Mr. Nielsen: Would it not be a fairer application of the principle to say that the kind of equalization to which the hon. member is referring should come out of the common tax dollar? After all, all Canadians are taxed at the same rate. The hon. member is suggesting that an additional burden be placed on the citizens of Whitehorse in the matter of consumer rates for electricity. I suggest that the common tax dollar should be the consideration, and with that principle I would agree.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Speaker, I would not agree completely with the hon. member. I think we in Canada have made some attempt at least to provide equity on the tax dollar basis.

Let us go back to the consideration of power. What we have been referring to is a form of tax, and I agree this will cost the people of Whitehorse more. I am sure the hon. member who represents Whitehorse wants his area of the north developed and hopes that it will one day become a province. That is also my hope. It seems to me that the areas which are developed already and which have some natural advantages should be willing to contribute to areas which have not. If, for example, the people of Whitehorse service the needs of people in adjacent areas, those who live in small or rural communities, they benefit because these people are carrying on mining and trapping. Why should they not contribute something? I have argued this point in respect of Saskatchewan.

I agree that the problems of the Yukon are somewhat different since the population is more scattered and the centres are smaller; it would be more difficult to put in a good system. But I think the principle is the same. The hon. member suggests there are inefficiencies in this Crown corporation, if this is the right term. I will not argue with him in that regard. There should not be any inefficiency.

Having regard to the total picture and the principle, I think the people of large centres, whether they be in Toronto as compared with the rural areas of Ontario, in Regina as compared with the rural areas of Saskatchewan, or in the Yukon, should display a sense of reasonableness. We cannot all live in Toronto, Regina or Whitehorse. Let us accept the fact that there are people on the fringes of these large areas who want power, and that the only way they can get it is through an extension of the services from larger centres. This is a reasonable and rational approach.

From my experience, the small communities have little one horse putt-putts to generate power. Very often they only run them on Mondays so that people can do their washing, and for several hours at night. In the larger towns they have a reasonable source of power but no real commercial supply. Individual farmers have their own electricity plants. I am sure this is the case in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. These areas have this type of power supply and, logically, this will be the situation for some time. In the future we must look for a better system. We must consider an over-all system to provide power in bulk on an economically sound basis and at a cheap, efficient rate that everybody can afford.

I consider electrical power as a building block in the development of any economy. I have had the opportunity of visiting a number of electrical power-producing plants in Canada. I was at an atomic energy plant in Quebec in October. I visited one in Pickering before Christmas, and I visited the Portage dam in British Columbia. I also visited the Squaw Rapids dam and the South Saskatchewan River dam, not to mention several other steam-generating plants using coal or natural gas. It seems obvious to me that without power a country will go nowhere, but with a cheap, efficient and secure source of power we will develop business and industry to serve the people well in the outlying areas as well as Canada as a whole.

With specific reference to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, I think a Crown corporation in charge of power should insist that businesses pay a fair price for energy. Businesses should contribute to the well-being of the people in their areas. Perhaps they should contribute to an even greater extent in relation to the power they consume, because of the security of their power needs.

As I indicated earlier, I believe that the Yukon and Northwest Territories will eventually become provinces. I am certain this will be the case in respect of the Yukon. There should be some kind of equalization of costs in respect of power, roads and other development features. This is the logical approach, and I agree with the hon. member for Yukon when he talks about equalization within these two areas. The hon. member may have a point when he refers to the comparative cost of power in the Yukon and in Frobisher Bay. Perhaps there is a logical reason for this difference.

If I understood the Parliamentary Secretary correctly, this equalization is to be conducted on a regional basis. Perhaps he would tell the House whether it is the intention of the government to equate these different costs. Is the cost of power in Frobisher Bay to be at the same rate as power produced at Whitehorse?

I have not visited the Yukon but I have been in the Northwest Territories, northern Alberta, northern Saskatchewan and northern B.C. I envisage a great future for these areas if we have patience and a willingness to invest our wealth. It seems to me that one of the best things we can do is make certain there are adequate sources of power for people who move in to develop these areas. In this way we can help them avoid additional development costs.

We should, logically, look toward a larger power service and a grid system such as exists in other sections of the country. This may be a long time coming for areas such as the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, but I think we should look for something of this nature in the north. For this reason, we hope the government will extend services to supply power—hopefully, ahead of business—while at the same time encouraging business to take advantage of such an energy supply.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) received a baptism of fire today in presenting this bill regarding the Northern Canada Power Commission. It was suggested by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that because the minister was not in the House to present the bill, the Parliamentary Secretary was like a boy sent on a man's errand. I suggest to the hon. member and other members of this House that the hon. member for London West is a big boy, and big boys can be rougher than little boys.

I should like to refer to the words of the hon. member for Yukon regarding the comparison between the power plant at Watson Lake, which he indicated was fully automated and required three people to run it, and a plant somewhere in the Northwest Territories. He did not identify the plant but suggested that it required 20 people to carry out the same type of operation. I shall not attempt to be an apologist for the Northern Canada Power Commission. However, I think that when this kind of an assertion is made it would be helpful if we knew precisely the community concerned. Basically, what we are concerned with in the Northwest Territories and in other areas of the north is the provision of power.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Orange: I will answer questions in due course. We are primarily concerned with the provision of power through the cheapest and best possible system to all users, commercial and residential.

• (4:50 p.m.)

This bill proposes to do a number of things. It proposes to increase the size of the board of the Northern Canada Power Commission, to involve the commissioners and councils of the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory in the selection of individuals from the two territories in the policies and planning of the commission, and to establish a form of rate equalization through various regions of the north. I believe it is rather far-fetched to think that rate equalization would take into account the rates in a community or in a city such as Whitehorse and suggest that the rates in Frobisher Bay should be lowered at the expense of the people of Whitehorse, Yellowknife or Pine Point.

Mr. Nielsen: You are picking up the losses, now.

Mr. Orange: The bill is also intended to provide additional financing to allow the commission some latitude in terms of investigation and studies and proceeding in a much more effective and efficient manner than in the past. It might be useful if we reviewed for a moment the development of the electric power systems of the Northwest Territories. At the present time and over the past number of years, three basic agencies have been involved in the provision of power. The private sector has been involved in communities such as Hay River, Yellowknife, Providence and Enterprise.

The federal government, through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and now the territorial government itself, took on the responsibility, with the development of health and school services in the Arctic communities and other isolated areas in the Northwest Territories, to establish small diesel plants for schools, community freezers and nursing stations. These power plants were gradually upgraded to five kilowatts, ten kilowatts and 40 kilowatts. When they reach the magic figure of 100, the Northern Canada Power Commission comes in with the expertise and equipment required.

NCPC, as we like to call it, has been the basic source of supply for communities such as Frobisher Bay, Fort Smith, Inuvik, Fort Simpson and in the past four or five years for smaller communities such as Copper Mine, Baker Lake and Pond Inlet. There is a continuing move in this direction. Having been involved, in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in one stage of the development of power plants, I find it rather interesting to recall the frustration the officials of the department faced when they wanted to increase power plants from five kilowatts to ten kilowatts. In addition, they had a generator here and a generator there and were faced with the problem of providing operators. Then the Northern Canada Power Commission took a look at the situation and proposed to do an adequate job for the communities.

The problem, basically, is one of cost of providing power to the person who must pay for it himself. In most of the small communities in the north the government, through one means or another, is able to absorb this cost in its budget. The Northern Canada Power Commission, in the arrangement it has with the territorial government, has set a maximum rate of 12 cents per kilowatt hour in respect of any small community. In Inuvik, for example, probably 98 per cent of the power generated and used is used by the government to heat the school, the nursing station, the RCMP station and house, and the housing and offices of the territorial government. However, the missions and the Hudson's Bay Company are required to pay the 12 per cent rate in this community.

People might ask, what does it matter what rate the Hudson's Bay Company must pay? Well, this company, like any other successful enterprise, must make a profit. It operates on the basis of every store showing a profit at the end of the year in these isolated and remote communities. At Fort Resolution, for example, two years ago the cost of power for the store and for the manager's accommodation was in the vicinity of $500 a month. The same situation would apply in respect of places such as Inuvik. The people who buy from such a store would pay for the power through their purchases. Therefore, one problem we face which is very important to the people of both territories is how to provide the best service at the lowest possible cost.

I am concerned that our study of this bill may be one of the few opportunities to really understand and know something about the Northern Canada Power Commission and the question of power in the territories. I suggest that perhaps this bill is begging the issue. I believe it is begging the issue of private power versus public power. I believe it is begging the issue of how we can ensure power development throughout northern Canada.

I had hoped that as a result of the committee hearings of 1968, the representations made to ministers by people of the north and representations made by the private sector, somehow or other a thorough examination of power development in the north might have been made. I would have liked an independent commission set up to examine the respective roles of private and public power in the north and to clarify the uncertainty, to which the hon. member for Yukon referred, which the private sector faces when it wishes to stay but says that if it is not wanted, it will leave. The private sector says: For heaven's sake, at least tell us whether or not you want us.

I would hope the terms of reference of such a commission would include an examination of the development of a power facility in the smaller communities and responsibility for the power sources. In other words, the question is: Who will develop the major power sources which at the moment remain undeveloped? Such a commission might also look at the areas which perhaps should remain as they are in perpetuity, for purposes other than electric power development. It could examine the relationship of private companies to public companies, the possible establishment of new or alternative sources of energy such as the use of gas in the Mackenzie valley, if and when it is discovered, as well as the value and use of a public utilities commission in both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

It might also examine the granting franchises in small, unincorporated communities, without the government moving in and saying to such communities: We are going to do it. It might also determine what is best for those communities, and examine the costs and the efficiency of the Northern Canada Power Commission. Mr. Speaker, when I refer to the efficiency of the commission I want to be very careful, because over the last couple of years I have developed a great respect for the manner in which it operates generally throughout the north.

Rather than have the board comprise a majority of civil service representatives, I would like to think that the chairman could become an independent person and no longer be the Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Here, again, I do not reflect on the ability of the present chairman of the commission. I would like to see discussion take place on where the headquarters of the Northern Canada Power Commission should be located, whether it should be here in an ivory tower in Ottawa, or in Yellowknife, Frobisher Bay, Chesterfield Inlet, or Old Crow. I would like these matters to be discussed and examined by an independent commission without having to accept recommendations coming from just one side.

As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, when the parliamentary committee met with the private sector, we did not come up with any recommendations about where to proceed from here. Our discussions were virtually of no value to the development of a proper power system throughout the territories.

Mr. Nielsen: How about a task force?

Mr. Orange: I do not care whether it be an independent commission or a task force. You name it. But let us have it set up from outside so that we in Parliament can get a picture of what should happen and where we should go from here. As I said, the Northern Canada Power Commission is a good organization. I believe it can become better and that it is working in that direction. In the past, part of the problem of NCPC was that they tended to hide their achievements under a rock. They do not take credit for many of the things they have accomplished in the north, nor do they seem inclined to want to project a better image. However, this changed somewhat in centennial year when the commission sponsored the Mackenzie canoe race and donated approximately $10,000 for the purpose. Within the last few years the commission has taken an active interest in fostering the employment of local people. For example, in Fort Simpson three out of four people employed by the commission are local residents. That is a move in the right direction.

I express concern about the proposed grid system. Probably my concern is little different from that expressed by the hon. member for Yukon. I hope that one day we will be able to develop our resources in such a way that we will have a grid system that will provide equalized rates throughout the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. This would be a very desirable objective. But until that day comes—and it is a long way away—we must be concerned about including in a regional program the private sector of the industry. In Pine Point, Yellowknife, Hay River and Fort Smith, power is primarily supplied by private enterprise. The rates charged normally apply to a community in which 95 per cent of the power used is for government operations. In such a situation we see the problem of the little guy, of the small businessman or of the fur trader who lives in the community, who owns his own house and who must obtain some relief from the exorbitant rates that exist at present.

I believe it is important that in the committee we hear from members of the commission on this subject. I believe that in 1965 a study was made to determine what the cost would be to the taxpayers of Canada to provide an equalized rate—and this not a low rate—for all the residents of the Northwest Territories. It was based on rates of 3, 4 and 5 kilowatts which, by the standards of the south, are still very high. Nothing came of that report. I am not sure what the final results were. However, there was an indication of the effect on a minimum number of people, particularly people in the smaller communities throughout the Arctic and throughout the Mackenzie.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, there are many unanswered questions as a result of the introduction of this bill, which must be discussed in committee. When the minister and his officials appear before the committee it may be possible for him to indicate whether he is prepared to have a task force examine the matters referred to in this debate. In conclusion I wish to make one point that may not have much relevance to the bill under discussion but which must be considered in connection with potential power development. There are many beauty spots in the north where a conflict arises between the developer and the conservationist. I give one example of this. We have already witnessed the fuss that occurred as the result of the declaration by one arm of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development of a region on the east side of Great Slave Lake as an area suitable for a national park, an area in regard to which a second arm of the department, the Northern Canada Power Commission, had just completed an expensive study of power development on the Lockhart River. I have visited the South Nahanni, which is one of the areas where such potential conflict may arise. I hope that a decision will be made by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, taking into account the interests of all parties concerned, to create a national park in that absolutely magnificent area. It is practically the last wild river area in Canada.

I appeal to the minister and his Parliamentary Secretary to listen to the suggestions that will be made by hon. members during the committee study of this bill.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious from the comments of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and of the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) that this bill does not deal, in the comprehensive terms required, with problems of northern development, particularly with respect to the subject of power in the north. It is for this reason that I enter the discussion at this time.

I think the hon. member for Yukon has offered a solution for the dilemma in which both these hon. gentlemen, in light of their particular concern for northern development, find themselves. It provides the vehicle whereby the subject matter may be referred back to committee of the whole House, and something more adequate to deal with the subject of power at this most critical juncture in the entire program of northern development might be worked out.

As has been pointed out by the spokesmen who took part in the procedural discussion this afternoon, under our former rules we had the opportunity to debate, in a preliminary way, the propositions and proposals of government at the resolution stage. This useful device was automatically available to Parliament. Although we have streamlined parliamentary procedures to the extent that the participation of private members of the House has been considerably downgraded or, in some cases, is no longer possible, I think that in a matter as important as this we might be well advised to adopt the solution that has been constructively proposed by the hon. member for Yukon.

I am disappointed, as is the hon. member for Yukon, that the minister is not present this afternoon. We are given far too few opportunities to discuss the problems and prospects of northern development. There is a dramatic story to be told in this regard, in light of developments which have taken place in both the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories over the past decade. Perhaps the minister's absence from the House this afternoon, when a topic of such priority is being discussed, indicates that he too is not greatly elated by what is contemplated in the legislation before us.

Without doubt, the question of power is fundamental to the entire subject of northern development. The thorough investigation recommended by the hon. member for Northwest Territories is long overdue in this respect. I know, as one who had responsibility for northern development during an important period in the expansion of the department, that we considered power to be of the essence inasmuch as the main potential in northern development is in the area of resources. The development of the natural resources of the north which, as we now know, exist in abundance will draw heavily upon the power potential of the north. In particular, it will draw substantially on hydroelectric power. There are a great many undeveloped sites in both the Yukon and Northwest Territories which have substantial hydroelectric power potential.

The hon. member for Yukon has outlined the gradual evolution, if I may use that term, of the functions of that body now known as the Northern Canada Power Commission. I should like to expand further on that developmental picture. The NCPC has been used in other areas of Canada where the federal government has become involved in power developments specifically designed to assist resource development. I am referring to areas such as Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces. As the hon. member for Yukon pointed out, it is significant to note that the name of the commission when it was first organized in 1948 was the Northwest Territories Power Commission. That is when there was urgent need for public involvement in the supply of power to the isolated areas of the Northwest Territories because private enterprise had not yet moved into this area of northern Canada.

The NWT Power Commission, as it was known in those days, moved into the Yukon Territory in 1950. In 1956 the name was changed to Northern Canada Power Commission. There was a further change, in 1958, in the functions of the NCPC. This occurred when the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act was passed in this House. The NCPC, as I have already intimated, was the federal vehicle used to bring considerable benefits to the province of New Brunswick. I see the former Premier of that province, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. Flemming), smiling in approval at my reference to the assistance that was provided in his province at that time. It was also provided in Newfoundland, in connection with the Baie D'Espoir project which now is a reality in Newfoundland and is bringing considerable encouragement to the development program in that area.

The interest rate on money provided under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act was one-eighth of one per cent, which I think hon. members will agree was pretty generous on the part of the federal government of the day. A 40-year repayment period was provided for. I am not sure whether the NCPC still carries out this expanded function under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act. The point I want to make in referring to this development in 1958 is simply that it was obvious that the federal government was using NCPC to assist in power development in areas where private enterprise was not willing to undertake the risk involved, and in the undeveloped and isolated areas of Canada where public initiative was required.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to cover the same territory that was covered by both the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Northwest Territories. As the members most familiar with the current situation, they have adequately covered the ground. As a former minister of this department, I strongly support the amendment that has been put forward by the hon. member for Yukon. As I have said, it is fundamental to the entire developmental pattern that has emerged in the past decade, particularly in the Yukon Territory and to the development, albeit on a smaller scale, of the Northwest Territories. The bill that the government has placed before Parliament will further discourage the movement of private investment into this great, undeveloped, geographic empire that has fallen to the government of Canada. There are 3.5 million square miles in the Northwest Territories alone.

I am sure that all ministers who have assumed responsibility for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will agree that it has been difficult to interest private enterprise in the development of the potential in our northern territories. This is partly due to the rugged nature of the terrain, the difficulties of distance and expanse of the geography and, in some instances, to the approach of the government with respect to the role that private enterprise can play in the developing north.

The present minister made a recent trip to Europe in order to interest investment from private sources in that part of the world. When I was minister, I visited Japan. This was based on the continuing contact that we had with the then Japanese ambassador. I am speaking of the early 1960s. He displayed enthusiastic interest on behalf of his government in the investment opportunities of the Yukon Territory. Since that time projects such as the New Imperial Mines and the Anvil Mine have become operative much more quickly than would have been the case had the investment potential in Japan with regard to natural resources not become available to the Yukon Territory. I could mention other cases where private enterprisers, at great risk to themselves, moved in and developed projects. These are now producing dramatic results in terms of income, as outlined by the hon. member for Yukon.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Figures that the Carr report indicated would not be realized until 1975 have already been achieved. This is because Canada Tungsten, which produces a rare mineral in the space age, created an entire community based on this resource. Clinton Creek, which is close to the Alaska border, is another extremely important development which has been made possible by the interests of private investment in the Yukon Territory. The course the government is now taking under the bill now before the House reverses the encouraging trend that has been under way in the past decade. We have been endeavouring to minimize the natural impediments and difficulties to private investment. We have adopted a positive attitude by providing specific incentives so that private enterprise would be encouraged rather than discouraged.

As I said at the opening of my comments today, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the urgent consideration of the government with respect to the psychological implications of the amendments proposed with respect to the functions of the NCPC. Perhaps at this stage this applies more to the Yukon Territory than to the Northwest territories. In every way possible, the federal presence of Ottawa in the territories should be gradually diminishing. This revolves around the whole question of growing autonomy in the northern territories. In the early 1960s the Yukon Territory was moving ahead dramatically. This was largely on the basis of the assurance that they would be able to control more of their destiny with respect to administrative matters as well as with respect to resource development. The purport of the bill before us reverses this trend. It is bound to have a discouraging and negative effect on the impetus of northern development which has been achieved during the past decade.

The hon. member for Yukon has offered the solution for the dilemma which is obviously causing agonizing second thoughts for the hon. member for Northwest Territories. In his remarks this afternoon, he did everything except publicly repudiate the bill. Hon. members from both sides of the chamber must work together to review the principle of the bill. We normally would have had the opportunity to do this at the resolution stage, under the old rules. We must take an in-depth look at the whole trend of northern development, as recommended by the hon. member for Northwest Territories. We would then have before this House a bill of which the minister could be proud. Instead of ducking his responsibility of piloting the bill, he would be happy to come before the House of Commons. He could use the bill as a further source of information and propaganda—I use that word term in the best sense—in the interest of northern development.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate this afternoon with a great deal of interest. I thoroughly enjoyed the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary, of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and of the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange). They have given the members of this House a much better insight into the problems facing the northern areas of Canada.

It is not my intention to spend a great deal of time debating the various clauses of the bill now before us. I wish to take this opportunity to make some rather general remarks about northern Canada and this bill. The bill which we are discussing deals with what I have always looked upon as two separate entities, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. The federal government should take another look at its plans for the future development of our nation. If at some time in the future the government feels we should have an additional two or more provinces in the northern part of our nation, we should logically and sensibly proceed to develop the various economic interests and ties of these areas. By this I mean that eventually, I suppose, the Yukon will be a Canadian province in its own right, with power to deal with its resources in the same way as other provinces.

In these circumstances, it is only sensible that we should develop plans for this territory along lines which will eventually suit it as a self-governing province. This applies also to the Territories. If, on the other hand, there is a move by the federal government to incorporate the two regions into one vast province, that is a different matter. As far as I can make out, there is no clearcut plan to govern the way in which these areas are to develop as far as power transmission to them is concerned. I realize there is a degree of self-government in these regions, but I feel there should be far more responsible self-government than there is at present.

Although the measure before us is not the best bill in the world, the act which it proposes to amend has certainly been of service to the areas concerned. I think there are opportunities for vast improvements in some respects, though I disagree greatly with parts of the speech made by the hon. member for Yukon. I believe that public ownership of power, if sensibly handled, can become a tremendous weapon for full economic development in areas such as the north. I was shocked to hear this afternoon that many of the smaller communities have been neglected for more than 20 years by a commission which was in fact set up to look after the interests of those rural areas, if you can call them rural.

When we are dealing with remote areas such as the north, subsidies are certainly in order if there is to be proper development there, even in connection with the supply of power. The hardy citizens who go to these areas are entitled to some of the amenities which we in a warmer climate enjoy.

The bill proposes to increase the membership of the commission by two members. I understand the new members are to be local people who understand local needs. This is an excellent idea and I have no objection to it. But the composition of the commission is another thing. I firmly believe that the deputy minister has no right to be sitting on the commission as chairman. If the commission is to show any measure of independence, it must be divorced from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Unless this is done, the minister and departmental officials will be giving too much political direction concerning the way in which the commission should operate. The government should look into the possibility of appointing a chairman from outside the department.

I note that it is proposed to increase from $50,000 to $250,000 the amount of money the commission can spend on investigations. Again, this is a step forward; the commission cannot do much with $50,000 to investigate the possibilities of sites for power development in the north. I hope that when we talk about investigation of hydro or power sites we shall not fall into the trap into which a number of hydro utilities have fallen throughout Canada. We have experienced this in British Columbia. Frequently hydro sites have been chosen because engineers have said, "This is a good site for the production of power." Tremendous ecological damage has been caused because adequate surveys were never made. There is still no legislation to oblige Crown corporations to carry out surveys to ascertain what ecological and other damage could be done if a dam were built. Consequently, huge hydro dams have been built at a number of sites throughout Canada, resulting in tremendous ecological damage.

I should like to see a safeguard put into the bill before us. A very simple amendment would do the job. It is that Crown corporations would be subject to the terms of the Navigable Waters Act. If this were done, they too would be required to make sure, when applying for permission to build a dam on a particular river, that they had a good case to present to the federal authorities and had taken into account possible damage to the ecology of the area. The way things are today, there could be a repetition of what happened on the Peace River when the Bennett Dam was built. No authorization was needed. The hydro authority was not required to tell the government what they proposed to do. No surveys were made to find out what damage would be done, and now we find that the whole of the Mackenzie Delta is in jeopardy because of a dam which was built before adequate surveys had been made to determine its effect on the ecology of the area.

Another point was raised in connection with rates. Again, I appreciate the objection voiced by the hon. member for Yukon. He looks forward to the Yukon becoming eventually a separate province, and feels that profits made from the sale of power there should not go to subsidize a little plant thousands of miles away in another part of Canada. There is some logic to this, certainly. In the case of an operation such as we have in British Columbia, covering the whole province, everything can be put into a pot and the rural areas can be subsidized. But in this case we find settlements set up all over the north separated by many hundreds of miles, and this amounts to a different proposition. We were not given a very clear explanation of what "regions" means. I think these regional areas might afford the Yukon protection in the matter of price equalization. This might well be the answer; I do not know. However, this matter can be examined during the committee stage.

With regard to setting rates on a regional basis, a point raised by some hon. members in the House, it is for the commission to decide rates as well as regions. I do not think you will get complete uniformity throughout. It might be very difficult to apply rates evenly across the entire area. I have looked at one of these reports and I can see nothing wrong with government subsidization. For example, the government has subsidized some of the coal used in coal-fired plants and this has helped reduce the end cost of the product—in this case, the cost of the electricity produced and supplied to residents. Something of this sort could be done for those living in the remote areas.

However, let me make it clear that I do not think the private utility companies are going to be a sort of fairy godmother to people in the north in regard to bringing power to remote areas. I was a member of the provincial House in British Columbia for a number of years. We fought for some time to try and force the private utility companies to put lines through some of the rural sections of the province, but they refused to do so. We carried on the fight before the public utilities commission, before the B.C. legislature and in the press. We held meetings and put all the pressure we could on the private companies. In many cases people had been living for generations without the enjoyment of the amenities of electricity, something they should have had. Public power finally did the job. I think the same pattern will emerge in the north.

For this reason I think the Northern Canada Power Commission could do an immensely good job of assisting such areas to obtain power at an average or moderate cost. I do not think these people should be called upon to pay high prices for electricity. If necessary, I think the government of Canada should not hesitate to give residents living in such areas large subsidies to help keep rates down. I think we owe this to these residents.

I should like to say a few words about power in northern areas. I feel not enough planning has been done in regard to power projects and other economic developments in the north. Generally speaking, to date the north has proved to be a huge treasure house of raw materials. Mining companies have moved into the north and set up operation. Unfortunately, we have witnessed all this raw material being shipped out of the area for processing. It is here that I suggest planning be done. The power commission should sit down with officials from other government departments and discuss steps to be taken to bring about more fabrication, more processing, of the raw materials that are presently being taken out of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. This processing should be done in the north where the raw materials are found.

Mr. Nielsen: Such as smelting.

Mr. Harding: Yes, smelting and processes like that. That is what the north needs. Such a development would be based upon huge quantities of power being made available to the smelters, the concentrators and so on. I understand there are some concentrators in the north now, but I am sure other industries would also spring up.

This is the kind of planning that should be provided for in a bill such as this or in some other type of legislation.

We must concern ourselves with what we will do for the people in the north. We talk about the Indians and the Eskimos who also live in the north, but alongside the Indians and Eskimos are a large number of other people who have gone north because they enjoy tough conditions and the type of life there. We must learn to develop the Canadian north economically. To do so we will require huge quantities of power which will have to be subsidized. As I say, we must first plan how we are to develop the north. In this regard, it is time the government laid down some guidelines. For example, the province of Ontario is insisting that a certain amount of processing of raw materials take place before those materials are allowed to leave the province. I see no reason why areas of the north should not enjoy some of the prosperity that comes from this type of economic development, though it is economic development in its very first stages. I urge the minister and his departments take another look at this problem.

I notice in the last report that there has been a considerable increase in electrical power consumption in the north. There has been a 10.1 per cent increase in electric power consumption and a 6.6 per cent increase in consumption of power for heating purposes.

Mr. Nielsen: There has been a 100 per cent increase in Whitehorse.

Mr. Harding: The hon. member for Yukon says there has been a 100 per cent increase in Whitehorse. This is an indication that people are using and want more power, and that the population of the north is growing. As I say, the north is one of the few remaining treasure houses of the world. With proper planning we can make certain it is adequately developed.

One last matter in conclusion. I do not think we should always think of power in terms of diesel or hydro generation. There are gasfields in the north and gas is one of the cheapest and best sources of power. Eventually there will be a number of localities in the north where power will be generated by gas turbines—turbines might be used in some areas even now—fed by the natural gas that is found there in abundance.

One hon. member made reference to the oil and gas-lines that might eventually come down along the Mackenzie River to Edmonton and be dispersed to other parts of Canada, and possibly even further south. Again, I believe we cannot leave this entirely to free enterprise. The government must make certain that there are proper plans regarding gas and oil distribution. This is another essential factor as far as development in the north is concerned.

There may be someone else who wants to say a few words on this rather interesting bill. In closing, I should like to say I thoroughly enjoyed the discussion which has taken place this afternoon. Let me congratulate particularly those hon. members who represent northern areas of Canada and who this afternoon gave the members of this House a picture of the north and the developments taking place there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), put a motion before the House. At that time I asked the House for an opportunity to consider it and to look at the authorities. If hon. members agree, I intend to dispose of the motion now and make a brief comment on my reasons. Before doing so it might be useful if I read the main motion and the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yukon. The main motion is the following:

That Bill C-193, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The proposed amendment thereto is as follows:

That all the words after "that" be left out and the following inserted:

"this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the recommendation in relation to the bill be referred to a committee of the Whole House".

I have had an opportunity to consider the very helpful arguments on the procedural point posed by hon. members, and to consult some of the authorities. I will very briefly give the two points which I feel make the proposed motion unacceptable to the Chair, on a procedural basis.

The first point relates to relevancy. Hon. members will note that the amendment is that the subject matter of the recommendation be referred to a committee of the whole House rather than the subject matter of the bill itself. I might point out that the recommendation is not before the House in any legal or formal sense. The relevant Standing Order provides that a recommendation is to be attached or annexed to a bill. I believe this is for the convenience of members.

It seems to me that the recommendation is not part of the bill and that we cannot consider it as such. The recommendation, therefore, is not relevant to the provisions of the bill; rather, it is extraneous to the provisions of the bill. Without reading it, I might mention Beauchesne's citation 203(1), which is helpful in this regard.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) put forward a very helpful argument on procedural aspects and the substance of this amendment. If I followed him correctly, he suggested that if the motion were adopted by the house, our procedure would not allow us to follow through after the committee had considered the subject matter of the recommendation. That was a useful argument, but before accepting it the Chair must also determine whether the motion is acceptable on the basis of precedent. I was not able to find any precedent in respect of this type of motion. That, in itself, may not be sufficient reason to rule it out of order.

There are precedents which would suggest that the subject matter of a bill, or an amendment providing that the subject matter be referred to a standing or select committee, or an established entity, commission or agency, would be acceptable; but there seems to be no precedent providing for a referral, at this stage of the proceedings, to a committee of the whole House. For those reasons I regret that on procedural grounds I cannot accept this motion.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the Clerk of the House indicated that the Chair might put the motion I have proposed by way of an amendment, with the consent of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has indicated that where the House is agreeable—and in this regard I must ask for unanimous consent—the amendment to the motion might be put in the way the hon. member has suggested. Without making a ruling on the procedural correctness of this amendment, I should like to ask the House whether there is unanimous consent. If there is unanimous consent, I think the motion as suggested by the hon. member, might be put to the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: The proposed amendment to the motion would then read:

That all the words after "that" be left out and the following inserted:

"this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a task force appointed under the Inquiries Act."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before ruling on the proposed amendment to the main motion I should like to refer to its procedural acceptability. Hon. members will recall that a similar procedure was before the House on January 13 in respect of a motion proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). Although that motion was somewhat extended, it was similar in terms. After considerable argument about its procedural acceptability, there was unanimous consent and the Chair felt the motion could be accepted. The motion was then put along the same line as now suggested in the motion proposed by the hon. member for Yukon.

Before I put the proposed motion, and so we will have this on the record, I should like to draw a distinction between this motion and what seems to be clearly acceptable in respect of this kind of motion. I refer to citation 386(1) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. I shall not read the whole citation, but it reads in part as follows:

That the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

There is an indication that this was procedurally correct, but there is a fine distinction and I think it is important that we make it. The formal motion which Beauchesne indicates to be correct, and for which there are precedents in this House, differs from the proposed motion of the hon. member for Yukon and the motion of the hon. member for Calgary North. The amendment advanced by the hon. member for Yukon proposes the referral of the subject matter to a task force appointed under the Inquiries Act. That is the distinction I should like to make at this point. It seems that it might be procedurally acceptable to refer the subject matter of a proceedings at this stage to an entity, group or commission which is in existence.

I had reservations last week as to the procedural correctness of referring the subject matter to a task force which was to be subsequently appointed. I have the same reservations in respect of the proposed motion of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). However, if there is unanimous consent of the House, and if it is the desire of hon. members to follow the precedent established last week, I would, by unanimous consent, be prepared to accept the motion.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, apropos your last remarks, there was unanimous consent of the House to allow the hon. member to amend his motion, but I hope this will not be taken as unanimous agreement in respect of its orderliness or regularity. In addition, since it is obvious the debate will not conclude this evening and the vote on the main motion for referral would have to be taken at a later time, perhaps tomorrow or later in the week, it was our intention to ask Your Honour to call it six o'clock if a ruling were to be given.

That being the case, it would perhaps be in order to request You Honour to consider the regularity of the motion for the reason Your Honour has just pointed out, namely, that there does not appear to be any precedent for referring either the bill or the subject matter, at this stage, to a body which is not yet constituted. Complementary to that problem is the fact that there may not, certainly on a casual reading, be authority under the Inquiries Act to set up a task force. If this is not an argument that stands alone, it is certainly one that tends to support the feeling Your Honour may have concerning the regularity of an attempt to refer something to a body which does not exist, because it may not be possible to bring such a body into existence. I submit that Your Honour's fears are well grounded in respect of the regularity of the motion, and I would ask Your Honour to reserve your ruling on it and to consider the matter further.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might say a few brief words. I am sure we all agree that whatever happens, it should happen tomorrow rather than now, since six o'clock has gone by. However, with reference to Your Honour's query concerning whether the amendment now before us, like the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) of last week, is in order, in view of the fact that the proposed task force does not exist, may I point out that citation 386 paragraph (2) seems to permit an amendment of this kind which urges the setting up of a select committee to consider the subject matter of a bill.

What I am saying is that there does not seem to be anywhere the kind of requirement that the entity to which the subject matter is to be referred must already exist. It so happens that the Board of Railway Commissioners did exist, but there is also this permission to refer the matter to a select committee that is to be set up.

The whole issue raised by the Chair is in respect of whether the body to which the matter is to be referred must already be in existence. I submit that under citation 386 (2), that requirement does not obtain and that whatever we may decide about the substance of the motion, it would seem to me, having gone this far, we should find it in order. But that, of course, is for Your Honour to do. I support the Parliamentary Secretary in his suggestion that whatever finding is made be made tomorrow.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak very briefly on the proposed amendment before us and the dilemma the Chair mentioned, of the very thin line involved here and the question of whether or not it might be resolved by unanimous consent. Although the hon. gentleman who just sat down is an acknowledged expert on the rules, I would point out that the significant thing in respect of the amendment of 1934 which referred a matter, I believe, to the Board of Railway Commissioners is that in so doing the statement was made that the amendment was as much a declaration of policy as if it had stated that the question of adjusting the railway rates on grain should be investigated by the board.

I believe this is a very fundamental point. In the reference to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, the inference was that there was not a deviation in policy. In other words, it was being referred to a type of board which would not in any way indicate any deviation from the basic policy enunciated in the bill. The basic point is covered in the first part of citation 386 rather than the point the hon. gentleman raised when he referred to paragraph 2. I do not think the amendment should be permitted.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Before Your Honour calls it six o'clock I have a very brief word to say about this matter. Also, before Your Honour calls it six o'clock perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome) will indicate the business for tomorrow.

In respect of the question to which Your Honour is now giving consideration, cluttered up with the arguments advanced by the other side, in the last few years the words "task force" have been engraved upon the hearts of the people of Canada. This is a government of task forces. The expression "task force" has now been given a specific meaning like the Holy Writ. I think Your Honour might take judicial notice of the fact that this is a government which operates by task forces.

While there might be some merit in the argument raised by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and the Parliamentary Secretary, I suggest we are a body which from time to time must advance, like the principles of constitutional law, by comparing it with a growing tree. We on this side believe that while the rules are there for the guidance of Your Honour, they must be changed and adapted to the need of a changing society. We are prepared to see Your Honour make some advance in this way and hope you will follow the precedents which have been sanctified by unanimous consent. I think this is a point Your Honour should take into account.

Northern Canada Power Commission Act

Without meaning to prevent other members participating in this interesting debate, I think the Parliamentary Secretary might tell us what we might hope to accomplish tomorrow and Friday.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I would refer Your Honour to the several inquiries set up by way of motions in 1963, 1964 and 1965. Such matters were referred to bodies which did not exist at that time.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I will simply say there is no intention to change the order of business from that announced by the House leader earlier this week.

At 6.12 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES AIR FORCE PERSONNEL REDUCTION, GOOSE BAY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43. My motion deals with an announcement made this morning that effective June 30 this year there will be a reduction of 570 military personnel, representing approximately 40 per cent of the United States Air Force complement at Goose Bay, and also a reduction of 30 in the civilian force. As it would appear that the same pattern of phase-out as at other United States installations in Newfoundland—Harmon Field, Pepperel and Argentia—has commenced, and as the Goose Bay area appears to offer no alternative employment opportunities whatsoever, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs take immediate action to determine the full intent of the American authorities with regard to the future of the U.S. base at Goose Bay.

That the government immediately move to prepare a contingency plan to meet what would undoubtedly be an emergency situation of national importance should the Americans completely abandon this base as in the cases of Harmon Field and Fort Pepperel.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member who has just spoken. Before it can be put to the House unanimous consent is required under the terms of Standing Order 43. I will therefore inquire whether there is such unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and consequently the motion cannot be put under the terms of Standing Order 43.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS RELATING TO ARREST AND BAIL

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-218, to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

TAXATION—ONTARIO PLAN TO AID SMALL BUSINESSES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Minister of Finance who I know is lurking behind the curtains because I have seen his pipe and his face behind it. I wonder if we could wait for a moment until the hon. minister takes his place. Can we give him a hand, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Tally-ho!

Mr. Hees: It is nice to see him back. My question is: As two months have now passed since the last federal-provincial finance ministers conference to which the treasurer of the province of Ontario submitted for consideration a plan to aid small business, has the Minister of Finance given consideration to this proposal during the intervening period and has he decided that it would be possible to utilize this excellent plan to aid small businesses across the country?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I have not only reviewed this plan but I have reviewed alternatives to it. As I have indicated previously, we have been looking at the situation—the white paper proposals, the submissions of business and the submissions of the province of Ontario with respect to the small business problem—and I would hope that when the tax bill is ultimately produced it will be well accepted by small business in the country.

Another point I should like to bring out is that the treasurer of Ontario has asked for a further meeting between provincial treasurers and finance ministers and myself. I am trying to arrange such a meeting in February but I am having a little difficulty because there are some important things going on for the Tory party in Ontario in February.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hees: I am glad to learn that the minister has compared this very excellent plan with the proposals contained in his white paper. In the course of this comparison has he not come to the conclusion that this plan is preferable to doing away with the 21 per cent tax rate and replacing it with the full 50 per cent levy, which seems to be the only real interest the minister has taken in small business?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary is in the form of an argument and I would not think it is acceptable in such terms.

ENERGY

UNITED STATES PROPOSAL FOR GAS PIPELINE ACROSS CANADA FROM ALASKA—COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION —CONTINENTAL POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister arising out of a statement made yesterday by the United States Federal Power Commissioner, Albert Brooke, to the effect that the Nixon administration is trying to hasten the construction of a natural gas pipeline across Canada from Alaska because of the energy shortages being experienced south of the border? Has such a proposal been received from the government of the United States, are any discussions going on and has any decision been reached?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions, of course, about the building of this gas pipeline. Just how far those have involved bilateral discussions between officials of our two governments I am not quite certain at the moment. But it would be our wish that a gas pipeline be built, I think it would be in the interests of Canadians as well as of Americans.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Would the Acting Prime Minister be prepared to give an assurance that, before any decision is made with respect to the construction of such a pipeline, the whole matter will be referred to a standing committee of the House in order that we may have an opportunity of seeing what the gas needs of Canadians are, whether or not they would be affected, and also any studies that have been made of the ecological effects of the construction of such a pipeline through Canadian territory?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that the ordinary procedure would be used in any application for the building of a pipeline in Canada. Parliament has laid down a procedure for the use of the National Energy Board. They would receive the application, and I am sure they would be as careful about Canadian interests as my hon. friend.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since U.S. Federal Power Commissioner Brooke also said, "Concurrent with this is the effort to develop a common continental energy policy with our Canadian neighbours", may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether discussions are going on at any level of government with respect to a continental energy policy, and would the government be prepared to make a statement on motions to give the House some information as to what energy commodities are being discussed and under what terms?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think I can say quite categorically that no discussions are going on between Canada and the United States in regard to a continental energy policy. I do wish to add, however, that I think the respective developments in our two countries should be co-ordinated as much as possible so as to gain maximum advantage for both countries.

CONTINENTAL POLICY—PRESSURE BY UNITED STATES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Were the ministers who attended the latest interministerial conference between Canada and the United States, which as the minister knows takes place once or twice a year, subjected to any behind the scenes pressure brought to bear on the Canadian government, as it has been in the past, for a continental energy policy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED STATES PROPOSAL FOR GAS PIPELINE ACROSS CANADA FROM ALASKA—PROTECTION OF HUNTING AND FISHING GROUNDS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Would the minister inform the House whether any steps have been taken, or will be taken, by the government to protect the traditional hunting and fishing grounds of the native peoples of the north over whose lands the pipeline will likely be routed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that if the National Energy Board were to recommend to the government the issuing of a licence for this purpose, the protection of the natural environment and the interests of the local inhabitants would be taken into account in reaching a decision.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—ESTABLISHMENT OF GRANT PROGRAM

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that the President of the National Dairy Industry Council, Mr. Jackson, speaking at a meeting of the annual convention of Canadian dairy producers in Fredericton, predicted a shortage of milk by 1972 as a result of domestic and foreign demand exceeding the level of production for the current year, can the minister tell us whether his government intends to develop a program for the purpose of helping farmers to produce more milk?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and some very constructive actions were taken by the dairy industry itself and a number of the provincial marketing agencies related to that industry within the last few days. I am not persuaded that there is going to be a shortage of milk or milk products in Canada for a very long time, and perhaps not at all.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

In view of this threat, would the minister not consider immediately ceasing "penalizing" those farmers who are currently exceeding their quotas?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the supplementary question is in the form of a suggestion. The hon. member should assume that the minister will consider it.

PENITENTIARIES

PRINCE ALBERT—RESULTS OF INQUIRY INTO RIOT—REINSTATEMENT OF GUARDS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It has to do with the situation at Prince Albert penitentiary. Has the investigation into the recent riot or disorder in the penitentiary been completed, and will the guards or warders who were suspended be reinstated?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the inquiry has been completed and the correction officers who had been suspended have resumed work. At the present time, a grievance has been filed and it is still under study at the level of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to ask the minister whether or not the major criticisms that were made in the investigation were to the effect that orders from Ottawa from the head of the penitentiary service, who is totally unacquainted with penitentiary service having had no experience in that direction, brought about a situation in which the convicts in the penitentiary assumed superiority and authority even over the warders?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the officials in Ottawa who are responsible for the administration of the Penitentiary Service enjoy my utmost confidence and I think they are people of experience who know about the problems in the penitentiaries and who are in direct contact with those who manage operations inside the penitentiaries.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, was a person not recently appointed as head of the penitentiary service who had no acquaintance with or knowledge of penitentiaries whatsoever?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. He may have answered this question in response to the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert. If he did I did not catch the answer. I would like to know whether the inquiry into the riot at Prince Albert has been completed?

Mr. Goyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Supplementary to that, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize for not getting the answer the first time, would the Solicitor General be prepared to make the results of that inquiry public?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I think that it has generally been recognized by the House that such inquiries are of a private nature and must serve our own purposes. Had I not been satisfied with the inquiry that was conducted, I could have used other means and turned to a higher level, but I think that this inquiry was performed very efficiently and that the situation is back to normal in that penitentiary.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary to the hon. gentleman and counter his suggestion. It is not a well recognized practice. Such inquiry reports have been made public on previous occasions. In any event, inasmuch as there appears on the Order Paper under the name of the government a referral to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee specifically dealing with penitentiaries, specifically for the committee to travel, and specifically to look at the situation in Prince Albert, does the minister not think he could take the members of that committee into his trust and let them see the report?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

SUGGESTED STUDY OF PROBLEMS BY COMMISSION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. In view of the recurring riots and troubles at Prince Albert and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiaries and others across the country, would the minister set up a commission of experts to study these problems so we can have better enforcement of penitentiary administration throughout the country?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Better administration.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, following the publication of the Ouimet report, two commissions have been established, whose task it is to inquire into the penitentiary system. There is, in my department, a commission that sits permanently, and there is an interdepartmental commission that meets as required. These days, this is indeed required, as was probably the case five years ago, and as it might be five years from now. Therefore, it is a permanent problem, and it is reviewed on a permanent basis in order to improve the situation that prevails in our penitentiaries.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTENT OF UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES REGARDING FUTURE USE OF GOOSE BAY AIR FORCE BASE

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, as some nameless voice keeps refusing unanimous consent to reasonable motions, I should like to direct the following question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of today's announcement regarding an approximate 40 per cent reduction of the military force at the United States Air Force base at Goose Bay and some reduction of the civilian force at the same base, will the minister undertake immediately to determine the intent of the United States authorities with regard to the future of that base?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the announcement from the United States government made clear, the United States and Canadian governments have already been very closely in touch on all aspects of this matter.

Mr. Peddle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Defence. Will he give immediate consideration to the defence committee's recommendation that Goose Bay be reactivated as one of the strategic Canadian bases for maritime command operation, for Arctic patrol and for patrol of Canada's coastal waters?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have had that under consideration for some time.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think the people in that part of Canada have a right to know what their future is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his supplementary.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I was merely trying to lay a premise for my question which is very urgent and important. Has the government determined what are the intentions of the United States government with regard to the future of this installation which is so important to the economy of that particular part of the country?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The reductions are part of a thinning out process on the part of the United States government. To answer the question directly, it is not the intention of the United States government to declare Goose Bay surplus to United States' requirements. They intend to retain the base.

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON USE BY CANADA OF GOOSE BAY FACILITIES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could direct a supplementary to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister had any discussions with the United States military authorities in respect of the use of their base and facilities at Goose Bay?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I have not personally had discussions but I would be quite prepared to inquire to see what departmental or military discussions have taken place.

UNITED STATES AIR FORCE PERSONNEL REDUCTION, GOOSE BAY—CONTINGENCY EMPLOYMENT PLAN FOR DISPLACED CIVILIANS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government has a contingency plan such as was alluded to by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and when the House might be apprised of the plan the government has in mind to offset the impact of the reduction or thinning out the minister mentioned, which is a reduction of 40 per cent?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The number of civilian employees involved is 30. As I understand it, about half will be laid off and the remainder will accept alternative employment with the United States Department of Defence. The Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are working very closely with the local authorities in an effort to minimize the impact. As a result of the representations we made to the United States government, they have substantially improved the conditions for the release of the employees. Under the circumstances I think we have done everything reasonably possible to mitigate the effects of this reduction.

COMMUNICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO LOAN BY GOVERNMENT TO TELESAT TO BE REPAID BY ISSUANCE OF SHARES TO PUBLIC

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Communications who is scheduled to be here today, but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government decided to make a loan of some $30 million to Telesat during the next two or three years, with the intention that the loan be repaid in a few years by the issuing of shares to the public?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the question is so urgent that it should be asked during the oral question period. The hon. member is referring to something which might be done within two or three years. It seems to me that normally this kind of question should be put in writing. If there is urgency which is not apparent to me, perhaps the minister might want to reply to the hon. member's question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I will take the question as notice. It is the kind of technical question to which I could not ordinarily be expected to have the answer.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, may I explain to Your Honour that I must have worded my question badly. The decision is being made now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In any event I do not think that should be considered as a point of order. The hon. member's question has been allowed and an answer of sorts has been given to him.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, of sorts, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister a supplementary question? When he draws the matter to the attention of the Minister of Communications, would he consider whether it should be a loan or whether, in view of the fact that the Canadian people will be taking the risk, we should not add to our equity ownership in Telesat?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's supplementary question is in the form of a submission.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—INQUIRY AS TO DETENTION OF PERSONS WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. As several weeks have gone by now since the implementation not only of the War Measures Act but of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, is anyone now incarcerated who has not been charged with a particular offence either under the Code or under the special new legislation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I will take that question as notice in view of the way it was put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—SPEECH BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the proceedings at the Singapore conference. Would the Acting Prime Minister be good enough to obtain and hopefully table in the House a copy of the Prime Minister's set speech in which he urged the abolition of set speeches at such gatherings?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest it would be difficult to accept a supplementary question to a question which is clearly not in order. I will return to the hon. member in a moment. At this time I recognize the hon. member for Spadina.

WELFARE

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY FUNDS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the statement of the mayor of Saskatoon regarding a national survey of municipalities and their welfare and unemployment pressures this winter, is the government prepared to provide emergency funds for the municipalities beyond what was stated in the budget?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I expect that this subject will be on the agenda of the meeting of welfare ministers later this month.

Mr. Ryan: Has the government conducted its own survey of the impact of unemployment on the services and finances of the municipalities? If so, will the minister table the government's findings?

Mr. Sharp: The government is generally aware of the impact upon the municipalities, but there is no special survey that could be tabled.

YOUTH

RECOMMENDATION BY TASK FORCE THAT SERVICE COLLEGES BE ABOLISHED—REQUEST THAT REPORT BE TABLED

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Are he and his officials giving consideration to the recommendation made by the task force appointed by the Secretary of State to look into the problems of youth to the effect that service colleges should be abolished?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I would say that would be speculation on the part of the hon. member.

Mr. Orlikow: I would like to ask the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada whether he would consider tabling the recommendations made by the task force appointed by the Secretary of State, which I understand have now been given to the minister?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): I think the Secretary of State said in the House a few days ago that when the final report was available and had been considered by cabinet, he would give consideration to tabling it or making it available in some other way. I believe he answered that question a week or ten days ago.

INDUSTRY

MANIWAKI, QUE.—DISCUSSIONS REGARDING SUBSIDIZATION OF SOGEFOR LIMITED

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Is he in a position to tell this House whether he has had any talks with the government of the province of Quebec with a view to granting money one way or another to the SOGEFOR plants in Maniwaki and Lac-des-Îles?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Abitibi wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Laprise: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the minister whether he intends to get in touch with the Quebec authorities or the SOGEFOR management and come to an agreement which might forestall the closing of the plants on March 5 next?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a suggestion which he must assume will be taken into account.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEWFOUNDLAND—PROPOSED INCENTIVE GRANTS TO PRIMARY INDUSTRIES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether the government is giving consideration to a proposal from the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council to allow primary industries in Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland to qualify for regional incentive grants in view of the failure of the program in these two provinces?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this request. It has likely reached my department and I shall have the opportunity to discuss it.

PARTICIPATION BY MINISTER IN NEWFOUNDLAND CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In view of the criticism levelled at the minister and his department by the Premier of Newfoundland, is it the minister's intention to participate in the economic conference planned in Newfoundland for February 4, and will he have his five-year development plan ready by that time?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have seen several letters and statements from Mr. Smallwood congratulating the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, but I am not aware of the last one. Unfortunately, I shall be unable to attend this conference.

DRUGS

LEGALITY OF POSSESSION OF HALLUCINOGEN MDA

Mr. Gordon Sullivan (Hamilton Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the recent death of Tom Coles in Toronto caused by sniffing the hallucinogen MDA, is the government considering making possession of this drug illegal?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I suppose that question falls more properly under the authority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but because of its importance I should like to answer it now. The question, I think, is based on an editorial in a Toronto newspaper to the effect that MDA is not covered under the present legislation. I am advised that in fact the drug MDA was added to Schedule J of the Food and Drugs Act on November 26, 1969. It is therefore a restricted drug, and both possession and trafficking are currently unlawful.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the name of the newspaper? It is so far behind the times.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INABILITY OF DISPLACED BOWATERS MERSEY SAWMILL EMPLOYEES TO COLLECT BENEFITS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. Because of a decline in the sale of lumber the Bowaters Mersey Paper Company closed its sawmill in Bridgewater, Nova Scotia, on December 15. However, its employees have been unable to collect their unemployment insurance to date. In view of the seriousness of their economic situation, will the minister investigate the matter to determine the reason for the non-payment of claims?

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

OPPORTUNITY FOR MEMBERS TO EXPRESS VIEWS PRIOR TO ACTION ON TOLLS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the visit of the Minister of Transport to Washington, presumably on the St. Lawrence Seaway toll matter, will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that there will not be any action, unilateral or otherwise, by the Canadian government on this matter until members of the House have had a chance to express themselves, preferably in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I think I can give one assurance, namely, that it will be some time before a decision is taken.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In view of the fact that the Minister of Transport is absent because of his meeting with his United States counterparts on this very important issue, would the Acting Prime Minister, in his charitable way, advise or instruct the Minister of Transport to make a statement on motions immediately on his return to Canada on what conclusions were reached in his discussions with his U.S. counterparts?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DESIGNATION OF MONTREAL REPORTER AS FOREIGN CORRESPONDENT IN PUBLICATION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Secretary of State, but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to the Acting Secretary of State or to the Acting Prime Minister. Possibly the matter should be raised as a question of privilege, but I think I will follow the alternative of putting it as a question.

I have in front of me a copy of a publication of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation called "Closed Circuit". The headline on the front page reads, "CBC Foreign Correspondents Picked Stories of the Year", and there are pictures of six so-called foreign correspondents, one from Moscow, one from Washington, one from the United Nations, one from the Far East, one from Paris and one, Mr. Peter Daniel, from Montreal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: It may seem somewhat humourous, but in view of the present circumstances in Canada it seems to me to be a rather serious matter that a Crown corporation, the CBC, should publish something like this that can be used by many in this country as an excuse for certain actions. I was wondering—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member proposes to ask a question following the statement he has made.

Mr. Nesbitt: Your Honour, perhaps there was a little disturbance in the House. I was going to say, would the Acting Prime Minister or, preferably, the Acting Secretary of State look into this matter and provide some explanation to the House since the CBC costs the country $180 million a year?

GRAIN

INCREASE IN WHEAT DELIVERY QUOTAS TO FILL MANITOBA ELEVATOR SPACE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that as of mid-December some 50 per cent of the elevator space in the province of Manitoba was vacant, could the minister advise the House whether a further immediate increase in general wheat quotas will be provided to allow more of this space to be filled more quickly than will otherwise happen?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the House well knows, it is our hope that the elevator system will not be overfilled and that it will be in a position to operate at peak efficiency. It is true, of course that an extra number of deliveries out of Manitoba elevators led to a depletion of stocks in those elevators during the last part of 1970. Since that time wheat quotas have been opened and an additional five bushels has been added to the barley quota bringing it up to 20 bushels throughout all Manitoba blocks. We think that with these actions we will soon see an increase in the stocks in these elevators.

Mr. Benjamin: In view of the number of complaints that various Members of Parliament have been getting about the amount of space in country elevators, can the minister advise us how quickly the remaining seven shipping blocks still on a three-bushel general quota will be raised to four bushels, and when we can expect a further general increase for all shipping blocks?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. My information from the Wheat Board is that most of the blocks were in fact put on the four-bushel quota for wheat. Those which were not were ones in which space was required for barley movement or the movement of other grain. The Wheat Board makes these judgments according to the amount of grain required for market, and with the system of shipping blocks it has some confidence that the grain can be delivered in time.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS PROGRAM—DEVELOPMENT OF COMMUNITY PASTURES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a related question. I raised the original question on Monday last when I asked the minister whether community pastures would no longer be opened up as has been done under PFRA. The minister indicated that I had misstated the facts. I have obtained a copy of the pamphlet issued by the minister in which he says that "any programs and policies which tend to encourage the breaking of new land would be discouraged." I wonder whether the minister wishes to correct the wrong impression he apparently left at that time and also his allegation that I misstated the facts?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might say that the statement which the hon. member has just quoted is correct, whereas the statement he referred to earlier was not.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the minister whether it will no longer be policy of the government to open community pastures?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the difficulty with that question is that it goes well beyond the narrow issue contained in the other statement. The exact nature of ARDA agreements, which are very often involved and which I think the hon. member is really referring to, involves discussion between the provinces and the government. I would not want to preclude the possibility of, in certain cases, certain specific agreements being entered into.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—CONSIDERATION OF ALTERNATIVE MANITOBA PLAN

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the answer the minister gave me on Wednesday with regard to his meeting with the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba. Since the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba has advanced a program for assistance to farmers that is obviously far superior to the stabilization program presently—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, would the minister give consideration to the advantages of the alternative plan advanced by the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's supplementary question is a representation. He has to assume that it will be taken into account. The Chair will recognize one more member for a supplementary question on this subject, the hon. member for Regina East, after which we will go to another matter.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—METHOD OF TAKING INCREASED COSTS INTO ACCOUNT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board if the government, in reviewing its original proposals in the grain policy statement, is giving consideration to means whereby increasing costs can be taken into account in its stabilization proposal?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are of course looking at all suggestions which might be made to us, including the one put to me the other day by the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba. Of course, while looking at it we should note that the producer contribution required for that plan would be in the order of 12 per cent.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of a statement made by the Ontario Minister of Mines that the federal government has discriminated against Ontario in the matter of a regional development grant to build a smelter for Falconbridge Nickel at Bécancour, Quebec, can the minister say if Falconbridge Nickel ever applied for a grant to build a smelter in Ontario and, if so, was its application turned down?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking about events which took place some time ago. I think his question ought to be put in writing or, if it is urgent, it could be considered at the time of adjournment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER AT COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—RELATIONSHIP TO UNEMPLOYMENT IN CANADA

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister which is related to a statement attributed to the Prime Minister in Singapore today. In one of his major contributions he delivered a lecture to his colleagues from Asia and Africa about the fact that the 1970's would be a decade of grave problems flowing from social unrest. While welcoming this belated recognition, may we also hope that it will also be reflected in a change of government policy toward the hundreds of thousands of unempoyed in this country?

ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED, PENSIONERS AND WELFARE RECIPIENTS IN PAYMENT OF DRUG COSTS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the large numbers of unemployed persons, low income pension recipients and people on welfare who are provided with medical care under the medicare legislation but who have no funds to purchase drugs, and in view of the urgency of filling the prescriptions of these unfortunate persons without delay, may I ask if the minister has any plans to take care of this situation immediately?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will refer this matter to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who will be in the House within the next day or so.

WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the importance of the federal-provincial welfare ministers' conference which is to begin on Monday, can he tell us what the agenda will be and whether extra assistance is to be advanced to provinces because of their rapidly depleting welfare budgets?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will not personally be attending that meeting. It will be attended by the federal ministers responsible. I am sure the agenda will be released as soon as it has been agreed upon. It has to be agreed to, as I think the hon. member will concede, by the provincial ministers concerned.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROVISION OF OVERTIME PAY

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Can the hon. gentleman advise the House if studies now under way relating to overtime pay for the world's finest police force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, will lead to action this year?

It has been missing since yesterday. This is a most important question. This bus replaced the Bullet. ALLEGED EARMARKING OF MONEY FOR TRAINING OF QUEBEC COLLEGE GRADUATES ONLY

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question either to the Acting Prime Minister or to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has $2 million been earmarked by a Treasury Board minute for the training of college graduates and others from the province of Quebec only? If that is so, why have these funds been earmarked for graduates from Quebec only?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take that question as notice to see what type of program is referred to. Of course, the increases which have taken place recently have been across the whole of the country. This could be true only if it related to a specific program which might not have been proposed somewhere else.

WHEAT—MANDATORY SUPPORT PRICE LEVEL—SASKATCHEWAN WHEAT POOL RECOMMENDATION

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. In view of the current study taking place in the agricultural industry with relation to the minister's statement last October on an agricultural stabilization program, can the minister indicate whether he is willing to accept the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool's recent recommendation that the present legislation be amended to increase the mandatory support price level to 100 per cent of the national average for the previous five years rather than the present mandatory level of 80 per cent of the national average for the past ten years?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that question has reference to a program under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Southam: Could I then direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has made that recommendation directly to my office. I will check to be sure.

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG PEOPLE ON MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY AND ACCIDENT RESEARCH

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Bearing in mind the efforts the government is now making to reverse the tide of unemployment, is consideration being given to employing young people this summer such as is being done in the United States on motor vehicle safety and traffic accident research and prevention?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know this is not a part of the general programs which are being considered for this summer in particular. I will have to check with at least two departments to determine whether the federal government is taking any action or proposing anything with regard to this particular field.

Can the minister say whether this subject has been discussed officially with the U.S. government? Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Such a letter was written to the Canadian Pacific Railway requiring this. The CPR has objected, which it is allowed to do, to the Superintendent of Insurance. The matter is presently under review.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS, FUNDS FOR INVESTIGATION OF PROJECTS, ADVANCES FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) that Bill C-193, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I was intending to speak on the amendment. I assume that it may be Your Honour's intention to deliver a decision on the amendment offered by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I will defer my remarks until after Your Honour's decision.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the hon. member for Peace River suspects, the Chair would like to make a decision on the proposed amendment offered yesterday by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

Hon. members will recall that during the course of the debate on second reading of bill C-193 yesterday, the hon. member for Yukon proposed an amendment which the Chair ruled to be not acceptable from a procedural point of view. The reasons for the decision were given at that time. The hon. member for Yukon then sought, and was granted, unanimous consent of the House to move another amendment. It might be helpful to hon. members if I briefly refer to the main motion and the amendment. The President of the Privy Council (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved:

That Bill C-193, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The hon. member for Yukon moved the following amendment:

That all the words after "that" be left out and the following inserted:

"this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a task force appointed under the Inquiries Act."

Hon. members will notice that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yukon is in the same terms as the amendment moved on January 13 by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). At that time the Chair expressed reservations about the procedural acceptability of the amendment. It was accepted only by the unanimous agreement of the House. When the hon. member for Yukon proposed the amendment yesterday, the Chair expressed the same reservations and stated that the amendment would not be acceptable without further consideration, unless the House unanimously agreed that it should be accepted. There was no agreement. The Chair then heard representations from hon. members on the question of the acceptability of the amendment, given the fact that there was no agreement.

The Chair reserved the decision. I have now had an opportunity to further consider the authorities and to read and consider the very helpful contributions made yesterday by those hon. members who assisted the Chair on the procedural point. I have come to the conclusion, regretfully, that the amendment cannot be accepted. I will not repeat what I said yesterday afternoon on the point that the amendment proposes a reference to a body which is not now in existence. As mentioned yesterday, there are precedents and authorities which, in proper circumstances, would permit the Chair to accept such a motion when the proposed reference was to an existing entity constituted or empowered to accept the kind of undertaking or study that would be required should the amendment carry.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in his assistance on the procedural point, referred to citation 386(2) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition as authority for accepting the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yukon. The citation reads:

> An amendment urging the setting up of a select committee to consider the subject matter of a Bill, might be moved and carried, if the House were adverse to giving the Bill itself a second reading and so conceding the principle.

With the greatest respect to the hon. member, it seems there is a distinction which I should try to draw. As hon. members know, there is a well established form of amendment on second reading, namely along the lines that this bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to such and such a standing committee. This procedure must be preserved, not for the sake of form alone, but because the law and practice of Canada and this House has recognized effective methods of dealing with legislation.

When legislation is referred to a body which is outside the legislative process, such as is provided in the proposed amendment, we are endeavouring to add a new arm to the legislative machinery. In so doing, the amendment fails to meet the requirement of what is generally referred to as a reasoned amendment, as defined in citation 382 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. In my view, the hon. member's proposed amendment is a substantive proposition and not acceptable as an amendment. Having said this with reference to citation 386(2), I want to add that I think it is a very helpful authority. I am sure hon. members are ingenious enough in their drafting skills to draft an amendment in circumstances such as these, based on the authority of that citation, which would be acceptable to the Chair.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): May I first say, as a postscript to the decision which Your Honour has just delivered, that it is my intention to accept it. Of course, I am bound to do so. However, let me say frankly, it might be helpful, it might be useful that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), myself, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and others did exercise our ingenuity not, as I said rather facetiously yesterday, to break new ground but to improve our practice. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome) and others on the treasury benches are listening.

As a result of new rules adopted in this House we have argued on this side of the House, and I think correctly, and I think admittedly, that the rights of minorities, the rights of members of the opposition and of private members generally have been seriously restricted. That change, of course, was a direction of the House to the Chair. But it was done in the hope and belief that new precedents would be established and that the committee would from time to time examine the decisions of the Chair based on these new rules so that we could adopt procedures in this House adapted to the needs of today. Unfortunately, this has not been done. I understand the dilemma in which the Chair finds itself. The Chair is driven to resort to precedents and citations which are based on Standing Orders as they may have been 20, 30, 40 or 50 years ago. The Chair cannot break out of that corral but we are in a different situation and there should be different rules. I will leave it at that.

I hope members on the government side will recognize that if opposition parties and members are to do their duty to the people of this country, and to their constituents in particular, there must be a more flexible approach. I am not saying this in a contentious way. I think it is an important problem; what we can do in this House, the restrictions which have been placed upon us, the new way we approach legislation must be borne in mind in our attitude to the rules. I am not saying this in criticism of the Chair. The Chair is bound by precedents and citations, precedents established 20, 30, 40, 50 or even 60 years ago. In the light of the rules of today, it is like comparing apples with elephants. I am grateful to Your Honour and to the House for being allowed to transgress the rules to this limited extent.

I want to deal with this bill. I commend to the House the arguments made by my hon. friend from Yukon which are specifically related to these proposals as they affect the people of the north. He has made a reasoned and eloquent statement of the facts. He has based it on principles which we in this country and, indeed, on this continent, have held for a great many years, that when we consider the question of power rates, like taxes, there must be an equitable disposition of them. I think my hon. friend made it plain that the effect of this amendment would be to create an unfair and inequitable distribution of power rates. My hon. friend from Yukon, speaking as a spokesman for this party, carries with him the full endorsement of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition with regard to this issue.

Speaking in a more general way on the subject opened up by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), to some extent the Parliamentary Secretary (Mr. Buchanan) when he opened this debate took a wide approach; he gave us the background of this legislation and the reasons for it. I want to ask the House to look at one aspect in the light of an amendment I propose to make—and I have now been driven to accept the established precedents. I hope the House will take note of what I have to say. As a northerner, I flew over that part of the country many years ago. I flew over Yellowknife when it was only a gleam in some prospector's eye; I have been down the river with judicial parties years and years ago and I know something of my hon. friend's aspirations and beliefs as to what may be accomplished in that country. We want to see proper development there, but because of one or two incidents which have been brought to our notice we want to make sure that the development which is brought about is one which can be brought about without harm or damage to the people of the country, to the ecology or to the orderly development of northern Canada.

I can indicate this best by relating it to one incident connected with the development of power in the north. I am free to do so because clause four of this bill provides that the Commission may investigate projects and advise the Commission of the Territories or of the Yukon of the areas which might be served. Under this heading, it is possible for any project for hydro electric power or power derived from the use of gas which may come down from the northern part of the Territories to be devised and put into effect. The bill provides carte blanche for this Commission to investigate and engage in almost any power project. We had an example of such a project which was not in the Territories precisely. As was said by the hon. member for Yukon, this Commission is interested in power projects outside the Territories and outside the north. I recall the project for the establishment of the Bennett Dam on the Peace River, a project which was referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay West in his speech yesterday. Anyone who knows the north knows that the Peace River and the Athabasca river systems join together to form the Slave River then flow into the Great Slave Lake and thence through the Mackenzie River into the Arctic. Up to about the 59th parallel of north latitude we find an extension of the great central plain of North America.

It is the only part of the North American continent where these rivers which are susceptible of the production of power also provide a means of transportation. There are in Russia three or four rivers which provide an equal and adequate service, but we have only one in this country. This whole issue was the subject of a discussion at Yellowknife early this year. It may well be that the Parliamentary Secretary was there when people prominent in public life, scientists and others interested in the north, gathered to discuss this among other issues. What about transportation into the north? What about the use of the rivers? What about the provision of power? How can it be done? How can it be safely and economically provided. One issue which was raised very strongly was: will it be necessary in the future, to come to a decision as to whether or not the waters of the Peace-Athabasca-Mackenzie system might well be dedicated both to the provision of transportation and also to the provision of power through hydroelectric projects. No decision was made on this, but it is an issue we shall have to face. Just today a question was asked about the establishment of a pipeline for the carriage of natural gas from the far north to the central part of this continent. So we are dealing with a major issue.

Therefore, I return to the point I started to make about the dangers that may be faced if the commission has to consider whether or not it should recommend to the government the construction of projects for the production of power. As I said, we have had a classic example of what can happen in connection with the Bennett dam on the Peace River. As the hon. member for Kootenay West, and I think also the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), said yesterday, here was a situation where the province of British Columbia placed across the Peace River where it passes through the Rocky Mountains a gigantic earth dam for the production of power that would be taken down to the central and southern part of British Columbia, and possibly even to the United States. This dam was initiated in the beginning of 1963. It was because I was concerned about this construction, had been in the northern part of my province as well as the Northwest Territories, and had realized the relationship between the quantity of water that would be discharged into the Mackenzie system and the construction of the dam, that I started to ask some questions in this House.

I started asking questions shortly after the session commenced in June, 1963. I asked the Hon. Paul Martin, now government leader in the other place, who at that time as Secretary of State for External Affairs was greatly concerned with this project and attempting to arrange a tripartite agreement between the United States, Canada and British Columbia, the following question on June 5, 1963, as reported at page 673 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of a report he made to the house today on the negotiations with the government of British Columbia.
> Did these discussions touch on the question of the application by the government of British Columbia or any authority of this government for approval under the navigable waters act of the Peace river dam project? If so, was any undertaking, conditional or otherwise, given to the premier of British Columbia?

With his classic capacity for uttering a great many words expressing very few thoughts, the minister replied:

> As the hon. member will appreciate, while we are in the first stage of negotiations it would be undesirable as well as improper to deal with subjects which were or were not covered by the negotiations. I can say no more at this time.

I was still gullible enough to believe that the then Liberal government would be willing to answer my question, so I pursued the matter on June 14, when I asked the then Minister of Public Works, now the distinguished Speaker of the other place, the following question to be found at page 1167 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works which is prompted by the questions already asked dealing with the agreement between the province of British Columbia and the government. Has the minister any knowledge of an official application made by the province of British Columbia or any agency or authority of that government under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for leave to proceed with the Peace river dam project?

The then Minister of Public Works replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire and I will answer this question on Monday.

I then asked this supplementary question:

If any such application is received, will the minister assure the house that despite any commitment which might have been made by his government there will be an ample opportunity for the many thousands of residents who live downstream from this proposed project to make representations to the government with respect to this scheme?

On June 18, I again asked the then Minister of Public Works whether he was in a position to answer the question I had asked. He replied that it was a hypothetical question and went on to say:

However, if it should occur, the act provides for a 30 day public advertising period—and so on.

I kept pursuing the matter through 1963 and finally in the fall struck some gold. I had asked the then Minister of Justice, the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, who on June 27, 1963 was Acting Prime Minister, the following question found on page 1633 of Hansard:

My question arises out of a reply I received from the Minister of Public Works last week. Has an opinion yet been formed in his department as to the legality of the province of British Columbia continuing construction of the Peace river dam without having obtained approval under the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act?

The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, while I remember the question, I am afraid I will have to take this as notice and inquire further.

So, at least I got notice taken of the question. Finally, on October 14 of that year, I repeated the question to Mr. Chevrier, as reported at page 3529 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he can answer the question I asked him the other day in a situation the urgency of which is sharpened by the fact that I understand the waters of the Peace river are now being diverted. The people of the country are anxious to know whether the river, which was plied by large ships 50 years ago, is still to be regarded as a navigable water.

Mr. Chevrier replied:

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to remind me of this question some time last week. I have the reply to his question here and it is as follows. The advice I have received is to the effect that the works in question are included in the class of works to which the Navigable Waters Protection Act applies. The position has always been taken by the Department of Public Works that the Navigable Waters Protection Act applies to a provincial government or an agency itself.

That was the statement that was made at that time. There is a rule, of course, about the securing of legal opinions, but because of the importance of the issue the then Minister of Justice was good enough to give me that reply. So, the fact is the record shows that more than seven years ago a statement was made by the constitutional adviser to the government, the chief law officer of the Crown, that it was essential that the province of British Columbia apply under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for permission to construct the dam, and to file a statement regarding the type of works to be initiated. That was not done.

I continued to press the Minister of Public Works for the next year and a half, but eventually I satisfied myself that because the federal government was overly anxious to secure the passage of an agreement with the government of the United States and wanted to get the credit for this, it had shut its eyes to the necessity of the government of British Columbia securing permission to construct the dam. As a result, the province of British Columbia, illegally and improperly, and in contravention of the act, constructed this dam and is at least morally responsible for the consequences.

I do not want to say anything more about the legality of this issue since actions are now pending. This is something that I hope the Parliamentary Secretary and the minister will take into account. But what has been the result of this? We have here a situation where the damage to which the people of Alberta, downstream from the dam, might be subjected was obvious to me, both as a representative of the people and from personal observations that I had made. Yet this government and the government of British Columbia blindly, stubbornly and persistently refused to examine the matter and went ahead with the project. Today, several thousand people have suffered directly. The water and sewage system of the town of Peace River has been affected and damage to the tune of $100,000 or more has been suffered. The livelihoods of about 1,500 people, part of them in the Northwest Territories in the area of the Peace-Athabasca delta, have also been affected.

People have asked me what brought this about. With northern rivers, there is a seasonal flood in the spring. The seasonal flood of the Peace River was such as to prevent the waters of the Athabasca joining the Peace to flow down into the Mackenzie. In the result, there was a constant wash in this delta and it became and has continued to be a natural sanctuary. This delta was on the route of one of the international flight-ways for migration birds. The birds rested there. Wild animals were there in great quantity. Recently, the federal government made some studies and established beyond any shadow of doubt, from a count of the birds and animals, that there has been a very drastic reduction in wildlife in this particular area. Finally, Mr. Speaker, and this is the thing of consequence, because what has happened probably cannot be undone, the engineering by nature, which may have taken 15,000 years to develop, has been wiped out by man in seven years.

But beyond that, what about the north? What about the Mackenzie system, a river system which provides a moderately inexpensive means of transportation right to the Arctic for three, four or five months of the year, depending on what part of the system navigation is being engaged in during those months? I am sure that Northern Transportation officials, a Crown agency operating in that country, will bear me out when I say there has been a very substantial deterioration in the capacity of that basin to carry traffic because of the Bennett Dam. What was done by the Province of British Columbia, illegally and improperly, has caused, is causing and will continue to cause a very serious situation by reducing the level of the water with regard to the possibility of transportation. This is something at which the government and the people of Canada must look.

Is there enough water flowing down that system to provide for additional power production and still maintain a reasonable means of transportation in the months during which navigation can be pursued in the spring? In addition to that, what about the ecological damage? I pressed the government on this. I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) about this, and also the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chretien). I have received no answer.

Events, Mr. Speaker, have a habit of overtaking us. We may well find that the commission may make recommendations to the government concerning future projects in that country, and decisions will have to be made. If what I am told about future development in the north in respect of gas, oil and other things is correct, then we may find that time is not with us. We have not got that much time. I suggest it is incumbent on the government, without any further delay, to establish a commission of inquiry composed of scientists, of people from the north and of people in public life, to examine this issue so that a decision may be arrived at within a reasonable length of time as to the extent to which the waters of the northern territories, particularly of the Peace, the Athabasca and Mackenzie systems, including the Great Slave Lake and the Slave River, may be utilized for power production and/or for transportation.

I make this plea in a nonpartisan way. Time will not wait for us. Because of the great demand, both in Canada and in the United States, for increased production of power, of natural gas, oil and other minerals, there may well be a very considerable acceleration of development in the north. That happened when the government of the Right Hon. gentleman from Prince Albert decided to proceed in 1957-58 with the very wonderful project of the roads to resources, and finally the Pine Point railway. We found that this opened up development and brought people and industries there at a rate that had never been anticipated. Now, this has been slowed down but, Mr. Speaker, there is every indication of it being revived, and revived in a very substantial way.

Before this comes about, there is a responsibility on the government to ensure that there is close and detailed examination of the potential for the development of power as related to the need of the waters for transportation, and in particular as related to the potentially very serious ecological damage as well as to the welfare and well being of the native peoples of the north. Probably this may be a little irrelevant, Mr. Speaker, but I point out that in the northern parts of this area there have been no treaties with the native peoples. Inadequate as the treaties are in other areas between native peoples and our government, in the northern parts of Canada there are no treaties at all. We have taken their lands; we have taken their forests; we have taken their waters. I submit there is a duty upon us, representing the people of this country, to make sure before any more damage is done that we have a good idea of what the situation is. With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, and so that this may be brought about I want to move now, in accordance with the time honoured traditions and precedents of this House, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell), that all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted:

"this Bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, may I rise briefly on a point of order? It has been the last speaker's habit on Thursdays, at the end of the question period, to ask for the order in which the government will continue to call its business, but understandably in his anxiety to participate in the debate today he overlooked doing so. As I indicated last night when the same question was asked, there was no intention to change the order at that time, but there has been a slight change in the order now. We would propose to follow this debate by going directly to Bill C-215, the Textile and Clothing Board measure, and thereafter to follow with the Crop Insurance Bill, then Bill C-207, the government organization bill, the Canadian National Railways financing bill, the statutory instruments measure and then, after that order, the Yukon minerals measure. Again, if any changes are to be made from that order we would endeavour to notify the opposition House leaders at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, because there had been this very momentous change, notice of which we received only today, I thought it better to wait until an announcement was made because it might well be that the government would have further changes to make.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the CNR financing bill is fairly high on this list, can the Parliamentary Secretary indicate whether some agreement has been reached regarding the pensions of retired employees of the CNR? This would facilitate the handling of that bill.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware to what extent that would facilitate the handling of the bill, but I am not able to make any further statement at this time.

Mr. Nielsen: Could the Parliamentary Secretary indicate whether it is the intention of the government to withdraw the Yukon minerals bill and, if not, when is it likely to see the light of day again?

Mr. Jerome: It is not the intention of the government to withdraw that measure.

Mr. Nielsen: And when is it likely to see the light of day again?

Mr. Jerome: As I indicated on that list, it follows after the statutory instruments measure.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS FUNDS FOR INVESTIGATION OF PROJECTS, ADVANCES FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) that Bill C-193, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this bill. The remarks made yesterday by the Parliamentary Secretary and by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) about the far reaching effects of this measure, were very disturbing to a number of hon. members. From reading the act itself, the proposed amendments and the resumé read into the record by the Parliamentary Secretary, it would appear that the purpose of the original Crown agency was to supply electric power and other public utilities in northern Canada. I wish to say a few words primarily to support some of the contentions offered and some of the questions raised in respect of the infiltrations of government and the consequent discouragement of private investment, not only so far as the Yukon is concerned but also the Northwest Territories and Labrador, which of course is one of the great frontiers of the Atlantic region.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member at this early stage of his remarks, but I am inclined to place some close limits on the debate we should have on this bill. I realize that since the debate started yesterday we have gone rather far from the principle of the amendments which are before us at this time. Although I realize this might have been done a little earlier, today I must bring to the attention of hon. members that what we have before us are very specific amendments. The act which this bill seeks to amend is not before us. I have some doubt concerning whether at this stage we should become involved in a debate on the policy of the government as it affects all northern regions of Canada. I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member. I always hesitate to raise a point of order, especially before an hon. member has spoken. Perhaps I am being unfair in this instance because I am not sure what the hon. member proposes to do. However, I feel that at one point or another there, should be a statement by the Chair to the effect that we should try to limit our discussion to the bill which is before us.

The rule of relevancy is one of the most difficult rules for the Chair to apply. Very often after an hon. member has spoken, the Chair rises to say we have gone beyond the terms of the legislation before the House. I am not sure if the right way to do it is by making this statement before the hon. member has spoken, but I thought we might become too involved in difficulties if in the course of today, tonight, tomorrow and perhaps on subsequent days, we should engage in a general debate concerning policy in northern Canada and, as the hon. member suggested, not only in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories but even in Labrador or perhaps other northern regions of the country. All this having been said, I am sure the hon. member will have an interesting contribution to make and we will follow it with interest.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by Your Honour, perhaps I might say with respect that Your Honour's lack of familiarity with the bill and the legislation which is in existence might be responsible for the comments Your Honour has just made. I point out to Your Honour that the bill under discussion concerns an agency of government, the Northern Canada Power Commission, which has authority to conduct its activities not just in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories but throughout the whole of Canada. The amendments which the bill before us purports to make, and which if passed would become law, affect indeed every region of Canada in light of the authority of the commission to operate in all parts of Canada.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me, with great respect, that not only are the hon. member's remarks in order but also all those made yesterday in view of the very broad operational authority which is conferred upon the NCPC by the initial legislation and by the bill before us.

Mr. Speaker: That is the hon. member's opinion. I do not share it entirely. In any event, the Chair will hear the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan).

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, back east there is an expression about taking the wind out of one's sails. I certainly would not wish to leave the impression that that has happened, but it could happen under certain circumstances. When I have finished my remarks I am sure Your Honour will be in a position to judge whether or not I have established the relevancy of my remarks. One reason I want to address my remarks in a general way is related to the conclusion voiced in 1969 by the Yukon Electric Company at a committee hearing when it referred to the discouragement of private investment in the north. Perhaps I should say more correctly that the reference was to the uncertainty about whether the government wanted private investment to be involved. This would seem to be the essence of the principle involved in Bill C-193. I would interpret the bill as a disincentive for private investment and I believe the remarks of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) yesterday clearly indicated what could happen in northern Canada, in the Yukon Territory and in other parts of Canada if this bill were passed. As the hon. member for Yukon indicated, the jurisdiction of the commission is certainly much more extensive than merely the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. This view is borne out by the property the Commission has acquired outside this area.

Yesterday, in referring to the NCPC activity in the northern part of Canada, the Parliamentary Secretary mentioned the breakdown of the investment in power between government and private enterprise. As recorded at page 2590 of Hansard he said:

> The federal government, largely through the Northern Canada Power Commission owns approximately 75 per cent of the generating capacity in the north with 10 per cent being controlled by three private utility companies and 15 per cent being controlled and operated by private organizations primarily associated with mining operations.

In reflecting on this the Parliamentary Secretary, of course, is acknowledging quite rightly that the NCPC and the government are not the only agencies responsible for distributing power in northern Canada. He is acknowledging the fact that 25 per cent of the investment in that part of Canada is private. I believe the hon. member for Yukon elaborated on this, and perhaps clarified it somewhat, when he said some $250 million has been invested by private companies in the distribution of power and in the provision of utilities in parts of northern Canada where the commission itself found it impossible or not feasible to provide services of this kind.

Again, in advancing the position of the government, the Parliamentary Secretary indicated the reason for the amendments. As recorded at page 2591 of Hansard, the Parliamentary Secretary stated:

> The act we are considering today, Mr. Speaker, was last amended in 1956. It is being amended at this time so that the commission can adopt a more flexible approach in meeting northern needs and in planning future long-term power development in both territories.

Perhaps the key phrase in that expression is "a more flexible approach". The government is planning a more flexible approach. I think I should indicate that, although the statement here is not very explicit, it is very important in terms of its implications. The quotation continues:

> The proposed amendments are as follows—: One, to increase the number of commission members by two. Two, to change the amount of the investigation or studies' fund from $50,000 to $250,000. Three, to allow the commission to set regional rates rather than to charge on the basis of individual plants costs.

Perhaps the following could be considered the key amendment proposed in Bill C-193.

> Four, to allow the commission to defer repayments of principal and interest where new capacity is in excess of immediate demands.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

> Five, to eiminate the requirement that the commission obtain Governor in Council approval to undertake any project or enter into any contract in excess of $50,000.

The first thing that strikes me, having read the proposed amendments under Bill C-193, is that certainly we have to accept the argument that by not requiring each plant to operate as a most efficient unit we are actually encouraging inefficiency. The commission, and this has been stated repeatedly in reports and in hearings down through the years, was charged with trying to despatch its obligations with efficiency. Each unit was responsible for reporting to the government its operating costs, the generated revenue, as well as circumstances which would result in a loss by that unit because public tax dollars would have to be used to offset such loss.

It seems to me the amendments which are being proposed indicate that the government is asking all the units to pool their reporting, and in reporting to government to indicate in a general way what the situation is in respect of the distribution of power by the commission. In that respect it certainly will not be obvious to the Canadian taxpayer or resident of the Yukon or Northwest Territories exactly how successful each unit is in returning to its ratepayers some of the generated revenue through a reduction in rates.

The hon. member for the Yukon indicated yesterday a second position which is certainly worthy of notice, and that is that some of the operations in northern Canada have been so efficient that one of them declared a profit of 600 per cent in one year. Of course, the hope has been that at least some of the revenue would go to the constituents—and here I am using the word "constituents" in a general sense—in the form of a reduction in the cost of power. What we are going to get now, according to the hon. member for the Yukon, is actually an increase in taxes for the people in those areas where operations have been efficient and where the return has been the greatest. In other words, according to the reports made to the House yesterday, some areas will be receiving the benefit of the efficiency in other parts of northern Canada.

Perhaps the most serious aspect of the legislation is the lack of incentive to private investment in the north and the uncertainty as to whether any private dollar should be invested in the Yukon or the Northwest Territories. I contend that this has tremendous relevancy to the whole question of northern development which has, to a large extent, been the area of development in Canada in the last decade. In 1969, the Yukon Electric Company indicated to the committee that they were very concerned about the position of the government with regard to private investment. As a matter of fact, the question of whether the government wanted private investment in northern Canada was raised specifically by that company.

I believe it was last Wednesday that one of the members from Canada's newest province raised a question in the House directed to the Minister of Finance (Mr.

Benson), which is recorded at page 2370 of Hansard. The question reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the decision by Wabush Mines to shelve plans for a three million ton expansion of its iron ore production in Labrador because of tax uncertainty, and in view of Brinco's reluctance to develop the Lower Churchill Falls power project for the same reason, can the minister say when he will present his tax reform legislation to the House?

The Minister of Finance indicated in response that he did not accept the premise of the hon. member's question and that he did not agree with the hon. member's conclusion. I might say for the record that later on, outside the House, the minister admitted he had misinterpreted the question. In fact, there has been a cancellation of a major development project in northern Canada because of the uncertainty of the direction of the tax proposals. I contend that this is a very serious situation and is certainly retarding the development of the northern part of Canada which, according to the members who have taken part in the debate to date, is the object of Bill C-193 and which, on the surface, appears to be a rather innocuous piece of legislation. The fact is that the utility companies in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories which are able to provide power in many parts of northern Canada make a profit, stay in business and are willing to expand. This indicates that there is certainly a place for private investment. As a matter of fact, if the Canadian north is ever going to develop, incentives must be provided as well as tax reform to allow private enterprise to participate in that development.

Last year we brought before the people of Canada a proposal in the form of a white paper to amend the taxation structure. Contained therein was a proposal to eliminate the three year concessionary tax arrangements which Canada has with mining, exploration, and development companies operating mainly in the northern part of Canada. The original reason for the concessionary tax arrangements with mining and development companies was to promote the development of northern Canada. The simple reason was that the risk factor in developing the north is great. Many more companies have failed than have succeeded. Companies have to gamble and a tremendous amount of risk capital is involved. In Labrador, which most economists, developers and planners feel is one of the great frontiers of the nation, there are great timber resources and especially a great mining and hydro potential. Private capital is badly needed. We have already heard that one company has shelved one of the major projects planned for that part of Canada because of the uncertainty which exists about the government's intention with regard to tax changes as well as the arrangement and organization of corporations doing what would normally be done by individual entrepreneurs.

In supporting the encouragement which is contained in Bill C-193 for Canadians to invest in the north, I would like to place on the record the conclusions reached by the president of one of the largest companies in the world, the British North America Company, or Brinco. Last July 22, 1970, Mr. Bill Mulholland, an outstanding North American and a young man with tremendous knowledge who replaced the former president who was unfortunately killed in a plane crash in northern Canada last year, was being interviewed by the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which toured the Canadian nation and heard the reports and briefs presented by various institutions and organizations in response to the government's white paper. Mr. Mulholland was being interviewed in St. John's, Newfoundland. I would like to read into the record one of the major reasons for the great concern among private businessmen about trying to develop our north and providing utilities in our last great frontier.

On page 7 of Report No. 77, the gentleman in question is reported as follows:

Finally, I would like to mention in particular that these proposals have some fairly serious implications for future projects. If we are contemplating today a project similar in nature to the Churchill Falls project,—

And let us remember, Mr. Speaker, that we are talking about a project built with private capital in northern Canada costing $1 billion. We hope that it will start generating power some time in 1971. I continue quoting:

—let us say in size, in the time period required for its construction and commercial arrangements extending over several decades, the effect of these proposals would be to render highly doubtful whether or not you could responsibly undertake to do it as a private company or a company such as ours where our shareholders in Churchill Falls are a mixture of both government and private organizations.

I do not think these exchanges have ever been placed on the record of the House. The reason is, I think, that the hearings took place in St. John's and the national media are not greatly concerned about reporting events in St. John's. If the hearings had been held here, what was said would have constituted a major news story. Mr. Mulholland indicated pretty well that if the Churchill Falls project were contemplated today, with our present uncertainties, it would never get off the ground. On page 10 the report contains the following exchange between the present Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Danson) and Mr. Mulholland:

Mr. Danson: Yes, it is pretty apparent in your brief. And you also say that the proposals would discourage subsequent development of a similar nature. Would this really discourage them to the extent that they would not take place, or would a company such as yours adjust like all businessmen to whatever circumstances are and then make their deals according to the new rules?

The Parliamentary Secretary was talking to Mr. Mulholland about a proposal, on the drawing boards, to develop the lower Churchill complex at Gull Island. This is to cost $1 billion of private money. The report continues:

Mr. Mulholland: One of the principal reasons for being a private business is that it justifies our existence and our willingness to take risks. In this particular project, BRINCO, the parent company, had invested $115 million prior to the end of 1968 before we had a power contract. One does it, of course, assessing the risks and the returns. The problem under these rules in the future in another project, is where would you raise the equity capital to get something like this started again. They do not, as a rule, spring forth full-blown with all of the uncertainties removed so that one goes to the market and raises money with no risk or uncertainties at all.

That was not the history of the Churchill Falls project. It is a history of great credit, I think, to private enterprise because individual shareholders of whom there are a great many right here in this province did have faith and confidence enough in the project to invest their money when it was not at all certain that all of these things would come to fruition and the project would go forward. Under this régime it is very difficult to see how one could responsibly ask people to do that, much less how one would persuade them if you were going to ask them.

There, in so many words, you have one of the most responsible men in North America in the field of investment saying that, in view of present tax uncertainties and encroachments by governments on areas that rightfully belong to business, such a project as the Churchill Falls Power development which could best be undertaken by private enterprise, would not be possible. This is especially true in view of present uncertainties and the psychological depression rampant in Canada. There, we were talking about a $1 billion project to develop a major source of power in Canada.

Last week, we heard that the government of Quebec was conducting an investigation into its rivers which flow into James Bay. That government wants to know the potential of Quebec rivers because great, future developments will be necessary on that frontier of Quebec if that province is to harness its resources. It hopes to harvest the benefits of such development. I do not know whether the government plans to move into this area—

An hon. Member: It does.

Mr. Lundrigan: —and dominate it completely. Does it want to control northern Canada and northern Canadian development?

An hon. Member: It does.

Mr. Lundrigan: If that is its plan, that ought to be clearly and effectively spelled out, so that business concerns such as the Yukon Electrical Company can take their investment and go elsewhere. That, precisely, was the conclusion of that company which was of major importance in northern Canada. It concluded that private business, in this area, could do a much more efficient job than the government. Such companies are saying, "If you want us to go from the area, let us know, so we can move out and develop other projects in other parts of the world."

I contend that, in view of legislation such as Bill C-193 which is now before the House, the government has a responsibility to the Canadian people, and especially to those in the north engaged in business, to spell out exactly what are its intentions with regard to the development of the northern part of Canada. That is our last great frontier, a frontier which is eyed with envy by our United States neighbour to the south. It contains resources in abundance, resources which will loom large in my opinion, in the future of Canada.

The amendment suggested by the hon. member for Yukon and moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) would, if adopted, have the effect of opening up this matter for wider discussion. We could thoroughly explore the implications of the legislation that has been put forward. I submit that the House wishes to give this matter a much more thorough examination, so that the full implications of this kind of legislation for the northern part of Canada and especially for the Yukon Territory which, I submit, at the moment is being disadvantageously affected can be determined. Some hon. members think that what is being proposed is more or less an experiment with government control in northern Canada. If the experiment is successful, then I suppose the government will use it as an example for bringing about other types of control in northern Canada. If that happens, we can assume that private business will go elsewhere to invest its funds.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) yesterday said, as reported at page 2603 of Hansard the right hand column:

I am concerned that our study of this bill may be one of the few opportunities to really understand and know something about the Northern Canada Power Commission and the question of power in the territories. I suggest that perhaps this bill is begging the issue. I believe it is begging the issue of private power versus public power. I believe it is begging the issue of how we can ensure power development throughout northern Canada.

He went on to say that he hoped that an independent commission would be set up to look into the broad question of private versus public power, the functions of NCPC generally, and the like. I see the hon. member present in the House and I say to him that this amendment, if accepted, would do just what he advocated yesterday. It will enable the standing committee to do more than merely consider a few functions relating to the bill before us. It will enable the hon. member in committee to advance amendments which, if accepted, would enable his objectives to be accomplished by the House on the report of the committee. I urge him, and all others of like mind on the government side, to accept the amendment that has been advanced. No one is opposing, at this stage, the referral of this matter to the committee. What we want in committee is the authority from the House for the broadest and fullest possible inquiry into the functions of NCPC. The only way that can be done is for the House to accept the amendment before it. I did not have the opportunity yesterday to place one or two items before the House. I propose to do that now.

I agree with the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), and other members who have spoken on the bill that the chairman of the Northern Canada Power Commission should not be the same person as the deputy minister of the department. It is the minister, deputy minister and other departmental officials who formulate the policy which NCPC follows. We will get shallow denials of that. The government will say that the policies are formulated by NCPC and that in most cases, approval is sought from the minister. I think we must be practical and face the facts of life. Policies are designed in the department. The hon. member for Northwest Territories knows that his constituents, particularly those in Yellowknife, have been crying out for years for the establishment of some sort of control over rates. The only way that will be achieved is by establishing a public utilities board. A public utilities board, being an independent body, would be able to review rates and to approve rates proposed by the NCPC.

Another glaring shortcoming in the policies of NCPC is the fact that it does not have agreements for the sale and purchase of power. It now supplies power as a wholesaler to distributors in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. In many instances, where huge dollar amounts of power are supplied, there is nothing in writing. No other business operating in a sound and prudent commercial way adopts such loose policies. The agreements do not exist despite the repeated verbal and written requests of the distributors to have NCPC enter into a contract for the sale and purchase of power.

The history of the private distributor and the private generator in the Yukon is very interesting. In 1958, the existing owners of the private distributor in the Yukon acquired ownership of that entity. Prior to that purchase, Mr. Speaker, Yukon Electrical Company had made verbal inquiries at the federal government level, the territorial level and in the Whitehorse business community. All of these inquiries elicited approval of the acquisition. This required a substantial outlay of funds by the system then owned by the Yukon Electrical Company Limited. The previous owners of that company had been very hard pressed for the necessary money to meet expansion. Efforts to attract capital, including prolonged negotiations with such financial suppliers as the Industrial Development Bank, were unavailing.

At the time of acquisition of Yukon Electrical Company by Canadian Utilities, the distribution system and the diesel plant were in very poor repair. The service was very unreliable and the rates were extremely high. I wonder how many members in the province of Ontario and other provinces would be surprised to learn that my electric light bill in Whitehorse is $48 per month. The average electric light bill, on a monthly basis, in the Whitehorse area is between $15 and $25 per month. These rates are based on a maximum of five cents per kilowatt down to a minimum of 1.6 cents. Compare those rates with the rates existing in southern communities. Compare those rates with the power being supplied in the more northerly communities where diesel fuel has to be hauled in by air transport and other high cost means. The electric power bills for domestic, industrial and government users in those areas are astronomical.

The new owners, having purchased the assets of Yukon Electrical Company Limited, immediately undertook the reconstruction necessary to bring safety and service levels to an acceptable standard under the Canadian Eelectrical Code. In 1957, the lowest level on the step was five cents a killowatt. This has been reduced over the years. Today it is 1.6 cents. The new owners undertook an expansion program which was designed to bring central station service to the smaller communities in the Yukon. This was encouraged by the government. With the encouragement of the then commander of the northwest highway system, when the army was still a substantial force in the Yukon—

Mr. Dinsdale: I thought there was a new policy of military persons in the north.

Mr. Nielsen: There is a new policy. We are led to believe that it is for the purpose of establishing Canadian sovereignty in the Yukon, which I never doubted belonged to Canada. There are four members of the military. They are to resist any encroachment of our sovereignty in that territory.

In 1958, the commander of the northwest highway system encouraged the company. A diesel plant was installed at Haines Junction, 100 miles west of Whitehorse. Service was provided to the Department of National Defence maintenance establishment at that point and the property of the Department of Agriculture experimental station at Haines Junction. I am very sorry to say that is no longer in existence. It was an integral part of the promotion of agricultural development in the Yukon. It is now going to pot. I thought I should add that, since the minister is in the House. It was a very sad decision.

In 1959, the company acquired a small existing diesel plant at Watson Lake, 300 miles east of Whitehorse. At that time the users of electrical power at that location were paying 25 cents per kilowatt hour for their electrical power. The service has now been extended to the entire community. A private supplier is supplying power to the Department of National Defence maintenance establishment at that point and the Department of Transport establishment seven miles away. Private enterprise constructed a distribution line to the airport location. In 1958 the lowest rate at Watson Lake was 25 cents a kilowatt. Since 1965, the rate has been 3.5 cents. I cite that as a classic example for those proponents of a public board in the Yukon who say that private investor owned utilities cannot do the job of supplying power at low cost to domestic and industrial users.

The territorial government of the day and the individual members of the council urged the Yukon Electrical Company to instal facilities in Carcross, 48 miles south of Whitehorse, and Carmacks, 100 miles to the north. In 1960 diesel plants were constructed at both of these locations. At Carcross, 17 miles from that community, a new mine was put into production this year. In each instance, franchise agreements were obtained and entered into with the commissioner of the Yukon. The company subsequently acquired diesel generating and power facilities that belonged to the Canadian army, the Department of Transport and other government agencies throughout the Yukon. It succeeded in combining all of these tangential power developments into one closely knit efficient power system.

What, I ask Members of this House, was the Northern Canada Power Commission doing all this time, operating under a statute which required them to supply and distribute power to the very communities that the private entrepreneurs eventually went in to supply? They were doing nothing. What is more, all this expansion, requiring huge sums of capital, was carried out by private enterprise from its own funds with encouragement from the minister, from the government. Now, all of a sudden, we propose to change the ground rules and say: Perhaps we needed your capital then to do the job we ourselves should have done, but we do not want it any longer. That is about the size of what is being said.

I will cite another classic example. In 1964, the Territorial Government had to ask the Yukon Electrical Company Limited to supply electrical facilities to the community of Old Crow 60 miles north of the Arctic Circle. This was a responsibility unwillingly inherited by the Territorial Government from the old Department of Indian Affairs and National Resources. The cost to the Territorial Government to supply this community was estimated at 27 cents per kilowatt hour, but the company agreed on a trial basis to serve the community at a cost of 25 cents per kilowatt hour. Service is now being supplied at 15 cents. Again, a classic example—I speak facetiously—of private enterprise, of private investment capital "gouging the community". The government itself set the rate at 27 cents but the community is now being supplied at 15 cents.

As recently as September 1968, the federal Department of Public Works, through the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, sold to the company its remaining distribution lines in the Whitehorse area valued at approximately $250,000. These lines are now being operated to supply various departments of the federal government as well as other customers in this area. This is significant. This is why I say the government has a responsibility to back away from the reneging it is doing in its business dealings with private enterprise here.

During the tenure of the Yukon Electrical Company Limited in the Yukon, the company has been encouraged by public statements by ministers in not only the present government but in the preceding government, and told that the policy of the federal government was to provide an environment conducive to the investment of private capital in northern Canada. We are backing away at high speed from those guarantees.

In the company's brief presented to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as my hon. friend who has just spoken has pointed out, the owners of Yukon Electrical said this:

> We are concerned that there is developing an atmosphere of public ownership only, and no others need apply.

What they want is a clear statement of government policy that this is not the case, and that private investors will be required to continue to be interested in providing electrical services to the north. How else are the private utilities to plan their operations unless a statement of this kind is forthcoming from the government? They said constantly in the committee: If you do not want our capital in the north, tell us so; take it over and we shall get out and put the money somewhere else in the world where investment is more attractive.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

There is another point in this regard. If members of the House examine the legislation of 1948, and the debate which arose thereon, they will find it is very clear that Parliament did not intend at that time to grant a monopoly to the Northern Canada Power Commission, a monopoly which it is now endeavouring by these stealthy amendments, for which the government must take responsibility, to acquire.

With respect to the establishment of a public utilities, board it has been advanced with a good deal of sense in the evidence before the standing committee that instead of the NCPC making policy decisions as to future developments in the areas under its jurisdiction, instead of the government making those decisions and passing them on to the NCPC to implement, and instead of putting forward the kind of amendments which purport to accomplish this objective in the bill before us, why cannot we use the National Energy Board and all the expertise which is available there for the purpose of reaching these decisions through the Territorial Government. Why cannot we use the National Energy Board for the purpose of adjusting and controlling electrical rates in the north? I hear some people, advocates of NCPC and of the government, talking on this subject, and one would think that the owners of the private development and distribution system in northern Canada were scared to death of rate control and rate approval. Nothing could be further from the truth. Nothing would be more welcome to the private generator and distributor in the north than to see a public utilities board or some similar body set up for the purpose of governing rates, provided, of course, that the NCPC would also be subject to the authority of any such public utilities board. It stands to reason that the user rates of the distributors of residential and industrial power depend on the wholesale rates at which NCPC pipes the power into the distributors' lines.

Another highly objectionable feature in this bill, and a most unbusinesslike one, is the idea of government going into areas on the assumption that only the government can do the job cheaply, although it is a principle accepted by most fair-minded Canadians that the public tender system is the only way to get a job done at the lowest cost to the taxpayer. Precisely this is happening in the operations of the NCPC. They go into an area and they do not give private enterprise the slightest opportunity to tender on the job. Indeed, when private enterprise hears of something which is to be constructed they write to the government and say: Let us take a crack at this; let us submit a bid; we think we can do it as cheaply as you, or more cheaply. The government says: We are not interested in your bids. We know we can do the job and we can do it more cheaply; we can get money cheaper than you can; you do not have the kind of capital we do to carry out such a project. Other shallow and groundless excuses are used as well.

I want to deal for a moment with the Carr Report which was a study of the economic future of the Yukon. The main thrust of this report as it dealt with the supply of electric power was to advocate government ownership of the means both of production and of distribution throughout the north. I see one of the members who was vitally concerned with the preparation of this report in the House, and it is interesting to note that if you examine the report carefully you find not one single economic fact presented to justify this conclusion. There is not one single piece of evidence in the report to indicate that cheaper power and better service to the consumer would be possible under public as opposed to private development. Indeed, there is not one scintilla of evidence that the public interest would be better served by an organization such as NCPC as opposed to investor participation.

Reference is made in the report to pragmatic rather than ideological reasons being the justification for government ownership; and the suggestion is that the trend is toward government ownership. Nothing could be further from the truth. In support of that statement, I again refer members of the House to the evidence adduced in the committee contained in an appendix to the brief presented by the Yukon Electrical Company Limited. I refer to research into the ownership and regulatory structure of the electrical utility industry in the United States done by one Mr. Schantz. Some very interesting conclusions are reached in that study, among which are that the trend is not toward government-owned utilities, but quite the contrary; and that there should be interlocking co-operation between the private and public sector.

It is interesting also to note that the job of the NCPC is to supply power to northern communities where private investment capital is either unwilling or unable to go. Yet we have power installation and distribution systems—I am confining myself to the Northwest Territories—in the communities of Arctic Bay, Broughton, Cape Dorset, Clyde River, Grise Liard, Hall Beach, Igloolik, Lake Harbour, Padloping, Pengnertung, Pond Inlet, Coral Harbour, Eskimo Point, Rankin Inlet, Repulse Bay, Whale Cove. All of these are owned by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and there are others.

If it is the job of NCPC to supply power to those communities where private investment capital is unable or unwilling to go, then why is it not doing the job of generating and supplying power to the communities that appear in the appendix to the thirteenth report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development for March 13, 1969? There is no doubt about the ability of the private sector to supply the necessary capital, and in view of the statistics I have put on the record by way of example, further of which is to be found in the reports of the committee in 1969. There can be very little remaining doubt in the minds of hon. members, I suggest, that private investment capital is not gouging the user in power rates. Indeed, the rates of NCPC where it supplies power on a retail basis are generally higher than those of the private generators and distributors.

This is not as innocuous a piece of legislation as it appears. There is every reasonable justification for the members of this House inquiring into the whole, broad aspect of the operations of NCPC and for the committee that will be examining the bill to make some useful recommendations to the government, having heard evidence throughout the north and from all interested power generators and suppliers, including NCPC. These recommendations may convince the government that it is going the wrong way as far as this legislation is concerned.

However, this kind of broad inquiry is impossible unless the amendment which is now before the House is adopted. Certainly, backbench members on the government side cannot be inhibited in their support for the resolution, because all they are supporting is the broadest possible inquiry in committee instead of the confined inquiry that would result if the resolution standing in the name of the government were accepted in preference to the amendment now before the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour on the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Baldwin) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Is the House ready for the question on the main motion?

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. An hon. member on our side rose to speak but Your Honour did not see him.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, it is almost time for private members hour. I was wondering if I might call it five o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize that I have to interrupt the thunderous applause to bring to the attention of the House the fact that it is now five o'clock.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin)—National Security—Presumed infiltration into Canada by American communist party; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Post Office—Suggested meeting with Letter Carriers Union to resolve alleged administrative confusion; the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)—Regional Economic Expansion—application by Falconbridge Nickel for grant—Alleged discrimination.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills. As there are no private bills, the House will proceed directly to notices of motions (papers).

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there are quite a number of notices of motions for the production of papers that precede the one we shall very likely be discussing. May I say that all those standing in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) are to stand today, as well as the two following it. If notice of motion No. 21, in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) could be called, we shall proceed with it as agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: All the notices of motions referred to by the Parliamentary Secretary will stand, at the request of the government.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF SUBMISSIONS TO ECONOMIC COUNCIL ON CANADA'S COMPETITION POLICY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the nearly forty submissions presented to the Economic Council of Canada for its review of Canada's competition policy, as referred to in the Council's report of July 1969 at page 4.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this country has had legislation which was designed to prohibit or at least control the ill effects of firms combining to avoid competition. The legislation, now more than 50 years old, has been singularly unsuccessful in achieving the purpose for which it was ostensibly drafted. For years there has been talk about the need to bring that legislation up to date. Repeatedly, on this side of the House, members of all parties have talked of the adverse effects of combines. There have been innumerable court cases in which some of the most respected firms in Canada engaging in various fields of economic endeavour have been prosecuted and convicted for violating the provisions of the anti-combines legislation. Despite this, Mr. Speaker, the available evidence shows that combines are more prevalent than ever, that they are more effective than ever, and that they continue to be detrimental to the Canadian people. This government announced some time ago that it was studying the question and that new legislation would be brought in at an early date.

The Economic Council was asked to make a study of combines. That study was to relate to the proposed legislation. The Economic Council presented an interim report. I do not want to refer to what is said in the interim report except to point out that, while making its review, the Economic Council received a large number of submissions from important organizations in business, labour and, I suppose, of the academic community, about the problem Canada faces in connection with monopolies and combines.

I am one who believes in that about which the minister has spoken so often since entering public life. I believe in participatory democracy. I believe in letting people know the facts so that they can give reasonable consideration to the problems we face and decide intelligently what can be done. I submit that this cannot be done if the government, whenever it proposes to act, proceeds to make inquiries, proceeds to call for studies and to ask for submissions, and then takes the view that all the material that has been gathered is its private property and that there is good reason for keeping the information secret. I submit that very seldom are there reasons for keeping such detailed information from the public. I am not talking just about Members of Parliament. The ordinary citizens of Canada, the press, the radio and those in television as well as Members of Parliament, ought to have the right to look at the record, to see the arguments advanced for and against a certain proposal, and to make a reasoned judgment as to why certain things should be done or not done. That is what I propose in my notice of motion for the production of papers. The government has refused to comply.

May I take a few moments to point out what has been happening in this country in recent years. Mr. W. F. Lindsay of the merger and monopoly branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs supplied certain relevant information to Marc Eliesen, Director of Research for the New Democratic Party, on the subject of mergers. I wish to look at the record and to show how many mergers have taken place in the last few years and how greatly accelerated the rate of mergers has become. According to Mr. Lindsay's report, in 1962 there were 185 mergers; in 1963 there were 129; in 1964, 204; in 1965, 235; in 1966, 203; in 1967, 228; in 1968, 402 and in 1969, the last year for which there are figures, there were 504 mergers. If we look at the rate at which foreign companies are taking over or merging with Canadian companies, we cannot help but be alarmed. All this is taking place at a time when the government has designated a minister to look at the question of foreign ownership and how it affects Canada.

The figures show, for example, that in 1962 there were 79 foreign takeovers; in 1963, there were 41; in 1964, there were 80; in 1965, there were 78; in 1966, there were 80 such takeovers; in 1967, there were 85; in 1968, there were 163 and in 1969, there were 168. We must remember that, in most cases, American corporations are taking over our particularly large companies. Increasingly, American business interests are taking over the most important segments of the Canadian economy. This concerns the people of Canada more and more. It is a problem about which every political party in Canada is concerned. Both the Ontario Liberal party and the Ontario Conservative party are discussing this problem more and more. We, of the New Democratic Party, are not alone in our concern about the increasing control exercised by United States interests of many facets of the Canadian economy. I know that Members of Parliament are aware of the fact that the oil industry, the mining industry, as well as a host of other fields in the Canadian economy, are controlled now almost exclusively by United States concerns. For this reason, we feel that the entire question of combines—and I submit that combines are usually formed to thwart the will of the Canadian consumer—ought to be looked at. We feel that they must be controlled. We feel that the formation of combines such as we have witnessed, Mr. Speaker, must be severely controlled or stopped.

We have called on the government to modernize, to refurbish and to rewrite the entire anti-combines legislation. We are glad that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) has promised that there will be legislation along that line. We welcome it. I do not say that we shall welcome his proposals; yet we welcome the opportunity to discuss the whole question. Without taking too much of the time of the House may I say, very simply, that we feel we, and the people of Canada, have a right to discuss this question and that we have a right to know all the facts. That is why it is essential that we have the kind of information which was supplied to the Economic Council of Canada for the report which they made. I see no reason why the government has refused in this and many other cases to give the information requested. There can be no other reason for their secrecy except the arrogant feeling of the government that only they are entitled to the facts before they decide on issues and policies, and before they introduce legislation.

I urge the government to reconsider its refusal to supply the information which I requested and to table the submissions made to the Economic Council of Canada on combines and competition.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): I gather from the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) that his main concern in moving this motion is the great number of mergers that have taken place in corporate structures in Canada in the last few years. While it is true that these mergers are taking place, the fact that they do take place is not necessarily bad. Also, the fact that some of these mergers may involve the takeover of Canadian companies by foreign-owned corporations is not something which can be controlled through competition policy. I am sure the hon. member is aware that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) is conducting a study to determine in what ways and by what means we can control the evergrowing encroachment on the Canadian economy by foreign owned corporations.

The report of the Economic Council of Canada does not suggest that we do this through a revised competition policy. I believe it would be of value to refer to this report and to quote directly from it. I quote from page 113 of the Interim Report on Competition Policy of the Economic Council of Canada:

> The previous Chapter emphasized that the basic reason for public policy to be concerned with mergers is that in the majority of cases they result in permanent changes in the structure of industry—changes that may have important implications for the future performance of the economy.

This does not mean that mergers should be prevented in order that we may exercise a greater degree of control over our economy and prevent foreign firms from taking over Canadian firms. That is not the sense of this statement. The report continues:

> These implications may be for good or ill or a mixture of both, and can usually be foreseen only very imperfectly. On the good side, mergers may be an important means by which owners who wish to divest themselves of a business or part of a business can do so with a minimum of disruptive economic effects. They may also be the most appropriate means of achieving certain cost savings, or of bringing about industrial reorganizations made necessary by changes in patterns of demand or in the technical conditions of production. On the bad side, mergers may bring about significant increases in market power capable of redounding to the disadvantage of consumers, and that can be extremely difficult to reverse or offset once the merger has been completed.

I wish to reiterate that the council was not concerned in this report about the aspects of foreign ownership which can sometimes be tied to mergers. I gather from the statements of the hon. member that this is his particular concern.

The first point I wish to make is that the 40 submissions referred to by the Economic Council of Canada were not really submissions to the council for its review of Canada's competition policy. In the introduction to the Interim Report on Competition Policy dated July 1969, the council made it perfectly clear that the 40 submissions which were received were in connection with the whole of its consumer affairs reference and not just competition policy. This reference by the federal government, dated July 22, 1966, requested the council and I quote:

> In the light of the Government's long-term economic objectives, to study and advise regarding:
> (a) the interests of the consumer particularly as they relate to the functions of the Department of the Registrar General (now the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs);
> (b) combines, mergers, monopolies and restraint of trade;
> (c) patents, trade marks, copyrights and registered industrial designs.

The council has been carrying out this reference on the basis that it will issue a total of four reports. This is specifically set out in the Interim Report on Competition Policy. The first two reports have already been made. The 40 submissions to which reference has been made cover the whole range of the four reports, not only the second report on competition policy.

The first report was the Interim Report on Consumer Affairs which was published in 1967. The second report was the 1969 Interim Report on Competition Policy. The third report will be an interim report on the various aspects of industrial and intellectual property covered by paragraph (c) of the terms of reference. Finally, there will be a fourth and final report which will contain further observations and recommendations, notably on the subject of consumer affairs. It will contain a general summing up of the interrelations between the three main elements of the reference and their place in the broad spectrum of government economic policies.

Shortly after receiving the reference, the council advertised in the media across Canada its readiness to receive written submissions from individuals and organizations with regard to any of the areas to be studied. Nearly 40 such submissions were received. These are presumably the 40 submissions referred to in the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. The council did not undertake to make any of these submissions public. Their invitation was couched in language which would lead the persons submitting briefs to expect that they would be held in confidence. In any event, there were not 40 submissions relating to the report on competition policy. As already noted, some of them deal with subjects about which the council has not even reported.

I suppose it would be possible for the council to identify those portions of the briefs which deal with the competition policy and to secure the approval of each of the contributors to having these portions tabled. What purpose such a tabling would serve in connection with an understanding of the council's report on competition policy is very obscure. After the council made its Interim Report on Competition Policy, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) extended a similar invitation to all interested parties to make representations with respect to the council's findings and recommendations. A considerable number of such briefs were received.

On December 11, 1969, a motion was made by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) requesting copies of all these representations. Subject to agreement being obtained, from those who made these submissions, the minister agreed at that time to table all these documents. In due course agreement was obtained from all of the parties involved to the tabling of the documents and they were all duly tabled on April 29, 1970. Accordingly, it seems very likely that virtually all the substantive representations made in respect of competition policy as such have already been made available to the House as a result of the tabling of documents by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The technique whereby submissions are tabled with the consent of the originator is a singularly appropriate one for this sort of situation and, undoubtedly, could be considered in respect of the documents which the hon. member for Winnipeg North wishes to see. Until, however, the Council has prepared its third and fourth reports, it would be unreasonable to require the submission of these papers which might give rise to a debate on the very subject which the Council is attempting to consider in a quiet and reflective manner for the purpose of reporting to the government its considered views. It seems quite clear that the public interest would not be served by the tabling of these submissions at this time. Precedent has left to the minister responsible discretion as to whether to recommend that papers of this type be not produced if he considers it against the public interest so to do. However, once the remaining two reports have been dully completed and rendered to the government, if it is considered by members of the House that there should be production of these papers, consideration could then be given by the government to following the same technique as was followed by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with a view to tabling the papers after consent has been obtained from each of the contributors of the briefs.

The interim report on competition policy has far-reaching effects. Its importance lies not only in the recommendations it made regarding mergers, the trade practices of industrial concerns and of certain retail and wholesale businesses. The Council also made recommendations concerning other areas which have not yet been subject to regulation by the federal government. The report suggests that instead of trade mergers, restrictions of trade and similar practices being treated as a criminal offence as we now do under the Combines Investigation Act, we should regard these offences as civil matters. In this lies a serious problem inasmuch as civil matters, as hon. members know, are the sole responsibility of the provinces under our constitution and before the recommendations in the report in this respect could be accepted there would certainly have to be agreement on the part of the provinces that the federal authorities take over responsibility for a field which would then be classified as falling into the civil section. This may be one reason why earlier action has not been taken on the report, but I am hopeful the minister will soon implement some of the recommendations made by the Council in its interim report on competition policy.

I hope that when these steps are taken they will be not only be directed at industrial practices in restriction of trade as we have come to know them; I hope that close attention will be paid to the recommendations the Council made with regard to certain courses of action which are now followed by many of the professional societies in Canada. This is referred to in the report, not at great length but sufficiently to bring to the attention of those concerned the fact that Canadians may be suffering because of restrictions imposed by professional societies in many provinces. This does not necessarily apply to all the provinces or to all the professional organizations but, in my opinion, the hon. member for Winnipeg North would be doing the public a service if he urged that early action be taken to curb the practices of various professional societies which restrict the number of persons who may belong to them so that the services of many skilled people are denied to those who need them at a fair price.

Some time ago I drew attention to the fact that the dental societies in Canada carry these restrictions to the extreme. I pointed out that it was very difficult for a person who received training in a country other than Canada or the United States to become licensed to practice dentistry in Canada. There was an incident which was well publicized during the Czechoslovak revolution. A number of dentists from that country came to Canada, but they were not allowed to practice here even though some of them were fluent in English and were competent in other ways. If my memory serves me correctly, there are only 33 dentists practising in Canada who have obtained their qualifications outside Canada or the United States.

On the other hand, the medical profession is very much dependent on practitioners who have received their training outside Canada. Certainly, half of those in Alberta received their training outside Canada. It seems as though we are allowing our professional societies to say: It is all right for you to do open heart surgery and major operations of that kind, but it is not all right to pull a tooth if you received your training at a university outside Canada. This is the type of restrictive practice which is causing a great deal of concern. It deprives Canadians of certain services to which they should be entitled, and this is the type of thing hon. members should urge the minister to control. I, personally, hope that when he presents a new bill to replace the existing Combines Investigation Act the minister will introduce provisions to ensure there is competition not only among industries and among retail businesses but also in the professions, because as pointed out in this interim report on competition policy this is an area in which there has been a lack of legislation.

I realize that to implement the recommendations of this report as far as the professional societies are concerned would mean stepping on the toes of the provincial governments because the regulation of professional societies, the statutes under which they were formed and under which they operate, are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. But I believe that in view of the concern felt on the subject in this country the provinces would be happy to see the federal government take a lead. I urge the hon. member for Winnipeg North and, indeed, all hon. members to encourage the minister to implement all of this report as soon as possible so that we can eliminate the unjust practices which are taking place in various aspects of the economic life of Canada.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House for production of papers, moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) asks the government to release some 40 submissions made to the Economic Council of Canada in regard to Canada's competition policy. These submissions were made in 1969.

Since we live in a free and democratic society, I think our first impulse is to say that all such documents should be made public. On the other hand, the hon. member is asking that the Economic Council of Canada release the submissions. We must bear in mind that when the Economic Council of Canada was established it was made free from and independent of the government. If it were made subject to the wishes of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and other portfolios in the cabinet, its effectiveness would be destroyed and its recommendations would not be given credibility. So the cardinal principle here is that the Economic Council of Canada be free from and independent of the cabinet; that its recommendations which are made periodically shall not be subject to political pressure from the government. Therefore, it seems to me that if we make demands at will for documents and information from the Economic Council of Canada, pretty soon the independent character which it presently has will be lost. If the documents and submissions made to the council were released, the release should be made by the Economic Council of Canada itself, not by the council on instructions from the cabinet.

It has been suggested that this concept of being independent of and free from political pressure from the government should be expanded and that there should be established a pollution and environment council for Canada; that this council too should be free from and independent of political pressures to enable it to range over the whole sphere of the Canadian environment and to make independent recommendations to the government and to Members of Parliament—indeed, to the whole country. If such a council were established, I am sure we would want it to be an independent body like the Economic Council of Canada, a body freed from political pressure and from demands for papers and documents at will on instructions from the government.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North said, the present combines legislation has been in force for many years; I think he said about 40 years. The legislation has been very unsuccessful, he alleged, and has not really served the purpose for which it was designed. I do not accept that contention. For example, there have been many prosecutions brought under the act; we read of them at regular intervals. I should like to refer to some of the prosecutions of the Department of Justice under section 33 of the Combines Investigation Act during 1969 and 1970. For instance, there was a prosecution in September of 1969 brought against a company in Regina that was retailing gasoline, and a fine of $100 resulted.

There was a prosecution in Montreal, in August of the same year, involving a manufacturer. This prosecution resulted in a fine of $1,000. There were many prosecutions in that year, including one brought against Imperial Tobacco Products, a cigarette manufacturer, resulting in a fine of $3,000. Not only do companies that are prosecuted have to bear the financial sanctions levied against them, but they also suffer adverse publicity as a result thereof. I am sure it costs the companies hundreds of thousands of dollars in advertising to offset the unfavourable publicity they have received.

[Mr. Foster.]

Therefore, looking at it from all sides, I suggest the legislation is not as ineffective as the hon. member suggests. Many major investigations have been carried out, such as the one involving paving companies in the province of Ontario. In that case very stern action was taken by the provincial government and a great many paving contractors were debarred from tendering on paving jobs for the provincial government for a period of years. There was an investigation made into gasoline pricing in the Sudbury area. Also, there has been an investigation into business forms throughout Canada, as well as a separate investigation in the province of Quebec. However, I think we would all agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North that all political parties are concerned about price fixing and we all want to have an effective Combines Investigation Branch in our government to keep price fixing under control.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to notice of motion No. 21, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) gave the impression that he is still thinking of competition as it was in the days of Horatio Alger.

Mr. Orlikow: You mean Mackenzie King.

Mr. Otto: Yes, even in the days of Mackenzie King. It is a common belief in many circles today that we have competition of sorts. Any hon. member who has engaged in business during the last 20 years will have discovered that in reality there is no competition, only tolerance. The briefs submitted to the Economic Council of Canada probably reflect this old idea that there is competition, and as a result the Economic Council has made certain recommendations.

The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) referred to prosecutions of paving companies. I have been familiar with this phase of business enterprise for about 20 years, and the fact is that this industry has not found a proper method of ensuring that the lowest bidder does in fact get the job. This applies not only to paving but to the gasoline industry and many others. The fact is that in this business practically every contract put out for tender requires a great amount of capital to finance it. In other words, these contracts have to be bonded and new machines and equipment have to be purchased. As a result, only a small number of firms can adequately undertake this kind of contract.

On the other side of the picture you have the reliability of the contractor; you have to consider his financial position. I regret that the hon. member for Algoma has left the Chamber, because I am sure he would be interested to know that in this industry it is the large firms which can undertake contracts and the smaller firms usually suffer a loss. If you check the financial pages over the last number of years, you will find that there has been a succession of bankruptcies in this business.

For years municipalities and provinces have been searching for a method by which contracts can be awarded to the person who can do the job at the best price and most efficiently. Such a method has never been worked out, because usually the person who puts in a low tender is the one who says, "I haven't much work to do, but I want to keep my gang working. I will bid a low price and hope that later there will be a contract on which I can make money." Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, he loses money on the contract and cannot continue in business. The firms which make money are those which bid for the large contracts of $15 million or $20 million, but these firms are limited in number and they divide the contract among themselves. The same thing applies to gasoline companies.

The hon. member spoke about mergers. If I may deal with that matter for a moment, I would point out that this whole situation has been mixed up with economic nationalism. Originally, mergers were attempts by a company or a group of companies to get control of subsidiary industries which would help them in their manufacturing or sales. It was a good type of promotion. For example, York Air Conditioning or one of the other large corporations acquired control over its suppliers in order to make sure it had an adequate supply of materials and in order to become more efficient.

Mergers are not made for reasons of efficiency; they are made merely for the purposes of the stock market. A company will acquire another company, not because the second company will be of assistance in its activities but because it might have cash reserves. It might have a good sales record in the market; it might have a loss position which could be used by the purchasing company. It is required in order to enhance the shares of the first company.

If the hon. member traces the history of some mergers, he will find that usually they are done on the basis of a group of individuals, "con" artists, getting control of a company. Using the shares, or future shares of the company they have acquired, they acquire yet another company by the transfer of shares and some money. But the new merger requires still another merger with other companies. As they acquire more companies they keep adding to their financial statement as though, indeed, the assets of their great megalopolis were going up. Though they transfer shares back and forth and make a few million dollars on them, eventually the large monopoly finds itself in the position where it cannot pay dividends and naturally the market, in its shares, plummets to the bottom. This is the history of mergers entered into without common sense being applied.

The hon. member talked about competition policy. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, there is no real competition. The days have gone when a small manufacturer could compete against a large manufacturer. The days have gone when someone could start a plant with two or three workmen, eventually get a larger share of the market and expand. Now if he becomes a threat to a large company, he is put out of business in about five minutes or his company is simply acquired. One can no longer produce for the small market. You have to produce for the mass market, and that requires an investment of millions of dollars. How many small entrepreneurs have a few million dollars kicking around in their pockets? There are very few. Instead, you have the large corporations, working fairly efficiently, having almost a monopoly of the market between four or five firms and tolerating small entrepreneurs on the periphery of the market who in turn will supply some good ideas and give the semblance of competition.

Sales are no longer controlled by the consuming purchaser. There is a presumption by the Economic Council and others that it is the purchaser who says, "I want that product. I have this much money. The product is good. This is the thing I want, and I will buy it." The presumption is made that this is a rational decision on the part of the buyer, but that is nonsense. The decisions that supposedly are made by the consumer are in fact made by the producer. The producer knows that he is going to produce so many millions of a certain article, depending upon what his market research has shown. Then he says, "I will spend so many millions of dollars on promotion and I will convince the consumer that he needs my product." As a result, you do not have a free market of any kind; you have the producer, who influences the consumer, who buys the product.

Competition between large corporations depends upon the success of their advertising promotions. This fact has been well documented in the financial pages of the Wall Street Journal and other publications. For example, there was trouble in the automotive market within the last few years because money was a little scarce. It was presumed that the automotive manufacturers would get very panicky because their cars were not selling; there was not much money around and people were not buying new cars. Mr. Speaker, that did not faze the manufacturers in any way whatsoever. The manufacturers had made their plans and knew how many cars would be sold in five years, because they had already convinced the American and Canadian public that every individual must have a new car every two or three years.

In between, when this recession cycle came into play, all the manufacturers did was switch the emphasis to the automotive dealer. To him they said, "For the next year or two we will let you make some money on repairs." As we know, each dealer is expected to have a repair section attached to his dealership. For the past two or three years the automobile dealer has been making money on repairs. Now, with the promotion back on new cars, he will be into that market again. The result is that the car manufacturer is not hurt.

Even if these papers were produced, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would derive no benefit from them because they are based on an assumption that competition exists, that there are small firms competing with the big firms and that it is the consumer who finally makes the decision. I hope I have explained to the hon. member some of the fallacies upon which he would find these papers had been based, and therefore will see that their production is not important.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this motion gives us an opportunity to consider two important aspects of our public policies. The points that occur to me as being important are, first, the operations of the Economic Council of Canada and, second, the questions of competition policy raised by the report of the Economic Council, published in July, 1969, on the subject of competition.

I take a very serious view of the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I am inclined to share the views expressed by my colleague the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster). It would seem to me to be very dangerous for this House to adopt the procedure suggested with reference to submissions or other material acquired by the Economic Council which would have the effect in the future of impeding inquiries by that body.

As we know, in this country inquiries are now carried on by public agencies, broadly speaking, in one of two forms. The form best known by tradition is that of a royal commission appointed under the Inquiries Act. Such a body holds public hearings and receives well-publicized submissions. To a considerable extent its affairs are conducted in public. In recent years, however, it has been found in Canada necessary to supplement this type of inquiry by inquiries of another kind. These are studies conducted by specially appointed agencies, some of which, as is the case with the Economic Council of Canada, are creations of statutes of Parliament. These bodies are experts in their own right and produce studies of great importance.

We have only to look at the annual reports of the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada and other agencies of this type to recognize the importance of their studies. In addition, they produce special studies. Some of these studies are undertaken at their own volition, but sometimes they are requested by the government of Canada. The report now under discussion falls into the second category. I believe that in 1966 the government of Canada requested the Economic Council to study the subject of competition policy and to make recommendations. I have looked carefully at the terms of reference of the Economic Council, and nowhere in them was it suggested, even by implication, that this was to be a public type of inquiry to be conducted as if the council were a royal commission appointed under the Inquiries Act. It was very simply and plainly a reference by the government to this expert body requesting it to bring its knowledge and ability to bear on this important problem.

In the course of its inquiry the Economic Council solicited views from the public. I believe it is within the knowledge of hon. members that advertisements were placed in newspapers. Members of the public who were interested in the subject were invited to make submissions, and some did. The 40 submissions referred to in the hon. member's motion are stated, in the Economic Council's report, to have resulted from their advertisement for submissions. But these submissions were made not for public consumption but for the assistance of the council. Some of these submissions undoubtedly contain a great deal of confidential information.

I think the efficacy of the Economic Council's operations could be destroyed if it were compelled, on the basis of a study like this, to disclose submissions made to it by the public when those submissions were not made under the condition that they might be made public at a later stage. Therefore, on the ground of broad principle I believe it would be a great mistake for us to adopt the motion of the hon. member. I believe in the long run it would lead to a lessening of the ability and influence of the Economic Council in conducting studies which are of importance to Canada.

The other subject which flows from this motion, particularly from the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky) and the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto), is that of the report itself. This, perhaps, is one of the few times the House has made any reference to this report. I have no doubt it will be extensively referred to later in this session when it is expected that amendments to the Combines Investigation Act will be presented. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has repeated the cynical view often expressed—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I did not say a word.

Mr. Blair: I offer my apology to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North has expressed the oft repeated cynical view that combines legislation in this country has been ineffective.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree with that.

Mr. Blair: The hon. member takes as justification for that statement the fact that the combines laws are still being broken and there are combinations in restraint of trade, and so on. If this argument had any validity, one might equally say that the Criminal Code is ineffective.

Mr. Orlikow: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blair: One might also say that many other laws are ineffective—

Mr. Orlikow: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blair: —because they have not completely stamped out crime or any other type of unlawful act. I suggest the combines law has mitigated unsatisfactory business practices in this country. It is said that in the United States the anti-trust laws are always sitting at every board of directors' table. I believe the same is true in this country. There is no question that these laws can be made more effective.

One of the most important features of the report under discussion is the specific, positive suggestions which are made in order to give greater effect to Canadian combines policy. Among these is the suggestion that our combines laws should not be narrowly based, as they are now, on criminal law but should be expanded and civil jurisdiction and civil law should apply to the administration of combines legislation. If there were a greater variety of remedies and more flexibility available to the administrators of our combines laws, I believe it would be possible to achieve greater control and efficacy in combines policy.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

• (8:10 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS, FUNDS FOR INVESTIGATION OF PROJECTS, ADVANCES FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) that Bill C-193, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity of reviewing carefully the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), yesterday and this afternoon. It is not my intention to be repetitive or to take up the time of the House in reciting what has already been so ably put by that hon. member. However, I should like to take a few moments to point out to Your Honour and members of the House why a number of people who have no personal knowledge of or immediate association with the Yukon, as I certainly have not, object to the type of legislation that has been presented to the House.

The Canadian north includes the Yukon, of course, as well as the Arctic islands and the Northwest Territories. In recent years the north has been the subject of great interest to all Canadians. I think everyone in Canada is very interested in seeing how this huge area, potentially vastly wealthy in minerals, is to be developed. I think all of us, no matter which party we support, are interested in seeing those resources developed in the best and most efficient way for all Canadians, particularly for those who live and work in the area.

Judging from the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary in presenting this legislation, and from the remarks of other hon. members, there seems no doubt that there has been very little consideration or analysis of the effects of contributions of private enterprise, as opposed to public or governmental enterprise, to the development of the north. Of course, many superficial remarks were made. As the hon. member for Yukon pointed out, the deputy minister made a number of superficial observations in this regard. Nevertheless, it is quite apparent that there has been no real analysis. We have had what one might call a guesstimate, if I might coin a phrase, as to which is the better of the two ways.

Some hon. members who may not have put their views on record—I do not think it is important whether or not their views are on record—have said that, the Northern Canada Power Commission must be effective because Ontario Hydro has been such a success over the years. I agree that Ontario Hydro has been a great success. It is a publicly-owned corporation, but it is just one publicly-owned corporation that has been a success. It is a non sequitor to say that therefore every publicly-owned corporation will be a success. From the evidence—I call it evidence—presented by the hon. member for Yukon, it is clear that the Northern Canada Power Commission has not developed power very efficiently. It has been unfair with regard to rates charged to some users, and particularly unfair in proposing to equalize rates among the users of the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

The hon. member for Yukon pointed out that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) took a trip to Europe not long ago for the purpose of raising private capital for this and related projects in the north. That was a very commendable effort on the part of the minister. But the minister, despite his efforts in this regard, has apparently been snowed under by the establishment—by that I mean the establishment of senior mandarins in the civil service—many of whom have by hook or by crook penetrated to the front benches of the government party. This sort of thinking has permeated this government and the previous government led by former Prime Minister Pearson.

There is one point that I think is very important. Whether a private or a public enterprise operates utilities such as we are proposing in this bill, it is quite clear there must be some kind of review board to regulate the rates. I say this because public enterprises can become just as vicious, and more so in some cases, than private enterprises. One must consider the psychological effect on civil servants involved in these enterprises. Whenever members of the civil service or of the public service, or whatever one wants to call them, become associated with an enterprise, they invariably feel that they are infallible; they think their decisions are infallible; they become wasteful. Therefore, there must be some check on them.

All too often in the last few years have we seen the growth of boards, commissions, quasi-governmental corporations and organizations all over this country. Some have been federal, others provincial. Once they have been set up there has been no real control over them. In theory they must answer to Parliament, but this is a lot of nonsense. Your Honour knows that, just as the rest of us know it. Once these organizations are set up, they do as they please. The Public Service Commission is a good example, as is the CBC. I could present many other horrible examples of such organizations which, once set up, do as they please. Once they are established they are like Frankensteins' monster; there is no means of controlling them. For that reason, since the government has shown every inclination to establish bodies of this kind, there should be a board composed of members of the cabinet, or people who are elected, to review the rates decided upon by this or any related organization.

I have said on a number of occasions, and I repeat it, that this government and its immediate predecessor have adopted too paternalistic an attitude toward existing development in certain parts of Canada. I refer to the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and elsewhere. Its whole attitude has been, mother knows best or, if you want to put it another way, big daddy in Ottawa knows best.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member was right the first time.

Mr. Nesbitt: Both terms are equally good. The government's whole attitude has been: We know what is best for you. Most of these people have never even been in the Yukon or the Northwest Territories, yet they say; we know what is best. You come across that attitude very frequently. You see it in civil servants who came to this country in recent years and acquired senior positions. Of course, half of them have never been outside Ottawa or very far from here. Not only have they seen little of Canada but they have come from other countries. I do not intend to mention names, but there is a long list of them.

Mr. Nielsen: They are the 24-hour experts.

Mr. Nesbitt: They did not do very well in their own countries and have tried to perpetuate their mistakes here.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Nesbitt: It is shameful. For a long time the elected members of Parliament have performed their functions adequately. We have always had a very good division of responsibility. Members of this House understand local problems. They enjoy the confidence of those who elected them. More recently the members of a very good public service have carried out the administrative duties relating to political decisions. Some of those engaged in the public service have wanted to do more. Their story is similar to the allegories of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries that were written in France, Germany and elsewhere. They were considered children's fairy stories, but really they were political allegories. I am thinking of stories like the fisherman's wife who wanted the sun, moon and everything else. Some of our senior public servants were not satisfied with influencing ministers indirectly or doing their jobs for them; they wanted to be in the driver's seat.

This situation became increasingly apparent in the Pearson administration. Right Hon. L. B. Pearson, the previous Prime Minister, was a former civil servant. Mr. Pickersgill, a former minister, was a very eminent, capable and able civil servant. These people did well. The mental attitude of the senior echelon, or mandarins as they are known, moved from the public service into the cabinet. We still find this situation. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) are all graduates of the senior school of the civil service. There is little doubt that they dominate the cabinet. This bill is another example of mixing the administrative level of government and the political decision-making which is supposed to be carried out by the elected members. It is true that the Prime Minister and some members of the cabinet, former civil servants, have been elected. We know why they were elected. There are still a number of seats in this country which are regarded as safe political seats: that is how they got here.

There is one matter which does not relate in general terms to the unsatisfactory side of legislation but to this legislation specifically. This was pointed out by the hon. member for Yukon. This bill should not go to committee. It should not be passed by this House until related bills which were passed in the last session, and proposed legislation that will affect that part of Canada, are carefully analyzed as to the impact and economic effect they will have on the Yukon, Northwest Territories and Arctic islands. To pass this bill as it stands would do a great disservice to the development of our country. Canadians are looking forward to the development of our northern territories and their great wealth. This development must be carried out in a way that is best for all Canadians.

Grave doubts have been expressed by members of this House and by nearly all the major organizations in the Yukon. They know best; they have to live with this situation. Many of the theoretical types sit in armchairs in Ottawa and have never visited that part of the country. Some consideration should be given to local wishes in this matter, but the government has not done this in the past. Maybe in 1971, the first year of the seventies, the government will turn over a new leaf and will pay attention to the wishes of the local people, those affected by legislation invented by mandarins in Ottawa. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I move:

That all the words after "that" be left out and the following inserted:

"this bill be read upon a day six months hereafter"

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that "upon a day six months hereafter" means that it not be read upon a day six months hereafter, but just in the hereafter.

Mr. Nielsen: As far as possible, in the hereafter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And read in another place.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I think it is clear that the purpose is not so much to talk about the desirability of bringing power facilities and the like to the people in the territories as it is to kill and destroy the concept of the bill. But that is neither here nor there. I think we were all amused by the applause that preceded private members' business at five o'clock. There were two or three minutes of non-partisan applause. I noticed that government members participated with great relish. I enjoyed the applause more than the speech that followed, in terms of content and its value to the debate.

It seems that one of the fundamental objections to the bill is the idea that power rates should be equalized between the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I have some sympathy for that concept. In the political development that has existed in both territories there has been a different and more advanced concept with regard to the political structure in the Yukon than there has in the Northwest Territories. Depending upon the degree of pressure that the government keeps on the brakes insofar as progress toward political autonomy is concerned, presumably the Yukon will reach the stage of provincial political status before the Northwest Territories. The Yukon will have a progressive political, provincial status before the Northwest Territories.

Because of the British North America Act, in terms of power, we have a concept in Canada whereby the equalization principle shall apply within provincial boundaries and not overlap into other provinces. I appreciate and endorse that concept. That is a very minor part of the Conservative campaign with respect to this legislation. It is a superficial type of argument. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) made this abundantly clear in the speeches he made on this bill and the amendments. The Conservatives feel that the fundamental question is private power versus public power; there is no question about that. The Conservative party is attempting to preserve the last vestige of exploitive private power whose purpose is to distribute and supply electrical energy in order to make a profit. We have gone through this argument in every province of Canada at one time or another, and every political party at one time or another has come out in favour of the concept of public ownership—only one of them out of conscience and principle and others out of political expediency.

It may be that the Northern Canada Power Commission is not the most sensitive to the needs of the people in the area; it may be that the commission is not the most efficient; it may be that it is bureaucrat-ridden; it may be that it is more concerned with its own paperwork than it is with the purpose for which it was set up; it may even be that some of the members of the commission are not even friendly toward the concept of public power. But I do not think this is reason enough, in a moral or philosophical sense, to defeat the concept we want to establish, namely, that public administration in this field is preferable to private enterprise. Every political party, every province in Canada has endorsed the idea that public power is more valuable to the people than private ownership, exploitation and development for the purpose of private profit.

It would seem to me that the contention on behalf of the Conservative party that the Northern Canada Power Commission is not responsive to the interests of the people of these territories somehow runs counter to their hope that they will be called upon to form a government after the next election. If hon. members to my right think it is likely they will form a government next time, surely it is a companion concept that they will be in a position to straighten out the NCPC and see that it is headed in the right direction.

The primary point to be considered in relation not only to the amendment before us but in relation to the earlier motion is that its purpose is not to have a task force study this issue in committee of the whole or elsewhere; the purpose of the Conservative party is to destroy the concept of the bill and establish over this last frontier the discreditive values of private exploitive power in the field of energy, despite the fact that it has been accepted for many years by every political party in Canada that public power is the most desirable, the most ethical and the most moral way of proceeding. We cannot agree with this attempt to destroy the principle behind the bill. I do not really think the Liberal party is any better disposed toward it than is the party to my right. It is simply that, sitting where they are, they have seen an opportunity to make political gain by taking something which is socially desirable and putting a political complexion upon it.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about the bill before us. You can only call it socialism. No matter how you slice it, that is what it is. Look at what has happened to Britain. It has been destroyed by too much socialism in the last 50 years. Who would think that a dynamic, young country like Canada—I almost said "republic" because that is what we are rapidly heading to under the dictatorship of an arrogant government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bigg: Wait for it. I know you are ahead of me, but you are wrong. It is not a question of personalities but of principles. We are carrying on our back an old man of the sea—socialism. If you like, you can call it democratic socialism. It can only work under the strong fist of a top-heavy bureaucracy.

It is only a week or two ago since Air Canada, which has a good deal of merit—we all know it is one of the finest airlines in the world, and so it ought to be; we are spending enough money on it—was a little worried because it was losing a certain amount of business. What did they do? Did they improve their service? No. They cut into the private part of the economy. They took away the routes of small outfits such as Wardair in Edmonton, my home city. I hope they are not simply picking on Edmonton, but they are picking on private enterprise.

There is something more important at stake here than balancing the books of Air Canada. Canada is big enough for us all, as the leader of the Créditistes (Mr. Caouette) has said. I would think the airways are big enough for both Air Canada and private enterprise. Who built Canada's air fleet? It was the bush pilots, every one a free enterpriser. Air Canada itself looks to these bush pilots when they need men among the brass to help run their enterprise. They learned the business the hard way. I am sick and tired of seeing well-meaning bureaucrats nibble away at free enterprise in every facet of the economic life of this country.

I could spend all my time discussing agriculture, but of course this is not a debate on agriculture, though it comes close to it. We are now invading the last frontier. Agriculture used to be a frontier. At one time you could say to the hungry people of Canada, or of the earth: Go west and take a fresh piece of land and carve yourself out a career. You cannot do that any more because the socialists have taken over agriculture. That is gone. What has happened to those who want to run farms? They have been told: Go into the cities and live in high-rise apartments. If you cannot beat us, you will have to join us. They have taken over the fishing industry, both freshwater and deep sea, instead of encouraging free enterprise to become more efficient through thrift and hard work. I heard a speech the other day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). In effect, he said: It will never do you any good to save your money, because if you save it we will take it.

I turn, now, to consider affairs in the north where we are carrying out another experiment. They tell us there is to be a new province there. What kind of province? Is it to be one where a young man can go to find relief from the cities, or prospect for oil on his own, or extract oil on his own or by forming a small company? Oh, no. Everything is to be done under government orders, under government quotas. The theory is that you can trust the government. How is it, then, that Mr. Pickersgill is now head both of the CNR and the CPR? He made the job himself under Liberal auspices. He is also the author of a biography on Mr. Mackenzie King. His self appointment is the biggest act of nepotism I have ever read about—and I have read all I can find on political science and the history of the world in order to try to become an efficient Member of Parliament. If that is not true, I defy him to deny it. No eastern potentate ever had the power that the members of this government have today.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: It sounds as though you are the new leader over there.

Mr. Bigg: I would welcome it, if you took on that job over there.

Mr. Mahoney: I will remember that suggestion.

Mr. Bigg: You have the money to do it. You do not need to be paid and can afford to give your time. It is a sacrifice for me to come down here. It is not a sacrifice for the millionaires. But I am not talking about millionaires; I am talking about the people who want to earn their living by the sweat of their brow. Those who were a little older than me told me that if I did my homework, if I worked hard at school, I was living in a land of opportunity and I could enjoy what I earned with my own hands. That is no longer so. I have to turn over to a bleeding, all-powerful, cynical, heartless government at least 38 per cent of every dollar that I earn, a government with no feeling for the little people except when the Liberals are on the hustings. Behind the closed doors of government they have no feeling for the little people, not even for the little cabinet ministers who are sitting opposite and who have no power in their own house.

We have been asking questions of the government, some 7,900 over the last three years, and none has been answered. Why is this? Because the mouths of ministers are taped with fear, the fear of this bureaucracy. I am not suggesting that they are fearful of any one man. I do not believe the Canadian people would put up with that sort of thing. I do not believe they are dictated to by one man. However, they are dictated to by a new and growing policy of Fabian socialism, a socialism that did not work in England and will not work anywhere else. There are still places in the world where you can make a living by hard work and enjoy the fruits of your enterprise. But none of these countries are socialist. The United States of America, with all its faults, is still the most prosperous nation on earth. When the rest of the world is hungry, war-torn and needs help, where does it go? Does it go to Red China or to Soviet Russia? No; it goes to the terrible eagle, the voracious, all-powerfull eagle.

When Canada needs money to develop its resources, where do we go? We go to the little people of the United States who are willing to take a gamble, though it is not a very big gamble to invest in Canada because there is still some free enterprise left here for them, and at the same time for us. There is still wealth to be had in Canada. But this bill will choke off one more avenue of free enterprise.

There are a great many people in the United States thinking very seriously about amending the U.S. constitution. They did not foresee the red menace and are seeking to have passed what is known as the twenty-third amendment and to force the federal government of the United States to sell back to the people of that country the means of production in industries in which the federal government has a monopoly. The United States is not free from creeping socialism either. This is why the people want to get the government out of the business of buying and selling in the marketplace. They feel this should be restored to the kind of people who created the affluence of the western world. Only the western world has sufficient resources to feed the hungry of the eastern world.

I could not vote for an amendment to provide for putting this bill off for six months; I want the bill torn up and put in the wastepaper basket where it belongs. We have proven beyond doubt that the most efficient form of work in the world is voluntary work, work which people are willing to give. Yet the Fabian socialists have told our young people this lie, that it does not pay them to go out to work, to be thrifty and to help their country produce. They have been told that their country owes them a living, and this is a damnable lie. Canada owes me nothing; but I owe every Canada every ounce of loyalty and energy that I possess to make her the country she should be. My hon. friend in the red shirt opposite thinks I am seeking the call of leadership. I am asking for leadership from the only place I can get it until the next election—from the treasury benches and from the back-benchers who sit behind them.

Should the CNR take over the CPR merely because the CNR is losing money? There might be an argument for this if the CNR were more efficient. In 1939 I rode on the British railroads, and I can say I have never ridden on such smooth-running, fast, up-to-date, clean, efficient, courteous railroads in my life, not even in Canada. I was in Britain a month or two ago and once again rode on the railroads, and I could not recognize them. They were late, dirty, and sloppy. Nobody cared. Why? Fabian socialism has taken over and now owns the railroads. It has tried to move into the steel industry and put England back on its feet. But what has happened? England is now on her knees begging Europe to admit her to the common market.

It should have been the other way around. England would not have to beg to get into the common market if she were the England of old; the common market would be knocking at England's door asking to share England's wealth and to learn England's know-how. Every industrial nation of the world copied England when England was free, when its people believed in free trade, productivity, hard work, thrift, honesty—all virtues that are "square." I have even heard people in Canada suggest that we should be willing to cut off ties with the old country, and by "the old country" I am talking about the country that has shown the world leadership. I could almost go along with cutting ties with Wilson's England, because Wilson cut off common sense. But there is hope there today for a man who calls a spade a spade.

I am no racist, but in South Africa it is easy for Fabian socialists to scream racism and murder. But they say nothing about the domination of the Indian Ocean by Russia. This is the real issue in that part of the world. However, I will say no more about that. I do not condone South Africa's treatment of the blacks. A lot of wealth is dug out of the mines by black slave labour. Are the Fabian socialists willing to serve in our armed forces, in our navy, in our air force, in our army?

• (8:50 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Are we going to war?

Mr. Bigg: We might.

Mr. Nielsen: We did once, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did not.

Mr. Bigg: I went to war once. Perhaps I was a fool, but I don't think so. I will go again for the same purpose, and that purpose is not to save all the bourgeois or the rich of America. It is to try to keep Canada strong, safe and free. For this I would be a fool again, if indeed I was a fool once. I would rather be a magnificent fool than a despicable coward. We are not talking about defence; we are talking about the free enterprise development of Canada without which we cannot survive. We are alone. We are no longer a bridge between prosperous England and the prosperous United States. We are fighting for existence. So is England, because she listened to Wilson. The United States has her hands full because the world is not grateful for what she has done, no matter what her mistakes may have been. We are alone, like it or not.

I am not against Red Russia or China. I am not against selling them wheat. Hungry people have to eat. Are we going to put all the means of production in Canada in the hands of the bureaucracy?

Mr. Nielsen: Of this government.

Mr. Bigg: Of any government? Even if we had our 208 members back, or if we had 248 or 258 members I would vote the same way. I would not want a Tory bureaucracy to run Canada any more than I want a Liberal bureaucracy to run it.

Mr. Nielsen: As it is doing.

Mr. Bigg: As it is. If any cabinet minister in our party were to carve out a $40,000 a year job for himself, I would oppose it; I would leave this party. Why don't you leave yours? My hon. friend talks about leadership. Let him have the courage to stand up and say he defies this heartless, arrogant government. He would not be a party of one for long; he would have two in his party.

Mr. Francis: He did.

Mr. Bigg: And don't think for a minute that he does not have the admiration of the Canadian people, whether they agree with him or not. He has character, he has courage—and he did not have to ruin the armed forces before he did it. I am looking for leadership.

Mr. Mahoney: I bet you are.

Mr. Bigg: But not to lead this party. I am looking for the leadership of other people whom I can follow. I am quite happy that our leader is not trying to run a cold-blooded dictatorship in this country, and I am happy that there are no mandarins sitting in our party. There have been times when I thought there might have been people in my party who were going too far to the left. You can ask any of them if they know where I stand. They know, Mr. Speaker.

In the few minutes at my disposal I am trying to make a plea for good old free enterprise, ordinary free enterprise without compulsion, without any nonsense, without any flag-waving or exaggeration of any kind. I have seen the affluence in North America, particularly in the northern end of North America, which has been built on the free enterprise principle. I am afraid that if the government takes over the means of production, as outlined in the Winnipeg manifesto, the Regina manifesto and all the white papers we have had in the last five years, the free enterprise way of life which I am used to and which I think will still work, will be gone. I may be a minority of one, but I do not think so.

I have heard my colleague from the Yukon outline this matter beyond question. He comes from that part of the country. He knows what the people up there want, and I go along with him. I still believe that the people of Canada have the courage, the brains and the know-how to run their own affairs. We do not need a paternalistic government. We need leadership. We need help to create an atmosphere in which free enterprise can operate. Cut taxes, improve transportation, improve education, but by all means stop telling our young people, our old people and everybody else that they are incapable of earning a living without mamma government holding their hand, because when mamma government is holding your hand with one hand, she is into your pocket with the other.

I am willing to take the chance to work. Pay me decently for what I do and I am quite content to look after myself from the cradle to the grave. Don't get me wrong, Mr. Speaker. I am not against social justice. I am not against keeping the old people who built this country, but I am against keeping our young people in ignorance of how this country was built.

There is only one way to share wealth, and that is to dig it out of the ground, to hue it out of the mines and cut it out of the bush. We must work for it. If I did as little work as some people in this country, I would not be able to digest the meals I eat. There is joy to be had in work. I have the scars of labour on my hands and I am proud of them. I spoke to a young man the other day who said, "I am not going to work. I have a Ph.D." Well, Mr. Speaker, I have a Ph.D. too. If he cannot be hired by a university as a political scientist, what is wrong with going out, climbing on an oil derrick and earning $50 a day? If you are young and strong, go to where the work is.

Mr. Hogarth: Where?

Mr. Bigg: That's right—where?

Mr. Nielsen: Get that on the record.

Mr. Bigg: What has your administration done in the last seven years? What has the Liberal administration done to create job opportunities for young people? Nothing. That is the first good question we have had from that side of the House. Worse than that, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals don't care. The young people don't mind so much being neglected as that the Liberals don't care—and that has been officially told to them; a Liberal minister has said, "We will accept 10 per cent unemployment." That is intolerable. No percentage of unemployment is tolerable.

Countries that do not have our opportunities, our resources, our people and the Liberal government that we have, do not have unemployment. They do not have unemployment in the Netherlands, in West Germany or Japan: those countries are short of labour. West Germany is importing hundreds of thousands of Italians to take jobs and earn good wages there, and they are in competition with us. It is not the German government which is doing this; it is the German people using their own brains, their own initiative, their own guts and their own money—and they are going to beat us into the ground unless we smarten up, and smarten up fast.

