent compared to our 8 per cent.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

It is interesting to compare the rates of unemployment in countries in western Europe for the year 1969 with the rate in Canada. In Germany, the rate of unemployment was half of one per cent. In Sweden, it was 1.9 per cent. In the United Kingdom, it was 2.2 per cent. In Italy, the rate was 3.1 per cent; in Belgium, it was 3.3 per cent; in the United States, it was 4.1 per cent, and in Canada, it was 4.4 per cent. Since that recent fairly pleasant period of 1969, compared with other countries Canada's rate of unemployment has increased substantially. Had the government pursued its policies of combatting inflation more vigorously, then instead of having the three-quarters of a million unemployed people we now have we probably would have one and a quarter million unemployed. In addition, instead of having the cost of living increase by 1½ per cent in the past year we would have had an actual reduction. That, of course, is a stupid suggestion but it is no more stupid than the policies followed by the government for the past two years.

We are told by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister that the prospects for 1971 are much better and that unemployment, like the snow outside this building, will disappear in the next couple of months as the warm weather comes. Well, these statements by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are just as incorrect as the statements they have made over the past two years based on the advice they have received from their economic advisers such as the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Deputy Minister of Finance and the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission. These advisers have consistently underestimated the unemployment figures and today are overestimating the prospects for reducing the unemployment. According to academic economists in Montreal and in Toronto, who have been much closer to the actual results in their estimates during the past couple of years concerning unemployment, the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment for 1971 will continue at 6 per cent for the whole of this year.

This means that for January and February of 1972, the unemployment figure which is now running between 650,000 and 725,000 will shrink somewhat, but probably only to something in the neighbourhood of between 525,000 and 550,000 people. That figure is completely unacceptable as an unemployment figure in a country as rich in resources and manpower as is Canada. Only people who live in ivory towers, such as the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and their economic advisers, can take comfort from the statistics we have received from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the estimates with regard to unemployment for the next 12 or 15 months. Mr. Speaker, they have forgotten, if they ever knew, what it means to be unemployed. They have forgotten, if they ever knew, what it means for a worker, whether a machinist, an electrician, a carpenter or a labourer, who is accustomed to living relatively comfortably on a weekly wage of $100 or more, to have to manage for months or years on unemployment insurance or on welfare.

Perhaps I might refer again to the figures given to us today by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. We see that the number of people who have been unemployed for six months or more has risen from 54,000 in January of 1970 to 108,000, more than double, in January of 1971. For these people the economic policies of the government of Canada have turned into a major disaster. I give the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) credit for the tour he made last month in which he visited the unemployed. Apparently, the Minister of Finance cannot take the time to do the same thing. If he is not sufficiently impressed by the gravity of the situation, by the fact that his own son was unemployed within the past year, I would suggest to the minister that he at least read the newspapers of any city in Canada. If he did so, he would understand how hard ordinary, honest and willing-to-work Canadians are trying to obtain work. He would see that many people who have had jobs for five, ten or twenty years have been laid off in these recent winter months and he would appreciate the difficulty they have in meeting their mortgage payments, rent payments, the cost of food and clothing, the cost of prescription drugs and everything else they require in this year 1971.

What has been the result of the abnormally high unemployment which has been deliberately introduced by the government of Canada? If we compare Canada's gross national product at the 1970 rate of unemployment with what it would have been had we had full employment—and I am talking about full employment which the economists calculate to be represented by their conservative figure of 4 per cent unemployed—we see that we have lost between $5,000 million and $6,000 million in production. Such an increased gross national product would have brought to Canadian governments, federal, provincial and municipal, an extra $1½ billion to $2 billion in tax revenues which would have permitted these governments to finance programs which would have paid the cost of providing full employment for Canadians. People who are still working seem to feel that since they are working they need not be concerned about the problems of those who are unemployed. I am glad to see the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) has entered the chamber. Once upon a time, before he became a minister, he had some understanding and some feeling for the needs of the ordinary citizen and the unemployed people. He seems to have lost that feeling, but it is good to see him here.

What people who are working fail to realize is that the increase in unemployment which we face in Canada has led to sharp increases in welfare costs at all three levels of government, costs which these governments can only meet by increasing the taxes which they collect from the ordinary taxpayer. Payments made by the federal government to the provinces under the provisions of the Canada assistance plan in 1969 totalled $420 million. In 1970 these payments rose to over $500 million, and I have been told by sources which I know to be reliable that the federal government estimates for their payments under the provisions of the Canada assistance plan for the year 1971 show that the cost will increase to almost $700 million, that is an increase of 40 per cent over the payments in 1970. In Ontario, the payments will rise from $159 million to $198 million, and in Quebec they will rise from $147 million in 1970 to $238 million in 1972. These increases will be paid for by the Canadian people through increased taxes. There is no other way in which they can be paid.

The situation facing local taxpayers at the municipal level is even more gruesome. In metropolitan Toronto, the cost of welfare will rise from $50 million in 1970 to $75 million in 1971. In my own city of Winnipeg, costs have gone up from $3,900,000 in 1969 to $5 million in 1970, and the estimate of the officials in the welfare department of that city is that in 1971 the cost of welfare will be $6 million. In Hamilton, costs have gone up from $1.5 million in 1969 to $1.8 million in 1970, and it is estimated that they will be $2.5 million in 1971. In Windsor, in 1969 the costs were $1.6 million, and in 1970 they were $2.27 million. In prosperous Calgary, welfare costs went up from $200,000 in 1969 to $450,000 in 1970, and the estimate for 1971 is $550,000.

I have been talking about the actual costs to the cities which the local taxpayer must pay. I have not been talking about the amounts of money paid by either the federal or provincial governments concerned. So, the increased unemployment which we faced last year has been financed by those people who are still working for wages and salaries in the cities which I have mentioned. These cities are not alone in facing this problem; they are simply a small sample of what has happened in every city in Canada in the years since 1969.

What can we do about this? It seems to me that what the Parliament of Canada should do is to commit itself to a policy of full employment. This can be achieved if we really set out to attain that goal. It can be achieved if the government rejects the bad advice which it has been given from its economic advisors, from the Governor of the Bank of Canada, from the deputy minister of finance and from the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, and will face up to some of the things which can be done. If the government will stop being mesmerized by the fear of inflation and by the fear of deficit financing, this goal can be achieved.

Let me briefly list a few of the things which the government can do fairly quickly in order to move toward full employment. I suggest that the government should decide immediately to increase unemployment insurance benefits. As the cost of living has gone up, it has become increasingly difficult, if not impossible, for workers laid off through no fault of their own to live and to meet their expenses at the present rates at which unemployment insurance is paid. I suggest that eligibility for unemployment insurance should be made easier immediately, and I suggest that the seasonal and supplementary benefits paid under unemployment insurance be increased immediately. On May 15, the seasonal benefits paid to thousands of workers across Canada will cease automatically, and welfare costs in cities such as Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver will immediately move up at an astronomical rate.

Second, I suggest that the federal government should immediately agree to increase the payments it makes towards the cost of welfare paid to employable unemployed from the present 50 per cent, under the provisions of the Canada assistance plan, to 65 per cent. Not only would this be fair because the cities simply cannot afford the cost of welfare, but also because the unemployment we are faced with today has been brought about to a very large extent by the deliberate policy of the federal government.

Third, I propose that housing programs should be increased immediately. The minister in charge of housing made a speech which sounded very well yesterday. He called on the provinces to get going, to move into the field of housing and, particularly, into the field of public housing. My own province of Manitoba came to the federal government, to the minister and to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with a program for public housing which is to cost $55 million. What happened? The words of the minister yesterday were coated in honey, but what are the cold, hard facts? When the province of Manitoba asked for $55 million, they were sent home with $31 million. Theirs was the kind of request for which the minister was calling yesterday, and yet it was reduced by 40 per cent. I suggest that that is not good enough. I suggest to the minister that he should look very carefully at extending the provisions of the National Housing Act so that loans can be made available for the rehabilitation of present housing stocks. Surely, we have learned enough by now, on the basis of past experience that we do not want to simply bulldoze the existing housing stock, much of it in good shape and simply needing some rehabilitation.

Fourth, I propose that the Minister of Finance give immediate favourable consideration to removing the 3 per cent surtax on income tax. Such a move would immediately put spending power into the hands of ordinary Canadians and would permit them to buy manufactured goods, thus, increasing employment opportunities for those who are unemployed.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Fifth, I suggest that the government give serious consideration to a sharp increase in the funding of products to encourage cities to move rapidly into sewage control and pollution abatement programs. I say to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), as I have said on other occasions, it is a disgrace that in the year 1971 his city of Quebec dumps almost 100 per cent of its raw sewage untreated into the St. Lawrence River; that Montreal, a city of 2½ million people, dumps over 90 per cent of its raw sewage untreated into the St. Lawrence River; and the city of Halifax dumps over 90 per cent of its raw sewage untreated into the bay on which it is built. I cannot think of anything more useful and more productive, both in terms of employment and improving the environment, than that the government should help those cities which I have mentioned, and many others—

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Certainly.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Does he know how many sewage processing plants are being built in Quebec?

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Orlikow: I would be very happy if the minister, later today or when we return to debate on the government organization bill setting out the powers of the minister of the environment, would tell us what is happening in Quebec City. When I say that close to 100 per cent of the sewage of Quebec City is dumped into the St. Lawrence River, I am quoting from a submission made by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities to the federal government less than a year ago. If the situation has changed, then I extend my congratulations to the minister and to the city of Quebec. However, I am certain they have a long way to go before they put an appreciable dent in the disastrous situation which has been created in that city.

If the government would move to do these things I have mentioned, then we would begin to move towards full employment; we would begin to wipe out the large scale unemployment which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion used to be concerned about when he was President of the CNTU, or at least which he seemed to be more concerned about than since he has become a minister. If the government would approve some of the proposals I have made, not very radical or revolutionary proposals, we would begin to move towards the just society about which the Prime Minister spoke so eloquently during the last election, and we would begin to make the just society a meaningful fact—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but I must do so to notify him that his time has expired.

Mr. Orlikow: If I could have 30 seconds more, I could complete the sentence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: As I was saying, we would move towards making the just society, about which the Prime Minister spoke so eloquently a year or two ago, a meaningful fact rather than the bitter joke which the phrase has become to so many of the unemployed.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, there are so many matters that could be discussed in the budget debate since, in Canada today, problems are legion. However, I shall follow the example that has been set in the past few days and deal with the most pertinent problem, namely, unemployment. I was going to deal with an ancillary mater, that of regional expansion and development. The Minister of Regional Economic Development (Mr. Marchand) is in the House, so perhaps I may deal with it towards the end of my remarks.

In the light of the statistics that were brought down today concerning the growing problem of unemployment, I would like to make some positive contributions to the debate. I believe the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will be speaking in the debate this afternoon, so I shall curtail my remarks in order to give him an opportunity to reply to some of the things that I shall say this afternoon.

There is no doubt that the question of unemployment has become critical. It is not just the transitory, seasonal unemployment that bothers Canada because of our severe winter weather. It is chronic longterm unemployment that has reached into the level of skilled and professional people. It has been a long, long time since we had young Canadians qualifying with Ph.D. degrees unable to find suitable employment. It is a long, long time since we have had people with technical skills unemployed, after a lifetime spent in the work for which they were specially trained, and it has been a long, long time since the young have been so severely affected by the chronic state of unemployment that besets the Canadian economy at present. Admittedly, there is always some unemployment and it is the chronic poor who suffer most in this regard. Now, because of the growing severity of the problem, they are feeling the pressure all the more because of the lack of policy and misdirection on the part of the federal government.

I am not going to engage in a battle of statistics because statistics are cold comfort. We do know that the situation is severe. Whether it be the number on unemployment insurance, the number who are registered for employment in the manpower centres, the number who are statistically calculated on the seasonally adjusted basis, it is a very black and serious day for a young country like Canada. I suggest that the situation has developed because of what has been designated the Benson iceberg theory by a gentleman in Manitoba, who applied this term to the minister's white paper on taxation. If one reads that book by the tax expert in Manitoba, who is also the leader of the Liberal party in Manitoba, Mr. Izzie Asper, I think one must come to the conclusion that he reached, that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brought down his white paper on taxation he obviously had not read the document himself because since that time he has been backing away from his own thesis.

That white paper has been discussed in season and out of season across the country. I do not think any of the important proposals in it had the approval of the people of Canada. There has been much newspaper comment on the White paper. I read one from the Deloraine Times published in my constituency. The item is headed, "An Angry Canada", and reads:

> Across the country, more and more people from all walks of life are asking: "What is Ottawa trying to do?"

That is a good question, but unfortunately the members who sit on the treasury benches in Ottawa are not able to answer it because they do not know the answer. In all the letters which are reaching my office there is evident a spirit of growing protest, economic protest and political protest. The other day one of my correspondents waxed eloquent with poetry, and I would like to read this for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is a poetic summary of the attitude of people in western Canada to the current disarray in government programs and policies. I know there is to be a ministerial safari to Saskatchewan this week-end. The ministers will get the message in person. I merely wish to give them a preliminary foretaste of what they may expect:

• (4:20 p.m.)

> Of Trudeau and Sharp you have heard,
> Edgar Benson is a big third.
> Recession, depression,
> In deadly procession
> Is the aim of this ravenous bird.

That was sent to me in a letter, and I think it is a good summary of the situation which faces the country at present. So far, the only minister who has spoken in the continuation of the debate has been the minister responsible for housing. His solution is, build more houses. He also gave us some words of wisdom when he tried to rebut some of the comments which opposition spokesmen have been making. He quoted that old aphorism, "The optimist sees the doughnut and the pessimist sees the hole." There are 700,000 unemployed people in Canada at present, as I am sure hon. members opposite realize. I almost said, "Hon. members absent", which would be a more appropriate term, and I include hon. ministers opposite when I say "hon. members opposite". It is very difficult for those people who are unemployed to see anything except a very dismal hole. There is not much dough in the doughnut that faces them in this dismal prospect. The government seems to be replying that unemployment is a rumour or, to use a phrase that the Prime Minister frequently likes to use, that it is, "a foul canard perpetrated by a bunch of people who are out of work." That is as close as they come to realizing the problems that accrue to those who find themselves among the 700,000 unemployed, a situation that has come about as a result of government bungling.

The Parliament of Canada set up within recent years the Economic Council of Canada. That Economic Council of Canada every year presents a report. Each year it reports the desirable goals towards which the government of Canada ought to aim. These are not the half-baked proposals of any private Member of Parliament. These are the carefully researched, analytical goals set out by the members of the Economic Council of Canada. We must have, first, full unemployment. I am referring to the points outlined by the Economic Council.

Mr. Francis: Full unemployment or employment?

Mr. Dinsdale: If the whip of the government party will read the report of the Economic Council of Canada he will see that full unemployment in Canada as a result of seasonal adjustments—I beg your pardon. I ought to say "full employment". Full employment, on that basis, is reached when our unemployment rate is 3.8 per cent.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question. He has twice referred to full unemployment.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have corrected myself and said "full employment". The figure there is 3.8 per cent. There must be, second, a high rate of growth, an annual increase in the gross national product of 4.75 per cent. Third, there must be reasonable price stability, which would be a 2 per cent rate of increase in prices annually.

Fourth, there must be a viable balance of payments, where the foreign exchange fund is not subject to undue fluctuations. The final and fifth point is, an equitable distribution of rising incomes.

These are the goals that the Economic Council of Canada has set out as fundamental to any rational economic policy in Canada. The government presently occupying the treasury benches has failed to achieve any of these goals. It has missed the target in all respects. And why has it missed the target? Because it has put the cart before the horse, that is why. It has been so preoccupied with fighting inflation which was self generated. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), who is present in his seat, knows something about that, because he was the minister of finance in the previous administration. Hon. Walter Gordon, who used to be minister of finance, would also know something about this. He was so mesmerized with his own propaganda when he wrote that book "Troubled Canada" in 1962, and with his own desire to get the economy going again when the economy was already going too fast, that the fires of inflation raged out of control.

For the past two years the present government has been deliberately bludgeoning the economy in order to deal with one aspect of the total economic situation. Only now is it moving to deal with what is the fundamental problem in the economy, providing employment for the citizens of Canada. This must be achieved, of course, through continuous economic growth. The hon. gentleman who spoke previously, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), outlined some simple proposals that would deal with this chronic situation of unemployment. I will not repeat what he said. I concur in all respects with those recommendations and wish to add an extra one. If the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing really wants to achieve his goals for housing, he should seek the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials.

The government, as a cure-all, is expanding government expenditures which will go into winter works and make work programs of various kinds. Well, if the government had not cancelled the winter works program a few years ago, they would not need to take this emergency action. The winter works program was an excellent method, on an annual basis, of levelling out the humps and bumps of the seasonal fluctuations in employment in Canada. The tragedy is that those massive injections into the economy at this late date will not produce any real impact, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) admits this, until the warmer weather comes. The minister says things will be better next spring. I say that he and the government should adopt the slogan that was adopted in the past for this excellent winter works program: "Why wait for spring; do it now."

If the ministers who are going to western Canada this weekend, or at least one or two of those ministers who have direct responsibilities in these matters, had gone out through the hustings, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) did two or three weeks ago, they would realize that unemployment is more than statistics. It involves hardships among families; it involves misery, frustration, suffering and despair such as Canada has not seen for a long, long time.

One of the policies that the official opposition has been recommending to the government is the immediate removal of the surtax. This was alluded to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North earlier this afternoon. This would have the desirable effect of releasing or at least easing the pressure on the private sector of the economy; because, if we are ever to deal with the chronic unemployment situation, we must encourage a rapid degree of growth in the private sector of the economy.

Rather than growth, we are besieged and beset by bankruptcies, mass firings and layoffs, as a result of the fact that private business is floundering because of excessive taxation by the government. Tax relief would give immediate impetus to the total economy. Instead of economic growth, we have a 5 per cent slack which will require a 10 per cent performance next year in order to make up for the current slack in terms of total productivity. Goodness knows when the economy will achieve the rate which has been mapped out for it by the Economic Council of Canada.

In order to live up to my promise and give the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion an opportunity to speak before five o'clock, there is just one other matter—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We don't stop at five o'clock.

Mr. Dinsdale: That's fine.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is a budget day.

Mr. Dinsdale: There is one other matter which concerns the minister directly which I wish to discuss at this time. There are special problems which relate to the Canadian economy which must always be kept in mind if we are going to achieve the goals laid out by the Economic Council of Canada, and if we are going to achieve the level of development and prosperity that should be the inheritance of a country as young, vigorous—the people, not the government—and rich in resources as the true north, strong and free.

The prime consideration is the problem of regional disparity. The minister has direct responsibility for this. The second is our high dependence on international trade, and the third is the same degree of dependence on our principal trading partner. We are closely tied to the economy of the colossus to the south, the United States of America.

In order to deal with the chronic situation into which the Canadian economy has slipped under the present administration, we have to do something about regional disparity. Perhaps this is outside the responsibility of the Minister of Economic Expansion, but the policies of the government as they affect my own province and the Prairie region generally are aggravating rather than assisting the difficulties. Manitoba is still basically an agricultural province. Agriculture is still the main source of economic activity. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), who was here a few moments ago, is from the west. He should realize that the policy initiatives that he is taking to deal with the growing crisis in agriculture are confounding the issue rather than providing solutions. I just mentioned that in passing because there will be much debate on the subject when it finally comes before Parliament. Bill C-176, the marketing legislation, was soundly shellacked when the Standing Committee on Agriculture was in Winnipeg last week. A spokesman clearly pointed out that if the terms of Bill C-176 are ever implemented, the diversified agricultural industry in Manitoba will be virtually destroyed. The same applies to the grain stabilization act, and the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, which the government is threatening to remove from the statute books.

I wish to deal with another matter that perhaps does not seem important, but which is vitally important to the agricultural community. In 1963, capital grants for agricultural fairs were suspended. There have been no capital grants for almost eight years. The government has promised action. Some of the facilities at these agricultural centres are becoming quite shabby. As a result, there is a growing and urgent need for some infusion of capital under either the suspended program or a substitute so that the agricultural industry might be given this boost.

In addition to the problems of agriculture, the government is promoting the depopulation of the smaller rural communities and encouraging the rush to the big metropolis. This aggravates the current unemployment and other social problems which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion was decrying in his recent speech to the Liberal party in Quebec. He prophesied that unless the social confusion and disorganization of the urban communities were toned down, we would be heading for severe trouble. Fundamental to this trend are government policies that encourage depopulation of the rural areas and concentration of the population in a few large urban areas where the social problems are so severe that it is almost impossible for civic administrations to deal with them.

In the western provinces there is a constant attrition of fundamental services. Transportation services such as railroads and air services are being downgraded as are postal services. The National Film Board used to play an important role in creating a sense of national unity and purpose by means of audio-visual education. This is now being downgraded. Local units are being closed in favour of the concentrated bureaucracy, Information Canada, in the larger centres. The CRTC is enunciating policies that militate and discriminate against the outlying areas. I have already indicated that the winter works program was discontinued, as were roads to resources. The tariffs are going up and up. This is direct discrimination against the Prairie community.

I read a very interesting speech by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) to the Canadian Importers' Association of Montreal on January 20. As a result of that speech, the Winnipeg Free Press, a liberal journal, referred to the policy enunciated as "This is protection in excelsis". That statement appeared in the February 1 edition in a leading editorial headed "Pepin's Promise".

To show that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was doing some delicate tight-rope walking on that particular occasion, I wish to quote some interesting extracts from his speech:

> Yes indeed! But what, where from, where to, how freely and how much must we export and import?
>
> Sorry, as you well know, no magic formula is available to answer these questions. When the clichés have been exhausted,—

As an interpolation, I may say he uttered most of the clichés.

> —what is needed is knowledge, judgment, wise reconciliation of conflicting interests, proper balance of advantages, the play of competition, consideration for economic, social, political, even ethnic . . . national, regional, professional factors.
> The key word is "balance". I often point out that the balancing act is the most important act parliament has ever passed. I should like to illustrate how this balancing act has, nevertheless, been implemented in recent Canadian trade policy. As a matter of fact, this is my only objective today.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The response, in this balancing act, has been protection in excelsis, which does extreme harm to the basic industry of the prairies and runs completely counter, in direction, to some of the more desirable programs which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is attempting to promote.

Before concluding, I should like to ask the minister whether he intends to say some encouraging words shortly in connection with the situation which has arisen in western Manitoba as a result of the government's decision to close down the Rivers Air Base. I know the minister intends to visit that part of the country to survey the situation there. One of the main causes of unemployment in the area concerned arises from this phase-out, based on government policy.

The city of Brandon, other surrounding communities and rural municipalities, along with the Province of Manitoba, have directed a brief to the hon. gentleman requesting that he designate this area as a special area under DREE so that adequate alternative programs might be developed. This is the sort of constructive initiative which is required if we are to use the powers available under DREE to deal with this fundamental economic situation, that is to say, with regional disparity. I trust that as a result of the many representations which have been made, mostly by spokesmen from this side of the House, the government will break through its hard shell of insensitivity and appreciate that when we talk about 700,000 people unemployed we are not dealing with statistics but with people—people with families, young people, and all the social and economic ills which flow from the tragedy of unemployment. Perhaps when the ministers are in the west, down on the hustings during the cold winter atmosphere this weekend, this message will come home to them loud and clear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, before I entered politics, I was always told that unemployment was the favourite food of politicians. Today, I see those who so informed me were quite right. It is not that I want to make a joke of the matter, because I know what it is to be unemployed. I have seen the unemployed and on many occasions I have fought for them, and I am aware that the problem is extremely serious.

However, I do not believe that opposition members have, at any rate so far, made really meaningful contributions to the debate on unemployment. Of course, they have complained about unemployment and denouncing unemployment and inveighing against the present government is a sure way of building up some kind of political prestige. It is easy. Anyone can do this denouncing and I appreciate that it should be done. There is not the slightest doubt about that.

However, I had thought that the opposition would do a little bit more than merely offer vague criticism. I expected them to submit concrete proposals, to tell the House and the Canadian people what policy should be adopted in order to put an end to unemployment and, in fact, to enable almost all Canadians to hold a permanent and remunerative job.

Some hon. members—my attention was drawn, for instance, to the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—appear to have written their speeches 20 or 25 years ago, taking into account the situation as it was then. Apparently, since then, they are repeating the same speeches, without being aware of the changes that have occurred in our society and without bearing in mind the decisions that have been made. The same stories are told because at the time they were pertinent. Today, however, such utterances have nothing whatever to do with the facts.

One member spoke of Quebec City. Nobody asked him to do so, but he spoke of it. He said that Quebec City has a serious problem because it dumps almost 100 per cent of its raw sewage into the St. Lawrence. However, for the past six or seven years, Mr. Speaker, we have been working with the province of Quebec and with the City of Quebec in order to eliminate the pollution of the St. Charles River. Two water treatment plants are being built; an amount of some 100 million dollars is provided for the treatment of all the small streams which pour into the St. Charles River. All this is being done. It seems that when the hon. member for Winnipeg-North-Centre, pardon me, Winnipeg-North, prepared his speech, this was not being done. That was the only way to bring a member of the New Democratic Party into the House. There is no doubt that unemployment interests the New Democrats, but—Mr. Speaker, I knew that the hon. member would resume his seat after hearing me make such a mistake!

So, Mr. Speaker, here is a man in public life who has just spoken of unemployment, of Canadian problems and who could at least inquire about and know these elementary facts. But it makes a good impression to assert before the Canadian people that absolutely nothing is being done although we would really have a wonderful opportunity to find jobs for our unemployed.

In any event, whatever criticism we may level at the opposition, it nevertheless remains that unemployment is a very serious problem in our society. Is the problem serious because there are 600,000 unemployed rather than 500,000 or 400,000? I am under the impression that any man who is unemployed against his wish, even though he were the only one of his kind, would be thoroughly unhappy and society should come to his assistance. It is not the fact that there are 200,000 or 300,000 which is serious. Obviously, this makes for a greater number of unhappy people, but for the one who finds no work it will not help his situation to hear that his third neighbour is also unemployed.

It is a quite personal problem. Unemployment also becomes a social problem when there is a significant number of workers out of a job.

Mr. Speaker, I would like us one day to have more revealing statistics on unemployment, not because I do not believe that there are 600,000 unemployed—there are perhaps 700,000 or 800,000—but in order to know the truth as it is. I do not intend to minimize the importance of unemployment. We have total figures concealing quite varied realities.

For instance, does the worker who from one place to another has been vainly looking for work in the last six, seven or eight months fit in the same category as, say, the longshoreman who, by the very nature of his job, is unemployed in December and January and gets backs to work only in February or March?

Besides, the teacher who stops working in June and starts again in September is in the same situation. Nobody ever thought of considering this man as being out of work during the summer months.

It is also the case of the construction worker who is unemployed for a few months in the year because of the weather and usually, the fact that he is idle for part of the year is taken into consideration when his wages are established.

Then, all these people are put in the same category.

Is the unemployed from Montreal, who has been looking for work for the last six months, in the same category as the fisherman who has to stop fishing in November or December? He is unable to fish. His work year is not the same as that of an urban worker. And everything is mixed up.

Those who work only a few hours a week are numerous. There are not any global figures available for them. But, I think unemployment is such an important problem that more detailed statistics should be required in order to examine them in a more rational way.

Some workers are unemployed because of the nature of the industry they are in. Some industries are seasonal. Is the farmer in the same situation as the secondary industry worker in a city like Toronto?

Mr. Speaker, it would be in the interest of the public to have more telling statistics, which would prevent such an important assembly as ours to talk somewhat at random about an extremely serious problem, without having accurate information on the situation.

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, the goal of my department is to reduce economic and social disparities between the various regions of Canada, in order to make sure, as much as possible, that people from every area enjoy an acceptable standard of living.

This is a simple objective, that everybody can understand, but the fulfillment of which proves to be very complex in practice.

I am the first to admit that it was not easy at the beginning because the machinery of economy cannot be changed in so short a period of time. One must admit also that it is very difficult to restore the economy of underprivileged areas when the economy of the country as a whole is going slow and the unemployment rate is high.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the present situation is very unfair to unemployed people, but it is also unfair to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion because when the general employment situation is bad in Canada, there is no doubt that the programs that we implement have much less impact and that their effect on the unemployment level in Canada is much less apparent.

I am convinced however that for the past two years, we have implemented programs that will enable us to reduce regional inequalities and the effects of which will be all the more evident since the Canadian economy will be going again.

There are three such programs. The first one provides for employment in slow-growth areas; the second one is aimed at improving public utilities in under-developed areas in order to provide the population with a better standard of living; the third program enables us to provide assistance to the under-developed provinces in adjusting to various changes and in taking advantage of all new employment opportunities.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

With regard to employment opportunities, the industrial incentives program in its new form has begun well. In 18 months, to January 31, we have 404 accepted offers of incentives for industrial plants in slow-growth regions. They involve an investment of $566 million. Towards that our incentives will contribute $123 million. The plants that we are encouraging will employ over 20,000 people when they are in production.

These are the new jobs directly created. They do not include the jobs preserved in plants which could not continue in production if we did not help them to modernize. They do not include the indirect jobs, the people who are employed because the new plants buy supplies and because their workers have wages to spend on additional products. The number of indirect jobs cannot be stated precisely, but a very modest estimate is 45,000. That is to say, in 18 months the new program has already set in motion investment that will involve, directly and indirectly, a total of at least 65,000 jobs in places where they are badly needed. This is the permanent result—the jobs created when the plants are in production. Admittedly, few of them are in production yet because they take time to build. That is a fact of life and the speeches of critics cannot change it. But these critics might note that the building of the new plants in itself creates immediate employment. Directly and indirectly about 75,000 man years of employment will be derived from the construction that the incentives program has already set in motion.

These are good results at so early a stage. The present state of the economy is not what any of us would like, but it is a great deal better than would have been possible without our regional development programs. For the future we have to go on expanding our efforts. That is why the incentives legislation was strengthened recently. It is why we are adopting new devices, like the Multiplex Corporation that we have just established as a joint agency with New Brunswick. Through that corporation we will be trying to bring a whole complex of large, modern plants into existence, centred on Saint John. That is just one of the new projects that we are trying to work out with provincial governments.

Since my department was established on April 1, 1969, we have not only launched the new incentives program, but, for a transitional period, we have continued the old ADA program. The cases approved under that program since April 1, 1969, are creating 19,000 new jobs as direct employment, and a total of over 40,000 jobs if indirect employment is included.

[Translation]

Then, Mr. Speaker, taking into account only the jobs which are directly or indirectly created by my department, I note that right there a total of approximately 150,000 jobs have been made possible thanks to this department. So, when the hon. members of the opposition state that this department is a failure and that it has done nothing, they are merely assuming the same attitude as the hon. member for Winnipeg North who makes statements without even trying to make sure of his facts.

Another important program being introduced by my department will help the provinces and municipalities set up the necessary public services for the development of low growth areas.

Since provincial and municipal authorities do not have adequate financial resources, the development of such public services cannot now materialize without federal help. This is why we have established our special zones program.

The first federal-provincial agreements, which have been in effect since April 1, 1970, provide for a federal contribution of the order of $243 million, spread over a two-and-a-half year period. The different projects issuing from such agreements involve directly or indirectly some 35,000 man-years.

[English]

For the benefit of those who are always referring to the winter works program, I will repeat in English what I have just said in French. Do they know how much money we are spending under the winter works program? We are spending about $25 million a year.

Mr. Dinsdale: It was doing a good job.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): In the last two years we have spent, for the same purpose but much more intelligently, about $245 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): So if hon. members want to hark back to the winter works program, then let them explain to the public what the government is doing.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the minister permit a question. Why, then, has the government resinstated the winter works program this year on an emergency basis?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We have not.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: We have done a more effective job than winter works.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It has been explained in this House time and time again.

Mr. Dinsdale: Winter works.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No. There are the shipbuilding loans, loans to the provinces for various winter works projects, but nothing like the old winter works program any longer exists. When you refer to the winter works program, I should say that this was about the only program at that time. There was, perhaps, one other. That program was concerned with regional development, and the total amount expended for the year was $25 million. My department now spends over $300 million for the same purpose. I believe we are doing much more. Those who think we can correct the unemployment situation by reverting to the old winter works program do not know what they are talking about.

Mr. Dinsdale: You are not achieving the same result—wasteful expenditure.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Then, we come to the matter of helping disadvantaged people. Whatever the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) thinks, I am very sensitive to the same values he has and I am working on this. I am not reading the same speech he read of 25 years ago. Besides the stimulation of employment through the incentives program, besides the help to community services in the special areas, we have a variety of other programs to help people to adjust to changes and take advantage of new opportunities.

Under the ARDA legislation, we have a great variety of programs to help rural areas. Let me take as examples two new projects recently started in Saskatchewan. At Cutbank, we are putting $1.5 million into a special training centre to provide Indian and Métis people with educational upgrading and work experience. Again, at Last Oak Park, we are investing nearly $3 million in helping Indian bands to develop recreation and tourist facilities from which they should be able to earn greatly improved incomes.

These are specific examples. We have been negotiating with the provinces broader ARDA agreements, which I expect to sign shortly. These will enable us to share with provinces in a very wide range of projects that will help people in rural areas to develop better incomes. I anticipate a considerable expansion of activity within the next few years.

As another aspect of helping people, we have greatly improved the resettlement program under which we help people in Newfoundland who want to move to the areas with better schools, better housing and more varied employment opportunities.

Then, we have the various FRED programs. The most ambitious is the Prince Edward Island development plan. That is working well, we are not complacent about it. Indeed, we are working out with the provincial government ways of making it more effective, particularly by providing funds for the school building program which is essential to economic and social progress on the island.

One of the most important of our new programs is particularly designed for severely disadvantaged people, such as people of Indian ancestry who have had little employment experience. We are anxious to provide a wide range of assistance to such people to set up, train for and finance their own undertakings. The details of such a program are now in the final stages of negotiation with the Prairie provinces and the Indian and Metis people, and we expect afterwards to expand the program to other provinces. Many of these social adjustment projects will build on the important work in preparing people for employment that is being done under the Newstart program.

Finally, in this brief review, I will mention the oldest of Canada's regional development programs. I refer to PFRA. Over the years, as everyone on the Prairies knows, it has contributed greatly to the improvement of land utilization and the conservation of water. Under today's conditions, with larger farms and the movement of prairie people into relatively larger towns, the key improvements in water utilization are necessarily those at the centres which act as the trading points for rural areas. With Brandon as a first example, we intend that PFRA should increasingly contribute to this need. In passing, I think I should mention I am very hopeful that very shortly we will have a solution for Gimli and Rivers. I have every reason to believe we have a solution.

Mr. Dinsdale: Come out with us soon.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am awaiting replies to my letters.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stop over on your way back from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Another indication of the broadened range of projects for PFRA is its assistance to an Indian band at The Pas to construct the water and sewer system and streets for a modern subdivision on the reserve. In a more traditional field, we are working out with the Alberta government the role of PFRA in rehabilitating the major irrigation works in southern Alberta.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this was a brief summary of my department's various programs. I am not saying they are perfect. But for hon. members to state out of hand in the House that the government is doing nothing for the underprivileged or the unemployed, this is mere demagogy. We are even accused of being unresponsive to the unemployment problem!

And yet, all of us, my department officials and myself as well as the cabinet that is behind me, are doing our utmost to find solutions to the Indian and Métis problems and those of the unemployed fishermen who are unable to find work and whose income is inadequate. We are trying to solve the farmers' problems with our ARDA programs. We are trying to find solutions to the problems of underdeveloped regions and declining industries, such as the footwear industry and the shipyards, by devoting the whole of our time to them.

The opposition members may say we are not good at it and that they would find the solution. Some will agree, some will not! But to have the Canadian people think that we are so many civil servants absolutely unresponsive to unemployment is to lie to them and try to make them believe such lies.

Mr. Speaker, there is one sure thing: the number 700,000 or 668,000 may be stated in the face of the Canadian people, but the opposition would really be wrong in not stressing that important fact in our social life. Indeed, the number is necessarily relative: 600,000 in relation to what?

Ten or 15 years ago, the labour force in Canada was about 5,000,000 or 4,500,000. Of course, 600,000 out of 4,500,000 has a somewhat greater importance than 600,000 out of 8,000,000. In the United States, there may be 1,000,000 unemployed, which is relatively less serious than in Canada because the labour force there is so much greater. Therefore when people use exclusively absolute terms and disregard seasonally adjusted rates, thereby ignoring the fact that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment fell from 6.6 to 6.2 per cent, I say they minimize the truth and want to hide it.

It is true that the unemployment rate has relatively decreased and it is important to mention it while complaining of the fact that in absolute terms, there are more unemployed than before. However, the fact that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment declined from 6.6 to 6.2 is extremely important and nobody could deny it. And if someone wants to use merely 130,000 more—

• (5:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: The figure is 668,000.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We know that, but you never mentioned the other figure. I say it is a good thing that you mentioned there are 668,000 unemployed in Canada. It is part of your job to do so, but it is also part of your job to say that unemployment has declined when this figure is considered in relationship to the other figure.

[Translation]

The rate went down from 6.6 to 6.2 per cent. We are now faced with an extremely serious and complex problem related to the general policy of the government which is being accused of promoting unemployment. Some of our unemployment may have stemmed partly from the government's action. But nobody ever came up with a practical and the solution to prevent this phenomenon.

When I hear our so-called leftists claim that the only way to fight unemployment is to lower taxes, I must say that I do not know where they learned their leftist's political philosophies. Indeed, this seems to be a rightist's attitude. In fact, who would benefit from tax reduction if not the wealthiest regions and this at the expense of the disadvantaged areas of the country? Come on, this is crystal clear!

Some hon. Members: Hear! hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This must be the most reactionary position in Canada today. The only way to assist the disadvantaged people of Canada is to enforce the kind of selective measures we have taken.

Mr. Speaker, I am as much concerned about the unemployment rate as any member in this House and there is no doubt that any politician would find such a situation disastrous. It is not as bad as the opposition pretends it is, but it may well be more serious than we thought. It is undoubtedly a serious problem and I only wanted to indicate that the government is engaged in correcting the situation and that my department has taken very significant action which will bring results, even though it might not yet be obvious because of the general situation. But I am convinced that we are going in the right direction and that, with some degree of co-operation, we shall be able to bring back a reasonable level of employment in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear! hear!

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Of all the people who should be talking and making accusations about vague denunciations, it occurred to me that the minister, because of what he has been saying in the last couple of months, is a master at it.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I have nothing to withdraw.

Mr. Fairweather: We will leave the record to speak for itself.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It speaks very loudly.

Mr. Fairweather: Even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had to do a little chopping down for vague denun-ciations. I will not trade statistics with the minister. I know that the unemployment rate in the Atlantic region of Canada, that is the number of unemployed as a percentage of the labour force, is, according to the revised statistical method of reporting today, 10.2 per cent. It is, therefore, up .2 per cent from the same period last year. That is why I am taking part in this debate.

I do not want to load the record with accusations that the government is doing nothing—that would be ridiculous. I know the government is doing something and I welcome the announcement, for instance, about the consortium Multiplex in Saint John. I just suggest that up to now the government has not done enough.

The conclusion of the debate on the budget delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) last December, comes at a time when we are all very deeply concerned about the issue of unemployment which, by the admission of the Minister of Finance himself, was deliberately created—a hardship by cabinet decree. On Tuesday, the Minister of Finance read the provinces a little lecture on how great he and the government were. I read the lecture, too. We were given it and also given the statistical tables. It occurred to me that it is normal practice for references to greatness to be left to the judgment of history. But this government is not content to await that judgment. They want to attempt to ensure their place in history now. In this they can be assured of some distinction, the distinction, I suggest, of placing a very cruel and unwarranted strain on the whole fabric of Canadian life.

I have tried to place myself in the position of one of the provincial ministers when the Minister of Finance told them to borrow to meet the increased costs of welfare—a superb response to a very urgent need. That is what the minister suggested, but he should have remembered that the increased cost was brought on by the federal government's decision to be tough on the issue of employment. The provincial ministers must have felt something of the shock one experiences in going from a warm room to an ice cold shower; bracing, if you can stand the shock.

What troubles me about unemployment, what troubles me after the genuine agony of those 668,000 Canadians who are totally out of work, is the government's complacency in the face of the figures. We continue to be treated to little homilies about it not being as bad as the statistics indicate. We have just had another example of that. We are urged to remain steady; we are asked to cool it, to keep calm. Well, the country needs a lot more passion from this government. We need evidence of more fire in the government's collective belly.

We had high hopes from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). We thought for a time that he was the conscience of the cabinet. But when the minister was faced with an ugly situation in Kingston when frustrated and angry men broke a window in the national employment office, all we got from the conscience of the cabinet was the statement that the glass was being replaced. As my leader reminded the country, men and women who want to work but cannot are losing a little bit of themselves every day. That is tragic. Tragic indeed it is, and this government is compounding the tragedy by their lack of a forthright policy to face the most serious issue that has faced this country since the second world war.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

The Atlantic report published the other day by APEC is a cool and, if I can put it this way, neutral analysis of the situation in Atlantic Canada. The report reads:

> The economy of the Atlantic provinces during 1970 was placed once again in the unenviable position of being forced to withstand the impact of the conventional methods of slowing the progress of inflation without having contributed to the phenomenon.

That is the economic history of the Maritimes in a sentence.

> Although there was more evidence than ever before that regional difficulties were being recognized through discretionary fiscal policies, it was clearly apparent that more fine tuning of these measures was still necessary. Under the circumstances the regional economy appeared to fare reasonably well during the year relative to past performance and to the faltering national economy. However, many of the deep rooted problems appeared to worsen under the influence of anti-inflationary policies, a slowing national economy and a sluggish U.S. economy.

I make no apology for quoting these and one or two more paragraphs from APEC's analysis of current economic conditions and trends. The council has won for itself an enviable reputation for being apolitical and research oriented. It plays no favourites and has won the respect of provincial governments, industry and trade unions for its carefully studied forecasts of economic prospects.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The analysis suggests that:

> ... the Atlantic region will not move into the upturn of the current cycle until at least the latter part of the third quarter.

The latter part of the third quarter is some six months ahead.

> As the 1970's began the principle question being raised in the Atlantic provinces was whether federal authorities would be willing to temper anti-inflationary policies to ease the impact on the economically immature areas of the country. Uniform application of these policies in the past has shown that their impact was most severe in areas such as the Atlantic region.
> Some attempt was made to lighten the burden of the anti-inflationary strategy on the regional economy in the March federal budget. These measures included: increased funds for loans to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to offset expected declines in the flow of private housing, money to assist low cost housing, aid to municipalities in setting up pollution abatement plants; increased mortgage funds for farm credit ... and increased funds for regional economic expansion.

But, Mr. Speaker, although these programs did set a precedent in recognizing the unique character of the regional economy, APEC's response was that policies expressly designed to alleviate the impact of federal contra-cyclical policies were needed. It was stressed that the economic structure of the region makes it particularly susceptible to economic slowdowns. Downturns occur more easily and faster than in the nation and recovery lags behind. Moreover, the region is adversely affected by cyclical variations and this is reinforced by the application of the broad levers of fiscal and monetary policy used to offset inflationary tendencies.

... The gravity of the regional situation led observers to anticipate that the year's second budget—

The one we are debating now.

—would recognize the need to bolster the regional economy and give it the impetus to move out of the trough in step with the nation.

And, as the analysis puts it so well:

This expectation did not, however, prove to be true ...

You do not need any embellishment on that statement that, "This expectation did not, however, prove to be true." These are not my words. These are not rhetorical adjectives that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion seems so sensitive about. They are the result of a carefully prepared analysis by an apolitical group having to do with the whole economic future of the Maritimes. It is because the budget we are now debating falls so far short of the national needs, and because the expectation that it would recognize the need to bolster and give impetus to the regional economy proved untrue that I, as a representative of the region, consider it my duty to suggest that the minister, to say the least, has been callous in the manner in which he has ignored the special needs of our part of the country.

It seems to me that there are four issues having to do with the general theme of unemployment and regional inequalities, and as I have a minute or two more I want to try to state them as briefly as possible. The first concerns the working poor and the socially assisted. I hope the House will forgive me if I discuss this with particular emphasis on New Brunswick. This is not meant to be a whining cry for money. Rather, I want to share with you a cri du cœur on behalf of those who are having a hard time of it this winter, and also regretfully for many, too many winters before this winter. Some of the statistics are known, as an editorial in Tuesday's Moncton Times reminds us. There are figures that in their stark brutality are almost unbelievable. I quote:

—55 per cent of Tracadie's population is receiving help and in the general region about 40 per cent is on welfare.

Parliament and the country must understand that thousands of our fellow citizens have a food allowance of 17 cents per meal, "whose chances of finding jobs in the heart of winter are nil, whose homes are windy shells." To continue the editorial:

One fact appears to emerge—that the traditional welfare system of providing a subsistence style of living, tied in with a minimum wage structure whose earnings are often less than welfare allowances, must be changed. It provides no incentive to work and the whole structure drives out the few who can acquire an education, leaving behind the few who would be supported anyway (the widows, the blind, the ill and the old) and those who because of lack of education cannot qualify for jobs much better than cutting wood and catching fish. Both of these are seasonal occupations and are subject to the vagaries of weather.

When several years ago a talented CBC producer, Richard Nielsen, incidentally a New Brunswicker by birth, tried in a sensitive and probing documentary to share some of the horror behind these mean facts, people castigated him for not showing pastoral New Brunswick basking in an August sun. I was profoundly saddened by the film and depressed by the public outcry against what it depicted. Instead of engendering a will to something, I am sorry to say that many people ran for cover. They put on blindfolds and said that that was not the New Brunswick they wanted to see. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if this issue, and the statistics in support of this issue are unsolved, they threaten by their brutality not only the unity in my province but the very fabric of this country.

Many people in this age of insensitive technocracy resist blood and guts words. They shun compassion and concern as being unworthy of the lexicon of a modern industrial state. As the old hymn asks, "When comes the promised time—?" Many Canadians are asking this question today. Many are asking this question this winter. I suggest that we, in this Parliament, have no higher priority than to work to end this patent injustice which is the lot of far too many of our brothers.

This leads me to the constitutional conference which completed another chapter in its continuing serial. We are now to be treated to constitutional underpinning to the determination of governments to fight regional inequality. But, Mr. Speaker, the niceties of constitutional language will have a hollow ring if these phrases are not translated into action. It will be idle and insulting to agree upon phraseology which has no content.

The budget we are debating certainly shows no evidence that one of the senior ministers in this administration understands his obligation to provide more funds for education and help to back up provincial tax revenues. The party I support will join the government in a common attack upon problems which are too vital for rhetoric, and I suggest, too human for a trading of statistical analyses.

In the statement of conclusions issued on February 9 at the end of the third working session of the constitutional conference, paragraph No. 7 is of interest. It is entitled "Regional Disparities." The first ministers, which seems to be the latest cliché for premiers and Prime Minister, recalling their conclusion on the subject of regional disparities at the working session in September, said that the constitution should include a recognization of the importance of equality of opportunity for all Canadians. It was, therefore, concluded that the reduction of regional disparities should be referred to both in a new preamble and in the body of the constitution.

(a) The preamble should state that one objective of confederation is the social, economic, and cultural development, and the general welfare and equality of opportunity for all citizens in whatever region they may live; (b) In the body of the constitution there should be a statement of obligation on all governments, federal and provincial

(i) to promote equality of opportunity and well-being for all individuals;

(ii) to ensure, as nearly as possible, that essential public services of reasonable quality will be available to individual citizens.

• (5:30 p.m.)

(iii) to promote economic development which will reduce disparities in the social and economic opportunities of individual Canadians in whatever region they may live.

This obligation would not be enforceable by the courts and would not have the effect of altering the distribution of legislative powers. If this statement, is to have flesh and blood transplanted and transfused on to what is merely a textual recognition of a fundamental problem in this country, we shall have to await policy decisions. We have a very limited understanding of this matter. You will forgive people in Atlantic Canada if on this issue, on this entrenchment which is really a declaration, we are "from Missouri". My fellow citizens have been examined, studied, measured, tabulated and analysed.

The fact of the matter is that despite the massive and debilitative exodus of our sons and daughters, still over one in ten of my fellow citizens is without a job as I make my speech today. These people do not now enjoy equality of opportunity and well-being. These Canadians do not have—even with the qualification of "as nearly as possible"—essential public services of reasonable quality available to them. The budget which will reduce disparities in their social and economic opportunities. It is no wonder that the statement is qualified by the proviso that this obligation is not enforceable by the courts. The case has already been proved many times over, and I suggest that the courts would have to find for the plaintiffs, the people of Atlantic Canada.

There are two other issues that I wish to discuss. I will just headnote them because of other constitutional considerations. Desks are being moved; tappings on the door will soon be heard. It seems to me that any consideration of Maritimes' problems would be incomplete if something were not said about Maritime union. All I will say is that the provincial Premiers have made a significant start in what has been a monumental task outlined by one of our great Canadians, Dr. John Deutsch, of Queen's. The government of Canada must make its decision clear at this time because a constitutional proviso is involved.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will need to enunciate policy in this area. The Prime Minister a few months ago made an important statement in Saint John about the opportunity for trade between the Maritime provinces and the New England states. This was an important speech. It must be translated from a speech and become action. I think there must be a quid pro quo here. The Prime Minister and the government must take the lead in discussions with the United States and determine whether the needs of the United States for resources or goods may be traded off—I use this term in its best sense—in order to provide an opening for the products of the Maritimes in the New England states. Actually, the word I have written in my text is "orchestrate": such ongoing negotiations with the United States cannot take place in isolation.

Somebody said to me the other day in Brandon, "I am a conservative free trader." I reminded him that there are conservative free traders covering all of Atlantic Canada. Part of the paradox we face in this country is that there are all these quids and pros and quos, so to speak. However, if the Prime Minister's speech is to be more than an excuse for an interesting visit to enable him to see some of the country and its people, I suggest that the government has the responsibility of trying to translate the Prime Minister's statements of optimism about the economic future of the part of Canada that I represent into government policy.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

I hope that if these two days of debate have done nothing else, they have reminded the government that the statistics made available today by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics have to do with a great many unemployed. I hope that they will remind the government of Canada that the first priority of hon. members has to do with 668,000 people each of whom is an individual who is being diminished and demeaned because of a calculated decision that will prevent many of them working this winter.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain how much time I have until the arrival of Black Rod. I have read most of the speeches made in the budget debate and have been present for some of them. One of the reasons for my taking part in this debate is that I have become aware, after listening to or reading the speeches, that we are really playing games with the people of Canada. Without exception we are all deeply concerned about the plight of 668,000 people. I do not think any member of this House would presume to feel a greater measure of concern than any other member. But it seems to me that when we talk about the people we are toying with their expectations; we are playing with their hopes; we are simplifying the problem; we are reducing the whole complex matter to a question involving single individuals and individual policies.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has been the recipient of most of the abuse, and when it has not been the Minister of Finance, it has been the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This has been more an exercise of opprobrium and simplification than one of analysing the basic problem—and, Mr. Speaker, the problem goes very deep. I think one of the truly disappointing areas of the daily question period is that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) continually asks the Prime Minister what program he is going to produce to solve the problem of 668,000 people. That is unrealistic. I suggest that it is irresponsible to stand up day after day to demand a simple solution, a simple formula, when no single program will deal with the problem the roots of which were buried 1.5 years ago and the solution of which lies several months ahead. Every member of the House knows that. It is time we stopped playing games with the unemployed and began looking at the situation in terms of its real context.

Mr. Peters: And what is that?

Mr. Faulkner: I cannot help being distressed by the position taken by the New Democratic Party in this debate. No stronger speech was made than that of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). No adjectives were stronger than the ones he used—"cruel", "heartless" and "callous." Where was that party months ago when the Prices and Incomes Commission was set up, when there was an attempt to develop voluntary restraints because it was recognized that there was a problem? Instead of exercising the leadership which is incumbent upon that party as a national party, it simply served as an apologist for the trade union movement.

I do not blame the trade union movement for some of the objections they took regarding the way they were handled by the Prices and Incomes Commission. When faced with that situation, what was the responsible course for a national political party? Was it to serve as the handmaiden, as the apologist of the trade union movement, or was it to act as a bridge between the legitimate misgivings which the trade union movement felt toward the Prices and Incomes Commission—a bridge which would have reconciled the differences that were developing—and at that point try to achieve some sort of compromise which would have made the work of the Prices and Incomes Commission more effective than it had been? This was the responsibility of that party which lacked the guts, the leadership and the intestinal fortitude to assume the role incumbent upon it as a national party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now let us hear your speech.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Faulkner: I am just coming to my speech. Unfortunately, I will not have enough time to complete it. I wish to read one of the more interesting paragraphs from the sixth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada. This paragraph puts the position and the responsibility of the government in a context which heretofore has been missing. I quote from page 156 as follows:

> It is frequently assumed that high standards of performance in our economy, as well as the major decisions on resource allocation, are almost entirely the responsibility of governments—sometimes even more narrowly conceived to be the responsibility of the federal government. Nothing could be further from the truth. Governments today occupy a larger and more influential role in the economy than in the past. But the fact is that we have a highly decentralized system of decision-making in Canada, in which the great bulk of decisions affecting the economy are actually made outside of government—in private markets of growing sophistication and complexity and, in many fundamental respects, outside the ultimate capacity of governments to control in any detailed way. In consequence, the attainment of our various goals and objectives will require improved decision-making in both the government and the private sectors.

It would be worth while for hon. members to review that paragraph and study its meaning. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) has probably read it. It puts in proper context the precise role and limits of responsibility of the federal government. It is that dimension which has been so patently missing from all contributions made by opposition members. What are the goals? The three goals we have all subscribed to, which are shared and outlined by the Economic Council of Canada, are full employment, economic growth and price stability. In its sixth annual review the Economic Council of Canada outlined the two basic areas in which the federal government has certain responsibilities, one on the demand side and one on the supply side. On the demand side they acknowledge that the principal tools available to the federal government are the traditional tools of fiscal and monetary policies. They analyse and outline the areas where the federal government can be effective on the demand side.

I recommend that hon. members read the various areas on the supply side where governmental policies are required. If hon. members read the list on the supply side and examine government policies in the past two years, they will have to confess, even if it is in the solitude of their own offices, that the record of the government in this area is particularly good. It is not only the record of the government but of Parliament. It has been recognized that in this limited area where we have a responsibility our record has been particularly good. That is cold, small comfort to 686,000 people.

Mr. Gilbert: You are right.

Mr. Faulkner: Despite the efforts of the federal government and decisions made by Parliament, the traditional methods which we have adopted have failed. During this debate, therefore, we should have explored some of the problems that any government traditionally has encountered in using the tools traditionally available to them. An interesting solution that is constantly recommended and is often alluded to by people in my constituency is that failing a solution to the problem of inflation we should develop a compulsory incomes policy and freeze wages. The traditionally bogey has always been the working men of this country. That is a misleading myth. However, the idea of an incomes policy of some form is a goal that should be pursued by this Parliament.

It would have been interesting to hear what opposition members have to say about this delicate area. It is in this area that the basic problem is found. My own view is that a compulsory incomes policy would not be workable in this country, for a variety of reasons. We should try to avoid developing the expectation among people in this country that the solution to our economic problems can be found in some form of compulsory incomes policy. The bureaucratic mess, the injustices it would create by a sudden freezing of a situation and the inevitable black market activities which would develop rule out a compulsory incomes policy as workable and viable.

Another approach that is sometimes suggested on the basis of European experience is some form of national collective bargaining. It is interesting to study the experience of the Netherlands and Sweden as well as Italy, France and other countries which have some form of national collective bargaining. It is particularly interesting to study the Netherlands example. They had what was considered to be a model formula until 1963 when the frustrations from the trade union movement at the plant level developed distrust between the workers and other union leaders. A wage explosion resulted.

This type of national collective bargaining with compulsory limits within which industrial bargaining takes place is not workable. It is not a viable solution. It would be interesting to hear from members of the New Democratic Party who, with all their shortcomings and weaknesses, have an understanding of the trade union movement and an appreciation of the mentality and thinking of trade union leaders as well as the rank and file. It would be interesting to hear them explore what possibilities may exist in our country for some form of national collective bargaining. Is it a solution we should be studying in terms of the broad economic problems that confront us today?

A position can be developed which falls short of national collective bargaining but which may have some merit in terms of involving those sectors of the economy which heretofore have not been actively and continually involved in the whole process of economic decision-making at the national level. In lieu of a formula for a compulsory incomes policy and effective form of national collective bargaining, we might explore ways of strengthening and broadening national consultation between recognized leaders of the key trade unions, leaders of key industrial sectors and the government. If this sort of consultation was established, instead of working through institutions such as the CMA and the CLC—although they do have some strength they do not have the muscle that is required—we could consult various industries, packing-house workers, steel workers, mine, mill and smelter workers, electrical and others. By working in a continuing framework with government at the national level we could identify what now appears to be missing: we could mutually identify our national interest. Economic decisions could be arrived at, not the compulsory or obligatory kind but an approach within which local and industrial decisions could be made.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (6:00 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act respecting statistics of Canada

An act to implement an agreement amending the trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand

An act to repeal the Leprosy Act

An act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson, that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, the remarks I was making at a quarter to six were terminated by the arrival of Black Rod. If I may have the indulgence of the House, I should like to simply wind up the remarks I was making at that time. The initial point I made was that in the budget debate we were playing games with the people of Canada and that most of the speeches referred boldly and courageously to measures that amount to palliatives for the immediate problems. It would seem that we have been developing false expectations in the minds of the people that the problems we face can be solved simply and that all that is required is another government program.

Earlier I warned that it seemed to me we were confusing short-term palliatives, albeit in some cases necessary and possibly advisable, with the major problem to which we should be addressing ourselves. I refer to the problem of trying to achieve the three goals set out by the Economic Council of Canada which were concurred in by the members of this House, namely, full employment, economic growth and price stability. No one has yet addressed himself to that particular problem. I warned, furthermore, that it was a mistake, at least to my mind, to build a gulf between the public expectation and the possibility of performance of this Parliament or this government. The opposition has often called into question the policies and attitudes of this government in terms of the general credibility of Parliament in the public's mind, but nothing will discredit this institution more quickly or thoroughly than a public attitude of expectation which, developed by the opposition in this House, cannot possibly be fulfilled by any government whether Liberal, Conservative or New Democratic.

The fact is that there has been an absence of fact and of candour in the speeches so far. It would seem to me to be true that the government's policy on both the demand and the supply side has followed a fairly orthodox line consistent with the best advice available. The other fact is that there are over 600,000 people unemployed. This is not simply a problem for the government of Canada but is as much a problem for the Parliament of Canada, because it demonstrates that conventional wisdom—I must say that as I have listened to the speeches of the opposition, most of the solutions offered fall within the context of conventional wisdom—is no longer satisfactory to meet the problems this country faces.

I suggest it is therefore important to turn our attention, as we move through a period of stability and growth in the next year and in accepting the invitation of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather)—and I have a great deal of confidence that the predictions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will be borne out—to the fact that some of these problems should be approached in a broad, non-partisan fashion through the aegis of the standing committees which could examine, for instance, the report of the Prices and Incomes Commission when its findings after its year of study have been completed, to determine what sort of powers, if any, the government of Canada will be forced to adopt in order to accomplish the three goals in which all of us believe. That dimension, in my opinion, has been missing in this debate.

The second point I wish to make by way of conclusion, having explored before six o'clock what I consider to be the inadequacies of either a compulsory incomes program or a system of national collective bargaining, is that one thing we can do is broaden and strengthen consultation between the government and the private sector. As I quoted from the sixth report of the Economic Council, the role of the federal government in dealing with the particular problem we confront is limited. The most honest assessment of the federal government's role will accept the fact that our responsibilities are limited. There is a role for the private sector, for provincial governments and even for municipal governments. There is a role in the allegedly free enterprise economy for the private sector. They have their own responsibilities in this area. But it seems to me that at the national level we have not yet explored these matters fully and openly with the private sector, involving the total talents available there, the leadership of the trade union movement, the leadership among the industrial sector and national policies directed toward a national strategy. I argue that we might develop a national strategy if we can develop within the private sector, labour and management alike, the sort of confidence which will allow for the full cooperation and the full utilization of the talent and ideas that are available.

The challenge to the Canadian economy is a global one. I represent a riding which knows something about Japanese competition. When one examines how the Japanese have organized themselves, the collusion that exists between the industrial and the governmental sector, one notes a concerted, united attack on markets abroad. It seems to me, therefore, elementary that some form of common strategy will have to be developed in this country. We cannot expect the sort of discipline that exists in Japan to prevail here. The culture and the ethic of this country are different. People are not disposed to adopt the disciplined way of the Japanese. I do not intend to question the culture by which they work and live, but I state it as a fact. Here we have to develop a national strategy which is consistent with a generally free economy and a society which is made up of individualists.

Unless we develop such a strategy at the national level, with the government using the full resources of the private sector and calling upon them for their ideas and their participation, the sort of inroads made into our economy and the challenges we have faced will be even more serious than in the past. My intervention has been brief, Mr. Speaker, and I would now like to yield the floor to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is my third intervention in this debate, but I make no apology for speaking three times and at some length on the subject of the economic difficulties that the government has created for the country, because each time I have spoken the situation has become more pressing and more serious. As reflected in the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and hon. members on the other side of the House, in this debate and elsewhere, the government has its own rather peculiar interpretation of the state of the economy.