Someone says, "If you don't like it, get out." Well, I don't have to get out. This is my country. I am going to stay here and see it through.

Mr. Nielsen: Just while the Liberals are in power.

Mr. Hogarth: That is going to be a long time.

Mr. Bigg: You have the media on your side. Everything you do is right with them, but even the media are getting fed up, Mr. Speaker. As far as I know, Charles Lynch is no particular friend of mine. He is a broad-minded, positive writer, and he says this government is smug; he says it is arrogant. That is the understatement of the year. Mr. Lynch states that the Conservatives pledged themselves to save Mr. Henderson. Why should anybody have to pledge himself to save Mr. Henderson, who is one of the most valuable civil servants in this country and one who has at least tried to stop the leak in the dike so that there would be a bit of money in the reservoir with which to do something if the government should wish to save this country.

If the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) is glued to his seat, I can understand why. However, he is free to rise and ask a question; this is a free country. It is not the man from St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) I am talking to; it is the red-shirted member from Calgary South, one of the wealthiest communists I know.

Mr. Lynch warns the Liberals that they are arrogant. I do not expect you to listen to me, because you never have, but you might at least listen to your own writers. When your own friends say you are becoming arrogant, you should listen to the warning. One hundred and fifty-eight members is not that many.

An hon. Member: How many?

Mr. Bigg: One hundred and fifty-eight.

An hon. Member: Not in this party.

Mr. Bigg: How many?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Bigg: All right, Mr. Speaker, I am not a hair-splitter. I am trying to make the government take a good look at itself whether or not it has gone far enough with nationalization of Canada's resources. Is it not about time these people returned to liberalism? There was a time when they had Liberals. Laurier was a Liberal.

An hon. Member: That is one.

An hon. Member: That is about all.

Mr. Bigg: St. Laurent was a Liberal. If Laurier were alive and suggested reciprocity, I would vote for it. I do not vote blindly for anything, but I would vote for it. I am giving a warning. I do not hit people without warning. Their own writers have warned them that they are cold-blooded, arrogant and do not care about the young people. The Liberal party is completely mesmerized and believes that 155 members represent a sufficient majority, that it can ignore the needs and rights of the young people of Canada and can play big daddy with everybody.

The Indians have never liked paternalism. They have hated having the government play big daddy with them. All they have ever wanted is to be allowed to be good Indians. This government has even succeeded in making them into poor white men. The young people do not like to think that 10 per cent of them must remain unemployed. Every young person in this country wants a job. In spite of being a working man myself, I do not believe I know enough about it to say which 10 per cent should sit back and not have an opportunity. I will not make that decision. I want to see a policy that will be big enough and wise enough to provide an opportunity for every young Canadian to be employed. I do not expect this government to accomplish that. No government has done it yet. There is nothing more discouraging than being unemployed. I have been unemployed myself for very short periods of time during the dirty thirties.

An hon. Member: No wonder.

Mr. Mahoney: It wasn't me; I didn't say a word.

Mr. Bigg: I hope the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) will always have a lucrative job in which he does nothing, because that is what he is doing as long as he sits on the back benches of the Liberal party and does not take the trouble to wake up the front benches.

Mr. Hogarth: I cannot wake them up when you are putting me to sleep.

Mr. Bigg: I suggest that if you want to sleep you should go where you usually go—somewhere other than this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Is that true?

Mr. Bigg: Do you think he has had enough, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. Member: Give him another one, Jack.

Mr. Nielsen: Belt him again.

Mr. Bigg: When we think of free enterprise, we must remember people like Punch Dickens who was a bush pilot. We might ask what kind of man he was. De Havilland Aircraft of Canada produced the best aircraft of its type in the world. Then we might ask who they wanted when they were looking for a man to head Canadian Pacific Airlines. It was the government of Mr. Diefenbaker that gave this airline a licence to compete with Air Canada. We all know how much better Air Canada has been with a little competition. When they wanted a leader they got Mr. McConachie, another bush pilot.

I could go on, but I bore the Liberals because they are a heartless bunch. They are arrogant enough to appear on TV and get up in this House and say we never had it so good. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) stood in this House and told us we never had it so good. Maybe we didn't, but there are many young people in this country who are looking to us for leadership. The main complaint from the government benches is that they do not get leadership from this side of the House. That is what the Minister of Finance said. This is one reason I am on my feet tonight. I am glad the minister is here. I admit having been delinquent, but I have been sitting here waiting for the dynamic leadership of this great party of the people.

An hon. Member: Get Diefenbaker.

Mr. Bigg: I was here when he was our leader, and we had leadership. I am on my feet tonight because I have not seen the contribution I expected from the other side of the House. I want to know what is the dynamic policy for the Northwest Territories, and if the government is to provide electric power, a pipeline, and so on, in northern Canada, how that will give us better light.

An hon. Member: You tell us what you would like to see happen.

Mr. Bigg: I go right along with the idea that we should encourage free ownership, private ownership of every industry, of oil wells, farms, orchards—you name it. I am in favour of the free enterprise system. It is the only thing I am fanatical about. I am fanatical about freedom. I am such a fool about freedom that I put my life on the line in 1939, 1949, 1959, and I hope I will in 1979, because I honestly believe it is the only thing that will work, and it has been demonstrated.

You want the empirical process? You want to see what happens? What happened in England? In only 50 years they went from the top to the bottom, but I hope they are on the way up again. We will do it now without any excuse, with the blueprints in front of us. We know that free enterprise works and that socialism does not. It does not work for me, and up till now it has never been the Liberal policy. I would admire the Liberals more if they decided that liberalism no longer works, that the free enterprise system no longer works. Let them be honest like my friends to the left; at least they are honest.

An hon. Member: How far to the left?

Mr. Bigg: They espouse socialism, and I honestly believe that if they were put in charge they would try it and see whether or not it worked. I honestly think it would be disastrous, and so far so do the Canadian people. If they change their minds in 1972, or whenever they spring an election on us, I will stand to be corrected. That is the view of most of the people I know, and of course I only speak from my knowledge of people who are generally over 30, as I happen to be a grandfather.

An hon. Member: Don't forget to read your speech tomorrow.

Mr. Bigg: I do not make speeches to read them myself. I make speeches in an apparently vain effort—

An hon. Member: How right.

Mr. Bigg: —to help you people make your decision which, if you were truly Liberals, you would have made yourselves. My party does not need leadership from me.

An hon. Member: But they need it from somebody.

Mr. Bigg: They want participation, and I want to know when you people will be allowed to participate in this democracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: When are we going to do away with the 30 or so men who sit in the attic and really run this country today?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) I might mention that I rose because the hon. member's time has expired.

Northern Canada Power Commission Act

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): The last speech was interesting, Mr. Speaker. It was interesting because to a large extent the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg) when speaking for 40 minutes ranged from one end of the country to the other. He circled the world. I listened very carefully, but on no occasion did he deal with either the Yukon or the Northwest Territories.

Some hon. Members: You weren't listening.

Mr. Orlikow: I was listening. We were told that the great fault of this bill is that it is a socialist bill. The hon. member for Pembina asks Members of Parliament to reject this bill because it calls for nationalizing power. I wish it did, but it does not. My colleague, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) pointed out, I think correctly, that the objections to this bill which we heard from the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) are that the hon. member for Yukon really believes that the private power company in that area can do a better job than if it were publicly owned. He is entitled to his opinion, but the facts as we have seen them in Canada do not bear him out.

The hon. member for Pembina tried to tell us that the difficulties in respect of power have been brought about because we in this party and members of the party opposite have been seduced by the teachings of the British socialists. I think I am correct in saying that the hydroelectric system in Ontario was made a publicly-owned corporation in 1905 when the British Labour Party was just beginning. It was made a public corporation by a Conservative government, under Sir Adam Beck.

If publicly-owned power is such a terrible thing, I suggest to the hon. member for Pembina that now is a good time to put that argument forward. The Conservative party of Ontario is going into a leadership contest, and I suggest to the hon. member that he approach the five candidates who are vying for leadership and try to convince them that publicly-owned power is bad for Ontario. He should try to convince whichever one becomes premier of Ontario that he ought to sell Ontario Hydro to private enterprise. I wonder how much support he would get from the Ontario Conservative party. It would be interesting to see.

Mr. Bigg: What would that do?

Mr. Orlikow: Ontario is not the only province which has publicly-owned power. In my province of Manitoba the last privately-owned power company was turned into a public utility by a Liberal government. In British Columbia the privately-owned power systems were turned into a publicly-owned power system by a Social Credit government. In Saskatchewan it was the CCF government which created a publicly-owned power system. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the power system is publicly owned. One of the things which distinguishes Canada from the United States is that we have hardly any privately-owned power systems in this country. Alberta is about the only province which still has a privately-owned power system.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Why do we have publicly-owned systems? It is because in every province they came to the conclusion, after the most careful study, that publicly-owned power could be brought to the people of the provinces concerned more cheaply and efficiently than by private companies. The reasons for that are pretty obvious.

Mr. Forrestall: Prove it.

Mr. Orlikow: If you want to build power facilities it is necessary to borrow large amounts of money, and no private corporation can borrow money as cheaply as can a publicly-owned corporation, provincial or federal.

Mr. Forrestall: Nonsense.

Mr. Orlikow: Let the hon. member look at what happened in Nova Scotia, where power is publicly owned.

Mr. Forrestall: It is also privately owned.

Mr. Orlikow: Not many years ago—I think most members in the House were here—a Liberal government in the province of Quebec took over all the private power facilities in the province and created one publicly-owned power corporation.

Mr. Comeau: Sure, the Liberals did that.

Mr. Orlikow: Yes, the Liberals in Quebec and the Conservatives in Ontario. That is precisely what I said. They did this because it has been proven conclusively that public systems can operate more cheaply than private companies. To appreciate this one only needs to go to Niagara Falls, in the province of Ontario, and compare the cost of power there with the cost of power in Niagara Falls, New York State. One sees the difference. In New York State power is still privately owned. So I say to the hon. member for Pembina that this bill does not call for the creation of a publicly-owned power system in the Yukon. If it did, I would support it much more vigorously than I do at the present time. But if it did, it would provide the people of the Yukon with cheaper power more quickly than the privately-owned system has, as has already happened in nearly all other parts of Canada.

I close by saying a few words about a matter to which the hon. member for Pembina referred repeatedly. I shall try to be briefer than he was. He suggested that Britain is in great difficulties because it was governed by a socialist government. He seemed to imply that all the resources and industries of Great Britain were publicly owned. That is not true. The vast majority of industries and resources in Great Britain are still privately owned. He compared Great Britain unfavourably with other European countries which belong to the European Common Market.

I suggest to the hon. member that if he were to read about countries like France and Italy, I am sure he would be amazed at what he would learn. He would also learn that what I am about to say is true. In France, Italy and other countries in western Europe, a much greater proportion of industries and services is owned by the state than is the case in Great Britain. So I suggest to him that Great Britain's difficulties do not stem from the fact that the means of production in that country have been socialized, nationalized or whatever he wishes to call it. Britain is in difficulties for entirely different reasons. Also, the reason countries like France, in which a large proportion of industry is owned by the state, are doing well is entirely different from that suggested by the hon. member. If the hon. member wished to talk about power in Canada, which he did not, he should have looked at the record. It is not at all what he said it was.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder if the hon. member would explain to me why the flow of immigration is all one way. Why are people leaving those havens of socialism and coming to this terrible North American, private enterprise economy?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let the debate close without commenting on some of the remarks which were made, particularly by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. It is refreshing to see the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) in his seat with his chin held high, lording it over the empty front benches. He reminds me of his colleagues in cabinet and particularly of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) who is now behind the curtains and is treating the situation in Canada as if they were on an ego trip. They are completely oblivious to the situation. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) was objecting vociferously when my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg), was speaking. If I knew half as much about anything as he knows about everything, I would be on the backbenches behind him on the other side of the House.

The NDP members really amaze me, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Skeena, who is aspiring to the leadership of that great national party, has been acting like a chameleon and distorting everything completely, as is typical. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) tried to do the same. Nobody is arguing about the existence of NCPC in the north. I am expressing the views of all segments of the Yukon population and not just my own. Surely the views of the population of the Yukon should reach even the feelings of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. These people do not want to pay for the losses of this system in the Northwest Territories. What could be a fairer position than that? They do not want the surpluses, which these amendments would take away from them, applied to losses throughout the whole system; they want the surpluses applied to reducing the rate in the Yukon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member talked about public power in the Yukon. He said that the Crown agency was established in 1948, 22 years ago, to provide power in those places of the north where private capital was unwilling or unable to go. He also said that private capital has not been doing the job and now, just because there is a huge development in the Yukon in terms of mining, they want to go in and skim off the cream.

Mr. Ryan: They are robbing the Yukon; that is what he said.

Mr. Nielsen: He said the NCPC could provide power more quickly in the Yukon. Tell that to the people of Old Crow who waited 20 years for power from the NCPC. Tell that to the people of Keno Summit, of Stewart Crossing and Pelly Crossing. Are these people not provided for by private enterprise, having waited 20 years for power from the public agency set up to do that job? Tell that also to the people of Carmacks, Burwash Landing, Destruction Bay, Haines Junction, Carcross, Watson Lake and Upper Canyon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: In all these communities Mr. Speaker, the public agency was set up, yet private enterprise went in and supplied the power. And the hon. member says that the public agency can do this more cheaply and quickly! The government specifically asked private enterprise to go into Old Crow. The hon. member could not have been here this afternoon when I quoted the rates. The government conducted the survey and came up with the answer that it would cost 27 cents per kilowatt to supply power to the community of Old Crow. They did not want to do it because it was costing too much, and they asked private enterprise to do it.

Private enterprise went in on the provisional basis of 25 cents per kilowatt, and private enterprise is now supplying power to this community at 15 cents per kilowatt, away below anything that public power could offer and below any rate that public power could be offered for in the Yukon. If you really want to go into the merits of the argument, you will see that power was first supplied at Watson Lake at six cents and it is now being supplied at 3.6 cents. At Whitehorse, power was being supplied at 6 cents and is now supplied at 1.6 cents. Do not tell me that private enterprise cannot compete, because it has supplied cheaper power to many communities of the country.

Regardless of the argument about public versus private enterprise, surely to consider the example quoted by my friend for Winnipeg North we must remember that it is the people of the provinces who make the decision regarding conversion; they have the right to make that decision. Surely we have the right in the Yukon to make the same kind of decision, instead of having it foisted upon us by another bureaucratic arm of government.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Nielsen: This reminds me of the contribution made by the member who is now behind the curtain, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth). He reminds me of a former Liberal member from British Columbia, Mr. Byrne. The only time he opened his mouth when he was a Liberal member of the House was when he wanted to change the position of his feet. I think the feet of the hon. member for New Westminster are even too big for that. There was deliberate distortion by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

An hon. Member: He is here now.

Mr. Nielsen: I am glad. He and others distorted the facts. They charged that the Conservative party—

Mr. Howard (Skeena): That is not true.

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member would return to his seat and make his interjection, I would be happy to join issue with him.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): And what would the hon. member do?

Mr. Nielsen: You cannot just charge—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the two hon. gentlemen want to have a private conversation, they might do so while both are in their places. Meanwhile, would the hon. gentleman kindly address the Chair.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They could both go behind the curtain.

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member wishes, I could join him in the corridor. He has charged, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative party's intention is to kill the bill.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That is the intention of the people of the Yukon, the population that I have an obligation to speak for in this debate. I am expressing the views of the Yukon population, just as the hon. member for Skeena might express the views of his constituents.

Mr. Ryan: If he knew them.

An hon. Member: He hopes to be leader of his party.

Mr. Nielsen: I can tell the hon. member that the Chamber of Mines, the Chamber of Commerce, the Prospectors' Association and, he will be interested to know, the labour movement in the Yukon do not like the idea—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: —of having the revenues generated as a result of their consumption of power in the Yukon going to pay for government extravagance in Frobisher Bay, Cambridge Bay and other places throughout the system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The truck drivers, the mechanics, the carpenters and the plumbers, who pay electric light bills far in excess of anything the hon. member has ever experienced, do not like it. That is why they want this bill turned down.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he identify the section of the labour movement to which he referred?

Mr. Nielsen: Certainly. I have in my office a telegram from Local 31 of the Teamsters. Ottawa members certainly cannot say that is not part of the labour movement. The Buildings Trades Council in the Yukon is just as upset as all the little people in the Yukon who have asked me to express these views. They think it is not fair to pay the same kind of tax that every other Canadian pays and, in addition, to have foisted upon them the cost of supporting the revenue-losing areas of commission-operated plants throughout the north. That is their objection. What could be unreasonable about that kind of objection?

I would inform the hon. member for Skeena that not only this party does not want this bill. It is not only me who does not want this bill. The people of the Yukon who use the power do not want this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Surely that is not an unreasonable position to take. All members of this House should listen to this kind of report. If they do not, the much-worn, threadbare phrase of "participatory democracy" will not mean a hell of a lot.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I think I have once again placed the matter in proper perspective. Coincidentally, the views I am expressing are the views of my party, because I solicited their support. I also solicited the support of the Créditiste party. They all support the wishes of the people of the Yukon which I have expressed in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I hope hon. members will see fit to vote for the amendment so that the government will at least have an opportunity to consider something which is universally considered to be undesirable in the Yukon.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? All those in favour of the amendment please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to see the Conservative party chicken-out after the declaratory speech we just heard.

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. One cannot let a baseless assertion like that pass unchallenged. The only reason this party is passing the legislation, on division, is to save the time which would be required in recording a vote, particularly in view of the fact we had one recorded vote this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the main motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT, INQUIRIES, REPORTS, ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE FOR WORKERS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-215 is to implement several essential elements of the new textile policy which I outlined in the House on May 14 last year, as you will remember. Hon. members will recall that this policy includes a whole range of measures dealing with the industrial, social and commercial aspects, with financial assistance, promotion on the domestic and international markets, technical assistance, and many other provisions. Some hon. members have expressed all along their interest, others, their support and still others their concern about this new policy. I shall therefore endeavour to be as clear as possible, and divide my statement in three parts, as I usually do. I shall deal first of all with what has already been done, then with the main features of the bill, namely Bill C-215, and, finally, with what remains to be done.

Mr. Speaker, the following has been done: first of all, my department has already expanded its export promotion efforts. The highlight of this increased promotion activity last year was participation by Canadian manufacturers of garment fabrics in the Interstoff Fair in Frankfurt, Germany, probably the most important international fair featuring garment fabrics. Although individual manufacturers had participated in the Fair previously, this was the first time they did so as a group. The results have been extremely gratifying. The participating Canadian firms received orders valued at more than $3.2 million; there are strong indications that $10 million in additional Canadian export orders will be generated as a result of this effort. I am pleased to note that our performance at the Fair elicited extensive comment in Germany and in Canada, for instance even from the usually unexcitable Dick Jackson of the Ottawa Journal. Our intention is to continue these highly promising efforts at the Frankfurt Fair in May and November of this year.

I wish to emphasize how successful the fair was because it shows quite clearly the very interesting possibilities international trade offers the textiles and clothing industries.

Secondly, increased attention has also been given to the promotion of apparel, both in terms of marketing and discovery of new markets, and of the quality of commodities. Although 1970 was generally a difficult year for garment-makers, exports to the United States increased from some $42 million to about $55 million. Advanced bookings indicate that the increase in sales to the United States may be even greater this year. Canadian creations are now featured regularly in American magazines, especially in "Women's Wear Daily".

I know that you do not read that magazine, Mr. Speaker, but I am told that it is the Bible of the women's fashion industry. Your wife is undoubtedly more versed in that field than yourself and judging from the results she puts it to good use.

Canadian fashions are gaining increasing acceptance on export markets, which is quite flattering for our industry.

With regard to the same matter, Mr. Speaker, on September 2, my Department launched the Fashion Canada Program to focus national and international attention on the best style garments being designed and manufactured in Canada. Fashion Canada is supported by the federal and three provincial governments as well as by several professional associations.

Its objective is to encourage greater design creativity and upgrade the quality in Canadian fashion products; to build a prestige image of fashion design in Canada; and to provide an environment which will encourage and retain Canadian fashion design talent. I am pleased to report that the program is meeting a good response from the industry, retailers, publicity media and the general public. In print media lone, FASHION/CANADA has so far been featured in some 350 articles appearing in close to 100 publications in Canada and abroad.

All this shows clearly, I feel, that there is, for the clothing industry of Canada, a very promising future, most promising indeed. I have had the opportunity to read, for instance, reports from American chain stores buyers who came to Canada and were most favourably impressed, even surprised, by the quality of products designed and made in Canada. There is an interesting phenomenon. The fact that the factory itself is small, may become, sometimes, an advantage. Since fashion, as we are all aware, is a most rapidly changing thing, there is even an advantage to being small since one has more leeway and can adjust far more quickly.

I had the opportunity to note, for instance—and this is obvious in the House—the extent to which Canadians have gone for coloured shirts. I recently addressed 50 persons. Nobody in the audience had a white shirt. The member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) will have to change his habits. The fact that Canadians went for coloured shirts represented a significant contribution to the survival of this industrial sector in Canada, because those shirts obviously cannot be produced on as large a scale.

As producers do not exactly know what will meet with popular approval—for instance, the bright red shirt of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney)—they will hesitate to produce one million shirts. They will only manufacture 100,000 and will survey the market before producing a further quantity. It is then no longer a handicap to be a small manufacturer.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): For my part, Mr. Speaker, I wear my old white shirts.

Mr. Pepin: That is because of the very low salaries of the backbenchers.

The hon. member for St. Boniface will buy himself some coloured shirts. He will also make an effort, as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) has been doing for so long.

In the third place, the supplementary estimates approved by the house before the Christmas recess contained amendments to the General Adjustment Assistance Program which will provide Canadian textile and clothing manufacturers with better access to the various types of financial assistance available under it.

I have explained the features of this program to hon. members on previous occasions; I do not intend to go into it in detail now. However, in the committee we have recently seen the favourable effects the program can have for producers of clothing, particularly, and for manufacturers of footwear also, to whom, as you know, the program has also been extended.

In the fourth place, at the beginning of November, I informed the house of the establishment of the Textile and Clothing Board on an interim basis under section 18 of the Government Organization Act. I also announced at that time the appointment of Dr. C. A. Annis of Ottawa, Professor Jacques St. Laurent of Sillery, Quebec, and Mr. J. D. Campbell of Campbellville, Ontario, as chairman and members of the Board, respectively.

Hon. members will recall that—as a first priority—I asked the Board to inquire into the importation of cotton and polyester-cotton yarns, and woven shirts. The board is now at work, Mr. Speaker, and I expect to receive its first report in the near future. I mention this now to show that the board will be taking quick action and will not put off decisions for six months or a year. I shall describe later on the functions of the board in greater detail.

In the fifth place, Mr. Speaker, and this is still in the first part of my speech where I try to explain what has been done—an important aspect of the new policy, pending full implementation of all its various elements, is the government's determination to make use of all the currently available instruments to prevent serious disruption of the Canadian market. When I informed the House last May of the new policy framework, I indicated that the government was giving urgent consideration to the critical situation that had developed with respect to woven shirts imported at disruptively low prices.

On June 2, the government invoked section 7 of the Customs Tariff to impose a surtax, on a non-discriminatory basis, on such shirts. The action was taken after a careful study of the situation in the industry which revealed that without it the long-term viability of the Canadian shirt industry would be seriously threatened.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, an ambassador called on me the other day and we were discussing the question of textiles and clothing in Canada and like many others, he expressed the hope that Canada would not adopt a protectionist position in this regard. And I asked him the following question: "Your Excellency, can you tell me how many shirts are imported in Canada?" He was taken a little by surprise, I suppose, but after some hesitation, he mentioned the figure of one million. I said: "Add 200,000, or 300,000 and say "dozen" instead of "units" and you will have a fair idea of the number of shirts imported by Canada at this time." I say these things that we shall repeat in committee, in order that some hon. members will not conclude too hastily that Canada is becoming a protectionist country.

Yesterday, I delivered a speech in Montreal on imports and I believe we do have not much to blame ourselves for in this field. Canada is a major importing country. In that speech, I quoted figures that I shall quote again in this House because they are very, very useful. But they might be used in this debate, because I hope no hon. member will launch into broad statements about free trade, without having at least consulted these figures showing present Canadian imports.

In any case, hon. members will recall that the decision to impose a surtax received the approval of the House on November 26. The House agreed to the extension of this surtax, pending a review of the Canadian shirt industry by the Textile and Clothing Board, which review will be initiated as soon as the Board has rendered its first decision on woven cotton and polyester cotton fabrics.

Sixthly, the government has extended the existing voluntary restraint arrangements while suitably modifying them in the light of circumstances. Officials of my department have re-negotiated and come to an agreement on the voluntary restraints applied by Japan, Korea, Hong Kong, Singapore, Mexico and Greece. New arrangements have been concluded with Romania, Poland, Trinidad, Tobago and Macao. Arrangements have also been made with the People's Republic of China and Taiwan. The officials of my department are currently holding talks with responsible authorities in Brazil, Spain, Portugal, the United Arab Republic, Columbia and Israel with a view to reaching other agreements. Thus, our policy is and will remain to try and enter into agreements with those countries, before considering any unilateral action.

Pending recommendations of the Textile and Clothing Board, the government shall continue carefully to analyse problems as they arise and will take whatever action is required. As in the past, Canada will consult with the countries concerned, as I said earlier, with a view to finding a negotiated solution, before considering unilateral action.

These then, Mr. Speaker, are the elements of the textile policy that have been implemented and the steps the government has taken to ensure an orderly transition to the new policy framework.

• (9:50 p.m.)

[English]

That is the first part of my speech. I have tried to summarize what has been done.

[Translation]

I often say in French that I do not make any discours (speeches). I always say: take away dix (ten) and replace it by un (one). You will then have one course instead of ten on the subject I am dealing with.

[English]

The second part of my speech concerns Bill C-215 itself.

Mr. Comeau: And about time.

Mr. Pepin: An hon. member says it is time I got there. Perhaps it is idealism on my part, but I have always believed that if the foundations are good, the house stands a little more strongly. The hon. member for Southwestern Nova (Mr. Comeau) might benefit from my example, Mr. Speaker.

The bill has three main purposes. The first is to provide for the establishment of a textile and clothing board. The second is to amend the Export and Import Permits Act. The third purpose is to amend the Customs Act. First, dealing with the textile and clothing board, the bill seeks to place this board on a more formal basis. I have already said it has been in existence, but its existence is now being formalized. What is the role of the board and what are its functions? Hon. Members will recall that under the new textile policy special measures of protection against imports will be considered only after, firstly, a formal determination of actual or potential injury and, secondly, submission of acceptable plans by the companies concerned indicating how they intend to improve their operations or maintain their efficiency so as to make them progressively more viable. This is very important.

If a company or group of companies or sector of the industry want protection, they have to demonstrate that there is injury, or threat of injury, under article 19 of GATT. Secondly, they have to present plans that the board will assess. The board will recommend protection only when it is satisfied, firstly, that there is injury and, secondly, that the plans to maintain viability or to bring it about are worthwhile—only recommended. So responsibility for action rests squarely with the government. I repeat, with respect to the degree of protection needed, the board can make recommendations only. It is the government that must take action. This is contrary to what has been reported, erroneously, in some newspapers during the past week.

What criteria will the board use in passing judgment? In formulating its recommendations the board is to take into account, firstly, Canada's international obligations; secondly, consumer interests; thirdly, all relevant employment and regional factors; and fourthly, conditions prevailing in international trade relative to textile and clothing goods. In other words, the board must look at all aspects of the question. Everything must be considered. The board also has to take into account the principle that special measures of protection are not to be implemented for the purpose of encouraging the maintenance of lines of production that have no prospect of becoming viable. This is provided for in the bill.

In addition to its functions with respect to the new import policy, the board will also certify groups of workers for the purpose of the adjustment assistance program for workers. Details of this program will be outlined tomorrow by my colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). Upon hearing him, hon. members will recognize, I'm sure, that this is a very important and worthwhile social feature of the legislation.

Before I move on to the other aspect of the bill, I should like to emphasize the somewhat unique nature of the new approach to the problem of disruptive import competition. To the best of my knowledge, Canada is the first among industrialized countries to predicate special measures of protection for the textile and clothing industries on a careful evaluation of injury and of adjustment plans by an independent body. Such an approach coincides closely with the principles and objectives of various international trade agreements and, if emulated by others, should go a long way toward improving the world trading environment. At the same time, the government will be in a position to provide effective and prompt protection to domestic manufacturers agains injurious import competition when warranted by facts and provided they undertake the necessary steps progressively to improve their competitive position. Some hon. members may have noticed the recent suggestion in the Wall Street Journal that Canada's "positive response" to the problems created by disruptive import competition "would be eminently more sensible for the U.S.", and I daresay for a number of other countries as well.

In regard to the changes to the Export and Import Permits Act, this act in its present form makes it possible for the government to control imports unilaterally in three cases: firstly, articles which are scarce in world markets—and certainly this does not apply to textiles —secondly, certain products under domestic price supports and, thirdly, any article when necessary to implement in intergovernmental arrangement or commitment. According to the present understanding of the Export and Import Permits Act, only in these cases can the government take unilateral action.

Action under the act has been taken in the past with respect to certain products falling under these three categories and the act could, conceivably, be invoked again under these circumstances. However, in its present form the act cannot be invoked to control injurious imports unless one of the three conditions is met. There has been some debate on that subject. The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) believes that the act as it is now could have been used in this area of textiles. General opinion does not support that view.

The new textile policy envisages the application of unilateral measures, including import quotas in cases where a negotiated solution such as, for example, a restraint agreement, cannot be reached.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

• (10:00 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the adjournment motion, would the acting House leader confirm that the bill under discussion will be the first item of business tomorrow and that any other items will be called in the sequence previously announced?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the understanding which has been reached through the usual channels.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL SECURITY—ALLEGED INFILTRATION OF UNITED STATES COMMUNIST PARTY INTO CANADA

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, on December 17, last, I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) whether his department was inquiring about the infiltration into Canada by the American Communist party which, with the help of outstanding Canadian personalities, publishes documents tending to undermine Canadian democracy and unity. Contrary to what he usually does, the minister chose not to answer my question.

Mr. Speaker, I put the question, which I felt was important, because the day before I had read an article published in Canadian papers, in Le Droit of Ottawa, amongst others, which read in part as follows:

American Communist Party influence reaches into Canada

Reverend Vincent Harvey, Director of the magazine Maintenant, Reverend Louis O'Neil of the Laval University Theology Department, François Aquin, member of the Quebec National Assembly, ... songstress Pauline Julien and author Farley Mowat would be among those who signed a manifesto inspired by the American Communist Party.

This has been revealed in the testimony of Gerald Wayne Kirk, ... during the hearings of the Senate sub-committee on the administration of the Internal Security Act—

—Through selective use of methods ... the American Communist Party has been able to worm its way into many groups ... and advocate its Marxist-Leninist philosophy. In addition, not only has its influence reached into Canada but many Canadian personalities have endorsed these movements—

After having given as evidence the manifesto entitled, "An Appeal of Canada to Peoples of the Western Hemisphere", we find the names of American and Canadian movers—

Besides the names already mentioned, we notice those of James G. Endicott, president of the Canadian Peace Congress, Rabbi H. Leonard Pelier from Montreal and Rabbi Abraham L. Feinberg from Toronto, Dr. Denis Lazure, president of the Inter-American Council of Psychiatric Associations, Mathias Rioux, president of the Alliance des Professeurs de Montréal, Roland Morin, president of the Quebec New Democratic Party ... C. B. Williams, G. Gibley, president of the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour and vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress, A. R. Pauley, provincial leader of the Manitoba New Democratic Party, and Brian Switzman, president of the Ontario Students Union.

Mr. Speaker, at the same time last year and more precisely at the end of November 1969, Mr. Lucien Saulnier, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the City of Montreal and Michel Côté, City Solicitor, appeared in Ottawa before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Committee proceedings No. 14, dated November 27, 1969, include Mr. Saulnier's statements, one of which, appearing on page 9, reads as follows:

We now know that in Canada, individuals and groups are working actively to implement a plan which will carry the destruction of freedom ... These individuals and groups are inspired and financed, in many cases, by foreign political powers related to an "International".—

In other cases, the same ideas and the same plan of action are supported by the Government of Canada through The Company of Young Canadians.

And Mr. Saulnier continues:

The partial revelations to which I will limit myself today are but a small example of things I know and of which I have privately informed the Prime Minister of Canada in the past year.

On page 12, Mr. Côté's words to the chairman of the committee are reported:

—With your permission, if you will allow us to distribute to the members of the committee the document to which I will refer throughout the explanation of facts in support of Mr. Saulnier's statement.

—the document you have on hand includes 47 items—

And, on page 41, Mr. Côté goes on and invites us to —look at document No. 13. It has three pages. All these documents were seized on the 10th of October, 1969, at the Workers' Committee of St. Henri. It is an invoice from the Gestetner Company of Canada Limited ... and it is addressed to "The Company of Young Canadians ... Chapel Street, Ottawa—

This duplicating machine had been delivered to a St. James street address in Montreal on July 31, 1969. It was being operated in one of the CYC's offices to print revolutionary literature to be distributed in Montreal.

On page 51, Mr. Côté mentions another raid on CYC members. He said, and I quote:

—We seized 18 metal filing cabinets, partly filled with documents, and newspapers ... They are newspapers entitled Gramma which are French-language newspapers from Cuba—

One saw on several occasions during university demonstrations some Volvo cars belonging to the CYC. You have a picture of those cars. Those vehicles purchased by the Canadian government and registered under the name of the CYC were part of and were even leading marches—

Such is the evidence referred to in the proceedings already mentioned and which led Mr. Lucien Saulnier to state:

These facts justify me to request formally and publicly a public Royal Commission of Inquiry into the clearly subversive activities of the Company of Young Canadians.

I agree with most Canadians that an inquiry should have been carried out at that time and if the government refused to take action in spite of the evidence supplied by the Montreal authorities, perhaps it is because of our Prime Minister's background.

The Canadian Intelligence Service in their publication No. 36 supply the following details on the Prime Minister, and I quote:

Our record on Mr. Trudeau shows the following facts: 1940—He is thrown out of the Canadian Officers Training Corps for reasons of indiscipline; 1947—he is studying at the London School of Economics and credits the Marxist professor Laski with "the most stimulating and strongest influence he ever knew"; 1950—He is in Shanghai when the Communists take over and becomes an admirer of the Mao regime; 1951—Back in Montreal . . .

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him under our Standing Orders has expired.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, without necessarily recognizing the merits of all the allegations made by the hon. member, I can assure him that the branches of my department in charge of security are closely checking the subversive activities he has just described. Should he wish to bring to my attention more precise facts I will diligently see to it that inquiries are conducted in that respect.

POST OFFICE—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH LETTER CARRIERS UNION TO RESOLVE ALLEGED ADMINISTRATIVE CONFUSION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on January 12, I raised with the minister in charge of the Post Office a question regarding the statement released that day—it was dated January 7 but released on that day—by the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada regarding conditions in the Post Office which were described in such a way as to cause me considerable concern. The press release reads as follows:

Roger Décarie, national president of the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada, which is composed of some 12,000 members across the country, is not at all satisfied with the department's attitude toward his union.

"We have just finished signing the contract and the struggle has resumed already, "he declared. Postmaster General Jean-Pierre Côté had expressed his wish to improve union/management relations after Mr. Kierans' departure, but since the publication of the Montpetit report, the situation could not be worse.

Senseless and ridiculous positions have arisen from the decentralization project. The Postmaster General is being completely ignored. The Deputy Postmaster General does not know more about the situation than a postal officer. The officer in charge of labour relations never shows up at union/management meetings. No one wants to make decisions, regional officers couldn't care less about departmental authorities in Ottawa and refuse all instructions. Every Tom, Dick and Harry issues instructions to which no one listens, claiming they do not have the necessary authority to act upon them. In short, it is the worst mix-up ever!

In the midst of all this commotion, the Letter Carriers' Union is trying to muddle through and to find solutions to their problems. The national executive of the union is being totally ignored by the Deputy Postmaster General who has instructed his local district and regional officers to engage in discussions on various items at local level.

The press release continues:

The Letter Carriers' Union cannot tolerate such nonsense any longer especially when the bargaining unit is being ignored by the employer. The situation is most critical—we do not want a repetition of the May-August 1970 period.

In departing from quoting this very interesting and disturbing document, in that wish I am sure the Letter Carriers' Union has the support of all of us here and, I am confident, of all the people of Canada. We do not want any repetition of 1970. I have the highest regard for the personal qualities of the man now in charge of the Post Office. I believe he is a man with a conciliatory bent, and I believe he will want to do all he can to forestall what would be indicated by this document as an already pretty serious situation.

The Post Office is a department which serves directly all the people of Canada. It is often, indeed, the most omnipresent outreach and outcrop of the Canadian government as an institution. It is therefore of the utmost importance that the greatest care be taken in so far as the relations of those who work in the department and those who manage it on behalf of the government are concerned.

I would call upon whoever is responding tonight on behalf of the minister to convey to him my earnest desire that the most careful attention and consideration be given to this developing situation. It may now be, to use the Old Testament phraseology, a cloud just a little bigger than a man's hand, but we do not want it to become a heavily ominous cloud which would bring back the disastrous conditions which we all know so well existed in the last 2 1/2 years.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the minister responsible for the Postal Service, met with the representatives of the union on January 14, 1971, in order to prevent situations like those described by the hon. member from occurring.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—APPLICATION BY FALCONBRIDGE NICKEL FOR GRANT—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question today in the House was directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) and was as follows: "In view of a statement made by the Ontario minister of mines that the federal government has discriminated against Ontario in the matter of a regional development grant to build a smelter for Falconbridge Nickel at Béconcour, Quebec, can the minister say if Falconbridge Nickel ever applied for a grant to build a smelter in Ontario? If so, was this application turned down?"

The question was prompted by a newspaper report carried on page 2 of the Ottawa Citizen last evening, January 20, which quotes Allan Lawrence, minister of mines for the province of Ontario, as accusing the federal government of practising discrimination against the province of Ontario in its economic expansion program. He went on to say that the main reason Falconbridge was building the refinery complex in Quebec was that it was turned down flat by the federal government when it requested assistance to build the smelter in Ontario.

I have trouble believing Mr. Lawrence, as do the people of northern Ontario, but I think the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion should have an opportunity to set the record straight and that is why I ask the question. I have been advised that Falconbridge Nickel never applied for a grant to build a smelter plant in Ontario; they never even made inquiries of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Mr. Lawrence made his statement at a meeting where he was trying to woo the support of delegates to the forthcoming Ontario PC leadership convention, so perhaps he can be forgiven.

I believe his statements were based more on a desire to garner delegate support than on facts. Mr. Lawrence is very popular in the north. It is one of the few places in the province where he is running ahead of William Davis for the leadership of his party in Ontario, so perhaps he got carried away with the enthusiasm of his supporters and strayed from the facts on the Falconbridge smelter. However, his words are reckless and irresponsible for a man who aspires to be premier of the province of Ontario, and now he has a credibility gap where his greatest strength is, in northern Ontario.

The question asked in northern Ontario is this: If Mr. Lawrence wanted this smelter to be built in Ontario, why did he not persuade Falconbridge Nickel to build it in Ontario? If he could not persuade them, why did he not force them to build it by passing legislation? That is the real question. This matter is of concern to me as member for Algoma because the closest access to Seaway shipping from Sudbury nickel mines is from the Spragge or Little Current area in the Algoma federal riding. Indeed, there has been talk at different times that the smelter might be located in the Algoma area. We certainly could use the 200 to 300 jobs that it would create. But more important is the question that residents of Ontario want answered. They want to know that they are not being discriminated against by the federal government.

I am convinced that had Falconbridge applied for a grant to build in northern Ontario, which is designated the same as the lower St. Lawrence area, the same grant would have applied. It seems to me that the main reason the company is building on the lower St. Lawrence is that there is year-round shipping there which is not available in the Great Lakes' ports.

Mr. Chas L. Caccia (Parliamentory Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) is to be commended for having raised so promptly and effectively an issue of evident concern him, and for his desire to serve the interest of the people he represents. Judging from his remarks, it appears evident that one of the candidates for the leadership of the Ontario Progressive Conservative party was a little carried away.

The allegation by the Ontario minister that the grant discriminates against northern Ontario, the present base of the company's operations, because that area is not eligible for incentives, in nonsense. The facts are that northern Ontario is eligible for incentives and that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion would have provided the same 8 per cent to Falconbridge if the company had chosen to establish there rather than at Bécancour. However, the company itself selected Bécancour.

UNEMPLOYMENT—EMERGENCY DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion with regard to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

This matter concerns the general critical unemployment crisis confronting the nation at this moment and specifically the disproportionate percentage among the youth of this nation, resulting in the critical social disorder and unrest manifested yesterday in Victoria and forecast in other parts of Canada.

With unanimous consent I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That this House urge the government to immediately hold emergency discussions with the provinces to develop and implement an urgent plan of action to bring relief to the problem and that the House urge the government to bring in immediate amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Canada Assistance Plan to bring immediate relief to the unemployed and those in need of social assistance.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Peace River under Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

HARBOURS

ADMINISTRATION RESPECTING SMALL VESSELS ON PACIFIC COAST—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave under Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity in the matter of small vessel harbours administration on the Pacific coast. The urgency has increased every year since 1964. The necessity arises from the failure of the government to act since the report of an inquiry instituted by the Minister of Transport was received in the fall of 1967.

I therefore ask leave to move seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the matter of small boat harbours administration on the Pacific coast of Canada, including the report of the inquiry into this subject conducted in 1967 by Dr. T. G. How, be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications with instructions to investigate and report its recommendations for action by this House not later than April 1, 1971; and that for this purpose the committee be authorized to travel from place to place within British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni under Standing Order 43. Unanimous consent is required. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

UNEMPLOYMENT—IMMEDIATE AMENDMENTS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT AND CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN TO EASE HARDSHIP

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government will consider the immediate implementation of some temporary amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, either in the form of a supplementary estimate or in the form of legislation, in order to ease the burden and hardship on unemployed Canadians who cannot qualify for benefits under existing legislation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are having some discussions with the provinces about the proposed legislation but until we have completed our discussions I do not think it would be appropriate to make a decision on such a proposal.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the government consider making immediate amendments to the Canada Assistance Plan in order to give the provinces more latitude in meeting the unemployment crisis as well as permitting the advancement of various types of social assistance, which is impossible under existing legislation or inadequate where the legislation does permit such assistance?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we are meeting with the welfare ministers next week and I expect that this will be a subject of discussion.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister would clarify his answer. When he said that there were to be discussions with the provinces, was he referring to the general unemployment insurance amendments represented by the White Paper that was published, or was he referring to amendments of an emergency nature to deal with unemployment in the next two or three months of this winter?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the provinces have expressed an interest in the proposals to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, and they would be interested in any amendments whether temporary or permanent. As the hon. member knows, if we were to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act in the way he suggested it would have an impact on the future of the plan.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister therefore inform the House whether the discussions are to involve the making of early emergency amendments, or are the discussions related to something that will happen some months hence?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we are hopeful that we can bring the unemployment insurance legislation before the House reasonably soon. Discussions are taking place, of course, with respect to the white paper that has been tabled.

UNEMPLOYED YOUTH—CANADA COUNCIL ON SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE—FEDERAL OFFICIALS PARTICIPATING

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the Canadian Council on Social Development has just indicated that the youth problem is of an explosive nature and that they expect to hold a conference around the end of February, can the Acting Prime Minister indicate who the appropriate federal officials will be who will be taking part in this conference?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I realize that the Acting Prime Minister is extremely busy and has to deal with many matters that must be brought to his attention, but I think unemployment is one concern about which the House and the nation are very anxious. I would ask the Acting Prime Minister, in view of the fact that the Canadian Council on Social Development has indicated that youth unemployment has reached explosive proportions, whether he would indicate who will be the appropriate federal ministers or officials who will attend the conference sponsored by the council, to be held about the middle or end of February?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): We have had representations from the council, Mr. Speaker, and this proposal is under consideration. I cannot answer the question until the cabinet have considered the matter.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED EMERGENCY MEETING WITH PROVINCES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the only meetings scheduled with the provinces are meetings with the welfare ministers some time later this month, would the Acting Prime Minister give consideration to holding an emergency meeting with the provinces and specifically designating unemployment as the critical area for discussion? I ask this question because most Canadians are not prepared to wait till spring for the promise of the Minister of Finance to be realized in view of the manifestation yesterday in Victoria—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lundrigan: Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister has some urgent matter on his mind that is taking up his attention this morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question. If there is no reply I suggest he cannot ask it a second time. It may be that the Acting Prime Minister did not hear the question, but I doubt whether it is in order to repeat it.

An hon. Member: Is there anybody responsible for unemployment over there?

Mr. Lundrigan: Maybe I should repeat it.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I misunderstood your action in the House. I thought you were rising to say this was in the nature of a representation rather than a question, but if the hon. member will repeat his question I will be very happy to try to answer it.

Mr. Lundrigan: I know we have a very competent Speaker, but we also have an aspiring Speaker in the House today. I repeat my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Will he consider an emergency meeting with the provinces in addition to the planned meeting with the welfare ministers to discuss immediate plans of action to try to at least ease the burden of unemployment in Canada, in view of the Victoria crisis yesterday and the impending problem in Quebec mentioned by Mr. Cournoyer some time ago?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the question of unemployment and the payment of welfare to those unemployed will be a matter of first importance in the discussions to be held next week.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RETIRED EMPLOYEES' PENSIONS—ACTION TO IMPLEMENT INCREASE RECOMMENDED BY HOUSE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he as yet received assurances from Canadian National Railways that the pensions of retired CNR employees will be increased along the lines recommended by this House?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have already held discussions with the CNR on this subject in order to get information as to what their response was to the report of the standing committee as concurred in by the House. I think I can say at this time that there is sympathetic response. I have asked for the specifics of what the company is anticipating it will do, and I should have this information on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in addition to seeking information is the minister indicating to the CNR that it would be highly desirable to act on this matter soon?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question in various ways and on numerous occasions. To repeat, I of course take the historic position that it is not my role in any sense to influence the decision of the CNR in these matters in a formal way. But I would hope the hon. member would recognize that I am at least as charitable and responsive to the needs of pensioners as he is, and I have found my own ways of showing this.

Mr. Lewis: How good an advocate are you?

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I think this could be a supplementary question. Will the minister report on discussions with another Crown corporation, Air Canada, as to the possible abatement of lay-offs, particularly in areas like Saint John and Yarmouth?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that is hardly a supplementary question. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North has a supplementary to the original question.

[Later:]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. As the question of pensions is a prime item in negotiations with the CNR on the part of the non-operating railway unions, will he discuss with the CNR the necessity of reaching an agreement on this matter in order to avoid the possibility of a strike which would have very serious effects on the whole economy of the country?

Mr. Jamieson: As I have indicated previously, this is one of the complicating factors with regard to dealing with these people who are already on pension, because a part of the issue is now a matter for collective bargaining. I am sure the hon. member would be among the first to agree that it would be highly inappropriate for me to inject myself into the bargaining process or for us to try to do the negotiating here in parliament. So I have tried to separate the two issues and deal with those already on pension as a somewhat separate issue from the one that is now a source or basis for collective bargaining.

REDUCTION OF PASSENGER SERVICE IN NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question has to do with Canadian National Railways service and is directed to the Minister of Transport. Following strong representations by northern Ontario Members of Parliament requesting that the transport committee hold public hearings in northern Ontario in order to assess the implications of the CNR's decision to abandon the services of trains Nos. 7 and 8 between Ottawa and Winnipeg effective January 31, can the minister advise whether the Canadian Transport Commission is in a position to hold such hearings or is prepared to force the CNR to maintain proper services?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a supplementary question. The hon. member is asking a related question and he will be given an opportunity to ask it in a moment.

[Later:]

Mr. Serré: Mr. Speaker, may I repeat the question I asked awhile ago. Has the Minister of Transport any further report on the developments regarding passenger service in northern Ontario?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the Canadian Transport Commission has, I believe as of this morning—if the order has not been issued it will be issued some time today—ordered Canadian National Railways to institute dayliner service between Capreol and Nakina in northern Ontario. The dayliner service will have to be introduced under this order simultaneously with the changes affecting the two trains, Nos. 7 and 8, which I believe will happen within a matter of days.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I wonder whether the minister can assure the House that northern Ontario will have much better service when they lose these trains than was the case in Newfoundland?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTION THAT PASSENGERS CARRY IDENTITY CARDS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Could he advise whether he intends to implement shortly a recommendation of the coroner jury which studied the circumstances of the crash in Toronto, July 5 last, of an Air Canada DC-8, to the effect that in the future air passengers be provided with identity cards bearing their fingerprints?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have seen a reference to the coroner's inquest but only in the news media. I would prefer not to comment until I have seen a formal copy of the recommendation of the coroner's inquest.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

OPPORTUNITY FOR MEMBERS TO EXPRESS VIEWS PRIOR TO ACTION ON TOLLS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. In view of the recommendation contained in the study made for the minister by D. W. Carr and Associates that the government should unilaterally increase tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway by 5 per cent annually for the next five years to recover part of the operating costs of the seaway, in view of the great pressure being put on the government by the United States government to raise seaway tolls, and in view of the news report from Washington yesterday which quotes the minister as saying it is highly likely that Canada will inform the United States of its desire to renegotiate the scale of St. Lawrence Seaway tolls, would the minister assure the House that the government will take no action until this very important matter has been thoroughly discussed by the House because of the great impact it can have on the economy of the country?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will try to go quickly through the various phases of that question. In the first instance, I have already indicated there will be no change in seaway tolls in the coming season of 1971. The government has decided that the existing rate of tolls will prevail except for the known increase that is to take place in respect of the Welland canal, which has been under way for four years. On the second matter of the reopening of discussions with the United States, I should be the last person perhaps to fall back on the claim that I was misquoted, but I did not indicate that we would open them purely and solely to deal with the question of increasing the tolls. There are a great many matters involved in our relations with the United States and it is to discuss the whole range of these that the discussions will take place. Finally, with your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the reason for releasing the Carr report at this time is to get full representations from all parties concerned with the seaway operation, and of course we have indicated that we will make no decision until after that. I am sure parliament will have ample opportunity to examine the report and perhaps even examine witnesses before a decision is reached.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might now go to the related questions raised a moment ago, first by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

AIR CANADA

LAY-OFFS OF EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS WITH CORPORATION

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister report on discussions with Air Canada as to the possible abatement of lay-offs, particularly in areas like Saint John and Yarmouth?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question concerns the possibility of ameliorating the situation of Air Canada employees who have been given notice. I have been in daily contact with the officials of Air Canada. I understand they are discussing this matter with the unions concerned as well as with officials of the Department of Labour. They are disposed to try to soften the blow as much as they possibly can. They have indicaed that their talks should conclude over the weekend, and I would hope for some word early next week.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, will the minister give us every assurance that there will not be extra lay-offs in any one area, that if there have to be lay-offs they will be across the board, and that there will not be a diminution of service in any city?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think this would certainly be one of Air Canada's intentions and I will transmit it in the words of the hon. member.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA FOR PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question I want to direct to the attention of the Acting Prime Minister. Having in mind the demonstration by unemployed youths at the opening of the British Columbia legislative session in Victoria yesterday and the generally black picture of unemployment in that province, has any request been received from the provincial government urging that additional federal aid be given in the form of useful public works projects?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the province of British Columbia is participating, as are all other provinces, in the measures that were announced by the Minister of Finance which enable the province of British Columbia to finance projects they would not otherwise be able to finance.

BANKRUPTCY

REPRESENTATIONS BY QUEBEC MINISTER OF JUSTICE ON STUDY COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Following the publication of the report prepared by the study committee on bankruptcy and considering the recommendations contained in this report, has the minister been officially informed as to the Quebec government's concern in this regard and, if so, what attitude does he intend to take?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I received a letter from the Minister of Justice of Quebec on January 18. There have been some discussions between officials of our two departments, and I am meeting a representative of the minister this afternoon in my office. Naturally, the Quebec government and anyone else interested in making representations will be and have been invited to do so, and an opportunity before any legislation is introduced for them to make comments will be provided.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question. Since the Quebec authorities are concerned with the fact that some of the recommendations contained in the report might be ultra vires, is the minister now insisting on considering these recommendations in order to establish whether such concern is justified?

[English]

Mr. Basford: I think the hon. member's questions are based on press reports. They are certainly not based on the letters and communications I received from the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, if I can find the reference. Perhaps you could go on to something else and I might be permitted to rise again.

[Later:]

Mr. Sharp: I should now like to reply to the question put by the hon. member for Hillsborough. The Canadian government has not been informed of and is not involved in any discussions with or between France and Quebec regarding this project. I take it for granted that no significant step would be taken in such a matter which concerns both Quebec and the federal government without full prior consultation.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I have no specific answer to that question, Mr. Speaker. The situation remains the same. Unfortunately these people are living on an island and they have to cross the channel. We try to advise them as best we can, and there is no other way. We cannot build a bridge immediately or next week. Anyway, I do not know if it would be economic to build a bridge.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact that a number of Indians have lost their lives because of inadequate transportation, would the minister make a statement on motions shortly in order that this serious problem can be alleviated?

AIR TRANSPORT

TRANSFER OF RESPONSIBILITY TO INVESTIGATE CRASHES TO INDEPENDENT BODY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the very serious situation that has arisen out of the crash of the DC-8 in Toronto last July, would the minister give serious consideration to the removal from his department of the responsibility for investigating such incidents and place it in the hands of an independent inquiry commission or board, so that the families of the victims may not in future have to go through the trials visited upon them as a result of the confusion arising out of this investigation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I certainly reject what I deduce to be the allegation in the final observation of the hon. member because I am totally satisfied that the investigation of this unfortunate incident was thorough and objective. However, with respect to the broader question he raised, as I have stated previously I have no objection in principle to some other arrangement being made with regard to the investigation of accidents. The difficulty is that there is virtually no unanimity among all the parties concerned on what the technique ought to be. However, the matter is getting ongoing attention, and if a better arrangement can be devised we will be glad to implement it.

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF TRAIN SERVICE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the almost complete breakdown of bus passenger service in Newfoundland, and the recent almost near tragedy when a bus with 25 passengers was lost for 12 hours, would the minister take the necessary action to have rail passenger service reinstated in Newfoundland?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I too noted, with a great deal of regret, that a bus had difficulty during a very severe snowstorm for a matter of 12 hours. I would be much more interested in the hon. member's suggestion if I still did not have very vivid memories of being stuck for four days on the Newfie Bullet half way across Newfoundland.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, would the minister give consideration to providing the travelling public in Newfoundland with a service equal to that to be provided in northern Ontario—dayliner service?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, would the minister tell the House whether, when he was stuck for four days on the Bullet, he had the comforts of a place to sleep and hot food to eat?

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport, first, if he was ever blown off the rails while travelling on a train and, second, if he ever hung over the Exploits River in a bus held back only by a tree?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and leave him as the only member from his province who has not asked a supplementary on this matter, so I will call on No. 4.

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR REPORTS ON BUS ACCIDENTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is a very serious supplementary, but first of all I was on that train, and I do not recall the minister being there when that happened.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: Can the minister give us an indication of when we will receive the reports of the investigations into the numerous bus accidents that have occurred since the institution of that service? I do not recall a single word of any report being released by the CNR. When can we expect the results of those inquiries?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot be specific about this but I will find out. I can assure the hon. member that all such accidents are investigated. I regret the emphasis that hon. members have placed on the number of accidents. Generally speaking, there have not been that many and the safety record of the service has been excellent.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED ATTEMPT BY POLICE TO PLANT DRUGS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, further to the question I asked the Solicitor General on January 14 about the alleged attempt by police to plant drugs in a residence in a small Saskatchewan city, does the minister now have an answer to that question?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that this story is absolutely groundless.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POLLUTION

REPORT ON INQUIRY INTO MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF RIVERS FLOWING INTO JAMES BAY

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Has the minister received a report about the inquiry on pollution caused by mercury discharged into rivers running into James Bay? Does he know who is to blame for this pollution?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to look into the matter and report directly to the hon. member. I do not have any information on hand at this time.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE OIL TANKER ROUTE BETWEEN VALDEZ, ALASKA, AND SEATTLE, WASHINGTON

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Have discussions taken place with the United States government concerning the possibility of establishing an oil tanker route between Valdez, Alaska, and Seattle, Washington?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, other than the normal discussions that go on with the United States with respect to navigation matters on an international basis, there have not been any discussions on the specific subject of a tanker route in that area.

OIL AND GAS PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION IN NORTH—COMPLETION OF RESEARCH ACTIVITIES

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can he tell the House when the present research activities in the Canadian north on the problems of oil and gas pipeline construction is expected to provide enough information for construction decisions in that area?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am confident that we shall obtain the required information in the course of next summer.

AIR TRANSPORT

MANITOBA—RESTORATION OF CLASS A REGIONAL SERVICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I would like to shift the action to western Canada for a moment. Has the minister received an invitation to preside at the official opening of the new air terminal subsidized by the Department of Transport to serve southwestern Manitoba? Has he accepted that invitation, and will he be announcing the restoration of class A regional air service during the ceremonies so that this fine new facility will have some useful function?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether the question is in order. The hon. member will appreciate that it is not quite in order to ask the minister if he has received an invitation to attend a public function, and whether he will attend. I think that the hon. member for Oxford might have an acceptable question so far as the Chair is concerned.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question to make it come within the ambit of the rules. Will the Minister of Transport consult with his deskmate, the Minister of Supply and Services, concerning the importance of the restoration of class A service?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This further question, or reframed question, is in the nature of a representation. Perhaps the hon. member could look across the aisle and see if the minister is giving effect to his suggestion.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—PLANS TO ALLEVIATE GROUND TRAFFIC PROBLEM

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, since this seems to be the Minister of Transport's day in the House, so to speak, I also have a question for him. Has he any plans or is he in a position at the moment to announce plans to alleviate the increasingly acute traffic problem at Toronto International Airport? I refer specifically to those vehicles which are taking passengers to or from the airport. At the same time, could the minister reply to a question which he started to reply to about a year ago regarding the use of the RCMP to direct traffic and replacing them by the Corps of Commissioners or something similar?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have answered various parts of this question before. I would much prefer to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. The problem in Toronto is compounded, as the hon. member knows, by our anxiety to give a fair break to the Toronto taxi drivers in giving them access to fares from the airport. We are looking at the whole question of parking and the general control of traffic in the area. I hope that with a change in the manner of directing traffic along the lines proposed by the hon. member, or something of this sort, we can alleviate the situation.

PENITENTIARIES

PRINCE ALBERT—PAYMENT OF CERTAIN GUARDS DURING PERIOD OF SUSPENSION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked a question of the Solicitor General concerning the riot at Prince Albert Penitentiary. I was then advised by the Minister that the report in connection with the investigation would not be produced. Is it not a fact that in the investigation it was decided that there was no negligence on the part of the guards or warders? If that is so, is it the intention of the government, now that these suspended guards have been reinstated, to compensate them for the money they lost during their suspension?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, six penitentiary officers were suspended following the inquiry, because it revealed circumstances where these officers had been negligent to say the least.

It is the intention of the department to be very strict in the application of internal regulations in prisons because those who are responsible for order there must be the first to set an example to the inmates.

It was in this light that we applied sanctions. As I mentioned yesterday, a grievance was filed by one of the officers. It is the only one. It is still being examined and we shall continue this examination in the normal way.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the question is, are those six who were suspended to receive compensation for the period during which they were suspended?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker. Their suspension was without pay.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: That being so, Mr. Speaker, why is the government concealing the nature and particulars of the report which I understand places the responsibility right here in Ottawa?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, suspension of penitentiary officers was perhaps not practiced in the past, but henceforth it will be. I repeat, it will be done fairly, and according to rules.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the facts were concealed.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF SPREAD IN PORK PRICES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the spread in pork prices between the 20 cents a pound for dressed pork which a farmer receives in Saskatchewan and the retail price of pork products such as ham, which sells for $1.20 per pound, will the minister look into this price difference and consider appropriate action?

URBAN AFFAIRS

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATION AT TRANSPORTATION CONFERENCE

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing and urban affairs. Has the minister indicated to the chairman of Metropolitan Toronto since his recent meeting with him that the federal government will attend the conference to be called by Metro Toronto Council for all levels of government and all relevant transportation authorities?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge, this conference has not been brought to my attention. I shall certainly be receptive to such an invitation if it should come my way.

HOUSING

STATUS OF MORTGAGE ON ROCHDALE COLLEGE, TORONTO

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): May I, on a question of privilege, correct an error that I made yesterday in answer to a question, as reported at page 2622 of Hansard. I used the word "mortgagee" whereas I ought to have used "mortgagor". I thank the hon. member for Hamilton West for bringing this matter to my attention.

Mr. Alexander: I will send the minister my bill later.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I gave counsel without fee to the hon. member for Hamilton West as a result of which he suggested the correction.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SPECIAL PROTECTION FOR FOREIGN DIPLOMATS IN CANADA

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government decided to organize special continuing protection for foreign diplomats in Canada. If so, will the minister be making a statement on motions to outline it?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the department has, of course, in recent months taken very special care of diplomats who are resident here. We have also responded to the requests of diplomats who feel that their lives or safety are in danger. These arrangements are made partly with the local police and partly with the federal police.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA AND CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PROTECTION OF INTERESTS OF PEOPLE

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport which is supplementary to questions asked earlier about transport problems. Will the minister once and for all put his foot down in his negotiations with Air Canada and Canadian National, and will he assure the House that he will protect the interests of the people concerned rather than the interests of the various organizations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDUSTRY

RENFREW AIRCRAFT AND ENGINEERING COMPANY—INVESTIGATION OF PROPOSED CLOSING

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last Tuesday I asked him whether he was aware of the intention of Renfrew Aircraft and Engineering Company to close its doors on March 31, thus putting a large number of people, in relation to the size of the community, out of work. The minister said that he had no knowledge of this but that he would inquire.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I inquired and the answer would take at least ten minutes to read. It is very complex and has to do with a general decline in the aircraft industry and with intercompany relations, in this case United Aircraft and Renfrew Aircraft. In checking, I found that since the designation of the Renfrew area in April, 1970, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has approved four applications for regional development incentives involving capital expenditures of $2.9 million and 241 new jobs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROPOSED CLOSING OF MANIWAKI LUMBER PLANT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Has the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce seen reports of the intention to close a lumber plant in Maniwaki on March 5? Has he investigated that situation, since all over the country plants are closing and adding to the desperate unemployment we now face?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is too easy a question. It is terribly easy for the hon. member to mention that plants, here and there, in Quebec or in Manitoba are closing. Indeed, plants will close in various parts of this country, but it is part of economic change and economic development that plants close and others open.

Mr. McGrath: That kind of progress we can do without.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I understand that a minister has the right either to answer a question or not to answer it, but I am darned if he has the right to read a banal lecture to members of the House instead of replying to a question. If he does not know the answer, he should say so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Pepin: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The question raised by the hon. member was one that was six months old. It has been fully covered and investigated by two or three departments of government. It is unfair for him to resurrect cases that are six months old and enumerate plants that are closing in the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the debate between the hon. member and the minister either on a point of order or a question of privilege will be very fruitful.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to restore calm to the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to take up time this way, but, as a member of the House I do not for one moment intend to sit back and take that kind of remark.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: The accusation of unfairness was unwarranted. I am concerned about the matter because the closing will take place on March 5. If the minister cannot do anything about it let him admit it instead of saying these things.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We still have not accomplished very much. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

NATIONAL PARKS

TRANSFER OF TRENT VALLEY AREA TO PARKS ADMINISTRATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): The third time is lucky, Mr. Speaker. Since the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development are both in the House, may I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. May I ask whether the takeover by his department from the Department of Transport of the Trent Valley system in order to turn that beautiful area into a national park has been completed, and whether we can expect work on this project to start soon?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the transfer has not yet been completed, but we hope it can soon be carried out.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Peddle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of the question period I have been rising to ask what I regard as a very important question. I had hoped that Your Honour would not regard by brief intervention earlier as being anything more than a reflex action provoked by the previous question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have an important question to ask but I am sure there are other hon. members who also have important questions which could not be raised. Unfortunately the question period is over. The hon. member might, with the unanimous consent of the House, ask his question if he so wishes. I tried to give an opportunity to every member who rose, and a number of hon. members who were given an opportunity to ask questions were rising for a second time. I may be wrong, but I have the impression that the hon. member was called upon earlier in the question period. In any event, I hope his question can wait until Monday.

Mr. Peddle: When Your Honour expresses the hope that my question can wait, does it mean that if it cannot wait you will allow it?

Mr. Speaker: I would be prepared to allow the question now. I suggest to hon. members that the hon. member be allowed to ask his question, though I was under the impression I had recognized him at the beginning of the question period.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FUTURE USE OF GOOSE BAY BASE BY UNITED STATES AIR FORCE—RENEWAL OF LEASE

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): My question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the announced 40 per cent reduction in forces by the United States Air Force at Goose Bay, can the minister inform the House whether, in the discussions which took place prior to the announcement, the United States defence department gave any indication that they intend to renew the lease for the air base which expires in June of next year? Is it Canada's intention to renew the lease, and can the minister tell us whether the 20-year lease signed in 1952 between Canada and the United States superceded the original 99-year lease signed in 1945 between the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the United States government does not intend to declare this base surplus. Negotiations for a continuation of the lease are now under way.

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD ACT

ESTABLISHMENT, INQUIRIES, REPORTS AND ASSISTANCE BENEFITS FOR WORKERS

The House resumed, from Thursday, January 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to report to the House that conversations have been held with the leaders of the parties opposite in connection with the desire of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) to speak immediately after the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). It is evident that the remarks to be made by the Minister of Labour could benefit all members of the House, including hon. members opposite who will follow him in the debate, and it has been agreed that this somewhat unusual order should prevail in this instance.

Mr. Baldwin: That is correct. We are always interested in hearing the novel comments of the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Last night, Mr. Speaker, I divided my speech into three portions. First, I dealt with what has been going on since May 14 when I announced in the House the government's new textile policy. I talked about the creation of the board, about promotion efforts, about the voluntary restraint agreements which had been signed or are being negotiated.

Then, I started explaining the ideas embodied in the bill before us. I dealt with the composition of the board and the criteria upon which it would base its judgments. I explained the functions of the board. I emphasized that the board has final authority when it comes to determining whether there is injury or threat of injury, and when it comes to determining the value of plans presented by the industry, but that it does not have final responsibility in matters affecting the degree of protection needed. That is a field of government responsibility; the board only makes recommendations. Some people have misunderstood this point. Next I tried to describe the changes the bill proposes to make to the Export and Import Permits Act. This is where I was last night when the sitting came to an end.

The new textile policy envisages the application of unilateral measures, including import quotas, in cases where a negotiated solution, such as a restraint agreement, cannot be reached. As I said last night, we always try to reach a negotiated agreement with low-cost countries whenever possible. The amendment in the bill would enable the government to do this. However, the new subclause could be invoked only after a formal determination of injury by the Textile and Clothing Board in the case of textiles and clothing and by the Anti-dumping Tribunal in the case of all other goods. Moreover, any restrictions imposed under this clause would remain in force only for the period required to prevent or remedy an injury. It is clear, therefore, that action under this new subsection would be taken only when needed and would take into account the provisions of relevant international agreements.

I might emphasize in this connection that most other countries have standing authority to take unilateral action of this type. However, the approach taken by the Canadian government contrasts sharply with the policy pursued by other countries in that many of them do not require a formal determination of injury to be made before proceeding with restrictive action. I think this is extremely important, and I suggest that hon. members commenting on this subject should take these facts into account.

Incidentally, I am sure the proposed amendment will commend itself to the great majority of hon. members. When another amendment to this act was before the House in February, 1969, the spokesman for the Progressive Conservative party, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) and for the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), expressed a desire to see the act used more effectively and extended in terms of the products to which it applies.

A few words, now, about the changes in the Customs Act. There have been cases in the past where countries agree to restrain their exports in order to prevent a serious disruption of the Canadian market but were unable to do so effectively. I have in mind a voluntary restraint agreement with respect to which the country which had agreed to restrain was not in a position to implement the agreement it had accepted. As I indicated earlier, the new policy envisages continued reliance on negotiated restraint as the principal means of protecting against disruptive imports. However, such an approach can only work if the agreed restraint levels are effectively enforced. The proposed amendment to the Customs Act will enable the government to assist the exporting countries in fulfilling their commitments.

This should be enough on the main parts of the bill itself. The last part of my remarks concern what is left to be done, what is ahead.

[Translation]

It is apparent, Mr. Speaker, that once this bill is passed, most of the main elements of the textile policy will have been put in place, including the establishment of the Textile and Clothing Board, the amendment of the General Adjustment Assistance Program, the introduction of the adjustment assistance program for workers, of which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) will be speaking in a few minutes, increased export promotion efforts, and the amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act and the Customs Act required for proper implementation of the new policy.

There are three other elements; first, rationalization of the textile tariff; second, establishment of Development and Productivity Centres; and third better statistics. I will say a few words about each one.

With respect to rationalization of textile tariff, the officials of my department are at present endeavouring to establish—in close consultation with the industry—the extent to which the conditional drawback procedures now available to shirt manufacturers could appropriately be extended to other sectors of the apparel industry. We know what a drawback is: an industrialist pays the required import tariff but gets it back if certain conditions are met. I know that this is of special interest to the hon. member for Gamelin (Mr. Portelance). If a workable solution can be found to this problem, costs to manufacturers of some types of garments could be reduced. In addition to any interim measures that may be taken along these lines, the government will undertake a systematic review of the textile and clothing tariffs. If the findings of this study make it possible to introduce an important change into the customs tariff, Canada will endeavour, on the other hand, to improve its access to export markets, or to obtain corresponding compensations. In plain English, it means that should it be decided to change the tariff, attempts will be made to "sell" these changes in exchange for advantage from other countries. In this connection, I should like to reiterate the government's readiness to join with other countries in efforts to seek a liberalization of the highly restrictive environment in which the world textile trade takes place at the present time.

Secondly, task forces for the textile and clothing industries consisting of industry and government representatives have been created to develop detailed proposals for the establishment of the Development and Productivity Centres. It is expected that they will submit their recommendations by the middle of this year.

And, finally, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has indicated that with some refinement in compilation and reporting procedures it expects to be in the position to provide on a timely basis all the statistics required for the effective administration of the new textile policy.

I have now accounted, Mr. Speaker, for all of the elements of the new textile policy as announced on May 14 last year.

Following my announcement of the new textile policy on May 14, my good friend the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) made a vigorous plea for "a more equitable balance than exists today."

It is my contention that the new textile policy achieves an "equitable balance." In fact it may be unique in this respect, both as a textile policy and as a policy developed for a particular industry sector. It takes into account regional and social considerations, producer and consumer interests, our industrial development and trade objectives, as well as our international obligations. I am certain that some will consider it too protectionist, others not protective enough. That in itself is an indication of the careful balance that has been struck.

Mr. Speaker, it is essential that the textile policy succeeds. For the first time, the government defines and presents, I would say, a general framework for every sector of a secondary industry, covering all aspects: imports, exports, production, research, development, promotion, etc. I believe it is the first time such a framework has been offered.

All interested parties asked that it be done. Producers said: What do you want us to do? Exporters were also interested. Unions, consumers, in one word everybody was looking for a clearer philosophy, a more definite structure and that is what we are offering today in Bill C-215.

I repeat, it is very important that the policy succeeds. Therefore, the government needs and expects the cooperation of all sectors of the industry, all interested parties and, particularly today, all members of Parliament, both of the government and opposition parties.

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first of all, may I express my appreciation to the House for permitting me to speak out of what would be the normal order of speakers so that I may try to clarify, to some extent at least, clause 21 of this particular bill to establish a Textile and Clothing Board. I think the minister sponsoring the bill explained in great detail last night and again today the benefits that could flow from this new policy.

As Minister of Labour I am, of course, concerned with any policy that could cause disruption of any type in the working force of this country. I am not unaware of the particular problems faced by labour-intensive industries such as the textile industry and the need to make them more competitive and efficient so they are able to meet the challenge of other countries which are traditional competitors in the field of textiles. I think it is safe to say that over the next year we will be faced more and more with the question of labour-intensive industries competing with countries that have lower labour costs. The answer to this problem is, of course, to have a higher degree of productivity, which sometimes results only from a greater degree of automation and acceptance of technological change.

I think that society, and certainly governments that take the initiative the minister has taken to rationalize those sections of industry that require rationalization in order to remain viable and vigorous, have in turn an obligation to provide assistance to those workers in labour-intensive industries who are affected by this policy. For this reason, I am very pleased that the minister, in collaboration with me and my department, has seen fit to include in this bill clause 21, which provides financial assistance and a certain degree of security for those workers who can be identified by a formula as members of the textile industry.

I do not intend to prolong the debate, in view of the courtesy and co-operation extended to me by the opposition, by speaking at length on the whole concept of rationalization and the effect it has on the work force, together with the moral obligations imposed on management and on government to help displaced workers. Rather, I shall confine my remarks to clause 21 and explain in a little greater detail in the House, before it is made public through the medium of the press, precisely what aspects can be emphasized at the moment.

I think the minister who has just spoken made it very clear that the end result, the logical conclusion of this policy, would be a more viable, vigorous and competitive textile industry in Canada. This, in turn, will mean not only the survival of the industry but, if his predictions are accurate—and I believe they are—it will mean an expanded textile industry over the next decade, and particularly a competitive one that does not have to depend for its survival entirely on high tariffs. This is in the best interests of the workers as well, of course, as of the country and for the economic picture in Canada.

With these ends in mind, the minister has brought in what I think is a very forward-looking piece of legislation; this is the type of action we should be taking more and more in connection with other industries. We have not ignored the fact, however, that these beneficial changes could and might result in some disruptive effect, even of a temporary nature, on those people presently employed in the textile industry, which as I have mentioned in some parts of the country tends to be very labour-intensive.

Clause 21 provides that, in order to keep any adverse effects of unemployment to a minimum, there will be a special program of benefits to those assisted workers affected by the bill and who have to cope with the problems of adjustment. In coming to this decision the government has been very conscious of the fact that many workers employed in the textile and clothing industry are over 50 years of age and are located in many instances in small centres where employment opportunities are limited. These are workers who possess skills which are not readily adapted to other work because of their long association with the textile industry.

I should like to outline very briefly some of the features of this program. Perhaps I should just read the clause of the bill in order to explain more fully what we intend to do. Clause 21 provides that any producer of textiles and clothing, or any trade union representing the workers of that industry, or any representative group of non-organized workers where unions do not exist, may apply to the Textile and Clothing Board for certification in respect of a lay-off of significant size and duration that can be directly attributed to one of several causes.

One cause, for instance, is the reduction of tariffs on any textiles or clothing goods imported into Canada which could cause temporary unemployment in a transitional period, or any condition set up by the government for special protection, or any case of serious injury or threat to the production of any textile or clothing goods as a result of import competition in circumstances where special measures of protection have not been recommended and not deemed practicable. This is the area which could only survive with particularly high tariffs.

Workers affected by lay-offs and certified by the board will be entitled to apply as individuals for specific benefits, the details of which will be covered by regulations now being prepared by the department. These regulations will be made under the authority of the provisions of Appropriation Act No. 4, which was approved by the House on December 15 and received Royal Assent on December 18, 1970. Provisions for the fund were made in the supplementary estimates of the Department for 1970-71.

The adjustment assistance program will provide for two types of benefits. The first is a supplementary benefit which will apply to all people who are associated with the textile industry regardless of age; that is for those workers regardless of age who are in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits as a result of lay-offs. Where lay-offs may occur that have a clearly established attachment to the industry there will be supplementary benefits which, when added to the benefits available under the present unemployment insurance system, will provide for a total benefit to a maximum of $100 per week, or two-thirds of the previous income from employment in the industry. Subject to transitional arrangements, these benefits will be payable only until such time as the benefit provisions of the new unemployment insurance act comes into force. This simply means that if there are some applications approved which result in this type of dislocation before the new Unemployment Insurance Act comes into effect, then the provisions of the new act will apply immediately, as of tomorrow theoretically, through the payment of supplementary unemployment insurance benefits to bring the benefits up to the level we propose under the new plan. When the new plan comes into effect, these people will fall within the new plan and the supplementary unemployment benefits will be eliminated.

Perhaps the more important feature of the plan that we propose for those workers who are over 54 years of age at the date of lay-off is that there will be a pre-retirement benefit amounting to 50 per cent of previous earnings, payable after the unemployment insurance benefits have been exhausted, and, if need be, until age 65 when entitlement to benefits under the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Plan begins. In other words, we have taken into consideration the fact that people over age 54 in the textile industry who have been associated with this industry for perhaps 20 or 30 years, who have no other particular skills and live in small communities in which perhaps the textile industry has been dominant, in the event of the plant closing down or automation causing a reduction in the work force, have a particular problem in view of the limited application of their special skills. Providing, of course, that we are unable to find them suitable work, and providing that even with training through the Department of Manpower and Immigration they are unable to find employment in the community or within a reasonable distance, we feel it is only logical that these people over age 54 who have been displaced, through circumstances beyond their own personal control, should have some form of personal assistance.

For that reason we propose, subject specifically to exhaustion of unemployment insurance benefits and the assurance that work is not available with or without manpower training, these people will be entitled to pre-retirement benefits from the age of 54, from the date of exhaustion of unemployment insurance benefits until age 65. These benefits will, of course, be subject to a scale which will be related to their income over a reasonable period of time during which they were employed by the textile industry. I might say that until the regulations are completed, the initial maximum payment under the pre-retirement benefit plan will be $75 a week. The amount of benefits will be adjusted for cost of living increases in the same manner that benefits are adjusted under the Canada Pension Plan. So, there will be an escalating feature to the pre-retirement payment. It will work precisely as the Canada Pension Plan works and it is based on studies that have been made primarily in the United States.

We will try to encourage people of age 54, 55, 56 and so forth to supplement this income up to $75 a week by not penalizing them by eliminating, as it were, their pre-retirement benefits if they work elsewhere. In other words, what we intend to do is permit persons drawing these retirement benefits amounting to up to $75 a week to benefit by an amount equal to half of any monies they may earn from another job in the community. In other words, they will be entitled to increase this benefit of $75 a week by 50 per cent of any supplementary earnings they may have of a temporary nature.

To qualify for this particular pension benefit, or the pre-retirement benefit, as we prefer to call it, a worker will have to meet a certain number of reasonable conditions designed primarily to establish the fact that the worker has traditionally been attached to or associated with the textile industry. He will have to have worked for ten years in the industry during the last 15 years prior to lay-off. I think this is a very fair proposition in that we are trying to design a specific program for a particular group of Canadians, those people associated with the textile industry who live in small communities where job opportunities are very limited.

If, for instance, in one community in Ontario of which I am aware, where the textile industry dominates the community, a worker has been attached to that textile industry for ten of the last 15 years, he will be eligible for the benefits, provided, of course, he meets the other conditions already mentioned and provided it is shown that his lay-off results from the conditions specified in Bill C-218. He will, of course, have to be certified by the Department of Manpower and Immigration as an individual for whom there is no present prospect of placement with or without training assistance. It is obvious that if there is a job available in the town for a man with this particular skill, perhaps in another textile concern, and the job is available, we expect him to accept it. If there is a requirement for retraining through the Department of Manpower and Immigration, that department will retrain the individual in order to equip him for that job, but these are the exceptions. If a job is not available, with or without retraining, and if a man has ten years in the industry in the last 15 years, he will be eligible.

The third condition is that the Manpower Department would periodically re-assess employment prospects in that particular community to make certain that a very small minority of people are not drawing the pension rather than taking advantage of work opportunities as industry expands once again. That is a brief explanation of the workers adjustment assistance plan. I introduce it with a considerable degree of satisfaction because I think it will create a unique and significant innovation in this country. At least we are recognizing the particular problem of people between the ages of 54 and 65 who are being displaced from an industry, certain segments of which the government thinks should be rationalized, in order to convert it to a more competitive position so that in the long run that industry will survive. I believe this will help the older workers to adjust to the problem of displacement with preservation of the individual's pride and dignity. I think the introduction of this program represents an important step forward in our effort to cushion the impact of unemployment through industrial change. This is a subject on which I have spoken on previous occasions, and on which I will have an opportunity to speak at length and in depth later on in this session.

In conclusion, may I say I would hope that all members of the House would accept the principle of the proposal that is outlined in clause 21 of the bill by which, if I might recapitulate, we would help all workers who are displaced, regardless of age, by supplementing their unemployment insurance benefits to the extent that they will draw two-thirds of their present income until the new Unemployment Insurance Act comes into effect. When those benefits have run out, those workers over age 54 who can show that over the last 15 years they were associated with the textile industry for at least 10 of those years, and who can establish by certificate by the Department of Manpower and Immigration that they are individuals for whom there is no suitable work in the community, will be eligible for this pre-retirement plan until age 65. The benefits are geared to their average income while they worked in the industry up to a maximum of $75 a week with an escalation clause similar to that which exists under the Canada Pension Plan.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-215 gives me the opportunity to comment on the conditions now prevailing in the textile industry.

I do not intend to speak at great length, because I know that certain members of my party also want to take part in this debate.

I think that without sharing the enthusiasm of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) on the effects of that legislation, we will give him our support just the same, since we do not want to be accused of practising obstruction and making things more difficult for the textile industry.

For a long time, Mr. Speaker, the problem of the textile industry has been drawn to the attention of the House and it is unfortunate that the government has put off for so long taking the steps necessary to its settlement.

I will mention later the representations which were made to the minister and to the government and left pending or considered futile.

If the textile industry is currently in an incredible slump, it is because the government did not assume its responsibilities and showed indifference toward the industry.

My long association with textile workers and the importance of this industry in my riding compel me to speak rather harshly to the government and to my hon. friend, the member for Drummond and minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I hope he will not construe my remarks as a personal reproach. I appeal to him in his capacity as Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and representative of a constituency where, again, the textile industry plays so important a role.

I do not hesitate, Mr. Speaker, to say that the government has failed in its responsibility, in its duty to the manufacturers, employers and employees of the textile industry. This industry, Mr. Speaker, in the emergency periods we had to face in the past, played a prominent role and, were it not for the superhuman effort made by textile workers during the last war, history would certainly been entirely different with regard to our armed forces overseas.

This industry deserved better attention for its past performance and I now say regretfully to the minister that his government has failed lamentably in its duty.

Mr. Speaker, what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said last Monday will surely generate a certain pessimism in the textile industry as well as among the workers engaged in this industry. For instance, let us read his own words as reported at page 2507 of Hansard:

> It takes a degree of courage for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to say to the textile industry of Quebec: "If you want to survive you must rationalize your industry. You must accept automation and technical change..."

Mr. Speaker, I cannot but make this comment: the remarks of the Minister of Labour were thoughtless or he was talking about a situation he knows nothing about.

The textile industry has substantially improved its equipment since the last World War. Millions of dollars were spent to bring it up-to-date; it can now boast of the same technological facilities as any other industry.

It is regrettable that the Minister of Labour comes so close to insulting the workers in the textile industry and the manufacturers of textile products by telling them they are dragging their feet and are unable to keep up pace with progress.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour should have inquired before making such statements.

And as reported at page 2507 of Hansard for Monday, January 18, he went on to say:

> "You must let us help you rationalize your industry, even if this puts 50 per cent of the workers in the textile industry out of work temporarily."

Thus, it would seem that at least 50 per cent of the labour force in the textile industry is to be dispensed with.

It is regrettable that such statements are made because they will spread panic among the workers as well as the employers in the textile industry.

I quote further:

> It takes courage sometimes to create unemployment. We have created unemployment in the textile industry and we will probably create it temporarily in other industries as we automate and as we rationalize these industries.

So now, Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to wonder whether, after implementation of this legislation within the textile industry other industries will not have the same fate, whether the government will not be taking them over.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we have evidence that the present government wants to take over all industries, beginning with this one.

That is most unfortunate and I hope that before going further the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will reconsider his plans.

Mr. Speaker, the textile industry is not just any kind of industry, but one which provides thousands of jobs.

The first textile plant was established in Quebec in 1827. Today, this industry is a source of income for 190,000 Canadians, that is 6 per cent of our national labour force.

In the province of Quebec, 55,000 people derive their livelihood from the textile industry.

Mr. Pepin: Textile and clothing.

Mr. Ricard: And clothing, I stand corrected. I should have been more explicit.

Three thousand six hundred manufacturers are engaged in the production of textile and clothing, worth more than $100,800,000. This industry is 80 per cent Canadian. Would it be for this reason alone, it matters that a particular effort be made, so as to preserve this industry, since it is owned, in a ratio of 80 per cent, by Canadians.

This industry spends every year more than $100 million in capital investment.

One sector of this industry, which emerged recently, has showed its ability to meet the requirements of the market, and here I refer to the production of rugs.

In 1959 this sector of industry provided only 1,700 jobs. In 1969 it employed over 5,000 workers.

Sixty per cent of textile manufacturing firms are in the province of Quebec. This means that this industry assumes a primary importance in the economy of the province.

Mr. Speaker, what is the origin of the present difficulties in the textile industry? They are caused almost solely by imports from countries where salaries are substantially lower than in Canada. We have known that for long; the hon. minister recognized it himself only a few months ago when he came before the House to ask us to extend the surtax on shirts. This is why I am convinced that the minister has already on hand all necessary statistics and data so that there is no point in setting up a board to study the difficulties of the textile industry, a move which would only delay further adequate action in this field. Meanwhile, other firms will have to close down and more Canadian workers will lose their jobs. In the end, who will be the losers? All of us Canadians!

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member to permit me a remark to clarify somewhat this situation?

We do not propose to set up a board of inquiry into the textile industry. The inquiry has already been carried out. The hon. member is perfectly right in saying that we already know everything there is to know about the industry. This Board will study special matters, for instance, cotton yarns so as to recommend the degree of protection essential to the survival of a viable sector—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, the minister has just made a remark concerning cotton yarns. It is also a well-known fact that cotton yarns from Japan enter this country at least 10 cents a lb. cheaper than their eventual cost here, on account of lower salaries paid over there. Why then should an inquiry be conducted? Why should a board be instructed to proceed with such an inquiry when we already known that cotton yarns imported from Japan and other cheap labour countries enter the Canadian market at a price with which we cannot compete due to the higher salaries paid to our Canadian workers?

From 1954...

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is mistaken, for there is no labour in Japan; all processes are automated.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, the member for Mercier can make his speech later if he wants to.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Would the hon. member allow a question for clarification?

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: As for questions, Mr. Speaker, I will answer them when I have finished my remarks. I am aware of the tactics of the government members; they are trying to distract me and to make me lose the thread of my ideas.

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with the fact mentioned by the hon. member a moment ago when he referred to Japan. He spoke about labour. I would like to draw his attention to the fact—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please resume his seat? I understand that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe would like to complete his remarks, and he has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively and respectfully to the two ministers' statements and I should like the same consideration to be extended to me.

From 1954 to 1967 Mr. Speaker, there was a 146 per cent increase in textile and clothing imports, most of which came from countries where labour is much cheaper than here, like Hong Kong, Japan, Korea and others.

From 1966 to 1968, the textile industry experienced a decrease of about 4,000 in its labour force. If we endeavour to reduce imports from cheap-labour countries, the result will be 20,000 new jobs.

It seems capital to me, Mr. Speaker, that this government should take the necessary steps not only to preserve but also increase employment in this country.

Again in the imports field, Mr. Speaker, in 1954, Japan exported 2 million pounds of textile products to Canada while in 1967, those exports rose to 37 million pounds.

In 1954, we imported one million pounds of those products from Eastern Europe, while in 1967 those imports rose to 20 million pounds.

Again in 1954, other countries exported to Canada half a million pounds of textile products while in 1967 those imports reached 15 million pounds.

Let us not look further, Mr. Speaker, for the cause of the uneasiness in the textile industry. Excessive imports are detrimental to our workers.

Nylon yarn which sells in Japan at $2.20 a pound is sold here at 80¢ a pound. Is that not enough, Mr. Speaker, to convince the minister of the need to take the measures that would put an end as soon as possible to that situation? I repeat what I have already said, Mr. Speaker: I believe that the establishment of this Board responsible for studying yarns and imports is useless. We will not oppose it, however, in case the government should take this opportunity to blame us for delays that would be prejudicial to labour. We will co-operate as much as possible, and if we could be sure that when the proposal is referred to the committee we would be able to have some amendments accepted, we would most willingly give it our support. But, I believe that our amendments will be dealt with in the same way as amendments submitted by opposition members to other committees. They will simply be ignored.

Mr. Pepin: Not if they are of some value.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, this measure comes too late. The government is doing the little it can do now, but it is much too late. He should have done so a long time ago, since in July 1968, the authorities of the textile industry, namely the C.N.T.U., Montreal, the United Textile Workers of America, Montreal, the Textile Workers' Union of America, Don Mills, Ontario, and the Canadian Textile Institute, Montreal, submitted a brief to the government pointing out the causes of the trouble in the textile industry. Indeed, one can read on page 16 of the brief, and I quote:

> The present situation leaves us a choice between two policies, one of which might lead to a constant drop in production, employment, investments and in the standard of living of the communities where industries must compete with low cost products.
> On the contrary, the other can assure the viability and expansion of a Canadian textile industry capable of contributing to the economic growth of the country. Obviously, there is nothing comforting in the first of these possibilities, but it should be kept in mind that it could become a reality.

Here are some of the recommendations that were made:

> The policy should:
> (a) eliminate any further dislocation of the market as a result of widespread below-average prices, and of the rapid and massive influx of commodities in new sectors of the Canadian market;
> (b) prevent any unjustifiable concentration of disruptive imports;
> (c) avoid the continuing erosion that results from the fact that, one after the other, new perturbing export sources disrupt other sectors of the existing market;
> (d) determine a trend whereby Canada could absorb a fair and reasonable share of the exports of low cost producers,
> (e) and, above all, allow the textile and clothing industries more sustained possibilities for more numerous and better paid jobs.

Those, Mr. Speaker, were the recommendations made at that time to the government; they were completely ignored. Other representations were made.

Mr. Speaker, the textile industry has never asked for special treatment; it is not asking for subsides; it seeks merely to continue offering employment to Canadians and making its contribution to the development of the Canadian economy. Although that important sector of our economy has expressed this wish repeatedly, the government has always turned a deaf ear. Indeed, it has always ignored its requests.

In the shirt industry we have proof that the inquiry by a board is not necessary at this time. We have proof that everything is known. The appropriate measures are known also. All the government needs to do now is to apply them.

Textile workers who have lost their jobs, manufacturers of textile goods such as shirts or other clothing who have been forced to close down failed to understand the indifference shown to them by the government.

The government is to be severely condemned in that respect.

Mr. Comeau: And how!

Mr. Ricard: On the occasion of a seminar held on June 14, 1969, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce had this to say:

> In December (1969), I shall have to make a statement in accordance with what I have just promised. I hope it will be favourable and, in any case, if it is not I shall confess publicly at that time that we failed.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I made it in May, with a delay of five months. Is that a crime?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, for the Minister, a period of five months is not much, but for the head of a family—

Mr. Pepin: Oh! no—

Mr. Ricard: —who has been unemployed for five months, it is too long—

Mr. Pepin: This is oversimplifying, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, the hon. member was not a minister for very long.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, this government cannot make us forget that they did not discharge their responsibilities.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the member was not in office as a minister very long. Had he acquired more experience, it would come in handy at this time.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but say that the hon. minister is showing his true colors. I prefer not to make any remarks akin to his.

It is tragic indeed to note from statistics that because of this ineffective, unimaginative and irresponsible government, 52 shirt factories had to shut down over recent years.

Mr. Comeau: That is terrible!

Mr. Ricard: Of this number, Mr. Speaker, 46 were located in the province of Quebec.

Are we not right in raising our voices in trying to somehow wake-up the government which is running the affairs of this country and in this period of unemployment which we are now going through to plead the cause of all the unemployed? If we dare do it we are exposed to the kind of ungracious remarks as were directed to me by the Minister a while ago.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member is touchy today!

Mr. Ricard: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that I am doing my duty and that I honour my commitments towards my constituents and towards all those workers who are engaged in the textile industry. I ask the Minister and the government to assume their responsibilities, to see that all the victims of the carelessness and the ineffectiveness of our leaders are treated fairly and are provided with employment. Charity is not what they want. They want an opportunity to earn an honest living. But this is a right which the government denies its citizens. This is deplorable and those who are responsible for it can certainly not take pride in it.

Let the government take its responsibilities, let it discharge its duties as promised and give work to those who simply want to earn an honest living.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes a number of steps to deal with two industries, the textile industry and the clothing industry, both of which have been and are in considerable difficulty. These are both industries which are "labour intense", inasmuch as a large part of the cost of the product is represented by wages paid to the workers who produce the materials or the finished clothing products. These industries are under tremendous pressure from imports from other countries such as Japan, Taiwan and mainland China. Those are countries in which the wage rate is substantially lower than the wage rate for similar work in Canada. There has been, therefore, over a number of years a great dislocation in these industries. There have been tremendous losses to employers. In addition, there has been a loss of jobs and workers in both industries have been paid low wages. We recognize the difficulties the industries face. We recognize the difficulties faced by the workers in those two industries. To the extent that the provisions of the bill, if implemented, will help the industry and the workers, we support this bill which has been proposed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin).

We recognize, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the traditional methods of coping with the difficulties of the industries have failed and will fail. We do not believe, as was believed by those of former generations and by former governments, Liberal and Conservative, that the solution to the problems of the industry and the problems of the workers in these industries lies in increasing trade barriers, in increasing tariffs and in imposing quotas. Such actions, Mr. Speaker, would not bring solutions for the difficulties of these industries any more than they would bring solutions for the difficulties of any industries.

We recognize, Mr. Speaker, that, since we are selling more and more of our industrial products to countries like Japan, Taiwan and mainland China, we must be prepared to trade with those countries and to purchase goods produced in those countries. We must do that if we are to continue successfully the pursuit of our objective of selling increased quantities of Canadian products, whether they be iron ore, nickel, copper or coal. Already we have been selling increasing quantities of wheat to these countries. As I say, we must be prepared to purchase the goods produced in those countries. We, therefore, support the trading policies which the government has adopted. We support the views of concern which the government is expressing about the plight of the textile and clothing industries of this country, and the plight of the workers in those industries who are being adversely affected by the increased amounts of textiles and clothing products coming into this country. So, in a general way as well as on principle, we support the objectives of this bill.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, we wish to point out to the minister and to the government that the kind of proposal being made by the government cannot operate in a vacuum. The rationalization of the textile industry will be difficult; indeed, I will say that it will be impossible in a period of major unemployment. May I remind the minister that in December, 1970, the last month for which there are figures, 538,000 people were unemployed in Canada. I am certain that when the figures for January are published they will indicate that at least 100,000 more people were unemployed than in December. Forty per cent of the unemployed in Canada are looking for work in the province of Quebec. More than 200,000 were unemployed in Quebec in December, last year. We are talking about two industries, the textile and clothing industries, which are very heavily concentrated in Quebec.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose for lunch at one o'clock, I was stating that the minister is proposing to rationalize the textile and clothing industries at a very unfortunate time. In December, 538,000 persons were unemployed, of whom 200,000 are in the province of Quebec. When the figures are released for January, I am certain they will indicate that substantially more than 600,000 are unemployed. I am certain that the unemployment figures for February and March will be in the neighbourhood of 750,000.

Mr. Anderson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have no wish to interrupt the hon. member's interesting remarks. I am wondering whether we should continue without any representation by the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Anderson: I understand they are interested in this debate. However, they have yet to appear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. We have a quorum in the House. All members are equal.

Mr. Orlikow: These two industries are very heavily concentrated in the province of Quebec. The latest figures which I have been able to obtain with regard to companies which employ 20 or more workers are for September 1970. In September 1970, 66,220 workers were employed in the textile industry of whom 37,253, or 56 per cent, were employed in the province of Quebec. In the clothing industry, 87,559 people were employed, of whom 56,516, or 64.5 per cent were employed in the province of Quebec. Any proposals to rationalize these industries which may lead to dislocation and unemployment, either temporarily or permanently, are extremely important, particularly with regard to the province of Quebec. In view of the heavy unemployment in the province of Quebec, it is not surprising that the government will do all that it can to make this change as orderly as possible.

As I said earlier, we do not think that tariffs, the traditional method of maintaining an industry or quotas which exclude imports, will succeed. We support the general policy of encouraging imports in all fields, as well as the principle of rationalization. We have always taken that view.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hogarth: There he is with all his friends.

Mr. Orlikow: When there is a reduction in employment and a dislocation of industry caused by deliberate policies and plans, we feel that the workers directly and adversely affected should not be expected to carry the brunt of that dislocation. The minister, who was actively engaged in working out the auto pact between Canada and the United States, will recall that was precisely the view we took. While we welcomed the proposal for the pact, we were very critical of the weaknesses of the provisions in that agreement which resulted in workers being laid off, either temporarily or permanently. We took a dim view of the reduction in employment of rail workers. In many cases, these employees were forced out of work or found it necessary to move to another city or province. I was very critical of the government and Air Canada when the overhaul base was moved from Winnipeg to Dorval.

This being the case, I could not help but read with a good deal of satisfaction and approval the proposals made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), and particularly the proposals made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), to deal with workers who are laid off or adversely affected by the rationalization of the textile and clothing industries which is to take place. I must say I was a little surprised we should have been given a speech by the Minister of Labour. I do not know why the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Manpower (Mr. Lang), who is much more closely involved with manpower programs, could not have made that speech, except that the Minister of Manpower comes from Saskatchewan and not from Quebec which will be much more seriously affected by what is proposed. If I am wrong, the minister will not hesitate to correct me.

I will put on record what the Minister of Labour said it was proposed to do for textile workers who will be adversely affected. I do so because I want to commend him for what he has done. I quote from the notes of the minister's speech as circularized—the words are not exactly as they will appear in Hansard, but I cannot help that. The statement reads:

> First, for all workers, regardless of age, who are in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits and who have a clearly established attachment to the industries, there will be a supplementary benefit which, when added to the benefits available under the unemployment insurance system, will provide for a total benefit, to a maximum of $100 per week, of two-thirds of previous income from employment in the industries.
> Second, for workers who are over 54 at the date of lay-off there will be a pre-retirement benefit amounting to 50 per cent of previous earnings payable after the unemployment benefits have been exhausted and, if need be, until age 65 when entitlement to benefit under Canada pension and old age security plans begins.
> Initially, the maximum payment under the pre-retirement benefit will be $75 per week.

The minister went on to say that this would be adjusted on the basis of the cost of living.

I want to commend the government for this step. We have been asking for many years that workers or farmers whose income is adversely affected by government policies—policies which may be very worthwhile for the country as a whole but which have adverse effects on certain people—should not carry the entire burden of the change. So, I commend the government for bringing forward this plan. But I ask the minister in all honesty: is this a special case for the textile industry. If it is, I cannot accept it. If this is a first step in a general policy of assisting workers or farmers who are required to make major changes in their lives as a result of government action, that is another matter.

In the last few years, and I am not thinking of 40 or 50 years ago, a number of changes have taken place. I have not seen in those cases the kind of generous, far-sighted treatment proposed by the government for the textile workers. For example, there is the situation in the boot and shoe industry, an industry which is not of much direct concern in my own constituency, but the boot and shoe industry, like the textile and clothing industry, has been put through the wringer in recent years as a result of heavy imports from abroad. Companies have closed down and workers have lost their jobs. Have boot and shoe workers benefitted from the kind of treatment now proposed for the textile workers? If they did, I have not heard about it.

As we know, the coal mines of Cape Breton Island and Nova Scotia are being phased out. I realize that for years the production of coal was subsidized very heavily, too heavily, probably, if the industry was to be brought into real shape. Then, the government decided that the industry had to be rationalized, and I agree that this was the proper course. As a result of rationalization a large number of coal miners have lost their jobs or will lose their jobs. I am not expert on this subject, as are hon. members from Cape Breton, but I have seen some of the cheques amounting to a dollar or two for a week, for a two-week period, which coal miners have received. The minister looks at me in disbelief, but one of the hon. members from Cape Breton has shown me a photostat of one of these cheques for 80 cents. This is the kind of treatment the coal miners of Cape Breton receive.

Consider the case of railway employees. Not a week goes by when one of the railway companies does not announce another closing of a line or the discontinuance of a passenger train or the removal of a dining-car service. All these changes have one result, a reduction in the staff of the railways. I think I have as many railway workers living in my constituency as any Member of Parliament in Canada, but I have not heard that the kind of proposals put forward today applied to railway workers also. I know there is a fund to compensate workers who are laid off by the railway companies as a result of technological change, but that fund has been built up by the workers' own contributions; they could have taken this money in wage increases had they not been so concerned about the effect of technological change on their opportunities to work. There has been no evidence of this kind of generous and far-sighted approach to the problems of unemployed railway workers.

Take the case of the workers who were affected by the decision of Air Canada to phase out the maintenance base in Winnipeg, which at one time employed several thousand workers, and to transfer this operation to Dorval. It is true the employees, particularly those who had worked for Air Canada for years, were given an opportunity, based on their seniority, to transfer to Dorval. I think that is proper. But there were many employees working in Winnipeg who were over 54 years of age and who had lived in Winnipeg all their lives. They were required to move to Dorval or lose their jobs. I do not recall that the Government of Canada or Air Canada said to these workers: You only have five, six or seven years of employment left before you have to retire, so we shall offer you the opportunity of early retirement on a generous pension to which the Government of Canada or Air Canada will contribute to enable you to remain in Winnipeg where you have lived all your life, where you own your own home, where your friends and interests are, and where you are looking forward to retirement. We did not see this attitude towards the workers of Air Canada, those in the boot and shoe industry of Ontario or the coal miners of Nova Scotia. Neither did we see it extended to the railway workers, no matter in which part of Canada they worked.

So, while I support the principle of this bill and commend the government for its very humane approach to textile workers, mainly in the province of Quebec but also in Ontario, who will be laid off as the result of the government's policy of encouraging the rationalization of this industry, at the same time I think that what is good for these workers is just as good and correct for workers in other industries in Canada.

I hope I am wrong, and that this bill is not just a political ploy for the benefit of Quebec. I hope it is just the first step in a policy that will be expanded into industries in other parts of Canada, so that workers displaced by technological change or by changes in government trade and tariff policy will not have to bear the entire brunt by becoming unemployed and suffering loss of income but will be given the same kind of quite generous and far-sighted supplementary unemployment insurance benefits and early retirement plans of the type proposed in this bill.

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-215, entitled Textile and Clothing Board Act, has great importance in the light of the situation prevailing in Canada.

I have another reason for taking a special interest in the bill, which is that over 1,000 voters in my district derive their livelihood directly or indirectly from the textile industry.

I am therefore very happy that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has introduced this legislation which will, I am convinced, be profitable not only to industry owners but also to workers.

On the other hand, experience has demonstrated that boards have never succeeded in solving all the problems put before them. In some cases, they have, it is true, been successful in locating the problems. They have also rendered great services, and doubtless the Textile and Clothing Board will help to solve some of the problems of that industry.

But let us not believe all problems will be solved by setting up the Board. Otherwise, it would be too easy to solve problems overnight. Some problems are very complex and require not only technical knowledge but also the co-operation of all interested parties. I hope the minister will get the co-operation of all the parties concerned, the industry and the unions.

The people concerned as well as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce are already aware of the problems with which the Textile and Clothing Board must first come to grips, because serious studies have been made these past few years by people interested in the textile industry, including unions, management associations ad various services of the Industry, Trade and Commerce Department.

As a result of these studies, briefs were submitted on a number of occasions to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in order to request various types of government intervention. The briefs contained full details on the performance of the Canadian textile industry, the problems it had to cope with and the future outlook.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of repeating all the statistics contained in these briefs in order to convince the minister how imperative it is that decisions be taken to help an industrial sector which is vital to Canada and particularly to Quebec. I think the minister knows all the details and that he is showing the textile industry his good intentions by introducing Bill C-215.

On the other hand, one should not triumph too fast. To my knowledge, for three years now, we have been making pressures on the government in the House and asking the minister to do something before it is too late.

As for myself, I think the government was slow in making decisions and there are others who feel the same way. The management-labour committee of the Canadian textile industry has already expressed its impatience at the slowness of the government to state its textile policy. The establishment of the Textile and Clothing Board is a step ahead, towards taking stands that I hope, will help to solve at least part of the problems.

In Canada, we have at the present time, some 200,00 workers in the textile industry, almost 60 per cent of them in Quebec. The decisions taken will therefore have a great importance for those workers directly dependent on the above-mentioned industry.

I would also like to point out that the textile industry buys considerable equipment and services from other industries, which means that a great number of workers in other industrial sectors are indirectly dependent on the Canadian textile industry.

This leads us to believe that the Board established under Bill C-215 will be permanent. In this connection, I urge to the minister to see to it that the Canadian textile policy is not developed solely by a Board. I can understand that the Board may make recommendations and appreciate the situation, but the reason for the existence of that Board is, in my opinion, to apply the policy that the government will develop for the textile industry.

Many times in the past the textile industry has experienced difficulties and if we were to eliminate all the industries that have had difficulties at one time or another I wonder how many would be left in Canada. For this reason, I can easily believe that the Board, through its advice, will be able to assist industrial concerns.

I also suppose that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will continue to help, through its Textiles Divison, so that the Board's decisions do not turn out to be administrative ones only, because further amendments to our textiles policy will be needed from time to time due to the changes that occur and that bring about or will bring about temporary or permanent difficulties for certain sectors of the textile industry.

One of the first tasks of the Board will be to make recommendations concerning the measures to be adopted in order to protect the producers of textile products and clothing against the competition of imports from countries where production costs are low or where export subsidies are provided for textile products.

In the past, we have tried to cut down imports by charging customs duties with a view to increasing the cost of imported goods. Later, exporting countries were asked to adopt quotas, in order to limit their own exports to Canada. All these measures proved inadequate and total imports increased steadily, so that not only Canada, but even the United States, were obliged to pass stringent measures to protect their own textile industries. This is to say that the textile problem is not particular to Canada, and that the measures we used to take are no longer effective. It is therefore necessary to provide for other measures relevant to the present situation. Owing to the constant increase of imports in the last decade, our textile industry's share of the domestic market has declined to 58 per cent during June, 1970. Such is, briefly, the situation.

Among the means available to the government to stem imports from low cost countries, there is the voluntary restrictions system negotiated by the two parties concerned. Now, the normal voluntary restrictions that Canada has always favoured in respect of normal imports have always turned out to be inadequate with regard to abnormal imports. As long as we were dealing with the old prewar commercial structures, traditional measures proved efficient enough. Customs duties being more or less normal, the customs administration having at its disposal basic means of action, it was generally possible to maintain within reasonable limits international competitiveness as far as textiles were concerned, without having to resort to exceptional measures. There were however, a few weak points where customs duties were shown to be inadequate requiring the intervention of other measures, such as the application of fixed values on imports coming from some countries.

As we have seen, the situation has completely changed following the tremendous amount of imports coming from much more numerous sources at prices against which any normal trade policy is powerless.

It is obvious today that the survival of some industries, in Canada or elsewhere, requires more than normal protection. Some have disappeared already and others will follow if the necessary decisions are not taken with determination.

In 1957, when it was found that measures were required to counteract the disruption of markets through abnormal imports, the quota system was adopted. Afterwards, on occasion, we had to resort to temporary embargoes, since the Canadian market for various products had become chaotic.

The available remedies took a new dimension when the long-term agreement on cotton textiles was adopted in 1961. This was largely a novel policy in the international textile trade, since it provided the signatories with the framework inside which they could make use of their respective quotas. For the various countries, it meant agreeing to controlled marketing, as well as to corrective measures in cases of disruption of the markets, restraints in the quantity of textile products put on the world markets and the need to eliminate any excessive concentration of some particular goods.

This agreement provided for an agreed increase in exports from low-cost countries, as well as wider access to strongly protected import markets.

For Canada, the result of all this was effective confirmation of the already deep penetration of its market.

In this regard, however, the agreement gave Canada the right to set values and to refuse to accept automatic quota increases, a privilege which has been seldom used.

This is to say that when such agreements are made in the future, we must set up the appropriate control system so that we can immediately determine whether the countries signatories to the Agreement are not breaking that very agreement.

Among the other solutions which could be contemplated is the application of quotas on total imports. To enforce this measure we would have to deliver import permits so as to be able to set the amount of products that a dealer will be allowed to import into Canada.

Doubtless this measure is drastic but if it is the only way to improve the situation we shall have to use it. Moreover, I suggest that under the current circumstances we have no choice if we want to prevent an even more disastrous situation and complete dislocation of the Canadian textile industry. We must therefore use all means available so that the Canadian textile industry may be assured of a higher percentage, which could be approximately 70 per cent, of our domestic market so that this industry may plan its production and make it profitable.

I am confident that the Textile and Clothing Board, in co-operation with the workers and the management associations, will find other solutions advantageous to all sectors of the Canadian textile industry.

By improving matters for the textile industry we will meet two goals at the same time. We will keep many Canadians working and we will at the same time create many new jobs.

In an article which appeared in the 42nd annual report of the Canadian textile industry, Messrs. MacPherson and Amery, respectively economist and assistant economist with Du Pont of Canada, state that the textile industry could provide Quebec, directly or indirectly, with 20 per cent of the new jobs which are presently needed in that province.

Employment opportunities, however, will depend on the availability of markets. For the next five years, the most important task facing Canada will be to provide employment opportunities for the young people who will come up on the employment market.

We must also recognize the limited amount of capital available in Canada for investment. The fulfilment of our national objectives, namely full employment and a rising standard of living, requires that approximately $20 billion be invested by 1975.

Yet, in recent years, investments were running at a pace of $10 billion a year. Our national economic policy should thus be such as to assist industries whose production could replace those products which are presently imported.

The Canadian textile industry has everything it needs to take an important share in Canada's economic growth and political stability. Contrary to the general opinion, the textile product market is one of the Canadian industrial fields showing the most rapid development and the growth of its productivity has been far greater than the national average.

Moreover, the textile industry does not require such tremendous outlays as other industrial segments. It therefore needs limited capital, which is one of the rarest advantages in Canada.

The part that is to be played by the textile industry in Canada's political stability, especially in Quebec, can not be underestimated. In 1969, that industry provided employment to nearly 200,000 people, namely 11 per cent of the labour force in the manufacturing field.

Given the best conditions of economic growth and autonomy, the textile product industry could have 280,000 employees around 1975, namely an average yearly increase of 5.5 per cent or about 13,000 people.

However, should the present tendency continue, the industry will need only 225,000 people and under adverse conditions, its total labour force, which is now set at about 197,000 could decrease by 6,000 employees before 1975.

The province of Quebec has especially important interests here since 60 per cent of the jobs provided by the textile industry are found in that province. There thus exists, between the industry's maximum and minimum needs in Quebec, a margin of 53,000 jobs indirectly created by the textile industry. Those figures represent about 20 per cent of the new employment opportunities in the province during the next five years.

In 1969, the textile industry in Quebec came fourth as to the value of its shipments, which amounted to $650 million. Most of the plants are located in the Eastern Townships and in rural areas where it would be difficult to create new jobs immediately, or a relatively short time, should we have to deplore further lay-offs.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the bill before us will notably improve the conditions prevailing in the Canadian textile industry.

This bill, like all the others, is not perfect of course, because there is no such thing as perfection. We shall have to be careful and provide for the corrections required from time to time, because nothing is permanent. We must always strive to improve our living conditions and the laws of our country.

In the past, the government has been timid in its interventions and each delay in intervening caused the situation to become worse. So I hope that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will show more firmness in the future and I also take this opportunity to urge him to introduce a similar measure to deal with the situation which now prevails in the shoe industry in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau).

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, we have been looking forward to Bill C-215 for a very long time. Textile products manufacturers have long been expecting the government to pass legislation that would help them out.

I am personally interested in this bill because in my constituency there is a textile manufacture providing employment for approximately 600 people and apparently, it is the largest in the area.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) last night delivered a lecture rather than a speech on the textile industry. We had the impression that he was speaking before university students, but nevertheless he explained to us what has occurred in the textile industry. He mentioned that Canada took part in a fair in Germany in 1970 and that it helped open a market of some $10 million for our Canadian production.

Also, he referred to our exports to the United States, to our participation in Fashion Canada, but I simply cannot understand how a minister can come before the House and say that everything is rosy in this industry, when he knows—

An hon. Member: Everything is in the red!

Mr. Comeau: —maybe, when he knows full well that this industry has and will have problems in the future.

I hope this bill, to which I do not object, will solve those problems and place the textile industry on a sound footing.

Last week, the Ministers of Labour and Finance (Messrs. Mackasey and Benson) also said that everything was rosy when they discussed unemployment. Cabinet members are wont to talk this way and take such a position.

Mr. Prud'homme: They are optimistic.

Mr. Comeau: This is all very well, but one must be realistic also. It is true that Canadian products are better than imports, and textile manufacturers must be commended.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce referred to the consultations he had with representatives of other countries, and he said that he did not want to take a stand unilaterally.

[English]

The minister boasted about the fact that Canada is the first country to provide protection from injury. Well, it should provide protection from injury in this particular industry because Canada is being gypped. The people in this whole industry should be protected because they are being gypped. This is the only country which has to protect its markets because it is the only country which is really being gypped. The minister warned members, and he was referring particularly to members of the opposition, not to feel that this bill was too protectionist. Who in this instance is opposed to protection for our own industry and its products? I suggest the minister was not warning the members of the opposition, but rather was warning some of his cabinet colleagues because he knows very well he had to fight with his colleagues on this measure. He knows that for two and a half years he tried to bring forward such legislation but was unable to do so because the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) and others opposed him. I am not afraid of protectionism but some of his colleagues are. I want this Canadian industry and its products to be protected. In the two and a half years I have been here, we have urged the minister to take action. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) mumbled something, but I did not hear his remark. The minister, a great university man, gave us a course on textiles.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Pepin: A much needed one.

Mr. Comeau: He has had previous occasions to refer to textiles.

An hon. Member: What about the hon. member in the red shirt?

Mr. Comeau: The hon. member for Calgary South is not concerned about textiles. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said that even if the government has to close plants, that is progress. What an attitude! The minister stated in the budget debate not too long ago, and the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) referred to it, that great rationalization and progress must be made in the industry. He stated that even if there had to be lay-offs, that would be progress.

Mr. Pepin: I did not speak in the budget debate.

Mr. Comeau: They are very courageous. They talk about the best interests of the workers. This morning, the minister explained what Clause 21 was all about, and I am glad he did. Clause 21 deals with benefits accorded to the workers after they have lost their employment at the age of 54. The minister said that provision is made for the necessary funds for this type of program in the supplementary estimates of the Department of Labour for 1970-71. Therefore, the government expects immediate lay-offs in the textile industry.

I cannot understand the attitude of the government towards the textile industry. The minister knows quite well that lack of planning by the government will result in the textile workers being laid off at the age of 54 and which will necessitate them being compensated by receiving two thirds of their salary. I am not opposed to that. We have to provide them with some form of living allowance. It is the government that is responsible and has to make up for the effects of its policy. If the proper policies had been adopted in respect of the textile industry, the retirement of workers at the age of 54 would not have been necessary. What kind of an attitude is it to retire a man at the age of 54? The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) says that this is progress, and the Minister of Labour agrees.

Mr. McCleave: Insensitive technocrats, both of them.

Mr. Comeau: The minister explained how the clause would be applied and he elaborated on the whole project. He outlined some of the conditions that a textile worker had to meet to benefit from this provision. Hon. members can read what the Minister of Labour had to say about it. The following is what the minister said in the last but one paragraph of his statement:

> In my view, the pre-retirement plan, in particular, is a unique and significant social innovation, tailored to the specific problems in the textile and clothing industries. It will help greatly to meet the problems faced by displaced older workers in a manner consistent with the preservation of individual pride and dignity.

Is retiring a man at the age of 54 consistent with the preservation of his pride and dignity? The government is very proud of the fact that they can retire a man at the age of 54. This plan seems similar to one often referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis), namely, the Devco plan, under which miners were taken off the production line and paid compensation. I have seen a cheque amounting to eight cents which represented the amount of compensation the Crown Corporation paid to a miner for one week. I hope the same thing will not occur under this program. If it does, the minister will hear from us again.

Under this program, the government admits its failure to deal with our economic problems and particularly with the textile industry in Canada. These pre-retirement benefits amount to two thirds of previous earnings. I do not believe the workers want to retire early, and if there had been proper planning for the textile industry we would not be faced with this situation today. Where are we going? These ministers are proud of the fact that they are retiring people early. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), in a speech he gave in Newfoundland not too long ago—and some hon. members from that province can correct me if I am wrong—asked "what is so great about people working?" The government has taken this attitude because they realize they cannot do a darn thing about unemployment. They are not interested in providing jobs.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce spoke about efficiency and modernization. The minister is not a naïve man. He is bright and he smiles all the time. He is optimistic, but somehow he is not sufficiently persuasive to be able to convince the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues to do something. This is where he fails. They do not have a plan. He might have one, but he cannot convince them to adopt it. They say they are doing great things for the workers, but they do not care about unemployment. The minister spoke about efficiency and modernization, although he knows very well that the textile industry in Canada is very modern and efficient. In fact, he stated so himself. I can quote his words as reported in the Globe and Mail of October 16, 1970 as follows:

> Said Mr. Pepin: "Contrary to opinions sometimes expressed, these industries are as efficient technologically as those of any other country, including the low cost producers."

Time and time again, the minister stressed that the Canadian textile industry is modern, efficient and rationalized. Yet, he is establishing a board to look into these matters. He referred to this aspect again last night. He pointed to an hon. member who was wearing a white shirt and indicated that all the others were wearing coloured shirts. He said these coloured shirts were a Canadian innovation. Canadian textile producers have been great innovators. It is my belief that other countries have copied what the Canadians have done and we are now importing these copied products into Canada. We should penalize these other countries for exporting these products which the Canadian industry has developed by limiting the importation of them. The government knows very well that the problem does not lie in lack of efficiency, but in allowing too great a quantity of imports.

The minister has given us statistics, but he knows very well that imports are now running at something like 65 per cent, which means that the Canadian textile industry is not supplying more than 35 per cent of the Canadian market. That is why we have this problem. I am not saying that we should ban all imports, but a reasonable advantage must be given to Canadian industry. Canada imports three times as many textile products as do the Americans, and twice as many as the British. This was the case from 1954 to 1967 and the situation has worsened since then. From 1954 to 1967 there was a 146 per cent increase in the amount of textiles and clothing imported into Canada.

The United States, Mr. Speaker, has decided to set quotas on textiles imported from Japan, but we have not; we have allowed matters to drag along; we have been the nice guys, and even where we did set quotas we told exporting countries, "If you exceed your quota we will not hurt you." The consequences of this massive importation are dislocation of production programs, restriction in the development of certain lines, costly diversification of production, abandonment of a number of lines and dislocation of the labour force in the Canadian textile industry. From 1966 to 1968 the Canadian textile labour force decreased by 4,000, and the situation has become worse since then. What can be done, Mr. Speaker? There are a number of solutions. The most effective one would be to limit importations. Quotas should be set and adhered to. If we set quotas for a particular country, we should not allow it to exceed those quotas. On the other hand, we could favour the synthetic sector in respect of which demand and production are increasing.

Is enough research being carried out in this field? The science report, although not dealing specifically with the textile field, clearly indicates that Canada has a below average industrial research and development output. Perhaps we could specialize our trade to lines in which we can compete. It is felt that action has to be taken by the Canadian government since the U.S. example shows the difficulties involved in trying to find bilateral solutions. A target could be set stipulating that 70 per cent of the Canadian market must be supplied by Canadian manufacturers, with the other 30 per cent being supplied by imports.

The solutions proposed by the federal government were announced on May 14, 1970, in the minister's statement on motions, to which I replied. They include nationalization of textile tariffs, improved methods of investigating dumped or subsidized textile imports, amendments to the Customs Act and the Statistics Act, creation of a textile review board, financial support for industries wanting to improve, increased or diversified production, financial assistance for affected workers, technical and promotional support through development and productivity centres, and a fashion design assistance program.

Bill C-215 which we are discussing, which is to establish a textile and clothing board and to make certain amendments to other acts, deals with some of the solutions proposed on May 14. I hope it works; I hope it will be effective. The bill will create the board, it indicates how it will work; it will provide for assistance to workers; it will amend the Export and Import Permits Act to control imports, and it will amend the Customs Act. The proposed board will look into the importation of textiles and clothing goods to determine if importation is threatening production in Canada. The board will either receive complaints from Canadian producers or open an inquiry on its own initiative. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the creation of the board, but I point out that it will simply make recommendations to the minister and then the governor in council will decide to restrain, and to what extent, the importation of one or a number of textile products.

The board may do other things. It may ask or receive from a producer of textiles a plan indicating how he intends to improve, change or modify his production in order to meet international competition. My comment is that the minister has stated many times that the problem is not efficiency; some of our plants are as modern as can be. If they are already modern, how can we improve them? We know where the problem lies. There is no need for the government to talk for the hundredth time to the textile industry in order to come up with recommendations. The minister and the government know where the problems are.

I have talked about what will happen once the lay-offs occur. The shame of it is that the government recognizes that lay-offs will occur, and so far as I am concerned the government wants them to occur. At present we do not know how the proposed program will work or what amount of money will be necessary to finance it. According to what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said today, this will be worked out in regulations which have not yet been promulgated.

If we consider the way workers are protected under the automotive agreement, we can see it is far ahead of what is provided for textile workers. I have here a copy of the transitional assistance benefit regulations covering automotive workers, but we do not know what the regulations will be for textile workers. Before we know what regulations the Minister of Labour will adopt, it is difficult to say if the program will be of any use. We must also remember that textile manufacturers are located in low employment regions and we do not know what measures will be undertaken to create other jobs.

Evidently, all this is consistent with the policy of the government to recognize that lay-offs and unemployment must occur because of changes in the textile industry. This is due to lack of planning. No decisions with regard to the textile industry must be taken before the board has determined for what period of time, and in what groups, lay-offs will occur. Textile workers are a group of specialists and cannot easily adapt to a new occupation in another field. If the government is of the opinion that there is no future for our textile industry, let it say so; let us not pussy-foot around. Canada could well specialize its production in another field, such as synthetics, and completely abandon wool and cotton production. Maybe this is what we should be doing. If it is, the government should say so.

Some people argue that the board is not necessary. The Importers' Association of Canada is against it, and for obvious reasons. Others consider that it is not necessary because we already know what the situation is. We have all the necessary statistics from the DBS and other groups in order to make the right decision on the importation of textiles, without the establishment of this board. Before the board makes recommendations, the concerned producers may have had to close their shops, although the bill provides for interim recommendations to the minister if the board feels the situation is at a critical stage.

My main point is that the bill establishing this board should have been introduced years ago. I am not opposed to it, but it should have been brought forward about five years ago. We are five years too late in bringing forward the bill. We now know the problems. I will follow the progress of the bill more actively in the committee. I urge the government finally to do something to help the textile industry. Let us not have this pussy-footing around, this business of going back to the textile industry and trying to find out exactly what they want. We know what they want so let us make specific recommendations. My criticism of this bill is that it has come five years too late and that a forward-looking government should have introduced it earlier.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Gamelin): Mr. Speaker, in October last, at the opening of the third session, one of the 68 bills put on the order paper was entitled: "Bill respecting textiles". What the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) did recently, which is now taking form, is certainly going to help one of the most important industries in Canada, one which creates a great many jobs and assuredly deserves a better protection in many fields.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) charged the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce of having taken far too much time in bringing in such legislation. He even went so far as to say that nothing had been done since 1968.

Already back in 1968 or at the beginning of 1969, the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced the establishment of a special committee which was to study the textile problems. The members of this committee had to meet several persons interested, that is union and management representatives, in short, all those who are more or less concerned with textiles. Moreover, the manufacturers were complaining about the number of shirts entering the country and apparently according to statistics, quotas were being largely exceeded. I shall come back later on this matter.

As the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) gave us various figures, I shall take this opportunity to say that some 190,000 people are presently working in the textile industry. In Quebec, several factories—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the talk-fest to my right. It is very difficult to follow the remarks of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. McCleave: The insensitive technocrats are doing it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They are not usually here on Friday afternoon.

[Mr. Comeau.]

Mr. Portelance: Mr. Speaker, I intend to be brief.

Naturally, such concerns are efficiently administered by directors who have succeeded in making the adjustments required to face strong competition, and who have endeavoured to sell their products in all commercial centres of Canada and other countries.

As the minister stated last night, in the field of men's clothing, sales to the United States have increased, but the duties on such goods are less than on shirts exported to the same country.

Statistics for 1966 show that Canada was allowed to import goods up to a value of $19.32 per capita. In the United Kingdom, the figure was $10.89 and in the United States, $6.07. This proves that three times more textile products and clothing were imported from other countries than from the United States, and even that the United States rate of imports was much lower than ours. Last year, the Mills Bill was proposed in the United States. This bill aimed at restricting imports through the strict enforcement of a global system of quotas. The American importers associations have stated that the application of quotas, without proof of prejudice, is completely contrary to everything that the American trade policy stood for in the past.

I feel that this bill is not as stringent and that it will be more favourably received than the one proposed in the United States. Just as some Canadian associations, Canadian importers seemed to fear it and were opposed to the passing of such a law here. Last Thursday, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) met with them in Montreal and was able to further inform them. In this respect, one newspaper reported the following:

> As regards the textile and clothing industry, Mr. Pepin has made it clear that the legislation introduced in the House last week and aimed at establishing a Textile and Clothing Board is unique in the entire trade community of the free world. He added, as pointed out moreover by the Wall Street Journal, that this step could very well serve as an example to others, in order to improve the situation as a whole in the world textile trade.

Therefore, as far as the Canadian industry is concerned, something new has at least been created and the companies as well as those interested in the textile industry will certainly be asked to be also creative in their respective field.

Canadian primary textile plants employed 54,300 workers in Quebec, 37,300 in Ontario and 2,400 in the Western provinces—in 122 plants—and 1,100 workers in the Maritime provinces.

Approximately 102,000 persons were employed in the manufacture of clothing and related products and thus, since concentration is in Quebec and in Montreal, there were 62,000 persons there employed in 1,540 plants. In Ontario, there were 24,000 workers employed in this industry and in the Western provinces 11,000. In the Atlantic provinces, the figure was 500. As I believe other speakers have mentioned and technologically Canada's textile industry is among the most advanced in the world, the minister is well aware of the fact. Over $500 million were invested within the past decade in this industry, and I truly feel that those interested in investing are not demanding a 100 per cent take-over of the Canadian market either. I think it is logical to let those people know what percentage of the market the industry can anticipate, of course, provided, it meets all the prevailing market conditions and is as competitive as possible.

There has been a serious drop in employment and revenue in the last few years, following the decline of business, for the benefit of imports from low-cost countries. Now and then, manufactures have closed for one or two weeks; the number of working days were reduced; work shifts disappeared; others have often worked fewer hours in several sectors of the industry. From 1966 to 1968, the total number of lost jobs reached 4,000.

According to the Canadian Textiles Institute, if textile products from low-cost countries had been manufactured in Canada in 1967, the industry would have employed 20,000 people and thousands of others in the clothing industry.

According to a report I received, the shirt industry in Quebec employed 6,008 workers in Quebec in 1965 and only 4,052 in 1969. The fewer number of jobs in the shirt industry is directly related to the drop in the Canadian production. Since 1965, 42 shirt companies had to close down in Quebec and seven in Ontario.

As to the reasons given for the stagnation of the shirt industry, they can be summed up by quoting the report of shirt companies:

[English]

The year 1965 was the peak year for domestic production, however between 1965 and 1969 domestic production declined 10%, feeling the impact of imports. In this same four year period imports went up 58%.

Imports from 1966-1969 totalled 4,484,100 dozen compared to 2,599,400 for the previous years (1962-1965). This is an increase of over 72.5%. By the same token domestic production for 1966-1969 totalled 8,030,200 dozen compared to 7,946,300 dozen from the period 1962-1965 for an increase of 95,900 dozen or 1.2%. In other words, in the most recent four year period for which we have complete statistics compared to the four year period preceding it, imports increased 72.5% and domestic production only increased 1.2%.

The increase in imports during this last four year period of 1,884,700 dozen shirts or an average of 471,175 dozen per year could have meant more than 1,300 direct labour jobs to the domestic industry per year, 60% of which would have been in the province of Quebec. In addition, many more indirect jobs would have been created in supply trades because of the multiplier effect of at least two to one.

With such figures, Mr. Speaker, I quite understand that the government should be seeking new jobs. We want to create new employment, in every field; indeed, in one province, attempts are being made to create 100,000 new jobs. The potential exists, since there are several jobs already. They need not be created, but they certainly need to be protected to enable us to compete in all fairness with the countries from which we import.

The question of the wages paid in the textile industry has cropped up repeatedly. It is interesting to consult the statistics on the hourly wages paid in the shirt industry in some countries. In Hong Kong, the going wage is 22 cents per hour, in Japan, 58 cents, in Singapore, 19 cents; in South Korea, 15 cents and in Taiwan, 20 cents.

Under the latest contracts signed by Quebec shirt manufacturers, there are zones 1 and 2. Zone No. 1 comprises greater Montreal and a territory which is 10 miles wide, and zone No. 2 includes the rest of the province. There is a salary differential of approximately 10 per cent only between the two zones, and we note that the average salary is at least $2 an hour. It is therefore very difficult for Canadian manufacturers to produce at such a low price what can be imported from countries where cost is much lower than here.

We know that import quotas are not as widespread in Canada as in some of our trading partners. Thus, Japan whose economy is the fastest growing and which is one of our partners, still enforces in 1970, 118 import quotas, despite low salaries.

The Canadian newspaper Financial Times of December 15, 1969 reported that Japan is slowly proceeding to remove its tremendous barriers against imports and foreign investments. But Canadian exports and investments are still facing various problems on the Japanese market. By liberalizing its trade, Japan is slowly opening new markets to foreign competitors.

In the next two years, the government intends to abolish 55 of the 118 import restrictions and quotas which are in force at present and can be considered as so many violations of the GATT regulations.

It would be very useful to obtain better statistics on imports.

In the shirt department, there are problems. Some countries have largely exceeded their established quotas and, in the past, this was always discovered too late. With this new legislation, the Board will be in a position to check the facts much more readily and get things going.

Mr. Speaker, clause 21 of Bill C-215 has been referred to. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe seemed most pessimistic when he suggested that 50 per cent of the workers might be fired or replaced. My own attitude is much more optimistic, because from now on all the companies which have managed to stay in this industry in spite of the difficulties that now prevail, will benefit from this piece of legislation. It should not be prejudicial to them. On the contrary, it should provide for the creation of many new jobs.

Of course, among those companies where skills and technology are firmly established, marketing will certainly solve the problems now confronting the Canadian textile industry.

Mr. Speaker, one has to be realistic and realize that these improvements alone will not enable the industry to cope with competition from textile imports from low-wage countries. The Canadian textile industry must do all it can to improve the present situation but it is not yet in a position to prevent this situation from getting worse on account of increased and unfair competition from countries where people work in conditions and for salaries which would be illegal in Canada.

I take this opportunity to commend the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) for introducing Bill C-215 and I sincerely believe that this unique initiative will remedy many existing problems.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): I would not ordinarily have entered the debate, Mr. Speaker, but on January 20 the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) spoke to the Canadian Importers' Association in Montreal, and speaking to that august body he said:

> What is needed is knowledge, judgment, wise reconciliation of conflicting interests, proper balance of advantages, the play of competition, consideration for economic, social, political, even ethnic, national, regional, professional factors.

Having delivered himself of that mouthful, the minister will, I know, need a great deal of help. He will not get it from his side of the House, so perhaps some of us on this side should offer it to him. I shall be putting forward an argument for a great deal of flexibility in the program the minister has offered. While some of the points he has made appeal to me a great deal, others do not.

I am worried about the implications of technocracy and bureaucracy in this bill. I am also worried lest at a time when we are facing tremendous economic problems, we may not be setting up machinery responsive enough to meet the demand. So I shall be putting in a pitch for a little company which does not even belong to the riding of Halifax-East Hants; it exists in the riding of my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in Halifax. But it is a plant which is very close to my own home. It employs a few people and it could employ a few more. I refer to Maritime Canvas Converters and Upholstering Limited.

Ordinarily, I would take up a subject like this in committee when the bill goes there for consideration. However, the trouble with that approach is that you can be a statesman there, but nobody knows you have either raised the problem or that there is one to be raised, whereas I would hope that Hansard for yesterday and today would at least have some circulation and would be almost required reading for anyone who has an interest in the textile industry in Canada. Other speakers, including the minister, have mentioned the impact the textile industry has on our way of life. I shall not go over that ground again. I quote again from the speech which the minister gave in Montreal on January 20:

> Canada imports about $700 worth of goods per capita per year while the United States and Japan imports goods worth about $180 and $150 per capita, respectively.

Those figures are worthy of attention, especially when it is considered that Canada properly takes its place with the two countries mentioned in that quotation when it comes to the standard of living of our citizens. So we are talking "big league" when we discuss the export and import situation in this country, and "big league" indeed when we deal with the difficulties imports can create for our domestic industry.

I suppose the minister is one of those twentieth century technocrats who are not as well versed in history as they should be. But there was a time 100 years ago when another Liberal government was in power during a recession. That was the government of the good old stone mason, Alexander Mackenzie, and in opposition was Sir John A. Macdonald, possibly the greatest Canadian who ever lived. It was a time of recession. It was also a time of insensitivity on the part of Alexander Mackenzie, caught up in thoughts of free trade. Sir John A., with that wonderful feeling he had for the needs of Canadian people, soon taught Alexander Mackenzie what the name of the game was when it came to building up a nation. Unless the government does more about building up the prospects for Canadian employment at the present time, the same thing will happen to them.

In any event, having made those comments, which seem to amount to a plea for unlimited protection, or at least to a plea for sensible protection, the case I have in mind is one where a little less protection is needed and a little more common sense. I hope the minister will listen. He is an insensitive technocrat. He wants to talk to somebody. I will put it on the record and then I will draw it to his attention. This problem arises from the fact that Maritime Canvas Converters could make good use of something called flax cloth, 18 oz. per square yard. I believe that is the technical term used for it. This material serves in the manufacture of ventilator covers, lifeboat covers, hatch covers and so on.

The company loses business in Canada because the Department of Finance has imposed duty on this material, imported from Scotland. As a result, the masters of vessels, and others, who could have these covers made in Halifax, thus providing work for Canadians, choose to go to the United States to get it done. The captains say to Maritime Canvas Converters Limited that they get a 25 per cent subsidy when the work is done in the United States. I am not talking about large potatoes; I am talking about jobs for people—and over the next few months we shall hear a great deal in this Parliament about jobs for Canadians.

We need a few sensible measures in addition to a little more flexibility than we have at present. Perhaps the minister's legislation will provide this. I should complete the story by saying that no Canadian firm makes flax cloth, 18 oz. per square yard. At least, there is none that has been heard of in Halifax. If such a firm exists, its salesmen have not reached that great east coast port. This material is made in Scotland and as far as is known it is not made in Canada. It may be made in the United States. Thus, it is hardly a commodity on which a duty has to be placed in order to protect a Canadian manufacturer.

The people in Maritime Canvas Coverters and Upholstery Limited have engaged in correspondence on this subject with the Department of Finance; I refer to a letter written to Mr. J. W. Latimer in that department. What I am suggesting to the minister is this. Since the board has these powers and there are to be changes to the Export and Import Permits Act and in our method of dealing with customs, we should not restrict these changes unnecessarily. I suggest there should be some means of throwing off customs duties rather than erecting them. In other words, there should be some means of removing barriers when the Canadian textile industry is not fulfilling a need that is very apparent, as proven by the example of the company to which I have referred. The minister nods: I thank him for listening to my argument.

I hope this point will be considered and that the law officers who will be briefing the committee when it deals with this legislation will be of the opinion that the powers are flexible enough to do what I suggest. We are not talking about many jobs, Mr. Speaker—perhaps 10, 15 or 20. However, we are talking about jobs, and since jobs are important, flexibility is a crying need.

My only other point is to warn the minister that he had better have a lady on this board. Three men are to be given the authority to decide what textiles Canada will manufacture. I do not know whether the minister reads the fashion pages or stumbles into the women's section of newspapers; I suppose the women's liberation news gets on the front page. But the ladies are in a fair amount of revolt, one of their main causes being fashions that they are asked to wear. Nowadays they decide for themselves; no man tells them what to wear. Therefore, it seems to me that if the minister does not have at least one woman as one of the powers-that-be on the board, he should at least have some female advisers in a pretty senior position; otherwise he might get himself into a great deal of trouble.

Mr. Comeau: With his wife!

Mr. McCleave: I am sure his wife tells him at home what he does wrong—but all wives do that. Perhaps the minister will agree that this move is imperative. With those thoughts I am delighted to have had the ear of the House for a few minutes.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to say a few words in the debate on Bill C-215, though in somewhat different vein from the remarks of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) and the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau). Every time I hear them speak in this House it seems to me the outlook is one of doom and gloom.

Mr. Comeau: You are never here.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am always here. On that point I would compare my record of attendance with that of either of the two hon. members. In fact, I would put my attendance against their joint attendance any day.

Mr. Comeau: Look at the index to Hansard.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This industry holds a very important place in the Canadian economy. It is the sixth largest employer among Canadian manufacturing industries, employing 124,000 persons. It comprises 22,600 companies whose total sales, including knitted outerwear, amount to $1.3 billion, $70 million worth of which goes to export markets.

It may appear unusual to some hon. members that a member from a western province should be so interested in a bill which appears intended mainly for eastern manufacturers. I would like to stress, however, that western Canada has an important share of the Canadian clothing industry. There are about 200 companies in the four western provinces. They employ over 10,000 persons and have total shipments in excess of $132 million. My interest is all the more justified if one considers that 126 of the 200 companies mentioned are situated in the province of Manitoba, most of them in the greater Winnipeg area.

The shipments to date of these 126 companies amount to $79.1 million, and the companies employ 6,300 workers. Comparing this with Saskatchewan, there are four companies in that province with shipments of $4.8 million and only 300 people are employed by these companies. In Alberta, there are 22 companies with shipments of $24.6 million and employing 2,000 people. There are 48 companies in British Columbia, with shipments of $24.1 million and a labour force of 2,100. I think these figures prove the point I have endeavoured to make.

In light of these figures, it is fair to say that the Canadian clothing industry is one of demonstrated capability. It is in fact competitive with clothing industries of other developed countries from the point of view of style, quality and price. This is attested to publicly by an important array of knowledgeable and influential people. Let me give some examples. We often hear members of the opposition quoting articles in newspapers, and sometimes I think we on this side do not get our fair share of publicity. However, on this particular aspect I should like to say that the press did give us a fair shake, and they would not have done so had they not meant it.

There was an article in Maclean's magazine for June, 1970, praising the style and quality of Canadian-made garments, entitled "You mean all that stuff is Canadian!". This is an article all Canadians should read. It describes what articles Canadians are making, exporting and wearing. Also, an article appeared in Men's Wear magazine in October, 1969, and I should like to quote from it as follows:

> Merchants say the reasons for more imports from Canada are rising prices of the European market, better deliveries, co-operative manufacturers and good quality and fashion...we like English fabrics, but the cost was getting too high. Now, we get the same fabrics from Canada ... at a much lower price—
> Two stores in the Atlanta area carry Canadian merchandise: Rich's and Rogue Specialty Shop. Rich's clothing is store labelled and purchased through the AMC buying group. The Rogue carries a line of leather goods and suits from Canada. Gerry Underwood, Rogue owner, reports the suits are one of his most advanced lines and bring a premium price—
> The merchandise manager for another major men's wear outlet spoke well of a Montreal clothing resource which supplied suits for his firm under a private label.

Another article appeared in the Ottawa Journal, written by Richard Jackson and headed "Trade Dept. 'Go-Go' Style Wins World Fashion Sales". He is a Tory, but since the story is a good one I will quote it. It reads in part as follows:

● (3:50 p.m.)

Showing New York, London, Los Angeles, Paris, Frankfurt what's up in high fashion?

Believe it.

For that's what it says in Women's Wear Daily, the bible of the women's fashion industry.

The other day, out of Frankfurt, West Germany, WWD carried this dispatch from its European correspondent:

"Twelve Canadian textile mills (10 in Quebec, one each in Ontario and British Columbia) garnered immediate sales of $3.16 million and potential for $13 million more at their first combined exhibit at the German trade fair for clothing textiles here.

The article continues:

But isn't the Canadian textile industry supposed to be in deep trouble, and what's it doing competing successfully against world competition at a Frankfurt trade fair?

Very nicely, thank you, says Industry, Trade and Commerce Minister Jean-Luc Pepin.

And not just in Frankfurt.

Then the article continues:

But in New York, Philadelphia, Dallas, London and a lot of other places.

Not just with textiles, either, but with sportswear, knitwear, furs, costume jewellery, rainwear, coats, dresses, leathers, and suedes, gowns, hosiery, suits, slacks, hats, shoes. The whole head to toe works in the world of fashion and fabric, male and female, and children too.

The article goes on in the same fashion but I will bypass that for the moment. I quote from Le Devoir of January 21, 1971 as follows:

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce attempted yesterday, in a speech before the Canadian Association of Importers, to explain the solutions selected by the government in the field of Canadian trade policy, on the basis of the principle that a balance should exist between advantages and drawbacks.

With regard to the textile and clothing industry, Mr. Pepin explained that the bill tabled in the House last week and providing for the establishment of a Textile and Clothing Board is unique in the whole commercial community of the free world. He added, as was reported in the Wall Street Journal, that this action might well be taken as an example by others with a view to improving the global situation of the world textile trade.

This Board composed of three members was established early in December and a bill to sanction its legal existence is now before the House.

Moreover, the minister expects that by 1975, Canadian footwear exports will have more than doubled, from $30 million in 1970 to $70 million.

Let us point out that the Canadian footwear industry, like the textile and clothing industry, is facing a very strong competition from Asian countries—mainly Japan and Hong Kong—where production costs are lower.

As far as privileged financing is concerned, the government is ready to implement all the anticipated and authorized means under its international commitments in order to reduce imports financed by foreign governments when they seem to hurt the Canadian industry.

I should like—

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

[English]

The Canadian clothing industry is, therefore, one of which we can be justly proud. The industry is characterized generally by an important number of smaller firms, 60 to 70 employees on the average. This characteristic enables individual firms to be flexible and adaptable, two features which are extremely important in a business subject to the whims of style and fashion. At the same time, however, the smaller size constitutes a drawback for most firms because it bars them from having ready access to the capital market. Being in a highly competitive business, the companies do not usually generate sufficient funds to finance needed expansion.

This is especially true of the garment industry in western Canada, and in Winnipeg particularly. There the companies are in a state of transition. From manufacturers of basic items—the utility type of clothing—they have evolved into highly fashionable items produced for sale throughout Canada and the United States. These companies are in a difficult period of transition; their demands for capital are rising, profits are meagre and they find themselves in a very vulnerable situation.

In contrast to these difficulties, the long-term prospects of the industry are much brighter. Given the projections of continued growth in the Canadian standard of living, it is reasonable to expect that Canadians will allocate a larger share of their income to purchasing clothes. With regard to exports, where the main considerations appear to be price, style and quality, our exporters have already made quite a remarkable impression. Between 1964 and 1969, the last year for which complete statistics are available, Canadian clothing exports grew from $17,248,000 to $58,321,000, an increase of 238 per cent. This is, therefore, an industry not to be neglected and I believe it is important that it be given every opportunity to further improve and increase its competitiveness.

Since the development of its textile policy, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has greatly assisted Canadian clothing manufacturers through its trade fairs and missions program, productivity centres, the Fashion Canada promotional program and the modification of the general adjustment assistance program to make it more readily accessible to this industry.

As the minister mentioned yesterday and today, Bill C-215 is but another element of the government's textile policy. He should be highly complimented for this approach. Quite apart from specific aspects of the bill, the creation of a textile and clothing board, amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act and the Customs Act which give the government the necessary tools to implement its new policy, the bill has a special significance inasmuch as it confirms the government's confidence in and support for the textile and clothing industries of Canada. This, in turn, is most important to Canadian manufacturers and should encourage them to take the necessary steps to expand and take advantage of the market opportunities available in Canada and abroad.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is general disposition to proceed immediately to item No. 7 on the Order Paper under public bills, namely, second reading and reference of Bill C-25 standing in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode), and that the preceding bills retain their position on the Order Paper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that all the items on the Order Paper appearing prior to Bill C-25 shall stand and retain their positions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL POLLUTION AWARENESS WEEK

MEASURE TO MAKE PEOPLE AWARE OF ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved that Bill C-25, respecting Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to have the opportunity to—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —to cut off your own colleague.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry; I must have misunderstood the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney).

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is one that I think is very worthy of endorsement. The problems of pollution—a matter so much in the public interest today—should be approached with a great deal—

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thought the measure before the House was No. 7 of public bills. I believe this item stands in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode), and I am wondering what the Parliamentary Secretary is doing on his feet at this time, apart from trying to talk-out his colleague's motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair has recognized the Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I am on my feet simply because Your Honour recognized me. I think the bill—

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering whether the hon. member intends to give us an explanation of his bill. This is what we are waiting for.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, in common with many of the other problems facing Canada and world society today, this is an area of concern. Nothing but the greatest benefits can come from a public awareness of the circumstances surrounding it.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I believe affects the rights of all members of the House and in particular the rights of the hon. member sponsoring this bill. As I understand the procedure resulting from Your Honour's recognition of the Parliamentary Secretary, it is that the sponsor of the bill will not have an opportunity to speak on it unless he is permitted to close the debate; he does not have the opportunity to open the debate and explain his bill. In view of the limits placed on private members' hour, I believe this precedent, if allowed to become practice, would have serious consequences. I believe a great deal of thought should be given to this procedure before we accept it. I hate to put my question of privilege forward in this language, but what has happened in the last few minutes is disturbing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is unnecessary confusion in respect of this point of order. What happened was quite clear. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) moved the second reading of his bill and the motion was seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay). Because some of us were shouting "Carried," I take it the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill thought he might get it through without speaking and he therefore sat down. All he did was tip his hat, as the book says, but that meant he had spoken. So it was then open to anyone to enter the debate, and Your Honour quite properly recognized someone. I do not blame the hon. member for trying to get his bill through, but he has lost his opportunity to speak at this stage. He can speak again to conclude the debate when we reach the end of second reading, but that could be a year from next March.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the business of the House might be facilitated if the Parliamentary Secretary were given an opportunity to table his speech as read, so that we could obtain the consent of the House to the motion.

Mr. Anderson: In rising on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I endorse the views of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) did indicate that he did not intend to speak to the bill, and Your Honour recognized another member who can speak for only 20 minutes. When the hon. member has concluded his remarks, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta can say a word or two.

An hon. Member: He cannot.

Mr. Anderson: Yes, he can.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think hon. members would wish to proceed with the debate. If there is any confusion, there at least is none in the Chair's mind. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) moved the second reading of this bill, and my impression was that he did not wish to speak. Having moved second reading of the bill, he resumed his seat. The Parliamentary Secretary was recognized by the Chair, and he now has the floor. I do not think we should hold up the debate by speculation as to whom the Chair should have recognized.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Peddle: Mr. Speaker, I move that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) be now heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta may be recognized only if there is unanimous consent of the House that he be heard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to accede to such unanimous agreement if it permits me to have the floor on an appropriate, later occasion and if I am not deemed to have already spoken on this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With unanimous consent, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There was a definite negative voice on the other side in respect of granting the Parliamentary Secretary the right to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I take it there is not unanimous consent. The Chair feels the debate should proceed.

An hon. Member: It is unanimous.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair hesitates to prolong the time taken on the point of order. The question is whether there is unanimous consent that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta be now recognized and that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) be recognized later in this debate. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Corbin) refused to give his consent.

Mr. Corbin: Mind your own business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair did not hear any negation of unanimous consent; therefore, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a long speech prepared, but I have a feeling that my colleagues not only on this side but on the other side of the House are prepared, after token objection, to let the bill go to the committee. If that is the case, I shall sit down and allow the Parliamentary Secretary to continue his speech.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Talk it out.

Mr. Mahoney: —I am glad we gave the hon. member an opportunity to make his speech. It would be a poor world had we not done so. I do not think anyone recalls what I said prior to the procedural discussion on this matter, so perhaps I should start from scratch. The question of pollution is one in respect of which a benefit can redound to our country and society as a result of the fullest public knowledge of all aspects of the problem. In this respect I would place it in the same category as foreign investment. We are likely to achieve nothing if we attack pollution from an emotional base, because in this way the wrong answers could be obtained which would be very serious indeed both in the long and short run.

I think we can accept as a fact that our physical environment is not as good as it used to be. In addition, we can probably all agree that it is not as good as it should be. General acceptance of these facts has been a great triumph in terms of the environment and the necessary prerequisite to the successful fight against pollution. I would also put it to the House as a fact, one not generally accepted, that our environment is a unified system and that one of our greatest problems is our habit—indeed, not only a habit but almost a diligent pursuit—of compartmentalization and specialization. This is common to many areas of life: when we approach the environment we are prone to slice it into separate uses, special technologies and different administrative units. This fragmented approach neglects the intimate relationships among the fundamental elements of our environment, yet pollution of one of these frequently results from the mismanagement of one of the others and even from efforts to control the pollution of another.

The decision to avoid polluting a river, by burning waste, pollutes the air. If we decide to bury the waste, we may pollute the soil and/or the ground water. This fragmented approach leads to a multiplicity of institutions for the management of resources and waste disposal. Pollution control is an integral part of resource management. Our institutional structure for resource management, both federal and provincial, comprises a number of departments with responsibilities usually limited to particular aspects of individual resources or groups of resources. The forestry departments are examples. In addition, other departments and agencies, while not primarily resource oriented, have policies and programs which have an impact on resource use and ultimately on environmental quality—the health department, for example.

Generally, our governments are organized in relation to human activities—agriculture, fisheries, industry, transport, health and welfare, education and so on. The resource-directed departments—for example, mines and minerals provincially; energy, mines and resources federally—have been very specialized not only in terms of the resources they are charged with managing but in areas of management responsibility. It is becoming increasingly obvious that if we are to succeed in controlling the quality of our environment, as much as possible we must manage our resources as an integrated whole. Comprehensive planning must be applied to the whole field of natural resource management if we are to succeed in balancing economic growth with environmental quality in order to achieve an optimum quality of life.

The emotional reaction to some of the conspicuous ecological problems that we have confronted in recent years has brought a consciousness of the pollution challenge, of the necessity of preserving our environment. But it has also brought us dangerously near to making some very serious errors through overreacting. The fact, of course, is that pollution control is not without cost.

I believe that control measures must inevitably be applied. The problem is how to apply them at a cost that our economy and society can bear. I suppose the costs that will confront this society, as it seeks to improve the ecology, will be reflected in two general ways. First, there will be a great deal of pressure on the public sector to provide services and facilities which will improve the disposition of waste and improve our methods of handling the materials that flow from human activity. On the other hand, we will impose great costs on industries, and these are properly chargeable to them. Many industries operate at a given cost because they are free to dispose of their waste products without any regard for the social cost or the cost to the environment; and, of course, Canadians will demand that they absorb these costs in their industrial processes. These costs will inevitably be passed on to the consumer. So we get right back to ourselves: we will pay for this improved standard of environment one way or another, be it through taxes or through higher prices of the commodities and services that we use and absorb.

The massive offshore oil-spill of January, 1969, in the Santa Barbara channel of California led to dire forecasts that the channel would be a dead sea and a marine desert ever after. This is perhaps one of the great benefits that could flow from the bill which the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) has put before us. At the time this oil-spill was very much in the news, we were faced with new reports along the following lines:

> Conservationists ... fear that Santa Barbara channel will become what they are calling a dead sea from oil pollution.
> Marine biologists fear the worst for the balance of nature ... The full damage to sea life, they say, may never be measured.
> Commercial fishermen in the area now claim that their business is going to be destroyed for years.

Life magazine rather outdid itself in a bit of biblical prose: "Now the churning of our passage was dark in a sea gone dead". It was beautiful!

The University of Southern California was endowed with a sum in the order of $250,000 by the petroleum industry, with absolutely no strings attached; the only condition was that the industry would exercise no control or influence over the project, its findings or its publications. The direction of the study was under an Australian marine biologist, Dr. Dale Straughan. The reports have finally come in. Dr. Straughan reported, at the recent international pollution conference held in Rome, no significant deviation from the expected kinds and abundance of fish eggs and larvae in the area. She reported that a survey of the sandy beaches over 12 months following the oil-spill failed to pinpoint any damage due to oil pollution. Researchers did detect an over-all decrease in intertidal zones, but the decrease occurred on shores far removed from the Santa Barbara spill, as well as on those fouled by oil. Dr. Straughan commented:

> This decrease was not associated with oil pollution but generally with increased human activity on some beaches and increased amounts of chronic pollution other than oil.