It is our responsibility as the opposition to try to bring this government back to some sense of reality. That is a difficult job with the government we have at present, but we have tried and we shall continue to try. We shall do so because this Parliament does not happen to be just a debating society where you score points and you win or lose on that basis. This Parliament, through its theoretical control of the cabinet, is supposed to be a place of decision and a place of power. This is a place where while awaiting their final appeal to the Canadian electorate hon. gentlemen opposite have to defend their actions or lack of same. That is what they should be doing during this debate on the budget. They have a heavy responsibility, which I must say they bear rather lightly—too lightly, some might say—for the serious economic and human condition that exists in Canada today.

The economic management of this country is not just a matter of manipulating figures. I believe there is a moral factor involved in the responsibility for economic management, and surely that moral factor demands that those who are responsible should feel a long-range obligation to do right by the people of Canada. Instead, we are governed today by short-range principles of expediency that seem to be aimed much more at making the government look right at the right time. The immediate past cycle of inflation and recession vividly illustrates a government that is following, not leading, and their method of operation is clear. Their approach to the problem of inflation is clearly defined in this way: play it safe until the cycle has passed its peak, take some initial action that looks good on paper but is woefully weak in fact, and once the crisis has peaked, slide with speed down the slope into recession and define that as the next problem to be courageously met by the government.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says that his government practises anti-cyclical economic management. I am convinced from the past series of budgets that this claim is specious. All we see are examples of the government either flooding the carburettor or pounding on the brakes as they ride the cycles, and as they make the ride they stop and start at most of the wrong places. There is a political benefit in the approach if you can make the cycles meet your election-timing plans, but that approach surely overlooks the economic and social perils involved in such a policy.

We are now being asked to give final approval of the budget presented to the House by the Minister of Finance last December 3, I say that to do so would be a betrayal of our economic principles and a betrayal of the people of Canada. The three opposition parties in the House differ on many things—but there is one thing on which we agree today, namely, that this government has failed miserably in its responsibilities to Canada, to the Canadian economy, to almost two million Canadians directly affected by the scourge of mass unemployment and to the Canadian people as a whole because we are all involved in this tragic situation.

Those who are unemployed are seeing their human dignity melting away with their savings. Those who are not fortunate enough to have the right to unemployment insurance benefits—and they are legion—have to go on welfare. Welfare may well be a human right in a civilized society, but for thousands and thousands of Canadians today it is, and it must be, a symbol of failure. I say to them, as I say to you, sir, in the vast majority of cases it is not their failure; it is the failure of this government that sits so smugly before us. These are the men that must bear the responsibility for the present situation. The Prime Minister and some members of his cabinet boasted of their willingness to put up with, as they have expressed it, a high level of unemployment in order to win the battle against inflation. Have they ever won that battle? The Prime Minister replied in the affirmative. Inflation is licked, he told the Canadian people a few weeks ago. But sitting on this side of the House I am probably a better authority on the outcome of the government's torture test. I say that inflation may have taken a licking, but it is still ticking.

Therefore I must inform the right hon. gentleman, if he does not know it already, that in this world wishing does not make it so. You do not solve problems merely by saying you have solved them. I know that to a government to which style and image are much more important than accomplishment, that might be a hard truth to accept; but it is the truth, and the self-admitted failure of the Prices and Incomes Commission to achieve any viable agreement is surely an indication of this. But if there is no indication that inflation is licked, at least the government has succeeded in another part of its endeavours: it has increased unemployment to an extent unparallelled for years.

I have already mentioned the effects of mass unemployment on the unemployed and their families—the loss of economic security, the loss of human dignity and the loss of faith in society. But the results of unemployment go far beyond the unemployed because mass unemployment affects everyone in the country and it affects, for the worse, the whole Canadian economy. It means lost opportunities for business. It means higher taxes for those who are employed and who must pay for the welfare for those who cannot get jobs. It means a general loss of production, expressed in the gap that exists between the potential of the economy and its actual performance. This has been estimated at $80 million a week under the lower unemployment figures of a month ago. We can only guess what this loss is today.

That is the reality of mass unemployment. That is the reality behind the statistics that the government presumably finds so comforting today. I remind the Minister of Finance that behind statistics usually stand human beings: there is the human factor involved. That is why it is possible for a six-foot man to drown in six inches of water. These are the statistics that the minister tells us result from the government's economic policies, and presumably from the budget which we are now debating.

Let us look for a minute at some of the statistics. They show that one out of every 12 men and women in this country is now looking for a job. They show that one out of seven of our young people under the age of 24 is now involuntarily out of work. They show that there are now 183,000 more Canadians unemployed and looking for work than there were a year ago. They show that almost one-third of those unemployed today have been without jobs for four months or longer. They show that there are 123,000 fewer people working in Canada today than a month ago. They show that there are 130,000 more people out of work and looking for work than there were a month ago.

We all know that the Minister of Finance enjoys making predictions, although generally I think he prefers to keep them to himself. But in this case, unfortunately for him, he inadvertently made his prediction in public a week or so ago. At that time the minister gracefully conceded, without apparently too much concern, that there would be an increase of up to 100,000 in the number of jobless Canadians from December to January. In fact, he indicated that this was about the normal increase between December and January.

Mr. Benson: Seasonally adjusted.

Mr. Stanfield: Seasonally adjusted, the minister says. Seasonally adjusted! I say "nonsense" to the minister, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Benson: Read the statistics.

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps the television misled me. Perhaps I did not hear the minister at all. Perhaps it wasn't him at all saying that he expected that the actual number of unemployed would go up between December and January. I hope he is not going to deny that, because I heard him. And as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that has been the normal increase. That was the increase a year ago. It was little less than that the previous year. That is why the minister was prepared to predict a similar increase this year. Sometimes the minister likes to appear to be a betting man. I wonder if he bet on the number of unemployed Canadians this month. If he had bet on the increase between December and January, he would have been out just about 30 per cent, or to put it in other terms he would have been out by some 30,000 human beings.

Mr. Benson: Would you bet on the figures that you use, and that the 6.6 per cent figure will not go down?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, for his own sake I hope the minister would not bet money. If the minister wants to make an issue on what I have said, I will be very happy to repeat what I have said and stand by it. I said I have not seen any realistic predictions relating to the economy this year which indicate that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment will drop—and I will stand by that.

Mr. Benson: May I ask the hon. member a question? I wonder if he would send me a copy of his speeches in the future, because I have been cut off his mailing list and so I really do not know what he says. I do not know why I have been cut off his mailing list.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to get a glimmer of understanding why the minister is following such foolish policies. He has not been getting the benefit of my suggestions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: Perhaps I could ask another—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: Could I ask a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister may ask questions only when the hon. member who has the floor, in this case the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), allows him to ask questions.

Mr. Stanfield: I would be delighted to have questions.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Leader of the Opposition why he has cut me off his mailing list. Perhaps he does not want me to know what he says.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the minister did not let me know sooner that he was not getting my speeches. I would have been happy to send them to him and in that way I might have saved the country an awful lot of trouble.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: As I was saying, for his own sake I hope the minister did not bet any money. But whether or not he gambled with money, he has been gambling with human beings and with the economy for far too long. We do not want or need a gambler to run the economy of this country. The Canadian people need someone who knows what he is doing; and without giving any personal offence, we do not have anybody like that today. The Canadian people need someone at the helm who not only knows but is concerned about the results of his policies, their effect on their lives and on the economy. We certainly do not have anybody who fits that description today. Instead we have men who talk coolly about seasonally adjusted figures, and about the economy having turned the corner. Last March the government told us we were beginning to turn the corner.

Mr. Benson: On inflation.

Mr. Stanfield: In December the Minister of Finance told us we were turning the corner. Today we have the highest unemployment figures of the decade. They are the highest both in actual figures and in the seasonally adjusted rate that the government is so fond of talking about. If this is the government's idea of turning a corner, I would hate to see how long it would take to get around a long curve. In fact, there is no indication that in any meaningful sense we have turned any corner at all in terms of reducing unemployment. This is the fourth year in a row that the seasonally adjusted figures have gone down between December and January. In other words, that is a normal development for this period of the year. The difference this year is that they are declining from the highest seasonally adjusted rate of the decade. And that is not the only difference: take a look at the real figures this year and compare them with those of a year ago.

A year ago the real increase in unemployment between December and January was about 102,000 Canadians. I presume that the Minister of Finance was looking at that figure when he made his prediction that there would be an increase of 100,000 between last December and January of this year. Instead, at the very moment when he is being so smoothly reassuring about the future he, as well as the Canadian people, have been whacked hard where it hurts with the knowledge that actually we now have not only 100,000 but 130,000 additional Canadians out of work.

What kind of improvement is this that the government is trying to peddle to the Canadian people? Perhaps in the bureaucratic mind that prevails in this government, the soft sound of seasonal statistics can replace the harsh facts. Perhaps it thinks that by seasonally adjusting the temperature it could even make winter disappear. Well, I for one would not bet on that—and I would not bet, either, that any so-called seasonal decline will convince the Canadian people that there his been any improvement at all. Anybody who looks at the figures of unemployment must realize that there has been a substantial deterioration between December and January. This government in its blindness to reality may be satisfied with the results, but a united opposition on this question is not satisfied with this pitiful culmination of one year of promises. I can assure the government that the Canadian people are not satisfied either.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Would he not admit that the percentage of increase in unemployment in the month of January over December is the lowest since 1959? I am talking about the percentage of the labour force that is unemployed.

Mr. Stanfield: Well, if that should happen to be true—

Mr. Benson: It is.

Mr. Stanfield: If that happens to be true, it is only because the figure relating to unemployment in December was so high.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: I was talking about the percentage of the labour force.

Mr. Stanfield: The government cannot deny that the increase of 130,000 in the number of unemployed between December and January is unusually high.

Mr. Benson: The increase, as a percentage of the labour force, is the lowest since 1959.

Mr. Stanfield: The figure is at least 30,000 higher than the minister predicted, and he predicted the normal increase between December and January. Speaking of figures, I was interested to note that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) earlier this afternoon was wondering about the accuracy of our statistics on unemployment. He did not doubt that more than 600,000 were unemployed. Actually, I think he suggested that perhaps between 700,000 and 800,000 were unemployed in Canada today. I am glad to note that he insisted on the importance of obtaining more accurate figures than we now have.

When a minister suggests that there could well be 150,000 more people unemployed than the statistics tell us, and when that minister himself has been and remains very close to the problems of labour in this country, I suggest that it is more than time for the government of which he is a member to face up to the gravity of the situation and stop playing the very questionable numbers game that the Minister of Finance seems to enjoy so much. I differ with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion when he tells us that the suggestion for a reduction of taxes is a right-wing suggestion.

Mr. Dinsdale: Nonsense!

Mr. Stanfield: That is exactly what I was going to say, nonsense.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: Unless the government decides to make all the decisions for Canadians it obviously has to leave some individual choice in the hands of our citizens. That is one of the things our economy is all about, freedom of choice on the part of individual consumers. It is by extending this freedom and by helping to create a little more confidence in our economy that we shall help our economy to get going again vigorously. That is our answer and we stick to it.

Let us keep a broad view of the total picture, and not the narrow view of selected compartments that the government keeps throwing at us. The provincial and municipal share of rising welfare costs is not financed out of a separate bank. In the cases of major cities that I have visited, welfare costs have doubled in the past year. There is no question that this fantastic increase is directly attributable to the unemployment that the Minister of Finance has been so adept at increasing. Provincial and municipal treasuries are stuck with half of those costs and they are in the process of financing their share through the use of their own taxation fields. The result is an additional tax burden which will further erode the purchasing power of the dollar for those on fixed incomes. These are the same people that the Prime Minister said he was out to protect when he began the war on inflation.

By zealously creating unemployment in the course of a fight against one kind of inflation, the government in effect has substituted another kind of inflationary pressure on the same victims. Let there be no mistake—indirect taxation for provincial financing of increased welfare costs will go up. I think that British Columbia has already had to take that step. Municipal taxation on realty will go up as cities struggle to cover their portion of rising welfare costs. Already the housing servicing cost component of the consumer price index is on the rise. No amount of crowing about admirable price performance can wipe away that fact. Those on fixed incomes in Canada will face these increases and will very seriously wonder just how the government's anti-inflation program has helped them. I suggest that as the squeeze hits other wage earners, they will demand an increase in their incomes to offset their increased taxation load and at least try to stay even in this treacherous game.

What is the response of the federal government to this potential for renewed inflationary pressures and this appalling victimization by taxation of those on fixed income? The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance say that they are going to stick at it, as is! There will be no temporary extension of unemployment insurance benefits to move large numbers of employable unemployed off the welfare rolls. Even though the surplus in the unemployment insurance fund is on the increase, there will be no extension. Even though the Prime Minister casually tells us that unemployment insurance is there to enable the jobless to ride it out during a period such as this, there will be no extension and no change. Why? I can only pressume that there will be no change because any extension at this time would disturb the finely-honed timing that this government has set for itself, the timing that will see the goodies passed out when it will do the government the most good. In the meantime, the cities and provinces can take a little flack and, what the heck, there's never much sympathy anyway for people on welfare!

I remind hon. members of this recent statement by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development: Long-term unemployment signifies lost productivity and life wasted—both national and individual misfortune. At present, according to the Department of Manpower figures released this morning 31 per cent of unemployed Canadians—in other words, approximately 200,000 men and women—have been unemployed for four months or longer. That, I suggest, is a scandalous situation. The longer the duration of unemployment, the more likely is the unemployed person to exhaust his unemployment benefits, if indeed he had any to begin with. Yet this government has obstinately refused to widen immediate benefits, and this in spite of the fact that in December, 1970, the surplus in the unemployment insurance fund was almost $475 million. That, I think, shows something of the concern of this government.

Of course, one must admit that there is something in the rhetoric of the government when it speaks of the just society and participatory democracy. Certainly no other concept has come so close to distributing unemployment impartially among all classes of our society. Blue-collar workers, white-collar workers, professional men and women, the skilled and the unskilled alike are experiencing the results of this government's mismanagement. There is no way of ascertaining the number of persons forced into the poverty category as a result of long-term unemployment. The OECD has found that turnover among long-term unemployed is extremely low and that few families in the low-income bracket have accumulated the resources necessary to withstand prolonged jobless periods. It is surely obvious, even to this government, that many thousands of Canadians have been impoverished as a direct result of policies that right now mean that 200,000 men and women have been out of work for four months or longer.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: And what about the young people? One out of seven is unemployed right now. That is the result of present and past policies. Where is the hope for the young people who will be pouring onto the labour market this spring? Certainly it is not in the policies of this government, Mr. Speaker. Even while it refuses to behave as if it believes the situation is serious, this government is trying its utmost to apportion blame to people other than itself. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) stated, as reported at page 2544 of Hansard:

• (8:40 p.m.)

During 1970 as a whole, unemployment in Canada averaged 5.9 per cent compared to 4.7 per cent in 1969. An important factor which contributed to this increase was the continued rise in the number of Canadians put out of work because of industrial disputes.

This excerpt from the minister's speech during the budget debate is another example of the government's hypocrisy in laying the blame for the results of its own policies on the backs of others.

Mr. Benson: It is not true.

Mr. Stanfield: It is not warranted by the facts.

Mr. Benson: It is not true.

Mr. Stanfield: The preliminary figures for 1970 indicate that the number of man-days lost through industrial disputes was less than in 1969. In 1969, more than eight million man-days were lost. In 1970, the figure was slightly less; there was a drop of more than 3 per cent.

Mr. Benson: It is not true.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister keeps saying: "It is not true".

Mr. Benson: What is the source?

Mr. Baldwin: Give the seasonally adjusted figures.

Mr. Stanfield: When we compare this figure with the number of man-days lost through unemployment, which amounts to 124 million, we can see even more clearly the real extent to which strikes and other disputes were involved in the rise in mass unemployment. No one minimizes the serious nature of labour disputes to those involved and to the economy generally. However, for the minister to play his "blame game" with this factor, and to magnify it beyond what the facts will support, is surely another reason to wonder about the honesty of this government in its statements of economic policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In other words, the minister's whole argument concerning the effect of strikes on mass unemployment belongs in the limbo of lame excuses made by a government that is bankrupt of policies and ideas, a government that has nothing to offer but blame for others and self-satisfaction as it continues to gamble that the economic cycle will not betray it. The Canadian people are fed up with a government that gambles with the health of the economy and the dignity of the individual.

The response of this government has been cool; I will certainly admit that. According to the Globe and Mail of February 10, the Minister of Finance suggested to the provinces that they could borrow if they wanted to do anything more about unemployment. That is cool: in fact, it is cold comfort indeed. The government has had warnings. It has had suggestions from many sources. Four our part, we have pleaded for the aboliton of the three per cent surtax, corporate and personal, which is supposed to be dispensed with in any event. We have asked for a further reduction in personal income tax. We have demanded a reduction in the 11 per cent sales tax on construction materials. We have done this because we believe such tax cuts would stimulate the economy. That is what is needed today.

We have asked the government to present a realistic tax reform package and thus reduce uncertainty in the economy. We have demanded that someone, anyone in the government be appointed to take charge of the fight against recession and mass unemployment. As an immediate measure for this winter we have suggested that unemployment insurance benefits be widened to cover many Canadians who are not presently covered or whose benefits may have run out. These are some of our suggestions. Other parties and groups have made other suggestions. I must admit that the government has been consistent: let us give them credit for that. They have turned a deaf ear to all our pleas and to the pleas of all sections of the Canadian people. In the face of a situation that has deteriorated from month to month, week to week and day to day, that has been their response. It is a response that the Canadian people can no longer accept because it is not a response at all. It is part of the political waiting game that this government is coldly and inexcusably pursuing for what it sees as its own political advantage.

I accuse this government of playing statistical games with the Canadian people. I accuse this government of playing political games with the state of the Canadian economy. I accuse this government of inhumanity in its approach to the grim reality of mass unemployment in this country. To come right down to the topic at issue, I accuse this government of presenting to this House a budget that is dangerously irrelevant to the problems that face us today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I accuse this government of economic incompetence, human neglect and social irrelevance. I ask this House, on behalf of the people of Canada, to disassociate itself from this government and to defeat this budget. Maybe then, at long last, we will be able to do something about getting the economy moving again vigorously and putting the employment situation on the road to recovery. If it will do any good, I will send the minister copies of my speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Give him a couple of buckets of heavy water.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as we approach the end of this debate we should recall that in introducing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Because I am vitally interested in all citizens of Nova Scotia, I wonder if the member from Vancouver would repeat the crack he made about heavy water, which is now the responsibility of the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Gray: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, as we approach the end of this budget debate we should recall that in introducing his budget to the House on December 3 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) outlined the latest of a series of far-reaching fiscal and monetary measures adopted by federal authorities since early last year to promote faster growth of production, employment and real incomes in Canada. I do not think it is necessary to again outline the substantial number of additional steps set out in that budget to provide still further assistance to individuals, regions and industries adversely affected by slow growth and, in the process, to provide a further major stimulus to expansion of the economy as a whole. However, I would like to recall and underline the conviction expressed in the budget that the economy was being set on a course aimed at bringing it back in the months ahead to the path of full employment of the nation's human and material resources.

In his December budget speech the Minister of Finance indicated to the House that there was already evidence the economy was moving toward a desirable stage of non-inflationary, long-term growth. The minister's contention has, of course, been greeted with what appears to be derision by members of the opposition parties who apparently never seem to allow themselves to be confounded by facts when they see political advantage, even though they may deny they are seeking it, in ignoring those facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: But since the budget was introduced more than two months ago further evidence has accumulated to show that the economy is now beginning to move forward at an accelerating pace. In making a judgment on this it is useful to compare our situation with that of the United States. While Canada is affected by developments south of the border, it has also become increasingly noticeable that the performance of the Canadian economy over the past several months has been considerably more satisfactory than that of the United States. During 1969, real output in Canada rose by 5 per cent compared with only 2.8 per cent in the United States. In 1970, real output in the United States actually declined by .4 per cent. Although final figures are not available yet, all indications are that the increase in real Canadian gross national product will be around 3 per cent.

Perhaps even more important is the fact that Canada has been able to maintain this relatively stronger pace of growth while at the same time making considerably more progress than the United States or any other industrialized nation in bringing inflationary pressures under control. This is something the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) appears to be concerned about. In December, the last month for which figures are available, the Canadian consumer price index declined by .4 per cent and was only 1.5 per cent above the level of a year ago. The United States' index was up 5.6 per cent in December as compared with the 1969 level. In November, 1970, the industrial productuon index in Canada rose by 1.3 per cent as compared with the level in October. This is the largest increase in any month since February. I think it is of great importance also that Canadian exports rose to a record level during 1970 with a result that we built up a surplus in our merchandise trade of some $2.9 billion, more than double the previous peacetime peak in 1968.

By the turn of the year there were important signs that capital investment in Canada was beginning to pick up speed. New housing starts were running at a record annual rate of 271,000 in the last three months of 1970, double the number of starts in the second quarter of last year. In the year as a whole, construction was begun of more than 190,000 housing units. A significant increase in housing construction is also contemplated during the current year. As members will be aware, in the statement which was made in this House yesterday by my colleague, the minister responsible for housing, a record number of 220,000 starts was forecast for 1971. There was also a significant increase in contract awards for non-residential and engineering construction toward the end of 1970. All this indicates there may well be a marked increase in investment in this field also during the current year.

Let me point out that in his speech to the federal-provincial conference in Ottawa earlier this week the Minister of Finance drew attention to the important point that in addition to these signs of increased activity there has also been a marked improvement in the underlying conditions required to sustain steady economic growth. He said:

> Our progress in overcoming inflation, the steady reduction in interest rates and indications that economic expansion has been renewed have all interacted to produce a new sense of confidence in the future by investors, business and consumers.

The minister said in the House that with continued good price performance these figures implied an increase in real output which will be more than sufficient to offset the increase in the labour force and so reduce unemployment progressively during the year. This expression of confidence in the accelerating expansion of our economy and the decline in the percentage of unemployed has continued to be received with scepticism by the opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the hon. minister accept a question?

Mr. Gray: I would be happy to accept questions at the conclusion of my remarks. I think I shall have ample time left.

An hon. Member: Oh, go on. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) allowed many questions.

Mr. Benson: My hon. friend does not have unlimited time.

Mr. Gray: The accelerating trend of the economy has been received with scepticism by the opposition. Perhaps they have difficulty in seeing what is going on around them, although they may deny it, in their blind thrust toward partisan advantage. By way of example I might draw attention to a report which appeared in the Globe and Mail some ten days ago of a speech by the Leader of the Opposition. The lead paragraph of this report, datelined Ottawa, read:

> Unemployment will not fall below 6.6 per cent this year unless the Trudeau government takes additional steps beyond those outlined in the budget last December.

The hon. gentleman went on to say, in speaking to a men's club here in Ottawa:

> The most optimistic forecast of Canada's economic growth for 1971 on the basis of present budget arrangements indicates the highest expected growth rate will make no appreciable reduction in our present rate of unemployment.

It appears the Conservative leader did happen to say something along the lines suggested by the Minister of Finance even though he seems to have forgotten about it. And it appears the Conservative leader does not stand alone in the view he expressed in Ottawa a few days ago. Only yesterday we saw the strange spectacle of Conservative, NDP and Créditiste parties joining together to condemn the government's economic policies and to forecast economic disaster. I use the word "spectacle" advisedly because it involved these three parties joining to condemn the government's economic policies in spite of the fact that each of them has advocated nostrums and panaceas for dealing with unemployment and inflation which are widely different and often sharply contradictory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: I suggest their gloomy and gloating message does not correspond with the trend of the improvement which is already noticeable in the state of our economy. The Leader of the Opposition may quarrel with the statistics, but these statistics issued by the Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Manpower are those he quotes when it serves his purpose; and this, surely, ought to demonstrate they are valid when they are quoted by the government to illustrate the accelerating trend of the economy and the improvement in the economic picture. Only this morning the Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Immigration—

Mr. Lundrigan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lundrigan: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The minister has quoted statistics. I wonder if I could ask him a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The minister has said that if he has time left he will answer questions at the end of his speech.

An hon. Member: He will make sure he has not.

Mr. Gray: I was about to say that the Bureau of Statistics—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? In spite of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. member resume his seat? The minister has the floor. He said earlier, in reply to the Leader of the Opposition, that if he had time he would answer questions at the end of his remarks. In these circumstances the Chair invites the minister to continue.

Mr. Lundrigan: I stand to be corrected, but I assumed it was the right of the minister to make the decision as to whether I could ask a question, since he now has the floor.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is the understanding of the Chair that the minister said he would answer questions at the conclusion of his speech.

Mr. Gray: These interruptions by the hon. member and his friends indicate that I may be saying things they do not want to hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: My point of order is twofold. First, the minister has not told me that he would not accept my question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: Perhaps hon. members would wait until I have finished raising my point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member has a point of order I would like him to state it immediately.

Mr. Lundrigan: During the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, the Minister of Finance was very touched by my hon. friend's statements. He interrupted eight or ten times and his questions were accepted. I should like to know whether we can ask certain questions—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is the understanding of the Chair that it is the prerogative of each member who has the floor to indicate whether or not he will accept questions during the course of his speech, or deal with them at the end of his speech as the case may be. I gather the minister said that at the conclusion of his speech he would accept questions if he had time.

Mr. Gray: I should like to say, if only to make sure that the hon. member does not feel he was ignored on his spurious point of order, that if he remains until the end of my remarks I shall be happy to answer questions from him. As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this afternoon, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Manpower and Immigration have disclosed that in January unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis fell to 6.2 per cent from 6.6 per cent in December. This is the sharpest drop in unemployment that has taken place in the last year, and is substantially below the 6.9 per cent recorded last September.

• (9:00 p.m.)

I invite hon. members to contrast this very encouraging improvement in the Canadian employment situation during the very first month of 1971 with the gloomy prediction made a few days ago by the leader of the Conservative party that there would be no appreciable improvement in the situation throughout the course of the whole year. Perhaps this is the kind of judgment that he must have applied when attempting to guide the affairs of the province of Nova Scotia, but I will not comment upon that. Contrast this—

Mr. Lundrigan: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, the minister, this acting, imitating or impressionable finance observer, is not entitled to present to the House—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With respect to the hon. member, I do not think he has a question of privilege. He may have a matter for debate, but the Chair has recognized the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray).

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Throw him out.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question of privilege I will hear it.

Mr. Lundrigan: I have a serious question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that in 1970, 1969 and back to 1954 there was a computational method used by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which allowed us to compare the seasonally adjusted figure for one month with months of previous years. In January, 1971—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate that that is not a question of privilege. It may be a point for argument, but the Chair has recognized the minister and he has the floor. If there is an opportunity in the debate—and I doubt that there will be—the hon. member might make his argument, but he cannot make it during the time allotted to the minister.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of National Revenue has the floor.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege.

Today is the last day of debate on the budget, and the Ralliement créditiste has not yet had the opportunity to express its point of view. Now, I should like to—

An hon. Member: You have not been here all day.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, we have been present in the House all day.

I notice that the Conservative member is trying unduly to hold up the business of the House precisely to prevent the Ralliement Créditiste from expressing their views on the budget.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With respect, I think neither the hon. member who has just spoken nor the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate really have questions of privilege or points of order. The minister has the floor and I think he is entitled to make his remarks. I would ask hon. members to permit him to make his remarks.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, in the interest of co-operating with the Créditistes I will deal with my argument—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat? The Minister of National Revenue has the floor.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the figures of unemployment and their accuracy I think the best proof of the correctness of the figures is that the hon. member's leader, the Leader of the Opposition, used and interpreted them for his own purposes. Any other hon. member is entitled to take the same figures and draw such conclusions as he thinks appropriate from them. In any event, I am informed with respect to the particular method of computation, and whether or not there has been an adjustment in the method used, that the fact of the matter is that the present method presents essentially the same results as the one to which the hon. member referred earlier.

Mr. Lundrigan: "Essentially the same" is not the same.

Mr. Gray: Basically the same result; exactly the same result. Let us contrast this encouraging progress that I have mentioned with the predictions of all three parties yesterday that government policies would do nothing to help reduce unemployment this winter and that the same policies have irreparable effects on economic growth. The joint DBS and Manpower Department statement has this to say:

> The underlying employment and unemployment situation improved in January, 1971.

That was the statement the Leader of the Opposition used for the basis of his remarks a few moments ago. The statement goes on:

> This seasonal reduction—

That is referring to the reduction in the number of unemployed.

> —was the smallest, in percentage terms, ever recorded for this period by the labour force survey. The increase in the number of persons unemployed represented the smallest percentage increase between these two months for many years.

I would also point out that the decline in unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis did not take place simply as a result of withdrawals of Canadians from the labour force. I am informed that the number of Canadians forming part of the labour force on a seasonally adjusted basis was at an all-time high in January. Again I should like to quote the release which the Leader of the Opposition seemed to find so useful to him.

> Consistent with the smaller-than-average—

Mr. Downey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey).

Mr. Downey: For the benefit of the House I think we should hear what the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has to say. Obviously—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With respect to the hon. member, that is not a point of order. The Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Gray: May I again quote from the release in question.

> Consistent with the smaller-than-average seasonal reduction in actual employment, employment on a seasonally adjusted basis advanced strongly from the previous month to 8,006,000, the first time it had exceeded the eight million mark.

It is correct that the statistics show an increase in the actual number of persons who were not working between December and January, but as the Leader of the Opposition in his own way agreed, I think, this is always the case at this time of year. In relative terms, the DBS report pointed out that the increase of 130,000 was the smallest since that of December, 1958, and January, 1959.

I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that nothing I have said should be taken as implying in any way that the government considers even the lower rate of unemployment in January as being satisfactory. I do not suggest that it is satisfactory and the government does not regard it as such. The government is concerned about the level of unemployment and what it means in human and economic terms to those affected. It has been taking action to meet what the Minister of Finance in his budget statement confirmed as the government's objective—the goal of a substantial and sustained economic expansion and therefore, I might add, the increase in employment which would come with such expansion.

The figures that I have cited, however, do provide further important evidence that the accelerating pace of economic growth resulting from the expansionary fiscal and monetary measures progressively adopted since early last spring, and added to by the December budget, have brought about a reduction in the level of unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis from last September onward. There may, of course, be variations from month to month, but the expectations are that this trend of declining unemployment will continue in the months ahead.

A few moments ago I referred to the strange spectacle of the three opposition parties joining in their condemnation of government economic policies, given the sharp conflicts in the policies that each party advocates. For example, does the Conservative party support the increase in government spending running into the billions of dollars advocated by the NDP? And if the Conservative party does support such a massive increase in spending, does it still press for tax reductions that would cost the federal treasury more than $1 billion?