In terms of fisheries' analysis, the California department of fish and game announced as follows:

> all fish appeared healthy and (it was) ... unable to find any indications of impairment in the food chains or damage to the fish populations.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Commercial catches by Santa Barbara-based fishermen were small when oil was on the water and the fishermen were remaining in port. However, boats from other ports continued to fish the channel. The department stated as follows:

> Comparison of the total commercial fish catch from the Santa Barbara channel and channel islands for these six months in 1969 ... with the same six months in 1968 ... shows no decrease in catch for the area. At the time of this spill, living birds in the channel numbered 12,000. By May the population rose to 85,000 because of seasonal migration.
> Mortality from all causes, including oil, is estimated to have been between 4,500 and 5,000 birds—

So we see that in a highly emotional, highly publicized, highly charged situation—certainly dramatic and spectacular in terms of pollution of the environment—in fact the after-effects were not as predicted by those who cried so emotionally at the time. Perhaps nature does have a somewhat greater capacity than we give her credit for to cope with natural disasters.

While we are on the subject of the bill, Mr. Speaker, another area of education which could certainly be undertaken covers some of the positive advantages. For the last 23 years or so, oil drilling has taken place in the Gulf of Mexico off the coast of the United States. In that time, over 11,000 wells have been drilled and of these only 30 have gone out of control. During the same period in the same area, commercial fishing has soared while in other waters it has declined. During the past decade the commercial fish catch in U.S. waters off New England, the middle-Atlantic, the south Atlantic and off the west coast declined by as much as 750 million pounds. In the Gulf it increased by 600 million pounds. Commercial fishing in the Gulf landed only 250 million pounds in 1940, 800 million pounds in 1955, and in 1969 this increased to 1.6 billion pounds.

The safe production of petroleum products in offshore areas is crucial. No one is suggesting that anyone should proceed with this activity if there is danger to the ecology or to nature, but the fact is that it is of great value to humanity to develop safe ways of getting petroleum from under the sea. Estimated reserves of offshore areas total about 20 per cent of the world's reserves.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Very respectfully, I bring to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary that the bill the House is considering is a very short and simple one. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary would assist me by relating to the bill his remarks on petroleum exploration.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, it was my impression that the intention of the bill was to designate a Canadian national pollution awareness week. Therefore, I would have thought that awareness of some of the more dramatic and spectacular causes of pollution would be related to the subject matter of the bill. This question has been to the forefront in Canada, certainly during the life of the current Parliament.

I do not regard the form letter as a particularly effective method of political pressure, but a year ago in Calgary there was an effective form letter, prepared by school children, urging action with respect to pollution. One of the recommendations in the letter was that we be limited to one automobile per family. It is interesting that in the letters sent to me by the students themselves, this recommendation was retained—but in four out of five of the letters they had induced their parents to sign, the parents had scratched out that particular recommendation. This only confirms my impression that while almost every intelligent person is concerned about pollution, very few are prepared to admit that they, as individuals, are contributing to it. Consistent with that attitude, they do not see why they should be expected to change their habits, much less make any sacrifice in comfort, convenience or efficiency in the interest of reducing or eliminating a source of pollution.

There are very few, if any, sources of pollution that do not have people, human activity, at their root. Only those involving human activity can be successfully legislated against. Workable regulations to limit and to reserve pollution will in every case demand that some people change their ways. Of course, we are all for that until we find that we are expected to make the sacrifice because we believe—sincerely, I am sure—that the benefit of our particular activity far outweighs its cost to the environment. The attitude is: Let us by all means render the pulp and paper industry uneconomic by shutting down all the old mills until effective antipollution devices are invented and installed, but do not ask me to stop idling my car on a winter's morning or burning autumn leaves.

That is why I say the purpose of this bill, the desire to pinpoint the significance of pollution in all ways, the significance of the cost of pollution to our environment and to our society, the benefits of controlling and reversing it, and the cost that we must pay in achieving that benefit, must all be made known to the public before emotional steps are taken. That is why I heartily endorse the purpose of the bill and hope it goes to committee.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I had a speech prepared to deliver on this most interesting bill, but since it seems to be the disposition of the House to get on with this important measure I shall only say that I take great pleasure in supporting the bill. I listened with amazement to the irrelevant remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary, who literally polluted the air with his verbal barrage. I can only say that he is not genuinely concerned for this bill, moved by his colleague in all good faith. But I assure the hon. member that we on this side of the House support him. We support his intention, we commend him for it and we hope the bill passes.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, on rising to take part in the discussion on the bill proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) I say at once that I and my colleagues have no objection to passing it. I do not think it will do any particular good, but on the other hand, unlike some of the other proposals put forward from the government side, I do not think it will do any particular harm.

The hon. member and I come from the lower mainland of British Columbia. That part of Canada needs no pollution awareness week to make its people aware of pollution. The people in the lower mainland of B.C. are aware of it 52 weeks of every year: they are aware of pollution by land, sea, air and sound. In that area, one half of one per cent of the land area of the province, live half the population of the province; and as somebody said earlier, where there is a concentration of people, you have potential pollution. We have real pollution in our area. For one thing, we have the Fraser River winding like a sewer through the lower mainland, polluted for years with the discharge of residential and industrial waste. Just recently a survey was made of it by a voluntary organization called SPEC. Some 51 students did an excellent job studying pollution of the Fraser. They presented a report incorporating detailed anti-pollution measures. That report is very appropriate to our discussions today.

As I say, the proposal put forward by the hon. member will do no harm, but I do not think it will do any good. It seems to me that we should allow this bill to pass so that more Canadians may become aware of our pollution difficulties. I think, also, that what is needed is not a week devoted to pollution awareness, or more studies on pollution, but action under the law. We should act, even under the criminal law, to curb existing pollution, including pollution on the lower mainland of British Columbia. Having said that, I resume my seat with the hope that this measure will pass.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few brief comments on this bill. First of all, I congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) for bringing the bill before the House. I think it makes a great deal of sense for Canadians to be made aware of our pollution problems. I suggest that when the bill is referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works it be re-named the Canadian National Environment Week Act. I suggest this because I believe that when we talk about pollution we talk in negative terms, whereas when we talk about the environment we talk positively.

I support the provision of the bill. I should like to see it go to committee. I hope that when the committee has a chance to examine the bill, it will also examine thoroughly the effect on our environment of those matters which already have been touched upon by this House. I commend the hon. member and support the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I should like very briefly, perhaps for not more than two minutes, to talk about the bill. May I, too, congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) on his iniative, his concern and his thoughtfulness in bringing forward this kind of bill. I have only one reservation: I do not know if the bill will do any good, but I agree with the hon. member from the NDP who said that it cannot do any harm. That is my only reservation. If the hon. member is to speak before the debate closes, he might touch on this point.

I wonder if a week is long enough. I am sure the hon. member would not find it difficult to persuade members on this side of the House to extend the period to one month, or to take in the whole of 1971.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to speak briefly on Bill C-25 now before the House. Our group does not intend to talk-out the bill. However, I wish to make a few remarks in connection with it. The bill is entitled "An act respecting Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week". I have not yet made up my mind whether the title of "National Environment Week" suggested by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) is better than the present title. Personally, I believe there is a need to make the public of Canada aware, by any means available, of the pollution problems facing us. I think the House generally ought to endorse such an objective.

As I say, we endorse the principle of the bill. I for one feel it is an excellent idea that one week be set aside as national pollution awareness week. If the legislation were passed, I am certain we should find a number of schools, organizations and individuals concentrating upon the major environmental problems which face us. Perhaps that would give school students and individuals in various organizations throughout Canada a chance to learn a little more about the serious difficulties that mankind and the Canadian environment face. I therefore feel that either a national environment week or a Canadian national pollution awareness week would be of benefit in educating our people about our pollution difficulties.

One or two small matters worry me about bills of this kind. I want to make it crystal clear that bills such as this can do some good. But it is amazing that amendments moved by members on this side of the House, which could have done as much good as this bill or even better, have not been accepted. What has happened, Mr. Speaker? We on this side have not heard one word of support from members on the government side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harding: Time and time again we have made suggestions which if accepted would have tightened legislation dealing with pollution. It is time for backbenchers on the Liberal side of the House to realize that all groups can assist in bringing forward good legislation.

Mr. McGrath: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harding: I see that I have ample time for speaking, Mr. Speaker. May I point out two or three things which have happened in the control of pollution in Canada.

An hon. Member: Don't kill the bill.

Mr. Harding: This bill deals with pollution. Little more than six months ago we passed the Canada Water Act. At that time members of the opposition fought for national standards. We lost the fight in the committee and on the floor of the House.

An hon. Member: The hon. member is all mixed up.

Mr. Harding: No, I am not mixed up.

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Harding: What is happening now, Mr. Speaker? The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) is going from one end of Canada to the other demanding national standards, the same standards that the Conservative party, the New Democratic Party and the Créditiste party fought for only six or seven months ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harding: At that time our Liberal friends without exception voted against the principle of national standards.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Comeau: That includes the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange).

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, this is just one more example of the need for full co-operation among all groups in this field. Without doubt, before this session of Parliament ends we shall have national standards or we shall see them introduced. The minister tells us they are being drafted. Who was right? We were right and the government was wrong. The government should have been with us in the fight for national standards six or seven months ago.

An hon. Member: Don't kill the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) to observe and come within the terms of relevancy. I suggest to the hon. member who now has the floor that his remarks are somewhat outside the scope of the bill that the House is considering.

Mr. Harding: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The point I have been trying to make is this: We should be aware at all times of the need for pollution control. I think hon. members in the government party were not very much aware of it when the proposition was before the House. There is one more point I wish to make. We need to be aware of pollution problems. Any suggestion that we can allow factories to pollute our waterways if they pay effluent fees is utter nonsense. Again, we fought about this matter six or seven months ago. Hon. members of the House must be aware of problems of this type.

Although one or two more members wish to speak, I should very much like to hear the sponsor of the bill winding up the debate. We should allow him a few minutes to explain his reasons for introducing the bill. Let him make the speech he prepared in connection with his bill. I shall say no more. Although I have been somewhat critical of past actions, Mr. Speaker, I make it crystal clear that I endorse the principle of the bill. I shall vote for the bill and try to push it through the committee when it is referred to it.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to join in the debate on this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Foster: I am glad to have such wonderful applause, especially from the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). He is a very close friend and I am glad he is supporting the bill. Sometimes we do not receive the kind of support we should receive from the opposition when dealing with good legislation such as is placed before the House by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode). This bill would proclaim a Canadian national pollution awareness week. The idea is to make Canadians more aware of the problem of pollution in order that future generations shall join in undertaking special projects during that week. They would then, throughout the year, practice the objectives and ideals established during that week.

The hon. member who preceded me talked about national water standards. I spent many weeks on the resources committee which drafted the Canada Water Act. I thought it was best to have the highest standard that could be achieved in any water basin or river system, rather than establish from the centre levels of water quality throughout the country. Although "national standards" is a nice catch-phrase, it is really a façade. National standards would be very difficult to work out in practice. People would contravene the regulations because it would be impossible to have one standard throughout the country.

Last week the joint constitutional committee of the Senate and House of Commons travelled across Canada. Briefs were presented throughout British Columbia and the lower part of Alberta. These briefs dealt more with pollution control than any other topic. Many people felt this should be a constitutional responsibility of the government and not in the area of divided jurisdiction, which is the case at present. As we listened to the briefs presented, I became painfully aware that the people of western Canada are unaware of the Canada Water Act. They are not aware of the very ingenious way in which it could be used in our present situation. The federal and provincial governments can delegate control of pollution of our environment, waters and river basins to water management agencies. One of the first duties of Parliament and agencies charged with pollution should be to make people aware that there is a Canada Water Act. This should be done during national pollution awareness week. Canadians can demand that the federal and provincial governments establish water management agencies for each river system, and in this way pollution could be controlled.

It is important that we have local participation. This is the value of local, water management agencies. People who live near a river basin can take an active part in this committee. They are the ones concerned with pollution in the area. I would like to see four water management agencies established in the province of Ontario, one for the Ottawa river, one for the two lower lakes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. The Chair suggested to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), and he agreed, that the bill under debate is very narrow in scope. We are not considering the Canada Water Act which was passed by Parliament some months ago. I ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the bill.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to round out what a national pollution awareness week could do. It could make people in the province of Ontario aware of the need to establish water management agencies throughout the province. I suggest that there should be one agency for the Ottawa River which would involve the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the federal government. There should be one for the two lower lakes, sometimes called the dirty lakes—Lake Erie and Lake Ontario. There should also be an agency for Lake Superior and Lake Huron, which are less polluted and one for the rivers flowing into James Bay and Hudson Bay.

I realize that many hon. members wish to speak on this bill, and I do not want to be accused of speaking too long. I support the bill; it has value and if passed could do a great deal to publicize this problem.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, in the remaining ten minutes there is plenty of time to pass the bill. I am irritated by the fact that members who pretend to be great saviours with regard to pollution are opposed to everything that is presented in committee. The government is not aware of pollution; they are not aware that Canadians cannot swim in clean water and breathe clean air. The government has not put its money where its mouth is. If this bill makes the government aware of pollution, I think all hon. members should support it.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my comments it would be advisable to read the bill now under consideration since the sponsor has refused to reveal to the House the reasons which led him to introduce that bill.

Bill C-25 which reads as follows:

An Act respecting Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. This Act may be cited as the Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week.

2. Throughout Canada, in each and every year, the second week in March shall be kept and observed under the name of Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week.

I wonder if members have taken the trouble of reading this bill. It is enlightening in certain respects and this is the question, Mr. Speaker, that I want to deal with this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Would the Parliamentary Secretary permit a question? If a private member presented a bill to set up little league baseball, would the government allow that bill to pass? Surely the Parliamentary Secretary is prepared to allow this bill, setting up a national pollution awareness week, to pass.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's-East has not quite understood the reason for my rising. I must indicate now that I fully support this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Corbin: I feel however that it could undergo certain changes for the better. If one considers the text a little more, one sees that the bill aims at the promulgation, by the federal government, of a Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week.

The English version is somewhat different, Mr. Speaker, for it reads:

In French the term used is "lutte" and in English "awareness". In my opinion, those are two different things. From the beginning, there is—although the purpose of the bill might be good and noble and the bill desirable and commendable—a contradiction in the drafting of the texts. Any committee to which the bill would be referred should first take the time to clarify the matter.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The object of the bill is obviously to draw the attention of the public to an important problem. That is the aim of any proclamation that seeks to reserve a day, a week or a month of the year to publicize a product or commemorate the day a man was born or passed away.

Mr. Speaker. these interruptions rising from all sides of the House disturb me somewhat.

As I was saying, the government has decided from time to time to set aside certain days, weeks or months during the year to emphasize something, to draw public attention to a problem and call on the public to commemorate something. However, I believe the government's objective is also to call the publics' attention to its concern with such matters, which is very important.

I think we cannot say now that the government is not interested in anything regarding environmental pollution and conservation. In fact, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry repeatedly demonstrated his concern in this field. This problem has been brought to our attention and we all recognize its urgency.

An hon. Member: Wrong!

Mr. Corbin: I dare say it is the chief concern of all nations today as evidenced by the many conferences being held on this matter. Every year, or every other year, these conferences grow in universality and in importance and even the United Nations are much concerned with the problems of environmental pollution and conservation.

Pollution affects water, air, the earth and forests and I believe the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) has tried to deal with the over-all pollution of our various environments.

With more time at my disposal, I could make a list of the efforts made at all levels of governments, provincial or municipal, and in other countries to fight pollution.

As I said, along with other members from all parties, this is a good bill. Some of us suggested that it would not make a great difference if we did not pass it. Of course, this is a matter of opinion.

The measure is desirable but I must say that in people's minds it would not add much, I think, to the seriousness of the problem affecting us all.

An hon. Member: Two minutes.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I raise this point before five o'clock to ask whether the House would give unanimous consent for us to sit beyond five o'clock for half an hour or so in order that the Parliamentary Secretary may complete his speech, and that the hon. member from Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) may make his comments and thus conclude the debate. I am sure that we on this side would give our consent to such a proposition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, before going on with my remarks, I should like sincerely to thank my colleagues for this opportunity to analyze thoroughly certain ideas related to the bill before us. I was afraid I would not have enough time to keep on with my remarks.

I was just saying that the bill would not change much in people's minds as to the seriousness of the pollution problem.

On the other hand, it could be that some people who have remained indifferent up to now will react as the result of a vigorous advertising campaign, that would put right under their noses the fact that the second week in March will be National Pollution Awareness Week.

They may hear such a proclamation over the radio, upon getting up in the morning. They may make a special effort in their personal life to contribute in their own way, to the fight against pollution.

That is possible but such a proclamation would not make things very different, I think. It is, nevertheless interesting to recall the general unconcern shown by the public as to the quality of the environment until the press took hold of the problem, first as sensational news and then gradually to deal with it as a permanent problem in our society.

As for the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, he objects to the second week in March being chosen. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that we had no occasion to hear the hon. member explain why.

I for one see no objection to it. For the hon. member, the second week in March heralds the end of the winter and the coming of spring. However, because of the piling up of waste, decay and debris almost everywhere, especially along the roads, this would have been a fine opportunity to call the public's attention to pollution.

On the other hand, the first or second week in September might have been the appropriate time of the year to make people aware of pollution. During the first or second week in September, students usually go back to school, and God knows how much waste holiday-makers leave behind them.

Finally, this is a matter of personal opinion, and if the government decides to proclaim such a week, it may, at its discretion, set aside the week it deems appropriate.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Speaker, I note that this bill should normally be referred to the National Resources and Public Works Committee. This committee is probably a remain of the previous committee system, when no special committee on pollution existed. However, Mr. Speaker, a special committee is today responsible for studying the various effects of pollution on our environment, and it is ably chaired by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson), now in the house.

• (5:00 p.m.)

In my opinion, the bill should be sent to that committee and not to the Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the Special Committee on Pollution are already experts and take a real and personal interest in all questions relating to pollution.

It is interesting to note the great number of members who have taken the floor briefly this afternoon to support this bill. This indicates the major concern of all Canadians with regard to this problem which is getting worse everyday. We have yet to grasp the seriousness and implications of this evil. The NDP members have stated that this measure entailed no special harm nor good. They are sitting on the fence. You must be either for or against a measure and I would have liked them to state more precisely their position on this subject.

The opposition members have also expressed some interest in this bill. However, their speeches have been quite brief. It would have been interesting to hear them elaborate on this program.

However, hon. members should not forget that such a bill, if it is passed, will forcibly entail advertising expenses if we want its proclamation to have any effect. Sustained publicity in newspapers, weeklies and dailies, in magazines, on radio and on television, will be necessary. Much literature will have to be distributed throughout the country and particularly in the schools. It should be aimed mainly at the young generation.

I referred to schoolboys and schoolgirls, Mr. Speaker, but I could also talk about junior college and university students, young men and young women who make up a generation which more than any other in the history of the world is aware of the very serious threat of pollution.

[English]

In conclusion, I would say that if the people are not now aware of the stench, filth and noise lying around them, then God help them: they need new eyes, noses and ears. I do not think that a particular week set aside to make the public more aware of this problem will make very much difference in the long run. However, as I have said, I do not oppose the bill. For one thing, it will provide another good occasion for all members of the House to let the country know their personal feelings in regard to our efforts to abate pollution.

What the bill is probably trying to promote—at least, this was suggested by one hon. member—is the need for greater consciousness of improvement of our environment. I lay the emphasis on the word "improvement"— improvement of the environment, not so much awareness of pollution.

We have plenty of pollution as it is; we should concentrate our efforts in the field of cleaning up the pollution. In this sense I think we should develop more publicity so that each individual man, woman and child will put a personal effort into cleaning up first of all, the immediate municipalities in which they live and then the whole world.

Mr. John Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in suggesting we extend our time for half an hour my colleague was concerned about the fact that many members of this House wish to refer to pollution problems in their areas. It seems that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) believes that in one week we can do something about pollution because of an awareness of it.

I should like to say in about two minutes that it is clear every municipal council in Canada is aware of the pollution problems in their areas. They are aware of pollution in streams and lakes. This is manifested by the fact that they have asked the federal government for assistance to construct sewage disposal plants. Most of these requests have been rejected. We are aware that these municipalities have had little or no co-operation from the federal government in their plans to clean up rivers and lakes. We are also aware that our young people have been encouraged to participate in various anti-pollution programs. I suggest they could work more efficiently on a program to clean up the banks of the rivers in our country. We are aware that the many anti-pollution programs underway in our country require assistance.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta suggests that in one week we can make everyone aware of the fact that we should do something about pollution. I suggest that in the last year we tried to persuade the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to agree to setting aside one day to be known as survival day. In a very flippant way he suggested this might mean another holiday for the entire nation. Does the hon. member think that because he has brought in a bill we can in one week do much in respect of anti-pollution across Canada and that this will mean something specific to the nation? If he thinks this bill will make people more aware of what can be done in respect of pollution, I wish him well.

I am sure people throughout this nation will find it ironic that it was left to a Liberal backbencher to bring in such a bill, that member being a supporter of a government which should do something to rectify the problems we face. There is an awareness to the problems of pollution. I am sure that what is required is a little initiative and concern on the part of the government. Perhaps in this way we could rectify the situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must advise hon. members that if the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Make it good.

Mr. Goode: This being Friday afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I know that hon. members would like to get back to their families, so I will not speak at length. I thank hon. members opposite and those of my own party for co-operating with me in respect of this measure. I am sure the House is unanimous in its concern for the environment of Canada. As a final comment I would say that I have no objection to the title of the bill being changed to read "National Environment Week". When it is referred to the committee, gi will enjoy working with my friends on this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In accordance with the order made earlier by unanimous consent, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock Monday afternoon.

At 5.13 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PUBLIC SERVICE

OBSERVANCE OF PRINCIPLE OF NON-DISCRIMINATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It arises out of the uncertainty and uneasiness caused by the statement circulated in the mass media that the government has adopted an employment policy that violates the principle of non-discrimination which parliament has enshrined in several statutes including the Public Service Employment Act, the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act and the Canadian Bill of Rights.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be instructed to inquire into the administration of the Public Service Employment Act, the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act and the employment practices of the Treasury Board with particular reference to the observance of the principle of non-discrimination.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed to the House by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre. This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not consent the motion cannot be put at this time.

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, I want it to be on the record that members on the government side have refused to give leave for this motion—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is obviously not a point of order. It is a point of debate. The hon. member knows that as well as I do, and I would suggest to him that he should not receive the floor on that basis.

• (2:10 p.m.)

SPECIAL RECRUITMENT OF FRANCOPHONES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also ask leave to move a motion under Standing Order 43. May I inform Your Honour forthwith that the subject matter is in the same area as the motion first proposed, but because I have worded the motion differently, and since I believe the government itself might like to have the matter cleared up, I hopefully ask that I be given unanimous consent to move the motion which I have drafted. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather):

That the report of the circulation of a memorandum entitled "Special Recruitment of Francophones in the Public Service" be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates—

I interrupt my reading of the motion to point out that that is the committee to which Public Service matters go.

—so that the said committee may investigate the whole matter and make sure that no steps are contemplated that would interfere with strict adherence to the merit principle in the recruitment and promotion policies of the Public Service.

I hope the House will give its consent so that this matter can be cleared up.

Mr. Speaker: I have before me a copy of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In this instance also the motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and therefore requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have noticed there is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

2 and 3. The rate of normal tax which applied at that time to individuals was 4 per cent on the amount of income over $1,500 in the case of unmarried persons or of widows or widowers without dependent children, or over $3,000 in the case of all other persons. (Exemptions were lowered in 1918 to $1,000 single and $2,000 married.) Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The strontium-90 level in Canada, as measured by its level in milk, was as follows:

FEDERAL GRANT TO NATIONAL CANCER INSTITUTE

Question No. 618—Mr. Thomson:

1. Has the grant to the National Cancer Institute been reduced and, if so, for what reason?
2. What are the government's plans for this grant this coming year?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes, federal assistance from the National Health Grant to the National Cancer Institute was reduced from $350,000 for the fiscal year 1969-70 to $250,000 in 1970-71. The National Health Grant is intended to support short-term projects (applied research, demonstration and training) designed to stimulate and develop improvements in health services. Support for individual projects normally does not exceed a period of three years. This grant is not intended to provide annual blocks of funds in support of continuing activities.

2. The "block grant" to the National Cancer Institute from the National Health Grant will be further reduced in 1971-72 for the reason stated above. However, the N.C.I. or research investigators supported by N.C.I. may submit applications for support on a project basis under the National Health Grant, the Public Health Research Grant, or to the Medical Research Council. Thus, the reduction in assistance from the National Health Grant need not represent a reduction in the level of government fund available for cancer research, but rather reflects a shift from the "block grant" approach to the "specific project" approach.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT RESEARCH CENTRE—COMPOSITION OF BOARD

Question No. 620—Mr. Godin:

Is the Board of the International Development Research Centre composed of ten English speaking Canadian members, ten foreigners and only one French Canadian member and, if so, is it the intention of the government to appoint other French Canadian members to the Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Board of Governors of the International Development Research Centre is composed of a Chairman, The Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, the President of the Centre, Dr. W. David Hopper, and 19 other Governors. In accordance with the provisions of the International Development Research Centre Act, the Chairman, Vice-Chairman and nine other Governors must be Canadian citizens. Two of the Canadian Governors, Dr. Louis Berlinguet and Mr. Paul Gérin-Lajoie, are French-speaking Canadians. Dr. Berlinguet is both Vice-Chairman of the Board of Governors and Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Board.

The present 21 Governors is the maximum number of Governors provided under the IDRC Act and, therefore, no additional appointments are contemplated at the present time. However, the terms of several of the present Governors are of two years duration. It will be possible, therefore, to appoint a larger number of French-speaking Canadians to the Board in 1972.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister relating to the program the federal government is now organizing to provide $2 million for the purpose of hiring unemployed Francophone university and college graduates this year. I should like to ask him whether there is any justification for the government keeping this program secret from the Public Service Alliance, Parliament and the people of Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was not the intention to keep this program secret. Indeed, in answer to the question I should like to table a copy of a statement made today by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, dealing with this question.

An hon. Member: Why didn't he make it in the House?

Mr. Diefenbaker: He should have made it in the House. He is running away today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course the Acting Prime Minister can only table the document with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, since the Acting Prime Minister says it was not intended that this program be kept secret, can he give the House some explanation of why the document circulated by the Public Service Commission of Canada contained the note: "This information is confidential and no official announcement will be made"? Has the Acting Prime Minister any explanation to give in that regard?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I believe that an explanation can be given and I suggest that when the President of the Treasury Board is here tomorrow these questions should be directed to him. The reason he made a statement to the press is that the press had been asking him questions and he felt, therefore, that he should not delay his answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He has run away from the House.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether it is now the policy of the government of Canada to develop employment projects in the Public Service designed to assist specific language groups and, if so, where the parliamentary authorization exists for such projects?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think the answer given publicly by the President of the Treasury Board, which my hon. friend apparently does not want to see, does deal with some of these questions.

An hon. Member: It does not deal with it.

Mr. Sharp: I suggest that questions can be put quite properly tomorrow and that the delay will not make any difference.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Egmont is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I suggest to Your Honour, Sir, and to hon. members that the House is now in danger of establishing a very unhealthy precedent in view of the fact that this important question has come to light and that ministers of the government feel they are not able to express themselves other than on days when they are supposed to be in the House under an informal system which has in no way been recognized by Your Honour or members of this House. Therefore I think the answers of the Acting Prime Minister must be considered most inappropriate and unparliamentary, and that hon. members have the right to hear now from the President of the Treasury Board rather than being asked to wait for 24 hours during which time the misister is free to make whatever statement he wants, whenever he wants, to the public at large.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MEMORANDUM, "SPECIAL RECRUITMENT OF FRANCOPHONES IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE"

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he will table a copy of the memorandum entitled "Special recruitment of Francophones in the Public Service" in order that we may have it before us officially?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to do that.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—SOURCE OF FUNDS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, as approximately $2 million is involved in this program, will the Acting Prime Minister advise the House from what vote that money is being taken?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this amount of money relates to next year and has not yet been allocated to any specific program. It is not a fund; rather it is an estimate of the staffing costs of departmental proposals to increase Francophone recruitment.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—CONCEALMENT OF EXPENDITURES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I return to the questions intitially asked by the Leader of the Opposition. I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he has discussed this matter with the President of the Treasury Board and what explanation there is for the fact that the President of the Treasury Board denied flatly the existence of the program when confronted with the confidential memo? Is it now possible for $2 million to be expended without the President of the Treasury Board knowing anything about it? At the same time, when the minister is giving his answer, will he let the House know whether there are some orders and directions for expenditure that have been made since the first day of March, 1970, which have not yet been made public or indeed have been kept secret?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The right hon. gentleman, having been the head of a government and having been in this Parliament longer than anyone else, certainly knows that the government would not be promising to spend any money that had not been approved by parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: The so-called secret plan referred to in the press is actually a study being carried out by officials with a view to further progress toward the goal of greater Francophone recruitment by determining how additional Francophones might be brought into the service and meaningfully employed within departmental programs. Knowing the right hon. gentleman's interest in the subject, I am quite sure he would approve.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman's evasiveness has become so characteristic as not to arouse any surprise. Now I ask him whether or not he will answer the question I asked, whether, during the period since March 1, there has been concealment of expenditures by the government of Canada? I particularly direct his attention to the fact that a memo providing for the expenditure of $190,000 for the answering of letters in respect of the white paper on taxation was concealed from parliament and it has not yet been made public.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Sharp: Quite clearly no money can be expended out of next year's estimates until they have been approved by parliament, and I hardly need to give any undertaking that if any of these plans do go through they will be brought before parliament for approval.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—OFFER TO TABLE MEMORANDUM—RECONCILIATION WITH STATEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the House of Commons will be given a reconciliation between the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board in which he denied the existence of the program and the fact that today the Acting Prime Minister offers to table a copy of the memorandum?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I understand that the chairman of the Public Service Commission may also be making a statement today because it is most desirable that this situation be clarified. It seems to have been based on some misunderstanding.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some falsification by the government.

Mr. Sharp: Certainly there was never any intention on the part of anyone concerned to conceal anything from parliament or from anyone else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the statement of the Acting Prime Minister that the government would like to see this matter cleared up, would the government like to reconsider its position with regard to the motion I made today under Standing Order 43 and let the matter be referred to a committee of the House?

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—ACTION TO STIMULATE ECONOMY GENERALLY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government is prepared to adopt a program designed to stimulate the economy so that it would be unnecessary to offer special projects for particular groups?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think there is some misunderstanding involved here. The program that has been under study is not directly related to the question of unemployment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No?

Mr. Sharp: It is related more to the desire of the government, which I am sure is shared by the opposition, that the balance between Francophone and Anglophone people within the Public Service should be restored to something more representative of the population.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Acting Prime Minister has given some study to this matter. Has he read the statement by the Public Service Alliance and the words of Mr. Edwards, "we would like to know how long this $2 million slush fund has been earmarked?" Also, I would ask the minister to advise when this plan was first arrived at, and can he give an explanation as to why the President of the Treasury Board on Saturday denied the existence of something that he admits today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman obviously is reiterating a question which was asked a moment ago.

ACQUISITION OF CROWN CORPORATIONS—MAJORITY GOVERNMENT INTEREST

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and arises out of a statement he made to the press last Friday concerning the proposed Canada Development Corporation. In view of the fact that according to his statement the government proposes to turn over Crown corporations valued at between $300 million and $400 million to this new body, can the minister give the House assurance that these government enterprises will continue to be owned by all the people of Canada and controlled by the government of Canada free, of course, from any day to day political interference as they are now?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the proposal involved is that the Canada Development Corporation could consider purchasing these corporations from the government of Canada. The legislation, of which I believe my hon. friend now has a copy, provides for consideration of such action in the future by the Canada Development Corporation if and when it is established by this Parliament, in which case legislative action by Parliament would be required before the corporations were turned over to the Canada Development Corporation.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): From the statement the minister made last Friday I judge that the capitalization is to be $1 billion. May I take from his statement that the government will have a majority interest on the basis of both the $250 million which is to be invested and the securities which it will receive in exchange for the Crown corporations?

Mr. Benson: Actually the capitalization is $2 billion, if my friend will look at the statement. The proposal is that in the initial period the government will own all the shares of the Canada Development Corporation. The proposal for investment of $250 million, which is put forward in the legislation, is quite apart from Crown corporations to be turned over for equity, if this is decided by Parliament, in addition to the government investing $100 million in equity in the first year and $75 million in equity in each of the two following years for a total of $250 million, with power provided in the legislation for lending up to an amount of $100 million in addition to the Canada Development Corporation.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That is the main point I was asking about. Does the government envisage, at whatever time it decides to sell shares in the proposed corporation, that the government itself will maintain a majority equity position vis-à-vis the Canada Development Corporation?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to analyse the whole of the legislation at this point, but it is indicated that for quite some time the government will have all the shares in the Canada Development Corporation. Ultimately shares will be offered for purchase. I think my friend will find that the legislation provides that only Canadians may own these shares, that no Canadian may own more than 3 per cent, and that the government's ownership in the over-all corporation ultimately could not be reduced to a point below 10 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West, but I think I should caution the House that we should not have a debate on an item which is now before the House. To some extent we would be anticipating an order of the day. However, I recognize that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has asked pertinent questions, and the hon. member for Edmonton West should have the same privilege.

Inquiries of the Ministry

RELATIONSHIP OF LEGISLATION TO REPORT ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister say that the theme, shall we say, of this legislation, the maintenance of strong Canadian control of companies in the private sector, is a reflection of the report that will be brought forward by the Minister of National Revenue with regard to foreign ownership in Canada? Is this the vehicle that the government of Canada will choose in order to implement whatever recommendations the minister will make in his report?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not at all, Mr. Speaker. I think this legislation stands on its own and will provide an opportunity for the development of Canada, with an opportunity for Canadians to participate in the ownership and development of the resources of Canada.

QUEBEC—FIGHT AGAINST ORGANIZED CRIME

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

Has he received from his opposite number for Quebec, Mr. Choquette, a request for federal government legislation or powers enabling him to effectively combat the Mafia in the province of Quebec?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Not as far as I know, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Laprise: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

In view of the increase of organized crime in Quebec, does the Minister of Justice intend to take action to ensure that the Criminal Code is enforced as it should be?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The Criminal Code is a well-known document, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF ARMS BY FRANCE TO SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of reported large new sales of French arms and equipment to South Africa, can the Acting Prime Minister advise if the government of Canada has expressed or will express to the government of France its concern about arms sales to an area which the Prime Minister the other day described as a potential Viet Nam?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already expressed in this House and in the United Nations, and I do so again, our opposition to the sale of arms to South Africa, which is in accordance with the resolution of the Security Council on this question. We are urging all countries, without exception, to comply with that resolution.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I have read some of the debates at the United Nations. However, can the minister advise if by letter or personal representation the government has expressed its view to France on this very serious matter?

Mr. Sharp: No, I do not think there has been any occasion, Mr. Speaker. The only country to which we have made any representations is a fellow member of the Commonwealth and, as the House well knows, we made those representations of the basis of trying to avoid a rupture in the Commonwealth. I am sure my hon. friend agrees with that. That is the only occasion and the only country to which we have made representations of that kind.

USE BY FRENCH TROOPS OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES FACILITIES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he is now in a position to advise the House on negotiations between Canada and France with respect to the use of Canadian Armed Forces facilities by French troops during the coming summer months?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take that question as notice.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, this question has been asked several times in the House and we continue to get the same reply. As a supplementary I ask the Acting Prime Minister to take seriously his undertaking to investigate the matter so that the House may have some indication of the relationship between Canada and France with respect to armed forces training.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S SHARE OF WELFARE COSTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the great increases in the costs of welfare being borne by the provinces and the municipalities as a result of the high unemployment existing in the country, is the federal government giving consideration to increasing its share of the cost of welfare that it bears?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, all I can advise the hon. member at this time is that should there be any change in the sharing formula under the Canada Assistance Plan it will be announced as a matter of policy in the House.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT INTENTION FOLLOWING MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, immediately at the conclusion of his meeting with the welfare ministers from the provinces will the minister make a statement in the House announcing the government's intention with respect to the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, although the deliberations at the welfare ministers' conference will probably not be open to the public on a day to day basis, as I indicated previously, there will be opening statements given by the ministers and there will be a closing statement. Therefore the House and the people of Canada will be well aware of the deliberations. But I reiterate that so far as any change in the cost-sharing arrangements under the Canada Assistance Plan is concerned, if indeed there should be such a change, that would be a decision of the federal government that would be announced in the House as a matter of policy.

ABILITY OF PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES TO PROVIDE WELFARE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, is the minister in a position to assure the House that the provinces and the municipalities are able to provide welfare for those who need it, in view of the very alarming increase in the amount of unemployment in this country and the consequential extraordinary rise in the welfare budget requirements of the municipalities and the provinces? Is the minister in a position to assure the House that those responsible for administering these programs in the field are in fact meeting the need and able to meet the need?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, if there were an incapacity on the part of the provinces and some municipalities to meet the need and the provinces therefore requested reconsideration of this matter, I am sure the government would be pleased to do so.

MANPOWER

RETRAINING PROGRAM—NUMBER OF APPLICANTS NOT ACCEPTED UNDER PRESENT REGULATIONS—SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Last week I asked him whether or not, in view of the large numbers of unemployed people who are unable to make use of the present manpower programs, he could indicate to the House the exact number of those who have applied for retraining or training under the programs but because of the regulations were not able to make use of this opportunity, and he indicated he would be prepared shortly to make a statement. Is he now in a position to indicate to the House in short form the exact numbers in this situation, and whether or not the government is prepared to make any changes in the present regulations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, following our exchange a day or so ago in the House I did make inquiries. I do not yet have a report on whether there are any meaningful figures available.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the increasing concern with respect to the numbers of students who will be unemployed during the coming summer, will the minister shortly be able to indicate to the House the kind of programs that will be operating, in view of the difficulties with last year's program for unemployed students?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as soon as a decision is taken it will be made known, but I cannot put a precise date on when that may be.

GRAIN

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—REQUEST FOR BACKGROUND PAPERS—CONSIDERATION OF ALTERNATIVE MANITOBA PLAN

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the importance of the grain policy proposals now under consideration, would the minister consider tabling or making available to interested members the background papers and analyses of the proposals as well as any other material that elaborates on them?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will give consideration to that recommendation.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, is the minister going to hold any further meetings with the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba concerning the alternative plan suggested by him and will the minister indicate if the Manitoba minister suggested or concurred in a 12 per cent farmer contribution, as referred to by the minister last Thursday?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the House a few days ago, it is my intention to have a meeting with the Prairie Ministers of Agriculture at which time any variety of items might come up, and at which time there will be an opportunity for further discussion of any proposals the ministers might have. The question of the farmers' contribution was discussed at my earlier meeting with the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IMMIGRATION

POLICY RESPECTING IMMIGRANTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the conflict between statements by top immigration officials that our immigration laws are "patently ridiculous" as they apply to the encouragement of United States immigration and the minister's statement on the other hand that "we need more Americans in Canada because of their easy assimilation in this country," will the minister make a statement on motions clarifying the policy of the department with regard to American immigration?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate to attempt every time to clarify what the press may report about what officials may have said, especially when they do not identify the officials nor, indeed, even try to pursue the tone of a quote attributed to the minister. There may be an opportunity for the House to discuss this whole issue when the legislation with regard to the immigration appeals board is before it, or indeed perhaps at another time when a statement on immigration policy is placed before the House.

Mr. Lundrigan: Will the minister state whether direction was given to his officials to allow the statement which was made to reach the press in order to distil public feelings regarding the heavy unemployment in Canada at the present time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is not in order in those terms. The hon. member will appreciate that the question is asked in the form of an argument. I do not think it is in order in those terms. The hon. member may want to rephrase his question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Were any directions given to the departmental officials to release a statement of this nature? Also, will the minister state the exact policy of his department with respect to United States immigrants?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As far as the second question is concerned, the hon. member is reiterating the question asked in the first instance as to whether a statement will be made on motions. I do not think that the motion should be made at this time.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Will the minister inform the House by a simple yes or no as to which version is correct, the version in his speech or the version of one of his civil servants? The answer should be simply yes or no.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REPORTED AGREEMENT BETWEEN QUEBEC AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENTS ON AMENDMENT FORMULA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Are the federal government and the government of the province of Quebec in accord on the general lines of a formula for amendment of the constitution, as reported?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recognize the fact that the question is very large in scope. I wonder whether the hon. member expects a statement of this kind to be made at this time during the question period. The hon. member may inquire whether the minister proposes to make a statement in due course.

Mr. Brewin: I will rephrase my question. Is it proposed to make a statement in the House with regard to any agreement that may be reached as to the amending formula for the Canadian constitution between the federal and the provincial authorities?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I would think that any announcement on the progress of constitutional discussions would be made by the first ministers after the conference that is to be held in Ottawa on February 8 and 9.

NATIONAL DISASTERS

REQUEST THAT MUNICIPALITY OF ASBESTOS BE DECLARED A DISASTER AREA

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister.

In view of the landslide which occurred in Asbestos causing the relocation of numerous families and requiring the construction of new housing, can the minister tell the House whether he has received a request from the authorities of this community that it be declared a disaster area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but I will inquire.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PRICES AND QUOTA ESTIMATES TO FACILITATE SEEDING PLANS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In order to facilitate the spring seeding plans of western farmers, will the minister announce as soon as possible the initial prices and quota estimates for the current crop year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In the proposals tabled in the House in late October, Mr. Speaker, it was indicated that we hoped to do this prior to March 1. This remains our hope.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SPECIAL FUNDS TO ASSIST INDIANS AND MÉTIS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It arises from the fact that some funds seem to be available for special groups of people, as is evident in the report concerning Francophones. Have the minister's department and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development submitted a request to Treasury Board for special funds to be used to meet the problems of the Indians and Métis since 40 per cent to 50 per cent of these people are receiving welfare at the moment?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the question asked by the hon. member is argumentive. I doubt whether the question as asked is in order. The hon. member may want to rephrase the question in order to make it acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

Mr. Korchinski: Has the minister made a special request for funds to Treasury Board for such a requirement?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member should direct his question to either the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I think he will find that some very imaginative programs of assistance to these people have been implemented.

SPORTS

CANADA GAMES, SASKATOON—PURPOSE OF ATTENDANCE OF MINISTERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in connection with the Canadian games at Saskatoon. Will the minister inform the House whether the Prime Minister and other ministers of the Crown will be in Saskatoon at the time of the games to demonstrate their athletic prowess or is the purpose to give the people of Saskatchewan an opportunity to get the "tone" to which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration just referred? I know that the purpose will not be in any way political, but for athletic purposes only!

POLLUTION

GRANTS OR LOANS TO INDUSTRIES AND MUNICIPALITIES TO COPE WITH PROBLEM

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): My question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. On January 20 I asked the Minister of Finance whether any low-interest loans or grants would be made to industries and municipalities to aid them in cleaning up pollution. The minister stated that he was awaiting recommendations from the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Will the minister be making recommendations with respect to grants or low-interest loans to industries and municipalities in order to clean up pollution?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): A number of recommendations will definitely be made, Mr. Speaker. Some have already been submitted.

ROBERT BURNS

ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I wish to direct a question to the government House leader. Is the government aware of the fact that today is the anniversary of the birth of the world's greatest poet, Robert Burns?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are aware of that. That is why we have a Scottish Acting Prime Minister today. I hope Your Honour and all hon. members will make private arrangements to celebrate the immortal memory of Robert Burns in a fitting manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGED TRAFFICKING IN INDUSTRIAL MILK QUOTAS—ADEQUACY OF DATA SUPPLIED

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Approximately 10 days ago I raised a question of privilege with respect to certain data which I had requested concerning alleged trafficking in industrial milk quotas. The minister promised to look into the matter. I wonder whether he has been able to do so.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): We took this under consideration, Mr. Speaker, and I understood that a letter was sent to the hon. member explaining the situation to him. If that was insufficient, perhaps we ought to have more correspondence.

Mr. Nesbitt: I know the minister does not want to create a wrong impression. I suggest that he look into the efficacity of his mail service. No such letter has been received.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the question ought to be directed to the Postmaster General.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PARTICIPATION BY MINISTER IN NEWFOUNDLAND CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It is prompted by the presence of Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland in the gallery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I bring that fact to the attention of the House so the minister will be most circumspect in his answer. Will the minister reconsider whether he will attend the special economic conference planned for Newfoundland, and is the special five-year program for Newfoundland now ready for signature?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy to attend the conference in Newfoundland because the date has been changed.

As to a special program to be signed by the province of Newfoundland, I should tell the hon. member that actually this is a program which has already been announced, and I expect it will be signed within a couple of months.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: As the minister is going to be in attendance at the conference, will he use his influence to see whether the premier will permit the Members of Parliament from Newfoundland to attend?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is in the form of a representation. He has to assume that it has been heard.

SPORTS

SUMMER GAMES, BRITISH COLUMBIA—INCLUSION OF PADDLING

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I wish that I had his tan and had spent a few weeks where he has obviously been. I welcome him back to the House. Would the minister—this is a little more than a direct representation—use his good offices to correct an oversight which has permitted the dropping of paddling from next summer's games in British Columbia? I ask this having in mind, as an item of economic trivia, that there were more paddles sold in Canada last year than track shoes.

Mr. Speaker: Again I submit that this is a representation rather than a question.

POWER

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—RESPONSE BY U.S. GOVERNMENT TO REQUEST THAT AGREEMENT BE CANCELLED

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): A week ago, Mr. Speaker, two questions were put to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and were taken as notice at that time. I should like to repeat them. Could the minister tell the House what the response has been from the United States government to his request that the agreement be rescinded under which 6,000 acres of the Skagit Valley will be flooded? Would he also indicate if it is Canadian government policy not to permit the flooding of the Skagit Valley in any circumstances?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): To put the record straight, a submission has been made to Washington in writing. I have spoken with some of the responsible officials in Washington on this subject and we are now awaiting a written reply from the United States government. That is the state of this affair at the moment.

FISHERIES

SEALS—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CANADA IN QUOTA

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): My question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry—I addressed it to his Parliamentary Secretary on January 14—and it concerns the opening date of the seal hunt and whether the minister would consider eliminating the discriminatory quota system which he has announced for the killing of seals in the gulf by Canadian sealers whereas Norwegian crews are allowed twice the number?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): There are a number of statements in that question which are not correct. Basically, the seal hunt will be carried out on a sustained yield basis. Canadians will not be taking fewer seals than the Norwegians. We intend to make an announcement about the opening shortly. It will be made in close consultation with the industry itself.

Mr. Carter: Can the minister elaborate and tell the House the quota which the ships are allowed to take in the area known as the gulf and in the area known as the front?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether that question is in order. The hon. member is asking for statistical information and unless it is given in the course of a general statement I would not think a question could be accepted in those terms.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, the minister has suggested that my information is not correct, so I would think the least I could expect is a clarification of the misunderstanding.

Mr. Speaker: From the point of view of the Chair I suggest it might be expected that the minister and the hon. member should get together and clarify the matter between the two of them. At this point the discussion becomes debate, and I do not think the hon. member's supplementary question can be allowed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DISCONTINUANCE OF DINING CAR SERVICE, OTTAWA-MONTREAL

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): My question is addressed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. In view of the importance of the matter, is the department making any investigation in connection with the discontinuance of dining car service on trains 30 and 31 running between Ottawa and Montreal, which are heavily patronized?

Mr. Speaker: My recollection is that this question was asked a few days ago. I do not recall whether it was answered, but I observe that the Parliamentary Secretary has taken notice of the question.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES ON WHITE PAPER PROPOSALS—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): During the question period last Friday the Acting Prime Minister referred to a meeting between representatives of the provinces and the federal government in connection with unemployment insurance and the proposed amendments to the Act. The answer left some doubt in my mind. I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he is now meeting with his provincial counterparts concerning the white paper proposals or whether he is at the stage of discussing the draft legislation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I would not presume to discuss the draft legislation with the provinces, but we are discussing certain proposals which are contained in the white paper.

Mr. Alexander: In view of the urgency of the unemployment crisis, can the minister tell us whether he has yet received answers from all the provinces? Is it still the minister's intention to bring this legislation in by July, 1971, or is he updating his timetable in an attempt to deal with the very harsh unemployment situation?

Mr. Mackasey: We are now running ahead of schedule in connection with the timetable outlined for the preparation of the draft bill, and I see no particular reason why we should not meet the target date of July 1, 1971.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, before orders of the day are called may I ask the leader of the House whether there is to be any deviation from the program fixed for today? Is there any change in business since it was last announced? More specifically, what items are we to consider after completion of the discussion on the textiles bill?

Mr. MacEachen: I think that at the end of the debate on the textiles bill, if it were finished, we would deal with the crop insurance legislation. If that were cleared I do not think I would call the government organization bill—I think that would be the first item tomorrow. I would consult with hon. members opposite as to what we should consider for the remaining time today, if there were any.

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD ACT

ESTABLISHMENT, INQUIRIES, REPORTS AND ASSISTANCE BENEFITS FOR WORKERS

The House resumed, from Friday, January 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I am next on the list of speakers which was drawn up the other day, but I do have a few comments to make on this textile bill. I assume this is a reasonable time at which to make them.

I cannot help feeling that the government's bill to rationalize the textile industry has some good points in it. As I see it, the long term outlook for the textile industry would be better if those engaged in it were in a position to produce goods at prices which consumers were willing to pay; goods which consumers needed and wished to purchase. If we are to produce any goods in Canada they have to be produced in competition with products of the same type manufactured elsewhere. This measure provides for a reasonable degree of rationalization in the textile industry and as such we should be willing to support it. I am aware there are some manufacturers, some individuals, who will be penalized. Some people will lose their jobs and it will be awkward for them. But if we are to have a healthy industry of any kind in Canada we are bound, as I say, to produce goods and services of a type which customers will recognize as being useful, and to put them on sale at prices they are willing to pay.

I should like to make a few comments with regard to the clothing section of the textile industry. For too long, it seems to me, we have tried to shore up this industry with subsidies and so on. We have sought to produce goods—I am thinking of cotton goods—in competition with Britain and India, countries with much greater experience than ours in producing goods of this type. I have suggested before, and I suggest to the minister now, that we should concentrate on products we need in Canada. I am thinking primarily about winter wear; I am not saying we should not produce other things. Let us carry out some research in connection with winter wear. I suggest to the minister, and to those who are involved in the clothing industry, that the winter clothing we now produce in Canada is bulky, heavy, and in some cases far from warm or waterproof. It is unsatisfactory regarded from both a utility and fashion conscious point of view. In this respect, I think we can do much more than we have.

I agree that in this area we have moved part way. For example, the crew of the Manhattan were clothed in Canadian parkas. Probably we produce as good a parka for this type of activity as anyone in the market, but as one who has spent a great deal of time out in the cold in the wintertime, I say there is much room yet for improvement.

I suggest the minister encourage the textile industry, through the offices of this board, to concentrate, if you will, consciously on improving winter wear for Canadians. This is the basic reason I am speaking in this debate. I was talking to a young university student a short time ago who was complaining that the knee boots that women purchase deteriorate under the influence of salt. When a person buys a pair of boots, I think there is no reason for having to wax and polish them to keep out moisture or make them salt resistant. This should be done by the industry before the boots are sent to market. I think if we want to sell our products, we should make sure they are really good products. I just offer this as an illustration of why further improvement is required.

I have indicated that we manufacture parkas and such like, but I think we might be more conscious of the style of winter clothing. We see in our stores coats that come from Yugoslavia. I am not knocking them as coats, but why cannot our Canadian winter coats have the same style and appeal? I cannot help but feel we could do more in this regard if we had the desire. Obviously, if we want to employ more Canadians we must develop markets, and this is one area in which we could expand our market.

Canada has been waiting for twentieth century technology, and I think this is also the case with wearing apparel. It is said that the best type of clothing for wear in the Arctic is two suits of caribou skin, one worn on the fur on the inside and the other with the fur on the outside. I suggest that something more appropriate is required in this twentieth century.

A few days ago I was reading a book about the United States economic invasion of Europe. The reason this invasion has been so successful is that there was a vacuum in Europe to be filled. I suggest to the minister that if we are going to keep Canadians producing textiles in Canada, then we must produce top quality goods at reasonable prices. I suggest we should not let the United States continue to take over Canadian markets, and with them the Canadian technology that produces goods for those markets.

I am aware that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) cannot just manufacture initiative, creativity, style, or even salesmanship, but if he would pay more attention to creating the proper atmosphere in which these things can develop, the workers in the industry will respond. I should like the minister to consider this suggestion in that light.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, as a westerner, I suppose that any time questions involving tariffs and other forms of protection are brought forward in legislation, I approach the legislation in the way that a prudent man approaches a beehive because I am afraid I shall get stung. It is the consumer who pays for this kind of protection. There is no pot of money—unless it is the citizens' tax moneys—into which the government can dip to support inefficient industry, if it be inefficient. When we raise the tariff barriers or put so-called voluntary import quotas on those nations which sell to us, thus raising the price of their goods in Canada or reducing the quantity of their goods that can be sold in Canada, then the consumer pays by paying more for his shirts, more for his textiles, more for his clothing generally.

It is to this matter that I am going to address myself. I have been astounded, I must say, at the attitude to this bill of members of the official opposition party, particularly those from western Canada to whom trade is so important. There appears to be nothing in this bill that they question. The only words we have heard from the spokesman for the official opposition party are to the effect that this bill is too little and too late; that protection is good and the more protection we have, the better. I would doubt this very much. After all, the Canadian textile industry started in this valley in the 1820's, with mills going up on the several streams in the Ottawa area and in other parts of eastern Canada. It was assumed that we had to protect this infant industry with tariffs, and no doubt we did. But how old is the infant now? It is one hundred and fifty years old, and we are still called upon to protect it because it is not yet ready to compete.

I would draw the attention of hon. members to a quotation from some remarks uttered many years ago, in 1893. A convention was held by the Liberal party and a delegate by the name of Mr. Gillmor had this to say. He was speaking of industries that live behind the safe walls of protective tariff barriers.

> These industries are like the fatted calf, always sucking, and they will never get weaned. These infants are never ready to have their protective tariff taken off. You suggest a reduction of tariff to them and they look so lean and miserable that you would pity them from the bottom of your heart. But when they feel that the tariff is safe for them, they swell to enormous proportions, and display their carriages and footmen, and their eyes stick out with fatness.

Let me also draw the attention of the House to the remarks of Sir Richard Cartwright on the subject of protectionism, made about the same time as the previous remarks. I am going to place the whole quotation on Hansard because one should not make partial quotations, but I might say that I do not agree with the second half of the quotation in today's context:

> The moment you introduce the protective system you create a class whose interests are essentially different from those of the people at large, and who become the ready contributors to corruption funds, sharing with their masters the plunder which they have been enabled to take from the people.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting, nor do I have any evidence, that "slush funds" have been involved in protectionist legislation of recent years, or for that matter during previous generations; but I do draw the first part of Sir Richard Cartwright's remarks to the attention of this House. Protectionism, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, is essentially a self-defeating operation.

In what I have said so far I think I have taken what could be called a rather negative attitude toward this bill. I do not want to be negative, as I hope to show; but I do question, and I am a little dubious. Let me look briefly at the general principles contained in this bill. It provides somewhat more protection than the industry now has. The industry may ask, and may in some circumstances obtain, protection by import quotas or by high tariffs if it is threatened with damage by imports—not so much actual damage but merely threatened damage.

The positive aspect of this bill, which is welcome, is that such industries are required, when they seek this additional protection, to also submit their plans for rationalization. They must show a plan which gives satisfaction to this three-man board, and beyond that to the minister and the government, that they plan to make their industries viable. This is a welcome feature of this legislation.

In common with other spokesmen for other parties in the House, I think that this is good, positive and forward moving legislation. But, I am left with the sensation, after reading this bill, that in terms of rationalization of the textile and clothing industries, this bill will be just as effective or as ineffective as the government of the day chooses to make it.

It can be effective if the industries which are in totally uneconomic areas are encouraged to move into different areas of production in which Canadians can specialize. I have spoken rather harshly of the clothing and textile industries, which all too often in Canada have paid abominable wages under abominable conditions, yet cried for the support of the government while doing so. Although this is a feature of a part of the clothing industry, it is obvious there are great initiatives in some areas, and there must be great efficiency.

I was interested in the minister's remarks when he pointed out the increased sales of Canadian goods to the United States market. We well know that, generally speaking, the United States has an advantage with its long production lines. Generally, United States manufacturers are very efficient producers. When Canada can increase its sales to the United States market in competition with producers in that country, clearly in these areas there is initiative, enterprise and skill on the part of the Canadian producer.

The legislation enables the government to encourage and even direct industries in the textile and clothing spheres to go out of unproductive lines and into productive areas. It is to be hoped that where a plant is totally unefficient, badly mismanaged, or in such a hopeless situation that no workable plan could come forward, these plants should be led quietly to the grave.

However, while this bill offers an opportunity to the government to divert entire industries into areas of efficiency, it also, from my reading of it, leaves the way open for this or any future government to impose import quotas, raise tariffs and protect the industry in one way or another. All too frequently, these plans for improvement could be accepted on the basis of a piece of paper. If a government should not choose to force an industry to follow its improvement plan as put forward, this legislation could provide nothing more than almost continuous protection of inefficiency.

I know that at the moment we are not considering the bill clause by clause, but I feel when the committee examines this bill, it would be wise to give careful thought to assuring that every action taken by the government on the advice of this board be reported promptly to Parliament. There must be protection for the manufacturer to ensure that his trade secrets are not revealed to his competitors when this government acts upon the recommendations of this three-man board. But I do not think it sufficient that action be taken by Order in Council. I suggest each recommendation should be reported to this Parliament. In addition, there should be an obligation on these industries to provide a progress report, say, at least quarterly, so that members of this House, as well as of future Houses, are able to consider carefully whether this legislation is in fact not being misused. I bring these suggestions to the attention of hon. members.

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, this has been an interesting debate on this bill. I have followed it by listening to all the speeches, and I have heard a variety of interesting suggestions from entrepreneurs who own the factories which may be getting obsolete, from workers who are looking for jobs, as well as those interested in developing countries which have goods to sell to our markets. I have also listened to interested consumers who want to obtain goods at the best possible price.

Perhaps the most interesting speech was that of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard). His speech can be divided into two parts. In the first part, he attacked the legislation as being useless and undoubtedly extremely damaging to the textile industry. In the second part of his speech he stated the legislation was long overdue, and that the government should have introduced these measures years ago. That was an interesting reflection.

Before I move on to a consideration of the legislation, I should like to refer to a number of facts about the Canadian textile and clothing industries in order to better understand the subject of this debate. The Canadian textile and clothing industries are, generally speaking, as advanced and technically efficient as those in other countries. They are well able to compete with imports from such sources as the United States, Britain and western Europe, but such is not the case when we are dealing with imports from low cost sources such as Japan, developing countries or state-trading countries. This is because of wage rates and other cost differentials or export pricing policies prevalent in those countries. Even with the utmost rationalization, it seems highly unlikely that there would be any possibility of our industry competing with the standard type of product imported from those countries.

In addition, significant new developments are taking place in world textile technology, products and markets. These developments are marked by the use of new machinery, greatly increased demand for fashion, style and higher quality, and by a major shift from the use of natural to man-made fibres. Faced with these new developments, the Canadian prime textile industry finds itself at the crossroads in terms of investment decisions to further convert into specialized products, blends and synthetics, and thereby remain at the vanguard of world textile manufacturing.

Given the importance of the industry within the Canadian economy as a whole, as illustrated by the fact there were $3.3 billion worth of shipments, and the number of jobs at stake, being close to 200,000 in 1969, the government decided, and rightly so, in light of the industry's demonstrated capabilities that it should be afforded some kind of assistance.

When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) outlined the textile policy in the House last May, some hon. members complained that it was too little and too late. In defence of the minister I should say that this textile policy constitutes a very new and unique approach in respect of aiding a sector of Canadian industry. This is the first time a strategy has been developed for an industry sector which takes into account all considerations. These include such economic considerations as regional interests, interests of the consumer and the producer, growth areas and stability of employment. They include as well such social considerations as adjustment assistance programs for workers and such international considerations as relations with our trading partners, obligations under the general adjustment assistance program and obligations to assist developing countries. The plan also encompasses such relevant policy instruments as trade policy, industrial policy including research development, marketing, industrial development and so on. This is also the first time that close co-operation during the policy formulation stage has been maintained throughout between the federal government, industry, labour and the provinces.

Contrary to what some hon. members say, Mr. Speaker, this is not a protectionist policy. We heard from the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) about how important protection is to us or how important he alleges it is. He said we could not compete in free markets. He pointed out that a number of Canadian businessmen say, from time to time, that they see a policy of protectionism developing in the United States. They also point to the domestic policy in Japan which is highly protectionist. Some people look upon the apparent enthusiasm of the government to rush in and embrace free trade in general as an indication that they are the boy scouts of GATT.

In my judgment, on the other hand, Canada has no alternative but to accept free trade. One must recognize that of every dollar's worth of goods produced in Canada over 40 cents is in respect of goods sold abroad. In other words, nearly half the goods produced in Canada are sold abroad. In Japan, by contrast, the figure is about 10 cents of every dollar. It can be seen, therefore that proportionately our dependance on foreign trade is four times greater than that of Japan. The figure for the United States, I believe, is about 12 cents of every dollar's worth of goods produced represents goods sold abroad. When we compare the situation in other countries to the situation in Canada we realize that, far from being boy scouts in our attitude towards GATT, we are doing the only thing we can to protect our economic interest today. The allegation that Canada can or should adopt a policy of protectionism is entirely unacceptable to me.

The figures from the textile and clothing industries speak for themselves. During 1969, Canada's per capita consumption of imported clothes and textiles amounted to $28.43 U.S. That compares with $15.61 for the United Kingdom, $10.40 for the United States and $6.86 for the European economic community. So, although we have the fear expressed by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre), and a very valid one, that this policy might some day be used for protection, we can see from the figures I have put forward that we are a very long way from having policies which could in any way be alleged to be protectionist. The aim of the textile policy is to encourage the Canadian industry to become and remain internationally competitive by specializing in the more sophisticated types of fabrics and products where factors other than basic import costs, such as style, quality, fashion and delivery, are predominant.

It is true that there will be a certain measure of protection accorded to Canadian industry, but it is important to remember the two main features attached to this protection. First, it is not granted automatically in that companies will have to satisfy the Textile and Clothing Board that imports are causing or threatening serious injury and that their own plans, which will have to be prepared by them with government assistance, will in fact enable them to adjust their operations so that they will become viable. Even if these conditions are fulfilled, protection will not be automatic because the final decision continues to rest with the government. The board which is to be set up will perform only an advisory function. The second limitation on the protectionist features of the bill is that any protection accorded will be of a transitional nature and subject to review by the board.

Another feature of the textile policy is that it will facilitate the phasing out of non-viable operations by assuring workers who may be left jobless as a result of such phasing out of adjustment assistance benefits. These have already been outlined by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). Any rationalization of an industry can cause unemployment. Indeed, technological change itself causes unemployment. The hon. member for Winnipeg

North (Mr. Orlikow) suggested that the government ought to accept the responsibility for providing such assistance to all workers who are rendered redundant by government policy and by technological change. This is an extremely tall order because it would have the effect of locking the government into a position of responsibility for keeping our economy from changing. I cannot imagine how such a policy, in the long run, would be in the best interests of the Canadian people, particularly in view of the responsibility we have to maintain our standard of living and to keep foreign markets for our products.

It is a principle of welfare economics, which might perhaps be introduced into this debate, that one can test a policy by asking whether those who benefit from the policy can compensate those who suffer from the policy and still be better off. When that test is applied to the transitional assistance policy, it becomes obvious that this is a policy which involves the availability of foreign markets, and the opportunity to rationalize and make viable existing Canadian sectors of the industry. As a policy, this is properly directed to make those sectors, which are proven to be so much better off, compensate those who suffer from the change and still retain a general benefit. I commend the government for adopting the policy in this case.

I suspect there are other industries which could be dealt with in the same way. The textile and clothing industries is the place to begin. This might sound like an arbitrary statement, but undoubtedly when we look at the figures it becomes clear that the textile and clothing industries have been very badly hit. But other sectors of the economy, such as the electronics industry, the shoe industry and perhaps others, have been adversely hit also. One would hope that the experiment in respect of this policy will prove it is possible to compensate many of those who suffer from competition and technological change by rationalizing an industry and coming out better off.

The policy also provides for a strong measure of support for national and international trade promotions. Many of these support programs are already known to the hon. members of this House, such as Fashion Canada referred to by the Toronto Telegram as "all the 'Made in Canada', 'Buy Canadian' and 'Good Fashion Seal of Approval' labels packed into one".

The trade fairs and trade missions programs administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce have already met with a remarkable degree of success. The establishment of productivity centres to assist Canadian manufacturers in developing a still greater degree of efficiency has yet to be achieved but, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said last Friday, this matter is well in hand.

In conclusion, I would like to suggest that Canada can ill afford not to have a viable textile and clothing industry, and the textile policy proposed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is surely the best way proposed thus far to achieve that end. Since the present bill is an integral part of the textile policy, I would strongly urge hon. members on both sides of the House to give the bill their full support.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) is rising for the purpose of asking a question. This is in order. Will the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) accept the question from the hon. member who seeks the floor?

Mr. Kaplan: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Comeau: The hon. member talked about rationalization. Is he aware of the act that in the last nine years the textile industry has spent over $656 million in order to make its operation more viable? The industry has been rationalized and made very efficient. Does the hon. member feel that the Canadian textile industry at present is not as efficient as it should be?

Mr. Kaplan: I do not think it is so much a question of rationalization as of specialization. What the Canadian industry has to do is find the markets in which it can be internationally competitive.

Mr. Comeau: It is the government's job.

Mr. Kaplan: This industry has no natural advantage. On the contrary; we are in exactly the same position as other western countries and we are at a disadvantage compared with many low-cost countries. Nevertheless, we have succeeded in finding markets for the textile and clothing industry in which we can be internationally competitive. I see this legislation as providing a framework for permitting the industry to concentrate its resources in areas where it can find viable international markets.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan), in his intervention in this debate touched on the point that holds the greatest interest for me, namely, the question of protection for workers in the textile industry who lose their employment because of government policy. I trust that I interpret his remarks correctly when I say that he supports this aspect of the bill but that he is disturbed by the suggestion of my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), that it represents a principle that might well be extended to cover all workers. That is what brings me into this debate, even though for just a few minutes.

Far be it from me to suggest that the provisions for displaced workers set out in this bill are adequate, namely, the supplementary unemployment insurance up to a certain point and then a 50 per cent pension from age 54 to age 65, but at least these provisions are in the bill, and I commend the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) for including this kind of provision in the legislation.

We already have some other provisions of this nature, even though they have their flaws, such as the Devco preretirement leave plan—if a certain friend of ours were in the chamber, that would get him to his feet—and there are now a number of instances where it is recognized that when workers are unable to obtain jobs for reasons that flow from government policy, the state has an obligation to those people.

I would like to suggest to the hon. member for Don Valley that instead of being afraid of this, he should welcome it, and that as a member from that side of the House he should push for it to be carried as far as possible. Indeed, I think that what is being admitted in the incorporation of this principle into the legislation is that there are times when people, workers in this case, have the right to live without that right being dependent upon their ability to get a non-existent job. I firmly believe that that is a principle which one of these days will have to be part of our whole social and economic structure. In fact, I suggest that the persistence of unemployment at this very time should make all of us do some hard thinking in this area.

Hon. members know that some of us are strong advocates of a guaranteed annual income. I know that the more this phrase gets kicked around, the more definitions surround it. I certainly do not mean by a guaranteed annual income the kind of incremental addition that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has in mind. I have in mind rather something in the nature of a demogrant. But I think that as unemployment persists, as automation and cybernation come along, and as the number of people who are required to produce the goods and services that make possible our standard of living decreases, we are going to have to divorce the right to live decently and in dignity from the question as to whether or not one can get a job. Welfare measures will not do it, a guaranteed income supplement that brings people up to a certain level of poverty will not do it either—it still keeps them poor. The fact of the matter is that government policy comes into this picture, but so will government policy come into the picture of our whole economy, and whether or not people can get jobs in the textile industry, or the automobile industry, or the boot and shoe industry or as PhD's in our universities, depends on government or social policy. I do not think it is civilized, just or intelligent that many ordinary people, running into hundreds of thousands, should have to suffer the stigma of unemployment and poverty because they cannot get jobs that do not exist.

The hon. member for Don Valley is worried about the government being locked into certain policies. I think this is true so long as this business of guaranteeing incomes is limited to various groups, categories or pockets. But I think that if Parliament could get to the place where we would guarantee to all of our people the right to live and an income to make it possible, the government would have even greater freedom with its policies so far as industry is concerned.

Therefore, I wholeheartedly support the statement made the other day on our behalf by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I am glad we have the TAB program, the SUB program, the Devco pre-retirement plan, and now this plan for pensions at 54 for workers who are displaced in the textile industry. You know, Mr. Speaker, it took us a long time to persuade the government to bring the old age pension entitlement age down from 70 to 65 years. Maybe we are going to have to bring it down to 60 or to 55 years. We have read about this in our studies of the economy, and of automation and cybernation. Let us face up to the fact and admit that in the year 2000 we are not going to have the kind of society in which it will still be necessary for people to get a non-existent job in order to have their rights as first class citizens.

Far be it for me to suggest that there is anything perfect about this plan that has been introduced. It is too inadequate. It is grafted on to a system in connection with which the government has not accepted its responsibility for full employment. But it does have the earmarks of the right approach when it provides that workers who lose their jobs because of government policy still have the right to live. Therefore, I welcome that part of the bill, and I hope that members like the hon. member for Don Valley, who belongs to a party which talks about a guaranteed annual income at its federal policy conferences, as well as at its provincial conferences, will not get locked into the kind of statement he made today but realize that this is the picture of the future—a guaranteed income to our people, to our workers, to our families regardless of whether they are able to get jobs, particularly when those jobs don't exist. Let us work hard at achieving full employment, but let us be honest enough to admit that the pattern is changing and that we are going to have to establish the right of all our people to life, and that right does not mean anything unless it carries with it sufficient income to live in dignity.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) apparently wishes to ask a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) before he resumes his seat.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Delighted.

Mr. Kaplan: When the hon. member referred to the risk of poverty which one faces when one becomes unemployed because of technological advance or government policy, he completely overlooked and made no reference in his remarks whatsoever to the unemployment insurance program, or to the fact that the government is greatly improving that program.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. member wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Kaplan: Does he not recognize that unemployment insurance, which exists and which is being improved, is the answer, or a great part of the answer, to the problem to which, he said, there was no answer?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder if the hon. member is aware of the fact that unemployment insurance covers a person only for a temporary period, and that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) admitted the other day, in the statement he made on this bill, that that is not enough to take care of people who are displaced permanently. The very proposal before us now is one that provides when this temporary unemployment insurance runs out, if a person is over 54 years of age, he is to get a pension equal to 50 per cent of his average income over a past period of time. I suggest to the hon. member that I am fully aware of the present Unemployment Insurance Act and I am fully aware of the proposals that are in the white paper that the minister gave to us last year, but I suggest that as long as unemployment insurance is for the purpose of protecting workers for periods of temporary unemployment, that does not meet this long-range problem which I think society does have to meet.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to support this bill. My purpose in speaking is to call the attention of the House to one or two points which I do not think have been raised heretofore, with the hope that they might be explored more fully in committee.

The textile industry in this country consists of various components. Yarn is produced; it is woven into cloth, and the cloth is used to make clothing. Indeed, in the case of artificial or man-made textiles, there is an even more primary process where Canadian raw materials are made into the essential ingredients from which the artificial fibres are made. But the whole industry in Canada is integrated.

There can be no primary textile industry making yarn, or making cloth, unless that part of the industry has some opportunity of a market to which it may sell its products for conversion into clothing. Conversely, and I think history has demonstrated this, there can be no healthy clothing industry in this country unless it is able to rely upon primary suppliers located in Canada. It is this integration of the total textile industry which I think should occupy our attention, and this is a measure of the problem which is faced by the proposed new Textile and Clothing Board.

For example, Mr. Speaker, I am told that at the present time two thirds of the sweaters made from synthetic fibres sold in the Canadian market are imported, and this disproportionate situation in the market reflects itself back to the primary levels of the industry. In my constituency, we have a very modern plant producing a certain type of artificial textile fibre, but this plant is unable to achieve its maximum efficiency because it is not able to produce at maximum capacity. We have a problem of immense proportions in that we are capable in this country of developing, and indeed we have developed, the technology which is appropriate to this modern age, but because of the disorders in the market caused by imports, principally from Asian and State trading countries, we are not able to achieve in practice that efficiency of which we are capable.

Looking down the line, and we should do this, there is another and an even more grave problem. This industry, and particularly the artificial fibre industry, is one in which there are rapid developments occurring in technology. In order to take advantage of these technological developments, it will be increasingly necessary for new and substantially large investments to be made in plant and equipment. And yet, Mr. Speaker, if order is not restored to the domestic textile market it seems perfectly apparent to me that these investments will not be made, and our country will be denied the opportunity to participate in these highly sophisticated and technologically developed industries which are important to us. We hear all the time that we should be concerned about secondary processing in Canada, and one of the most frequent examples taken is the production of oil and natural gas and the petro-chemical industry. It is the products of this industry which, to some extent, form the basic raw materials of the artificial fibre industry.

So my concern about the effect of foreign imports on the ultimate consumer market extends back to a whole complex of policies which involve our capacity, using our natural resources, for the improvement of employment and the development of better technology in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I desire only to bring these matters briefly to the attention of the House so that they may be more fully investigated in committee. I think that it should satisfy people in my position to know that the concept of injury which will be applied by the new textile board in measuring the effect on imports will not be narrowly applied to the finished products with which imported products compete. It should be widely and wisely construed in order to extend to all elements of the textile industry, so that we in Canada can continue to develop an efficient and technologically advanced industry in this country.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and say a few words on the means designed to assist the Canadian textile industry which has been facing serious problems for many years.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), considering his duties and his approach to a solution of the industry's problems, has not made much headway so far. He merely provides a limping industry with a pair of crutches to enable it to drag itself a bit further.

But this alone will not hasten its pace! I do not think the textile industry—or any other industry for that matter—will start running faster because the minister foresees unemployment. In fact, he wants the government to commit itself to paying salaries to those who are laid off, out of the citizens' income, consequently, out of public funds. New taxes will therefore have to be levied in order to pay a large number of citizens who are still unemployed in our vast country, with so much remains to be done.

While the means to keep all our citizens employed could be found, we are content to pay them to do nothing; some are robbed in order to pay others. In short, means are taken further to increase the cost of living, by increasing prices. I wonder where lies the soluton to all that.

The special legislation on the income supplement to be granted to the textile workers is another crutch given to our limping national economy.

After the textile industry, it will be the footwear industry, the tobacco industry, the furniture industry and so on.

The furniture industry is dependent to a large extent on the textile industry, because it uses a great quantity of textile products for upholstering. The furniture industry as all others is on the verge of bankruptcy. Indeed, I could mention several companies which were fairly successful but had to close. The minister is aware of this.

Why is the furniture industry not as profitable as the textile industry? It is because people have no purchasing power. Now, when there is no purchasing power, industry is in jeopardy because it cannot sell its products. When the government raises taxes, increases rates of interest or leaves it to financiers to set them, higher prices follow.

Consequently, it is impossible to compete with foreign countries. It is impossible because the cost price is too high, due to the government's short view policy, which has not foreseen all these things. When new taxes are levied, prices increase as well as the cost of living, and it is more difficult to meet competition and sell our products because people have not the required purchasing power.

All our economy is off balance. It cannot be improved through partial measures. The taxation system is upside down, as well the pension plans, the interest rates, the salary rates, prices, reserves and exemptions from taxes and income taxes. In short, everything is upside down in this country.

As long as the government puts poultices on wooden legs, it will not solve any problem.

The family system, as well as those of education, companies, salaries, incomes, labour and capital are upside down. I repeat: Everything is upside down. As long as we do not attempt to find a solution, things will be the same, everything will go from bad to worse. It is not by issuing crutches to the textile industry workers aged 55 or more that we will remedy the disarray of our national economy. We are wasting time and energy by keeping on groping like that all year long, by passing laws which do not settle anything and which contribute further to mixing up all our economic, social and political activities. Therefore let us have a look, once and for all, at our whole economy, let us explore the basic reason for its over-all of balance! Subsequently we will be able to discover a general remedy, for we have that capacity provided that we want to do it, that we open our eyes and see what is going on.

Here is what appeared in the newspaper La Presse on January 23, 1971, about the textile industry:

January 1970: 80,400 jobs.

September 1970: 77,301 jobs.

Therefore, there has been a decrease of 3,000 jobs in the Canadian textile industry in 1970 (the last statistical data available are for September).

The majority of those new unemployed are Quebecers, since 60 per cent of textile workers live in Quebec.

After such a hard blow will the textile industry, the third most important industry in Quebec, find itself in a dead-end road? No, replies Mr. Frank Brady, general consultant to Dominion Textile. "The industry has everything not only to maintain itself but also to rapidly develop, provided it finds efficient tools to fight against its two greatest enemies: imports from countries (mainly Asiatic ones) with low production costs and...fashion!"

In the first case, the answer must come from the government, according to Mr. Brady, while in the second case the industry itself is involved just as much as the public.

A CAPITAL INDUSTRY

Both because of our climate and because of our comparatively high standard of living, the textile industry has advanced steadily in our country. Every Canadian buys an average of 33 lbs. textiles per year. The problem is that the Canadian textile industry, which at one time was practically the sole supplier of the domestic market, has seen its share of it go down to some 55 per cent in 1970.

This has caused not only employment difficulties but some anxiety as well. The Canadian textile industry, which is well entrenched in Quebec where it employs 56,000 workers, has a turn-over of approximately $2 billion. Eighty per cent of the industry is Canadian-owned and it enjoys a very good reputation on the domestic market.

In recent years, it has attracted new investments of some $100 million per year. Should this rate of progress continue, the industry would supply jobs for some 130,000 persons by the end of the seventies, 70,000 of them Quebecers.

WILL PROGRESS CONTINUE?

The point is whether the rate of growth will continue.

According to Mr. Brady, the textile industry is now in a better position than ten years ago for rapid expansion. It has successfully changed over from natural fibers to straightforward manufacture of synthetic fibers. Technologically, the textile industry is up-to-date. According to Mr. Brady, it can compete with any industrialized country, and without special protection.

Mr. Speaker, there are textile plants in my district and I know of one which has spent $2.5 million on new machinery. Additions were built to receive this new equipment and once all these facilities were provided at a cost of just about $3 million, they were not even put into operation for lack of outlets for any new products. This machinery is of the latest design and there was hope that new jobs would be created but the opposite occurred; indeed, apart from this expansion, other departments were forced to close because even their production cannot be sold.

These products cannot be sold because there is no purchasing power in this country. I wonder when the minister and the members of this House will get it into their heads that it is not advisable to take away from the citizens all purchasing power by collecting taxes, by charging prohibitive interest rates to industries and to individuals who apply for loans, thus letting everyone deal with this problem, as this leaves the way open to exploitation and the government tries to find palliatives like the one the minister is now proposing.

Not only do these palliatives lead nowhere, but they are going to increase the cost of living again and create injustices to other industries, for if we pay salaries to unemployed people in certain industries, we will have to do the same for other related industries, and where will we find the money? Taxes will be raised and by the same token the cost of living. What good will it do? The corrective measures which the government is applying to industry are only so many new restraints, new harassments which will bring about injustice and unrest even worse than what we are experiencing today.

The problem cannot be solved that way. Settling the problem implies leaving an adequate purchasing power with the taxpayers, and decreasing interest rates to a reasonable level so that industries may be in a productive position. If an industry borrows money at a 12 per cent interest rate, how can anyone expect it to be able to operate?

But nobody is saying a word about that, not even the Minister. There is not even one member of this House to regret it. As for the Tories, they are happy with criticizing the government. How did they propose to solve the problem?

Since the days of Confederation, this county has been run by Grits and Tories and we are now caught in an appeling state of stagnation. Because of overproduction, we subsidize western farmers out of growing grain and we penalize eastern farmers to keep them from producing milk. Even so, we are unable to distribute our affluence. The situation is the same in the textile industry. Why? Because Canadians lack the necessary buying power. Because instead of increasing their buying power we are taking some more away from them.

Lay-offs will do nothing to reinforce the taxpayers' buying power. Nor is it by paying starvation wages, by robbing some to help the others, that we will improve our economy, or give the consumer the purchasing power required to reactivate the textile industry, and other sectors of industry. On the contrary: things will go from bad to worse.

We could say many things about textiles, but what is the use of rehashing details, explanations and figures? I only wanted to tell the minister the present situation is not normal.

To my mind, the real solution to the problem is to give a compensated discount on prices. There, Mr. Speaker, is one way of pleasing the people! That is one way of reducing cost prices! If we do not know where to get the money, or want to take it where we should, the only thing to do is look at the surpluses in Canada this year. We had a surplus of over $34 billion in 1970 and the one we will have in 1971 will be even bigger. If we used it to give compensated discounts on prices to bring them down, we would lower the cost of living and we could tell the unions: We shall not grant any salary increases but we shall reduce prices by granting compensated discounts; that will increase purchasing power and ensure greater distribution of goods.

Then, we shall be in a better position to compete with other countries. At the present time, taxes prevent us from producing for export, because of the competition of other countries.

That is where action is needed, and the minister does nothing about it. Embargoes on this and that do not solve the problem either, because, if we export goods, we must also import some. To solve the problem, Canadians must be given the means required so that they can spend, make necessary purchases in order to clear our production. We shall export our true surpluses. We shall import other goods that we do not produce here, and which we require. There is a sound economy. This is what we ought to do, and this is what the minister must consider more and more. I do not want to blame the minister more than I ought to, for he is not alone in this business. In fact, there is above him, above the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and above the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), a superpower that controls the whole economy of this country. However, we must ask the minister to show enough nerve to stand up to all that and to bring Canadians the required improvements, so that our economy will be balanced, thus allowing all Canadians to live decently in their country which is full of resources.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the members of this party have already indicated their support for the bill now before the House; therefore, I do not intend to speak at length. However, there are a few points I should deal with prior to the minister closing the debate.

All hon. members of the House will recognize the difficulties facing the clothing and textile industries in Canada. To the extent that this bill does assist in resolving some of the problems, we welcome it and wish the minister all success in any programs started under this legislation. There is a complex of factors involved in dealing with this legislation and in developing policy and programs. As has been pointed out, our trade relations are involved in more than one way. We have had heavy imports of clothing and textile materials, particularly in recent years. More than one interest is directly affected since many people in Canada have an interest in increasing trade relations in many of those countries that import Canadian products. At the same time, this has posed problems for Canadian workers and producers in various areas.

In addition, we have an interest in trade relations as well, because under any rationalization program it is quite likely we shall have to turn to export markets for some goods that might be produced in Canada. I noted that the minister said the government would attempt to resolve many of the present difficulties, and I think this is the correct approach in terms of trying to come to grips with these problems.

There are policy matters that also have to be considered. We agree with the minister in his attempt to formulate policy which will liberalize trade—and I use that word with a small "l". At the same time, although we want to see trade liberalized there are domestic problems that must be taken into account. In this regard, we are particularly concerned with the employment aspect of the problems facing the clothing and textile industries.

Thus, there are conflicts in developing policy and there is a divergence of interests as well. We are concerned with the direction of government policy. The minister has indicated on many occasions that the government has to perform something of a balancing act. This is correct in the technical sense, but this balancing act comes after the basic policy framework has been established and developed. What we should like to hear from the minister at some time is something more in the nature of the basic direction of policy development rather than the details into which he goes on occasion with regard to the technical aspects of the situation. In saying that, I do not underrate the many important technical problems with which we have to deal.

I think a few words have to be said about the attitude of business and private interests in Canada. Hon. members have had it drawn to their attention in recent days that a number of representations taking violent exception to the bill now before the House have been made. The first point of objection registered by certain private interests is that it seemed the government was going to play a role in solving the problems of this industry. I suggest that this is an irresponsible attitude to take. Whatever might be said about some specific objections that may be raised, some of them valid, I suggest it is irresponsible for the private sector of the economy to take an attitude that, in effect, rules out a role for the government to play in solving our economic problems. This is a Neanderthal attitude which does no one any good in the long run.

This bill is but the first step in the development of a rationalization process for the textile industry of Canada, and it is a useful first step. It does not necessarily mean that we are going to approve what follows the bill; we shall have to judge that on the basis of government action. But an important point that needs to be stressed is that the success of the program will depend upon subsequent actions taken by the government, for which we shall hold the government responsible. The bill leaves final responsibility with the government, not with the board, and the minister underlined this point in his remarks.

The minister also outlined what seemed to be a comprehensive approach involving trade, the economy, regional problems, employment factors and assistance to workers and others when problems arise. This bill provides the framework within which a program of action can be developed, and we will be watching with interest to see what the government does in following up this program. We want a strong textile industry in this country because it has a very important role to play in terms of providing employment and needed goods for the people of this country as well as goods for export to other countries.

As I have pointed out, we have to be concerned with our external trade relations, both with respect to attempts to liberalize our trade and with regard to certain trading practices that have created problems in the past. I noted that the minister stated he intended to undertake a rationalization of tariffs, and we will be watching to see what the government does in this regard, too.

One further point I should like to stress, a point that I feel is of great importance, was also raised in the debate on Friday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). It is impossible for a program of rationalization in this or any other area to be successful when there is a high degree of unemployment in Canada or a high degree of slack in the economy. The best of programs cannot hope to be successful in solving the problems of this industry if it has to operate within this kind of framework. Thus, I presume that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) will do everything he can within the councils of the government to ensure that the government adopts more quickly than it has indicated so far, policies that bring about a change in the direction of the Canadian economy.

We are very much interested also in the program to give assistance to workers who become dislocated, something that we feel is very important. I do not intend to labour this point since it has been dealt with adequately both by the hon. member for Winnipeg North and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We approve of the principle contained in this bill; we shall have further questions to ask in committee, and we hope that a positive and concrete program will follow from this legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the chamber that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade, and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like in the first place to thank the hon. members who took part in the debate. I regret only one speech and it is that of my friend from Compton (Mr. Latulippe). I would have liked him to use that opportunity more effectively to philosophize on matters other than poultices and strait-jackets. I wish he had dwelt on the importance of taking progressive steps to solve our problems.

Since we are only human beings, I consider politics as the art of fulfilling the "possible." I do not think that all problems can be solved thanks to a single formula, whether it is purchasing power or anything else. Indeed, I think that problems are settled gradually. Moreover, quite often, the solution of a problem gives rise to two others which are sometimes just as difficult to solve. Such is life! I think that my idea of life and politics is much more realistic than the hon. member for Compton seems to imagine. History will be the judge as well as the people of Compton and Drummond.

However, this debate will have allowed us to identify important questions. The first one, raised by the hon. members for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) and South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) was about the nature of the Board itself. What are its power, its functions? What is this Board supposed to do? The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe seems to believe that the Board is going to launch a wide inquiry into textile products; such is not the case. The Board will have to pass judgments on specific, concrete cases and in a very short period of time. It will be necessary to correct that impression as soon as possible.

The hon. member for South Western Nova has wondered: Why set up a Board? Could not the government itself not take those decisions as soon as possible, immediately? What he suggests is the system we already have, and it has not worked that well; otherwise, we would not have Bill C-215. We think it would be advisable to formalize all this a little, to create machinery that will study these matters in a manner a little more open, a little more independent than up to now, on the basis of some better defined criteria.

Another series of questions will deal, at the committee stage—as far as I can judge from the debate—with the requirement of bringing concrete plans to the Board. The hon. member for South Western Nova, once again, asked himself the question. If it is merely a matter of modernization, why, he said, should the Board insist on the companies' plans being submitted? Here the hon. member for South Western Nova underestimates the importance of the adjustments to be made. If adjustments are to be made it will be absolutely necessary for the Board to know these plans and to supervise their application, otherwise it will not be possible to know whether required changes are taking place or not.

Questions were raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and the hon. member for Winnipeg-North Centre (Mr. Knowles) having to do with the assistance program. I welcomed the fact that both hon. members seemed to say this was a rather good program.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A step in the right direction.

Mr. Pepin: I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) will welcome that judgment. Both those hon. members asked the question, if it is good for the textile industry why would it not also be good for other industries which are at times in the same predicament. This is an obvious question and we thought about it seriously. During our considerations at the committee stage, I assume we will consider at some length the concept of government responsibility. It is not always easy to identify the government as being responsible for a specific change.

Let me give a rather far fetched example. If the government of Nova Scotia decided to build a road which happened to pass a mile or so away from the old road, would the government be responsible for losses suffered by those people operating gas stations on the old road which motorists would not patronize as often as they did before? Again, the concept of government responsibility is a very difficult one to assess. In attempting to define in the bill this responsibility for assistance, we decided there were three areas where this government responsibility would come into play. We have them in the bill.

Again there are divisions along philosophical lines. Hon. members of the NDP say they would immediately give full application to this principle of assistance to workers in industries damaged somehow by government action. They would implement the whole principle immediately. What will happen in respect of this measure and how it will be used in the future is very important to us on the government side. If it works well and we find that reasonable use is made of this workers' assistance program, it may be that the idea will become more or less generally accepted and applied to other cases.

Let me come now to the suggestions of the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre). Among other things, he laid some emphasis on the fact that the government of today will carry a very substantial responsibility for the success or failure of this measure. I could not agree with him more but I should like to expand a little bit on that idea. It is not only the government of the day that will be responsible for the way this bill will be used; its success depends also on the imagination, the dynamics and the interest employers will demonstrate. It is also important that the workers react to this legislation in a favourable way. I am being absolutely frank when I say that circumstances will also have a lot to do with the manner of implementation of this measure.

The hon. member, along with others, has made the point that this bill may not be implemented or used in exactly the same way under varying circumstances. There is no doubt in my mind that this is a simple truth. In difficult circumstances of unemployment, for example, the measure will be used in a slightly different way than if we had hundreds of jobs that could become obsolete. I am being very frank, as I think this is the right thing to do at this time. That is why I keep repeating that this bill provides a philosophy, a direction and creates a framework for decisions. As the hon. member suggests, its success depends on the sense of responsibility of the government, of the unions, and of the employers.

It seems to me that industry and unions are pleased with the fact that some framework is being created. I feel ill at ease when I hear people suggest that this bill is a protectionist bill, and I feel ill at ease when they say it is a very liberal bill, one that will create unemployment. In my view both positions are wrong.

Mr. McCleave: Time will tell.

Mr. Pepin: Those are exactly the words of Mr. King of Domtex "time will tell", after he read the statement of May 14. I go along with that suggestion. Success will depend upon the response of all the people involved.

Some people have asked me about the basis of selection of the members of the commission. You know them: Mr. Annis, Mr. Campbell and Mr. St. Laurent. Some have suggested that these men are not from the textile industry. I have said in reply that this was part of the deal. We did not want employers in the textile industry unions or importers to be formally represented on the Board. What were the main qualifications of the three gentlemen selected? I have stated that the most important criterion was judgment, because it seemed to me this was the most useful attribute.

I am sure we will debate these matters in detail at the committee stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE EXTENDED COVERAGE

The House resumed, from Friday, January 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Olson that Bill C-185, to amend the Crop Insurance Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken previously on this bill because I wished to read the extensive debate which took place on January 15. I believe there are one or two very valid points which have been mentioned in this debate which should be re-emphasized. As we know, this bill deals with just one modest amendment to the present Crop Insurance Act. It deals particularly with the flooding of land, cultivating and fertilizing of land, and the planting or seeding of a crop in areas where certain crop damages have occurred in recent years. My remarks shall be very brief because, as I said a moment ago, other hon. members, such as the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu), and the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), have dealt with this bill as it relates to their particular areas.

The bill is interesting, not so much because of the subject matter it deals with, but because of what it lacks. I wish to refer for a moment to the original crop insurance legislation which was introduced in 1959. It is understandable that this piece of legislation still lacks a good deal because this was the first time we had a crop insurance plan for Canadian agriculture. At that time, the problem was not knowing where to begin, where to end or what would be practical in terms of legislation. Now, however, there has been a reasonable time lapse and a number of inadequacies are apparent in this legislation.

I recall that in 1959-60 the Province of Manitoba took the initiative and introduced legislation to complement the federal legislation because that legislation was only enabling legislation and the main responsibility for effective crop insurance still lies with the provinces. Manitoba was in the forefront and other provinces followed. At that time I was rather discouraged to see Saskatchewan dragging its heels. I can recall, directly and indirectly through newspaper comments and so on, having discussions with the hon. member who was then the Premier of Saskatchewan and now the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) about the fact that Saskatchewan apparently was dragging its heels. However, I believe Saskatchewan has co-operated very well in an effort to bring in a comprehensive crop insurance scheme to meet the potential of the present federal legislation.

One of my worries, and one of the reasons I rise to speak at this time, is that in looking at the figures I find that only about 15 per cent of the people actively engaged in agriculture utilize the crop insurance plan. What is the reason? In my opinion, the reason would seem to be that the plan falls short of what it should be. It would be logical to conclude that the present crop insurance plan is inadequate for the purpose for which it was originally developed.

For a moment I should like to refer to certain recommendations made by the task force on agriculture. The recommendation reads:

> In 1975 a Federal-provincial committee should appoint an independent body to make a comprehensive evaluation of the effectiveness and efficiency of the crop insurance program and, in particular, to recommend on whether or not the current subsidy should be continued.

This is an indication that the members of the task force were concerned about the present legislation. I do not agree with the time at which they suggest such action should be taken. At another point, the report suggests the immediate discontinuance of the PFAA program. I cannot agree with this because the PFAA, since it was introduced, has filled a very great need and has been very effective in many areas in which crop insurance could not apply. I say that, for the moment, we should not consider taking any action to do away with the PFAA program until we have a more effective crop insurance program. In paying this I believe I speak on behalf of a great many farmers in western Canada. I think they would support this contention.

Further on the task force report reads:

> The equivalent of the annual subsidy paid to the PFAA program by the federal government should be allocated to the financing of the Prairie Grain Price Stabilization Program.

I cannot agree with this suggestion, either. This is another example of the present government trying to rob Peter to pay Paul. I refer to these matters because they tie into the present discussion in respect of crop insurance.

In conclusion, may I say my first reason for rising at this time to take part in the debate is to re-emphasize what I and others have said. The legislation is not being utilized to anything like its maximum potential. Because of this, I suggest that the government should set up a small representative group of key farm figures from farm organizations to immediately, not in five years as the report suggests, make a close study of the present crop insurance plan and report back to the minister or the Standing Committee on Agriculture with recommendations for a better piece of legislation.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, for years I have been interested in the aims and objectives of crop insurance. I should like to take this opportunity to speak briefly on the amendments which are before us in Bill C-185. A number of members from various parts of Canada have spoken in this debate. A number of rather interesting suggestions have been made. It is not my intention to repeat these. However, there are one or two points I wish to re-emphasize so far as crop insurance is concerned.

I might point out that the first crop insurance act was enacted in 1959 It provided for federal government financial assistance to provincial crop insurance programs, with the proviso that these programs meet certain standards. In this first act, the criterion was that production remain below 60 per cent of the average long-term production for the crop insured in that particular region. We find that a re-insurance provision whereby the province pays a premium to the federal government in return for which the federal government assumes 75 per cent of the losses incurred by the province was added in 1964. This was an incentive to other provinces to join the plan. In 1966, an amendment to the act increased this coverage to 80 per cent and thus provided the farmer with substantially better protection.

Today, the Crop Insurance Act provides, to those provinces which have instituted a crop insurance program, a guarantee which will cover losses up to 80 per cent. Assistance from the federal government comes to 50 per cent of the administration costs, plus a contribution equal to 25 per cent of the total premiums paid. This program is costing the federal administration about $5 million a year and, according to the minister, this is expected to increase to $7,500,000 within the next three years.

According to the statistics, the plan is increasingly being used by farmers throughout Canada. In 1968-69 some 64,376 farmers purchased crop insurance coverage totalling almost $175 million. The premiums paid for crop insurance came to just over $13 million, and the claims against the various plans totalled over $15 million. Again according to the minister, the plan is actuarily sound, and to date for every dollar paid into the program by the farmers, the federal government, and in some cases the provincial governments, 97 cents have been paid out in indemnities to those farmers suffering crop losses. I believe this indicates that the vast majority of the money in the plan is actually going to the farmers who need it.

We find that eight out of ten provinces have crop insurance programs. I understand that only Newfoundland and New Brunswick are not participating. The province of Manitoba, which was the first province to introduce a program for crop insurance, still has the largest number of farmers taking advantage of the plan. Last year some 14,200 farmers in Manitoba took out insurance. In my own province of British Columbia, only 810 farmers took out insurance last year and the total amount of their insurance was $8 million. There is no doubt that to date only a small percentage of farmers in Canada avail themselves of this protection against crop loss.

The amending bill before us will provide for contributions to insurance programs which will cover losses of preplanting costs. This is a good amendment and will cover another major hazard in crop production. There is not doubt that very substantial costs are involved before the seed is ever planted. A long period of wet weather, for example, could prevent planting. The losses involved, of course, would be as the cost of getting the land ready for seeding, the application of fertilizer, and in some instances the loss of plants for transplanting, etc. To have these crop costs covered under the plan seems a logical extension of the act.

There is further protection to those engaged in fruit growing along the lines I have already mentioned. This aspect will prove of interest to the fruit growing areas of Canada. In my riding, particularly in the Creston district, we have a small but excellent fruit producing area. However, to date I believe very few growers have availed themselves of crop insurance.

It seems to me that one of the chief drawbacks of the programs set up by the provinces is the fact that the crop insurance rate is too high. This has been a common complaint across Canada. Perhaps rates could be reduced if there were more farmers participating in the plan. In this connection, I would urge the minister to examine the possibility of extending the coverage to other products not now covered under the act. The fact that only 64,000 farmers in Canada out of almost 500,000 have opted for crop insurance is an indication that in many cases the cost is beyond their financial means. They are prepared to take the chance of getting through the growing season without substantial loss.

Another reason farmers have not been participating in the plan is the fact that a large number of them still do not know the details of the crop insurance program. Again, I would suggest to the department that the full terms of the plan be made available to all farm organizations and farmers' groups throughout Canada. I think it is essential that they know what is available for them in the line of crop insurance, and I think this would add substantially to the number of farmers participating in the plan.

In conclusion, I would say that any review of legislation is always good, and our Department of Agriculture should review this legislation to see if some of the provisions are preventing farmers from using the plan. I, personally, feel that the legislation is needed. Let us make it as reasonable and as comprehensive as possible.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): I rise to say a few words at the conclusion of this debate. I promise the minister I will not take more than five minutes, so that we can get through in the time allotted to this debate.

I feel that not too much has been said about the application of the act to the cash crop farmers in southern Ontario, and that is why I wish to draw to the attention of the minister some parts of the act which I feel contain defects. I think now is the time to draw them to his attention so that these provisions can be improved. I agree with the two previous speakers that the program has not been put into effect as widely as was intended. Generally speaking, farmers have been somewhat leery of the program. They have felt that it has not provided the coverage that they expected. I spoke to some of the people who sell insurance in our area, and also to some of the people who are involved in cultivating in Norfolk and Haldimand counties, and these are some of the criticisms that they have had with regard to the application of the act.

One reason that perhaps the program has not been applied too widely in our area—and this is no fault of the act—is that in the last number of years we have been favoured with very few serious crop failures. For that reason alone, not too many farmers have taken insurance.

The other provision that could be corrected is that the program is limited to small grains and, latterly, to orchard crops. Tobacco is one of the prime commodities produced in our area, and the terms under which the act is administered in Ontario do not apply too well to that commodity. Tobacco is a high revenue yielding crop, but it also requires a very high input. Farmers are not able to acquire enough insurance under the plan that is now set up to be of much value to them.

Another criticism that has come to my attention relates to the insuring of the fall wheat crop. In southern Ontario, fall wheat is often harvested at a time of very high humidity not experienced in western Canada. Over the last number of years, there has been a considerable amount of sprouting in wheat before it has been harvested. Farmers who have had crop insurance have found that the value of their crop decreased from $1.50 to $1.20 per bushel because of sprouting. They have not been able to collect anything at all under the crop insurance program because the administrators of the plan argued that they had, in fact, achieved a yield above the five year average on which payment is based. But at the same time, the value of the crop to these farmers was decreased because of the sprouting which took place. These farmers will not have anything more to do with crop insurance. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that some of these minor details could be ironed out to the benefit of the farmers concerned.

Another abuse that has been taking place under the present administration of the act is that under wet conditions a farmer will put in his crop knowing full well he will not be able to harvest a proper yield. He will harvest half his crop, but apply to the commission to be compensated for the loss of the whole crop. This is a definite abuse, but I think the amendment in Bill C-185 will certainly take care of that.

The other, and perhaps more important point I wish to make is that adequate coverage is not now available to farmers in cash crop areas where there is a very high cost input. This is a point I mentioned at the outset of my remarks, and it is in this vein that I wish to conclude. One example may illustrate what I am trying to point out. The tariff insurance companies, general insurance companies, will offer a certain type of crop insurance. Again, I refer to tobacco as an example. Hail damage is one of the great hazards experienced by tobacco growers. From the tariff companies, tobacco farmers are able to buy whatever amount of insurance they wish to purchase to cover their input costs, whereas under this program as it is now set up they are able to get back only 80 per cent of the five year average. This is not adequate to cover their costs of production. Therefore, it seems to me, essential that the federal government set guidelines for the provinces to follow, to obviate some of the glaring defects that I have tried to point out.

The thing that is most needed in the area from which I come is more adequate coverage. The farmer's risk is great. Therefore, he should be covered to a far greater extent. He is able and willing to pay for more coverage because now he certainly is paying the tariff companies. In many cases, the cost is excessive. I draw these defects to the attention of the minister and his departmental officials in the hope that, when they sit down with provincial officials to re-assess the whole program of crop insurance, some of these defects may be overcome.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must point out to hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will close debate on this stage of the proceedings.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I see that there are only a few minutes left before the hour for private members' business, and perhaps if I give you notice that I shall take only a minute or two beyond that hour the House may agree not to see the clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, on rising to close the debate on second reading I wish to thank hon. members for the generally favourable comments which they have made with regard to the amendments that are proposed at this time. While there have been a number of suggestions made regarding other means of making crop insurance more useful to Canadian farmers, there seems to be general agreement with the contents of this bill and the extended coverage which it will be possible to provide in federal-provincial crop insurance agreements. Because there seems to be general agreement with the amendments proposed, I will direct my remarks to some of the other related comments made by those taking part in the debate. I did not hear any hon. member disagree with the amendments proposed in the bill. Suggestions were made during the debate that the crop insurance programs now in operation in eight provinces do not offer insurance for all crops. Mr. Speaker, the crop insurance regulations list the following insurable crops: wheat, oats, barley, rye, flax seed, corn, buckwheat, soybeans, potatoes, sugar beets, tobacco, sunflower, rapeseed, mustard, apples, pears, peaches, plums, prunes, cherries, apricots, strawberries, grapes, tomatoes, spinach, broccoli, brussels sprouts, cauliflower, cabbage, peas, beans and forage.

Any other crops for which it is desired to develop an insurance plan can be added to this list by order in council amendment of the regulations. Therefore, it is only necessary for a province to present a plan for any crop which meets the requirements of the act, and we will be prepared to include the plan under the federal-provincial agreement. The initiative, however, for including additional crops under the provincially operated crop insurance programs must come from the provinces. As I said, my officials are prepared to assist in the development of new plans and are presently doing so in the regular course of their duties. In fact, we have recently offered to assume responsibility for necessary research for all new and continuing plans.

Some hon. members indicated that they were of the opinion the cost of crop insurance was a major reason for participation not having increased more than it has. Every discussion about crop insurance starts with the observation that the growing of agricultural crops in Canada is a very, very high risk business. And, of course, it is. The reason we have a Crop Insurance Act is that it was considered the cost of such protection would be too high for farmers to carry themselves. That is why today the federal government pays 25 per cent of the necessary premiums, and 50 per cent of the administrative costs in all provinces with which agreements have been completed. It is the reason the provinces pay the other half of the administrative costs. Ontario and Quebec also contribute to the premiums.

As a result, federal contributions cover about 31 per cent of the cost of providing insurance and provincial contributions provide another 15 per cent, so that farmers are only absorbing 54 per cent of the actual costs when they pay their premiums. The average premium, including the government's share, is about 7 per cent of the coverage provided, so that farmers' premium rates generally run at about 5½ per cent. Those of us who have purchased single risk hail insurance throughout the years have paid more than this for that very limited protection.

There has also been some criticism of the amount of coverage provided, particularly for grain crops in the Prairie provinces. There has been a suggestion that the historical yield data used to determine the level of guaranteed production has not provided a realistic basis for insurance in some areas. Certainly, it seems to me that if we are to guarantee production it must be on the basis of the productive capacity of the land as indicated by yields over a period of years. The number of years experience to be used is a matter for negotiation between the federal and the provincial governments, but I might say that we are very flexible on this matter, as is evidenced by the fact that the long-term average yields used to arrive at coverage vary from five to 25 years. In Saskatchewan, a recent study by the Saskatchewan Crop Insurance Administration indicated there was very little difference in the average yields calculated on a ten year basis from those calculated on a 25 year basis, and that in fact in many areas the 25 year average was higher.

Attention was drawn to the fact that the five year period 1965-69 being used to determine coverage for fruit crops in British Columbia contained two poor years, that is, 1965 and 1969, resulting in reduced guaranteed yields. This, of course, often is a factor when a very short period of years is used. However, the period used this year will drop off 1965 and add 1970, which will reflect increased production guarantees. While the original Crop Insurance Act provided that the maximum production guarantee for any crop was 60 per cent of the long-term average yield, we introduced amendments in 1966 which increased the maximum coverage available to 80 per cent of the long-term average yields. At that time, we also provided that if a province so wished, coverage could be calculated on the basis of an individual farmer's yield history rather than on area yields.

There has been a suggestion made that increased inputs into crop production should be reflected in higher guarantees under crop insurance. This is the prime reason we raised the upper limits to 80 per cent of average yields under the 1966 amendments. It will always be necessary, of course, to keep guarantees at levels which, while adequate to cover out of pocket costs of production, do not remove incentives to produce and harvest crops efficiently.

Much has been said during this debate about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. For several years I have been receiving representations urging me to have this legislation repealed and, as has been mentioned, the task force report is very definite in this respect. However, I have taken the position that the western provinces should have time to make crop insurance available to all farmers, and for a wider variety of crops, before the act is eliminated. I appreciate very much the comments which have been made by those taking part in the debate, both for and against PFAA. I will keep these opinions in mind when a final policy decision is being made in this regard.

In closing, I wish to emphasize that the primary responsibility for crop insurance rests with the provinces. While we are supporting provincial programs in a substantial way, we have very limited authority to influence the type of programs offered. Every effort is being made to keep in close touch with provincial crop insurance agencies in order that we are constantly informed of insurance needs of farmers and to assist wherever possible in meeting those needs.

As is evidenced by the previous amendments to the act and regulations to increase federal contributions, increase coverage, make possible coverage on the basis of individual farm yields, provide reinsurance of provincial risks, to include additional crops and to provide for extended coverage for plants, trees and unseeded acreage, we are ready at any time to meet any reasonable request of the provinces to recommend changes to Parliament in order to make crop insurance a more useful factor in our struggle to stabilize farm income. The amendment contained in Bill C-185 is another step toward meeting the requests that are made from time to time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson)—Broadcasting—editing of national news on budget basis; the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise)—Industry—Maniwaki (P.Q.)—talks on possibility of granting money to Sogefor plants; the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton)—Regional Economic Expansion—control of pulp mill in Alberta.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO INSURE CITIZENS AGAINST DEMANDS FOR FULL RETURN OF OVERPAYMENTS RESULTING FROM ERRORS BY PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide that where, due to error or negligence of a public servant, a member of the public becomes indebted to the government—as by overpayment of a pension or allowance—then the government should, by insurance scheme or otherwise, assume a portion of the liability for repayment of the public funds paid out without authority by government error or negligence rather than exact, as now, full repayment from the recipient by arbitrary process of law or government decree.

He said: In all of the time that I have been privileged to serve in this House, Mr. Speaker, no other single problem has enjoyed a higher priority in my thinking and efforts than the plight of the elderly pensioners and the elderly and disabled war pensioners in our country. Even as I say this, I give full marks to the scores of other hon. members who have taken every opportunity to speak out in support of a more compassionate approach to the problems facing those who can no longer fend for themselves.

One of the failings in our approach to this problem, Mr. Speaker, is that we have tended to view the problem of old age security as something that can be legislated out of the way and forgotten about. These people are considered as units in a segment of the population that has been provided for by specific legislation. If any new problems arise as a result of the implementation of the law, these units must be treated alike, with little or no regard for the individuality of the problems. Those of us who do not have to depend on old age security for our subsistence must be constantly on guard, Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid the very human failing of assuming that because there is legislation to provide for the elderly, they must obviously be provided for the full extent and in the spirit of the law.

Experience has shown that this is not the case. In many cases, it might even be said that nothing is further from the truth. Experience has shown that the implementation of the old age security legislation has, in many cases resulted in hardship that is akin to outright inhumanity to many of the recipients of old-age security payments who have no other means of support. However well intentioned any piece of legislation might be, Mr. Speaker, there is always the danger that the intent of the law will be thwarted through the advent of human frailty or inefficiency in the implementation of the law. Therefore, it has been the custom with governments such as ours to insure that there is either implied or actual right of appeal against arbitrary decisions rendered under a particular statute.

Hardly a day passes that I do not receive letters from constituents who have been notified that the government has garnished their old age pension, veterans allowance or pension, in order to recover overpayment of benefits. In many cases I have found that the overpayments have occurred as a result of improper screening by public servants charged with administering the old age security legislation. In many cases I have found that the overpayments occurred as a result of downright inefficiency on the part of federal employees.

It does not matter whether the overpayments were the fault of the government. Present legislation provides for the government to garnishee old age pensions, veterans pensions or any other income of recipients in order to recover overpayments. This can be done, Mr. Speaker, even if it results in the withholding of the entire amount of a pension or other benefit. As the present legislation is written, there is no right of appeal by the recipient. The government minister responsible for the legislation made this clear on March 9, 1970 in his reply to a question from the member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart).

With Your Honour's indulgence, I wish to put on record a few examples of how the present old age security legislation can be made to work against the very people for whom it was written. One woman was threatened with having her guaranteed income supplement entirely cut off because she could not provide the department with the amount of her husband's income. This woman has not seen or heard from her husband for over 11 years. Two recipients, a husband and wife, received an overpayment of $70.40. A $30 deduction was made for two months and a $10.40 deduction the third month. Cases like this cause great hardship. It is taken for granted that government employees are fully qualified to look after the interests of these people who may have a lack of schooling. But they have great difficulty in dealing with the huge volume of letters they receive asking different questions, so a great many of them are set aside.

I have an instance of another overpayment, the overpayment of a widow's allowance by the Department of Veterans Affairs in the amount of $296.52 because this lady had assets and property in excess of $1,250. The allowance was in the form of a special award of $175.00 monthly after her husband's death. Another overpayment by the Department of Veterans Affairs involved an amount of $194.47 resulting from the fact that the lady in question had banked her $70 monthly allowance instead of paying her son room and board as she had agreed to do, accumulating $194.47 in excess of the maximum allowable amount. This was due to forgetfulness on her part but the allowance would not be paid again until she had given a cheque for $194.47 to the department.

It is safe to assume that every member of this House has a score of such cases on his desk and that a considerable part of the time of each of us is taken up in attempting to resolve such difficulties as these. I have no doubt that every hon. member is as interested as I am in taking whatever steps are necessary to ensure that old age security and veterans legislation lives up to the original intent of Parliament. I would be the first to say that any cases involving fraud or wilful intent to defraud should be prosecuted to the full limits of the law. However, where there is no demonstrated intent to defraud, and especially when it can be shown that the overpayment is at least partly the fault of a federal employee, then the benefit of the doubt should be given to the recipient. Also, where it can be shown that repayment would work undue hardship on the recipient, the overpayment should be forgotten as is the practice in the United States.

I urge all my colleagues in this House to support my efforts to amend present old age security legislation so as to ensure that it can be administered fairly and humanely. All will agree, I am sure, that this was the intent of the legislation. It is our responsibility to make certain that the legislation is sufficiently flexible as to enable individual cases to be dealt with on their own merits and that there is, within the body of the law, the right of appeal against arbitrary decisions. We cannot do any less, and we should not delay any longer.

Government Administration

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to the remarks of the distinguished member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott). I share his concern, as I am sure do all other members of the House, with regard to the instances of hardship he mentioned and the difficulties which have been created for citizens, particularly older citizens, and in some cases for veterans.

I share his wish that our administration should be humane and fair. I should like to emphasize, though, that we are talking primarily about administration rather than legislation. Parliament has provided in its laws for certain rules to be followed and it has called upon the departments of government to administer the laws according to those rules. I should like to deal with some of the principles which I believe to be involved in the motion before us. It seems to me there are three principles which we could acknowledge at the outset. First, no one should profit unlawfully as a result of an error or as a result of negligence on the part of public servants. Second, no member of the public should suffer as a result of error or negligence on the part of public servants. Third, every reasonable precaution should be taken to prevent the occurrence of errors, in the first place, or their reoccurrence in the second place.

Let me deal briefly with each of these principles. As for the first, that no one should profit unlawfully as a result of the error or negligence of public servants, it seems to me that a number of instances might be cited. The hon. member refers to the overpayment of pensions by the DVA. I think he would agree that in some instances these overpayments may have come about as a result of information withheld by individuals not necessarily with intent to defraud but, perhaps, inadvertantly, not volunteered. Any hon. member will know the legislation with respect to veterans' pensions requires a certain set of criteria to be met before pensions are paid. If the property or income of an individual exceeds a certain amount, the pension is affected. Should the hon. member wish to deal with this problem, I suggest he would have to do so as part of a separate piece of legislation.

Again, one would have to include provision for the kind of error which might occur as a result of a mistake in a customs situation. If an individual were to import or take with him materials which were dutiable, and they were not assessed, it could be claimed within this general ambit that he was profiting as a result of the error or negligence of a public official. What about the situation in respect of income tax, particularly refunds? Suppose an individual qualified for a refund amounting to, let us say, $200 for which he has claimed and an official, making a mistake in the decimal point, sends him a cheque of $2,000. What is to happen? The individual concerned has profited by that error to the extent of $1,800 and, in a sense, all the taxpayers of Canada would be subsidising him.

The second principle I mentioned was that no member of the public should suffer as a result of official error or negligence. The Financial Administration Act, Section 23, specifically recognizes this eventuality. I cite section 23(1) as revised in 1968-69. It says that the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of Treasury Board, may make regulations authorizing the deletion from the accounts in whole or in part of any obligation or debt due to Her Majesty or claimed by Her Majesty which does not exceed $5,000. The second part of the paragraph says that obligations, debts and claims so deleted from the accounts during any fiscal year shall be included in the public accounts for that year. So, the principle with which the hon. member is concerned is already recognized in legislation. I will return to this point in a few moments.

Let me deal briefly with the third principle. I stated at the beginning of my remarks that every reasonable precaution should be taken in the first place to prevent the occurrence of an error or its reoccurrence later on. Just how do you prevent mistakes, Mr. Speaker, when there are literally tens of thousands of individual cases involved, tens of thousands of separate events in the course of a year handled by public servants? How do you eliminate or minimize human error—because this is really what we are talking about in this general area. I suppose we are really asking, on what sort of principles of good management can we rely?

I suggest that there are two, in particular, that apply in this instance, that exist at the present time and which are being actively promoted and followed in the public service of Canada. The first is a pre-audit system, a system that aims to detect the kind of errors and negligence that occur before notice is sent out to members of the public. The second administrative procedure is the operational review; that is to say, there is a system of review that would ensure that the audit system is functioning properly and that suitable changes in the operation are made in time to take advantage of technological or other improvements, such as the computer.

Surely, the first thing to bear in mind here is that we are dealing with human beings. We can attempt through some system and the use of intelligence to minimize the chance of human error, but we cannot legislate it out of existence. We cannot regulate it in the sense of issuing memos and hoping that somehow or other error will go away. As long as human beings are administering systems, errors will be made. In fact, I suggest to the hon. member that no system is any better than the people who are administering it. There is a common phrase in use by those who are interested in computers, which undoubtedly are one way of minimizing human error. The phrase is "GIGO", which stands for "garbage in, garbage out". In other words, no computer is better than its input.

With all the goodwill in the world there will always be instances where members of the public receive payments to which they are not entitled. The motion before the House proposes that the government give consideration to the introduction of legislation to provide that the government assume a portion of the liability for repayment of overpayment. I, for one, am not convinced that additional legislation is required.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

There is already provision on the statute books for the deleting from the accounts of Canada of any debt due to the Crown. I refer to section 23 of the act, and I have already quoted the section. Perhaps it is important at this juncture to recognize that this amendment to the Financial Administration Act, 1968-69, replaced what had earlier been a limit of $1,000 with the limit of $5,000 to which I have referred.

It is true that the deletion of any debt from the accounts does not absolve the debtor; but normally no further collection action is taken by the government unless it learns that the debtor has acquired assets or has assets of which the government was unaware. Deletion of the debt from the accounts is approved when an investigation reveals that enforcement of collection would be possible only by inflicting real hardship on the debtor. I think we are getting here to the focus of the hon. member's concern: the question is one of inflicting real hardship upon a debtor.

I should like at this point to refer to page 9.27 of the public accounts for 1970. Under the heading "Obligations, debts and claims deleted from the public service" I find that in the year ended 1970 there were 13,910 debts deleted from the public accounts, amounting to a total sum of $3,287,521. This did not include the figures for the Department of National Health and Welfare, so I went back to see what sort of relief might normally be expected from this department. The year before, when the limit was $1,000, there were 133 debts not in excess of $1,000, and 3,722 not in excess of $100. In other words, approximately 3,800 debts were deleted from the accounts of the Department of National Health and Welfare to a total value of just under $100,000.

In the fiscal year ended 1970, most of the deletions were from the Department of National Revenue but there were significant deletions from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Just under 3,000 debts were deleted in that instance, and there were others from the various departments, including the Department of Veterans Affairs to which the hon. member made particular reference. In the fiscal year ended 1970, 336 debts totalling $13,700 were deleted from the public accounts.

My point in referring to these figures in some detail is to emphasize that the laws of Canada, and particularly the Financial Administration Act, already recognize the principle that in cases of real hardship the government will suspend but not eliminate its claims for repayment. There is a procedure laid down for the claimant who states that his circumstances involve real hardship. If the debt is under $2,000 there is a departmental review process; if the debt is over $2,000 the matter goes to treasury board. I think it is also important that recognition of the human problem be given here. It is the current practice to allow up to five years for repayment of a debt under $1,000. In the case of larger debts individual arrangements are made.

Let me conclude, then, by stating that our laws at the present time do recognize the problem the hon. member has recounted to us this evening. Our administrators and public servants are bound by the provisions of legislation passed by this House. Provisions for review based on hardship are operative and indeed reported on each year in our public accounts. In addition, time is given an individual so affected to repay his debt or make restitution.

In my view, the current practice as authorized by Section 23 of the Financial Administration Act meets both the tests I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks; that is to say, the test in respect of an injury to a taxpayer in the sense that no one should profit unlawfully as a result of error on the part of public servants and, secondly, that no member of the public should suffer as a result of such error. Suspension of collection—which takes place, incidentally, only after non-collectability has been clearly established—ensures that no hardship is inflicted on the debtor. The fact that collection is only suspended also ensures that no improper profit is enjoyed.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest this afternoon to the introduction of a notice of motion by the honourable member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott), which motion reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide that where, due to error or negligence of a public servant, a member of the public becomes indebted to the government—as by overpayment of a pension or allowance—then the government should, by insurance scheme or otherwise, assume a portion of the liability for repayment of the public funds paid out without authority by government error or negligence rather than exact, as now, full repayment from the recipient by arbitrary process of law or government decree.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of this House the example used by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott) to illustrate his case. The motion states in part, "as by overpayment of a pension or allowance." I presume, therefore, that the hon. member's concern is directed to the recovery of overpayments made to pensioners and other recipients of federal benefits.

Since the hon. member makes mention of pensions and allowances, and since on the basis of probability, in view of the large number of transactions involved, this is an area in which overpayments from all causes are likely to arise, I am confining my comments to experience in the administration of old age security pensions, the guaranteed income supplement and the Canada Pension Plan. There are, of course, many other agencies making government payments to the public: for example, the Canada Pension Commission, the War Veterans Allowance Board, the Unemployment Insurance Commission, Manpower, agriculture, and so on.

In relation to the total number of accounts administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare, the number of overpayments from all causes is insignificant. When I talk about overpayments I am referring to overpayments from all causes—from administration errors to the fact that the information provided by an applicant is incorrect and in some cases amounts to an attempt to commit fraud. In fact, the administrative procedures that have been established ensure that the number of overpayments due to errors in administration are kept to an absolute minimum.

To cite one example of the type of procedure that is used to reduce administrative errors, the determination of eligibility for a benefit and the payment of the benefit itself are conducted independently of the process of verification and two independent checks are made to determine the correct amount of the benefit. In addition, persons are notified as to their entitlement to benefit, so that no person should be ignorant of the amount of benefit to which he is entitled.

It seems to me that we are dealing with a basic principle relating to rights. A person entitled to benefit has a right to receive that benefit. He should not receive less than the full amount of any benefit to which he is entitled and he should not receive any more than this amount. This principle is the basis for recovering any overpayment made to a member of the public regardless of the reason for the overpayment. The fact that an error may be due to negligence on the part of the administration, or the fact that hardships may result, is not sufficient consideration for forgiving any indebtedness which arises from administrative errors.

I ask why an individual should gain because of an administrative error even if he suffers because of this error. If, for example, a person were paid too little in relation to his entitlement, the error would soon be made good. If he is compensated for any loss which may be due to error, then in justice he should repay any undue gains arising from the same cause. If, due to a computer error, a recipient received a cheque for $1 million—and this has happened in the past—should the individual be entitled to the $1 million? The answer is, of course not. The legislation is quite specific on this point and is designed to safeguard both the individual and the privy purse.

Most people are fully aware of the amount of pension to which they are entitled, either because they are given some form of notice of the amount they should receive or because they know the amount of the payment which they receive each month. If they suddenly receive a payment which is more than the amount specified in the notice or more than their customary payment, the very least they should do is inquire from the administration the reason for the difference. If a person accepts the payment knowing full well, or even with some misgivings, that it is more than his entitlement, then why should he be relieved from part or all of the burden of repaying the excess?

Since the motion is silent as to question of large versus small repayments, I must assume that it refers not only to the situation in respect of small overpayments but to all overpayments regardless of the amount. In this latter respect, surely we cannot be considering relief, partially or otherwise, where a person has derived a substantial benefit either at one time or over a period of time, even if this is attributable to administrative error.

Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare considers very carefully whether the recovery of an overpayment is likely to cause hardship, and this circumstance is taken into account in the recovery process. If the overpayment is large, so that its repayment results in an onerous financial burden on the person concerned, arrangements are worked out whereby the repayment is made over a period of time by small instalments, so as to minimize as much as possible the hardship to the individual making the repayments.

Of course, for such a procedure to be effective the administration must either be aware of the person's circumstances or it must be able to determine this from other information available. For example, in the case of overpayments which are recovered from recipients of the guaranteed income supplement, the administration would be aware that people in this group have low incomes. In respect of recovery this would be taken into account and reimbursement would be in very small amounts. Therefore, in situations where overpayments arise for whatever reason, barring fraud, it is incumbent on the individual to communicate with the administration and arrange a scheme for recovery which would minimize hardship.

I should like to mention that some consideration has already been given, in legislation passed in this House, to a situation whereby hardship may arise in respect of the recovery of overpayment. I refer to the recent amendment to the Old Age Security Act which was passed on December 17 and received royal assent on the following day. Under this legislation, the period in which overpayment has been made and for which recovery can be effected has been limited to two years, comprising the current benefit year and the year preceding the current benefit year. This provision will apply to all senior citizens who are eligible to receive the guaranteed income supplement.

The intent behind this legislative change is to recognize that pensioners eligible for the guaranteed income supplement fall into low income categories and that recoveries of overpayments incurred over a longer period could result in considerable hardship. I should mention, however, that while this legislation limits to two years the period in which overpayments occur, it is not applicable where the pensioner has made a wilful misrepresentation or has committed fraud for the purpose of obtaining a benefit.

It is my belief that departure from the established recovery procedures would at least be unwise, if not outright folly. Moreover, the concessions which have been made to our senior citizens who are in receipt of the guaranteed income supplement recognize the special circumstances of this group. Furthermore, I am convinced this House would not be acting in the public interest were legislation passed that forgave indebtedness to the Crown regardless of the cause, and especially where large sums of money are involved.

[Translation]

And finally, Mr. Speaker, I am satified with the way in which the government passed the legislation mentioned by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton in his motion and which, as he himself admitted, was to set a two-year recovery limit for low-income people who would have received overpayments. This, I think, is a question of justice and as this was a marginal group for income purposes, the government agreed to amend the Old Age Security Act on December 17.

Mr. Speaker, if we look at the hon. member's motion, we can see that he wished to tell the House that this might be very beneficial for those who have been paid benefits over and above their regular allowance, but it seems to me it would be grossly unfair with regard to the administration of public funds for which the government is responsible.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for having introduced this motion and I know that he had probably forgotten that on or about December 17 a bill was introduced for the purpose of providing for what seemed to have caused some hardship to those who fortunately had been paid more than what they were entitled to. He will agree that in its capacity as guardian of public funds in Canada, the government must provide efficient administration.

Perhaps also I could say that the federal administration is assuredly the best government administration in all the country for never have I seen here in Ottawa so many dedicated civil servants working not for money, but for the sake of work well done. They are highly conscientious. In fact, because I know them, I admire them. I have had occasion to talk to them, to ask them for statistics. Even when their work was most demanding, they always showed me remarkable kindness and courtesy, for which I am grateful. These faithful public servants are unknown to most. I hope there will be some public recognition of Canada's debt to them, and a reward of some sort. They are entitled to our attention, our courtesy and our appreciation and I hope they will continue to carry out the functions to which they are dedicated, the service of the world's most beautiful country, Canada.

[English]

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, before becoming involved in a discussion of the merits of the resolution itself, there are two or three observations I feel compelled to make concerning the language of the notice of motion. First, the motion reads in part:

> —the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide that where, due to error or negligence of a public servant, a member of the public becomes indebted to the government—

Further on in the motion we see a recurrence of that type of language where it reads:

> —then the government should, by insurance scheme or otherwise—

I shall have something to say about that in a minute.

—assume a portion of the liability for repayment of the public funds paid out without authority by government error or negligence—

So we are talking about payments made without authority by the government, due to the error of a public servant. The basic difficulty involved is that although we all know, or suspect, that a good many people in all their dealings with government welfare schemes try to put one over on the government or on the public, as it were, in an effort to cut corners and play all the angles, the fact is that while this suspicion exists, most people in the category of having been overpaid in respect of their pension scheme or individual welfare program act in good faith and with good intentions and very little blame should be attributed to them.

What makes it difficult is that the recipient being honest and acting in good faith does not necessarily mean the mistake rests with some malfunction in the government. I refer to the numerous cases that have arisen where a welfare recipient happens to be at the same time a recipient of another benefit from a totally different source. One can imagine the situation that might arise with a veteran who has a disability, who is over 65 years of age and who perhaps has a small income-producing property or an interest-bearing investment.

The qualifications for receiving some of these benefits are dependent upon the source of income and the financial position of the recipient. Indeed, when a recipient is a beneficiary under several plans the situation is extremely complicated for him or her, and often entirely without any ill-intention by the recipient and without any error by the government it can turn out that after several months, and in some cases several years, an applicant who has in good faith filled out a form is rendered ineligible for a certain type of welfare payment. Often the reason is that he is receiving a disability pension, a private pension or income from interest on an investment which he has not declared and which makes him ineligible for the welfare payment he has been receiving for several months. He would have required the aid of a very competent solicitor to understand all the intricacies in the first place, and surely we should not expect people who apply for welfare to seek the advice of a solicitor before doing so.

The information filed with an application has to come primarily from the applicant, so there can be no possibility of error by the government. People may think the government should assume liability for these overpayments, but I do not think it should. I suggest even more important and to the point is that much of the difficulty which applicants experience in making separate applications for welfare schemes is that they run into a mass of red tape. I think we all know, as Members of Parliament, that if we are to help people in their relationship with the Department of National Health and Welfare, it is not in attempting to persuade them they are not entitled to benefit but, rather, in helping to cut through the red tape they have to endure in order to get their applications processed.

Let us bear in mind that consideration of the application is based on the presumption that the facts are supplied by the applicant. The government must proceed on that basis, because any other assumption would require a team of investigators that would in total match the existing staff in the department. Therefore it is imperative that the applicant supply the information. That being the case, the matter is already sufficiently complicated without superimposing stringent, independent insurance coverage or some kind of insurance scheme so that if an overpayment occurs the application has to be subject to an insurance claim to determine whether everybody has taken the proper steps. The way in which insurance is now handled has become a standing joke on television. People have had many laughs about red tape encountered in dealing with the government, but they get as many laughs out of insurance schemes which tend to drop people who make the slightest error in reporting their situation.

I suggest that the way we proceed at present is the most efficient, and that the applicant must provide the correct information. There are times when the situations of applicants are extremely complex. These situations have to be faced by both parties. When this occurs, I submit that the approach now adopted by the government is the best possible. First of all, unless deviation from the norm has been most flagrant it is rarely suggested that people should be prosecuted for knowingly receiving an overpayment. No doubt some people who received overpayments knew they were getting more than they were entitled to, yet prosecution is not mentioned. That, in my opinion, is as it should be.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Jerome: I prefer not to be interrupted while making my remarks. I would prefer to wait until six o'clock.

Mr. Kaplan: My question is brief. Is the hon. member aware of the extent to which overpayments occur in a given period? For example, how much has been paid out in overpayments this year?

Mr. Jerome: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not. I can answer a brief question briefly, for once in my parliamentary career. Frankly, I am not sure that it would change my view in any case.

In conclusion, I submit that the words used in the motion imputing error or negligence to the government, and the words in its final sentence indicating that at any time the exactment of repayment is by arbitrary process of law or by government decree, suggest an authoritarian approach which in my experience does not exist. In any case, I submit that to change the approach taken at present would require applicants to assume the legal significance of an application for insurance or an application for a pension scheme, and would increase existing red tape by superimposing a structure which would build another labyrinth in order to accomplish a solution. I therefore submit that the notice of motion should be rejected and that the present situation, which has been rather excellently handled by the department, should be continued.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I am sorry that we cannot hear more of the eloquent pleas of the hon. member. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS ACT

PROVISION FOR EXAMINATION, PUBLICATION AND SCRUTINY

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-182, to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the dry title "statutory instruments" rather belies what I believe to be the importance of this bill. I feel it is a significant step toward a more open society in Canada and constitutes a major legal reform in the area that lawyers and parliamentarians have called subordinate or delegated legislation. It represents the first step to be taken by the government in fulfilment of an undertaking given on behalf of the government by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), who was at that time President of the Privy Council, to the House of Commons on June 16, 1970. At that time the minister, in outlining the government's proposed course of action in relation to the recommendations contained in the third report of the Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments which was tabled in the House on October 23, 1969, stated to the House as follows:

> Due to the nature of the committee's recommendations it is not practical, nor is it reasonably possible, to proceed with their implementation by any one means. Rather, implementation of the committee's recommendations will require action of three different kinds: first, legislative action by Parliament to replace the existing Regulations Act by a new statutory instruments act; second, a number of cabinet directives to implement several of the recommendations which cannot be dealt with by general legislation and, third, amendment of the Standing Orders for the purpose of establishing a scrutiny committee to review regulations.

Before the coming into force of this bill it is the intention of the government to implement the second part of the undertaking by issuing the appropriate cabinet directives to deal with departmental directives and guidelines and the conferring by legislation of regulation-making powers. The cabinet directive relating to departmental directives and guidelines will be in accordance with what was stated by the then President of the Privy Council to the House in these words:

> Departmental directives and guidelines that might reasonably be interpreted as affecting the rights of members of the public in a legal sense will be required to be submitted to the Deputy Minister of Justice before they are issued. The Deputy Minister of Justice will make a report to the person desiring to issue the document indicating whether the proposed directive or guideline is essentially legislative in its nature and, if so, whether it would be appropriate to incorporate it into regulations or, where there appears to be no authority to do so, whether the relevant statute should be revised with a view to conferring such authority.

The directive relating to the conferring by legislation of regulation-making powers will set out certain criteria which should be as closely adhered to as possible. It is my intention to recommend that regulation-making powers such as the following should not be granted except after careful deliberation:

(1) Power in a statute or in a regulation made thereunder to exclude the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts;

(2) power to amend or add to the enabling act or other acts by way of regulation;

(3) power to make regulations having retrospective effect;

(4) power to subdelegate regulation-making authority;

(5) power by regulation to impose a charge on the public revenue or on the public other than fees for services;

(6) power to make regulations which might trespass unduly on personal rights and liberties; and

(7) power to make regulations involving important matters of policy or principle.

In other words, the criteria which I tend to recommend to my colleagues in the government will exclude the granting of powers such as I have just enumerated. The third part of the undertaking will be implemented by recommending to the House the amendment of the Standing Orders to provide for the establishment of a parliamentary committee to review statutory instruments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On this day of the Gaelic, the learned House leader will introduce it in due course.

This bill is the first major revision of the law relating to delegated legislation. The Regulations Act was enacted in 1950 and, subject to the consequential amendments made to it when the Official Languages Act was passed in July of last year, it has existed without amendment since it was originally enacted. Since the enactment of the Regulations Act there has been a gradual and continued growth of government, bringing in its train a proliferation of regulation-making bodies.

As a direct result of the exercise of regulation-making powers by these bodies, the number of regulations that are being made has greatly increased and the lives of all Canadians are now directly affected by regulations. It is obvious and self-evident that the direct result of this increase of delegated legislation has been a gradual erosion of the power of Parliament in its role as guardian of the people of Canada.

In recent years concern has been expressed by members of the public as well as by Members of Parliament relating to the increase of legislative powers being given to the executive without any realistic form of parliamentary control. I deeply share the concern of those individuals. This legislation, together with the other steps that I have outlined, is an attempt to restore a measure of parliamentary control over the executive and to redress the imbalance in the relationship between the individual and the state. The growth of modern government has meant an alienation of much of our citizenry. The size and anonymity of government has deprived the individual citizen from participation in the decision-making process. The anonymity and remoteness of government has left an imbalance between the citizen and the state. We are looking for new ways of increasing methods of redress, recourse and appeal for the average citizen against the government over which he must have the ultimate control.

The statutory instruments bill is the latest step in the continuum of law reform directed to the protection of individual rights from the power and remoteness of modern government. This continuum includes such measures as the new law regarding expropriation, the Federal Court Act passed before Christmas, the Tax Review Board Act, also passed before Christmas, and the National Law Reform Commission. In the future it will include laws relating to the right of privacy and other human rights.

In the preparation of this bill, the third report of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments, prepared under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), was extremely valuable. To the chairman and members of that committee I express my appreciation for the excellent report which they made. That report formed the basis upon which the legislation now before the House was drafted.

At the committee stage I intend to render an accounting to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I will compare the report with its implementation in the form of this bill. We were not able to accept all the recommendations. I will attempt to explain to the committee and the House where we departed from the recommendations and why we did so. Generally speaking, the non-partisan report of the special committee of the House of Commons has been in large measure implemented in this legislation.

It is the government's intention to implement the recommendations of the special committee to the fullest extent possible in the manner that I have outlined. The government in no way denies the desirability of fully implementing all the recommendations of the committee, but it was decided that full implementation of certain recommendations was not possible due to a number of practical problems which we found when preparing this legislation. To explain where we have departed from the recommendations of the committee would require a full explanation of the details of the bill. If hon. members will permit, I will not at this time attempt to outline or justify those departures. I intend to do so at the courtesy of the committee.

One of the main features of this bill is that it is designed to protect the public from the improper or unusual exercise of power that has been delegated by Parliament. This will be done in three different ways. First, most proposed regulations will be required to be submitted to the Clerk of the Privy Council who, together with the Deputy Minister of Justice, will be responsible for examining the proposed regulations to ensure four things: first, that they are authorized by the statute pursuant to which they are to be made; second, that they do not constitute an unusual or unexpected use of the authority pursuant to which they are to be made; third, that they do not trespass unduly on existing rights and freedoms and are not, in any case, inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights; and fourth, that the form and draftsmanship of the proposed regulations are in accordance with established standards.

The examination procedure will be carried out by legal officers of the Department of Justice before a regulation is made. It is hoped that at this stage in the regulation-making process any proposed regulation that fails to meet the criteria which I have just enumerated will be revised in such a manner that, having regard to those criteria, it becomes acceptable to the Department of Justice and to the person or body that proposes it.

Although it is not my intention to deal with individual provisions of the bill at this time, I do not wish any hon. member to be left with the impression that it will be possible to carry out the examination I have mentioned for all proposed regulations. If asked to give an example of the type of regulation for which an exemption from examination may be proposed, the regulations made under the National Defence Act would immediately come to mind. I am advised that the daily orders for the Canadian Forces alone number in excess of 2,500 each week.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: I suspect the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) is seeking the floor for the purpose of asking a question. This can be done if the minister grants permission. Is this agreed?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Agreed.

Mr. McIntosh: I wish to ask a question before the minister leaves that part of his speech. The minister said the regulations will be left to the scrutiny of the judicial officers of his department. Will he tell the House what they intend to do about the interpretation of any word or phrase in these regulations? Will they give a definition if it is required?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): At that stage the primary purpose will be to see whether the regulations meet the criteria. The ultimate interpretation, in one sense, lies with the scrutiny committee of Parliament. In a wider sense, the courts of this country will be called upon, if the regulation is challenged, to interpret whether the regulation is intra vires or ultra vires of the enabling statute. The interpretation of words will not be the primary purpose at this stage.

Mr. McIntosh: There will be no change in the present system?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There will be a change in the present system. There will be a judicial scrutiny by the Department of Justice to ensure that the four criteria are followed. The second safeguard to be provided by this bill is to give to the members of the public a statutory right of access to statutory instruments, which includes regulations. This right of public access, coupled with the fact that most regulations will be required to be published in the Canada Gazette, will enable the public to be informed of the provisions of laws that are of particular interest to them; that is to say, laws that become laws because they are statutory instruments or regulations passed pursuant to an enabling power in a statute of Parliament.

Although it is contemplated that there will be exceptions to the general rule that every regulation must be published in the Canada Gazette, the right of members of the public to inspect and obtain copies of those regulations will not thereby be denied. In only very limited and necessary circumstances will the right of public access to statutory instruments be precluded. I imagine the committee will want me to enter into more detail in this respect. It is expected that public access will be precluded in respect of instruments such as orders that reveal the location of any unit of the Canadian Forces or the location of any ammunition, weapons or equipment for use by the Canadian Forces, and parole certificates and mandatory supervision certificates issued under section 10 of the Parole Act. Exceptions such as the examples given are necessary to protect, in the first case, the security of the country and, in the second case, the interests of the individual.

The third way in which the rights of the individual will be protected from the regulation-making power of the state is by the requirement of clause 26 of the bill which provides that most statutory instruments will stand permanently referred to any parliamentary scrutiny committee which is established. It is my hope that the members of the scrutiny committee will be able to find the time to examine all regulations, but especially those that have wide application to the public. In this way, members of the public will be assured that Parliament is at least aware of those regulations which have an impact on their daily lives.

The statutory instruments bill is wider in its application than is the present Regulations Act. As already noted, the bill deals with statutory instruments generally, whereas the Regulations Act deals only with regulations. In addition, the law relating to regulations has been significantly extended to deal with matters such as rules, orders or regulations governing the practice or procedure in proceedings before federal judicial or quasi-judicial bodies, regulations made by federal Crown corporations and regulations made by any federally-incorporated company where a penalty, fine or imprisonment is provided for their contravention. These regulations will now come within the meaning of the word "regulation" as defined in the bill and will be treated in the same manner as any other regulations, with the exception of the Federal Court and Supreme Court of Canada rules where there will be no examination as to form and draftsmanship.

I thank the House for its courtesy. Many of the provisions of this bill are technical in nature and, as a result, I anticipate that a number of questions will be asked at the committee stage. Again I point out that the bill was fathered by a special committee of the House and the government has done its best to implement as fully as possible the recommendations of that committee. I look forward to appearing before the standing committee just as I had the honour of appearing before the special committee when it was considering its report.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this is an appropriate time of the year to be considering a subject with such mysteries as statutory instruments, subordinate legislative capacities and statutory authority. All of these have a fine mystic ring to them. Another great mystic gift which appears at this time of year is the dish of haggis, which is almost impossible to describe as to contents and almost impossible to feed to a large number of people. But for the connoisseur, what a dish is haggis! And for the connoisseur parliamentarian, I suggest we have an equal feast before us, something with which perhaps only a few directly concern themselves but when you get immersed in it you find yourself really fascinated because it is one of the basic questions before Parliament.

I think the guts of the bill, if I may use that expression, are to be found in clause 26. I appreciate the minister's saying in his opening statement that there would be a quick establishment of the committee. I think this is important. Clause 26 provides:

> Every statutory instrument issued, made or established after the coming into force of this act, other than an instrument the inspection of which and the obtaining of copies of which are precluded by any regulations made pursuant to paragraph (d) of section 27, shall stand permanently referred to any committee of the House of Commons, of the Senate or of both Houses of Parliament that may be established for the purpose of reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments.

Since the principle of the bill is really embodied in this clause, perhaps I may comment on it for a few moments and predict the events which will follow. First, I would hope that the review and scrutiny provision would be somewhat broadened and that there would be added an opportunity, if one is not contained in the wording already, to comment and to make suggestions. I presume this is what one has in mind in establishing such a committee. I think this right should be spelled out. However, this is a detail which we can examine when we get into committee.

I would hope that any Member of Parliament or any member of the other place confronted with a problem involving the scrutiny of statutory instruments would have immediate recourse to the committee to be established and would be able to muster that committee almost immediately to deal with the problem he or she brings there. Let me be specific. A few weeks ago the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) passed regulations, as he was given authority to do under the Motor Vehicles Safety Act which was passed by Parliament a few months ago. Immediately, most of us received form letters from motor cycle enthusiasts saying there was something wrong with the regulations, that they impinged upon their freedoms and should not have done so. I will not go into whether or not their complaint was justified. The point I would make is that there should be an instant remedy open to people and complaints that such groups raise should be brought somewhere where they can be looked at and satisfaction obtained.

I hope that when the scrutiny committee is established it will give every parliamentarian in this or the other place an opportunity to immediately take up questions involving the use of statutory instruments and obtain at least an answer. This would make the work of the committee all the more real to every Member of Parliament. I hoped that the committee would be a joint committee, that is, of both Houses, for the simple reason that the other place has a continuity that this place does not have in certain years, usually every fourth year when we become fractious, obnoxious and engaged in that great sport the federal election. Since the people in the other place are immune to that, they would give continuity to the committee and I think this is important.

I would further suggest to the minister and to the leader of the House that it be a small committee; I have in mind something of the order of ten members. I do not think it is a great problem how many government bodies or opposition bodies you have on it. I do not think the vote would be partisan. I see it more as a committee where the vote would be as independent as one could have from parliamentarians in a set-up such as that.

So much for the main clause of the bill, what I should like to see done and the kind of committee I should like to see established. I think, also, it should be a committee with fairly senior personnel of great experience with statutory instruments. The minister nods agreement, and I presume this will be the thinking of the committee. In any event, the reputation of the committee will rise or fall depending upon its ability to deal quickly, as intelligent persons, with the work referred to it.

Now may I say a few words about one of my hon. friends who is not here this evening, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). He deserves considerable credit for the fact that we are now debating this bill. He has been an advocate of such action for a considerable time, and I will prove that by making two references only. The first is to the debate in June, 1965, when the procedures of this place were being discussed in the House. At that time the hon. member for Peace River made a motion to set up among the committee of this House one on delegated authority. The Prime Minister of the day, Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, made other suggestions, but let me quote what the hon. member for Peace River said, as reported at page 2276 of Hansard:

> In the first instance, he said, there is consideration being given to setting up a royal commission to inquire into the necessity for an ombudsman.

I see the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) pricking-up his ears and I am sure that later in the debate he will be speaking to that aspect of the matter.

> Second, he thought the committees, as constructed and set up by this particular section we are discussing, would provide an opportunity to examine into the very dangerous situation which prompted me to move this amendment. I refer to the very increasing extent to which government, particularly the executive branch of the government, is operating with the aid of Orders in Council.

The hon. member continued his argument. I cite his words not only to prove that he was on the right track then and that finally his patience and persistence paid off, but to pay tribute to one of our truly great Members of Parliament. He returned to the fray on September 17, 1968, in the debate on the Address that year, and as reported at page 107 of Hansard said:

> There should be a committee on delegated authority.
> I do not have too much time but I must stop here for a moment to emphasize this tremendously important issue. Most of the regulations and most of the authorities which affect the ordinary person in Canada, together with the pressure of large government corporations or crown companies, have come about as a result of authority which this Parliament has delegated to others to exercise on its behalf. We live in one of the very few democratic countries that have taken no steps to provide an opportunity for the ordinary man and woman, through the medium of a committee such as I have proposed, to ventilate and bring forth his argument in respect of any grievance he may have which has arisen not because of an act of Parliament but because of something done under authority given to others to act under an act of Parliament. This has a grave effect on our democratic society.

So on at least two separate occasions in recent years the opposition House leader made a very strong pitch for the sort of legislation we are now discussing. I now turn to some of the other reasons why it is an absolute necessity to pass legislation such as this and establish a committee of the House along the lines proposed. Professor J. R. Mallory, in his report "Delegated legislation in Canada: Recent changes in machinery", as reprinted in the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, volume 19, which was published about 18 years ago, dealt with the experience in this regard of the government of Canada during the last war.

He pointed out that it would have been impossible to carry on the work of government without making very vast changes in the machinery of the Prime Minister and cabinet of that day; without those vast changes it would have been impossible to bring about the flood of Orders in Council and other documents from on high, if I may use that description. I suppose it was natural that that sort of philosophy should spill over into the post-war period. At page 471 of the journal to which I have referred, Professor Mallory says the following about this problem:

> —we may conclude that the central executive machinery of the government of Canada has undergone considerable change and adaptation to meet the needs imposed on contemporary government. Functioning under the 1939 procedure the central executive would have broken down in a few weeks under the burden of ordinary government operation today. This change and improvement has taken place rapidly and quietly on ministerial (and, no doubt, official) initiative. It demonstrates again the remarkable flexibility of cabinet government. It remains to be seen how far Parliament, the public, and political parties can adjust themselves to the challenge of the administrative state.

Perhaps it is of interest to note that we are entering upon a period that seems to be more challenging than recent times, more economically uncertain than recent times and one where we may have to prove ourselves a great deal more flexible. This is particularly true of the reaction of the government to financial events. If the challenges were immense in time of war and more immense in the post-war period, I suggest they may be even more immense in the days that lie ahead.

Having listed my reasons for saying that a measure to establish such a committee is necessary, I would also point out that about three out of every four statutes that parliamentarians pass contain at least one section that enables regulations to be made. In the committee referred to by the minister there was presented a special study made by Madame Immarigeon, of our parliamentary library, which revealed that 303 of 416 statutes examined contained power to make subordinate laws. The report she gave the committee showed that 6,892 regulations, covering 19,972 pages, were published during the period January 1, 1956, to December 31, 1968, averaging 530 regulations per year. That did not take into account regulations exempted from publication and documents of a legislative nature but not officially considered to be so. An example of this would be handbooks of directions to pilots.

Perhaps the most telling point of all as to the importance of such a committee is that the major legislation in the field of immigration consists of regulations that are passed, not the statutes themselves. So I would think there is agreement among all members that it is important to get this committee established, to get it a good staff and to put it to work.

I should like to make reference to what I think may be a weakness in this legislation, certainly something that will have to be considered when the bill is studied in committee. According to our advisers, under clause 9 of the bill it will still be possible to enact retroactive regulations. This is in conflict with the recommendations of the committee that there should be no power to make regulations having a retrospective effect. I think that recommendation is to be found at page 33 of the report of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments. There will be considerable questioning about the departure from the committee's recommendation when this bill comes before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

My final concern is that the measure will be considered by that committee rather than by a committee of the whole House. The committee of the whole House is not frequently used, but when it is much enthusiasm in respect of parliamentary business occurs in this place. Certainly that was the case with respect to the electoral laws. When dealing with something as important as this bill, I would be inclined to say that it should go to committee of the whole House because it is basic to the operations of Parliament.

The minister has pointed out that there are technicalities involved in the law dealing with statutory instruments. He is perfectly right in that respect. I have had some difficulty making up my mind whether it would be a good thing to have this measure go to committee of the whole House or to our committee of legal experts. On balance, I suppose it is better that it should go to that committee. I think consideration should be given to setting a period of time for the consideration of statutes such as this by a committee of the whole House. I hope the government House leader and the leaders of other parties will consider such a formula.

Mr. McIntosh: Why legal experts only?

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) asked why it should be a committee of legal experts only. I was arguing that it should not be one of legal experts only. The difficulty is that when we consider anything in committee of the whole House, everyone enjoys it so much they want to stay for the rest of the winter, and that tends to knock askew all the other business with which Parliament is seized.

Perhaps I should repeat my suggestion. In respect of a measure such as this, thought should be given by the House leaders to putting it before committee of the whole for a set period of time. If the measure could not possibly emerge from the committee in the time set, it could be sent to the special committee. I make that as a suggestion. The principle of this bill is one we have sought for a long time. We look forward to working on it in a non-partisan but vigorous way in the committee in order to make it a fine piece of legislation for the protection of our rights as parliamentarians as well as the rights of those Canadians whom we serve.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I hasten to remove from the debate any element of drama or suspense that may linger by making the announcement that we, too, support the principle of this bill and will vote for it on second reading. Perhaps the reason for this is that the bill, as the minister has made clear to us, is the result of an excellent, non-partisan report of an all-party committee. It was a small committee which studied this matter and worked on it thoroughly, and I think it produced a report that we can all support. Let me read as a basis for our support of the bill the first paragraph of the committee's report, because I think this is important:

> This report is based on the assumption that public knowledge of governmental activities is the basis of all control of delegated legislation. For parliamentary democracy is a system of government which requires that the executive be responsible to the legislature and that both be accountable to the people, and there can be neither responsibility nor accountability where there is no knowledge of what has been done. In political matters knowledge is the beginning of power, and its lack, impotence.

The bill is technical in nature, as has been made clear by those who preceded me in the debate. Technical or not, it is a significant advance in the attempt by Parliament to control subordinate legislation. Some people have objected to the immense proliferation of subordinate legislation. But the complexity of our times is such that it is absolutely ridiculous and would indeed be Canute-like to object to the fact that there will be a great volume of subordinate legislation.

However necessary subordinate legislation may be, it can also be dangerous if certain conditions are attached—if it is secret and if it is not scrutinized by representatives of the people. The point of this legislation, as I understand it, is that it seeks, through providing for publication and scrutiny, the assurance that there be adequate knowledge by the people themselves and their representatives in Parliament of legislation which affects them and their rights.

The legislation itself does not appoint, as was the major recommendation of the special committee, a scrutiny committee. That is something for this Parliament to do by its own votes. I understand that that will be an accompanying measure to the legislation that is before us. I regard scrutiny of subordinate legislation by representatives of Parliament as the key to effective control over subordinate legislation. I want to stress a point made in the report of the special committee. When the scrutiny committee is set up it should have the power, in its discretion, to refer regulations to other standing committees for consideration. The reason I emphasize this point is that I contemplate that the scrutiny committee will be a small committee with almost legalistic functions to scrutinize the legislation from certain explicit points of view. I think it is essential that other committees of this Parliament should be used to scrutinize legislation from the point of view of substance and not only from the point of view of the legal implications.

Let me give an illustration with which I am very familiar. I have in mind legislation in the field of immigration. Those who are familiar with immigration problems know that nine-tenths of the effective administration in respect of immigration law is by regulation and not by the Immigration Act. It is many years since we changed the Immigration Act. The immigration regulations have been changed, and they set the basic form for dealing with people who come to this country and wish to stay or those who seek to bring their families, relatives and friends to Canada. This is all done by regulation. Those regulations should be scrutinized not just by a small legal committee, a committee on statutory instruments or subordinate legislation, but also by a committee of members of this House who are familiar with immigration matters.

I cite this merely as an illustration of the importance of having the substance of legislation scrutinized by specialist committees of the House. If we are to have effective parliamentary control over subordinate legislation, the power suggested in the report of the special committee will have to be exercised, namely, the power to refer matters to other committees.

The substance of the legislation we are asked to deal with is contained in clause 24 and, perhaps, clause 23. I do not propose to discuss at this stage the details of the clauses of the bill. Clause 23 provides for publication in the Canada Gazette. Clause 24 applies to the right of access to statutory instruments. Clause 25 applies to the provision of copies of instruments for those who are concerned. Clause 26, the most important of all, provides for the scrutiny by Parliament of statutory instruments. I believe this is the core of the legislation. Clause 27 is one which this House and the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will have to examine very carefully. It provides for exemptions. In my view, the exemptions are drawn much too broadly. I believe we will have to look very carefully at this clause. If too many exemptions are provided, I believe the bill will be robbed of its main function.

There are one or two other details to which I should like to refer. One I believe is of considerable importance, although perhaps it sounds a little technical. I refer to recommendation 6 of the report of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments. It provides that all departmental directives and guidelines as to the exercise of discretion under a statute or regulation, where the public is directly affected by such discretion, should be published and also subjected to parliamentary scrutiny. I would say that is a novelty. At the present time we have directives relating to immigration which are not public and which are not made available even to the Immigration Appeal Board. These regulate the rights of would-be citizens and present citizens to bring in relatives. It is a discretion which is hidden from the public, and it should not be. I hope we will study this particular recommendation to see whether it can be more firmly incorporated in the legislation.

Another recommendation to which I wish to refer, although not in detail, is recommendation 19 which provides for the new committee on regulations and sets out the basis of its actions and discretion in six criteria. These six criteria are somewhat broader than the list of criteria to be given under the statute to the officials of the government. I think we should take a careful look at that matter.

I conclude my remarks on this subject by saying that one of the major exercises of Parliament should be, and I think is, to ensure that among the myriad of public authorities, public regulations and public laws there be adequate voice given to those who are affected by the regulations. I commend this legislation because I think it is a step in that direction. Whether it is an effective step will depend not on the legislation itself but on the vigilance of the scrutiny committee and the willingness of us all to make sure that the all-embracing laws which affect this modern society are designed and work for the benefit of individual citizens.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his brief explanation of this bill. However, I believe he should have elaborated some parts of his introduction a little more, because when I spoke on the resolution which was the forerunner of this bill I expressed the hope that the proposed special commitee to be set up under the provisions of the bill would have the power to effectively police the application of the legislation which may in part be delegated to the various branches of the public service.

From reading Clause 26 it would appear that the purpose of the proposed committee would be to inspect, review and scrutinize the statutory instruments. In fact, that is exactly what the title of the bill says; it is an act to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments. In referring to the last section of clause 26, we see that it provides:

> —that may be established for the purpose of reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments.

I ask the minister where the committee would go from there, after it has scrutinized. It seems to me an exercise in futility if having scrutinized the instruments, and so on, they have no power to do anything. If there are no teeth in the legislation, and if they should find a discrepancy or misinterpretation, what use is the committee? I can think of several pieces of legislation with which I have had to deal since I have been a member of this House, in respect of which no agreement has been reached concerning certain clauses because of lack of definition, because of lack of boards to deal with these matters and because there was no acceptance of the dictionary interpretation, such as there is in our courts. Therefore, our constituents do not have, through their Members of Parliament, recourse in fighting the injustices we have been talking about.

I suggest that the terms of reference of this committee are not broad enough. The committee should have the power to take effective action after it has inspected, reviewed and scrutinized. The committee should have power to adequately control the present arbitrary, unsupervised exercise of power by the bureaucracy. Otherwise, as I have said before, the whole thing is an exercise in futility.

The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) said he hoped every member of this House would be able to bring some problems before this committee to be rectified. I suggest that if the bill passes as it has been presented to this House, without any teeth by which to act, it will just be another exercise in futility for members to bring problems to the committee. Members of the committee may agree or disagree with the member, but their hands will be tied if there are no teeth in the legislation.

If there is one thing we as Members of Parliament are charged with, it is to ensure equal justice to all Canadians and to protect the rights and liberty of the individual as well as the rights and liberty of minorities. We can no longer slough off our responsibilities and give unrestricted, vast power to others without supervision, as has been done in the past. Too often we have given power without ensuring that those to whom the power is delegated will exercise it unselfishly and with impartial justice.

The farming industry certainly is one which has encountered the uncontrolled and unsupervised use of delegated power, much to the detriment of the individual farmer. I intend to offer proof of this in a few minutes. Professor Henry J. Laski, one of the many constitutional authorities in Great Britain, did not agree that delegating power was a dangerous trend which should be stamped out. In his book "Parliamentary Government in England" he described delegated power as an elementary procedural convenience essential to the positive state. But having said that, he warned as follows:

> The vital thing is that Parliament should be in a position to make objection to any use of it when it deems fit—

We as members should do this because, as I said before, otherwise we will have abdicated our responsibility and our authority; we will have delegated our responsibility. He continues in these words:

> —and that it should be so able to examine what is done in its name as to make it certain that nothing to which objection can be taken escaped from its purview.

In other words, use the device but take sensible precautions. I hoped that the committee of the House proposed in this bill would have the power to ensure that these precautions were taken. I am disappointed that there are no teeth in the bill. In our case, this important point has been forgotten.

It has been proposed from time to time that setting up the office of an ombudsman would serve to overcome the situation created by the abdication of our responsibility. At one time I agreed with this, but since then I have changed my mind. To establish the office of ombudsman would merely be establishing another government official. We realize how ineffective this would be when we consider the scant regard paid by the executive and the public service to our present economic watchdog, the Auditor General. The terms of reference of the Auditor General are ineffective. He can dig out errors and mismanagement, but he can do nothing about them. An ombudsman would be in the same position. I say that this responsibility lies with us as members of this House. Besides appointing another official outside of Parliament to do a job that is clearly that of Members of Parliament, it would not rectify the position in which we find ourselves. It would be just another abdication of our responsibility.

In my opinion, what we need is what I have stated on previous occasions, that is, a parliamentary body that will be armed with power, without regard for governmental rank or influence, one that will be empowered to pursue its own course within its terms of reference, free of direction or influence by the government. It must be strong and free enough to ride close-herd on all recipients of Parliament's delegated authority and to command their compliance and respect. The pattern of the Public Accounts Committee of this House, with its chairman drawn from opposition ranks, might be a very good one to follow. I repeat that to me the essential feature must be that its findings, reports and recommendations carry with them some compulsion on the executive or individual responsible member of the executive, the Prime Minister and cabinet members, to take subsequent action. The very least that must be done is to ensure that anything turned up by the watchdog committee receives a fair and public hearing in this chamber.

I charged a few moments ago that individuals in the farming industry were one group that has suffered economically over the years as a result of delegated power placed in the hands of public service officials. It is because of the continued abuse by officials in this field that I am deeply concerned about this bill. I had great hopes that at least we would have a procedure or a vehicle whereby Members of Parliament could regain control of the power given them by their constituents.

On December 3, 1968, the hon. member who is now Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray)—I am glad he is in the House tonight—is recorded in Hansard as having made the following statement:

> It is my understanding of the will of Parliament expressed in schedule "A" of the Customs Tariff Act that implements and machinery for farm purposes come in duty free.

I am sure the minister expressed the thoughts and understanding of most of the present members of this House, as well as the thoughts of a great number of citizens of this country. Unfortunately, the will of Parliament has not been carried out by the administrative body. Let me remind the House again of what the minister said he believed the will of parliament to be—"that implements and machinery for farm purposes come in duty free". It is very clear and simple—that any machine or implement, regardless of other uses, when it is used for farm purposes is exempt from duty.

Let us examine for a moment how the bureaucrats have eroded the will of Parliament in their administration of this directive. It is not necessary at this time to relate to the House a step by step dissertation of when the erosion of the will of Parliament started, and of each case along the way which progressively became more restrictive and further removed from the will of Parliament. Suffice it to recount the last experience I had in this regard in presenting a case to the Tariff Board when I learned from their ruling that they had closed the door completely on any implement or machine for farm purposes coming in duty free. This was a complete reversal of what was intended by Parliament. To prove my point, the presiding officer of that appeal board, in appeal No. 914, at page 93 of the transcript, made the following statement:

> If you can satisfy the board that these pumps are only for use in agriculture irrigation then they are an agriculture machine.

The chairman of the Tariff Board has recorded there the true interpretation of what the board and the department accept as the definition of the term "agricultural machines, implements and apparatus". A few moments ago I related to the House what our present Minister of National Revenue said about the clause in the act. The actual action taken by the bureaucrats and by departments and boards is entirely opposite to the statement made by the minister in the House. An implement or machine must be made so that under no circumstances can it be used for any other purpose. Any agricultural machine, implement or apparatus must only be used in the pursuit of agriculture, and for no other use, before it can qualify for exemption.

Such a ruling, as hon. members know, is ridiculous because no implement or machine has been or will be invented that is used exclusively for agriculture. Some other use can be established, if even on a one-time basis, and it is simply an "out" for the bureaucrats to say that these machines and implements may be used only in the pursuit of agriculture. Therefore, in making such a ruling or precedent—and I say it is a very narrow ruling, laid down by the board—legislation passed by Parliament is ignored or negated by those charged with the administration of the act. If a committee had been formed with the power to act, as we had hoped would be the case, many of the practices which the public has to put up with would be rectified.

I await clause by clause discussion of the bill. Perhaps the minister has a suggestion to make to the House to give power to the committee to rectify the misunderstandings and lack of definition as well as misinterpretation. What I am trying to establish is that no matter how we word our legislation, the Canadian public either benefits or suffers as a result of the application or interpretation of the legislation by those charged with its administration and enforcement.

Such application by the bureaucrats in regard to agricultural implements is, in my experience, far removed from the intention of Parliament when the legislation was originally passed. In other words, we as parliamentarians are abdicating our responsibilities when we allow the bureaucrats to twist and warp the intent of our legislation. I say we have done this, perhaps not in a great number of cases but certainly in several with which I have had to deal in my term of office as a Member of Parliament.

I regret that I, as a Member of Parliament representing people of this country, have no recourse but to plead with the minister. In most cases the minister has not been long enough in the portfolio to correct all the abuses that he knows exist within the department. This is our system. We have built it up to the point where we cannot take back some of the responsibility that we have delegated to the civil servants. I am not blaming civil servants entirely—this is the system. It has progressed too fast for us. But here, again, I say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) that this is a vehicle whereby we can rectify some of the mistakes we have made in the past.

I am not blaming anyone in particular, but the legislation must have teeth in it. To my mind it is not strong enough in its present form. It only gives power to scrutinize. All hon. members scrutinize the regulations that come before us, but we have no power to tell the bureaucrats that they are not using a proper definition of the words—for example, that they are not putting the proper definition on the benefit of the doubt clause—and that this was not the intent of Parliament. In reply they say, "We have the power to interpret and this is what we are going to do." In fact, in a number of cases one department decides what is going into our legislation and another department has the power to interpret what the first department put in. How ridiculous! You cannot get both departments to agree, and it would appear that at present we have no instrument to reverse that trend. I would hope that this bill is the instrument we need to return the responsibility of application in the manner intended, to those elected by the citizens for that purpose.

I have mentioned one precedent established by the bureaucrats in regard to the interpretation of agricultural implements, and that is that the machine or implement must be made only for use in agriculture. Common sense asserts that such a qualification is impossible to meet. However, the bureaucrats have made their demands even more restrictive with regard to interpretation and thus have started a gradual process of making Parliament's legislative words meaningless. I cannot for the life of me understand why this or any preceding Parliament did not come up with an instrument whereby we could rectify these things that we know are going on, and stop the bureaucrats carrying on from year to year with a wrong interpretation of the legislation passed by this House.

A letter dated May 26, 1961, from the Deputy Minister of National Revenue reads in part:

> Having in mind the wealth of precedent in connection with the interpretation of the phrase "agricultural implements" as used in the Customs Tariff, much apparatus which has a purely agricultural application cannot properly be described as agricultural implements or agricultural machinery.
> The point at issue in each of these appeals is: can these contrivances be considered to be embraced by the phrase "all other agricultural implements or agricultural machinery, N.O.P." or are they more properly to be regarded as simply passive agricultural apparatus as a silo or a milking stall.
> The grain and livestock bodies at issue are utilized for containing grain and for penning up livestock during transportation. In view of past precedents and rulings of the Tariff Board, I trust you will understand my position in considering these articles of a passive nature to be not admissible under tariff item 409F, in the absence of a naming provision therein.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

A letter received from the Minister of National Revenue, dated November 5, 1968, reads in part:

> It is the position of the department that in order to qualify as an agricultural machine an article must contain mechanical features and be recognizably "agricultural." The Tariff Board set forth this principle in appeal No. 237, and it has been followed by the board on other occasions.
> In other words, it must be determined at time of importation whether or not an article is an "agricultural machine." The fact that one particular unit may be for use on a farm does not in itself qualify the product as an agricultural machine.

There are a number of reasons why I have quoted these two letters. Possibly the main reason, Mr. Speaker, is to establish the necessity of modernizing our procedures within this House of dealing with legislation after it has been passed, and made ineffective in its application when dealt with by the administrative body of our system. At present it would appear that Parliament has very little recourse against unfair and unintended application of legislation passed by it in good faith if the bureaucrats decide, through misinterpretation or for some other reason, to apply it in some other manner.

I would hope that the committee proposed by Bill C-182 would be an instrument to deal with matters such as I have described. I hope that when the minister explains clause 26 of the bill, he will assure the House that it is intended that the committee he proposes will have the power and the means to direct and police the application of the legislation and not merely the privilege to inspect, review or scrutinize the regulations. The committee must be given power to direct the application as intended by Parliament. I would hope the committee would have the power to correct any misunderstanding over the interpretation of any word or phrase in our legislation. I would hope it would have the power to rule that any particular word, unless otherwise defined in the legislation, would be interpreted in the manner practised in our courts rather than according to the narrow and restrictive meaning now enforced by the bureaucrats.

My second reason for quoting the two departmental letters is to show the gradual erosion of any purposeful meaning in our legislation by the rulings and precedents established by the bureaucrats without any direction by Members of Parliament on the legislation passed by them. In the letter of May 26, 1961, the deputy minister stated that the agricultural machine, apparatus or implement, because of precedent laid down by a former Tariff Board decision that the article was of a passive nature, was not admissible duty free. This is an arbitrary decision on the part of the members of the Tariff Board and it was not the intent of Parliament, because no mention of a passive or active nature is made in the legislation.

The minister may ask me why my constituents do not take this matter to court. The answer is that in most cases the amount of money involved may be only $100 or $200. The minister, being a lawyer, knows the costs of court actions. It would be poor insurance for a farmer to put up $1,000 or $1,500 to take a case to court when the amount involved is only $100 or $200. The farmer does exactly what the minister would do; he pays the $100 although he knows he should not have to pay it.

I have copies of correspondence supplied to me by other hon. members, relating to problems of a similar nature. For example, there is correspondence with regard to a wheeled applicator for the insertion of anhydrous ammonia into the soil, made necessary by new methods of farming and making former applicators obsolete. The bureaucrats ruled that the new applicator was not duty free, although the applicators it replaced had been admitted duty free. How ridiculous can their decisions become? Here is another example, Mr. Speaker. An hon. member wrote to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) on behalf of a constituent, asking whether the constituent was entitled to a rebate of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials used for the construction of a silo. The minister replied in part:

> I am advised that while building materials for the construction of farm buildings are not exempt from the sales tax, there is an exemption for materials and parts for the construction or repair of silos for the storage of ensilage.

A short time later the hon. member received another letter from the Minister of National Revenue, presumably written by the officials of the department, which referred to the letter written by the Minister of Agriculture. It read in part:

> Certain materials for use in the construction of silos for storing ensilage may be purchased by farmers without payment of sales tax. However, lumber and other multi-purpose materials must be purchased tax paid.

In other words, Parliament ruled as the Minister of Agriculture stated, that materials for use in the construction of silos may be purchased by farmers without payment of sales tax. However, the bureaucrats ruled that if the materials are multi-purpose, the tax must be paid. There is no material used in the building of a silo that is not of a multi-purpose nature. Therefore, the farmer pays the sales tax. If the ruling of the departmental officials sticks, the time this House took to pass that measure was just wasted. Why not let the bureaucrats run the whole country, if we are not going to return to this House some of the responsibility we have abdicated to them?

A similar situation exists with regard to grain storage bins. Under the Excise Tax Act there is provision that manufacturers or producers are entitled to sales tax exemption with respect to facilities designed, manufactured, advertised and sold for storing their finished products on their manufacturing or producing premises. The minister has ruled that farmers, being producers, are entitled to purchase grain storage bins for storing on their farms grain of their own production, free of sales tax. The two qualifying factors here are that the grain must be stored on their farms and that the grain must be of their own production.

The ruling does not specify the granary has to be used exclusively for grain storage for any specified period of time. It does not specify the manner of disposal after it has served its purpose. It does not prohibit other uses of the building if the need arises. It does not specify recovery of the sales tax in the event it is sold at a later date. In spite of all this, the officials have ruled that if the granary in question can be used for some other purpose, it is not sales tax exempt. The officials' ruling is the one that is enforced: the farmer pays.

The points I am trying to make by these examples are as follows: first, the use, or abuse, of the delegated powers of Parliament by the bureaucrats; second, the abdication of our responsibilities, as Members of Parliament, that has arisen because of our present system; third, the necessity of producing an instrument to rectify the iniquities that have developed; and, fourth, the necessity to modernize our procedures so that our social system will not develop into a bureaucratic dictatorship. I hope that the minister or the House Leader, when setting up this committee, will consider having some practical people on it. We do not want all legal minds. I hope the committee will have the power to do something about the problems that are set before it. I know there will be many problems.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable pleasure and some pride that I see Bill C-182, the statutory instruments bill, before this House. As the chairman of that special committee, I want to mention the names of some people who very materially contributed to the fact that the bill is now before the House.

The first sentence of the report which this committee presented to the House reads as follows:

> This report is based on the assumption that public knowledge of governmental activities is the basis of all control of delegated legislation.

I believe that this bill is a very important contribution to the end of providing public knowledge of governmental activities. It is the fundamental basis on which citizens of this country will be entitled in future to know more about, and therefore have more control over, the activities of government. The two other pieces which I anticipate will be added to this structure of knowledge and control will be the new parliamentary committee, which I expect will shortly follow adoption of this bill, and the promulgation of certain executive directives to deal with matters internal to government which cannot be effectively dealt with in any other way.

The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) rightly pointed to the incompleteness of this bill with respect to the kind of scrutiny and action which will be taken by the subsequent parliamentary committee. I anticipate that that will be the substance of the changes in the rules which will be proposed by the House Leader, when the rules changes are introduced. Naturally, we will all be very interested in the substance of those changes when they are proposed.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) mentioned a matter to which all members of the committee attached great importance. That is the question of administrative interpretations which have from time to time been given to regulations. If this matter cannot be reached in any other way, I trust that it will be thoroughly and effectively dealt with by the executive directives which we expect will be promulgated by the government in furtherance of the policies contained in this bill.

This bill will be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for a thorough clause by clause scrutiny. I do not propose to take the time of the House this evening to discuss the details of the bill. I will confine my remarks to a few general statements, since I will make a more detailed statement on the bill at the report state. All hon. members, whether they are members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs or not, will also be able to raise questions at that time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Lawyers and non-lawyers.

Mr. MacGuigan: As the minister suggests, lawyers and non-lawyers. I wish to pay tribute to a number of members opposite for the very great contribution which they made to the presentation of the report by the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments—which is the basis of this present legislation. I wish to pay tribute to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), who is in the House this evening. He and the hon. member for Greenwood were pillars of strength on the committee. They made very material contributions to the report which was presented.

I also wish to mention the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who is not in the House this evening but who was a very active member of that committee. Also present for the debate this evening is the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Forest), the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Murphy) and the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson), all of whom were very active members of the committee. I thank them for their contributions. By not mentioning the names of all members of the committee I do not want to suggest that they did not make as full a contribution. Indeed, they did, but it would be tedious to go through the whole list. However, I want to thank all members of the committee.

At this time I want to say a special word of thanks to certain members of the government. In his presentation before the committee, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) urged us to present a bold report and to press the government to reveal areas which had hitherto not been considered to be matters of public knowledge. The leadership of the minister and the then President of the Privy Council were very instrumental in helping the committee to present its report and in getting the report before the House. I also thank the present House Leader for giving this matter a relatively high priority on the list of government bills.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: I want to mention the two counsel who assisted the committee, Dr. Gilles Pépin, now of the University of Montreal, and Mr. John Morden of Toronto. They were of considerable assistance to the committee throughout the hearings and in the preparation of the final report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: I make these comments to illustrate the contribution which a great many people made to the report and to this bill, as well as to other implementations which the government will be bringing forward. This is a genuine team effort. I thank members from both sides of the House. I take great satisfaction from the fact that the report is far-reaching and that in presenting this bill the government has maintained the thrust of the committee's recommendations. This matter is of sufficient importance to mention at this time so that the House will take formal notice of it. I reserve any further comments until I have the opportunity of participating in discussion at the committee stage. I will then have some words to say at the report stage.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) remind us of the exhortations of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) that the committee bring forward a bold report. The committee may have acted in that regard. However, I wish the minister had been as persuasive with his colleagues so that we would have had a bill which measured up to the level of his exhortations.

This bill is a timid, half step. I hope to demonstrate where the government and Parliament should have gone with regard to this bill. I was not a member of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments, but my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and I have been especially concerned about this subject.

Those members of the House who served with me on the finance committee and, from time to time, on the justice committee will know that I have been a steady critic over the years of those sections of any legislation brought before the committee or this House giving broad, sweeping powers to the governor in council to make regulations. I have been particularly critical of the wording that is used. I can point to a rather regular consistency, bill after bill, every year over the past several years, where I have been very critical of this.

As a matter of fact, just a few weeks ago, on the bill dealing with sales finance companies, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) was prepared to accept a suggestion that we remove some highly offensive wording which would have precluded any questioning of regulations. In other words, the government itself would have been the judge of the quality and propriety of the regulations which it purported to pass under that law.

It seems to me that Bill C-182 has been drawn up—of course, it was drawn by the Department of Justice—for the benefit of the Department of Justice. It has a neat flavour in that the ultimate authority is, naturally, in regard to references—and they are almost legion—to the Deputy Minister of Justice. It is provided that these regulations shall all be passed, that there shall be certificates and that there shall be a registry of regulations maintained by the Department of Justice. I say, fine! I would agree with one step there. But we must remember, plus ça change plus c'est la même chose.

Who drew the regulations in the past? Who were the draftsmen? In many instances it was the Department of Justice. Certainly the department gave its approval; or it may have been that the influence of the department was wide. I put it this way: their influence, maybe, was by paste and scissors. We saw from one bill to another the same offending words and we were always told by the public servants who appeared before us as witnesses, "Well, these are the regulations as they appear in all the other bills and we are not doing anything different here." No, they were just perpetrating potential injustice.

So I say, there is perhaps one correct step in this measure. I refer to the maintenance of a registry. I think we will be better guided in committee by the departmental officers in the praticalities of what is suggested in the bill, whether in the submission of the draft regulations to the Privy Council or in the interchange with the Department of Justice, and whether we may not be setting up a very complicated set of machinery which will delay the preparation of legislation and of regulations.

I would like to put up a warning light at this point. I would not want to have this House, in passing this bill, simply create some form of Frankenstein which will cause too much coming and going and too much exchange of approval of approvals as between the Privy Council and the Minister of Justice. I think we understand that oftentimes a simplified procedure is far better than a detailed one.

We must clearly understand what we want in this legislation. What does Parliament want? Is it the power to suspend the coming into force of regulations, in other words that no regulations would pass into delegated legislation or come into effect unless approved by Parliament? This, clearly, would not work. We do not want that. After all, why has Parliament provided for these powers to make regulations under the legislation? It has done so for the sake of simplicity, flexibility, the need for adaptation and other valid reasons. On the other hand, we must have scrutiny of these regulations. They must be exposed to public examination. Statutory instruments must be scrutinized and exposed to public examination; there cannot be application until approval.

There must be review, with the power to have Parliament revoke improper statutory rules. Not the committee referred to in the bill; I do not think anybody wants that. The only body which could revoke a statutory instrument would be Parliament. The committee would recommend to this House that a particular statutory instrument be revoked or amended. Certainly no committee of this House should have power to tell the government that its regulations are hereby revoked; Parliament must do that. The committee which is being set up to review this matter is acting on behalf of Parliament, and it seems to me this is what is wanted. It is Parliament that controls and it is Parliament that must revoke statutory regulations.

By whom should this be done? I asked, what did we want? Scrutiny, review and a power to recommend to Parliament to revoke. By whom? I would suggest, as did my hon. friend from Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh), a committee of Parliament, a small committee of members of both Houses—that would simplify things—adequately staffed, because we want them to have an automatic referral of regulations and constant, ready reporting so that the process is as simplified and as efficacious as possible.

I have dealt with the matter of review, but there are other ways in which to accomplish scrutiny. First of all, there is the built-in scrutiny of the submission that is made to the Privy Council and to officials of the Department of Justice. This in itself will screen off a lot of difficulties. So that is step No. 1. Step No. 2 is the provision for publication in the Canada Gazette. In this regard I suggest to the minister that the proposal in this bill goes too far. When we were discussing the anti-dumping bill—this applies to other legislation as well—much to the astonishment of government members and also to myself the officials admitted that there was power under the Regulations Act for the governor in council to make regulations exempting the publication of regulations. So there is no guarantee of scrutiny here.

I agree that there may be certain circumstances involving national or international security where there should be an exemption power, or power given to the governor in council to pass an order providing that certain statutory instruments be not published, but only if this be in the overriding public interest. Having attended the same law school which I attended, I think the minister will recognize the legal theory that exceptions should be narrowly construed. In this particular case I strongly commend to the minister that exceptions to the necessity of publication should be narrowly construed.

With regard to the recommendation that as much as possible we adapt our legislation, I suggest that we make an amendment to the provisions of this bill dealing with the Revised Statutes to provide that there shall be included, in all legislation heretofore passed that gives power to make regulations, the words that appear in the new section 28A of the Interpretation Act. I refer to the expression "subject to the affirmative resolution of Parliament", or "subject to the affirmative resoluton of the House of Commons". I suggest these words be inserted immediately in all such legislation. Certainly I anticipate it will be included in all future legislation. This is going to the ultimate stage, to that far point that the minister exorted the committee to reach. I hope he will now be able to convince his colleagues to accept this sort of amendment in committee so that we can go to the limit the minister wanted.

Let me cite one example to the House. I do not want to be invidious in any particular regard, but let me make reference to the immigration regulations. I regularly have occasion to refer to them myself. The 1967 regulations were departmentally inspired. They were drafted by the department and accepted by the minister and the governor in council. Although I and other hon. members in the House, both privately and publicly in speeches as well as in constant correspondence with the minister and his officials, have objected and criticized some of these regulations, nevertheless Parliament has never directly accepted those regulations as such.

We are told that the law as passed by Parliament provides for the making of regulations, but let us look at the effect of the regulations. Let us consider the assessment of an applicant for landed immigrant status. We have to consider the ability of the applicant under the points system. The applicant is told he is either qualified or he is not qualified. He is not told in what respect he is deficient or to what degree he is deficient. He is not given access to his performance; no statement is given him indicating he has failed owing to inadequate training, insufficiency of language, that he has lost so many points because he is of a certain age, or anything of that nature.

He learns about his points only if he has had the gumption to ask for a reassessment and a special inquiry. His counsel or friends cannot ask for this information in order for them to judge whether the applicant should apply for a special inquiry, or to help him meet these questions. Perhaps the applicant has some evidence to substantiate his application, but he is not told what evidence is lacking. Only when he appears at the special inquiry is he told how he was rated. At one time one could obtain information about the points rating and often could assist the immigration officers with additional evidence. Conversely, you were in a position to tell the applicant, "Forget about it; there is no way your application will be approved, and there is no question of a special inquiry". Although we are told these are the regulations, the regulations have not been passed.

It seems to me that the legality of these statutory instruments must be tested. First of all, one must ascertain whether they are within the power of the act and, secondly, whether they are just or unjust to a given applicant. I do not think a committee on statutory instruments should substitute its wisdom for the determination of any application. Neither do I think it should go into immigration dossiers and substitute its judgment for that of the officials. That is not the purpose of this legislation. Then there are many other boards, and so forth, which would not concern this committee but which would be a matter for the Federal Court.

I hope I have not taken too long to examine this bill, and that I have made suggestions that commend themselves not only to members of the House but to those members who sit on the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Indeed, I hope to be on that committee myself. I hope the committee will be able to produce a good working bill from the present proposals.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

LEPROSY ACT

PROVISION FOR REPEAL

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill S-7, to repeal the Leprosy Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed and bill read the third time and passed.

PENITENTIARY ACT

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the annual report for the year ended 31st December, 1968, made pursuant to section 30 of the Penitentiary Act, contained in the third annual report of the Department of the Solicitor General, tabled in the House of Commons on November 3, 1969, be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and

That during its study of the aforementioned report, the commitee be empowered to adjourn from place to place in Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, much of today's progress has been accomplished by agreement, as a result of the excellent work of House leaders, a rank to which I was appointed today in the absence of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). May I suggest that we have a five minute holiday for most hon. members and that those who wish to partake in the late show be permitted to plunge forthwith into the same.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the hon. member whether this delegation of authority was made in pursuance of the new legislation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member that the Chair now see the clock as indicating 10 p.m. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the business for tomorrow could be confirmed and, if it is what we think it is, since it is in the name of the Prime Minister who is not here, will the minister indicate who will be introducing it?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the first bill to be considered tomorrow will be the government organization bill and it will be dealt with by the President of the Treasury Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

BROADCASTING—EDITING OF NATIONAL NEWS ON BUDGET BASIS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, some little time ago in the committee I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier,) who is in charge of the CBC, to explain to me the workings or arrangements in respect of the editing of the news carried by CBC. Since the minister at that time was unable to do so, I decided to put a question to him in the House and debate the subject at this time.

The situation is that when a news story develops in Toronto, Ottawa or Montreal the news editor of the CBC has to make a decision as to what is news. He does this and then it is put on the national news. I am not criticizing that policy, because obviously somebody has to decide what is news and this is the logical job of the news editor. However, there is an additional problem in respect of other areas of the country.

If a news story develops in Halifax or Vancouver, in addition to the news editor deciding whether the item is of national interest he must also take into account that it will cost the CBC several hundred dollars to send that story live from Vancouver. The figure of $1,000 was quoted to me some time ago. I am not sure how accurate that is but I am sure the cost amounts to several hundred dollars anyway. If a story is brought from Halifax live to Toronto this, again, costs the CBC several hundred dollars.

In addition to the normal decision as to whether a story is newsworthy, this budgetary consideration must be taken into account. In the event the news editor decides a story is worth while, he will have a tape sent by mail to Toronto where it is put over the CBC national news. If it is a morning story, it may well not appear until that evening. If it is an afternoon or evening story, it will not appear until the next day. If the story is not important enough it may not appear at all, because by the time it is put on TV it will be yesterday's news. The news editor must decide between yesterday's news and a good story today, particularly in respect of the television field because space is limited. He will always decide in favour of today's news.

Let me refer to the real basis of my complaint. If a story is news in Vancouver, it should be televised live to Toronto for appearance on TV that day. It should not be postponed until the next day. There are budgetary considerations when news stories come from Vancouver or Halifax which do not have to be contended with when the stories come from Toronto, Ottawa or Montreal. My argument is that the outlying areas in Canada tend to be bypassed in respect of worthy news stories, and I do not think this is right.

My understanding is that the CTV network operates on the same basis. If I extend criticism to the CBC I should perhaps extend it to the CTV network as well. The difference is that the CBC is a national concern, supported by the tax dollar, and we might assume that one of its principles is to promote equality of treatment across Canada. Perhaps the CTV network does not have this same obligation because it is directed more in terms of money.

In either case I do not think this is a good way of choosing newsworthy stories, that is, on the basis of whether we can afford them. If news from Saskatoon is of national interest, as a member or resident of that area I feel it should get the same type of coverage given to a story emanating from Toronto, Ottawa or Montreal. Frequently that is not the case now. As I said earlier, I wanted to ask the minister questions in this regard when he appeared before the committee but he was unaware of the technical matters or specific arrangements. Hopefully, the Parliamentary Secretary is in a position to enlighten us on the matter at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), I was asked to answer this question.

Since decentralization was carried out at the C.B.C. last spring, more and more importance is being attached to the contribution of the CBC's regional offices to the broadcasting service.

The CBC has correspondents in all provincial capitals who contribute regularly to the information and public affairs broadcasts over the radio as well as on television, and whose task it is to report on Canadian facts to all Canadian people, as is required by the Canadian Broadcasting Act.

Thus it is wrong to claim, as does the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson), that certain areas in this country that are far away from production centres of national television news bulletins, would suffer on account of the distance and that, for financial reasons.

Information directors hold daily preparatory meetings prior to issuing television bulletins, during which they decide on the importance as well as on the time to be given to the news of the day. As the time allotted to televised news is established beforehand, certain items transmitted by regional centres must necessarily be dropped temporarily or completely, on account of the importance and time to be given to more significant news. But that is never done for financial reasons.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

INDUSTRY—MANIWAKI (P.Q.)—TALKS ON POSSIBILITY OF GRANTING MONEY TO SOGEFOR PLANTS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last, that is January 21, I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) whether he intended to get in touch with the Quebec authorities or the Sogefor management and come to an agreement which might forestall the closing of the plants on March 5 next.

I presume the minister has had enough time to take into consideration this most important question as far as the 800 employees of the Maniwaki-Mont-Laurier-Lac des Îles area are concerned. In fact, failing an immediate solution, three plants will close down, by reason of a lack of outlets for their production, or of poor administration, or perhaps even of both. This somewhat recalls the situation that prevailed in 1929-30, when there was overproduction but inadequate purchasing power for the consumers to get the goods offered.

People know that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is granting money earmarked for industry in some low-employment zones, for the opening of new lumber mills or plywood plants, for the production of building materials, whereas existing businesses intend to shut down because they find no customers for their products.

While taxing the Canadian people for subsidizing new industries, we are maintaining the 11 per cent tax on building materials, which prevents people from buying such products.

The federal government is keeping silent before the problem facing the Sogefor employees. The government should, as soon as possible, offer to help the Quebec authorities and the Société générale de financement to find some means of preventing the closing down of those plants in a region where 28 per cent of the people are unemployed and where 10 per cent are on welfare. If those plants do shut down, this percentage will be over 50 per cent.

Those forest and wood industry workers as well as the whole population of this area have reasons to worry. In fact, they will be greatly affected by the shutting down of these plants. The governments should not be content with instilling confidence into these people but should also assure them that they will keep their jobs. They are not interested in living on unemployment benefits which will cost $40,000 to $50,000 per week to the public Treasury, neither on a pittance from the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The forest and wood industry provides most of the occupations for these people who do not want to lose this industry and have given evidence of it. The Maniwaki people are prepared to set up a co-operative with their own savings so that this enterprise may survive. However, I do not know whether those savings will be sufficient for the enterprise to keep operating.

Following discussions I have had with the municipal authorities, I am asking the Minister and the government to take necessary steps to prevent the closing down of those industries and spare those people hardships, anxiety, unemployment and privations. Perhaps this enterprise should be granted the necessary subsidies to maintain its operations for at least one more year and to find new markets for its production. Quite a few things will have to be done to reorganize these industries and make them viable.

I said earlier that the administration had a weakness which should be corrected but the government should avoid flooding the market by creating new and similar industries unless it is confident that their production will be in sufficient demand.

The minister should let us know what his plans are in this connection.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, Sogefor is a wholly owned corporation of Société Générale de Financement de Québec. This latter company is a holding company in which the province of Quebec is the principal investor. I want to assure the hon. member that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is fully informed, both of the basic economic problems of this company as well as of its current financial difficulty. He is equally aware of the extremely vulnerable position of the over 500 workers in the three locations and the woods operations of Sogefor.

This department, however, administers an act of this Parliament, the Regional Development Incentives Act, which makes assistance available for plant expansion, plant modernization or for new plants establishing in designated regions. Sogefor is in a designated region, but there is no authority under the act to make grants simply as a subsidy to carry a company through a difficult period or to try to develop new markets for a company.

Perhaps the question has to be addressed to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion have definite limitations concerning the kind of aid that can be given. We do not provide assistance, and we lack authority to do so, for temporary aid of a financial kind which seems to be requested at this time, nor could we simply help one company or a group of investors to buy out another company in order to proceed. We must be governed by the requirements of the act concerning expansion or modernization.

However, I want to say to the hon. member that if and when this company makes an application to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for aid that conforms with the conditions of the act, that application will be given urgent consideration. The department is fully aware of the dislocations that would result in those communities from Sogefor closing down and it would do what it could in considering any application that came forward that would fit into the authority of the department.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—PARTICIPATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN CONTROL OF PROPOSED ALBERTA PULP MILL

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on December 14 I addressed the following question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand):

In view of the large investment by the federal government in the proposed pulp mill in Alberta, is it the intention of the government, either directly or through one of its Crown agencies, to hold any equity capital in this operation, or is there going to be any safeguard of the federal interest through having some members on the board of directors—

This followed a question by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) which reads as follows:

In view of the minister's recent announcement that Proctor and Gamble are to receive an incentive of some $11,790,000 to construct a pulp mill in Alberta, can the minister indicate whether this is a foreign controlled operation? If so, was consideration given to providing the incentive to a Canadian company or Crown corporation?

The minister answered:

Mr. Speaker, we certainly considered the possibility of an incentive to a Canadian company, which unfortunately was not ready to start operations at this time.

For some time members of this party have urged the government to reconsider its policy of making grants such as it is doing and in the way it is doing to foreign-controlled companies. The answer that the government has given on most occasions is that any such policy would hurt the depressed areas of this country which it is attempting to assist through its regional development incentive program. I suggest that this ignores the conflict that may develop with any sort of meaningful policy that the Department of National Revenue may eventually bring forward with respect to the control of foreign ownership within the Canadian economy.

However, Mr. Speaker, whatever element of validity there may be to the point that the government makes in this regard, I suggest that now there is a new, golden opportunity. Today, at last, a bill concerning the Canada Development Corporation was given first reading in the House. I suggest that this presents a new opportunity to protect the public interest by providing for participation of the Canada Development Corporation in major projects which are being assisted by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I suggest that a plan should be worked out whereby grants made by the Department of Regional Expansion for industrial projects should involve an exchange of shares in the company which is receiving public funds to assist it in becoming established.

The question of foreign ownership is a matter of major concern in Canada today. In fact, we are reaching the ultimate: a recent study has shown that in 1968, 94 per cent of the expansion of a group of American-controlled companies in Canada was being financed with Canadian money, with money generated within Canada. Statements have been made since then by authorities pointing out that this figure is now higher. This is a problem we must tackle at once.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the manner in which some of the projects are being carried out influences the character of the Canadian economy. We do not, in fact, get the full benefit of some of the developments which are being assisted. For a long time we have talked of Canadians being hewers of wood and drawers of water. It might be said with respect to the production of kraft pulp, which is what is involved in the proposed mill at Grand Prairie, Alberta, that this is only a glorified form of Canadians being hewers of wood. In fact, kraft pulp is a rather inglorious product, albeit an important one in the economic picture.

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, it might be useful to draw the attention of the public to the way in which Proctor and Gamble looks at the future as described in Moody's Investor Service, which is available in the Parliamentary Library. The December 15, 1970, issue describes the Proctor and Gamble expansion as follows:

Proctor and Gamble Co. of Canada, subsidiary, plans to build a bleached kraft pulp mill near Grand Prairie, Alta., costing over $80,000,000. Mill will expand current pulp-making capacity and help assure a continued adequate supply of bleached kraft pulp for its growing household paper products in U.S.—

In its August 7 issue, Moody's had this to say about Proctor and Gamble:

Subsidiary expansion: Charmin Paper Products Co.—

That is a subsidiary owned by Proctor and Gamble in the United States.

—plans to build a household paper products converting plant at Modesto, California—

I am not aware whether there is a direct relationship between these two plants, but nevertheless I think these two developments, coming so close together within the over-all picture of the development of Proctor and Gamble, illustrate the fact that we are not getting the full benefit out of projects which we are helping to assist in Canada. In addition I would point out that a recent news item stated that Canadian Bechtel Ltd., a subsidiary of Bechtel Corporation of San Francisco, has been selected by Proctor and Gamble as general contractor for the pulp mill at Grand Prairie. Again we have an American concern which gets this major contract.

I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. O'Connell) would be much interested in statements made recently in Regina, Saskatchewan, by Mr. Walter Gordon. Mr. Gordon said as follows, as quoted in the newspaper report:

Governments must be careful in handing out huge industrial incentive grants, and first assure that no Canadian company can handle the development. Mr. Gordon said it makes him uncomfortable to think of a large U.S. soap manufacturer (Proctor and Gamble) receiving $12 milllion in government money to build a pulp mill in Alberta.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is always interested in the remarks of Mr. Walter Gordon. Indeed, he approves in general of Mr. Gordon's views. I was on the same plane as Mr. Gordon when he went to Moose Jaw. I do not think he made his main speech in Regina. It was at least close to the hon. member's constituency.

The Proctor and Gamble Co. of Canada is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Proctor and Gamble of Cincinatti, Ohio. Its project at Grande Prairie was based, in the first place, on its being the company to which the province of Alberta granted the necessary timber cutting rights. Any Canadian company proposing a similar project would certainly have been given the same consideration of the need for an incentive in order to create new employment.

Other aspects of the hon. member's question ought to be answered in the following way. The agreement with Proctor and Gamble requires the company to comply with all the terms and conditions of the Regional Development Incentives Act and regulations. This legislation provides no authority for the government to take an equity position in the operation, nor for government representation on the board of directors.

I share with the hon. member the hope that the Canada Development Corporation, which Parliament is in the process of creating, will provide opportunities for Canadian participation in projects of this kind in the future. However, it is only fair to say from the perspective of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion that the department cannot make distinctions and insist upon conditions more onerous in the designated regions than are applied elsewhere in Canada. If, for example, they did so in terms of equity or representation, it would work against the mandate that Parliament has laid upon it to foster economic expansion, employment opportunities and social adjustment in the designated regions.

An over-all policy with respect to foreign investment is required. The Canada Development Corporation, as an instrument of that policy, might well mean that we will be approaching a different future with respect to economic development of this kind. I do not share the disdain of the hon. member—with regard to the kind of employment being developed in the northern forest areas. I cannot simply call it employment of hewers of wood and drawers of water.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TABLING OF MEMORANDUM RESPECTING PROPOSAL TO RECRUIT FRENCH-SPEAKING CANADIANS

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) gave assurance that a memorandum from the Public Service Commission with respect to a proposal to recruit French-speaking Canadians into the Public Service would be tabled in the House. Under Standing Order 41 I should like to table this document in both languages.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister how long this statement is and whether he would consider reading it to the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the question is in order. I am not sure whether it is a point of order, but perhaps the minister might respond to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Hales: Would the minister make a statement on motions?

PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL RECRUITMENT OF FRANCOPHONES—ANNUAL REPORT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rose a moment ago but I was awaiting any developments that might take place. I rise to ask leave of the House—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —to present a motion under Standing Order 43. I make the earnest plea to my hon. friends opposite that before they say no they give the matter serious consideration. I have drafted a motion which I have made as inoffensive as I possibly can. It is a motion that does not prejudge the issue in any way. It meets the suggestion that has been made by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) and others on that side of the House that the question alluded to in the document just tabled should somehow come before one of our standing committees. Therefore I earnestly plead with the government that unanimous consent be given to a motion which simply proposes that the annual report of the Public Service Commission be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. My motion asks for nothing else. The committee could then call the chairman of that commission, the President of the Treasury Board and others. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather):

• (2:10 p.m.)

That the report of the Public Service Commission of Canada, tabled in the House on June 3, 1970, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey, has proposed a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 which requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has suggested that we give this proposal serious consideration. If he is serious in that regard I would be happy to give it careful consideration, but I cannot do so in 30 seconds. If he wants to let the motion stand until tomorrow, we will consider it before then.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to agree that the motion stand until this time tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—COMMISSION MEMORANDUM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board who was not in the House yesterday. The Acting Prime Minister suggested then that the minister would be very happy to answer these questions today.

An hon. Member: Smile, Bud.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board, who has asserted there was nothing secret about the program to hire Francophone university graduates, whether he has any explanation to give for the note on the memorandum of the Public Service Commission of Canada which states:

This information is confidential and no official announcement will be made.

If this matter was not secret would the minister also explain why there was no discussion with the Public Service Alliance on a matter of such basic importance to the alliance and the Public Service?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this matter was discussed yesterday to some degree. This note reflects a misunderstanding as to what the memorandum represents. The first paragraph, if the hon. member will read it, makes it quite clear that this is conditional. It states:

The basis of the survey was a request as to how many additional Francophone graduates you could gainfully employ should the salary costs be covered from funds outside your budgeted programs.

This is in the nature of what I may describe generally as a feasibility study. In trying to determine what is feasible and what is not, I think this can be most usefully done in private by the officials rather than in a public way which would lead inevitably to expectations that might not in the event be justified. The confidentiality referred to here is in relation to this particular program under gestation, if indeed such a program eventually were approved by the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In frustration.

Mr. Drury: I might say that this memorandum outlining a procedure for increasing the proportion of Francophones in the Public Service is not an approved program. It will not be a program approved by the government until it has been submitted to the Treasury Board and approved—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize for interrupting the minister, but I do not think he should make a statement at this time unless he wants to revert to motions. I appreciate that he is trying to reply to the question as completely as possible, and that is very much in order.

Some hon. Members: Revert to motions.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps at this point the Leader of the Opposition, if he has a supplementary question, might be allowed to ask it.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Revert to motions.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the President of the Treasury Board wishes to revert to motions so he can make a full statement, but I assume he does not since the offer was made to him previously. I have a supplementary question. The memorandum definitely refers to aspects of "the program", which suggests that in fact there is a program. May I ask the President of the Treasury Board a question relating to his assertion that this program was simply a normal extension of the efforts of the government to increase the number of Francophones in the Public Service. Does the President of the Treasury Board know of any previous instances in which the Public Service Commission confined appointments to persons of a specified racial origin?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts about that question. The Leader of the Opposition is asking the minister whether he knows of previous instances in which this policy was followed. I am not prepared to recognize that the question is in order.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the purpose of my question is to elucidate how this can be considered a normal extension of the government's policy. Can the President of the Treasury Board tell the House of previous instances in which such a policy has been applied?

Mr. Drury: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister might try to reply in some way. I certainly do not wish to be obstructive on a matter which hon. members appear to consider very important, but when the Leader of the Opposition seeks information concerning whether a situation has applied in the past that is not a proper question for the question period. The Leader of the Opposition has perhaps qualified the question and in this sense the President of the Treasury Board may wish to reply.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I wish to co-operate with the Chair and I will put the question in a different way. I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether, in his opinion, it is consistent with the acts of this Parliament for the filling of positions to be confined to persons of a certain racial origin as distinguished from the question of language specifications? Is it the position of the government that specifying racial origin as a prerequisite for filling positions, as distinct from competence in language, is consistent with the legislation of this Parliament concerning the Public Service?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid we are getting into semantic problems here because I am not sure that Francophone indicates or connotes a racial origin.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: I would find it difficult, therefore, to indicate occasions on which the Public Service had simply sought out people of a particular racial origin in the past. They have not and, indeed, the law precludes this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: What is being sought here, as was recommended by the Royal Commission on Biculturalism and Bilingualism, is a higher proportion of those with a French-speaking background in the Public Service in Canada in relation to the current and past overwhelming majority of those with an English-speaking background.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see there are many supplementaries. We have 40 minutes. We will start by recognizing the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—PROVISION OF FUNDS—RESPONSIBILITY FOR INITIATING STUDY AND DRAFTING MEMORANDUM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might get the minister away from a study of semantics and ask him a straight question. Was he familiar with the contents of this memorandum prior to its disclosure or was it issued without his knowledge and consent?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I was not familiar with the contents and it was issued without my knowledge. I would suggest that endeavours to conduct a feasibility study should not require the consent of the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since the minister is President of the Treasury Board, may I ask whether the Public Service Commission, or whoever was responsible for formulating this memorandum, had authority to say that $2 million would be made available for the purposes stated in the memorandum without the President of the Treasury Board having given his prior consent?

Mr. Drury: The memorandum, as I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, is couched, at least in the opening phrases, in the conditional tense, as it should be. Perhaps there is a greater element of certainty in subsequent paragraphs which I do not think is warranted inasmuch as there is no approved program. Indeed, it has not yet been definitely ascertained that this proposal is feasible.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister, then, who is responsible for initiating this feasibility study and drafting this memorandum for distribution to the various departments without the knowledge and consent of the President of the Treasury Board?

Mr. Drury: I think it is well known that the government has indicated its desire to see a higher proportion than at present or in the past of Francophones in the Public Service.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

An hon. Member: Who did it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think that this situation will be helped very much if the minister is not allowed to answer the question.

Mr. Greene: You want to play politics.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Who took the initiative?

Mr. Drury: I do not want to engage in some form of dialectics but I do want—

Mr. Hees: Just answer the question.

Mr. Drury: —the lack of comprehension to be cleared up. It is well known that the government has expressed its intention and desire to increase the proportion of Francophones in the Public Service.

Mr. Hees: You said that before.

Mr. Drury: To this end it is willing and has declared its willingness to devote additional resources toward the accomplishment of this purpose if satisfactory means are proposed to achieve this. The process we are looking at here is part of an exploration of possible means of achieving this purpose.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): By whom?

Mr. Drury: It has long been the instruction of the government to proceed in this direction. The precise details of programs, their gestation, the examination of ways and means which would be feasible, are done, as they should be done, by those who are familiar in the field—the officials. They propose ways and means for approval by the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. Lundrigan: My question is not a supplementary but a related question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I gather there are supplementary questions. Perhaps I might go to the hon. member's related question in a moment.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I have a brief supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. Would he mind giving us the government's official definition of the word "Francophone"?

An hon. Member: Good question.

Mr. Greene: Can't you afford a dictionary?

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that perhaps it might be time to go on to another question, but the Chair has infinite patience this afternoon.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—RESPONSIBILITY FOR AUTHORIZING EXPENDITURE OF MONEY

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary question for the minister and I hope he does not have to struggle with this one. Who, outside of the Treasury Board has the authority to authorize the $2 million?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): It is only the parliament of Canada that can authorize the $2 million.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that five or six members are rising on supplementary questions. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—RECONCILIATION BETWEEN MINISTER'S STATEMENT AND TABLING OF MEMORANDUM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board is based on the answer the Acting Prime Minister gave me yesterday when he said yes to my question as to whether we would be given a reconciliation between the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board, in which he denied the existence of a program, and the fact that a copy of the memorandum has now been tabled.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the only problem there is to try to reconcile the words "memorandum" and "program". There is a memorandum which is before the House. There is no program, and there will not be a program until such time as formal approval has been given to a proposal. This is a step in the gestation of a proposal, and until it becomes approved it is not a program.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did the minister know of the existence of the memorandum when he was interviewed about this matter over the weekend?

Mr. Drury: Regrettably no, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—CONSULTATION WITH LANGUAGE COMMISSIONER

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Champlain wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the minister if the Official Languages Commissioner has been consulted and has told the government what he thinks about it.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! I am not sure whether this question was heard.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Translation]

I am not sure that the Acting Prime Minister or any other minister has heard the question put by the hon. member for Champlain. Would the hon. member ask his question again?

Mr. Matte: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

I would merely like the minister to tell the House whether the Commissioner of Languages has made recommendations to the government in this regard.

[English]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge. I would think that this would tend to fall a little outside his particular jurisdiction as he is concerned with the use of French within the Public Service, not the means by which it is achieved.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—SPECIAL EFFORTS TO HIRE NATIVE INDIANS

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. It arises out of the answer he gave to the Leader of the Opposition. Does this mean that special efforts on the part of the Public Service Commission to hire native Indians have been abandoned?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker, by no means.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—ASSURANCE THAT CONTINGENCY VOTE WILL NOT BE USED WITHOUT ADVISING HOUSE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. Would the minister give the House the assurance that the money for this program would not be taken from the contingency vote, No. 5, without first advising the House?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I most certainly can give that assurance, Mr. Speaker.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—GRANT TO TRAINING SCHOOL IN FRANCE —UNEMPLOYMENT IN CANADA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on this subject. It has to do with the training of Francophones. Has the government come to the conclusion that there are not enough people speaking the French language in Canada and that it has become necessary to go outside of Canada and, by a $1 million grant, establish a public service training school in Bordeaux, France, to graduate Francophones who will be given an opportunity to work in Canada? Did the minister know about that? Is he aware of that fact, and is there not enough unemployment here without going abroad and spending a million dollars?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the first part of the question is in order. Of course, the latter part might be somewhat argumentative. The minister may be allowed to reply to the first part of the right hon. gentleman's supplementary question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that the government has been supporting the establishment of an institution in Bordeaux, France, to serve the whole of the Francophone-speaking world. I may add that I know of the right hon. gentleman's interest in promoting Francophone aspirations and that he would be the first to support them.

Some hon. Members: Oh oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that last observation deserves an answer and I rise on a question of privilege. I point out that I was the first person in Canada to fight in the courts for French language rights in the province of Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman has made his observation and perhaps he might ask his supplementary question now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I want to put the truth before the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently he is not aware of it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the House that the Chair has been very lenient about these many supplementaries. I wish to advise the House immediately that I do not propose to allow any supplementaries on the subject after we have heard the right hon. gentleman's supplementary. I shall stand firm on that decision.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, without any gratuitous observations, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs answer the question? Are there not enough unemployed French Canadians in Canada who could qualify for these positions? Instead of going abroad and spending $1 million in France could we not employ Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have already ruled that the question is argumentative and is not in order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The truth of my remarks is evident.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MANPOWER

ISSUANCE OF DIRECTIVE TO OFFICES REGARDING RELEASE OF UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister which concerns another memorandum. Can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether the government or any department of government has issued an order or directive to all Canada Manpower offices across the nation that they are not to release their unemployment figures? If so, can he indicate what the reason was for that directive?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such order. I shall make inquiries.

Mr. Lundrigan: Will the Acting Prime Minister undertake to inform the House tomorrow of the reason for the directive and the purpose behind it?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who will be here tomorrow I believe, and can answer the question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UGANDA—INQUIRY AS TO GRANTING OF DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION TO NEW REGIME

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the government giving consideration to granting diplomatic recognition to the new military regime in Uganda, and would the minister care to make a statement on this matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are following developments closely in Uganda. The situation at the moment is unclear and until there is some further clarification we do not intend to act.

UGANDA—SAFETY OF CANADIANS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, has the Secretary of State for External Affairs any information on the safety of Canadians in Uganda? We have heard about the regrettable loss of two lives.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There are approximately 300 Canadians living in Uganda. According to preliminary reports of casualties, as hon. members know, two members of the White Fathers Order have been killed. We have made inquiries from the British High Commissioner's office there, and he assures us that at the moment there is no danger to Canadians in Uganda. The two who were killed were killed purely by accident. They happened to be on the spot but were not involved in any way in the uprising. We are keeping the situation under close observation, and if there are any adverse developments we shall consider whether further action needs be taken.

INDUSTRY

MANIWAKI, QUE.—REQUEST FOR GRANT TO HELP CITIZENS' CO-OPERATIVE TO ACQUIRE SOGEFOR—EFFORTS TO FIND NEW MARKETS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I should like to put my question to his Parliamentary Secretary.

Could he tell us whether the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is in a position to grant a substantial subsidy to the citizens of Maniwaki who have organized a co-operative in order to purchase the Sogefor plants?

[English]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has looked very closely at the problems encountered by Sogefor. There are a number of problems involving markets and supplies of timber. I suggest to the hon. member that any request for special, financial assistance to the company should be directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which is precisely the one I discussed at the time of adjournment last night. Nevertheless I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary if in the course of his present travels the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will try and find outlets for the production of these plants.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENTAL INCREASE FOR PERMANENT MARRIED QUARTERS —WHITE PAPER—DESTROYER CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. While he is on his feet, perhaps he might also give some indication with respect to the question of rents which I asked him about earlier. Can he indicate to the House and country when we may expect his white paper on defence policy? In preparing the white paper, has he given consideration to dividing it into two parts, one part that would deal specifically with the need for funding for new weapons systems and replacement systems and the other with the more general question of defence policy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the timetable I have set for internal purposes and which I hope to meet would mean that it would be available for the House about Easter. With respect to the hon. member's suggestion, I shall reflect on it. It seems to me that the question of the actual policy should come first and, closely related to that, should come the question of equipment and arrangements with regard to equipment. I shall be glad to consider his suggestion.

I have examined the question of rents, which the hon. member was kind enough to bring to my attention last week. I find that it is being considered in conjunction with the general question of housing for members of the Armed Forces which the hon. member for Malpeque was kind enough to bring forward about a month ago. I hope within several weeks to be able to make a statement comprehensive of all aspects of this question of accommodation.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, with regard to rental increases for married quarters, could the minister not hurry up his consideration of the matter since the personnel concerned have been advised already of increases in rentals effective April 1 which will more than offset the last increases in pay?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we have a little way to go to April 1, but it seems to me that the most sensible thing is to make a general statement with regard to both rental and housing policy.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, in making a general statement, I wonder if the minister would advise the House of the present status of the DDH program and the extent to which there is a growing urgency with regard to refunding that program?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to consider that. I hope to be in a position to report to the House and, more particularly, to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on this and other matters about the middle of next month, when I gather that the estimates will be available before the committee.

TRANSPORT

SNOWMOBILES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LIST OF SAFETY SPECIFICATIONS—NATIONAL MANUAL

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It relates to earlier questions about the safety of snowmobiles. Since the decision of a coroner's jury last week in North Bay, Ontario, laid the blame for a snowmobile accident jointly on an inadequate braking and steering system and the inexperience of snowmobilers, is the minister now prepared to table in the House a list of basic safety specifications that his department considers to be essential with regard to the production and sale of snow machines in this country?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If I understood the hon. gentleman's question correctly, there are some ten regulations that have been gazetted. The other day I indicated I was not sure if they had been but I have learned that they were. It would be quite easy for me to table them in the House or make them available to the hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the lack of experience of many people in the use of these machines, is the minister or his department preparing to make available some kind of national training or safety manual that snowmobilers could use?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, at this very moment exhaustive tests are being carried out in the vicinity of Ottawa on some 15 different makes of snowmobiles so that our officials and the experts may have in the field knowledge of any additional regulations that may be required. If the data that is acquired on this basis is of use, I am sure that we would be more than pleased to make it public, yes.

INQUIRY AS TO CHARGING OF COST OF TICKETS TO LIBERAL BANQUET AS DEDUCTIBLE EXPENSE

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister inform the House whether companies purchasing $50 tickets in blocks of ten for the Liberal fund raising banquet to be held in Toronto on March 3 are charging these tickets off as tax deductible expenses?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question might be placed on the Order Paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED UNITED STATES PROPOSAL TO IMPORT CANADIAN WATER

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister with reference to the statement made yesterday by Mr. Rogers Morton, President Nixon's choice to become Secretary of the Interior, when appearing before a Senate hearing, that "the United States should study a proposal to import Canadian water." Is the Acting Prime Minister aware of this proposal and, if so, what is it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Sir. I thank the hon. gentleman for bringing it to my attention.

Mr. Hees: Would the Acting Prime Minister ask the Secretary of State of the United States what this proposal is and report to the House tomorrow?

Mr. Sharp: As far as I know, if Mr. Rogers wanted to make a serious proposal to me he would do so. He has not done so, so I do not really think this represents any serious negotiation between Canada and the United States.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE

ASSURED MAIL DELIVERY PROGRAM—EXTENSION TO OTHER COMMUNITIES—REGIONAL AIR SERVICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is directed to the minister responsible for the Post Office. It arises from his announcement concerning an assured mail delivery program. Now that the minister has decided to restore the quality of service once enjoyed by Canadians, is this assured delivery to be limited to the cities and communities outlined in his announcement or will it be gradually extended to other important communities such as Charlottetown and Brandon?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, from Toronto the assured mail program will cover the 24 centres which are mentioned in the announcement. The assured mail program is directly related to the communications between different centres, and we have chosen the centres that can have next-day delivery.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure we shall have time during the remaining few minutes to hear supplementaries about all these important centres across Canada, but for the moment we might hear further about Brandon-Souris.

Mr. Dinsdale: In light of the minister's answer perhaps I could direct this question to the Minister of Transport. Is it the minister's intention to deal with our urgent air service problem so that we, too, might be assured of this improved quality of service?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I think the question is rather broad, but I assume the hon. gentleman is only concerned about his own community.

Mr. Dinsdale: Western Manitoba.

Mr. Jamieson: I think he is as well aware as I am that level of usage is one of the determining factors. We are doing our best to put the kind of aircraft into that service that will accommodate the people who are offering their patronage. Perhaps the best thing the hon. member could do would be to induce more of his friends and supporters to fly by air.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Fly by air?

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): May I ask the Postmaster General when he intends to reinstate air mail service to western Saskatchewan?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I will look into that.

[Later:]

ASSURED MAIL DELIVERY PROGRAM—EXPEDITION OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CARDS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether in line with his intention to provide improved mail service from one point to the next, that is, a 24-hour service, any thought has been given to providing direct service from computer centres where unemployment insurance cards are processed to regional offices on a trial basis to see whether this idea would work?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): We shall consider that suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

ASSURED MAIL DELIVERY PROGRAM—EXTENSION TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the minister's announcement of assured one-day delivery and the fact that Prince Edward Island has been omitted from these arrangements. Is this omission to be permanent? When can the people of Prince Edward Island expect the same service as is being provided to the rest of the country? In the meantime would the department be prepared to provide a subsidy to help cover the cost of transporting night letters and the like?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Coté (Minister without Portfolio): I should like to point out that the cities and centres which will not be getting the 24-hour service from Toronto will not be losing anything they already have; the new proposals will not alter the service that these places are already getting. Hon. members should understand that if we are to guarantee this service we want to make sure we can provide it, and the only way we can do this is if we know there are planes flying from Toronto at certain times.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Is the minister aware that there is direct mail service from Montreal that might make use of this service?

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—REASONS FOR INCREASE IN PRICE OF MILK IN ONTARIO

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Ontario dairies have just announced that the price of milk will go up 4 cents for three-quart jugs and we can expect that Quebec dairies will follow suit. May I ask the minister whether this increase, in his opinion, stems from an imminent shortage of milk or from other causes?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member is talking about the pricing arrangements for fluid milk, and these do not come under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Agriculture or of the Canadian Dairy Commission.

WELFARE

REQUEST FOR GRANT TO BLACK UNITED FRONT, SYDNEY, N.S., TO ESTABLISH DAY-CARE CENTRE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): In the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare may I direct my question to his Parliamentary Secretary. In light of the announcement by the minister's office that a special $10,000 grant has been made to the greater Victoria low income group of Victoria, British Columbia, toward a day-care centre for the children of women on welfare engaged in part-time employment, will the minister give consideration to making a similar grant to the Black United Front of Sydney which is attempting to establish a similar program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that his question is in the form of a representation or suggestion to the minister, and he must assume that it will be considered by the government.

Mr. Muir: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with this government I find I cannot assume anything. Since the government can find money for tom fools and others, surely it can find money for the good people of the Black United Front—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's point of order is an additional representation.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REGIONAL AIR POLICY

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Bearing in mind the fact that we have been waiting quite some time now for an air policy, more particularly for a regional air policy affecting small airports, can the hon. gentleman tell us when we may expect a final statement in this regard?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I have indicated to the House on previous occasions that I do not anticipate making what might be described as a major statement with regard to new regional air policy. We are in the process of refining and making certain changes in the existing policy in consultation with the regional carriers. Some changes are already in effect. Talks are continuing, and I would expect to see evidence of these changes in this program rather than in any one policy statement.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—NUMBER OF SITES UNDER CONSIDERATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport, bearing in mind that the minister expressed his thoughts concerning regional airport expansion in terms that his answer could not be decisive until such time as a decision had been reached with respect to the international airport in Ontario. Can the minister now advise us whether the sites he has been looking at have been reduced in number and can he give us at least some indication when he intends to express the new policy?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I regret I cannot. Talks are still going on. I seem to have the impression from discussing the matter with officials both of the federal government and of the Ontario government that there appears to be no legal way in which four major, large sites could be announced with the absolute assurance that there would indeed not be some land speculation. Therefore, it has been necessary to explore alternative means of accomplishing the same objective, that is, giving the parties concerned an opportunity to comment before a firm decision is arrived at.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, is the minister now indicating to the House that he is still considering four sites? Perhaps the minister will tell the House whether the number of sites has been reduced in terms of practicality and feasibility.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, essentially what we are looking for is the most appropriate site to meet the aviation needs of southwestern Ontario which will at the same time meet the environmental needs and other objectives stated by various groups. As I have said repeatedly, there is no specific site. All we hoped to do was to be able to say that there were a number of alternatives. Let me repeat that neither the government of the province of Ontario nor the federal government has been able to find a sure-fire method of avoiding land speculation. What we are hoping to do now is to find some other avenue which would not identify —

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

WELFARE

REQUEST FOR GRANT TO BLACK UNITED FRONT, SYDNEY, N.S., TO ESTABLISH DAY-CARE CENTRE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I shall try to outline to Your Honour my point of order. In view of the fact that a major portion of this afternoon's question period was devoted to questions pertaining to a $2 million allotment or grant to a certain group in this country—it may be a good or bad thing; I am not disputing that—I should like to point out that I raised a question relating to a grant from the government on behalf of the black people involved in the Black United Front at Sydney, Nova Scotia, in order to set up a day-care centre, something they are working at very hard.

If Your Honour would explain to me why that question was out of order and a reply not allowed, I would appreciate it. Surely to heaven a small group like this can get a grant from the federal government, or are the black people different from other groups to which the government gives grants?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have noted that the Chair did not suggest that the matter was not important; it is obviously important. The hon. member has raised the question on previous occasions. I suggest to him that the question asked today was in the form of a representation. He subsequently raised a point of order and again I suggested he was making a representation. I would again suggest to him that the point of order he is now raising is in the form of a submission to the government.

I recognize the importance of this matter. If the question period was taken up to some extent with one particular subject matter, that cannot be the responsibility of the Chair. After a while I did try to suggest to hon. members that we might go on to another subject. If the hon. member has been penalized thereby, I am sorry. Perhaps the question might be raised tomorrow.

Mr. Muir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is always another day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

Hon. C. M. Drury (for the Prime Minister) moved that Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants is rising on a point of order.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, my point of order concerns the motion that this bill be read a second time and referred to committee of the whole. I suggest that the motion not be put because the bill contains at least seven distinct proposals or principles; at least, I will argue that it does, though the number may be less depending on one's attitude to the various sections of the bill. Be that as it may, I suggest to Your Honour that there is more than one proposal or principle involved in this bill, and therefore, having regard to the very ancient privilege of the House that members should not be asked to give simple answers to what are, in effect, several questions intermingled together, I ask Your Honour to take the position of ordering that the bill be divided when the vote comes so that hon. members have a chance to make a decision on each proposal.

To lay the foundation for my argument, may I first note that there are these separate provisions in Bill C-207. The first part, clauses 2 to 7, creates a Department of the Environment. The second part, clauses 8 to 11, amends two acts: the Government Organization Act of 1966, and the Resources and Technical Surveys Act. The third part, clause 12, amends the National Research Council Act. The fourth part, clauses 13 to 24, creates ministries and ministers of state. The fifth part of the bill, clause 25, amends the Parliamentary Secretaries Act, otherwise known as "answering the prayers of the hungry". The sixth part, clause 26, amends the Post Office Act. The seventh part, clause 27, amends the Public Service Superannuation Act. The eighth part, clause 28, amends the Salaries Act. Finally, part nine, clauses 29 to 34, contains general and transitional provisions, and these may be apportioned variously among the other parts.

If we were to pass Bill C-207 and it became an act of this parliament, there would have to be ten separate entries made in the index of statutes passed this session. There would have to be nine consequential amendments to seven additional statutes that are amended by schedule B of this measure, and these would also have to be indexed separately. I am suggesting we have a measure here that covers the waterfront.

To recapitulate in a slightly different way, we are being asked to create a new department; we are being asked to vary administrative duties of some existing departments; we are being asked to create ministers of the Crown who will formulate and develop government policy and, as well as providing for these salaried ministers, we are being asked to provide for additional salaried Parliamentary Secretaries. Distinct from those matters, we are also asked to vote yea or nay, without hearing witnesses, on behalf of those affected on the question of the retirement rights and obligations of public servants. I think you would agree that is a most unusual step.

These are propositions contained in the measure, some of which deal with people within my vision, or who would be within my vision if we had full attendance here, and others who are outside this House. I suggest that this does strike at the right of parliamentarians to decide questions with a simple yes or no, without having to consider very complicated questions which cannot be answered very simply. This is absolutely impossible. There is a solution which would enable us to avoid this situation. I suggest it is found in a precedent established in this House by a ruling of Mr. Speaker Macnaughton on the flag resolution and also in English practice. I will refer briefly to both. Many members of the House are familiar with the ruling of Mr. Speaker Macnaughton. It is to be found in Votes and Proceedings of Monday, June 15, 1964, oddly enough, right after a return to a question asked by Mr. Fisher dealing with the future of the Bonaventure.

The future of the "Bonnie" has been decided, but we still have this ruling by Mr. Speaker Macnaughton which I think is a guide to us in respect of this difficult motion. I am sure Your Honour is familiar with this ruling which appears at pages 427 to 431 of the Votes and Proceedings of that date. The decision of Mr. Speaker Macnaughton reads:

I must come to the conclusion that the motion before the House contains two propositions—

The problem was relatively simple because there were only two, but I suggest there may be as many as seven involved here. Mr. Speaker Macnaughton went on to say:

—and since strong objections have been made to the effect that these two propositions should not be considered together, it is my duty to divide them as follows:—

Then, he divided the two resolutions.

I was not in the House at that time, but I gather that this method of dividing these important questions was satisfactory to the members who were here. They could at least make up their minds much more easily than we can when we are dealing with this omnibus measure. I hope it will not be argued that we are not dealing with the question of principle but with the question of whether the bill should go to the committee, because many members of this House regard the second reading stage as one involving the principle. We are going to be faced with a problem somewhere along the line as to how one can cast a simple yes or no vote on a bill containing as many as seven different and distinct propositions.

I should like also to refer Your Honour to the British Hansard, for June 6, 1917 when that House was dealing with a bill concerning the "Representation of the People". The Speaker of the British House was dealing with the question of whether or not a motion should be divided. He quoted earlier authorities. One of the latest references to earlier decisions in the British House seems to indicate that members were jealous of their tradition of ensuring that they were not faced with complicated questions. The Speaker in 1917 quoted an earlier ruling of Mr. Speaker Peel of July 26, 1894, who laid down the following principle:

—that an Instruction for the division of a Bill was only possible "when that Bill was divided into parts, or else, comprising more than one subject matter, lends itself to such division into parts."

I am suggesting, Sir, that the measure before us does lend itself to division into several parts. Which ones will be the subject of dispute during the debate that follows, I have no idea, but I suppose some people would like the setting up of the environmental department but might quarrel with the idea that the old Department of Fisheries be swallowed up by it. Some people might think there should be more Parliamentary Secretaries, and I know there are a number of members around with eyes shining with anticipation, but others may think this question should be thoroughly examined. If I had any very strong objection, I would say that the creation of these ministries for example, is very basic. Only time and the debate will tell which of these seven propositions we face will exercise members who will vote yes or no, and those which will not exercise the members. I could also mention the part in respect of civil servants, which is in my view a basic part. These are the things that bother me.

I gather from reading the ruling of Mr. Speaker Macnaughton, and the history of the rulings that led up to it, that the Speaker would be guided by a sizeable number of people voicing an objection to being presented with a simple yes or no vote on a complicated question. I want to make it clear in asking for your ruling that there be a division, that I am not voicing only my objection. I speak for the members of the Official Opposition. They endorse my position that there should be this division, and they ask you, through me, that when a disposition of this motion is made Your Honour divide the questions. Then, we will not be faced with the problem of going through intellectual gymnastics in trying to decide which parts to vote against because they are objectionable and which parts to support. I think the precedents I have pointed to are sufficient, so I rest my case. I would ask that Your Honour give it respectful consideration.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make two comments on the argument which has been so ably made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. It is true that he raises some issues which are relevant as we begin consideration of this bill. It may be of some assistance to the House to realize that the over-all theme of the bill is to improve and make more efficient the organization of government. All the propositions which are, in the words of my hon. friend, contained in the bill, are directed, at least in the mind of the government, to improving and making more efficient the organization of government. All the items the House is asked to deal with in the bill are relevant to the over-all theme.

I would argue that during this session we have dealt with bills which contained several propositions. We have dealt with bills in this session which have amended several other acts. One which comes to mind immediately is the omnibus loans bill which included loan guarantees for fishermen, farmers and others. Those three were dealt with at the same time. Yesterday, we dealt with the second reading of the textile legislation and I believe one could find quite a number of propositions in that particular bill. Mr. Speaker, I would also mention that on previous occasions we have had before us similar government organization bills in which new departments have been created, so at such times essentially the same kind of legislation has been considered. There is, therefore, ample precedent. I do not see any difficulty from that point of view, but I now come to the crux of the argument made by the hon. member, namely, that there are several principles in this bill.

The authorities, of course, always refer to the principle of the bill on second reading. Presumably, one could argue that the over-all principle of this bill is to ask the House to approve a scheme of improved organization of government. That would be the single principle, but there are other principles as well. Mr. Speaker Michener did rule on this point at one time when he was confronted with a bill which made him ask the question, can a bill which raises several principles, come before the House for second reading. I recall very clearly the ruling but I have not had an opportunity to find it. He ruled that on second reading the House could indeed be involved with a bill which contained one or several principles. I would argue that this ruling is relevant here if my hon. friend's argument that there must be one principle and one proposition is to be pressed. I think that both precedent and that particular ruling would assist in clarifying the point.

I shall conclude by saying that the House, in looking at this bill on second reading, presumably must balance the principles and consider whether those principles each hon. member can support are more important than those he may not be able to support. In other words, we would have to be guided by that consideration as we all are in looking at any bill. An hon. member could give support over-all to the bill on second reading and then, when it reaches the committee of the whole stage, he would have an opportunity to say yes or no to each particular proposition. The House is not at any particular point being denied an opportunity to judge every single proposition in the bill, because that is the purpose of the committee stage. Hon. members will be able to determine their attitude in respect of the Department of the Environment, in respect of the Ministries and the Ministers of State and in respect of the Public Service Superannuation and they can say yes or no. So, no opportunity is denied members to decide on each of these so-called propositions.

I shall simply summarize, Mr. Speaker, by saying the over-all theme or over-all principle of the bill is the improved organization of the government and that each of these so-called propositions is directed to that policy objective. In the past, we have had bills which have included changes in various departments. We have had bills which included various propositions. Indeed, we have a ruling of Mr. Speaker Michener that on second reading the House could be asked to deal with a bill which contained several principles. Finally, the members of the House will be given an opportunity to say yes or no to each of the so-called propositions when each clause is called during the committee of the whole stage.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) for raising this point of order. It is one to which I believe Your Honour will have to give very serious consideration. I shall not have the time of the House to produce all the citations, partly because I do not have them in front of me and partly because I am sure I produced them all in the debate which led to the ruling of Mr. Speaker Macnaughton to which reference has already been made. At the outset I may say, in terms of dealing with precedents, that there is one difficulty we have in that the ruling of Mr. Speaker Macnaughton was in respect of a resolution, whereas this is in respect of the second reading of a bill. I admit that before we start. However, I believe the principle which has been enunciated by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants still stands, namely, that Parliament should have the right to make a decision on a principle standing by itself.

I should like to answer directly the main argument used by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). Before doing so, may I say that the reply of the President of the Privy Council to this point demonstrates how serious the matter is. The Government House Leader says we have often done this. He pointed out that a while ago we had before us a bill which amended three loans acts and that on various occasions we have had before us what are called omnibus bills. This is exactly the point. This is the reason I believe it is exceedingly important that this point of order has been raised at this time. In this bill I believe we have a glaring example of how far a government can go when it starts to operate under the umbrella of an omnibus bill. This bill not only has the nine or 10 parts, each of which is separate from the other, but also has schedules and in some of the items in the schedules there is not just a list of departments which have been moved around but actual amendments to statutes which are not referred to in any of the nine parts of the bill itself.

You know, Mr. Speaker, one must not place ideas in the government's head because those ideas might be picked up. However, it is not a very giant step from this to one bill which would include the work of the whole session. The government could bring us here and while we were debating the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne a huge omnibus bill could be brought in for the improvement of life in Canada. There would be about 14 parts in the bill covering the many things the government had in mind, as well as a schedule containing all the little details, and before we knew it we would have the work of a complete session introduced in one bill. Perhaps I am carrying this a little far, but of course one does this in making a point, and with this government even the absurd is not impossible. So, I say that in terms of the operation of Parliament this point of order is very important. How far can a government go in combining a host of different subjects into one bill and ask Parliament to vote on them en bloc without any regard for the individual points?

Now Sir, the chief argument that the President of the Privy Council used to try to offset the case made by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants was that the House is not being denied the right to make a decision on each of the individual parts of the bill. I challenge that statement. The Committee of the Whole may have the chance to make a decision by a standing vote which is not recorded—no names are put down—on each individual part of the bill. But the Committee of the Whole is not the House. In fact, Your Honour frequently has to draw our attention to that. You are not unaware, as the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, of what goes on around here. However, as Mr. Speaker, you are aware only of what goes on in the House, not of what goes on in the Committee of the Whole.

Under our new rules, when a bill goes to a standing committee and comes back for the report stage, we can of course cope with this problem by putting down report stage amendments. In fact, I have frequently defended the establishing of that new process as one of the best things we have done around here. It is now possible for a bill that has gone to a standing committee to come back here and become subject to report stage amendments which are debated in the House with Mr. Speaker in the Chair and to have recorded votes on each amendment. As a result, the House can make a decision on every individual point. If this bill were being sent to a standing committee instead of being dealt with by Committee of the Whole House, that would apply. When the bill came back at the report stage, members could pick out the parts with which they disagreed and put down the appropriate amendment. The House could then make its decision.

However, the motion calls for this bill to go to Committee of the Whole House, and our rule is quite clear. When a bill is reported from Committee of the Whole House, there is no debate and no amendments are allowed at that point. So, the House itself will have no chance whatsoever, despite the assurance of the President of the Privy Council, to vote on the individual propositions either at second or third reading.

I submit that because of this situation, very serious consideration will have to be given to it. Your Honour has been working pretty diligently from your seat up there on high and you may have a ruling by the time this debate is over. On the other hand, you may like to take it under consideration. The point made by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants carries weight when he says that a lot depends on how considerable the opposition is to this section or that. He quoted Mr. Speaker Macnaughton on that point, and it may be that Your Honour may wish to reserve your judgment.

The heart of the appeal that is being made is that the House should have the right to vote separately on these different individual propositions, and notwithstanding the assertion made by the President of the Privy Council, that right is not given to us on the one vote on second reading. It will not be given to us on the one vote on third reading, and we do not get a chance to vote at the report stage on this bill. Therefore, I say that this right is being denied.

Another argument of the President of the Privy Council is that there is one principle involved, that this bill is to improve the organization of the government of Canada. That is a nice play on words, and we have had a fair amount of that today. But in general terms, surely that principle applies only to the setting up of new departments and to shoving or pushing the ministers around a bit. When you get down to the question of Parliamentary Secretaries, to the amendment of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, or to amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act, surely you are getting a long way from the broad general principle of reorganizing the government of Canada. I do not think that a case can be made for the assertion that this is just one general proposition. It is a mixed bag of nine parts, with at least seven or eight different propositions in those nine parts, plus all the individual items that are set out in the schedules. I think this is a most unsatisfactory way to deal with the business before us.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to take part in this most important debate.

I commend the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) for raising a point of order, so as to show, once more, the embarassment where the hon. members find themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and, from the way he talks, one quickly understands that for the government it has become a matter of fact and that, more and more, motions or bills will be moved that will bear on a whole series of separate proposals.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss briefly a particular point. The President of the Privy Council bases himself on the principle that more and more, in the past, the Chair has accepted the principle of omnibus bills, that is bills which contained several different proposals.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my own group, I want to say that the principle of omnibus bills has become for the government a weapon which allows it to handle in its own way the vote of each and every government and opposition member. This principle has become a weapon against democracy and the voting freedom of Parliament members.

Mr. Speaker, one may wonder about the meaning of the vote cast by a member since the right to vote in this House is one of the reasons why we have been elected. Now, the basic quality of a member's vote is that it is freely cast.

Secondly, his vote must be enlightened, that is to say, the member must be in a position to understand easily what it is about.

Let us remember the last omnibus bill containing some hundred amendments to the Criminal Code, and which raised for us a problem of conscience. At that time we either had to vote for the whole bill or to reject it.

It will be alleged that it is still possible for a member to object to a part of the bill he does not approve at the report stage, at the second reading stage or at the committee stage. But, Mr. Speaker, on second reading, the vote is not taken on that, but on the principle of the bill. If the practice of introducing omnibus bills is carried on, members of Parliament will hardly have anything else to do but to press on a button to indicate whether they are for or against a bill depending on its title.

Mr. Speaker, the government thinks that because legislation is introduced it will succeed in solving a given problem. As far as the opposition is concerned, it does not seem a good way to do it. And the trouble does not come from the fact that sometimes the opposition will disagree with the government, but, as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants said a while ago, from the fact that a member may be for five proposals and against the seven others, whereas another supports three proposals and opposes the nine others. A member be in favour of the 12 proposals and likewise he can be against them all.

If the Chair accepts the principle of omnibus bills, whatever their content, only members in favour of the whole bill or those opposed to the whole bill can truly exercise their right to vote in a free and enlightened way. This is riding rough-shod over the enlightened and free vote of all members in favour of some proposals and opposed to others.

If a thorough statistical study were to be undertaken, it would be found that throughout the House extremely few members are either in favour of or against the whole omnibus bill. I voice again our concern that omnibus bills, that I would term package deals and take it or leave it propositions, are used by the government to deprive members of their right to vote freely. Hence, a member is placed in such a position that he actually cannot vote according to his conscience. If he is in favour of certain social measures, it does not necessarily mean that he would be in favour of 50 other proposals included in the bill. Under this procedure, the member is forced to vote for or against a bill as a whole under the pretext of speeding up the proceedings.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the time has not come to establish at this stage whether it is better to speed up the proceedings to the limit, or to respect the stand and the views of the various members on each proposal contained in a bill.

As far as we are concerned, we strongly object to the principle of omnibus bills which trample on the rights and freedom of members and also on the authority of Parliament, which can easily dispose of motions, as can often be seen.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to page 56 of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. I have little experience of parliamentary procedure, but nevertheless I wish to quote paragraph (10) of Standing Order 58, which reads in part as follows:

> —the Speaker ... shall put forthwith successively, without debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of any item of business relating to interim supply, main estimates, and supplementary of final estimates—

So, Mr. Speaker, I wonder why at this stage you could not raise and put all the questions contained in the omnibus bill so that the business of the House might be expedited to the great satisfaction of the government.

Mr. Speaker, you may smile at this little example because it is so simple, but it certainly would be normal, especially as we are aware of your concern for the protection of members' rights. If it is abnormal to move a motion to cover all those financial matters, we suggest that a bad procedure is being perpetuated because then we keep supporting the government when it introduces omnibus bills that may contain from 10 to 200 different proposals.

Mr. Speaker, the argument of the President of the Privy Council has no validity whatever, for it is utterly preposterous to talk about a "reorganization of the government". If it had any validity, one could in the same bill introduce a motion on every department and Crown corporation and all the Chair would have to say is: "It is true, these various elements are related because they all have to do with the government."

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that this is an instrument in the hands of this government to trample democracy and participation, as well as the freedom of each member.

I hope to be forgiven for this argumentation which is more or less in order. I merely wanted to base it on good common sense which, I submit, is too often trampled on in this chamber.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, some 15 or 20 minutes ago I thought I had a number of fresh arguments to advance, but the last two speakers have pretty well covered the ground which I had hoped to cover. Having listened to them, and more particularly to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), I am more than ever convinced that my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) is correct.

It seems to me that the minister, in effect, is asking Parliament to say that the end justifies the means. He says that the purpose of this bill is the efficient re-organization of the government, and therefore everything can be locked into the same bag. I put it to him that his argument is ridiculous because we could take every measure that comes before the House dealing with matters of trade, whether sponsored by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), lump them into one bill, and say that they were for the more efficient prosecution of the trade of Canada. In other words, during a whole session we might have perhaps only half a dozen omnibus bills. I see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) benignly nodding his head. That is just the attitude I find so repugnant, the attitude that the end would justify the means.

I find it exceedingly difficult to see how one can ask the House to pronounce itself, on second reading, on a ministry to be set up to deal with environmental control, which I am sure meets with general approval in the House, and at the same time on the question of the early retirement of certain civil servants, which happens to be fitted into this omnibus bill. The relationship between those two questions is absolutely non-existent. There is no connection between the early retirement of senior civil servants and the creation of this new ministry. Yet we are being asked to decide on these two questions in single recorded votes, both on second reading and third reading. That is a denial of fairness. I must add my voice to those who protest most vehemently against our being asked to consider second reading of a bill of this kind.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up the time of the House with arguments that have already been so well presented, particularly by my colleague the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As a matter of fact, the latter advanced some arguments that I was going to present, and I agree thoroughly with what he said. I would just like to add that I do not think he went far enough.

The question of what items should be within a single piece of legislation, as Your Honour well knows, has been a problem for a great many years. Shortly after I first came to the House in 1954, the government of the day presented a series of amendments to the Criminal Code and, although contained in one bill, they seemed to involve a great many unrelated principles. Of course at that time there was an opportunity for a member to express his views in the House on second reading but there was no opportunity—and I think this is important—to have a recorded vote on specific amendments, as there is under our new procedures. At that time, technically speaking, while the proposed amendments came under the same umbrella, inasmuch as they dealt with the criminal law of Canada, I repeat that they dealt with a number of different principles.

When the latest amendments to the Criminal Code were considered a couple of years ago there was, of course, under our new rules an opportunity for hon. members on the report stage, after the bill had been referred to special committees of this House, to express their views on the different principles involved. These principles involved such things as gambling, lotteries, abortion, sex offences and the like. However, as has been pointed out, in with this bill we are dealing with a whole series of apparently unrelated principles. We are being asked at this time to vote on them en bloc. It is like saying to us, "Do not throw out the baby with the bath water; surely, you do not want to vote against the whole bill just because of one small objection you have to one aspect of the bill?" The implication in that argument is that every member of the House is in complete agreement with almost every clause of the bill, and that is manifestly not so. I am sure Your Honour recognizes that.

In that connection, Your Honour, may I say that I think it is the right and privilege of every member of this House to make known his position on certain matters. That is one of the reasons our constituents sent us down here. On matters of public importance, and particularly of moral importance, that come before this House, a member has the right to have his vote recorded. If this bill is considered in committee of the whole, there will be no opportunity whatsoever for a member's vote, to be recorded so that his constituents will know how he voted. Under those circumstances our parliamentary system provides no opportunity for recording the votes of elected representatives, on certain subjects. It has been said, "Of course, the people can read Hansard." It is not always easy for constituents to get hold of copies of Hansard, particularly since nowadays there are such large constituencies. I think it is only fair and proper that a member's position on any particular clause of the bill, especially a bill containing a number of unrelated items such as this bill, should be recorded.

This leads me to the final point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker. I have already indicated on many occasions in this House when successive governments have been in power, and when a question has arisen about the sort of legislation which may be presented to the House, that I object to an umbrella bill which introduces a whole lot of unrelated principles.

An hon. Member: The Tories did that.

Mr. Nesbitt: Arguments have been presented on this point. For instance, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) may express the view that this is really a bill to improve the organization of government. Yet, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) so aptly put it, you could include almost everything in such a bill and call it an act to improve the quality of life in Canada. I submit that a set of principles or guidelines will have to be laid down. I do not think anyone in this House wants to place an unnecessary burden on Your Honour or whoever may in future succeed Your Honour. Nevertheless, somehow guidelines will have to be laid down. These matters have come before this House time and again. Unless guidelines are laid down to prevent governments, either the present government or any other, from trying to do this kind of thing, this House will become nothing but a mockery and a joke. I suggest, respectfully, that Your Honour might defer a decision in this matter for a day or so, and then lay down for the present occasion as well as for future occasions a set of guidelines that ought to be followed in such cases.

I realize, being a pragmatic person, that a certain amount of discretion must always be left to Your Honour, or to your eventual successor. That will be necessary. It seems to me that some sort of guidelines will have to be laid down to indicate that the parts, of any omnibus bill that is presented to the House must bear some closer relationships than is apparent in this case. In other words, the principles of the bill, to refer to Mr. Speaker Michener's decision alluded to by the President of the Privy Council, must themselves be related. I hope that to avoid difficulties not only on this occasion but in future, Your Honour will lay down some guidelines. I hope, when this kind of legislation is presented to the House in future, it will be necessary for it to fall within the ambit of certain guidelines. I hope Your Honour might be able to do this.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the arguments which have been advanced. It seems to me that the main burden of the argument that has been made is that members of the House must, when the Speaker is in the chair, be provided with an opportunity of voting, if not on all the details, at least on all the separate propositions contained within any bill. If that is valid, Mr. Speaker, then I suggest there is no purpose for the committee of the whole; and, if you want to take the argument to ridiculous lengths, there is probably no purpose for the standing committees of the House, either. If hon. members opposite wish to argue that all the details or different propositions of any bill must be the subject of a separate vote, with Mr. Speaker in the chair—I am not arguing as to the purpose for which members might wish to have their votes recorded—then, of course, there would be no reason for the committee to take under consideration bills of this nature, or any other nature.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is competent for either standing committees of this House, or indeed, the committee of the whole of this House, to amend any clause of this or any other bill. To be more specific, Mr. Speaker, the amending capability enables such committees to delete completely any clause from this or any other bill. This has been the practice for a very long period of time, Mr. Speaker. So, when any member argues that he does not have an opportunity to disagree with this or that individual provision of this bill or indicate that he supports other parts of the bill, I submit that his argument is not valid.

Mr. Nesbitt: Nobody has argued that point.

Mr. Olson: I suggest, further, that every member of the House is also a member of the committee of the whole, and that the opportunity of disagreeing or agreeing is not denied to him. It is a novel argument, I suggest, that every disagreement with respect to certain provisions within a bill ought to be the subject of a recorded vote. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) supports that argument. He says he wants to advise his constituents how he voted on any of the separate propositions of the bill.

Mr. Nesbitt: My constituents want to know how you vote. I do not know if that holds true for the minister's constituents.

Mr. Olson: That has not been the practice of this House, either in the committee of the whole or with regard to standing committees. Hon. members have known for a long time that the total numbers of those for or against a proposition only have been recorded.

Mr. Alexander: Could the minister elaborate on that point?

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. Olson: Citation 389 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, page 279, reads in part:

> A motion opposing the second reading of a Bill must not anticipate amendments which may be moved in Committee. Alterations which may be affected by amending the clauses of the Bill cannot be moved on the second reading.

I know that it is not intended to move amendments to the motion at present. I have quoted that citation only to give credence to our rules, and to the precedents for our rules, which provide that there is an opportunity in the committee of the whole and in standing committees for amendments of substance to be moved.

I think that if the arguments against our proceeding with the bill at this time hinge on the point that hon. members will not have an opportunity to vote on each separate proposition in the bill, I can only say that these arguments, if acceded to, would be a new departure and not in keeping with the practice over a long period.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, even though I have sat in the House for a limited time, I have the nerve to say that I listened with amazement to the minister who just spoke. My first experience with an omnibus bill was the bill dealing with the Criminal Code amendments relating to homosexuality, abortion and other matters. I listened to that debate in my early days in this House. I sat here perplexed and frustrated because the procedure leaves individual members, particularly on the opposition side, in a precarious position. I am not too interested in members sitting on the government side because I know how they think and how they vote.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Alexander: I know because of the pattern of the record. I hope the minister is not trying to convince me that this procedure is correct and that it is, in truth, participatory democracy. A member on this side may be in favour of some parts of the bill and unalterably opposed to others. Nevertheless, to be credible and to show involvement in the work of the House he has to vote either directly for or against the bill as a whole. I do not want the minister to shake his head when he knows what happened in connection with that omnibus bill. I hope he is not serious when he says it does not really matter. It is one thing for people over there, where members are like sheep who follow a leader, and another thing for those who sit on opposition benches and wish to become involved with certain principles which they find either offensive or in keeping with their own ideas.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I note that the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) wishes to take part in the debate. Evidently, I will allow him to do so, but I would suggest to hon. members that I have heard the argument for and against the point of procedure raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) a moment ago and I will soon be ready to make a ruling, taking into account all the points raised during the debate. Moreover, each of the members who wished to take part in the discussion has had the opportunity to do so without any intervention from the Chair. I think that in all fairness, the hon. member for Abitibi should enjoy the same privilege. The House will be interested in hearing him, I am sure; but if hon. members agree with me, after having heard the hon. member for Abitibi, I will give hon. members an opportunity to hear my own views in this connection

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend speaking at length on this matter. I know that many things have been said for and against omnibus bills. As far as I am concerned, I am opposed to this type of proceeding which places members in rather tricky situations. One part of an omnibus bill may be easily acceptable to us while another may leave doubts in our minds.

We can recall the omnibus bill to amend the Criminal Code and also a similar bill introducted in 1966 or 1967 concerning an increase in old age security pensions from $65 to $75. Everyone agreed on this point, but the bill also included a provision to increase taxes in order to replenish the old age security fund, which many opposed. It was therefore necessary to approve or reject both provisions as a whole. In consequence our position was untenable.

According to the government, this type of bill is introduced in order to facilitate consideration of it. I suggest that it is not so. If the bill on government re-organization had been studied in stages, if the case of each department had been examined, it could have been determined which ones need to be organized or re-organized. Certain provisions could have been adopted in five minutes, ten at the most. For the others, a little more time would have been needed, but on the whole all members would have been able to express their views on each provision, and that is not the case now.

I believe that the government should stop introducing bills of this sort and should instead submit very specific bills so that we may express our views clearly and frankly.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) as well as his colleagues who have wanted to make their views known and thus enable the Chair to benefit from their long experience in order to make a decision and to humbly express its opinion on the matter.

[English]

The point raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) is one of very great importance. I think I may say that when this bill was introduced in the House and given first reading, I raised my eyebrows and wondered whether the established procedures were being followed. Because of that, I have been thinking about the situation, and even before the point was raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants I gave the matter serious thought wondering whether we were proceeding in the right direction.

There is no doubt in my mind that there is considerable substance in the point raised by the hon. member in the first instance. I am also quite impressed by the argument advanced by other hon. members in support of his objection. I think that, in a way, he has a legitimate grievance or complaint.

My problem is, of course, whether he can advance a legitimate procedural argument, and this is where I find some difficulty. As the House knows, the Chair has to be guided to a considerable extent by precedents established over a number of years. During the hour or so this debate has been going on, the learned gentlemen at the table have obtained for me, at my request, certain precedents showing that similar points have been raised in the past. This is not the first time we have had before us a measure of the kind which have been called omnibus bills. On many occasions objections have been raised very strongly by hon. members. I would not like to go into all the details but, briefly, if hon. members will allow me, on April 2, 1953 the House had before it an amendment to the National Defence Act. Mr. Brown of St. John's West raised the point:

> I have no doubt the minister can explain why this resolution covers two or three acts. Is it customary to do that?

As members will see, the point was being raised in 1953, and I am sure it was raised even before that. The Minister of National Defence at that time, Mr. Brooke Claxton, claimed that this was what had been done in the past and, as was done today, suggested this had long been the practice of the House. In any event, nothing was done, and the bill was presented to the House unchanged. It was voted upon in its original form.

The question was brought up again; the same bill was subjected to the same objection. The objection of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was reported at length in Hansard on December 10, 1953, at page 797. His words are preserved there for posterity and perhaps I should repeat them for the benefit of double posterity, if that exists.

> This procedure places the members of the house in the situation of being faced with a resolution which deals with eight different matters. Naturally there are eight different principles involved under ordinary circumstances. As far as I can see from casual examination, most of these things are matters which perhaps everyone in the committee would agree with. When we hear more about them, that may not be so. In any event, it might very well be that amongst those eight amendments is one with which we would disagree violently and therefore feel called upon to vote against the resolution or particularly, after we have the bill and have the information, to vote against the bill because of that one matter.

This is the argument which was advanced in 1953 by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Well put!

Mr. Speaker: The argument was well put, as it was well put today by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others. I said that I did not want to go into the details of the few precedents I have before me of more recent vintage. However, reference was made to the Veterans Benefit Act of 1954, and again the same argument was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Then, jumping a decade or so we go to 1964, when the late, respected and beloved member for Digby-

Annapolis-Kings, the Hon. George C. Nowlan, raised the same point. He said, as reported at page 9086 of Hansard for October 15 of that year:

> As the minister has told us, we are dealing here with the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act. Quite a mélange.

Perhaps hon. members might have wanted to say the same thing about the bill now before the House. There is no question, without going further into the details, that this is a long established practice. We have had this type of omnibus bill before the House on many occasions. The President of the Privy Council and the Minister of Agriculture have quite rightly argued their case that this is long established practice and that the government has followed past practice. That is their argument and it has to be respected. Certainly, the Chair must take that into account because of the importance of precedent in our system.

However, where do we stop? Where is the point of no return? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West, said that we might reach the point where we would have only one bill, a bill at the start of the session for the improvement of the quality of life in Canada which would include every single proposed piece of legislation for the session. That would be an omnibus bill with a capital "O" and a capital "B". But would it be acceptable legislation? There must be a point where we go beyond what is acceptable from a strictly parliamentary standpoint.

At the same time, having now reached second reading and having had this bill before us for some time, I doubt whether we should take the very drastic and extreme position, as I suggest to hon. members it would be, of saying that this bill is not acceptable to the House, that it should not be put by the government and that it should not be considered by hon. members. In my view it should be the responsibility of the Chair, when such bill is introduced and given first reading, to take the initiative and raise the matter for consideration of the House by way of a point of order, as I have taken the liberty of doing with a number of private members' bills. When those bill came before the House for first reading I entered a caveat about them and gave hon. members an opportunity of expressing their views. At any rate, some of those bills were refused by the Chair.

At that point, it is much easier for the government to go back to the legislative mill, to the judicial luminaries of the Department of Justice, where these bills are prepared for the consideration of Parliament. If I may say so, I think that even those very learned gentlemen should take into account the fact that this aspect of legislation is of interest to all hon. members, of interest I am sure to the government, and certainly of interest to the Chair, namely, that there must be a point where an omnibus bill becomes more than an omnibus bill and is not acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

One or two hon. members have argued that there would not be an opportunity for members to express their views by way of a vote on individual parts of the bill or individual clauses. That is perhaps not entirely correct. I am not here referring to the committee of the whole; I have made that distinction before now. For hon. members to express their view in committee of the whole on a particular clause of the bill is not the same as being given an opportunity to express their views on a clause of the bill by way of a recorded vote.

The House must note that there is a third reading stage of a bill. When a bill comes to the House for third reading, there is not one clause or one part of the bill that cannot be brought into question by way of an amendment proposing that the particular clause or section be referred back to committee. I think this gives every hon. member an opportunity to vote either for or against, or to express his views in the House either for or against, a particular clause or part of the bill, and to do so by way of a recorded vote. Accordingly there still is a measure of protection afforded hon. members.

Having said this, I would have to rule—if I must rule—that the government has followed the practice that has been accepted in the past, rightly or wrongly, but that we may have reached the point where we are going too far and that omnibus bills seek to take in too much. All hon. members should be alerted to this difficulty of which the Chair is fully conscious. When another omnibus bill is proposed to the House, it should be scrutinized at first reading stage, when hon. members will be given the opportunity of expressing their view, and the Chair can express its view, either that the bill goes too far or that it is acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

I think that this discussion has been a valuable one, certainly as far as the Chair is concerned, and I thank hon. members for the views that they have expressed. Certainly, I am very impressed by them and propose to take them into account when the circumstances warrant an examination of the point of order in the future.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I am always first to stand and say that I appreciate the wisdom and experience of the Speaker. In view of the preamble to your ruling, so properly given, and in view of the fact you have indicated that an omnibus bill might encompass all matters related to the improvement of the quality of life of all Canadians, it seems to me it would be proper and justifiable to reach the conclusion that Mr. Speaker has perhaps chastised the government lightly but firmly.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that is hardly a point of order; it is more a point of disorder.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief point of order which is perhaps more in the nature of a question. At some future date, perhaps after this legislation has gone through the House with whatever the result, I wonder if Your Honour might give consideration to giving the House your views on the set of principles which should be applied to omnibus bills.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I have the same point of order. I, too, entirely concur with the views expressed by members of the House and, indeed, with your ruling. I think it is important at this juncture to point out, if I may, that according to the precedents cited, at no time has an omnibus bill been presented to the House giving carte blanche to the government to appoint ministers, Parliamentary Secretaries and the like. That is an important point which I think should be taken into consideration in the future.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that at this point we are resuming the debate we were having a moment ago. Perhaps hon. members might have expressed these views while we were considering the point of order, so that additional arguments might have been advanced for the consideration of the government and the guidance of the Chair. However, the motion has now been put and the Chair recognizes the President of the Treasury Board.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in moving second reading of the bill sponsored by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I should like to make it clear that I do not intend to go into detail regarding each clause of this bill, because this can be done after the motion for second reading has been passed. Hon. members may wish to raise questions of a general nature relating to the bill; I shall try to answer them. It is my intention to deal with the principle on which the provisions of this bill are based.

In essence, the government organization bill deals with the constant challenge facing Parliament and the government to be as efficient as possible in doing those things which are in the interest of the Canadian people and society. This challenge is imposed upon us by the rapid changes taking place today, and our response in this regard must be positive. Both Parliament and the government must be flexible; both must adapt their procedures and structures; and in the final analysis, the test is whether they are continuing to respond effectively to the needs of the society and of the world with which they must deal.

The government is determined to meet the challenge of change by continually enhancing its capacity to deal effectively with all those matters that are vital to the welfare of Canadians. If enacted, the bill before us, will better equip the government to develop and implement new policies to serve Canadians in a variety of fields: amongst them, the fight against pollution. At the same time it will provide for greater accountability of the executive to Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to turn to Part I of the government organization bill, the Department of the Environment Act.

I believe that very few Canadians need to be convinced that the challenge posed by a deteriorating environment, which faces all people and particularly those living in industrialized nations such as Canada, is one that raises the very issue of human survival itself.

This fundamental issue was clearly recognized by hon. members through their initiative some months ago, to call for the establishment of a Special Committee on Environmental Pollution, which has been ably chaired by the member from Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson). I have no doubt that if Parliament approves the proposal to establish a Department of the Environment, the new minister and his officials will follow with keen interest the proceedings of this Special Committee.

A principal objective of the proposed minister of the environment and of his department would be to ensure that Canadians, both now and in the future, would be able to enjoy a natural environment of high quality. It would be their task to see that acceptable levels of environmental quality are set and where they have been transgressed, that efforts are made to restore these levels and to prevent undesirable changes in the future.

These statements are easy to make, Mr. Speaker, but in a society where many have only recently become aware of and concerned about the problems of environmental quality, a new understanding of and new perspectives on these problems must be developed so that we can come to a general agreement on the sort of balance that should be struck between the quality of our natural environment and the pursuit of those activities which often result in pollution of the environment. The new minister must help Canadians understand the causes and effects of environmental change and their implications, so that the activities of our community can be directed to achieve desirable levels of environmental quality.

Part I of the Government Organization Bill outlines the powers, duties and functions of the Minister of the Environment and lists the statutes for which he is to be responsible. In addition to the minister's general responsibility for renewable resources and for environmental quality, his responsibilities will include those recently transferred to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry by order in council pursuant to the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act. While as a general rule it is important to separate within the administration of public affairs, the exploitation interest from the conservation interest, this rule should not apply in a strict sense—it is important to make a distinction particularly where the resources in question are renewable. Fish, wildlife, crops and trees must have a clean environment if they are to flourish, and they often provide our first indicators of environmental deterioration. Those who are involved in the field of renewable resources have a keen understanding of the importance of conservation and high levels of environmental quality.

In fisheries and forestry for example, there is a keen awareness of the importance of conservation and of the maintenance of environmental quality to continuing commercial success. Therefore, the addition of new emphasis on conservation will not detract from but augment the traditional role of the federal government in relation to those who are engaged in the fisheries business and forestry business. Accordingly, I am confident that the new department will serve the interests of those engaged in fisheries and forestry operations even more effectively than they have in the past.

The renewable resources elements of the new department will be in partnership with the new environmental quality activities of the federal government which were recently transferred to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. The water sector of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, one of the recent transfers, is concerned both with the quality of water and with the management of water as a resource. These two responsibilities are, for all practical purposes, inseparable. This was the conclusion last summer when the House passed the Canada Water Act which embodies the concept of integrated management for water.

The minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) will retain his responsibilities for all energy matters, including the generation of hydro-electric power. The new Department of the Environment will, however, continue to provide the bulk of the water surveys and related information required by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in its activities concerning the development of hydro-electric power.

Certain important water pollution monitoring and control activities of the Department of National Health and Welfare have also been transferred the the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and will form part of the new department.

The bulk of the air pollution programs of the Department of National Health and Welfare have likewise been transferred to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, since these have assumed the brunt of the federal government's fight against air pollution.

The transfer of the Meteorological Branch of the Department of Transport to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry will complement these air pollution programs. Thereby forming the nucleus of the new department's concerns for atmospheric quality. There is, of course, a close inter-relationship between concern for water and for atmospheric matters.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

I would like to enlarge upon some aspects of the role of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources now that its former responsibilities for water have been transferred from the minister of that department to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis). An increasing emphasis must be placed on the development of our energy and mineral resources. These are likely to be two of the most important areas of national interest in the 70's; they are keys to the future. Powerful states and great societies will be mightily concerned about them, as we who have them so richly in our inheritance, must also be. It is with this understanding that the responsibilities of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for the development of comprehensive and coordinated policies in these areas have become substantially greater in the last year or so.

I am sure that I do not have to remind the House, Mr. Speaker, of the recent successful efforts directed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) which will result in greater access for Canadian oil to the U.S. markets. Efforts of this kind, which the Government has accelerated in the last year or so, must be based on full and clear understanding of the energy and mineral resources of Canada and the implications for the well-being of Canadians of their exploitation and marketing, as well as of the impact on the quality of the environment.

Parts II and III of the bill, Mr. Speaker, deal with matters consequential on the establishment of the Department of Environment, as well as a few other matters which do not affect the principle of this bill.

Accordingly, I will move on to Part IV, the Ministries and Ministers of State Act. The warp and woof of our ministerial system is very complex. Strands of history and tradition are interwoven with elementary political principles and the basic values of our society to form a continuously evolving fabric. One does not tamper with this system except with very good reason and after the most careful consideration.

Situated at the interface between Crown and Parliament or, as those educated in the American tradition might say, between the executive and the legislature, the ministerial system is in many respects the essential characteristic of our form of government. As such, its development is rightly very much of concern to Parliament generally, and to this House in particular. One of the reasons, then, for bringing forward in the form of legislation the changes envisaged by this bill, is that doing so affords an opportunity for us to talk about the ministerial system, to review how it has evolved in recent years and how it may evolve in the future.

A good point of departure for such a discussion is perhaps an obeisance to the fundamental constitutional principle that it is the Crown's business to organize itself for the administration of the affairs of state, and Parliament's business to guide and supervise that administration by grants to or withdrawals from the executive of duties, powers and functions and of the funds with which to exercise them. Hon. members will immediately recognize that these statements are clearly very great simplifications, one might even say over-simplifications, but it is necessary to be somewhat rudimentary in order that we never lose sight of the basic principles and concepts on which that system is built.

How the Crown organizes itself and how Parliament, in effect, supervises that organization differs considerably as between Great Britain and Canada. We, of course, are rooted in British traditions and have the great advantage of being able to look from time to time at parliamentary institutions in Britain and elsewhere in the world for refreshment, stimulation and occasional correction. None the less, it is hardly surprising that having had our own independent legislatures for over 200 years and this Parliament for over 100 years, we now have many independent ways of our own, customs and conventions that are clearly uniquely Canadian.

Of Great Britain's ministerial system one can really say that the Crown may organize itself as it sees fit.

Ministerial offices and departments are established entirely by prerogative acts. Parliament's supervision is exercised partly by stipulations in terms of the numbers of Members of Parliament that may comprise the ministry at any one time, partly in terms of the allocation of supply and partly by subjecting transfers to new ministers to the liability of potential annulment by negative resolution within a given number of days following tabling of the relevant Order in Council. Within this framework, I think it can safely be said that the government of the day may advise Her Majesty, and Her Majesty may deem it appropriate, to organize her ministry and her public service in any way she wishes.

We in Canada have a somewhat more restrictive tradition. Fundamentally, of course, the prerogative vested in the Crown to establish ministerial offices and fill them remains as untarnished here as it ever was. The office of the President of the Privy Council, and that of the first minister, are examples of offices created under the prerogative. Following Confederation, there was for a time the office of the Secretary of State for the Provinces and there is no reason that this could not be reinstituted or other secretaries of state established. Likewise, a minister for this and for that. But notwithstanding all of this, as a general rule, the Crown in Canada has accepted limitations on its power to organize itself for affairs of state which are not known in Great Britain. Largely as a result of our colonial past, ministries and departments of government have been established by legislation as well as being subject to constant reconfirmation by votes of supply. Even if the Crown established a host of new ministers and departments under the prerogative, it could not pay one of them a penny without the authority of this House and of Parliament. When the Public Service in its broadest sense included no more than a few thousand officials and the activities of the public sector trespassed no more than a few percentage points on the gross national product, when at the turn of the century life was somewhat slower and ministers, officials and members could take their tea on Thursday afternoons in front of fireplaces in their offices, one can understand that delays in organization were almost as inconsequential as the endless metaphysical debates about the jurisdictions of ministers. But the circumstances of today do not admit of delays and jurisdictional uncertainties of the dimensions of the past and so, clearly, we must regard as wholly unsatisfactory a system that admits of such delays and uncertainties. Today, jurisdictions must be clear, and actions must be swift. Above all, a government which disposes of an annual budget of one-sixth of the gross national product, and which employs hundreds of thousands of people must be subject to clear direction and close supervision by the elected representatives of the people and, from amongst them, the Ministers of the Crown.

I have mentioned that in days of yore it was the general rule that governments gave effect to their organizational proposals one by one as urgent demands upon the time of the House permitted. Under these circumstances, the implementation of government initiatives, however vital, and even the simple acts of housekeeping—routine but of enormous consequences in terms of dollar amounts—had to be postponed and sometimes even put over from year to year.

It was in the face of this relentless and often inevitable tendency that governments began some years ago to make greater and greater use of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, and in this connection, of ministers without portfolio. Duties, powers and functions have in the past been transferred in great numbers to and from ministers without portfolio and efforts have been been made with more or less success to transfer to ministers without portfolio the control and supervision of portions, if not of the public service properly speaking, at least of employees of the Crown corporation and agencies. We thus arrived at a situation where ministers without portfolio in fact had portfolios. A complicated situation became further complicated, and jurisdictional lines already confused became further confused.

This created a problem for Parliament, and for this House in particular, because the accountability of the government to Parliament was much more confused, diluted and imprecise than it should have been. In other words, Parliament was the weaker as the result of a ministerial system which had failed to keep pace with the demands placed upon it.

Partly to alleviate this situation, the previous prime minister introduced the technique of the government organization bill and that has, to an extent, ameliorated the situation. It has not, however, solved the problem of delay or put in place a ministerial structure sufficiently varied and flexible to cope with contemporary demands of complex issues and big government. Nor has it solved the problem of a prime minister in allocating manageable responsibilities to ministers and defining them with precision. It is to resolve these problems that we propose what in the current government organization bill is identified as the ministries and ministers of state act.

This legislation would identify two kinds of ministers in addition to the departmental ministers and ministers without portfolio with which we are all familiar. I say "identify" rather than "establish" because we already have the kind of ministers described in the bill and all we are now doing is putting names to what already largely exists. The ministerial structure described in the bill flows from an analysis of what governments have been doing under the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act and under the prerogative in relation to ministers without portfolio. This analysis leads to the identification first of the departmental minister, such as the secretary of state or the minister of national defence, who is the subject of departmental legislation. At the other extreme, there is the minister without portfolio whose title suggests a freedom from particular administrative responsibilities to take up a roving commission that would give his colleagues in cabinet a source of advice and judgment.

In between the departmental minister and the minister without portfolio, circumstances have clearly demonstrated a requirement for a kind of minister for a designated purpose who, while clothed with the rank and status of a departmental minister and supported by a staff of public servants, would be charged with a particular mission, usually of a policy nature, generally of short, or at least not necessarily of permanent, duration.

Finally, there is the fourth kind of minister: the minister who is assigned primarily to assist another minister and who would be called a minister of state. A minister of state might assist a minister with particularly heavy responsibilities or with a specific responsibility requiring special attention. Ministers of state would be able to receive powers, duties and functions from other ministers, and would be responsible to Parliament directly in accounting for the manner in which they exercised them.

The possibility of transferring powers, duties and functions to a minister without portfolio has not been precluded. The clear intention is, however, that this position would be used for the purposes its title suggests, and that in the future a prime minister would no longer feel compelled to assign to ministers without portfolio responsibilities which would be much more appropriate to other categories of ministers.

I may endeavour to summarize. With the enactment of the ministries and ministers of state act, there would be four categories of ministers of the Crown. Ministers in all four categories would be appointed on the advice of the prime minister by commission under the Great Seal of Canada, to serve at pleasure, and be responsible to Parliament as members of the government of the day and for any responsibility which might be assigned to them by law or otherwise.

Departmental ministers would occupy an office created by statute to which are attached powers, duties and functions defined by statute; have supervision and control over a portion of the public service known as a department; be limited in number by the number of statutory ministerial offices; have salaries provided for by title in the Salaries Act; and seek appropriations on their own from Parliament to cover the cost of the activities for which they are responsible.

Ministers of state for designated purposes would occupy an office created by proclamation on the advice of the prime minister; be limited in number by statute to five; be charged with responsibilities for developing new and comprehensive policies in areas where the development of such policies is of particular urgency and importance; have a mandate effectively determined by the prime minister which would be of such duration as to enable them to come to grips with the policy problems assigned to them; receive powers, duties and functions and exercise supervision and control of relevant elements of the public service; and seek parliamentary appropriations independently of any minister to cover the cost of their staff and operations. They would have a "secretary" who would have the status and authority of a deputy head for the purpose of the Financial Administration Act and the Public Service Employment Act, and would preside over ministries which would eventually either become parts of new or existing departments or whose existence would be terminated.

[Mr. Drury.]

Ministers of state would be appointed to assist a departmental minister in the discharge of his responsibilities; receive powers, duties and functions; be limited in number by the appropriations that Parliament is willing to pass to cover their salaries and expenses; and receive the same salary as a minister without portfolio provided for them in the estimates of the minister with whom they were to be associated. Finally, ministers without portfolio would have responsibilities assigned by the prime minister, and would not normally exercise statutory powers, duties and functions.

We do not believe, of course, that the provisions of the ministries and ministers of state act will provide the best of all possible worlds, but we do believe that they constitute a solid and most important advance. In designing them, we have tried to adhere to the genius of our system of government. We have not thought it wise to try to recast completely the ministerial system. Neither have we felt it wise to open up the increasingly obvious distinction among departmental ministers, that is, the distinction between those concerned primarily with operations, those concerned primarily with policy, and those concerned primarily with control. These are all products of history as well as of reason.

Decision making is, after all, a political as well as an administrative process. Whereas logic and measurement can certainly be promoted to high place in considering the administrative process, one should think twice before putting them in a position of dominance over the hundreds of years of history from which we have distilled the experience with human nature which is, in so many ways, the essence of our political process.

It will be said by some that the ministries and ministers of state act will significantly enlarge the administration. Particularly will this be the complaint when the House deals with part V of the government organization bill, which is an amendment to the Parliamentary Secretaries Act. We would not at all accept this allegation, Mr. Speaker. After the government organization bill has passed, statutory offices would exist for 26 departmental ministers in addition to the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council. There would be provision for the appointment of not more than five Ministers of State for designated purposes, and subject to the requirements of the Crown and Parliament's agreement to appropriate the necessary moneys, it would be possible to name a number of Ministers of State and Ministers without Portfolio.

The government does not envisage the appointment of all five of the Ministries of State, but it will ensure that the ministers, of all categories, and the Parliamentary Secretaries who may be appointed will be in a much better position than now to advise, develop and direct policy, and to control a government employment of half a million public servants.

In the last election there was a prevalent demand for greater sensitivity in government, to be accompanied at the same time by more government activity and less government intrusion or, at least, less "big" government. As I implied earlier, Mr. Speaker, the best answer to this apparent riddle lies in the strengthening of parliamentary institutions and in this context, among other things, in an increase in the number of Members of Parliament acting within the public service to develop policy, and generally to provide a nexus between the people and the public service.

The primary concern should not be that cabinets are too large but rather that too few ministers are charged with so many urgent matters that they have to abdicate the task of policy development, or at least its control, entirely to experts who do not have to be directly responsive to changing popular feelings. It is well to remember that however big a cabinet, all ministers are accountable to Parliament individually. Distribute all the burdens of government across a smaller ministry, and you generalize the grasp that each minister has over his larger area of responsibility—

Mr. Stanfield: Did you say grasp or graft?

Mr. Drury: Grasp.

Mr. Stanfield: I wasn't sure.

Mr. Drury: —and necessarily make more nebulous the substance of his reporting to the House.

One human being endowed with no more than 24 hours in a day can comprehend only so much, and the more you put on his plate the more general his comprehension, and so his accountability of it is likely to be. Thus, it is not a bad thing if we move towards somewhat larger ministries since Parliament benefits from the greater precision that enlargement allows. Particularly is this so in the type of situation that in the past has had to be dealt with by transfers to Departmental Ministers or Ministers without Portfolio, but which in the future will be open to the use of Ministers of State.

Previously, and as things now stand, the undertaking of a special mission of policy development was added to all the other departmental duties a minister might have. Under the Ministries and Ministers of State Act, it will not be necessary to detract from one area of public concern in order to come to grips with another, and hon. members will know the special missions above and beyond a minister's departmental responsibilities that the government has identified, and they will have directly accountable to them the ministers who have been charged with these missions.

It is also in line with the concept of enlarging the interface between those who administer public affairs and Parliament, and particularly this House, that the government proposes Part V of the Government Organization Bill, the amendment of the Parliamentary Secretaries Act. There is clearly a need to provide ministers with assistants in discharging their manifold responsibilities, and nowhere more so than in relation to Parliament. This has been the purpose of our system of Parliamentary Secretaries and it has proven to be beneficial not only to ministers but to hon. members in providing them with a continuously available means of access to departmental information and services. The existing provisions of the Parliamentary Secretaries Act are that there cannot be more than 16 parliamentary secretaries appointed to assist ministers at any one time.

It has been many years, however, since the number of ministers with departmental responsibilities has been anywhere near 16, and at the same time the need for parliamentary assistants has enormously increased as a direct consequence of the development of the committee system and other government efforts to enhance the role aud authority of Members of Parliament. The Government Organization Bill proposes that there could be as many Parliamentary Secretaries as there are ministers with departmental responsibilities or with major portfolios.

Section 4 of the Salaries Act lists the offices of these ministers, and so the government organization bill provides that the number of Parliamentary Secretaries should not at any one time exceed the number of ministers who hold offices for which salaries are provided in section 4 of the Salaries Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to turn to Part VI, concerning amendments to the Post Office Act.

In addition to some of the major changes that I have just described, Mr. Speaker, the reform and reorganization of the machinery of government often calls for a certain amount of fine tuning in the light of experience. The House will recall the announcement of the appointment of the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Côté) as Minister without Portfolio to assist the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) with his responsibilities for postal matters. The simultaneous and urgent requirement both for reform of the Post Office as well as for the development of major new policies in telecommunications, prompted this move.

The House will also recall that when the Department of Communications was established by the Organization Act in 1969, this act included an amendment to the Post Office Act providing that "the Minister of Communications is the Postmaster General". It continues to be the government's view that mail is an important mode of communication and that postal affairs must always be closely coordinated with other modes of communication. Given the importance and urgency of formulating and implementing new policies for improved telecommunications and improved postal service for all Canadians, it has become imperative that the responsibilities for communications and postal affairs should be evenly shared by two ministers. Hon. members are aware, Mr. Speaker, of the studies being made at this time on the structure of postal and telecommunication services.

Accordingly, Part VI of the Government Organization Bill includes a section to amend the Post Office Act, to provide that the Minister of Communications would be the Postmaster General unless a Member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada were appointed to the office of Postmaster General by appointment by Commission under the Great Seal of Canada.

So far, Mr. Speaker, I have talked almost exclusively about structures and institutions and now I would like to deal with the question of personnel which is the subject of Part VII.

At present, it is impossible for a public servant to retire before age 60 without losing a substantial portion of the pension that he could receive at that age. This has created particular hardships for certain categories of employees such as air traffic controllers, aircraft pilots, certain National Film Board technicians and penitentiary guards, where the requirements of their work are such that, normally, continued employment after the age of 60 may be beyond an individual's capacity or may be held to be too exacting at that age. In other cases, public servants who might wish to take up a second career in their later years may hesitate doing so because of the severe reduction in their pension if they left the public service before age 60.

In a sense, these people are locked in by our present superannuation arrangements which do not provide for retirement before age 60, except on health grounds, without accepting an actuarial reduction in pension. Since many of these public servants have talents and experience of rather unique character which might well be of value to other sectors of society, the government believes it to be in the public interest to make possible a greater degree of mobility between the public and private sectors than has existed in the past, by lowering the age at which voluntary retirement can be sought, without loss of pension.

Not only will improved and more flexible early retirement provisions work to the benefit of individual employees, but they should aslo provide a firmer basis for improving the effectiveness and efficiency of the public service.

There may well be a number of specific cases where individuals, after many years of useful public service, are no longer capable of meeting the changing requirements of their jobs. Situations like this can arise from a variety of circumstances including the unusually high pressures and tensions of executive employment as well as the failure do adapt to change. The existing retirement provisions do not enable the government to deal with cases like these in anything but very harsh terms, if at all, but the new provisions will enable the government to release such individuals from the public service without undue hardship to the persons involved. These new provisions should also enable the government to exact the high standards of performance required in a dynamic public service.

Since it is particularly important at the apex of responsibility in the public service that the public is served by the best people available at the height of their career, special provisions should be provided for those who occupy the positions of deputy minister or its equivalent.

[Mr. Drury.]

In the public sector, provisions for early retirement are also becoming more common. The Civil Service Superannuation Plan of one province, for example, has just been amended to provide a full pension for public servants at age 55 with 32 years of service. In the United States, federal servants may retire on a full annuity at age 55 once they have 30 years of service to their credit.

The proposals in the Government Organization Bill are in line with these provisions.

Mr. Speaker, there remain Parts VIII and IX of the Bill, but since these do not relate to the principle of the Bill but to matters which are consequential upon earlier parts which I have discussed, or which are transitional, I do not intend to deal with them at this stage. The schedules to the Bill list the acts for which the Minister of the Environment would be responsible and provide for further consequential amendments and so here again, I will not comment on them.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to review the main elements of the bill. The enactment of the Department of the Environment Act will greatly facilitate the mounting of a concerted attack by the federal government of the problems of pollution.

The enactment of the Ministries and Ministers of State Act and the amendment to the Parliamentary Secretaries Act, will enable the administration and the executive to come to grips much more effectively than in the past with the myriad responsibilities facing the government of Canada now, and with many other responsibilities that we know will fall to the government in the future. The enactment of this piece of legislation will also enhance and make clear the accountability of the Executive to Parliament—a particularly important provision in a period where the responsibilities that fall to the Executive appear to grow without an end in sight.

Finally, the amendments to the Superannuation Act will provide a new basis for the development of improved personnel policies which this government has regarded as a key to better management of public affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for the cooperation of hon. Members in giving this bill careful consideration and speedy passage.

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, first, on behalf of hon. members, may I thank the minister for dealing with points of principle and leaving some of the details until later. I, myself, will concentrate on two or three subjects, instead of trying to cover the whole waterfront. It is unlikely that I shall spend much time in dealing with the fact that astronomic observatories are to be taken from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and put under the National Research Council. I think the appropriate place for the observatories would be under the authority of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) so that the government could keep in some kind of touch with rising unemployment.

Mr. Gilbert: Very good.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External Affairs—Sale of arms by France to South Africa—Canadian position; the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte)—Indian Affairs—National Parks—Quebec—Development of park in St. Maurice Valley—Construction of ski centre in Saint Gérard; the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski)—Indian Affairs—Special funds to assist Indians and Métis.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT FINANCING OF PRIVATE MEMBERS PUBLIC BILLS

On the order: Private Members' Public Bills:

October 20, 1970—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-9, An Act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965 (Financing of private members' public bills).—Mr. Baldwin.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the sponsor of the bill, who is away on parliamentary business, perhaps there could be agreement to allowing this item to stand without losing its position on the order paper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed? Shall the item referred to by the hon. member stand and retain its position on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont) moved that Bill C-16, to amend the Criminal Code (Abolition of Corporal Punishment) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length on this bill. It is my great hope that, in a few minutes, hon. members on both sides of the House will be disposed to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, where it can be dealt with in detail and from which it can be returned to the House for third reading. I think I should indicate clearly at the outset that the subject is corporal punishment. I find that when this term is used people often think in terms of capital punishment and are somewhat confused about the subject generally, not because they do not understand what is meant when one talks about whipping and flogging but because the more polite term, corporal punishment, is not as familiar to them.

It is probably true to say that corporal punishment has not been the experience of most Members of this House, at least not in their adult years, and presumably it is not an experience which most of us will ever be obliged to undergo. Yet, it is an experience to which certain of our fellow citizens have been subjected, administered as it is under federal statute and in federal institutions. It should, therefore, be very much our concern to take note of the form of state-instituted violence as it is still practiced in this country, particularly since so many hon. members have put on record their strong opposition to the use of violence to resolve problem situations.

In these circumstances it is disturbing to consider that violence is still being exercised in this country—not often, but on occasion, as a certain form of punishment in connection with what is termed justice. To assist in the realization of what this means I should like to quote one description, which was given a few years ago, of the experience of one man who underwent corporal punishment in one of our institutions. This is from an article which was printed some time ago in the Toronto Star, documenting on a question and answer basis the experience of this one individual. The extract reads as follows:

Q. Could you tell us about the strapping and what happened at the time?

A. As to the machine, you mean?

Q. Yes.

A. Well, at the time you go before you get strapped you go up before superintendent there.

Q. Well, yes?

A. And he sentences you to be strapped and you go down to the first floor and they take you down to the machine. When you get there you are examined by a doctor for heart to see if you are physically fit to stand the strapping. Then you are taken and strapped with the machine—what they call the machine. Your hands are handcuffed and your legs are cuffed and also your ankles are cuffed. There is a kidney belt which goes around your kidneys and one around your thighs and there is very little movement you can make while in the machine. Then they blindfold you and pull your shirt over your head and you don't know when you are going to get strapped. Everyone scrapes their feet on the sand floor and you can't hear it coming—it's impossible. The way I understand it, they wait until you relax before they give it to you.

Q. Are you standing erect in the machine?

A. Yes, you are standing on your feet. You are bent over in a leaning position over a crossbar that goes across your middle. While the actual strapping is being administered, there is a doctor there that takes your pulse all the time you are in the machine and afterwards all the officers leave the room and you are taken out of the machine and the blindfold is taken off. If there is further punishment after that like the hole, you are taken directly from the strapping room to the hole.

This description of what might be called a civilized approach to violence surely seems offensive and shocking to the general public as well as to members of this House. In this enlightened era of the 'seventies, these details must come as a shock to all those who believe we have travelled some distance in our understanding of how to deal with those who commit criminal offences. On the other hand, we may feel that the kind of program which has been described is only of limited interest. Yet more than one psychologist and observer of the human scene has suggested that the exercise of corporal punishment, as instituted under statutory authority in this country, people get a vicarious, masochistic pleasure from knowing that some person is being dealt with in this barbaric fashion. It may be true, and it is certainly true according to statistics, that there are not many people in our country today who will have to face a sentence of corporal punishment in the year 1971. However, if even one person must undergo this kind of barbaric sentence without any objection from any of us, what does it say about our society generally?

I am impressed by the fact that in 1956 a committee of the House of Commons met to consider questions related to capital punishment, lotteries and corporal punishment, and made certain far-reaching recommendations. It is of interest that since that day Parliament has substantially changed the law with respect to both capital punishment and lotteries, but it has yet to act on the recommendations of that committee with regard to corporal punishment. Let me read just one of the recommendations which was contained in the report of that committee.

> The Committee kept two considerations in mind throughout its inquiry into corporal punishment as a part of the sentence of the court. The first was whether it deters those subjected to it from further crime and, secondly, whether it deters the public generally to a greater extent than other methods of punishment. The evidence did not justify the view that it will exercise any special reformative or deterrent influence on individuals upon whom it is administered and, on the whole, it appears to have the contrary effect. The Committee concluded that the existence of corporal punishment affords no unique deterrence to crime. Accordingly, the Committee recommends that corporal punishment be abolished for any of the offences for which it is presently prescribed in the Criminal Code.

It seems passing strange that we should be able to act in connection with many other matters during the past 15 years and yet have failed to take the necessary action to remove from the statutes of this country authority for the administration of corporal punishment. It is to be noted that in the United Kingdom, which is often held up as an example to this House, corporal punishment was abolished as far back as 1948, nearly 25 years ago. Since that time, studies have been carried out to establish whether there is any relationship between the non-use of corporal punishment and the records of crime, and it has been conclusively found that there is no relationship. Indeed, it might well be that the abolition of corporal punishment has had a positive effect on the level of violent crime in Britain.

It seems to me the time is long past when Parliament should act on this subject. As long ago as March 18, 1968, I introduced a bill to this end and argued that it should be acted upon either as separate legislation or along with appropriate amendments to the Criminal Code. Unfortunately, the then minister of justice, now the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his successor have not yet taken action to end a method of punishment which is retrograde and out of harmony with the changes which have been made in our Criminal Code.

Why have we not taken steps to abolish corporal punishment? Presumably one must take account of the argument which is still being used by those who contend that the institutional use of whipping or flogging has a positive value. In the first instance, there are many people who would say that there is a definite deterrent, that the very fact it is known that for specific crimes a person will suffer the sentence of being whipped or flogged will in some way deter him from the acts that he is about to enter upon.

The argument of deterrence is a well worn one and is often used, but it is not one that has ever been, in my experience, reasoned or thought out at length. It presumes, in the first instance, the kind of rational preconsideration of some violent or anti-social act. It presumes that the person who is going to commit some particularly offensive crime—and the provisions of the Criminal Code with respect to corporal punishment refer, in the main, to crimes of a moral nature respecting the violation of a child or some form of sexual offence—would take into account during the time of determination to commit this kind of offence that indeed he might suffer corporal punishment as a penalty. I suggest this proposition makes some very great and really hard to accept assumptions. I think that if one were able to penetrate the minds—the sick minds, for the most part—of those who contemplate such events, we would find that anything that might act as a deterrent would primarily be related to the fear of being caught.

In this regard let me refer to the report of a review of corporal punishment in Great Britain published by the Advisory Council on the Treatment of Offenders and presented by the British Home Secretary to parliament in 1960. I quote from the report:

> It was clearly concluded that corporal punishment was not an especially effective deterrent immediately before its abolition, and they—

That is, the statistics.

> —show that its abolition did not result in an increase in the offences for which it was previously imposed.

Having had some 12 years experience with the non-use and non-application of corporal punishment, it is their conclusion that the deterrent value of such punishment is impossible to prove. I think the fact that the courts of this country have generally dispensed with the use of corporal punishment is the result of the experience of the judiciary that it no longer makes any sense whatever in the name of justice to sentence offenders to this form of punishment.

Others would argue that there is an aspect to this punishment that allows for the reform of the individual and that perhaps the particularly difficult criminal, the offender who has not been handled successfully in any other way, can best be dealt with by the exercise of this form of punishment. But what have the studies shown? They have shown very convincingly that healthy people, people who have a positive and healthy outlook on life, when sentenced to corporal punishment suffer the least in terms of long term effects. Yet the people who are sick, the people who commit the kind of offences for which corporal punishment is prescribed as a sentence, when the sentence is passed experience not only a prolongation of their sickness, but their sickness is made a good deal worse. In effect, the rehabilitation program is severely retarded, if not totally set back altogether. There is therefore no convincing argument that the use of corporal punishment for the reform of the offender is effective.

There is a final element to this which I think must be very carefully considered. It is the basic element of which, all too often, we lose sight. I refer to whether or not in having corporal punishment available for use we are protecting society. I wonder whether we have really looked at this question and closely examined those people who have been unfortunate enough to have experienced a sentence of corporal punishment.

Those who have interviewed a number of people who have indeed been whipped or flogged have found that in almost every case the hostility and hatred that this punishment has engendered in these individuals is most difficult to relieve. In many instances, when these individuals go back into society they carry with them into public life a most deep-set and dangerous hostility to the general citizenry. If by the execution of corporal punishment in our federal institutions this is indeed the result, then we have not only not protected society but we may have even endangered it the more. If we have indeed sent people back to society from our federal institutions seething with hatred and hostility as a result of these acts, then we have only ourselves to blame.

I think we must also state that generally, in cases where the state sanctions this form of institutional violence, it must make it more difficult to object, as surely it must object, to the casual and instant violence that bursts out in society from time to time. How credible is it for any government or department of government to be totally opposed to the kind of violent acts that all too frequently occur in our society when in fact that same government and department have reserved unto themselves a form of violence that no one of us can readily accept?

Some hon. members may wonder why I choose to raise this matter so strenuously in this House. I do so because it is my impression that the only place where corporal punishment continues to be sanctioned on a regular basis is in federal institutions. I have attempted in a preliminary way to find out to what degree corporal punishment is used in provincial institutions, and I have found that it is not used at all, to my knowledge, in this province. Indeed, I am gathering the impression that corporal punishment is seldom, if ever, used provincially. But what is being made obvious to me is that in federal statutes and in federal institutions the use of corporal punishment is still provided for and permitted. Surely, this is the place where we should give leadership. Surely, this is the place where we simply should not be following the pack. One can only hope that in this particular instance we might follow the action the government of Great Britain took in 1948, or the action taken by other provinces since then, even the action of the House of Commons committee in 1956.

At the very least, this government should make sure that before this Parliament reaches the stage of dissolution it will have taken some action to abolish the use of corporal punishment in federal institutions. Not only do I think that this is the government's duty; it is something that must be done. I urge all members of this House, having expressed their views, perhaps somewhat briefly during the next few minutes, to allow this bill to go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that the committee can effectively implement the action recommended.

Mr. Hogarth: Would the hon. member permit a question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hogarth: The hon. member is obviously very knowledgeable on this subject, and has gone into it very ably and in some detail. I support the bill entirely, but the one thing I cannot understand is why he merely seeks to abolish corporal punishment as it is provided for in the Criminal Code but does not prohibit its use under the Penitentiaries Act. It is my understanding that the prison officials in this country are hold-outs against the abolition of corporal punishment for the sole reason that they find it very effective within the institutions. I do not know on how many occasions it is used, but I think that is one point of view. Being knowledgeable of this situation, why did the hon. member not go further? Is he prepared to retain that aspect of corporal punishment?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have that question and to have any assistance I can get in drafting this bill. I think this is a useful suggestion that could well be implemented by way of an amendment at the committee stage. Certainly, my aim was to be consistent. Since the principal use of corporal punishment, as the hon. member has pointed out to me, is in federal institutions and penitentiaries, I wanted to make sure that that point was included in the amendment to any statute. I would support the suggestion that has just been made by the hon. member for New Westminster.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, it is assuredly a most happy occasion to discuss in this House a bill from an opposition member and dealing with a truly important subject.

It is true that corporal punishment exists only in relatively rare cases which amount to nine sections of the Criminal Code, but it involves a far more important principle and this is what I would especially like to discuss during my allotted time.

May I say, at the outset, that I will refrain as much as possible from citing an exaggerated number of statistics because I think that their usefulness is considerably restricted. They can indicate some trends, but I believe that great caution must be exercised in their use, for hon. members know pertinently that people with different opinions can use statistics to make their point.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Canadian Criminal Code should be amended so as to abolish corporal punishment, as it is indicated in the bill proposed by my hon. friend.

I am happy to outline here the main facts and considerations that lead me to believe that abolition of corporal punishment would be in the best interest of Canada. I am convinced that before the prescriptions of criminal law can be determined in detail, the purpose of the legislation must be clearly defined in the light of the philosophy governing the treatment of delinquents.

I also think that in the years that followed the original drafting of the Canadian Criminal Code, the changes that occurred in our social morals and in the judgment of behaviour were significant enough to require a new definition of the object of our justice system.

In general, countries of the civilized world recognize that corporal punishment of delinquents is in itself indefensible. As an indication of the revengeful feelings of society, it must face individualized justice systems, aimed at the efficient protection of society through methods of delinquents rehabilitation.

It must be pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that such a change in attitude did not stem from a feeling of disgust for the psychic pressures that may have been inflicted upon the delinquent as a penalty. Modern thinking in that field has evolved, especially as a result of the findings of society with regard to the legal penal system, and a better understanding of the causes of human behaviour, and more particularly abnormal behaviour. This enlarged field of knowledge, mostly the result of research in social science, has been useful in the study and therapeutics of mental illness throughout the civilized world. More recently, a good part of it has been used to some extent in the treatment of delinquents.

We cannot ignore the verdict of history which has repeatedly led to the conclusion that crime seems to have developed to a larger extent when and where punishment was most severe.

The high rate of relapse in our country and the increase in cases of degenerate conduct among discharged delinquents have led responsible persons to conclude that our jails are schools of crime. Since a generation, the study of social sciences and research in that area have succeeded in giving to mankind a pertinent knowledge of the cause and meaning of human behaviour from which it is possible to draw conclusions on the propriety of a social or antisocial behaviour.

Although there are still in that field many unknown factors which are subjected to experiments and studies, there is a sufficient number of data, the accuracy of which has been shown and which remains pertinent in any consideration of the delinquent, so that criminal law can take them into account.

The delinquent is not solely responsible for his criminal conduct. I recognize that all human behaviour stems from motives which urge the individual to try and satisfy some often unconscious needs. It is recognized that this concept is not as simple as were the more ancient and naïve interpretations of behaviour, which admitted the innate presence of a demon that could only be expelled through physical mutilation.

Having admitted that behaviour is influenced by the interaction of inherent individual characteristics and by the individual's experience in his surrounding and in the prevailing cultural environment, it was deduced that the possibility of changing the behaviour may exist, through a modification of the conditions which determine it.

Since the system of justice administration aims at protecting the collectivity against violation of its laws, and that vindictive punishment does not seem to have afforded such an effective protection to society, and also as the possibility of modifying the delinquent's attitude and behaviour so that his crimes will end or become less frequent, it seems to me that criminal law should not practise social vengeance but improve the protection of society in submitting the delinquent to treatments which, according to medical science, are most likely to ensure his rehabilitation.

It is my view, Mr. Speaker, that the abolition of corporal punishment would eliminate from the Canadian judiciary system certain provisions which, in spite of the intentions of the court, are nothing else but means of revenge which do not contribute in any way to the rehabilitation of the delinquent.

Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity, as soon as I heard that I would have to speak on the legislative proposal submitted by my hon. friend, of doing a bit of research on statute law, and I have discovered principles that I consider fundamental and which I shall endeavour to define and to summarize briefly.

[English]

I am respectfully of opinion that there are three principles of criminal justice requiring earnest consideration in the determination of punishment, viz., deterrence, reformation and retribution.

• (5:30 p.m.)

The governing principle of deterrence is, within reason and common sense, that the emotion of fear should be brought into play so that the offender may be made afraid to offend again and also so that others who may have contemplated offending will be restrained by the same controlling emotion. Society must be reasonably assured that the punishment meted out to one will not actually encourage others, and when some form of crime has become widespread the element of deterrence must look more to the restraining of others than to the actual offender before the Court.

Reformation is the most hopeful element in the question of punishment in most cases, and it is in that direction that the efforts of those concerned with criminal justice will be more and more directed. But reformation, too, has its distinct limitations. It has been found in England that many who have passed through all the stages of binding over to keep the peace, probation, approved school, and prison, have yet become habitual criminals. They appear to be beyond all human reformative agencies.

The underlying and governing idea in the desire for retribution is in no way an eye for an eye or a tooth for a tooth, but rather that the community is anxious to express it repudiation of the crime committed and to establish and assert the welfare of the community against the evil in its midst.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to give a brief summary of my views on this matter. I think the time has come for our modern society to have enough confidence in the individual who, in spite of his errors, has a right to rehabilitation. In my view, those who, at the same time that they advocate individual liberty and civil rights, speak out for abolition of corporal punishment, deserve our support.

For my part, I must say I cannot deal with the matter without a certain degree of emotion as for many years I was a defense attorney. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am showing partisanship when enthusiastically advocating the abolition of corporal punishment except in the case of some extremely serious offenses, when it has been established that corporal punishment is the only possible solution.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, that in my youth, when my father deemed the usual normal means to be inadequate, manu militari, or a spanking, as it is known to us, often solved the problem. Evidently, that is perhaps why I went to the bad and am now a member of the House of Commons. However, I must say that in such pleasant company, both that of government members and that of opposition members, I have no complaints.

[English]

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to thank the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) for his concern and his progressive thinking with regard to this important matter. When I heard him describe the vivid and horrible detail of what happens to a young man when the broad strap is applied to him it made me feel ashamed to be a Canadian when this law is on the statute books. The hon. member could have gone into more detail with regard to the effect of the cat-o'-nine-tails when it is inflicted on a young man. It takes a person days and sometimes weeks to recover from the welts on his back. He could have told us that the strap is perforated so that the soft flesh on a man's buttocks is drawn up and torn with each stroke. This is the type of law we have.

The hon. member for Egmont suggests that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I am inclined to disagree with him because we have had studies on this matter and have gone into the matter in detail. When I think of some of the studies there have been on this matter, it would seem that it is now time for action. Back in November of 1968 when the Commissioner of Penitentiaries was before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs I asked him certain questions. These questions are recorded in the report of the Ouimet committee which came out in March 1969. In 1968, as recorded in the Ouimet committee's report, these are the questions I asked and the replies by the Commissioner of Penitentiaries at that time:

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Commissioner, I would like to direct other questions to you with regard to corporal punishment—

Mr. MacLeod: —As far as institutional corporal punishment is concerned, it cannot now be imposed in an institution without the specific approval of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries. Of course, we have very elaborate regulations governing the manner in which it is to be imposed. No more than ten officers can be present. The prison psychiatrist or medical doctor must be there; the warden or deputy warden must be there. The punishment can be stopped at any time by the doctor or the psychiatrist or the warden or deputy warden. Of course, the only problem with making rules about corporal punishment is that the more humane you try to make them, the less humane the operation looks in the end result. My own feeling is that the tendency is for it to go into disuse as a possible prison punishment and, of course, when that happens then presumably the regulations in the act will reflect the practice.

Mr. Gilbert: In other words, you would not have any objection if I brought forth an amendment to repeal that particular section?

Mr. MacLeod: I would not, no. As a judicial punishment, it is remarkable that it is reserved under the Criminal Code for offences that involve the use of violence or the threat of violence by the offender. Our people seem to think that it may have a useful short-term benefit if it is imposed on an offender, but ultimately society reaps more violence from him than it inflicted upon him.

The Ouimet committee states:

The committee agrees with this view. We are of the opinion that corporal punishment is contrary to modern prison philosophy and practice and we recommend its abolition.

Mr. Speaker, that is in respect of corporal punishment in Canadian penitentiaries as a disciplinary measure. It is pointed out in the Ouimet report that from January to October 15, 1968, there was only one case of infliction of corporal punishment. In 1967 there were 19 cases, and in 1966 there were 32 cases. So one can see that the practice is falling into disuse. The hon. member for Egmont said he found there has been no practice of corporal punishment in provincial institutions. The Ouimet report states that Manitoba is the only province or territory which has used corporal punishment as a prison disciplinary measure in recent years.

The report also states that it still appears in prison regulations in British Columbia and Newfoundland but has not been used in those provinces for some decades. So there we have it. It is not being applied in provincial institutions and yet it is applied in federal institutions. We also have the words of the former Commissioner of Penitentiaries with regard to his proposed abolition of it.

Mr. Speaker, as a result of that interview with the commissioner I brought forth a bill which is exactly the same as the bill now before us. That bill was brought forth in December of 1968, two years ago. From that time until now there has been no action. I wonder why we have had no results. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has done very little with regard to this important matter other than bring forth the omnibus bill on the Criminal Code and, last week, the bail bill. He appears to be tidbitting with regard to essential reforms of the criminal law. Surely he can bring forth a mini-bill covering such matters as the abolition of corporal punishment, the abolition of vagrancy as a charge, the right to counsel, uniformity of sentencing procedures and legislation with regard to dangerous offenders. All these matters have been dealt with in the Ouimet report and they have been dealt with in committee. It is high time we had legislation.

I hope that the Minister of Justice will not wait for the Law Reform Commission to bring forth its report concerning these matters. We have had so much study on these matters that it is time we had action. I hope the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) will exert his influence on the Minister of Justice to adopt this measure to abolish corporal punishment. He is quite right that an amendment to the Penitentiary Act is required to give it more strength.

It is very easy for me to speak for the abolition of corporal punishment. Perhaps because of my background and experience in the law I have tremendous abhorrence for the infliction of corporal punishment. Just before I spoke this afternoon I was contacted by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg) who, as a former RCMP officer, wanted to participate in the debate. He said he supported 100 per cent the bill put forth by the hon. member for Egmont. It is his experience as an RCMP officer that the infliction of any type of corporal punishment is wrong in principle and in practice. He said that the only type of punishment with which he would agree would be punishment inflicted by a mother or a father, because that has love as its basis. These are the views of the hon. member, and he made them part of his maiden speech back in 1958. Thus far there has been no action. Not only do I support the hon. member for Pembina but I support other experts, because it is very easy for us to become emotional on this subject, as I am partly because of my experience, my Irish background and my emotional nature.

I direct hon. members' attention to an expert on this subject, Mr. A. M. Kirkpatrick, executive director of the John Howard Society. In an article in the Canadian Welfare magazine of July and August, 1968, he said that the Criminal Code provides for sentencing by the court to whipping for rape and attempted rape, sexual intercourse with a female under the age of 14, indecent assault on a female, incest, indecent assault on a male, choking or using drugs on a victim who attempts to resist the commission of an offence, robbery and armed burglary. Juvenile offenders under the age of 16 years and females are not subject to corporal punishment. He goes on to say as follows:

> Most of the offences listed above are sexual offences presumably carried out during an emotionally aroused state or as a result of a disordered mind. Corporal punishment would not be considered appropriate in the treatment of mentally disturbed persons and therefore should not be considered in sex offences which are manifestly psychological in derivation.

This is the view of Mr. Kirkpatrick. He says that in respect of most offenders there is no deterrent value in whipping for these offences. With regard to the argument—this is one of the arguments put forth by the hon. member for Egmont—on the salutary effect of whipping for these offences, he says:

> The view is often expressed that corporal punishment would have a salutory effect on youths who have persisted in their criminal activities despite reasonable efforts to change their behaviour by probation or reformatory treatment. The United Kingdom departmental committee on corporal punishment in 1938 recommended abolition of caning young offenders. In 1948 this recommendation came into effect. By this time caning had in any event become obsolete as a method of treatment or punishment as it had been found to be ineffective.
> Corporal punishment is regarded by the recipient not as treatment but as retribution which breeds violence and perpetuates hostility. The use of corporal punishment on young offenders would reinforce the view so many of them have that they are not wanted and have no place in society and would further add to the hostile and aggressive behaviour they have developed through home and environmental experiences. Any positive efforts made toward their reform and rehabilitation would be rendered more difficult by such reinforcement of negative behaviour patterns.

Then he sets forth the concept with regard to criminal law as follows:

> The common objective of all concerned in this whole process should be the protection of society by the rehabilitation of the offender. But no one can rehabilitate another person. Opportunities and inducements may be provided but the desire to change must come from within the individual. The use of fear aroused by physical punishment is based on a concept of wilfulness and may have some immediate value while the threat is imminent but has little permanent effect in the reintegration of character which is essential for life in the free society in which the offender has already demonstrated failure to adapt.

He also points out that corporal punishment breeds a great deal of bitterness.

> In April, 1955, the counsel to the committee interviewed in the offices of the John Howard Society of Ontario a number of men who had been strapped in the institutions. A verbatim report of these interviews was made and revealed general hatred by the recipient of the officers involved in his strapping, a determination to get even when released from the institution, and an attitude of greater caution in the institution in infringing rules without getting caught. These interviews revealed that the strap had not been a deterrent as most of these men had experienced it several times and most had returned to prison on sentences subsequent to their having been strapped.
> Some of our institutions house intractable human beings whose hostility and aggression create serious problems of disciplinary control. Newer methods are proving that it is wiser not to counter such hostility by unnecessary force which breeds bitterness; but rather to divert it by work and training programs, by the loss of "good time", and by the creation of privileges which may be withdrawn. Such might be short leaves for home visits and work-out opportunities. Sanctions may be progressively increased with minor penalties achieving great results in the prison setting. Basic to such methods is the individualizing of the inmate and getting at the causes of his incorrigibility. All penal institutions are by nature self-contained social units in which grave abuses of human life and personality have occurred in the past. This must be avoided in any progressive penal system.

> With the changing approach to penology now being made in the penitentiary system, the development of an educational, vocational, religious and cultural program should provide a basic undergirding for a more positive meaning to life in the institutions. The provision of amenities and the anticipated inauguration of short-term leaves for family visiting offer vastly increased privileges which may be withdrawn. The developing emphasis of the psycho-social approach being made by professional personnel through individual and group therapy and medical sedation should enable changed attitudes to the treatment of disturbed inmates in episodic aggressive outbreaks of hostile behaviour. The reduction of the size of the population in the institutions should contribute to better staff-inmate relationships and a permeation of the inmate subculture. The development of medical corrections centres should make possible the removal of disturbed inmates from the general institutions into a milieu specifically designed to cope with their behaviour.

I could not agree more with Mr. A. M. Kirkpatrick, executive director of the John Howard Society of Ontario.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Disagree?

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I just heard one of the members in the front row comment that he could not disagree more. He represents the old, reactionary view—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Oh, take off your halo.

Mr. Gilbert: —with regard to the treatment of young people and that type of approach to criminal law. Mr. John R. Seeley, a Canadian sociologist now associated with the Centre for the Study of Democratic Institutions at Santa Barbara, California, has also set forth what the hon. member for Egmont said, that the men who inflict this type of punishment obtain a psychomasochistic experience. Surely it is time that this was prohibited. I also quote Mr. J. D. Griffin, the general director of the Canadian Mental Health Association, who suggests its abolition.

I introduced an amendment to the omnibus bill which was introduced by the Minister of Justice, dealing with the abolition of corporal punishment. I presented it in committee and it was ruled out. I also presented it at the report stage and it received the same treatment. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if we were to poll all hon. members of this House they would agree it is high time this regressive measure were taken off the Canadian statute books. I have never experienced a more barbaric, anachronistic measure.

We do not need any further study. We have had the committee; we have had the Ouimet report. Now it is time for the Minister of Justice, who lost a great deal of his progressive image when he invoked the War Measures Act—

An hon. Member: That isn't true.

Mr. Gilbert: —to regain some of his prestige, some of his progressive spirit by bringing forth a measure which would not only abolish corporal punishment but would abolish the crime of vagrancy, provide for uniformity of sentencing, and legislate with regard to dangerous offenders. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to hon. members to show their finer instincts and to bring forth legislation in this regard which is in harmony with the social views of today. I hope the hon. member for New Westminster will exert all his power and pressure in favour of this bill and will not become the Reagan of the west by being against such an important measure.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member who has just spoken I wish to point out that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has publicly announced that corporal punishment will be abolished. I recognize that this step has been a long time coming, but I assure the hon. member that I have done everything I can and used all the power of a single backbencher to get that bill before the House. However, I think it only fair to state that the House is very occupied with a great many things and, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), there is not a high incidence of use of corporal punishment: thus, there are perhaps one or two measures which could take precedence over its abolition.

The bail reform bill which is now before the House is one of the most important and progressive pieces of criminal law legislation that I have seen for some time. I would ask the hon. member to be patient because I assure him, according to what the Minister of Justice has said, that there is a minor omnibus bill coming in which will bring about long-needed reform in the criminal law. I believe he will find that many of the reforms in it are in keeping with his ideas.

I am certain the minister would not want to delay the matter further by referring these new suggestions to the Law Reform Commission. I look forward to seeing them before the House in due course.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Hogarth: By all means.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Since time will run out in a minute or two, and since the hon. member has indicated that there is general disposition on the part of the House to deal with this matter quickly, would it not save the time of the House and of the committee if the matter were referred to committee? Then this item could be passed and we could get on with the other items mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, I was just going to point out that the Parliamentary Secretary is in the chamber. Since the minister has announced that we are going to abolish corporal punishment, and since this bill takes the matter half way, I was about to suggest that we refer the bill to committee right now and assist the minister a little in this regard. However, the only matter that concerns me is that if one looks at the schedule of business that is before the justice committee this year it will be seen that it is absolutely impossible to get down to this particular bill. Therefore, we might as well wait until the omnibus bill comes in, which can be considered in a comprehensive way by the House without being restricted just to private members' hour. I am in favour of the abolition of corporal punishment and of capital punishment and I am only sorry their abolition has not come before the House sooner.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, what I have in mind is not as cruel as my hon. friends of the opposition might think. If at six o'clock I am not finished with my remarks, it will not mean that I am necessarily opposed to Bill C-16 introduced by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). Indeed, as was said by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth), the Minister of Justice has repeatedly stated, I believe, that he was for the abolition of corporal punishment and that a bill to this effect would soon be introduced.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) did ask a while ago the hon. member for New Westminster when the minister intended to introduce this bill. May I inform him that if his party had not delayed to such an extent consideration of Bill C-181 last fall, we might have been in a position to pass this legislation in the very near future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The time allotted to the consideration of private members' Business has expired and I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury (for Mr. Trudeau) that Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, before five o'clock I said that I wanted to deal with a few minor points before reaching the substantive part of my remarks in connection with Bill C-207. The second point I wish to make, and admittedly it is a detail, concerns some of the translation of the bill. If expert advice is correct, it would seem that if one were to adopt the English language version of the bill it would be quite simple to develop Fundy tidal power, whereas if one were to adopt the French language version that would be much more difficult. I am sure the government does not intend to develop Fundy tidal power and therefore it does not matter which language version of the bill one chooses to look at. But it is a point worth noting. Once again we have before us, so to speak, two bills. On the basis of expert advice it seems that the legislation as drafted in either of the two languages may be construed somewhat differently on this point.