Mr. Gilbert: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Gilbert: Broadview, Mr. Speaker. I notice that the minister is reading his speech. This is against the rules of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: I wonder whether he would refrain from doing so; otherwise he is violating the rules.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate that the practice of the House over a long period has been that hon. members would not read speeches. I do not think the minister is reading his speech; he is referring to his notes. In any event, I would not want to draw any distinction between hon. members on either side of the House. I think if there is any fault here it may lie equally.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I would confirm I was simply referring to my notes basically to the same extent as the Leader of the Opposition. I would like to ask if the NDP favours the 6 per cent reduction in personal income tax advocated by the Conservative leader and a similar reduction in the corporation taxes proposed by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). By the way, if the hon. member would like to look at my notes and see my scratches it would be obvious that this is my own speech. My notes would speak for themselves on this point.

Members of this House may wonder whether we should come to the conclusion that both the Conservative and NDP parties have now come around to supporting the Social Credit doctrine of the Créditistes as the solution of our economic problems, and I make no comment on the logic of that.

In the weeks and months ahead the three opposition parties may provide to the public of Canada some enlightenment in respect of the policies they jointly propose to resolve our economic problems. They readily condemn the policies of the government but have shown little ability to put forward their own solutions for the people to consider in place of the hodge podge of policies they advocate individually. Therefore, I am confident a majority in this House will be more than willing to support the policies of this government which have been more successful than those of any other nation in halting the dangerous spiral of prices and which have set the stage for the resumption of a stable expansion of production and employment in Canada.

To conclude, may I say that the concern about the present level of unemployment and the slack in the economy is something which I share and which I know the government shares with Canadians generally. I want to assure the House that the government is certainly aware of and is carrying out its responsibility to the people of this country in creating conditions in which there are increasing opportunities for employment and the development of the great potential which is ours as Canadians. I ask this House to vote to approve the motion before it and thereby to approve the budgetary policies of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. During the course of his remarks the minister indicated that if he had time he would answer questions. He has four minutes left. I recognize the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he can indicate the forecast in real economic growth for the year, and if he is not prepared to do that, as the Minister of Finance has not been prepared to do it, is he prepared to say that 5 per cent or 5½ per cent, which is the minimum rate of growth referred to by the Economic Council, is necessary to keep unemployment from increasing further?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member's question is one which leads to the type of answer he is seeking. He is seeking forecasts which he wants to be able to turn to his own use later on. However, I can say I am optimistic about this country. He does not appear to be, and he should be ashamed of that.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, if I were Minister of National Revenue I would be ashamed to give an answer like that. Can the minister indicate anywhere in the last decade when the number of unemployed in this country between January and February increased by as much as 130,000?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I could be mistaken and I stand to be corrected, but I think in my remarks I referred to December 1958, to January 1959.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I shall not waste the time of the House by reminding members that unemployment has increased by 183,000 in one year—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member seeks the privilege of asking a question, and I recognize him.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, if you would give me half a second to get my question out I think I could do justice to it. The minister just delivered the most supercilious speech I have ever heard. Having rejected in toto the proposition of the Leader of the Opposition and of our party so far as taxation reductions are concerned, and the reduction in the tax on building materials and the like, I wonder whether he is prepared to offer any consolation to the 668,000 unemployed Canadians who have absolutely no expectation of any improvement in livelihood as a result of the speech of the Minister of Finance today and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: I did not speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope the hon. member will ask his question. The minister's time will expire in one minute.

Mr. Lundrigan: He needs about 16 hours, but let him have one minute now.

Mr. Gray: I think the government, in the budget speech of my colleague the Minister of Finance outlined the measures which are having and which will have the effect of decreasing unemployment in this country. We are listening to the people in this House and across the country and are keeping the situation under constant review, but I think the point of the budget of the Minister of Finance is that what the government is doing is appropriate for this point in time and that this budget therefore deserves the support of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not hear unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I was really afraid I might not have time to express the Ralliement Créditiste point of view on the budget statement although we have been in the House all day.

Consideration of the budget always allows members to debate the general policy of the country or deal with some specific subject. Today, I should like to take advantage of the opportunity to discuss unemployment, about which much has been said and written and very little done.

In view of the fact that when the debate in the House is on unemployment—and we have had such a debate all day—there is verbal quibbling on the number of unemployed with statistics being wielded back and forth, I should like to speak particularly of the manner in which unemployment statistics are established as I question—and I have very good reasons to do so—the value of figures quoted in the various Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports.

I am familiar with the methods used to compile those statistics. Some 800 persons spend one week every month visiting from 30 to 40 households to gather unemployment statistics. They must visit about eight homes in one work day.

Each investigator is paid $1.92 per hour, plus 13 cents per mile he travels, or 16 cents per mile if he has business and pleasure insurance coverage. Each investigator must call on the same family every month over a six-month period; six new homes are visited every month, and six dropped that were formerly visited over six consecutive months.

It is getting to be a big joke that the same investigator should come for six consecutive months and ask the same household if they are still unemployed and how many hours they worked in the previous week.

Some people may be surprised that heads of households, tired of being bothered by the same investigator for the very same thing, will send their dogs after the statistician at the second or third visit. Then, the man will make up statistics in his car, with figures he estimates by himself, for fear of being bitten by the dog. I know that the third month, when he returns to the same household after finding out at previous interviews that the head of the household was getting annoyed at always being asked the same questions, the investigator feeling embarrassed always having to ask the same questions and since he would run the risk of getting a more or less rude answer as on previous visits, he merely fills his IBM forms with the previous answers or puts in imaginary answers in order not to bother again the investigated household.

Other investigators sometimes keep a copy of the answer given in the questionnaire at the first or second interview and knowing that the household will again be investigated the following month, they complete their forms in advance and make a courtesy call to them during the week, in order to prove their presence. Everything is then concluded and statistics are established.

With such methods, it is stated that the number of unemployed has been computed in Canada. With figures arrived at in such a poor scientific way from a sampling of 3,000 Canadian households per month they talk then in this House, with great compassion, on the most serious problem now—unemployment—leaving aside what is less important for the government, the unemployed in this country.

The 30,000 households "investigated" for six consecutive months constitute about ½ per cent of all Canadian households.

If, during these so-called inquiries, an average unemployment rate of 7 per cent was found for households visited for six months, the number of unemployed recorded is multiplied by the ratio represented by the 30,000 households investigated out of a total of 5,180,473-odd Canadian households in 1966.

I have before me the last issue of the Canada Year Book, that is 1969, which is available to every member of this House. One can see there the number of Canadian households visited. This is the latest figure. On which figure and which year does the Dominion Bureau of Statistics base the "guesstimated" number of unemployed in order to supply monthly statistics on the unemployment rate? How is it possible to believe that the figures published by DBS are correct while, on top of all that I already mentionned about the production of statistics, they instruct the 800 investigators who are on the road for a week a month to visit rural districts where there are fewer unemployed, because a farmer who works on his farm in the winter is not unemployed? And in the summer, they take a sample of the unemployed in the cities.

Mr. Speaker, let us establish statistics now with statistics. For instance, the 800 persons taking the monthly census each represent about 6,500 households, because there were 5,180,473 households in Canada in 1966.

How is it that the province of Newfoundland has 71 census takers while it has only about 96,632 households? Therefore, there are about five times too many investigators in Newfoundland since they should be 14 and not 71. Are those statistics serious? With such random statistics it is no wonder that the government is all the time probing and searching. The governments are very well represented by such bad statistics. Our statistics are a joke when we know the way they are made up. Only jokers can make such statistics.

Since Prince Edward Island comprises 25,360 households, it should have four investigators instead of nine, so there are five too many.

Nova Scotia, with 185,245 households, should be entitled to about 29 investigators. It has 54, 25 too many.

New Brunswick has 141,761 households and is entitled to 21 investigators. There are 43—22 too many or twice as many as it should have.

The province of Quebec with 1,389,115 households would qualify for 214 investigators, but since it has only 153 it is short 60.

Ontario has 1,876,545 households, should have 289 investigators, has only 201, therefore it is short 87 if ratios should be taken into account to get accurate figures.

Manitoba has 259,280 households and would be entitled to 40 investigators but has 47, that is 7 too many.

In Saskatchewan there are 260,822 households and it should be entitled to 40 investigators; there are 51 of them, so 11 too many.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Alberta includes 393,707 households, so it would be entitled to 60 investigators; however, it has 81 investigators—21 too many.

British Columbia had 543,075 households in 1966 and while it was entitled to 84 investigators, it had only 81. Therefore, it was short three. However, it is still in British Columbia that the best balance is achieved as concerns investigators.

And if I should pursue a little further my examination of statistics for the province of Quebec, especially those concerning unemployment in the city of Montreal, there, again, I will discover most interesting facts. For instance, in nine constituencies of the city of Montreal where unemployment is high, there are ten investigators. The constituencies of Hochelaga, Lachine, Bourassa, Laval, Saint-Denis and Saint-Jacques each have one; Maisonneuve-Rosemont and Saint-Henri have two each; and Papineau has none whatsoever. The unemployment rate shows a tendency to increase in nine constituencies and ten investigators are being assigned there to collect data.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

Now, here is a contradictory picture. In the constituency of Ahuntsic, we find five investigators, in Durvernay, four; in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, four also. Consequently, in those three constituencies, there are 13 investigators.

Now, in three constituencies where unemployment is declining 13 investigators can be found, and in nine constituencies where it shows an upward trend we find ten investigators. So, 13 investigators in three constituencies where unemployment is apparently going down will give a picture and compile comparatively misleading statistics, whereas ten investigators in nine constituencies where the opposite trend prevails will come up with statistics bound to give an erroneous picture of the unemployment situation.

The more we study statistics, especially when one is aware of the funny methods used to establish them, the more we see that speeches made on the unemployment rate prove irresponsible.

Why should the government refuse to take into account the figures provided by the manpower centres, even though they might be incomplete? Why is it that some public servants have been under orders to keep those figures confidential? The government is frightened because they do not want the public to know the real extent of the economic disaster that will result from their actions.

Let us give as few figures as possible and let us publish only those figures that are meaningless. Statistics are being "botched up" and we have seen, unfortunately, that the government is proposing "botched-up" solutions to the unemployment problem.

Since I first came to parliament I have known many a budget and I have always seen almost the same things: taxation budgets, bankruptcy budgets, unemployment budgets, budgets without foresight, "amateur" budgets, all soaking in speeches by so-called experts which always lead us to the same place—deeper and deeper down the economic drain.

An old French marshall once said that in all his life he had learned to distinguish three common factors, one of which was enough to lead a man or a businessman to bankruptcy. The first cause of bankruptcy, he said, often lies in an overconsumption of what is bottled in bond. The second cause is often an exaggerated love for women other than one's better half.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rondeau: —and the third one is government, which often lead us to bankruptcy. We should blame those so-called experts.

In 1971 even more than ever, he who talks does not pick the tab. Funnily enough, it seems that all members in this House, and especially those sitting on the government's side, are complete ignoramuses for the number of so-called experts around the ministers or in the cabinet increases everyday.

Mr. Speaker, financial experts are working for finance and the governments elected by it are at its service. Unfortunately governments make use of budgets such as the one before us tonight and such as the ones that will be presented in years to come, so as to better fleece the people in favour of finance.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) announced a deficit of $570 million in his supplementary budget for 1970-71 and another of $600 million in the 1971-72 budget. Those deficits represent new taxes for the Canadian people and at an early date, in spite of the promises on the part of experts who predicted a $250 million surplus, announced by the hon. Minister of Finance in March 1970. All statistics on unemployment are the result, as I explained earlier, of a heap of figures established in a non-scientifical way, that the government may change when they see fit by ordering inquiries in sectors or areas suitable for hiring, so as to better disguise unemployment.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, there being only a few moments left before the vote on the budget takes place I think I should state at the outset that usually I look upon it as a kind of pleasurable venture to speak in this House, but I cannot say that this evening. I do not see how anybody could have any joy in participating in a debate that primarily revolves around unemployment, in these days where there is a large amount of despair and disillusionment among thousands and thousands of Canadians; where misery, as a result of people being out of work, is almost unparalleled in our history; where, Mr. Speaker, in a land of plenty we have got thousands and thousands of families in need and in destitute or near destitute conditions; when in this land the good life abounds around us in all areas and all directions but does not quite reach into the bread line; where the affluence and wealth of this nation are beyond a person's dreams, agricultural, natural and human, and the only spin-off that comes from that type of wealth is the spin-off of welfare and unemployment insurance.

These results, from the type of structure and system we have, are lauded by the government as being prime attributes of its own policies and its own decisions. This afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson)—one of the only times I have heard him say this—told the House that he was concerned about the unemployed. After he had made many answers to many questions today and on other days, being flippant and arrogant about it, he finally exhibited some degree of concern. But I think that is the sort of concern of the comfortable. That is the type of concern that is irrelevant to the real situation in life. That is the sort of concern that is an insult to the people who are unemployed in this nation. It is the concern of a man who participated in a program deliberately designed to create unemployment. And that is the sort of concern that should be rejected because it is not, in fact, concern.

It is the concern of a man who enjoys playing the numbers racket, the concern of a gentleman who in the old English term would probably be called a nutcracker or schemer, someone intent on covering up his own incompetence and the bungling and failure of his government. Is it any wonder that the three opposition parties, who have divergent views on what should take place to get the economy into shape, should band together in the face of such bungling? Why should the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) ask such a question? That is the reason the opposition parties are combined together, because they think in terms of human needs and requirements, not in terms of statistics and the numbers game played by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Department of Labour, and tonight by the Minister of National Revenue who poured out statistic after statistic after statistic, which proved to me the truth of the old saying that figures don't lie but liars sometimes figure.

That is precisely what the Minister of National Revenue has been doing and the government has been doing it every day that new statistics develop. They have argued about the validity of it, about how many people it contains, what its implications are and what its implications are not. Surely that is irrelevant. There should be more concern about people themselves, about misery, about the degradation that takes place when people are forced to walk the streets looking for employment but cannot find it. Then we had the Minister of Finance say almost gleefully today, in the television room down the corridor, that if unemployment insurance is not available to people the government had done such wonders through the Canada Assistance Plan that people could go on welfare. That is, Mr. Speaker, a shameful insult to the people of this nation and to their social requirements. It is no answer if the government says: We want to see people end up on welfare. We can do little except put them on unemployment insurance and juggle with the figures and facts.

The people of our nation ought to realize what this government is really concerned about. It is concerned, not about the social good of the unemployed people of this nation, not about the present state of the economy and not about the degradation and destruction of social life and family life but about the situation as it will be in 1972. The government is gearing every one of its activities with its eyes firmly fixed at the middle point of that year. Why is that, Mr. Speaker? According to the cold, heartless calculation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), 1972, unless something unusual happens, will be the year of the next federal election. That is what the government has its eyes on. That is when the propaganda mechanism will be in full use. He thinks that perhaps the people will forget by 1972 what happened to them this time.

I think the government is in for a rude awakening. This sort of thing has gone on in previous years. Previous governments, most of them Liberal, tried to engineer matters so that they could successfully fight general elections. This government said that it deliberately set out to cure what it called inflation by creating unemployment and it is now saying that it will cure unemployment by creating inflation. People will not buy that sort of thing. The Liberal party has long been noted for its deceit, chicanery and doubletalk. Basically there is no difference between it now and what it was a number of years ago, except that there are some different faces at the top. It is led by the same sort of people. At present we have a combination of a heartless, detached technician called a Prime Minister and a former bookkeeper for a used car dealer. This great bookkeeper happens to be the Minister of Finance. With this combination, what can the working people of the nation expect?

Division

An hon. Member: A great deal.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): They can look forward to being fed into a computer, to emerge as statistics, or to being fleeced. Probably to both.

Mr. Perrault: Keep it non-political now.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Perrault). the whole government and the whole Liberal party are really proud of themselves tonight, Mr. Speaker. They set out to bring this nation to its knees, and to their everlasting shame they have succeeded.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): My leader applauds that remark.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 60(8) to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the question now before the House. The question is on the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Benson) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Lundrigan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether the vote just seconded was seasonally adjusted or actual.

DOMINION BUREAU OF STATISTICS

[Translation]

TABLING OF PRESS RELEASE ON METHOD OF CORRECTING SEASONAL ADJUSTMENTS IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, under paragraph (2) of Standing Order 41, I should like to table copies of a press release issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and explaining the minor change made in the method of adjusting seasonal variations and showing that this method brings no change in the result obtained regarding the seasonably adjusted unemployment rate of 6.2.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I take exception to what the minister has attempted to do in that it does not come within the four corners of Standing Order 41(2). I have raised this point previously, Mr. Speaker, and I raise it in all seriousness today because of what happened yesterday and of what is being attempted to be done today. Standing Order 41(1) reads as follows:

> Any return, report or other paper required to be laid before the House in accordance with any Act of Parliament...may be deposited with the Clerk of the House on any sitting day—

Standing Order 41(2) goes on to say:

> A Minister of the Crown, or a Parliamentary Secretary acting on behalf of a minister, may, in his place in the House, state that he proposes to lay upon the Table of the House, any report or other paper—

If one were to take the words "any paper" in their fullest and broadest sense, a minister could table anything, even a written memorandum which he had sent to somebody else. But I suggest to Your Honour and to the House that when this rule was changed a short time ago it was never thought that it would be prostituted in this way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Under the principle of ejusdem generis, these words should be interpreted in a particular way, and for a minister or a parliamentary secretary to attempt to bring in a self serving, exculpatory, or explanatory press release in this way constitutes, in my opinion and in the opinion of the members of this party, an infringement of the rights of minorities and an abuse of the rules.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I know that Your Honour is very much aware of this problem, and I would just say one more thing in support of the point I am making. Yesterday the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) attempted to seek unanimous consent of the House to make a motion, and in your response Your Honour said:

> I have expressed the thought on earlier occasions that if hon. members were entitled, when moving a motion under Standing Order 43, to make a general statement it would only be equitable—

I stress those words.

> —that someone on behalf of the other side should be allowed also to make a statement, and that certainly would be contrary to the spirit of Standing Order 43.

Your Honour does not want there to be a double standard in the House. I do not want a double standard, and hon. members of all parties in the House do not want a double standard. But if, after hon. members have attempted to move motions under Standing Order 43, someone on the government side is to be permitted to make a statement, I suggest even more strongly that when a minister of the Crown attempts to bring in a press release to explain something which happened on a previous day and to try to justify it and apologize for it, members on this side should be entitled to reply.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat difficult to deal with the point of order, and I assume it has been difficult for the house leader on the other side to deal with it because he has not had an opportunity to examine the paper that the minister tabled under Standing Order 41(2). But from the description given by the minister it seems pretty clear that it is a paper dealing with a matter coming within the administrative responsibility of the government.

It is an explanation of the issue that was raised yesterday affecting the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which is under the administrative responsibility of the government.

An hon. Member: So are many other things.

Mr. MacEachen: Of course, if the statement went beyond an explanation of the statistical methods employed it might not fall within this Standing Order. But I do make the point that it is possible for a minister to lay on the table a report or paper dealing with the administrative responsibilities of the government, and thereupon the same shall be deemed for all purposes to have been laid before the House.

When this standing order was agreed to it was understood that there were matters of interest to the House that could be laid on the table—

Mr. Baldwin: But never press releases—never.

Mr. MacEachen: —that should not be communicated to the House in the form of an oral statement which would lead to further oral statements. I agree that we are in this position somewhat because yesterday the hon. member and his party abused the rules. I think it worth pointing out that when one rule is abused, as it was abused yesterday, without any opportunity for spokesmen on this side to reply to long argument made by the other side, this tends to lead to other abuses.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker ruled yesterday.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker ruled yesterday that if an argument were to be made under the particular Standing Order used by the opposition, it would be equitable to allow the other side to argue. That was his ruling and we did not argue the point. But if the same practice is to be followed in the future, if hon. members should use the Standing Order to make an argument, then we shall have to claim our rights on this side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The minister, not having been given an opportunity at any point yesterday to answer the arguments made by the opposition, today used another Standing Order to lay on the table an explanation of the statistical procedures that were employed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I claim that under this Standing Order he has the right to do that, but I think his action has to be understood in light of the situation that developed yesterday, which I thought was quite unsatisfactory from a procedural point of view.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the President of the Privy Council simply to assert that what the minister has done is only to exercise a right under Standing Order 41 (2) does not necessarily make it a fact. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, and in my view you should so rule, that what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did was to use Standing Order 41(2) to get the floor, and once he had the floor he made what amounted to a statement on motions.

Mr. Baldwin: Quite right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): To say that he was tabling a document, without adding anything more, would have been all right. But he described that document in a manner which constituted, in effect, entering into the debate which Your Honour would not permit yesterday—and I do not quarrel with that ruling. The President of the Privy Council has just said that the government had no chance to reply yesterday and therefore it was replying now. That is precisely what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did. The words he used were the government's answer to the whole question of the change in the methodology, to use Your Honour's word of yesterday. I submit that because the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has today made what is a statement on motions, Your Honour should follow the rule that permits spokesmen for the opposition parties to comment on such statements.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I assumed that I could make a statement in response to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member assumed a bit too much. I would think that very valid points have been made in this argument by the President of the Privy Council and the hon. member for Peace River. We are faced with a very difficult situation.

Hon. members will recall that when an attempt was made yesterday by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate to present a motion to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43, I rose and on a point of order suggested to the hon. member that his statement was going somewhat far beyond what was allowed under Standing Order 43, that he was in effect making a statement, and that if we allowed such statements to be made in support of motions under Standing Order 43 the government, or someone on behalf of the other side of the House if such a motion were made by a government member, should be allowed to make a statement in reply thereto. This is why I invited the hon. member to put the motion as quickly as possible. The President of the Privy Council has stated that to reply to the statement made yesterday by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce thought what he should do is table a document in the form of a press release by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. Pepin: By the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. Speaker: I have serious doubts whether this is a correct practice. I would think that the correct practice might have been for the hon. minister to make a statement on motions.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that the minister has made a statement. I am not certain that he has. I felt that the minister in tabling the document was coming very close to making a statement when he described the document that he was tabling. I cannot judge nor rule that it was really an argument or statement which the minister was making when he tabled the document. Perhaps he should not have described it, as he did. Having said that, I cannot find that the minister has made a statement. It is still open to him to make a statement on motions—one not relating to Standing Order 41(2)—at which time opposition members would have an opportunity to make statements.

My suggestion to hon. members again is that when we extend the rules we become involved in difficulties such as the one we now have. If a question during the question period is accompanied by a statement or prefaced with an allegation of fact, the question is really out of order. An individual member putting a question which includes a statement of fact or an allegation may be unhappy when the minister argues a case or makes a statement in reply to the allegations of the hon. member. Again, I would say that both the question and the answer are out of order.

It is when members try to use the rules to their advantage as members that the House and the whole system get into difficulty. I invite hon. members to try to respect the rules as much as possible, to try to follow them as closely as possible, and to discipline themselves to respect not only the letter but the spirit of the rules which have been proclaimed for the efficient operation of this institution.

This has been a somewhat unhappy incident, I would hope it would guide members and the Chair in future situations.

Mr. Lundrigan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I accept Your Honour's ruling with great respect, as I always do. However, may I say that even though we do not have the Dominion Bureau of Statistics as a backup to our research system we do have a competent research office, and on the basis of Your Honour's ruling I assume it will be acceptable for us to table in the House on Monday a statement prepared by our research office.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the hon. member would have to have the rules amended in the meantime. Perhaps that might be done over the weekend.

POLLUTION

SPRINGHILL MINE DUMP FIRE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to put a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing importance. The residents of the town of Springhill have been suffering from the effects of a mine dump fire since 1965. This fire is presently burning over an area of some 45 to 50 acres at a depth of from 40 to 60 feet. On a wet, humid or snowy day the fire pollutes the whole town of Springhill and the surrounding area.

A number of investigations have been carried out into the effect of this pollution and the means whereby this mine dump fire can be extinguished. An investigation has been under way by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources since early last year, which was supposed to have been completed by September of last year but has not been completed to date. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has informed me that the information contained in this report will not be made available to the public. Since this pollution could well affect the health and lives of the people of the town of Springhill, numbering some 7,500, I move that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Environmental Pollution.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order immediately in connection with this motion. I do so, I hope, in the spirit of the ruling you made a few moments ago and in an effort to co-operate.

I appreciate the importance of the matter the hon. member raises and the effect his recital has on our feelings, but it does illustrate the difficulty that arises if an hon. member is permitted to give what I consider to be a rather substantial description of a problem and then ask leave to make a motion and confront the government with a decision as to whether it should acquiesce or reject the request at this time. Surely it is putting the government in a very difficult position if its only response on an occasion of this kind is to say yes or no. It could be interpreted by the people affected as indifference to their problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is far from being the case, because the government is sympathetic toward those who may be affected by these circumstances. However, I believe that if it is possible for an hon. member to make an extensive explanation of the reasons for placing a motion before the House it ought also to be possible for the government to consider the situation and make an extensive explanation of the circumstances which make it possible or not possible to give leave for the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Otherwise the situation that is developing under this Standing Order will go from bad to worse and lead to a most unsatisfactory position, in fact, to the very difficulty to which the Chair drew attention a few moments ago.

Mr. Speaker: I hope we do not become involved in a repetition of what took place a few moments ago, but I will hear the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North.

Mr. Coates: I think there are one or two questions which should be clarified. The President of the Privy Council intimated that this was the first time the information contained in my statement had been provided to the government as a basis for reaching a definite decision. In the first place, I stated the facts of the situation in as concise a manner as I could. There was nothing partisan at all in what I said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: The second point is that I made a speech in the House a very short while ago in the course of which I mentioned this subject. The President of the Privy Council was in the chamber. He comes from the same province as I do. He knows the situation. He cannot get up and camouflage—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The argument made by the hon. member at this time is not entirely relevant to the point of order raised by the President of the Privy Council. The President of the Privy Council has in substance reiterated the point that the Chair made a moment ago.

I appreciate the difficulty in connection with Standing Order 43. Hon. members have been using Standing Order 43 more and more since the House adopted a change in our rules to eliminate difficulties that had resulted from an abuse of the use of Standing Order 26. The Committee on Procedure and Organization, in its wisdom, revised rule 26, and there are some hon. members who feel that perhaps it is now operating a little more efficiently and to the greater satisfaction of hon. members, though this opinion may not be held universally by hon. members.

What we are obviously doing now is using Standing Order 43 to replace Standing Order 26, and in my view Standing Order 43 was never intended as a substitute for Standing Order 26. In my view Standing Order 43 should be interpreted by the Chair as strictly as possible. When hon. members make a motion under Standing Order 43 I have invited them to limit their presentation to the House to the urgency of the matter and not to develop or present a substantive argument. I am satisfied that in most instances this prescription has been respected by hon. members. We have had a considerable number of motions under Standing Order 43 which have been limited, brief, to the point, and non-partisan as the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North suggested a moment ago. They have been motions that have been limited entirely to indicating the urgency of the matter raised in the motion.

In my view there is nothing substantially wrong with the motion moved by the hon. member. In the difficult situation that has been raised by the point of order made by the President of the Privy Council, only two things are possible. First, the House can change the Standing Order. The Standing Order is in the book and it is open to hon. members to use it, and this is what they have been doing. If the majority of the House is of the opinion that the Standing Order should be amended, then it is open to hon. members to change it, either by proposing a motion to the House or by having the matter considered by the Committee on Procedure and Organization, with that committee reporting back on the advisability of making a change in the rule which could then be considered and possibly adopted by the House. The only other alternative is to rely upon the Chair to use its discretion in deciding when, in the opinion of the Chair, the presentation of the motion has gone beyond the limits prescribed by Standing Order 43. This is what I have tried to do and what I shall continue to do. I might say again that in this particular instance I find nothing substantially or essentially wrong with the motion proposed by the hon. member.

As a parting word, may I add that the concurrence prescribed by Standing Order 43 is not the concurrence of the government but the concurrence of the House. Even if the whole government—the cabinet—were in favour of a motion proposed by any hon. member, it would be sufficient if one member of any party, even a member from the ranks of the hon. member who proposed the motion, to oppose the putting of the motion: it would then not be put. We should interpret this Standing Order in the way it should be interpreted, which is in the way it is written, namely, that it requires unanimous consent, that is, the consent of every member of the House. I do not think the government should want to take on its shoulders the responsibility of refusing a motion. If a motion is refused, it is not refused by the government but by the House, as expressed by the voice of but one single member who has the right to refuse his consent to the putting of the motion.

I again want to tell hon. members that I am fully aware of the difficulties which have arisen in respect of the interpretation of the use of Standing Order 43. Until such time as it is amended by the House I will do my best to satisfy hon. members on both sides, including the President of the Privy Council, and to ensure that it is not abused or used for presenting substantive arguments and that the presentations of hon. members are limited to an indication of the urgency of the matter.

Hon. members have heard the motion and I must inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent so the motion cannot be put.

WAYS AND MEANS

DESIGNATION OF ORDER OF THE DAY TO DEBATE WAYS AND MEANS MOTIONS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 60(2), I request the designation of an order for consideration on Tuesday next of the ways and means motions tabled by the Minister of Finance on December 3, 1970.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN ENGLISH AND FRENCH TEXTS OF STATEMENT OF CONCLUSIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of the Prime Minister because I think this question should be directed to him. However, I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister and perhaps we can get a satisfactory explanation. On Wednesday the Prime Minister tabled the text of the communiqué of the federal-provincial conference. There appears in the English and French texts what seems to me to be an irreconcilable difference in the use of language. I refer to page 10 of the French text and page 9 of the English text. Is the Acting Prime Minister able to explain to the House how the English phrase "expressed its sympathy" is equivalent to the French phrase "se déclare en accord"? What steps are going to be taken to reconcile this difference?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has said, this is a question which ought to be directed to the Prime Minister rather than the Acting Prime Minister since I was not present and presiding at the meetings of the constitutional conference. However, I will direct this question to the Prime Minister and I am sure he will be glad to provide an explanation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister also direct this question to the attention of the Prime Minister? What steps have been taken in direct or indirect contact with the premier of the province of Quebec who apparently relies fully on the French text as expressing what happened at that conference?

UNEMPLOYMENT—ESTIMATES OF SEASONALLY ADJUSTED FIGURE AND GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT FOR 1971

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance who, while he is not on the roster, may compensate for the six ministers whose names are on the roster for today but are not present.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question regarding the prediction by government economists that the seasonally adjusted figure for unemployment in 1971 will be in the neighbourhood of 5 per cent to 5½ per cent. Does this express the government's estimate of what the unemployment figure will be for this current year?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to ask my hon. friend a question in return as to the source of that information. I just do not have that information.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think this would be an order. Perhaps the hon. member might like to ask a supplementary question.