I do not intend to cover the waterfront in my speech. For one thing, as a backbencher it would be presumptuous of me to cover the many proposals put forward in the bill. My colleagues will be joining me and will be making specific contributions. For example, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) will deal with the demise of the Department of Fisheries, that honoured and ancient department, under this legislation. His colleague and my colleague who represents an adjoining riding, the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) will deal with the pollution authority to be established by the bill. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) will deal with costs. Before the debate is over other members of the Progressive Conservative Party will make contributions. My contribution will be to sketch things out in a general way on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and perhaps to concentrate more specifically on areas that have caused me and my colleagues the greatest concern.

Unquestionably, as was argued earlier today, there are a great many elements to this bill, some of them laudable and easily supported, some questionable and others that probably ought not to be supported at all. Hence arises our concern about the omnibus feature of the bill. It reminds me of the concoction depicted in Al Capp's cartoon series, "Li'l Abner," as kickapoo joy juice, which is made by melting together and mixing almost all ingredients under the sun, some of them tasteful and others not quite so tasteful. The prize part of the kickapoo joy juice legislation which we are considering concerns the department of the environment. I think that is the chief jewel the government can display in the showcase so far as this legislation is concerned.

May I say, first of all, that there is some advantage in having the battle against pollution directed by a single minister. The direction of this battle has up to now been spread among several ministers. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has some part of it. His role will probably continue. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) is also involved in the battle, but he uses it as an excuse to thump his chest over the issue of sovereignty. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) is in it. His department contains the greatest number of experts in the fight against pollution. These experts are to be transferred to the new department of the environment.

I am sure that my colleague from South Shore, who will follow me in the debate, will deal with the demise of the Department of Fisheries in his usual capable manner. I was going to say "exhaustive manner" but I would not want anyone to misunderstand the use of the word "exhaustive" in connection with the speech of the hon. member for South Shore. The subject will be covered and no stone will be left unturned. I hope that describes adequately the type of speech that my colleague for South Shore will make.

As I say, there is perhaps an advantage in taking some of the cooks away from the pollution broth and putting one minister to work on it, but we in the official opposition, largely through the speeches and work of the hon. member for South Western Nova, will seek to strengthen the provisions in this omnibus bill. One thing that is obviously needed is money. We have all sorts of programs with glittering titles going around in the pollution field, but when you look at them you realize there is nothing with which to make the programs work. I hope the minister of this new department will be given money with which to work in the field of pollution. The suspicion grows in my mind that by setting up a new department and by putting an old department within it, the money from the old department may mislead the public into thinking that a new war on pollution will be waged, whereas nothing will be done about it at all. That will be a matter for my hon. friend from South Western Nova to develop.

There is some satisfaction on our side that this approach is being taken by the government, that is, the establishment of one department. This is something we have suggested. The first position paper put out last year under the auspices of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) dealt with the question of pollution and one of the policies set forth in it advocated the following:

> Stepping up the flow of interdepartmental, federal-provincial and international activity and co-operation by creating a Department of Resources and Environmental Management through which all major environmental federal statutes will be administered, and which will become the central core of the federal anti-pollution program.

That day may have come. We hope it has come with the establishment of the department of the environment. Let there be no misunderstanding about this, though: we want not only a department of the environment; we want a body that will get in and do battle with pollution. We shall not be satisfied if we simply engage in a semantic exercise which does not tackle one of the great problems confronting Canadians today.

As I say, my hon. friend from South Shore will be dealing with the swallowing up of the Department of Fisheries by the new department, lamenting, I suspect, the loss of identify of one of the long-established departments of government and pointing out that many fisheries problems are still without solution affecting both inshore and offshore fishermen whose fishing grounds are raked by those vacuums of the sea, the great foreign trawlers. It seems odd that in a measure which creates five ministers of state there should be no room, apparently, for a minister of fisheries, one of our time-honoured Canadian posts. This seems strange to me, especially when there are a multitude of fisheries questions crying out for solution and when we consider that the new minister of the environment will have his hands full fighting the pollution battle and little time to spend dealing with fisheries questions.

I suspect, too, that the new minister of the environment, the present Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, will find himself in a strange position. Part of his attention should be given to the question of the output of renewable resources. At the same time, he is expected to deal with pollution. It seems to me there is some conflict between production on the one hand and control of pollution on the other, so the poor gentleman may develop schizophrenia regarding his duties.

I have mentioned that it is Conservative policy to develop a federal department whose main concern would be environmental control and management. May I point out to the minister—I am sure this will be followed up by my hon. friend from South Western Nova—that there is no power which will give the department of the environment authority to enter into agreements with the provinces. The bill speaks of dealing between the federal government and the provincial governments, it is true, but it does not go so far as to enable agreements to be made between them, as I understand the legislation. I believe the new minister may co-operate with the provinces or agencies thereof as set forth in clause 6(b). This, to us, is another weakness of this measure.

Another portion of the bill provides for the setting up of ministers of state. We have considerable reservations about this part of the legislation. I assume, for example, that a ministerial post could have been established to oversee the operations of Information Canada if the necessary authority were there at the time Information Canada was established. Under the legislation the governor in council would be empowered to appoint the ministers and to assign duties to them.

It is true Parliament gets on the scene when it comes to voting the minister money to carry out his work, but that is something like holding a post mortem; the corpse is laid out before you and you are simply asked to approve what was done or put the best possible face on what went wrong. You do not have the opportunity in such a set-up to say, "This is a good thing and should be encouraged", or "This is a bad thing and should never have been allowed to get off the ground."

My hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who is away on parliamentary duties at the present time, will I am sure be speaking later on the rather intricate relationships between the Crown, ministerial appointments and Parliament in general. I am sure this will be part of the topic he will tackle.

Then we come to the question of appointments not only of ministers of state but of Parliamentary Secretaries, whose number is to be increased. It is calculated, believe it or not, that in the run of a four-year Parliament 138 members supporting the government could have a paid position of some kind with the exception of committees chairmen. This is almost 90 per cent of the strength of the present crowd supporting the government of the day. This is a figure that makes the mind reel. Twenty-eight of these would be members of the cabinet. Ten would be ministers of state, five being appointed for each of the two-year periods in a Parliament lasting four years. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has already introduced the idea of appointing Parliamentary Secretaries on a two-year basis, and 28 of these could be appointed for each two-year period, making 56 altogether. There would be two Deputy Speakers, one for each two-year period, and there would be two Deputy Chairmen of committee of the whole House. On the basis of assuming a change every two years, there would be a whip and assistant whip, each for a two-year period, and 18 chairmen of committees, or 36 over four years.

• (8:20 p.m.)

These are maximum figures. One assumes that the Prime Minister of the day would not make all these appointments, but even if he made a number it is obvious there would be titles enough, and in most cases emoluments enough, for more than 100 members of the governing party in a four-year term. Certainly this is one way to develop prime ministerial patronage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCleave: You must wait for the Prime Minister to get back. I cannot help you.

Mr. Otto: There is always room for a backbencher.

Mr. McCleave: There speaks an honest backbencher. Fate has not been very kind to him, but he is always in there pitching and one knows that he exists.

Mr. Ricard: And he always speaks right.

Mr. McCleave: My colleague points out a further virtue of his, namely, that he always speaks right no matter what he says. I suggest there is a large element of prime ministerial patronage in the proposed set-up. Members on this side get hungry, too. I would not have said that but my banker thought I should speak out, and he does have some influence on me. There are members on this side with responsibilities and difficulties, too. We work just as hard but are somewhat down on our luck in a war on poverty that has been solved so successfully for one crowd but not the other. As I say, this proposal has enormous potential for patronage in the hands of one man and I do not think it will be accepted very easily by Canadians who at the moment, at least, seem to be in some sort of mood for political change. I know this has happened at all levels in Nova Scotia and recently in New Brunswick, and it threatens to happen in other provinces simply because people are concerned about what seems to be lack of sufficient regard for the tax dollar by people who have been elected. These people will not be happy at the vast increase in titles on Parliament Hill.

The only exception I make to this is my approval of the salary to be paid to the minister now in charge of the Post Office. I do not think anybody on the opposition side would say this is not justice. It is justice. He took on a miserable job. He had to clean the stables and solve the difficulties created by another person who was getting full ministerial salary, whereas the present minister is only at the level of Minister without Portfolio. That is unjust and I am cheered to see that the bill will right at least that injustice. One other point I should like to make about the increase in the number of those around the Prime Minister, ministers of state, extra Parliamentary Secretaries and the like, is that at least this means there will be almost twice as many people to share the burden of forgetting.

I come now to the provision of the bill dealing with the Public Service of Canada and the question of early retirement from the public service. This provision is so different from the rest that I wondered why it was included in the first place. It did cross my mind that perhaps this section of the bill was more connected with the reorganization of the government than we first imagined, and that it would open up a vast senior level of the public service of Canada for appointments by the government. While there has been talk about people retiring, from my reading of the legislation there might also be the retirement of people; that is to say, showing them the door at an early age, as well as people themselves stepping over to open it and to march out into retirement. This is a question that will occupy us very much when we study the meaning of the legislation.

If I am correct in assuming that there may be a danger in this regard of forcing out people below normal retirement age, then we are opening up a very substantial question indeed, because it would mean that the government could, in effect, sweep aside top level public servants and replace them with government hirelings. If that is the case—and there is some suspicion on this side that this is exactly what the Prime Minister is aiming to do—this step will be resisted.

Be that as it may, there is one part of the legislation that is absolutely abhorrent. It is that the early retirement proposals can be imposed through inaction in committee of the whole House with nobody being given the opportunity to appear on behalf of civil service associations to express their view on this measure. I think this is wrong. I remember a couple of years ago being a member of a joint parliamentary committee of which the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) was co-chairman. That committee dealt for a substantial period of time with some very important changes to legislation dealing with the public service of Canada. I say that this issue is as important as any that we dealt with at that time. I say, further, that public service associations and others should be given an opportunity to appear and express their views. I know the Public Service Alliance has endorsed the idea in principle, and that I understand. There is still a pretty good point to be made, that one has to study the ramifications to find out whether these associations are speaking for their memberships or, as often happens on the Ottawa scene, whether the statements are being made for a few in the name of man's.

Finally, Sir, I am generally surprised by the bill and I question again the horrendous form in which it is presented to us. I do not intend to scout the point of order I raised this afternoon, which was dealt with so capably by members on all sides and by the ruling of Mr. Speaker. I would point out that then we have a bill in which there are contained parliamentary enactments and the removal of clauses, replaced by other clauses in various schedules to the bill, we are really being asked to give away a great deal as parliamentarians. I think it is absolutely abhorrent to the notion of what Parliament is all about to bring in that sort of measure for consideration in this chamber.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard):

That all the words after "That" be left out and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-207 be not now read a second time but the subject matter of part I and schedule A to the bill be referred to the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution, the subject matter of the long title to the bill, clause 1 and parts II and III be referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, the subject matter of parts IV, V and VIII be referred to a committee of the whole, the subject matter of part VII be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and the subject matters of part IX and schedule B to the bill be referred to each said committee for consideration of so much of the said subject matters as relates and is necessarily incidental to or consequential upon that subject matter hereinbefore first referred to that committee."

It would take a caravan of Philadelphia lawyers to lead one through a labyrinth like that, but this simply illustrates the problem we are up against in dealing with Bill C-207 which covers the waterfront and has a format which is offensive to the simple minds of those of the legal profession because of its complicated and labyrinthic meanderings. I am not in support of simply trying to make the best of a very bad piece of legislation; therefore I move that amendment to the bill.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate that it might be a little difficult for the Chair to accept the amendment in its present form. The hon. member, by his comments, has indicated that he has some doubt as to the procedural acceptability of his amendment as drafted. If the hon. member would like to offer comments to indicate to the Chair that the amendment as drafted is acceptable, then of course a ruling will be made.

The hon. member knows it is in order to suggest that the subject matter of a bill be referred to a standing committee, but I suggest that to go behind a motion which is before the House which at the second reading stage of a bill, and to divide it in an indirect way, is not acceptable procedure. If the hon. member has other advice for the Chair, I would be pleased to hear it.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not make myself as clear as I intended. I did not have any doubt about the amendment I moved; I was simply pointing out that it appeared to be in a very awkward form because of the difficulty of dealing with the many points in the bill we are considering.

Mr. Speaker: Because I have serious reservations about the amendment, perhaps I should have another look at it. I should think if the hon. member simply moved that the subject matter be referred to a committee, there would be no difficulty. I doubt very much that the detailed amendment moved by the hon. member is acceptable, but I will have a second look at it and make a ruling in a few minutes.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when Your Honour says you will be giving a ruling in a few minutes, does that mean that if there is any argument it should be made to you now?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. I was hoping that anyone having any views to express for the guidance of the Chair would put them forward now. Obviously it would be better to hear procedural argument before we proceed with the next speaker who will, I believe address himself to the substance of the motion before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the amendment comes as a surprise to me, and I use that word in two senses; first, I did not know it was coming and, second, it is a unique and novel amendment. In fact, I think the hon. member deserves a medal of some kind for having drafted it. However facetious that is, it is not to be taken as lack of sympathy for the amendment. Recently we have had two or three attempts to move reasoned amendments, the gist of which were to refer the subject matters of bills to certain entities. There is still on the Order Paper a motion for second reading of the young offenders bill and an amendment thereto which would refer the subject matter to a special committee to be appointed under the Inquiries Act.

A few days later when another member sought to move an identical amendment to another bill—I forget which one it was for the moment but it does not matter—Mr. Speaker was in the Chair and ruled it out of order on the ground that the entity to which the subject matter was to be referred did not exist. When we pointed out that this was on all fours with the proposal regarding the young offenders bill, the response from the Chair was that there was unanimous consent in that case for the reference to be made to a body yet to be appointed.

The point I am making in this regard, Mr. Speaker, is that the Chair does seem to have agreed that it is in order, as a reasoned amendment, that the subject matter be referred. I think that the sum and substance of the last two incidents makes it clear that the Chair feels that the body to which reference is made must exist. We accept that. That is precisely what the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) is doing. He is seeking to move that the subject matter of the bill be referred to bodies that exist.

The only problem that seems to arise in Your Honour's mind relates to the plural nature of this reference. If the hon. member were moving that the subject matter of the entire bill be referred to one standing committee, or one entity that existed, I take it Your Honour would have no objection. What seems to bother you, Sir, is that the hon. member is referring it to several different committees. Your Honour suggests that that bothers you because it seems to be an indirect way of dividing the bill.

I think the ruling Your Honour will make will depend upon your interpretation, almost, of the motivation of the hon. member. Is his prime purpose to divide the bill? If so, Your Honour has good precedent for ruling it out. Or is his prime purpose to refer the subject matter of the bill in order that they may be dealt with elsewhere? I think it is clear, not just from the way the hon. member spoke but from the wording of his amendment, that he is not seeking to divide the bill. We accepted Your Honour's ruling earlier that that cannot be done. The primary purpose of this amendment is to refer the subject matter of the bill to extensions of this House, to appropriate committees which could deal with these various propositions.

Your Honour, in your remarks earlier today, admitted there were many different propositions, if not principles, in this bill and you sympathized with our complaint about having to deal with it in omnibus form. We have accepted the ruling you made that it is one bill and cannot be divided. However, I would argue that this amendment should not be thrown out on the ground that it is an attempt to divide the bill, because I do not think that is what it is. I believe it should be accepted as a straightforward attempt to have the subject matter of the bill referred to committees which could appropriately study its various portions. I would hope that Your Honour's ruling would be in favour of the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his contribution. The time he took to express his views regarding the procedural point raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) has given me a little more time to think about the matter and has convinced me further that the amendment is not procedurally in order. I am not suggesting this is an indirect attempt to divide the bill and that the amendment should be rejected on that basis. At the same time, I am not accepting the suggestion of the hon. member that this should be accepted as a reasoned amendment. It is not a reasoned amendment. It is largely a deviation or a change from the old-established form of amendment which provides that the subject matter of a bill or a motion before the House be referred to a special committee or a standing committee.

What I believe is objectionable from a procedural standpoint in connection with the proposed amendment is that it goes into the details of the bill. I suggest that this cannot be done in the form of an amendment to refer the bill before the House, which is for second reading, to different entities or different bodies. There is more to the matter than determining the body to which the subject matter is to be referred. I fully agree with the suggestion made by hon. members that the committees to which it is proposed to refer the several parts of the bill do exist; but as I have said, there is more to the point than that.

My difficulty in accepting the hon. member's proposed motion is that it goes behind the bill and seeks to touch the different parts of the bill by way of an amendment which normally should not be put forward in this form. The hon. member, in the course of this long debate—I assume it will not finish tonight or tomorrow and that we will be considering the bill for some time—may have an opportunity, with the assistance of some of his colleagues, to propose an amendment which would be more procedurally acceptable to the Chair.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the legislation now before the House is such a mixed bag that one cannot do more than touch on some aspects of it in an opening speech. Some of my colleagues, however, will deal with specific sections of the legislation and in committee of the whole we will be in a position to deal with it in more detail.

Since this bill is in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) I expected the right hon. gentleman would have been here to introduce it, or that it would have been left until he was here at which time he would have indicated the main thrust of government policies inherent in government reorganization. The fact that the bill has been introduced by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), not the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp), the House leader and certainly not the Prime Minister himself, indicates to my mind that either this bill is largely window-dressing or that its real purpose is to provide for changes in superannuation for senior civil servants. I hope that before this legislation is disposed of at this stage of the debate, the Prime Minister—who will probably have returned by that time—will have entered the debate to outline the government's rationale behind the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, if government reorganization is to be of any value it should have a specific purpose with clearly defined objectives. I listened in vain this afternoon to the statement of the President of the Treasury Board for some statement of purpose. There was no delineation of the government's goals and objectives in the statement made by the minister. The fact is that the government is obsessed with the means rather than the ends. Canada today is being led by technocrats, when it needs statesmen. The government is like a giant machine with a weak motor; they keep adding pulleys and belts which only add to the burden of an already overworked motor.

The government is obsessed with administrative procedures because it lacks any clearcut objectives. A mere reshuffling of responsibilities among various ministers and the moving of certain responsibilities from one department to another will not guarantee results unless there are clearcut policies to be enunciated, and we have heard none today. Efficient government administration of course is essential, but administration is only a tool which is designed to bring about clearcut results. Without goals, administration becomes merely a bureaucratic nightmare.

The government loves this technocratic jargon about input and output, but the fact is that the input has been fuzzy and the output has consisted mainly of rhetoric contained in white papers and in ignored reports of parliamentary committees. Bureaucratic rhetoric and technocratic jargon are no substitute for clearly stated policies and specifically defined objectives. This legislation, like so much of the government's activities, is designed to give the impression of movement while standing still. The Prime Minister has become the great illusionist. The public are invited to see the action and be where the action is, whether it is riding elephants or modelling the latest fashion in sartorial elegance. In the meantime, the ship of state is going nowhere and never leaves the harbour. It is like a training ship—all bustle and activity but the ship never puts to sea.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Boulanger: Tell us something new. This is old.

Mr. Nesbitt: Nothing has changed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): This government likes to give the impression that it is the latest word in technocracy and efficiency.

An hon. Member: This is a 1912 speech.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We have had good examples of it. It was amusing to watch the President of the Treasury Board this afternoon trying to explain how it was that we got rid of the Postmaster General and put the Post Office into the Department of Communications, because the Post Office was part of the communications system, and then trying to explain by some metaphysical contortions why it was necessary to take the Post Office out of Communications, without saying frankly that the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) had made such an unholy mess of the Post Office they had to take it out.

When we hear hon. gentlemen opposite talking about efficiency, we have only to consider the snafu of the last few days. Here we have a memorandum from the assistant director of the Public Service Commission sent to the various departments of government, setting forth proposals for a program to hire certain Francophones and intimating that $2 million will be available for this purpose. The President of the Treasury Board does not know anything about it.

Mr. Gibson: That's what you think.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I say to the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) that I at least have accepted the minister's word.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is more than he has done.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am sorry to hear that he has not. But no such memo could be sent out to departments of government unless it was with the knowledge and consent of either the President of the Treasury Board or someone in the Prime Minister's office.

Mr. Francis: Nonsense.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): No one would dare to send out a memo promising departments that $2 million in addition to the regular appropriation would be available unless this had been approved either by the President of the Treasury Board or by someone in the Prime Minister's office. I accept the statement of the President of the Treasury Board that it was done without his knowledge and consent. When I asked the President of the Treasury Board this afternoon who initiated and authorized this memo and where it came from, he went around and around talking about gestation. There never was a more difficult birth on the floor of the House than the one we watched this afternoon as the minister laboured through an answer.

Mr. Nesbitt: It was a good argument for abortion.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The fact is that he knows who initiated it and is afraid to tell the members of this House. The President of the Treasury Board said this afternoon that this legislation would make the executive more responsible to Parliament, but he did not set out in any particular where the legislation would help make the executive more responsible to Parliament. The fact is that Parliament is more and more losing control of the purse-strings. Under our new system estimates go to committees which do not meet until the session is well under way, and then they are rammed through committee in the last few hours. There are only certain days on which estimates can be debated and we find that when we come to the end of those days many of the estimates have not been dealt with. Money is voted without estimates ever having been discussed. The Crown corporations do not report to committees in many instances. The report of committees that have looked at the estimates are not discussed in the House.

An hon. Member: What about opposition days?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The report of the Public Accounts Committee is not discussed. The only way in which we can raise in the House the complaints of the Auditor General regarding government mismanagement is to raise the matter on one of the allotted days or by moving a motion under Standing Order 26. I think that Parliament is exercising less and less control over the executive. Instead of hon. members opposite treating this matter so lightly, it might be more advisable for them to take their responsibilities seriously. Members on both sides of the House should take whatever steps are necessary when this legislation is before the House to insist on the type of controls which Parliament should exercise over the executive and over the purse-strings. The mere reorganization of departments will have little value for this country unless we have from the government a clear statement of the policies that lie behind their administrative changes.

Let me give one or two illustrations. For several years we have been asking in the House for a clearcut statement of the government's science policy. The President of the Treasury Board has had some responsibility for science policy. Perhaps after this reorganization a minister of state will be given the responsibility for looking after science policy. If hon. members took the trouble to read the first volume of the report of the Senate Committee on Science Policy, they would see there one of the most damning indictments of the government.

It points out that $1 billion a year which Canada spends on research is, in the main, wasted. It points out that because of departmental rivalry and the veto power of Treasury Board, the federal government has muddled along with "a series of limited and isolated science policies, without having an over-all view of what was going on and a global strategy for what had to be done". That is true. It also points out that in the field of research into technology we lag far behind most of the industrial nations of the world, even small nations like Holland, Sweden and France. It points out that increasingly we are becoming dependent upon the research carried out by U.S. corporations, and that Canadian companies are having to rely more and more upon fabricating and processing research conducted by U.S. parent companies. The Committee quite properly point out that this is part of the reason for the foreign domination of our economy.

Mr. Speaker, the real reason for many of the takeovers in Canada has nothing to do with capital. Canada has been an exporter of capital for some years. The minister need not shake his head. If he takes the trouble to read the royal commission report he will find those figures are there. The real reason for many takeovers is that American parent companies are able to supply the technical know-how and apply the results of technological research. It is for that reason they are able to take over Canadian companies and to supply services that Canadian companies have not been able to supply.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I point out that the whole question of a science policy ought to be delineated by the government; the mere moving of some of the branches from one department to another will not give us a science policy. The report of the Senate committee indicates that unless we get a science policy, Canada will be in trouble.

The same is true with respect to the setting up a department of the environment. We all agree that the idea of having one minister responsible for pollution control and for the preservation of our environment is a good one. It is being suggested that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) will probably be appointed to that post. He is a man who has always been deeply concerned about pollution problems. He comes from a part of Canada where we have seen some of the devastating effects of pollution, in particular its effects on our fishing industry, and I think the choice of that minister to become head of a department of the environment is a good one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): But, Mr. Speaker, the appointment of a minister of the environment will do little to meet the problems of pollution unless the government is prepared to give him the legislative power and the funds with which to discharge his responsibilities. The government knows that the public are distressed and alarmed about the pollution of our air, water and soil. It knows that the public are clamouring for action. So the government has decided that this is a popular issue and that it must do something to appease the public clamour. The government's solution is to appoint a minister to deal with this matter. But, Mr. Speaker, the mere establishment of a bureaucracy under one minister will not in itself cope with the problem of increasing pollution.

This afternoon the President of the Treasury Board said that our environment is deteriorating very rapidly. But he did not indicate in his statement, and there is nothing in the legislation which suggests that the minister of the environment will have any power to stop deterioration in our environment.

Mr. Drury: You have heard of the Canada Water Act?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Let me deal with the Canada Water Act. It is illustrative of the inadequate powers which the minister of the environment will have to cope with the problems of water pollution. The President of the Treasury Board ought to know that in the Canada Water Act there are no national standards; there is no central authority. There will be water quality management boards, none of which have yet been set up, but they will have the power to set their own standards in different areas. As the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry himself said, this could lead to the establishment of pollution havens in those areas that are much less concerned and much less vigilant than other areas.

Mr. Hogarth: Like Nanaimo.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The hon. member can speak for his own area.

Mr. Hogarth: I am speaking for yours. You know the smell of the pulp mill in Nanaimo.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I know all about the smell of the pulp mill in Nanaimo.

Mr. Hogarth: What can we do about it?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan The Islands): I am perfectly certain that the setting up of water quality management boards, with representatives of some of the polluting companies sitting on the boards, and with no national standards, is not likely to improve the situation.

Mr. Hogarth: You never give the minister credit for the constitutional limitations on his power.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I will deal with that matter in just a moment.

Mr. Hogarth: Good.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I want to point out that these boards will not meet the situation. None of them have been set up yet, and we have no indication that they will be set up. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) has been very skittish about answering questions in this regard. Their composition is ambivalent and their powers are extremely limited. What we need is legislation under the Criminal Code of Canada, making it a criminal offence to pollute the air, the water and the soil of Canada. What we need is a national pollution control commission with power to set national standards, with power to work through local pollution control boards and to see that those standards are enforced. We need a national pollution control fund to provide grants and loans to municipalities and to industry so that the treatment facilities can be installed at the earliest possible time. Unless the government is prepared to put teeth into this legislation, teeth which are notoriously absent from the Canada Water Act, the new minister of the environment will find himself just as helpless and just as ineffectual as has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in dealing with this job.

May I deal with another department that the minister referred to this afternoon, that is, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Hogarth: What about the constitutional problem? Tell us about the constitutional problem with regard to pollution control.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member was here when the debate was taking place on the Canada Water Act, he heard this question dealt with very adequately by my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). No one doubts for a moment that this Parliament has the right to deal with legislation referring to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Hogarth: Yes, but that will throw men out of work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has the floor and he should be permitted to make his contribution.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, whenever the Liberal party are caught in a jam for doing nothing, their first excuse is the Constitution. When you chase them out of that bomb proof shelter, then they say you are going to throw men out of work. You will not throw men out of work; you will put men to work. If men are employed installing the necessary treatment facilities, that will provide employment. There is no need to put people out of work. Installing sewage treatment facilities and affluent recycling equipment in the factories will put people out of work. The trouble is that hon. gentlemen opposite want to fight pollution with rhetoric and loquacity instead of with action. This is typical Liberal policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If fancy words, task forces and reports would solve problems, hon. gentlemen opposite would have solved them long ago. But whenever they face a problem all they do is trot out excuses. They must have a factory in the Liberal party for manufacturing excuses. Excuses are the only thing they have produced in abundance to date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Government Organization Act, 1970

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): This afternoon the President of the Treasury Board made reference to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, which is referred to in this legislation. Again I insist that setting up and defining the areas of activity for this department will not achieve any worth while results unless we get a clearcut statement of policy. If the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has a policy, it has certainly been kept under wraps. I think we have a right during this debate to hear a statement from the government as to the rationale behind the development of our resources.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Is the sole purpose of denuding ourselves of both renewable and non-renewable resources the supplying to other countries of raw material to feed their factories? If it is, we have only to look at our own financial picture for the last 12 months. In 1970 we broke all records for exports, yet the per capita income of Canadians hardly moved upward. In the last half of the year it declined slightly. With all our production and all our sales overseas, we have not enriched our own people, for the very obvious reason that the price of raw materials on world markets has lagged behind the price of durable goods, and because the primary extraction industries are highly capital-oriented. They have a low labour content; jobs are to be found not in the extraction industries but in the processing and manufacturing industries. Is it the policy of our Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to export our raw materials as soon as possible and in as raw a state as possible, or have we a policy of progressively processing more and more of our raw materials in this country? If we have such a policy, it certainly has not been outlined by this government.

This afternoon the President of the Treasury Board said that we have been able to obtain access for greater amounts of oil to the United States market. Yet we have heard no statement of policy as to the relationship between our gas and oil exports. There has been no clear policy statement as to the energy requirements for Canadian development and growth and what is surplus to our need.

It is rather interesting to note that almost every American who makes a speech, whether it be the Federal Power Commissioner or the Secretary of the Interior, keeps talking about a continental energy policy between Canada and the United States. Yet when I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about this, he says that there is no continental energy policy. The Americans seem to know about this policy, but the Canadians do not. Even when they attended the conference here in Ottawa, the secretary of the interior said, "We are pressing for a continental energy policy between Canada and the United States." It is strange that only the Americans knew about this continental energy policy and that Canadian participants in the discussion have never heard about it. Last Thursday, when I asked the Acting Prime Minister about this continental energy policy, he said there is no such policy. He said, of course, that there is co-ordination between Canada and the United States on energy matters.

What we want to know is, when does a co-ordinated energy policy become a continental energy policy? Surely the Acting Prime Minister was playing with words. I hope that before this debate is over we shall have a statement from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources setting out government policy on our energy resources. Are we to continue giving away the most accessible energy resources we have, and then be forced to go farther afield to secure energy resources for our own uses, resources that will undoubtedly cost more than those immediately available? These are questions we want answered. If we do not obtain the answers in this debate, we shall expect to obtain them during committee of the whole stage.

Mr. McCleave: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Now may I say a few words about superannuation.

An hon. Member: Why not speak to the bill?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If the hon. member does not know about the bill, I suggest that he has not read it. The bill deals with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. It deals with the environment and with the matter of superannuation. The trouble with hon. gentlemen opposite is that they have really been sold this bill of goods and the idea that if you tinker around with the machinery it does not matter whether or not you have a policy. We have tried to discover the government's policy. If the government has a policy, we shall expect the ministers to stand up and outline that policy during this debate.

In closing I want to say a few words about the superannuation provisions. We shall deal with them more specifically in committee of the whole. I think there is some merit in allowing superannuation plans to be flexible. But surely the flexibility ought not to apply just to privileged groups in the Public Service. The provision about which we want a great deal more information is the one saying that a deputy minister who has served for ten years or more with the government shall have the right to leave government service, work in industry or elsewhere, continue to make his superannuation contributions, which would be matched by the government, and be eligible for a full pension despite the fact that he may have worked for the government for only a limited number of years prior to his reaching the age of 60.

What is the rationale behind this provision? If a man's services are not satisfactory to industry, they let him go. They may give him one year's salary or even allow him to take a deferred pension. In industry, generally a man is not allowed to leave one firm's employ and continue to pay into that firm's superannuation fund so that he will obtain a pension not only from the employer he has left but from the new employer to whom he has gone. This is a most unusual provision. If some deputy ministers or civil servants are performing services that are no longer satisfactory, then surely the government can dispense with their services. It can give them a separation allowance or a gratuity and allow them a deferred pension.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Why is this special provision being made for deputy ministers only? Of course, some deputy ministers have been former Liberal candidates and Liberal activists. Is this the sweetener that the government is giving to these people to ease their discomfort when it turns out they are administrative mediocrities and political liabilities? Is this provision designed to enable representatives of industry to move with ease from government service to industry and then back to government service without any loss of income security?

The Prime Minister keeps talking about participatory democracy. What the Liberal government has been building over the last few decades is a managerial oligarchy manned and manipulated by the corporate structure. Many of the ministers in this administration and in the Pearson administration were former civil servants—part of the mandarin class that makes policies behind the scenes. Some of these ministers went back into the civil service, like Mr. Pickersgill and Mr. Chevrier. They moved easily back and forth within the inner circle of the power-brokers.

Most of the advisory committees which have been established are, like the advisory committee on oil and gas, made up of representatives from the very industries they are supposed to regulate. The line between the government and the corporate structure is becoming increasingly blurred almost daily. While the Prime Minister makes speeches about participatory democracy, the corporate elite are manipulating the levers of power. They no longer merely advise the government; they are rapidly becoming the government. I think, therefore, that this provision to enable deputy ministers to move from government to industry or from industry back to government, always within this cosy little arrangement, is one which should be looked at very carefully.

The President of the Treasury Board told us this afternoon about the nuts and bolts of administration. I urge the government to use this debate to outline the policies behind this administrative reorganization. What are the goals toward which the government is moving? Let us hear from the man who is to be the new minister of the environment. Let us hear from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Above all, let us hear from the Prime Minister so that we may know the purposes which lie behind this administrative re-shuffle and the aims and objectives the government has in mind in presenting this legislation. We have heard about the administrative changes. We want to know the policy decisions which lie behind the legislation we are asked to consider and we shall insist upon being told what they are either on second reading or in committee of the whole.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on reading Bill C-207 entitled "An act respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto" a member cannot but leap with anger.

A brief study of the administration of the Liberal government since it was elected in 1968 reveals that its sole preoccupation has been to review its policies. To do so, it hires commissioners-inquirers who review the policies of the various services and departments, which finally leads to the publication of white papers. And we know at what rate those task forces, those Royal commissions of inquiry, those organizations and reorganization plans have proliferated.

Now, today, Mr. Speaker, with much fanfare, the government introduces a bill of the package-deal type, containing more than 12 different proposals that, according to the Appendix, are related to more that 15 different acts. Hon. members will have to vote for or against the whole bill as if it were or should be the instrument that will save the nation from the problems it is facing.

The bill seeks to create a Department of the Environment, to make small changes within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, to create ministries to be headed by Ministers of State who will get $15,000 a year over their normal salary.

When we keep on reading, we find out that the intention is to have as many Parliamentary Secretaries as there are departments and to re-establish the Post Office Department—where there have been five Postmasters General in ten years—to increase pensions while old people are oppressed and the unemployed are told: Starve, tighten your belt, wait till you are 65 years of age to draw your pension.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the bill is not only sickening, but shows clearly that the government instead of establishing a just society is endeavouring to establish one where public funds will go to a privileged class, to some all-powerful and greedy officials, at the expense of the public.

This bill becomes the favourite tool or weapon of the government to reward supporters who have become useless or too old.

Mr. Speaker, it is a means like another to keep those individuals from doing their duty and to make them toe the line with the promise that they will be remembered later.

Finally, what changes will the bill bring? We are told, in the first place, that it will create a Department of the Environment. This department, according to the President of the Treasury Board, is to deal with pollution.

But, Mr. Speaker, after hearing his speech, I read a small newspaper article which said much and which appeared in La Presse on January 26, 1971. It is entitled: "No to affluence is the price of pollution control".

May I be allowed, for the information of my hon. colleagues, to quote brief excerpts from it. It says:

"Canadians will have to give up affluence to pay the cost of fighting pollution," said last night the Chairman of the Bank of Montreal, Mr. G. Arnold Hart. However the public must be cautioned against the sudden passing of ill-advised legislation".

• (9:30 p.m.)

The quotation continues as follows:

And that is where the problem lies. According to the banker, any effort to combat pollution will result in economic restraints, but he added that "it is much too easy a temptation to wish the people responsible for pollution to bear the cost of the fight against pollution."

Mr. Speaker, is there anything more absurd than the excerpt I have just read? This banker who enjoys the protection of governments for unduly increasing his profits at the expense of the Canadian population, who can lend 14 times each dollar deposited in his bank, who has enjoyed the protection of governments and who controls them, now tells the Canadian people at the time when the minister announces the establishment of a Department of the Environment that the invoice for this fight against pollution will have to be paid by the population. In turn he repeats after the governments: Tighten your belts, starve, as we do not have the money for this fight.

Mr. Speaker, that banker makes one forget wherein lies the problem. He shifts it completely and tells the public: You will, once again, have to pay the price.

There is no doubt that the problem of pollution in Canada is very serious. Because we have been remiss in the past, we cannot delay further its solution. Nevertheless, with the establishment of this department, the government is trying today to make political capital. Because it is dishonest, because it plays with people's votes, and with their pocketbooks, it does not say how it will meet the costs of this fight.

Government members make bombastic speeches, but they do not explain how the costs of this fight will be met. On the contrary, the government is following the same policy as bankers who say: The people will have to tighten their belts; they will have to pay the bill, to starve and keep on depriving themselves, because governments kotow to high finance.

That is the most absurd situation it is possible to find in a government, namely that the government is in the power of high finance and, at the same time, it distracts the people with a so-called policy of grandeur.

Mr. Speaker, remember where a policy of grandeur, leads to. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talked about fighting inflation; we saw him on television and we heard him say, with a quiver in his voice, that the only problem in Canada was inflation.

People were told: Tighten your belts, do not raise salaries by more than 6 per cent, deprive yourselves. Older people who were out of work and were not yet entitled to the old age pension were told: Wait until you are 65 years of age. Tighten your belt a little, good times are just around the corner. Young people were told: Go to school, get diplomas, tomorrow you will have a happy society where you will find a place for yourselves.

Mr. Speaker, where do such incisive formulas and this anti-inflationary policy of greatness lead us, with the appointment of agencies like the Prices and Incomes Commission with which to deceive people floundering in the system, when their only concern is to get votes.

That does not solve anything. It is a policy of bandaids on wooden legs and we see today that the fight launched against inflation resulted in uncontrolled and uncontrollable unemployment.

What is the result of this omnibus bill that contains 35 or 40 different provisions which, in the end, settled absolutely nothing? People are amused with these matters and bankers are allowed to continue to exploit people, to keep their hold on them as slaves in front of the dollar bill. On all fours in front of the dollar bill, this government does absolutely nothing to change the situation. On the contrary, it protects the magnates of finance, and to give itself the appearance of a responsible, dedicated and well-intentioned government, it introduces a bill to increase the number of parliamentary secretaries and ministers without portfolios, as if there were not already enough of them to deceive the people of this country and produce nothing.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the bill is absolutely unthinkable since it is known that it will not solve the basic problem. There are points I would like to return to more specifically. The following passage occurs on page 9, concerning clause 27 of the bill, and I quote:

(1) The amendments proposed by this subclause would provide improved early retirement benefits for certain categories of persons employed in the Public Service, calculated on the basis of the age, length of pensionable service and circumstances of retirement of such persons.

Mr. Speaker, that is part of the explanatory notes. It will be remembered that when the House discussed old-age pensions quite recently we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, asked the government to at least consider the possibility of bringing down the minimum age for payment of old age pensions. We were told: It would cost too much. When the government was asked to allow people over 50 to get their old age pension before the age of 65 so as to enjoy income security and at the same time get out of the labour market overcrowded with unemployed, they answered: That is not good enough, it is a bad measure.

But it seems to be good for civil servants. This means that the government protects a very small part of our society, namely, the civil servants, and does not treat in the same way those who provide the money to pay these civil servants.

The government should at least be fair enough to treat the taxpayers and the civil servants equally instead of favouring one group at the expense of the others. I think that is a sample of an unjust society.

On page 11 of the bill, in the explanatory notes, one can read this:

This amendment would enable a former deputy head to elect to continue to make contributions under the Public Service Superannuation Act after he ceases to be actively employed in the Public Service.

Here is another example of discrimination between workers in the private sector and the civil servants encouraged by the government. If the House accepted this amendment, the government would allow a public servant to retire and keep on contributing to his pension fund as though he were still working, so that in the end he might have more substantial pension.

I am not suggesting that those provisions concerning public servants are bad, but if the government considers them good for public servants, they should be just as good for other Canadian citizens. That is why I wonder about the logic in the government's position. When we propose to ensure decent living conditions and economic security to the Canadian citizens, the government replies: It would be too expensive, it is not feasible, it is not advisable.

This is another example of how this government is running the country. They claim to be fair, but in fact, they could not care less about the Canadian people.

On page 12 of this bill appears the following explanation, and I quote:

This amendment to the Salaries Act would provide a salary for each Minister of State referred to in clause 19.

Mr. Speaker, clause 28 reads as follows:

5. The salary of each Minister of State, being a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, who presides over a Ministry of State is $15,000 per annum.

—in addition to his regular salary.

• (9:40 p.m.)

In order to prove to what extent this legislation is unacceptable, I will quote some statistics. Lately, the government tabled at the request of hon. members the report of the Committee on Parliamentary Salaries and Expenses presided over by Mr. Beaupré. With little or no knowledge of the role of a member of Parliament, this Mr. Beaupré suggested, without any kind of explanation, without demonstrating that a member could deserve it, without any mention at all of the services that a member could render, an increase in salary to $25,000 per year. Several members say that such an action is unacceptable because it does not provide at the same time for increased services.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder what services the Ministers of State will do the Canadian people with the disguised salary increase that the government will give to certain members for performing imaginary duties, unless these are defined for us.

At any event, that $15,000 emolument shown here in the case of a Minister of State is an indirect trick on the part of the government to avoid censure for rewarding certain members, for granting them an increase. Should the government members not agree with that, I invite them to deny it.

I will now bring the discussion on the following point: A Post Office Department will be created under this measure. I have but one word to say about that. We may recall that during the last ten years, the government kept on changing the Postmaster General, almost every moon as the Indians would say. We may recall also the troubles, the problems we had in that department.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Post Office Department is absolutely necessary. But listening to the minister's speech, we might believe that he can solve all problems.

As for me, I am still puzzled and I still say that this is again the icing on the cake, that it does not remove the poison in the cake because it does not solve the problem.

I should like to come back to the creation of the Department of the Environment. It will be tremendously publicized, with special emphasis on the battles it is going to fight, but all things considered, we all know that this will not settle the problem.

What will this department do? It will carry out studies, it will set up royal inquiries and will appoint commissioners to travel throughout Canada and see by themselves that pollution does exist. Anyway, we already know that it will pay fantastic amounts of money and for what result? To set up such bodies as, for instance, the Textile and Clothing Board which will be practically useless. In any case, the already overtaxed Canadians will have to foot the bill.

Besides, no use waiting for the minister's explanations since his masters, namely the bankers, have already answered on his behalf. The Chairman of the Bank of Montreal has already stated: "Let us deny abundance to all Canadians, let us refuse participation by each Canadian to this country's wealth, let Canadians tighten their belt to pay for pollution".

This is why I am quite sorry that the government keeps on, by all kinds of bills—including Bill C-207—creating departments, eliminating some of them, organizing or disorganizing the administration, appointing secretaries and firing them, granting salary increases, and all this merely to inform the population and put a bandaid on a wooden leg without ever solving the basic problem.

The basic issue is economic. As long as money is not tamed, as long as money has not been put at the service of human beings, as long as this government fails to creat the financial tools for financing those various programs—even if they are good—he will not be able to reach its goals.

This government would have the best laws in the world if it could only afford the necessary financial and fiscal policies to implement these programs which, under the present system, will only contribute to an increase in the private and public debt of Canada and will spread poverty in our affluent country.

It is high time the government stopped introducing new legislative measures designed only to change a few names, to shift a few people, to increase a few salaries or to make a favour to a few civil servants. Let it rather tackle the basic problems, review its financial and fiscal policies, consider new opportunites for Canada to set up a system in which money will serve man and not the other way around, as is now the case.

The governement is proposing to set up a new department to fight pollution but they will have to tell us some day how they intend to finance this program.

The only logical solution for the government is to keep on taxing people. In the meantime, we see the right hon. Prime Minister drop four millions without interest in Indonesia, another million and a half here, another million there. In the meantime, the provincial and municipal debts keep piling up, and so does our national debt.

This war on pollution can only be waged with the co-operation of the provincial and municipal governments which cannot afford it since they are already in debt up to their ears. The public debt of Quebec, for instance, rose by 100 per cent within four years while the public debt of Canada climbed by 40 per cent within three years.

This shows that we are in a serious predicament but we shall not wipe off our debts by plunging head on into new ones.

Mr. Speaker, as members of the Ralliement créditiste, we urge the government to review its positions on money matters and to set up an adequate machinery. The Bank of Canada should serve the Canadian people. The government should take measures aimed at human beings, such as the compensated discount and a national dividend, in order to carry out the only essential reform in Canada, that is an economic reform and respect all Canadian citizens by enabling them to develop normally as they are entitled to.

Finally, I regret that the government should crush the Canadian people, keep ignoring them; at the same time, it messes about changing, setting up, organizing and disorganizing ministries, while distracting the people from the real problem of an economic nature.

I consider that the problem is there and unavoidable. The more we delay coming to grips with it, the more thoughtless bankers, such as Mr. Arnold Hart, will be able to say: The Canadian people will still have to pay. Meanwhile, the banker thrives; he takes advantage of the funds provided by the government. I believe that the war on pollution should start "in the head" of those who make fun of others and only make the problem worse.

Strangely enough, in Canada, the governments protect big finance. A review of the Bank Act takes place every ten years, but nothing is changed; more and more power is given to the banks and to private financial institutions. Thus, the Bank of Canada remains a puppet organization.

Let the Bank of Canada play its full role and, instead of speaking of reorganizing the government as we do in this bill, let us deal with the reorganization of the Bank of Canada, that it might really serve Canadians. Strangely enough, every year a bill on the reorganization of government is introduced in Canada, but no mention is ever made of including the Bank of Canada in this reorganization.

Government members may find my remarks amusing. They may be out of place but, to my mind, this bill is completely off the track. It is not intended to solve any of the problems which now confront Canadians.

This is absolutely ridiculous. It is making fun of Canadian people and still amounts to creating a just society for a small group of men, at the expense of the majority of Canadians.

To conclude my remarks, I can only repeat that as long as the monetary system is not reorganized, all other reorganizations will not solve the problem but on the contrary, they will only be a matter of entertainment for the people and especially the government members.

[English]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes available before ten o'clock I should like to speak briefly about two sections of the bill before us. Part VII deals with public service superannuation. This is the part which is being followed very closely by many people in the Public Service of Canada today. The bill espouses a new and very important principle, that of voluntary retirement on the part of any employee who has reached the age of 55 and has to his credit not less than 30 years of pensionable service.

It has become clear to me, Mr. Speaker, from the telephone calls and letters I have received in the last few days and weeks that this provision is welcomed and that a number of people are anxious to take advantage of it. Their thinking with regard to the retirement policy has undergone many phases. There was a time when no one thought of retiring at age 55. I suppose in a large number of cases the men and women who are thinking of leaving the public service at that age, after 30 years of contributing to the superannuation scheme, have in mind undertaking another type of activity which will be very useful not only in respect of their mental health but in giving them an opportunity, while they still have the capacity, to do great things and enjoy life to undertake a new kind of career without jeopardizing that which they have built up. I had a call the other day from a gentleman who at 52 years of age had 35 years of pensionable service. He suggested I might consider moving an amendment so that with 35 years of service he could retire at age 52.

Mr. Speaker, I think what we are trying to do now is a good thing. I would not propose at any stage that we try to go beyond the standard which is spelled out. I am aware of a number of very difficult retirement cases. Among the most difficult are those involving contributors to other schemes which have an early retirement age. I think particularly of the armed forces of Canada. I had the case of a gentleman who had retired from the naval service of Canada at age 39. His concern was that he was not permitted under the Superannuation Act to build up many additional years of contribution. He had 20 years of naval service and retired at age 39. He was permitted only to build up another 15 years contribution under the Superannuation Act. He felt this was an injustice. He was willing, capable and, presumably, encouraged by his department to stay on the job and proposed to stay there until at least age 60 if he could improve his pension rights by so doing.

We must bear in mind that in spite of the very good provisions this government has provided for persons who retire, the provisions are still very modest. Persons who retired 15 years ago find they cannot in any way compete with the tremendous increase in the cost of living. I hope that the committee in looking at a number of the technical provisions of part VII will be able to review other cases of hardship which might be brought to their attention in respect of pension schemes. We are anxious to do the right thing; we want to treat our employees fairly. The government of Canada is in this connection breaking new ground and is doing the kind of thing of which I am sure all of us are proud.

I should like to say a word or two about part I of this bill. It creates a Department of the Environment. The gentleman who is to be designated as minister of this department is presently in the House. He will be the lead-off speaker in the debate tomorrow. He will make a statement which I am sure will be welcomed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), who said he was looking forward to the remarks of the minister who will be responsible for the department of the environment.

I hope that the minister, who will occupy the new building in the sister city of Hull, on the other side of the Macdonald-Cartier bridge, will take an interest in the immediate environment of the national capital region. As a member representing this area, I have felt from time to time that there is a great deal to be done in our own back yard within the national capital region. A great deal could be done by way of a determined attack upon the polluting factors which have so obviously affected the environment of our great national capital.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): There is a job to be done on the Ottawa River.

Mr. Francis: That is precisely the first place to start. Assistance must be given to the city of Hull in the development of its primary, secondary and tertiary treatment facilities, and to the city of Ottawa in respect of its secondary and tertiary facilities in order that one of the truly magnificent rivers of this continent might be restored to a degree of the purity it knew in years gone by. The fact is that those of us who live in the capital city know that when the wind blows from the east, the kraft mill at Thurso is changing its process, because there is very obviously air pollution.

The fact is that the sulphur-dioxide droplets that form under certain adverse weather conditions have had their eroding effect upon the very stones of these buildings, as anyone who is familiar with maintenance problems could demonstrate and explain quite clearly. But I am confident there is an aroused community conscience, an aroused awareness of pollution problems as well as a contribution by the words which are commonly heard in day-to-day speech, in every issue of every newspaper, on the television screen and wherever we go. We talk today about ecology, about the biosphere and about pollution. These are words which have come into very recent use in our language.

I am confident the minister who will have these responsibilities is one of the most capable persons who could be chosen for the job. There is no question that he has a job to do. I hope he will look at the problems of air pollution, water pollution and even soil pollution, and that the national capital region will be one of the first places to receive his attention. In that way the cities which have not yet developed within this region, the very necessary treatment of human sewage and control of industrial waste, will have the encouragement, inducement and active support of a ministry of this government which I am sure has a very significant role to play in creating the kind of environment in which we hope to live.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is now ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SALE OF ARMS BY FRANCE TO SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I inquired of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) concerning the apparently well-founded reports of new, large French sales of military aircraft to South Africa. Recalling that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had recently referred to the South African area as a potential Viet Nam, I asked what representations the government had made to the French government on this very important matter.

It was my impression that this country was resolutely opposed to trafficking in military arms; we have heard many proclamations by members of the government along these lines. Certainly the British Prime Minister and government learned by letter and otherwise about our viewing with alarm the proposed sale of military supplies to South Africa under the Simonstown agreement. I do not suggest that strong expression of views within the Commonwealth membership is improper or inappropriate, although the handing of the famous letter from Prime Minister to Prime Minister was something less than thoughtful diplomacy.

But it is not thoughtlessness that I complain about in the minister's answer. I am appalled at the distinction he made when he confessed that this government had not made representations to France against the sale of arms to South Africa. Only to Great Britain had such representations been made. These were made, in the minister's words, on the basis of "trying to avoid a rupture in the Commonwealth". I have no hesitation in proclaiming my belief that the Commonwealth is a valuable international institution, the breakup of which would not be a contributor to world peace. But, surely, trafficking in arms can be judged in a more direct and explicit way than by checking the international membership of the country engaged in this practice. Are we to believe that the sale of naval frigates by Great Britain is a more serious threat to world peace than the sale of 100 Mirage jets by France?

If the Canadian government sincerely believes that arms sales threaten world peace, they should say so, regardless of what state is playing the role of merchant of death. Latest statistics indicate that only the Soviet Union and the United States export more military equipment than France. But not a word, not even a letter, has been exchanged. We read about improving relations between Paris and Ottawa—and if anyone can help the cause, our most excellent ambassador can. Canada and France are charter members of the United Nations. We are in the Francophonic organization, and while that body is seized of cultural and technological issues, surely it should allow for freedom of expression on a bilateral basis on a matter of such frightful urgency.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) was in Paris recently. He is a very important minister. Could he not have advised the French government about Canada's long-standing opposition to arms sales? It is hard to believe that this government can give its thoughts no tongue except when conversing with Whitehall. I hope the government will muster its courage and tell France, as it told Britain, that we view military merchandising as a deterrent to peace-making. I would not like it to appear that all the talk in the Far East recently about purity, and all the protestations, are mere hypocrisy. I hope we may soon hear of some consistency in respect of this very grave and frightening matter.

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while listening to the hon. member's remarks, I was wondering whether he was giving more importance to the sale of arms to South Africa than to the Commonwealth itself. Perhaps the translation was not accurate. This might be a thought that crossed his mind following a question that he asked also last week concerning the future of the Commonwealth and the possible withdrawal of Canada from it. That question had been transferred by the Speaker for debate at ten o'clock. I came here but the hon. member did not show up. Then, I asked myself if he had not completely forgotten his love affair with the Commonwealth and, listening to him tonight, I am inclined to ask if he has really abandoned all the respect and the love he had for the Commonwealth.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, in brief I believe the hon. member's question should be dealt with in two ways: on the one hand, there can be no doubt of any kind as to the Canadian government's quite clear and straightforward stand on the sale of arms to South Africa. The Canadian government clearly expressed on several occasions its opposition to such a sale and the minister informed the House, in answer to the hon. member's question, that Canada has repeatedly expressed this point of view at the United Nations.

In regard to apartheid, I clarified the Canadian government's position during a debate at the United Nations General Assembly on December 8 last when I expressed the hope that all member countries, including of course France and all the other countries which sell arms to South Africa, would abide by this embargo.

The second point I would like to deal with concerns the hon. member's question: why did Canada not make direct representations to the French authorities. I wonder why the hon. member blames France rather than other countries, for France is of course not alone in selling arms to South Africa. And it seems curious to me that the hon. member casts the blame only on France this evening and that he does not ask us why we did not also make direct representations to other countries and why we made some only to Great Britain. Of course, we made some to Great Britain, because the Commonwealth conference was to be held and we feared that the course that the British government was about to follow would blow up the Commonwealth.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—NATIONAL PARKS—QUEBEC—DEVELOPMENT OF PARK IN ST. MAURICE VALLEY—CONSTRUCTION OF SKI CENTRE IN SAINT GÉRARD

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the question directed to the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on January 20, 1971, challenges the responsibility of the minister with respect to the decision made by government experts concerning the access road to the national park in the St. Maurice Valley.

Therefore, it is important and indeed urgent that this matter be cleared up and that the minister dispel our doubts.

The Mauricie daily, Le Nouvelliste, suggested a fortnight ago that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and member for Saint-Maurice, could well be more or less directly involved in a conflict of interests in connection with the access road to the Mauricie national park and to a proposed ski centre.

The minister was roused to indignation and claimed that there were no grounds for these "charges or innuendoes". We take his word for it, but so as to remove any doubt as to his integrity, I think he should give straight answers to the following questions:

Can we establish a relation between the trip to Hawaii, the ski resort in St. Gérard and the entrance to the national park?

Did the minister actually go to Hawaii? Why did he come back. Did he know that two businessmen from the St. Maurice valley were there?

Can the minister say whether he knew about the ski centre in St. Gérard and did he take part in any way in this scheme?

Has the minister frequent contacts with these businessmen?

How can the minister explain that these businessmen are taking options on land in St. Gérard when it is a well-known fact on the one hand that the entrance to the national park could be of benefit to their enterprise and on the other hand that the location of this entrance is not yet publicly known?

Can the minister say whether he knew about the ties between these businessmen who are investing large amounts of money there and the possibility that they may benefit from the location selected for the park entrance location?

[Mr. Ouellet.]

Has the minister discussed with Mr. Matteau, for instance, the possibilities as to the location of the national park's entrance?

Has the minister heard of a brief suggesting that the park's entrance be at St. Gérard? Is it true that a departmental officer said to the person who submitted the brief: "Forget it, everything is settled?"

Is the minister in touch with Mr. Guy Suzor?

Finally, which is the most likely entrance location for that national park?

Mr. Speaker, the St. Maurice valley people would like answers to all these questions.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend read Le Nouvelliste a little late, because if he had read it last Tuesday, he would have found out that Le Nouvelliste, in which the same questions were asked, was satisfied with the answers I gave that, first of all, the entrance to the park was not known and would not be for some time, that the ski centre in question is far from the park and, secondly, that the people who wanted to invest money in the St. Maurice Valley had asked me whether the federal government would help them. And I told them that the federal government did not have any program to do so.

But if investors in that project had been Americans, they would have been invited to City Hall for a cocktail and to sign the Golden Book. But since those people were French Canadians who wanted to risk a few dollars for the welfare of the population and to create a few winter jobs, questions were raised.

Mr. Speaker, I answered the following day, in its editorial page, Le Nouvelliste stated in an article entitled:

NO REASON TO DOUBT MR. CHRÉTIEN

Mr. Chrétien was not long in reacting when he stated that the "charges or innuendoes" contained in the said articles were baseless. The member for Saint-Maurice specified "that no decision had been taken concerning the establishment of a national park in the St. Maurice Valley. Nobody has privileged information in that connection. The decision should be taken by the planners of the National Parks Branch and based on technical considerations."

In addition, the Minister stated that "there was no relation and there will never be any choice made between the establishment of the park and the project of a ski centre in the Saint-Gérard-des-Laurentides area."

That restatement should put an end to the debate. We have no valid and serious reason to question the word of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice. A doubt has been raised and Mr. Chrétien answered in all honesty.

Besides, Mr. Jean Chrétien has been in politics for about ten years and never have his honesty and integrity been questioned once. Prime Minister Pearson had recognized the qualities and qualifications of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice by appointing him Minister without Portfolio in 1967.

He eventually became Minister of National Revenue.

—The next year, Mr. Trudeau appointed him Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

We must also add that Mr. Jean Chrétien has always been dedicated to his constituency and the Mauricie region.

Probably much more than the hon. member for Champlain, Mr. Speaker. And I continue:

It it truly regrettable that he is today somehow a victim of circumstances. We accept without reservation his explanation for he enjoys respectable credibility based on a spotless record.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that I came back before the anticipated date at the request of the House Leader of my party because certain bills concerning my department were to be put before the House.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.13 p.m.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL RECRUITMENT OF FRANCOPHONES—ANNUAL REPORT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I indicated I would give consideration to the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for unanimous consent to refer the report of the Public Service Commission to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. What the government desires is a full examination of its policy on bilingualism in the Public Service by a committee. Hon. members are likely to find the reference by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre unsatisfactory for such a review. However, when the estimates are referred to the standing committees in about three weeks' time, we will undertake to facilitate an examination of this important question through the appearance of the responsible minister and other key witnesses, some of whom, I may add, may not find it possible to testify at a hearing immediately.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, does that mean the minister is denying unanimous consent to the motion I made yesterday?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in view of the circumstances I have outlined I thought the hon. member would co-operate by withdrawing his motion.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that there is not unanimous consent and therefore the motion cannot be put.

MANPOWER

RIGHT TO INFORMATION ON PERSONS SEEKING EMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask for unanimous consent to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It concerns the public's right to know about a matter of public concern and the denial of that right by a branch of government. Since January 21 Canada Manpower has arrogated to itself the right to refuse to release new statistical data respecting the number of persons who have applied for jobs at various Canada Manpower centres. Today such information is refused to members of this House, members of the press and all other persons whom Canada Manpower wishes to keep in ignorance. With unanimous consent, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) I move:

• (2:10 p.m.)

That this House asserts that it is the undoubted right of Members of Parliament, members of the press and all other members of the public to receive upon request current statistical facts respecting the number of persons who are registered with Canada Manpower Centres as seeking employment.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has proposed a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. This motion, to be put from the Chair, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder whether we should give consideration to eliminating from the rules Standing Order 43 because of its obvious ineffectiveness and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether this is a point of order. If hon. members are dissatisfied with the operation of any rule a suggestion can always be made that it be reconsidered by the Committee on Procedure and Organization. It might be worth our while to look at this rule. As hon. members know, the application of Standing Order 43 in the House during the last year or so has been rather novel. Standing Order 43 has not normally been used as it has been used during the past year or so. Actually the new method of proposing matters of urgency has supplanted to some extent the former usage under Standing Order 26. It may be that we are putting ourselves into a difficulty in relation to the use of Standing Order 43. I would think that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is a worth while one and perhaps those members of the House who represent the different parties on the committee in question might like to put this matter on the agenda of the committee when they next meet.

Mr. Lang: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I should like to bring to the attention of yourself and members of the House that the procedure by which the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate raised the question yesterday, then spoke on television and again raised the matter today can mislead not only the House but members of the public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is just an argument.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lang: The hon. member by a brief check with my office could in fact have found—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would agree that the Chair should listen to what the question of privilege is about. It is difficult for the Chair to determine whether there is a real question of privilege until there has been at least a brief statement to indicate what it is about. I suspect the point the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands wishes to make is that there is no question of privilege. This may well be, but I think I should at least briefly hear the minister.

Mr. Lang: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Ricard: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has recognized the minister on a question of privilege. I will see the hon. member on his point of order in a moment.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may ask a question if the minister who has the floor will allow a question.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am asking Your Honour if—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands might indicate whether he wishes to ask a question of the member who has the floor.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): No; I wanted to ask Your Honour if notice had been given to Your Honour of the question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: I may say that no notice has been given to the Chair, but the Standing Order provides that when the question of privilege is one which arises out of debate in the House then no notice is required. It well may be that the question relates to the statement which has just been made, but I cannot judge that until I have heard the minister.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that we proceed in an orderly fashion. The hon. member has raised a point of order. I think I have answered to the best of my ability the point raised by the hon. member. It seems to me we would make some progress in this matter if I were allowed to hear briefly what the minister has in mind. I may then be able to determine whether the minister should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In fairness to the minister I think he should be allowed to state his question.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member seeks the floor on a question of privilege I must then point out to him that there cannot be two questions of privilege at the same time. There is now one before the House. The minister has the floor.

Mr. Lang: I may say in passing that this sort of thing makes it obvious that it is necessary to examine Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members : Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down, professor.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has the floor to state his question of privilege.

Mr. Lang: The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has raised again a matter to which he referred in public last night, having already raised it in the House. In doing so he has reported hearsay when with the slightest bit of checking he could have found there was no such directive and that the situation simply is that information which is to be given by manpower managers is to be given in an orderly fashion under a directive which has existed since 1968.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the minister. Obviously he does not have a question of privilege. The minister has outlined his proposition. I have been as lenient as possible in allowing the minister to refer to what the question of privilege might be. Hon. members know what a question of privilege is. I have reminded the House very often of what in my view constitutes a question of privilege. I would not think that the hon. member personally or members generally have been affected in their right to discharge the business of the nation. I would think that the point raised by the hon. member is not akin to a question of privilege. I do think the matter should not be pursued.

Mr. Lang: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I was coming to my question of privilege which was the basis upon which—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must rule, having heard the minister, that the point he seeks to raise relates to a statement which allegedly was made last night. It is necessary for me to rule that according to our Standing Orders the usual one-hour notice should have been given to the Chair. No such notice was given. If the minister will file notice, perhaps he will be given an opportunity to explain further what the question of privilege might be.

DRUGS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROGRAM TO COMBAT NON-MEDICAL USE—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PSYCHOTROPIC SUBSTANCES

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to announce to hon. members that the Department of National Health and Welfare is inaugurating today a comprehensive national program to combat the non-medical use of drugs which will include extensive research, information, treatment and drug analysis programs.

This co-ordinated approach to the drug abuse problem arises out of continuing departmental studies and careful consideration of the recommendations of the interim report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Non-medical Use of Drugs which was tabled in the House on June 19, 1970.

The over-all program will be co-ordinated by Dr. Aurèle Beaulnes of the department.

Research on the non-medical use of drugs will be conducted jointly by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Medical Research Council. Participation will be open to all Canadian scientists wishing to expand their research or initiate new projects on the bio-medical, sociological, educational, or other aspects of drug abuse.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The requirement for research was determined by the serious lack of knowledge concerning the effects of psychotropic drugs, especially over the long term. Priorities for research have been established and will be made known to scientists, along with an invitation for them to apply for research support in the various priority areas. All applications received from scientists will be assessed on the basis of merit and relevance to the drug abuse question.

Research will also be encouraged in the fields of epidemiology and sociology in order to further knowledge on the factors that lead individuals to drug abuse.

The recommendation of the Le Dain Commission that the federal government investigate the establishment of regional drug analytical laboratories across Canada has also been approved and amendments to the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act have been passed in order to get these laboratories operational.

The new regulations will permit a physician to receive a sample of a controlled, restricted or narcotic drug from an individual under his professional care and to transmit it for analysis to a scientist authorized to possess the drug for this purpose. This service is of extreme importance to physicians treating drug abuse sufferers, as proper analysis will assist the practitioner to determine the most appropriate treatment for his patient.

The information program will provide Canadians with up to date factual information on drug abuse. The program will be developed in consultation with provincial health and welfare departments and other agencies dealing with the problems of drug abuse. Assistance will also be provided to provincial programs and, where necessary, to initiate new programs.

The information program will consist of four components: data retrieval, data analysis, information processing and communications.

The department will support a greater number of innovative services designed to meet drug-related social problems. Demonstration grants and other short-term assistance will be provided for experimental programs undertaken by existing or new organizations, some of which will be operated by the young people themselves. These innovative services will include such projects as crisis intervention, rehabilitative and preventative service, detached street work, indigenous counselling, information and referral services, as well as residential treatment centres, work activity programs, employment services and other community development services related to the problems of drug abuse.

Through such innovative programs particular effort will be made to strengthen the ability of families and communities to understand and deal with social conditions that generate youth alienation, drug abuse and other allied problems.

For fiscal year 1970-71, the Department of National Health and Welfare has budgeted a total of more than $400,000 to finance these initiatives. The total amount forecast in the next fiscal year for the over-all program is $4.5 million.

In addition, I should point out that under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government is sharing in the cost of a wide range of welfare and rehabilitative services, many of which are directly related to the prevention and treatment of social problems associated with the misuse of drugs. It is my hope that the provinces will make greater use of the sharing provisions of the plan. I will discuss this matter with the provincial ministers of welfare this week.

Further details regarding application for grants for research under this program and for further information will be brought to the attention of interested researchers.

As hon. members are aware, a plenipotentiary conference on psychotropic substances is currently under way in Vienna, Austria. Sixty-two nations and a number of international agencies are participating in the deliberations.

The conference has been called on recommendation of the United Nations Commission on Narcotic Drugs which drafted a protocol on psychotropic substances at its meeting last year. This protocol envisages international and national controls on psychotropic substances which are liable to abuse, such as LSD, amphetamines, barbiturates and certain tranquilizers.

Canada has taken the position that the international instrument which will result from the conference should provide maximum flexibility in order to take into account present Canadian policy in this area, as well as changes or developments which may occur in the future.

I have received a report from the Canadian delegation and I am pleased to say that many countries share the Canadian view and have emphasized the need to prepare a protocol which would be acceptable to a large number of states. It is our view that national governments are in the best position to determine the proper procedure to follow under the particular set of circumstances existing within their territories relating to the abuse of specific drugs.

The Canadian delegation is headed by Dr. Maurice LeClair, Deputy Minister of National Health. Canada's alternate delegates are Dr. R. A. Chapman, Assistant Deputy Minister, Food and Drugs; Dr. Aurèle Beaulnes, Coordinator of the Federal Programs on the Non-Medical Use of Drugs; Mr. J. D. McCarthy, Director, Legal Services of my department and Miss Pauline Sprague, Department of Justice. Officials from the Departments of Secretary of State, External Affairs and National Health and Welfare are, as required, acting as advisers to the delegation.

The delegation has not been empowered to sign the protocol. As I have indicated previously, this House will have a full opportunity to review the agreement before consideration is given to its ratification.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first may I say that I am pleased to learn that no commitment of an international nature will be made without prior consultation with the House. Consequently, apparently no commitment of an international nature will be made which will limit the kind of program and the kind of laws that we may wish to adopt in this country without prior consultation with parliament.

There is no question, Sir, about the urgent need for research, information, treatment and drug analysis programs. If one questioned in one's mind the urgency of this matter before, surely after reading the interim report of the Le Dain Commission one could hardly entertain such doubts.

I must say that I find it difficult to understand why we had to wait for such a long time for an announcement of such a general nature as the minister made today. In fact, it seems to have been prepared at the last minute because, without meaning to give offence, I got my copy as I was entering the House.

Mr. Munro: I thought the hon. member would like to see it.

Mr. Stanfield: I am grateful for the minister's consideration. Although I have had only a few minutes to consider what the minister has said, it is quite apparent that the program announced by the minister ought to mean a good deal and should be designed with a great sense of urgency in mind. It may mean a good deal or it may mean very little. It is very difficult to judge from the minister's statement. For example, the minister said that some $4.5 million will be spent in the next fiscal year. Yet there is no indication as to how this amount is to be broken down and how much is to go for any particular purpose. We only know that $400,000 has been assigned to finance certain innovative programs.

Mr. Munro: That is for this year.

Mr. Stanfield: I beg your pardon, that is for this year. Nevertheless there is absolutely no indication as to how the $4.5 million is to be broken down next year and how much of that amount is to go toward research, toward developing information, toward communication and toward financing innovative programs. Therefore it is a little difficult to understand why it has taken the minister so long to present even this kind of general statement to the House.

In speaking about an information program, the minister is still in the position of having to say that this program will be developed in consultation with provincial health and welfare authorities. Although it is many months since the Le Dain Commission brought down its interim report and many years since the urgency of the problem became apparent, there is no indication that any such program has been developed. I say again that the need is urgent in all these areas.

It is not possible to judge the effectiveness of the minister's proposals on the basis of the information he has given us. I simply say that I hope this announcement represents a determined effort on the part of the government to move ahead in the field of research, information, treatment and drug analysis programs. If it does, I assure the minister that he will receive the full co-operation of myself and my associates as we wish to encourage the government to move forward in a determined way to face this problem in our society which has reached such grave proportions.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the morning newspapers carried a story that the minister would be making a statement today. It is unfortunate that the minister did not make copies of his statement available before the House met so that those who are expected to comment could have given serious study to the matters with which the minister has dealt.

The announcement in the statement is a beginning and we welcome it. However, we are more concerned about what is not in the statement than what is. We are concerned about whether the minister has discussed with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) the changing of those sections of the Criminal Code that deal with drugs. We are also concerned about whether the minister has discussed with the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) the role of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The RCMP have been carrying on intensive undercover investigations. They have not only encouraged people to use drugs but have encouraged people to give drugs to undercover agents so that these people can be prosecuted for trafficking, not just possession. The RCMP have been acting as agents provocateurs. These matters should have been commented on by the minister but he has not dealt with them.

We are pleased with some parts of the minister's statement. Research into the medical and social effects of the very wide use of drugs is long overdue in this country. If the government is going to encourage serious research into this matter, we welcome it. We welcome the proposal that doctors will be permitted, encouraged and given the opportunity to submit drugs which they obtain from patients to a research institute which will be able to give information to the doctor with regard to the constitution of a particular drug. I hope the minister has discussed with his colleagues in the cabinet the possibility that the police might be able to go to the doctor concerned and insist on obtaining the name of the person who supplied the drug. If the police can do that, the whole program will immediately fall flat on its face.

An information program based on facts which have been ascertained by experts in the field will be invaluable. I hope it will be an educational program based on facts rather than the kind of exaggerated scare programs and propaganda so prevalent in the past which young people in particular have completely rejected with the result that to a large extent young people no longer listen to anyone who is not in their age group.

It is encouraging to note that the government will sponsor experimental, innovative programs such as drop-in centres where troubled people may go for help. I wish the minister had said that the officials of his department had discussed the problem with the medical profession and the hospitals. Certainly for the first year or two that this program is in effect a large majority of those who have adverse reactions to the use of drugs will go to hospitals as they have done until now. I wish the minister had stated that a program had been worked out with the doctors and hospitals so that it will not be necessary for them to make reports to the police, thereby initiating prosecutions of people who have come to them for assistance. This has happened too often in the past—I know that the minister is aware of this fact—and it ought to have ceased long ago.

We are happy that the representatives of the minister at the international conference on the use of psychotropic substances have made and will make it clear that Canada intends to maintain freedom of action regardless of the decisions or recommendations made at that conference. We are happy that the Canadian government believes that all countries should be free to follow experimental and flexible programs which may lead to new methods of dealing with this problem, because the repressive, regulatory methods used up to now have completely failed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the minister sent us the French version of the statement he was to make to the House, and I thank him for it. That may explain the delay in delivering a copy to the spokesmen of the various political parties.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I think we must applaud idea of launching a comprehensive program in the fight against the non-medical use of drugs.

This measure will also entail extensive research, information, treatment and drug analysis. The word "extensive" worries me a bit; having had personal experience with research, we know extensive research is a lengthy process. The government recognizes that information is sadly lacking in that field.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that so much has been said to date on the use of drugs, especially among the young, that there is no reason why the government should lack knowledge or information on that matter. We arrived much too late to undertake a fight against the use of drugs, and the minister says that the program will encourage research in the fields of epidemiology and sociology in order to further knowledge on the factors that lead individuals to drug abuse.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government took time to think about it. We know that today many young people are drug users. Why? Because they have nothing to do; they are out of work. It has been thought at one point that the use of drugs helped them forget the bad administration of which they were victims, but it is not so. We found out the use of drugs encouraged them to revolt against government measures that did nothing to help them.

Mr. Speaker, the information program will consist of four components: data retrieval, data analysis, information processing and communications. I feel that there is nothing to say against these points of the program. However, I would blame the government for neglecting to fight the underworld which gains enormously from the sale of drugs in high schools to young people of 12, 13 or 14 years of age. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if the R.C.M.P. would go to the trouble of investigating this matter, it would be easy enough to expose those who are selling drugs to youngsters. Up to now, it seems that nothing has been done and no useful recommendation to that effect is included in the program.

In his press release, the Minister states that, through such innovative programs particular effort will be made to strengthen the ability of families and communities to understand and deal with social conditions that generate youth alienation. The first thing is to prevent them from obtaining drugs illegally, as is the case at the present time.

The minister also expresses the hope that the provinces will take advantage of these shared-costs programs. I know that some provinces will cry shame because they may not have the means required to initiate other fights against such things.

The federal government introduces programs that require the co-operation of the provinces, without prior consultation. I suggest that the views of the provinces should have been asked for before this program was announced.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the minister that, in a related field, that of alcoholism, for example, the government collects each year millions of dollars in excise taxes and spends only $14,000 annually to fight this scourge. If the fight against drug abuse is carried out in similar fashion to that against the abuse of alcohol, we can expect a colossal failure.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CNR—PENSIONS, RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Question No. 73—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions of less than $25.00 per month?

2. How many are in receipt of a pension of $25.00 per month?

3. How many are in receipt of pensions of (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month (b) $30.00 to $39.99 per month (c) $40.00 to $49.99 per month (d) $50.00 to $59.99 per month (e) $60.00 to $69.99 per month (f) $70.00 to $79.99 per month (g) $80.00 to $89.99 per month (h) $90.00 to $99.99 per month (i) $100.00 to $124.99 per month (j) $125.00 to $149.99 per month (k) $150.00 to $199.99 per month (l) $200.00 to $299.99 per month (m) $300.00 per month or over?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: The information shown being as of December 31, 1969. 1. Number of pensioners receiving less than $25 a month, 465.

2. Number of pensioners receiving $25 a month, $2,092.

3. Number of pensioners in receipt of pensions of: (a) $25.01 to $29.99 a month, 538; (b) $30.00 to $39.99 a month, 1,079; (c) $40.00 to $49.99 a month, 878; (d) $50.00 to $59.99 a month, $838; (e) $60.00 to $69.99 a month, 749; (f) $70.00 to $79.99 a month, 802; (g) $80.00 to $89.99 a month, 841; (h) $90.00 to $99.99 a month, 964; (i) $100.00 to $124.99 a month, 2,361; (j) $125.00 to $149.99 a month, 2,190; (k) $150.00 to $199.99 a month, 3,664; (l) $200.00 to $299.99 a month, 5,022; (m) $300.00 and over, 3,167.

In a number of cases the amounts of pensions paid by Canadian National Railways do not represent the total pensions payable to employees for railway service. Pensions payable by the CNR to international employees (service in both Canada and the United States) relate to their service in Canada only. Such employees also receive annuities payable under the U.S. Railroad Retirement Act or the Social Security Act for service performed in the United States. For example, in the group receiving pensions of under $25 from the CNR, there are sixty-seven former international employees who also receive U.S. Railroad Retirement or Social Security annuities in respect of CNR service rendered in the United States. The balance of this group consists of employees who elected early retirement (before age 65) with reduced basic ($25) pensions, and employees who had very short service and small contributions.

8. What was the total amount paid out of the above funds in pensions during the years ending (a) December 31, 1968 (b) December 31, 1969 (c) December 31, 1970?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. 2. To calculate the yield we have used the Dominion Bureau of Statistics formula and the information requested in questions (1) and (3). Under this formula, the investment is deemed to be: Opening Investments etc. plus Closing Investments, etc. less Earnings. 7. As at 31 December 1969 Canadian National Railways owed the funds $1,518,430. This represents the normal monthly clearance paid off in January 1970 arising from Company and employee contributions less pensions paid and refunds.

8. Total amounts of the pensions paid out of the Pension Trust Fund were: Year ended 31 December 1968, $46,065,616; year ended 31 December 1969, $50,335,506; year ended 31 December 1970, not yet available.

1. What steps has the Department of Transport taken with regard to the development of a National Airports Plan?

2. When is such a plan likely to be completed?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. A team has been formed and is presently working on this project.

2. The team's first report on this subject is scheduled for completion next Spring. It will provide a preliminary Plan as well as the basis for the on-going development and updating of a viable National Airport Plan.

2. What has been the decision of the Canadian Government regarding the sale of this hydroelectric power?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of External Affairs as follows: 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

*FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO FRONTIER COLLEGE AND CYC

Question No. 456—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. (a) How much financial assistance has the federal government provided annually to Frontier College each year since 1960 (b) which department or departments provide the grant?

2. What has been the annual grant to the Company of Young Canadians since its inception?

3. To foster the outstanding work of the Frontier College program, is the government considering increasing the annual grant?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have had some conversations with the hon. member who posed this question, and since the reply is rather lengthy he has agreed that the reply be tabled but recorded in Hansard as if it had been read.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary's information is correct. Inasmuch as I have been waiting for this reply since November 17, I would insist that it be printed in Hansard.

[Editor's Note: The text of the answer follows]

Mr. Jerome: I am informed by the Departments of Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and Secretary of State as follows:

1. (a) and (b) Department of Labour: $10,000 each year from 1960 to 1968, inclusive. $5,000 each year from 1969 and 1970. Department of Manpower and Immigration: In the fiscal year 1970-71, $20,000.

2. Payments to the Company of Young Canadians since its inception have been as follows: 1966-1967, $893,908; 1967-1968, $2.4 million; 1968-1969, $1.9 million; 1969-1970, $1.9 million.

3. Beginning with the fiscal year 1971-72, the Department of Manpower and Immigration will assume sole responsibility within the federal jurisdiction for federal grants to Frontier College. Some financial support of an indirect nature can also be given in the form of purchases, by the department, of training and research services under the Adult Occupational Training Act. In this connection, the department has had many discussions with the provinces and with Frontier College in an attempt to increase such purchases, which under the law require provincial concurrence. Purchases have been relatively small, mainly for the reason that provinces consider that they can supply the training required through provincially operated institutions.

CUSO—MESSRS. RICHARD WILLIAMS AND HUGH WINSOR

Question No. 491—Mr. Robinson:

Are Messrs. Richard Williams and Hugh Winsor presently employed by the government as members of CUSO and, if so (a) for how long have they been so employed (b) where have they been employed (c) what are their duties (d) how much have they been paid (e) do they in any way represent government policy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned the answer is: Messrs. Richard Williams and Hugh Winsor are not employed by CUSO, nor are they by this Agency.

NEWFOUNDLAND—AIRPORT FACILITIES

Question No. 494—Mr. Carter:

Does the Department of Transport have plans to reactivate airport and landing facilities at Argentia, Newfoundland as an alternate airport for Newfoundland's East Coast and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No. The Department of Transport operates and maintains the airports at St. John's (Torbay) and Gander which are available for the air carriers operating in this area. Carriers engaged in regular scheduled domestic flights to Newfoundland and those engaged in Trans-Atlantic operations have not stated an operational requirement for Argentia as an alternate airport. In addition, Argentia is not equipped with the necessary instrument landing aids both non-visual and visual, terminal facilities or facilitation services such as customs, health, immigration etc. The number of aircraft using facilities and services which would be required for alternate airport purposes could not justify the high costs involved.

POLLUTION—EXHAUST EMISSIONS

Question No. 499—Mr. Mather:

In efforts being made or studied towards reducing motor vehicle exhaust pollutants, is consideration being given to converting carbon monoxide to carbon dioxide by the use of manganese dioxide?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Motor Vehicle Safety Act provides authority to establish standards limiting the levels of various pollutants emitted from motor vehicle exhausts. Consequently, Department officials, in cooperation with experts of the Department of National Health and Welfare and other Federal Government laboratories concerned with fuels and engine design, are monitoring all developments which may make possible reductions in emission levels. The Department is aware that manganese dioxide is being used as a fuel oil additive to reduce smoke. In addition, manganese dioxide is one of a large number of available oxidation catalysts which may be considered for use in reducing emissions from motor vehicle engine exhausts.

REMOVAL OF PAGES FROM SPECIAL "FOREIGN TRADE" SUPPLEMENT

Question No. 512—Mr. Crouse:

For what reasons were pages 1 and 2 removed from the Special "Foreign Trade" Supplement between Canada and China, as issued by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in October, 1970, when the issue was forwarded to Members of Parliament?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Pages 1 and 2 of the special "Foreign Trade" supplement published following the establishment of diplomatic relations between Canada and the People's Republic of China were removed when it was discovered that information they contained might have been misleading unless supplemented with additional material which, if added, would have required reprinting. Rather than destroy the issue in favour of reprinting, thereby retarding distribution of important trading information to the Canadian business community and incurring additional costs, it was decided to delete the pages from all copies.

EMPLOYMENT OF DOUGLAS ANGLIN BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Question No. 513—Mr. Robinson:

Has Mr. Douglas Anglin of Carleton University ever been employed or engaged, in any capacity, by or on behalf of the federal government and, if so (a) how (b) for how long (c) what remuneration, if any, was paid to him for services rendered?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): No. (a) Not applicable. (b) Not applicable. (c) Not applicable.

EFFECTS OF BRITAIN'S ENTRY INTO EEC ON CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

Question No. 528—Mr. Mazankowski:

Has a study been made by the government concerning the effects of Great Britain's entry into the EEC on Canadian agricultural exports and, if so, are projected details available?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Government has under continuing review the possible effects of Britain's entry into the EEC on all Canadian exports, including agricultural products. Any projections that are made at this time are necessarily tentative, as the final terms of access for Canadian agricultural exports to Britain and the EEC depend both on the outcome of the current negotiations and on the evolution of the common agricultural policy of the community. The net results for our trade of these concurrent developments, the extent and timing of which are not yet known, cannot of course be measured in detail at this stage. In his recent statement to the House, however, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce reported on the general implications for Canadian exports of United Kingdom entry into the EEC including particular reference to the situation confronting our agricultural exports and gave a detailed outline of possible changes in terms of access for Canadian products.

CLEANUP OPERATIONS OF OIL SPILL FROM "ESSO KOBE" IN GASPÉ

Question No. 547—Mr. Anderson:

1. What chemicals were used during the cleanup of the oil spill from the Esso Kobe during October, 1970, in the Gaspé?

2. Was the use of such chemicals approved of by the Department of Transport officials prior to their use?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The chemical Corexit 8666 was used by Imperial Oil during the cleanup of the oil spill caused by the Esso Kobe in October, 1970, in the Gaspé. Nine hundred gallons of this dispersant were sprayed onto the surface of the oil spill only, and covered with peat moss. The resultant emulsion was absorbed and recovered successfully from the water surface.

2. Prior approval for the use of dispersants was not granted by the Department of Transport in this case. The Department policy is that dispersants may be used with due care, when a threat of fire exists and there is a possible hazard to existing amenities.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—MAN-HOURS SAVED AS A RESULT OF USE OF COMPUTERS

Question No. 552—Mr. Robinson:

How many man-hours have been saved as a result of the utilization of computers by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce during each year since computers have been used?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce estimates man-hour saving as follows: 1965/66, 62,260 man-hours; 1966/67, 244,300 man-hours; 1967/68, 296,162 man-hours; 1968/69, 304,555 man-hours; 1969/70, 342,962 man-hours; 1970/71, 349,916 man-hours. Savings are based on actual computer output plus the computer output scheduled for the remainder of fiscal year 1970/71, compared with the same volume of output using the previous equipment. It is worth noting that the much greater volume of output by the computer was not economically feasible using the previous equipment. Prior to fiscal year 1969/70 all savings, and for the last two fiscal years about 90 per cent of the savings are attributable to the Canadian Government Travel Bureau.

Questions

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO QUEBEC MUNICIPALITIES

Question No. 543—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

During each year since 1968, did any departments or government agencies make loans to Quebec municipalities and, if so (a) which ones (b) for what purpose were the loans made (c) to what municipalities (d) what were the amounts (e) what was the rate of interest (f) for what period of time?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Yes, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority.

INTERNATIONAL AIRPORTS—AIR CONDITIONING

Question No. 560—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What levels of temperature and humidity, over what duration or occurring at what frequency, are required before air conditioning can be installed at international airports for (a) the users of such terminals (b) the working staff of Department of Transport or airlines' employees?

2. Have such studies been carried out at the Halifax International Airport and, if so, will the government Table as an "Order for Return" the details of such temperature and/or humidity studies?

3. With respect to airports, is it the responsibility of the Department or the user to pay the capital cost of air conditioning?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The Ministry's policy limits the provision of mechanical cooling of buildings to those geographical areas where the exterior humidity index exceeds 75 for a period of 3 per cent of the time during the summer season (June, July, August and September). It also permits the provision of mechanical cooling for those areas within buildings where equipment operation is affected by environmental conditions (computers, electronic equipment) or where a temperature build up can result from equipment or other means to the extent that forced ventilation cannot maintain a maximum effective interior temperature of 75°F (as defined in the revised ASHRAE comfort chart) for a period of 3 per cent of the time during the summer months. This policy is applied equally, regardless of the occupancy of specific areas.

2. The Halifax Terminal is located in an area where the humidity index does not reach 75 for a period of 3 per cent of the time during the summer months. Areas in the Terminal Building where equipment protection or where serious heat build up (e.g. Control Tower Cab) would be a problem, have been cooled. There has not been a study of other areas. Indoor temperature and humidity data is collected only when problems are identified. The Ministry is not aware of any request for such studies at Halifax. This data is therefore not available.

3. The policy with respect to terminal building rental rates is to recover the cost (capital and maintenance) for exclusive use space from tenants in the rental rate. Where air conditioning is provided, the tenants have their portion of the cost of air conditioning in the rent for the space.

NUMBER OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS GRANTED IMMIGRANT STATUS SINCE SEPTEMBER, 1968

Question No. 568—Mr. Chappell:

1. How many Americans between the ages of 18 and 30 have been allowed landed immigrant status in Canada each month since September, 1968?

2. Does the government have any data on how many Canadians of the same age have been allowed landed immigrant status in the United States during the same period and, if so, how many?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. United States citizens between the ages of 18 and 30 granted landed immigrant status on arrival:

TRANSPORT—PARKING OF INDIVIDUAL LIGHT AIRCRAFT

Question No. 570—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Has there been a recent change in policy with respect to the parking of individual light aircraft at Department of Transport airports in Canada and, if so, what is the new policy?

2. What is the Department of Transport policy with respect to light aircraft owners entering into parking agreements with the Department with respect to parking on departmental land?

3. Is outdoor parking available and permitted for individual light aircraft at Montreal International Airport, St. Hubert Airport, Toronto International Airport, Halifax International Airport, Winnipeg International Airport, Calgary International Airport and Vancouver International Airport?

4. What is the current policy with respect to directions to visiting light aircraft at our larger airports with respect to short period parking, overnight parking and for periods up to one week?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. There has been no change in policy with respect to aircraft parking at ministry airports.

2. At an airport where land commercial planning and utilization permits, land can be leased on a short term basis for parking of an aircraft.

3. Outdoor parking is available and permitted as follows: A private aircraft weighing 5,000 pounds or less may park free of charge for a 24-hour period at the international airports listed, but at the St. Hubert Airport such an aircraft may park free of charge beyond the 24-hour period when the aircraft is parked in an area set aside and marked by the officer in charge of the airport as a free parking area. Any aircraft weighing more than 5,000 pounds parked in excess of six hours at any of the airports listed is assessed a parking fee as follows: For each 10 square foot unit of area or portion thereof (a) per day, $ .01; (b) per week, $ .06; (c) per month $ .20; (d) per year $1.20. Minimum parking charge per day or any part thereof in excess of six hours, $1.00. Occasionally due to heavy aircraft traffic it may be necessary to direct aircraft to a fixed base operator for parking accommodation.

4. At airports with control towers aircraft are directed to designated parking areas by the tower staff. Arrangements for long term parking are subsequently made with the airport operations staff. At airports without control towers aircraft taxi to the terminal area and if necessary are then directed to designated parking areas.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES 1968-1969

Question No. 586—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. What was the amount of money spent by the government through the United Nations during the years 1968 and 1969 as contributions of assistance to underdeveloped countries?

2. What proportion of such assistance was given under the heading agriculture or agricultural products?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer, in so far as CIDA is concerned, is:

	1968-69	1969-70
1.	$23,635,000	$34,585,000
2.	48.5 per cent	55.7 per cent

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS—REPRESENTATIONS BY MR. CRANFORD PRATT

Question No. 596—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government advise if the representations made by Mr. Cranford Pratt before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence have influenced its policy towards Rhodesia or any other African nation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Government receives representations from many individuals or organizations who are interested in international affairs. It is not possible to identify the specific influence which any particular individual or group may have on Government policy.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS—REPRESENTATIONS BY MR. CLYDE SANGER

Question No. 621—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government advise if the representations made by Mr. Clyde Sanger before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence have influenced government policy towards Rhodesia or any other African nation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Government receives representations from many individuals or organizations who are interested in international affairs. It is not possible to identify the specific influence which any particular individual or group may have on Government policy.

RHODESIA—THREAT TO WORLD PEACE—CANADIAN POSITION ON MEMBERSHIP IN UNITED NATIONS

Question No. 624—Mr. Robinson:

Does the government consider Rhodesia as a threat to world peace and (a) if so, in what way (b) if not, will the government consider supporting a Rhodesian application for entry into the United Nations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In 1968 the Security Council, of which Canada was then a member, passed unanimously a resolution which contained a reaffirmation of the Security Council's determination that the situation in Southern Rhodesia constituted a threat to international peace and security. The basis for the Canadian support of this resolution was the Government's appreciation of the situation following upon the unilateral declaration of independence by the minority regime in Rhodesia. Since Canada does not recognize Rhodesia as an independent state, the Government would not support a Rhodesian application for membership in the United Nations.

Questions

RECOGNITION OF RHODESIA AS INDEPENDENT STATE

Question No. 629—Mr. Robinson:

Does the government recognize Rhodesia as an independent state and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Canada does not recognize Rhodesia as an independent state. The Government regards the unilateral declaration of independence by the minority regime as illegal.

AIRPORTS—OTTAWA AND REGINA

Question No. 630—Mr. Skoberg:

1. (a) Have any plans been initiated for the providing of enclosed passenger ramps at the Ottawa International Airport (b) is such a proposal being given active consideration?

2. Are plans being made to provide for a cocktail lounge at the Airport in Regina, and (a) if so, when will construction start (b) if not, is it being considered for the immediate future?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. (a) No. (b) proposal is currently under review.

2. No plans are being made specifically for a cocktail lounge at this time. (b) Terminal building expansion is tentatively considered for fiscal year 1973-74, at which time the matter of the cocktail lounge will be given due consideration.

SUPPORT OF REQUEST BY RHODESIA TO BE HEARD BEFORE SECURITY COUNCIL

Question No. 666—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government support a request by Rhodesia to be heard before the Security Council of the United Nations during the present session and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is the prerogative of the Security Council to decide who may appear before it. Canada is not at present a member of the Council. Presumably any hearing for Rhodesians would be in conformity with Rule 39 of the Security Council Rules of Procedure which stipulates that the Council may invite persons considered competent to supply it with information or to give other assistance and that they would only be heard as individuals, not as representatives of a state which no member of the United Nations recognizes.

PUBLIC DEBT AND INTEREST PAID DURING FISCAL YEAR 1969-70

Question No. 687—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. What was the public debt at the end of the fiscal year 1969-70?

2. What was the interest paid on the public debt during the fiscal year 1969-70?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. Gross unmatured public debt amounted to $22,637,140,229.

2. Interest on the public debt amounted to $1,675,910,611.

[Mr. Benson.]

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all hon. members. At the present time there are 20 questions standing in my name on the Order Paper. One of them, starred question No. 12, was also on the order paper of the last session of parliament. Your Honour made mention earlier of Standing Order 43. I think we are rapidly reaching the point where, if Your Honour is going to be credible in the House, when we have questions about matters that are not national in importance or urgent which have to be placed on the order paper, there must be some method of ensuring that members who make written inquiries of the government secure the information in question within a reasonable period of time. Starred question No. 12 is specific in detail and may require some investigation, but certainly it does not require an investigation that takes over one year in order to provide an answer. I suggest this makes a mockery of the written question system we have in this House.

I dislike having to get up and talk about this matter from time to time, Mr. Speaker, but if I am going to be able to secure information that I consider urgent and necessary for me to perform properly my duties as a Member of Parliament, surely I have some right to expect the government to furnish a written reply within a reasonable period of time. This is not happening and it has not been happening for some time. I believe this matter has to be referred to some committee in order to make a determination of the time period available to the government within which to provide an answer, whether or not either the government or the member asking the question considers the answer to be all the information. It is absolutely ridiculous for a question to sit on the order paper for two sessions and still be unanswered.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, apropos the hon. member's point I will, of course, make a note of starred question 12 to which he referred.

Mr. Hees: That is good of you.

Mr. Jerome: But I think it is appropriate to point out that during the last week 75 replies have been taken care of.

Mr. Hees: What about the big backlog?

Mr. Jerome: If the hon. member would listen—

Mr. Hees: If you will say something we will be glad to listen.

Mr. Jerome: This brings our rate of reply up to the present moment, including some questions which have been answered only recently, to slightly better than 67 per cent of the questions posed.

I can also report to the House that during the past week I have personally contacted each minister and pointed out to him the questions that remain unanswered at the present time which fall within the remaining 30 per cent. They have undertaken to do everything possible to reply at the earliest possible moment. Therefore, Mr.

Speaker, I think we are doing everything possible to handle the matter reasonably at the present time.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to draw to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary that I have had a question on the order paper since October 21 dealing with the Department of National Defence and the Department of Supply and Services.

Mr. Jerome: That information will be noted as well, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, question No. 79 in my name was put on the order paper this session on October 8. It was also on the order paper last session. It asks for information about consultants and companies doing studies for the Prime Minister's office. The Prime Minister has a large staff and I really do not see why it should take this long to answer the question.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on October 29 last, I put on the order paper notice of motion for production of papers No. 145, regarding the construction of a federal building in Victoriaville, a project which has been pending since 1955. I have been waiting, like my hon. fellow citizens of Lotbinière, for an answer to this question which comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this is an urgent matter, and I must insist that the government answer it as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Jerome: I have taken note of that number as well, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Chair should mention that I have noted the point of order raised by the hon. member. He has suggested that the Standing Order dealing with written questions on the order paper and notices of motions for the production of papers be reviewed. As the hon. member knows, the Speaker is not a member of that illustrious committee, the Committee on Procedure and Organization, though I always make it a point to bring to the attention of the committee points of order that are raised in the House in relation to the proper functioning of our Standing Orders. I will certainly do as I have done in the past in the case of the point raised by the hon. member. It will be brought to the attention of the chairman of the committee.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a similar question of privilege in relation to question No. 688 which has been on the order paper since the middle of January. I understand the relevant information was given to the press the day after I posed the question, and I cannot understand why we in the House of Commons could not have had that information before that time.

Mr. Munro: Read the newspapers.

Mr. McIntosh: That is not the proper way to get the information.

Motions for Papers

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion No. 99 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and to the authorization of the government concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the parliamentary secretary is it the pleasure of the House that Notice of Motion No. 99 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ABITIBI CONSTITUENCY—BUILDING AND REPAIRS TO FEDERAL BUILDINGS, ETC., 1969-70

Motion No. 99—Mr. Laprise:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence, briefs, telegrams and other documents between Les Entreprises d'Abitibi Limitée and the Department of Public Works pertaining to the building or repair of wharfs, launching ramps, federal buildings in the constituency of Abitibi during 1969-1970.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notices of Motions Nos. 17, 18, 29, 54, 65, 86, 87, 135 and 159?

RESTRAINT GUIDELINES—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION AND GOVERNMENT

Motion No. 17—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., between the Prices and Incomes Commission and the Government of Canada in which the Commission suggested guidelines for restraint that the federal government might follow referred to by the Prime Minister as reported in Hansard of November 25, 1969 at page 1201.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, consultations between the government of Canada and the Prices and Incomes Commission are on a confidential basis and I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Pardon my inelegance, Mr. Speaker, but my answer is "nuts".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I presume I should interpret that as meaning that the motion is dropped?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, put the question.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Motions for Papers

COPPER EXPORT PERMITS—JANUARY TO SEPTEMBER, 1969

Motion No. 18—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all export permits granted for copper exports for the period January 1, 1969 to September 30, 1969.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will recall in response to his earlier motion, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce cannot comply with this request since details on applications for export permits are treated as confidential and are communicated only to persons legally entitled to such information. If it is helpful, I could add that the total number of permits for copper exports in that period is 1,581—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the Parliamentary Secretary that according to our rules he is not entitled to give that information at this stage of our proceedings and that he can only indicate whether he is prepared to answer the motion.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion in view of the comments I have made.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the comment that it is only those who are legally entitled to this information who may receive it, I would suggest that surely Parliament is legally entitled to do so.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

DRUGS—DRYING UP OF EUROPEAN SOURCES OF SUPPLY BY INTERNATIONAL FIRMS

Motion No. 29—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the evidence collected by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs showing that some of the international drug firms are trying to dry up the sources of supply in European countries, as treated by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in an address to the International Organization of Consumer Unions on June 29, 1970.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the information referred to in this motion was received on a confidential basis and its disclosure would seriously prejudice the sources of information on our lower cost drug program. Therefore I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, if the minister had said that on the basis of the information the government was going to take some legal action to stop this practice I would have agreed, but since he did not I cannot agree.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

[Mr. Speaker.]

EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES UNDER DEFENCE PRODUCTION SHARING AGREEMENT

Motion No. 54—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of a list of all Canadian firms exporting products to the United States, under the Canada-U.S. Defence Production Sharing Agreement from its inception in 1959 to November 30, 1969, listing the specific materials, components, etc., exported and the dollar aggregates involved.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has reviewed the hon. member's second request and is unable to comply since the information is commercially confidential affecting the competitive position of participating companies. However, the minister would be prepared to table estimates of the dollar aggregates and a list of names of companies interested in participating in the production sharing program, if this would be acceptable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I accept that, Mr. Speaker, subject to the hon. member's right to put another motion on the Order Paper if he is not satisfied.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that Motion 54 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

STUDY REGARDING EFFECTS OF INCREASE IN FREIGHT RATES ON REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Motion No. 65—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study undertaken in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion regarding the effects of increase in freight rates on regional economic expansion as mentioned by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and reported in Hansard of March 18, 1970 at page 5184.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the department studies the impact of various federal programs as part of a continuing appraisal of slow growth regions. However, this is designed to assist in drafting policies and programs rather than to produce formal reports. Therefore, since there is no report which could be tabled I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, even though there is no report, in view of the freight rate increase of six per cent I think some information should be given to the House.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CONSULTANT STUDY ON COMPARATIVE CONSTRUCTION COSTS OF CHEMICAL PLANTS

Motion No. 86—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Chemical Construction Corporation on comparative construction costs of chemical plants undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1967-68, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st session of this Parliament.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce cannot accept this motion since the study is part of the chemical industry study which was based largely on information received in confidence from Canadian industry and, moreover, there is an agreement between the Canadian Chemical Producers' Association and the department not to disclose this information. In view of this, I would ask that the hon. member to reconsider and withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: I will reconsider it and may resubmit it.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CONSULTANT STUDY ON INDIAN SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Motion No. 87—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant study on Indian social development undertaken for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st session of this Parliament.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, no final report has yet been received in connection with this study and I would therefore ask the hon. member if he would kindly withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: I would appreciate it if the motion were allowed to stand on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

STUDIES RELATING TO CHEMICAL INDUSTRY

Motion No. 135—Mr. Gilbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all reports and studies related to the chemical industry as reported in the Annual Report of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, April 1, 1967-March 31, 1968, on page 51.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that in response to his previous motions the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was not able to provide the study as it is based largely upon information supplied in confidence to the department from Canadian industry. In view of this I would ask the hon. member if he would kindly withdraw this motion.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, it is time this information was made public and I would ask that this motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

INFORMATION ON EXTENSIVE LAY-OFFS OF WORKERS IN FOREIGN CONTROLLED FIRMS

Motion No. 159—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report undertaken in either the Department of Finance, or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, showing information on the extensive lay-offs of workers that have recently taken place in foreign controlled firms in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move the motion on the hon. member's behalf.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that no report was undertaken in either the Department of Finance or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce showing information on the extensive lay-offs of workers that have recently taken place in foreign-controlled firms in Canada. In view of this perhaps the hon. member would like to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I guess the hon. member has no option; but it might be a good idea if the government did undertake such a survey.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining Notices of Motions for Papers stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

OBJECTIONS BY QUEBEC TO WHITE PAPER—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour with reference to the letter he received from Mr. Cournoyer, the Quebec Minister of Labour, objecting to the white paper on unemployment insurance. Has the government of Canada rejected those objections made on behalf of the government of Quebec, and does it intend to proceed with the implementation of the white paper regardless of those objections?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, a careful analysis of the letter of November 13 which appeared this morning in Le Devoir does not lead to the conclusion that the province of Quebec has rejected the contemplated legislation I propose to bring forward in the House shortly. Since the receipt of that letter there have been several meetings between myself and my counterpart in Quebec which I think have led to a satisfactory explanation of most of the major issues which the province of Quebec raised in that letter of November 13.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, is the minister telling the House that the government of Quebec is satisfied to have the minister proceed with the white paper and has withdrawn its objections in this regard? Has the minister replied in writing to Mr. Cournoyer and, if so, would he table the correspondence between himself and Mr. Cournoyer in the House?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I do not say this in a sarcastic vein, but there are a lot of questions in this regard and if I do not answer them all I hope later in the day the hon. gentleman will ask the few questions that I do not answer at this time. I think neither I nor the hon. gentleman would be able to infer from the letter that the province of Quebec does not intend to participate in the proposed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. The role of the province of Quebec is that of employer and there are provisions in the white paper which would allow any province that does not wish to participate in the plan to remain outside as an employer.

Many of the objections, not all, that the province of Quebec raised in their analysis of the white paper in their letter of November 14 have, I believe, been met satisfactorily not only as a result of the exchange of correspondence but also as a result of several meetings which I have held with various ministers of the province of Quebec. As to whether or not there is a reply to that letter, I may say there is, but whether or not I intend to table it will depend on my opinion of the circumstances under which that letter appeared in the Montreal Le Devoir. I would be very surprised if the letter which appeared in the newspaper appeared with the written or verbal consent of the Minister of Labour of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the minister seek the approval of Mr. Cournoyer and the government of Quebec of the tabling of any such correspondence, and did he mean to indicate to the House that Mr. Cournoyer and the province of Quebec were dropping their assertion that unemployment insurance and manpower programs ought to be administered by the province of Quebec rather than by the parliament of Canada?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, what I am really trying to say is that when there are differences of opinion between the federal Minister of Labour and his provincial counterpart, a difference of opinion which is real or imaginary, I prefer to settle those differences by direct negotiation rather than by an exchange of correspondence in newspapers.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister a direct question relating to seeking the permission of the Quebec minister and the government of Quebec for the tabling of this correspondence in the House. Since the letter from the Quebec minister has been published, will the Minister of Labour seek permission from the government of Quebec or from its appropriate minister to table the correspondence in this House?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly discuss with the Minister of Labour of the province of Quebec how this confidential letter appeared in a public newspaper.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe wish to ask a supplementary question?

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell the House whether it is official that in his letter Mr. Cournoyer tells the federal Minister of Labour that this letter might be published?

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in that letter Mr. Cournoyer drew my attention to this possibility, but I am not sure that this was written with his approval.

ALLEGED REFUSAL BY QUEBEC TO CONTRIBUTE TO FUND

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Abitibi want to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister of Labour told us earlier that since receiving this letter from the Quebec Minister of Labour he has had discussions with the latter about the white paper on unemployment insurance. Can he tell us whether the Quebec Minister of Labour has agreed or refused to contribute for workers, Public Service employees and employees of the Quebec government?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be unfair for me to speak on behalf of the province of Quebec, particularly since they have not seen the proposed legislation. I would not want to be in contempt of parliament by showing the proposed legislation to the province before members of the House of Commons have had an opportunity to study the bill after first reading.

IMMEDIATE CHANGES TO ASSIST HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYED

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. As it now appears certain that amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will not become effective for quite some time, and since the hard core of the unemployed—those who have been unemployed for over three months—is double the normal rate for this time last year, would the minister give consideration to introducing some interim measure now so that the families of these hard-core unemployed do not suffer unduly during the winter months?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I am sure the representation the hon. member has made on behalf of the unemployed, who suffer severely as a result of less than satisfactory benefits, will be drawn to the attention of the provinces as well since they have an important role to play in respect of the approval of this particular legislation. Nothing has changed my position as expressed in the House several days ago that the proposed new legislation will be before the House of Commons by the date I specified, namely, July 1, 1971.

OPPORTUNITY TO OPT OUT OF NEW LEGISLATION

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that he has mentioned the opportunity for the province of Quebec to opt out of certain aspects of the plan, and since there will be a tremendous cost to provincial governments and local school boards if teachers are brought under the new unemployment insurance legislation, does this mean they will also have an opportunity to opt out?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I want to apologize to members of the House if I left the inference that a province could opt out per se. I said there would be provision for any province to opt out as an employer. With regard to the added cost to the province in respect of the universality feature by the inclusion of additional costs to school boards, this is more than offset by the fact that hundreds of thousands of people will no longer remain on the welfare rolls and thus be a direct burden on the province and the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan. Because of the increased benefits, people will at least be able to survive or live on the unemployment insurance benefit alone and not need supplementation by welfare.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond on a supplementary, but then I think we should go to a new item and recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. Then, perhaps we could return to the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate after we have completed a round of original questions.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, since the minister only emphasized the preface to my question in that he referred to the co-operation of the provincial governments along with the local school boards, may I ask whether the provinces will have the opportunity to opt out of this particular category of the UIC legislation?

Mr. Mackasey: No. Universality means obviously what it says.

Mr. MacInnis: What does universality mean?

Mr. Mackasey: You have asked the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DESTROYER CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM—ADDITIONAL COST

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board regarding the DDH-280 class destroyer escort construction program. I should like to ask the minister whether a decision has been taken in recent days to scrap this program or is any such decision now under consideration by the government?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, no such decision has been taken. In so far as I can speak for the government, consideration is not being given at this time to scrapping the program.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. Can he tell the House whether there have been some 13 major design changes at a cost of some $100 million in this construction program?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, in a construction program of this magnitude, extending over a number of years, there are bound to be design changes to avoid technological obsolescence during construction. I think probably a more adequate explanation of this will be given by the Minister of National Defence when his estimates are under discussion in committee in the relatively near future.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that this program was originally to cost $170 million and expenditures are now estimated at some $227.7 million, may I ask the minister if either he or the Minister of National Defence will make a statement to the House fairly soon as to what the additional estimated cost is to complete this program, and is it the government's intention to complete it?

Mr. Drury: As I said, the Minister of National Defence, I think, has already indicated his intention to review this construction program with the parliamentary committee.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Yes, next month.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Could the President of the Treasury Board further advise the House whether or not the question of employment in those two river yards is a major factor in any consideration at present being given by the treasury benches with regard to the DDH-280 program? I ask that because a tremendous number of people would be thrown out of work if there were a negative decision.

Mr. Drury: The question presumes that we are proceeding to what the hon. member refers to as a negative decision. This is not the case.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

TELEVISION—UNDESIRABLE ADVERTISING DIRECTED TOWARD CHILDREN

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

Is it his intention to follow the lead of the Movement in favour of abolition of advertising directed at children (MAPDE) and also to submit recommendations to the CBC in order to avoid future flagrant abuses of advertising directed at children, for instance for toys, clothing and cereals?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I feel that is more a responsibility involving the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. However, any suggestion emanating from that department would be promptly forwarded to the CBC.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO LETTERS FROM PROVINCES EXPRESSING OBJECTIONS TO WHITE PAPER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I also have a question for the Minister of Labour concerning unemployment insurance. First, I should like to refer him to Hansard of January 25, page 2713, where I am recorded as having asked the minister the following question:

In view of the urgency of the unemployment crisis, can the minister tell us whether he has yet received answers from all the provinces? Is it still the minister's intention to bring this legislation in by July, 1971, or is he updating his timetable in an attempt to deal with the very harsh unemployment situation?

The minister's answer was:

We are now running ahead of schedule in connection with the timetable outlined for the preparation of the draft bill, and I see no particular reason why we should not meet the target date of July 1, 1971.

I find it a little difficult to understand the minister's position at this time, and I question his credibility.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of asking a question. Perhaps he might come to that point now.

Mr. Alexander: I will do so, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's answer today regarding the province of Quebec, can he assure the House that there are no other hidden letters from the provinces voicing their objections to any particular matter in the white paper on unemployment insurance? In other words, can we be assured that there are no objections from any other provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked the minister to assure the House that there are no hidden letters. I wonder whether a question in those terms is in order. I gather that if the hon. member would put the question in another form the minister might answer it.

Mr. Alexander: I will remove the word "hidden", but the minister understands my position.

[Mr. Drury.]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): What I do not understand is why the hon. gentleman, who is one of the more likeable members of the House, would want to question my credibility. In the nine years I have been in the House I have never questioned the credibility of any Member of Parliament. I do not think it is the tradition in this House to question the credibility of any member of the House.

The hon. member's question the other day was whether I felt I would be able to meet the timetable that I had mentioned previously on several occasions in the House, namely, July 1, 1971. I repeated that date today in answer to a very reasonable question from the Leader of the Opposition. I repeat now that I see no particular reason why the legislation should not be ready by July 1, 1971. I will have to wait for the official reaction of the provinces to the proposed legislation after they see the draft of the bill which will be available to members of the House at the same time.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I say with all due respect that I appreciate the lecture the minister has given me, but may I draw his attention to the fact that he has not answered my question. I want to know whether he has received any correspondence from any other provinces similar in nature to that received by him from the province of Quebec. It is a simple question calling for a simple answer.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member must know, as a member of the appropriate committee, that in July letters were sent to all the provinces inviting them to appear before the committee, to which the hon. gentleman made a very valuable contribution. I could check with the appropriate chairman, but I doubt very much that any official opposition to the concept was raised before that hearing by any of the provinces. Certainly, there have been questions from various provinces and in order to answer these we have been in constant communication, including visits to each and every capital of the provinces.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

DATING OF PACKAGED FOOD

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would he say whether a request has been received from the government of Manitoba urging that the dating of packaged food for consumption purposes be made mandatory and included in the federal packaging and labelling legislation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I received a very helpful letter from Mr. Hanuschak of Manitoba. I discussed it with him over the telephone. It is my position, which I will enunciate further in the committee because the bill is before the committee, that the question of date stamping or an indication of age of products can be provided for under the existing wording of the bill. I provided for that in the drafting of the bill. But if a clarifying amendment would be helpful, I would be quite happy to look at some form of amendment to make sure there is no doubt about the matter.

FINANCE

PLANS TO STIMULATE EXPANSION OF PRIVATE SECTOR OF ECONOMY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Although short-term interest rates have dropped because of the relatively rapid expansion of the money supply, there is still no indication of increasing activity in the private business sector. What further plans does the government have to stimulate expansion of the private sector of our economy?

Mr. Speaker: I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that the question is very wide in scope. He is inviting the minister to make a general statement which I suggest to the House cannot be made at this time.

MANPOWER

RIGHT TO INFORMATION ON PERSONS SEEKING EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. What was the reason for the directive, memorandum, instruction, circular, whatever he prefers to call it, of January 21 to the Canada Manpower offices which has resulted in impeding the flow of statistical data from these offices to the Canadian people?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): A memorandum of that specific date has not been brought to my attention. On a date in January, Manpower centres were reminded of a policy statement or directive that is three years old which had indicated to Manpower managers that information which was released should be released with the necessary information about its validity and about its exact nature so that no one would be misled by erroneous figures.

Mr. Lundrigan: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow a supplementary question from the hon. member in a moment, but first I wish to seek the co-operation of the House. There are 20 or so hon. members who are seeking a chance to ask questions and there are perhaps not much more than 10 or 15 minutes before the end of the question period.

Mr. Lundrigan: I will do my best to co-operate with Your Honour, and knowing there are several members who wish to ask supplementary questions I will content myself with asking this final supplementary question.

Could the minister indicate why, as a Member of Parliament I was advised yesterday by a Canada Manpower office that in order to receive current data from Manpower I would have to apply in writing to the manager of the office, explaining the reasons for seeking such data, that the local office would then have to get clearance from the regional office, that a final decision would be made somewhere along the line, and that the tightening of security was precipitated by a memorandum issued on January 21, 1971?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: May I say in answer to the hon. member that I cannot explain to him how he received that answer except that, knowing how he asks his questions, I am not surprised he received a strange answer.

RIGHT TO INFORMATION ON PERSONS SEEKING EMPLOYMENT—AUTHORIZATION AND WORDING OF DIRECTIVE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can ask this question in a way that even the minister will understand. Did he order the sending of a directive or instruction on January 21 that information was not to be provided unless it was cleared by various managers, upper managers, top managers and the like? Did he also have inserted in the statement the words, "managers are advised to spell out the favourable features of the manpower program—"

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is the rest of the quotation—"at this time of high unemployment"?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that was a long question but the answer is a short and unequivocal no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I ask the minister to table that directive in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier in answer to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, no directive of that date has come to my attention, but since the hon. member has something he would like to present I am sure he could make it public.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Facetiousness is no substitute for information which the minister should give.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the right hon. gentleman ask his supplementary?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, surely.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, one has always to preface a question in order to meet the irrelevancies of these ministers. May I ask the minister whether he has no knowledge that, through his own Manpower offices in Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver, any such information was sent out? Will he look it up?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will see the hon. member for St. John's East for one supplementary on this subject, and if there is time I will return to the hon. member for Edmonton Centre. I apologize to the hon. member.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SUGGESTED LIFTING OF RESTRICTIONS ON SUPPLYING OF INFORMATION BY OFFICES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the seriousness of the unemployment situation, will he take immediate steps to lift any and all restrictions on the free flow of information from Canada Manpower offices across the country?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, this department co-operates with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in providing the most reliable information we have on unemployment figures. In many other ways we do provide a tremendous amount of information, and I will be glad to send hon. members the most recent data we have.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL RECRUITMENT OF FRANCOPHONES—REQUEST THAT PROGRAM NOT BE INITIATED PRIOR TO CONSIDERATION BY COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to one of the two presidents across the way, either the President of the Privy Council or the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the statement made earlier today to the effect that the government prefers to postpone for several weeks any discussion of certain public service recruitment programs, can an assurance be given that the program referred to in the memorandum tabled yesterday will not be put into effect before the committee has an opportunity to discuss this matter?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should reiterate that there is no such program. I did give an assurance yesterday that a program of this character would not be put into operation out of the contingency fund without being disclosed first in the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer just given by the minister, can he tell us whether the meeting that was called, according to the memorandum tabled yesterday, "to help speed up the implementation of the program" was held on Tuesday, January 12, and what were the results of that meeting?

Mr. Drury: I will have to take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether the meeting ever took place.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They don't tell you any more than they tell us.

REDUCTIONS IN ISOLATED POST ALLOWANCES—REQUEST FOR DELAY UNTIL REVIEWED BY COMMITTEE

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the great concern expressed over the Treasury Board's announcement of cuts in isolated post allowances for federal government employees in certain isolated and remote communities in Canada, would the minister be prepared to delay implementation of these changes until an appropriate committee of the House has had an opportunity to review the entire question of isolated post allowances and report on this matter?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the scheme of providing allowances in isolated posts has been one under discussion for some time with the Public Service Alliance and other appropriate employees' staff associations in the National Joint Council. Some time ago agreement was reached in the National Joint Council to implement a program which would be indexed to the differential in the cost of living. That program has been in operation and recently, quite automatically, with effect from February 1 some allowances will go up and some will come down. I think it would be unwise to interrupt this normal process. However, if a committee of the House wants to look at the whole program I have no objection to that.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether these reductions, which are pretty substantial, were in fact discussed with the representatives of the employees concerned before they were implemented or whether they were implemented unilaterally by the government?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the agreement, indeed with the proposals of the employees' representatives, changes both up and down are automatically related to the cost of living index differential.

ABITIBI—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS TO COMMUNICATE IN FRENCH

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Supply and Services.

When his officials have dealings with my constituents, they always do it in English and refuse to speak French. Could the minister tell us if this is due to lack of good will on the part of his officials or to the inadequate number of French-speaking officials?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the question asked by the hon. member although interesting and important is more a representation made to the department and the hon. member must assume that it will be taken into consideration.

MANPOWER

SIGNIFICANCE OF MEMORANDUM TO OFFICES REGARDING RELEASE OF UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the second surreptitious resurrection of memoranda this week, can the minister say whether the manpower managers have been commissioned, either by his office or by Information Canada, to act under direction as propaganda agents for the government, and have they been specifically instructed to point out the multiple manpower programs to balance public opinion in this period of high unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED REPEGGING OF CANADIAN DOLLAR TO ASSIST EXPORTERS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance tell the House whether we can expect an early decision with regard to repegging the Canadian dollar because of the increasing number of major Canadian concerns engaged in the export program which are reporting losses and having to lay off hundreds of people as the result of loss of contracts caused by the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar on the international market?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that I could not give any indication of this in the House at the present time.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I may have misled the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Another?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hillsborough.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister rises on a question of privilege. Before I recognize the minister, perhaps he noticed that I recognized another hon. member when he suggested that he should take advantage of the fact he had the floor to answer another question. We have tried to get away from that practice in the past. It might be better if we returned to the minister in due course to allow him to answer the question, but for the moment I gather he has a question of privilege and the Chair will hear him.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to avoid raising a special question of privilege, but I would like to point out that there were several questions asked this week about the Canada Development Corporation by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the minister indicate what the question of privilege is?

Mr. Hees: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I should simply like to say, in answer to one of those questions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that that is precisely what he cannot do at this moment. I appreciate that the minister may want to reply to the question, and he should be given that opportunity, but it is better for the orderly conduct of the question period that the minister should reply later to the question asked previously, as he has indicated he wishes to do. He will be recognized in due course.

BILINGUALISM

USE OF CONCEALED TAPE RECORDER IN INTERVIEWING AIR CANADA EMPLOYEE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister which concerns the taping by an official representing the language commissioner of conversations with Air Canada clerks without the knowledge of the said clerks. Can the minister assure us that henceforth no employees or officials of the government of Canada, public commissions or corporations will perpetrate upon the people of Canada such sneaky, snoopy Orwellian intrusions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question is in a form which is very difficult for the Chair to accept. The Chair will recognize the Minister of Finance.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ACQUISITION OF CROWN CORPORATIONS

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I had had an opportunity to answer the question earlier not so much time would have been taken. I simply want to say that in answering the question raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands I said that if it were decided to turn over certain Crown corporations to the Canadian Development Corporation the government would have to come to the House and ask for permission to do so. Actually, section 39 of the CDC bill, which has had first reading, takes care of that matter. If parliament approved that section, the government would have the right to negotiate the sale of these enterprises to the CDC. I thought that was an important point that should be corrected.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN FORMATION OF MARITIMES COUNCIL OF PREMIERS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the progress made at yesterday's meeting of the three Maritimes premiers, in view of their intention to form a Maritimes council of premiers and establish a secretariat, and in view of the additional costs that these projects would entail for the provinces, has the federal government indicated that it is prepared to participate in this matter in some meaningful way?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The matter has not been raised yet with the federal government, to my knowledge.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE CLOSER RELATIONSHIPS WITH GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Since there is a considerable measure of detente in central Europe, and since the Federal Republic of Germany has itself entered into more direct relationships with the German Democratic Republic, has the Canadian government given consideration to entering into closer relationships, particularly trading relationships, with the latter government, the East German government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to that question is, not any official recognition. We are prepared, of course, to trade with the people of the GDR, but I do not believe, and I think this view is shared by the government of the Federal Republic of Germany, that official recognition would forward the detente that we all seek.

Mr. Brewin: Has the government given any consideration to establishing a different basis for trade relationships with East Germany?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have no objection whatever to trading with the German Democratic Republic. I do not believe it would be in the interest of the promotion of progress toward a detente in Europe if any action were taken that would create the impression that we were about to recognize the German Democratic Republic officially.

CONSTRUCTION—SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance concerning the recent statement by the president of the Canadian Construction Association in which he expressed concern about the 1971 prospects for the industry. Since activity in that industry has fallen far short of the government's predictions, would the minister be prepared to consider eliminating the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials as a first step toward boosting the construction industry?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that the outlook for the construction industry in 1971 is pretty good.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

WELFARE

ASSISTANCE TO COURTS IN LOCATING DESERTING HUSBANDS AND ENFORCING SUPPORT FOR WIVES AND CHILDREN

Mr. Rud L. Whiting (Halton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the minister is meeting with his provincial counterparts this week, will he discuss the possibility of setting up machinery so that information regarding the whereabouts of deserting husbands and fathers can be furnished to provincial courts in order to assist them in forcing these men to support their wives and families?

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. May I ask him whether he has received representations from Canadian publishers of original Canadian books requesting government assistance? If so, has the government given consideration to those requests? Also, when may we expect a statement in the House on government policy concerning this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the latter part of the hon. member's question is in order in the sense that he asks whether a statement will be made on motions. A reply may be made to that part of the question.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there is no present intention to make any statement on motions. As the minister responsible for federal government publishing, as well as for certain programs of encouragement of national identity and solidarity, I have been interested in meeting with Canadian book and periodical publishers in order to explore their problems. But in dealing with—

May I table that answer and may it be taken as read?

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

[Editor's note: the answer follows:]

The transfer of administrative activities from Calgary to Edmonton is an organizational move wherein the overall responsibility for the management and administration of postal services in the province of Alberta will be concentrated in one district office located in Edmonton.

As part of the general reorganization now under way, the department is adhering to a general policy of boundaries of district offices conforming to provincial boundaries. Where the workload justifies more than one district may be established. Districts are divided into areas and area managers appointed who are responsible for the administration of postal services in these areas.

Adherence to provincial boundaries has resulted in the transfer of responsibility for 50 per cent of the offices formerly coming under the jurisdiction of the Calgary district office to the provincial district offices located in British Columbia and Saskatchewan.

With the transfer of these offices the need of two district offices in Alberta no longer exists as the administration of the postal services in Alberta can be consolidated and effectively managed under the jurisdiction of the district office located in Edmonton. Area managers as an adjunct of the district office in Edmonton will continue to be located in Calgary responsible for the administration of postal services in the southern part of the province.

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATE INCREASE—DISCUSSION BY MINISTER WITH CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It concerns the request of Canadian railways for a 6 per cent increase in freight rates which, if granted, could very well aggravate the already critical unemployment situation. Has the minister discussed this request with the Canadian Transport Commission? If so, what have been the results of such discussions?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not discussed this with the CTC. As I have said on many occasions, this is a decision entirely within the competence of the railways concerned. They, I understand, filed notice of this intention before the CTC, but I am neither obligated nor, indeed, do I have the right to consult with the CTC on a matter of this kind.

Jean-Paul L'Allier, the Quebec representative at the Conference of French-speaking countries, concerning the composition of the Canadian delegation, to the effect that the composition of the said delegation was ridiculous and prejudicial to the effective operation of those conferences.

Does the Secretary of State intend to change the composition of these delegations and if so, along what lines?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I was given to understand, Mr. Speaker, that this statement made by the Quebec minister had been misinterpreted or inaccurately reproduced by the newspapers. GLUE SNIFFING—REPRESENTATIONS TO MANUFACTURERS OF PRODUCTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I hope Your Honour will allow me this extremely important point of order. It concerns the Minister of National Health and Welfare who is in the chamber at present and will be attending the ministerial conference. I have a statement signed by 11,500 people in Hamilton, including young people and adults, who are concerned about glue sniffing. I hope the minister will raise this matter at the conference. With a view to having his colleagues approach the manufacturers in order to ensure—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is obviously making a very important and interesting report to the minister. Perhaps he might consider the advisibility of continuing the submission with the minister as he leaves the chamber. It is not a point of order. I assume the hon. member wanted the opportunity to make that representation, and I assume he is satisfied that he has done so. I cannot accept it as a point of order. Orders of the day.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a further point of order?

Mr. Alexander: I will not be long. I appreciate Your Honour's indulgence. Since the minister is going to become involved with drop-in centres and crisis centres throughout the country, will he give this matter prime consideration because of the interest shown by these 11,500 people?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Tuesday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury (for the Prime Minister) that Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-207, an act respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto. In my opinion, this bill illustrates more adequately than words can say the bureaucratic manner of doing things. This type of legislation can only create chaos and confusion in the minds of many Canadians.

This bill is somewhat like a sausage. It is composed of many things with no one, not even the government, knowing all that it contains. The House of Commons is being asked to accept one package which establishes a department of the environment, creates ministries of state, increases the number of parliamentary secretaries, gives the Postmaster General a new status, establishes new retirement regulations for public servants and special pension privileges for deputy heads. Is it any wonder that the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) raised a question about the validity of this bill?

There are some parts of this bill with which I can agree in principle, such as Part I which proposes the creation of the department of the environment. However, in my opinion, this method of presenting important legislative measures deters consideration in depth of the impact of these proposals on the Canadian nation. My principle concern is for the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. It is being swallowed up by this new giant, the department of the environment, which, according to the press, will have an annual budget of approximately $200 million and a staff estimated to be between 11,000 and 13,000 persons.

As I said a moment ago, I welcome the establishment of the department of the environment. However, I believe its terms of reference should be confined to antipollution measures. Environmental concerns are no longer the private preserve of the bird watchers. The same bell tolls for all.

The manner in which the abuse of water affects our Canadian fisheries resources, both inland and on both sea coasts, is and must be of primary concern to the federal Department of Fisheries and Forestry. In many ways, fish may be our first line of defence as pollution effects on fish have time and again warned of and dramatized the extent to which we are poisoning our environment. According to recent reports, mercury is still finding its way into our fishing areas. It is affecting Japanese canned tuna. Mercury in fish is not new. Researchers at the New York state department of environmental conservation have found levels of mercury in preserved fish caught 40 years ago that are more than twice as high as levels that would now bar those fish from the market.

It is my understanding that a recent landing of 15,500 pounds of swordfish by a Nova Scotia swordfisherman was examined. It was found to contain mercury in excess of the amount fit for human consumption. This poses very serious questions. What are these swordfishermen to do? There are at least 48 boats of varying length operating in the swordfishing industry between Sambro and Yarmouth, to say nothing of the ships operating out of other areas. Will these fishermen be required to go on relief? What other type of fishing can they pursue? Who is to pay the enormous cost of new equipment for some other type of fishing which may be found to be suitable? These are serious questions. It is interesting to note that tests made at the Scriffs Institution of Oceanography in California indicate that some of the lead pollutant from automobile exhausts were found in liver tissue of sea bass caught off the coast near smog-plagued Los Angeles. Obviously, we are moving in the right direction in setting up legislation to purify our air and water in co-operation with the provinces.

If hon. members refer to Schedule A of this bill, they will note that pollution is only one facet of the responsibilities of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davies). It became evident sometime ago that control of pollution in Canada should receive number one priority from the government. However, its policies to date have seriously fragmented our pollution control authority thereby leaving our industries, provincial and municipal governments in a state of chaos and uncertainty regarding our pollution laws. At present our pollution control laws are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), the Minister of National Health and Welfare, (Mr. Munro), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. MacDonald) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing). These ministers under whom responsibilities fall for control of pollution do not have a co-ordinated plan of attack in order to deal with this vital problem. Therefore, our programs are bogged down in waters muddier than our policies were supposed to cure.

As we say in Atlantic Canada, our pollution program was all sails and no rudder. It was going everywhere, but nowhere, as no leadership was provided. Hopefully, this leadership will be provided under the new department of the environment. However, it is disturbing that the Department of Fisheries and Forestry will be lost in the shuffle. Under the British North America Act, legislative jurisdiction over fisheries is vested in the federal government. Over the years, the federal government has delegated its powers over fresh-water fisheries to the provinces. Non-tidal fisheries are administered by the provinces and the tidal-fishery or saltwater fishery is administered by the federal government. Recently the fresh water fish marketing corporation was established in co-operation with the provinces. Generally speaking, regulations proposed by the provinces are approved by the federal government. This makes legislative jurisdiction over fisheries matters national in scope.

Upon checking the records, I find that Canada's federal fisheries service began with confederation but it functioned as a branch of other departments, such as marine and fisheries, until 1930 when the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King established a separate department of fisheries. In explaining his action for creating a separate ministry, Mr. King read the list of acts for the administration of which the minister would be responsible, and then stated:

> These are matters of considerable importance. The hope is that this all important resource and the industry to which it gives rise will be developed to a much greater degree than has been the case in the past. If the minister devotes his time and attention to that end, he will find plenty to do.

These are not my words; they are the words of a former Liberal Prime Minister, but in my opinion that admonition could be given today, in 1971. Since I was first elected as a Member of Parliament in 1957, I have not been able to avoid the feeling that in some parts of Canada the fishing industry is looked upon as being of no importance. This, of course, is unfortunate, and I hope the present government will not become a party to furthering this type of attitude throughout the nation. In my opinion, and in the opinion of the party I represent, the commercial fishing industry is vitally important, not only to the economy of the Atlantic provinces but to Canada as a whole.

To give you some idea of the importance of this industry, I point out that the total catch by some 68,000 Canadian fishermen during 1969 amounted to 2.7 billion pounds, with a landed value of $182 million. In its 23rd annual report dated June 1970, the Fisheries Prices Support Board estimates that the value of fishery products derived from the 1969 catch—of which 70 per cent was exported—will amount to approximately $370 million. The United States continues to be our main export market and the figures I have mentioned are most important when you consider that these earnings for the most part are distributed over vast areas of Canada. In some cases fisheries income represents the only earnings in regions of economic disparity.

The government of Canada cannot help but become involved in many problems of an international nature if we are to obtain the greatest advantages for our fishermen engaged in the principal Canadian fisheries on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Without question, the conservation of stocks of fish, which are in danger of extinction from causes other than pollution, is of vital importance at the present time. One of the most critical areas is in the north Atlantic, where Danish fishermen have virtually depleted the stocks of Atlantic salmon. Many of the salmon caught by the Danes are from Canadian salmon hatcheries, though this is only one of our problems.

Another serious situation on the east coast relates to the diminishing stocks of haddock, cod, redfish and flatfish. It is now generally agreed that stocks of haddock and redfish are virtually extinct on the Grand Banks, and flounder stocks are being depleted. Furthermore, it is now abundantly clear that inshore cod stocks are less and less dependable because of continuing excessive fishing efforts by foreign fleets. In fact, our Canadian inshore and offshore fishermen are appalled and alarmed at the accelerated pace of events and the relentless pressure on our fishing resources by huge foreign trawlers. This overfishing sets up a chain reaction for the depletion of one species through uncontrolled fishing efforts brings increasing pressure on other species, and the situation has now reached the stage where, if the present trend continues, the incomes of large numbers of inshore and deep sea fishermen, as well as the jobs of thousands of shore workers, will be seriously threatened. I believe that unless positive and firm action is taken to manage our fishing resources on the continental shelf off Canada's east coast we can expect disastrous effects on our over-all industry in the not too distant future.

These are all matters of great concern to us in the Atlantic provinces and they should be the subject of strong representation by Canada's Minister of Fisheries and Forestry when he attends the next law of the sea conference, which unfortunately will not be held until 1972. A lot of fish will come over the rails of foreign fleets by that time, and since we will no longer have a minister of fisheries, a minister known by that name, my concern and my fear is that the international law of the sea conference will become bogged down in discussions about seabed mineral exploration and pollution with the real and thorny question of fisheries conservation pushed far, far into the background.

I sincerely hope this will not be the case, but if we do not hold the fishing industry in high esteem as a nation by retaining a fisheries minister, how can we expect other nations seriously to consider our claims to the fisheries resources off our coasts? With the abolition of the Ministry of Fisheries and Forestry, we will also lose a certain amount of advertising value which accrued to the fishing industry as a result of having a fisheries minister. It was always nice to visit an exhibition and to see a display put on by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. This was helpful in the over-all marketing of fish right across Canada as well as in other parts of the world.

In my opinion, we must utilize every opportunity to impress upon other nations, especially those nations depleting our fisheries resources, the importance of this industry to Canada. I do not know the present plans of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) but I would suggest and urge that he include over-fishing in the north Atlantic as an agenda item for discussion when he visits Moscow in the spring. Important as pollution is, there are many aspects of the fishing industry which require study in depth and which must not be overshadowed or overlooked.

One of the essential tasks of the minister of the department of environment will be to solicit the co-operation of provincial governments in maintaining uniform standards for clean water and air. He will have the new and massive Canada Water Act in his legal arsenal and not the least of his problems will be to prepare some sort of priority list for action. In my view, it is doubtful whether this nation can afford all the pollution controls that it should have in the next several years. Therefore, a distinction will have to be made between what is absolutely essential and what is merely desirable.

I cannot help but wonder, for example, which hat the minister will wear if he pursues his proposal that Georgia Strait be reserved as an underwater national park. This would mean that pulp mills and fishing towns currently using the strait would have to clean up their operations considerably, something the provincial government has been unable to make them do. Obviously the new minister of environment is going to be a very busy man.

Turning from the west coast to the east coast, I cannot help but wonder, since technical surveys of energy, including energy developed from water, now come under the department of environment, what stand the minister will take on developing Fundy tidal power in Minas Basin for the benefit of all Atlantic Canada. Under clause 11 the minister may co-operate with provincial governments or agencies on programs enhancing environmental quality, and I know of no program in Canada that would do more to improve the environment of Atlantic Canada than the development of Fundy tidal power.

This development would provide energy without depleting a non-renewable resource; and if it were built from a point on Cape Split across Minas Basin to Cape Sharp near Parrsboro, would provide a valuable revenue-producing, shorter transportation link between the south shore of Nova Scotia, the Annapolis Valley and the markets of central Canada. It would provide power without polluting the air for as long as the tides rise and fall—and that will be a long time, Mr. Speaker—while providing much needed employment and industrial expansion in Atlantic Canada, where it is sorely needed at the present time. Obviously, the question to be decided in the very near future is not whether tidal power can compete economically, but whether any alternative to tidal power can be developed to compete with its freedom from any form of environmental pollution. I believe this project should be given top priority. I believe it deserves to be Canada's number one development project at this point in time. However, I wonder what stand the minister of environment will take on this matter, for this is only one of the many new problems he faces which must be resolved.

In my opinion, the minister designate takes his duties seriously but it had been presumed, up to this point, that the portfolio of Fisheries and Forestry was a full time job. Now, if this is so I can only conclude that the minister designate for this new conglomerate will be bogged down and overburdened, so something is going to suffer. Will it be pollution control or fisheries and forestry?

Let us face facts. With a department of such magnitude ministerial responsibility is no longer possible, because of the sheer amount of work. In addition to accounting for the activities of the department, the minister must act as parliamentary spokesman for the numerous boards, commissions and agencies associated with the work of the department. Therefore, the time that he can devote to policy considerations will become increasingly less, and there are still many fisheries problems unsolved. We have been waiting since 1964 for action on our territorial sea and fishing zone legislation and we are still waiting. There has been no settlement as yet of the thorny problems surrounding the fishing rights of the French on the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

I also note that Bill C-207 provides for the appointment of an officer called the Deputy Minister of the Environment, to be the deputy head of the Department of the Environment. The Montreal Gazette of January 7 reported that the present holder of the position of Deputy Minister of Fisheries will be retiring a few months in advance of his 65th birthday to make way for a new appointee. The proposed appointee has a good reputation for competence, arising out of his success as deputy commissioner general of Expo 67, but a resumé of his previous activities makes no mention of any experience in matters relating to fisheries. The press release from the Prime Minister's office also expressed appreciation for Dr. Needler's services, and expressed the hope that the government would be able to call on him for special assignments and advice, especially in the fisheries field where he is an acknowledged authority.

Dr. Needler has been associated with the fisheries department in different capacities since 1929. In my opinion, a man of this calibre should have been retained, in order to strengthen the Canadian delegation at the International Law of the Sea Conference in 1972. It would seem that the fisheries branch will fast become the unwanted stepchild of the new Department of the Environment, and this could spell disaster for many people in Atlantic Canada where fishing is a way of life.

There are many other questions that could be raised on this section of the bill. For example, the legislation outlines the job that must be done, but it does not say who will pay the bills. Further, it mentions co-operation with the provinces and the municipalities, but it provides no mechanism for establishing pollution controls. Who will train pollution control officers? Will the federal government pay for their training and their salaries when they are posted throughout Canada?

These are some of the questions unanswered by the bill, but as time is passing, I must turn briefly to the other sections of Bill C-207. While I stated my agreement with some reservations to the establishment of the Department of the Environment, I cannot agree with Part IV of this bill cited as the Ministries and Ministers of State Act. The proposal would permit up to five ministers of state to be in existence at one time. This is a preposterous recommendation, a proposal which cannot and should not be approved by this House. We have at the present time the largest Cabinet in this country's history, with a total of 29 including the Prime Minister.

I suppose no one can say this enormous cabinet has not been effective, for by putting their heads together, by working as a unit, this cabinet has been successful in establishing a situation in Canada where we see more than 6 per cent of our labour force presently unemployed. This was one of this government's objectives, namely to create a little slack in the economy. The little slack developed into a slump, and the dark shadow of the worst winter of unemployment in history is today threatening our work force of eight and one half million Canadians. A survey among our top economists, labour leaders, and businessmen shows that they expect an army of some 750,000 to be unemployed this winter.

However, it is evident that this government has plans to improve the lot of those with low incomes by appointing five additional ministers. In addition, the bill proposes the appointment of a Parliamentary Secretary for every minister who holds an office for which a salary is provided in Section 4 of the Salaries Act. There are 16 parliamentary secretaries at present, receiving an additional $4,000 per year, and the proposals to increase the cabinet and allow each minister a Parliamentary Secretary can only be termed political piracy of the public purse by this Liberal government.

This is a devious, socialistic piece of legislation, the aim of which is only to increase the number of ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries without having any specific duties for them. This is not only a socialistic proposal for the expansion of Ottawa's bureaucracy, but the course of action proposed in this bill further diminishes the powers of Parliament and makes a mockery of elections in which people vote for a Member of Parliament in the sincere hope and belief that once elected he will have some say over their affairs, over their laws, over the manner in which they are governed. This situation no longer exists under this government, which seeks to undermine the power of Parliament so that it can ride roughshod over the wishes of the Canadian people.

Listen to the words which call for the establishment of Ministries of State:

> Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters coming within the responsibility of the Government of Canada warrant the establishment for the time being of a special portion of the public service of Canada presided over by a Minister charged with responsibility for the formulation and development of such policies, the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

Under this legislation, the House would not even be permitted an opportunity to debate the proposal to establish a new ministry, and I cannot help but wonder why we are debating Bill C-207. Why did the government not go ahead and set up the Department of the Environment and do all the other things for which this bill provides by Proclamation? Why does this government bother to keep up the sham of even considering Parliament? Obviously, it is only a sham and a show put on to mislead the voters of Canada into believing that, indirectly through their vote, they have a say in the policies and programs introduced by this government.

What a sham and what a delusion! By Proclamation, the Governor in Council can establish at its discretion up to five ministries of state and the responsible minister, according to this bill, will be in charge of policy formulation and development. This is, of course, contrary to all tradition, since policy formulation has always been a Crown prerogative. When you read this bill, you begin to realize the arrogance of this government. You begin to realize its desire for dictatorial control of the whole machinery of government, without the necessity of coming to Parliament for sanction or agreement to its policies.

This is bureaucracy gone mad, Mr. Speaker. This is another way for the government to create another Information Canada without an Act and without reference to a House committee or without estimates. We have seen too much of this already. One example is the assumption by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) of responsibility for the implementation of the recommendations of the Bilingual and Bicultural Commission without an Act giving him this authority.

I cannot help but wonder, and the people I represent cannot help but ask, why this government is seeking the power to create up to five more ministries of state. The government already has the power to name ministers without portfolios to be in charge of temporary problems. Why create new ministries? To this question there can be only one answer, for it is obvious that this government still believes that by building up a large bureaucracy in Ottawa, by expanding the establishment, by placing more and more people under its direct control, it can cure the economic ills of Canada. In holding this belief, the government is being very naïve, or stupid, or a bit of both. There is only one way to get our economy back on the rails and that is to give business and private enterprise a chance to show what it can do. By this I do not mean that the government should saddle an even greater load on the backs of Canadian businessmen by increasing the number of cabinet ministers and their aides.

There is nothing in this bill that will encourage further plant expansion or the risk-taking which businessmen are constantly being exhorted to take. In fact, more business investment is the first thing that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and his colleagues have stated is the key to growth in our economy and in our employment opportunities. Yet, this is the last thing they seem to want to encourage. In fact, the present hodge-podge of programs, dictated by bureaucratic discretion and political power, is fragmenting rather than building faith in Canada's future among our businessmen and leading industrialists. This is not the way to restore faith or dynamic growth to our economy.

I still hold to the belief that the quickest, most effective and least inflationary way to relieve our present high unemployment rate and lift Canada out of the present recession in which it has been plunged by this government would be through a cut in personal and corporate income taxes. Some economies at government level would also be helpful. One such move should be to cut down rather than expand the present number of Cabinet Ministers. Anyone who reads the recommendation attached to this bill, unless he is blind, mute, or partisan, will agree that this bill does not really represent new organization of the Government of Canada but rather is an indication that Ottawa's bureaucracy is adrift in a fog, without the aid of a chart, or compass, or depth sounder to guide it. For these reasons, I cannot support this section of the bill when it comes up for a vote.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today, Bill C-207, sets up a new department. It sets up a new Department of the Environment. This new department replaces the present Department of Fisheries and Forestry. It also brings a number of related services, branches, and divisions together to deal with pollution. These include wildlife from Indian Affairs and Northern Development, water from Energy, Mines and Resources, meteorology from Transport and the environmental health unit from National Health and Welfare.

Our new Federal Department of the Environment will be concerned with Canada's renewable resources. It will be concerned with wild, living things, resources like trees, fish and wildlife. It will also concern itself with their life support systems, other resources like air, water and soil. Taken together these living and life related resources make up a natural whole. They are interrelated. They are mutually self-sustaining. They must be managed and they must be guarded in a comprehensive way. They must be operated on a sustained yield basis, now and in the future.

Our new Department of the Environment has two common elements. One is living and the other is essential to life. One will deal with living organisms. The other will deal with their environments. Together, they constitute our earthly biosphere, and our earthly biosphere is very fragile indeed. Looked at from outer space our biosphere is thin to the point of vanishing. It is a thin envelope encircling this tiny planet of ours. Reaching a few thousand feet up our mountain sides into the air and dipping a few hundred feet down into the water, it sustains all the life we know. Yet it, too, has its deserts and its dead spots. So, the preservation of our biosphere, of which Canada makes up a very important part, must be of great concern to us all.

Our new Department of the Environment is a resource management department. But it differs, in one very important respect, from our other resource departments. It deals with the animate. It deals with the living. It deals with the renewable. It is primarily biological in its orientation. It puts the accent on quality rather than quantity. It must often be soft nosed, not hard nosed. It must put ecology ahead of economics whenever a choice has to be made between the two. However, ecology and economics are not always opposed. We can have economic growth and a healthy environment, too. But to have maximum economic growth and a sound environment will take a lot of doing. It will take a lot of monitoring, a lot of careful planning; the best possible management plus considerable give and take on both sides.

Economic growth in the old-fashioned, quantitative sense is an illusion. It is shortsighted. It is narrowly conceived. It recognizes certain private costs but ignores others. It passes hidden charges onto others. And these hidden charges can later turn up in the form of barren soil, smoke laden skies and waters which are repulsive to us all. A fuller accounting of costs, and especially of costs and benefits over the long run, inevitably turns up a different balance sheet. Blighted landscapes and unhappy hours are negative factors which must be taken into account. More public costs must become private costs. The cost of pollution abatement must be met, increasingly, by the private sector. After all, private enterprise has proved that it can deal efficiently with many things. Why not see to it that our industrialists, and our scientists, deal with many of our environmental problems as well?

Let me refer to what I regard as a classic case. Let me refer to the drilling for oil in our beautiful Strait of Georgia in B.C. If the oil companies were allowed to go ahead I doubt if the price of petroleum products would come down in Vancouver. Of course, the local fishery would be threatened, pleasure boating would be less pleasant and waterfront properties would not be as valuable as they used to be. These minuses, I am convinced, would outstrip the value of the new jobs on west coast drilling rigs by a factor of more than ten to one. Natural apprehension, the public's concern about the destruction of the local environment, and the threat to our tourist industry would be too great. Economists refer to many of these considerations as "intangibles". But they have their own inherent value in our human scheme of things. No politician worth his salt can ignore them. No local ecologist or no global environmentalist would, either.

Recently, the Science Council of Canada referred to the Strait of Georgia. It suggested that an Ottawa based economist take a dispassionate look at the pros and cons of drilling for oil there. Reading between the lines, one gets the impression that the Science Council thinks that such an investigation might even come down on the side of the oil companies. I doubt very much whether it would, Mr. Speaker. I doubt it very much.

Anyone with any idea of the quality of life could not help being skeptical about the idea of oil derricks in the Strait of Georgia. Anyone with a feel for "intangibles" would guess that a careful cost-benefit analysis would turn thumbs down on the establishment of an oil industry in the midst of this recreational mecca. There isn't another area in Canada quite like it. I doubt if there is really another area anywhere in the world which has a greater potential for human enjoyment and the wise use of leisure time. This is why I am convinced that it will make a magnificent national marine park, perhaps the first in Canada; undoubtedly, the biggest and the best in the word! Ecologically speaking, drilling for oil in Georgia Strait is sacrilege. Environmentally speaking, it does not make sense. Scientifically speaking, it shows a callous disregard for human values. I am surprised that the Science Council would stub its toe on that one!

I must not imply, Mr. Speaker, that offshore drilling is all bad. Canada has a long shoreline. It has the longest shoreline in the world. We also have a vast Continental Shelf. It reaches 400 miles out into the sea off Newfoundland. It underlies all of Hudson's Bay and most of our straits and seas in the High Arctic. So we have a choice. We have a choice of location from an environmental point of view. So, let us choose our offshore drilling sites with care. Let us make sure that we do not set up oil drilling platforms where they are bound to be offensive, where they hurt real estate values and where they will be detrimental from a recreational point of view.

Of course, our new Department of the Environment will have to keep a close eye on the oil industry. It will have to keep a close eye on Canada's natural gas industry. It will have to watch coal mining, uranium mining and copper mining. It will have to make sure that natural leaching processes do not distribute too many copper ions around for they, like many exceptional concentrations of trace metals, are poisonous to fish and other forms of wildlife. It is true that man needs more energy and cleaner energy. He needs better construction materials and he needs chemical products which fertilize the land. But he can pay too high a price. He can churn out too many substances which are anti-life. He can produce too much that is harmful, that is toxic, that is suffocating, that blunts our senses, that shortens our lives.

I have singled out the oil industry as a starter. But I could have mentioned the pulp and paper industry instead. Using Canada's magnificent forest cover, it generates more employment than all of Canada's mining industries combined. But our pulp and paper industry is a polluter, too. It passes some of its costs on to others. Half or close to half of all the wastes being dumped into Canadian waters by industry originate in our pulp and paper mills—50 per cent or close to 50 per cent in bulk, in tonnage terms. This is why the pulp and paper industry has been singled out for special treatment under the Fisheries Act. This is why it is facing new regulations, new regulations under the Fisheries Act which are nation-wide in their effect.

This is why we are joining with the provinces in our efforts to clean up our pulp and paper mills before it is too late. Our approach to industry may interest you, Mr. Speaker. First, we comb the literature; then we talk to the consulting engineering companies, and ours are the best in this business. Then, we sit down with the industry itself. We learn all we can about the best plants, how they have been built and how they operate. The best is the test. From the best, we develop a set of standards which we know can be met and practiced. These new standards are embedded in our regulations. Coupled with the deadlines, we put the laggards in industry on notice. We put the polluters in industry on notice from one end of the country to the other.

This massive clean up, of course, will cost money, a good deal of money. It will cost the pulp and paper industry, and consumers, several million dollars for every $100 million dollars of new pulp and paper mill construction. It will cost roughly half as much as the industry's annual wage increase settlement with labour. It will be barely offset by one year's increase in productivity. I do not want to make light of these increased costs. Our forest based industries have been going through a difficult time. Prices are only a little higher than they were in the mid 1950s. Wage rates have been going up by leaps and bounds. The Canadian dollar has been revalued and Canada's pulp and paper industry still faces a battery of income and income related taxes which, in total, are among the highest in the world.

Still, pollution abatement must be given top priority. New mills must not be built unless they contain the necessary in-plant facilities, catchment basins and biological treatment ponds. They must pass muster with government inspectors and engineers. Sound operating procedures must be followed to the letter. Nothing which is toxic to fish must get out of the systems of these plants. Nothing must be allowed to escape from these plants which is deleterious to aquatic life of any kind.

Old mills, understandably, are in a different category. Each one tends to be a special case, each one calls for special treatment. Some are already obsolete, others do not have enough space in which to instal the necessary facilities. So conversion presents a problem. This is why our new department of the environment has to look at each plant in turn, and this is why we cannot expect many of these older mills to be cleaned up overnight.

The technique is to schedule a series of changes, each with its own particular deadline. The sequence of adjustments leads up to a final deadline. Failure to comply with the schedule can result in a series of fines. The longer the lag, the bigger the bill. Running at $5,000 a day, it can add up to a lot of money, to more than $1 million a year if the company is unlucky enough to be found breaking the law for that length of time.

Some hon. members have asked when our new regulations dealing with the pulp and paper industry will be published in full. My answer is, in a few weeks time. We still have to hear from some of the provincial pollution control boards. We still have to have a final meeting with the pulp and paper industry itself. But no one with any competence will be able to say they were not consulted first and consulted thoroughly.

We have leaned over backwards to make sure we were reasonable. In so doing, we have created a precedent. For the first time in Canada, and perhaps in the world, the best brains in industry, in government and in our universities have sat down together to tackle pollution in an entire sector of our national economy. They are pooling their knowledge and revealing their plans with a view to giving Canada the best treatment facilities and the best treatment procedures so far known to mankind. One of our problem areas is the Ottawa River from the national capital downstream to Montreal. Half a dozen pulp mills have been using it for decades as a big industrial sewer. Once our federal Fisheries Act regulations are in place, these mills will have to sit up and take notice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Davis: They will have to do this because we will have a single standard to which they must conform on both sides of the Ottawa River, and from its headwaters to the sea.

Ontario administers the federal Fisheries Act in Ontario. Quebec administers the federal Fisheries Act in Quebec. Relying on the same Act and enforcing the same regulations, we should be well on our way toward solving a problem which has been baffling both levels of government for years.

Using our federal Fisheries Act, we will be able to stop the polluters. We will be able to stop these local pulp and paper mills from treating the lower Ottawa River like an industrial sewer. Facing a common set of regulations and enforcement procedures, they will have no choice. With Quebec, Ontario and Canada breathing down their necks, they will have to make the Ottawa River a fit place for fish to live.

Before I leave water and begin to talk about air I should, perhaps, say a word about mercury. Canada is far ahead of the United States in this connection, and well ahead of most countries in western Europe. Unlike Japan, and to a lesser extent Sweden, we have caught our mercury pollution problem in the nick of time. We are well on our way to solving it, without having to face a human health problem in this country.

The main offender has been the chlor-alkali industry. It used to dump thousands of pounds of mercury each year into our rivers and streams. As soon as we began to detect high levels of mercury in wild birds and fish, we called in the companies. They were told to stop polluting and to recycle their effluent. They were instructed to keep their mercury bearing wastes inside their factory fence. The companies moved quickly to put things right. They built settling ponds and began pumping surplus fluids back into their plants. This recycling process has been highly successful. It has already cut the amount of mercury getting into our rivers by more than 90 per cent.

The record, on a plant by plant basis, makes interesting reading. It is documented in a table which I have here, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I could have the permission of hon. members to have it included in today's Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NOTES:

(a) Based on Departmental estimates of mercury losses in liquid effluent of 0.15 lbs per ton chlorine produced.

(b) Based on measured effluent concentrations.

(c) Based on estimates by the Company.

(d) Standard Chemical Co. Ltd. will have a new plant on line early in 1971 which will replace the existing one. Their mercury losses are estimated to be 0.01 lbs per ton chlorine produced.

(e) Plant commenced production in 1970.

Mr. Davis: In looking over this table, you will note that some plants have done better than others. Some have already reported a loss figure of less than 0.005 pounds of mercury per ton of chloride produced. This is excellent. It is well below the target figure which Swedish experts recently considered to be the limit of modern technology, namely 0.01 pounds per ton of chlorine produced.

Our ultimate aim, nevertheless, is perfection. We want to make our Canadian chlor-alkali industry as antiseptic as possible. We want to bring the mercury content of its effluent down to the point where there is no net addition to the background levels already present in nature. In other words, our target is for the industry to tend to take mercury out of its natural water supply rather than add new mercury. This is actually happening in one or two Canadian localities now. It must become the objective of all chlor-alkali plants in Canada and our fisheries regulations will be drafted so as to make this performance compulsory from coast to coast.

To be even more specific, the target set in our regulations is 0.01 pounds of mercury per ton of chlorine by April 1, 1971. The target for September 1, 1971 for all plants is 0.005. The target for the end of 1971 is the local background level or better. A year from now all our chlor-alkali plants should, in effect, be improving on nature. They will be taking mercury out of their natural surroundings rather than adding mercury to them.

Now, let me turn to the question of clean air. We have a lot of new teeth in so far as water is concerned. We have an amended Fisheries Act, an amended Canada Shipping Act, and a brand new Canada Water Act. These were all put in place in 1970. Now, we need a new clean air act. We need it in 1971. We need to supplement the powers which the federal government already has in respect of water and soil. We need it because the potential polluter has a choice. He can choose to burn his waste products and send them up the chimney rather than dump them in a neighbouring stream or bury them in the ground.

As in the case with water, we are working closely with the provinces. We are asking them for their advice. We are asking them how our new federal clean air legislation can complement their own provincial laws. We are asking them also how they would like us to deal with motor vehicles and other products which are sold throughout Canada and which can be a serious source of atmospheric pollution unless they are designed and equipped in the proper way at the factory itself.

I have already been talking to my opposite numbers in the provinces about transborder situations and international situations. I have been trying to head off jurisdictional wrangles. I have stressed our willingness to complement provincial law and to avoid unnecessary duplication. I have stressed the need for national ambient air quality objectives, and on all these scores, Mr. Speaker, I have met a favourable response in one provincial capital after another.

That there is a federal role in respect of air, I have no doubt. Its movements are broadly continental in their sweep. They are generally from west to east. Coming in from the Pacific and sweeping down across the Prairies, they lose moisture and pick up moisture. Crossing along over Ontario and Quebec, they may also pick up fumes from thousands of factories and millions of automobiles. These outpourings, along with those emanating from great American centres like Chicago and Detroit, are bound to affect the quality of our atmopshere. They are bound to affect the quality of the air we breathe in the area of the St. Lawrence and in the Atlantic region as well.

Air, even more than water, is indifferent to man made boundaries. It sweeps from province to province and from nation to nation. It can weave its way across the international boundary line and back again. It can be upgraded by plankton in the ocean and young trees on land. It can be quickly downgraded again by industrial man at work and at play. Renewed by plant and animal life our worldly air mantle has great recuperative powers. But these powers, like those of our rivers and streams, are finite. They are by no means unlimited. They can be over-taxed, much as Lake Erie has been over-taxed by the outpourings of the main industrial heartland of North America. They can be over-taxed by industry and municipalities alike, and they can only be brought back again at great cost to others, some of whom may live hundreds and even thousands of miles away.

I would like to make an important point here. I am opposed to a patchwork approach to pollution. I am opposed to different standards in different places. I am opposed to pollution havens. I am opposed to big industry picking on our weaker provinces and our weaker municipalities. I am opposed to sloppy housekeeping anywhere, because it is bound to hurt the local citizenry in the end. I am prepared to argue against those who say that each industry and each municipality should be able to rely on the so-called "assimilative capacity" of its local waters and its air. If they are allowed to do this the effects are bound to be cumulative. What do they say to the next industry that comes along? And to the next and the next? What do they say to a doubling and a trebling of the output of the initial industry? When does the regulatory authority cry halt? And when does it begin to discriminate against late comers saying that the rules of the game have to be changed after all?

Why not insist on the best clean up procedures at the outset? And why assume that we must really spoil our environment before we begin to clean it up again? Why act as if we know all about the assimilative capacity of our surroundings in the first place? The scientists, and you and I, Mr. Speaker, do not know very much about assimilative capacity at all. Those who take the patchwork approach to pollution do not know much about ecology. They do not know much about living things. Perhaps they have never heard about the synergistic effects of one pollutant piled on top of another. Individually, they might not have much of an effect, but in combination several pollutants can kill several times over, and who knows what combinations and permutations will result from several industries and several municipalities dumping their wastes into the same local environment?

So, why run the risk of losing everything when uniform national standards can provide us with all the protection we need? Why run this risk when recycling within the factory fence is possible in most cases? And why settle for anything less than the best when new industry can be made to take every precaution as long as everyone is being treated the same everywhere in the country?

Earlier in my speech, Mr. Speaker, I took a swipe at the Science Council of Canada. I took a swipe at the technocratic gobbledygook which it published recently about oil drilling in the Strait of Georgia. But I should add, Mr. Speaker, that the recommendations of the Science Council of Canada are not all bad. Some of them are excellent, and many of them we have already acted upon. Others we intend to adopt in the very near future. The Science Council says that we should have a federal-provincial review board. We already have a forum for consultation on these issues. We have the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers, and I might loosely refer to it as the Council of Renewable Resource Ministers. The Canadian Council of Resource Ministers met recently in Winnipeg. It discussed forestry for three full days. In previous years it had discussed fisheries, recreation, and the development of river basins. It has concentrated on pollution at times, and on land use at others. Frankly, I think it is more than a review board. It has the ability to look ahead as well.

The Science Council says we should set up special advisory committees and consult frequently with the top brains in industry and in our universities. It says this with particular reference to forestry. But we, in this department, have already asked Mr. T. N. Beaupré of Domtar to chair our new Forestry Advisory Council. Its first task is to review our forestry research priorities. Later it will concentrate building a two-way bridge of ideas between our Canadian Forestry Service and the companies themselves.

The Science Council believes that we should contract out more of our research work. Less development should be done "in house" and more should be done in company plants and graduate schools. I agree with this. We in Ottawa have tended to be too inbred. Too much of our work has been done behind closed doors, and too many studies have been filed away without being read by people who could make some practical use of them. The Science Council says that we should concentrate on certain areas of research and avoid spreading ourselves too thin. I agree with this also. I agree that more of our work should be mission oriented. I agree that it should be tailored to suit Canada's particular needs. I agree that our environmental endeavours should fit our own Canadian situation. Let me give you a particular example of what the Science Council means and of what I mean.

The Science Council says that we should build a big new environmental centre on the west coast, dealing with the marine-atmospheric interface and employing biologists as well as oceanographers and climatologists. It would be located facing the Pacific. Already we are developing a tidy nucleus in West Vancouver but more, much more remains to be done on the air side, and it is

B.C.'s turn in so far as the building of a big new environmental institute is concerned.

The Science Council makes a good case for ice studies and ice removal in the lower St. Lawrence. I have no doubt that environmental studies aimed at clearing this great waterway in the winter months will pay off handsomely. Here is another task which our environmentalists should tackle with determination.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and tell the House about our testing of pesticides in Halifax, about our eutrophication studies on the Great Lakes, about fish farming on the Prairies, and about our efforts to rescue the wildlife habitat on the Athabasca-Delta. But suffice it to say that our scientists and our engineers are hard at work. They are working flat out on pollution problems and renewable resource management problems from coast to coast, and from the Great Lakes to the Arctic Archipelago.

Our new environmental department is a decentralized department. Less than 10 per cent of its work force is located in the Ottawa area. The rest are to be found out where the fish are, where the trees are, where the lakes are and where the problems are. Our biggest wildlife centre is in Edmonton. Our biggest fisheries research laboratory is in Nanaimo. Our big centres for inland waters are in Winnipeg, Manitoba, and Burlington, Ontario. The headquarters of our meteorological service is in Toronto. Our main oceanographic institute is in Dartmouth. We are planning a new centre for Arctic studies in the Northwest Territories. Here is decentralization with a purpose. It is decentralization with an eye to the expansion of our resource base, and with a view to enhancing our environment in the long run.

In this wide ranging speech, I have covered a lot of ground. But I must be careful, Mr. Speaker. Our new Department of the Environment will not embrace all of the activities of the federal government relating to pollution control. Other departments like Agricultural, Urban Affairs, Northern Affairs, Transport, Regional Economic Expansion and Energy, Mines and Resources will also have important responsibilities in the environmental field. They will deal with particulars, while the role of our new Department of the Environment is more general. It is more sweeping, and it includes the role of a coordinator. It must make sure that our plans do not have any gaps in them, that our programs are as broadly based as possible, and that the quality of life in Canada is preserved for all time to come.

Reading our daily press and watching television one is often gripped with a sense of apocalyptic doom. Handed a sordid dossier of man's mishandling of his surroundings, we are bound to be depressed. I agree with those who are sounding the alarm. If things keep on this way we will be in a real mess. We will be in a real mess by the year 2000. But let us not blame science and technology for all our ills. Man's greed is the real culprit. It is his greed in the material sense which is to blame for the present state of things.

Of course, we have to mend our ways. We have to stop doing those things which the scientists tell us are harmful to our environment. Since greedy practices have become a habit, this will not be easy. But, knowing the facts, we have the will to change. We have the will to use modern technology in such a way as to ensure our own survival and that of all other living things.

Of course, Canadians will have to make some hard decisions about the kind of world which we want our children and their children's children to inherit from us. Environmentally speaking, we all want it to be a better world than we now know. So, we must make sacrifices in the 1970's. We must make sacrifices, especially on the economic front. But armed with more scientific know-how, we can enhance our environment. Our new department of the environment, properly manned, properly organized and properly directed, can help us on our way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Davis: Before sitting down, Mr. Speaker, I should like to join the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) in saying a word about our present deputy minister, Dr. Needler, who is to retire shortly. For many years he has been in the government service. He performed a yeoman's task, first on the Fisheries Research Board and, latterly, in the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. I hope we have not seen the last of him. I shall do my best to persuade him to act as an adviser to us, particularly on international matters and, more particularly, in relation to the next Law of the Sea Conference. I hope that these few words will allay the concern of the hon. member for South Shore about our ability to deal with fisheries problems, and especially international fisheries problems, in the months and years ahead.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry? I listened with much interest to his comments regarding the cleaning up of the environment, and especially to those remarks concerning mercury. As he is aware, a very serious situation has developed in the Canadian deep-sea fishery. Fishermen who are landing swordfish are finding that their catches are being impounded because of their mercury content. Since this is an immediate and urgent matter, may I ask whether the minister has looked into it. What are those fishermen to do? Are they immediately to go on unemployment insurance or are they to continue fishing on the understanding that any swordfish which may be landed will be purchased by the minister's department, in order that this important and viable industry may be continued in Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the department has been in close touch with the fishermen and the vessel owners concerned. They understand the situation. They understand that there is little likelihood of our being able to pass, and therefore market, the swordfish that they are likely to catch. Probably some of the smaller, younger fish might meet the standards. Many of the larger and older swordfish are unlikely to meet these standards. As a result, we have the same problem facing us in respect of this deep-sea fishery as we had with respect to some of our lakes in Western Canada. In that case, we had to ban fishing altogether and find ways of supporting the incomes of the commercial fishermen affected.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question before he concludes his remarks? At the same time, may I be permitted to join in the sentiments expressed by the minister and by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) with regard to our retiring Deputy Minister of Fisheries. Since the minister did not really touch upon this matter in his remarks, could he tell us what is to happen to our Department of Fisheries, which heretofore has been primarily responsible for the maintenance and enhancement of our commercial fisheries. What is to happen to the department, and how will that be related to the new department about which the minister has been speaking so eloquently?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the responsibility for fisheries is most important. That is one of the major responsibilities given to the federal government under our constitution, the British North America Act. We must do our utmost to make sure that the fishery is maintained and nourished as effectively as possible. We shall be identifying various fisheries services. They will use the badges, letterheads and so on which formerly were used by the department. The functions of these services will be paralleled by the functions of the forestly services and the wildlife service. In other words, we shall have the Canada fisheries service, and it will use all the designations which formerly were used by the department. That also applies to the Canada forestry service and the Canada wildlife service.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House, may I be permitted to ask a question of the minister? In order to allay our fears over the future of the minister's fisheries responsibilities in Atlantic Canada, may I ask whether it is intended in future to appoint two deputy ministers, one to be responsible for fisheries and the other to be responsible for environmental pollution matters?

Mr. Davis: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. We shall have one deputy minister who will bring about effective co-ordination within the department itself. In addition, we shall appoint several assistant deputy ministers, one of whom I believe will be an assistant deputy minister of fisheries.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I listened to the minister this afternoon with a great deal of interest. May I thank him for his courtesy in letting me have a copy of the speech he intended making. It is always easier, if one sees a copy of a speech before it is made, to follow the minister's remarks and to note the various points raised.

Before proceeding with the main part of my presentation, there are one or two comments I wish to make about the minister's remarks. I wish to talk about standards. The minister indicated that standards were being set up. I presume that they will be national standards. We should like to know whether they are being set up under the Fisheries Act or under the Canada Water Act, or whether they are to be established under the new wildlife services branch which is to be set up. I think all members will be interested in knowing that. Possibly I ought to have directed a question earlier to the minister on this matter.

The minister made a good point by indicating that he is very much opposed to the patchwork approach to pollution legislation in Canada. I am delighted to hear that. Nevertheless, in looking at the particular bill we are debating, it seems to me that it constitutes a patchwork approach to pollution problems. I say that for the simple and sole reason that it has not taken into account all aspects of pollution, and I think it ought to have done so. I intend to deal with that matter later in my speech.

The minister also said that he is opposed to pollution havens. Again, I think this is good news. I know that the minister has advocated this on numerous occasions. This shows me that at long last the truth of what we said when debating the Canada Water Act has come home to the government benches. Under the Canada Water Act, if water quality management areas as outlined in the legislation were set up, pollution havens would be created in Canada. If the standards are not equalized throughout the length and breadth of the country, pollution havens could be established in various provinces. The minister mentioned that we are to have uniform and national standards. I endorse this statement 100 per cent. This is a sound approach to the over-all problem. Of course, we do not think that the same standard ought to apply to every little patch of water in Canada. That was not our intenion, and the minister knows it. So far as I am concerned, the mere fact that the department is to move in the direction of imposing national standards shows that it is wise and sensible. Its action will indicate to industry all over Canada that we shall not allow pollution havens in any province or any part of any province. Again, I wish to make clear to members of the House that that was the precise point we tried to put across last year when debating the Canada Water Act.

Before coming to the bill itself, I wish to make one or two other observations. We understand that three new services are to be created, services dealing with fisheries, forestry and wildlife. I wish to leave this thought with the minister. We are going to have a wildlife service. When are we going to have a Canadian wildlife act? There must be a revision of all the ideas connected with wildlife. It will be necessary to study international agreements and hold discussions with representatives of other countries. We must move quickly along this line.

I wish to make a few comments about the bill we are currently debating, Bill C-207. I feel this bill is an example of poor legislation. There is no doubt about that. This bill encompasses several major principles, many of which have no relation to each other, apart from the fact that some slight change in government organization is taking place. A new department of the environment is to be established. It will carry out a number of functions which other departments previously carried out. This should be the subject of a separate bill so that it could be debated independently of the other issues. It has no relation to the Public Service Superannuation Act which is discussed in Part VII. It does not have any relation to Part VI which relates to the post office. It does not have anything to do with the section dealing with the addition of a number of Parliamentary Secretaries to the government payroll. This is a clear indication that the bill should have been broken down into a number of separate and related topics and presented to the House in that form.

An omnibus bill of this type is an excellent way for the government to try and cover up some of the unpleasant moves it wishes to make by tying them to other pieces of legislation which might be acceptable. Hon. members are given the choice of either accepting or rejecting the whole package. This is not a sensible way of handling the nation's business. I trust that the procedural debate which took place yesterday will result in the elimination of this type of omnibus bill in the future. There are many items covered by the bill, but I intend to confine my remarks to Part I which establishes the new department of the environment. Possibly I should make a few general remarks on pollution before I start.

In May 1969, the United Nations made a report on problems of the human environment. It outlined the crisis of world-wide proportions which faces us in this field. Since that report of almost two years ago, we have increasing evidence of the deterioration which is occurring in every aspect of our environment. Even with warning signals flying everywhere, we are only toying with the problem. No all-out attack has been launched to find solutions to our problems. No concrete, over-all plan has been devised by this government to tackle this major and worsening situation. Perhaps a few comments from the United Nations report would put in proper perspective the need for a measure to launch an all-out attack on our pollution problems, rather than the partial and ineffective solutions offered in Part I of this reorganization bill.

The United Nations report emphasized that for the first time in the history of mankind a crisis of world-wide proportion involving the human environment was arising. The portents of this crisis were apparent in the explosive growth of human populations, the poor integration of a powerful and efficient technology with environmental requirements, the deterioration of agricultural lands, the unplanned extension of urban areas, the decrease of available space, and the growing danger of extinction of many forms of animal and plant life. The report stated that if current trends continued, the future of life on earth could be endangered. In dealing with pesticides, the report indicated that an estimated billion pounds of DDT had been dumped into our environment and that we were adding to it at an estimated rate of 100 million pounds per year. The total world production of pesticides was estimated at over 1,300,000,000 pounds annually.

The report estimated that 500 million hectares of arable land have already been lost through erosion and salinization. I point out that a hectare is 2.471 acres of land. Over one billion acres of arable lands have been lost to mankind through various types of mismanagement. The report indicated that two-thirds of the world's forest area has been lost to production and that 150 types of birds and animals have become extinct as a result of mans' actions. It estimated that another 1,000 species or races of wild animals are considered to be rare or endangered. A number of these are within the confines of our own country. The report indicated also that erosion, soil deterioration, deforestation, watershed damage and the destruction of animal and plant life continues, and in some areas are accelerating. This over-all type of loss is endangering man's existence on earth. The three basic causes of this deterioration or pollution of the human environment were classed as, the accelerated population growth, increased urbanization, and an expanded and efficient new technology. Each of these was closely associated with the increase in demands for space, food and natural resources. The failure of society to plan for logical and sensible development along these lines was leading to wholesale pollution of our environment and endangering the very existence of mankind on this earth.

Canada is a relatively young nation. We have one of the largest land masses in the world under our control. We have immense resources. Our population in relative terms is small, and yet we find that immense damage has been done to the human environment. Pollution is now classed as one of the major problems facing the Canadian nation. Many forms of wildlife have been endangered. Pesticides are affecting the quality of the fish, meat, and foods we eat. Recreational areas are being destroyed and because of their filthy and unhealthy conditions are being barred from public use. In many of our heavily industrialized areas, air pollution has become a major health hazard. Our Arctic and northern territories, which constitute 40 per cent of Canada's total area, are endangered because of lack of adequate land-use regulations. This is an area where the ecology is extremely fragile. Many of our major waterways are being used as sewers to flush untreated effluents into the lakes and oceans where they can wreck their damage on the ecology there.

We have inherited all these problems because of man's inherent greedy nature and the failure of governments over the years to realize that the prosperity of a nation must not be entirely based on economic values. We have too long worshipped the almighty dollar and allowed the rape of our natural resources to take place on an unprecedented scale, regardless of the consequences. It is up to us today, Mr. Speaker, to make some of the moves which should have been made generations ago, and insist that full and proper protection of our environment be one of the prime objectives of legislators. There will have to be a re-thinking and a re-shaping of the policies of all groups. If this is not done at an accelerated pace within the next few years, we might well find that man's existence on this globe will be extremely limited.

The bill before us is called the Government Organization Act, 1970. It provides for a re-organization of several government departments. It sets up a new department called the Department of the Environment. This new department will include all the functions of the old Department of Fisheries and Forestry, along with a number of related services which have been moved out of other departments. There will also be some new directives for dealing with environmental pollution.

I feel this aspect of the bill setting up this new department of the environment, with an outline of its functions, is certainly an improvement over any existing federal efforts to deal with our widespread water pollution problems. However, Mr. Speaker, I feel that it falls far short of what we should be doing in this field. Several of the key requirements for adequate pollution control are missing from the legislation. Unless immediate action, such as I intend to outline, is taken on some of these matters I am afraid much of the legislation will be ineffective.

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that on a number of occasions we have had re-organization of government departments in an effort to solve some of our economic and social problems. In many instances, the changes have not been too beneficial. The setting up of a new department is often the excuse for a further delay by government in carrying out much-needed reforms. The excuse is that the new department must be given time to organize its program and set out its priorities. However, if this new department is to be successful, there must be a wholesale change in this government's approach to our environmental problems.

If this policy change is not made, then all the switching around of government functions will do little to solve those problems which currently face us. It would be disastrous for our nation to try and lull the general public into feeling that an all-out attack by the federal government was taking place on our environmental problems when, in fact, very little was being done. There is little point in any government passing new regulations if they are not prepared to enforce the regulations which are already in effect and which, if they had been properly enforced in the past, would have eliminated most of the major pollution problems which now face us today.

Perhaps I should give several examples of the failure of the Canadian government to enforce pollution laws and pollution regulations which have been on our statute books for years. The best example is to be found in the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence river system. In a 1909 treaty with the United States, we find this reference to pollution:

> It is further agreed that the waters herein defined as boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other.

Despite this clearcut directive that boundary waters shall not be polluted, we find that both Canada and the United States have totally ignored it, so that today parts of the Great Lakes system are among some of the worst polluted waters to be found on the continent. Just a few days ago in this House the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) tabled the final report of the International Joint Commission on Pollution of Lake Erie, Lake Ontario and the International Section of the St. Lawrence River. This report is a damning document of almost total neglect of this vast waterway by both the United States and Canada. It shows the complete lack of government concern over the years for the enforcement of pollution laws and regulations. Today, we are in the process of setting up programs to try and undo the terrible damage which we have caused to this water environment. The cost will run into the hundreds of millions of dollars and it will take a long period of time to restore in any real measure the quality of the water which we should have in this river system.

This failure of enforcement is related to practically every Act which we have in our statutes containing regulations pertaining to pollution. In most instances, these regulations have lain dormant for years and have been completely ignored by both the government and the general public alike. For example, no charges were laid under the Navigable Waters Protection Act during the years 1963 to 1969, for violations of those sections dealing with pollution of waters. Under the National Parks Act, only one infraction was recorded in the same seven year period. There were no pollution infractions charged under the Mining Act and the Migratory Birds Convention Act followed a similar pattern. A few infractions of the many hundreds of the Canada Shipping Act Provisions were reported and dealt with. The best attempt at enforcement was carried out by the fisheries department, and the many cases of mercury pollution, etc., which are turning up these days are a clear indication that a host of other charges should have been laid many years ago.

I feel it is essential for members to speak out on these issues. A reorganization of government departments is taking place. I presume this move is made with a view to having the new department operate more effectively and more efficiently. If the object of the government in setting up the new Department of the Environment is to lay a solid base for the solving of our environmental problems, then I feel that the move will be ineffective.

There is no doubt that there will be some improvement in dealing with our water resources, but even here the new department will be ineffective in many ways. I feel that the change has been made in an effort to lull the Canadian public into thinking that a real job will be done on all environmental problems. The mere structure of the new department, and the many missing components required to get at the basic cause of pollution, are indications that a major, all-out attack on our environmental problems will not be achieved by this reorganization.

To begin with, I feel the new department has been given the wrong name. I feel a better name would be the "Department of Renewable Resources". The structure of the department indicates that, in addition to the renewable resources of fisheries and forestry, it will be responsible for several former portfolios involving only renewable resources. This means it will be merely another of the competing departments of government. It will not be the effective, universal overseer of all environmental activities. This department as set up is not intended to have any voice or control over those other government departments whose activities might have ramifications in the environment.

This must be crystal clear to all members of this House. If it did have this power, there is no doubt that there would be major friction between the minister for this proposed new department and every other department of government. I firmly believe that any authority dealing with our environment should not hold direct responsibility for a particular resource portfolio. Ministers who are responsible for fisheries, forestry, northern development, mining, manufacturing, agriculture, transportation, etc., have vested interests in pursuing activities most advantageous to their specific areas. It seems to me that a national environmental authority should be able to stand above the narrower concepts in order to judge the effects of all potentially relevant human activity.

There is absolutely no doubt that responsibility for any particular resource based industry might conflict with the responsibility to protect the environment from damage. Two good examples are to be found in the production of energy generated from hydro sources and in agriculture, where there is need to protect crops, even by the use of pesticides, which could cause major soil pollution and might in the long term have to be banned.

There are a number of alternatives to handling the environmental problems through this new department. We could set up a genuine department of environment with no direct responsibility for any particular resource portfolio. This department could be formed to take responsibility for coalescing an denforcing all current environmental control legislation. It could set and police national standards. It is absolutely essential that some move be made to correlate and enforce current laws. There is no indication that this will be done in the present legislation. For example, the new minister is not going to enforce the pollution regulations administered by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This new department could be given the task of scrutinizing all activities in the country for their potential environmental impact. In this respect, adequate surveys on resource development projects would be undertaken before these projects were allowed to proceed. In this way adequate safeguards would be set up to protect and conserve our Canadian heritage.

A good example might be in the field of hydro. Here, full and adequate surveys would indicate the feasability of the project and the damage which might result to other aspects of our environment. I might add, this type of survey was desperately needed to measure the potential effects which the building of the Bennett Dam might have had on the vast Mackenzie Delta. There was no department charged with this responsibility at that time. There was no department to insist on this type of a survey, and there is nothing in the current legislation to indicate that this situation has been remedied.

The department should be asked to provide positive reclamation programs for those parts of the environment which have already suffered damage. Here again, we could pick up numerous examples where positive reclamation is required. One of the largest and most important of these examples is to be found in the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence river systems, although there are dozens of reclamation projects needed in every part of the country.

The department should be given the power to develop a population policy for Canada. Many people consider that Canada is vastly underdeveloped, but population policies for Canada and the world will be one of the future keys to solving major pollution problems.

If the setting up of a department of environment such as I have outlined does not meet with the approval of the government, then perhaps the government would consider creating an Environmental Council of Canada. You might say these two suggested organizations would be somewhat similar, but one would have more power than the other. This Environmental Council would be similar to the National Pollution Control Commission which our party advocated when we were dealing with the Canada Water Act. The creation of an Environmental Council of Canada was recommended to the government by the Science Council of Canada. It should be a non-political organization sponsored by the government. Its basic role would be the provision to the public of facts about their environment upon which they would be able to base adequate value judgments. It is absolutely essential that the general public be given the cost in material welfare of providing a quality environment.

Canadians must have these facts, and they must be given a chance to make a choice once these facts are made known to them. This Environmental Council of Canada could be an independent Crown corporation with a directorate representative of environmental interests, with a small professional staff. It would conduct and publish the studies and forecasts of environmental problems in Canada. It could make analytical reviews of environmental questions which are the subject of public interest. It would, in effect, become the major source of informed opinion on environmental problems in our nation.

The council could be a valuable advisor to the government, if the government decided not to set up a separate department. It could stimulate particular ministers to an appreciation of the inter-relationship between resource uses and the necessity for considering problems in a larger context. It should draw attention to gaps in the support of environmentally oriented research. It should provide the inspiration and leverage for new kinds of activities in government departments. We have similar councils in Canada today. One is the Economic Council of Canada, which advises the government on economic problems. It publishes a report which is available to all individuals and groups in Canada. This report outlines the real economic problems facing the nation. Perhaps an environmental council of Canada, set up along similar lines, might also be able to provide Canadians with effective guidance on environmental problems. I bring this to the attention of the minister because I realize that the government is not too keen on setting up a new department which will oversee all environmental problems throughout the nation.

I indicated at the beginning of my remarks that there were a number of major factors missing from the proposed new department of the environment. I have mentioned several, but one of the most important relates to finance. We need a national pollution control fund, call it what you like, and this is another of the keys to the solution of many of the most acute and persistent pollution problems which face us today. The federal government cannot really launch an effective campaign against environmental problems unless it is prepared to put up huge sums of money to launch an all-out attack against these problems.

It must be crystal clear to everyone in Canada who knows anything about pollution that one of the big problems holding back a number of solutions is that problem associated with money. Perhaps the best example can be found in the field of sewage treatment. Municipalities from one end of Canada to the other are anxious to deal with the sewage problems which face them. The fact is that the tax base of municipalities and provinces is too restricted for them to carry out any crash program on sewage treatment, although some funds are being made available by the federal government through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. However, the amounts available for sewage treatment are insufficient to meet the problem.

In this respect, target dates should be set for the completion of secondary and tertiary plants and, most of all, money must be available at low interest rates to the municipalities so they can get the job done. There is much the federal and provincial governments can do to provide low cost loans. The failure of the federal government to take effective action along this line is an indication that it is derelict in its duty in so far as this aspect of pollution clean-up is concerned. There should be a right, by law, for every Canadian to live in clean environment, to breathe clean air and to use clean water. It should be a crime to pollute and our legislation, if necessary, should be enforced by an amendment to the Criminal Code making pollution a crime.

I have not much time left but there are one or two points I should like to summarize quickly, if I may. I feel that much wider use of advisory boards should be made by the government in so far as environmental problems are concerned. I realize that the minister is interested in this and has indicated that he intends to move in this direction. I hope he moves quickly because we have little time to lose.

Another reason I feel the new act is not going to be effective can be found by a consideration of schedule A. We find there are a number of very important pieces of legislation missing from this schedule. I have in mind legislation which the minister and his department will not be in a position to oversee. One of these pieces of legislation is the Arctic Water Pollution Prevention Act. Why should this department not have jurisdiction in respect of that Act? We passed legislation in an attempt to stop oil pollution of Arctic waters, and this Act should certainly be included in schedule A.

What about the National Parks Act? If there is any area which is part of the over-all environmental picture it is our national parks. Why is this Act not included in the new department along with some of the other functions taken from the various departments? The national parks represent one of the keys to our environmental protection, yet we find reference to this area missing from this list of legislation.

Let us consider the Navigable Waters Act. Why is this not one of the items which falls within the jurisdiction of the minister of this department? Because of this exclusion Mr. Bennett was able to build the Peace dam without having to come to the federal government. A crown corporation in the name of the province or in the name of the federal government is not covered by the terms of the Navigable Waters Act. One of the first thing we should do is make sure that the legislation we now have is amended in order to give this new department a chance to call for surveys when provincial governments, hydro companies or crown corporations want to dam a river.

Other pieces of legislation are missing. This is what makes me feel we will not get the effective control of our over-all environmental problems that we should get. Let us go up to the Arctic for a moment. Here we have our northern area, 40 per cent of Canada's total land mass, under the control of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The emphasis there is on economic development. That department has a Deputy Minister who has been concentrating on economic development, and doing a good job, but who has totally ignored for many years any of the environmental problems which have been brought to the attention of the department. To-day, the same man is to be in charge of the economic development and environmental problems in the Arctic. As someone said, it is like putting the fox in charge of the chicken coop, because environmental problems will largely be ignored. These are the things which worry me.

I believe a thorough examination of the legislation should be made in an effort to have more controls in the department. If there is not a department with over-all authority to co-ordinate the services, set up standards, provide funds and set out priorities in respect of pollution problems in Canada, we will not have the effective controlling measure we should have. I thank the House, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to make these remarks. I can assure the minister that during the committee of the whole stage we intend to question very closely many of the policies and programs which have been outlined and which we trust may be amended in the proposed legislation.

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, a number of members on the other side of the House have expressed some reservations about the particular bill which is before us. I should like to say I have a reservation but it really does not have anything to do with this particular bill. I think this is a good bill. It encompasses a number of studies, thoughts and new departures. I am very happy to participate in this debate and would like to limit my remarks mainly to the establishment of the new Department of the Environment.

The establishment of this department is a giant step forward which should go a long way toward overcoming the so-called pollution crisis about which so many people in Canada and in the world are concerned. I am not one of those who cries doom and gloom and thinks that everything is lost. I agree, however, that there are some serious problems in respect of air, water, soil and other kinds of pollution and that there remains much to be done. Because of the great concern shown by Canadians in the last few years, and the strong legislation brought forward by this government, I believe the battle against pollution is beginning to be won and that even greater strides will be made toward winning the battle in the next few years.

Yesterday the Leader of the New Democratic Party said that the creation of a new Department of the Environment lacks goals. I do not agree with this assessment. I believe it is very clear that the goal established here is to ensure and create a better and cleaner environment for Canadians. The creation of this department brings together in a single ministry those federal agencies which deal with our so-called renewable resources. I think it is a great idea to have one department deal with water, air, soil, fisheries, forestry and wildlife. In establishing a Department of the Environment, the government is following an integrated or indeed an ecological approach to the improvement of our environment. The key word here should be "ecology".

As one who has studied ecology, at least plant ecology, I am very pleased to hear the word used in much of our everyday conversation. Ecology is quite an old science. Indeed, it has been pointed out that it goes back to the days of Socrates. Just for the record, the term "ecology" was composed in 1885 by a zoologist named Reiter. His combination of the Greek roots "oikos", meaning home, and "logos", meaning study or discourse, etymologically implies study of organisms at home, although he made little further attempt at definition. A year later Haeckel, another zoologist, formulated a simple definition which was in keeping with the original usage of etymology and which remains today the most widely accepted definition of the scope of the word. Haeckel defined "ecology" as the study of the reciprocal relations between organisms and their environment.

A great many problems, indeed most of those involving the conservation of biologic resources, greatly over-reach the limits of any one field of specialization. Ecology is a science that integrates separate disciplines, synthesizes them and presents them as a system. It is very natural and right that the Canadian Wildlife Service should be with fisheries, foresty, and the other disciplines of the Department of the Environment. The minister outlined many of the reasons this should be so. The basic orientation of this branch is scientific in nature. For a long time I have felt the Wildlife service was rather out of place in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and would be better located in a department which was functionally oriented in the same direction as it. The same can be said in respect of the Water Resources Branch.

I also hope that as the new department begins its monumental task one of its functions will be to encourage more education in the environmental sciences. Ecological, or environmental education if you like, has been very lacking over the years in our Canadian universities. By and large, if a Canadian student wished to receive any kind of specialized education in the ecological sciences he had to go to a United States university. I am glad to note that recently courses in environmental studies are being offered at certain universities. At the University of Calgary they are offered up to Master's level; at the University of Manitoba up to Bachelor's level; at the University of Waterloo up to Bachelor's level; at the University of St. Jerome up to Bachelor's level and at York University up to the level of a Master's degree. Perhaps by definition I am omitting some very valuable courses offered by other universities, but I believe I have made my point. I hope the new Department of the Environment will do everything it can to rectify this situation.

In addition, I believe the Department should be involved in assistance at the pre-university level. With the type of expertise it has, it should be in an excellent position to give leadership in this field. Some schools boards and teachers' organizations have been doing some great work in this area but they need some encouragement, guidance and assistance. Just the other day I received a submission from the Kamloops School District No. 24, specifically from supporters of the McQueen Lake Environmental Study Centre, in which assistance was asked from this new department. I think they have an excellent program and I hope that their request meets with some success. The objectives of their projects are very laudable indeed. I should like to point out a few of them. The first is functional on-side activities of man and also an aesthetic appreciation by man of nature. Some examples of environmental studies approached by students are these: In art, simple mosaics from leaves, grass and twigs; landscape painting and inspiration for landscape painting.

In the field of ecology there is human, ecological history of homesteaders, pond life, grasslands, forests and over-all environment. I could go on. In zoology, they suggest the migration of birds and animals, nesting of birds, life cycles of small mammals, and insect life. All these should be studied more intensively. This is the kind of thing that the new department could encourage by helping out the organizations that I have named.

I was very pleased to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) suggest that an environmental council should be established to advise the minister and to bring attention to the things that are being done in the field of environmental sciences, particularly the work that is being done by the new department. I suggested this at one time in a question I put to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and I hope that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis), and indeed the Prime Minister, will give this matter very serious consideration.

I think that the whole government approach to pollution control and environmental quality should be put together. I sympathize with the hon. member to some degree when he points out that perhaps certain other matters should also be dealt with by the new department of environment. On the other hands, the department might then become too large. I am not in favour of creating what might be called a pollution czar, and I think perhaps if this were done by the government under the bill before us, the first criticism that might be levelled by opposition members would be that the minister is an empire builder.

The hon. member made another good point with regard to population. I feel that this is going to be a serious problem which we will have to face in the next few years. Over-population is certainly a serious problem. I do not know whether it will come under the jurisdiction of the new department of environment, but I hope that the minister can also give this serious subject some consideration.

I was going to deal with the matter of standards but perhaps I will leave it for now. I was a member of the committee dealing with the Canada Water Act. Much of the debate here centred about a lack of definition. I agree with the minister when he says that we should not create pollution havens. We also said this in the debate on the Canada Water Act. At the same time, we have to recognize ecological differences between the different waterways and in different parts of the country. I hope that, as a result of the remarks the minister made today, this whole question will receive a much clearer treatment in the next few months.

I agree with one thing which the Leader of the New Democratic Party said yesterday and which I will paraphrase. He said that the present Minister of Fisheries and Forestry was a good minister. He said that he had confidence the minister would do the job that is required because of the record he has achieved in the last couple of years. May I add that the people of Kamloops are very proud of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry who was born and raised there. Even though he has not lived there since his late teens, he is still considered a native of that area.

In closing I want to wish the minister luck in his new department. I know that most of the Canadian people will be with him in his efforts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to participate in this debate which I consider to be very important, since this bill deals with a great number of matters, all of which are more or less important. I believe that pollution is perhaps the main subject matter of Bill C-207 and this is why I would like to elaborate on it.

However, I feel that other sections of this bill should have been dealt with separately because we more or less object to them. In passing, may I say that this method of introducing omnibus bills leaves us in a rather difficult situation. Hon. members will understand that we agree with certain aspects of a bill such as this while we disagree with others.

On second reading, especially, we have to commit ourselves with regard to the principle of the bill. That puts us in a rather difficult situation. That is why I feel that, although the practice dates back quite some time, as soon as we find that it does not meet the proposed objectives or the needs of the debate, it should simply be set aside. We should not feel bound by tradition.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to deal more specifically with the problem of pollution. It is difficult, over a short period of time, to delve into all the aspects of an omnibus bill such as this one, and if the occasion arises, I shall at a later date deal with the other aspects of the bill.

Pollution is not a new problem. It has been around for a long time, but apparently we have only been concerned about it for a few years. It is evident that rivers have long been polluted, but the flow of some of them enabled us to protect the supply of drinking water. However, as population increased in some of our cities, pollution has worsened and we have continued to use those rivers as open sewers. Today, we must bear the consequences.

Industries set up on shore-lines have also contributed to their pollution. Now, we know that a single plant producing 1,000 tons of pulp daily consumes as much oxygen as a city of 250,000 inhabitants.

It is readily realized that the owners of the numerous factories which must satisfy the needs of consumers, whether they are pulp mills, oil refineries, or even alcohol distilleries, are more interested in picking up profits than in the protection of the consumer. The great number of factories has largely contributed to the pollution of streams, rivers, the Great Lakes and even the ocean.

I feel that our governments, as well as those of other countries, must undertake a battle against pollution. I trust that the neighbouring countries have provided for this, now, and that they will keep on taking the required measures so as to contribute to the control of water and air pollution.

For a long time in the history of Canada disputes have arisen between border cities about air pollution, for example. You will recall the discussions in Trail, B.C., some years ago which degenerated into legal action. Such events have gradually made the population and the governments aware of the necessity to undertake this fight against pollution.

It gives us some satisfaction to see that the industries themselves have come to the point where they admit they are sources of pollution. Who would have thought this possible only ten years ago?

I have on hand a booklet dealing with the concern of the pulp and paper industry over water pollution. It is an article written by Mr. Robert Snorton about a conference held in Washington on October 23 and 24, 1969, under the auspices of the United States Department of the Interior. If the industries that have been the worst offenders with regard to the pollution of our rivers and waterways are worried, the time has come for them to participate in the fight against water pollution, first of all by modifying their plants and by putting a stop to their dumping of waste in waterways.

A few weeks ago, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) and myself asked questions in the House about mercury pollution in James Bay. We believe that pulp and paper mills in Quebec and in Ontario dump their waste in the rivers flowing into James Bay. As a result, the hunting of white whale was forbidden there last year, because mercury pollution exceeded the rate acceptable for consumption.

The directors of pulp and paper industries, not only in Northern Quebec and Northern Ontario, but across Canada, should take steps to put a stop to the pollution

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, the recent examples of Dow Chemical, Wyandotte Chemicals, CIL and ALCAN which admitted having discharged mercury into the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence shows the tragic importance taken by industrial pollution.

We are now being told that those industries do not want to take the responsibility for correcting this situation. According to the Quebec Water Board, 140 gallons of water are required to produce one barrel of oil, 20,000 gallons of water for a ton of paper, 450 gallons for a barrel of beer. It takes 100 gallons of water to produce one gallon of alcohol.

In a white paper published in February 1970, the Water Board estimates that 80 per cent of water pollution results from industrial activity. A paper mill which produces 1,000 tons of pulp a day consumes as much oxygen as a town with a population of 250,000 people.

These industries use up an enormous quantity of water to produce beer, oil or pulp and our resources are limited, although we have believed for a long time that they were not. We are being told that only 3 per cent of all water available in the world is fresh water and that two-thirds of this fresh water is frozen at the poles.

For these reasons, we should not waste our freshwater resources even if we consider our low level of pollution, our relatively low population and the number of lakes and rivers in Canada.

I think that it is not only up to governments to use the taxpayers' money to fight pollution but also our biggest industries which contributed so much to our water pollution should share in this effort.

I was appalled yesterday when I read the statement made on January 26 by Mr. Arnold Hart, Chairman of the Bank of Montreal and I quote:

The Canadian people must be willing to forgo abundance so as to palliate the cost of pollution.

Mr. Speaker, the government is surely able to fight efficiently against pollution without having to deprive their citizens.

I suppose that, according to Mr. Hart's statement, the taxpayers will be asked to pay more taxes by the government, to provide for such an effort, but I do not think they should be deprived of the present abundance in order to pay for that. According to Mr. Hart, we have no other alternative than being poisoned or being starved to death.

There is no reason for us to die on account of that. Our institutions should be sufficiently organized and financed to fight successfully, without people having to suffer financially.

Among other things, Mr. Hart has this to say, and I quote:

—that is where the problem lies.

—any effort to combat pollution will result in economic restraints—

Such financiers fear so much lesser profits that they are anxious and frightened about the war on pollution.

Whether the bill is paid by our industries or our government, the consumer will bear the costs in the long run. The new Minister of the Environment should be smart enough to control this war on pollution, to prevent abuses, and exorbitant expenses leading nowhere. Besides, he should make sure that necessary legislation is introduced to put an end the pollution of our waterways.

I believe that industries should be required to treat sewage and smoke from their plants. New installations will be needed to reach such goals. New industries should be called upon to treat their sewage before returning it to nature, and also to adopt measures preventing air pollution.

Northern Ontario, especially Sudbury, has plentiful mineral resources, but nearing Sudbury, one is astonished by the view it offers. There is no need to set on an interplanetary trip to see what the moon is made of. A visit to the Sudbury region would give a notion of what the lunar landscape looks like. Air and water are so polluted that vegetal and, animal life is nonexisting. I am blaming both the Ontario and Ottawa authorities for having allowed this situation to develop around a city whose inhabitants should be permitted to lead a normal life.

Cities should also be compelled to treat their sewage. Surely there is some legislation allowing cities to borrow and benefit from incentives to build water filtration plants; some of them did it but many others, in spite of government legislation and of certain incentives, have not been able to do it because their finances, their charter or their tax assessment did not enable them to raise sufficient capital to undertake such schemes.

As for shipping, our laws have not been enforced with sufficient severity. I know there is legislation which forbids ships operating in our rivers, our lakes, or close to our coasts to discharge oil, but the fine is so small that they find it more economical to dump oil into the St.

Lawrence or into our lakes. Our laws are repeatedly broken since it is found more profitable to pay the fine.

I believe the act should be altered and that steps should be taken—this is very urgent—to ensure that transportation of hydrocarbons by vessel be strictly regulated in order to avoid such disasters as have taken place recently off Canadian coasts and those of many other countries. Tankers are damaged, or go into collisions and there is immediately a panic because of the disappearance of life near those coasts, which leads to immeasurable ecologic perturbations.

In my opinion, governments should agree to draw up much stricter regulations governing the manufacture of tankers that navigate in our waters, and take the steps required to avoid such frequent disasters.

In this respect, there would certainly be plenty to do. Research is also needed to find out the various effective ways of fighting pollution. I know that our country, Canada, can count on the services of scientists who are quite willing to work and who are highly qualified to undertake and pursue this kind of research. They will work at it efficiently and at a cost that will still be reasonable.

I want to assure the House, the department and the minister who will be appointed, of my co-operation in this regard. I am sure that averything will be done in the interests of Canada and that all hon. members will work hand in hand with him. This way the government will make sure that our country does not become poisoned by polluted water and polluted air. Any legislation aimed at preserving us from these hazards is welcome not only by hon. members but also by the entire population.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PLANS TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM—ESTIMATE OF JOBS TO BE PRODUCED

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement made yesterday by Alberta's minister of welfare that he was coming to the welfare conference "not to discuss welfare programs but to discuss unemployment, which is causing welfare costs to soar, and to find out what the federal government is going to do to reduce unemployment", will the Acting Prime Minister take the opportunity tomorrow on motions to outline to the House what answer the federal government has to give to provincial inquiries of this kind which are made with great seriousness? At the same time, would he outline to the House and the country what estimate the government has concerning the number of new jobs its present program to fight unemployment is expected to produce in the next three months?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I share with the hon. gentleman the view that unemployment is the most serious problem with which the country is faced at the moment, and I am not at all surprised that the Alberta minister should regard this as a most important issue to have before this conference. I can assure the hon. member that our representatives at the conference share that view and will be ready to discuss it with the Alberta minister.

Mr. Hees: The minister, as usually happens, did not answer my question. I would ask him again if he would take the first opportunity on motions to outline what the government is going to do to fight unemployment, as requested by the minister of welfare of Alberta. If he will not do this, would he outline to the House and to the country the government's estimate—and it must have an estimate—of the number of new jobs it expects its present program to produce in the next three months?

Mr. Sharp: On a number of occasions the Minister of Finance has dealt with this question. I would point out to the hon. member, however, that there has been a very substantial increase in employment already this year, and we expect there will be a further increase.

Mr. Hees: You mean unemployment.

Mr. Sharp: No, both. This is the essence of the problem we face, namely, that there is an increasing number of jobs in the country but the labour force happens at this particular time to be increasing much more rapidly.

Mr. Hees: As the minister refuses to answer my question, I would ask him whether it is not obvious that the government's program is in reality expected to produce very few new jobs, and is it not a bluff intended to kid the Canadian people that something is being done?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTION UNDER CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the government is prepared to offer to the provinces at the welfare conference an increase in the percentage paid by the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan to 60 or 65 per cent?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I expect that this question will be raised in the discussions today and tomorrow. The government is not yet in a position to give an answer.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED ASSISTANCE TO MUNICIPALITIES AND PROVINCES TO MEET WELFARE COSTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the high rate of unemployment is causing such a heavy financial burden on the cities and provinces I wonder whether at the welfare conference or at a special conference of the premiers of Canada which would be called immediately the Acting Prime Minister would outline a policy and discuss with the premiers some financial assistance to the municipalities and provinces?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The Prime Ministers of Canada will shortly be meeting here in Ottawa and I expect that they will raise these kinds of questions.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, I think they will.

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSITION OF PROVINCES ON IMMEDIATE AMENDMENTS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—EARLIER INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In light of the assurance given yesterday by the Minister of Labour that the federal government would bring to the attention of the provinces the need for immediate amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act regarding benefits for the hard-core and young unemployed, would the Acting Prime Minister undertake to keep the House fully informed on whether any provinces express opposition to emergency reform along these lines, and if so, which province or provinces?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I expect these problems will be aired and there will be an opportunity not only for the House but for the country as a whole to be aware of the representations of the provinces.

Mr. Alexander: If agreement with the provinces on this matter can be obtained, will the government introduce two specific emergency amendments regarding access and benefits for the hard-core and young unemployed this winter and spring rather than wait until July 1, 1971?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. As the Minister of Labour said yesterday, there is a timetable for the introduction of unemployment insurance legislation. This will be adhered to. I would remind hon. members that steps have already been taken to increase the benefits.

Mr. Alexander: So you do nothing for four months.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Could he indicate to the House whether the hammering and drilling we can hear back in this corner are an indication of the increased number of jobs being offered by the government in Ottawa?

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Would the government give consideration to increasing the salaries of its employees so that they will not have to be on welfare at the present time, as was reported on the news this morning over the CBC?

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont. I should point out that we will have to go on to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands in a moment, but the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Egmont at this time.

UNEMPLOYMENT—RESPONSE TO REQUEST OF FEDERATION OF MAYORS AND MUNICIPALITIES FOR WINTER WORKS AND OTHER PROGRAMS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the conclusion reached following the survey conducted recently by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities that federal programs are inadequate to solve urban unemployment, and their request for consultation to consider possible winter works programs, crash programs, etc., would the Acting Prime Minister indicate what response was made to the Association of Mayors and Municipalities on this important question?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question. However, I do want to say to the hon. member that I am sure he would agree that under our constitution it is not only legal but it is also a matter of government policy to discuss the position of the municipalities with the governments that have responsibility for them, namely, the provincial governments.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in light of the Acting Prime Minister's response, would he ascertain whether there will be consultation with the provinces shortly on this important question, or whether in fact anyone in the ministry has received such a request, because apparently it was forwarded to the government a few days ago?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I said today and as was said by another hon. member from that side of the House, the ministers who are attending the Council of Welfare Ministers are raising these questions. They will be discussed. I can assure hon. members that no one has a greater concern for the problems of unemployment than the members on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—MINISTERIAL AUTHORIZATION FOR MEMORANDUM—DISCIPLINARY ACTION RESPECTING CIRCULATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister arising out of the memorandum tabled by the President of the Treasury Board on Tuesday entitled, "Special Recruitment of Francophones in the Public Service." Since the Acting Prime Minister has now had several days to look into this matter, I want to ask him whether this memorandum was drafted and circulated with the knowledge and consent of any ministers? The President of the Treasury Board has already said that it was done without his knowledge. I want to know whether the Secretary of State, the Acting Prime Minister or any other minister knew of this memorandum and, if so, which minister authorized its circulation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity of canvassing all my colleagues but I have spoken to those who might be directly concerned, namely, the President of the Treasury Board and the Secretary of State who have responsibilities in the field of the Public Service, and I have ascertained that they were not aware of the contents of this circular.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, am I to take it from the minister's reply that this memorandum was circulated solely on the initiative of the Public Service Commission? If so, does the Public Service Commission have the authority to commit the government to an additional $2 million annually over and above the regular appropriations, and does it have the authority to set aside the merit system on its own initiative.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the impression that the second part of the hon. member's question has already been asked, but obviously because the hon. member appears to place great importance on the matter the minister should be allowed to reply.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House the other day, there has been no money appropriated by parliament yet for next year, and before any money would be expended for this purpose not only would the Treasury Board have to approve it, not only would the government have to approve it, but parliament would have to approve it. No money has been appropriated for this purpose yet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: On the second point may I say that I for one and the government as a whole are interested—I do not know what the view of the hon. member may be—in the recruitment of more Francophone Canadians into the Public Service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: That is the purpose of government policy which has been endorsed in all parts of the country. I hope it is supported by my hon. friend and by all those on the opposite side. This policy is being implemented. We have under study a proposal which would help to effect this purpose. Just how it is going to be worked out we do not know yet. There is simply a study under way, and we hope that we can find some way of accomplishing our purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. Apparently the hon. member for Egmont seeks the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because I am sure that the Acting Prime Minister would not even wish to suggest by his response that there has been any change in the position from that originally enunciated when the vote was taken in the House and hon. members in fact supported that policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That has nothing to do with a question of privilege.

Mr. Forrestall: With respect, Mr. Speaker, it certainly has something to do with it because certain implications arise from this nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the policy of bilingualism in the Public Service is not at issue, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government proposes to take any disciplinary action with respect to the circulation of the memorandum outlining a program which is in complete violation of the Public Service Employment Act and seeks to destroy the merit system which has been established in this country for decades?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that in this case the merit system is at issue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: It is perfectly possible within the merit system—this has been thoroughly supported by the bilingualism commission, by the government and by the Public Service Commission—to bring more Francophone Canadians into the Public Service. I can assure the hon. member that this government is thoroughly committed to and will observe the merit system in bringing more Francophone Canadians into the Public Service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Inquiries of the Ministry

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—ONE-CANADA POLICY

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Does the Acting Prime Minister feel that spending $2 million of the taxpayers' money on a specific group of university graduates from one province is in keeping with the government's proposal for a one-Canada policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is inviting the minister to express an opinion and in those terms the question is not in order.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—RCMP INQUIRY INTO DISCLOSURE OF MEMORANDUM

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, since the Acting Prime Minister has investigated the actions of members of cabinet to find out where the leak was, would he inform the House whether the RCMP have been asked to conduct an investigation into the leaking of the confidential memorandum on the special program to provide employment for Francophones in the Public Service?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Why not, Mr. Speaker?

PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—APPLICATION TO NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. When this program is under way, will it also apply to Francophone students from the province of Nova Scotia? Will they be given every opportunity to participate?

An hon. Member: Include New Brunswick as well.

Mr. Muir: Will they have the same opportunity as the students of any other province?

An hon. Member: Including New Brunswick.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope so, and if there were any danger that in any way we were not giving all Canadians an equal opportunity to join the Public Service—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are not.

Mr. Sharp: —then I would certainly think that the government ought to be condemned. But I do not think that it should be condemned just because special efforts are being made to bring more Francophone Canadians into the Public Service. I have been a public servant and I know about this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Sharp.]

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Forrestall: There speaks an ex-mandarin.

Mr. Muir: If the Acting Prime Minister seriously and sincerely believes what he is saying, why did this memorandum only mention Francophone students from the province of Quebec and not the province of Nova Scotia where there are many French-speaking students?

Mr. Sharp: The answer is very simple. This is not the whole of our program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN NUMBERS TO BE EMPLOYED UNDER PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Since the number of 250 French-speaking civil servants represents only a small part of the federal civil service, could the Acting Prime Minister say whether the government would consider increasing the number to about 2,000 to make it a fair proportion of French-speaking employees?

SUGGESTED EARLY IMPLEMENTATION OF PROGRAM FOR HIRING OF FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Considering the importance of the French-speaking representation within the civil service and the comments which could reduce it, could I ask the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. La Salle: —if you would be kind enough to let me ask my question, you will perhaps understand what I mean.

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he can assure us that the memorandum, in view of its importance, will be tabled as soon as possible in the House in order to enable those who wish to have a fair representation in the civil service to support it?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see some support from the other side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: When the estimates are under consideration, we have promised to facilitate all proceedings and to get all the facts before a committee of this House and the House. We have nothing to hide in this respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see four or five members who are very anxious to ask supplementaires on this subject. I doubt whether we should spend the rest of the question period on this matter, although I realize it is important. Perhaps the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings might be recognized for the moment.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, this is obviously a very important matter. A few moments ago the Acting Prime Minister indicated that what has come to light through this leak is only a very small part of the program. When may the House and the country expect to learn more of the program through ministers, or do we have to wait for leaks through the press and radio? When will we learn this?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): The Acting Prime Minister stated that all the facts will be ascertained at the time the estimates are before the House. How is that possible when the Acting Prime Minister cannot find out from his own cabinet ministers who was responsible for the memorandum?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that the questions are now becoming slightly argumentative. I realize that the matter is important. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. Other hon. members may want to ask questions about this very interesting matter, but in fairness to other members who may want to bring other important and interesting matters to the attention of the government, perhaps we might go on to the next subject and in due course return to those hon. members who want to pursue this matter.

GRAIN

PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS ON NEW AGREEMENT TO REPLACE INTERNATIONAL GRAINS ARRANGEMENT—NATURE OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the minister in a position to advise the farmers of Canada generally and western farmers in particular whether, as a result of the ten days of meetings so far in Geneva, there is any indication that a new agreement will be entered into between the nations to take the place of the International Grains Arrangement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, beyond confirming the continuation of the negotiations and Canada's participation in all of the committees at these meetings I do not think it would be helpful or appropriate to comment upon the progress of the negotiations themselves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then may I put this question, Mr. Speaker, since this is also something which, as the Acting Prime Minister himself said, should not be hidden. Do the Canadian representatives at the meeting favour controlling production to match demand, an end to crop subsidy payments, maintenance by producers of fixed floor prices, and importers buying at uniform rates? Are these some of the representations that Canada is making?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think I should simply repeat my previous answer, except that I should add that some of the matters included in the question of the right hon. gentleman are far from anything that anybody would represent. Our position in general is well known. We favour an international agreement, one that will be of interest to this country. It is also well known that we believe in a free trading world in which those countries that are supporting an inefficient agricultural industry should make more room for our production. This policy is also well known and I am sure it is being put forward at the meetings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for his answer. What I was reading from were the representations made by the Canadian delegation and given by the press. Would the minister now tell the House which of the matters I mentioned are so far from the thinking of the Canadian government as to shock his finer sensibilities?

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—AMOUNT OF FARMERS' CONTRIBUTION—MAXIMUM GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL PARTICIPATION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister responsible for the Wheat Board whether, in view of the stand taken by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that contributions by grain growers to a stabilization plan should not exceed a maximum of one per cent, the minister is prepared to accept this as the maximum burden that he could expect to place on the western grain growers at this time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, many discussions have been going on, as all hon. members know. In these discussions, not surprisingly, the farm organizations have tended to suggest that if the farmers pay less rather than more the plan would be more attractive to them. What we have to try to do is to determine from our discussions where they put their priorities in terms of types of program, and then as a government we must reach a conclusion as to the total amount of financing that may be possible out of general revenue.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's statement at the meeting he had with the Manitoba Farm Bureau in which he said that he recognized there would have to be a limit to the amount of money which would be available, is he prepared to inform the House what is the maximum contribution, subsidy or aid the government is prepared to make available to the western grain grower?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the proposals presented in the House on October 29 indicated a certain level of participation which the government was obviously considering as reasonable. As I indicated to the CFA yesterday, this is the kind of question that is bound to be under continuing review as circumstances change and as the facts become more readily apparent to everyone concerned.

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING PROTEIN GRADING OF WHEAT

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Because of its importance to our export trade and in view of the very great interest in the matter on the Prairies, can the minister inform the House when he will announce the regulations under the new Canada Grain Act which will authorize protein grading for wheat?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we hope that within a very few days we will have the regulations ready so that the Act can be proclaimed. With regard to the protein grading aspects or the changes in the grades taking into account protein, we are required to give some notice of this. I think I have already stated that we hope to make a start on this at the beginning of the new crop year so far as grades to the farmers are concerned.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—OPPORTUNITY FOR HOUSE DEBATE PRIOR TO FINAL DETERMINATION—REQUEST FOR BACKGROUND PAPERS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the importance of the grain policy proposals and the varying views that have been expressed by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture at the meeting this week, will an opportunity be given the House to debate this important matter before the proposals of the government are finalized? May I also ask the minister whether he is in a position now to provide an answer to my inquiry of Monday last whether background analyses and information developed with respect to the government's proposal will be tabled or otherwise made available?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it would be my hope that we would make to the House a further presentation of the government view on what the proposals should be and to make this presentation in the form of legislation that would then be put before the House and a committee of the House for full discussion and debate.

I have looked into the question of the tabling of background studies and information, but I find that so much of the total development of the program is in a variety of forms as not to be suitable for tabling. It would be inappropriate to present to the House at this stage those portions which are in fact on pieces of paper, though of course it would be my intention to answer very fully questions asked by hon. members, and indeed to provide for the fullest exploration of the subject by hon. members at the committee stage.

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister who answers for the Wheat Board. In line with the thinking he expressed to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and his statement that "it is essential that every effort be made to maximize the return to the grain producer from the sale of his product both at home and in export markets", is the government giving consideration at this time to establishing a two-price system for wheat, since it takes Canadians four minutes to earn the money to buy one pound of bread compared with 12 minutes in Russia and 27 minutes in Japan, which might also be in line with some of the—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply, but I have to caution hon. members that in a few minutes we will be running out of time and we have not even completed the first round of questions.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Naturally, Mr. Speaker, we are conscious of the representations that are made by distinguished farm organizations on this or any other subject. This really forms a part of the total analysis of the appropriate amount of assistance or financial help that can be made available to the agricultural industry.

TRADE

MEAT—INSTRUCTION OF NEW ZEALAND PACKERS BY CANADIAN EXPERTS ON CUTTING AND PACKAGING

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I will direct to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns the Canadian team of experts who were sent to New Zealand to instruct meat packers in that country on the cutting and packaging of meats for the Canadian market. Does he not think that this gives an unfair advantage to these people who are competing with our packers for markets in this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is inviting the Parliamentary Secretary to express an opinion in relation to the opinion that he himself has expressed indirectly, and to that extent the question is not permitted.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ASBESTOS, QUE.—ASSISTANCE TO LANDSLIDE VICTIMS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Since damages resulting from the recent landslides in the town of Asbestos, in Quebec, will amount to several million dollars, could the minister say if he has been consulted by the municipal authorities with a vew to redeveloping that part of the town of Asbestos and assisting the victims?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have received a telegram from the mayor of the town who has asked if he could see me regarding this matter.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. Order. Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to recognize the hon. member for Richmond for a supplementary, and I will come to him in a moment.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Could the minister tell us whether the mayor has mentioned when he would like to meet him?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR CANCELLATION OF FINES FOR LATE FILING OF RETURNS BY SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Because small businesses in Canada are encountering difficulties in making collections, will the government cancel or declare a moratorium on monetary fines for late filing of government returns, as the penalties imposed are to a large degree a form of blackmail on the part of the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The first part of the question is in order, but I would think that the second part is more in the form of an argument. The hon. member may want to rephrase the question, but in any event the first part is quite in order and perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it that this is in the form of a representation that we should forego monetary penalties. We do not have the subject under consideration at the present time.

Mr. McIntosh: Does the Acting Prime Minister not agree that many of the delays in filing have been brought about by circumstances of the government's own making such as its inability to sell western grain or to cope with the high rate of unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIONS TO WORLD BANK RESPECTING PEGGING OF INTERNATIONAL CURRENCIES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance to advise the House whether the government of Canada has made direct or indirect representations to the governors of the World Bank with a view to changing the pegging system of international currencies either to a floating average or a wider band of spread in order to avoid some of the difficulties we have had in recent years?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have not made direct representations, but this matter has been under discussion, as my hon. friend knows, by the World Bank for some time. It was brought up at the last general meeting of the bank at which time the governors expressed their views, and it is under continuing study.

[Later:]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Can he tell us whether it is his or the government's intention to press this point with the governors of the World Bank in order to assist Canada to return to a more flexible, fixed currency?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would simply say that the matter is certainly worthy of study and is indeed presently being studied, as my hon. friend knows. Canada will participate in such studies.

IMMIGRATION

REFUSAL OF VISITORS' VISAS TO REPRESENTATIVES OF SOUTH VIET NAM PROVISIONAL REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Does his decision to refuse visitors' visas to certain representatives of the provisional revolutionary government of South Viet Nam, who had been invited to speak in Windsor, represent a change in policy on the part of the government because, as he knows, his predecessor did allow such people to come to Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, this does not represent a change in policy. In applying this policy, of course, every specific fact and variation must be taken into consideration, especially in a case where special permits for people who may be otherwise prohibited are involved. In this particular case the meeting did not seem to be one essentially of a Canadian direction, and that certainly had some weight in the decision taken.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, does the minister think it necessary to protect the people of the United States from hearing the views of a section of the people of Viet Nam with whose fate they are very much involved?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is obviously an argument.

[Later:]

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood concerning five South Vietnamese. Has the minister received any representations from the United States government in this matter?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, certainly not. The decision was made on the basis of Canadian law and on the basis of our policy.

GRAIN

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—RAISING OF AMOUNT OF YEARLY EARNINGS REQUIRED TO PARTICIPATE IN STABILIZATION FUND

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister who reports to the House for the Canadian Wheat Board. It relates to a comment he made a few minutes ago with respect of the fact that agricultural policy is presently under review. Is the government considering raising the disqualifying restriction respecting participation in the grain stabilization fund from $10,000 to $15,000 yearly earnings and, if so, is a statement to be made on this subject shortly?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly one of the subjects on which we sought representations and upon which we have had discussions. I would anticipate that it would be part of an official announcement of any decision.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED OIL PIPELINE FROM PRUDHOE BAY TO VALDEZ, ALASKA—CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since United States interests have indicated they are planning to construct a pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez on the west coast, can the minister advise the House whether consultation was carried on with the United States authorities as to the best possible route for this pipeline?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have had many discussions with United States authorities about both gas and oil, and certainly the idea of a pipeline across Alaska or down the Mackenzie Valley. All these matters were discussed between ministers and secretaries.

[Later:]

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister in relation to the question asked a few minutes ago about the Alaskan oil pipeline. I believe the minister indicated that Canada was making representations to the United States. I notice the minister is shaking his head. May I ask whether Canada has taken any particular position on this proposed pipeline, and what is the government's position?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should be asked to take a position on a pipeline through United States territory. Just to clarify the point, I did not say we had made representations. I said there had been consultations between ministers and secretaries.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I realize the pipeline is within the United States, but since trans-shipment to United States ports would involve Canadian coastal waters it would seem to me Canada must have some interest in this matter and I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister would care to put forward our position on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think this should be done at this time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS—BASIS OF STATEMENT BY MINISTER TO SENATE COMMITTEE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in light of the remarks of the Minister of National Defence yesterday to a committee of the other place, would he indicate whether or not he based certain comments he made, particularly his certainty of a greater likelihood of peacekeeping operations in the Middle East, on discussions he may have had with United Nations officials, or was he just prophesying or looking into the future?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I made on both possible theatres were really based on an assessment of conditions of operation rather than any expectation that there would be an early political settlement in either of the two areas. In view of our experience in UNEF in the Middle East in the past, I think on the whole it is obviously easier for us to operate there than it would be in another theatre.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, can I assume then that there has not been any basic change in our position and in our existing plans in respect of peacekeeping operations and the involvement of Canadian forces, particularly in regard to the Middle East, and that this was contingency thinking the minister was expressing yesterday? Can I assume that he did not in the course of his comments reject the position of his predecessor in respect of Viet Nam?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it was an indication that we, as the hon. member says, assume as a task continued peacekeeping assistance. This responsibility will only arise once there has been political settlement. I think I did recognize that in my view it would be far more difficult to carry out effective peacekeeping in the Viet Nam area than in the UNEF area.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION OF CAR REPAIR INDUSTRY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in his absence perhaps someone opposite would take notice of it. Having regard to the statement to the Quebec National Assembly by the president of the Automobile Protective Association, which was critical of the honesty and quality of the car repair industry and called for greater consumer protection, is the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs investigating or does it intend to investigate the car repair industry, as has been done in the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister will be here tomorrow and I will see that the question is brought to his attention.

FINANCE

AMOUNTS BORROWED BY PROVINCES FROM LOAN FUND—JOBS CREATED

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a $150 million loan fund has been provided to finance job-creating public works, will the Minister of Finance table the amounts each province has borrowed since his announcement prior to Christmas and indicate how many jobs have been created by this fund?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the first part of the question is probably quite possible to answer. I think the second part might be fairly difficult because the provinces are treating the matter differently and we have to get the information from them. I should also indicate that the amount of the allocation we have decided upon is $160 million rather than $150 million.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, has the department refused such loans to any province because of their proposals not being sufficiently job-creative?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would have to take that question as notice in order to look at the individual consultations with the provinces.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GUINEA—MASS EXECUTIONS—CANADIAN INITIATIVE FOR INVESTIGATION BY UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister with reference to the mass executions in Guinea which have brought sharp protests from His Holiness the Pope and other world figures. Can he advise whether the government contemplates any initiative which might be helpful in bringing this matter under the purview of the appropriate United Nations body dealing with human rights?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have followed the events in Guinea with great interest. I am not quite sure whether we would take any action as a result of these studies, but I share the concern of the hon. member about mass executions of this kind. While we have not made any formal representations on the subject, I can assure him that we do not look with favour on any mass executions of this kind whether they take place in Guinea or wherever.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury (for the Prime Minister) that Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on this very important bill, Bill C-207, which has to do with the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto. First, I must register two objections I have before proceeding with the main body of my remarks.

Once again, we have an omnibus bill presented to this House. It is sort of a grab bag, a mixed bag. This bill covers many subjects which are not particularly related. I most heartily agree with the remarks Your Honour made when deciding whether the omnibus bill should be allowed to proceed. At one point you mentioned that you had raised your eyebrows when this bill was first tabled in the House. Then, after having looked at the bill, and when handing down your ruling on the motion that it not be proceeded with, Your Honour stated that omnibus bills seem to take in too much and that we have had many other instances of this in the House. I am sure Your Honour's recommendation that these bills should be scrutinized when first tabled will be followed. So, I, as an elected representative of this House, object very strenuously to having to vote on a bill containing a number of subjects, some of which have my approval while others do not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hales: I should like to vote for the clauses setting up the Department of the Environment. But I do not approve for one minute of the part which would set up the different ministries of the government, and I would like to have the opportunity to vote against that. Obviously, we are placed in a very unfair position. I hope this precedent will not be continued and that in future each subject will be presented in a separate bill.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hales: Yes.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Would the hon. member not have the opportunity to vote against individual proposals in the bill when the bill is in the committee of the whole House.

Mr. Hales: Yes; I will have an opportunity to vote against a proposal but the vote will not be a recorded vote. The recorded vote will not be on each issue but rather on the whole bill. I can register my dislike of a particular part of the bill, but still the bill as a whole will carry. That is the point as I see it.

My other objection is that the time of this House will be taken up discussing this bill on government reorganization when we have serious unemployment problems facing this country involving nearly three-quarters of a million unemployed people. I believe it would have been much better if the government had placed before us a bill in the name of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), entitled a bill to prevent human misery and economic waste.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hales: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that is what we should be spending our time on at this moment.

I may say, with regard to the contents of the bill, that it has nine parts. It certainly is a catch-all bill. The bill provides for setting up a Department of the Environment, and sets out the duties of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as well as the duties to be assigned to the Minister of the Environment. It transfers the responsibility for astronomical observatories from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to the National Research Council. The fourth part of the bill concerns ministries and ministers of state. The fifth part concerns Parliamentary Secretaries. The number is to be increased from 16. The sixth part provides for the appointment of a Postmaster General. We already have one, but still there is this provision. The seventh part concerns the Public Service Superannuation Act and provides for improved early retirement. Part VIII amends the Salaries Act to provide a salary for each minister. Part IX is a general section.

I do not have time to deal with all the parts of the bill, but in the time available I wish to speak on Part IV which deals with ministries and ministers of state, Part VI regarding the post office, and Part VII regarding superannuation. Then, I should like to say a little about the cost of this whole package deal we are discussing at the moment. Many of my colleagues, and members on the other side of the House, have spoken about the setting up of a Department of the Environment and about pollution. I am delighted that this part is contained in the bill, but I wish it appeared by itself. As a member who has a university in his riding, I am particularly pleased that we are now to have some legislation to take care of pollution and to place it under the jurisdiction of one minister. Just the other day I received a letter from the University of Guelph. I was asked what we had done in respect of noise pollution control. I was surprised to learn there were no federal provisions covering that, except in the Department of Transport regulations concerning aeroplanes. So, it is good to have this part in this bill.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the part in respect of ministries and ministers of state is a real package, indeed. Here, we certainly have an example of a government dream or a bureaucratic dream. In addition to having the ministers we have today, we are to have ministers of state for specific purposes. There will be five of these. They will be paid $15,000 plus their other salary. There will also be ministers of state with no specific duties to perform. There is no limit to how many ministers of state can be appointed. There are three types of ministers in addition to ministers without portfolio, as we have now. What a mixed bag of tricks this will be.

The bill does not state what the ministers will do, but let us take a look at it. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), in introducing this bill, said it will provide for greater accountability of the executive branch to Parliament. What nonsense! Here, we will have five ministers appointed with no specific duties assigned to them, but the House will have nothing to say about the departments they will head. This is probably the most devious piece of legislation this government has ever presented. Its only aim is to increase the number of ministers. The bill contains no statement of purpose, no clearcut objectives. Not only does the government have nothing specific for the ministers to do, but it is also proposing a new way to diminish the powers of Parliament. This is a very serious aspect of the bill.

Under the bill, the House would not be permitted to debate the proposal to form a new ministry. Just imagine, we will not have the authority to debate in this House the establishment of a new ministry. The government could set up a ministry of information Canada. They can do whatever they like without coming to the House. As the minister said the other day—and he was perfectly right—parliamentary control lies in the ability of this House to deny money for any undertaking of which we do not approve. What chance have we on that score? Even if everyone on this side were present and voted against granting the money, the government could still go ahead and set up ministries. So that argument does not hold water. By proclamation, the Governor in Council may establish at his discretion up to five ministers of state. The responsible minister would be in charge of policy formulation and development, and this is contrary to tradition since policy formulation has always been a Crown prerogative.

We have had a sample of this reorganization in the House. I want to say that this reorganization will not cure all the ills of the government. Let me remind hon. members that the government split the Department of Labour into the Department of Labour and the Department of Manpower and Immigration. I think every elected member has experienced great difficulty in his riding as a result of that action. The division of these two very closely related departments of government has not been very popular. What can be more closely related than a man out of work and one seeking a job? In my city of Guelph there is the manpower office, but the unemployment office from which the unemployed collect their benefits is in the central area of Waterloo. There is no co-ordination between the two offices and there has been nothing but trouble since the department was split.

In 1968, the new Department of Communications was set up and the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) was in charge of the Post Office, Telesat and other forms of communications. We know what a mess we got into there. There was nothing but trouble. I am sure the President of the Treasury Board will not appreciate what I have to say, but I cannot miss the opportunity of reminding him that the government set up the department of industry, against the wishes of the opposition and over our protests. On June 27, 1963 as recorded at page 1663 of Hansard, the Hon. Gordon Churchill said the following:

> My criticism of the bill, and of the whole idea—

He was referring to the bill setting up the department of industry.

> —is that the Department of Trade and Commerce, as it is at the present time, is equipped to do all that the proposed department of industry is aiming to do.

What could be more plain and forthright than that? On June 28 of the same year, Mr. Churchill said:

> —this is a mistake, in that a very strong department, trade and commerce—which could be called industry and commerce—is being weakened by this proposal.

How true those words were. The government paid no attention to the opposition of the day. They went ahead and set up the department of industry.

What did that cost the taxpayer of Canada? The department was set up in July of 1963, and in 1969 it was amalgamated with the department of trade and commerce in great confusion. People were transferred from the department of industry to the new department. The department of industry had hired very expensive people, and these people had to work alongside employees of the department of trade and commerce who were paid much less. There was no end to the trouble and confusion that resulted. If I had been an employee of the department of trade and commerce when that happened I would not have been happy with it either. In the first year, the estimates of the department of industry were $23.7 million. In 1967-68 the figure was $118.1 million, a fourfold increase in four years. Then, there was the amalgamation, and that is the expensive story of the department of industry.

We must not forget about the staff. It will be said that people from different departments will go into the new department of environment and will be absorbed there. But if we experience the same thing that happened with the department of industry, this will not be so. In 1963-64 the staff of the department of industry numbered 274. In 1964-65 the staff grew to 786, a 200 per cent increase. In 1967-68, the budget of the department was $118.1 million and the budget of the department of trade and commerce was $81.3 million. So reorganization is not new to us, and I mention these figures to show that reorganization is not an answer to all these problems.

I think I have said enough on this subject, so I will now deal with Part VI, the Post Office. What a checkered career this department has had. At one time it used to be a stable department which ran efficiently. It did not bring in too much money but it gave good service. The public was reasonably happy with it. But reorganization took place. What a licking the public has taken since that happened. They paid more but got less service. That is the first thing we should note. I have letters to substantiate this. A constituent wrote that it took seven days for a letter to go from Guelph to Toronto, and six days for a letter to go from Guelph to the University of Western Ontario in London. The counter serlvice in the post offices was discontinued on Saturdays and was not resumed until recently. Even now, it is not in effect all day Saturday as the minister said it would be. I find that counter service has been reinstated only up until twelve o'clock noon.

We have had five day delivery introduced. We had a national strike for three weeks in the summer of 1968. From January, 1968, to March, 1970, 1,227 post offices were closed. In April, 1969, 2,500 low budget publications lost their second class mailing privileges. In November, 1970, 140 lost mail bags were found. They had been left in a truck in March, and after the truck had been stored in some place in Montreal no one checked to see if it was empty. The 140 bags were found in November. That has been the checkered career of the Post Office to have a new minister of the Crown, a Postmaster General.

We did not really need this bill to appoint a Postmaster General. As I understand it, an order in council could have appointed him. True, we need some provision to increase his pay, and rightly so. He should be paid as much as any other cabinet minister, but I am sure that could have been done by amending the Organization Act, or the act dealing with the pay of ministers. But no, Mr. Speaker, it is done through this bill.

I am against the appointment of a Postmaster General. I am surprised that the government did not propose making the Post Office a crown corporation. The government had 15 studies conducted by six consulting firms over a 12 month period. I have one such report before me, that drawn up by Kates, Peat, Marwick and Co., the first page of which reads:

> From these studies emerged the overpowering conclusion that the Post Office, as a Crown corporation, could better fulfil its role in the future. It cannot operate effectively as a department of government and serious reservations exist as to whether it can continue to meet the requirements of Canada within its existing framework of operations except at exorbitant cost to the people of Canada.

This is an opinion for which the government paid. Mr. Speaker, it is the opinion of the Conservative party that a crown corporation would be a better arrangement. The government paid for this advice but did not follow it. Now it introduces this bill to appoint a Postmaster General.

Again, I quote from the consultants' report:

> The quality of the senior management group is the most significant consideration before the Post Office today. A transition to Crown corporation status and improvement of operating performance will place great pressure and demands on key executives during the next two to three years.

Yet in this bill the government proposes the appointment of a Postmaster General instead of turning the Post Office into a crown corporation.

What about the public service superannuation part of the bill? There are some good points in it. I am in accord with the proposed provision whereby any civil servant who has 30 years of service and has reached the age of 55 years can retire. That is a good idea. But nothing is said in the bill about the funded cost to the Treasury, and this will be considerable, Mr. Speaker. There will be a large price tag on that proposal.

Now, we go to deputy ministers. There is no reason given to indicate why the government wants this. I suppose one can only draw certain conclusions. The bill provides that any deputy minister with ten years' pensionable service at age 60 can retire and continue to pay contributions under the Public Service Superannuation Act. I cannot agree with that. It would be discrimination of the worst order. Why should a deputy minister have that privilege any more than an assistant deputy minister or other senior officials? Why shouldn't Members of Parliament be allowed to continue to pay into their pension fund after they leave here? Why shouldn't the same provision apply to everybody?

Another reason I am strongly opposed to this provision is that I understand under the present arrangement the government pays a contribution of 6½ per cent and the individual pays 6½ per cent. Now, if the individual retires and continues to pay his contribution the government will also continue to pay its share. If I am incorrect I hope I will be corrected, but I would hope it would be the retiring person who would pay the full amount, and that the government would pay nothing.

Mr. Drury: That is right.

Mr. Hales: Anyway, it's a pretty good deal.

Then, there is the question of the definition of a deputy. According to the bill this means a president, chairman, or any other chief executive officer. The President of Air Canada will qualify for this. The President of of the Bank of Canada will qualify just the same as a deputy minister. The President of the IDB, the President of Polymer, and the head of the National Capital Commission will get the same deal. Nothing is said in the bill about the cost of this proposal. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that funding the superannuation account for all those people will amount to a tidy sum of money.

What about the cost of this whole package? Not one word was said about that by the minister who introduced the bill. We are going to give the government a blank cheque when we pass this bill, and I would guess that blank cheque could amount to $1 billion. Yes, Mr. Speaker, this reorganization is liable to cost the country $1 billion. Increase the number of Parliamentary Secretaries from 16 to 29 at $4,000 each, and you have an additional $52,000 right there. You have five additional ministers at $15,000, and there is another $75,000. Then, you have an unlimited number of other ministers at $7,500 each. Some of these ministers are not going to have deputy ministers but secretaries. Why does the government want to confuse the matter this way? Why not have deputy ministers in all cases? It's a real bag of tricks and you end up with a real mumbo-jumbo.

If five separate departments are set up, each with their own specific minister, their own deputy ministers and staff, the cost for each department will be in the neighbourhood of $100 million. Look at what the cost was when we established the Department of Industry. If you have five departments, you will have a cost of $500 million right here. Then, add on all the superannuation, the pension funding and the like, and I think you will find I am not too far out when I mention $1 billion as the cost of this government reorganization bill.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I simply reiterate what I said at the beginning of my speech, that I am very much opposed to the introduction of omnibus bills. I find myself in the position of wanting to vote for something but cannot support it without voting for something which I oppose. Secondly, we are taking up the time of the House debating a government re-organization bill at a time when we should be dealing with something to help combat unemployment.

It is very difficult to figure out this new cabinet arrangement. The bill will certainly take control of certain matters out of the hands of the House and put it into the hands of the executive. I do not approve of that. As an elected representative, I feel that I ought to have the opportunity of voicing my opinion and of voting on whether a certain ministry shall be set up. I should have the right to say whether I think it is necessary or not, and to vote either for or against its establishment. Yet the bill, as drafted, will make us into mere rubberstamps. That I do not like. It is quite plain that that is the direction in which we are heading. I am, therefore, sorry that the government saw fit to bring forward Bill C-207 respecting the organization of the government of Canada.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, having heard the minister speak and having heard from gentlemen opposite, I am at a loss to understand whether this bill actually is a bill dealing with the reorganization of the government. Is it, as the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) seemed to indicate, a bill that will enable us to deal with our environment? According to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) and the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales), this bill will answer the purposes of backbenchers on this side of the House in that it will provide employment, at greater pay, for many of them.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member is hoping.

Mr. Otto: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants suggests that since many new positions will be made available under this bill, very few backbenchers will be left in the House. I want to assure him that he and I will always enjoy a position on the backbenches.

Mr. McCleave: Hear, hear.

Mr. Otto: He will remain there because he will be in opposition, and I will remain here because I have been on the backbenches for the last eight years. I see the minister laughing.

An hon. Member: The hon. member is a good Member of Parliament.

Mr. Otto: Thank you. I am considered a good member. I intend to deal with the bill. May I, first, say something about the academic discussion on the bill. We were privileged with a tutorial from the cardinal, His Eminence, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). I am sure he will not mind being called the Richelieu of Ottawa. After all, Cardinal Richelieu was one of the most famous administrators of all time, the mandarin of mandarins.

Mr. McCleave: But was he not connected with a religious order?

Mr. Otto: He was a professional administrator, and there is no doubt as to who was the power behind the throne in those days. Similarly, I have no doubt as to who is the power behind the throne in this country in these days. I, therefore, think it quite proper to refer to the President of the Treasury Board as "His Eminence".

Mr. McCleave: The minister is being blamed for much. I expect him to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Otto: I should like to take into account, for a moment, the historical background of Parliament. We are told almost daily that the Members of Parliament control the purse strings and the final disposition of money. I submit that that is an Alice in Wonderland type of proposition, because we all know that the amounts voted on the estimates are governed, to a great extent, by the needs of administrators who want the money. We see the estimates, but we provide no check. We obtain no information as to what this money is to be used for exactly, why it is needed and for what purpose.

An hon. Member: That is a secret.

Mr. Otto: That is how it is now. The President of the Treasury Board was quite right in saying that the reorganization of the government really affects the structure of the government and that it is within the competence of the government to carry this out. He spoke of the historical background. Previously it was the prerogative of the Crown, acting through the Privy Council, to bring about such changes. That tradition has gone. Now, the government must seek the approval of the House when it wishes to reorganize itself. Reorganization is really a government responsibility. The government is responsible for the conduct of its affairs. I am inclined to the belief, Mr. Speaker, that we may be reverting to the old system. I ask the minister to consider whether there is no possibility of our returning to the old methods of acting in Parliament. Under the reign of this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—and I use the word "reign" advisedly—perhaps we ought to consider whether we should not revert to ancient practices in which all members of the House, whether on the government side or the opposition, joined together in opposition to the ministry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Otto: Without any doubt in the world, I think the Prime Minister at present has the absolute mandate of the people. I am not saying this in any derogatory way; I am saying it out of admiration. I ask people whose noses are freezing outside the West Block in winter or who are roasting there in summer, "Why are you here?" They say that they want to see the Prime Minister. Recently the Prime Minister went to the Maritimes, one of our poorer areas, and then he went out west before the wheat had been sold. He came back a hero. Judging from that, I do not think there is any doubt that he will command the allegiance of the people of Canada for a long time to come. I, therefore, feel that Members of Parliament could well revert to the position that they enjoyed previously in history before the organization of parties.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, may I now speak to the bill itself. It is to set up ministers of state responsible for certain areas. I do not object to that. I see nothing objectionable in giving ministers responsibilities for certain areas. For example, there is no cabinet portfolio for the minister in charge of housing. Housing is not necessarily a municipal problem; it is a national problem also. I think there ought to be some cabinet position dealing with this matter. Housing must be made the responsibility of some department of government, otherwise some of us will say, "Housing is a municipal problem, and we therefore cannot deal with it. The subject will not fit into any pigeon hole in Ottawa." The result will be that we shall not be able to deal with housing in a responsible way.

Urban problems must also be dealt with. May I, in that connection, commend the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing for his recent innovation which resulted in officials of CMHC as well as other experts taking part in a sort of "think" week. Hon. members will recall, as was reported in the press a few days ago, that the minister, CMHC officials and other experts in the field of housing, took two or three days off from their regular duties to consider the very serious problems in the field of housing. The minister wanted advice. That was the first time the mandarins or administrators had actually invited opinions from other experts. I commend the minister for that. I ask him not to pay attention to sneaky remarks in the press which complained that the conference had cost $12,000, as though that was a fantastic amount. If the conference had cost ten times that sum it still would have been worth it.

I now intend to deal with one of the provisions of the bill found on page 5, that provision dealing with the National Research Council. I am glad that the President of the Treasury Board has remained in the House to hear our speeches. That, I think, is most responsible on his part. He knows well that I do not easily flatter ministers. Would the minister give some thought to renaming the National Research Council, mentioned under part III, and calling it the Research and Development Corporation? It should be a crown owned corporation for research and development. May I explain my reasons for my request. As the report of the Senate Committee on Science Policy indicates, scientific research in this country is broken into fragments. We have medical research, research for military purposes, research into aircraft, and so on. All in all, we spend about $4 billion on research in Canada.

The complaint in the Senate report is that this research is not applied research, but almost pure research which is applied to one small department. The research branch within the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will have absolutely no meaning unless it is co-ordinated with the Department of Finance, Department of External Affairs and other departments. Because our industry is not large enough to support private interest and development, a crown corporation will always be needed. This corporation should be responsible for all phases of research, scientific, market, inventory, sales, export, manufacturing and medical. Everything should be combined in one corporation.

I wish to give an example of what I am talking about. At the present time, the research corporation is being used almost exclusively for the military. It should have a much better and broader application within the government. At the moment, we are having a little more luck than we probably deserve with regard to exports. However, we have a problem with uranium. We are stockpiling it. The president of the uranium company is suing the Prime Minister on some issue. The world lacks uranium. Canada has very large quantities of uranium. What are we going to do with it? If we had a proper research and development corporation, people in that corporation would realize that many places in the world need electrical energy but do not have the necessary $180 million, $200 million or $300 million to build an atomic power plant. The need is for small package units that would produce electrical energy. These could be exported on a lease basis rather than selling them. These could be installed in Bolivia, Colombia, Argentina, Africa, the near East or anywhere else they are required. These countries could be charged on the basis of kilowatt usage. Imagine what would happen in these areas if they had power to start new industries and education. They do not have these primitive things which we take for granted. When speaking to the president of the Atomic Energy Commission, he informed me that such a plan had been investigated for many years. However, it would be rather expensive. He compared it to the cost of Canadian power which is generated from water. That is not the issue.

One segment of a research development corporation could research the demand for power throughout the world and what price countries would be willing to pay. Another segment could work with the Atomic Energy Commission to develop a small unit capable of producing 300 or a few thousand kilowatts. This could be installed in villages and towns without great expanses of hydro lines and cables. Canadian electrical engineers in the corporation could work on developing ways and means of packaging small units. Researchers in the Department of External Affairs could research conditions in countries willing to buy these units, as well as the agreements we would make with these countries. The financial research people could determine the length of time these units would be required and the profits that could be earned by our manufacturers. Another segment of researchers within this corporation could service these units.

It would be necessary to determine how much uranium we have in Canada. Also, how could we avoid having this uranium used for other than peaceful purposes? Market research could also be conducted by this corporation. When a report was issued by the corporation, all departments of government would have an accurate picture. This might help solve our problems with uranium, unemployment and rationalize our industry.

Canada almost has a world monopoly on uranium. We have productive facilities and good engineering techniques. No one will deny that we should be the most efficient nation in the world in producing electrical power plants. At present, we have people who are interested in this subject but they are enclosed within one small department, Atomic Energy Commission. Their message does not reach any other minister. Instead of an approach concept to research, we have tiny bits of research.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) informed me that his department has a very large research and development branch. I repeat, they only deal with a very small segment of the field. When introducing the previous bill in this House, the minister talked at some length about coloured shirts. Because we now have coloured shirts, he thought this would be the salvation of our textile industry. This is a little off the track and I ask Your Honour to bear with me. The minister thought because there are so many coloured shirts that Canadian manufacturers would exist in perpetuity.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That day you had on a white shirt.

Mr. Otto: I am glad the hon. member made that remark. The shirt I am wearing was a Christmas present from my mother-in-law. I need not say anything further about why I am wearing this shirt. The male animal is inclined to be a rather lazy creature. In the morning he has only seven minutes in which to get dressed. That is not much of a problem because he only has the choice of one suit and maybe two or three ties. The computations are only one in three. However, if he has to compile the proper tie with the proper shirt with the proper suit, he is faced with the computation of 27 choices. In a short time everyone will be back to the white shirt because it is a simple way of doing things.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is the reason I kept mine.

Mr. Otto: The minister is flying by the seat of his pants. His department and many others operate by intuition. Intuition is not enough. We need careful research.

Mr. McCleave: Or your mother-in-law.

Mr. Otto: I hope she does not read this Hansard. I have resisted the coloured shirts because there is only room for one peacock in a pen. I am not going to compete in this enclosure because we already have someone who is a very keen and avant garde dresser.

I hope I have explained what I hope will be called Part III of the bill. Instead of the research council, I hope the government will introduce a crown-owned research and development corporation. In the past I have tried to point out the need for such a corporation.

Recently I was approached by a fairly responsible electrical engineer. He pointed out that we have the St. Lawrence canal. We also have the problem of where to build atomic energy plants and what to do about the hot water that results from them. He suggested building a plant above each of the locks. In this way we would have a winter canal system which would be open all year. When I asked how this would affect the ecology, he said this would require more study but he felt it could be done. The St. Lawrence canal system cost us a fortune. It is only used six or seven months of the year. At present, who could investigate this plan? People within a research and development corporation could instigate research. These people would then inform manufacturers, private industry, even the government, what were the market prospects for South America. They would be able to tell manufacturers of, for example, luggage or stainless steelware that there was a solid market with a good efficiency rating. The same report could be presented to the Department of Finance, the Industrial Development Bank and so on. Exporters could be told that they could get financing from the Export Development Corporation. All this could be done as one packaged unit.

This is what is required, and in this regard the minister should heed very seriously the advice of the Senate Committee on Science Policy. Then, he could ascertain whether he does not agree with me that the real need is for an application of research. Before research is applied it must be assembled by such a corporation. That is all I have to say about this bill. I have not taken too much time, but even though I have been short and to the point, I hope the minister will understand that I am very serious in my suggestions. If the minister examines the problem I think he will find that a secretary of state in charge of such a corporation is what is required in Canada; and I do not think any member of the House would object to the appointment of a minister of such a department.

Mr. Jack Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, a lot of ground has already been covered, and I am not going to enlarge on the argument whether or not we should have an omnibus bill. However, I do want to agree with the necessity for reorganization in the interest of better government, though I do not necessarily think, from what I have read of this bill, that this is the proper way to bring it about.

What the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) has said, in essence, is that we are seeking to give Canadians the kind of government they want. This, of course, is the avowed wish of every member of this House. I make bold to say that what the people of Canada want today is a system of government that gives the people full employment, and I am still of the opinion that they want this under a free enterprise system. I do not think we should try to give the people of Canada more government in a quantitative sense, but rather that we should try to improve the quality of government.

This is why I do not agree that we need more ministers. What we need is better manipulation of the ministries we now have, and I do not think this is beyond accomplishment. I do not think ministers can give leadership in the departmental set-up we presently have unless the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does his share. Since my experience of being prime minister is not very great, of course, I cannot criticize the present Prime Minister on this score. Therefore, I will attack the problem from quite a different angle. I am going to suggest that the backbenchers on both sides of the House do not do their work properly. If they did, then I believe that the backbenchers of this House have the power, under your able leadership, Mr. Speaker, to discipline the treasury benches, and through them the Prime Minister himself.

In 1939 and 1940 we had an example of what happened when the back benchers of England, and through them the cabinet ministers, failed to discipline their prime minister. The excuse for this is always the same, of course—that since the prime minister has final say he must be given a great deal of leeway in choosing his cabinet, and so on. The Prime Minister must have the power of going to any corner of the realm to pick those men who can best serve their country. In the final analysis, his judgment is a human one.

In our parliamentary system we take from the ranks of the people certain men of various occupations and backgrounds to lead the country. But the process does not end there. It is only now, some 30 years after the event, that I have been given the answer, and perhaps fortuitously no later than this morning, as to why Mr. Neville Chamberlain, the then prime minister of England, was so incapable of leading that country. The answer is plain and simple: he lacked not only certain knowledge, but he absolutely refused to take advantage of the advice of those men who were close to him who did have the knowledge, the ability and the courage to lead Britain. One of these men, whom I need hardly mention, in parliament at that time was one Winston Churchill, who for most of his life was a backbencher. However, his contribution as a backbencher was so outstanding that when nobody else in England had the ability to get the country out of the hole it was in as a result of wishful thinking and high-sounding ideals but with complete disregard for human nature and the facts of history, they reached into the back benches to bring out Mr. Churchill over and over again.

At the height of his power, although he always made decisions himself—and strong they were—and although he gave leadership such as we have seldom seen in any democratic country, he remained open to persuasion by those around him. He very rarely, if ever, marched out into the forum of the world to make big decisions affecting not only his country but the future of mankind without at least having had full consultation.

That is a lesson not too far back in history which I think we would do well to remember today. As I have said, I am not going to presume to tell the Prime Minister how to do his job. But I do suggest that every backbencher of this House should do his job, namely, to see that the government and its policies fit the needs of the people. If they do not, then if necessary members should have the courage to regroup, not up-country preaching revolution and growing radishes but in their own caucus in Ottawa. If we cannot persuade those in authority in our own caucus, then we should find a caucus where we can. We have had one or two examples of great courage in this House, and I think the results have been, and will continue to be, very salutary.

It is not sufficient for ministers of the Crown to point to hon. members on this side, as they have done during the past year, and to say that they get no leadership from the opposition. Let me assure them that if they show us leadership and reorganize for better government, then they will get all the support they want, and perhaps a great deal more than they can sell to the treasury benches and to their own leader. I do not want to be negative and am not going to spend the few minutes at my disposal being negative. But I do want to remind the House that one or two other mistakes have been made that I think should not have been made. Let me tell these ministers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member, whose speech is very interesting—and I do not want to put him off stride—but it does seem to me that in the last few minutes he got rather carried away and forgot that he should address his remarks to the Chair.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Bigg: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did not intend to direct my remarks to the House in any other manner. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I beg the members of the government not to repeat what I think are errors in the approach to governing in general. This has been the cause of what might appear to be a lack of co-operation from this side of the House.

In the second paragraph of the press report of the speech of the President of the Treasury Board there is the suggestion that the best answer to this apparent riddle lies in a strengthening of the parliamentary institution. Parliament has only one big stick. Once people have made their choice of a political party—that is how we are elected and I do not quarrel with this at the present time—and once we have elected an executive, there is only one way that Parliament, including the backbenchers on both sides of the House, can control what may be a well-meaning executive which is getting out of line and does not have the confidence of this whole House.

The only control we have over such an executive is monetary control. If we are to preserve any parliamentary control whatsoever, we must maintain monetary control. If there is no control, we have no democracy and the whole riddle will be solved once and for all. If we are to maintain this system, as I am sure all of us want to do, we must stop what we have been doing openly. Had we lost this right of monetary control accidentally, we might be able to excuse ourselves. Six years ago we gave up our Easter recess in order to debate the dangers of allowing Vote 15, which I think we all remember, of becoming a means whereby the executive could sidestep Parliament and raise salaries. At page 10003 of Hansard for November 17, 1966, just four and a half years ago, I indulged myself in a little prophesying. Let me quote what I said then:

—I do not know why the vote could not be increased to $500 million next year in order to get around the power of Parliament.

Just two days ago I was looking over the votes to come before Parliament and I noticed that this same vote has, by devious means, reached the astounding sum of $250 million. In 1966 I might say quite frankly I was exaggerating in an attempt to create a dramatic effect, but we now see that this vote has reached the halfway mark of that figure which I mentioned. At that time, it was $15 million and it has now reached $250 million. To all intents and purposes, our control over Parliament and its daily proceedings has been very seriously weakened.

As hon. members know, we have changed the method by which estimates come before the House. It is very difficult now to debate the estimates of any department thoroughly because of the allotted time. The government is getting bigger every day. As I said a few minutes ago, it is not the size of the government which will help us out of our difficulties, but rather the quality. There is a danger in allowing an executive, liberally oriented, conservatively oriented or socialistically oriented, to have unlimited powers without control. The basic human desire for power and of an increase in power is irresistible. It is our job to reorganize government along better lines and to see that, instead of increasing the number of departments, we do everything we can to ensure that the departments we now have streamline their efforts from the top down. It is understood that the departments accept reasonable proposals from their ministers, but the ministers should keep their ears to the ground so far as their backbenchers are concerned.

Instead of setting up an even greater bureaucracy in every department with more and more experts knowing more and more about less and less, we should return to the good old, common sense days of Parliament. We have 265 men here who have been chosen at random but who represent the common sense and the good judgment of the average Canadian citizen. That is good enough for me.

I would go along with the presidential system if I thought anybody in Canada or anybody in the world, for that matter, had enough knowledge, integrity, application and the popularity to lead the Canadian people through thick and thin. History has shown that such a man has never been produced. In my opinion, the greatest leaders in history have been those who have been great enough to reduce their ultimate power by sharing it among men they recognized as being as dedicated, as knowledgeable and as loyal to their country and the free enterprise principles for which they stood. It is when such men are willing to share these powers, and when those of us who sit behind the chosen leaders have the courage to discipline them, that Parliament works best.

Monetary control is our only weapon. We must be able to refuse to pay these people who are not carrying out the will of the people. That is the only way Parliament can work. I will fight against this as long as I am here, and I will not preach to others that which I will not do myself. Any time my party seeks to subvert the will of the people by giving them things they do not want or by setting up power groups beyond the control of the people, I will seek a seat elsewhere in this House. I do not think it will be necessary to go back home to Alberta to preach revolution and grow radishes—and I have grown my share of radishes. I have seen the results of the preaching of revolution. I should like to see a little more evolution in respect of our affairs. Perhaps we should even take a step backward toward the days when we believed in the very institution to which we belong, and to which we have sworn to dedicate our time and loyalty.

In a little lighter vein, let me say I was interested in the dream expressed by the last speaker of keeping the St. Lawrence Seaway open. A dream is one thing, but practical operation is another. If the previous speaker had thought for a moment he might have recalled that rainfall in Canada is marginal and if it were not for the wisdom of the Almighty in freezing up our lakes and rivers in the winter time most of Canada would be a desert.

The idea of keeping our rivers and lakes open all year has to be thought out very carefully. At this time we require a great deal of research before interfering with the nature of our rivers and lakes, the ecology of our Arctic, the wild creatures, and even the future of our forests, grasses and other growth. There is a need for research. In Parliament, a multiplicity of ideas are expressed and I believe an alert executive could pick out the important things, be they dreams or solid, well thought out scientific advice. No one man has all the knowledge.

I realize, of course, that I have been somewhat negative and critical up to this point. However, when I rise to speak I usually try to offer something positive as well. If we accept the fact that these ministries are necessary—and I have no doubt we will have them—I should like to suggest how the extra amount of taxpayers' money which is to be spent in this regard might be used. There are two ministries which are long overdue. I suppose people are thinking that, first, I talk about cutting down and then talk about creating additional ministries. I say that if we are to have new ministries let us exercise some common sense in this regard. We need a ministry of youth. This is not a new idea. Ten years ago I spoke at length in this House about the need for a department or a minister of youth. I believe the ten years which have elapsed since then have proven the need.

Every department of government in Canada, to a certain extent, is involved with the problems of youth, some deeply and some not so deeply. There should be co-ordination of the work of these departments. I do not think the pied piper approach will work as well as the previous speaker suggested. I believe the young people of today, if the pending federal election is held off for another 18 months, will probably have the vote. Most of them will be unemployed unless we do something about that problem. I believe a ministry of youth could well make this its number one project. There is the danger, of course, that people who are not in favour of the idea of a department of youth will say I wish to establish a Hitler youth movement. Far be it from me; but it is essential that the interests of our young people be co-ordinated. A great percentage of the taxpayers' dollar is involved in their education. Their future in terms of job placement is very complicated at present. The trade training program of a previous administration was probably the best thing it did. It far exceeded in importance the bill in respect of the Great Slave Railway, the selling of wheat to Red China or any of the other short-term stop-gap things which are very necessary and important.

However, the welfare of our youth involves the welfare of our whole nation. The youth will not be satisfied with the dulcet tones of the pied piper's music any longer. They want something solid; they want assurance that they will have an opportunity to take their place in this new dynamic Canadian society. They want to help us beat the Japanese and the West Germans in the markets of the world. I hope they will never be called upon to fight in our armed forces, but they certainly will be called upon to serve in a Canada which is alert to its responsibilities in the world. In terms of economics, we are in the proud position today of having our balance of payments position good and our exports high. Yet, it is strange in this age of great and magnificent affluence for many of us—some people say for 90 per cent of us—that 10 per cent of our population, and most of them young people, should be neglected. This is not the fault of any one administration. My party formed the administration when I begged for action in this regard. I have begged for it ever since. Several provinces have taken up this challenge and their departments of youth are working very well.

The original dream in respect of the Company of Young Canadians was good. I believe we learned something from that. I do not think we should put off any longer the consolidation of our efforts on behalf of the young people merely because we made a mistake. Far from it; the mistakes in respect of the Company of Young Canadians should be merely sign posts along the road indicating where the soft ground is. But let us have leadership. Let us not place this responsibility on the shoulders of a junior member of the new administration. Such a person should not be a sub-cabinet man but rather the finest leader we have. If necessary this responsibility could be that of the Prime Minister himself. If he has the magic touch with the young people, why not put it into action; why not give our young people the leadership they are anxious to have. We do not want only the 13 year old girls with autograph books waiting for the next act of the Prime Minister. We want the college graduates, the young men and women who desire homes and solid jobs in Canada, clamouring on Parliament Hill.

I wish many of these young people would march here with banners calling for this type of action. This would be preferable to having them lead a revolution or a movement to upset the government. I submit that so far the government's best has not been good enough. A negative approach is not good enough. When there are not sufficient jobs to go around in Canada I do not think it is good enough to say, "let us just share the jobs we have". This attitude reminds me of a snake with its tail in its mouth. I am afraid that when we have had 10 more years of this there will not be a snake. I suggest we should have a plan for Canada which is big enough to include all of us. In a country the size of ours there should be a clamour for immigrants. The future in Canada should be such that a solution would be possible for even the problem the young people are worried about. They do not want to bring babies into this world because some of them say there is no future here. I would like to think that every family could have four children who would have a future and that no one would have to worry about abortion.

I would like to see the people in the position of having to worry about income tax and running away from Benson. I would like to see them in the position where they would have to worry about paying $4,000 or $5,000 income tax on an income of $15,000. That is the kind of worry they want. If this reorganization of government means that the cabinet ministers will be able to solve some of these problems, then I know there will be a good deal of co-operation from both sides of the House. If we find that members of all parties in this House are absolutely bankrupt of any ideas, or any loyalty to the people of Canada, then it will be obvious that we are already overpaid. I happen to think that a Member of Parliament who does his work is probably donating his time. It is not well-known that the average take home pay of a Member of Parliament is that of a public school teacher. Many people come here at a monetary disadvantage. They do not have their arms up to the elbows in the public treasury. Those people who speak out at this time will have very little chance of getting the double pay that is to be offered to these extra cabinet ministers.

I believe it is very dangerous to think that any government in Canada is in such an entrenched position that it does not have to worry about a turnover in the future. I do not think for a minute that government members should be worried about their own tenure of office; far from it, but it is discouraging to hear it said in this House "we are not worried about you". I do not expect them to be worried about me or my leadership or lack of leadership, but I do expect them to be worried about the fact that the people of Canada are looking for quality in government which they do not think they are getting at present.

Having been here 12 years, I know how difficult it is to gain a reputation for giving the kind of service which the public wants. But we have to go to work on it and we will have to have the co-operation of everyone. I do not think it is necessary to try to make something appear legal which, in fact, is not legal. I do not think it is necessary to try to fool anyone. I think much time may be gained by coming out in the open and explaining to us what the problem is. Let us take, for example, the problem that arose about hiring Francophone students. I for one was very disappointed that it became a cause célèbre. I feel certain that if we had known all the facts, which we did not know, this would have been unnecessary because there are equally generous offers for everyone in this country. These matters should have been discussed frankly in the House.

The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) who spoke before me referred to the dream he has. I will give you mine. I do not know how this dream could be brought about except through the agreement of all parties. I should like to see, as a result of government reorganization, some machinery established which would enable us to have an all party caucus which would meet once a month. Since we are all prima donnas, to a greater or lesser extent, I would want the press to be excluded from these meetings. Thus, we would have an opportunity once a month to appeal to members in all parties without our remarks getting into the press and without trying to influence the people back home. We could speak with as much confidence as one could expect in this bear pit about matters on which we will agree.

One such matter, for example, could be the full employment of our young people. We could discuss the problem and thus find ways of shortening the discussion in the House. We could discuss the expenditures necessary for training facilities and for leadership, for all the things that would be necessary to overcome not only the problem at present but as it might develop in the future in view of automation and outside competition in a highly industrialized and aggressive business world. For this we would need the co-operation of everyone. Is it too much to ask that we meet once a month, if necessary behind closed doors because we are not sufficiently mature to do it in the open, to discuss matters which would benefit the people of Canada as well as the rest of the world on which we do not really require any debate?

In this way, we could eliminate the bottleneck which we encounter here on all matters which do not require debate and which are very serious. It seems to me that we would then not have to wait for a place on the Order Paper. Once a month we could donate an hour or two of our time. This would not necessarily be compulsory but we could say "I was there and I told the government how far I was willing to go along the road of co-operation." This has not been done since the days of Burke and Pitt—more is the pity. In the last 200 years we have solved some of the problems which they faced in those days. In the days of Pitt and Burke—the great men of the English parliamentary system—there was child labour. Children, some of them with tuberculosis, were washing bottles 18 hours a day in garrets.

The problem we have now in Canada is sharing too much wealth. Some of us are so drunk with our own wealth that we are willing to sit back and say that we can stand 10 per cent unemployment. Perhaps I understand the situation because I lived for a good many years of my life among the 10 per cent who did not have too much. I did not have a two car garage. I lived in a world where one did not always have enough to feed the children and one had to have the scars of labour on one's hands. I think that the reason this institution is still working is that we can still stand up and debate here. I hope it is not too late to get through at least to the backbenchers in this House and to say that we all agree on certain matters. If we are going to use 35 ministers to do what 30 people are able to do, let us hope that the 35 will work more effectively than the government has done in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it would be assuming a lot to say that, should this bill be passed by the House, I might become the first Parliamentary Secretary of the new Department of Environment. Of course I would be honoured to assume that responsibility and to serve the government and the minister in that capacity.

I support readily Bill C-207 respecting the organization of the government of Canada and the setting up of a new department—some have called it a superdepartment—which will assume tremendous responsibilities with regard to the management and protection of our environment.

I endorse this bill because it has become necessary to place under one authority most of the responsabilities relating to environmental quality. It would be easy to believe that this new department has been made necessary because public opinion has been requesting it in recent years. Obviously, its establishment was suggested in the recommendation of various task forces, by several hon. members and even by editorialists.

However, let us not oversimplify like the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who said and I quote:

• (4:20 p.m.)

> The government knows that the public are distressed and alarmed about the pollution of our air, water and soil. It knows that the public are clamouring for action. So the government has decided that this is a popular issue and that it must do something to appease the public clamour. The government's solution is to appoint a minister to deal with this matter. But, Mr. Speaker, the mere establishment of a bureaucracy under one minister will not in itself cope with the problem of increasing pollution.

Mr. Speaker—as I said a few moments ago—this is political small talk. The government is obviously aware of the expectations of the public and knows it must take them into consideration in due course. Creation of the Department of Environment became necessary because of the need for the federal and provincial governments to control pollution through efforts which should logically result in setting up an organization responsible for a good number of the serious and widespread pollution problems that affect air, water, land, in a word, for everything that moves and blows.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of delivering a lecture on the quality of the environment. It is true that I would have a whole series of opinions to express and I know that all hon. members will not necessarily agree with me. We know by experience that their opinions vary easily. In any case, there will be other chances for me to speak on the subject of environment.

Today, I speak in support of this new government measure. In the past, I have had, in my capacity as a simple member, the opportunity of requesting a better governmental organization that would admit of more rigid control over the rational development of our natural resources and that would allow for the passing of more adequate conservation measures. And on this question, I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who has said so eloquently, and I quote:

> We all agree that the idea of having one minister responsible for pollution control and for the preservation of our environment is a good one. It is being suggested that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) will probably be appointed to that post. He is a man who has always been deeply concerned about pollution problems. He comes from a part of Canada where we have seen some of the devastating effects of pollution, in particular its effects on our fishing industry, and I think the choice of that minister to become head of a department of the environment is a good one.

Some will say this new department should have been established several years ago. Undeniably, the new name, Department of Environment, will focus attention particularly in the fight against pollution but it is wrong to claim that up to now the government was not concerned with the problem. In fact, excellent legislation has been introduced here, sponsored by other departments, since the early days of this Parliament,—and I give as an example, the Canada Water Act, which in the future will come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Environment. For a good number of years, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry had some prerogatives that enabled him to conduct the fight against water pollution in particular. It would be fair to say that water pollution has always been a major concern of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry.

Besides, the idea of setting up a Department of Environment is beginning to take form in several if not all provincial governments and specially in New Brunswick where they decided to follow the example set by the federal government. They cannot be blamed. On the contrary, they deserve encouragement.

Some will say that it was not necessary to reorganize certain elements of the administration. The answer to that is that times have changed and the government must necessarily adapt its structures to the priorities of the day. In fact, it has to act before a crisis develops and in the present situation, it must try to protect ecology.

I think that the new department will neither be too big nor too powerful, if the need for it is recognized from the start. This is too serious a time, Mr. Speaker, to linger on idle considerations.

I believe that all hon. members sincerely acknowledge the need for the new department responsible for the balanced management and control of our renewable ressources as well as the quality of the natural and human environment. Some will say we do not go far enough, others that we are too late, that we did not act quickly enough, etc. If those people are sincere, they will not hesitate to adopt the proposal presently under study. As a matter of fact, I invite them to bring forward some constructive criticism, and not some purely partisan considerations, in order to help the government carry out its mandate in an enlightened way.

I listened yesterday to all hon. members who spoke on this bill. I heard the hon. member for Kootenay-West (Mr. Harding) read some extracts from the 9th review of the Economic Council of Canada, advocating the establishment of an environment council. I am happy that he is considering this recommendation seriously.

A little over a week ago, the hon. member for Malpèque (Mr. MacLean) urged the government to establish a human environment council. Rising to speak on that occasion, I quoted several passages from the 9th review of the Economic Council.

There is no problem here. To my mind, all members as well as the government agree that it would be useful and appropriate to create such a council whose task would be to give advice and recommendations and perhaps suggest bold and positive policies. This environment council will probably be established eventually and I hope it will be soon.

The member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has expressed the fear that the fisheries service, and in the end all the services provided to fishermen until now, would be lost in this new Department of the Environment.

I can understand his point of view, but the minister has already given us assurance that it will not be so. The fisheries service will keep its identity; it will continue to give improved services and to suggest bolder policies in connection with all Canadian fisheries, whether they be Atlantic or Pacific coast fisheries, Arctic or soft water fisheries.

It would be wrong for any member to interpret the merger of the Department of Fisheries and the Department of the Environment as a death blow to fisheries or even as a lack of interest on the part of the government in one of the oldest and most respected occupations in North America.

I would even go as far as saying that any member who would so interpret the creation of the new department would be practicing partisan politics. This having been said, I admit that any member has a right to speak that way. To me, such a stand would denote that he has not understood the significant objectives proposed by the government in instituting the important Department of the Environment.

• (4:30 p.m.)

On reading the remarks of the hon. member for South Shore, I noticed certain parts which give me some concern as to his objectivity. I still respect the strength of his arguments, but I do not know what the hon. member meant yesterday. He wanted to act as the spokesman for his party, for the fishing industry, with regard to Bill C-207. I could not help noticing the confusion of his assertions.

On the one hand, he clearly admitted that he agreed in principle with certain parts of the bill, such as the Part I, dealing with the establishment of the department of the environment. He actually said, and I quote:

—I welcome the establishment of the department of the environment.

Then he stated, after having admitted that he had always considered the Department of Fisheries and Forestry as a full-time occupation, and I quote:

Now, if this is so, I can only conclude that the minister designate for this new conglomerate will be bogged and overburdened, so something is going to suffer.

Let us face the facts.

With a department of such magnitude, ministerial responsibility is no longer possible, because of the sheer amount of work.

It becomes impossible to look after all those matters, according to the honourable member. But what solution does he suggest to reduce the burden of the minister? He objects to the appointment of five Ministers of State. He stated:

This is a preposterous recommendation.

—a political piracy of the public purse by this Liberal government.

The minister will be too busy, but the honourable member does not want him to have a parliamentary secretary to help him.

I do not understand what the hon. member is driving at, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion, his story does not make sense. We might learn something more at the committee stage.

I also want to say that I did not intend to pick on the member for South Shore for whom I have much esteem as a fellow citizen of the Atlantic provinces. I merely quoted his words to show the confusion other members of his party share with him, because they approach the bill from a much too partisan viewpoint. Yet, they do not have the monopoly of truth.

Fortunately, the member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) who is carefully listening to me this afternoon and whom I also like very much, is a little more understanding. Therefore, there is a little hope for that side of the House.

We must be wise enough to change with public opinion, with the sometimes upsetting turn of events. We must not fear to help make history. To keep what is good, to preserve and to improve our environment or some parts of it, to wisely develop our resources, considering the quality of the environment, to seek man's happiness, to ensure our future and the future of generations to come, such is the difficult task of the new Department of the Environment.

I shall limit my remarks on that particular subject, Mr. Speaker. I might have more to say at the committee stage or at the third reading stage.

In conclusion, I would like to quote an excerpt from the Christian Science Monitor of December 11, 1970, a newspaper distributed free of charge to all members—in fact I do not know why—that contains many editorials on pollution, ecology and all that.

This newspaper tells us that the Americans are as much concerned with this matter as we are.

The article I mentioned is entitled:

[English]

"Silver lining seen in pollution cloud". The article, in part, reads as follows:

America's crackdown on pollution is proving to be a blessing in disguise for some businessmen. Widespread concern about environmental spoilage and destruction is inspiring invention and creating a wide new field of private enterprise as well as thousands of jobs and career opportunities.

So, instead of fighting the antipollution wave, often directed at industry, many smart industrialists are taking advantage of it.

How much and how fast this new business grows may depend on how tough cities, states, and the federal government are on environmental polluters and how much money the taxpayer is willing to spend to clean up the sky, earth, and water around him. Only a few firms will spend money for pollution abatement without being forced to.

A little further on, the article reads:

Much of the new environmental concern by industry is obviously the direct result of state and federal antipollution legislation. Local governments generally have been much slower to respond. —

Dr. Robert W. Cairns, vice-president for research for Hercules Corporation of Wilmington, Del., predicts that industry can solve this nation's pollution problems 'with proper environmental and economic incentives.' —

H. D. Doan, president of Dow Chemical Company, another industrial giant, recently spoke in a similar vein. He chastised industrialists for complaining about the financial burden of antipollution legislation and told them to turn the situation into business and profits by providing 'new ways of thinking and new technical answers.'

Industry, he said, can make money in the vast environmental cleanup.

I am not opposed to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Comeau: Would that not raise the cost to the consumer?

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: This, I submit, is a progressive—not conservative—attitude worth mentioning during the study of this bill.

It would be unfortunate if some politicians were to lead the public to believe that the responsibility for eliminating pollution rests entirely with the government. In this fight against environmental pollution, our primary objective is sound balance between those resources which could be exploited for the benefit of the Canadian people and mankind in general and preservation, conservation and restoration. There should be balance in the distribution of efforts in order to wipe out pollution, and these efforts should be exerted equally by the various levels of government and industry. The time has come for our businessmen and our industrialists to join forces and attune their efforts and expenditures to those of the governments.

Finally, I will say that young people who are still undecided as to their future career should give a thought to the wide field of activities related to this fight against pollution.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg) on several occasions during his speech apologized to this House for being somewhat negative. I intend to be somewhat negative, but I will not apologize. I think it is the duty of a Member of Parliament on some occasions to be negative. I consider this bill to be an outrage. It is undoubtedly one of the most misbegotten, if not the most misbegotten, pieces of legislation ever to appear before this House. Obviously, it is the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) bill. That would be obvious even if his name did not appear on the front page, because it demonstrates a total lack of understanding and an utter contempt for this institution.

Lest some think that I am about to launch into an "Oh, dear, things aren't what they used to be at the old school" speech about the hallowed traditions of parliament, let me disabuse them. I object to Parliament being treated with contempt. I object to its importance, its prestige and its role being downgraded; because only a healthy, vital and vigorous House of Commons can hope to exercise proper control over the immensely powerful men on the cabinet benches who direct and administer this country and, in so doing, exercise the vast and ever-increasing powers of its government. Moreover, and perhaps more importantly, only a healthy, influential and aware House of Commons is capable of injecting into a governmental system increasingly dominated by the bureaucracy the kind of responsiveness to the felt needs of the people that is necessary if complete alienation of the people from their government and the consequent anarchy, violence and repression are to be avoided.

As is so often the case with things the Prime Minister does, this bill is too clever by half. It demonstrates the danger in someone's adopting the advice of Machiavelli without understanding that Machiavelli was proferring his opinions to another sort of prince, one who governed in a land without law and without well founded institutions of government.

We are being asked, in considering this bill, to pass judgment on no less than nine different subject matters and at least five, perhaps more, matters of principle with a single vote. In summarizing them, I think I can do no better than to quote from the remarks made by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) as reported on page 2760 of Hansard:

• (4:40 p.m.)

> —there are these separate provisions in Bill C-207. The first part, clauses 2 to 7, creates a Department of the Environment. The second part, clauses 8 to 11, amends two acts: the Government Organization Act of 1966, and the Resources and Technical Surveys Act. The third part, clause 12, amends the National Research Council Act. The fourth part, clauses 13 to 24, creates ministries and ministers of state. The fifth part of the bill, clause 25, amends the Parliamentary Secretaries Act, otherwise known as "answering the prayers of the hungry". The sixth part, clause 26, amends the Post Office Act. The seventh part, clause 27, amends the Public Service Superannuation Act. The eighth part, clause 28, amends the Salaries Act. Finally, part nine, clauses 29 to 34, contains general and transitional provisions, and these may be apportioned variously among the other parts.

[Mr. Corbin.]

He went on to say:

> To recapitulate in a slightly different way, we are being asked to create a new department; we are being asked to vary administrative duties of some existing departments; we are being asked to create ministers of the Crown who will formulate and develop government policy and, as well as providing for these salaried ministers, we are being asked to provide for additional salaried Parliamentary Secretaries. Distinct from those matters, we are also asked to vote yea or nay, without hearing witnesses, on behalf of those affected on the question of the retirement rights and obligations of public servants.

In attempting to justify the inclusion of such wildly differing subjects within a single bill, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McEachen) offered us this gem, and I quote from page 2762 of Hansard:

> "—the overall theme or overall principle of the bill is the improved organization of the government and that of each of these so-called propositions is directed to that policy objective—"

One can immediately recognize that argument for what it is, sophistry, and mediocre sophistry to boot. The Prime Minister in preparing this legislation, knowing himself to be extremely clever and, speaking ex cathedra, having declared the rest of us to be nobodies, decided to pack so much material into this bill that there would not be an opposition member or a government backbencher who could not find within it an opportunity to ride his own particular hobby horse. Thus, he anticipated each of us would enthusiastically ride off in a different direction, leaving him free to do as he pleased.

Moreover, by including a motherhood provision in the form of a department of the environment, he felt he had ensured a favourable vote for the bill. This is the same practice so often employed by American congressional committees, a legislative technique universally deplored. Well, I am not going to play his silly little game. Apart from everything else, this bill is aggravating because it graphically illustrates the ignorance, incompetence and inefficiency of the government. By placing each of these several measures in a single bill, they have virtually guaranteed that more time will be taken to enact them into law than if each had to be introduced separately, as should have been the case. I say this because it is a lead-pipe cinch that most members who speak on the bill will give vent to their entirely justified anger at the form of the bill, as well as debating the substance of the various subject matters. It would be hard to discover in the history of this country another government which has so effectively and consistently botched the presentation and execution of ideas, even good ideas, as has this government.

As annoying as it might be to be subjected in this fashion to the inefficiencies which result from having to follow the whims of a rank amateur in terms of the managing of this House—I am not speaking of the President of the Privy Council—it is downright enraging to hear the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) argue that the provisions of the bill will strengthen our democracy when the bill itself, and many of the omnibus bills which have preceded it as well as those which will undoubtedly succeed it, tend to weaken our central democratic institution, Parliament. Whether this is an acceptable form of legislation is one of the matters of principle that our vote on second reading will help to decide. I suggest it is not.

Stephen Leacock once described Parliament as:

> —a place where men come together merely to hear the latest legislation and indulge in cheers sighs, groans, votes and other expressions of vitality.

Parliament may often resemble that description, but in spite of all it does serve the useful function of helping to focus public attention upon matters of concern and to define and delineate the considerations involved. In so doing, Parliament aids the public in coming to intelligent conclusions about the actions of government and helps individual members of the public to decide their own position on questions of importance. This whole process, so key to the effective functioning of a democratic state, is injured and perhaps even dies when the issues before Parliament become unfocused and blurred about the edges, when the manner in which they are presented lacks clarity and precision. Nothing could obscure issues better than does this bill and yet the government would have us believe that some of its provisions will strengthen our democracy.

Bernard Crick in his book, "The Reform of Parliament" had this to say:

> The only meanings of parliamentary control worth considering, and worth the House spending much of its time on are those which do not threaten the parliamentary defeat of a government, but which help to keep it responsive to the underlying currents and the more important drifts of public opinion. All others are purely antiquarian shufflings. It is wholly legitimate for any modern government to do what it needs to guard against parliamentary defeat; but it is not legitimate for it to hinder parliament, particularly the opposition, from reaching the public ears effectively as it can. Governments must govern in the expectation that they can serve out their statutory period of office, that they can plan—if they choose—at least that far ahead, but that everything they do may be exposed to the light of day and that everything they say may be challenged in circumstances designed to make criticism as authorative, informed and as public as possible.

I, in principle, accept that statement, although I would reserve the right to modify it in detail. The corollary of such a statement is that votes in the House are no longer the important control over the actions of the executive. Rather, appeals by the opposition to the electorate are the important control. The only real sanction, the only real stricture on government action now, is the prospect of defeat in the next election.

With a majority government and the well-established pattern of voting solidly by party, the votes in Parliament are virtually meaningless and are useless as a means of effecting parliamentary control. What is important in the functioning of Parliament is the opportunity for discussion. What is important in the functioning of Parliament is the quality of the discussion conducted. What is important in the functioning of Parliament is that discussion be focused. How in heavens name can discussion be focused when a bill includes at least five different matters of principle? How are the gentlemen in the press gallery going to impose an order and a theme upon a debate which will bounce from pollution, to ministers' salaries, to pensions, to jobs for the boys, to the post office and back again? And how, as a consequence, is the public supposed to form any opinion except that this place is a hopeless mess?

I have already described the dangers attendant upon Parliament becoming a less effective mechanism of control over the executive, and a less sensitive instrument for transmitting to and impressing upon the executive the needs and aspirations of the people of Canada. The increasing use of the omnibus bill as a means of presenting government legislation is but another in a long series of steps taken by the Prime Minister to make Parliament as irrelevant in fact as it always has been in his fancy. Every measure which this government has taken in the name of Parliamentary reform or government reorganization, including this bill, has had the effect of making Parliament increasingly irrelevant and powerless and of expanding the power of the cabinet, more especially the Prime Minister.

I suppose one could argue two exceptions to this general rule, the first being the government's endorsation of the new committee system, the second being the provision of research assistance to opposition parties. I do not intend to launch into an analysis of each, but in reality they represent the Prime Minister, the illusionist, at his best—or worst. Its the old shell game. Research assistance was given to the opposition parties and now to government backbenchers, but not enough to make a profound difference in the effectiveness of the House, simply enough to make it appear that something had happened. In the case of committees, they were denied the staff and the powers which would have made them truly effective and immediately the government began pointedly to ignore their existence. As an illustration, I need only refer to the fact that a decision was taken by the government on its role in NATO at the same time as a parliamentary committee was sitting to determine its position on that very matter, or to the fact that the government decided to cancel the Prince Edward Island Causeway project before a standing committee of the House examining that question, among others, had had the opportunity to conclude its deliberations. There are a multitude of other examples.

I want to look briefly at some of the other developments which have contributed to the aggrandizement of the cabinet, especially the Prime Minister, at the expense of parliament. I do this at the invitation of the President of the Treasury Board who has indicated to the House that one of the purposes of this bill is to give us an opportunity to discuss the development of the ministry and its future.

One of the first things the Prime Minister did on entering the House was to establish a roster or system of rotation for the appearance of ministers during the question period. This measure was taken by the Prime Minister without any prior consultation with opposition parties, even though a committee to study procedure was at that time being established. The delays and buck-passing made possible by the roster system have down-graded the importance of the question period, made the atmosphere in the House a lot less electric, and given ministers more time to prepare a mass of verbiage with which to bury their mistakes. A highly desirable thorn in the government's side has been blunted.

Mr. Francis: Remember the new procedure we have.

Mr. Rowland: I will come to that in a moment. Next was the establishment of the Prime Minister's regional desks. On the surface, the regional desks would seem to be the Prime Minister's attempt to honour his pledge to bring the government closer to the people. The regional desks will act as the eyes and ears of the Prime Minister in every corner of this country. They will act as funnels of information from the people to the Prime Minister. If a person has a problem he can now easily bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister, or rather to a member of the Prime Minister's personal staff. In this sense, the government will be brought closer to the people.

But what are some of the other results? First, it will mean the by-passing of Members of Parliament. If you can go directly to number one, or be persuaded that you are going directly to number one, why bother with number 264, or even number two? In short, the regional desks will rapidly create a situation in which the executive is expected to act as a check upon itself. The Prime Minister, through his regional desks, will be omniscient and omnipresent. Ultimately, and in a political sense, he will also be omnipotent.

Then came rule 16A, which substituted for freely negotiated agreements on the allocation of time in the House the absolute authority of the government House leader, even if he was opposed three to one, or even if he met by himself, to set down any arrangement for the allocation of time for the consideration and disposition of any item or items of the business of the House or its committees. The opposition succeeded in defeating this attempt to create a gag for the House, but another rule only slightly better, the son of 16A, is now part of the Standing Orders of this House.

Then, there are the countless executive task forces and commissioned studies which have been established and announced to the public with great fanfares of publicity since this government took office. However, there has been only one Commons committee of inquiry. The executive task forces report to the cabinet, even to the Prime Minister, directly. The cabinet decides whether the findings should be made public, and the reports are declared privileged documents. This has resulted in an increase in the information gap between ministers and other members. It has also resulted in the glamour and publicity surrounding the cabinet, while the House has been pushed back into the shadows. I could go on and cite other examples but I believe I have made my point. In any event, I can make the same point again by referring to the section of this bill which deals with ministers of state.

In introducing the bill, the President of the Treasury Board offered the following justification for it. As reported at page 2769 of Hansard, he said:

> In essence, the government organization bill deals with the constant challenge facing Parliament and the government to be as efficient as possible in doing those things which are in the interest of the Canadian people and society. This challenge is imposed upon us by the rapid changes taking place today, and our response in this regard must be positive. Both Parliament and the government must be flexible; both must adapt their procedures and structures; and in the final analysis, the test is whether they are continuing to respond effectively to the needs of society and of the world with which they must deal.

In short, the argument is one of efficiency. One simply cannot quarrel with the objective of enabling the government to readily adapt itself to changing situations. But the means selected to accomplish this are something else. Two kinds of efficiency are involved: efficiency in terms of rapid policy development by the administration, and efficiency in terms of the adaptation and strengthening of our democratic institutions. I submit that the ministers of state proposition contained in this bill indicates the government has opted entirely for the former at the expense of the latter.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There would have to be unanimous consent to call it five o'clock. Is it agreed that the Chair call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave)—Trade—Steps to limit imports of Australian and New Zealand beef; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter)—Industry—Construction—suggested removal of sales tax on building materials; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Government Property—Vancouver—suggested refusal of lease to Four Seasons Hotel.

It being 5 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely Notices of Motions (Papers).

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on one previous occasion the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) brought before the House one of several Notices of Motions for the production of documents standing in her name. At that time it was agreed that she would select one of them and the others, all in the same category and dealing with the same subject matter, would go off the Order Paper.

Pursuant to this agreement, one of the hon. member's motions is coming before the House again, and it is agreed that the same procedure should be followed. The House will therefore proceed to the consideration of Notice of Motion No. 130, standing in the name of the hon. member, and all other Notices of Motions for the production of papers standing in her name that precede this motion on the Order Paper will be removed. I think the hon. member will confirm that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the Parliamentary Secretary. Is it agreed that an order be made in the terms he has outlined?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR COPY OF STUDY OF FAMILY PLANNING IN VANCOUVER

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study undertaken by the University of British Columbia in the fiscal year 1969-70 funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare on "Social and Medical Factors of Women Attending Vancouver Family Planning Clinic and a Group of Women not Attending a Family Planning Clinic in two areas of the City of Vancouver".

She said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I wish to discuss today requests a copy of the study undertaken in the fiscal year 1969-70 which was funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare and has to do with the social and medical factors of women attending Vancouver Family Planning Clinic and a group of women not attending a family planning clinic in two areas of the City of Vancouver. This study would be of great interest to me if I could obtain a copy of it, because what we are trying to do not only in Vancouver but across Canada is to emphasize the need for widespread birth control information and the establishment of family planning and birth control clinics. It is of great significance and importance that studies of this kind be made available not only to members of Parliament but to the public generally.

It would appear from the title of this study that we have two groups of women in comparable economic situations, one of which attended a family planning clinic while the other did not. Apparently we also have a comparison of the results of these two situations. I do not know what is in the report and there is no way of which I know, of getting the information to the people who would be concerned and interested in having it.

I find it astonishing that such information should be withheld from the members of this House. There are obviously no security reasons involved and no reasons for secrecy. The taxpayers provided the money to have this study conducted. On another occasion in this House, I pointed out the testimony of one research individual who has done studies for the department and who feels that nothing but public good could be served by having these studies made available to people in this House and others who require them. I think a refusal of this kind is beyond understanding and I want to protest once again that this should be the case. Let me also say that even though I have dropped the other resolutions on this subject from the Order Paper, because I did not want to monopolize the time of this House, there will be others to replace them on the Order Paper under my sponsorship or the sponsorship of other people, at least until we succeed in having this unreasonable regulation removed.

I can understand that if there were questions of security involved in this sort of thing secrecy might be necessary, but for the life of me I cannot see that this government is doing any service by withholding very essential facts from the people of this country. From the little bit of knowledge we have been able to glean, some of it out of date, we know how important this subject is.

For example, back in 1960 the United Community Service of Vancouver, which is a big united welfare organization, did a survey on multi-problem families, that is families with children on the records of social and health agencies in the city of Vancouver. That organization found that in the course of one year there were between 2,100 and 2,800 such families with two or more of the following problems: economic, behavioural, health, child neglect and juvenile delinquency. The organization found that half of these families experienced three or more of these problems. I point out that this survey was done in 1960 and that undoubtedly the proportion would be very much greater under today's conditions.

We must remember that these are conditions which are of very great concern not only to people interested in the quality of family life and situations these families face, but also to the taxpayers who have to foot the bills in respect of economic, behavioural, child neglect, juvenile delinquency and a host of other problems facing us in any of our big cities. Among the characteristics of these multi-problem families on the records of the social and health agencies which this survey mentions is that these families have a large number of children. In fact, the families produced not less than five children on the average, which is much higher than the Canadian average of something over three.

The survey also pointed out that in a large number of these families the parents had contacts with social agencies long before the formation of these families and that their children were turning much earlier toward health and social agencies for help. The survey also found inbreeding in these families. One classic example was a man who had 230 relatives by blood or marriage known to a social agency. That might be a bonanza for the civil or public service, but it certainly was not a bonanza for the city of Vancouver when it came to looking after these relatives with all their costly problems.

There is a great need for birth control in families of this kind. The survey states:

In light of the above facts, it would appear well worthwhile making every effort to bring family planning services to those families, as all the evidence suggests that few dependent families really want to have large numbers of children. They may get them because they are too ignorant, apathetic or feckless to use effective birth control methods.

It goes on to say:

> Very few of this type of family use the services of the family planning clinics—only 24 persons on social assistance visited the clinics last year, [that would be 1959] and while some, no doubt, seek their doctor's advice, the birth rate suggests that many do not.

This survey was conducted in 1960, but even in 1970 and now in 1971 there are only three large hospitals in Canada out of some 900-odd which have family planning clinics attached. One can realize the tremendous need. The survey goes on to state:

> That this type of family can be successfully encouraged to plan their families has been shown in England, where a domiciliary family planning service in one instance reduced the birth rate of the families serviced over a period of two years from 7.8 to 6.3. This service is now being provided by an increasing number of English municipal health authorities through the agency of the Family Planning Association.

If we could get adequate family planning information in Canada, and I am talking specifically about British Columbia which is by no means the worst, but does require it, distributed throughout this country, along with accessibility to birth control devices we could reduce the average number of children per family. This would have a number of important results. It would reduce the burden of many families and enable them to achieve economic independence. The other day I heard a woman from Toronto say very pathetically, when discussing the problem of poverty: I have eight children and my husband is able to get work for only four months in the year. What am I supposed to do to make ends meet even on city welfare?

The very considerable cost to the state of supporting these additional children would be eliminated if we could get a reduction in the number of children. The survey suggests that:

> Even a reduction in the average number of children per family of from, say, five to three children would mean close to 5,000 fewer children to be supported.

This would mean close to 5,000 fewer children being a worry and a burden to families which cannot support them, even though they worry the same as families in income groups which are able to support that many children.

The survey then states:

> Fewer unwanted babies would also mean fewer children in the courts or in custodial care.
>
> The remaining children would be better cared for by a less burdened mother.
>
> The continuing cycle of dependency would be reduced to smaller proportions.
> While environmental factors will play their part, it is reasonable to assume that defects of character, physique or intelligence were responsible for a good proportion of these families falling into the multi-problem category.

• (5:10 p.m.)

> In terms of the future, breeding from the bottom does not make too much sense.

The people in this category know that and they are asking for help and advice in the matter of birth control. They are not getting it in anything like the amount we should be providing. I want to say I believe birth control is of the utmost importance. The Family Planning Association of British Columbia in its recent leaflet states:

> Babies born out of wedlock during the 1960's in this province increased from 7 to more than 12 per cent of total annual births. The largest group was born to mothers aged 15-19.
> Many of these children are not adopted because the number of adoption homes is dwindling. Some concerned couples are trying to help by having one or two of their own, and if they want more, adopting the rest.
>
> But there are always the left-overs.

Indeed, there are always the left-overs.

I should like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the words of Dr. O. M. Solandt, Chairman of the Science Council of Canada who, I am very glad to see, has recently solved a serious conflict of interest problem which concerned him and a number of others. Dr. Solandt, whose remarks on this subject of population control are always very wise, recently said this:

> Trying to clean up pollution and solve our urban problems without controlling population growth is like treating a patient's fever with ice packs and aspirin without giving him the antibiotic that will directly attack the cause of the fever. Temporary efforts, just like ice packs, are essential, but we must attack the cause of the disease, not just the symptoms.

Too many people are congregated together in our urban areas trying to avail themselves of the services of their community and the funds which should not have to be handed out in such amounts in order to look after dependent people and their children. I would call attention to the fact that the recent report on the status of women has urged very strongly that birth control facts and devices should be available to all who need them across this country, including those at the school level. I read a report a moment ago to the effect that in British Columbia the largest group of babies born out of wedlock involved mothers aged 15 to 19. If this matter of family planning is directed only at married women, then it will be everlastingly too late to deal with this particular problem.

I should like to turn to another reason for action. There is great concern across this country about the rising incidence of abortion, both legal and illegal. The rising incidence of illegal abortions is well known and has been well documented on a number of occasions. But there are also far more legal abortions in some districts than should be necessary. One reason for the great number of legal abortions, where there is some opportunity for legal abortions and where they are really being carried out, is that people simply do not know the facts concerning the prevention of unwanted pregnancy.

Birth control ought to be the first line of defence against unwanted pregnancy. If we in this House do not succeed in moving this government toward having a wider program on birth control, and having more clinics available, then we fall down in our duty to cut down the incidence of unnecessary abortions. Of course, I am in favour of legalized abortion because at this time unless women can obtain abortions safely when required they will go to places where abortion is legalized. This involves a horrible discrimination against women who are poor and do not have the means to obtain a legalized abortion. I say to many hon. gentlemen in this House on the benches opposite, who very comfortably consider this problem to be something which does not come too close to them, that they are actually prolonging the agony of women who must have abortions either because the birth control device has failed or because of their ignorance or because of other factors. Many of these women cannot obtain legal abortions.

I see one of my colleagues from Vancouver shaking his head. I do not know whether he is doing so in disagreement or because he abhors the situation. If it is because of disagreement, I would point out to him that the hospitals in Vancouver which do perform abortions and which are trying their best to meet the need do not have the facilities to do it. Pregnancy will not wait. As time goes on one reaches the horror stages. Organizations have travelled around showing pictures of the awful stages which abortion should never reach because it should have been carried out much earlier. I, too, have seen an abortion. I saw it with my own eyes. I should like to see all these horror pictures documented. However, I am not here to discuss abortion, except to say that the reason we now have far more illegal abortions than we should have, and more legal abortions than we need, is simply that we do not make available birth control techniques and devices as freely as we should.

Hon. members may think this is not true, but I should like to point out that 74 per cent of the women who wished to have abortions, and who went to the Planned Parenthood organization in July, had not used any form of contraception. A great percentage of them did not know where to obtain contraceptives or what type to use.

I should like to draw my remarks to a close by returning to my original theme. I believe members of this House are sufficiently grownup to know that we ought to be trusted with the reports the government has. What is the government doing with all these reports? If these reports resulted in legislation and action in respect of family planning, then I might have some sympathy with the practice of secrecy in this regard. I believe these reports need ventilation, lots of fresh air and sunshine. I urge that members of this House who are interested in these reports be given access to them so that we can give the public of this country the knowledge and information they must have if they are to co-operate in this participatory democracy which I want to see become much more real than anything we have at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) for her contribution to our previous debates on family planning or abortion.

I wish to thank her also for her co-operation in bringing the number of motions on these problems down to a minimum so that her colleagues would have an opportunity to express their opinions in the House.

I know that family planning and abortion are of great interest to her, as I say, but since other members from her party have already expressed opinions on this matter, I would not want family planning and abortion to be considered as a cure-all as readily accessible as contraceptive pill vending machines. I hope we will not come to that because it would be going too far.

If we were to pursue the question of abortion to the point advocated by some members of the New Democratic party, I believe we would be going back to Hitler's time, to eugenics. As a matter of fact, abortion could be practised on request, when the least doubt would exist as to a possible disability of the new-born child. It is going a little too far. I know that the problem at the present time is an emotional one. It requires serious discussion.

But we should not let ourselves be carried away by emotion and create a problem without solution. Abuse must be prevented and it is by adopting fair and reasonable legislation, as we did by amending our Criminal Code, precisely on this important issue of abortion, that we will be able to determine whether we were right or not. I think we will be able eventually to say to the next generation that perhaps we were right to prevent abuse and from the outset to refuse to allow abortion on request and thus step into the unknown as did Russia and other countries which have had to repeal their legislation to protect their people, since we must be quite careful not to become the tools of our own destruction.

It is always nice to find that intelligent people can sit around the same table and discuss a most important question.

• (5:20 p.m.)

[English]

My intention this evening is to review certain aspects of family planning, a concept which, as you are aware, is receiving the support of this government, not only in Canada but also through the Canadian International Development Agency in the emerging nations of the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, even in the most privileged countries, the quality of life is now being threatened by a population explosion that was particularly marked these last years. Among the various means suggested to check such a population explosion, the best known is the birth control pill which was approved by physicians and welcomed by the general public.

[English]

Introduced some ten years ago, these drugs have held out hope to nations struggling under population pressure and to individuals attempting to plan a family.

To the physician, oral contraception not only presents the accustomed challenge of weighing the benefits of a medication against its possible harmful effects, it also introduces a novel and important relationship between himself and his patient. Hitherto it has been implicit that the patient accept the experience and judgment of the doctor. However, in prescribing these drugs, the doctor is usually acting neither to treat nor to prevent a disease. He is prescribing for socio-economic reasons. This situation demands that the patient be fully informed and participate in the decision of whether or not she should use an oral contraceptive. The corollary of this, of course, must be that the physician keep abreast of all implications of the use of the pill and, in cases of doubt, refer the patient for another opinion.

The introduction of oral contraceptives has, unfortunately, brought some problems. As early as 1961, the incidence of certain complications associated with the pill were identified. In the ensuing years, extensive studies have been carried out in Canada and abroad to establish the relationship between oral contraceptives and these various effects.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare's (Mr. Munro) concern for the safety of Canadians taking the pill resulted in his appointment of a special advisory committee of leading medical authorities to assess the physical and mental wellbeing of women practicing family planning in this manner.

The report of the special advisory committee was tabled in December in this House. The committee, chaired by Dr. R. A. Kinch, who is obstetrician and gynecologist in chief at the Montreal general hospital and one of Canada's leading authorities in the field, provides answers to such basic questions as, first, what, if any, are the risks of oral contraceptive therapy, short or long term, inducing serious conditions or altered physiological processes. Second, how do these risks compare with similar serious conditions in healthy non-pregnant women of child bearing age. Third, how do these risks from the use of the pill compare with those of the pregnancies which had been thereby prevented. Fourth, how do the risks of the pill compare with other hazards of modern life. Fifth, what practical clinical measures may be taken to reduce risks. Should the Food and Drug Directorate further regulate the sale or distribution of hormonal contraceptives? Sixth, should the Food and Drug Directorate, based on the advice of its consultants, take the responsibility for informing physicians and the general public on all aspects of the use of hormonal contraceptives.

Of the 28 recommendations resulting from the excellent report prepared by the committee, three relate to general matters, and 13 concern pre-market testing, post-marketing surveillance, pharmaceutical advertising, and information to the professions and the public. Twelve recommendations deal with studies in epidemiologic, haematologic and endocrine fields.

While the report stressed that the risk of coronary thrombosis from using oral contraceptives containing 50 micrograms of estrogen is not of sufficient significance to demand special precautions, the special advisory committee pointed out that women using the pill should be reminded of the need for continuing medical supervision and be alerted to signs of potential trouble so that specialist consultation may be obtained where appropriate.

The committee found that the combined type of oral contraceptive is virtually 100 per cent effective in preventing unwanted pregnancy, while effectiveness of the sequential type is slightly lower.

The report reviews in considerable detail the present state of medical knowledge of the mode of action and the short and long term effects of these drugs, and contains a number of valuable recommendations about the direction of future research in this field. It also makes recommendations about providing information on the use of the drugs to the medical profession and to the public and advice to the Food and Drug Directorate about testing the products before they are marketed.

Other major points made by the committee were that there is no evidence so far of any incidence of premalignant change in the uterine cervix directly attributable to birth control pills. No significant increase in the incidence of breast cancer has yet been detected, although for 25 years or more concern has been voiced that the clinical use of estrogen may induce the disease in women. Concern has naturally heightened since the introduction of oral contraceptives. The committee concludes there is no firm evidence to suggest any relationship between genital and breast carcinoma and oral contraceptives.

Much of the committee's discussion and study centred on the real and potential hazards of oral contraceptives. A relationship between thromboembolic disorders and the use of oral contraceptives has been established, with evidence suggesting the level of estrogen in combinations as a possible major factor in determining the risk of thromboembolism. The committee recommended further investigation of the relationship and that, whenever possible, physicians should be advised to prescribe a preparation containing not more than 50 micrograms of ethinyl estradoil or mestranol.

Oral contraceptives present the doctor and patient with a novel and important relationship. Hitherto it has been implicit that the patient accepts the judgment, expertise and experience of her doctor. However, the fact that these potent drugs are now prescribed for predominantly healthy women demands that the patient should be informed and participate in the decision as to whether or not she should use them. If she does decide to use oral contraceptives she should be reminded of the need for continuing medical supervision and be alerted to signs of potential trouble, with appropriate specialist consultation where indicated.

The combined type of oral contraceptives is virtually 100 per cent effective in preventing unwanted pregnancy, 0.1 per 100 women per year, while effectiveness of the "sequential" type is slightly lower, 0.5 per 100 women per year. The progestational potency of these drugs depends on the type and dosage of progestogen employed, as well as on the dosage and anti-progestational effect of the estrogen combined with the progestogen. However, in spite of the individual variations in potency of their components, the efficacy of oral contraceptive preparations marketed in Canada appears to be related to the group in which they belong, that is, combined or sequential.

Oral contraceptives act primarily by suppressing ovulation. The present theory is that the action of the combined preparation is mainly through its progestogen component, abolishing the LH peak by inhibition of the release mechanism at the hypothalamic level, as well as suppressing the usual feedback stimulus to LH release by estradoil secreted from the developing follicle. The estrogen component may reinforce ovulation suppression, inhibiting follicle ripening by suppression of FSH secretion. The theoretical mechanism of action of the sequential compounds is that the estrogen produces only the second of the above effects. This hormonal checkmate leaves the ovary in a quiescent state and causes reduction in both its activity and size. Other effects of steroidal contraceptives on cervical mucus and sperm activity have been described, but these drugs act mainly on ovulation. Perhaps the most important aspect of the committee's discussion centred on the real and potential hazards of these preparations, recognizing the fact that they are used by a very large number of Canadian women.

A number of studies have established an etiologic relation between thromboembolic disorders and the use of oral contraceptives. Additional evidence now suggests that the level of estrogen in these combinations may be a major factor determining the risk of thromboembolism in patients using them. However, additional time and investigation will be required to resolve completely the question of dose relationship and thromboembolic complications. In spite of possible deficiencies in the existing data, the committee felt that the basic principle in therapeutics embraces the concept that the smallest dose of medication consistent with achievement of the desired effect is, in general, the best treatment. In this instance the lowest dosage of the estrogens—mestranol and ethinyl estradoil—presently available in oral contraceptives compatible with virtually 100 per cent effective contraception is 50 micrograms. Thus, whenever possible physicians should be advised to prescribe a preparation containing not more than 50 micrograms of ethinyl estradoil or mestranol.

With respect to carcinogenesis, it has been shown that estrogens and progestogens are capable of producing or enhancing neoplastic changes in the endometrium cervix, ovary and breast in experimental animals. However, in some instances both estrogen and progestogen appear to be protective against neoplastic change. These results are not directly applicable to the human because of dosage differences, methods and length of administration, differences in species tissue reaction and a large number of other variables.

In the human there is no significant clinical study supporting the proposition that carcinoma in these or other sites is caused by the administration of synthetic estrogens or progestogens. Although a few cases of endometrial carcinoma have been reported after prolonged estrogen therapy in older women, there is no proof that this represents a cause-effect relationship considering the millions who have been treated with estrogens for menopausal symptoms. Progestogens appear to have caused regression of endometrial carcinoma and combined or sequential type oral contraceptives theoretically should not, and in practice have not been shown to cause endometrial malignancy in the human. There is no evidence to date of any increased incidence of premalignant or malignant change in the uterine cervix directly attributable to birth control pills.

With regard to the breast, there are no studies of sufficient duration to embrace the long latent period for cancer production but it is possible that prolonged steroid—estrogen—administration may imply some risk if given in the occult phase of the disease. The possible role of oral contraceptives in mammary carcinogenesis has been discussed and it is recognized that thus far, the first ten years of wide usage has failed to demonstrate a relationship in the human.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few remarks on the issue of family planning and other related factors such as genetic counselling that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has brought to the attention of the House by asking for the production of papers which are really the results of research work funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare. I commend the hon. member, as others have already done, Mr. Speaker, because this is a problem which is very vital so far as population control and the environment are concerned. Furthermore, the physical and mental suffering from both legal and illegal abortions could be saved if parents and other people would take advantage of what is available now due to the progress in medical science and the health facilities provided by federal and provincial governments.

• (5:40 p.m.)

In the matter of family planning, Mr. Speaker, sound counselling is the fundamental issue. I should like to deal with the matter of the counselling of people who are going to be parents, and especially with the matter of counselling in genetics. Perhaps hon. members of the House are aware that the World Health Organization in Geneva submitted a report not long ago stating that genetic counselling is the most immediate and practical service that can be rendered in medicine, surgery and family planning. The report also said it is probable that in all countries 4 per cent of live births suffer from some genetic condition which could benefit from genetic counselling, either in relation to repercussions on the family or to successful diagnosis and treatment of hereditary diseases.

Medical genetics today has progressed far beyond the pedigree-collecting stage of the past. I can safely say that genetic concepts are directly influencing many aspects of medical practice even today. It is through the use of modern chemical and physical techniques in the study of the living organism that we have been led to the increased understanding of life processes, including those mechanisms by which genes guide, develop and function in the body. The essential function of the gene is to carry information. At the moment of conception the new zygote receives a selection of genes from each parent, which gives the egg certain information about the way it is to develop and function.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Haidasz: After I have finished my speech, if the hon. member does not mind.

Mr. Gilbert: The answer to my question would greatly elucidate what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Haidasz: If the hon. member does not mind, I shall answer questions after I have finished my speech. Through mitosis these genes are reduplicated and appear in each nucleated somatic cell of the body. The reason for this is that in order for genetic information to guide the development of the organism, the information which is carried by the genes must reach to each cell cytoplasm. It is through the desoxyribonucleic acid component of the chromosome that information is transmitted, and it is the particular order at some particular place on the chromosome that determines a particular function in deciding the nature of the cell that it is in. This information must be transmitted from the gene to the cytoplasm. It is thought that this is probably performed through the ribonucleic acid that is synthesized in the nucleus and in some way receives the patterns determined by the desoxyribonucleic acid component.

Mr. Gilbert: That was quite a mouthful.