An hon. Member: We could change the rules.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the source of that information is a report in this morning's Globe and Mail by Mr. David Crane who received this information—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I will ask the minister a direct question. What is the government's estimate of the seasonally adjustment unemployment figure for this current year?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the author of the newspaper article obviously had access to the research department of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the government has not stated publicly the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment for any specific time during the year. It has stated that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment will go down from its high of last September of 6.9 per cent, and indeed it has now declined to 6.2 per cent, much to the chagrin of my hon. friend.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, if I can persuade the minister to stop being flippant and try to deal with the question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You have a job there.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the statement by Mr. Smith, the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, that it will require an increase in real output of 6¾ per cent to get unemployment down to 4 per cent in three years, a 7½ per cent increase to get unemployment down to 4 per cent in two years, and a 10 per cent increase in real output to get unemployment down to 4 per cent in one year, may I ask the minister what the government's estimate is of the increase in real output of the gross national product for 1971?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, when I get around to making my next budget speech in a month or two—April, probably—I will at that time, as usual, forecast what the GNP will be.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Another budget in April?

Mr. Benson: Maybe in March.

[Later:]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance arising out of an answer he gave just a moment or two ago in which he suggested that the government had not made any public statement as to the forecast of unemployment. I should like to ask him whether the government has made any estimate of likely unemployment, either actual, seasonally adjusted or both, for this year and, if so, would he please inform the House what that estimate is?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, periodically the government does estimate what is going to happen over a period of time, but it is not the practice in this House, nor has it ever been the practice, to make these assumptions public as they are just assumptions.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Inasmuch as the government and the minister are not averse to making forecasts in respect of housing starts, the gross national product and other types of economic activity, why will he not disclose his estimate of levels of unemployment? Is he embarrassed or ashamed of it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: No, it is done during the budget speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member and the minister that we are now entering the field of argument.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ROLE OF PROVINCES IN COPING WITH RECESSIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in the minister's invitation to the provinces to finance further unemployment assistance, was he introducing a federal constitutional proposal that the federal government should have the fiscal and monetary power to create recessions and the provinces the responsibility to find the resources to cope with them?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the premise of that question is wrong. I simply pointed out to the provinces that the bond market had improved greatly because of the actions taken by the government over the past year, that it was possible for them now to get money in Canada to proceed with public works, which was not a possibility a year ago, and that by borrowing in Canada they assist the whole Canadian economy because this does not put upward pressure on the Canadian dollar.

[Mr. Benson.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTERNATIONAL CONTROL COMMISSION—REPORT ON DEFENCE MEASURES TAKEN BY REPUBLIC OF VIET NAM

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could he tell us whether the Canadian government, as a member of the International Control Commission, has received a copy of a report on the measures taken by the Republic of Viet Nam, to ensure its own defence, and would he table this report in the House?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As I said in the House the other day, Mr. Speaker, we have asked for meetings of the International Control Commission. Informal meetings are now proceeding. Just what the content of these discussions will be we do not know yet.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I wonder if the minister could indicate as well whether there has been any communication from the two original co-chairmen of the Geneva conference on whether or not they have made any progress with regard to the reconvening of that conference in terms of bringing a period of peace and stability to southeast Asia?

Mr. Sharp: We have called for a meeting of the ICC. We expect it will be held. Just how far the Indian and Polish members will co-operate with us in investigating all of the breaches of the neutrality of Laos, I do not yet know.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—BUREAU OF STATISTICS SEASONALLY ADJUSTED FIGURE FORMULA—STATEMENT BY MANPOWER MINISTER

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the press statement tabled by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce today states that a new method is being incorporated by DBS for dealing with seasonally adjusted figures, would the Acting Prime Minister repudiate on behalf of the government the erroneous statement made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration yesterday that this was not the case?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As I understood the allegation of the opposition yesterday, it was that the government has directed the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to make changes. That is completely unfounded. The Dominion statistician, I am sure, would resign if there were any interference with the publication of these figures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Would the Acting Prime Minister get down to answering the question I asked, even though it may be embarrassing, and repudiate the erroneous statement made yesterday by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that there was no new method?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether by using the new method adopted on January 1 there would have been any difference in the results during the month of January, 1970, from the results under the old method and whether in fact it is legitimate to compare the results in January, 1971, with the results of the statistics since the year 1954 computed under the old formula?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): That is exactly what DBS says in the statement which I tabled this morning. I am in a funny position, Mr. Speaker. If I told DBS how to compute their statistics I would be accused of telling them how to establish statistics, which is the last thing I would do. For one reason among many, I would not know how to do it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That never stopped you before.

Mr. Lundrigan: While agreeing with the minister's last statement, may I ask further whether in fact the statistical formula which came into use on January 1, 1971, made any difference in the regional computations in view of the fact that in August when the old formula was used the figure for Atlantic Canada was 8.5 per cent while under the new formula the figure is 8 per cent. I ask that in view of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Pepin: I will ask DBS to establish that and I will also ask them to issue a communiqué which I will table on Monday.

TORONTO—ACTION TO RELIEVE CONGESTION OF FACILITIES

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I would like to ask the Minister of Transport what action he will be taking to relieve the intolerable congestion of facilities at the Toronto International Airport.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that you would permit me sufficient time to give in detail all of the steps that are being taken. Perhaps, however, you will permit me to indicate to the hon. member that arrangements were finalized yesterday for the building of a special temporary terminal at Toronto which will be used exclusively for charter flights beginning, I think, on June 16, and which should significantly relieve the pressure on the current terminal.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NOVA SCOTIA—CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES ON RESERVES TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister may recall my question of a few days ago when I brought to his attention the statement by Mr. Noel Doucette, the president of the Union of Nova Scotia Indians, that 90 per cent of Indians in Nova Scotia were unemployed. The minister stated that he would inquire to see whether there was a special problem in Nova Scotia in regard to new housing starts and said he would be glad to report to the House. I wonder if he is in a position to do so now.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report to the House that in 1970-71, we have spent $195,000 to build houses in that area and that this year we have decided to bring up that item to $246,500, which will ensure the construction of 29 new houses in the area mentioned by my hon. friend. As for the other reservations in Nova Scotia, the president of the Indian Association has asked us to delay our program, because the Indians would like to consider the situation before we proceed.

[English]

Mr. Muir: The translation came through that $185 million had been expended. I would be glad if that were so but I assume it was wrong. May I ask the minister whether he is aware that the latest so-called increase of $100,000 was for all of the Atlantic region and that Nova Scotia only received $47,000? Is he also aware that as many as two, three and even four families are living in one house, if I may be so bold as to call some of these shacks houses?

Mr. Chrétien: I just said that we will construct 29 new houses on the area to which the hon. member referred. As far as other areas in Nova Scotia are concerned, the Indian Association of Nova Scotia asked us to delay because they themselves are conducting a survey of the situation.

Mr. Muir: I wonder if the minister is aware of the fact that the president of the Indian Association has completed his survey and it has been sent to the department. He said the other day that he wants houses built for all the Indians. He does not want any delay. They have a high rate of illness and there are more Indians in hospital than whites because of lack of housing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

AMOUNT OF BORROWINGS BY GOVERNMENT IN 1971—ABILITY OF PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES TO BORROW IN CANADA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On Wednesday last, as recorded at page 3242 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Finance a question regarding his statement to the provincial premiers in conference that if they needed more money they should go out and borrow it. His reply was that the government will be borrowing $2 billion to pour into the economy this year. Is that $2 billion in addition to the $1.5 billion which the government will be required to borrow for refunding purposes to meet maturing obligations? Does this mean the government will be borrowing this year $3.5 billion?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Yes, it is $2 billion new money.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister whether he considers that it will be possible for the provincial and municipal governments to borrow in the Canadian market if the federal government is going to borrow $3.5 billion, or will the provinces and municipalities be required to go to the United States market despite the advice by the Minister of Finance that they should refrain from doing so?

Mr. Benson: I think that there will be ample funds in the Canadian market to take care of $2 billion in borrowings by the federal government plus the legitimate requirements of the provinces.

TRANSPORT

TORONTO—STUDY OF RAIL COMMUTER SERVICES

Mr. John Roberts (York-Simcoe): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the government decided to initiate studies into the provision of rail commuter services north of Toronto?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. On Wednesday I agreed with the chairman of Metropolitan Toronto that the Department of Transport would take the initiative in conjunction with my colleague who is responsible for housing and urban affairs with a view to determining what further rationalization may be possible in terms of the rail lines leading into Toronto to see whether these can be employed for commuter purposes.

Mr. Roberts: Can the minister give some indication of when he expects these studies to be completed?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker. The first phase is simply to devise a mechanism through which these studies can be undertaken. We will be discussing them with the railways, the province of Ontario and the various municipalities concerned, but a start will be made almost immediately.

[Later:]

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to a previous one and it is directed to the minister in charge of housing. Has he set forth any moneys in the CMHC budget to acquire or hold lands to help relieve the transportation problem that the Minister of Transport has referred to regarding Toronto?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there is no precise authority within the Act for that to be done. As my colleague, the Minister of Transport, has indicated, it is a matter to which we are beginning to address ourselves. There are other areas of Canada which have shown an interest in this matter and in the context of setting proper urban objectives we will not exclude it from consideration.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCTION OF PASSENGER SERVICE IN NORTHERN ONTARIO—SUGGESTED HOLDING OF PUBLIC HEARINGS BY TRANSPORT COMMITTEE

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport relating to rail services in Northern Ontario. Following the strong representations by all Northern Ontario M.P.'s requesting that the Transport Committee hold public hearings in northern Ontario in order to assess the implications of the CNR's decision to reduce its passenger service and in order to study the whole question of rail services, is the minister now prepared to say whether he will authorize the committee to hold such hearings?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to say what I can authorize the committee to do. Surely the committees of the House are pretty well autonomous in this regard. The Transport Committee will have a reference from the House of the estimates of the department and also of Canadian National within a very short time, and I assume any decision members of the committee make in this regard would be conveyed to me.

[Later:]

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the fact that when trains Nos. 7 and 8 were taken off no representations to the CTC were provided for in the format adopted, would the President of the Privy Council be prepared to permit the Transport Committee to make a tour of the areas affected so that the communities which are being sadly affected would have an opportunity to make their case to a public body?

[Later:]

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Transport and also has to do with the cancellation of trains Nos. 7 and 8. Would he tell us if he himself is making representations to Canadian National in an effort to persuade them to reverse that decision in light of the numerous representations being received by members of this House?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I can only reply that I hope hon. members opposite will get over their ambivalence. On the one hand they are asking me to keep my hands off the CNR when it appears desirable to do so, and on the other hand they are asking me to make representations to the railway. I have conveyed to CN on every occasion the representations made to me in this regard, and I feel that is as far as I can go.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that the supplementaries on the first question asked by the hon. member for York-Simcoe have only a distant relationship to the first question. I do not think these questions should be asked as supplementaries. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's West.

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—REFUSAL TO PAY EMPLOYEES UNABLE TO WORK BECAUSE OF SNOW STORM

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport relating to action taken by the CN at St. John's, Newfoundland, whereby they refused to pay 550 of their employees who were unable to go to work because of a severe snow storm. Would the minister have an investigation carried out with a view to correcting the situation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries and I will convey to the hon. member the views of the CN on that matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GEORGES BANK—ISSUE OF OIL DRILLING PERMITS BY CANADA PRIOR TO AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the results of seismic surveys in the Georges Bank area are being compiled, can the minister state if Canada will issue oil drilling permits for the Georges Bank area before an agreement is reached with the United States on the median line issue?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take that question as notice since it is a very technical one.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question at this time. Since Canada's position is well known, our interpretation of the international boundary being the median line, can the minister say what is the United States position?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy when answering the first question to give an answer to that also.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE RESPECTING TERRITORIAL LIMIT OFF SOUTH COAST OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, while we are on this subject may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he is in a position to report to the House what recent initiatives have been taken with the government of France to resolve our treaty problems with that country with respect to the territorial limit off the south coast of Newfoundland?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not think this is a supplementary. It might be asked as a related question, but at the moment I believe the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has a supplementary.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With great respect I think the question is supplementary, but even if the question is related I think the minister should be allowed to reply to it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is the hon. member's opinion but the Chair has reached a judgment decision, and that is the decision I have made. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

GEORGES BANK—CANADIAN RESPONSE TO UNITED STATES POSITION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what response the Canadian government gave to the United States position on Georges Bank, namely that the U.S. government does not acquiesce in or recognize the validity of permits or other authorizations issued by the government of Canada to explore or exploit the natural resources of any part of the Georges Bank continental shelf.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I have the impression that the question asked by the hon. member is related to the same extent as that which was asked by the hon. member for St. John's East. It might be a solution to the problem if the minister were allowed to reply to this question and the hon. member for St. John's East were allowed his as a supplementary to it. The question of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has been asked and perhaps the minister should reply.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to try to reply to both of these related questions. With respect to the last one asked by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, this would be the natural position for the United States to take, just as it would be for us if we disputed the claims of the United States. We would take the same position. I do not think it is unusual. I shall find out what reply we made to this particular contention and report at the same time as I reply to the other question.

As to our discussions with France they have been proceeding on and off. I am not quite sure whether they are now on or off, but they continue.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—LOSS OF EMPLOYMENT BY FISHERMEN—PLANS FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Inasmuch as upwards of 100 fishermen, and that is a conservative estimate, of Indian origin on the west coast have been pushed out of the fishing industry this year because of a variety of reasons, can the minister declare or announce what plans his department has to alleviate and help in that situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, evidently the problem is extremely complex. The up-dating of fishing fleets to conform with the new policies of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry on the west coast raises a very serious problem. However, we make financial assistance available to Indians so that they may compete in this market. As far as redundant manpower is concerned, general programs have been set up to find other jobs for them or to train them for other fields of employment.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I think it was a month ago today that the Minister of Fisheries said that a new financing program would be operated through the Indian Fishermen's Assistance Board. What I am asking is whether the minister can announce the details of that program so that the Indian people will know where they stand?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister and to the hon. member that this is the kind of statement that should not be made by way of an answer to a question. The minister might indicate if he would be prepared to give an answer by way of a statement on motions.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to tell the hon. member when we will be prepared to make a statement in this regard.

PUBLIC WORKS

DEVELOPMENT OF CHURCHILL TOWNSITE

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Have he or the officials of his department had an opportunity recently to confer with officials of the Manitoba government in relation to the future development of the townsite of Churchill and, if so, can the minister advise the House what progress is being made?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we have had a series of consultations with the government of Manitoba and with Premier Schreyer personally. It would be my hope and expectation that we could look forward to an agreement with the province of Manitoba at a fairly early date.

HOUSING

READJUSTMENT OF INTEREST RATES ON HOUSING MORTGAGES ALREADY IN EFFECT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

In his speech the other day, the minister stated that the rate of interest on housing loans had been lowered to 7¼ per cent. As most of the housing loans granted during the last few years bore interest at 9¼ per cent, does the minister intend to adjust the rate of interest on those loans accordingly or grant some kind of adjustment to the builders?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I did not say that the residential mortgage rate was 7¼ per cent. What I did say was that the CMHC programs, section 16, section 35, and other programs related to sewage treatment, land assembly, etc. have been reduced as of the day before yesterday from 7⅞ in one case and 8¼ in another to 7½ per cent. That is the federal government's direct lending program under those sections of the Act and it does not affect in anything but an indirect way the private market rate which is currently floating around 9¼ per cent to 9½ per cent.

MAXIMUM CMHC GUARANTEE ON HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing, Mr. Speaker. In view of the rapid deterioration of housing quality in many Canadian centres, can the minister tell the House if the government is thinking of increasing the maximum amounts guaranteed by CMHC with respect to home improvement loans in order to cover the rising cost of building materials and labour?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we made amendments to the National Housing Act in June, 1969, permitting loans for the purchase of existing housing and the rehabilitation of existing housing. In those cases provision was made for a maximum mortgage loan of $18,000. We are increasing the funding of our direct program through CMHC to encourage that kind of activity. I referred to that in my comments the other day and also in answer to a question from another hon. member.

REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATE ON DIRECT LOANS BY CMHC

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I should direct it to the Minister of Finance inasmuch as he is over here obtaining advise from my leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: May I direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing.

An hon. Member: The Minister of Finance has returned to his seat.

Mr. Gilbert: Is it the intention of the minister to reduce the interest rate on direct loans presently being made by CMHC?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we made a reduction within the last six or eight weeks. It was a slight reduction. As soon as it seems possible to do so, it will be my desire to lower it again. The rate currently stands at 9¼ per cent.

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE—NUMBER OF JOBS TO BE CREATED

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Two weeks ago the minister told me in his reply that he was not aware of the figures quoted by a Quebec organization on the number of jobs that will be created by the Ste. Scholastique complex. I would like to ask him whether he has checked those figures and if that project is still capable of providing 75,000 new jobs?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question reasonably fully on the last occasion by saying that both sets of figures, the ones that were presented by the officials in the first instance and the ones that have subsequently come to light from other agencies, were estimates. I have asked the officials to take another look at them to see whether they can be refined further. They are only estimates, and I think it is fair to say that one set could probably be defended every bit as well as the other.

AIR TRANSPORT

RECOMMENDATIONS AFFECTING TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT AND AIR CANADA FOLLOWING INQUIRY INTO DC-8 CRASH

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Since the board of inquiry which investigated the crash of the DC-8L jetliner in Toronto was critical of the Department of Transport and Air Canada, would the minister undertake to make a statement on motions assuring us that those recommendations which were announced by the inquiry are being considered and in fact incorporated?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member ought to have completed his comments by saying that there were references to several other agencies besides Air Canada and the Department of Transport. To the extent that the recommendations apply directly to DOT, we accept those without qualification. We are seeing what can be done now to implement those recommendations. On the broader question, the whole issue is being examined and I will report to the House when we have arrived at conclusions.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's statement the other day, in which he suggested that he had no doubt about the airworthiness of the DC-8L jetliner, are we to assume that the criticism in the report recommending a redesign of the engine to wing assembly and the recommendation with respect to improvements of the landing brake system are to be ignored?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the minister to reply to the question because of the delicacy of the matter. I think that normally such a question would be ruled as being argumentative. Perhaps the minister should be allowed to reply to the question.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you, Your Honour, for your consideration, because it is a matter that I would not want held in abeyance. My statement was very carefully worded, and I repeat it now. We are completely satisfied about the airworthiness of this particular aircraft, if the operating manual and instructions are followed. I think that is simply reflecting the views of Mr. Justice Gibson.

On the larger question, we conveyed the findings to all appropriate parties in the United States. As the hon. member and the House will appreciate, this question is one that has to be negotiated internationally, because it is not simply Canadian aircraft that are involved or Canadian aircraft which are flying over Canada. I want to emphasize that the airworthiness of the aircraft is not in question provided proper procedures are followed. It is my information that they are now being followed to the letter by all Canadian carriers.

HOUSING

WYNYARD, SASK.—STATUS OF PROJECT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of housing. In view of the housing capital budget announced by the minister this week and in view of the visit tomorrow by the minister to Wynyard in Regina East constituency, would the minister indicate if he will have any welcome news for the people of Wynyard on the ten-house project they have been trying to obtain for the past five years?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am very appreciative of the reminder. I will do everything I can to get the appropriate information on that particular project at this time.

SASKATCHEWAN—ACTION TO INCREASE STARTS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister responsible for housing. Since Saskatchewan received only 2 per cent of the total federal public works spending in 1970, and since the number of housing starts fell from 4,425 in 1969 to 993 in 1970, what special action has the minister taken to rectify this situation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member, but I missed the first part of his question.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might take note of the question and reply at some other time. There are only a few minutes left in the question period.

CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION

SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF RESPONSIBILITIES TO HOUSE COMMITTEE

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport inasmuch as this matter was dealt with a while ago. It is of great concern to western Canada and pertains to the Canadian National, and the problems of railways generally. May I ask the minister if he would give consideration to the possibility of dissolving the Canadian Transport Commission and giving the responsibilities of the commission to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of the House?

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a representation. He must assume that it will be considered.

GOVERNMENT OFFER TO FORMER LAPALME DRIVERS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Post Office. Would the minister please make a statement on motions, informing this House exactly what offer the government made, other than the offer of the Prime Minister which was refused, to the Laplame drivers?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: I do not consider this to be funny at all. I should like to know what was offered. I should like the minister to explain to the House exactly what the offer was and why it was refused.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): I think, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is too important for us to make fun of it. I am ready at any time to table the last proposals that were made to the Lapalme boys.

SHIPPING

PROMULGATION OF REGULATIONS AFFECTING SHIPYARDS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the government's interest in the subject of unemployment, and in view of the fact that shipyards have had to lay off some of their shipwrights because the minister's department has not promulgated regulations with respect to the program announced over six months ago, will the minister make efforts to see that those regulations are promulgated so that the shipyards can get on with their work?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is referring to the support for exports.

Mr. Comeau: No. I am referring to the program that was announced by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, which affects the minister's department.

Mr. Pepin: I have seen the regulations. I thought they had been issued. I shall look at this matter again.

WOOD BUFFALO AND GLACIER—TERMINATION OF LOGGING LEASES

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the minister's department, in line with parks policy, tried to buy up or terminate the logging leases at present in force in Wood Buffalo National Park?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, these are the only logging rights in a Canadian national park. We do not intend at this time to buy them up since we are negotiating with the Alberta government with a view to exchanging this area for a region in southern Alberta which might well become a most interesting national park.

[English]

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, has the department completed the buying up of timber berths in Glacier National Park?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, but I think we have managed to buy back all logging rights in the national parks of the Rockies.

WOOD BUFFALO—PLANS FOR REFORESTATION—AGREEMENT ON EXCHANGE OF LAND

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): A supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Actually, I have two questions. First, is his department planning to proceed with the reforestation program in the park? Second, when does he contemplate that agreement with the government of Alberta will be reached on the exchange of land that he mentioned?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, these two problems are complementary. If we make an exchange with the government of Alberta, the latter should initiate the reforestation program in the park. However, we are awaiting results of the negotiations and I cannot tell the hon. member when they will be conveyed to us.

PROFIT BY ITALIAN SPECULATORS ON RESALE OF CANADIAN BARLEY

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Does the minister have any knowledge and, if so, can he tell the House the approximate profit per ton that Italian speculators are making on the resale of Canadian barley?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for information which normally should be sought by way of a written question. Unless there is urgency, the question in those terms cannot be accepted.

Mr. Downey: A supplementary question. Can the minister state whether the mass exodus of the cabinet to Saskatchewan is what the grain farmers of western Canada can expect—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

ACTION RESPECTING CLOSURE OF STATION AGENCIES IN SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister taking any initiatives as the result of protests concerning the closure of 56 CPR station agencies and nine caretaker agencies in Saskatchewan and Alberta which was recently authorized by the Canadian Transport Commission?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take the question as notice as to specifics. I know that there has been some action within the past week or so. I understand this is one of the matters I may be discussing with the government of Saskatchewan over the weekend. I am told that I will be going to Yorkton, so I will give the hon. member's regards to his constituents.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 9, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Tuesday, February 9, clause 6 of the bill was under consideration. Clause 5 of the bill had been allowed to stand with the amendment of the hon. member for Kootenay West. Is the committee ready for the question on clause 6?

On clause 6—Protection of environmental quality.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, I want to raise a matter, not by way of a point of order, but as an objection. At this stage we are dealing with clauses 5, 6 and 7, the proposition to establish a department of the environment. It has been announced that this new department will be headed by the present Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and with the passage of this bill and the establishment of this new department, the Department of Fisheries and Forestry will disappear. I think it is incumbent on the government, because of the importance it attaches to this proposal to set up a department of the environment, to have the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry here. He is the person who is to head up this new department; he has been chosen by the government for that purpose. It is unkind of the government—

• (12:20 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Discourteous.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Discourteous, of course; but I was being generous and gentle today, as I always try to be, though dealing with an insensitive government it is difficult to achieve this objective consistently. Certainly, though, the government owes it, if not to Parliament, then at least to the Canadian people, to see that the minister charged with heading the new department is here to deal with the subject from his point of view.

I know the President of the Treasury Board will not accede to this request. If he had felt any sensitivity about it, either he or the Acting Prime Minister would have seen to it that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry was here to handle this matter himself.

Mr. Drury: Perhaps I might comment on the last remarks made by the hon. member for Skeena. As he is, I believe, aware, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has attended—

The Chairman: Is the minister rising on a point of order? It was the understanding of the Chair that the minister was rising on a point of order. If I am in error the hon. minister might so indicate.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Drury: I would find it difficult to classify this intervention as a point of order, so I shall wait.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Then, it obviously has no substance.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The minister rises to say something, and the only way he can do that is by way of interruption or by way of a point of order or a question of privilege. He declines to pursue the matter in that way. I would not object if he wished to make some statement. Indeed, I am ready to yield the floor so that he might do that.

I see he is not interested.

Mr. Drury: I am. It is just that I find it a little difficult—

The Chairman: Do I understand from the hon. member for Skeena that he is prepared to yield the floor to the minister at this point?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): That is what I said.

The Chairman: There was some confusion about the point of order. I understood the hon. member to say that.

Mr. Drury: I believe the hon. member is aware that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has attended up to the present the discussions in the House on part one of the bill.

An hon. Member: That is not so.

Mr. Drury: He had intended to be here for the continuation of this debate, but I regret to say that because of difficulties in making travel arrangements he is not here this morning.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): It would have helped a great deal if that explanation had been made earlier. Presumably, this leaves us in the position of having to proceed with our consideration of the bill while awaiting the minister's appearance. He may be here later today. I understood the minister to say he encountered travel problems this morning. Perhaps this afternoon he will be here, and able to deal with some of the matters with which we are concerned.

I should like to make reference apropos to what is sought by this particular clause, to the statistical information which was provided yesterday about levels of unemployment, and the degree to which those figures were distorted by the government. I should like to mention how this sort of distortion and flavouring of the statistics relating to the number of people unemployed is used to cover up the real seriousness of the situation. Yesterday, as I understand it, statistics were issued by the Department of Manpower, by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and by the Bureau of Statistics, all three of them agencies of the government, giving separate and different statistical information. Frankly, I think each one of them either deliberately or accidentally underestimated the number of unemployed in the nation. I mention this only to counterbalance what the Minister of Labour said on a previous occasion when the figures were not accurate—

Mr. Drury: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. It is my understanding that we are dealing with clause six. I hope we are not rehashing yesterday's budget debate.

The Chairman: The Chair was listening to the hon. member for Skeena. I thought that he intended, very rapidly, to relate his opening remarks to clause six.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I do not think the President of the Treasury Board is out of line. He is correct. We are considering clause six. I heard you say that myself, Mr. Chairman. I should have thought the government would have shown some concern about unemployment by operating under the terms of this clause. I believe my remarks are germane and to the point. Let me read the clause:

> The Minister of the Environment—shall (a) initiate, recommend and undertake programs and co-ordinate programs of the Government of Canada which are designed to promote the establishment or adoption of objectives or standards relating to environmental quality or to control pollution;

Surely, sufficient is involved in these activities to enable us to relate embarking on undertakings of this sort to the fact that we have the highest level of unemployment experienced in this nation for many years. Obviously, by objecting to the course of my remarks, the President of the Treasury Board indicates that the government has not thought clearly about this subject. It is my contention that this should be an aspect of government activity; in other words, efforts to control pollution can also be used as a means of finding employment. It could be done under this particular clause. We could save our environment and, at the same time, save our own people. I am sure no one on the government side would object to my advocating a program of this sort, even though the President of the Treasury Board did not seem to think that the application of the clause could have the effect I am suggesting.

As I was saying, large numbers of people are not included in the unemployment statistics though they are, in fact, unemployed. I have heard figures of—

The Chairman: I say to the hon. member, with respect, that I have listened to his explanation of the manner in which he proposes to relate his remarks to clause six. I gave him the benefit of the doubt because there was, I thought, some relationship, but I should like to say to the hon. member that we should not transgress too far upon such a thin thread of relevancy.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I have great admiration and respect for your instructions as to how the rules should be applied, Mr. Chairman, but, with that respect, I suggest I have heard figures ranging between 75,000 and 100,000 people in connection with those who are undertaking retraining programs administered by the Department of Manpower. They are doing so in the hope that they will learn a new trade which will better fit them to become employed within the economic structure. What I am saying is that here is an area for worthwhile activity, namely, the training of our people to prepare them for work in pollution control where they may help to save our environment. With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I do not think this is any tenuous thread or that it is incompatible with the terms of clause six.

I refer to the clause again. It provides that the minister of the environment shall initiate, recommend and undertake programs relating to environmental quality or the control of pollution. In the course of doing so he is to co-operate with provincial governments, agencies or any bodies, organizations which have similar objects. This presents a clear opportunity for the government to do something worthwhile in the field of environmental control. It is in these circumstances that I referred to the numbers of people who are undertaking these manpower training programs, indicating, as an aside, that these people had been left out of the Minister of Labour's explanation of what was contained in the unemployment insurance statistics.

Let me tell the committee that we might well employ some of the native Indian people in this field. Many of them have a greater experience of the natural part of life than do a lot of the people who live in cities. After all, the streams, lakes and forests of our land are their environment. We could embark on an excellent program of environmental control by using people who are of Indian origin. Their cultural background fits them to understand environmental control easily. Moreover, there is, as hon. members know, an exceptionally high amount of unemployment among the Indian people. Let me put a statistic or two on the record. These statistics result from a survey of the native Indian population by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in the Pacific region for the fiscal year 1970-71—just last winter. The survey showed that in the Fraser Indian Agency, which covers the lower mainland and up into the Fraser River, New Westminster and that area, 19.3 per cent of the work force of Indian people was unemployed. This was one year ago. The government is talking in terms of a 6 per cent or 6.2 per cent average throughout the nation, yet one year ago unemployment in one Indian agency in British Columbia was three times that amount. On the west coast, I take it in the area represented in part by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, during the same winter 23 per cent of the Indian people in the Campbell River region were unemployed.

• (12:30 p.m.)

In the area represented by my hon. friend from Kamloops-Cariboo, in the Indian agencies of Kamloops, Nicola and Lytton in the central region of British Columbia, agencies that are covered by the Canada manpower centre at Kamloops, the percentage of the labour force unemployed was 44.3 per cent. The whole range of statistics just for the province of British Columbia alone gives a similar picture.

Inasmuch as this statistical information was available to the government, to the manpower department and to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development one year ago, there should have been developed some kind of program with regard to environmental control of pollution. These programs would have given these people some gainful and meaningful work, and by the same process enabled them to contribute something to the quality of life in Canada.

Last night the Minister of Regional Economical Expansion took part in the budget debate and recited a number of programs that his department was planning in this particular area. I submit that this was simply window dressing. If the minister is really concerned about this sort of thing, then clause 6 of the bill gives him an opportunity to do something about it. It gives him the opportunity to initiate programs or to co-operate with other agencies in similar objectives. I am sure that the Department of Manpower and Immigration has a similar objective with regard to environmental matters as that proposed by the department of the environment itself. If there is one area in which co-operation might more easily be had than any other area, it is between two departments of the same government, two structures in the federal area, each of which has a constitutional authority to involve itself in this sort of activity.

As I say, the speech of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion was window dressing, and if you read between the lines you will find that he is not seriously concerned about tackling environmental questions, about using the opportunity available to us through this sort of government activity to put people to work and to help save the nation from ecological destruction.

Let us examine what the minister said last night in order to show how distorted a view of the situation he gave the House. The minister said that one of the great steps they were taking was that they had almost concluded—the government is at the stage of "almost concluding"—new ADA agreements with a number of provinces. I think he said particularly with some of the Prairie provinces. Under these new ADA agreements there would be ample opportunity to enable native Indian people on or near reserves, in co-operation with the provinces, to do something meaningful which would give them self-respect, instead of destroying that self-respect by welfare programs and by the high unemployment level that exists among our native Indian population.

That statement by the minister was false. It was false to the extent that it did not tell the whole truth. In order to show how shallow is the approach of the government to this whole question of improving the economy, I can say that almost one year ago the federal government signed a new five-year ADA program with the province of British Columbia. Under that program specific mention was made, among other things, of initiating programs for the employment of Indian people as well as programs for employment in the fishing industry; there was a companion activity. Even though that ADA agreement has been in existence for almost one year now, there has not been a single, solitary program put into operation of any help or benefit to a single, solitary person of Indian origin. So, when the minister stood up last night, as he did, and said that we were negotiating ADA agreements to help the native Indian people seek employment and the like, that was a falsehood.

The Chairman: Order, please. An hon. member wishes to ask the hon. member a question, but first of all may I say that the hon. member is wandering further than he should from clause 6. I would invite him to make his remarks germane to this clause. An hon. member is rising to ask whether the hon. member for Skeena would permit a question.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, I will take my cue from the Minister of National Revenue last night who said he would be glad to answer any questions at the conclusion of his remarks. I, too, will be happy to do so at that stage.

May I say I did not intend to wander. My intention was deliberately and consciously to suggest the course that this government should follow. In view of the earlier intervention by, and lack of imagination of, the President of the Treasury Board, it is obvious that the government has no intention of involving itself in this area. However, I submit it is possible for the government to do so.

One area in which the government should become directly involved through the activities of this department is in municipal sewage treatment plants, to use that for the purpose of argument. Many municipalities in this nation do not have the financial base or resources to build their own. They are up to ears in debt and are unable to get additional funds so they can embark upon a thorough program of sewage treatment within their municipal boundaries and thus curtail pollution of the environment that comes from that source.

This is an area in which the government could easily involve itself by making money available to the municipalities. I realize that the Minister of Finance, both yesterday and on other occasions, gloatingly referred to the $16 million loan fund that has recently been established as a base for a make work type of project to the provinces and the municipalities. But I submit that $160 million is not very much in view of the job that we have to do to preserve our environment.

In order to put this question into some reasonable perspective, I should like to relate the generous way in which the Canadian government has looked in the past, indeed even today, upon situations in other countries. Take, for example, the attitude that Canadian governments have adopted towards lesser developed nations like Argentina, Greece, India, Pakistan and a couple of dozen others. Let me point out the extent to which Canada has lent money to these countries. I am not disagreeing with the necessity for using what resources we have and can afford to assist other nations that are less well off than we are to enable them to increase their economic standard of living and quality of life; I mention this only in the context of what we should be doing for our own municipalities.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. The hon. member for Skeena did indicate that he would accept a question from the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. St. Pierre: I listened with great interest to the hon. member's remarks concerning Indian reserves in British Columbia, and I know that the facts are as he states them. My question is, in view of the fact that the ADA agreement requires that initiative shall begin with provincial governments, and since the B.C. government resolutely refuses to take any initiative on behalf of Indian reserves anywhere in B.C., how can the member properly criticize this level of government when it is the other one which is refusing to assist the Indian reserves?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, I would point out to my friend, the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin, my appreciation for putting this different dimension on what I was saying. It was not I who raised the ADA agreement, it was the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion. Last night he said this was the valuable way his government and his department intended to tackle the problem. That is why I said he spoke a falsehood last night because he knows very well that no ADA agreement is going to provide these things. I just wanted to put this in context. I thank my hon. friend for pointing out how inept and calculatedly false the minister is.

An hon. Member: You didn't answer the question.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Skeena raised some questions that obviously require answers from the government. If we are being asked to establish a department of environment, Parliament should know what this department is going to do. We want to know whether there is any meat or substance to the powers conferred on the new ministry, and whether there will be the kind of authority which is being asked of Parliament in this particular case. We want to know whether there is going to be any meat or muscle in these words relating to the initiation of programs to improve the environment.

If the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry were here today, I am sure he would be in a position to confirm what I propose to say about one example of the kind of concrete step some of us think the government should take if the department of environment is to really perform the function the hon. member for Skeena mentioned in connection with the state of the fishing industry in British Columbia.

The clause we are dealing with makes reference to the fact that this minister has the authority, once this bill becomes law, to work in co-operation with other agencies, including provincial governments. I am sure the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is as well aware as I am of the close interrelationship between industrial activities of the forest products industry in British Columbia and his responsibilities as the minister of fisheries. He must realize that what has been happening in British Columbia over a period of time has created a situation, and if we are going to restore and maintain the environment something of the order of $100 million will be required to bring the streams in British Columbia back to the level of potential production of salmon they enjoyed in their natural state.

As my colleague said, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is not present at the moment. Undoubtedly, the President of the Treasury Board is assuming some responsibility for putting this bill through the House. I am sure he is familiar with the spending programs of the federal government. Perhaps he is the appropriate minister to answer some of these questions and to inform the House whether, if we give this power to a new minister, this department will be anything more than simply parliamentary window dressing.

This is the kind of information we should have. We should be informed about the effects of these programs on unemployment, and I have in mind particularly those people who are relatively unskilled in an industrial society. Many Indians possess skills which could usefully be put to work carrying out these programs. Is the government going to put $100 million into the hands of the minister of environment in order that he might actually do something to improve the situation on the coast in relation to the environment in that part of Canada which was very productive in respect of Pacific salmon when it was inhabited only by Indians? This is the kind of question I think is germane to the discussion on this clause of the bill. Some spokesman, on behalf of the government should be in a position to provide real answers before we put the seal of parliamentary approval on this proposed measure.

I am sure that the whole question of preserving the environment in other parts of Canada is equally as important. It probably requires the same kind of financial muscle that is required to effectively deal with the deteriorating situation of the natural environment on the Pacific coast. Even though we are doing away with the fisheries part of the department's name, the minister does have responsibility for the sea coast and inland fisheries which the department of fisheries heretofore held. Let me emphasize the relationship between the proposal in this clause of the bill and the importance of useful and productive work. A fundamental question is involved which should be answered by the government before we pass this clause.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the two preceding speakers who dealt with clause 6. This is one of the key clauses in the bill. We are told that this government is going to initiate, recommend and undertake programs, and co-ordinate programs which will be designed to promote the establishment or adoption of objectives or standards relating to environmental quality, or to control pollution. We are told that the government is going to promote and encourage the institution of practices and conduct leading to the better protection and enhancement of environmental quality.

We have not heard from anyone on that side of the House how the government intends to do these things. We are not holding up this legislation. The House of Commons is entitled to this information. We are fed up with this passing of permissive legislation which is never complied with by the department concerned. Someone on that side of the House should get up and tell the House of Commons is a crystal clear way what the government intends to do. Surely, the government has a number of programs lined up. Surely, it has a number of projects in mind for various provinces in Canada. Surely, someone in the government should tell us how the government intends to tackle these problems and how much money it intends to spend. How is the government going to approach the over-all problem of pollution which exists in Canada today? I agree with the two preceding speakers who have said we have had absolutely no word from the government in this regard. We should have some information before this clause passes.

But there is something else with which I want to deal which is, in my opinion, vital so far as this legislation is concerned. If those who are interested in environmental standards would look at clause 6 and read to the last line on that page, they would see that it refers to promoting the establishment or adoption of objectives or standards relating to environmental quality, or to control pollution.

Before I sit down I will move an amendment that we make these national objectives our standards. This is what we are after. I have gone through a number of speeches which the minister has been giving from one end of Canada to the other within the past four or five months. He is always talking about national standards. I am going to suggest to the government that if they are interested in national standards, then let us put them in the bill. Reference must be made to them in the legislation which is currently before the House. If the government does not do so, it will be a clear indication, just as we had in the Canada Water Act, that there will be a hodge-podge of standards from one end of Canada to the other, and this we do not want. I want to point out that the minister, himself, has been preaching this idea of national standards which he took from us last year. If this is the philosophy of the new department, then it must be spelled out in the legislation. We are going to insist that it be incorporated there if we can persuade the government that this is what their requirements should be.

I should like to point out the need for national standards. We have gone over this I do not know how many times. If there are no national standards, pollution havens will form from one end of Canada to the other, and the public of Canada do not want pollution havens. The public of Canada do not want one province in Canada to have lower standards than another, thus giving it an opportunity to attract industry. Last year at the federal-provincial conference a number of provinces made submissions to the government. One of their biggest worries was that if national standards are not written into legislation, encouragement would be given to big companies, such as pulp mills, to say to one province that unless it keeps its standards down, the company will move to another province where the standards are lower. This is not what we want. We are fighting pollution in this country, and for goodness sake let us act as sensible politicians in the House. Let us draft legislation which will tell these potential polluters that we do not care where they go because all parts of Canada will be protected. We will not give one part of Canada an advantage over another by allowing a hodgepodge of different standards which can only result in pollution havens. We seem to have a great deal of difficulty in getting this idea home to the government.

I want to point out on this standards issue that two years ago the committee on national resources passed a unanimous report that national standards be established throughout this country. It is amazing to me that there are no members on the government side, who were members of that committee, supporting this report which was unanimously adopted by the committee. They should be telling the government what they want. It should not be left to members of the opposition to draw this to the government's attention constantly.

We have raised the problem of standards and, in a moment, I will move an amendment. Before I do so, I want to again mention the programs to which reference is made here. We will not solve pollution problems in Canada unless this government makes up its mind that vast sums of money will be set aside to tackle these problems. No minister of the Crown has risen to tell us where the government will find this money to carry out the program under consideration. What about the disgraceful mess which results from the fact that many of the big cities are dumping almost 100 per cent of their sewage into adjacent streams? We are told that CMHC has a limited amount of funds allotted to tackle the problem. We should be setting a time limit of five or seven years from in which to achieve our objectives. We should be letting the people of Canada know that when 1975 or 1980 roll around, we will make certain that every municipality in this country will have stopped dumping raw sewage into the waters of this nation. This, objective should be spelled out in the legislation. Then, we should provide funds to these municipalities, low cost loans, so that they can get on with the job of dealing with the sewage problem.

There is a host of other projects. What about the dozens of lakes and rivers that are polluted with mercury where even now fishing is banned? If any fish are caught in those rivers they have to be destroyed. We have to buy that product and destroy it. How are we going to go about cleaning up this mess which we have allowed industry to create over the years?

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That clause 6, subsection (a) of Bill C-207 be amended by adding thereto on page 3, line 1, the word "national", so that line 1 will read "or adoption of national objectives or standards".

The Chairman: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. When the committee rose at one o'clock we were considering clause 6, with an amendment thereto proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board if the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry will be here this afternoon? If we are going to approve the granting of certain powers to him, including authority to prepare certain programs, it seems we ought to have some information from him as to what those programs are.

It is true that the minister made an excellent speech in general terms on the question of pollution. But it was one of those speeches about motherhood and apple pie with which everyone agrees. No one likes pollution, and everybody thinks the environment has to be protected and the quality of life ought to be improved. Surely, the committee is entitled to some information as to what programs the government has in mind, what standards the minister proposes to set, and what general objectives he expects to attain. This kind of information can only be given to the committee by that minister.

May I also say that when we come to deal with Part II of the bill dealing with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources we will certainly insist upon that department's minister being here, but that is merely an aside. Have we any hope that the minister of fisheries will be here this afternoon to deal with some of the questions raised by my colleague?

Mr. McGrath: Before the minister responds to that very important question, Mr. Chairman, may I say I think it is impossible for us to discuss this part of the bill or any proposed amendments without the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry being here. We experienced the same situation a few days ago, and at that time the President of the Treasury Board accepted a very useful suggestion to defer discussion of the amendment until the minister was present. I would ask him to take the same suggestion under consideration today. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, we could defer discussion on this part of the bill until the minister of fisheries returns, because I do not see how we can usefully discuss this part of the bill without him, and I say this with great respect to the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, obviously the passage of the bill would be very great assisted, and hon. members would be better informed, were the minister here. Unfortunately, I learned during the lunch hour that it will not be possible for the minister in question to get here this afternoon. If it is the feeling of the committee that it is important to have him here, then perhaps we should stand the remaining clauses of this part of the bill.

However, in respect of the requests for an indication of the standards that the minister proposes to set and the kind of programs he is going to have, I might just comment that this may not be an orderly way to proceed. What we are examining here is a structure within which the minister will be able to perform his duties, and we should be looking at the appropriateness of the structure rather than undertaking an examination of the programs.

The purpose of the legislation is to enable the minister to formulate, and present in the usual way, programs for dealing with the problems we face. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has said that the minister has already given a speech in which he indicated his convictions and beliefs generally. This legislation, coupled with the putting forward of programs in the usual way in the estimates, subject to review by a standing committee in detail, seems to me to be the orderly way in which to proceed toward the programs and an examination of them. If, however, it is felt that the committee could be substantially assisted by having the minister present, perhaps we could stand these clauses rather than waste time.

I might say in respect of the amendment now proposed, and I do not think, perhaps that the minister concerned needs to speak about it, that the present purpose of clause 6(a) is to initiate programs and to seek the adoption of standards and objectives in relation to pollution. A number of aspects of this environmental problem are exclusively matters for provincial jurisdiction. By adding the word "national" as has been proposed by the amendment, we should, in my view, considerably narrow the field of activity of the minister concerned. As the wording now stands, he is instructed by Parliament to concern himself with an endeavour to promote objectives and standards relating to provincial jurisdictions as well as to the federal jurisdiction. In my view, adding the word "national" would pre-empt or remove him from that particular field. I am not sure if the hon. member had that in mind. I gathered from his remarks that he wished for an extension of responsibilities in relation to jurisdiction rather than a narrowing.

There is no question but that the matter of the setting of national standards will be a preoccupation of the minister of the environment and should be a duty and responsibility. As the hon. member pointed out to the House, he has already indicated that this is his intention. However, by incorporating this phraseology in the section, we should, in my view, narrow this field and limit this responsibility. I hope that he will be authorized and, indeed, instructed, to concern himself in the establishment of standards in areas which are purely of local or nonfederal jurisdiction.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West. I wish to say at the outset that I disagree with the remarks that the minister has just made. The minister said that setting national standards would limit the area in which this department would be able to work. I think the opposite would be the case. The desired result, I submit, could be brought about in one of two ways. One positive way of achieving standards would be to have the provinces, municipalities and territories of Canada, as a result of consultation and co-operation, agree to uniform national standards for the control of pollution and for the cleaning up of the mess that is prevalent in all parts of our ecology.

Failing that, there is another way of achieving national standards, but it is not as good. If we were unable to obtain a high level of standards after consultation with the provinces, and after all they are all concerned about the matter of pollution control, then it seems to me the federal government should give the country the kind of leadership the country expects. It ought to lay down national standards. I submit that no provincial premier, and no mayor of any municipality in the country, would dare to oppose those standards unless he wished to commit political suicide. I hope that the federal government has the imagination to accept this idea, which would meet the wishes and demands of the public of Canada. The government ought not to allow any of the little premiers or mayors, who act like Arab sheiks more concerned with their little "oildoms" than about their countries as a whole, to frustrate it. Actually, I have heard of no objections to national standards from provinces or municipalities. It seems to me that the demand for them is universal. Any suggestion that the amendment would limit the effectiveness of the federal minister, I think, begs the question. That is negative thinking and ignores the kind of responsibility the national government ought to exercise.

It would probably take about ten years to complete a program involving municipal pollution control. Under that program, every city in Canada, within a ten-year period, ought to be provided with not just primary and secondary sewage treatment facilities, but with tertiary treatment facilities which would recycle the water and provide drinkable water for the population. This program must be implemented from coast to coast. It must not be implemented merely by municipalities able to finance such projects. Neither must that program be undertaken only by provinces capable of undertaking it. There must be provision for all provinces and municipalities to receive some financial assistance. Obviously, pollution policies will be required.

May I, off the top of my head, suggest a formula which could be used. Perhaps the minister of the environment could make available 25 per cent of the cost of a project as a non-repayable grant; another 25 per cent would not be repayable if the work were done within a certain period of time. The remaining costs, if there were any costs to the municipality or province, would be financed by loans bearing interest of 3 per cent, 4 per cent or 5 per cent. I submit that such policies could be undertaken in a more orderly way under a federal authority. Also, the standards established ought to be national. I know of no municipality in Canada that would object, because such a program requires leadership and imagination on the part of the national government. Some municipalities or provinces may impose less stringent controls than others in the field of pollution. This must be stopped. I think that leadership from the federal government is required for those municipalities and provinces which might not live up to national standards.

May I now talk about industrial pollution? The federal authority, it seems to me, must have control in this area in order ensure that the costs of industrial pollution control are not passed on to consumers as price increases. Industrial polluters have profited for decades because they have not been forced to instal anti-pollution equipment which would have been costly. Having made those kinds of profits for a number of decades, I do not see why they should now continue. This would be unfair. I do not see why the law of the land cannot require the people involved to amortize the cost of anti-pollution equipment from profits over a given period of years. If a steel company needs to spend $50 million or $60 million on pollution control equipment, it seems to me that the shareholders of that company should take a reduction of 25 cents or 50 cents per share over a five-year period, say, because they were amply rewarded in the years when the corporation was operating without such equipment. It is in these areas that I think the national government ought to exercise some control and direction. The co-operation of all sectors will be needed if we are to cure pollution and prevent it in future.

For too long have too many officials of many governments in this country attempted to hide behind the British North America Act and to use that act as an excuse for not doing something or for avoiding responsibility. Surely, in this age when the Canadian people are mobile, there ought to be some leadership and direction from Ottawa in this area. In all fairness, there should not be limited standards or different standards as between one jurisdiction and other. The citizen of Montreal visiting Regina has just as much right to breathe clean air and drink clean water in Regina as he has in Montreal. He is a citizen of Canada, and the air and water of the country from coast to coast belong to the citizens of Canada.

Mr. Harding: Hear, hear!

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Benjamin: We need national standards in the field of pollution control to prevent differences of this sort occurring. Surely, the jurisdictional argument for not doing something is no longer valid. It is time for this government to start acting and stop speaking. As my leader said a few moments ago, we have only had motherhood speeches. Everyone agrees we must do something about pollution. There is no argument on that. However, we want to know how, how much and when. We do not want a bill containing motherhood clauses that are so wishywashy and weak that the minister is unable to effect, enforce and ensure pollution control and the clean-up of our air and water.

I hope members opposite will support this amendment and persuade the minister to accept it. In that way, members opposite will not be constrained to vote against that amendment. I hope they will express some support for this kind of approach and this amendment.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The President of the Treasury Board is always very meticulous and careful in his pronouncements. He always ensures that the language he uses is precise and does not lend itself to misinterpretation. Before lunch, the minister deliberately indicated something to the committee that was not in accordance with the truth of the situation. When we inquired before lunch about the whereabouts of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, the President of the Treasury Board stated that the minister was having some transportation difficulties and hoped to be here this afternoon. At the opening of the session this afternoon, the President of the Treasury Board stated he had learned over the lunch hour that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry could not be here this afternoon. As regretful as that is, perhaps we should let the matter stand and proceed to another part of the bill.

I just had a conversation with some one in the office of the minister of Fisheries and Forestry. I was told, and I am sure that the President of the Treasury Board knows, that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, by previous decision of the cabinet, is in Saskatchewan today to take part in the opening of the winter games. Although the minister knew that this bill would be before the committee today, he did not bother to cancel his other engagements. Members of the cabinet are in various parts of Saskatchewan today, partly as a publicity program and partly in conjunction with the opening of the games. By direct instruction of the cabinet, the minister is in Biggar. He is scheduled to be in Regina tomorrow, then Moose Jaw, returning to Ottawa on Sunday.

I am sure that the President of the Treasury Board does not want to leave the impression with the committee that it was through accident or inadvertence that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry was not able to be here. The President of the Treasury Board should briefly indicate the circumstances, so this country will know that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry had no intention of being here today, although he knew the bill would be discussed because the Government House Leader indicated that this would be the first item today. Members of the cabinet knew that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry would not be here today. It is not an accident, but a deliberate absence, and at a time when the minister should be dealing with public business. The President of the Treasury Board stated that, in dealing with the legislation before us, we should be concerned with the objectives and not the details. He stated that we should be concerned with the construction and the broad general outlines, not the specifics of the program. According to the minister, this is the orderly way to do things.

On previous occasions when the government has introduced legislation, it has misled the House by following courses of action not contemplated at the time which nullified the understanding the House had about the manner in which we would deal with that legislation. I wish to give an example of this. Amendments to the Fisheries Act dealt with in the last session contained the provision that before industry could get approval to build a new plant, it had to file with the minister or the department plans and specifications for pollution and environmental control measures. The purpose was to ensure that the provisions of the Fisheries Act were followed by the industrial plant. Because this was a matter of public concern, an undertaking was given that the plans and specifications would be available to the public so that they would be aware of what the industry planned to do in terms of meeting the general objectives of the Fisheries Act.

Yesterday, I moved a motion for the tabling of plans and specifications submitted to the Department of Fisheries and Forestry pursuant to the Fisheries Act relating to pollution control and engineering matters. These Plans related to the Buckley Valley Forest Industries Limited proposed pulp mill in Houston, British Columbia. Contrary to the intent of the act, the parliamentary secretary stated that the government had no intention of making them public or disclosing this information. He stated that the plans and specifications are the private property of Buckley Valley Forest Industries Limited. The intent of the law was to do the opposite.

The President of the Treasury Board has now asked us to follow the same procedure, namely give blanket approval to the vaguely worded bill before us and leave the implementation of it to the cabinet. Then, the minister could deal with these plans in secret, keeping the public from knowing what is taking place other than what might be revealed in press releases issued from time to time.

I have read a press release of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and have heard him when he was interviewed over television. As far as the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is concerned, speaking for argument's sake now about the pulp mills in particular, the hon. gentleman expressed the opinion that any water used in such a project should be kept within the plant; that pulp mills should be required to operate a recycling process so that they poured no water back into the river, lake or stream systems of the nation. These pulp mills, he said, would have to extract within the plant, or break down by a bio-degrading processes, the chemicals and toxic substances which were present, and they could only add water to replenish the amount absorbed by evaporation, absorption and natural processes of that kind. Because this statement was made apropos the new fisheries legislation, and because Buckley Valley Forest Industries is proposing an operation which is not now in existence, we are entitled to know whether the declaration by the minister represents a requirement to be imposed upon the company and upon other plants from now on. Will it, in fact, be a requirement when the chips are down and when the legislation is enacted?

The procedure used yesterday by the parliamentary secretary to deny this information to the people in the area concerned, to those who live downstream from the site of this proposed new pulp mill, to those who are up in arms over this issue, runs completely contrary to the intentions of Parliament, the expectations of Parliament and to the proposition which was put to Parliament by the minister when the amendments to the Fisheries Act were introduced. These considerations must apply, I submit, with regard to the legislation now before us. The present attitude is not good enough morally, bearing in mind the obligations the government have to the people of Canada. The moral obligation to people is what we can best rely on, I suppose. To use vague phraseology about initiating and undertaking measures for pollution control, without spelling out the substance of the ideas and programs which do exist, amounts to asking once more for a blank cheque approach, namely, for a general endorsement by Parliament couched in legal phraseology. When it comes down to the fine print, we discover that the cabinet fails to fulfil the trust placed in it by Parliament or its obligations in terms of the national structure.

In passing, I believe I can justifiably contend against the assertion by the President of the Treasury Board that the inclusion of the word "national" in the provision concerning standards would narrow the authority of the minister. I submit that just the reverse is true and that the minister is using a superficial argument which is not borne out by the facts. Surely, as everyone seems to be agreed, the question of controlling our environment, of preserving the ecology in which we find ourselves, of preserving nature and perhaps human life itself into the bargain, is of such importance that it must be considered national in scope. It should not be undertaken in such a way as to produce one set of standards in one province and another set of standards in another province, or one of set of standards in one municipal area and a different set in another. Surely, we ought to think in terms of a national concept, a national goal.

We have just completed a federal-provincial conference on the subject of the constitution. Full disclosure of what went on at that conference has not been made to Parliament or to the people of Canada, but it is to be hoped that had the government felt it lacked sufficient constitutional authority under the British North America Act to cope with this issue of pollution it would have asked for agreement from the provinces to cloak itself with that authority. But even apart from this, assuming there is some difficulty in the constitution which would make legislation by the federal government ultra vires should it seek to establish itself in a national field, there is nothing whatever to prevent Parliament from declaring that it is interested in the national scene, that the standards which are established should be national in scope and inviting the provinces to accept them.

Clause six provides that the minister, in pursuance of his obligations, powers and authority under clause 5, is able to co-operate with provincial agencies or with any other agencies or bodies having objectives similar to his own. If we were to establish a national standard there would be no difficulty about saying to the provinces: here is an area which we have carved out in the national interest and we suggest you take this standard and put it into effect. This is what we did in connection with the Hospital and Diagnostic Services Act. This is what we did in connection with the medicare legislation. We established national requirements and said to the provinces: If you want to participate in this program these are the criteria you have to meet. This is all we are asking by virtue of the insertion of one simple word "national" in the text of this bill. For the minister to say that this would narrow the field and limit his scope to put these ideas into full effect is spurious reasoning and should be rejected. There must be a national concern and a national objective, not a requirement which can be one thing in one part of the nation and, according to the pressures exercised, something else in another part of the nation.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I wish to speak briefly on the amendment to add the word "national" before "objectives and standards" because I feel an important issue is at stake. Unfortunately, the President of the Treasury Board was not able to deal with it convincingly. I am not trying to detract from his performance in any way, because obviously he is operating under difficulty in an area with which he is not personally acquainted.

The other day we were confronted with a definite example of the need to set a national standard for use in pollution control. In this case I refer specifically to air pollution. In many of our urban centres today, as a result of the increasing emission of noxious gases by industry and transport traffic, air pollution reaches such a peak at times that whole areas become almost unfit for habitation. Those who live or work in Montreal know only too well the situation which occurs when, because of a weather condition known as inversion, the pollution level rises above a certain point. On the occasion I have in mind it goes to about .4 parts per million which, as I understand it, is close to the point where a city becomes uninhabitable, particularly by those subject to respiratory diseases.

On the first really bad day, I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry what steps were being taken by his department to assist the provincial government and the municipal authorities. One thing which became apparent from the reply was the absence of a consensus as to the level of air pollution which exists from day to day in Montreal. In addition, there seems to be considerable variation between the standards which apply in one city as compared to the standards set by another. Those who have had an opportunity to compare the official reading with the unofficial reading given in Montreal know there is a wide difference as to the actual degree of pollution.

I am told, in effect, that even the official measuring devices that are used vary widely. This can create real problems if provincial statutes or municipal bylaws are passed establishing safe levels for the emission of foreign substances into the atmosphere. As a matter of fact, at the present time there is a substantial amount of law on the books respecting air pollution, so much so that if in the city of Toronto the official measuring devices indicate that air pollution has reached a dangerous level, certain industrial plants can be shut down. If these measuring devices that are being used are not consistent in the measurements they take, if they are not set according to some national standard, then intrusions of a federal authority by the establishment of some blanklet legislation or administrative regulation may create some real problems for the effective administration, either on a provincial or municipal basis, of pollution control standards.

It seems to me that what the hon. member is attempting to do in his amendment is to make it crystal clear that when this department is established it will set national standards and objectives to which the provinces and major municipalities will always be able to refer. These will be universally accepted standards. If this is not to be the case, then when we come to deal with the problem of controlling environmental pollution in this country we will be creating what will almost amount to a system of anarchy by depending on the particular devices employed or standards established from place to place. I am sure that no hon. member would find this a very satisfactory situation in terms of trying to improve and clean up much of the pollution that already exists in this country; and certainly air and water pollution are two major areas of pollution that we must confront now.

As I said earlier, I think the minister is going to have difficulty in logically opposing this amendment—unless, of course, he does not have a full understanding of what is being attempted in this legislation. Perhaps the suggestion made by one hon. member some time ago that we stand this clause until the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry returns is appropriate. I am a little shocked, not only that the minister has not planned to be here—if indeed he considers this matter to be important—but also at the glib way in which the President of the Treasury Board indicated that he had been here throughout the debate. Hon. members will recall that we, in fact, stood clause 5 the other day because the minister was not here at that time.

While there may be some kind of slap-dash handling of the matter by the government at the present time, we of the opposition want to deal with this legislation responsibly. We cannot deal with it responsibly when ministers are not here to defend and to explain various aspects for which they have accepted responsibility. Thus we should at least have the good sense to stand those aspects of the legislation until the ministers concerned do deign to come to the House to discuss these matters with us.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I think it might be a good idea to stand the clause. The atmosphere of this chamber is not always that of a cloister and it may be difficult for the minister to appreciate the nature and the quality of the arguments that have been so effectively advanced by members from all parties of the opposition.

I think the minister should be given the chance to read what has been said. The President of the Treasury Board smiles. It may well be that the very reasonable arguments advanced from this side of the House from time to time merit only smiles from the treasury board, though I hope that is not the case; but since the minister is going to undertake a fearful responsibility, I think he might well examine the arguments that have been made. Most of what can be said has been said, though I might be able to advance in a few sentences one or two additional arguments.

With regard to the national aspects of this matter, I am sure that if the Fathers of Confederation and those voters and citizens of the country in 1867 who were responsible for the constitution of Canada had realized what their descendants were likely to do to the environment, to the waters and to the soil, they would have so framed the British North America Act as to place this particular aspect of our life within the sole jurisdiction of the federal government. After all, the winds that blow in this country blow traditionally in a certain direction. The waters flow in a certain direction. The winds that blow the pollutants that have been emitted into the atmosphere and environment flow across provincial lines and international boundaries. Waters flow across provincial borders and international boundaries. These conditions cannot be seasonally adjusted; they blow and flow without regard to that matter.