Mr. Haidasz: The ribonucleic acid migrates to the cytoplasm and imprints corresponding patterns on the enzymes, globulins and other large molecules being synthesized there. This concept of the work of DNA and RNA is similar to that of some process that reproduces a pattern by a cast or template and is referred to as the template hypothesis. At our present state of knowledge, this is the accepted explanation of how the child receives from its parents the blueprint that guides its development and function. The template hypothesis has been confirmed recently by new developments in the study of abnormal human hemoglobins. It has been discovered that sickle-cell disease is caused by a change at a single gene locus and is characterized by a normal hemoglobin. In sickle-cell disease it seems that both normal and sickle cells produce their own type of hemoglobin, and this is what one would expect according to the template hypothesis.

Genes are also known to determine the presence or absence of enzymes, the antigenic specificity of the red blood surface, the nature of the serum globulins and many other biologic properties of the organism. The template hypothesis suggests that with any recessively inherited disease in which there is a known biochemical defect it should be possible to detect the gene in clinically normal carriers by the appropriate tests. Tests of this nature can be used to demonstrate such diseases as galactosemia fibrocytic disease of the pancreas, glycogen-storage disease and an increasing number of other errors of metabolism.

Another interesting development in medical genetics is the demonstration of chromosomal diseases. Recent improvements in the techniques of observing human chromosomes now make it possible to count them accurately and identify them by their length and shape. The presence of an extra chromosome is evidence of Downs' syndrome which results in a mongoloid child. Also, abnormal chromosomal numbers have been demonstrated in Turner's syndrome and in Kleinfelter's syndrome, diseases which affect the sexual physiology of the offspring.

How can medical practioners benefit by and contribute to understanding the advances in medical genetics? First, this can happen through research. The practitioner has the best opportunity to know family groups and there is a great deal which can be learned about the inheritance of disease. For example, observing the occurrence of unusual conditions in several members of the family may provide a clue to identifying new genetic disease. The medical practitioner can also benefit from medical genetics in the early diagnosis and treatment of his patients. Knowing that another member of the family has a particular disease could be a useful clue to determining the patient's condition. Knowing that there is genetic disease in the family can be of invaluable assistance in early diagnosis.

Early recognition is vital in conditions where early treatment may prevent irreversible consequences of disease, especially at childbirth. The siblings of a child with phenylketonurea can be tested in early infancy for biochemical abnormalities associated with the disease. This disease can be treated with a suitable diet. Early identification can prevent irreversible changes occurring in either the brain, glands or the liver, and it is through prophylactic therapy that the defects of some genetically inherited diseases can be ameliorated. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, knowledge of the former history of the disease patterns of a family may be of great value to the physician as well as parents seeking advice concerning family planning.

Much has been said about genetic counselling. I do not intend to dwell deeply on this aspect of genetics. I merely say that parents of a child with a genetically transmitted disease usually want to know the chances if the same condition may occur in the future. The family physician in this case may be the best qualified person to interpret the risk figures to the parents in terms that make sense to them.

Due to the medical advances, especially in the twentieth century, one unavoidable consequence of this progress is that where in the past people with hereditary disease tended to die young or were unlikely to have children, improved methods of treatment are greatly increasing their chances of reproduction. There is little doubt that there will be some increase in inherited disease. It may be necessary to counsel parents to limit the size of their families if they are known to carry genes of a deleterious nature. The decision, of course, whether to limit family size is an individual one which must be made by the parents concerned and must take into account how they feel about their responsibility to future generations. But to make such a decision parents must be counselled and made aware of their responsibility to their descendants.

I would now briefly like to examine some of the genetic influences on childhood disease. It has been estimated that about 50 per cent of chronic illnesses of children have their origin before the child is born. Conditions such as hair lip, cleft palate, club foot, mental retardation, epilepsy and allergy, to mention but a few, are present at birth. Although the patterns of these diseases have been laid down prenatally, we should not necessarily presume that they are hereditary. The point is that because a condition is present at birth and is congenital, not all congenital conditions are hereditary. By the same token, some hereditary conditions are not congenital, that is, they do not become apparent until much later in life. An example of this is Huntingtons' chorea. Nor should it be forgotten that there are other environmental influences at work prenatally other than purely genetic ones.

The environment of the embryo includes the immediate environment of the uterus, the placenta, membranes, etc. However, it also includes the body processes and health of the mother, including enzymes and hormones, and her illnesses acute and chronic such as rubella, diabetes mellitus. Also it includes the nutrition of the mother. This may be of great importance in situations where severe protein or vitamin deficiencies occur. Finally, there is the induced environment through drugs administered by the doctor during pregnancy, and excessive cigarette smoking, all of which may have a profound effect on the developing embryonic tissues. Also, we should not forget radiation, be it therapeutic or diagnostic, and radioactive fallout if administered in large enough doses.

All these so-called environmental factors complicate or may even make it impossible to determine whether a particular defect has been caused genetically or through environmental influences. Cleft lips and cleft palates are examples of defects that could be produced either through genetic or environmental factors. The genetic counsellor, therefore, must be extremely cautious in predicting the outcome of future pregnancies in a woman who has borne a child with such defects.

It has been determined that congenital malformations account for between 20 and 30 per cent of total neonatal deaths. By studying the genetic make-up of the mothers and children involved, through detailed family histories and through metabolic and environmental investigations, it may be possible to determine how congenital malformations are produced.

A very important field of genetic research is in the study of mental retardation. A great deal of research is being conducted to attempt to investigate the cause of mental retardation however hopeless. The finding of genetic causes could lead to effective steps in prevention and treatment. Epilepsy is another problem of considerable magnitude in children and one variety, the centracephalic type, has been demonstrated to have hereditary tendencies. In the case of epilepsy, the genetic factors are not simple but seem to be dependent upon the interaction of several genes.

Another aspect of the science of genetics and of its value to medicine is in the clarification of the human blood-group systems with its applications to the problems of forensic medicine, transfusion, and hemolytic disease of the newborn. I have already referred to the studies of the hemoglobin molecule and the genetic variations found in sickle-cell and other anaemias. This is a typical example of the application of genetic techniques to clinical research. However, it must be remembered that medical genetics is still in an early stage of development and its most important contributions to clinical medicine will be in the definition of specific disease entities and the provision of reliable data as to familial distributions.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, medical genetics and the process of genetic counselling is contributing in great measure to our understanding of the processes of heredity. New interpretations of the relationship of heredity and environment are assisting man in controlling his own evolution. The science of genetics contributes to unifying our concepts of disease and assists in counselling and advising those who have encountered problems which may be of a genetic nature. The science of genetics also enables us to understand more fully the environmental effects in the prenatal stages.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The doctor's hour, however educational it may be, has expired. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was just about to commence dealing with the section of the bill concerning the ministers of state proposition. I find this section of the bill somewhat ominous. I think a careful reading of it is an indication that it means the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will no longer have to come to Parliament to seek its approval of the reorganization of government departments. Through the device of ministers of state and the powers given to the Prime Minister in connection with the creation of this new office, the Prime Minister will be able to shift about sections of departments at will and Parliament will have its opportunity to pronounce upon the wisdom of such changes only when they are fait accompli. And this is done, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) tells us, in the name of increased ministerial accountability to Parliament.

I realize that the Prime Minister, through the governor in council, has always had this power but in recent years it has been somewhat limited by the device of government reorganization bills. I would suggest to hon. members that the section of the bill dealing with ministers of state is a step away from the kind of advance toward parliamentary control of ministers which previous government reorganization bills have represented.

In the minister's explanation of the idea of ministers of state there is a lengthy discussion of the ministerial system and how it has evolved. This portion of his speech was undoubtedly prepared by one of the professors in the Prime Minister's office. Let me say in passing to this anonymous person that if I were still teaching political science at a university and this section of the speech had been prepared as an essay, I would give him a mark of 60 per cent and send it back with the comment that jargon is no substitute for argument—"interface," indeed. The minister's discussion of the development of the ministry glosses over the key development. Any serious observer of parliamentary democracy in Canada, in Britain, in Australia or anywhere it is practised in the modern world, if asked to state the most important development in the system over the past half-century or more would without hesitation reply that there has been a consistent increase in the power of the executive, or cabinet, at the expense of legislatures.

This concentration of power is constantly being intensified. The process has now reached the point at which the cabinet's power in relation to that of the Prime Minister is going into eclipse. All modern commentators on the constitution make reference to this fact. Indeed, they place great emphasis upon it. Humphrey Berkley in his book "The Power of the Prime Minister" puts the case this way:

> Those who think that British constitutional reform is basically about parliamentary procedure are attacking the problem at the circumference; the centre problem is about the power of the Prime Minister. I accept that we are now operating a presidential system: to do otherwise would be unrealistic. Let us concede the Prime Minister has presidential powers and equip ourselves with the necessary safeguards.

True, Mr. Berkley is speaking of the British Prime Minister, and true also he may be indulging in a bit of hyperbole. However, when one looks at the recent developments in Canada, the basing of election campaigns upon the image of a leader, the vast increase in the personal staff of the Prime Minister, the increase in the Prime Minister's power of patronage through the expanded cabinet system of parliamentary assistants, even further expanded in this bill, and the device of regional desks, one recognizes that, although perhaps overstating the case, Mr. Berkley is presenting a very real problem, one with which we shall have to come to grips sooner or later.

The growth of the power of the executive in the past could in no way be characterized as the result of nefarious plots by successive generations of power-hungry men. In the past it could not. It is, in many ways, the natural outgrowth of demands being made upon the modern state and the strengthening of the party system. The rejection of the laissez faire system of government, the almost universal acceptance of the concept of the positive state, the disappearance of Sir John A. MacDonald's "loose fish", and the creation of cohesive, rigid voting blocks in Parliament have all produced this phenomenon of concentration of power in the hands of the executive.

To come back to the bill, surely if one were really concerned about the constantly expanding powers of the ministry and Parliament's decreasing control over it, one would devote one's efforts to strengthening Parliament through its committees and through services provided to private members, rather than to increasing the size of the ministry as this bill provides. In the case of this government, however, there has been a deliberate move toward concentrating power in the hands of the cabinet and the Prime Minister. I earlier described the deliberate steps they have taken and I will not go over them again.

Why is this being done? I suspect it is a function of the personality of the Prime Minister. Like most of us, he fears and mistrusts what he cannot understand. There is no doubt that he possesses a profound lack of sympathy for and virtually no understanding of Parliament. He can only find it in himself to trust the judgment of those who are directly dependent upon him for their positions, hence his increasing tendency to rely almost exclusively for advice upon his vastly expanded office staff.

The Prime Minister is slowly but surely strangling Parliament and discrediting it in the eyes of the public. If it finally dies and becomes a purely honorific part of the Constitution, as has the monarchy, it may have become so thoroughly discredited that few will mourn its passing. But when faced with the monolith with which the Prime Minister is replacing Parliament, many more Canadians than do already—and that number is substantial—will regret the day that the reins of government fell into the hands of an academic who understood neither the country, its people nor its institutions. He will be remembered as an amateur in the art of government who left behind as his monument a few changes to the Criminal Code, a divided country, an embalmed House of Commons, the memory of some titillated teeny-boppers and a few puzzled, well-padded English speaking professors who had fooled themselves into believing that change in a revolutionary social situation could be accomplished without pain.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, rather than taking up the time of the House with political versions of the art of government, I welcome this opportunity to make some concrete remarks during the second reading stage of Bill C-207, known as Government Organization Act, 1970. The federal government is to be commended for bringing in this bill which, if enacted by the House of Commons, will better equip the government to develop and implement new policies to serve the needs of the Canadian people. The proposals in this bill will help meet the challenge of many changes brought about in our country by technological progress.

The most urgent challenge facing the government of Canada, indeed all industrialized nations of the world, is the one of survival of the human and animal species in a progressively deteriorating environment. The proposal in Bill C-207 to establish a department of the environment is most desirable and indeed, in my opinion, long overdue. In the past three years when I presented during each session of the House of Commons my bill entitled "To provide for Canada a clean air act" I called for the establishment of a department of environmental quality to fight pollution of air, water, soil and noise. Today I am very happy that the government has resolved to increase its fight against environmental pollution by establishing a special federal department and putting in charge the present Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) in whom we have a great deal of confidence. I hope that his colleagues will give him both co-operation and sufficient resources with which to carry out his responsibilities.

Yesterday the future minister of the department of the environment outlined his philosophy with regard to environmental pollution. It was interesting to hear from the minister that he believes we can have economic growth and a healthy environment too. The minister was very frank when he stated that the massive clean-up of our polluted environment will cost both industry and consumers quite a bit of money. But to be fair, Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will be able to convince his cabinet colleagues, especially the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), that they should grant tax incentives both to the public and industry, thereby encouraging all sectors of the Canadian society to take advantage of all the anti-pollution devices which become available and others which may be mandatory. The federal government should also consider the removal of all types of sales taxes from anti-pollution equipment which both industry and citizens would purchase. Furthermore, the government should give consideration to creating low-interest loans to both firms and citizens for the installation of expensive anti-pollution devices.

The minister in his speech also mentioned that we need in 1971 a federal clean air act. We all agree with him. Indeed, this clean air act has been promised in Parliament on several occasions in the past few years. As a former Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare I would like to say that a great deal of work on air pollution and a federal clean air act has been done under the leadership of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munroe), who today also deserves honourable mention. In the continued effective fight to control air pollution, firm leadership will be expected and co-operation between these two departments, other federal departments and, indeed, the provinces will be necessary.

The problem of environmental quality in Canada will still involve several federal departments. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, which minister will have the ultimate task of leadership, initiative and the basic responsibility to oversee all the problems of environmental quality in our country? Will the minister of the department of the environment be able to demand epidemiological studies and other research work to fulfil his responsibilities?

In this and related problems I believe that the act establishing the department of the environment should provide for a national advisory council on the environment in Canada. This council would be independent and would report to the minister. It could really assist him in his grave responsibilities. This advisory council would assess in an objective manner the progress of the federal government's anti-pollution measures and environmental protection programs. It should be an independent agency for the review of government policy in environmental matters.

The environmental advisory council would be composed of scientists, industrialists and members of the public who are concerned with environmental matters. The council would assess environmental pollutants, pollution abatement programs and other threats to the environment on a continuing basis and report regularly both to the government and to the public on the success or failure of abatement programs. Appointments to the council should be made on a decentralized basis. Further, nominations should be invited from such organizations as universities and conservation bodies, as well as industry. Furthermore, the council should be generously funded to be able to carry out research, information services, adequate field work and even hold public hearings across the country.

The information available to us in Bill C-207 includes the enumeration of the duties, powers and functions of the minister. We note especially in clause 5 that the department of the environment will be responsible for renewable and forest resources, fisheries, migratory birds and other non-domestic flora and fauna. This is a very good concept, but I believe it is still incomplete. I ask, Mr. Speaker, why our national parks and the special preserve of our wilderness, which are also the habitat of migratory birds, our flora and our fauna, have not been assigned to the new department of the environment. A comprehensive approach to environmental quality should, therefore, include the national parks. Open space for recreation and for the preservation of our wilderness is an essential element of our environment. In our study of the bill I believe the committee of the whole should give this matter close scrutiny.

Furthermore, clause 5 (e) does not include noise, which is a very important factor in the quality of our environment. The crescendo of noise, no matter what its source, is becoming more and more an environmental problem. Noise can adversely affect not only the health of human beings and domestic animals but also wildlife. It can also adversely affect archeological and geological structures. Therefore, environmental noise is in some way connected with the other pollutants of our environment.

In perusing Bill C-207 we note that both the department of the environment and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources will have responsibility for meteorological technical surveys. I am wondering whether this duplication of responsibility is intentional and, if so, why. Perhaps the inclusion of these technical surveys in the field of weather as a responsibility of the two departments is only an error in the drafting of this legislation.

In his speech yesterday the minister quite rightly stated that pollution knows no national or even international boundaries. Indeed, it is a worldwide problem. In dealing with the provinces and national governments, no doubt constitutional and international law problems will arise. When Parliament passed the Arctic waters pollution prevention bill it was criticized in some quarters as being contrary to the principles of international law. Canadians in the majority disagree with that opinion. I believe members of this House also feel that the overwhelming weight of world opinion favours the decision we took when we passed that bill.

However stringent the legislation we pass in Parliament in matters of pollution abatement, the regulation, supervision and enforcement powers must be carried out faithfully. In this matter, tact and diplomacy will be very necessary because we will need provincial and international co-operation. If finding a basis for co-operation between various levels of government is sometimes difficult in our country, it is all the more difficult to achieve among sovereign states. We can expect to encounter difficulties in persuading those nations which are struggling to achieve industralization that they should not repeat the mistakes of the prosperous nations, but should from the start build into the cost of their industrial processes the necessary expense for protection of the environment.

Even among nations which do not have a great disparity of economic development, agreement sometimes is difficult to achieve. The record of co-operation between Canada and the U.S.A. has not always been excellent. This has been our experience even though the International Joint Commission has carried out very good investigations. The U.S.A. seems to be reluctant to make a firm decision concerning the banning of phosphates from detergents, even though independent expert evidence has established that our Great Lakes water system will not be cleaned up unless the U.S.A. makes the decision to ban phosphates from detergents. Clause 5 (g) establishing the department of the environment empowers it to enforce the regulations of the International Joint Commission. I believe the way to achieve real progress in respect of cleaning up our international boundary waters and keeping our air clean is by strengthening the International Joint Commission so that co-operation by the U.S.A. would be ensured.

I am curious to know how the present ad hoc arrangement between the Department of External Affairs and the U.S.A. anti-pollution authorities is making out. No doubt someone will suggest that Canada-U.S.A. co-operation in these matters would involve the surrender of some sovereignty. This, however, would be a great example to the international community. International co-operation is necessary in order to preserve the environment. It must be recognized that the preservation of the environment is in the national interest and indeed is sometimes above national interest. We are proud that Canadians are taking a leading and active interest in the forthcoming United Nations Conference on Human Environment which will take place in Stockholm in 1972. This conference must be successful in marshalling world co-operation and the adoption as soon as possible of programs and standards to launch a world assault on those forces which are challenging our environment.

We also welcome in Bill C-207 provision for the establishment of ministries of state. This will enable the government to give greater status to the minister responsible for federal policies in respect of housing. It is hoped the studies now being carried out by the present minister, along with the powers which shall be given to him by this bill, will be of assistance to him in meeting the challenge of better housing for Canadians and especially in solving the problems of urban sprawl, redevelopment and urban transportation.

This bill will also give the government an opportunity to appoint a minister in charge of federal science policy. There is a great need in Canada for co-ordination of research activities and scientific pursuits in the various federal government departments and agencies. I hope the government will give the earliest possible serious consideration to the establishment of a ministry of science.

It is also my hope that the part of the bill dealing with the Postmaster General will provide that minister with the status and authority he requires in order to improve postal delivery in Canada. I have received many complaints from storekeepers who sell newspapers, and also from subscribers and editors of ethnic weeklies, that the delivery of these newspapers is late and very irregular. I appeal to the Postmaster General to review federal government policy regarding postal rates for ethnic weekly newspapers and church and professional publications. The circulation of these newspapers and publications contributes a great deal to our national life. However, since the increase in postal rates became effective, their circulation has diminished; consequently, their revenues have diminished.

It is true that part of the decrease in circulation has resulted from lost advertising, but the most serious blow was delivered by the federal government's increased postal rates which raised the cost to some publications by a staggering 500 per cent or even 1,000 per cent according to the information available. I know that tomorrow a delegation of the Canadian Ethnic Press Federation will be meeting with the Postmaster General to discuss the postal rates and irregular delivery of their publications. I hope they will receive more than just a sympathetic hearing.

• (8:30 p.m.)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I commend the Prime Minister for the proposals in Bill C-207 which are steps in the right direction to improve services for Canadian taxpayers and indeed for the entire nation. This bill deserves our support as well as our constructive contributions during second reading stage and especially in its study by the committee of the whole House.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on the bill before the House. As others have pointed out, this one contains proposals applying to about nine topics. Once again we are dealing with an omnibus bill not unlike one we had before. It is not quite the same because it is less erotic and less sadistic, but it is more political and patronizing.

In rising tonight and repeating just about all the others have said, I am wondering whether we will bring the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to reason and prevent introduction of still more omnibus bills.

This afternoon we heard the very interesting speech of the future parliamentary secretary of the future Department of Environment. At least, he introduced himself as such. His speech was very captivating precisely because it dealt with only one topic, namely our environment.

There is an example of the effect of a bill on a precise subject. I have listened to the hon. member with great interest because he gave precise arguments on a given subject. It would have been a different thing if he had had to deal with all the subjects under this bill.

Still, before referring this bill to the committee of the whole, we are asked to express our views on the general principle of the bill and to vote, if required.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder how we could logically vote on such a bill because we agree with several clauses, particularly with Part I on the environment and others such as the one about the Post Office. On the other hand, we reject other parts that deal with, for instance, the increase in the number of parliamentary secretaries and the appointment of Ministers of State whom I call "ministers of unemployed parliamentarians" because they have no department to head. We also oppose other principles. We must absolutely try to make up our minds about the bill to be able to vote for or against it.

Given a bill such as this, the opposition parties should form a coalition and refuse to refer it to the committee. I cannot reasonably say that I am in favour of the bill now under consideration because it contains too many disparate provisions.

Even you, Mr. Speaker, I think that you have voiced your disagreement when you asked yourself how long will the government continue to introduce such bills as this one entitled: "An Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto."

If we consider the contents of the bill, we find a speech from the throne. Moreover, we note that all members speak as if they were discussing a speech from the throne. In fact, it is more a program than a bill and this is why I liked your statement, as recorded on page 2768 of Hansard which reads as follows:

> However where do we stop?

You were then referring to the introduction of omnibus bills.

> Where is the pont of no return? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West, said that we might reach the point where we would have only one bill, a bill at the start of the session for the improvement of the quality of life in Canada which would include every single proposed piece of legislation for the session. That would be an omnibus bill with a capital "O" and a capital "B". But would it be acceptable legislation? There must be a point where we go beyond what is acceptable from a strictly parliamentary standpoint.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am fully in agreement with you, and specially when you said:

> Having said this, I would have to rule—if I must rule—that the government has followed the practice that has been accepted in the past, rightly or wrongly, but that we may have reached the point where we are going too far.

We say about this omnibus bill, as we said about the first omnibus bill, when we were mixing homosexuals with guns and bullets and abortion. Today it is the same confusion and we are asked—whether we like it or not—to accept it as a whole. Even if it is impossible to convince the Prime Minister, I wished to make these comments in order to rally other members of his party to our viewpoint. I will never believe that this group of 150 will be influenced by one man. When we tell them that it is nonsense—you do so yourself even—they still try to convince us that it is logical, and this has gone on for two days. There is no need to be a lawyer or a judge to realize it. I am quite willing to accept the wrapping, but the contents seem hardly digestible, Mr. Speaker, and it is the reason why I make these remarks before expressing my opinion on each clause of the bill.

The first part deals with pollution and the establishment of a Department of the Environment. I am very happy that such a department is being set up but my pleasure is mixed with fear. Indeed the functions and the powers of the Minister of the Environment include all the matters that fall within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. The laws do not give to some other department, ministry, branch or agency of the government of Canada jurisdiction over fisheries, renewable resources including forest resources, migratory birds and other non-domestic flora and fauna, and water. As for water pollution, it originates in the lakes and streams that flow into the rivers. In this connection, the federal government will cross swords with the provinces, since it always refers us back to the provincial government. I cannot imagine how it can be, since we have been urging all governments to stop the large companies in our areas from pouring their waste into our rivers all year around.

In my region, there was a salmon river which has been polluted by paper mills in the last 30 years. Now, we can only catch third grade fish in it. Whatever warning we give the federal government, as I did when I was the mayor of my town, in order to try and call its attention to that, the answer is: This is the juridisction of the provincial government. I turned to the provincial government without ever obtaining the slightest improvement. The company responsible for pollution kept on making everything dirty with impunity, and, today, we are surprised. Governments had been advised of this. They were aware of it. It seems surprising today that everything should be polluted. Governments have known about this for 35 or 40 years and still, they tolerate this situation.

Why? Is it because large companies have too much influence upon governments? Is it because they supply too much money to campaign funds?

Now, the department will devise cleaning up programs, in order to fight pollution. Again this is going to be paid for by poor workers in the form of taxes. These big companies, which are responsible, are not going to pay, and this is why I wish to warn the minister. They are the real polluters. Indeed I heard someone say a few days ago that those who will pay will necessarily be the taxpayers.

Well, I say no. In these serious instances of pollution, the taxpayers should not pay, but the government should coerce these companies into undoing the damage they have done to our waters.

We are also confronted with pollution caused by the accumulation of garbage in cities. The government should consult with municipalities in dealing with this problem. As a matter of fact I spoke about it this afternoon to the officials of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to try and attract the attention of the government on the need to pass legislation and regulations to urge municipalities to discharge their sewers elsewhere but not in our waterways, and thus control the present situation.

I am sure that the future minister will arrange meetings with the provincial authorities. In fact, the provincial government will always be involved and it is a touchy operation—especially in the province of Quebec—for federal members to "swing a leg over the fence" as people would say. These will have to be contacts with the provincial authorities and joint programs will have to be developed so that every municipality will feel the obligation to comply with certain regulations designed to cleanse our rivers and streams.

We are told that it is too late, but better too late than never. If we fail to take action within the next decade, in my area, I am convinced that not a single fish will survive. We may have the most beautiful lakes and rivers, but all of them will surely be spoiled due to the nearsightedness of our governments.

The municipal authorities are certainly not able to solve this problem alone and I know the minister is convinced of that. That is why, besides establishing the department, the minister should take care not to imitate other ministers by merely creating committees charged with the responsibility of doing the work for him. He should take direct action and suggest concrete programs to be carried out immediately.

Then, we will be able to say that we really have an active and a progressive department. As far as pollution is concerned, there is no time to lose, I think.

Now, I am turning to the second part dealing with Energy, Mines, Resources and Technical Surveys, which will include hydro-electric power. Here is a problem that is likely to cause many headaches to the federal government when the time comes to make arrangements with the government of Quebec and other provincial governments.

• (8:50 p.m.)

I hope this task will be carried out quickly and, as far as I know, there is no reason why the provincial governments should object to the federal government's proposals for joint action in this field.

As regard Part III, namely the National Research Council, we agree with the clause transferring responsibility for astronomical observatories to the National Research Council. We can only commend the minister for dealing with this matter which, I believe, falls under federal jurisdiction.

With Part IV of the bill, we are really coming to the crunch of the matter. We have been told in Part III that three new ministers of State would be appointed. That will make five. When the Prime Minister is asked about the reasons for this government reorganization, the answer can be found in the January 27 issue of La Presse, and I quote:

> The federal government intends to set up new ministerial duties in order to face "emergency matters".

Mr. Speaker, I really wonder about these "emergency matters". The only "emergency matter' that I can see in the creation of these new puppet departments and the appointment of new ministers of State is an attempt to please as many people as possible. I think the appointments could give the Prime Minister quite a headache. Considering the size of his representation, everybody will probably want to have cabinet post. And since there are simply not enough posts available, why not make up a few extra ones. But this is done at the taxpayers' expense. He will appoint five ministers of State who will receive $15,000 in addition to their salary. Moreover, he will appoint 18 parliamentary secretaries with a $4,000 gift to each of them.

An hon. Member: It is not 18.

Mr. Gauthier: I am told it is not 18 but 16. If we figure the expenses that would result from the appointment of five new Ministers of State, 36 or 38 parliamentary secretaries, 18 committee chairmen, one whip, one assistant whip, we may well wonder where this will lead us to. We realize that in the end everybody will be happy, everybody will be rewarded, everybody will have his piece of pie. But in order to please everybody, it will cost one billion dollars more to this country. We forget that. That is why I cannot logically and sincerely approve the provision of this bill providing for the appointment of Ministers of State and parliamentary secretaries.

A bill dealing with this particular subject would be very interesting. I wish I knew the result of a vote on bills of that kind. But what happens? It is hidden inside the cake so that we might be led to swallow it. However, we shall not, even at the risk of being told by our electors, as often happens when we vote against a bill: You voted against the bill on pollution. But nobody will suggest that this bill features other kinds of pollution—salary pollution, gift pollution and political pollution! This is why I can not support it.

This is why we ask the government in future to introduce subjects one by one so that we can discuss each of them thoroughly. At the present time, everything is camouflaged and the vote will prove unfair to us.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) said this afternoon: You will vote in committee. What is a vote in committee worth? This is a joke. Nonetheless, the public wants to know whether elected members have voted for or against a clause to which they were opposed. With a bill like this, there is no way of knowing.

This being the case, we request that when such important matters as expenses exceeding one billion dollars are involved, they be divided into parts. Since the government rejects the idea, we shall oppose the bill.

As for part VII concerning the public service superannuation I am all for it. I am glad for the civil servants because they will be entitled to a pension at 60. They will even have the right, if they stop working before 60, to keep on contributing to get a full pension. I would like it if these provisions could also apply to old people: this would be interesting. For the last two or three years it has been requested that their penson be paid at 60. The pensioners agree. Unfortunately they have to wait until 65 to get their pension cheque while the civil servants who, incidentally, have had salaries of $12,000, $15,000, $18,000, $20,000 or $24,000 per year will get their pension at 60. That is not so bad. I am glad for them. I am not against it but I wish old people could get their pension at 60 and that their spouse could get it too, whatever his or her age. This would be justice. There is discrimination against part of our society. All our citizens should be granted the same treatment if the so-called just society is to be achieved. Legislation should be extended to our senior citizens and then the Canadians will be satisfied.

Mr. Speaker, my time is running out.

One might wonder how I would vote on this bill. After all I said, Mr. Speaker, one will realize I am on the horns of a tremendous dilemma. This is why even though I support without reservation certain parts of the bill, some other parts keep me from approving it in its entirety. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will cast my vote against this bill.

[English]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, in participating in the debate on this bill which does a number of things may I first commend the government for tackling the very serious problems relating to the environment. Responsibility for these matters has up to this time been scattered among numerous departments. That responsibility in the main will now be concentrated under one minister and one department which is to be known as the department of the environment. I wish the new minister who will assume these substantial responsibilities the very best fortune in his efforts to deal with many of the serious problems that face this nation in so far as pollution is concerned.

• (9:00 p.m.)

I shall place on record some facts about a very serious situation that exists in my constituency in the province of Nova Scotia. I wish to make all hon. members fully aware of this situation which is probably unique in Canada. It is the type of uniqueness that the residents of the coal mining town of Springhill would like to have eliminated as soon as possible. That town is faced with a critical pollution problem that endangers the health of its 7,500 residents. I would describe the situation as nothing less than a national disgrace which has been allowed to go on and on. I think it would be of value to the minister and hon. members to have some background information regarding this situation.

Springhill was a mining town. It suffered two calamitous disasters in 1956 and 1958 which took the lives of many miners. The only two employers in that community were eliminated. For some time the people of that community had grave doubts about the future. I am sure this was the case with people all across this country, because Canadians everywhere rallied behind the brave people of Springhill. People all across Canada, including the provincial government of Nova Scotia, assisted the people of that community in many ways. As a result, Springhill has developed a very good industrial base. The federal government can take the credit; it established a very substantial minimum security penal institution which provides a good deal of employment for the people of the community.

Because Springhill had been a coal mining community for a long time, a very large mine-dump developed. The waste products from the mining operations were deposited in the dump. To give some idea of the extent of this mine-dump, I would say that it covers between 45 and 50 acres of land in the midst of the community. About 1960 a fire started in this huge mine-dump. At that time it was not very serious. Although some efforts were made to put out the fire, it continued to burn. The burning became more and more extensive. Today it covers almost all the 45 to 50 acres of land. The fire continued because the dump contained a great deal of coal. I understand that between 10 per cent and 15 per cent of the mine-dump is coal. The fire penetrated deeper and deeper into the mine-dump. I am told that at the present time the fire is burning at a depth of between 40 and 60 feet. The fumes from the fire have started to rise and on a windy day, especially on a humid day, the fumes cover the whole of the town.

We hear a great deal about the bad effects of smog in the cities of Los Angeles and New York. More recently we have heard it associated with the cities of Montreal and Toronto. Unless one visits the town of Springhill on a windy or humid day you do not realize how dense are these fumes or how hazardous they are to the health of those who live in the community. It might well have caused the death of some residents of Springhill. I have no doubt that it has stopped industries locating there. If an individual who is considering locating a plant visited Springhill on a day when the smog is in existence, he would have second, third and maybe fourth thoughts about locating there and asking his employees to suffer what could be a very hazardous health problem.

For the past five years the people of Springhill have been trying to have this mine-dump fire extinguished.

They have been trying in every way. I do not say that governments have ignored the problem completely. The provincial department of mines has made some studies of the situation. The federal Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources have also conducted studies. Since April 22, 1970, officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources have been preparing a report based on a study they have been conducting as to how this mine-dump fire may best be extinguished. While some efforts have been made, they have not been substantial. They have not been the kind of efforts that would be made if this fire were located in the centre of the city of Ottawa and the people of this city were breathing the fumes from that mine-dump fire, thereby endangering their health. Because this is happening in a small town in Nova Scotia, the people have to suffer on and on. A person with an asthmatic or bronchial condition is put in a very serious situation, one that I suggest should make him leave the community because of possible danger to his life. Hence, I should like to see prompt action taken to put out the fire. Some of the studies which have been carried out indicate that a substantial amount of money is involved in putting out the fire. I think it makes no difference how much is involved; no one in Canada should be asked to live in a community so badly polluted that they might be risking their lives by remaining there.

I have recounted the situation today and hope that when the new department is created—or before it is created, if action can be taken soon enough—steps will be taken to extinguish this fire in the shortest possible time. Having an appreciation of the kind of people living in the community of Springhill, and recognizing the way they have fought back with courage and determination, after two mine calamities, from the brink of complete disaster, I am sure the taxpayers of this nation would gladly see money spent to extinguish the continuing blaze that is such a blight on this great and wonderful town.

It is my hope that the new minister of the environment will take quick action to see that a report that was supposed to have been completed in September of 1970 is released. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) informs me that the report is not yet complete and that it will not be made public when it is complete. Perhaps the information contained in that report is so shocking, not just to the people who live in the community of Springhill but to the people of the whole nation, that it is better so far as the government is concerned that it be kept secret. But I believe it is in the interests of the people of that community to make the report public as soon as possible and that immediate action be taken thereon.

We all became very concerned about the effect on the environment of the Arrow disaster in Chedabucto Bay, as well as the effect it had on wildlife. I am just as concerned about human life in the town of Springhill, the residents of which have been facing this terrible pollutant day in and day out, 365 days of the year, for the last decade. The government spent $4 million to clean up the Arrow pollution and it had better spend $1 million, or whatever is the cost, to extinguish this mine-dump fire as quickly as it can.

I should now like to pass to another subject which will also interest the new minister of the environment, and that is Fundy power. I am indeed pleased to see the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) in the House this evening, for as Nova Scotia's representative in the cabinet he was of material assistance in having a study carried out by the federal government and the governments of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. This study revealed that Fundy tidal power was a feasible scheme from an engineering point of view, though it expressed some doubt as to the financial feasibility of the scheme.

Since this programming board's report has been brought down, new information has come to light. An international conference was held in Halifax in the spring of 1970 on the utilization of tidal power. It was chaired by Dr. Thomas J. Gray of Nova Scotia Technical College and produced much valuable information on the feasibility of harnessing the Bay of Fundy tides, as well as a new insight into how tidal power could best be harnessed to produce thermal power 24 hours a day at an economic rate. In addition, there was information about the marketing potential of Fundy power. There is no doubt that Fundy power could be sold just as quickly as it is produced. The question appears to be one of dollars and cents. The man who will be the first minister of the environment has said that cost is not as important as pollution-free projects wherever they may be and in whatever sector of the economy they fall. Fundy power would be completely pollution-free; no pollution of any kind is associated with tidal power.

Only recently the United Nations indicated that tidal power was a vital future source of energy in the world because of its pollution-free aspect. Surely Canada should be the first to seize upon the opportunity of producing pollution-free power in gigantic amounts which would be available to the whole of Canada as well as to the United States, especially the eastern seaboard of that country. What is more important, Mr. Speaker, is that the federal government, through the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has indicated a willingess to re-examine the programming board's report to determine whether this project, in light of new technical evidence particularly as to how power can best be utilized from the tides, is feasible. He has said the government is willing to go ahead with this re-examination if requested to do so by the other two partners who initially assisted in a financial way toward the production of this report.

The Premier of the province of New Brunswick has indicated his support for a re-examination of this project. The Premier of Nova Scotia, for reasons best known to himself, has said he will not request a re-examination of the report produced by the programming board or the new material that is available. I do not understand why the Premier of Nova Scotia takes this position, because that province would be the beneficiary in many ways and it is impossible to imagine what such a project might to for the revitalization of the whole of the Atlantic area. A simple example is that between 7,000 and 10,000 jobs would be created almost immediately on the construction of dams to harness the tides. Such a transfusion of employment would transform Nova Scotia from a "have-not" to a "have" province. It would probably do the same for the whole Atlantic area. I am sure this is one of the basic reasons the Premier of New Brunswick is anxious to have the report re-examined. In any event, the Premier of Nova Scotia says he does not wish it re-examined.

The taxpayers of this country have an investment of $2,250,000 in the original report. I suggest it would cost far less to conduct a re-examination to bring the report up to date, so that Canadians might know whether the Fundy project is feasible, than it cost to bring about the original report. In view of the fact that the President of the Privy Council has a personal and friendly relationship with the Premier of Nova Scotia, I hope he will urge the Premier to take action to bring about a re-examination in order that we might in the near future look forward to a project to harness Fundy tidal power. In this way the people in the Maritime provinces would not have to wait forever and forever for such a project.

There is one other point I should like to raise. The power-hungry states along the eastern seaboard must soon decide where they will get power over and above that made available from Churchill Falls. The decision cannot be delayed, because this area of the United States is already facing black-out and grey-out periods. This places the utility companies in a precarious position. Even during the winter months these seaboard states are having to close factories and shut down offices because of power shortages. There can be no action in this regard until the Premier of Nova Scotia requests that the report be re-examined. Surely to goodness the Premier should explain to the people of Nova Scotia and the people of Canada why such an examination should not be carried out immediately. In other words, all Canadians should be made aware of the facts that exist today regarding the development of Bay of Fundy tidal power.

I now turn to the government reorganization proposals contained in this bill. At the present time we have 29 cabinet ministers, two without portfolios. When this legislation passes there will be four additional portfolios, which means we will have 31 departments of government. This is three times the number of portfolios held in the United States. That fact does not particularly concern me, and I might point out that the new Premier of Nova Scotia has cut down the number of cabinet posts. What concerns me as much as the idea of 31 ministers sitting around a table trying to decide something is that for some time there has been developing a stratification within the government of which the public has not been aware. If the government intends to set up an elite oligarchy, they should tell the people about it. If there are to be senior and junior ministers, let the government say so. We appear to be getting the proliferation of appointments of people in the Liberal party to an elite oligarchy charged with the responsibility of running this country in the way it desires.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Coates: This government has been running the country "well," Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Right into the ground.

Mr. Coates: Today we have the most unemployment in the country since the days which we call the dirty thirties. We have approximately 750,000 persons unemployed. The statistics for December indicate something like 535,000. Surely there must have been an increase of 100,000 in January, and probably another 100,000 who became tired of reporting to Manpower offices, were not qualified for unemployment insurance benefits and went on welfare and forgot about working for the next three or four months.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the department of the environment will create new employment. The establishment of more portfolios and more Parliamentary Secretaries will provide a few more dollars for a few more Members of Parliament, and nothing else. For some time I have followed the tremendous build-up in the super bureaucracy which this government has taken great pride in developing. It now sits as a further stratified layer between the cabinet and the Public Service of Canada. The only thing I can say about the 80-odd people in the Prime Minister's office who secure in excess of $800,000 annually from the taxpayers is that they give damn poor advice. It is their advice the government has been following, and it has put this country in the throes of one of our worst depressions in this century.

We are getting a lot of flak from the back benches of the Liberal party. Whether or not the backbenchers realize it, they do not count because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has regional desks to advise him. Perhaps if the Prime Minister took their advice we would not be in the throes of a depression, but he does not pay any attention to them now.

An hon. Member: And we don't pay any attention to you.

Mr. Coates: It is too bad you do not pay any attention to me, because if you did you would realize you are nobodies. The Prime Minister said so in the House and he has indicated in his every action that you are nobodies. Mr. Speaker, it is good to hear the flak from these boys now, because I'll bet that when they go home they will receive a lot of it; more and more flak will be coming their way in the days ahead. They should stop and think, because if they do not know it already, if the Prime Minister has not told them—and if he has not told them, they do not know it—there is one thing as certain as life itself, and that is that unemployed people mark their X's and a devil of a lot of X's will be marked against this government when these people have an opportunity to vote.

If government backbenchers would like some non-partisan advice about the state of the economy at the present time, I have before me Richardson Securities of Canada Investment Securities Review for 1970. There is a Richardson in this House; I do not know whether he has any association with this organization. This review reads in part as follows:

> The present recessionary state of the domestic Canadian economy primarily reflects a cut-back in consumer durable and housing expenditures.

It is a recessionary state, according to the investment dealers. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is a recessionary state not only to the investment dealers; it is a recessionary state for at least three-quarters of a million Canadians. They know this because they are on unemployment insurance or welfare at the present time. This government ignored the warning provided not only in this House but by every segment of the economy that we were plunging into a recession. They went under the guise that inflation was the problem which had to be corrected. In December, when he saw the unemployment figures the Prime Minister announced that inflation was beaten, that it was no longer a problem and that unemployment was now the problem. They created it.

Mr. Nesbitt: It took courage to create it, too.

Mr. Coates: They created it, and what are they doing about it?

An hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Coates: Don't say "nothing", because they are producing a $2 million fund to give employment to 250 graduates from the province of Quebec. That is the way they will solve the problem. It was good to see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) on television when he was shown the memorandum. Apparently he is not a member of the elite oligarchy because they did not tell him about it.

An hon. Member: Didn't they tell him about it?

Mr. Coates: No, they did not tell him about it. Probably the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) or the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier)—it could not have been the Prime Minister because he was out of the country, but perhaps it was his two right-hand men or the right and the left of him—forgot to tell the President of the Treasury Board, so the poor unfortunate soul had to appear on television and say, "I do not think any such memorandum exists" and then watch a reporter produce it to him. Then we watched him sweat; we could see the beads of sweat dropping off him.

An hon. Member: He is sweating right now.

An hon. Member: What about the horses?

An hon. Member: What about the bananas?

Mr. Coates: I heard somebody say something about bananas. They are for the Prime Minister's orangutan. He goes away, and when he cannot find girls he finds an orangutan to kiss. Mr. Speaker, we have a "big deal" for the Canadian taxpayer. The government are going to take $2 million from Canadian taxpayers to help unemployed graduates; but they will only help graduates who come from the province of Quebec. Maybe they will help French-speaking graduates from some other province—maybe!

Mr. Paproski: What about the Ukraphones?

Mr. Coates: There are Anglophones and Francophones and Ukraphones but there are not Canadians any more, according to this government. This government went across the country preaching "one Canada." Well, it is a special kind of "one Canada." It is getting to be one Canada if you are from the province of Quebec and a completely different Canada if you come from anywhere else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: One Canada for those who speak the French language but a completely different Canada for those who speak any other language. That is the "one Canada" we have today, with the fund which is being made available by this government to create employment for 250 French-speaking graduates from the province of Quebec. If you speak English, no show: you are not involved; you just are not part of it; you are not in the "in" group.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Paproski: You are not even in the cabinet.

Mr. Coates: Who cares if you are not in the cabinet? If you are not Trudeau, Pelletier or Marchand it does not make any difference whether or not you are in the cabinet. The President of the Treasury Board discovered that. They do not tell the rest of the cabinet what is going on. Even the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) does not know.

I imagine there are a lot of secret memorandums at the bottom of which you see the little N.B. which says "This program is to be put into effect without any public information being provided about it". It is a different ball of wax. We have an example of just what can happen when a small, elite oligarchy takes over the government of a country. With the government's proliferation of super bureaucrats, the people of Canada are discovering the information to be bad, the policies to be bad and the end result to be misery, misery, misery.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to an excellent speech by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates). It had its serious moments as well as some lighter moments, as speeches in the best parliamentary tradition should have. But upon reflection even the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) would agree that the speech the hon. member has just completed, practically all of which fell within all-fours of the ambit of the bill, demonstrates very well the futility of the exercise upon which the government is asking us to embark. So far as I am concerned, this bill makes a farce of parliamentary democracy and is a waste of parliamentary time.

The President of the Treasury Board made an attempt in his initial remarks to indicate what he thought was the principle of the bill. I and some of my colleagues are perfectly prepared to attempt to debate the bill on the principle which the President of the Treasury Board enunciated on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The President of the Treasury Board said that the bill, if enacted, will better equip the government to develop and implement new policies to serve Canadians in a variety of ways, among them the fight against pollution.

He went on to outline his concept of the need for greater flexibility and manoeuvrability within the operations of the federal government. But he also made what to me is a most astounding observation, namely, that the bill would increase the accountability of the executive to Parliament. I find that a very strange statement from the President of the Treasury Board. I find it to be very strange reasoning. I attempted to look carefully through the bill's various aspects and phases, with its references to various changes to various pieces of legislation, and I fail to understand how it does anything but the opposite of increasing the accountability of the executive to Parliament. At the very least, it does not change the situation from the one we now have.

The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis), in his speech which he termed wide-ranging—to which I may refer later—again illustrated very well the futility of this exercise, because he delivered what my colleague, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland), called a motherhood-type speech. It would have been a very good speech, made in the right place at the right time. To those of us who have been following some of the speeches the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has made in various parts of the country, and in particular in the coastal areas of B.C., much of it had a familiar ring. In other words, in a debate which, according to the title of the bill, concerns itself with government organization, the minister made a speech which might very well be right and proper on a public platform seeking to arouse the Canadian public to the dangers of pollution, but it had nothing to do with giving the House an inkling of how he understands the responsibility which he has been asked to assume as the minister of a new and enlarged department.

So I think that if the debate is to have any meaning at all, it has to revert to the question of whether or not it is desirable for the House to have this kind of bill thrust before it at almost every session. In some remarks that I drafted earlier today, which I was sending to my constituents, I described the situation in these terms. I raised the question: Is Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau merely a technocrat intent on shuffling round the building blocks of the various structures within the organization of the government of Canada like some child learning his ABCs from a new Christmas gift, or is he a master strategist moving purposefully toward a new era of effective government, attuned to the needs of the latter part of the twentieth century?

This, I suggested, is the substance of the debate which is rapidly gathering momentum in Parliament. Then I went on to say, as did the President of the Treasury Board in his speech, that pretty well every year since 1966 we have been presented with these bills having to do with government organization—omnibus types of bills. Perhaps in 1966 those of us who were around did not really sense that this was the beginning of a large cloud which was looming low on the horizon. Perhaps we were not aware what was really happening, of the trend and direction in which the government was moving in connection with proposals to change the operations of the federal government.

The fact is that one of the side-results of this form of legislation is that year by year it is becoming more and more difficult to keep track of the legislation we have, because many important aspects of legislation are being buried inside these mammoth government bills, which do not only deal with the restructuring of federal government departments, as other speakers have said. So I think it is time some of the facts of our current situation were brought forward in this debate.

What is the present situation with respect to the authority of the government to move in restructuring or streamlining the activities of the federal government, and why do I suggest this situation is making a farce of parliamentary democracy and parliamentary debate? Let us consider the question of the proposed new department of the environment. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what is the point in our sitting here tonight debating the feasibility or otherwise of the establishment of a department of the environment when we are already faced with a fait accompli in everything but name? It makes me think of that old and well-worn saying that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet.

What added powers and responsibilities is the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry getting under this bill just because it is proposed to change the name of that department? I submit that there are absolutely none. I have gone over the Order in Council that was passed on November 26, 1970, P. C. 1970-2047, and I have looked at the powers and duties that were then added to the responsibilities of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry under the authority of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act. As far as I have been able to check, there is not one item or aspect of this bill that is not already covered by that Order in Council so far as the responsibilities and duties of the minister are concerned.

Some of us, of course, recognize that the responsibilities of the President of the Treasury Board lie in the allocation of funds and that he is just acting on behalf of the Prime Minister in this debate. But when introducing this measure, when he referred to the new department of the environment he gave no indication that the minister would have any further back-up or muscle to do anything about improving our environment. So really all we are indulging in is an exercise of rubber-stamping something the government has already done. Even if we were to defeat this bill, the authority the government has already exercised under the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act would not be affected in any way. So, Mr. Speaker, we come back to the question: Is this bill just a matter of technocratic juggling?

A department of the environment is something many of us would like to see and would support. But, Mr. Speaker, I have some reservations about putting these kinds of responsibilities in the hands of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry because I represent an area of Canada where the commercial fisheries are very important. Other hon. members who participated in this debate have said this is true of their areas also. There is the latent fear in the minds of many of us that the minister will become so interested in making airy-fairy kinds of speeches about the environment and about underwater marine parks in the Strait of Georgia that he will no longer accept as a major responsibility the enhancement and development of the commercial fisheries of Canada.

In his speech, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry mentioned some of the things that had been transferred, but he did not give us any reason why responsibility for the national parks was not being placed in his new department, when general control over renewable resources is included. In other words, why should the Wildlife Service go into the hands of the minister of the environment who is concerned with renewable resources, and the national parks system of Canada, which many of us regard as part of the keystone to maintaining our natural environment for the enjoyment of future generations, be left outside the ambit of the responsibilities of this minister? We cannot really debate that question because the government has said: We have already set up this department in all but name.

I noticed that this transfer of powers is the kind of continuing process to which the President of the Treasury Board referred. To give some perspective to what has happened, I look at the introduction to the first—and I am not sure whether it will be the last—annual report of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. This is how it reads in the introduction:

> A major change in departmental organization occurred early in the fiscal year resulting from an Order in Council dated July 12, 1968, under which the forestry branch, together with certain advisory, administrative, and technical support elements from the Department of Forestry and Rural Development, were combined with the Department of Fisheries.
> Co-incident with the announcement of this re-organization was the appointment of the Hon. Jack Davis, Member of Parliament for Capilano, B.C., as the minister responsible for fisheries and forestry.
> Following the establishment of task forces to study the restructuring of the department as a result of the fisheries-forestry merger, the new Department of Fisheries and Forestry officially came into being on March 28, 1969, with the enactment of the Government Organization Act, 1969.

Now we are sort of undoing that exercise and starting on a new exercise, and I suppose new task forces will spend their time reshuffling the various elements of this new department. This may be an interesting and perhaps even necessary technical exercise, but it does not give Parliament the opportunity to assess what the government really has in mind in relation to a department of the environment, the controlling of the environment against pollution and its preservation for future generations of Canadians. In other words, all we have is a reshuffling of the machinery, which we are being asked to rubber-stamp. We have had no real indication from the minister who introduced the bill, from the Prime Minister, from the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, or from anybody else over there, as to the direction in which future policies should move and how much money will be put into the pot to back up those policies.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Before we proceed with the adjournment debate, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the House leader would indicate what he proposes to place before the House tomorrow and at the beginning of next week, and for as far into next week as he can tell us.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if I may deal with tomorrow first, I would like to call the bill that has been under discussion today. I suggest that if tomorrow at any point we reach the stage that no further members wish to speak on second reading, and if at that point there is a desire for a recorded vote, we would agree to put off the vote until Monday. It may be that there will be no wish to have a recorded vote, but if there is we would have it on Monday. If, following that point, there were time available before four o'clock we would complete the day by dealing with other items such as the omnibus loans bill, the Canada-Jamaica tax agreement and, finally, the New Zealand-Canada trade agreement.

On Monday I would call the government organization bill, continuing it from whatever stage it had reached and, hopefully, completing it. Then I would call the Canada Development Corporation bill and the bail reform bill. Any of the items that I have mentioned for tomorrow left uncompleted would follow that bill.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question to clarify one small point? I presume that if the second reading debate were to end tomorrow, the three items that were mentioned would be proceeded with in the order in which they were mentioned, with the loans bill coming first.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that would be the order of calling the bills. After the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has expressed his views on the matter, I wonder whether the House will accept my suggestion with respect to the recorded division and, if so, whether that agreement might be put into the form of an order of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we would agree to such an order. I do not know what the minister would say if we were to suggest that nine votes ought to be taken instead of one. That, however, is another matter. We will agree to that order. While I am on my feet, may I ask if the minister intends, once we have dealt with the second reading of the bill and brought it into committee of the whole, to continue the debate on the bill until it is completed, or does he plan any interruption for any purpose?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we hope to continue with it until it is completed. We should only consider interrupting the debate on that bill if the House were to become so weary of it as to make no progress.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then would the minister interrupt it for Easter?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I gather that the agreement of the House Leaders is that if a vote should be required in connection with the second reading of Bill C-207 tomorrow, it will be deferred until Monday. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we would call the vote just as Orders of the Day are called, after oral questions, if that is agreeable.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRADE—STEPS TO LIMIT IMPORTS OF AUSTRALIAN AND NEW ZEALAND BEEF

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am bringing before the House tonight the matter of imports of beef from New Zealand and Australia because I have not been able to obtain from the government and the minister responsible what I consider a satisfactory answer about where we are going in regard to beef imports. The matter was first brought to the attention of the House when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) early in 1969 returned from a tour of Asia and announced that we could expect increased imports of beef from New Zealand. He said that these imports were mainly derived from the slaughter of canner and cutter cows and that we did not have enough of such cows. By June, 1970, it was obvious that these imports were creating a real problem in Canada. So much beef was being brought into Canada and re-exported to the United States that the United States complained.

On June 25 I urged the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), as recorded in Hansard, to report to the House before the recess what action the government would take and what policy it would follow on this matter. No satisfactory answer was received. On December 1, 1970, I again asked if steps would be taken to limit the amount of beef imported into Canada from Australia and New Zealand to levels that would not pose a threat to our own market. The minister replied, as recorded at page 1628 of Hansard, as follows:

> This concerns a matter we negotiated with Australia and New Zealand during midsummer when it presented a serious problem. We hope that the kind of negotiations which led to a solution of the difficulty then will be conducted in the future.

In December or January I again asked the question and received no satisfactory answer. In either June or July of last year the United States put a complete ban on the re-export of these products coming into Canada from New Zealand; they were blocked off. The full flow of products then on the high seas was unloaded in Canada. The "Canadian Cattleman", a journal issued by the cattleman's association, expressed very grave concern. It pointed out that we were reaching the point where 10 per cent of the beef we consumed was imported from Australia and New Zealand. In the period January to September, 1970, Canada imported 62 million pounds of beef from New Zealand and 43 million pounds from Australia. This is the nature of the problem.

At a recent meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, we discussed the new provisions in trade with regard to these imports. When I asked the witnesses who appeared before the committee whether we could negotiate quotas with New Zealand under the agreement, the answer was yes. To my knowledge, no attempt has been made to take this kind of action. Our market is wide open. We have quotas on butter because it is necessary to protect the dairy industry. However, our beef markets are open to everyone. We tell other countries to come and help themselves.

The North Battleford News Optimist, which is published in the centre of the cattle-raising area in Saskatchewan, states that United States officials have stated this embargo on imports of New Zealand beef to the United States will continue throughout the current year. Are we to assume that our market will be left wide open? The New Zealanders are exporting their problems with regard to dairy products and beef to this country. The minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board stated that Canadian farmers would put an additional three million acres into forage for beef production. When speaking to the Canadian Confederation of Agriculture on January 27, the Minister of Agriculture stated as follows:

> Our livestock industry is responding to new challenges. The beef industry has invested millions in new feedlots from coast to coast, we are increasing our national herd, we are adopting new processing and merchandising techniques—

Hon. members opposite are not rising to meet the challenge. The minister is responsible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) has raised a problem which existed in Canada last summer. It is quite true that at that time large quantities of Australian and New Zealand beef were being imported into Canada and transshipped to the United States. The situation arose because the Americans had put a prohibition on imports of beef from those countries. Canada was in the position of being exempt from those prohibitions.

As a result of the distress we were causing the American market by allowing this beef to come through Canada, and the threat that our free entry into the American market could be prohibited if we did not do something about it, we made representations to New Zealand and Australia. We obtained agreement from them that they would not ship beef into Canada during the period in which it would cause distress. At the time this agreement was reached there were shipments on the high seas on their way to Canada, and it took some time to clear these shipments out of the Canadian market. The agreement that we made with those countries at the time was that they would suspend shipments until such time as all this beef was cleared out of the Canadian market. Since then we have not had this problem.

• (10:10 p.m.)

It is true that the New Zealanders and Australians generally ship low-grade, or manufacturing beef to Canada, the sort which goes into wieners and manufactured goods of that kind. We anticipate that if the problem should arise again we would have no difficulty in taking the same kind of action and obtaining the same kind of agreement from the New Zealanders and Australians that we obtained previously. If that occasion arises we will have no hesitation in asking them to take the same action.

The hon. member suggests that we should put artificial embargoes on the importation of beef from other countries.

Mr. Gleave: Not artificial, real ones.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Real embargoes. This is a temptation. I think that all producers in Canada would like to have free access to every market in the world and prohibit imports to this country. May I remind the hon. member that every time we put up a barrier against somebody else's goods there is a temptation for them to put up a barrier against ours. We are fighting a trade war with other countries—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY—VANCOUVER—SUGGESTED REFUSAL OF LEASE TO FOUR SEASONS HOTEL

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the matter I raise tonight is of vital concern not only to the citizens of Vancouver but to all Canadians. Stanley Park is an incomparable asset, one thousand acres of beauty and recreation, owned and open to the public of this country and invaluable as a tourist attraction. At this moment its future is in jeopardy.

Over the years the Vancouver city council has spurned the only over-all plan the city ever had and has released more and more nearby waterfront areas to private land speculators and developers. One of these, Harbour Park Developments Limited, made 200 per cent speculative profit on these holdings between 1965 and 1969. Now the city council is on the verge of allowing a $40 million hotel, apartment and specialty store complex to be built on the 14-acre waterfront lot at the entrance to Stanley Park. Instead of open park space and a magnificent view of mountains and harbour, we are going to get a concrete jungle within 24 feet of the park, an impossible traffic situation in an already congested artery and a betrayal of public trust on a grand scale.

This is the time for plain talk, and I wish the minister were here tonight to deal with the question. This cluttered, greedy plan is a steal, and a steal possible only under the cloak of secrecy and evasion. The only public authority prepared to fight for the public and to save Stanley Park for the people has been the Vancouver parks board. For years they have done all they can to protect one of Vancouver's greatest assets.

Where does the National Harbours Board come in? The truth is that much of the land on which this Four Seasons cement colossus is to be built is owned by the National Harbours Board, whose signature is required for the lease. Further, one piece of the land, the Gilford Street waterlot, which was deeded by the National Harbours Board to the city in 1917 so that the public could have access to the water, is now in the process of being deeded back to the Crown by the city of Vancouver for the sum of one dollar so that the National Harbours Board may have everything in order for the signing of the lease.

In 1917 the Harbours Board gave a waterlot to Vancouver so that the public could have access to the water. Apparently today's Harbour Board is prepared to aid private speculators and developers to fence the public away from water, mountains and parks. I challenge the minister to refute this charge. I challenge him to carry out his duty to preserve and protect the heritage of the waterfront for the public. Let him refuse to sanction this lease. Let him listen to the Vancouver parks board and organized citizen bodies in the city of Vancouver. Let him negotiate with the city council to protect the rights of Canadians from coast to coast who have a share in the ownership of Stanley Park which is, as you know, owned by the Department of National Defence and leased to the city of Vancouver.

At the very least, let the minister look at the compromise plan of the Vancouver parks board, a plan which would preserve the block next to the park for public use. This plan would leave the private developers with the second block. It would allow the parks board to develop a fisherman's wharf and restaurants such as have made San Francisco famous, to build a public, revenue-producing marina and a variety of other self-financing attractions.

Wherever you are, Mr. Minister, will you decide for a few well placed persons, or for the whole community? Will you go along with private speculators, or save irreplaceable public land? You have the power to stop this violation of public trust on the part of a few shortsighted people who would sell out the public heritage for a few pieces of paper. The decision is yours; where do you stand?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I asked the minister if I could appear for him this evening. Ever since he made that interesting date with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) on December 13 I have been envious of him and have been looking forward to keeping it for him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It serves you right.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Some of the comments of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway are not entirely in keeping with the facts. I share with her the concern of all of us for the preservation of parkland in British Columbia, particularly in respect of that site to which she has referred. There has been no evasion of the truth, or secrecy. I would indicate to the hon. member that the lease was signed by the Harbours Board in respect of that piece of property over five years ago, so the government of Canada is not in a position to take action to do anything to affect such a lease.

Many representations have been received by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) in respect of the proposed development. Some, such as those put forward by the Vancouver parks board, are not in favour of the undertaking. Others have identified the proposed development as being imaginative and as an appropriate addition to the downtown establishment. The proposed development comprises a hotel, various types of living accommodation, shops, walks, boat mooring facilities and extensive ornamental gardens; the same kind of thing the hon. member has just recommended. The lease in question has existed for some years. Recently it was renegotiated to accommodate land use more appropriate to the locale.

In light of representations received, and in consultation with various members from the Vancouver area on both sides of the House, the Minister of Transport has been re-examining the whole question. Meetings are taking place currently and the House will be informed of new developments as soon as they occur.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Another sell-out.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.21 p.m.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING PAYMENT OF DUES BY NON-UNION EMPLOYEES, STATUS IN DECERTIFICATION APPLICATIONS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on the order paper under Private Members' Public Bills there stands in my name a bill which has a certain technical defect. I would request that, with the permission of the House, the order for second reading of Bill C-209 be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of Bills. First Reading of Senate Public Bills. Government Notices of Motions.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Greene: No, Mr. Speaker. I wish to make a statement on motions.

Mr. Speaker: The item "Motions" was called previously. Is there agreement of the House to return to motions to allow the minister to make a statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Alexander: We will give you a break, Joe.

ATOMIC ENERGY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT ENABLING ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED TO CARRY OUT ENGINEERING ASSESSMENT OF DEUTERIUM PLANT

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that the government has authorized Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to enter into an agreement with Deuterium of Canada Limited and the government of Nova Scotia to enable Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to carry out an engineering assessment to determine the feasibility and probable costs of bringing the Deuterium plant at Glace Bay into production.

The province of Nova Scotia and Deuterium of Canada Limited have a very substantial investment in this venture, and its failure would be a serious financial setback for the province of Nova Scotia.

The province has indicated to the government that it is not practicable, because of the lack of sufficient technical expertise at the provincial level, for the province to bring the plant into production and operate it with its own provincial facilities and resources. The government has therefore authorized the above study, which does not include any commitment on the part of the federal government or AECL to carry out further work or to put the plant into production or to operate same, but which study will be submitted to the government for its consideration upon completion.

The study will be embarked upon and completed at the earliest possible date, and AECL has been authorized to spend the sum of $300,000 of its own funds toward such study.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I say that from my own observation the co-operation between Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the province, and Deuterium of Canada Limited has always been very close. Officials of Atomic Energy of Canada have always been most helpful, and I am pleased to see that this degree of co-operation is evidently continuing. I express the hope that this study and other efforts will lead to an early solution of the problems since this is obviously of great importance to the province of Nova Scotia and indeed to the country as a whole.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, we approve of such a study being made. However, I regret that studies of this nature were not undertaken a long time ago. Much trouble and inconvenience would have been avoided. I agree with the minister that the amount of knowledge on the provincial level is not adequate to deal with this type of problem. I think it can be more properly done by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and I wish them and the province of Nova Scotia well in any such study.

• (11:10 a.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, since I am quite familiar with the problem of the heavy water plant in Glace Bay, I am pleased to make some comments on the minister's statement.

What surprises me is that the federal government wants to assist a Crown corporation established by the former premier of Nova Scotia who is now Leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). This corporation, as we know, is on the verge of bankruptcy. It is a white elephant. It has shown only deficits since the beginning and it costs several million dollars in interests alone.

We know quite well that the leader of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia based its election campaign last year on the possibility of saving the heavy water plant. Now, that plant is completely obsolete and we want to save, at a cost of $300,000, an undertaking that is considered in Nova Scotia as nothing more than a white elephant. Moreover, until now the company has been very badly managed financially.

I wonder how come the federal government now wants to risk an amount of $300,000, unless it is to keep the election promise of the present premier of Nova Scotia, and also to save an undertaking launched by the Leader of the official Opposition, a crown company on the verge of bankruptcy that has never produced an ounce of heavy water to this day.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—WELFARE COSTS—INCREASED FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE UNDER CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Does the government now propose any increased assistance to the provinces and the municipalities in view of the skyrocketing costs of welfare resulting from increasing unemployment? I point out that this is particularly urgent in view of statements such as that made by the Metro Toronto Social Services Commission describing the problem as reaching crisis proportions even in Toronto, that great centre which we normally consider to be one of the most dynamic and prosperous cities in the country.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would agree with the last statement made by the Leader of the Opposition that Toronto is one of the most dynamic and progressive cities on the continent.

[Mr. Thomson.]

Mr. Sharp: In answer to the question that was put to me may I say that the subject of the shares of costs of welfare was discussed at the conference yesterday and will be discussed again today. As I said yesterday in the House, the government has not yet made a decision on the requests of the provinces.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Acting Prime Minister whether this is a subject that can just be considered along these lines? In view of the information that is coming forth daily as to the effect of increasing welfare costs not only upon the people who have to go on welfare but upon the governments directly involved, does he believe this is something than can be let run along, or is the government of Canada now prepared to increase the federal share of assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan in relation to the funds required to meet the costs of welfare, particularly of welfare for those Canadians who are employable?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would expect us to consider the requests before we make any decision. I can assure him that the matter is under active consideration in cabinet, and when a decision is made it will be announced in the House.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister not agree that the government has had about a year to consider this question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT—CONSIDERATION OF INSTITUTION OF GUARANTEED INCOME PLAN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In addition to the consideration that the Acting Prime Minister says will be given to the request for an increase in the percentage paid by the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan, may I ask, particularly in view of the persistence of unemployment, whether the government is also considering the proposal for the early institution of the guaranteed income plan for Canadians?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government was the first in this country to issue a paper on the subject, which indicates our very great interest in the matter. It is, as the white paper indicates, a matter of government policy. This is the direction in which we think we should move.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since the white paper to which the Acting Prime Minister has referred turns down the guaranteed income plan, will the government reconsider it now that it has been requested by a number of the provinces?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the white paper does not turn it down. The government believes that this is the direction in which we should move. I am sure the hon. member will agree that there have been very great advances, as illustrated by many of the discussions now going on with the provinces.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ESTIMATE OF JOBS TO BE PRODUCED BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PLANS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister advise the House as to what the government's response was to the unanimous demand yesterday at the welfare conference by the representatives of all the provinces that the government increase the share it pays under the Canada Assistance Plan to 60 per cent or, if possible, to 65 per cent, since increased unemployment is making it impossible for the provinces and municipalities to meet relief costs?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. gentleman heard my answer to the question asked by his leader. Perhaps he was not listening to what his leader had to say. He asked me precisely that question and I said that the matter is under consideration.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister advise the House as to what was the response of the government to the request of these ministers yesterday—it was more of a demand than a request—for the government's estimate of the number of new jobs which will be produced by the government's unemployment program during the next three months?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday to the hon. member when he asked a similar question, there was a very substantial increase in the number of jobs in Canada in 1970.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: We expect that there will be an even greater increase in the number of jobs, mainly as a result of the measures taken by this government.

Mr. Ricard: There is to be increased unemployment. That is what the minister means.

Mr. Hees: There has been a decrease, not an increase.

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN AT WELFARE MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, since unemployment, according to the minister's statement and the requests of the provincial ministers, is the No. 1 issue at the welfare ministers' conference, may I ask which minister has been designated as the spokesman for the government at the conference on unemployment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the spokesman at the conference is, of course, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since this is a meeting of ministers of welfare, he is speaking for the government at that conference. The whole question, of course, of what measures should be taken to meet the requests of the welfare ministers is a subject for the cabinet as a whole.

UNEMPLOYMENT—NUMBER DRAWING INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister about the government's unemployment program. Has he received reports showing that the total number of people unemployed and drawing unemployment insurance benefits now stands at 756,000?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I cannot vouch for the accuracy of the figure, but I do know that the figure of those receiving unemployment benefits, which indicates the great improvement that has been made in this plan over the years and which is so useful to those who are out of work today, is of the order the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as that figure is of the order I have mentioned, and since it appears to be an integral part of the government's program to increase unemployment, I wonder whether unemployment has yet reached a satisfactory figure in the minister's opinion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Hamilton West rising on a supplementary?

Mr. Alexander: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT—IMMEDIATE AMENDMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT IN VIEW OF INCREASE IN FUND

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): As the unemployment insurance fund has increased from $454 million in September, 1970, to $473 million in December, 1970 and is steadily increasing, indicating that the unemployed either cannot qualify or have exhausted their benefits, a situation that is unbelievable and unacceptable particularly to the more than 500,000 people out of work, will the Acting Prime Minister now accept our advice and bring in the much-needed reforms regarding unemployment insurance?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the government has a firm timetable. It is not going to be deterred by attacks made upon the plan here or elsewhere. We intend to bring this legislation forward. I think it will be a very great improvement.

Mr. Alexander: Will the minister kindly advise what I should tell the 538,000 now out of work? Are they to eat cake?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DELAYS IN PAYMENT OF INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the seriousness of the unemployment situation, will the Acting Prime Minister ask the Minister of Labour to report to the House on Monday on the cause of the extensive and excessive delays in the payment of unemployment insurance benefits and on the measures that will be taken to correct the problem?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I have talked with the Minister of Labour about this situation, Mr. Speaker, and he assures me that a very high proportion of the claims have been met on time, and that those that are delayed are a very small fraction of the total.

Mr. Gleave: In view of the fact that the city of Saskatoon is quite small and I am receiving many complaints, there must be a great deal more than—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A moment ago the Acting Prime Minister referred to the fixed timetable of the government for the introduction of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Does the minister consider the maintenance of a fixed timetable more important than the welfare of the people of this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSING

MONTREAL—EFFECTS OF PROPOSED EXPRESSWAY

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. Will the minister join with the city of Montreal in urging the government of the province of Quebec to abandon the project to extend the trans-Canada highway through the city of Montreal in view of the fact that 2,000 families are likely to be uprooted and it is admitted that there is no other housing in which to place them?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I think I replied to a similar question from the hon. member a few weeks ago.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

OBJECTIONS TO PROPOSED MAXIMUM FAMILY INCOME LEVEL

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government decided when and if it will reply to the provincial ministers in connection with the representations they made on the income security plan as it affects family allowances, particularly the strong objections from the province of Ontario with regard to the maximum cut-off family income level included in the plan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The reason the government put forward its proposals in the form of a white paper was to invite comment. I understand there will be at least some revisions in the plan expressed in the white paper.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Can the minister state when the government is likely to make this announcement so that we can then consider how sincere it may be?

Mr. Sharp: I expect the announcement will be in the form of legislation.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPORTED PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH CIVILIAN SECRET SERVICE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It is in connection with a civilian secret service being established to replace the Royal Canadian Mounted Police security and intelligence agency. Is it a fact that a decision in this regard has been made, as reported in the press, and if that is so will the minister say whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force is to be placed in a position in which it will have no responsibility in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the Acting Prime Minister replies I think I should take exception to the form of the question asked by the right hon. gentleman since it asks for confirmation or denial of a press report. Perhaps we can assume the question has been asked directly, in which case the Acting Prime Minister might be allowed to reply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, with all respect to Your Honour—

An hon. Member: Now, don't get mad, John.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I suggest to you that the manner in which the question period is being restricted places the opposition in a position where it cannot discharge its responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the opposition has been discharging its responsibilities very ably. In any event, the rule to which I have alluded is one of long standing. It is just as easy to ask a question directly, and I must assume at this point that the question has been asked in this way.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, from where I sit I do not see any restriction on the freedom of the opposition to ask questions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Your are the biggest dictator of all in that connection and you would not know.

Mr. Sharp: May I say that there is no substance whatever to the report that has appeared.

Mr. Muir: You are as dull as usual, Sharp.

Mr. Sharp: The government is not considering transferring any of the responsibilities of the RCMP in the field of security to any other agency.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will the minister say whether a civilian secret service group has been or is in the process of being set up?

Mr. Sharp: I thought I had answered that question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just with evasiveness.

Mr. Sharp: There is no substance to the report referred to by the right hon. gentleman. The government has not established such a force and does not intend to do so.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

MONTREAL—ESTABLISHMENT OF CROWN CORPORATION TO PROVIDE TRANSPORT SERVICE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board.

Since a document issued by his department suggests the establishment of a crown corporation to provide a mail carriage service in Montreal, could the hon. minister advise whether he favours this proposal and whether he will urge the government to create this corporation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard this question too clearly, but if it is addressed to me, I can say that the government has considered this proposal and concluded that this solution was not feasible.

POLLUTION

THREAT POSED BY TANKER TRANSPORT OF OIL FROM VALDEZ, ALASKA, TO CHERRY POINT, WASHINGTON

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of vital importance to the province of British Columbia and I should like to direct it to the Minister of Transport. As Atlantic Richfield Oil Company is in the process of building a $150 million refinery complex at Cherry Point adjacent to the British Columbia border to handle Alaskan oil which will reach the refinery in 125,000 ton oil tankers by a water route, which represents a real pollution threat to Canadian territory, has the minister's department been approached by the United States government regarding the possibility of establishing a tanker route between Valdez, Alaska and Cherry Point in the state of Washington?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In spite of the hon. gentleman's reference to the fact that this is a very important matter to the province of British Columbia, it does not appear to me to be a matter of extreme urgency. Perhaps the Minister of Transport should be allowed to reply briefly.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there has been no direct approach made to me of which I am aware, but I will be glad to check to see whether any representations have been made to my officials.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the refinery construction is in progress before any hearings have been held regarding the trans-Alaskan pipeline syndicate application, in which Canada may be interested, will the minister direct inquiries to the United States to determine whether there is any substance to the report that the refinery complex will be in a position to receive Alaskan north slope oil?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do understand the urgency of this question and I can assure the hon. member that we have the situation under scrutiny. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich brought this question up the other day, and I do believe that a very serious problem is involved for the coastal region if in fact these plans proceed.

Mr. Harding: In view of the terrible pollution threat this proposal represents to the whole southwest section of British Columbia's inside passage, would the minister make representations to the United States government to try to stop this project from being constructed in this area?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I have said, we consider this to be a serious problem and we are examining the matter now.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT IN VIEW OF BAIL LEGISLATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to whom to direct this question because there are so many gallivanting ministers of the Crown, with only nine here today—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: —but I hope I can get an answer from the Acting Prime Minister. Since the government is now bringing forward a bill to make bail easier, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether the government has decided to withdraw the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, known as the Turner bill in Quebec? I ask the question because making bail easier would seem to be in contradiction of the Act which is still in effect.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have no plans as yet to withdraw that measure. As I understand it, the province of Quebec still feels that it is desirable to have these special powers.

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the Acting Prime Minister's statement yesterday, does he believe there should be one law with reference to bail as far as the province of Quebec is concerned and another law as far as the rest of Canada is concerned?

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO CONTINUATION OF FEED GRAIN FREIGHT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture; I have given him notice of same. Could the hon. gentleman indicate whether feed grain freight assistance will be continued, as requested at the meeting this week of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, may I express my appreciation to the hon. member for advising me as we were coming into the House that he intended to ask this question. I have not seen the full context of the request in the resolution that was considered at the Canadian Federation of Agriculture convention, but I should remind the hon. member that early last summer we indicated that the rates in effect now will continue until the end of this fiscal year. Of course, in the new fiscal year we will have to bring estimates before the House for the appropriation of funds for the levels we set for that year.

[Mr. Harding.]

Mr. McCleave: I wonder whether the minister would tell me whether he said yes to me or whether he said no?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I attempted to explain to the hon. member some of the procedural requirements relating to the expenditure of funds—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MANPOWER

TEXTILE INDUSTRY—POSSIBLE LAY-OFFS BECAUSE OF RATIONALIZATION POLICY

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Could he give us an estimate of the number of Canadian textile workers who would be laid off as a result of the rationalization policy proposed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning this industry?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, the purpose of the legislation that has been introduced is to strengthen the position of the textile industry. I think it will and I believe that there will be less unemployment than otherwise would be the case.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Could the Acting Prime Minister table in the House as soon as possible a statement on the number of jobs that will be created at Sainte-Scholastique, considering that, apparently, some very definite figures indicate that not more than 50 per cent of the number expected will be created? Could he tell the House how many jobs will be created following the construction of the Sainte-Scholastique airport?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Perhaps I might be permitted to answer that question, Mr. Speaker. I have not actually seen the assessment that was made but I understand it was made privately. It is purely a theoretical projection, and at this stage it is exceedingly difficult to come up with what might be described as a firm figure as to what the total permanent employment picture is going to be.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: I want to ask another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Does the Minister of Transport still believe that it will be possible to make 100,000 new jobs available through the establishment of this airport, as it was indicated—

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTED REINSTITUTION OF SIX-DAY DELIVERY TO PROVIDE JOBS FOR UNEMPLOYED

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Post Office. Before asking my question I should like to congratulate him on his efforts to restore the next-day delivery that Canadians were accustomed to having before his colleague—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time and the hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Hales: In view of the great amount of unemployment in the country, would the minister consider reinstituting six-day delivery, thus creating jobs for many unemployed Canadians?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as I said in reply previously to the leader of the hon. member's party, the recommendation of the Davey report is under study. If this service were now reinstituted, I do not think it would be especially for the purpose of reducing the number of unemployed in the country because I think this problem will be solved very shortly.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF MUNICIPAL LAND BANK

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of housing. In view of an excellent article in the Toronto Telegram in December by the hon. member for Trinity, wherein he said that the Canadian housing situation is bad and getting worse and that the government missed an excellent opportunity—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question without citing the article.

Mr. Gilbert: I think all hon. members should read this article, Mr. Speaker. He said that the government had missed an excellent opportunity in not implementing the recommendation regarding setting up a municipal land bank. Would the minister reconsider that recommendation and perhaps implement it in the near future?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is in the form of a submission and recommendation. He has to assume that the matter will be considered by the minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DISCONTINUANCE OF DINING CAR SERVICE, OTTAWA-MONTREAL

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received any news from Canadian National Railways that they will suspend their plan to discontinue dining car service between Montreal and Ottawa on February 1, which action will further contribute to the unemployment problem and to the seriously deteriorating rail service between the national capital and the metropolis of Montreal?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I have received no such word from the CNR.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, would the minister consider amending the Canadian National Railways Act so as to make that body more responsible to the people of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: —and to ensure that the Canadian people will get the service they expect of a national railway?

CROWN CORPORATIONS

AIR CANADA, CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SUGGESTED REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING AVOIDANCE OF EMPLOYEE LAY-OFFS

Mr. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Would the government of Canada approach those in charge of crown corporations such as Air Canada, Canadian National Railways and others and seek their co-operation in avoiding lay-offs—particularly at a time of heavy winter unemployment—which can only aggravate the already deplorable unemployment situation in this country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is a little behind with his request; this was done some weeks ago by the government.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, is the Acting Prime Minister able to assure the House that the government has received an assurance from these crown corporations that the request of the government will be complied with and that there will be no further lay-offs of the sort announced by Air Canada and the CNR during this season of winter discontent?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would want the CNR, Air Canada and other corporations of this kind to be run as good business ventures. We make the same sort of representations to private companies to do the same thing. We are quite confident that these Crown corporations will pay as much attention as private companies, and I hope a little more to our requests.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister but I see a number of members are trying to ask questions who have been unsuccessful so far. I am trying to get to them as soon as possible.

FREIGHT RATE LEVEL IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES—ACTION TO REMOVE DISCRIMINATION

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Transport. It is related to the question put to him just prior to the Christmas recess concerning the excessively high freight rates presently existing in many parts of western Canada. He stated that soon after the first of the year he or his officials would look into the matter. Is he now in a position to report on what progress has been made?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, shortly before Christmas I had some telephone discussions with Premier Thatcher of Saskatchewan and as a result, a mutually agreeable date, I think within this present week, was agreed upon for officials to travel to Saskatoon for the initial discussions. I will be going there within a matter of a couple of weeks to follow this up.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have made it plain, as have other members of this government, to all provincial governments that the government of Canada considers that the constitutional right to make payments directly to individuals in all parts of Canada is an integral part of Canadian confederation and will not be abandoned.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Considerable progress was made at the meetings this week with the mayor of Regina and other officials of that city. As I recall the timetable, we are going to Regina practically at the same time as the meetings will be held in Saskatoon to which I referred a few minutes ago, and I would hope that if we do not resolve the matter completely at that time it will be sufficiently advanced so that the contracts can be signed and the whole deal completed within the present year.

Is the minister aware of the cutback in housing on the Clandeboye and Fisher River district reserves in Manitoba and would he look into the matter to determine why this program has been cut back at this time?

MOROCCAN AID PROGRAM—UNDERWRITING OF COST

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister dealing with the $300 million aid program negotiated and signed jointly by the governments of Quebec, Canada and Morocco. Can the Acting Prime Minister indicate to the House whether the federal government intends to underwrite the total cost of this program, namely, $300 million?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. gentleman has his figures wrong. He must have lost the decimal point. But I can tell him that this project is a project of the Canadian International Development Agency which is being undertaken in co-operation with the province of Quebec. It is an expenditure of the federal government and we are very gratified that the province of Quebec is co-operating so closely with us.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate the total cost of the program because the Globe and Mail reported that the cost of this program jointly negotiated—

SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION OF ROAD LINKING LABRADOR COMMUNITIES AND QUEBEC

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent announcement of curtailment of military and civilian forces at Goose Bay, will the minister expedite government consideration of the recommendation of the Transport Committee which was concurred in by the government over a year ago regarding federal participation in the building of a highway linking major Labrador communities to the province of Quebec?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since the announcement or indeed prior to the announcement of the phasing down of operations at Goose Bay there has been an interdepartmental committee working on this question not merely involving that particular proposal of the Transport Committee but also a number of alternatives. I would hope we would reach some conclusions shortly as to what are the most appropriate steps we can take.

BAY OF FUNDY TIDES—REOPENING OF PROJECT STUDIES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge there is no request from either of the provinces which participated in the study to have it reopened at the present time.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, in light of the absence of a formal request or discussion between the province of Nova Scotia and the federal authority, would the minister use his good offices to make sure that this project when it is developed does involve all three levels of government and not just one?

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, on November 27, 1970, the President of the Treasury Board replied as follows to a question of mine:

> The government is now reviewing the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Since there seems to be some confusion about the precise nature of this review, I should like to ask whether a review of the Public Service Staff Relations Act is currently in progress and, if so, are the staff associations whose members will be affected by any subsequent changes being consulted?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the review is currently in progress. As the Public Service Staff Relations Board reports to the House through the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, perhaps I should let him answer concerning the plans for consultation.

INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the uncertainty that exists in the country or has been developing in the past few months, can the minister indicate whether the government will be making a clearcut statement with regard to the question of foreign investment in Canada in the near future?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As has been said on a number of occasions, the government has the matter under consideration. One of the ministers is charged with making a report to the cabinet, which has not yet been made. I cannot predict when it will be made.

Mr. Yewchuk: Can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether the government has had a chance to look at the committee report, which has become popularly known as the Wahn report, with regard to Canada-U.S. relations. Has the government had a look at this report and does it accept the recommendations of that committee?

Mr. Sharp: Of course we have looked at it. It was a report of a committee of the House. The government has not taken any position on it.

Mr. Yewchuk: Can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether this report will be discussed or debated in the House of Commons in the near future?

Mr. Sharp: I do not have control over such a debate. I do not know.

AGRICULTURE

ENCOURAGEMENT TO FARMERS TO MARKET LIGHTER WEIGHT HOGS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I had questions for two different ministers but they have both left the House. I will direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the surplus of hogs and the corresponding low prices on Canadian markets, would the minister consider encouraging farmers to market hogs of a lighter weight by making changes in the pricing and grading formulas?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Burton: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising out of the fact that some ministers who are due to be present in the House today according to the government's roster system have already left although the question period is not over. This makes a mockery of the parliamentary institution.

An hon. Member: They will be here on Monday.

NEWFOUNDLAND CONFERENCE—ASSURANCE THAT NEW PROGRAMS WILL BE FIRST ANNOUNCED IN HOUSE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I want to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It is prompted by a question put to the Minister of Transport by my colleague, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. In view of the participation in the economic conference sponsored by the Newfoundland government to start in St. John's next week by three federal cabinet ministers, can the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that no new federal programs will be announced for that province until parliament has been informed first?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I do not know whether I can give that undertaking. It is not that I know of any that are going to be announced, but sometimes questions are asked and sometimes it is quite appropriate for ministers to make statements outside the House before making them here. It is not an invariable rule that ministers must make their statements in the House first and, as hon. members know, there are occasions when it is important and in the public interest that announcements be made outside the House before being made here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But it is a parliamentary rule.

Mr. McGrath: The government has announced that there will be substantial federal participation in a proposed master plan to be unveiled by the government of Newfoundland. In view of the fact that the Newfoundland Members of Parliament have been denied access to this conference, I again ask the Acting Prime Minister if he will assure the House that no new federal initiatives will be announced for the province of Newfoundland until parliament has been informed first?

Mr. Sharp: I have nothing to add to the statement I have already made.

Mr. Speaker: The question period expired a few minutes ago. However, I believe the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has a supplementary to a previous question.

TRADE

IMPORTS OF BEEF—POSSIBLE QUOTA AGREEMENT WITH NEW ZEALAND

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to put my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In his absence, possibly I could put it to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the previous decision to cut off imports of New Zealand beef because it was creating problems in the Canadian as well as in the United States market, can the Parliamentary Secretary inform the House whether the government is prepared to work out a quota agreement with New Zealand on imports of beef similar to those now existing for butter and dairy products so that the situation can be regularized?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I had the privilege last evening of debating the subject in the House with the hon. member, and I pointed out that if a problem should arise again with regard to imports of Australian and New Zealand beef the government anticipates it would be able to take appropriate action on the same basis as that taken last summer when the problem arose at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

TABLING OF REPORT ON PRIMARY NICKEL PRICES

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions for a moment.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree to allow the Parliamentary Secretary to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jerome: I should like to table on behalf of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs two copies each in the two official languages of the report by the Prices and Incomes Commission on primary nickel prices.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL RE-ORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Thursday, January 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury (for the Prime Minister) that Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): When I was speaking yesterday evening, I expressed my astonishment at the fact that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) in introducing this bill had suggested that if passed it would enhance the control of Parliament over the executive. I had, by way of illustration to counter his astonishing statement, made some reference to the proposed department of environment. I suggested that this department had already been created by Order in Council and that, therefore, to ask us now to approve its establishment was making a mockery of the concept of the control of Parliament over the executive, rather than the reverse. A few fancy bits of verbiage and a new name do not in any way alter the substance of what the government has already done by Order in Council under the authority of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act.

I think it is pertinent to this debate that we should dust off this Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act. It appears to have been on our statute books for a long while. It has not been amended since the Revised Statutes of 1952, and if I read it correctly there, it was taken intact from the Revised Statutes of 1927. I have not pursued its history further back than that. It has only two sections in addition to the Title. I submit it is time we took a look at its terms in detail, and that in fact it should be part of the record of the discussion on this government organization bill. So, I would like to quote from it. Section 2 of the act reads:

> The Governor in Council may (a) transfer any powers, duties or functions or the control or supervision of any part of the public service from one Minister of the Crown to any other Minister of the Crown, or from one department or portion of the public service to any other department or portion of the public service; or (b) amalgamate and combine any two or more departments under one Minister of the Crown and under one deputy minister.

Section 3 reads:

> Whenever under the provisions of this Act, or under any other lawful authority, any power, duty or function, or the control or supervision of any part of the public service is transferred from one Minister of the Crown to any other Minister of the Crown, or from one department or branch of the public service to any other department or branch of the public service, the Minister, department or branch to which the power, duty, function, control or supervision is transferred, and the appropriate officers of that department or branch, shall, in relation thereto, be substituted for and have and may exercise the respective powers and duties that formerly belonged to or were exercisable by the minister, department or branch and the respective officers of the department or branch from which the power, duty, function, control or supervision is so transferred as aforesaid.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, that is the complete text of that act which has been sitting on our statute books for a long while.

It is important in this context because, as the President of the Treasury Board himself said in his introductory speech the government, in latter years, had been making increasingly wide use of the powers which are conferred by this statute. In fact, Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out last night the department for which it is proposed to substitute the new department of environment was, in fact, created in this way, as I indicated by making a reference to the introduction to the first annual report of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. So, I think it is quite pertinent that we should examine the situation in respect of the government organization bills which are becoming an annual event in the sessions of this Parliament.

If, in fact, we were being asked to repeal, or amend, or alter the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, so as to reduce the authority of the government to move segments of the public service about at will from one part of the ministry to another, then I suppose the veracity of the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board would be emphasized but,

Mr. Speaker, that is not what we are being asked to do. I suggest that the debate on this bill is well focused upon the question of just what direction we are heading in relation to the whole question of the authority of the executive to manage the public service and the authority, if any, that Parliament should be able to exercise.

In considering this question I thought I would put forward a form of a bill which I think perhaps actually represents more closely the real state of affairs at this moment than does the exercise which the government has proposed for us in the government organization bill that we are debating. I would like to suggest this as an appropriate statement of the actual state of affairs which currently exists as far as the relationship between the parliamentary branch and the executive branch of the government of Canada is concerned, and in particular with reference to the developing position of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the picture, which has been touched upon by some of the other speakers in this debate. So, Mr. Speaker, this is a draft bill. It reads:

Government Organization Act, 1970

An Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

9. This Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation at the pleasure of the Prime Minister.

Schedule A.

Every Act heretofore or hereinafter enacted.

• (12:10 p.m.)

You may have recognized, Mr. Speaker, that I have put forward this proposal with tongue in cheek. I have done so to emphasize the point that, for all practical purposes, my proposal represents very closely the actual state of affairs in our governmental system at present. If we are to consider the realities of the situation, perhaps we ought to consider the form as well. Parliament ought not to be asked to go annually through this exercise, as we are now being asked to participate in this debate, unless this House is to have some real authority over the nature of what government departments shall be brought into being from time to time. In the absence of that authority, I think we should simply recognize that this matter lies entirely within the prerogative of the executive and in the hands of the Prime Minister, and be done with it. At least that would give us a greater opportunity for assessing and discussing real legislative proposals upon which the operations of the government must hinge.

There are bills before us that have substance and that will have an impact on the future. We passed several during the previous session. For example, the Canada Water Act is the kind of bill that will affect the future operations of the government in relation to the welfare of the Canadian people. Unless the government can agree, when dealing with such questions as organization, to place before Parliament propositions of significance and meaning which Parliament can debate and decide in order to give real guidance to the course the government should take in the organization of the operations of the public service, we ought to have done with the kind of mockery we are witnessing now. Instead of discussing a fait accompli with regard, for example, to the establishment of a department of the environment, we ought to have the opportunity, if the government believes that Parliament should have the power to direct some general trends of government organization, of expressing ourselves on the basic concept before the department is established and not after it has been created. That, Mr. Speaker, is the meat of this debate, especially when one looks at the matter in the light of the terms which were set out by the President of the Treasury Board in his initial remarks.

Debate might be more real or meaningful if the government were to introduce in resolution from the concept underlying the setting up of a new department or underlying the division of the operations of the government. I made a rough draft of the kind of resolution that might be considered in the context of the current debate. If, before action was taken under the Transfer of Duties Act to create the department of the environment, we had been given the opportunity of telling the government what we thought the nature of that department ought to be, what general areas of operation it ought to be involved in and what jurisdiction it ought to exercise and then perhaps allow the government to look after the details of transfers of branches or subbranches in order to build the appropriate organization based on a concept approved by Parliament, and if a resolution along the lines I shall read in a minute had been introduced in the previous session and agreed to by the House, then, I suggest, not too much criticism could have been levelled at the transfer, for example of the wildlife service from one ministry to the new department of the environment.

In order to emphasize my feelings on this matter, Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest that the House might have adopted a resolution along the following lines:

Resolved:

That there be established a Ministry of the Environment, with duties, powers and functions extending, within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, over renewable resources and the protection and enhancement of the quality of the natural environment, including water, air and soil quality; such duties and powers to include the implementation and administration of all relevant legislation enacted by Parliament, including that related to water, fisheries, forests, migratory birds and other wild animal and plant life; And be it further resolved: that the appropriate existing branches and agencies within the Public Service be transferred to, and co-ordinated within the proposed Ministry of the Environment.

If we had been given an opportunity to participate in a debate on such a resolution before the establishment of the department, instead of after, we could have embarked on a really meaningful debate in Parliament which could have been of value in guiding the government on the details of its organization. For example, in view of the overlapping in certain areas of government, we could have discussed whether any elements or government organizations dealing with the soil of Canada ought to be removed from the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture and placed under the jurisdiction of the new department. We could have embarked on a meaningful debate over the question of whether the management of the commercial fisheries of Canada ought to remain the responsibility of the ministry of fisheries or be transferred to the ministry of the environment. We could have debated the question of whether the parks branch should remain within the rather strange, existing structures of the Department of Indians Affairs and Northern Development, or whether it might more appropriately come within the department of the environment. The Parks branch now seems to be a sort of appendage to the department headed by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). If we are increasingly to use our present methods, what is the point in even bothering to go through this kind of hollow exercise which deals only with the outer shell and not with the meat of the change in government structure and organization. I think it is time for Parliament to indicate that we ought to call a halt to the present trend in government actions.

Although I have not consulted the relevant debates, I imagine that the Transfer of Duties Act was intended to be used for the sort of minor transfer arrangements that create some flexibility in the operations of government. I am quite sure that the parliamentarians who agreed to the passage of that bill, and who put it on our statute books, did not envisage that one day the executive, of its own accord, would use the authority of that law to create out of the blue entirely new departments embracing new concepts of government. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge hon. members of the House to consider the implications of what we did this year, last year, the year before that and the year before that, in dealing with omnibus bills relating to government organization.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, a great many members on this side of the House have already voiced their objections to this kind of omnibus bill. It is not my intention to repeat what has been said. However, I wish to state that I agree with the position of my colleagues in this party and members of other opposition parties. The basic problem is that hon. members, including government members, are faced with the situation, as the old expression goes, of having to throw out the baby with the bath water. In other words, there are many things in this bill that should be separated. I cannot understand why the government would not like to have on the record the unanimous support of the House on some aspects of this bill. On the other hand, there are some sections of this bill which a great many members, including government members, may not wholeheartedly support.

With regard to the phrase the "baby and the bathwater", the baby part of the bill deals with the new department of the environment. I think all hon. members are generally in favour of that, particularly in view of the fact that it will come under the auspices of one of the better ministers of the cabinet. No government is all bad. There are some good ministers in the present cabinet. Certainly, the minister who is proposed to head this new department is in this category.

The matter of having the whole problem of pollution under one department has been promoted by my colleagues for approximately a year. Perhaps the government does sometimes pay attention to suggestions from the opposition. If so, we welcome that. It is ridiculous to have some aspects of pollution under the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis), some aspects under the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), some under the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and some under the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene). The federal government is very limited in what it can do with regard to pollution. It is very gratifying to learn that the authority, and resulting co-ordination, will at least come under one minister, a very capable minister at that.

Having dealt with the baby, I now wish to deal with the bathwater part of the bill. The bathwater part of the bill deals with the creation of ministers of the state, Parliamentary Secretaries and the like.

Mr. Crouse: That is pretty dirty water.

Mr. Nesbitt: Our rules of Parliament are properly designed so that we cannot impute motives to individuals in this House. No one really knows what is going on inside someone else's head. Sometimes they do not know themselves. Knowing the background of this present session of Parliament, a reasonable person could only reach one conclusion. By means of this omnibus bill, the government is indirectly attempting to do something that it does not want to do directly. When the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was asked what the just society meant, he said "just for grits". The legislation before us amply justifies that remark.

As hon. members are aware, suggestions have been made at various times that the government might do something about increasing the salaries and allowances of members of this House. Because the suggestions were not adequately presented to the public, they met with considerable resistance. This is chiefly because the public have not been made aware of the expenses and costs faced by members of this House. This is one of the weaknesses of Information Canada. However, that is another matter. Apparently the government is not anxious to present legislation to increase members' salaries at the present time. Some members opposite asked what could be done to get government members off the hook, and to forget about the opposition members. This bill is evidence of what is happening.

This bill recommends the appointment of five additional ministers of state. As I understand the bill, they will receive an additional $15,000 a year. That is pretty good. At the present time there are 28 cabinet ministers. If this bill is passed, there will be 33. As far as I know, there is nothing to prevent the Prime Minister from appointing an additional number of ministers without portfolio who will receive an additional $7,500 per year. It is also suggested that there be as many Parliamentary Secretaries as ministers. They will receive an additional $4,000 per year. This is a very interesting arrangement. If and when this legislation is passed, there will be 33 ministers of state and ministers without portfolio, and 33 Parliamentary Secretaries for a total of 66. In addition, there are 25 committee chairmen.

At the moment, these committee chairmen do not receive an additional stipend, only a title. However, they may eventually receive more. According to what we hear, there is considerable stirring among the backbench government members. They can hardly be blamed because, at the time of the last election, many were persuaded to run on the basis that eventually there would be an increase in the stipend or something else would be forthcoming. It is easy to understand how this bill came about.

In the past, people have accused the Prime Minister of having socialist inclinations. I do not agree with that. In view of this legislation, the Prime Minister must be a prime promoter of good, old-fashioned capitalism and incentives. The creation of additional ministers of state, ministers without portfolio and Parliamentary Secretaries, is a wonderful way of keeping people under control. If a member of the government is a good boy and has some ability, he will be made a minister of state. If he is not quite as good, he might be made a minister without portfolio. If a member behaves and keeps his nose clean, he may become a Parliamentary Secretary. If he is bad, he may be made a committee chairman with no additional money, only a bit of honour. If he is really bad, he will be put in the sin bin and not receive anything extra. That is the way it goes. It is fairly easy to switch Parliamentary Secretaries on the excuse that everyone should have the opportunity of showing their wares. This is a good idea. It also brings in a good income.

Many people have the uneasy feeling that by introducing this bill the government is establishing a device to reward government members with extra income and at the same time ensuring that opposition members do not receive anything extra. This is a sort of Machiavellian way of doing things. It is to be expected. We do not know where this idea originated. Undoubtedly, there are members opposite who are capable of thinking of such things. It is nice for members to have titles and extra money. It is nice to have the title of a Privy Councillor so that when you leave this House you can put the initials P.C. after your name.

• (12:30 p.m.)

The Prime Minister was apparently a good student. He must have spent a good deal of time reading about a man who was a dictator in Haiti for a good many years, Henri Christophe, who met a very sad fate. He died with a silver bullet in his head. He had a very interesting way of dealing with things. He liked to have a lot of flatterers around him, but he did not have the money to pay them. Unlike the present government, he did not have the means of extracting money from the people. He gave all these people round him titles. He did not call them ministers of state, nothing as pedestrian as that. Mr. Speaker, I am not making this up, this is on the record. He called people the Duke and Duchess of Lemonade, the Count of Sugar Cane and the like. I am rather surprised that the Prime Minister, with his inventive mind, did not think of something like this for the members of this Parliament. He could easily have appointed somebody from London, Ontario as the Baron of Blizzard, or somebody from the Windsor or Sarnia area could have been given the title of Prince of Pollution or something of that type. I am surprised that he did not do this in view of his inventiveness and imagination.

Mr. McBride: What about the Marquis of Maple Syrup?

Mr. Nesbitt: That is a good suggestion from the hon. member for Renfrew-Lanark-Carleton (Mr. McBride) the Marquis of Maple Syrup. Perhaps he would like to have that title; it is nice and sugary. Perhaps my thinking is not as accurate as it might be in this regard, but in view of the evidence I do not see how anybody could come to any other reasonable conclusion.

Let us consider the remainder of this bill. We have dealt with the watery portions of the bill. There is a great deal of verbiage, a lot of shifting and shuffling of cabinet ministers and those areas falling within their jurisdictions. I think it is probably a good idea that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) has been given responsibility for everything that could be sold. I think this is probably a good idea. I hope the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) will remain in the same position so we will not have people in manpower offices all around the country receiving advice from other ministers. Most of this shuffling and shifting that is going on reminds me of the old shell and pea game we used to see at county fairs; first you see the pea and then you don't.

The government has become worried about the image of the Prime Minister as created by the public relations people. It has now become apparent that, in fact, what has happened has been that, to paraphrase Mr. Marshall McLuhan, logic has become mystery. I should like to change that slightly and refer to the attitude of the government as being one in which shadow has become substance. The government is great in this field. It always presents what it intends to do by doctoring up these shadows and presenting them as substance. This is merely an example of shadow and substance being the same.

We have heard a great deal about participatory democracy. Much of this image has been created by Information Canada and other government agencies. The government does not accept suggestions from this side of the House. Members on the government side feel that no one on this side has any good ideas. The acceptance of a suggestion from this side seems to be considered by the government as a sign of weakness, unless there is a great deal of pressure accompanying the suggestion.

I am surprised that the government did not take advantage of the omnibus bill to accept and implement the idea of an ombudsman. As everyone in this House knows, this idea has worked very well in a number of other countries including Finland, Sweden, New Zealand and others. I understand it has worked very well in Alberta, and I am surprised the government has not accepted the idea. The more a central government becomes involved in various aspects of human life, the more it alienates citizens from government authority. An ombudsman would do a great deal to alleviate this situation.

I was looking over a number of files I have in my office. I discovered one in respect of a widow of a serviceman in the Royal Canadian Navy. He was killed two or three years ago as a result of the greatest possible negligence on the part of authorities on the ship on which he was serving. His widow was denied any account of what actually took place and she was unable to take appropriate action against the Crown. This woman had a number of children and there is apparently no remedy for her situation.

I have another file respecting an elderly lady in my own city who slipped on ice on the Post Office steps and was seriously injured. A representative of the Public Works Department who was employed there came around and told her that the ice should not have been on the steps. He said she had a valid complaint and she should put her complaint in the mail within a week. She accepted that advice and did so. The government of that day, which was the same party in power today, said she had not sent in a formal notice and was not entitled to any compensation.

I have another file in my hand in respect of a man in the Armed Forces who was badly injured while on duty. He tried to obtain compensation but the Department of National Defence refused to give him anything. I am sure every Member of Parliament could cite examples of this kind of thing. This is further evidence in support of the need for the appointment of an ombudsman. An ombudsman would get right to the seat of the difficulty, which results from the bureaucracy of the civil service, and would put a stop to the infernal policies of secrecy adopted by every branch of organized government.

Let me cite an example of this secrecy which came to light as a result of a letter I received two days ago from a constituent. He is a druggist in the city in which I live. I do not think he is an admirer of the present government but he said he was glad to find that the present government was very anxious to keep its correspondence clear, concise and untroubled. In an open letter which was enclosed in an envelope from the Department of National Health and Welfare was a sheet of paper with absolutely nothing on it. Apparently, this represents the policy of secrecy.

This policy of secrecy applies in many other ways. Perhaps by referring again to Haiti I can make my point. The government there was attempting to change some of the directives of Papa Doc Duvalier. This type of thing is taking place apparently in respect of government organizations or agencies such as Air Canada. We have heard evidence of the use of electronic devices to determine the efficiency of its employees in the two official languages. This is a rather shocking type of inspection.

When I first came into this House a Liberal government was in power. At that time that government attempted to use the same techniques in respect of post office employees. Television cameras were installed in the washrooms in the post office at Peterborough. I cannot imagine what the purpose was, but it was suggested that the government wanted to find out whether people were stealing things. After a great deal of pressure was applied, the government was forced to abandon this project. I certainly hope that this kind of behaviour and activity will cease forthwith.

Other examples of government secrecy have been apparent in this House in the last couple of days. My hon. friends to my left are always asking for the production of papers. I do not recall more than one or two instances during this session of Parliament when these requests have been accepted. It certainly is not the custom of this government to give out information respecting memoranda between departments. Everyone knows that this sort of thing is taking place and that the government makes a fetish of secrecy. This reminds me of my association with the Department of External Affairs when junior foreign service officers made a great thing of placing a high degree of classification on all information. It seems to me it is very dangerous to treat everything as being secret. It is like the boy who cried wolf. Sometimes when you really want to keep something secret people treat it with carelessness, and this is the only result of trying to keep everything secret. I suggest some steps should have been taken by the government in this bill to try to prevent this complete hiding of all information, even of the most trivial and inconsequential nature, from the people of Canada, not to mention members of the opposition whose job it is, under our parliamentary system, to criticize the mistakes of government and offer solutions or alternative methods.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Another thing the government should have done but did not is this. We have had enough complaints, even complaints from members on the government side, about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I do not want to elaborate on this matter; I have said enough about it in the House over the years. However, I do want to say that it is apparently the accepted pattern of behaviour in public affairs broadcasts made by the corporation for individuals to use these public facilities, which are made available to them at great cost to the public, as an instrument to try to brainwash the people of Canada by expressing their own particular political, personal and economic views.

I do not have to enlarge on this because every member of the House knows that this sort of thing is done regularly. Members on both sides of the House have been very anxious to put some kind of control on those using the facilities of that organization to promote their own political, personal and economic philosophies. Many things could be done, but one suggestion is that we establish a parliamentary committee, on which no party is dominant, which could entertain complaints made by the public and others and then make recommendations to the CBC.

Then, there is the related matter of controlling actions emanating from government commissions. Certainly, from what we have heard this week some control needs to be exercised over the Public Service Commission. The Unemployment Insurance Commission has been having a grand time during the last few years conducting a virtual reign of terror among various sections of the public, interpretating the act in its own way. The commission follows the pattern in, "Alice in Wonderland", being both judge and jury. This can be said not only of this commission but of most government commissions.

These commissions were set up with the very best of intentions. There was to be no political interference. Although I have heard suggestions in former days with regard to the public service, I have never found any great evidence of interference. All of these commissions and crown corporations like the CNR, Air Canada and so on, were set up on the understanding there was to be no political interference. But once you have created a Frankenstein monster, which in theory is responsible to Parliament as a whole, you in fact have created a monster that is responsible to no one.

As any hon. member who has been in this House for some time well knows, there is no way you can deal with the administration of these commissions, even though they are public emanations. The public pays $180 million a year to maintain the CBC. I am not suggesting that members of parliament should be allowed to meddle in the running of crown corporations, but I do suggest there should be some degree of control by the House in actual practice.

Perhaps an arrangement similar to what I have suggested for the CBC would be workable, but it is clear that something must be done to control the activities of some corporations. I think the government would be the first to welcome this suggestion, in view of the action taken by the Public Service Commission during the last few days—at least if what the government says is true. Only this morning the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) suggested in the House that something must be done to make crown corporations such as the CNR and Air Canada conform to public policy, particularly as it relates to unemployment at the present time. Only a few moments ago members on the government side gave a round of applause to the hon. member for that suggestion, indicating their support, and I give him my support as well.

Another step that could be taken would be the improvement of the committee system of Parliament. A new committee system was introduced a couple of years ago with high hopes. To be perfectly fair, a great many government members of these committees have exhibited a great deal of independence and have put forward some very good ideas. But what has happened to the committees' reports? I was a member of the transportation committee at the time the committee went on an expensive junket to look into Maritime transportation problems. But before the committee had returned to Ottawa the government had acted on some of the matters the committee was considering.

The defence committee took a two or three week trip to Cyprus, West Germany, Sweden, to hell's half acre one might say, and submitted what was almost an unanimous report on defence policy. Although this report was supported by most government members, again it was completely disregarded by the government. Then, suggestions were made by the veterans committee, and there was the notorious incident with the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development whose unanimous suggestion was ignored.

Now, everybody knows that no government can be expected to accept every report of every committee; that would be clearly ridiculous. But it does seem that some arrangement should be made to oblige the government to pay some attention to reports made by committees, particularly unanimous reports. The government's attitude has a very bad effect on Parliament as a whole. Those members who work very hard on committees, and spend long hours devoting their attention to them, are treated like children playing house. If committees are merely a means of keeping people occupied around here, then this situation is not satisfactory.

Another matter that should have been dealt with in the bill, and which I will not deal with at length, is limiting the staff and expenses of cabinet ministers. Since we now have a cabinet that is about three times as big as it was previously, some limit should be placed on expenses. I remember some years ago one cabinet minister—I am not going to mention his name because that would not be proper, but if hon. members want to know they can see me afterwards privately—who had his office redecorated about four times in one year. He had a gold coloured rug on the floor, gold handles on his door and all that sort of thing. There is no excuse for this. If we are going to have a multiplicity of cabinet appointments, then something should be done to limit expenses.

My final suggestion relates to a most important matter. Members on both sides of the House have talked about our youth. Some say youth is bad, others say that it has never had a chance. We hear references to the generation gap and to other trite expressions. But no one to my knowledge ever does anything about youth. I asked a question about the plans for student employment this summer, and I was told that the government was formulating plans and getting around to dealing with that matter. Apparently responsibility has been divided between the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang). It is the old story of too many cooks not only spoiling the broth but not making any broth at all.

It seems to me that the government has missed a glorious opportunity here. I hope that before this bill receives second reading the government will consider withdrawing it and accepting some of the suggestions made by members on this side of the House. The government can then bring in a bill all of us can be proud of, one which would greatly assist future operations of this or any other government.

Therefore, I hope the government gives serious consideration to establishing a department of youth. I do not refer to some phony department that does not do anything but to one that would really turn its attention to two very important matters, one of which may well affect the basic future of Canada, especially during the next 25 to 30 years. To a certain degree, this suggestion had been adopted by a minister of the previous Liberal government, Miss LaMarsh. I was not always an admirer of Miss LaMarsh, but in this case she did something very good. During centennial year she arranged for young people from all provinces to travel across Canada. They were able to visit in other provinces for a few days. Nothing could have been more valuable in terms of the future of this country. Young people, for example from Quebec, had an opportunity to visit Saskatchewan and vice versa and young people from southern Ontario had an opportunity to visit Newfoundland. One thing is certain. Twenty-five years from now the people who now are in the age bracket between 12 and 20 will be running this country. If these people live in virtual isolation they might develop many built-in prejudices. They might have suspicions in respect of what people in other parts of Canada are trying to do against them. Such things are bound to arise in a country such as ours with its great distances.

One problem Canada has always had has involved the suspicion the English and French-speaking members of the population have had of one another. This is only natural. If people are unable to communicate there is bound to be suspicion. There is enough suspicion between the Maritimes and Ontario about economic problems and yet the people speak the same language. However, when we have the additional problem of language, the situation becomes worse. One way to get around this difficulty is by helping the young people move around the country so that they will have an opportunity to talk to each other. In my area we have had students from all parts of Canada visit us on an exchange basis. Nothing could be better for the future of our country. At the present time, when large numbers of high school and university students are out of work, it would be money well spent—instead of pouring it down the drain in respect of the CBC and some other institutions—to provide funds so that these young people could travel. I do not suggest that the arrangements should be elaborate. The young people I know would not want this.

The young people would like an opportunity to visit other parts of the country. If we could help them do this we would be performing a real service to our country and its future. The young people would be occupied in this way rather than being influenced by the rabble rousers who are not interested in what is good for the future of Canada. We know that last year many of our young people were on the highways without proper food and the other necessities. One can expect people to be resentful about this. This is a plan the government might consider implementing this summer, in view of the unemployment situation which faces our young people. They might not earn any money in this way but at least they would get a wonderful appreciation of what our country is and could be.

There is one final comment I should like to make. I believe that not only the young people of our country—and I get around every year to all the high schools in my area—but also many of the middle-aged and older people have no real idea how Parliament or our government operates. I do not know how we can expect the average citizen to respect this institution when he has little knowledge concerning how it works. So far as I am concerned, no adequate book has been written on the subject of how Parliament operates. Most people think that members sit here all day listening to golden words or little pearls of wisdom. When a debate is in progress, such as is the case now, they say that hardly anyone is present. We all know the reasons for this, but the public does not know or does not understand. Frequently, we are compared to the United States. You can bet your bottom dollar every young person in the United States knows how the Congress works, how the committee system works and what the powers of the President are. Very few people in Canada have any idea how our system of government works.

Perhaps the government, with the co-operation of the provinces, the CBC, and through the use of pamphlets and the press could help our young people understand how our democratic parliamentary system works and why it is not necessary to go to the streets in order to put ideas across. So many people say that nobody pays any attention to them. They say the country is undemocratic and that they have to take to the streets. That idea is promoted by people in Canada for their own ends. Many people have no idea how parliamentary democracy works or how the cabinet system works. This situation must be changed if we expect the country to flourish in the future. If the educational system of our country, in the hands of the provinces, is not working in this regard something must be done to make it work. Our system of government has been worked out over the centuries. It is a very flexible system. Something must be done so that future Canadians will appreciate and understand it. If this is not done, then anything else that is done in this House will be of little value to the future of our country.

I hope the government will make some appropriate changes in this bill so that it might incorporate some of the suggestions which not only I have made but which other hon. members have made and probably will make within the next few days.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, at this point may I call it one o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is unanimous consent the Chair can call it one o'clock. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I leave the Chair to resume the same at 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Honey): Is the hon. member for Mercier rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Boulanger: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I wish to inform Your Honour that on the opposition side the clock shows three o'clock. I wonder whether it is because the opposition has nothing else to say but the fact remains that time is running fast on the opposition side. I would like this situation dealt with.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: I want to make a correction, Mr. Speaker. I think, in all fairness, it must be pointed out that we are always ahead of the government.

Mr. Hogarth: When one considers who is going to speak this afternoon, I think we should call it five o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Forrestall: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. If one assesses what has been accomplished with regard to the great plight we are in today, we might as well quit now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If hon. members on both sides of the House are not impelled to speak too long this afternoon, we might notice that clock for the purpose of adjournment.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I am greatly cheered by the enthusiasm with which I am awaited.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: I really did not think that anyone on the government side would rise and ask the opposition to get going. After the going over they got this morning, I thought they would be very pleased if the opposition benches were not too well filled.

Mr. Walker: We are still waiting for something sensible.

Mr. Gleave: While you are waiting for something sensible, we are waiting for something constructive.

An hon. Member: You will just have to wait longer.

Mr. Gleave: Undoubtedly so. If this bill is passed, we will have a few extra ministers to help the cause along. I hope they will be more effective than the ones we have now.

The bill before us contains some proposals to deal with our environment. According to one press report, it is man's greed that is supposed to be the real culprit responsible for the damage that has been done to our environment. The article goes on to describe the Ottawa River as a flowing sewer which is at the service of a group of pulp companies. This may be so. I am willing to accept the description of it by the hon. member on the government side. What surprises me a little is that it took the government so long to make this finding, since the situation has been evident for a while now. Perhaps it took them that long also to find out that greed is necessary to the functioning of the economic system which the people on the government side so fondly embrace. Why they are so surprised to see it evident in our economy passes my understanding.

• (2:10 p.m.)

The proliferation of departments and the appointment of extra ministers will not change that situation to any degree. A government which can view present unemployment with equanimity will scarcely solve the problem of unemployment by setting up another department. It will scarcely solve the problem I mentioned this morning, namely, that people in my constituency and indeed in other parts of Canada who are thrown out of work and apply for unemployment insurance payments to which they are entitled, find themselves waiting for six, seven or eight weeks before they get benefits.

What is really necessary is to have the departments presently responsible for these matters operate more effectively and efficiently. Sometimes I think the government has fallen prey to its own propaganda, to its own myths, to its own shibboleths. Cabinet ministers think the just society has really arrived. Perhaps if they would take a good sampling of public opinion instead of creating other departments they would do something about the reality in which they live.

I am concerned to some extent about the matter of environment. This bill refers to soil and water. I just wonder if the new minister will be able to work with those ministers who are responsible for agricultural matters in order to bring about a rational land conservation policy. Last spring we had a program which called for the summer fallowing of a great deal of acreage in western Canada. In fact, it forced farmers to summer fallow land for two years in succession. Mr. Speaker, you can scarcely conceive of a policy that would be more destructive of the basic soil on which our agricultural community depends. You can hardly conceive of a policy which would lead to more water and soil erosion than this type of program.

I wonder if the new minister in charge of improving the quality of the environment will be able to meet with his counterparts and take effective action to protect the environment. In view of the way our cities are expanding I wonder if policies can be developed which will enable feed lots and other agricultural enterprises to fit into the urban picture so that all the needs of our people will be met. Too often, large feed lots and other agricultural enterprises are situated close to cities. On occasion the urban spread encircles farms, and then people living within the urban area demand that things like livestock enterprises, which they find unpleasant, should no longer be carried on within that area. This is not the result of planning, and indicates that no decision has been made that this or that area is suitable for this or that purpose. This situation is the result of speculation, of the greed which is described in this article. I very much doubt that those who drew up this bill were much concerned about these sorts of situations which relate to land use.

[Mr. Gleave.]

I am reasonably sure that the government has been fairly ineffective in dealing with pollution. I recall the situation in Manitoba and the mercury pollution which resulted from discharges into the Saskatchewan River system. I am certainly not aware of the federal government acting in concert with Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta to discuss the matter with chemical and other industrial companies. Instead of that happening, the province of Manitoba launched a law suit against pulp companies and chemical companies in the two other provinces. Unless a better approach is made to the pollution problem, the federal government will be ineffective. The incompetence, the do-nothing attitude of the federal government in this field is of real concern.

Then, there is the question of the trade war going on between the provinces, with the province of Manitoba having to launch action in the Supreme Court in order to establish the prerogatives which properly belong to the federal government in the matter of trade. Trade should flow freely across this land, but the federal government seems to have abandoned its responsibilities in this area.

We have one minister in charge of the Wheat Board, Mr. Speaker. He tries very hard to succeed. I have asked him about the problems that exist in connection with the marketing of rapeseed and futures prices. He has said that he will talk with the Grain Exchange. I believe he said he had a letter from the Exchange, but I have not seen it yet. He has said that he will try to correct the inequalities and inequities that exist in the futures market. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there is some malfunctioning of the system. Today, I raised with him the matter of the spread between the Vancouver future and the future at Thunder Bay, which is some 46½ cents per bushel. Anyone who is knowledgeable of the Grain Exchange, or who is even an observer of the commodity exchanges, will know that this is not a good situation. In fact, it indicates a malfunction in the exchange and a distortion of the prices received by the producer and paid by the consumer, whether the consumer be an importer like Japan or a domestic consumer.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Yet, as I say, no effective action has been taken. Are we waiting until some outsider is able to move in to correct the situation? You can only go so far with camouflage and with going through the motions. It is all very well for posters put out by Information Canada to depict a couple of people practically naked, clad only with a couple of maple leaves. You can have your fun with things of this kind; but that is only play acting. That does not come to grips with the realities or the day to day decisions that the people of Canada are trying to make. You know, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) may be enjoying himself very much riding an elephant, a tiger, a turtle, or whatever else he may find convenient for transportation, but those of us who remain here must live with our day to day problems. There is no indication that the government has become seized of the day to day problems relating to the slowdown in the economy, a slowdown that is creating hardships in all walks of life in all parts of Canada. That slowdown was brought on, encouraged and fostered by the people who sit on the government side of the House.

What disturbs me for example is that the minister responsible for agriculture does not seem to know where the government is going or what its objectives are. Let me illustrate what I mean. We are proposing to encourage the production of forage crops in western Canada. We are proposing to increase, through this method, the size of cattle herds and the production of livestock; yet, at the same time, we are encouraging the increased importation of meat from other countries. I am not one who says that we ought to draw a solid circle around Canada and prevent the importation into Canada of food products. That is not a practical suggestion. What I am saying is that the farmers of Canada have a right to know what the government's policy is. They have a right to know what the limitations of that policy are and, before investing millions of dollars in growing forage crops in western Canada and in increasing livestock production in Canada, they have a right to know what the policy of the government is with regard to importations of meat. Then, they can plan and govern themselves accordingly. This they do not know. All we hear when this point is raised are remarks such as, "Well, we stopped some of this importation before, and we may do so again." That sort of policy is at variance with the policies of other countries.

The United States does not absolutely block the entry of meat coming from other countries. That country has established quotas for meat coming from all countries except Canada. It has established such a policy and its producers have a working knowledge of that policy. They know where they are going. That sort of thing needs to be done here and it has not been done. The Government cannot get away with its present careless and ill-defined policies. The Prime Minister cannot get away merely by shrugging his shoulders and saying, "It is not my job to sell wheat." He did not need to tell us that. We knew that. Nevertheless, it is his job, and the job of those who are part of his government, to outline the policies under which we operate.

Under this bill we shall be able to do either very little in regard to the environment or a great deal. All will depend on the thrust and determination of the government of the day. What is done will depend on how determined governments will be to improve the quality of life. It will depend on how determined they are to make this economy work instead of fiddling while Rome burns.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my views on this bill and, at the same time, express my concern about one important aspect of the bill. I am especially concerned about its effect on the Atlantic provinces and, as well, on British Columbia and the great lakes areas of Canada. I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, over the downgrading, as a consequence of the passage of this bill, of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I think, Sir, that that is a cause for legitimate concern. I am sure that if the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) represented a constituency in the Atlantic provinces, he would probably share that concern and not sit complacently and smugly listening, as he does today.

An hon. Member: He does that well.

Mr. McGrath: That is exactly what this bill does. Notwithstanding the assurances and reassurances that the minister has given us, the evidence shows clearly that the department of fisheries is to go. After this bill becomes law, that department will no longer carry out its very important functions, as it has been doing since Confederation. I was especially concerned and, indeed, surprised that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) said absolutely nothing in his speech to allay this fear or to reassure us. As a matter of fact, to put it mildly, I was shocked when reading the minister's speech to find no reference whatsoever to the department of fisheries or to the future responsibilities with regard to fisheries under the new set up. I am not for a moment suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that this was deliberate. I am suggesting, nevertheless, that something alarming is happening in this area. Since the new department to be formed is to be given all these new areas of responsibility, it is only natural that the age old responsibilities, the traditional responsibilities, of the department of fisheries relating to the management and well-being of the fishing industry of this country should be downgraded and "get lost in the shuffle".

As I say, I do not think this is being done deliberately; nevertheless, the government is doing that. This omnibus bill does precisely that. It will do away with the department of fisheries, that department which is one of the oldest, if not the oldest, of departments in the federal government. Certainly, it has existed since Confederation. During the course of his speech the minister did not refer once to the importance of the fisheries to the Canadian economy, and especially to the importance of the fishing industry to the Atlantic provinces and British Columbia. That industry, Mr. Speaker, in 1967 produced millions and millions of dollars for the Canadian economy. That industry in this country employs directly over 90,000 Canadians.

I wish to put some statistics on the record in order to illustrate how important this industry is to the Atlantic provinces. In the province of Newfoundland, 24,000 people are directly employed in the fishing industry out of a total work force of 130,000. In the three Maritime provinces, 31,000 people are directly employed in the fishing industry out of a total work force of 466,000. These figures are taken from 1968 statistics compiled by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. I put them on the record to illustrate how important this industry is, not only to the province of Newfoundland, but to all the Atlantic provinces of Canada. In the four Atlantic provinces, over 55,000 Canadians are directly employed in the fishing industry. This fact becomes even more impressive if we use the multiplier factor.

In terms of its importance to our balance of payments position, Canada ranks third in the world as an exporter of fish. The total value of our exports of fish in 1968 was in excess of $227 million. This has been increasing each year in terms of its value on the export market. Most of our exports are to the American market which is very important to Canada. Although Canada is one of the largest fish-producing nations in the world, this fact is ignored in the over-all planning of this new department. It has, I regret to say, been ignored by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. He is a good minister. He has done many good things for the fishing industry and has introduced many innovations. He has modernized this department.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear?

Mr. McGrath: I have no hesitation in saying that. However, this is all the more regrettable because in his zeal and determination to form this new department, which will include many new responsibilities, the minister has downgraded the fishing industry and its importance to the over-all economy of this country. The industry does not merit one word in the name of the new department. It is not even mentioned in the name of the bill. We have cause for genuine, legitimate concern.

I listened to my colleague with interest when he expressed his concern during the course of this debate. When the minister was asked what would become of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry when this bill becomes law, he replied, and I will paraphrase, that it will continue as a service in the new department in the same way as the forestry and Canadian wildlife services. I do not want to be unfair to the minister. He is not here at the present time. However, this statement can be found at page 2832 of Hansard for January 27. The minister stated that the department of fisheries will no longer exist as a department. As he termed it, the Canadian fisheries service of the new department of the environment will rank in terms of importance with the Canadian wildlife service and the Canadian forest service.

The Canadian wildlife service serves a very useful function in the preservation and management of our wild life. The forestry service carries out very useful and efficient work in the field of experimentation in an attempt to combat various diseases in our forests. Neither of the services directly contribute to the Canadian economy to the same extent as the fisheries industry, and I am speaking in the federal context, especially in the Atlantic provinces and the province of British Columbia. I feel that we have cause for concern in the overall context of federal responsibility.

I notice that the appointment of the new deputy minister has already been announced. I understand that he is a professional engineer from Montreal. This man does not have the remotest connection, nor has he ever been remotely connected, with the fishing industry. This is more evidence of why we are concerned about the downgrading of the fishing industry and the fisheries department in this bill. The department of fisheries is to be a service within the new department similar to the wildlife service. It will be presided over by an assistant deputy minister. I sincerely ask, what is wrong with having two deputy ministers in the department? I made this suggestion to the minister. I will put this suggestion in the form of an amendment at the appropriate time.

If there were two deputy ministers, one could be responsible for the over-all management of our fisheries department and the other could have over-all responsibility for the other areas in the new department. In this way, we would ensure that the responsibilities of Parliament in the areas of management, development and exploitation of Canada's fisheries would receive the attention it so justly deserves. The new deputy minister has been appointed, notwithstanding the fact that this bill is still before the House. I would have at least expected the government to wait the few days necessary for this bill to go through the legislative process, be enacted and become law before announcing the appointment of the new deputy minister.

I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) in paying tribute to the retiring Deputy Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, Dr. Needler. I am happy to note that he will continue to play a role in the department and that he will have a special responsibility in so far as the fishing industry and our international negotiations with respect to conservation are concerned.

There are reasons for concern. They are manifest in the minister's speech and in this bill. I say to the approximately 4,000 Canadians who are presently employed by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry that they better get on the bandwagon or else they will be left out. They better acquaint themselves with the new responsibilities of the minister in the area of pollution and pollution control. As far as this government is concerned, there is not much future in the fishing industry, although the facts and statistics I have put before the House certainly contradict that statement. I do not for a moment want to take anything away from the importance of having effective measures to combat pollution. We all know the seriousness of pollution. We know of the critical stage we have arrived at in this country and in this world. We have polluted our environment to the point at which certain species of wildlife are under threat of extinction. We know that the very survival of man is at stake. Let me repeat that it is necessary and essential that we adopt effective measures of control.

It is logical that we give this responsibility to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. He is obviously the man who should have the responsibility for combating pollution. That minister is responsible in respect of our fisheries, and this is an area which is more directly affected by pollution than perhaps any other in Canada.

This fact was recognized long before pollution became a popular subject. It was recognized when the Fisheries Act was drawn up many years ago. At that time, adequate provisions were written into the act to combat pollution. Unfortunately, for reasons which have not been sufficiently or adequately explained, these provisions in the Fisheries Act have never been enforced.

When we were amending the Fisheries Act and examining the Canada Water Act we could not find a rational or logical explanation why various ministers of the department of fisheries down through the years did not see fit to enforce the very stringent and strict provisions of this act. We put forward the suggestion when the fisheries Act was last before the House that, in effect, there was no need for a Canada Water Act if the pollution provisions of the Fisheries Act were enforced. The federal government already had the power at the time Parliament enacted the Canada Water Act to combat pollution. The Fisheries Act contains provisions even to this day which, had they been enforced, would have prevented a great deal of the pollution which now exists. The Canada Water Act is much like a toothless tiger. It is ineffective. I do not want to repeat the arguments presented at the time this bill was presented to the House, but it is ineffective to a large degree because it depends upon provincial and municipal initiative. The provinces and municipalities in this country will be motivated and guided by economic considerations. These considerations must be favourable to them before water management areas in Canada are set up to combat pollution.

The Minister of Fisheries, who will inherit jurisdiction for the Canada Water Act as a legacy under this bill is now saying these things, too. But, Mr. Speaker, he is a little late. Let me quote what he is reported as having said as it appears in the Sunday Express of January 3, 1971 under the headline "Whiz-kid Davis Defends Mother Nature". This minister is our knight on a white charger and is reported as follows:

> Davis feels the poison chemicals which can kill in even small quantities should be the first target of government attack, and to ban them he'll use the Canada Fisheries Act, not the Canada Water Act which was so recently passed by parliament.
> "The Canada Water Act requires federal-provincial-municipal co-operation to work. The law is already there in the Canada Fisheries Act to force clean-ups, and industry is being fairly co-operative"—

We can draw some consolation from the fact the minister is now saying what we said at the time the Canada Water Act was before the House. We can draw precious little consolation from the fact that the time spent considering the Canada Water Act, its preparation, the debate on it and the exhaustive and extensive examination by the committee must be written off as a waste of time. The water act is not yet operative. It has no past, and if what the minister says is an indication, it has no future.

We are asking that this new department created by this omnibus bill now before the House reflect in its name the importance of the fishing industry to the Canadian economy. What is wrong with naming the new department the department of fisheries and the environment? In that way we might expect the department to live up to its obligations in so far as the fishing industry is concerned. As things now stand, there is a risk that the fishing industry in Canada, which is a responsibility of this Parliament, will lose something in the shuffle.

I suggest that perhaps we should make provision for the appointment of two deputy ministers. I think there is precedent for this suggestion in that we have a deputy minister of health and a deputy minister of welfare within the one department. In the interest of preserving this industry upon which Atlantic Canada is so dependent, I should like to know what is wrong with the suggestion that the word "fisheries" be incorporated in the name of the act. In that way, the federal government's responsibility under our constitution, as recognized at the time of confederation, would be assured. Perhaps we could appoint two special deputy ministers, one responsible for fishing and the other responsible for the environment.

There are other subjects I should like to deal with if time permitted, but I realize a number of other members want to participate in this debate. Members from the Atlantic provinces have some concern about conservation and the establishment of agreements which hopefully can be negotiated in order to provide some kind of agreement on a sustained yield basis in respect of Atlantic fisheries.

We know that negotiations are taking place at this time and that there will be a meeting of the International Commission on North Atlantic Fisheries. I am told that this will be a subject on the agenda of that meeting. It is my view that the Canadian fisheries industry should be adequately protected by meaningful international agreements which will hopefully be worked out by the International Commission on North Atlantic Fisheries when it meets in May of this year.

This morning I read of the formation of a committee in the United States in respect of the preservation of the Atlantic salmon. We have said many times in this House to the Minister of Fisheries and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that we are concerned about the future of the Atlantic salmon. It is being threatened as a species by the exploitation of one of the member countries, namely, Denmark. It is a well-known fact that within the last ten years Denmark has discovered the North Atlantic salmon feeding grounds. These salmon are hatched in Canadian rivers and protected by Canadian laws. Millions of dollars have been spent to preserve this species of fish, not only as a source of food but as sport fish as well. If the Danes continue to exploit this fish off Greenland at the present rate, then the Atlantic salmon cannot possibly survive as a species beyond the next ten years.

A group of prominent people in the sport fishing industry in the United States recently took some initiative in this connection, and I salute them for it. I only hope a similar initiative will be taken in Canada. In particular, I hope the government will tell Denmark in the strongest possible diplomatic language that Canada takes a very dim view of its activities in the over exploitation of Atlantic salmon; that if Denmark does not agree to preserve the species under some sustained yield system, Canada will threaten economic sanctions against them until they do. I have made this suggestion before, as has the hon. member for South Shore, and I now make it again.

We wonder what will become of these urgent and pressing problems faced by the fishing industry once this bill passes the House and this new department of the environment is set up. For our part, we will continue to express our concern in the only way open to us, namely by moving appropriate amendments to the bill when it comes before the committee of the whole House.

Before I take my seat, I want to make one more point. As a member of parliament, I resent very strongly the government putting this bill before the House in its present form. I find there are provisions in the bill that I can support wholeheartedly. On the other hand, I find provisions to which I am very much opposed. Yet, I must take the whole package or I must reject the whole package.

I contend that Members of Parliament should not be placed in this position. This bill deals with many unrelated subjects. I have read Your Honour's ruling and the arguments preceding it, and I acknowledge that there are precedents. But I submit there is no precedent which supports an omnibus bill of this sort that embodies so many different, unrelated subjects, from additional Parliamentary Secretaries to pensions, from setting up a new department of the environment to creating new ministers of state. Members of Parliament should not be placed in this position.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): Mr. Speaker, this bill has been referred to on a great many occasions as an omnibus bill, a government catch-all or a new bag of tricks. The descriptive part of the bill indicates that this is an act respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto. Having read the bill, and also the speech made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), it appears to me to cover the entire waterfront of the government activities. Items dealing with new ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries appear to me to be a backdoor method of increasing the salaries of many of the more vociferous backbenchers on the government side. The fact that during this debate there has been better attendance by these hon. members is an indication that hope is springing eternal in the Grit breasts.

Well, Mr. Speaker, why not? The extra $4,000, even for two years—which of late has been the prescribed life of most Parliamentary Secretaries—would add an extra $2,000 to the yearly salary of a great many government members. A great many of them could be the recipients of this extra income during the lifetime of a Parliament. After all the guff that came out after the announcement that Members of Parliament might get an increase in salary, this looks to me like a backdoor method of giving a reward to the righteous, so to speak. It is also a method of holding out a carrot before the other poor rabbits as an indication that if they behave themselves they, too, may become Parliamentary Secretaries. A former outspoken cabinet minister in the Liberal party many years ago said: "If we want to get away with it, who's going to stop us?" The same arrogant air of ruling by divine right has once again permeated the front benches of the government.

A few years ago this House was faced with another omnibus bill, the one that created our over-burdened committee system. The failure of that particular scheme as evidenced by the present breakdown of our committee system, cannot help but make this House and the nation skeptical of the effectiveness of this and other schemes. For example, yesterday the committee chairmen and their deputies in both the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs were not prepared to discuss a bill which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) has stated is one of the most important to come before this Parliament this year. The minister was in the House making a speech and had not troubled to find out whether the committee was sitting. As a result the committee had to wait 15 or 20 minutes, wasting the time of members and the witnesses who were to appear. This is just one example of the ineffectiveness of our committee system.

However, most of my remarks will be related to the establishment of a department to be known as the department of the environment. This is a department that members of this party have for many years advocated. Last year when we were discussing the water bill, time after time, both in committee and in the House, members of the official opposition suggested the creation of such a department. I think all the environmental problems that are so prevalent in this country should be placed under the jurisdiction of one minister.

I should like to say that the minister who is going to head this department is, in my estimation, one of the most far-sighted and able ministers. He is probably the one most capable of grappling with this particular question. This is the most redeeming part of this legislation. I understand, of course, the problems facing members from the Maritime provinces, where fishing is such an important part of the economy. These members have indicated that they fear for the fishing industry of Canada if that department is downgraded.

I was a little disturbed when the minister who is going to head this department said in the House the other day that we in Canada must make sacrifices, especially on the economic front, if we want a better world than we have now. It almost seems as if the minister does not feel the time has now come to take action to deal with many of our environmental problems.

Last Friday in this House the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney), when speaking on a bill that had to do with setting aside a national pollution awareness week, had this to say, as reported at page 2690 of Hansard:

—the desire to pinpoint the significance of pollution in all ways, the significance of the cost of pollution to our environment and to our society, the benefits of controlling and reversing it, and the cost that we must pay in achieving that benefit, must all be made known to the public before emotional steps are taken.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, this was brought to the fore by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I refer to an article in the Windsor Star for February 27, 1970, under the heading "Pollution, water: Is Trudeau serious?" I shall read a few excerpts from this editorial to indicate the point I wish to make:

On Wednesday a sizeable audience of Windsor citizens heard health and welfare minister John Munro speak on the necessity for an all-out fight against all forms of pollution. There was even the promise of a clean air act to go with the recently passed Canada Water Act.

All very dandy.

Except that Mr. Munro's boss, Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, had downgraded current concern about pollution as just another "kick" on Tuesday night when taping a television show with Carleton University students.

This is just another kick people are taking. The article continues:

The PM's remark must also make resources minister J. J. Greene feel a little sick about the Canada Water Act and the considerable trouble Greene has gone to in justifying its necessity when the majority of provinces would rather the federal government left the area of water pollution well enough alone.

Joe Greene was not over having the rug pulled out from under him by the swinging bossman. Mr. Greene had also just made his most unequivocating statement about Canada not selling its water to the United States in the House of Commons.

Lo and behold, there was Mr. Trudeau telling the student audience at the television taping that since Canada can't use all its water it shouldn't be possessive about it. We, of course, should consider selling our resources "for good, hard cash" said the Prime Minister.

This is an indication to me of the feeling of the government at the present time. They hope pollution is something that will go away. It is an indication that the government does not have any immediate plans to control pollution. They fear that the majority of Canadians do not understand. This would seem to be an insult to the credibility of the Canadian people. There have been sit-ins, think-tanks, symposiums and pollution probes at every level of government and its agencies. In fact, the other day when someone spoke of the Ottawa River it was suggested that we have another survey. We have had so many surveys that it is now time for action. Studies by magazines, periodicals, radio and television have all brought home to the public the extremely critical situation we face in connection with our environment. One of the principles of true conservation is that each generation passes on to the next an environment as close as possible to the one he received.

We brag about our affluent society. We certainly have done a dandy job of ruining our environment. Do we have to wait until disease runs rampant throughout our land because of our inability to grapple with our wastes? Do we have to wait until babies die from air pollution before we do something about our air? Are we to find ourselves running short of arable land, pure water and clear air until one day we find ourselves knee deep in garbage?

One of my first speeches in this House was in the field of conservation. I have always been happy and proud of the fact that one of the first conservation programs was established in my area. I refer to the Grand River conservation program. The main physical structures were built within the confines of my riding. However, the authority that has the responsibility for administering this scheme found itself in difficulty because federal assistance was cut off last year by the repeal of the Water Conservation Assistance Act when the water bill was passed.

The previous act contained a formula whereby the three levels of government participated in projects of this type in the ratio of 37½ per cent by the federal government, 37½ per cent by the provincial government and 25 per cent by the municipalities involved. In private conversations I have had with the minister he indicated that he would consider some type of assistance for a water management plan on the Grand River, but until he indicates whether a new formula will be presented, or to what extent the federal government will participate, it is difficult for the responsible body to carry forward its projected plans.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I would remind you that I pointed out to Your Honor that the clock on the opposition side read 3 when it was actually two o'clock. It now reads 4 p.m.

I was then told that we would go by that clock and proceed to private members' business when it read four o'clock. If Your Honor is ready to make a ruling, please note that the clock in front of me shows that it is now four.

Some hon. Members: Four o'clock.

Mr. Boulanger: The members are ready to call it four o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the majority of the clocks show it is still not four o'clock.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, this situation would appear to be almost the same as some of the other things run by the government; two are running and one has stopped.

Mr. Boulanger: We are not making progress, anyway.

Mr. Harkness: The clocks are like the government—running out of order.

Mr. Howe: When I attended football games we had a cheer which went like this: Feed them oats, feed them hay, feed them anything but stop that play.

I see no reason why the water act of last year cannot be amended to include the original formula. The Grand River Conservation Commission has plans which, if implemented, could create hundreds of jobs and could be of tremendous assistance to the communities in the area by improving the quality and flow of water so necessary for continued development.

This is only one phase in the improvement of our environment. I see many areas in which government action could be taken by various departments toward improving our environment. For instance, our Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has laid great emphasis on the necessity of equipping cars with gadgets that would reduce the amount of deleterious material coming from exhausts. The areas where this is most prevalent are the centres of our cities. Many municipalities have installed equipment to measure the pollution content of these areas, and the readings vary to a frightening degree. Recently in a Canada-Japan newsletter an article appeared entitled, "Menace of Pollution Spurs Search for Practical Electric Car". Periodicals and magazines have emphasized the necessity of this type of pollution control, and universities participated in a marathon race across the United States emphasizing the importance of so-called clean car exhaust systems.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has made a great issue of the new packaging bill he has brought forward. But has he brought forward a container or bottle to hold hazardous products which have brought into jeopardy the lives of so many children in Canada? The latest figures show there were 50,000 last year. What has the minister done with regard to throw-away, non-returnable bottles which have become such a blot on the highways and the streets of our towns and cities? Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have to wait for the people of Canada to become emotionally aroused before we take very rapid and vital steps to eliminate pollution.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Our government is twisting and turning, trying to find ways and means of grappling with the problem of unemployment which finds hundreds of thousands of Canadians in a hopeless, helpless, almost frantic situation as they face not only days and weeks but in some cases years with no hope of steady employment. I have in my hand two or three speeches that were made by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis). I know he is very interested in these projects and in the solution of this problem. One of his speeches is entitled, "Conservation: a dynamic concept". What we need is a man with dynamic concepts and ideas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, we cannot have stagnation.

Mr. Howe: Another speech which the minister made is entitled, "Recycling and recovery: the twin keys to environmental control". Both of these speeches contain a great many ideas regarding ways and means of improving our pollution problem in Canada. Recycling and recovery is something in which I have become very interested. I have here a book entitled, "Garbage as you like it. A plan to stop pollution by using our nation's wastes". It is a very interesting book, well written, in simple language, but it gives some idea of methods used in other parts of the world to dispose of garbage, to recycle it and to segregate it. Garbage can be composted first and then sold as a fertilizer. Paper could be reclaimed and so could metal, to be used in factories to carry on our industrial production.

A few years ago "bold" and "imaginative" were used as a catch-phrase by the Liberal government. If my memory serves me correctly, the government did not prove to be very bold or imaginative. We can survive a monetary crack-up. We can survive a social revolution. We cannot survive the destruction of our environment. It will take bold and imaginative planning, such as the creation of satellite cities on unproductive land rather than the creation of asphalt deserts on our good, arable land. There has been a historic tradition in the Liberal Party of suggestions of this kind. I remember a speech made by a former Prime Minister of this nation, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, shortly after the last war in which he said this would have to be done. At that time they were not sure that wars were over. The same is true today. We know how vulnerable our cities would be if war broke out.

The former minister in charge of housing, who was previously the Minister of National Defence, also had the idea of setting up satellite cities. These are bold and imaginative ideas to move people from crowded areas of the cities to land that is unproductive and where cities could be built and developed. It will take bold and imaginative ideas such as the development of a recycling program for the water in our homes, apartments and places of business.

A couple of years ago there was a great deal of fanfare concerning the building of a house in Rockcliffe where the water was to be recycled. I telephoned the National Research Council recently and was told that this project had been wrapped up because of a couple of problems that arose. If they can recycle the water in swimming pools used by our children in schools, why cannot they recycle the water used in our homes, apartments and other buildings? I maintain that we are not doing enough research in this area. Solutions to these problems will have to be found if we are to survive. Many cities have tried different ways and means, but so many of them result in just moving the problem from one place to another. In other words, incineration fills the area with tons and tons of pollutants which filter down, sometimes not on the city but on some place in the area.

It would seem that some plans have proved effective; they are described in this book. Means have been found of segregating different types of garbage and composting others. Many cities are coming to grips with the problem. I know that in my area, in the last year several municipalities have been having difficulty disposing of their garbage and have united to buy land on which it could be disposed. Further research might indicate means whereby a number of smaller communities could form a composting unit where their garbage could be disposed of in one area. These are problems which have to be solved if we are to avoid destroying our environment.

I think the government should explore the possibility of providing assistance for communities which face such problems. I know that through the National Housing Act assistance can be provided to communities for setting up sewage disposal programs, but I think we have to delve into the problem deeper if we are to accomplish what must be accomplished in order to survive. Many projects that are not completely self-supporting have been helped financially through the sale of fertilizer, paper and metal.

It appears that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has the idea that pollution is not very important in the minds of the people of Canada. I do not think it is necessary to await public approval before taking the bold and imaginative steps which I have suggested to overcome unemployment and many of the environmental problems which our affluent society has created.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak briefly on only one or two of the matters dealt with in this bill. As a matter of fact, if one were to deal with all the proposals in the bill, the limit of 40 minutes on speeches at this stage in our proceedings would have to be stretched. However, the evils of an omnibus bill of this kind have been dealt with by my colleagues and I will only add my protests to theirs against this sort of measure being introduced. This measure is called, "an act respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto". The bill might much more properly be entitled, "an act to provide jobs for the boys". That is essentially what it is.

In my opinion, the most important provision in the bill is the one which provides for a considerable increase in members of the cabinet. Up to five ministers of state will have specific jobs to perform. Several other ministers of state will not have specific jobs to perform but will assist the ministers who presently have departments. There will also be ministers without portfolio. At present there are 28 members in the cabinet. With the additions proposed under this bill, there may be anything up to 10, 12 or 15 more. This would make the biggest cabinet of any country in the world.

Our cabinet is already too big. We have 28 ministers looking after the affairs of some 21½ million people. Immediately to the south of us is a country with 10 times our population. They have 12 cabinet members, plus the President and the Vice-President—14 people to look after the affairs of a population of some 220 million—ten times ours—and with a great many more international commitments and governmental business of all kinds than we have. It is an absolutely ridiculous situation for us to have a cabinet of 28 people while the United States cabinet numbers 14.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, rather than increasing the number of cabinet ministers, if this were a reasonable bill we would be cutting the number down to at least half. As a matter of fact, I do not know how they all find a place to sit in the cabinet chamber in the East Block. There is not room for 28 chairs around the cabinet table, so a considerable number of them must sit back in the corner like Little Jack Horner.

Some hon. Members: Where is Jack?

Mr. Harkness: There just is not room around the table for them. There may be room in the temporary cabinet chamber, which used to be used for the Progressive Conservative caucus, on the third floor. So long as they use small chairs, they may possibly squeeze 28 around that table, but certainly if the size of the cabinet is increased there would not be room for all the ministers. Somebody says that maybe the cabinet will be run on the roster system. Certainly something will have to be done along that line.

If you examine this measure, Mr. Speaker, you will see that it is one of the most ridiculous proposals ever put before the House. It is a complete waste of public funds. Rather than increasing efficiency in government, it is bound to decrease efficiency. A cabinet of 28 is too large. A cabinet of 28 cannot operate efficiently. If you are to have a dictatorial form of government with a Prime Minister and two or three of his close colleagues running it, it does not matter if you have a cabinet of 300. But if you are to have cabinet government, which I think is the best form of government, you need a cabinet of manageable proportions—and a 28-member cabinet is not that. Increase the size of the cabinet by 10 or 15 ministers and it becomes a completely hopeless situation. We will not have cabinet government; we will have a dictatorial form of government with the Prime Minister and two or three of his cronies running it and the rest of the cabinet being more or less nonentities. I protest as strongly as I can against an innovation of this kind.

If the government was intent on introducing effective cabinet reorganization, it should have looked at the British system where there is a cabinet of anywhere from 12 to 15 ministers, with a number of junior ministers who look after administrative functions of various kinds. To add another 10 or 15 people to a 28-member cabinet is complete nonsense; it is making a mockery of the cabinet system of government. What it really amounts to is making jobs for the boys, to give more of the members who sit on the government side official jobs, higher salaries and more staff—things of that sort—to make them feel more important and more satisfied. This is being done at a terrific cost to the Canadian population not only in dollars but in efficiency. Instead of government being more efficient, it will be less efficient under this type of system. And how much more it will cost, God only knows!

When I was a member of the cabinet, ministers had one executive assistant. Now ministers have three, four or five executive assistants. What, in God's name, all these people do I don't know, except waste the people's money. That is what they do, waste the people's money and put out propaganda on behalf of their ministers and the government. As far as making any contribution to the government of Canada is concerned or to the welfare of the Canadian people, theirs is negative rather than positive.

Somewhat the same criticism applies so far as Parliamentary Secretaries are concerned. The Parliamentary Secretary is a very anomalous animal. He is something like the mule in the animal kingdom; he has no pride of ancestry and no hope of posterity. I think it was a great mistake to bring in Parliamentary Secretaries of the nature we have in this country. A Parliamentary Secretary has no authority whatsoever. He cannot sign a single document. When I had a Parliamentary Secretary and on some occasions two I did not know what to do with them half the time because they had no authority. You could not give them many jobs because there was no legal basis for their carrying out the jobs. They could not sign anything; they could not really make any decisions. So far as many of the proposed new ministers are concerned, the only difference between them and Parliamentary Secretaries will be that they will have authority to sign documents and do things along that line. This business of creating more Parliamentary Secretaries, with their present absence of power and thus their inability to do an effective job in a ministry, again is a mistake.

As I said a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, if we want to improve the situation we should look at the British system where they have a cabinet with a limited number of people, junior ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries who have some authority. For these reasons I think this bill should be defeated. The government should withdraw the bill and introduce something reasonable, something which will be more effective and more efficient rather than something, as is proposed here, which will be less effective and less efficient than the set-up we now have —and God knows that has been bad enough!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to follow a former cabinet member because he has personal knowledge of how the system works and therefore has the authority to make valid criticism. He has knowledge of what went on when he was a minister. He knows what Parliamentary Secretaries can do, and he certainly knows that there is no use appointing another 15 or 16 of them. He knows what a minister can do and therefore he knows how many ministers we should have. His points are very well taken.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Corbin) also made a speech last night—

An hon. Member: Yes, a very interesting one.

Mr. Comeau: Exactly. I listened to him carefully. He said that among other things of interest to him was that he might become the first Parliamentary Secretary of the new Department of the Environment. He dealt with the question of the new department and quoted instances proving that industry is now paying more attention to the fight against pollution. No doubt that industry will pay attention to it. If industry is compelled to pay the cost of fighting pollution, taxpayers will still have to pay, for prices generally will no doubt increase. It is true that industry can take advantage of some circumstances and innovate—if I may use this word—however, the main consideration is still that to fight pollution money is needed.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

I do not intend to deal with every aspect of the bill because I am not knowledgeable enough to do so. However, I wish to speak about the creation of a department of the environment. Really, there are too many items in this bill for one to deal with. The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) said that apparently the government wishes to create positions to be filled by backbenchers and that this will make them more vocal. At the moment they are afraid to talk, but if they are paid another $4,000 a year they may become more interested in what is going on in this country.

I agree with the comments of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) with respect to the Department of Fisheries. I need not repeat them. This department will have minor responsibility. I ask, why has the Department of Agriculture not been engulfed in this new department? That is an interesting question. Obviously, the government knows there would be too much opposition from the western provinces, and it does not want that. This shows how little the government has considered the problems of the Atlantic fisheries and Canadian fisheries in general.

How can one minister handle this great portfolio and know what is going on in all these fields? Surely, that responsibility is too vast. There are too many questions which are unanswered. For example, we have been asking for some time for the establishment and enforcement of fishing limits off our shores. The Department of Fisheries has not been able to cope with these problems. Emphasis has been placed upon participatory democracy. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) has not been able to indicate how he will handle this present responsibilities to fishermen, let alone his new responsibilities. I must say, since the minister has spoken a great deal about pollution, that he is the logical person to handle this matter. Perhaps one of the new ministers of state will be able to assist him.

An hon. Member: What about Parliamentary Secretaries?

Mr. Comeau: Since the minister's portfolio will be so vast, probably a Parliamentary Secretary and a minister of state will have to help him with some of his responsibilities. It might be said that the number of ministers will be too great. However, since the new department will cover many responsibilities, perhaps they will be divided among several members of the cabinet. For example, I know that the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) has hardly anything to do now; he is completely lost. Instead of adding other ministers to the cabinet, could the government not ask him to take over some of these added responsibilities?

I see that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) is in the House. We do not hear much from him: I hope this is not an indication of the amount of work being done in that department. Anyway, I know it is not. I have mentioned a couple of ministers who do not seem to have very much to do. That being so, could they not take over some of these responsibilities? We need not necessarily add new ministers—

Mr. Richardson: In my department everything is working well.

Mr. Comeau: The minister says that everything is working well: there are no complaints respecting his department, apparently. If that is the case, I congratulate him, because his is the only department that is working well.

Mr. McCleave: Ask and you shall receive.

Mr. Comeau: As I said before, I am not opposed to the creation of the new department. Actually, I am glad the opposition has gained a major victory in convincing the government to put its anti-pollution efforts under one ministry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Comeau: We have advocated this for quite a while and the government has been opposed to it. When we discussed the Canada Water Act last year, the government did not want to listen to us. They said it was too complicated and that we could not do this and that. When we made similar suggestions in the debate on the Fisheries Act amendments they said, "We do not even want to hear about that." They brought in silly arguments and defeated our amendments. The backbenchers spoke in committee. Perhaps they thought that by voting down the amendments they would stand a chance of becoming Parliamentary Secretaries. They would not hear of our suggestions, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this year we proposed the establishment of a centralized office responsible for pollution control. We were aware, and still are, that the various ministers upon whom responsibility fell for pollution control did not have a single mind on how to attack this vital problem. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry was ambivalent; the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) was talking everywhere about sovereignty; the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) was not prepared to deal with oil pollution.

Mr. Speaker, to include in the same bill pollution control and the control of renewable resources gives an interesting dimension to the problem.