The enforcement of the present pollution laws in the Fisheries Act, the Shipping Act, the Navigable Waters Protection Act and so on is based on the criminal law. Offences created in respect of matters that pertain to restrictive trade practices and to national health and welfare rest on the delicate edge of the criminal law. But I should like to think of this in the broader sense so that we can regulate, as well as prohibit or sanction, following failure to abide by pollution regulations. I know that this is a sensitive area and that some provinces are very concerned about it. However, I think that if this matter were left to the people of Canada as a whole, they would say that jurisdiction in this regard must be vested in the federal authority. I think there is no alternative.

I have promised to be brief and I should just like to mention one other aspect. Problems are being created in relation to certain international labour standards. Treaties that have been entered into by federal representatives with regard to labour conditions have been notorious for the fact that some of their terms have never been implemented because they relate to matters that fall within the accepted and acknowledged jurisdiction of the provinces. The same thing can be said about the United Nations declaration of human rights; some of these rights cannot be implemented because at the present time they come within provincial jurisdictions.

I am convinced that some time within the next 10 or 12 years negotiations will be had on an international basis on various matters. The nations of Europe are talking about this among themselves today, and I think eventually nations from behind the iron curtain will also be involved. Treaties are going to be signed relating to pollution control and the setting of standards for the environment. The United States will be taking similar action. There will have to be international agreements on setting standards.

This question, as I say, has not yet been settled constitutionally. I could make a lengthy constitutional argument here as though I were addressing the Supreme Court. I could argue that there is a good case to be made for jurisdiction resting with the federal authority, but of course I will not do that. If there are going to be international treaties executed ultimately, what power and authority will the federal government have to implement them? I suggest this will be extremely limited except under the aegis of criminal law. If this amendment is passed, it will provide some assistance to the federal negotiators.

I asked this question of the Prime Minister the other day in good faith, as we ask most of the questions we direct to the Prime Minister because we have not learned yet that it does not pay to ask questions in good faith. I asked what discussions had taken place at the federal-provincial conference in respect of pollution. When I asked the question, someone told me the minister was attending the conference to discuss this matter.

We have tried to put the amendment in terms that will strengthen the position of federal negotiators during discussions on this matter. I think there is no doubt that ultimately this jurisdiction must rest with this Parliament and this government. This is an opportunity to assert the view of this House that this should be the case. For these reasons, I intend to support the amendment.

Perhaps I will not have to go that far. When the minister returns he might say he has read the submissions of the hon. member who initiated this discussion, including those of the hon. member for Egmont, the hon. member for Skeena and possibly even the hon. member for Peace River, and because he is deeply impressed by those arguments he intends to accept the amendment. In any event, I will not hold my breath while I am waiting, but I urge the government to give consideration to this amendment.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I cannot help but be entertained by the hon. member who has just spoken.

Mr. Baldwin: I am glad to serve some useful function.

Mr. Drury: I should have thought that he, as a lawyer, would have appreciated the addition of this qualifying word would limit the standards and objectives the minister is to promote and to encourage. If the hon. member will read this clause he will see that this is the purpose. It is to promote and encourage standards and objectives in the field of environmental quality control. If we include the word "national" then the minister will be limited to promoting, advocating and attempting to have adopted standards other than international. Let me try a little Latin on the hon. member: inclusio unius est eclusio alterius.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the hon. minister add "seasonally adjusted" in Latin at the end of that?

Mr. Drury: The hon. member does not seem to understand the limit being imposed, so I presume he will not understand that the minister will not accept the amendment for the same reason. By adopting this amendment we would keep the minister out of the international field. That is what the hon. gentleman is proposing, that the minister should not be attempting to promote standards in the international field.

In view of the fact there seems to be unanimous agreement, we should perhaps let the balance of Part II stand during the absence of the minister, and proceed to the consideration of Part III.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, there is another question that should be dealt with at the moment. Earlier, I indicated to the committee that the President of the Treasury Board in fact misled the House today when he gave the reason for the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. I said then, and I say again, that the President of the Treasury Board knew where the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry was. He knew why he was absent and by relating to the House a reason other than the true one he, in fact, misled the House. Admittedly, that is a serious accusation but I am prepared to substantiate it if necessary. I think the minister should be afforded an opportunity to say truly why the minister is not here.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, what I did indicate on each occasion was precise. The hon. gentleman has a rather fanciful story about what the Cabinet did or did not do. He assumed that I was present at the Cabinet meeting, although he does not know.

An hon. Member: It wouldn't have made any difference, anyway.

Mr. Drury: I would not dignify this flight of fancy on his part, constructed largely out of whole cloth, by answering it in detail. As I indicated in the House this morning, I was advised that because of difficulties in making travel arrangements the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry was not present. I was advised during the lunch recess that he was not going to be here this afternoon, and I so advised the House.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, what the minister has said is correct. He said there were some travel difficulties. I have in my hand a document which lists the schedule or itinerary of a number of Cabinet ministers, one of which is the President of the Treasury Board. This document indicates that the President of the Treasury Board was supposed to leave here at eight o'clock this morning to go to Saskatoon. He obviously knew last night, as a result of the announcement by the Government House Leader, that the first item of business today would be the resumption of consideration by the committee of the government's organization bill. I assume that because of that knowledge, and there may have been other reasons, the minister decided to cancel that proposed trip.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That's their loss and our loss too.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): He cancelled his proposed visit to Saskatchewan. In addition to that itinerary, there is an itinerary for other members of the Cabinet. They all emanate from the same place. There is an itinerary for the President of the Treasury Board and for the Hon. Jack Davis, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. I assume because they are altogether, the President of the Treasury Board would have known about this. That is why I made the remark earlier when the minister stood up in the House and said with great precision that there were some travel difficulties which kept the minister away. In fact, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry was then on the way to meet an obligation as outlined in this schedule.

The schedule indicates that on Friday, February 12—that is today in case you were not sure about it—at 12.30 p.m., about the time the President of the Treasury Board rose in this House, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry was scheduled to depart Ottawa by Jetstar, arriving at the Saskatoon airport at 3.15 this afternoon. How could the minister stand up and say with great precision that this involved travel difficulties? I suggest he was deliberately misleading the House by not telling the House the facts of the matter. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I think if the hon. member for Skeena had a point he has made it. At the present time we are not discussing the itinerary of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. I think the House knows exactly what the hon. member had in mind and I do not think we are now entitled to go further into the itinerary of the minister. If there is a charge to be made against anyone, a charge should be made. We should not be discussing or listening to a recitation about the travels of hon. ministers.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I have great respect for your view about this, Mr. Chairman, but the President of the Treasury Board initiated this recitation this morning in an incomplete and inaccurate way. I think the committee is entitled to know the facts of the situation, and I suggest they are not as the President of the Treasury Board related them.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Let me say to the hon. member for Skeena that unless he has something new to add he has explained very clearly what he wanted to say about the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. I am sure he does not want to beat the point to death.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): You are quite right, Mr. Chairman, I explained the matter clearly up to the point of the minister's departure from Ottawa. I think the committee is entitled to know why the minister is not here. He is not here for the simple reason he had a very pressing engagement in Saskatchewan which he considered more important than his attendance at Parliament and more important than the question of environmental control. Apparently, the President of the Treasury Board also considered this more important. Apparently, the entire Cabinet considered it far more important than environmental control in this nation. The progress of this bill to set up a department of environment is obviously less important than a meeting at four o'clock Saskatchewan time where the minister is attending a reception of the Biggar Liberal party.

• (3:00 p.m.)

That is what is more important, Mr. Chairman, and that is what should be brought out. That is the truth that should be told in the House, not the cover-up, phony excuse used by the President of the Treasury Board. That is exactly what it was, a phony excuse in which he referred to travel difficulties. The only travel difficulties were that the minister intended all along to go to the reception sponsored by the Liberal party in Biggar, Saskatchewan, and to disregard completely the business of the House and the business of this nation in its care and concern for environmental factors.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): It is a shameful situation. In addition to that, the President of the Treasury Board knew this precisely and in the face of that and without disclosing it to the House he stood up and barefacedly said that he learned by accident in the afternoon that the minister will not be here, and because he will not be here this afternoon, regrettable as that is, we should stand these matters. That is the first cover-up, to put the matter to one side because the Liberals in Biggar are more important than the people of this nation.

If the President of the Treasury Board wanted to be truthful, he should have put it on the record. But it is obvious from the way he is approaching the English language and from the way he approached the secret document about the employment of Francophones that the minister is not concerned about telling the truth of the matter; he is only concerned about using the English language to cover up the truth.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I am becoming a little impatient. The hon. gentleman has been reading the mind of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and he has also been reading my mind and, as usual, arriving at the wrong conclusion, with a lot of rather unpleasant innuendos all the way through.

The fact of the matter is that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestly, I am informed—I have not spoken to him, nor do I pretend to read his mind—learned of the intention to proceed with this bill today. He was in Vancouver. When he received this communication by telephone, he undertook to try to make travel arrangements to come back here. By this morning he was not here. The fact is that the hon. gentleman has a timetable similar to mine, and because he could not get from Vancouver back here in time the hon. member assumes that the intention was to proceed with the timetable as it is written. I suggest that both his logic and his imputed motives are false. I suggest that perhaps we should let this clause stand.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): At 10.45 last night Vancouver time, which is 2.45 a.m. Ottawa time, and at 10.50 p.m. there were two Air Canada aircraft leaving Vancouver which would have got the minister to Ottawa this morning, first-class or economy, in time to prepare for this debate and in time to cancel his program for the Liberal party in Biggar, Saskatchewan. That also is the truth of the matter and it has nothing to do with innuendo, slander or anything else. I just make the direct statement that so far as the minister, the President of the Treasury Board and the government are concerned, the Liberal party in Biggar is more important than the well-being of the people of this nation with regard to environmental matters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point which the President of the Treasury Board made in connection with the amendment before the House. He pointed out, in reply to two preceding speakers, that the addition of the word "national" would restrict or limit the objectives. I want to say very clearly that what I am trying to do precisely is limit the multiplicity of standards which we have in Canada. That is the reason for setting national standards. I want to bring home this fact to the President of the Treasury Board. That is exactly what I am trying to do in the amendment.

We are trying to establish a set of standards in Canada so that we will not have provinces or water quality management areas following a host of different standards which will eventually create pollution havens. We are completely fed up with the present circumstances under which provinces and water quality management areas have been given the power to set different standards in different parts of Canada. As long as we have this type of legislation on the statute books we will continue to have trouble with the root cause of the problem. If we are to stop pollution in this country we will have to set broad, national standards and let industry, the public and governments alike know that these are the standards and that we will not allow them to be broken. This is the reason for the amendment we are proposing.

The minister tells us that it is a good idea to have a number of broad objectives. For goodness sake, we have been running wild for years and that is the reason we are in trouble now. That is the reason it will cost us billions of dollars to clean up the mess. Let us make certain that we have criteria and national standards which will do the job of controlling pollution nationally and provincially. These people are asking for guidance from the federal government and they are not getting it. They are getting nothing but a great big run-around in this bill and in other bills, in the setting of standards and in everything else. It is time the environmentalists and the Canadian public realized this. I suggest that the minister's answer is anything but satisfactory.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether or not this clause is to stand.

The Chairman: There was no agreement to stand the clause.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I thought the President of the Treasury Board indicated that he was prepared to stand this part of the bill and to go on to part III. That was my understanding.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Skeena said he was not prepared to have it stood.

Mr. Comeau: I will be very brief on the subject, but I would very much like to have the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry here. This is why I would like to have the clause stood. This type of amendment was proposed when we discussed the Canada Water Act last year. The NDP and our party proposed the type of amendments that are being proposed now, providing for national standards, but they were defeated. At page 2830 of Hansard of January 27, 1971, just two weeks ago, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry made the following statement. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary can answer my question. The minister stated:

> I am opposed to different standards in different places. I am opposed to pollution havens. I am opposed to big industry picking on our weaker provinces and our weaker municipalities.

• (3:10 p.m.)

He went on to explain what he meant. Then he asked this question of the House:

> So, why run the risk of losing everything when uniform national standards can provide us with all the protection we need?

The hon. member from Renfrew is being hypocritical about this. He is going to vote against the amendment despite what the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has said. This is exactly what the minister wants to do under this legislation. I repeat his words:

> So, why run the risk of losing everything when uniform national standards can provide us with all the protection we need?

How can you explain the fact that the government does not want to accept this amendment?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You cannot explain it to someone who does not want to understand.

Mr. Comeau: The hon. member for St. Boniface never understands.

Mr. McGrath: He only speaks from his seat; that is where his brains are.

Mr. Comeau: He did not participate in the debate on the Canada Water Act.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That was because you people took up all the time.

Mr. Comeau: That is the reason he does not know the arguments that were presented. On that occasion the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry had all kinds of arguments to defeat our proposals. Now he is adopting one of our main proposals. He is advocating national standards—but I think he is just talking that way to the Canadian public. He does not really mean it because the President of the Treasury Board, speaking for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry this afternoon, does not want to accept this type of amendment. I cannot understand the President of the Treasury Board talking about infringement of provincial jurisdiction and all that sort of stuff. The Minister of Fisheries spoke in favour of national standards. He got headlines in all the newspapers; it was on the front page of every newspaper in Canada. The minister was being really tough, but now the government is backing away. I ask the minister or his parliamentary secretary to explain the reasons why the government does not want to accept this amendment.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman understood that I was against national standards and was opposing the amendment for that reason, this is clearly a misunderstanding. I think in my earlier remarks I said that the Minister of Fisheries, and indeed the government highly favours the creation and adoption of national standards. There are, however, other fields in which standards would be useful and those are areas which at the moment are exclusively under provincial jurisdiction. I think that we as Canadians are interested in seeing that standards are adopted for areas which are under provincial jurisdiction and we know that the minister would wish to promote and encourage the adoption of such standards. He also would wish, as the hon. member for Peace River indicated, to encourage and promote the adoption of international standards. If one limits him to purely national standards, I suggest this tends to obviate at least the responsibility for promoting and encouraging the adoption of both international standards and provincial or local standards.

I understand the argument that the adoption of national standards is important and the minister has publicly recognized this. He continues to feel that it is important. Indeed, the wording now in the clause would enable him to accomplish fully those purposes that he has indicated, and nothing would be added by the proposed amendment to the achievement of the objectives that he has stated.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I must object to that misinterpretation which I think has been quite innocent.

Mr. McGrath: There was nothing innocent about that.

Mr. Baldwin: It is either ignorance or innocence and I prefer to say innocent in the circumstances. One of my colleagues has said that the minister's argument was a red herring. Mr. Chairman, it was more like the dead mackerel that shines and smells at moonlight. I stated categorically that in my judgment, within the next few years it will be almost inevitable that international agreements will be entered into. This being the case, I asked what will be the authority of the federal government to implement agreed international standards.

If the federal government is left in the position it is in now with respect to international labour arrangements and the implementation of the United Nations' human rights code, we will be in very serious trouble. But if we make it absolutely plain, be setting national standards, that the federal government has a right to set those standards, as advocated by the amendment, then at a later stage the federal government will be in a position to implement international standards: it will not have to go to each of the ten provinces—and some day there may be 11—and say: Here is the agreement we have signed. It is deemed imperative as a result of international negotiations that these international standards be established. The federal government would have to ask Alberta, British Columbia, Ontario and so on to pass legislation to implement those standards. I believe the hon. member is trying by his amendment to obviate that and put the federal government in a position where it will be easier for it, having established its right to set national standards, to implement international agreements.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, as I listen to this discussion it becomes more and more obvious to me that the President of the Treasury Board is either clutching at red herrings in an endeavour to dredge up some argument against the amendment or he has not read clause 6 of the bill. It may be a mixture of both. Clause 6 has two subparagraphs. Clause 6(a), to which the amendment refers, clearly states:

> initiate, recommend and undertake programs, and co-ordinate programs of the government of Canada, that are designed to promote the establishment or adoption of objectives or standards—

If the government of Canada through its various agencies and programs is not interested in encouraging the promotion of national standards, then what is the purpose of having a national government? I felt that in his exchange with the hon. member for Peace River the minister was trying to introduce a constitutional cloak or smokescreen by suggesting that the insertion of the word "national" into clause 6(a) would restrict the application of the bill. Clause 6(b) refers to the idea of the minister working with other agencies, and in particular provincial governments, to "promote and encourage the institution of practices and conduct leading to the better protection and enhancement of environmental quality".

• (3:20 p.m.)

So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is a clear distinction between what is envisaged in subclause (a) and subclause (b), and to suggest that the insertion of the word "national" in subclause (a) would restrict the powers of the minister to work with provincial agencies under the terms of subclause (b) is arrant nonsense. That is why I suggest that the minister has not read it, or he is trying to draw red herrings into the debate. I fail to understand the minister's viewpoint, Mr. Chairman.

I heard the President of the Treasury Board speaking on these matters long before the introduction of this bill. Why is there this extreme reluctance on the part of the government of which he is a member to introduce national controls in terms of national standards? The minister may recall that in 1966 a conference was called in Montreal under the auspices of the Council of Resource Ministers. His colleague who is now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was the minister who had responsibility in this area at that time. I was one of the few members of the House who took the trouble to go down, to register and attend that conference. I remember making a speech in this chamber not long after the conference was over. I gave a summary of the conclusions of the conference and quoted the guidelines suggested by it, guidelines which had reference to air pollution, water pollution and soil pollution. The conference was divided into those areas.

I quoted the recommendations that more or less delineated the areas of responsibility that might be assumed federally and provincially in respect of the battle against all three areas of pollution. The conference recommended unanimously that one of the basic responsibilities of the federal government ought to be the initiation of national standards of quality for air, water and soil. Mr. Chairman, those at the conference represented people from one end of Canada to the other; it was on of the most representative conferences ever held. There were experts in various fields of science, particularly biological science. There were representatives of the federal government and of the Fisheries Research Board. There were municipal representatives and senior officials of the public service of all the provinces. There were municipal legal advisers. There were representatives of industry and of conservation groups from across the country.

Out of all the mix and exchange of ideas there emerged, above all else, one concept—that the role of the federal government should be in the establishment of national standards of quality. I remember very well what a top management person in the pulp and paper industry said. He was part of the group I was in. He said that while they recognized that cleaning up the pulp and paper industry of Canada would cost money, and while it was true that no businessman liked to spend money that would not bring any direct return on the profit side, nevertheless so far as they were concerned if they could be assured that they would not be placed at a competitive disadvantage with people in other parts of the country they would buy the idea; they would clean up the effluent being discharged into the air and water from the pulp and paper industry.

That was the basic theme that emerged from the conference attended by representatives of science and industry. To my knowledge, in that industrial group there were highly placed people from the pulp and paper industry from the Pacific as well as from the eastern parts of Canada. That was the consensus and that was the feeling one obtained from talking to senior people in the public service of the provinces, people who were speaking frankly and off the record, so to speak, so far as any direct quotation of their words was concerned. That consensus was reflected in the guidelines that emanated from the conference. Yet here we are in 1971 and we are discussing a bill to set up, among other things, a department of the environment. As the hon. member for South Western Nova suggested, the minister who is to head the department has said that he believes in national standards. Nevertheless, the President of the Treasury Board has presented his argument. Earlier in the exchange, which I will not go into, he said that he did not think we had attended any cabinet meeting. I have been wondering whether he attended the cabinet meeting at which was discussed the government's support of this bill and whether he knew that the attitude of the minister who is to head this department is that there should be national standards in Canada.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that when the President of the Treasury Board suggests that this amendment would restrict in any way the powers and duties of the minister of the department to deal co-operatively with the provinces, he is speaking arrant nonsense. We are in no way attempting to insert anything in subclause (b) which would do that. We are trying to suggest that the bill should clearly set out that so far as the activities of the federal government are concerned, the responsible minister should have the green light to provide leadership in the setting of national standards and objectives respecting the quality of the environment in Canada. I cannot understand why the President of the Treasury Board should object to that kind of concept being included in the bill, particularly when it was stated to the House by the minister who ought to be here to deal with policy questions involved in amendments of this kind.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, this amendment is of such vital importance that I think the minister's reply of a few moments ago cannot go unchallenged. I wish to make two or three points. The minister is trying to make out that we are trying to strap provincial authorities. I do not know whom he is trying to kid. He has apparently fooled the members of his own party but he is not kidding any of the opposition members or the general public.

The bill we are dealing with is federal legislation. We cannot legislate for the provinces. We cannot legislate pollution standards for the provinces of this nation and the minister knows it. Yet he stood up and said we will strap the provincial authorities if we include "national" in the clause. I have never heard such unmitigated nonsense. The argument just does not hold water—but a great many things which this Liberal government has done do not hold water. Let us read the beginning of the clause. Anyone who can read and understand English will understand what clause 6 (a) says. It reads in part:.

initiate, recommend and undertake programs, and co-ordinate programs of the government of Canada—

This is the government of Canada.

An hon. Member: We are the government.

Mr. Harding: The hon. member says that he is part of the government?

Mr. Mahoney: The members on this side make up the government of Canada.

Mr. Harding: As I say, this is the government of Canada.

An hon. Member: The hon. member may not like it, but this is the government.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Harding: We are initiating programs of the government of Canada. If we are to have national standards in these programs, they should be included in the legislation. That is all we are asking. We do not want to hear gobbledygook about affecting the provinces and municipalities. It is crystal clear to anyone who reads the legislation that it applies to programs of the federal government. This is what we are pressing for. We want national standards. The people of Canada want national standards in federal programs. Let us include it in the legislation and decide once and for all. Again I want to make it crystal clear that there is nothing in here to indicate that the federal government will dictate standards to the provinces. It is their own affair whether they have pollution control legislation. We could try to put pressure on them, but when it comes to this type of program we must be strong and courageous and insist that national standards be written into the legislation.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few comments apropos what the hon. member for Kootenay West has said about national standards. He stated that this is national legislation and if there is a constitutional obstacle it does not and cannot override the position of the provinces. The provinces will still be free to work within the areas of their jurisdiction. I and others to whom I have spoken briefly wonder why there is a distinction and a different approach. I wish to refer to Bill C-224, an act relating to ambient air quality and to the control of air pollution. Although this bill is not now before us I think it bears looking at because it will presumably be administered by the department of the environment. Clause 2(i) contains the words "national ambient air quality objective". It uses the word "national".—Further on there is reference to national ambient air quality objectives established pursuant to other sections of the bill. Clause 4(2) of the bill reads:

The Governor in Council may from time to time prescribe as national ambient air quality objectives any objectives formulated by the minister pursuant to subsection (1).

It gives the cabinet the authority to establish national ambient air quality objectives. Clause 7, regarding national emission standards—provides:

—the Governor in Council may prescribe national emission standards establishing the maximum quantities, if any, and concentrations of such air contaminant—

Clause 8 reads:

The Governor in Council may publish or cause to be published national emission guidelines indicating quantities and concentrations in . . . air—

Because the bill before us is federal or national legislation, it would contain the same or similar phraseology with respect to air pollution. If this principle is followed in establishing national objectives and national emission standards with respect to air pollution, it should be contained in the overriding legislation, namely, that which establishes a department of the environment. The objectives should be national standards in the broadest possible sense. That is all we are asking. Any argument which states that the use of the word "national" would narrow the matter is spurious. If that argument is accepted, the use of the word "national" in the air pollution bill will also narrow that bill. That is not the purpose. The government should accept the objectives of the minister and declare them as national. What is harmful about that?

Mr. McGrath: If the minister were here, Mr. Chairman, I believe he would subscribe to the arguments which have been made. The minister has stated on a number of occasions that this is one of the objectives he has in mind. This is one of the over-all objectives in establishing the new department of the environment. A few months ago we debated the Canada Water Act. At that time we advanced arguments to indicate why we felt the Canada Water Act could not work. We said it could not work because it depended upon federal-provincial co-operation; it depended upon establishing water management boards across the country that would have varying standards influenced by the special interests of the province or the municipality involved. Following an interview with the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, the January 3 edition of the Sunday Express stated:

"The Canada Water Act requires federal-provincial-municipal co-operation to work. The law is already there in the Canada Fisheries Act to force clean-ups, and industry is being fairly co-operative"—

Where did we hear that before? That argument was advanced by members of this House during the examination of the Canada Water Act. We said the Canada Water Act was not necessary to provide the government with legislative authority to clean up our waters, rivers and inland lakes; the authority was already contained in the Fisheries Act. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is now saying the same thing. We felt, and still feel, that the Canada Water Act was bad legislation because it set up varying standards across the country which would be dictated by the special interests of the provinces and municipalities. In other words, we will end up without a national standard for water in this country.

• (3:40 p.m.)

This is what the amendment now before the committee is all about. This is why I believe that if the minister were here he would be anxious to have such an amendment incorporated. It would clearly define what he is seeking to do, namely, to set national standards for the environment. In the same article in the Sunday Express appear the following words:

Mr. Davis rejects the concept of varying standards of water quality as espoused by J. J. Greene, Minister of Energy, when he had charge of the Canada Water Act.

Mr. Chairman, the minister himself was saying in that interview what we are trying to say in the House this afternoon and what my hon. friend is advocating in his amendment. If this bill is to mean anything at all, it must set up national objectives and standards for cleaning up our environment. The minister referred to this again the other day in the statement he made on first reading of the clean air bill. It was to set national standards. This is why the bill was brought in. He brought it in so there would be a national standard for clean air, not a standard affected by the special interest of particular provinces, of particular municipalities or even of international interests. It would be one decided upon in the overriding interests of this country as a whole. While I am on the subject of the press release of February 9, in connection with the clean air bill, I noticed it said:

Mr. Davis is minister-designate of the new department of the environment.

Mr. Chairman, there is no new department of the environment. Parliament has yet to give approval of the establishment of a department of the environment. There is a proposal to set up such a department. I suggest that the person responsible for writing that press release, and the minister who must take ultimate responsibility for it, were anticipating what they have no right to anticipate, namely, that Parliament will give consent to this bill as proposed by the government.

In this connection I have an amendment to move when we come to clause 2 regarding the name of the department. It is one which the minister, being the sensible man he is, will certainly be prepared to consider. The whole debate this afternoon underlines the ludicrous situation in which we find ourselves. We are trying to advance arguments to improve this legislation agreeing, as we do, with many parts of it, and we find ourselves at a great disadvantage because of the absence from the House of the minister who will have the ultimate responsibility for this new department, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry.

I remember a few days ago when the minister was supposed to participate in a great economic conference in Newfoundland. With the usual promotion which is one of the characteristics of the Premier of that province, it was announced with great fanfare that on the final day of the conference, which was last Wednesday, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Minister of Transport would be present. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry was not present because he had to come back to the House of Commons to pilot this legislation through the chamber. Now we find that his presence is not, apparently, of such great importance. Where is he this afternoon? He is in western Canada. He is not attending to any governmental duties. He is attending a conference of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan when he should be in this House attending to his responsibilities and listening to the very reasoned arguments put forward by hon. members who are trying to fulfil their obligations to the people of Canada by making this a good bill.

We remember the experience of a few months ago when the Canada Water Act went through this House. We contended it was bad legislation because it failed to recognize the necessity for a national standard of quality control for clean water. Because this plea went unheeded we shall gradually see the Canada Water Act, which took up so much of the time of the House, pass into oblivion, where it belongs, to be superseded by the legislation we are now putting through and the concomitant legislation which is to accompany it such as the clean air bill and other measures which I am sure the minister will be introducing in connection with his new responsibility for pollution control.

I believe the amendment put forward by my hon. friend will generally improve the bill. With great respect to the President of the Treasury Board, I find it difficult to understand why the government will not accept it. I feel that if the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry were in the House today he would be prepared, as a reasonable man, to listen to the constructive arguments which we have put forward and to accept an amendment which we contend would have the effect of improving the bill. I am genuinely sorry that members of the House did not agree with the proposal put forward by the President of the Treasury Board to stand this part of the bill until the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is here to take part in the debate. In the absence of the minister, what we are doing now is a useless exercise. With great respect to the President of the Treasury Board, he can never answer the arguments we are putting forward. He does not understand the bill, he has no responsibility for studying this part of its provisions and he will not have the ultimate responsibility of administering it.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will accept this small amendment. As has been pointed out, a similar provision is made in the air quality legislation. I see a number of members present this afternoon who are interested in controlling the pollution of the Ottawa River, a body of water which is interprovincial. They are well aware that if this effort is to be successful, co-operation will be needed from dozens of municipalities both on the Quebec side and on the Ontario side. It is obvious the minister will be unable to operate on the basis of standards set up separately by Quebec or by Ontario. Not only will there have to be agreement between the provinces as to the desired standard, but co-opertaion must be forthcoming from the townships concerned. Those responsible for spending money on clean-up plans in Quebec will have to take into account the degree of pollution from the Ontario side, and vice versa.

I am unable to understand why the minister should be reluctant to see the word "national" added. The fact that the President of the Treasury Board comes from Quebec may have much to do with his attitude in this respect. When we talk about issues which affect Quebec in any way, there seems to be a particular reluctance to attempt to remove from that province any of the authority it might have. He knows that if there is agreement between the authorities concerned, the standard which is ultimately reached will be in effect a national standard accepted by all who take part in anti-pollution programs. I see in the chamber today a number of members from the Ottawa Valley, the Ottawa River basin, who know full well that the effort of the national government will be paramount when it comes to dealing with the pollution of that river.

I have been very concerned during the last few weeks, as have many other members, as we have travelled across the country investigating another area in which a national standard will have to be established. I refer to the agricultural commodities. Again we have found, not so much a reluctance on the part of the provinces to make an agreement with the federal government to allow the federal government to establish national standards and quotas as a reluctance on the part of the federal government to take any initiative. I would be interested to hear the minister tell the committee whether or not the law clerks who drafted this piece of legislation were different from those who drafted the clean air legislation which makes reference to the word "national" in many instances. Certainly there has been a reluctance to refer to national standards in this legislation.

The Ontario Water Resources Commission will have a great deal to say in regard to standards to be established to control the pollution of this interprovincial waterway, which frankly is all that we are talking about. If we are talking of intraprovincial pollution, then the provinces will have their own standards. As far as interprovincial pollution is concerned, we will have to take into consideration the standards that are set by all provinces, and the mean that will be arrived at will be the national standard.

In this regard we are continually raising the old bugaboo of the Constitution. I suggest that if the federal government got off its fanny and made a decision in this matter, the decision would never be taken to the Supreme Court on appeal; the provinces would either meet the standards or would not do so. It has been suggested that if we are going to improve the environment, this is one area where the federal government can exercise a great deal of authority. In most instances the expenditure of money will be called for. In this regard I am reminded of a discussion I had a week or so ago with the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec. We were discussing the constitutional problem of just what belongs to the provinces and what belongs to the federal government and I was interested to hear him say, "You put money into it and you will have jurisdiction over it. There will not be any worry if you put money into it". He suggested that the federal government has been able to get control of national dairy marketing because the federal government has put money into it.

This reminds me of the story of the young man who asked a young lady if she would go upstairs with him for $1 million.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Peters: She said she would. Then he said, "Well, how about a couple of bucks?" and she replied, "What do you think I am?" He said, "Well, we have established that; all we are dickering about is price". It seems to me that on this question of the Constitution all we are dickering about is price and I suggest my story is a parallel. If, as the Minister of Agriculture of Quebec said, you are willing to put money into something, then you need not worry about the jurisdiction.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I apologize if there are tender ears in this place. I suppose the hon. member for St. Boniface has more tender ears than anybody else. Perhaps the facts of life are now known to him, and if so I apologize to him for shocking his sensibilities. If I can get back to the matter of control of the environment, in many instances the municipalities have a responsibility that they are not in a position to carry out. In many cases the provincial governments are not in a position to carry out the responsibilities that they have.

It seems to me that if the federal government is really interested in creating work for people it should quit playing around with programs such as the area development incentive program, under which the cost per job is $50,000, and start doing something to control pollution of the environment from the municipal point of view. If we spent $1,000 per job in the municipalities we would probably make quite a contribution toward the creation of a cleaner environment. This is particularly true in the Ottawa Valley and the upper Ottawa in which I have very great interest. There are hon. members of the House who represent constituencies situated along this great waterway which stretches pretty well from the north to the south of the province, and I am sure most of them would agree that the establishment of national standards for the Ottawa River is absolutely necessary. To do so will require the co-operation of hundreds of municipalities in the elimination of their pollution of this large waterway. For its part the federal government will have to assist the provinces in their supplementation of the resources of the municipalities.

If the President of the Treasury Board opposes the idea of having a national standard established or promoted as a national objective for controlling the quality of the environment, then he must be admitting that this is a matter that should remain with the provinces or with the municipalities or with someone else. I think anybody who has examined pollution will realize that the national government will have to set standards and in most cases will have to help the municipalities, the provinces and industry of this nation to meet those standards. I think we would be very foolish if we were to say that we are going to provide the wherewithal to meet standards that are not ours, standards that we have not formulated. I am sure that many municipalities believe their primary treatment plants have gone as far as they can to protect the environment, and I am equally sure that those municipal standards are quite inadequate from a federal or even a provincial point of view. So in refusing to establish a national standard government is admitting that the converse must be true, namely, that it wants somebody else to set those standards.

I think few people would agree that industry should set its own standards. Certainly the minister who will have to administer this part of the legislation does not say that. He has said that the federal government will have to set the standards. We will have to put up the money to assist in setting standards and we will demand that certain standards be met before new industries are established in certain fields. This is what the minister has said of the pulp and paper industry, and the government is going to spend money in this regard. I suggest that the standards the minister has in mind are not provincial, municipal or industrial standards, but national standards.

The Chairman: Order. It being four o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

Progress reported.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-10, an act respecting La Société des Artisans, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

• (4:00 p.m.)

It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely notices of motions. I understand there is agreement to allow to stand and retain their positions motions Nos. 9, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21 and to proceed with motion No. 24.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

HEALTH

SUGGESTED CONFERENCE TO CONSIDER UNIFORM ANATOMICAL GIFT LEGISLATION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of convening a national ad hoc conference of appropriate people to encourage the enactment in all jurisdictions in Canada of uniform anatomical gift legislation and to consider the need for international agreements to facilitate the transfer of human tissue between Canada and other countries.

[Mr. Peters.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I have placed before the House today calls on the government to convene a national conference to promote the adoption in Canada of uniform anatomical gift legislation. The term "anatomical gift" refers to donations by people of tissues from their bodies for transplant therapy, medical research or medical teaching purposes. It is several years since the celebrated heart transplants dramatically focused world attention to the possibility of extending man's life by replacing worn-out body parts with those from another human being.

Some hon. Members: We have a few around here.

Mr. Foster: Although the practicality of doing large numbers of heart transplants is still being assessed and the techniques refined, there can be no doubt that many other organs and tissues can be routinely transplanted in a practical way. There are 35 different body tissues and organs which can be successfully transplanted. There can be no doubt that thousands of lives could be either saved or made more healthy by the modern techniques of transplant therapy. However, the scientific knowhow for transplant therapy in Canada is years ahead of the legal framework to allow would-be donors to easily make gifts of their body tissues. It is a sad state of affairs when the legislators of a country cannot pass relatively simple, non-controversial laws to facilitate medical progress as fast as the medical research people can develop these new techniques.

We in Canada will be in a few months at least three years behind the United States in this area of medical legislation. A uniform act was proposed there in 1968 and has been accepted by every state of the union since that time. I think it is in the interest of Canada and the United States that both countries start to provide a working, uniform act. One was started in 1965 and by 1968 a uniform act had been adopted in the United States. All jurisdictions in that country passed this legislation. In Canada we had not agreed on a uniform action until last summer's conference and no jurisdiction in this country has passed the legislation. Let me read part of a short article which appeared in Time magazine of July 13, 1970. It states under the heading "Anatomical Gifts":

> At Salt Lake City's University of Utah Hospital recently, a 57-year-old man lay dying after heart surgery. In his wallet was a card that read: "Desiring that humanity may benefit I hereby give for any lawful medical purpose any specific organs or parts of my body determined to be medically usable . . . upon my death".
> In the past, hospital authorities would have had to negotiate with the patient's next of kin to obtain organs for transplant, and the organs might have deteriorated and become unusable before permission was obtained. There was no such delay at the Utah hospital. Informed by the patient's wife about the donor card, surgeons were able to operate on him as soon as he was pronounced legally dead. They removed both kidneys for transplant and both eyes for cornea grafts. Within a few hours, one of each was used for transplants in other patients.

The speedy donation was made possible by Utah's passage of the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act, which gives any patient the right to bequeath his body or organs for medical purposes. Because of almost nationwide adoption of the act—and changing attitudes towards transplants—surgeons long frustrated by a shortage of donor organs now foresee an increase in the supply.

Last week while discussing this problem with a transplant surgeon I was told of all the difficulties incurred in obtaining enough organs. This man specializes in urology and he said that in Canada at the present time it is estimated that 450 people are waiting for suitable kidneys and other organs that might be transplanted. A uniform act was adopted, as I mentioned before, at the conference of commissioners on the uniformity of legislation last summer in Charlottetown. This draft legislation was largely based on the proposed Ontario bill. I should like to pay tribute to the work of the special Ontario medical-legal committee headed by Mr. Allan Leal which has done a great deal of work on this subject during the last few years. However, in spite of this uniform draft bill being available to Canadian provinces, there is little indication that the matter has had much priority with provincial legislatures. Some of the ministers of health at the December meeting in Ottawa had never heard of the need for this kind of legislation.

It is not hard to document the number of people in Canada with serious kidney disease or haemodialysis, waiting for kidney transplants, or the number of people with impaired vision awaiting corneal transplants. However, statistics do not seem to impress governments as much as public opinion and demand for action. This would be one value of an ad hoc conference of people interested in the problem, to focus public interest on the need for such legislation across Canada. This conference would also provide a source of information on the need to provincial ministers of health, their departmental officials, medical associations and other interested groups and individuals.

There are at least two matters of concern to the federal minister of health which the provincial representatives would want to discuss. The first of these concerns the international transfer of human living tissue. Because of the geography of North America, much of the communication between surgical transplant teams is between Canadian and United States cities. For instance, if a surgical team in Hamilton has a patient dying of kidney disease and a donor bank at Rochester, New York, had a suitable kidney available, it would be rushed to Hamilton by police cruiser with no consideration for customs regulations.

It is obvious that transplant therapy is still very glamorous. However, when it becomes routine and transfers are carried out by commercial carriers there may well be problems in transfers of tissue at international boundaries. This matter should be considered by the people concerned and a formal arrangement made between Canada and other countries to facilitate the transfer of human living tissue. Another matter of international concern is the status of the wallet-sized cards which give a physician authority to use the tissue from accident victims for transplant therapy when they are away from their province or country of residence. There are 5,000 automobile accident victims in Canada every year and many of these involve our friends and neighbours in the United States. The status at the international level of these cards should be studied and an agreement between Canada and other countries made.

I have only touched on some highlights of the need I see for a national ad hoc conference on anatomical gifts. However, I believe from these remarks hon. members will be convinced that this is an area of law in Canada which is not only holding up medical research and education but is continuing human suffering and shortening lives. So I call on the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) not only to be sympathetic to this problem but to act in a positive way, to convene this conference, to call together the best experts on the subject and the responsible provincial authorities for a meeting here in Ottawa. Only in this way will the needs of the country in this area of science and medicine be promoted and quickly adopted.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to take part in this debate, for two reasons. First of all, because the subject is one of cogent relevance to the present and is also becoming more and more important as scientific discoveries and capabilities improve; and, second, because the man in whose name this motion stands, the hon. member we do not want to follow that procedure". The corpse is members of this House, bringing to it a very fine reputation in the field of medicine as well as a compassion for the needs of people, and especially for improving legislation that will help out in human circumstances. I want to extend the basic motion that is before us. It has to do with uniform anatomical gift legislation within Canada and also across international borders.

The hon. member who proposed the motion and who has just spoken to the House referred in particular to portions of bodies of deceased people. But there is another dimension to this question, and I know he is aware of it, and that is parts of bodies from people who are still living. So we are concerned here with three things, and I will introduce the third. The first is the movement of cadavers or of corpses across international lines, or the freedom for medical people to remove from the deceased certain organs that can be used on one hand for research and on the other for people who are alive.

Second, the motion bears upon the removal from a living, healthy person of an organ, for instance one kidney or some other organ that they will donate to another person. Third, I want to raise a new dimension which I think makes this motion extremely relevant if not of crucial importance. I read recently that in one author's opinion the most urgent and exciting and, in a real sense, the most frightening breakthrough of our decade is that we have come to have the ability to develop life in a test tube, to sustain the development of embryos in incubators and to produce not only tissue but complete human embryos apart from the female body.

In other words, scientists have become able to produce complete human embryos apart from the social context in which the embryo, upon reaching the stage of birth, is delivered into a family context. We have now come to the situation of being right on the verge of being able to produce human beings in foetal or embryonic form that do not belong in any particular family. If we produce an embryo, a human child, and if this child is sustained—and scientific knowledge now enables us to sustain life until such time as that child can function as an independent individual apart from incubators and special laboratory equipment—whose responsibility is that child? First, is it the offspring of the mother from whose body the female egg, either fertilized or unfertilized, was drawn? Is it the legal responsibility of the father as the donor of the sperm, or is this offspring the product of and therefore the legal responsibility of the originator of the laboratory in which this experiment was conducted, or of the technician so involved?

Also, to go one step further—this has a more direct bearing on the hon. member's motion—what happens to the initiation of life in a test-tube or the bringing together of egg and sperm outside of a female body, outside of the natural environment when this tissue develops? It is more than tissue, really; it is more than a limb in the sense that my hand is a limb or any other part of my body. Here we have in tissue form, because everything ultimately stems from tissue development, a complete human being. If for some reason the life is terminated or a decision is made to terminate it after one week, one month or five months of development, then this also comes directly under the question that is raised by the hon. member. Does this tissue have a special value, and what legal framework do we have in Canada or should we have today for the whole new set of circumstances which is being developed?

I will go one step further. All of us in our culture are familiar with the phenomenon of identical twins. What do we do when we perfect the art of what I would call, in semi-laymen's terms, primary fission in the sense of being able to make complete duplicates at an early stage of embryonic development so that we not only have identical twins but thousands of identical people reproduced over and over again? Theoretically you could populate a whole world with people who are all of the same chromosomal structure. This, again, means that we are starting to deal with tissue in areas that were not even dreamed of as recently as a decade ago.

It is true that the hon. member for Algoma pointed out that what has caught the public's imagination is the transplanting of heart, of kidneys and of different organs, but it seems to me that the real urgency is in evolving the process and procedures and the rules and regulations toward which the hon. member aspires in the whole realm of laboratories to create, to sustain, to direct and to reproduce life. In this sense I think we have not only to talk about kidneys and hearts but we have to talk about complete embryos, and we even have to deal with the question of who is the owner, if you want to call it that. Maybe you do not like that way of putting it. Perhaps I could put it as the question of who is responsible for the offspring that does not derive his or her existence from what we call the traditional family context.

These are questions that are far more urgent than people in our culture realize them to be. But because they are horribly frightening that does not mean they are not pressing on us. By adding that dimension to the hon. member's motion, I hope he will not be too dissatisfied that I have taken the liberty of the idea he has placed before the House this afternoon to draw attention to what is on our doorsteps. I want to now refer in concrete terms to some items he mentioned briefly or tangentially. They are the following: Unless specific statutes exist in Canada permitting persons to make donations of their bodies or of tissues or organs from them, there is, as we all recognize, the possibility that liability could be imposed upon physicians and institutions acting in accordance with the wishes of a donor made before death.

A lot of Canadians do not seem to realize that once they die their corpses are not their own property. They do not seem to appreciate that once death is legally pronounced, the corpse, the remains of the individual, becomes the legal property of the next of kin. Because of this, although you or I or the next person may very much want certain transactions to take place concerning, for example, funeral rites, concerning burial, concerning cremation, concerning removal of cornea or tissues of any kind, if we have failed to convince that person who is our legal next of kin of the merits of our recommendations or desires, then we have no right to assume that our wishes will be followed out.

For this reason doctors have been traditionally, and I think rightly so, reluctant to charge in, in the sense where angels fear to treat because this is a very emotional context. Anyone has any experience with such a routine procedure as post mortems is aware of how much difficulty most doctors have in simply obtaining permission to perform post mortems, even without taking portions of the corpse or body to be used for perhaps good reasons, in the sense of being laced in another human being or used for medical research. Therefore, it would seem to me it becomes extremely important that we have legislation along the lines that the hon. member hopes to have, and that we should have it uniform. It seems important that we should have the agreement of all provinces and also agreement stretching across internatinal lines.

If we are going to pursue this subject with full information, it is important for the House to recognize that provision already exists in law, in the Canadian provinces and territories for donation of human tissue, and is of two distinct kinds. Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and the Yukon have what are known as corneal transplants acts which relate only to the donation of eyes for use in improving or restoring sight. The Northwest Territories and all other provinces except Quebec have human tissue acts which permit donation of the entire body or of certain organs or tissues for medical education and research, as well as for replacement and rehabilitation. This would be replacement of parts.

These acts are very much alike in content. The corneal transplant acts provide that a hospital administrator may authorize a qualified practitioner to transplant the corneas of a deceased person who dies in hospital if that person had requested such use in writing or made such request orally during his last illness, with two witnesses present. I would emphasize the words "in hospital" because it is quite a different situation if death should occur outside a hospital. If death occurs outside the hospital, and even if the deceased had made a request for donation of certain portions of his or her body, authorization for transplantation must be given by the relatives in a prescribed order of preference. In other words if we does not plan to die in a hospital it is not good enough to want to give your eyes or some other portions of your body away. You must convince the person or persons who will be your next of kin that you want to do this. And, Mr. Speaker, this is not as simple as might first appear. Traditionally if a husband dies, his wife is the next of kin, and vice versa. But there are circumstances in which a whole family will die, or in which a husband and wife will die together, and one has to go through the succeeding relatives to obtain permission for transplants.

I turn now to the other body of legislation. Here I speak of the human tissue acts. It may be worth pointing out that in this instance, as the hon. member for Algoma has made clear, health is the responsibility of the provinces and essentially we are talking about action required at the provincial level. The human tissue acts permit use of the entire body or of organs and tissues for rehabilitation, medical education and research. Again in this instance, if death occurs in a hospital the hospital administrator may authorize the use of the body in accordance with a written request of the deceased or in accordance with an oral request if made in the presence of two witnesses during the final illness. And again, if death occurs outside the hospital authorization must be given the relatives of the deceased in a set order of preference.

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Algoma has a professional background in the field of medicine. He has proposed this afternoon the convening of a national ad hoc conference to encourage the enactment in all jurisdictions of uniform anatomical gift legislation and to consider the need for international agreements to facilitate the transfer of human tissues between Canada and other countries. As noted previously, tissue acts are already in existence in seven provinces and the Northwest Territories and they are generally uniform in content. This has not arisen by chance alone. Each year there is a conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada. It is composed largely of deputy ministers and senior executives from departments of justice and attorney general departments both at the federal and provincial levels. The 1965 meeting of commissioners adopted and recommended for enactment a human tissue act. This was subsequently used as a model in seven provinces and the Northwest Territories.

I am very much in sympathy with one point in particular made by the hon. member for Algoma when he pointed out that although this model was before the provincial governments, many of them, I suppose under the pressure of multiple requirements in modern day government, seem to have taken no action and, worse yet, to have little interest in the matter.

Speaking as a Canadian and as a Member of the Parliament of Canada, I hope that provincial governments across our nation will rapidly take action in tnis field. At the most recent meeting of the Commission on Uniform Legislation, held in Charlottetown in September, 1970, the 1965 model act was revised, thus bringing it into line with more recent medical and scientific developments and the consequent acceleration of public interest in this field. For many years individuals have asked me in my professional capacity and otherwise how they may be assured that portions of their body, if not their entire bodies, could be used for some useful purposes after their demise. It has been difficult to advise people in this area because there has not been the complete and full legislation that there ought to be in it.

The revision made in 1970 in Charlottetown is, with minor changes, the same as the draft prepared in 1969-70 by an ad hoc committee of the Medico-Legal Society of Toronto. That society comes from no less a place than Toronto, the fair city that houses the provincial government of Ontario. That revision is almost identical with the new draft legislation which is being considered now in the province of Ontario. No doubt every member of this House who is from Ontario hopes that the Ontario government will take action on this. It is the result of more than two years of deliberation by doctors and lawyers both in government and in private practice who are concerned about the medico-legal aspects of tissue transplant. This revised act of the Conference of commissioners on uniform legislation is one of the most up-to-date of its kind to be found anywhere at present.

Thus, the present situation regarding uniform legislation is that all provinces and the territories have a model, the most recent of its kind, in their possession. Jurisdiction in this medico-legal area over-all is essentially provincial, as I think we all recognize. This topic was discussed at a meeting of health ministers in November, 1970, which was not long ago, and the advisability of a national conference was then considered. However, no express wish was forthcoming from the provincial spheres. If this debate serves no other purpose, perhaps it will serve the purpose of encouraging the provincial governments to take action on that which is already before them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to say that I regard this as a good motion.

Mr. McBride: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am very close to the end of my speech and I hope the House might see its way clear to allow me a very brief extension of time. I would conclude rapidly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Does the House agree?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We agree, provided there is no arrangement whereby the few minutes the hon. member talks and the few minutes somebody else will talk will result in the motion being talked out.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I would not wish us to enter into an agreement under which the rights of some members to speak would be based on what we do at the end of the private members' hour. I think every member has the right to decide for himself what he wants to do with respect to a bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). I do not think we ought to look ahead to what may happen.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, I express my appreciation of the interest of others. I was saying just before my time had expired that there was no unanimity, and apparently no great anxiety was expressed by officials at the meeting in November, for the provinces to move ahead in this field. I think that was unfortunate. So for reasons given previously, although it might be said that there was no active support for this kind of motion, we should support it because it has apparently become obvious that the provinces need to be goaded or encouraged into action.

The international situation needs to be made uniform, because tourism is expanding all the time. Many, many people through accident, disease or bad luck are bound to die while they are in transit in countries other than their own and therefore the matters touched on in this motion become more and more important for those reasons as well. The motion has become especially important in view of the rapid developments which have led to the creation of life in test-tubes and to the sustaining of life in incubators. Those factors make the subject matter of this motion all the more urgent.

Another matter which might be discussed at a national conference is the suggestion that uniform legislation might recognize an individual's wishes in the disposal of his own body. I am criticizing the archaic concept which says that if one dies in a hospital one's wishes will be recognized, but if one dies outside a hospital one's wishes may not be recognized. The legal right relating to the disposition of one's body after death passes to the next of kin, and that must be recognized. There ought to be some method whereby a person's wishes, made known before death, are recognized. In my professional capacity I have run into this situation many times. Sometimes an individual requests that his body be disposed of in a certain manner, yet after death the next of kin say, "No, we do not want to follow that procedure". The corpse is in their hands and they say, "We will do it another way."

The motion being considered this afternoon is important and requires the attention of members on all sides of the House. It has been a pleasure to participate in this debate, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I think it would be appropriate to suggest to hon. members that private members' hours are only one-hour "shots" and that hon. members might prepare their speeches, in accordance with the rules, to last 20 minutes. I would say that 15 minutes would be desirable rather than 20 for speeches during this hour.

Mr. Dinsdale: Agreed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to amend your motion and reduce the time to ten minutes. I hope that all the talk of death of the last few minutes does not foretell the death of this motion, especially at the hands of its friends. It seems to me that this is a good motion. I cannot see anything in it that would embarrass the House or the government if it were to pass. I hope that it will not be subjected to death by talking out.

If I may speak for the entire opposition—if those on my right will give me carte blanche to do so, and I am sure I can do it for all the others—we welcome the opportunity this afternoon to go a second mile and to return good for evil, or whatever you want to call it. The mover of the motion, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), is frequently the last speaker in private members' hour. He is almost an official "talker-outer". Let me tell him that we on the opposition side will not do that to his motion. We think it is a good one. I think that the appeal he made, that the law should at least catch up with medical science, is a good one. Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will have the opportunity of putting the question on this motion to the House and that it will be carried before five o'clock.

• (4:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to congratulate the former speakers for their contribution to the debate on so important a motion.

I should also like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), for introducing a motion intended to arouse the awareness of all Canadians to the importance of having reserves of organs for future transplants in order to help those who might eventually need them to continue leading a more pleasant life.

Allow me also to thank my colleague from Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) who, with his usual logic, gave us an extremely important lecture, from the legal point of view, and especially with regard to the difficulties that might stem from the suggestion of my friend from Algoma.

I would also like to congratulate my friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who would not like to see this motion condemned to death, as he so aptly put it. I know that, even though he has a very good heart, he would never consent to leave it for some future transplant because we need such a man as he in this House as we need all Canadians having some experience of public life.

I would also like to recall—my friend from Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton has pointed it out—that the matter comes under provincial jurisdiction, as does everything related to health. I attended the federal-provincial conference of health ministers, held last December 9, and the question of the motion of my hon. colleague from Algoma was brought up. After a brief discussion, the provincial ministers of health probably decided that, the area being so sensitive, it was probably useless to pursue the discussion.

At any rate, I would simply like to point out to the House that provincial ministers have been informed of the situation and that certain other matters which might result from it will certainly be discussed during future federal-provincial conferences, for he is right when he states that this is where these questions should be discussed since they are strictly provincial matters.

It is rather odd that this motion be introduced on the eve of what is known as "sweethearts' day", Saint Valentine's Day, and I am sure that tomorrow there will certainly be an exchange of hearts throughout Canada, which will perhaps not overjoy scientists, but those who are willing to open up their hearts. This is in the best interests of all Canadians.

Jean Rostand wrote a book entitled Pensées d'un biologiste. First, there are a few things I should like to say on the question of biology. Let me say them in English. They will be more readily understood. There are a few subtleties that cannot be easily translated. One may say that science has made men out of us without first having made us people worthy of the quality of human beings.

Another way of translating it into English would be: Science has made us Gods before we are even worthy of being men, which is, in my opinion, a very profound, thought-provoking sentence, considering the speedy progress of medical science in our times, which might well some day lead us to extinction.

As the hon. member for Algoma pointed out, that is why we should take action such as the motion advocates, precisely so that, in co-operation with the experts, we may restrain the present trend of scientific change.

I do not mean to say that science should be shoved into the background, but rather that it should be studied in co-operation with human beings who have lived and had experience either in the field of science or in some other field, in order that no action may be taken which might cut down the essence of human life.

Human Tissue Transplants

Mr. Speaker, after all is said and done, life is so very short that we must beware of curtailing it further since, apparently, in the present world everyone hopes for more recreation, less work and increasingly high salaries.

Therefore, it might be preferable, in the light of these remarks, to refrain from over-rapid progress.

[English]

For centuries man has been searching for a way to transplant body organs from one individual to another in cases where body parts have been destroyed or damaged by disease or injury. Since World War II great advances have been made in the transplantation of skin, bone, corneas, kidneys and, more recently, hearts. Many of the surgical questions surrounding transplantation were resolved by about 1950, some of the medical questions by the mid-fifties.

As this House is aware, the problems of transplanted organ rejection are being extensively studied in many major medical centres of the world. Human organ transplantation poses many difficult technical, ethical, moral and legal problems which concern not only the physicians but also lawyers, moralists, sociologists and, indeed, the community at large. It is unfortunate that the law has not co-operated with the medical profession to the extent necessary to obviate the legal aspects of organ transplant. Although in Canada court decisions are rare, it is nevertheless the fact that in some instances medical progress is still being held back by legal constraints.

I would like to review some of the difficult decisions which face the physician who is working in the field of organ transplant surgery. First, by whom is a donor pronounced dead? In the majority of cases a patient is pronounced dead by his own physician, the man who is responsible for his well-being, or by the physician who sees the patient in an emergency room. Under normal circumstances, when a dead body is found the death certificate is signed by the legally appointed physician who takes care of such duties. As the House is aware, occasions have arisen where the moment of death has been in dispute. This has happened in the case of moribund patients and the medically accepted time of death is when there is no longer evidence of brain action, as indicated by a flat or non-reactive encephalogram.

As Your Honour is aware, the time between the death of the donor and the removal of the organs for transplant purposes is critical. This applies particularly to anatomical parts such as kidneys and hearts, etc. On the other hand, bone and corneas can be stored in anatomical banks for a considerable period of time. There is also the problem of matching the anatomical donation with the blood type of the recipient, and no organ should be transplanted unless the A, B, O red cell blood groups match. Since anatomical organs cannot yet be stored for any length of time, and therefore cannot be pooled, recipients should be pooled in such numbers that when an organ of a certain blood group becomes available the proper recipient can be selected. A system such as this is already in operation in the Netherlands and isolated examples of pooled recipients have been set up in various large cities.

I would like to return, Mr. Speaker, for a few moments to some of the moral and ethical problems which come to mind. One could ask, is it right that the hope of a patient for survival should be dependent on the expectation of death of others? Or, what are the ethics of a surgical team awaiting the death of one patient in order to save another? Or, what about the case where a healthy donor volunteers an organ such as a kidney to maintain the life of another? This latter example has occurred frequently with identical twins, usually associated with kidney malfunction. Another ethical question that is raise is, who should be selected as recipient for an anatomical donation? On what basis should such choice be made? To what extent should the medical profession choose between the risk incurred by the donor of the transplant and the value of the life of the recipient? To attempt to resolve such moral and ethical issues uniformly through legislation is almost impossible because the answers depend in many cases upon the individual's religious views, his attitude to the sanctity of the human body and his respect for the individual.

To return to some of the legal problems involved in human organ transplantation, in general these relate to live donors, cadavers, recipients, attending physicians and next of kin. I have already touched on some of the issues related to live donors. Is it legal to mutilate a healthy donor to the advantage of another person? Should the donor be allowed to consent to a serious operation upon himself for the benefit of another, especially if as a result of the removal of a donated organ the donor's health might be seriously impaired? I have already mentioned the difficulties associated with defining death. A problem associated with this definition is how long should life be maintained in a donor who has irrevocable damage to his brain? Or, for example, when does death occur if such a life is being maintained artificially?

Another issue could relate to the payment or indemnification of a donor for the donation of his organs. We are aware that blood donors may sell their blood. Should donors be allowed to sell their organs to needy recipients? Would such a sale be legal? And would the recipient pay income tax on such payment or should it be regarded as capital gain? Possibly we should consider the application of sales tax to such sales. Or, if the donation is a gift, should gift tax be paid? And finally, if a financial value is attached to useable organs from cadavers, should such items be included in the estate of the deceased?

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, there are many issues involved. Perhaps these could all be summarized by the question, does a dead body have human rights which are to be protected? The problems I have identified this evening illustrate that unless there are specific statutes permitting persons to make donations of their organs or their tissues, there is a strong possibility that liability could be imposed on the doctor or institution acting upon the wishes of the donor or even of the recipient.

You have already heard, Mr. Speaker, that many Canadian provinces and territories have laws governing donation of anatomical gifts or tissues and that these laws cover medical education, research, replacement and rehabilitation. You have also heard that the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada at their meeting in 1965 adopted and recommended for enactment the human tissues act, and that this act has been used as a model in seven provinces and the Northwest Territories. The Medico-Legal Society of Toronto has acted in an advisory role to the commissioners and their work by lawyers and doctors has been used as a model for uniform legislation.

The federal government is sympathetic to the problems associated with anatomical gifts, organ transplants, and is encouraged by the work of the Medico-Legal Society. By the same token, the fact that only seven provincial and territorial legislatures have enacted uniform legislation is disturbing. The federal government is prepared to respond to the request of the provincial governments at any time. As this House has already been informed, the question of the medico-legal aspects of organ transplants was raised at the federal-provincial conference late last year. At that time the need for such a conference was not affirmed by the provincial ministers of health. Possibly as a result of this debate provincial authorities will assume new interest in the question of uniform legislation. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is always willing to respond to the consensus of provincial ministers of health in this respect.

With regard to the international aspects of the motion before the House, this is a question which has received international consideration through the World Health Organization. At this time, the European community is far ahead of the North American continent. There already exist in Europe organ exchange programs such as Euro Transplant between the Benelux countries and the federal republic of Germany, Euro Transplant Italia, Scandia Transplant between the Scandinavian countries, Euro Transplant West including France. On the North American continent there is a U.S. east coast system covering the central Atlantic coastal area and eastern United States. Los Angeles has a local system and also belongs to a more general United States system. The federal government would be willing to respond through the World Health Organization to the development of international protocols covering anatomical gifts and their transportation across international borders.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I regret to interrupt the hon. member. His remarks were very interesting, very anatomical—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And killed the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): —but I must point out that the hour for private members' business has now expired. Perhaps hon. members would permit me to make a few remarks since the hour has expired. I think it was appropriate that the four speakers who addressed the House on this very cold subject should have been two ministers, a doctor and a veterinarian. Now, if hon. members will allow me, I shall pass from the cold anatomy of the heart to the living heart and remind hon. members that Sunday the 14th—not Saturday the 13th—will be St.

Human Tissue Transplants

Valentine's Day, a day to tell our sweethearts that deep in our hearts we love them so dearly. To the ladies we say, "God bless you and thank you for everything." And to the patient members in the House, I wish you a happy and restful weekend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

END OF VOLUME III