We have strongly advocated that one minister should deal with the whole problem of pollution. As I said, we made numerous proposals last year. We made proposals during the Canada Water Act debate on the whole subject of pollution. This bill is vague: it tells us what job has to be done but it does not indicate how it is to be done. It mentions co-operation with the provinces and municipalities, but provides no mechanism for co-operation. Will this be done on an ad hoc basis? Will subsidies be available? What about the training of pollution officers? That should be a relevant question in any discussion of the Canada Shipping Act. Will the government pay for their training? Also, why will not this department have control over pollution in the north, in view of the great dangers of ecological imbalance in that region? I do not see anything in the bill that says the new department is to be responsible for what happens in the north.

Because the department of the environment is to take over some of the responsibilities of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, some changes have been proposed in the bill. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources will be left with responsibility for non-renewable resources. In this connection it is interesting to note the difference between the English and French texts of the bill. Some changes will probably have to be made in this regard.

Part II of the bill is worth mentioning, since clause 11 (2) (b) gives the minister the power to "enter into agreements with the government of any province or any agency thereof respecting the carrying out of those plans." Why cannot the minister of the environment enter into direct agreement with the provinces and thereby make this department really effective in the fight against pollution?

Mr. Béchard: It does not exist yet; that's why.

Mr. Comeau: The hon. member says that the department does not exist. There spoke a former Acting Speaker and Deputy Chairman. A man who is in charge of one of our committees tells me the department does not exist. Of course it does not exist; we have not passed the bill. I think that was an awful remark for the hon. member to make.

An hon. Member: Yes, it was.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it cannot be done.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) is not being objective; he knows better than that because he was Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House.

[English]

The hon. member knows that a bill is not law until passed by this House. The word "pollution" had sex appeal last year and it still has some sex appeal. The government brought in all kinds of legislation to pretend that it was really doing something to fight pollution. It introduced the Canada Water Act, the amendments to the Fisheries Act and to the Canada Shipping Act, and the bill we are now considering. It also introduced the Arctic waters pollution bill. There has been a great deal of talk on the subject of pollution, but no action. There has been no action because the government has refused to make money available to fight pollution.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Last week I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) whether low-interest loans or other types of aid to industries and municipalities had been recommended in order that they could fight pollution. The minister stated that he was waiting for recommendations from the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. When I directed the question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, he stated that some recommendations had already been made and more would be forthcoming. He did not state what the recommendations were. The government will have to tell me what recommendations were made because I now have on the Order Paper a question regarding this problem. Other than grants or loans which have been made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for sewers, no money has been made available for the fight against pollution. It is easy to pass legislation and pretend to be the great saviour in this regard, but municipalities need money to do the job. The municipalities cause 50 per cent of the pollution but they do not have the money with which to do anything about the problem. Municipalities and industry require assistance from the federal government in order to fight pollution. Recently we heard of an industry which failed because it did not have the finances to meet the required standards. I am not saying that industries should not have waste-treatment facilities, but they should not suffer because the federal government will not provide financial assistance.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) allow me a question?

Mr. Comeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Béchard: Is the hon. member making a comparison with the former Atlantic Development Board that was created without the necessary credits for the development of the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. Comeau: I did not grasp too well that question, Mr. Speaker, but I want to say this: in order to fight pollution—and we have been doing that for a year or two—we need money. It may be true that the department will have the necessary credits to fight pollution, but there is nothing that says so in the bill. Moreover, nothing was said last year to indicate that credits had been appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, we should begin by fighting pollution amidst the Conservative caucus.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just added to the general pollution. Anyway—

[English]

It is easy to pass laws but it is another thing to apply them. Many agencies were supposed to be set up under the Canada Water Act, but very few have been set up. I would be interested to know how many have been established. I will find out because I intend to put a question on the Order Paper. There has been some success in the fight against pollution, for which I give the government credit. However, this success is mainly due to the efforts of private enterprise. I warn the government not to depend on private enterprise to do the job.

We have a serious unemployment problem because of the state of our economy. Industry cannot be kicked too hard in difficult times. The government must be reasonable and willing to do its share. If the government wants private enterprise to do something about pollution, it must be prepared to make money available for this purpose. I wish to give an example of the complexities of the problem of pollution. The International Joint Commission recently submitted a report on pollution of the Great Lakes. The report was tabled in the House by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). It contained several recommendations. One recommendation was that a program be instituted to control and reduce phosphates in detergents by December, 1972.

Government members are looking at me. They will say that even before the report of the International Joint Commission, Canada introduced the Canada Water Act designed to eliminate phosphates prior to December, 1972. I will deal with that matter in a minute. Industry has been asked to eliminate phosphates in soaps and detergents. However, more than half the pollution in the Great Lakes is caused by municipalities dumping sewage and other materials into them. The government has urged private enterprise to control phosphates but it has not assisted the municipalities to do a similar job.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Let us give a few minutes' rest to the members' hour, it is already 4:40.

I would like you to rule on my point of order. If you would look at the clock on your left, to call private members' hour, it is already 4:40.

By what clock will you go? Since it is 4:40 we are breaking the rules as the private members' hour should have started at four o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I will have to take into account the majority of clocks!

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I have already had this answer from the chair but I had hoped I would get a better one from you. Thus, you are going by the two other clocks and not by the clock in front of me.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: It seems a great waste of time to remind hon. members opposite that we are always at least one hour ahead of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. "whippet", as I think he is called in French, for giving me a little rest since I have a slight cold this afternoon.

Nevertheless, a second recommendation from the IJC—

[English]

The International Joint Commission recommended reducing phosphates in municipal and industrial waste to the extent of 50 per cent on the Canadian side of the Great Lakes and 75 per cent on the American side. It said that the cost of a clean-up program for industrial and municipal waste would be in the order of $1,373 million for the United States and $211 million for Canada: this would be the cost of building proper treatment facilities. This means that Canadian municipalities and industries must spend $211 million for their part in cleaning up the Great Lakes. Although the government has enacted legislation which requires industry to reduce phosphates it has refused to make available any part of the $211 million for this purpose. The government has been quick to act, while not spending any money. It has merely lowered the boom on private industry without getting involved in large expenditures for research.

It was reported this morning that approximately 2,200 manufacturing enterprises went bankrupt last year. This should be of great concern to the government. The International Joint Commission a couple of weeks ago recommended a detailed and fully co-ordinated contingency plan between Canada and the United States to effectively respond to major accidental oil spills and other hazardous materials. This is not a new proposal. The task force made similar recommendations. There are three major reports the International Joint Commission's third interim report, the report on the Arrow situation and the latest report of the IJC which advocate the same thing. Still no steps are being taken by this government to initiate such a plan. This is why I attack the government in respect of this policy. It has bypassed all advice in respect of legislation and it has taken no action. The government has pretended to the people that it has done something, but it has really asked industry to do something about pollution. The government does not want to spend one cent on controlling pollution. I hope the new minister of the environment will do something in this regard.

We need this new department. We have advocated its establishment for some time. We have felt that the minister has more responsibility than he can handle in the fields of forestry and fisheries and he is now being given another task, that of looking after environmental pollution.

Mr. Béchard: Then you had better give him another Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Comeau: The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) knows very well that I want this new department to be successful, but I do not think the present minister can do an efficient and effective job while at the same time handling his responsibilities as Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. We should establish one minister responsible for fisheries in the Atlantic provinces to deal with the problems there.

The interventions of members of my party have not all been negative and I do not apologize for anything these hon. members have said. On the contrary, members on the government side have expressed a negative attitude. I suggest this is because they are not capable, for the most part, of reading the available information by my party on this topic. They know nothing about it because they have not read about it. They do not know anything about it and I would bet that government members do not know the situation we face today. The Canadian public is beginning to realize the situation and want strong measures adopted. Even some of the Liberal members are starting to talk about a fall election because they will not be able to cope with the unemployment situation next winter. This is shameful.

Let me refer to what happened at the conference in Niagara Falls. I should like hon. members to read the report of the committee headed by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) who was a co-chairman with Mr. John A. Fraser. This report indicates what my party would do if it were in power. I do not intend to read the report to government members of the House, because they do not care. This is a government which has advocated participatory democracy.

Mr. Reid: We are Liberals, not Tories.

Mr. Comeau: We can excuse the hon. member; he has just made his maiden speech and is unaware of the problems.

Mr. McCleave: He is not a very beautiful maiden, either.

Mr. Comeau: The problems of pollution are vast and complex. The solution rests with a commitment by national, regional and municipal governments in respect of health-condition priorities. We must have a department which will act in this regard. This government must allocate funds to carry out the job of eradicating pollution. Initially, a popular structure for streamlining must be adopted by the new department. I hope it will succeed in this regard.

I do not see anything in schedule A of the bill which deals with laws passed by Parliament which would transfer authority from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to this new department. There you have it; this is not a complete department and it does not deal with Arctic problems. I think I have spoken sufficiently in respect of pollution. Let me remind the House that the only way of doing a job in respect of pollution involves the expenditure of a considerable amount of money. We cannot ask industry to undertake the whole job; we must do our share.

The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has at least youth on his side and he is serious in his responsibilities in the field of fisheries. What we really need is a minister who has more than a passing interest in this field. Like other hon. members, I seriously object to the omnibus character of this bill. I object to the fact that we must vote on it on the basis of participatory democracy which we do not have.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private member's business, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find there is unanimous agreement to proceed to item No. 26 standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and allow the preceding items to retain their position on the Order Paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Does the House agree to the suggestion of the Parliamentary Secretary, that we proceed to item No. 26 and allow the preceding motions to retain their position on the Order Paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED DEDUCTION FOR TEXTBOOKS, EQUIPMENT, MEDICAL FEES, ETC., IN RESPECT OF STUDENTS, THEIR PARENTS OR SPOUSES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to amend the Income Tax Act to provide that where a student, enrolled at an educational institution, is entitled to deduct his tuition fees in computing his income for a taxation year, he may also deduct expenses paid by him for textbooks, laboratory equipment or charges in respect thereof, student union fees, medical fees, athletic board fees and other expenditures necessary for or incidental to enrolment at the educational institution; and similarly, that a taxpayer, whether the spouse or otherwise the student, who pays such tuition fees and other such expenses, whether in whole or in part, upon behalf of the student, may deduct any amounts so paid in computing his income for a taxation year.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members who have allowed their motions to stand in order that I may discuss this measure which I think is of concern to everybody in this House and in the country.

My motion really is in two parts. The first part gives a student the right to deduct tuition fees as expenses from moneys earned to provide for a college or university education. It also provides for the deduction of expenses incurred in respect of laboratory equipment, textbooks, etc. The most important feature relates to the right of a taxpayer, generally the parent, who has committed himself to putting a daughter or son through college or university. This expense should be allowable as a deduction from income tax.

[Mr. Comeau.]

In order to arrive at a conclusion on this matter it would be helpful to put on record the cost of education in Canada, which is mounting every year. I checked these figures this morning and they are the latest available. The estimated total cost of education in Canada is $6,674,706,000, or $6.6 billion in round figures—in other words, about half the total federal budget in Canada today, which is around $13 billion. The cost of higher education at Canadian universities amounts to $1,602 million. This gives the House an idea of the costs we are talking about.

Then there is the student loans plan which has worked very well in Canada. Many students would be unable to attend university or college but for this scheme. In 1968-69 there were 109,293 loans made to students, amounting to $62,500,000. In 1969-70 there were 128,070 loans, amounting to $77,500,000. This gives hon. members an idea of the amount advanced to the students of Canada by way of loans. I am sure every member of the House would agree with me that the youth of this country is the greatest resource we have.

It is of interest to note how many students are attending university. Enrolment at universities and colleges in Canada in 1969-70 was 299,889, almost 300,000 students. They were permanently enrolled. Of this group, this year 5,206 will be graduating. I shall have something to say about that in a moment. In addition to the almost 300,000 students there were 125,266 students attending on a part-time basis. My motion asks that in cases where parents are trying to educate their sons and daughters at college or university they should have the right to deduct the cost of that education from their taxable income. That is the meat of the motion.

A lot has been said about the salaries of Members of Parliament. I know one member on this side—there are probably members on the other side in the same position—who is sending three of his family to university. The total salary of a Member of Parliament is $1,000 a month, of which about $400 is deductible. In my family I have two dependents. I am left with about $600 pay. So how my hon. friend on this side can educate three boys at university is beyond my comprehension.

I hope that my suggestion finds some merit among members on the other side of the House. After all, it is the government that runs the country. When things are bad, some members of the government try to spread the idea that Parliament runs the country, but when things are good it is the government that runs the country. I should like to see taxpayers who are trying to educate their children given the privilege of writing off the cost of higher education no matter in what university or province the higher education is received.

What would this cost the nation? I will have something to say about the employment of students, but at the present time the unemployment situation is such that there will be 5,200 students graduating from university and looking for jobs. There were 30 to 35 per cent of the graduates of the last class unable to get full-time employment. I suggest the only way to improve the employment picture is to cut taxes, not increase them. Therefore, let us start at that spot and allow taxpayers to deduct the cost of higher education from their taxable income.

When the Hon. Walter Gordon was Minister of Finance, he said in one of his budget speeches that the rate of personal income tax in the United States was higher than the rate in Canada. It is true, the rate in the United States is higher. However, every year I tell my sister living in the United States what my salary is and ask her what my taxes would be if my wife, my two children and I were living in the United States in the same sort of house in which I live in Canada. She tells me that my tax would be about 25 per cent less than I pay here. Although the rate of tax looks higher on paper, there are many tax exemptions and deductions in the United States. The working man can write off the taxes paid on his home, the interest on his mortgage, the cost of educating his children, as well as various other deductions. As a result, the net tax is much less.

Let me deal briefly with the employment picture. I should like to refer to volume 33 of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for April 16, 1970, and put on record what was said at that time. Questions were being asked of Mr. Bryce and Mr. Brown. Mr. Bryce is economic adviser to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and he was speaking with great affection about the white paper on taxation, about taxes and the ability to educate students. I asked him who drew up the white paper. After some discussion, which will be found at page 62 of the report, Mr. Bryce admitted that he and Mr. Brown drew up the white paper on taxation. So if Mr. Bryce is the economic adviser to the Prime Minister, we know whose baby the white paper on taxation is—the Prime Minister's.

I also asked him whether the capital gains tax proposed in the white paper would be higher than the one in the United States or Great Britain. As reported at page 63, I asked:

> All right, let me put it this way. He may have misunderstood my question. Suppose it is a person—I only brought the farmer in as an example because I know your exceptions and I could quote the other side to it—an ordinary land holder who bought some land, then sold it and in that taxable year, whatever year it might be, he made $10,000. I am asking you, under the ordinary rules, would not that capital gain be added to his taxable income in that one year.
> Mr. Brown: Yes, sir.

So it would be added to his taxable income in that year, one hundred cents on the dollar, though I know there is a provision with regard to spreading the cost over a number of years. Then I asked:

> Yes, so basically, although you have mentioned some exceptions and I am prepared to determine those in a few moments, what the chartered accountant of one of the national firms said is true, that the distinction between capital gains and income will be virtually abolished because in many cases—I have given you two or three illustrations, but I am sure you could give me more than I have given you because you are far more knowledgeable in this field—it will merely be added to the taxable income and become taxable in the year. Is that correct?
> Mr. Brown: Yes, it is.

• (4:10 p.m.)

> Mr. Woolliams: Is the difference then between United States' and Great Britain's capital gains tax that they, the United States, have special rates on capital gains and rates on taxable income in the ordinary way. Is that not correct?

Mr. Brown said yes, and that the United States has a frozen rate of 25 per cent. Now I come to the real meat of some of the things I asked. I asked whether in certain circumstances, under the capital gains tax as set out in the white paper, in the first year of operation it is possible that a gain on land would be as high as 80 per cent. Mr. Brown and Mr. Bryce said yes and that even after the first year it is possible for it to be as high as 50 per cent. If there is any question about this evidence I should like hon. members to read it carefully. It appears at page 66 and 67. Then I asked whether under the white paper proposal we would not have a higher capital gains tax for middle-income Canadians than people in the United States and in Great Britain, and the answer was yes.

Then I put this question which I believe justifies my discussing the ability of young people in Canada to obtain an education by earning money at the time and to obtain employment after education. I said:

> I think, with the greatest respect, you have been sniffing public opinion—

This is what I said to Bryce and Brown:

> —a little better than the public have been sniffing their own facts. I question up to the last six months, and maybe the last two months, that the Canadian people, and even informed Canadian people, ever realized that the tax in this nation under capital gains could be as high as 50 per cent, and under certain circumstances the first year as high as 80 per cent. This is now just taking hold in the nation.

What effect has this white paper, after being discussed for a solid year in the committee, had on the economy of Canada? This is what Mr. Bryce, the economic adviser to the Prime Minister, the brain trust, said:

> Undoubtedly some projects, some investments will be affected by uncertainty as to what the tax position is going to be. I think it is inevitable in the process of tax reform and this process of tax reform has been a long time in getting under way and is being extended by the kind of process that we are going through now. On the whole, I think most Canadians have felt this is a price worth paying to have a thorough examination of the system.

Maybe that is where the Prime Minister got the idea for his phrase "like it or lump it". Then I said that we had a very high level of unemployment and asked whether they thought the fear and uncertainty in this regard would have an effect on the mining, petroleum, farming and manufacturing industries which would slow down the economy. The answer by Mr. Bryce was yes, but he thought Canadians were prepared to put up with it.

The man who went to the other place—I always think of the Senate as heaven—had various figures on unemployment, but today we have figures showing there are 750,000 people unemployed. I do not want to be one who preaches doom and gloom like they did in 1962, but this depression which has particularly hit the youth of Canada—our university students and the young men and women who are trying to find jobs—has been brought about by the government because they say it is the only cure for inflation. I say these are nineteenth century methods.

So we have a man-made depression in Canada. We are told there are now 750,000 people unemployed. When we consider that 300,000 students in university will be coming out in three months' time it is obvious that there will be one million unemployed people in Canada out of a population of about 21 or 22 million.

What is the government doing? We are told the government has a program, but it is never disclosed to us. Of course, the Prime Minister does not bless this place with his presence too often these days. He has been absent for a certain length of time. However, I say the government surely has a responsibility for the youth of this nation and should start a program now to cut taxes and immediately permit taxpayers to write off the cost of education against taxable income and give students a break so they may be able to find summer employment to help them return to college.

I plead very seriously with the government to show some concern about the 30 per cent or 35 per cent of our young men and women under age 25 who are unemployed in this country. Some of these young people are graduates who have a doctorate in economics or a doctorate in this or that. They are unable to find jobs. I am glad the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) is here. He is a good friend of mine from my home city. He has a young family and I know he is concerned about this situation. I hope he will take to the minister the suggestions I have made. I hope the cabinet will do something to relieve Canadian families of the cost of education. The suggestion I have made is not novel. I placed it on the Order Paper so that today I would have an opportunity to express myself, in the hope that something would be done for the youth of Canada.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in joining this debate because in my riding of Vancouver Quadra is situated the University of British Columbia. The staff and students of this university would gladly tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it is now the biggest single campus in Canada with a full-time, registered student population during the winter of approximately 25,000.

I am quite sure Members of Parliament from Montreal would tell us that the University of Montreal has an even larger campus. I am also quite sure that hon. gentlemen from Toronto would say the campus of the University of Toronto is even larger than that of the University of British Columbia or the University of Montreal. What this shows, as the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has pointed out today, is that our university population is growing very rapidly to the point where it is coming close to 400,000 students in post-secondary institutions and the problem of paying the tuition fees to keep them in universities and secondary institutions is a great one indeed.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

It is an added pleasure for me to be able to enter a debate in which the hon. member for Calgary North has taken part. The hon. member, who was in the House yesterday afternoon during private members' hour, will remember what a shocking bore that debate was and how speaker after speaker stood up to read that which had been handed to him by the departmental hack-writers until members were falling over in their seats and snoozing. So it is nice to see a man on his feet debating a subject without his nose in a text written by a poor scrivener in one of the buildings of the public service, sneezing in the dust of the files.

An hon. Member: I thought you would be accepting the motion.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Deachman: I want to speak a little on the motion. It is worth pointing out that the government does permit deductions, and has since 1961, for that part of a student's university fee that is clearly related to his studies. The plea which the hon. member for Calgary North makes is that this be extended to include other items in the category of student fees in order to give the student additional income tax deductions.

I have some figures here which are worth noting and which give an idea of the size of the present deduction. Perhaps from that we can get an idea of the total sum involved. In 1968, the deduction in respect of tuition fees, based on all taxation returns, amounted to about $111 million. On the basis of taxable returns, the amount was about $81 million. You can estimate from that that in the year 1968 the cost to the federal and provincial governments which did not receive that revenue was in the order of $20 million. So we are looking at $20 of revenue which federal and provincial governments forgo in respect of only that portion of the fees which relates to studies. How much more of these fees is unrelated to studies, I am not quite sure. It varies from department to department in the university and it depends on the extent to which the student involves himself in all sorts of student activities. Some of these are obligatory, such as alma mater fees and the like, while athletic fees and fees of other kinds are not.

In any event, we can estimate that if the whole package were deductible, it could go up perhaps by another 25 per cent to 50 per cent and we would be looking at revenue losses of the order of $20 million or $30 million spread over the 400,000 university students in Canada today. It is not really a very significant sum. However, there are many other ways in which we can assist universities through the federal government.

When we come to these comparisons it is interesting to note a tendency which exists. I think the hon. member for Calgary North will concur in what I am about to say. When the federal government starts to support a university through one device or another, the province in which the university is located takes a look at its annual budget and the amount of money it pays to the university, and the provincial Minister of Finance shrugs and says, "Look at the federal treasury putting all that money in. I will cut back my budget to the university this year and let the university ride on the back of the federal government".

I know that in my own province of British Columbia this was very evident a few years ago when Dr. Bladen of the University of Toronto brought down his report on university financing, a report which was commissioned by the universities of Canada. It demonstrated clearly the tendency of provincial Ministers of Finance, when they see a federal windfall coming, not to let the benefit accrue fully to the university by cutting down their own budgets. So whatever we do in this direction, let us do it remembering that not all the funds will pass directly into the hands of the universities but some will be taken away from them before they ever get there.

In what other ways does the federal government assist the universities of Canada? It is estimated that in 1969-70 the advances to the provinces for post-secondary education were $625 million, or about two-thirds of $1 billion. Student loans, which were mentioned earlier in the debate today, in 1969-70 amounted to $80 million and they went to 130,000 students. If we look at the full statistics on this we find that the outstanding value of student loans as of June, 1970, was $237 million, of which the federal government was paying interest on $163 million. This is a very considerable contribution to the young people of this country who are looking for help in financing their studies.

The Canada Council assists universities in a number of ways, particularly through its capital fund which, hon. members will remember, was originally set at $50 million and to which additional funds have been added. At the University of British Columbia, in my own constituency, funds of the Canada Council went a long way toward the expansion of the university library and some went into student housing. Last year Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation set aside out of its available funds for mortgage lending a sum in the neighbourhood of $55 million for student housing loans across Canada.

I note that at the University of B.C., which had a considerable building program for student housing, $5½ million from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation went into construction that year. We expect an equivalent amount go into the completion of that construction in the current year. As a result, the student who is housed in these quarters is housed at a much cheaper rate than he would be outside. The effect is to reduce the amount which can be charged locally because of the influence of rates on the campus and rates which are established in relation to the amount of funds they are able to borrow from sources such as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Of course, the government has involved itself on campuses across Canada in a number of very sizeable scientific laboratories and scientific developments, including the new Triumf development at the University of B.C., which is a nuclear experimental laboratory of important dimensions. Very considerable funds have been poured into the development of a new health sciences centre at the University of B.C., the eventual cost of which will top $20 or $30 million, as well as into several laboratories long established on the campus of the university dealing with forestry and fisheries. These are ways in which over the years the government has given support, not only to the universities but also to students.

There is another area of support which is extremely important to us in reviewing the total picture of what we can do for the student in order to make it possible for him to secure his education. That is in the field of jobs for students during the summer time. I was heartened to learn that $50 million is to be made available this summer for youth programs. I hope all that money will not be spent on buses and gasoline, as suggested by the Globe and Mail, and that some will trickle off to youth and students who are attempting to educate themselves. But it is not really on crash projects such as this that we must count. We must count on annual programs, programs which year after year will sustain students who go out and try to earn enough money in order to go back to university in the fall.

I have always felt that the federal government could do much more than it does now to establish a well co-ordinated program, drawing on the resources of many departments and using them to assist students in summertime. I want to suggest some guidelines which the government might think about with respect to such a program. First, the program be well co-ordinated. Second, it should give summer employment over a long time. Many of these programs are so short in length that they are not totally effective for the student who has to work in the summertime. Third, these programs should pay real wages and not just toy wages. Very often when a student looks at a government program that is offered to him he says, "That's just dandy, if all I wanted was popcorn money. If that is all I wanted I would take the job, but I have to put some money away in order to go back to university next year." We should look at the wage scale we are paying students if we expect these programs to do any good.

The jobs offered to students should not be petty little ticket-taking jobs at the gates of our national parks. I think that a student's work in the summer ought to be related to his knowledge, his education and his skills, so that he will reach the end of summer with a wad of money in his pocket, ready to return to university and feeling he has put in a useful summer being a good Canadian citizen and doing a useful job. I think a student's job should have some real purpose in building Canada. The summer should be a time during which we are doing surveys of all kinds, doing work on the Indian reserves, perhaps doing a lot of those things that other agencies in the past have tried and which the Canada Council has only loused up.

Finally, there ought to be known criteria. The work that a student does in the summer, the wages he receives, the task to which he addresses himself should not interfere with the permanent labour force. We should not try to sweat students in summertime and thereby force working men, who have to earn money for their families all year round, out of decent jobs. These should be special jobs for students devoted to a special service and designed for the purpose of enabling students to return to university in the fall. These are some of the thoughts that I wished to put before the House this afternoon on the occasion of this very excellent debate launched by the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be very brief in my comments. Essentially, the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), through advocating the device of making expenses incurred in the course of obtaining an education deductible for income tax purposes, has the effect of lightening the financial burden now being sustained by students and the families of students enrolled in educational institutions. I believe it to be an imaginative, interim step toward the removal of all financial obstacles which stand in the way of the complete fulfilment of each individual in our society, in so far as education contributes to the fulfilment of the individual. The suggestion is especially relevant at this point in Canada's history, with unemployment being astronomically high, because it is becoming increasingly difficult for students to find the kind of summer employment they require in order to have wherewithall to return to school in the fall.

One might have hoped that the hon. member for Calgary North in preparing his resolution would have proposed to the government the total elimination of financial obstacles standing in the way of the achievement of an education, but I expect that he formulated this resolution in the least radical way in order to make it more palatable to the conservative tastes of hon. gentlemen sitting opposite on the government benches.

I think the economic pay-offs of encouraging the development of an increasingly well educated population have been well documented within the last few years by studies such as those conducted by the Economic Council of Canada. I also believe there can be no doubt in the mind of any hon. member that financial considerations have a considerable influence upon the amount of formal education which Canadians seek and receive. For example, studies have demonstrated an almost directly proportional relationship between the income of a student's parents and the frequency with which his university education has been interrupted. I suspect that similar relationship could be established with respect to other post-secondary institutions if similar studies were undertaken.

To the degree that the provisions of this resolution would contribute to the removal of financial obstacles to a person's obtaining the best education of which he is capable, it is worthy of the support of this chamber as a recommendation to the government for action, and on that basis I would support the resolution. However, if I may I should like to introduce another area for thought into these deliberations.

It has been the experience of jurisdictions that have chosen to make education at all levels available to their citizens without cost, and even in those jurisdictions which offer considerable financial incentives to their citizens to pursue their education, that the successful pursuit of post-secondary education remains largely an achievement of the middle and upper classes and that the participation of lower-income groups in the programs is only marginally higher than it is in those jurisdictions which offer no such financial encouragement.

Since it is a demonstrable fact that native intelligence levels amongst the children of lower-income groups are distributed in exactly the same manner as they are amongst the children of the middle and upper-income groups, it would appear that a major part of the problem is one of motivation, the degree of assumption of success on the part of children, the level of expectations of children and the ability of middle-class teachers to deal in an adequate fashion with the education of lower-income students. I suggest that this question of motivation and the means of developing it is an area to which the House could profitably devote some of its attention in the near future.

In saying this, I am not suggesting to hon. members that it would not be a worth-while measure to remove all remaining financial obstacles to education—to use a shorthand phrase, making education at all levels and in all categories free. What I am saying is that if there is to be such a program and this is the way in which we should be moving, we need to develop concurrently with such a program a means of developing the kind of motivation amongst all our citizens which would enable them to avail themselves of the program with some prospect of success.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to support this motion proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). One of the things we most certainly should do is encourage self-help among the young people. But because it is difficult for young people in the labour market today to help themselves, I think the second part of the motion is worth while, namely, that parents who are already overburdened with taxes should be given some relief when they keep students, sometimes to the age of 30 and beyond, out of competition in the labour market in order that they may remain at school and thus be enabled to make an even higher contribution to the welfare of Canada. Therefore, I do not see any great argument against proposal.

I do not object to spending money to be used in education, especially when it is spent well. Nevertheless, it would be only fair if we could relieve the burden of those Canadians who already are paying too much in taxes in this regard. I am talking about middle-income Canadians. They are already carrying a triple burden of taxation. They already pay heavily in taxation if they own their own home, as most of them do. They carry the burden of education; taxes levied against their properties pay for education. I know about this: I pay $700 in taxes every year on a bungalow in a village. I do not object to that because I think the money is well spent. Nevertheless, there comes a limit in our ability to pay. Relief must be given, in view of present living costs, for those with children going to high school or university.

Obviously, if you make $10,000 a year you cannot ask for welfare or assistance of any kind; you can only ask for equity in taxation, and I claim we are not getting that. If you dip into your depleted resources and support a student of 18 years of age or over who could be earning his own living but who is not working and is therefore being kept off the labour market—I assume that nearly all such students would help themselves to go through university if they had the chance—I submit you are entitled to relief from the burden of triple taxation.

Man cannot live by bread alone. Our present taxation structure gives some relief to the student going to school but that relief applies only to student fees for tuition. It ought to apply to more than just tuition fees. A university student today cannot enjoy a well-rounded life on an amount that is merely sufficient to pay for his tuition fees and for bed and breakfast. The Canadian student has the right to look forward to a rounded life in sports, social events and culture, and to a broadened experience. There are too many eggheads who buried their noses in books for six, seven or eight years, obtained their Ph.Ds and thereby became far removed from the facts of life. Many of them do not know the proper way to raise children or the proper way to deal with their fellow man.

That may be why some of them are far too refined and are out in left field. They have left behind common sense. They do not know anything about unemployment, about how people pay their bills or even how they have a good time. They have forgotten all that on the so-called road to progress. Our taxation laws should take into account our necessity for a well-rounded life and the fact that mother and father are entitled to have a dollar left after taking home their so-called affluent pay. Otherwise, all our taxation becomes ridiculous nonsense. I will not waste any more time arguing this matter. I think the motion is good. I will sit down, ask for the question to be put and see whether we cannot be unanimous at least on this one narrow point.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention to the speech made by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I commend him for bringing this matter forward. I must also criticize him, because his motion does not deal with the problem of equalizing educational opportunities in Canada. Those who represent the rural parts in Canada, the areas far removed from universities, know that the main cost of educating our young people is not the cost of tuition; indeed, that may be considered as being one of the smaller parts of the cost. The main cost lies in the burden of sending the student to university and bringing him back. As I say, the main cost is not the cost of tuition but the cost of room and board as well as the cost of transporting the student to and from university. He must go to university, return home at Christmas, go back to university and then come home at other times. In these latter areas lies the real cost.

If we are interested in doing as the hon. member for Calgary North suggests, of equalizing some of the costs of education and making education more equitable and available for a greater number of students then, it seems to me, we must concentrate in those areas I have mentioned, the costs involved in sending a student to university and in maintaining his room and board. I have raised this matter, since coming here in 1965, several times with ministers of finance. Every time they have said to me, "What about students who live in cities and choose to live in residence? Should they not also expect to obtain relief through these tax deductions?" My answer to that has been a simple and unequivocal no. Those people have a choice. The student coming from outside the city has no choice. If he wishes to further his education, he simply must pay for his room and board.

Generally speaking, the incomes of the parents of children in rural communities, who wish to send their children on for further training or education, are lower than those of parents in urban centres. Therefore, a student who goes into a city to attend university, obtain post-secondary education, or even attend school, is at a disadvantage when compared with his urban counterpart. It seems to me that in the white paper tax reforms which the minister is proposing, special note ought to be taken of this discrimination which adversely affects students coming from the rural areas of Canada.

It can be safely said, for example, that for the tax dollar which the rural taxpayer pays to the federal government he probably receives less value than he receives in return, in comparison with any other dollar he may spend. The reason for that is not hard to see. When we go to rural areas we can see just how many federal and provincial government offices are there, compared with the number of such offices in urban communities. According to the 1961 census, the people of my riding finish school either at grades 5 or 6. That is their average educational level. The difficulties of such people in dealing with the bureaucracy of the federal government or provincial governments are almost insuperable, because they simply do not have the education or confidence that one needs to deal with bureaucrats in Ottawa or in any other urban centre.

Although we are prepared to accept some diminution in the return on our tax dollar in the field of education, we protest against the kind of discrimination that is now practised against us, a discrimination arising from the way in which the federal government has arranged for tax deductions to apply solely for tuition without taking into account the most important costs involved in higher education. It is all very well to talk about the crippling burdens that tuition places on the student when in fact about 80 per cent of the costs of higher education is now borne by the general taxpayer. It is borne by individuals, for example, who are not married, by people such as the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson), neither of whom has taken the plunge into marriage. Yet both of them are supporting the education of my progeny and of yours, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Reid: Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, since we are considering the tax burden on individuals I think it could fairly be said that the more equitable way of distributing that burden would be if the government were to provide tax deductions for room and board to those who must directly pay for higher education in the rural areas. Also, through general taxes they pay the cost of supporting the university and post-secondary school establishment through their payments to the consolidated revenue fund. When we look at the tax position, it becomes even less equitable when we are concerned about making access to higher education the right of all.

We should pay attention to the particular position in which people living in the rural parts of Canada find themselves because of the particular higher education cost structure. This question will become more and more important because there is more and more centralization in the country and less opportunity for extension courses and the like being extended to rural residents. I suggest to the Parliamentary Secretary, who will no doubt be reporting this debate to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), that he seriously consider this representation to ease the financial burden on the rural taxpayer. He should also consider the cost of transportation and room and board while living in the urban centre, and the fact that incomes in rural areas are much less than those of parents of students living in urban centres.

In addition to the money which the federal government provides through the student loans program and research grants to universities, it also provides a significant amount of money to the purses of universities. I was interested in the remark of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), who said the money made available by the federal government is diverted to other things which the provincial governments may consider more important. I recall when these grants were first made available five years ago, the province of Ontario was accused of cutting the amount of money being paid to universities and using it to build roads. This may have been an admirable social objective but it was not in keeping with the means or purposes for which the money was made available. Because of this kind of fiscal irresponsibility, if the federal government is to ensure that the money goes to the proper place it must engage in the difficult practice of shared-cost programs. Everyone must share the blame and no one must share the credit, to ensure that the moneys go to the proper place.

Under the terms of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1967, the federal government agreed to transfer substantial tax revenues and to make an equalized grant to the provinces. In exchange, the provinces accepted full responsibility for supporting post-secondary education, which requires at least junior matriculation for entrance. To enable the provinces to meet this responsibility the federal government transferred four percentage points of personal income tax and one percentage point of corporate income tax to the provinces. In addition, a post-secondary educational adjustment payment was added, to bring the total transfer up to the greater of $15 per capita of the residents of that province or 50 per cent of the operating costs of post-secondary education in the provinces.

In the last fiscal year for which I have been able to obtain figures, the fiscal transfer and cash adjustment payments for 1969-70 were over $625 million. That money must be paid by the federal government which has no control over the accounting procedures or the way in which budgets are set; the provincial governments merely submit their bills. By the terms of the act and agreement, the federal government must pay. In addition, the federal government provides substantial assistance to students through the student loans plan and grants by the Canada Council and others. In the year 1969-70, approximately $80 million in loans was authorized for over 135,000 students in post-secondary institutions. The value of the loans outstanding as of June 30, 1970, was $237 million on which the government was paying interest on $163 million.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't talk it out.

Mr. Reid: Is there a question?

Mr. Bigg: Yes. When are you going to sit down?

Mr. Reid: Before I sit down and, hopefully, close the debate I want to reiterate the peculiar financial disadvantages faced by people in northwestern Ontario and other rural parts of Canada. The benefits which the federal government makes available for higher education are considerable. Grants paid to institutions go a long way in making higher education available for more people than ever before. However, a significant amount of the total cost of higher education must still be met by the rural people of Canada through expenses such as room and board. A very expensive part of their education must be borne directly by the parents and students concerned.

I suggest that a way to equalize the direct cost to the students and their parents would be to permit them, where there is taxable income, to write off the costs of transportation and room and board. As a student from a small community who attended university, I can testify as to the expense and the financial difficulties. It would be pleasant if the government provided a surprise in the White Paper tax legislation to allow these additional deductions.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 1, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON SINGAPORE COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not possible, in the few minutes which the rules permit me, to describe to the House in more than a summary fashion the Singapore Conference of Commonwealth Heads of Government. With the permission of hon. members, however, I should like to convey to the House some of the impressions that I brought away with me. These impressions, hopefully, will add to the information already received from Singapore in the form of the conference communiqué and the very full journalistic reports.

The meeting was, as the House is aware, the first regular Commonwealth Conference to take place outside of London, and the first at the head of government level to be sited in Asia. I think that an Asian location was most fortunate, partly because it was in Asia that momentum was first initiated for the Commonwealth to be transformed from its older, more confining structure into the widely representative association which it is today, and partly because an Asian situs permitted conference delegates to live and work in a newly-independent community in which racial harmony is a necessary fact of life. The world, as we know but so often tend to forget in the immediacy of our own domestic problems, is populated to an overwhelming degree by persons who are desperately poor and whose colonial experience in many instances leads them to question the values and the sincerity of the developed countries. All too often as well, "rich" and "white" are regarded by them as synonymous. We forget these facts at our peril.

In Singapore it quickly became apparent that the future of the world will not necessarily be determined in accordance with European conceptions. The Commonwealth, viewed from Singapore, presented challenges to the ingenuity and good will of its members to find ways of communicating across differences measured in many instances by thousands of miles and by centuries of experience, yet without insisting upon adherence to preconceived notions or attitudes. In the result, the value of the Singapore conference might best be described in terms of the comprehension gained by delegates, and not by the persuasion which anyone attempted to exercise.

The conference dealt with a number of important issues, Mr. Speaker, foremost among them the contentious issue of arms sales to the Republic of South Africa. I am relieved, as I am sure are all here, that, following consideration of factors affecting the security of maritime trade routes, the members agreed to the formation of a committee to study these questions as they relate to the Indian and South Atlantic Oceans in hopes of resolving some of the complex variations and differences of view. I am also pleased that an amended Declaration of Commonwealth Principles, which had been presented earlier to the meeting in its basic form by President Kaunda of Zambia, received the unanimous support of the meeting. Each of these measures confirmed to a large extent the belief by most heads of government that the Commonwealth Association is important; one that is capable of contributing significantly to a better understanding among men of their common ideals and aspirations, their fears and problems, and their increasing interdependence in a technologically complicated world.

The agenda at Singapore permitted wide-ranging discussions of political and economic trends in the world, of the possible consequences of the entry of Britain into the European Economic Community, of a variety of Commonwealth programs, and of the immediate future of the Commonwealth association. Canada disclosed at the meeting that it was prepared to support up to 40 per cent of the financial burden of an expanded commonwealth fund for technical co-operation. Canada also supported a less rigid format for future conferences—one which will relieve some of the unnecessary pressures now present in the preparation of an acceptable communiqué; one that should reduce the number of pre-prepared statements and thus permit heads of government to take advantage of the particular nature of the meetings. There was general agreement that these changes are desirable, and that the unprecedented opportunity for so many heads of government to meet regularly and informally should be jealously protected.

[Translation]

It is my view now, Mr. Speaker, as it was prior to Singapore, that Canada could get along without the Commonwealth but it remains my strong view that we could not get along nearly so well. No problems would be solved by the break-up of the association; not one member would find it easier to advance its own interests in its absence. The Commonwealth benefits all members and harms none. It is my firm expectation that with the help of the important Commonwealth Declaration the association will prove to be a major contributor to the enrichment of human relations. Commonwealth members share a common language. Even more important, they share a common idiom. In the result, there is permitted an informality of encounter and a meeting of minds that surely must be the envy of other countries.

The journey to and from Singapore gave me an opportunity to travel briefly in four of the many countries which have issued invitations to visit over the past several years. Three of those countries—Pakistan, India and Ceylon—are Commonwealth members and long-time major recipients of Canadian economic assistance. Together with the journalists and photographers who accompanied me, I travelled to several of the more important of our aid projects. Through the pens and cameras of these reporters, Canadians are now more aware of the way in which Canadian funds have assisted persons less fortunate than ourselves. I found, too, that in each of those countries the earlier visits of Canadian Prime Ministers St. Laurent and Diefenbaker were well remembered. I should add that the extensive travels in 1958 of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, when he occupied this office, were brought to my attention again and again.

The fourth country visited was Indonesia, the giant of South East Asia, which Canada has recently named as a country of concentration for our aid program and one of whose outstanding citizens, General Nasution, will soon come to Canada as your guest, Mr. Speaker.

In each of those countries the program provided for discussions with the Prime Minister or President and between Canadian officials and their counterparts. These face to face encounters, and that with the Shah of Iran during an overnight stop in his country, provided an opportunity to learn at first hand of the attitudes and beliefs of world leaders in a way which cannot otherwise adequately be duplicated.

A refuelling stop at Lahr permitted me to meet a good number of our servicemen, their wives and children.

[English]

Wherever I went, Mr. Speaker, I am happy and proud to report that the name of Canada was held in warm and sincere respect. The professional dedication of Canadian representatives abroad, be they in the public service or the armed forces, serving in our diplomatic missions or in United Nations of NATO assignments, the quality of our aid programs, the value of our trade and investment relations, the friendly and positive nature of our external policies within and without the United Nations—these have all accumulated for Canada over the years an enviable reputation. I am happy to report that the resourcefulness and skills of the members of my official party and of the Canadian Armed Forces crew who were responsible for our transportation contributed not only to the effectiveness of my trip but to Canada's good name wherever we went. To them I am grateful and offer my thanks.

I have no doubt that all Canadians will agree that this high national reputation places upon our fortunate country a special obligation to conduct our affairs both internally and externally in a manner in keeping with the desire of all men to live in a world which contributes to human dignity, justice and social progress. To this end, all Canadians must dedicate themselves consciously in order to be rid of racial or regional or linguistic prejudices for these are belittling to the world, to Canada, and to us as individuals.

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote in conclusion three sentences from the closing remarks of Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew, Chairman of the Singapore Conference. He said:

> In a multitude of ways, this conference has mirrored in miniature some of the irreconcilables the world community faces. They must be made less irreconcilable. It will become too costly and painful for mankind if these conflicts are not tempered by the spirit of common brotherhood.

Canada cannot live apart from the world. Events in far off places do affect us, as we have seen again and again in our history. If we are able to influence those events for the better, through attendance at important international conferences, and through meetings with heads of friendly states, then it is the duty of Canada to attempt to do so. This duty does not flow from some vague international role to be played by Canada. Canada must act according to how it perceives its aims and interests. It is in our interest that there not be a general racial war in Africa in the near or distant future. If the Commonwealth Conference reduced the chances of such a war, and if the Canadian delegation contributed to the success of that conference, then I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the effort was well expended.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to welcome the Prime Minister back to the House of Commons and to see that he is in good health after his extensive travels. He seems to have recovered well from the bout of sunburn which afflicted him in the course of his trip. I can sympathize with him in the pain of that experience because sunburn perhaps affects him in the same place as it affects me. As a result of my own familiarity with this localized discomfort I believe I shall have some insight at least into what may be one of his actions during the next week or so: when I see him scratching his head I shall know he is not necessarily perplexed—he is just peeling.

We always follow the Prime Minister's travels with interest. His most swinging encounter this trip appears to have been with an orang-outang named Joan. This adventure evidently happened during a recreational period spent in a wildlife sanctuary. Some people might accuse the Prime Minister of frivolous behaviour with Joan but I want to make it plain that I do not. I am aware of his abiding affection for wildlife and I can believe that this episode may well have been a serious discussion, perhaps about the possibility of a cabinet appointment for Joan as part of the government's current reorganization program—and I hope nobody will think I am being unfair to Joan.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I am prepared to believe there was a similar serious purpose in mind when the 350-pound turtle was turned on its back to make sure it would stay put during the Prime Minister's visit. I expect this arrangement was designed to help the Prime Minister maintain an awareness of Canadian domestic affairs while he was away. I can picture this hapless, hard-shelled creature, head withdrawn under cover, feet pawing the air in protest, all its immense potential immobilized. The Prime Minister would surely ponder such a sight, and this thought about home would surely flash through his mind: "I wonder", he would say to himself, "how the Minister of Finance is making out with the economy."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I thank the Prime Minister for his report on the Singapore conference. I share his view that it would have been tragic indeed had the Commonwealth collapsed as a result of the dispute over the British arms sale to South Africa. I understand that the Prime Minister, along with certain other participants at the conference, played a part in preventing a break-up at this time. I believe that he, as well as others who were active in this sense, deserves our congratulations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: We must recognize, however, that the danger to the Commonwealth is not yet over. Irrespective of what happens with regard to the sale of arms to South Africa there remains a considerable amount of tension and perhaps even resentment between some Commonwealth members. I know the Prime Minister does not like the image of Canada as an honest broker, but however we may describe the role I believe this country should continue to try to retain the trust of all sides so that we can do our part to keep the Commonwealth in existence and strong.

Certainly it is a complicated institution but it has been, and remains, one of the most effective forces in the world for peace and understanding among nations. It is in Canada's interest to encourage continued harmonious relations within the Commonwealth and I hope we shall do everything in our power to this end. I am encouraged in this regard by what the Prime Minister said this afternoon.

I have already expressed my pleasure at the Prime Minister's return to parliament. In his absence the Acting Prime Minister and his other colleagues were trying, I am sure, to mind the store, but they often gave the impression of merely going through the motions. They seemed to feel that the action was taking place many thousands of miles away rather than here at home.

Unfortunately, I have to tell the Prime Minister that even in his absence Canadian problems persisted and in some cases grew worse. I presume that the Prime Minister has been brought up to date on the unemployment situation. He may remember—I am sure he will—that shortly before leaving he announced that henceforth unemployment was Canada's number one priority. I can only presume that having told the people this he forgot to mention it to his colleagues in the cabinet. Otherwise I find hard to explain the lack of concern they have displayed about this problem while he was away.

In fact, when the right hon. gentleman is out of the country we seem to get a more vivid and accurate picture of the kind of government that he leads. Each temporary removal of the Prime Minister's colourful wrapper enables us better to know what is really in the package. When the actions of this government are not modulated by his charming charisma in the course of their transmission to us, we get the real message, and it is an old, familiar message of arrogance and complacency that becomes less and less acceptable as times become more and more difficult.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: On his return the country has a message for the Prime Minister. It is a message of urgency. The country can no longer afford delay, and it does not want sweet talk any more than it wants vague promises. This country wants action, and it wants it now. It wants effective action to fight mass unemployment, not next summer, not next spring, but now. It wants action to alleviate human misery now. It wants action now —

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Stanfield: —to get the Canadian economy moving vigorously again.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition, of course, since he is making such an important comment on the important statement made by the Prime Minister. However, before we get into serious difficulty I think at this point I have to remind the hon. gentleman what he knows much better than I do, that comments on ministerial or prime ministerial statements should be limited as much as possible to the contents of the statement made to the House. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is only because of the seriousness of the conditions existing in this country that I am speaking about these matters. As I terminate, may I in personal terms most cordially welcome the Prime Minister back to Canada and to parliament. On behalf of the members of my own party and also the Canadian people, I think, I welcome him back in the hope that he will now have something concrete to propose to deal with the pressing problems of this country. We can wait no longer.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members of this party I should like to welcome the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) back from his safari abroad. In common with all Canadians, we have followed his travels with great interest through television and the press and have watched him riding elephants and camels and smooching with an orang-outang.

I thank the Prime Minister for the report he has given the House this afternoon. I commend him for his statement regarding the importance of the Commonwealth and the part which it can play in the life of our day and generation. I was glad to hear him say that he thought we would gain from this association. This is a commendable change from the time when the Prime Minister, prior to a previous conference, described the Commonwealth as a useful anachronism.

I for one do not accept the idea that the Commonwealth was in any danger. The Commonwealth is a free association of free nations working together for certain common principles and objectives. It is not necessary that they agree about everything. There is no requirement for unanimity. There can be no question of the Commonwealth trying to force its decisions or opinions on any single member of the Commonwealth.

I do not agree with the Prime Minister's statement in India that if other countries left the Commonwealth we would not want to feel less pure than they. I think it should be remembered that the men who go to these conferences to represent the various parts of the Commonwealth are simply heads of government who in a democracy at that particular time, according to the will of the electorate, head their respective governments. Governments come and governments go in a democracy but nations continue and the Commonwealth continues, and no statesman has the right to talk about taking any country out of the Commonwealth. The people are determined to stay in the Commonwealth, and I do not think any disagreement should lead to talk of the Commonwealth disintegrating.

For that reason I am all the more concerned about the whole question of the sale of arms to South Africa by Great Britain. The Prime Minister seems pleased that the amended version of the Zambian declaration of principles was accepted unanimously by all Commonwealth nations. It was accepted unanimously because it had been rendered meaningless by the Canadian amendment which said:

> No country will afford to regimes which practice racial discrimination assistance which, in its own judgment, directly contributes to the pursuit or consolidation of this evil policy.

Of course, by allowing each member to decide what in its opinion is assistance to the policies of racial discrimination and apartheid it was very easy to get unanimity. I submit that the Commonwealth could have survived even had there been a difference of opinion on the Zambian declaration of principles, and that it would have been a good thing for Canada to line up with those nations who uncomprisingly and specifically condemn racialism and those who supply arms to those nations which practice racialism.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

The Prime Minister said in his report today:

> It is in our own interest that there not be a general racial war in Africa in the near or distant future. If the Commonwealth reduced the chances of such a war, and if the Canadian delegation contributed to the success of the conference, then I submit Mr. Speaker, that the effort was well expended.

This did not solve the problem of the sale of arms by Great Britain to South Africa; this merely shelved the problem. The setting up of the committee of eight to look into the trade routes in the South Atlantic and Indian Oceans has merit, but the whole question of whether or not we approve of the sale of arms to South Africa has been left entirely unanswered, and the declaration adopted is virtually meaningless. Therefore the problem has not been solved; it has been merely shelved. I recognize, of course, that the Canadian Prime Minister is in some difficulty in lecturing other countries about the sale of arms when Canada has been selling over $300 million worth of arms annually to the United States to carry on a bloody and senseless war in Southeast Asia. Therefore it is very difficult to lecture other countries on international morality when one's own hands are dirty.

May I say in closing that there is one thing for which the Prime Minister can be very thankful. One of his colleagues, Mr. Milton Obote of Uganda, found that during his absence a general had taken over. I say to the Prime Minister that in his absence a general has also taken over—general discontent, with an army of between 500,000 and 750,000 unemployed. We welcome the Prime Minister back to the cold world of reality. He returns to face real problems. The Canadian people, who on television watched him playing Santa Claus round the world, hope that he will be equally generous in dealing with the problems that face Canadians.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has just reported to us about his participation at the Singapore Conference. I am convinced the survival of the Commonwealth depends to a large degree on the success of such conferences. It is certainly in the interest of Canada to maintain excellent relationship with all member countries.

I remember that two years ago, I attended the Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association with other hon. members. I was most interested, and mainly surprised at the vitality and vigour of the debates. Although we spoke the same language, we sometimes told each other some very hard facts but I finally understood that within an association, it is necessary to speak frankly.

I am also pleased to see that the Prime Minister during his travels has stopped in Ottawa. Frankly, all Canadians are pleased to see him back.

We are also glad that the Prime Minister has received such a warm welcome in all the countries he visited. The press, television and radio have kept us informed about those social activities. It could not be otherwise, Mr. Speaker, since Canada has been generous to those countries.

The Prime Minister of Ceylon stated that Canada was one of the most important supplier of the Colombo Plan. Indeed, the newspapers reported that before the visit of the Prime Minister to Ceylon, Canada had granted that country loans totalling some $94 million. It was therefore quite normal for that country to extend an appropriate welcome to the head of the Canadian government.

Another loan was granted to Indonesia, another country which the Prime Minister was pleased to visit.

During the past five years, all those countries received assistance from Canada which granted them interest-free loans of some $419 million, according to a reply given on June 18, 1970, to a question put on the order paper.

On his return to Canada, the Prime Minister might also decide to grant loans without interest to the provinces and municipalities of Canada, so as to allow them to undertake public works in order to relieve the misery of families affected by unemployment.

It is said sometimes that credits granted to foreign countries help them to buy products in Canada, thus providing work for Canadians. I am convinced that this is an excellent formula, and I feel that the loans that we would grant to provinces and municipalities, so as to allow them to undertake public works, would help not only to stimulate Canadian production, but also to reduce the high unemployment rate that we have presently.

I hope very sincerely that the Commonwealth conferences will be beneficial to Canada. I hope also that in the course of this year we will see very profitable results ensuing for Canada from the last conference.

SOCIAL SECURITY

GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43. Because the reasons for presenting it are contained in the wording of the motion itself, I need take no time in introducing it. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), that:

In view of the request of a number of the provinces for the early establishment in Canada of a guaranteed annual income, and in view of the support for such a program by all parties represented in parliament, this House now declares its support, in principle, of a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians, and urges the government to introduce such a plan at an early date.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is being proposed by virtue of Standing Order 43. The House knows that this Standing Order requires that there should be unanimous consent. I have to inquire whether there is such unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimity, the motion presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre cannot be put.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO REMOVE ATTEMPTED SUICIDE AS AN OFFENCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-220, to amend the Criminal Code (Attempted Suicide).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is pretty straightforward. It is to remove from the Criminal Code the section dealing with the punishment of those who attempt suicide so as to permit the provincial areas of concern to pursue better more humane methods of operation than in the existing section of the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

WRITS OF ASSISTANCE ISSUED 1961 TO 1969

Question No. 87—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

For each department or agency by name, how many writs of assistance were issued for each year 1961 to 1969 inclusive?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Writs of Assistance issued on behalf of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the years 1961 to 1969, except as noted, are: 1961, 249*; 1962, 38*; 1963, 46*; 1964, 44*; 1965, 6; 1966, 245; 1967, 176; 1968, 220; 1969, 286.

*These figures do not include Writs of Assistance under the Customs and Excise Acts, the records of which are available only from January 1, 1966.

CANADIAN EXPORTS TO SOUTH AFRICA 1963 TO 1969

Question No. 177—Mr. Rowland:

1. What was the total value of exports from Canada to South Africa in each year 1963 to 1969 inclusive and what are the projected total figures for 1970?

2. How many firms located in Canada were involved in such exports in each year?

3. How many Canadians are dependent exclusively for their employment upon such trade?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Dominion Bureau of Statistics is concerned: 1. Total value of exports to South Africa, as published in "Trade of Canada—Exports by Countries", are shown below for the years 1963-1970 (to date).

Year	Domestic Exports ($'000)	Re-exports ($'000)
1963	60,299	383
1964	69,166	875
1965	76,226	2,026
1966	74,393	2,017
1967	77,690	1,764
1968	68,341	1,691
1969	78,513	1,655
Jan.-Oct. 1970	86,978	1,399

2. and 3. To be answered below.

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. Answered above.

2. and 3. It is impossible to give precise answers to parts (2) and (3) of this question. However Canadian exports to South Africa, which are expected to top $100 million in 1970, are broadly based and are comprised to a very high degree (over 90 per cent) of fabricated materials and end products inedible. This compares to our exports to Britain (62 per cent); the EEC (54 per cent); and Japan (34 per cent). The percentages are even more striking in the category of end products alone i.e.: Britain (7 per cent); the EEC (13 per cent); Japan (3 per cent) and South Africa (34 per cent). All figures are calculated on the basis of Canadian exports for the first nine months of 1970. For the first six months of 1970 South Africa ranked fourth as an individual offshore market for fully manufactured goods (D.B.S. Classification, end products inedible) behind Britain, Australia and the Netherlands and ahead of such countries as Japan, Germany and France.

There is a very broad regional representation in Canadian sales to South Africa as indicated by our leading exports to that market viz: aluminum; automobiles and trucks, newsprint, softwood lumber, printing and writing papers, motor vehicle parts and accessories, wood pulp, wheat, sulphur, canned and smoked fish, textile fabrics, various chemicals and plastics, and a wide range of fully manufactured goods.

W. J. A. GAGE LTD. PUBLISHING COMPANY

Question No. 270—Mr. Rowland:

1. Was the textbook firm W. J. A. Gage Ltd. recently purchased by American interests?

2. Had majority ownership in the W. J. A. Gage Ltd., prior to the purchase, been in Canada?

3. How many textbook publishing houses now operating in Canada are wholly Canadian owned or have a majority interest owned in Canada?

4. What percentage of the Canadian textbook publishing business do Canadian owned textbook companies now control?

5. Were conversations held between representatives of the Government of Canada and W. J. A. Gage Ltd. before the sale took place?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned and several other relevant Departments, the answer is as follows: 1 and 2. Information reported by W. J. A. Gage Ltd. under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act indicated that as of December 31, 1969 the majority ownership of the company was Canadian. The firm has entered into an agreement to sell a majority interest in its textbook publishing division to a United States firm with a new company being formed to operate this Division. There is no indication that the existing company W. J. A. Gage Ltd. has ceased to be majority Canadian-owned.

3. In the year 1968, 22* companies that can be identified as wholly or majority Canadian-owned reported to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics factory shipments of textbooks of their own manufacture.

4. The 1968 value of textbook factory shipments by the 22 companies identified as wholly or majority Canadian-owned represented 40.3 per cent of the total Canadian factory shipments of textbooks as reported to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in that year.

*Companies have been classified as Canadian-owned where information reported under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act indicates that more than 50 per cent of the voting stock is held by Canadian residents, or where other publicly available information provides conclusive evidence as to company ownership. A number of smaller textbook publishers do not report under the above Act nor is sufficient other evidence available to conclusively establish their ownership. These companies which have not been identified as to ownership accounted for 2.4 per cent of total factory shipments of textbooks in 1968. It is possible that not all establishments publishing textbooks as a secondary activity are included in the above figures. However, it is believed that the omissions, if any, are insignificant.

5. No.

3. How many RCMP were located in the Province of Quebec on October 18, 1970?

3. 718.

4. Although no members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were transferred to the Province of Quebec during the period following the kidnapping of James Cross on October 5, 1970 various members of the Force performed temporary duty in the Province of Quebec since that date. The approximate cost of the transportation, housing and feeding of the additional members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police employed on temporary duty within the Province during the period October 5, 1970 to November 5, 1970 was $11,900.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): By the Department of the Solicitor General: 1. Yes, as of November 5, 1970 the cases were still before the courts.

2. Yes, they were arrested and are being held under authority of the War Measures Act. The following charges have been laid: Pierre Vallières, Section 4(a) War Measures Act; Sections 62(a), 62(c), 230 and 231(a) Criminal Code of Canada. Michel Chartrand, Section 4(a) War Measures Act; Section 62(c) Criminal Code of Canada. Charles Gagnon, Section 4(a) War Measures Act; Section 62(c) Criminal Code of Canada.

	$3,719,663,270	$3,749,582,814	$4,014,619,802

Note: Distribution of the above figures is based on the province in which collection points are located. The amounts are the Customs duties, excise duties, sales tax and other excise taxes taxes collected at Customs ports and collection offices within each province on goods which may be used or consumed in any province. Consequently, the provincial totals should not be taken as reflecting the effect of Customs and Excise duties and taxes on the residents of each province.

PAYMENT OF REWARD FOR INFORMATION LEADING TO ARREST OF ABDUCTORS OF JAMES CROSS

Question No. 670—Mr. Godin:

Has the government paid the $75,000 reward for the person providing information leading to the arrest of Mr. Cross' abductors?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): One of the conditions agreed between the federal and provincial governments in the making of the reward offer was that the identity of any person providing information would be fully protected and would remain confidential. This condition was promulgated in the announcement of the reward offer. In view of the agreed condition it would not be in the public interest to say whether or not a reward had been paid.

Orders for Returns

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. Since October 9 my question No. 143 dealing with aircraft tenders has been on the order paper. At one time or another various bits and pieces of information sought have been either given in committee or in the House. I wanted the information in tabular form, as well as some additional information. Surely to goodness the answer to this question could have been given within three or four weeks. It is long overdue.

Your Honour understands well and I have had a good deal to do with the use of written questions in the past. We readily understand that questions are put on the Order Paper in order to elicit information, but not at some indeterminate time in the future. We know that questions can be put down in a much more logical and understandable form than during oral questions so that the information can be more readily produced. I suggest to Your Honour that the conduct of the government in postponing answers to questions such as this one is quite indefensible. I hope that we can get answers with a minimum of delay; otherwise the whole purpose of questions on the order paper is frustrated.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I will take note of that question, but I do resent the implication that we are delaying.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jerome: As I said last Wednesday, every effort is being made to answer every question on the order paper. At times they are put forward in quantities so great that it is not possible to answer them. Last Friday some 55 further questions were put on the order paper. The ministries are kept very busy trying to keep up with the pace, but we are doing the best we can.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, last week I raised a question concerning an answer to my question No. 79 which was put on the order paper on October 8 in this session and also put on the order paper four, five or six months before that in the last session. Could I get some indication when this question, which I do not think is that complicated, will be answered?

Mr. Jerome: Further to the hon. member's remarks of last week, some further work has been done on the answer, and I hope we will be able to provide it in a very few days.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NUMBER OF PERSONS DRAWING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26 I wish to ask leave of the House to move a motion for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration.

Without making extraneous or embellishing remarks about the gravity of the situation, may I say that the motion concerns the fact indicated by the Acting Prime Minister on Friday, January 29, as recorded in Hansard at page 2889, that about three-quarters of a million Canadians are presently claiming unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has filed a notice as required under the terms of Standing Order 26 and which has given me the opportunity to give serious consideration to his request. The subject of his proposed motion, as outlined by him, is similar to others which have been made from time to time upon the publication of statistics relating to unemployment. The last requests for such motions were made by the hon. member for Spadina and by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on January 14 last. The reasons outlined in the ruling denying those motions, as reported at page 2397 of Hansard of January 14, 1971, would appear to apply in the present circumstances.

As hon. members know, we have just recently had a two-day debate on the subject of unemployment. That took place on January 18 and 19, the House dividing on an amendment by the hon. member for Edmonton West. That was on the third and fourth days of the budget debate. As hon. members also know, Standing Order 26 provides that the Speaker should take into account the probability of the matter being brought before the House within a reasonable time by other means. There are still two days available to hon. members for completion of the budget debate. Indeed, the Standing Orders will provide a number of other opportunities for further discussion of the unemployment situation.

In view of the provisions of Standing Order 26 and in light of all the circumstances, I must conclude that the hon. member's motion should not be put to the House today.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—NEW MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's recognition during the Christmas recess that unemployment is now the country's number one problem and as no new measure has been announced since then by himself or by his ministers in his absence, now that the Prime Minister is back I would like to ask him whether the government proposes to announce immediately any new measures to deal with this grievous problem and render the present situation a little less unjust?

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should discourage the Leader of the Opposition from thinking that new measures can be announced each time the opposition notices that there is some unemployment in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Some!

Mr. Trudeau: New measures were introduced last March to change the cash requirement position of the government from a surplus to a deficit, inidicating that as early as then the government was aware that it had to reverse the economic trends in the country in spite of the fact that the official opposition was condemning us for going into a deficit position. Again in June we announced measures; again in September we announced measures, and again in December. We do not expect, Mr. Speaker, to be announcing them every other week. The hon. member knows that the economic system is not something that changes direction over night. We are confident, and the economic indicators all indicate it, that the measures we initiated last March and in June, September and December are having a beneficial effect and that this serious problem of unemployment will be improved as time goes by.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not ask the Prime Minister to show any consideration for me but simply some consideration for the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the recent statement by the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada that he is not impressed by the degree of stimulation provided by the government's fiscal policies, is the Prime Minister prepared now to consider selective tax cuts? I do not ask the Prime Minister for an announcement every other week, Mr. Speaker, just one good policy that will do the trick.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister apparently does not want to answer questions. In view of the forecast by economists outside the government service that they see no prospect of any material reduction in the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment in 1971 based on current fiscal policies, is it the government's policy to accept this level of unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be referring to some economists but this certainly is not the consensus. I repeat that the economic indicators are, on the contrary, to the effect that the downtrend in industrial production is not continuing, that the index of industrial production is rising, and that in seasonally adjusted terms we have reached the maximum unemployment that we are likely to go through. The Minister of Finance did indicate that in absolute figures it is likely that the figures will rise in January and February, as they do every year even in the best of years, but it is not the intention of the government to be panicked into putting the country back on an inflationary course.

GOVERNMENT FORECAST OF PEAK WINTER UNEMPLOYMENT—NUMBER OF JOB APPLICANTS AT MANPOWER CENTRES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's statement that the unemployment figures may rise, and in view of the fact it is reported that government economists have forecast the unemployment peak this winter as between 675,000 and 700,000, can the Prime Minister tell the House what the government's forecast is as to the peak which unemployment will reach in the present winter? What is the government's estimate of the unemployment figures for this winter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the figures, and I do not believe it is customary to answer statistical questions in the House.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Then, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, when he was Acting Prime Minister, said outside the House that the government had an estimate as to what it thought the unemployment figure would be, and he did not divulge it at that time. Is he prepared to divulge it now?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I think the Prime Minister is quite right in saying that statistical questions of this kind are not in order in the question period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since someone in the government must know what the unemployment figure is, may I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration if he can tell the House what the latest figures are of the number of persons who have applied to Manpower centres as being out of work and desirous of securing employment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not have that figure, but I am sure I can acquire some recent data covering the particular information which the hon. member is seeking and try to furnish it to him.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED REINTRODUCTION OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct this question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the thousands of unemployed in the country, is the government now going to reintroduce a winter works program as requested by the province of Ontario?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is that the program we introduced involving $160 million is about six times as big as any winter works program we ever had.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT—WELFARE COSTS—SUGGESTED CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS ON FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister this question. In view of the heavy financial burden on the cities and provinces because of the number on welfare in Canada, would the Prime Minister now agree to call immediately a premiers' conference to discuss assistance to the cities and provinces in the financial plight in which they now find themselves?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there will be a premiers conference next Monday and Tuesday. This subject is not on the agenda but I am sure that if they—

Mr. Woolliams: Not on the agenda!

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, it is "not on the agenda."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNEMPLOYMENT—LOANS TO PROVINCES—INCREASE IN AMOUNT TO BE SPENT THIS WINTER

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's histrionics may I address my question to the Minister of Finance who may not try to perform an act. In view of the fact that only $40 million of the $160 million loan fund to municipalities and provinces that he referred to a few minutes ago is scheduled to be spent by the end of the present fiscal year, which means during the winter months, and in view of the increasing unemployment situation, is he prepared to make a change in the amount to be spent this winter and increase the amount to the provinces and the municipalities?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are willing to advance the money to the provinces just as soon as they are ready to accept it and they have projects under way.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Benson: To finish that answer I might say that the provinces will have to estimate exactly when they need the money. If it means a change in estimates this year because they can use it more quickly for these particular purposes, then of course we would consider a supplementary estimate.

UNEMPLOYMENT—GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT INCREASE REQUIRED TO REDUCE LEVEL TO 4 PER CENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Again referring to the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada who is reported to have said at Waterloo that in order to reduce the unemployment rate to 4 per cent—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether it is in order to quote extensively or even briefly from a statement of this kind. Perhaps the hon. member might ask the question in another form.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I shall try. Can the Minister of Finance inform the House whether he has revised his estimate with regard to what will happen to employment and unemployment? Does he agree that it will require a rate of growth in the gross national product of some 10 per cent in order to reduce unemployment to about 4 per cent in one year?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what I have said is that we expect the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment to decline throughout this year, and that is still our expectation.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Since government officials, presumably officials of his department, are giving forecasts regarding unemployment to the press, would the minister be good enough to consult them, obtain the information from them and give it to the House?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I will not accept the first assumption made by my hon. friend.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR MORE UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE OFFICES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Since there are some 750,000 claimants for unemployment insurance benefits at present, would the minister give consideration to establishing, even temporarily, suboffices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in various areas, because the offices are now regional, have to cover a very large area, and it is very difficult for claimants to secure their benefits?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question gives me an opportunity to state categorically that there are not 750,000 people in Canada drawing unemployment insurance today. I challenge the hon. member for Skeena to reveal the source of his figures.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: Nor are there 750,000 claimants. On Thursday, the figures announced by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the end of November were 480,000 action claimants.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North has a supplementary question.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, rather than argue about the numbers—

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North in a moment. I understand that the hon. member for Skeena is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege would not have arisen if the Minister of Labour had not thrown out a challenge. May I point out to him, if he does not know this already, that the figure used last Friday was substantiated by no less a person than the Acting Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Minister of Labour might allow the hon. member for Skeena to indicate what the question of privilege is.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is this: who the hell are we supposed to believe over there?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That was obviously a point of debate. I believe that the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North wishes to ask a supplementary question. We ought to return to him. I suspect that the supplementary he wishes to ask is related to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is based on the original question I asked. I am not worried about whether there are 700,000 or 800,000, or whatever the number is; I am worried about a devil of a lot of unemployed people who are unable to obtain satisfactory service from the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I want to see that they get better service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Since the matter has been raised in this way, I have no alternative except to suggest to the hon. gentleman that if he has any tangible evidence of any lack of service by the Unemployment Insurance Commission he should do what other members of the House do and bring the particular case to the attention of my department. Then I shall rectify it.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister wishes to raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is this. Unintentionally, I am sure, the hon. member for

Skeena on Friday said the following, as reported at page 2889 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister about the government's unemployment program. Has he received reports showing that the total number of people unemployed and drawing unemployment insurance benefits now stands at 756,000?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister again. We appreciate the point he is trying to make, just as we understand the point which the hon. member for Skeena was trying to make. This, I suggest to the hon. member, is simply a question of debate. It is not a question of privilege at all. The hon. member for Skeena suggests that certain figures were given to the House; the Minister of Labour suggests that those figures were not given to the House. This has nothing to do with privilege. There must be some other way for the matter to be resolved without the raising of questions of privilege.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ESTIMATES FOR JANUARY, FEBRUARY AND MARCH

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on television yesterday the Minister of Finance said that the January figure for unemployment would be 100,000 greater than—

Some hon. Members: Speak up.

An hon. Member: The hon. member's microphone is faulty.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, on television yesterday the Minister of Finance said that the unemployment figure for January would be 100,000 greater than—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Apparently there is some difficulty with the microphone. I seek the co-operation of hon. members to give the hon. member for Winnipeg North a chance to ask his question so that it can be heard by the minister concerned and by the Chair. The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, on television yesterday the Minister of Finance said that the unemployment figure for January would be 100,000 greater than the 538,000 applying to December, and that unemployment would be 12,000 greater in February. Can the minister tell the House and the country whether the figures he quoted on television yesterday were correct and what the estimates of unemployment are for January, February and March?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke on television I was simply indicating, and my friend can obtain this information by studying the figures over the years, that the change in unemployment figures between December and January, because of the seasonal factor, is normally about 100,000, and that between January and February this change is usually between 12,000 and 15,000. These figures are all published and available for all members of the House to see. I am referring to the unadjusted unemployment figures over the years. After February the unadjusted figures, those relating to the absolute number of unemployed, tend to decline very rapidly.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member on his supplementary, but I think I ought to caution hon. members that that type of question ought to be asked directly and that there should not be references to statements made by ministers outside the House. The rule is well known. Hon. members cannot ask ministers to comment on or to confirm or deny statements made outside the House but may ask their questions directly. The hon. member might now be allowed to ask his supplementary, after which I believe the Chair ought to recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse who has been waiting for the chance to ask the lead-off question on behalf of his party.

Mr. Orlikow: Can the Minister of Finance give to the House the estimates made by officials of his department of the actual numbers who will be unemployed in the first three or four months of 1971?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister has already answered part of that question. I think everyone knows the answer to the other part of the question. I have given it. If the opposition would study the figures which have been published over the years, they would find the seasonal changes that I have mentioned.

Mr. Muir: The Prime Minister says that we must like it or lump it.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—REVISION OF POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In the light of what he said in Fredericton, at the meeting of the dairy producers, could the minister indicate to the House whether the government is contemplating a change in its dairy policy so as to increase substantially the subsidies paid to dairy farmers?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, the translation is not coming through the public address system. To answer what I heard, I should like to advise the House that we are working as rapidly as we can with the industry. We had several meetings last week, and we hope we can come to the point at which we can make an announcement within a few days regarding the levels of support.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There may be a lack of communication both ways between the hon. member and the minister. Perhaps the Chair ought to recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF ARMS BY FRANCE TO SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I am glad to be able to qualify for the fervor of the welcome that has just been given to me by the House. I rise, as is usual for me, to ask a question. Before I ask my question, might I be allowed to join in welcoming the Prime Minister back to the House. I know something of Prime Ministers' conferences and the difficulties encountered. I join in the welcome to him and express appreciation of the kindly reference myself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having done that, I now direct a question to the Prime Minister. Even from the meagre reports from the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference, I gathered that the Prime Minister had raised a strong objection to the sale of arms to South Africa by the United Kingdom. In view of the fact that Canada is a member of the Francophone group of nations in Africa, I have tried recently to get some information from the Acting Prime Minister. I see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is telling the Prime Minister in advance what the answer should be. Has the Prime Minister communicated directly with the French government to complain about the fact that the French are selling a tremendous amount of arms to various parts of the world, including the latest order of 100 Mirage aircraft to South Africa? In keeping with his strong adherence to the principle in which he believes, has the Prime Minister directly approached the French government to indicate Canada's condemnation of such action? Without the consent of the French government, French munition firms are not permitted to sell arms to various countries.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will begin by answering that the right hon. member has his facts right about Canada's condemnation of Britain's intention to sell arms to South Africa. I cannot say as much for the leader of the New Democratic Party, who does not seem to know these facts. On the question of whether we protested the sale of arms to France, the answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. We protested in the United Nations. In Singapore I mentioned the subject on several occasions. I must confess that my communications with the head of the government of France are not as direct as with the head of the government of Great Britain, who was kind enough to discuss this problem with me. If Mr. Pompidou wants my advice, I will repeat to him what I have said both publicly and privately.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not my recollection. When the Prime Minister wrote a letter to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom condemning Britain out of hand, he was not asked for his opinion or that it be made public. Whatever the communications are with the Republic of France or the local embassy, on behalf of all Canadians will the Prime Minister consider doing that which he did with such energy against the United Kingdom?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Trudeau: I am surprised that the right hon. member, who has experience in Commonwealth matters, has not been able to make a distinction between la Francophonie and the Commonwealth. In the Commonwealth the custom is for members to consult with each other frequently on matters which affect the others. In this particular case the Prime Minister of Great Britain said he would consult his Commonwealth colleagues about the opportunity of taking that step and their reaction to it. La Francophonie does not operate in this fashion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if Canada believes in a principle applicable to the United Kingdom, is it not time it should follow the same principle toward France?

REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES RESPECTING AERIAL BOMBARDMENT OF VIET NAM, CAMBODIA AND LAOS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the increasing American aerial bombardment of Viet Nam, Cambodia and Laos, with the resulting destruction of civil lives and the ecology of these countries, has the Canadian government made or will it be making representations to the United States government on this subject?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have not made any representations for some time. As the hon. member knows, we did make very vigorous representations with the result that there was a very sharp reduction of military activity in Viet Nam, including bombing. We will again study the matter in view of the ecological and other considerations raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Prior to making these objections to the United States, may I ask the minister if the United States government invited representations, as was the case with the British?

Mr. Sharp: There are occasions when we make our views known in the United Nations and elsewhere. We have no hesitation in making our views known on this matter. I hope they have the support of the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis: I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister not object to the British sale of arms to South Africa prior to communicating with Prime Minister Heath?

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED PROTEST TO CBC AGAINST PROGRAM INVOLVING CERTAIN VIETNAMESE BARRED FROM CANADA

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the minister protested through the proper channels the action of the CBC last evening in giving substantial television time—in colour yet—to five Vietnamese whom he only recently banned from entering Canada because they wanted to use closed circuit television to direct their propaganda to Canadian and American audiences?

Hon. Otto Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, I was not aware of the incident until this point in time. Of course, it does not strike me as falling within my jurisdiction or offending anything I did in any way.

WELFARE

RECOMMENDED EMERGENCY FUND FOR PROVINCES BASED ON PER CAPITA INCOME AND UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the federal-provincial welfare conference did not reach any decisions and there will have to be continuing conferences, will the minister advise the House whether he is considering the provision of an emergency welfare fund for the provinces based on per capita income and unemployment rates, as recommended by the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Without agreeing with the premise initially stated by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member, coming from Newfoundland, is aware that the Atlantic provinces submitted a proposal to the federal government for a change in the cost sharing formula under the Canada Assistance Plan. The hon. member's colleagues from Newfoundland, who attended the conference, are aware that the federal government has that formula under consideration.

Mr. Marshall: Will the minister advise how he proposes to cope with the immediate crisis which exists in the provinces and municipalities in view of the over-extension of welfare budgets? Also, how does he propose to cope with the critical need for immediate relief to those suffering both physically and mentally right at this moment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member and the minister that this question is very wide in scope and would require a statement on motions.

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN FEDERAL PAYMENTS UNDER CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the fact that the problem of welfare costs exists right across the country, can the minister state if he will be making an announcement at an early date on whether the government is prepared to increase the percentage it pays under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker. I cannot precisely state when there will be an announcement in this connection, if indeed there will be an announcement. As the hon. member is aware, in the white paper on income security approximately 14 areas are identified for revision under the Canada Assistance Plan. Negotiations will continue with the provinces on whether a consensus can be developed with reference to them. In the meantime, it is open to the provinces to change their own priorities to deal with this problem and to receive fifty-fifty sharing with a view to more adequately improving this situation.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BRIEFS AND REPORTS PRESENTED TO CONFERENCE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Will the minister agree to table the briefs of the provincial welfare ministers and the reports of the federal task forces, which were presented at the federal-provincial conference?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As the hon. member should be aware, two of these task force reports were in fact tabled and made public last Friday. The other is not yet complete.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TESTS—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): My question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since President Nixon's budget proposals now confirm that the United States definitely intends to continue underground nuclear testing on Amchitka Island, is Canada considering making further representations to the United States with respect to the continuance of this program and, if so, what is the nature of these representations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have now received scientific reports concerning these operations and they are under consideration. We have not made up our minds whether or not they would justify our making another representation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Forrestall: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has already recognized the hon. member for Surrey so it might be easier to allow him to ask his question. Later, I will return to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

[Later:]

Mr. Forrestall: Did the scientific information we are currently studying reach us before the United States made a firm commitment to go ahead with further testing? The Secretary of State for External Affairs is, of course, familiar with the reasons for asking this question and its great importance to Canadians, particularly those living on the west coast.

Mr. Sharp: We had some knowledge that the United States was considering proceeding with these tests. The information we are studying was received before the President delivered his recent message. Its importance is reinforced by the announcement which has now been made.

POLLUTION

THREAT POSED BY TANKER TRANSPORT OF OIL FROM VALDEZ, ALASKA, TO CHERRY POINT, WASHINGTON

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): My question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the mounting public protest in British Columbia in connection with the proposed shipment by tanker of massive oil supplies through Puget Sound, can the minister tell us whether the government has accepted this potential threat of pollution? If not, then what is the position?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): This question, of course, involves international waters—the high seas—and waters off the west coast which are within the sovereignty of the United States. It is thus a matter which concerns the Secretary of State for External Affairs and, since it deals with oil transportation, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The hon. member may rest assured, however, that the government is seriously concerned about the transportation by large tankers of very large cargoes of oil down the west coast, particularly in the area, hazardous to transportation, of Puget Sound.

AGRICULTURE

CLOSING OF CANADA PACKERS' SLAUGHTERING FACILITIES, HULL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Murray McBride (Renfrew-Lanark-Carleton): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the widespread concern felt among farmers in eastern Ontario over the loss of markets represented by the announcement that Canada Packers are closing their slaughtering facilities in Hull, what action does the government plan to take to prevent this loss of a traditional outlet for livestock products?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I am keenly aware of the concern of livestock producers in the area affected who have traditionally delivered their animals to this plant for slaughter. However, it does not fall within the purview of my department to make announcements respecting the construction of other plants in this area. I should like to advise the hon. member that the regulations concerning meat inspection have not been responsible for the closing of this plant; the action was more directly related to the treatment of the effluent coming from it.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

FINANCE

ECONOMIC COUNCIL COMMENT ON FISCAL AND MONETARY POLICIES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Having heard the homily delivered by the Prime Minister on the long-term effects of the government's monetary and fiscal unemployment policy, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance would now agree with the chairman of the Economic Council, and admit he was wrong in criticizing the fifth report of the Economic Council of Canada which warned the minister and the government of the long-term effects of its monetary and fiscal policies?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is very interesting but it is in the form of an argument, or debate.

CONSIDERATION OF PRICE AND WAGE CONTROLS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INCOME POLICY

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. In light of statements by the Minister of Labour, is the government actively considering mandatory price and wage controls at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Throughout the period when we were actively concerned with inflation, I did say to the House that the government was studying all means whereby inflation could be curtailed and controlled. This was one of the means we were considering, and have been considering.

Mr. Ryan: I take it, then, that it is under active consideration. In light of similar statements by the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission and the uncertainty of the economy generally, will the Prime Minister make a statement on motions outlining the position of the government with regard to an income policy for 1971?

Mr. Trudeau: I certainly cannot undertake to make a statement on policy on that particular basis. It is the kind of statement which is generally made in a budgetary context, and it will be made when the next budget is brought down.

INDUSTRY

MAINTENANCE OF OPERATION OF McBEAN COAL MINE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the possible involvement of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which is one of the minister's babies, can the minister advise us what steps are being taken by the government to prolong the life of the McBean mine, bearing in mind that 200 men will face unemployment if this mine closes in March as scheduled?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire whether some action might be taken or whether is was decided recently to do so and I shall report about it to the House.

AIR CANADA

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO MINIMIZE LAY-OFFS OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Did the minister meet with any officials of Air Canada recently? If so, was he pleased with the meeting and can he offer some hope there will be an abatement of the lay-offs proposed by that organization?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I did not meet with any officials of Air Canada, but our industry specialists met with representatives of both the unions and the company to ascertain what, if anything, could be done to reduce the impact of the proposed lay-offs.

Mr. Bell: We realize that the Minister of Transport has a responsibility in this regard, but will the hon. gentleman undertake to involve himself in this matter having in mind the effect of heavy lay-offs particularly in certain areas?

Mr. Mackasey: It has been the policy of this minister, and of the Department of Labour to be continuously involved with all industries that come within federal jurisdiction at all times.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): In view of the fact that some of the people being laid off have to move today and have been given lay-off notices which will mean that for two weeks they will receive no pay, will the minister undertake to look into this serious situation immediately?

TRADE

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—SEEKING OF ASSOCIATE STATUS FOR CANADA—ACCESS TO UNITED KINGDOM MARKET

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): My question is addressed to the minister who answers for the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the United Kingdom is seeking entry into the European Common Market and the effect this might have on Canadian exports, is the minister studying the possibility of Canada seeking associate status in the European Common Market, and can he inform the House what steps have been taken to ensure access for Canadian grain, pulp, paper and other commodities to the United Kingdom market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board): The question of associate status is not, to my knowledge, under active consideration. The government is, of course, making representations to Britain continuously about the position of our trade. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce reported not long ago on the most recent discussions he has held with his counterparts in Europe and with the government of Britain.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

LEVEL OF MERCURY CONTAMINATION IN SWORDFISH FOUND UNFIT FOR MARKETING—POLICY FOR GUIDANCE OF FISHERMEN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct this question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the fact that two shiploads of swordfish totalling 30,000 pounds, recently landed in Nova Scotia, were found to be unfit for market because of mercury contamination, can the minister tell us the level of mercury contamination in these fish and indicate whether this level would be such as to prevent the sale of these fish for mink or pet food? Will he also tell us whether his department has established a fishing policy for the guidance of those who fish for swordfish so that they may regulate their operations in the future?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some doubt whether the question asked by the hon. member is in order; he seems to be asking for detailed information. But since the matter may be of particular urgency, if the minister has the information he might convey it to the House.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Unfortunately, most swordfish caught on the high seas at a considerable distance from Canada contain more than the half part per million of mercury. The older, larger fish are having to be condemned, at least for human consumption. We are looking into this situation very carefully and if there are any alternative uses for the swordfish that have already been caught we will certainly make use of them.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, since the entire swordfishing operations of Atlantic Canada have now been brought to a standstill, can the minister indicate whether he or his officials have established some policy for the guidance of those men who are now unemployed through no fault of their own?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we will endeavour to do much the same thing that we did for other fisheries in this country, namely, to support the incomes of fishermen until they can either find work in another segment of the fishery or be retrained for employment in other industries.

YOUTH

INVITATION TO SEND DELEGATES TO COUNCIL OF SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

Can he tell us whether the government has been invited to send representatives to the Canadian Council of Social Development Conference on Student Employment and Transient Youth Services? If so can he tell us what departments will be sending representatives and whether officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare have been invited to attend?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have no recollection of any invitation emanating from the organization the hon. member has just mentioned. I will however make inquiries in this regard in order to be able to pass on to him the information he wants.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Friday, January 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury (for the Prime Minister) that Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that we have a thorough debate on Bill C-207 in view of the wide range of subject matters involving government operations that are covered by this bill. I recognize the unavoidable absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recently, but at the same time I think it important that he be present during this debate, and that we hear from him about some of the implications and consequences that flow from the changes that are proposed in Bill C-207.

I did note that when the Prime Minister returned to Canada from the Commonwealth conference he chose to make a reference to the business that has been dealt with by the House of Commons during his absence and indicated some impatience with the progress being made by the House of Commons. Just what the reason is for this impatience I find difficult to tell. As a result of this comment, I took the time to review the matters dealt with by the House of Commons during the 15 days since we recommenced the session on January 11.

First of all, we have spent four days on this bill, the government reorganization bill. I suggest it was necessary to spend this time in view of the many matters the government has chosen to include in the bill and in view of some of the consequences of it. Two days were spent on the budget debate. I would ask whether the Prime Minister feels we should not have spent those two days on the budget, since they were devoted by agreement to a consideration of the very serious unemployment problem facing Canada. We spent two days on the young offenders bill, as a result of which the opposition persuaded the government to delay further consideration of the bill until it had considered some representations that have been made and reviewed its position. I suggest that, in taking this stand on the bill, the opposition was fulfilling one of its responsibilities in this House. That disposes of eight of the 15 days.

I do not want to deal in detail with the remaining seven days, but I do wish to point out to the Prime Minister that the House of Commons gave third reading to seven items of government business. Most of those bills were of some importance and consequence to Canada as a nation. One bill received second reading and then went through the report stage. There was also a motion to refer a subject matter to a committee of the House of Commons. I suggest that, in light of the business dealt with during the absence of the Prime Minister, the House of Commons has in fact been carefully discharging its responsibilities during that period.

To turn to Bill C-207 now before the House, I may say I took note of the comments made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), who introduced this bill on behalf of the Prime Minister on January 26. At the conclusion of his speech, he asked for the co-operation of hon. members in giving the bill careful consideration and speedy passage. I suggest that there is a conflict between those last two phrases, "careful consideration" and "speedy passage", for the reasons I have already enumerated.

The fact is that in this bill we have a mish-mash of many aspects of government operations. Possibly there is some justification for including some of them in the same bill, particularly those items dealing with executive functions and executive operations of the government. However, also included in the bill are some very important provisions that involve new precedents and departures from principle as they relate to the public service of Canada. Just what sort of rationale the government used in putting together these two areas, matters dealing with the executive functions of government and matters dealing with the public service, I fail to see.

I think there are implications in the decision the government made to include all these items in the one bill. In fact, I think this points to the view of government that is held by those on the treasury benches. As pointed out by some other members, we really have a group of technocrats running the government. I think this point was made very well by the President of the Treasury Board who, in introducing the bill on second reading, said as reported on page 2769 of Hansard:

> In essence, the government organization bill deals with the constant challenge facing Parliament and the government—

Then, the first point he made was this:

> —to be as efficient as possible in doing those things which are in the interest of the Canadian people and society.

I suggest that this is the view of a technocrat. To be fair, I should also point out that the minister went on to mention the changes taking place in Canadian society, and said there were implications for the relationships between governmental institutions and our changing society. Nevertheless, the first point he made was the one of efficiency. It is the view of some technocrats that an attempt should be made to make efficiency an end in itself rather than a means to an end.

I suggest that the government needs to give more consideration than it apparently has to some of the implications that flow from the bill now before the House. One of the most important of these that I feel requires consideration is the balance between the executive arm of government and the legislative arm of government. In recent years we have witnessed an increasing concentration of power in the hands of the executive branch of government. We have had any number of examples within the past two or three years which indicate that the sole concern of the government has been to increase the power of the executive branch.

• (3:40 p.m.)

One example, of course, was the introduction of the roster system, and the manner in which the government did it. I want to say that I sympathize with the situation of ministers generally, in view of the very wide range of responsibilities they face and the difficulties imposed on any group of human beings in discharging these responsibilities. Again, I would have to point out that what we had was the imposition of this roster system on Parliament with some unfortunate consequences. I should have thought it would have been quite possible, by following a procedure of negotiation and the exercise of a little patience, to have worked out a system that would have been acceptable, to all concerned. In fact, I suggest that, in the long run, the government would have been caused less trouble than it has had as a consequence of the manner in which it imposed this new ad hoc system.

We had the introduction of regional desks in the Prime Minister's office. Again, this involved a concentration of power and a bypassing of Parliament through the setting up of independent machinery which was responsible only to the Prime Minister. I think this has resulted in an imbalance of power in our governmental structure.

Then, as well, we had rule changes, some of which were introduced by the government. Most of these rule changes, I think, met with the general approval of members of the House of Commons. However, I suggest that the intent of the government in forcing through some of these proposals, and in particular Rule 16a, was to disrupt the proper balance between the executive and the legislative functions of government.

There are also consequences arising out of the use of the committee system and some of the changes which have been made in the operations of the committees of the House. I do have to say in that context that I think all of us recognize that, to some extent, we are experimenting. We are in an experimental stage in dealing with the rules which relate to the operation of the committee system as it is presently embodied in the structure of the House of Commons. There are some satisfactory aspects to the operation of committees, but I think there are also problems that have to be taken into account. I think the fact is that the committee system, as it has operated over the past two years, has in effect reduced the power of the House of Commons in areas which are the proper jurisdiction of the House of Commons.

Another area in which there have been developments relates to the increase in staff and the increase in powers and functions of the Prime Minister's office as well as the office of the Privy Council. This aspect is well known to hon. members and again can only result in a further imbalance of power. As a matter of fact, there are some suggestions that this change has resulted in some imbalance of power within the Cabinet itself. The suggestion is that the result has been to concentrate power in the hands of the Prime Minister and those around him. The developing trend, therefore, has been a rising growth in ministerial staffs. This is, of course, related to the increasing role that Parliament or government must play in our society. This, by itself, should not be criticized. It simply must be noted when we are taking into account the changes which are to be made in the executive and legislative functions of the government.

We have a further growth in the ministry. This, of course, has to do with the executive branch. There is provision for a number of ministers of state within the government. We are going to have more Parliamentary Secretaries and a larger cabinet. Possibly they are needed and possibly further development is needed. I am not going to argue against these changes in view of the very important role the government must play in our society today, but again we have the government concentrating the growth in the executive function and the power of the executive. I think the question must be asked, where is the balance in this situation? I think the power of Parliament to act has been reduced, and this has been noted by many parliamentary authorities on the constitution and government of Canada. Comments to that effect appear in a number of texts which I could cite if necessary. These authorities have, in fact, pointed out that, in many respects, Parliament is in the hands of the Cabinet. I suggest that the power of Parliament has been reduced, in particular in dealing with money matters. This, of course, goes to the very core of the Power of Parliament as we know it, and as it must function if we are to preserve and develop our parliamentary institution.

There have been a number of token gestures to help the opposition parties in particular, and private members in the House of Commons, including such things as extended research assistance. Of course, this assistance has helped the private member and Parliament, but I suggest that in no way does it begin to offset the increasing power of the executive as we have seen it. While I am on this subject, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to note, as I have had occasion to do during some other debates in this Chamber, the comparisons that are often made between Canada and Great Britain. I believe the President of the Treasury Board made similar references when he was introducing this bill.

The fact is that while our parliamentary institution and our system of government has been modelled on the British parliamentary system, we do have to keep in mind the fact that Canada is a different sort of country. In the first place, we have a federal system of government rather than a unitary system. This imposes some very fundamental differences on the way in which government operates. We are at a different stage of development. The geo-economic structure is different, and I think as such it imposes some real differences on the operation of government and our parliamentary institution.

While at this stage I should also deal with some of the provisions of Bill C-207 concerning the ministries and ministers of state. I know that some rather extensive powers are to be given to the Governor in Council in deciding on the need for a new ministry of state. Clause 14 of the bill, if I might be allowed to quote briefly from it, reads:

> Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters coming within the responsibility of the Government of Canada warrant the establishment for the time being of a special portion of the public service of Canada presided over by a Minister charged with responsibility for the formulation and development of such policies, the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

True enough, this does introduce some flexibility into government operations. It also begs some questions and it leaves some questions hanging in mid-air. For one thing, it seems to me in reading over this particular clause, along with some of the others, the question of the status of these ministers of state within the government and the Cabinet is left in the air. It seems to me there are some unexplained aspects and areas which are not completely clear. Will these ministers be of Cabinet rank or are they in fact going to play some different sort of role within the government?

In addition, I also note that there is no time limit in respect of the phrase "for the time being". It seems to me that the use of this phrase does suggest this is a temporary arrangement or an arrangement which is of limited duration. However, since there is no provision to limit the existence of these new ministers of state, we could see a new ministry of state established, as is provided for in clause 14, for the time being, which in fact became a permanent institution. It would then have been established not by this Parliament but by the Governor in Council. I suggest this is not the proper way to proceed with the business of government. I also note that power is given under clause 15 to transfer functions from other departments or other agencies of government to one of these new ministries of state.

I suggest that here is another important consideration. If parliament does vote money for the use of an agency or a department of government and then the reorganization is carried out, under the provisions of this bill power is given to transfer some of that money from existing agencies or departments to this new ministry of state, and this new ministry of state may in fact be constructed on an entirely different set of principles. In fact, the establishment of this new ministry of state may involve completely new departures from government policy. The departures from government policy may be completely acceptable to Parliament, to myself and to other Members of Parliament, but the fact is that the government is given the power in this bill to transfer moneys which have been voted for one existing structure, and presumably a certain set of policies which go along with it, to a new agency which may be operating on a completely different basis. Of course, that would apply only within the fiscal year in which the particular change occurred, but again I suggest it is a violation of the principles of parliamentary government and of the control of Parliament over money matters.

I think also we must keep in mind what is happening with regard to the collective ministry. Here, I note one of the comments by the President of the Treasury Board. He suggested that the warp and woof of our ministerial system is very complex. I am not quite sure what interpretation might be placed on that remark. The interpretation of some people is that things are going to the dogs. Certainly, there is a good deal of foundation for that belief. I think the government is warping many of the responsibilities which they have been called upon to bear, and with respect to the woof, there are indications that many aspects of our affairs are going to the dogs.

We have to keep in mind what is happening to the various ministries because it would appear that the government is embarking on some new departures in policy with regard to the ministry. It would appear that the government is perhaps taking a partial step at least towards the British system which does involve a separation of the functions of the cabinet and of many of the ministries which exist within the British government. I suggest that we need a clearer elaboration on this particular point, and on some of the implications and consequences of the provisions of this bill with regard to the over-all operation of government. I suggest, with all due respect to the President of the Treasury Board, that this can only come from the Prime Minister. This is why we need to hear from the Prime Minister in this debate. I want to make clear that I feel there will be many occasions in dealing with the problems of society as they exist today when it will be necessary to have special agencies such as are provided for in the sections dealing with the establishment of various ministries of state.

However, I think we do need to reconsider some aspects of this particular portion of the bill. At the same time, I should also state that reference has been made to the possibility of appointing a minister of state for science policy. We are going to have a minister of state for urban affairs and possibly in some other areas of government activity as well.

There is one particular area to which the Prime Minister should give his attention. I refer to the very serious state of affairs that exist in Canada today because of the fact that the rural society in Canada is disintegrating at present, in some cases as a result of policies and in others because of the absence of policies. At present we have a number of departments of government which are concerned with one or more elements of rural affairs in Canada, but nowhere do we have a co-ordination of those efforts. The Department of Agriculture, of course, is involved; the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has also been involved in rural problems and rural affairs. A number of other departments must of necessity be involved as well, each with their own particular area of responsibility. But nowhere do we have a co-ordinator, at least in terms the public can identify or that can be identified by members of the House. Thus, I would suggest that in a reorganization of the government consideration should be given to the establishment of a ministry of state for rural affairs. I will not attempt to spell out any thoughts I might have at this time concerning what it should include or how it might be structured. However, I feel there is a good case for giving consideration to the establishment of such a ministry which could co-ordinate the activities of the government in dealing with the problems of rural Canada which are very serious indeed and which, I feel, must be taken into account by the government in the near future if we are going to salvage any sort of viable rural society in Canada.

One of the more important aspects of the bill has to do with the establishment of a department of environment. I noted very carefully the remarks of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) who is the minister designate for this new department. I noted also some of the steps that are proposed and some of the steps which are being taken to deal with the problems of pollution and environmental planning. I am sure all hon. members will agree with those steps. I think that this is a very important new department of government. I suggest that when we are dealing with problems of pollution and of environmental affairs and planning, in fact we are dealing with some of the crunch issues that face society today, both in Canada and in other countries. The fact is that the state of our environment, its deterioration, is one of the causal factors of the social discontent in our society today. I say that because in today's society young people in particular note that there are two particular elements present around them which could result in an end to human life on this planet within their own lifetime. One is the threat of nuclear war, and the other is the possibility of environmental deterioration which would make life on this planet no longer possible. I suggest the realization that there are elements present about us today that could result in a termination of life does result in some of the impatience which we see about us in society and some of the discontent which we have seen expressed in so many forms within recent years.

In dealing with the new department, I think it must be noted that this is where we will have a crunch between government and industry. This is where we are going to face the crucial issue of whether industry will be required to operate in the public interest or whether it will continue to be allowed to operate strictly for its own profit, its own narrow interests and benefits. This is where we are going to face some crucial issues, such as whether or not the government has the determination to ensure that industry in fact takes the necessary actions to develop a better environment so that we all might live healthy lives.

There are two or three other issues which I should like to mention as well in dealing with the new department of environment. One has to do with the potential conflict which I feel must be taken into account and which should be drawn to the attention of the House. The department of the environment will be concerned with all aspects of the natural state of life, and this will have particular consequences in northern Canada where the ecology is very fragile. On the other hand, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources are more concerned with the economic and commercial development of that area. It seems to me that there is ground for potential conflict within the framework of the departmental structures as proposed in this bill, taking into account this area. It is a problem which must be noted by hon. members, and by the government in particular.

I find it difficult to understand why the government dos not propose to transfer the national parks service to the proposed department of the environment. It seems to me it is a natural for inclusion within that department. This is an agency dedicated to the preservation of certain areas in their natural state for the use and benefit of all our people. But it is not being transferred to the new department. It is being left with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, even though responsibility for the Canadian wildlife service and for the Migratory Birds Convention Act is being transferred to the new department.

The bill proposes the establishment of a Post Office Department separate from the Department of Communications. This, of course, involves a rather long, sad story which I do not intend to relate at this point. However, I would like to take this opportunity to place one matter on record again, the matter of rural postal service. I am very much concerned about it because I have had to deal with a number of problems in my constituency, and I know the problems in other areas of Canada, where the withdrawal of postal service seriously affected rural communities. I must say that in some instances I could not argue against the withdrawal of postmasters from small communities, but I wish to place on record once again a proposal which I made when I was speaking in the Throne Speech debate last October. I see no reason why we could not develop a sub-post office system in some rural areas similar to that which operates in large urban centres. I see no reason why we could not have a main post office located at some central point, with a number of sub-post offices operating under its jurisdiction to ensure an adequate standard of postal service for all the settled rural areas of Canada.

Much has been said during this debate about the proposed amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act. Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I take serious objection to some of the provisions in this respect. I fully sympathize with an attempt on the part of government to introduce a greater element of flexibility in its personnel management policies. Certainly, I am not going to stand in the way of any reasonable steps which will enable the government to deal with its personnel-management problems in a better way, but I am not prepared to support a measure which will provide a degree of favouritism to some people in the public service which is not available to others. I feel that these proposals in Bill C-207 are very objectionable.

This is one of the most important pieces of legislation to be brought forward during the current session of Parliament. I am very unhappy at the government's handling of the bill, and at the manner in which it was introduced. I am very unhappy when I think of some of its implications and consequences, and that is the reason for my intervention in the debate today.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks in connection with this bill on the fifth day of debate are to express a rejection of any question of an apology for a continuation of the debate. I can only express regret that the Canadian media have seen so little in this bill which is about to transform the structure of parliament, of the Governor in Council, and the relationship between the two. They have been deluded, as in the past, by siren songs of efficiency, of flexibility, and themes of that kind. And yet every time that this is done it is done at the expense of parliament, at the expense of the House of Commons.

This is another slice of the salami sausage, only this time it is a big chunk that is being taken. I shall go into that in greater detail when I discuss the proposals to set up the ministries of state and then, by proclamation, make the necessary changes. It seems that this administration has forgotten one fundamental principle. This House is not responsible to the cabinet, nor does it owe obedience to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The Governor in Council is responsible to this House, but to see it behave, to see what the Governor in Council wants to do, you would never believe that. It rides roughshod over the principle of having to come to this House to justify its actions.

Every time we give the Governor in Council power to do something it is an abdication; it is a laissez-passer; it is a carte blanche to go and do something without telling parliament. I know it will be said, "well, there will be provision in the estimates thereafter." Just whom are they trying to fool? Is the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) going to try to substantiate that argument, that there is control by authorization after the event, that there is control after the payment of the salary of a minister? What debate is there on the salary of a minister? What debate is there now on any estimates? What opportunity is there for justifying the restructuring of government? Mr. Speaker, government is responsible to this House. This House is not a tool of the cabinet. But this cabinet is composed of technocrats and former bureaucrats who insist that this House must be molded, must be trapped, must be formed into some complacent organization. It makes me think that in the minds of those who have designed this they wish a rubber stamp assembly, merely to say yea or nay, much as we see in various countries around the world operating under despots, benevolent or otherwise.

In precisely a bill of this kind, and by this devilish principle, you can see the manacles being fashioned to be tied to hand, to wrist, and to ankle of this House. Oh, it will be made to sound very plausible, very smart, and acceptable under the guise of so-called efficiency and flexibility. The government backbenchers have been hoodwinked all the way through. Some additional parliamentary secretaryships have been thrown to them as a sop. They are just pennies for children, candies for grasping, greedy kids.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is what this is. There is no need for all these new parliamentary secretaryships. We shall see, when we see the final composition of the ministry with the four categories of ministers, just how big the cabinet will be. I suppose that a parliamentary secretaryship will become a first rate status symbol. Parliamentary secretaryships will become status symbol No. 1. The government will appoint a few more members from the backbenches who have had no experience of parliamentary secretaryship. May I say that I spent many years as one. I have some idea of the duties of that office, of the potential of that office and how few ministers are able to recognize the best way to use their Parliamentary Secretaries to full advantage. Most ministers have been scared of their Parliamentary Secretaries. They are frightened they might take some of the shine away. This has been one of the facts of life in the past. That appointment was made as a reward on a regional basis, or for good attendance, or far too often for some other capricious reason. On the other hand, there have been some very notable exceptions of ministers who understood how to use a Parliamentary Secretary. Such ministers used the Parliamentary Secretary to his best advantage and, as well, for the general benefit of the department and of the minister. I will deal with that question in a moment.

Having said that, I hope, for goodness sake, that the press, the radio and television, instead of chasing their tails like puppy dogs on other fluffy issues, will look at this particular bill and see how serious it is. Oh, there has been mention of it, but that has been in passing. The hare is running another way and they all want to chase after it. Yet the principal game is here, in the consideration of Bill C-207, and they ought to pay attention to this debate.

I want to join in the general resentment and objection to the omnibus nature of this bill. I made some remarks to Your Honour at the opening of this stage of the debate about that matter. I have noted Your Honour's remarks and, of course, do not question your decision. Yet I wish, with the greatest of respect, to underline to the Chair the absolute requirement, and I say this in all seriousness because I have had some experience in that position, that any question put before the House must be capable of resolution in a clear and straightforward manner, readily understood by hon. members. There must be no tricky solutions. Yet, Mr. Speaker, this bill, to import a phrase, is too clever by half. It is a contradiction of principles. Oh, we were fed some pap the other day.

We were told that this bill was for the greater efficiency of government. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) said that the underlying principle of the bill was the more efficient organization of the government. What a lot of nonsense that is. As I said to Your Honour, we could take all bills relating to one ministry and lump them together into an omnibus bill. I suppose then that we should consider 15 or 18 bills during the year. For instance, we could take all the bills dealing with trade and lump them together. After all, it could be said that they are for the improvement of the trade of Canada and that that is the principle of that bill. Surely to goodness, we are not reduced to that; and therefore I say, this bill must be rejected. This bill must be rejected because of its manner of presentation. Separate bills should be introduced, as was done in the past. When the ministry of forestry was first set up, an appropriate bill was brought in and discussed. When fisheries and forestry were combined, there was a government reorganization bill. The previous administration under Mr. Pearson brought in a proper bill for that.

Mr. Drury: That was dealing with government organization.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But it certainly did not do all that this bill seeks to do. This bill is to extend to deputy ministers or deputy heads certain continuing privileges with regard to superannuation. What on earth has that to do with the setting up of the department of environmental control or with the redefining of the duties or responsibilities of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources? I have no cause for complaint about the latter department. What has it to do with the redefinition of "Post Office". After all, that poor orphan has been left out in the snowdrift since last fall. One can almost see the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) pining away from the lack of attention in this House. That is fine. That is proper reorganization.

But, Mr. Speaker, will the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) tell me what that has to do with reducing the period of service in the Public Service after which some shall be entitled to additional pension benefits? What has that reorganization to do with an obvious sop to some deputy ministers, now or in the future, who are to be allowed to continue contributing to the superannuation fund after they have ceased their government employment? What has all that to do with the organization of the government? Nothing at all. Nevertheless, hon. members are interested in seeing the establishment of a department dealing with environmental control and the consequential changes regarding responsibilities in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. As I was indicating, there possibly will be a narrowing of the definitions of the responsibilities of the latter department so that perhaps the minister will not make a damn fool of himself with regard to oil and gas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That way he can concentrate on a few lesser matters and perhaps pay better attention to them.

Mr. Paproski: Sock it to them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will give general approval to the establishment of the department of environmental control. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I am sure I can say, and I think most of us will agree, that that is not the solution. The setting up of the department will not solve the problems of pollution. This is only putting together a framework. We see the direction of the intention. I hope that there will not be an attempt to bring in all sorts of bits and pieces from wherever they can be gathered in the Public Service, and that there will not be the sort of growth in the department that we have seen in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and that we saw when the President of the Treasury Board was minister of industry. In those cases we saw empires being built. We then saw some of them being torn down again. We saw how much swelling went on. Thousands of public servants were engaged in a wild campaign of empire building. We hope this will not occur again with this particular department. This department cannot be another organism of government that is given an unbridled head to grow and proliferate.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I would like to see a much more highly organized department which placed emphasis upon efficiency and co-operation with other levels of government. It will not be the only department that has to deal with the control of pollution. The provincial counterparts and municipalities will also have responsibility. All responsibility will not be in the hands of one mammoth department.

I was completely mystified when the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) suggested that the national parks should be under the jurisdiction of the minister responsible for the control of pollution. I suggest to the hon. member that there are plenty of national parks which are for the benefit of the people and not for a bunch of theorists. The protectionists would put up 15 foot fences around large areas of the country, lock the gate and throw away the key.

Mr. Burton: Environmental planning, not pollution.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is not environmental planning. When it comes to the philosophy of the national parks, in many instances it is just for the preservation of bears. Those people who have never been in a national park are quick to state their opinions. Those who have direct contact with the advantages and problems of national parks are scoffed at by the self-proclaimed authorities who live thousands of miles from any meaningful national park.

I already referred to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As he will have fewer duties in the future, I hope that this will eliminate the possibilities of the wild performances we have seen in the past months with regard to oil and gas development, sales to the United States and our relationship to the United States with regard to resources development. Perhaps he will have more time to pay attention to the facts with regard to our nuclear policy. Hopefully, he will have an opportunity to read the report of the Senate Committee on Science Policy with regard to nuclear development. The President of the Treasury Board raises his eyebrows. He used to have responsibility for nuclear power generation and heavy water production, so perhaps he is sensitive. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should be able to stick to the facts rather than make wild sounding statements.

I now wish to deal with the creation of ministries and ministers of state. This is where my qualified assent to the bill ceases. As I indicated earlier, I think that Parliament is being raped by this very subtle step. The government has stated "Give us the powers and we will look after them in the future." Parliament is being asked to grant these powers carte blanche.

In the context of the Canadian organization, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) is more powerful than the President of the United States within the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain in respect of the British Parliament. There is less restriction on the Prime Minister of Canada than there is on the head of the two countries which I mentioned.

The government wants to create five ministries of state to be established by proclamation of the Governor in Council. Why is Parliament being asked to do this? Not one justifiable reason has yet been advanced as to why the government should not come before Parliament before creating a new ministry. The hon. member for Regina East referred to the wording of clause 14 a few moments ago. I will not put it on the record. However, if one reads these words in clause 14 he will see that there is no hope left for this House. That is what will happen if the Prime Minister and the Governor in Council obtain this reserve supply of ministries.

Under the terms of clause 16 the Governor in Council, by proclamation, may vary the means and nature of departments. The government does not have to come before Parliament in order to create these five potential ministries of state. I suggest that with a little care, at least half of the really worth-while areas of responsibility within the government could be concentrated in five ministries. It would not take me very long to calculate how much of the controlling features of government could be included under five ministers of state. There are going to be four categories of ministers. There is nothing to prevent a cabinet of ten, which would include five ministers of state who would have responsibilities of an all-encompassing nature. A minister of state for economic affairs could be responsible for trade, industry, finance and revenue. The heart and core of government could be under the jurisdiction of five ministers of state. Five ministers and the Prime Minister could control everything in a cabinet of ten ministers. The cabinet, by proclamation, could play around within the compass of these five ministers of state. Hon. members opposite are so easily satisfied. They do not have any qualms or uneasiness about what might happen.

Now, if there is to be a ministry of state for a particular purpose, if it is to be called a ministry in name, like others, why change the name of the chief executive officer, now to be known as a secretary, not as an under-secretary? We already have a secretary of two departments. We have a Secretary of State; we have a Secretary of State for External Affairs. Their chief executive officers are know as under-secretaries. But, to take one example, there is to be a ministry of state for urban affairs whose chief executive officer will be known as the secretary for urban affairs. Is he of cabinet status, or is he not, in the minds of the public? We have a Secretary of State who is a cabinet minister with definite responsibilities, well-know by tradition. There is no confusion. But as to the Secretary of Urban Affairs, what happens in that case? C'est un autre fonctionnaire. But he has a title of the same rank as a cabinet minister. Why contribute to confusion?

Mr. Drury: What about the Secretary to the Treasury Board?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Well, he is not an official who is seen by the public to that extent. And then again, I would say there was perhaps a lapsus ommisus on the part of Parliament when Treasury Board was set up as a separate ministry. At the time the title "Secretary of the Treasury Board" really came into being the Minister of Finance was the President of the Treasury Board—it was not a separate ministry to that extent. Of course, the hon. gentleman is quite right. I am glad the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) has brought this point to my attention. Perhaps my criticism should have been made earlier. However, I believe it is highlighted now. I would say that the Secretary to the Treasury Board, that this official, if indeed he is the senior official directly under the President of the Treasury Board, should be known as Under-Secretary, if he is the deputy minister, because after all there is no reason why a man should be known as a Secretary for Urban Affairs when his minister of state will be known as the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

As I said earlier, there has to be a minister of a department and I suppose that is category one—or is he to be known as a sort of minister, class four? You know, like deputy minister one, deputy minister two, deputy minister three. We now get into categories of ministers. I suppose the minister class one would be a minister without portfolio, a minister class two would be a plain minister of state who had been appointed to assist somebody. Third, the ministers of a ministry of state would be ministers class three, though their salaries would be about the same. Then, of course, there are posts of prestige with some additional "perks". They would be the ministers of departments, the ministers class four. But what sort of catch-all is this? It is like a cat's breakfast.

I am wondering what kind of a cabinet will emerge out of this. All ministers of equal rank meeting together, some 30 odd? The President of the Treasury Board knows very well that there will be no decisions reached in meetings of a cabinet so large; it merely becomes a debating society unless there is, shall we say, one presiding thereover who is not so benevolently disposed that any discussion can take place. In that case, everything will be approved in accordance with the wishes of the Prime Minister. That, of course, is a possibility. But in my own limited cabinet experience I always felt that 25 was far too many. Ultimately, one would come to the idea of an inner cabinet. So, there will be ministers of state who will not be entitled to attend all cabinet meetings. Oh yes, ministers class three and ministers class four might make it into cabinet, but a minister of state would not be required to attend unless the affairs of the department to which he is related were under consideration, or a report on which he had been working was up for discussion. And, of course, the poor old minister without portfolio would be called in only now and then. It would be the old story of "don't call us, we'll call you". I can imagine what type of jealousies this will cause as between competing ministers, the jockeying that will go on, the knifing that will go on—

Mr. Langlois: Speaking from personal experience?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Non, monsieur, not at all. When it comes to personal jealousies and knifings, the President of the Treasury Board went through a period of years here from 1963 to 1966 when the place was awash with blood.

Mr. Langlois: You can start from 1958.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. former Parliamentary Secretary was not here in those years.

Mr. Langlois: I read.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There was a short period when there was disagreement but it finished very quickly. That is the way it went. It is not the first time it has happened and it likely will not be the last, because it is the nature of men that they disagree and sometimes they disagree violently. So, there you are. In any event, let us say that this framework here is made to order for nights of long knives.

Another point I shall refer to is administrative in nature. It affects the transference of funds under clause 16, the question of the transference of funds without authority by way of an estimate and an appropriation bill for a particular ministry. I believe we shall see attempts made to transfer funds by way of a proclamation or order in council. The President of the Treasury Board could possibly take it upon himself to give the House an unqualified undertaking that such a proclamation will not be used to effect the transference of funds from one ministry to another. It is my view that there is only one way of lawfully transferring funds from one ministry to another and that is by means of an appropriate item in the appropriation bill.

Mr. Drury: And the Transfer of Duties Act?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is the only way to do it—to obtain parliamentary sanction. I certainly do not agree that it could be done by proclamation. Clause 16 is the one which makes the changes. Oh, it seems to me that within the last 18 months some subterfuge was attempted, but the government was caught; it had then to stand red-faced, protesting its innocence, saying something had perhaps been done through inadvertance. This is something we should avoid. I would point out to hon. members on the government backbenches that they have a responsibility. They do not realize how they are being shackled, manacled and muzzled. That is something that should be made absolutely clear.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I also wonder why we must have this increase in the number of Parliamentary Secretaries. The number, of course, will be limited by the number of ministers class 4, as I call them. They are the ones who will come under section 4 of the Salaries Act. The ministers of ministries of state will come under section 5 of the Salaries Act and will not be entitled to parliamentary secretaries, but the section 4 ministers will. With all due deference, not every minister in the list requires a Parliamentary Secretary, though I know some ministers who could really do with two.

Mr. O'Connell: What we should have is more ministers.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The other way to approach it would be a proliferation of ministers. However, some ministers, who I will not name, could quite easily employ the services of two parliamentary secretaries, two good men or women as the case may be, providing they are given their head to go ahead and work.

As I have already pointed out, I have had over 14 years' experience in this House. I came into the House as a Parliamentary Secretary. I was fortunate in the minister I first struck because he was quite prepared to assign as much work as I wanted, and sometimes quite a bit more. But some of my colleagues were not so fortunate.

I also remember when I occupied the chair Your Honour now occupies, and on other occasions when I have been on this side, seeing some really good men literally wither on the vine because they had a minister who was either jealous of the potential of his parliamentary secretary or who did not know how to delegate authority.

It seems to me absolutely ludicrous for an intelligent Parliamentary Secretary to stand up in the House when an ordinary question is directed to his minister during the question period and to mutter or stutter that he will take the question as notice.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He gets $4,000 a year for that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am glad to see that in some instances ministers use their Parliamentary Secretaries to pilot legislation through the House. Not necessarily major departmental legislation, but certainly many of the amending bills or legislation from the other place, which is usually of an amending nature, can be taken through the House in this way. Let the minister take through a major bill by all means. I know the hon.

member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will express horror, but I would use more Senators in the cabinet to avail myself of the talents in parliament. I would also make Parliamentary Secretaries more responsible in the House. I would not be averse to using a minister of state or a Minister without Portfolio to cover in the Commons a minister who sits in the Senate. The British parliament has functioned very satisfactorily in this way for decades—no, far longer than that. Some present day cabinets draw about one third of their members from the House of Lords, and their spots are covered off quite adequately in the House of Commons by Praliamentary Secretaries or ministers of state. It seems to me this is the way it should be done.

I should like to see Parliamentary Secretaries take more charge of debates. Let them be responsible for the debate behind the minister. It is not for the minister's office, for some lackey or executive assistant in the Minister's office, to take charge of a debate; that is the responsibility of the Parliamentary Secretary who should know what is in the legislation. Let him organize the debaters behind the minister if the government is putting up speakers. However, this government and others have been far too prone to muzzle their members and not let the backbenchers in on the discussion of legislation. If the Parliamentary Secretaries want any tips on how to organize a debate, let them consult the opposition chairmen of committees and also former Parliamentary Secretaries over here who have had that task. I think there is a tremendous future in the use of Parliamentary Secretaries if proper use is made of them.

However, I am just wondering whether this is some means of taking wholesale care of the deficiences of our parliamentary pay as far as government backbenchers are concerned. That is what this measure appears to be because more government backbenchers will have their pay increased by $4,000. I suppose one of these days, when and if this legislation goes through—if it is not thrown out because of this type of provision—we will have another dozen Parliamentary Secretaries named. This salary increase is guaranteed to embellish the bill as far as government backbenchers are concerned. I say it is ridiculous to have 26 or 28 parliamentary secretaries because there is not the need.

An hon. Member: It would be cheaper to send them to the Senate.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With all due respect, this provision is for the relief of some impoverished government backbenchers.

I come now to my last point. Why should a former deputy head be allowed to contribute to the public service superannuation fund beyond his service? This proposition raises questions in my mind. First of all, would such contributions be matched by the crown and, if so, under what formula? There is no provision in this bill that the contributions shall not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The provision is already in the act. Everything is matched.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Well, this is a question we want answered. It seems to me that every penny contributed to the public service superannuation fund by a public servant is matched by the crown. A reading of this provision leaves me in no doubt that there should be a matching contribution made by the crown. I am sure there are many deputy heads who now wonder what on earth they have been given. A fair reading of this provision would cause anyone to say that there had to be a matching contribution. In any event, I have raised the question and I should like to know what formula is to be used.

• (4:50 p.m.)

What is the minimum service to be required before a deputy head could avail himself of this provision? I understand that it is ten years pensionable service, so that apparently answers this question. I should like to know also why this is being done. As a result of the annual salary increases, have these deputy ministers grade one to grade four reached a salary range from $30,000 to over $40,000 per year? Is that not good enough? Do we have to give them this additional privilege? I have not heard this is going to be offered to ministers or Members of Parliament. After they cease their services or take a leave, perhaps with the inducement of their electors, are they to continue to contribute to their pension funds?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so only to advise him that, according to the rules, his time has now expired.

Mr. Drury: I think he is almost finished, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of the House. I have very little more to say, but I did want to put these questions on the record. Is this to be an inducement to squeeze out certain deputy ministers? Is the little "deputy head" to include a secretary to the ministry of state, because he is described as the chief executive officer under the terms of this bill?

Why is this privilege being extended to deputy heads and no one else? Does it extend to heads of agencies who are of the rank of deputy head as we now have in many instances? I had in mind the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Chairman of the Broadcast Commission and the heads of a number of these government boards and agencies including the CRTC who hold the rank of a deputy head. Are they to be included under these provisions? We want to know that.

I spoke about the power struggle between Parliament and the Governor in Council, and I shall not go into that in detail now, but I say that any change in the efficiency or better organization of Parliament, whether it is by an amendment of the rules or done under the guise of a government organizational or reorganizational bill, is equivalent to reducing by another notch the power and prestige of the House of Commons.

To go back to the theme I put forward at the beginning of my remarks, we see many so-called democratic assemblies around the world which frankly represent rubber stamp operations. They exist only to give the rubber stamp of approval to the action of an executive which may be a small cabinet of ministers under a dictator or under an absolutely powerful president. There is absolutely no question of the existence of a democracy at any time within those regimes. This is the sort of thing we are called upon to move toward sometimes under our rules. We are being asked to take one giant step toward that end through this bill, some parts of which are quite unacceptable. There are other parts dealing with the ministries of state and the appointment thereof, and some of the other things provided for which are totally repugnant to this House, and I would ask hon. members to reject the bill on that basis.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I am wondering if we could call it five o'clock?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is unanimous consent, the hon. member may call it five o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Canadian National Railways—request for government committee respecting pensions to expedite House business; the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Allmand)—Canadian National Railways—Discontinuance of dining car service, Ottawa-Montreal; and the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather)—External Affairs—Proposed Amchitka underground nuclear tests.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO INCREASE PENSION AND GRANT COST OF LIVING SUPPLEMENT WITHOUT MEANS TEST

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give immediate consideration to amending the Old Age Security Act to provide for the full amount of the income supplement provided thereunder to be incorporated into the basic pension, for the amount of the basic pension to be increased to $150 per month, and for the increase granted each year on account of an increase in the cost of living to reflect the full extent of that increase, so that all persons 65 years of age or over who meet the residence requirement will receive a full pension of $150 per month, plus the cost of living increase, without any means or income test, the full amount of the Old Age Security pension thus being recognized as a matter of right.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this Motion that Your Honour has just read from the Chair calls for the old age security pension to be raised to $150 a month and for us to get back to the basic principle of the Old Age Security Act. That principle is that pensions under that Act should be paid on a universal basis without any means or income test on any part of it. The motion also calls for the cost of living escalation which has been in the legislation for a number of years to be made applicable to all pensions paid under the Old Age Security Act, and likewise, for the present 2 per cent ceiling on the amount of escalation that can take place in any year to be removed so that the full amount of the cost of living increase might be reflected in the amount of the pension itself.

As I shall no doubt be told during the course of this debate, this is not the first time I have presented a motion of this kind. It is not even the first time I have presented this very motion. I suggest, however, that the urgency of this motion is increasing and that it is time for the government and Parliament to give it serious consideration.

My assertion that the urgency of this matter has been increased is based on two propositions. The first of these propositions is an obvious one, one which, no doubt, hon. members had in mind when I said there was urgency, namely, the increase in the cost of living and the difficulty that many of our senior citizens are having in living on the amount of income that they now receive. Despite the provisions that were made in a bill which has already been passed in this session, and which we must therefore not refer to in the course of this debate, the amounts that will be available in April still do not bring our senior citizens up to the poverty line. That is one of the points of urgency that I feel make it imperative that the government and Parliament reconsider the whole question of the provisions of the Old Age Security Act.

I said, however, that there were two bases for my using the word "urgency", and in my view the other one is even more serious, if not quite so precise as the dollars and cents angle I have just been speaking about. The other element of urgency arises from the fact that the government in its white paper on income security has come out clearly and definitely for a lessening of the application of universality and for greater use of selectivity in all of our pension, welfare and security programs. I know that the government does its best to marshall arguments. I know that it quotes figures, that it tries to tell us that universality is out of date. But I suggest that this declaration by the government that it is going to move in the direction of selectivity rather than universality is a case of going the wrong way and that it will yet destroy our whole social security setup.

I know that there is a great deal of talk about what we are going to do for the poor, whether they are senior citizens or the working poor or any group in our society. But I do hope that some day we will get to the realization that it is not good enough just to do things for the poor and keep them that way. When we do things for the poor because they are poor, they are poor at the end of the road. This is not good enough for a society that is capable of producing the amount of wealth that we can now produce in this country. If we are going to do something for people and not hurt their pride and dignity, not do damage to their souls in the process, we should do it for them because they are people and have rights as people. In my view, the day will come when even our attitude toward jobs and toward being employed will change. Now, you are not a first class citizen unless you can get a job, and if the job is non-existent, you have to fall back on some form of unemployment insurance. When it is gone, you have to fall back on social assistance, relief, welfare, or what have you.

I firmly believe the day will come when all people in a democratic and decent society will be guaranteed the income to enable them to live as a matter of right, whether or not they get attached to an existing or a non-existing job. I want us to move in that direction, and back in the early 1950s I was glad when we started to move in that direction by putting our old age pensions on a universal basis. Like other members in this House, I have had enough experience with older people to know that that legislation did a great deal for the sense of pride of our older people.

Now that we are going in the other direction, we are losing much of the gain that we made by that course of action. Therefore, I suppose this is a case of starting all over again. It took us many years to get the means test removed and to put the old age pension on a universal basis. It stayed that way for a decade and a half. Now, because the government has announced it is going the other way, some of us have to start all over again. If that is the case, I suppose that is what I am doing today. By this motion, I am saying we are starting all over again to try to win the battle for old age pensions to be paid to all our people as a matter of right. Let us not talk about any war on poverty, about being concerned about the poor, or about the dignity of our people if we are going to require these means and incomes tests. If we really mean what we say about dignity and the rights of our people, let us determine that our legislation will provide a proper standard of living, first of all for our older people, then for our families, and for our citizens generally, not because they are hard up but because they are people.

I need not make the point that I do not stand alone in my contention that universality is a much better principle to work on than selectivity, but I would like to read a few sentences on this subject which I thought put the point very well. They were contained in a brief that was drawn up by the Canadian Council on Social Development in December, 1970. These are comments on the position set out in the white paper so far as the government's old age pension position is concerned. At the point in this document from which I shall read, reference is made to certain dangers and then the following statement is made:

> A major example of this inherent danger is the unfortunate polarization of the argument about "universality versus selectivity" in the white paper on income security.

I have said that I am a universalist, but I am happy to subscribe to what I now read in this paragraph. It goes on to say:

> The two are not necessarily incompatible, granted effective use of the income tax system. Progressive income tax is the fairest way we know of raising money for social purposes. If it is wisely employed in relation to income security measures, the desirable features of selectivity can be achieved while maintaining the most important advantages of universality. Indeed, it is noteworthy that the white paper on unemployment insurance argues strongly for the principle of universality (which the white paper on income security appears to denigrate) in support of its proposal to include all members of the labour force in the program, whether or not they are likely to benefit by it.

I might say that in this same document the Canadian Council on Social Development—which we knew for so many years as the Canadian Welfare Council—complains about the level of benefits under the Old Age Security Act not being high enough and also about the fact that those on the basic pension will not get the cost of living escalation. But I come back to the portion of a sentence in this paragraph which I have just read which it seems to me is very significant, "If it is wisely employed"—that is, the income tax principle—"in relation to income security measures, the desirable features of selectivity can be achieved while maintaining the most important advantages of universality." If I understand that right, and I think I do, it says very simply that it is far better to make a universal grant, whether it is the old age pension or what have you, and tax those who, because of that grant, get into higher income brackets, than it is to test people's income before you give them something that should be their's as a matter of right.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that I think the Liberals of the early 1950's, and they were in power most of that decade, were right when they agreed to our demand to take the means test off the old age pension. I think that the Old Age Security Act which was passed in 1951, and came into effect on January 1, 1952, was the best and most progressive piece of social legislation ever passed in this House of Commons, and I am proud to have had a part in seeing that this was done.

Far from accepting the statement that some of us are old fogies because we want to stay with that principle that was brought into effect in January, 1952, I suggest that that is the way to achieve a just and decent society, not to call upon people to disclose their means before they get something that is handed to them because they are poor, but to grant pensions, allowances, and soon, I hope, a guaranteed annual income to all our people as a matter of right.

This is private members' hour, Mr. Speaker. I have now taken up 13 or 14 minutes of it. I know what will happen to this motion. Debate will still be taking place until you, at six o'clock, tell us you are leaving the Chair until eight o'clock. So, I do not expect it to come to a vote this afternoon. I do not expect to win this battle this month, perhaps in the next little while, but I do ask hon. members of the House to give serious consideration to this whole question. I will listen to argument. Others have their right to present their points, as I have mine, but I submit we are going in the wrong direction by taking away universality from the old age security pension. I urge that we get back to that principle as soon as we can and, when we do it, that we establish the pension at more realistic levels, such as $150 a month with the right of everyone who is on the pension to the cost of living escalation.

I will not take time to answer the arguments that I know will be made about the cost and all the rest of it. We have been over that ground many times. We can afford in this country what we want to do. If we want a decent, just society, if we want people to have their share of the affluence we are able to produce, we can order our affairs accordingly. This motion asks that we take this one important step in that direction, and I hope hon. members will give it favourable consideration both in this hour and in the thinking about old age pensions that they will do, as they must, in the months that lie ahead.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I repeat that it is always an honour for me to have an opportunity to deliver a speech during the private members' hour, particularly on as significant a subject as that dealt with in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I am satisfied that he has long been concerned with the welfare of elderly Canadians. I hope he will pursue this laudable objective, especially with regard to subjects involving persons of a certain age who served well the Canadian community.

The hon. member must also be commended for stating that the Liberals of the early '50s were progressive and enlightened men because they passed legislation on this most important question of old age security pension.

I must say that even though they were right in 1950, they did not think perhaps that one day they would have to take new measures and adjust to other circumstances. Many changes have occurred since 1950 and many more will occur in the future. In 1950 these people were wrong about income security especially with respect to people who retired at 70.

I should say also that at that time oil heating was far less popular than it is today. In fact, many people still burned coal for heat. If we had not evolved and since today coal is increasingly rare, I wonder where we would be.

In fact, changes are happening so fast that one must keep up with the times. The present government, like those that preceded it, has to go through some sort of readjustment made necessary by present circumstances.

I also know that the hon. member is in favour of a universal plan as opposed to a selective one. This is all very natural since his party is essentially socialist. In fact, the New Democrats shun like the plague anything that is selective by nature. They insist on giving a little to everybody and, the end result is that nobody gets anything.

In any case, this philosophy is far remote from that of the present government and I take this opportunity of expressing my appreciation for it because given our present circumstances and more specifically the amount of public funds at the government's disposal, it is unthinkable that with the financial resources available we should give out more money in all directions as we would like to do.

Unfortunately, with the responsibility to govern comes also the responsibility to redistribute the money at our disposal.

As far as the arguments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are concerned I recognize in part their value. He and his colleagues are trying to get into power. I do not say that they are using the right means to do it but it seems to me that they used one of those means. Indeed people who are not in power say a lot of things which generally may sound pretty good to the press and to the public. But when one takes a serious look at the issue one realizes quickly that it is inconceivable to satisfy everybody by passing uniform acts in order to make every body happy.

When you have lived for a while you know that it is impossible to please everybody. It is inconceivable that everyone should be happy in this valley of tears of ours. Even tremendous amounts of money cannot satisfy the rapacity, if I may call it so, of human nature.

Those who have something want a bit more, and those who have more want even more than they have, and so on, until death.

But I should also like to mention that the federal government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Isabelle: I was alluding to the liberals, Mr. Speaker... I should also like to mention that the liberal government—how strange that the word should always find its way to our lips, that even our adversaries should be forced to use it—belongs to the elite of Canadian society.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The federal government has been legislating in the field of social security since 1927. It started by granting a modest pension of $20 per month to which the provinces contributed. In 1931, the federal government decided to contribute 75 per cent and in 1949, the amount of the pension was raised to $40.

But on Friday, I heard one hon. member say he was surprised at the speeches full of substance that had been prepared in dusty offices of some officials. I think that to make sensible and rational speeches, one must be rather well informed and from what we hear in this House, it is not easy. I do not know whether this is due to excessive smoking, but it seems that there are hazy periods in some poor brains, at least judging from what they say.

In spite of the hon. member's comments, I would like as much as possible to stick to the text which I had the pleasure to draw up with some officials, because as I said a while ago it is difficult to memorize all relevant statistical data. Moreover, it is the custom in the House when a question is put to government members to consider statistics to be out of order. This is normal.

Indeed, the public life of Our Lord lasted three years. I do not know whether he studied from early childhood until age 30, but at 33 years of age, he died under the tragic circumstances with which we are well acquainted. This is why it is unthinkable that I could give you specific information gathered for quite a long time. Indeed, somewhat like Our Lord, I came into political life a little late and I did not have the astuteness of some members who have spent almost all their life behind those oak walls where stiffness and coldness usually prevail.

I would like to keep to a text, as much as possible, because it contains some extremely interesting figures.

[English]

Since its introduction, the Old Age Security Act has been amended on a number of occasions. The rate of benefit was increased twice in 1957, first to $46 monthly and then to $55. In 1962, it became $65, and in 1963 the monthly pension again was raised, when it reached $75 a month. It remained at $75 until 1968 when, because of an amendment enacted in 1965, the pension could be escalated each year depending on, and in accordance with, changes in the pension index used for the Canada Pension Plan. Provision was also made in 1965 to reduce the pensionable age under the old age security pension program one year each year so that the OAS pension would be payable in 1970 to all persons aged 65 and over. As a result, the percentage of elderly persons aged 65 and over covered by the OAS program increased from 66 per cent in 1965 to 91.8 per cent in 1969 and very close to 100 per cent in 1970.

[Translation]

I must say that this is an extremely important thing, since it deals largely with the problem of money expended for this program.

I would like to say also that—

[English]

By 1970, the Old Age Security pension was $79.58 monthly and the maximum guaranteed income supplement amounted to $31.83, for a combined total of $111.41 a month, but by the end of that year the OAS pension scheme had been amended again following the proposals set out in the White Paper on Income Security.

Under these new changes to the Old Age Security Act, which received Royal Assent on December 18 as we know, substantial improvements have been made to benefits payable under this income support program for our senior citizens and improvements have been made with respect to its other features. The basic old age security pension has been set at $80 a month while the maximum supplement, payable to elderly persons with little income other than the old age security pension, has been raised to $55 monthly for a single pensioner and to $95 a month for a married pensioner couple. The 1971 maximum supplement will increase by 72 per cent for single pensioners and by about 50 per cent for pensioner couples over what it was in 1970.

In 1960-61, and this is very interesting, Mr. Speaker, the expenditures under the Old Age Security Act were $592.4 million and represented 1.55 per cent of the Gross National Product. Between that year and 1969-70, the value of the Gross National Product more than doubled, but costs in the same period under the OAS pension legislation, which by then included the guaranteed income supplement program, nearly trebled to $1,730 million, so that in 1969-70 OAS/GIS benefits to aged people represented 2.16 per cent of a much larger GNP. These costs are therefore growing at a faster rate than Gross National Product, which means that a greater proportion of the nation's resources are being channelled into this program for the aged. These amounts exclude any payments or assistance received by elderly persons under any other programs, whether government or privately administered, which, if included, would increase the proportion of GNP just mentioned.

The hon. member has recommended that each elderly person now eligible for the old age security pension should be paid a basic $150 a month, escalated each year by the full increase in the cost of living. Let us consider the financial implications of his proposal. Taking the fiscal year 1969-70 as an example, old age security pensions and guaranteed income supplements payable in this year totalled $1,730 million. If instead all OAS pensioners received $150 a month, total expenditures in that year would have been $2,809 million. His proposal would involve an additional $1.1 billion. Based on estimates for fiscal year 1971-72, annual expenditures under the new OAS/GIS amendments legislated for in 1970 and which will come into effect on April 1971 will total $2,183 million, whereas under the scheme proposed in this motion expenditures would amount to $3,108 million. From these data, it can be quickly calculated that paying all pensioners $150 a month would cost the country nearly $900 million more than the recently amended Old Age Security Act.

Further, if these dates are projected and if the base-year benefits are escalated at 2 per cent a year, costs in the fiscal year 1975-76 under the amended Old Age Security Act are estimated to be $2,450 million, while those under the proposal suggested in this motion would amount to $3,680 million, more than $1.2 billion in extra expenditures. This means that in four years the additional cost of the proposed scheme under motion 13 will increase from $900 million to $1.2 billion over the new OAS/GIS program. Not only are these additional costs large, but they are becoming larger and larger as time goes on. Surely the hon. member is not suggesting that the taxpayers of this country can afford this additional load in one particular sector of the income security system. As it is, the latest amendments to the act will place an additional $200 million into the hands of the most needy elderly persons in the current year. Hon. members will agree that is a substantial sum of money.

[Translation]

Any good government will try of course to provide as much social security to the taxpayers as possible but as I said at the beginning the financial means at the disposal of the government are limited. However through his white paper the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is trying to ensure better distribution of the funds at his disposal.

To me, the principle of redistribution is the most important today, much more so than in 1950.

The same thing probably applies to family allowances. It is obvious that if our resources are distributed exclusively to one population group, as proposed in the motion, we will necessary have to neglect the other Canadians. Even those who are unemployed will be deprived of certain financial resources if we put all our eggs in one basket.

[English]

Another factor is that the hon. member is suggesting a return to the type of program based on an approach of universality, while the philosophy of the white paper on income security suggests selectivity in income security. Universality was important at one stage of the development, but social and economic change indicates that a selective approach is a much better technique. This change is explained in the recently issued white paper on income security, part of which I quote as follows:

> The challenge, then, is to arrive at a renewed affirmation of income security policy which will have the effect of assisting the people in the greatest need without detracting from programs designed to stimulate the economic development which is the basis of national well-being.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I regret to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary, but his time has expired.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I will speak for only a few moments. I support the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), with one reservation. My main concern is for the aged in this country who are suffering from exceptional incapacity. The white paper on income security states that after April 1 old age pensioners will receive $135 a month. This is certainly below the poverty line. Hon. members forget that there are old people who cannot look after themselves. There are people in my province who are crippled because they worked for many years trying to make a meagre living. They live alone in hovels. They need a tenants' allowance in order to acquire proper accommodation. When they ask for increased benefits, we cannot supply them.

The previous speaker referred to the great cost in providing additional benefits. The state owes the aged of this country a decent living, a living at least above the poverty line. The motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does not ask for too much; it asks for $150 a month. As I stated, I have one reservation. I do not agree that a man of 65 years of age earning $25,000, $30,000 or $35,000 a year requires such a pension. I do not agree with a universal, across the board pension of $150 a month. I say, with respect to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that if he inserted an amendment which would require a means test I would support the motion to increase the old age security to $150 a month. That would be little enough, Mr. Speaker. The government should forget about bandying around figures and talking about the millions of dollars it would cost. There should be no end to this bucket. I say that old people who are exceptionally incapacitated should receive more.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is to be congratulated on bringing this motion before the House. As everyone knows, he is an outspoken advocate on the problem of old age pensions. We are happy to have an opportunity to debate this motion this afternoon. The hon. member spoke on television last evening in a similar way. He will be pleased to know that at least one of the members on the government side took time to listen to his dissertation. The hon. member proposes that old age security benefits be increased to $150 per month for everyone 65 years of age and over. If this were done, we would be able to do away with the guaranteed income supplement which we passed only a few weeks ago.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has suggested that the urgency for bringing forward this motion is the increase in the cost of living. He has also argued the question of universality versus selectivity. I suppose that is the real argument. To be against this motion would be to be against motherhood. We are really debating whether $150 per month should be available across the board regardless of the income of the person receiving it or whether it should be available on the basis of a means test.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). He is a very capable member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. He handles himself well in that committee. He opts for the selectivity approach rather than universality. I have forgotten all the figures mentioned by the Parliamentary Secretary as to the increased cost of a universal as opposed to a selective program. However, one figure that sticks in my mind is that there would be an increased cost of $900 million over the present program. As the number of our senior citizens increases, this amount will increase.

One aspect which has been brought to my attention by people concerned with welfare in my constituency is that people receiving old age security benefits and the guaranteed income supplement are not eligible for general welfare assistance, except perhaps for drugs. It seems to me that when the federal government is negotiating the terms of the Canada assistance program with the provinces, some provision should be made to meet the needs of people in exceptional circumstances, people receiving old age pensions, to qualify them for special assistance should the cost of housing, for instance, be unduly high or should some other special need arise.

Income maintenance for this group of the Canadian population has been the subject of numerous revisions and adjustments from time to time. Income maintenance payments for aged persons made under federal programs amounted to $773 million in 1962-63. The figure had risen to about $1,950 million in 1970-71, just short of a threefold increase. Older Canadians now receive income protection through a number of measures both public and private. Under public programs income support is available under the Old Age Security Act, the guaranteed income supplement, retirement and aged survivors pensions under the Canada and Quebec pension plans, and supplementary social assistance under provincial welfare programs, the costs of which are shared by the federal government under the Canada assistance plan. In the private sector, income protection is provided through private pension plans or various self-help measures such as annuities and other privately-arranged retirement schemes. Public and private programs which provide income support are important to elderly people. It is also important to ensure that a wide range of health, welfare, recreation and other services are provided to meet the needs of this group.

I should like to review the needs of elderly persons for benefits in kind or services. Canada's first century of progress was characterized by the pioneering of young people. Only in comparatively recent years have we become fully aware of the special circumstances of the aged in our population. Changes in this aspect of our development have come upon us faster than we have been able to prepare for them. There are greater numbers of older people than ever before, and the number continues to rise. The urbanization of our society, employment practices, inflation and rising costs of living have all contributed to the changed conditions for older persons. Since families live in smaller homes and in apartments, there is less room to accommodate aged members of families. There are fewer tasks for old people to do in the home, and too often they are left out.

I turn, now, to population and life expectancy in Canada. The 1.6 million persons aged 65 and over in Canada represent slightly less than 8 per cent of the total population. Thus, while Canada may be regarded as having a low percentage of older people when compared with some other countries, we are experiencing serious and increasingly complex problems for which there are no simple solutions. Life expectancy at birth for both males and females has risen substantially over the years. On the other hand, although the number of aged persons has increased, only small gains in life expectancy can be reported for those who reach age 65. But while improvements in life expectancy are important, of equal or perhaps greater importance is that the quality of life be improved. The problems of the young have become of such concern that they have to a major extent absorbed the creative energies as well as the economic resources of communities. All too often, therefore, there is little left to invest in improving the quality of life of the older sector of the population.

Hospital care is available to all residents through provincial hospital plans by means of a cost-sharing arrangement with the federal government. The majority of the provinces are participating in medical care plans in which the federal government shares in the costs. For the indigent, payments for health care are assured by the provincial governments, with costs shared by the government of Canada under the Canada Assistance Plan. This plan is designed to provide increased federal aid, thereby enabling the provinces to integrate, expand and improve their welfare assistance and service programs.

Aside from health care there are some services specified in the legislation which can be of special assistance to the aged. I refer to case work, counselling, assessment, information and referral, home-maker or home-help and day care. In some places hot meals are delivered to older persons at midday in their own homes. Arrangements to live with private families, the so-called foster care programs, are being developed in some areas. Nursing care for the aged in their own homes is also provided in many communities. Senior citizens centres have been provided in some places, where the aged can go for recreation and in many cases receive a range of other services. Hundreds of clubs have been organized, some of them by older persons themselves and others by churches or other agencies. A national organization of older adults has been established with branches in most of the provinces. It is interesting to note that nearly all these groups presented briefs and wrote to many Members of Parliament during the past year and a half while we were reviewing the old age security program and the guaranteed income supplement.

The Canadian Council of Social Development, which was formerly called the Canadian Welfare Council, has concerned itself over the years with matters pertaining to the aged and aging. Some provincial and local welfare councils have established sections on the aged. Service clubs have been actively engaged in organizing and helping older persons in many localities; for example, they have developed senior citizen centres in housing projects. These service clubs as well as churches, fraternal organizations and other voluntary agencies frequently engage in providing recreational programs for the aged. Grant programs organized by the Department of National Health and Welfare, as well as grants from federal funds allocated to fitness and amateur sport, have provided funds for research and demonstration programs which directly or indirectly will improve the care of elderly persons.

I should now like to refer to the provision for living accommodation for aged persons. In all provinces, homes for the aged and infirm, including nursing homes, are provided under provincial, municipal or voluntary auspices. The provinces contribute to the maintenance of needy persons in these institutions, 50 per cent of the payments in respect of assistance cases being met by the federal government. All provinces, in varying degrees, make capital grants toward the construction of homes for the aged and infirm and in some provinces capital grants are also available to municipalities, charitable organizations and non-profit corporations for the construction of low-rental housing. According ot the 1961 census, of the 747,000 heads of households aged 65 and over, almost one-quarter lived alone. It is within this group of older adults—those who live independently in their own homes, whether owned or rented, and whether separate dwellings, flats or apartments, as well as an additional 198,000 elderly persons who live with relatives—that the need for community services exists.

An attempt has been made to describe in a very general way the programs available to serve older persons in Canada. But the gaps are many, and too often even existing services fall short of being able to meet the needs. It is generally agreed that older persons should remain in their own homes in the community for as long as possible. To achieve this goal, a range of community services designed to provide the necessary care of the appropriate type and of the quality and quantity required is essential. Moreover, these services have to be readily available to persons in both urban and rural settings.

In Canada the emphasis has been upon institutional care. This is due to many reasons, including distances to be travelled, difficulty of staffing programs in more isolated areas, limited professional resources and inappropriate living arrangements for aged persons. Thus, when communities have turned their attention to the needs of the aged they have tended to plan first and, all too often, for the construction of institutional care facilities only.

An added complication arises when an old person is in hospital and is ready for discharge to a lesser level of care. Frequently there is not a bed available to provide the care he needs in a home for the aged or a nursing home. Even if there is, he may resist transfer because payment is made on his behalf under the provincial hospital plan for as long as he is in a general, chronic or convalescent hospital, whereas for institutional care, or care in his own home, with few exceptions he must pay for services himself in so far as his financial resources permit. In order to encourage older persons to remain out of institutional care, it may be that we shall have to consider paying for community services so that institutional care offers no financial advantage. For any special services which may be needed by only a limited number of persons, payment may have to be based upon ability to pay.

It is roughly estimated that from 5 to 10 per cent of aged persons require some form of institutional care. Some 20 to 30 per cent are in need of intensive supportive services within the community at large. The remaining 60 per cent are well, ambulant individuals functioning independently in the community. We see them every day going about their affairs; we do not think of them as aged. Indeed, if we are suddenly asked to focus our attention upon the needs of the aged, those living in institutions first come to mind. We think of the bedridden, the frail and the sick.

More emphasis should be placed on keeping those aged persons who are well and actively carrying on their affairs in that happy state. Preventive health measures, such as disease detection screening programs and early treatment of conditions found through such programs, should be intensified. Since it has long been recognized that chronological age is a very unsatisfactory determinant in deciding the ability of a person to continue in employment, there should be greater flexibility in respect to the age of retirement. It is, however, a proven fact that fewer persons at age 65 wish to continue in employment than was the case 25 or 30 years ago. Technological advances are beginning about even lower ages for retirement in some industries. Further, by actual choice, increasing numbers of persons are voluntarily choosing to retire earlier than age 65.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Foster: As soon as I finish my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to give the hon. member an opportunity to pose a question. Without becoming involved in the pros and cons of arbitrary versus more flexible retirement arrangements, there is no doubt that society still equates productivity with monetary reward; that is, life earning a living. There is a consequent loss of status for the majority of persons at retirement. But some older persons have perceived "productivity" in terms of service to their community, in service to contemporaries and in creative achievements. The aged represent a vast resource of human abilities and skills which society has been overlooking.

Some older adults are asking: What can we do to help ourselves, each other and the community? Many are simply continuing to serve within the community as they have all their lives, but others are offering themselves for the first time, sometimes for service on a voluntary basis, sometimes for pay. Older adults are very strongly motivated to engage in various programs through a desire to help others. Even those who are not in the best of health report that having something to do for others keeps them active.

In summing up, may I say that aging, a lifelong process of growth, development and change, begins before birth and progresses at different rates and in different ways in every individual, depending upon genetics and environment. Just as each phase of a person's life cycle is determined by those which have gone before—adulthood, adolescence and childhood—so also is the preparation for a successful and satisfying life in later years a lifelong preparation. A first requirement is good health care, including the application of all known aspects of preventive and restorative health practices, so that we do in fact attain complete physical and social well-being to the greatest degree possible. Further, every individual needs to develop interests, retain and sharpen his curiosity about the world around him and participate in lifelong education whether formal or informal.

There is no single problem of the aged. Rather, there is a whole complex of problems—health, housing, jobs, family and community relationships, attitudes and so on. Planning in terms of older persons requires a realistic approach to the problems on a wide variety of fronts. We need to apply new knowledge, new concepts and new techniques as these emerge. We must learn to live with change and to direct it. We must continually remind ourselves that effective solutions are intimately related to the conditions under which we live, and when some of the conditions change we must adjust other aspects of our lives to these changes. We need to be experimental, creative and imaginative in developing programs to meet the challenge of the later years and in accord with the society in which we live.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member concludes his interesting dissertation, would he mind saying whether he is for or against the motion?

Mr. Foster: I have already said, Mr. Speaker, that being against the motion would be like being against motherhood.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The fifteenth hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury (for the Prime Minister) that Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing these past few days Bill C-207, entitled an Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

This bill provides for the reorganization of several departments and the establishment of the Department of the Environment. The minister in charge of this department will assume all the responsibilities of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry while receiving new powers in order to control the pollution of the environment.

As regards this scheme, I remain rather sceptical. It appears that this is an improvement over present efforts to solve the problem of water pollution and it is obvious that immediate steps must be taken in that respect. But I am wondering if those that are proposed in the bill will be adequate and effective. As a matter of fact it is not because there is a Department of Agriculture that all farm problems have been solved. Neither did the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce put an end to all bankruptcies across the country.

I hope the public will not be under the impression that the proposed department is the answer to all problems relating to pollution, because in any event it is a very serious one.

Let us refer to an article in La Presse of Wednesday, June 11, 1969, under the by-line of J.-Claude Paquet, entitled: Water pollution is beyond control, and I quote:

"Water pollution is overtaking us at a frightful speed. One may even affirm without a doubt that it is beyond control." This statement was made yesterday by Dr. Richard Nelson of Hull, a member of the water development committee of the Quebec Wildlife Federation.

Assembled at Manoir Richelieu for their annual convention, the engineers and technicians of the water development association expressed their concern—

Speaking in a somewhat reproachful tone, Dr. Nelson told members: "You fully realize that you have retreated too long behind the imperviousness of your discipline, only allowing scraps of information to leak through, uninclined to launch a sustained campaign against water pollution.

Deficiencies responsible for the present situation are to be found at all levels of our community.

A large measure of the blame should be placed on the silence of the experts on water in the face of what is happening.

According to the lecturer, organizations dealing with Quebec's water problems have given the impression, up to now, that all is for the best in the best of possible worlds and that the higher authorities have the situation well in hand.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, we can imagine to a certain point all the publicity which will accompany the setting up of a department of the environment. We know that new regulations will be issued if they are required. Actually, some very logical ones have already been in existence but they were practically never implemented. I would like to quote a report which was published in the newspaper Action on September 22, 1969:

Our natural environment has a tendency to depreciate slowly! "The fast depreciating and often non-reversing condition of the natural environments needed for recreation is a by-product of our industrial society". This serious accusation against our modern way of living was brought by Professor Robert Lagueux, during a lecture that he delivered at the conference on water problems during the weekend in Quebec.

According to him, this degradation has been taking place at such a pace, especially for the last ten years or so, that one can truly speak of a clogging of the natural cycles of recuperation and self-purification of the environment.

This problem is so serious that it endangers the survival of man, Mr. Lagueux told us. In his opinion these ever increasing dangers result from the arrival on the market of these multiple-use chemical products with unknown side effects.

According to the lecturer, we are embarked in a vicious circle.

We waited until the situation became urgent before taking steps and securing the services of television, newspapers and radio to do some advertising.

I remember quite vividly the recommendations made by the federal government a few years ago with regard to farmers. I recall among other things that they had been instructed never to dump insecticide containers into rivers or lakes.

During the same period, with the federal government's blessing, the Canadian Corporation for the World Exhibition dumped thousands of gallons of DDT around the Expo grounds. Since these were islands in the river, the St. Lawrence was completely polluted, so much so that today we wonder just how much longer the fish will survive.

Nowadays, publicity is made at the housewife's expense. She is told what detergents to choose while she only uses a few gallons of water a week to do her washing.

I would therefore appreciate it if the sponsor of this bill could tell us whether the government has asked the pulp and paper companies, which pour their residues 24 hours a day into the river, to change acids.
